The House met at Three o'clock.

RETURNS TABLED.

Number of persons employed in the Department of the Interior.—Hon. Mr. Sifton.

Number of dismissals from the Civil Service made in the cities of the Dominion since first January, 1915.—Hon. Mr. Sifton.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS—COST OF SCAFFOLDING.

*Mr. BROUILLARD:

1. Including the amount paid for the labour and the materials that entered into its construction, and the removal, what was the total cost of the scaffolding erected along the entire front of the old Parliament Building in April, May and June, 1916, prior to taking down the walls and tower?
2. Does the total cost of the said scaffolding form part of the cost of the new Parliament Building?
3. What became of the lumber of which the said scaffolding was built?

Hon. Mr. REID:

1. Lumber, $4,241.84; bolts and nails, $512.45; labour, $5,199.75; total, $9,954.04.
2. Yes.
3. Lumber to the value of $553.77 was sold to the Military Hospitals Commission for their building. The remainder has been put into use for general scaffolding, shoring, bracing, etc., during the erection of the new building. The smaller timbers and planks are used up but the larger timbers are still in use.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—COST OF ENGINE REPAIRS.

Mr. GAUVREAU:

Is the Government or the Minister of Railways aware that the amount for repairing an engine at the Canadian National Railways shops, St. Malo, Quebec, is five times higher than it was at the Riviere-du-Loup shops, before the machines of the latter were transferred to St. Malo?

Hon. Mr. REID: Neither the Government nor the Minister of Railways has any such information.

UNOPPOSED MOTION FOR PAPERS.

Mr. BOURASSA:

2. How many of these chief clerkships were held respectively by English-speaking and French-speaking officials in the same year, and what were the names and titles of each chief clerk?
3. How many chief clerkships are held today by English-speaking and French-speaking officials respectively, and what are the names and duties of such chief clerks on the said staff of the House of Commons?

SITTINGS OF THE HOUSE.

Rt. Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister) moved:

That on and after Friday the 4th instant and until the end of the present session the House shall meet at two o'clock in the afternoon of each day.

He said: I have conferred with my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) and with the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) in regard to the disposition of the notice which stands on the Order Paper. I have also endeavoured to ascertain the views of hon. members generally throughout the House and I understand that the motion in the form which I now propose will be acceptable.

Mr. BUREAU: Does that include Saturdays?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No, not Saturdays. As far as Saturdays are concerned, I propose to leave that question in abeyance at present until we have made progress with the Budget and until it is more apparent as to what programme it will be possible to deal with at the present session.

Mr. FIELDING: That will apply also to Monday?

Mr. BUREAU: It says "each day."

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT OVER KING'S BIRTHDAY.

Rt. Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister) moved:

That when this House adjourns on Wednesday the 2nd day of June, it do stand adjourned until Friday, the 4th day of June.

He said: My personal view, as I explained at the time, was that we might very well have sat on the 24th May and the 3rd June. However, in deference to what seemed to be the general view of hon. members, the House stood adjourned over the 24th of May. Under the circumstances it seemed to me that our action might be misunderstood if we did not adjourn over to-morrow. There is the fact also that hon. members had a somewhat protracted session yesterday and I dare say some will desire to make amends.

Mr. BUREAU: Oh no; we are young.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend is anxious to sit to-morrow, I see.

Mr. BUREAU: No, no; I do not wish to assume any blame for that.

Mr. BELAND: But he disclaims any fatigue.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am sorry that we are not all so young and energetic as he is. However, I present the motion in that form.

Motion agreed to.

CATASTROPHE AT THERIAULT AND ST. QUENTIN, N.B.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. PIUS MICHAUD (Restigouche and Madawaska): I wish to ask if the Government is aware of the great catastrophe that took place yesterday at Theriault Settlement and St. Quentin in my own constituency. There are sixty-five families homeless; there is a million dollar loss of property and I understand that under these circumstances the Government might come to the assistance of these poor, unfortunate people.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The unfortunate disaster to which my hon. friend has alluded has been made known to the Government through the press, not otherwise. There have been like disasters, I believe, in other parts of the country through forest fires. However, the subject has not been considered by the Government. We will take it into consideration, perhaps, within a day or two, but I would like to remind my hon. friend that assistance in the case of disasters of this kind might possibly come more particularly within the sphere of activity of the Provincial Governments.

CANADIAN MINISTER PLENIPOTENTIARY AT WASHINGTON.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve): I have not the despatch under my hand, but I read in this morning's Citizen that in the Imperial House yesterday the question of the appointment of a Canadian Ambassador at Washington was raised, and that one of the members of the Imperial Cabinet declined to give the information sought by two members of the House. The reason alleged in this despatch for the refusal of the Imperial Government to speak on this question is, that it has been understood that the correspondence between the Imperial and Dominion authorities should be kept confidential. I give at first hand the substance of the despatch in question, and I would ask the Prime Minister to inform the House if this correspondence is to remain permanently confidential or whether some day we might know why such correspondence has been exchanged and the reasons for the secrecy.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am not prepared to say that a time will not arrive at some date in the future when the correspondence can be brought down, but I repeat what I have already stated; that according to my judgment it is not desirable in the public interest to bring it down at present. As to the answer which was given in the British House of Commons my attention has not been directed to it. My understanding is that the Imperial Government takes precisely the same view, as to bringing down the correspondence, as was announced to this House by the Canadian Government.

Hon. Mr. FIELDING: The despatch in question rather intimated, without saying so specifically, that the correspondence has been withheld at the request of the Canadian Government. The inference drawn from reading the despatch is that the Imperial Government would be quite willing to bring down the correspondence, but in deference to the Canadian Government they do not feel free to do so.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Any impression of that kind is incorrect.

OPIUM AND NARCOTIC DRUG ACT AMENDMENTS.

Hon. NEWTON W. ROWELL (President of the Privy Council) moved the second reading of amendments made by the Senate to Bill 20 to amend the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Explain.

Mr. ROWELL: The amendments are purely formal. I do not think they alter the meaning of the Act as it now stands in any respect, but it may be that they make the meaning a little clearer. There is no objection to them.

Motion agreed to.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT ACT (FRENCH VERSION).

Rt. Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 131, (from the Senate) to amend the Criminal Code (French version).

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will the minister explain the nature of the amendments which have been suggested. They are to correct clerical errors, are they not?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes, purely and simply to correct errors of translation. There are quite a number of them but I understand they have been carefully gone over by the officers of the House.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee on the Bill.—Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section two—French version amended.

Mr. FIELDING: The serious feature about these amendments is the reflection that is cast upon the translation in so important a matter as a statute of Canada. I should think that is the gravest aspect of the matter. Without knowing very much about it, I should think it a subject that calls for the very serious consideration of the Government and of Parliament.

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not think the gravity of the matter can be exaggerated, but these errors go back to the time of the printing of the Revised Statutes in 1906. Attention was recently called to a few errors with the result that it was thought desirable to have a careful examination made to see if we could not, once for all, get this translation correct. There is no question at all of the gravity of the matter, but the responsibility rests upon whoever was responsible for the translation, in 1906 I think it was, at the time the Revised Statutes were translated. I made some inquiry on the subject and the explanation given to me was that at that time the work was practically entirely in the hands of one man. That work is not of a simple character. Anybody who has ever attempted translation of this character, I think I may safely say, no matter how familiar he is with the two languages, will realize there is nothing more difficult than getting an exact translation; and sometimes when the translation of laws is made by men who have not the requisite professional knowledge they have greater difficulty I think, in apprehending and rendering the exact meaning. I quite agree that this is a serious matter. I have called attention to the gravity of the question, and I believe that at the present time a committee composed of members of both Houses is considering the whole subject of the translating staff, and of any improvements that may be made in the system.

Mr. BUREAU: I notice on looking over the Bill that some of these corrections are not errors of translation; for instance, the first clause of section 3, in which we are asked to insert the word "et" before the word "d'une"; that must be an error by the proof-reader. Then section 10 is to be repealed by substituting another section. I have not read the French version of the section, but by repealing the old section and substituting a new section I cannot see that we are correcting any errors of translation.

Mr. DOHERTY: We are repealing the existing French translation and substituting a correct translation. Perhaps it sounds peculiar to state it in that way, but we are letting the English version stand. The English and French versions are both equally the law, but here we find one version is perfectly correct, while the other is not. The only method, it seems to me, by which we can make it clear is to strike out the incorrect and substitute the correct, and in that sense it is a matter of translation, as is also the first amendment the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bureau) mentions, in that the English version contains the word "and," while the "et" is missing in the French version. I understand that in validating the Revised Statutes the usual practice was departed from, and they were passed in English, then translated and a statute enacted making the translation law. It was certainly an extraordinary way to deal with laws that ought to be passed concurrently in both languages. But, as I have said, those who were in control at the time—I do not know whether my hon. friend had any share in that control—must be responsible for that departure from the established practice.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I was a member of the Government at the time the statutes were revised, and I remember that the French translation did not come in force at exactly the same time as the English version. Probably my right hon. friend will remember that Sir Alan Aylesworth,—who was then Minister of Justice,—had to introduce special legislation in order to meet the general law which makes it obligatory that both versions should come into force concurrently. The translation of the Revised Statutes was entrusted to a well-known lawyer, the late Mr. Horace St. Louis, of whose ability there can be no question. He was absolutely proficient in both languages, and at the time no better man could have been selected for that work. It is quite possible, however, that as there are certain differences between the British Criminal Code and the French. Mr. St. Louis may have used expressions taken from the French Code Criminel which have no place in our Criminal Code. In glancing at the Bill I notice that there are many omissions which are rather in the nature of printers' or proof-readers' errors, and I see very few words or expressions which would indicate that the translation was poorly made. On the contrary, I think the translation appears to have been made as perfectly as possible, and I would like at once to remove the doubt cast by my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) on the ability of the translator. On the whole I think the sooner we correct these errors the better for our practitioners.

Mr. BELAND: I do not wish to contradict anything that my hon. friend from Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) has said. There may have been a number of omissions and errors in the printing, but we find from the Bill before us that about 300 corrections have to be made. I do not for one moment question the competence in French of my hon. friend the Minister of Justice, but I want to ask him if his translation is found to-day to be wanting to the extent this Bill would indicate, how is he satisfied that the translation of the clauses referred to is now perfect when it was previously imperfect? In other words, what is the composition of the Board of Translators that has passed judgment upon these amendments? The moment the minister declares that he is satisfied and gives the House satisfactory assurance as to the competence of the Board of Translators, I do not think we should go over every item.

Mr. FIELDING: If my hon. friend from Maisonneuve gathered from what I said that I had any desire to reflect on any individual translator, I can assure him that that was not my intention. I do not know who the translators were, and from my limited knowledge of French I should hesitate to speak on the subject, but I know enough of the difficulties of translation to appreciate them, and my only thought was to convey to the minister and the Government the importance of a correct translation, especially in regard to our statutes. A correct translation is important in relation to all our documents, but when we come to the law of the country and find after a lapse of years that there have been "printers' errors"—and it is very easy to blame the printer or the proof-reader—it seems to me that we ought to realize the importance of having skilled and capable men as translators, and if we have been lax in that respect in the past, by all means let us elevate the standard of the men we engage for this work, which is one of the highest classes of work in our public service.

Mr. DOHERTY: As I said, I fully agree with everything that can be urged in regard to the importance of having correct translations. It was a matter of alarm to me when my attention was first called to this large number of errors, and I have done my best to impress upon the law officer looking after this work the importance of getting these amendments correct now. As I said, I understand there is at present a joint committee of both Houses considering the question of the organization of the translation staff. I do not know how far they have proceeded, but I do hope that they will give the most serious consideration to the importance of having this translation work properly done. I am not in a position to give to the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Béland) the name of the translator or translators who made this revision. But I did impress upon the Parliamentary Counsel, from whom I can obtain the name without difficulty, the importance of getting the best talent available. and above all—because I think it is more a question of care than a question of ability —that he should impress upon those doing the work the importance of doing it carefully.

Mr. JACOBS: What assurance have we that the changes proposed by this new Act are going to be correct? The Bill comprises twenty pages and deals with changes affecting practically every section of the Criminal Code. The minister speaks about these errors as being merely errors of translation. On page 11 of the Bill the following changes are proposed in the French translation of section 129:

By substituting the words "Si deux ou plus de deux prisonniers sont" for all the words in the first line to the word "accusés;" and by inserting after the word "infraction," in the second line, the words "et si l'un d'eux;" and inserting after the word "procès," in the last line, the words "devant un jury."

That is not correcting an error in translation, it seems to me. It is making an entire change in the law.

Mr. DOHERTY: The English words corresponding to these words that are now sought to be inserted in the French version are in the English version; therefore all we are doing is making the French version correspond with the English. As to what guarantee we can have that these changes are correctly made, there are two ways by which we may be assured: either by relying upon those officers who have done the work, or by taking up the English version and comparing these enactments with it. Tnat of course, would be a somewhat tedious work for the committee to undertake

Mr. BUREAU: The change in section 829 would seem to make the thing worse. The English version says: "If one of two or more." The present French translation says: "Si un prévenu, sur deux ou plus." You are going to strike that out and substitute the words: "Si deux ou plus de deux prisonniers."

Mr. BELAND: Has it occurred to the minister that this Bill should be submitted to a small Committee of the House over which the minister might preside? We have on this side a number of eminent lawyers who are fully conversant with both languages. It would not take them more than two hours to go over these different items or clauses and see if the translation is proper, whereas if we take the Bill up clause by clause in the Committee of the Whole, it may take us two or three days to deal with it.

Mr. DOHERTY: I am prepared to welcome the co-operation of such hon. members as my hon. friend has referred to, who may be willing to undertake this work. In view of the suggestion that has been made, and in order that we may be in a position to carry it out, I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. DENIS: Before the committee rises I have an observation to make. I do not want to cast blame on anybody, but it seems extraordinary that all these mistakes should have been made, either in the translation or in the correction of proof. For instance, if we look at the changes proposed in section 129, we find that it is proposed to substitute the word "quatorze" for the word "sept." Well, how in God's world could a translator make the mistake of using the word "quatorze" instead of the word "sept?" It is no easy task to translate laws. Those who have some knowledge of two or more languages know of the enormous difficulties that are met with in the translation of laws or speeches or anything else. We have had what I might call a world example in the translation of the Peace Treaty. Complaints were made at the Peace Conference that the Treaty was not properly translated, although the services of the best experts in the world had been obtained to translate that Treaty. Of course, we may easily come to the conclusion that a translation is very far from perfect without casting blame on anybody, but this particular case brings us to the consideration of a much wider question, and it is this: If so many mistakes have been made in the translation of the Criminal Code, a statute that is referred to every day—and probably it was because of that that the mistakes were discovered—what other mistakes must there be in the translation of other laws? If we come to the conclusion that there must be many other mistakes in the translation of other statutes, then the French versions of our laws are very undependable and very uncertain. This is certainly a very serious state of affairs. In my practice I have seen lawyers use either the French or the English version, according to which best suited their purpose; the Minister of Justice, having been a judge, probably knows something about that. That there was a difference between the two versions was apparent. Of course, there is always the guiding principle —if it is a guiding principle—that when a law is originally written in only one language we should refer to the original in order to find out what its intent was. But it is a serious state of affairs when in the translation of a single law there are over three hundred mistakes, the correction of which now has to be made. I am simply suggesting that the Government should adopt some method of ensuring that all our laws are correct, or should appoint some one to supervise the laws as they go through, so that something may be done in order to remedy this inconvenience, because I am quite sure that if we set translators to work on some other law, next session a new Bill will have to be introduced in order to correct discrepancies.

Mr. DOHERTY: I am very much afraid the hon. member is correct in his contention. Might I suggest to him a very simple way by which the recurrence of this might be avoided? This was an exceptional case in which the law was passed in one language and subsequently translated; but with that exception all laws that come before Parliament do so in both languages. If hon. gentlemen who are perfectly familiar with the French language would have before them, as the Bills are being passed, the French version as well as the English, and would keep an eye on the French version, it would be a very simple matter to see that they both correspond. In that way we would have the matter controlled by this House and we would not be dependent on the greater or less degree of carefulness on the part of translators. Strictly speaking, that would be the proper way of passing the laws, although I do not want to suggest that every hon. member should be reading the two versions. I make that suggestion as a remedy which I think would be an effective one. In the meantime, perhaps the committee which we are going to form to go over this Bill might profit by that occasion to talk over what means might be found to guard in the future against the recurrence of this serious defect.

Mr. FIELDING: Might I ask, just as a matter of curiosity, not by way of criticism, by what process the conclusion is reached that the English version is right and the French version is wrong? Are we not bound to assume that both languages are equal before the Parliament of Canada? Somebody might say: You are all wrong; the French version is right; what you want to do is to correct the English version.

Mr. DOHERTY: It is quite possible that there might be an error in the English rather than in the French version; but as regards this particular law, we are in a position to know that the English version was the only version scrutinized by Parliament and that in this instance the French version is a translation. I am not at all prepared to say that a court would exercise a preference as between one language and the other; the court would have no proof by which it could assume that one language was the original language. If you take this instance to which attention was called, the difference between the two versions is this, that the English version says that a man shall be liable to a sentence of fourteen years, while the French version says that he shall be liable to a sentence of seven years. Speaking offhand, I would think that it would be the duty of any judge to apply that version which makes the penalty the least, because he ought to have no doubt in his mind that the man is liable to the penalty which he imposes.

Mr. BUREAU: Would the court not take the language in which the Bill was drafted and introduced in preference to the other?

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not think it is usual for courts to hear testimony as to proceedings that took place when a law was going through Parliament. The law arrives at the court as the law, and I do not think the court would be justified in hearing such testimony. Hon. gentlemen will remember that in Quebec we have rules laid down for the guidance of the court in the event of there being found differences between the two versions. I think if my memory serves me right, the over-riding rule is that the judge is to adopt that version which is most in accordance with the general principles that govern the subject.

Motion agreed to.

Progress reported.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS.

Hon. J. D. REID (Minister of Railways) moved the second reading of Bill No. 141, respecting the Canadian National railways.

Mr. FIELDING: Was that on the list of Bills which my right hon. friend gave to the House last night? My recollection is that it was not.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No. I will not take it up if there is any objection—

Mr. FIELDING: I am not objecting.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The Minister of Railways informed me that he proposed having the Bill read a second time and then having it referred to the Railway Committee.

Mr. J. D. REID: My intention is simply to have the Bill referred to the Railway Committee.

Mr. FIELDING: I understand the purpose of this Bill is to provide for the extension of several branches of the Government railways in the West?

Mr. J. D. REID: Three short extensions of lines now owned by the Canadian National railways. When we require a new charter or an extension, we must come to Parliament and go through the usual process just as if this were the Canadian Pacific or any other private railway. We are asking for three extensions, and I wish to refer the matter to the Railway Committee in the ordinary way.

Mr. FIELDING: My hon. friend knows that these days we are constantly talking of economy. If it was the declared policy of the Government not to make any such extensions, I should hesitate before asking for any extension in the East. But if we are to provide for some extensions of the National system in the West— and I assume these are justifiable extensions—it is not unreasonable that we should consider claims that may arise in the East. I have had brought to my notice and wish to bring before Parliament the claim of the town of Lockeport, in the county of Shelburne, a very important fishing district in Nova Scotia, about three miles from the railway. That is to say, what is known as the Halifax and South Western railway, part of the Government system touches the water of Lockeport harbour, but is three miles away from the town. Communication is by a ferry boat, and that is very unsatisfactory but, of course, better than nothing. There is a growing feeling there that this large town, which is incorporated, ought to have more immediate connection with the railway, and it is not surprising that the people of that district desire that facility. Every day we are realizing that more attention should be given to the fisheries of the Dominion as a source of food supply. This is one of the districts in which the fishing business is pre-eminent. It is growing in importance all the time, and the desire of the people that they should have direct communication with the railways, instead of having to take their freight three miles away either by road or ferry boat, is a very reasonable one. I think representations have been made to President Hanna at Toronto, and I would ask my hon. friend to communicate with the department with reference to this matter. I desire to urge on the minister that if our financial condition was such that we could not provide for railway extensions in any part of the country, I would hesitate to bring this matter to the attention of the Government, but if we are to provide some extensions in the West it is only rational and reasonable that a moderate expenditure of an urgent character in the East should also be considered. It is a new question to my hon. friend, I have no doubt, but I should be glad if he would investigate and see if something cannot be done to give these people the small advantage of what is no more than a siding of about three miles.

Mr. J. D. REID: This is the first time I have heard of the matter. I agree that if any great number of extensions are to be made in the West, the East should also be considered equally. I will take this matter up with the management of the Canadian National railways and see if the wishes of the people in that locality can be met.

Mr. BELAND: May I ask a question of the Minister of Railways?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: It would only be by unanimous consent that the Minister of Railways could answer, as he has already exhausted his right to speak.

Mr. LAPOINTE: We all consent.

Mr. BUREAU: Hear, hear.

Mr. BELAND: I understood a few days ago that the House was to be supplied with a report of the operation of the Canadian National railways. I have received a copy of one report but it deals only with the operations of the Canadian Northern railway. Under what head can we find information respecting the operation of the Intercolonial, for instance? The Intercolonial is a part of the Canadian National Railway system, but I can find no reference to its operations in the report that has been laid on the Table.

Mr. J. D. REID: The report on the operations of the Intercolonial is generally given by the minister when his Estimates are before the House. Then there are the usual statements in the report of the Minister of Railways. If any information is desired beyond what is contained in those statements, I shall be glad to give it when my Estimates are before the committee.

Mr. BUREAU: That applies also to the Transcontinental and the Grand Trunk Pacific?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and referred to the Select Standing Committee on Railways, Canals, and Telegraph Lines.

RAILWAY ACT, 1919, AMENDMENT.

SECOND READING.

On the motion of Hon. J. D. Reid (Minister of Railways and Canals), Bill No. 135, to amend The Railway Act, 1919, was read the second time and referred to the Select Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines.

ADMIRALTY ACT AMENDMENT.

On the motion of Hon. C. J. Doherty (Minister of Justice) Bill No. 139, to amend the Admiralty Act, was read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair:

On section 1—appointment of deputy judges:

Mr. BUREAU: Does this mean that the Governor in Council or local judge in Admiralty may appoint a deputy judge even if the judge is still in office?

Mr. DOHERTY: No. Regularly speaking, unless you have an officer you cannot have a deputy of that officer. The deputy judge is the deputy of an existing judge. This amendment is to prevent it happening that the deputy, because the judge dies or his office otherwise becomes vacant, shall cease to have power to act.

Mr. FIELDING: How would that apply to a deputy minister?

Mr. BUREAU: "Le roi est mort, vive le roi!" The king never dies, nor do ministers. They may walk out of office, but few die.

Mr. McKENZIE: There is nothing in the Bill as to the class of persons from whom the deputy would be selected, although, of course, it is well understood what the qualifications of the deputy judge should be.

Mr. DOHERTY: I have not in my hand at the moment the provisions which determine what shall be the qualifications, but there is nothing new in this except the empowering of the Governor in Council or local judge in Admiralty to appoint a deputy judge when the judge's office for one reason or another becomes vacant. The qualifications are not altered in any way by this.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

EMPLOYMENT OFFICES CO-ORDINATION ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Minister of the Interior) moved the second reading of Bill No. 124 (from the Senate), to amend The Employment Offices Co-Ordination Act.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING: Explain.

Mr MEIGHEN: I explained this Bill on its introduction. It is to enable the minister to make the grant provided for by the former Act, in the case of institutions carried on by municipalities, where the provinces decline to avail themselves of the Act.

Mr. BUREAU: This applies to Nova Scotia and New Brunswick alone?

Mr. MEIGHEN: And Prince Edward Island.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This Act was assented to on May 24, 1918. The Act required that any assistance that was given to carry out its purposes and to encourage the co-ordination of employment offices, should be given to the provinces in accordance with its provisions. The Act made no mention of any assistance being given in any other way. I was very much surprised to find that, notwithstanding the legislation which has been enacted in that form, the Government, by Order in Council, have undertaken to give a much wider construction to it than that which Parliament placed upon it. I have in my hand a copy of Order in Council No. 3171, assented to on the 24th day of December, 1918, in which I find the following paragraph:

Therefore His Excellency the Governor General in Council, under and in virtue of the provisions of the Employment Offices Co-ordination Act, is pleased to order and it is hereby ordered as follows:

(a) The Minister of Labour may establish and maintain for a period of eighteen months from January 1, 1919, such employment bureaus as may be necessary, and not established under the provisions of the Employment Offices Co-ordination Act.

(b) The Minister of Labour may establish and maintain offices at such points as he may deem necessary, provided the municipality supply office space and equipment required.

There is an Order in Council that distinctly gives power to the Government in regard to a matter on which this Parliament has legislated and these powers are completely beyond those that are granted by statute. I hope, when the minister refers to this matter in committee, he will have some satisfactory explanation to give to Parliament on the subject. It is perfectly plain how the money to be appropriated for the purpose of carrying out this Act was to be expended. Section 5 reads:

The moneys appropriated for each year shall be allotted and paid to the governments of the respective provinces in the proportion which their expenditure for the maintenance of employment offices bears to the total of the expenditures of all the provinces for such purposes, but in no case shall the allotment to any province exceed one half the amount expended for the maintenance of employment offices by such province.

The moneys were to be appropriated and paid to the governments of the respective provinces. That is what Parliament said. Parliament said nothing about authorizing payments to or for municipalities. Parliament said nothing about giving the minister power to establish offices under Order in Council as might suit himself. This is a very serious departure from what can be considered at all right and proper in view of the statute as it has been enacted by Parliament. Further, section 6 of the Act says:

The payments hereinbefore authorized shall as to each province, be conditional upon agreement between the minister and the government of the province.

This Order in Council says:

The Minister of Labour may establish and maintain offices at such points as he may deem necessary, provided the municipality supply office space and equipment required.

There is no reference to the Government of the province at all, the clause simply empowers the minister to make any arrangement he pleases with individual municipalities. But that is not all. There is, it seems to me, another flagrant violation of the practice and rights of Parliament, in another Order in Council which was passed on the 12th of March, 1919, in relation to the very same matter. I have a copy of the Order in Council in my hand. It is No. 537 and it was assented to on the 12th March, 1919. I find that the last part of the Order in Council is as follows:

The minister therefore, recommends that an amount estimated at $30,000 be placed to the credit of the Department of Labour from the War Appropriation for the purposes of making subventions to various provinces on the basis stated, the said sum of $30,000 being over and above the appropriation of $50,000 named in the statute for the fiscal year 1918-19.

Here is another most important departure. The statute itself fixed the amount which Parliament authorized the Department of Labour to pay. Clearly, in fixing that amount, Parliament intended to place a limit upon the extravagance of the Government in the matter of the establishment of these employment offices and assisting other employment offices which were established. Notwithstanding that legislation is before the ministry they pay no heed whatever to the law but take public moneys that have been appropriated for one purpose and use them for an entirely different purpose. We have had so many instances of this kind of indifference to Parliament and the legislation of Parliament that the time has come when a halt should be called to further proceedings of this kind by the Government. I repeat that I hope the minister will have some explanation to give to the House when the Bill gets into committee. I would just draw the attention of the House and the country to the fact that here is one more of the many instances that have been quoted this session, first, where legislation passed by Parliament has been absolutely ignored and the Government has taken action entirely beyond the scope of that legislation and, second, where moneys appropriated for a particular purpose have been used by the Governor in Council for an entirely different purpose notwithstanding that Parliament has placed a restriction upon the amount of public money which should be spent in a particular direction.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time and the House went into committee on the Bill, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 1—definition:

Mr. MEIGHEN: I was not able, having moved the second reading, to reply to the leader of the Opposition. I should not let the occasion pass without saying something about his solicitude for the Government. His great care is that we do not exceed the legal bounds of our authority. I did not have my attention drawn to the Orders in Council he read to the House, or the portions which he read, but just sitting and listening to them and looking at the Act itself, I was not struct by any conflict between the terms of the Order in Council and the wording of the Act. Nor do I see any reason at all to believe that the terms of the order in the least degree exceed the powers given to the Governor in Council by the Act. Referring to the first one, if I got it rightly—I would be glad indeed to have the copy sent across—it provided that, by means of regulation, the Minister of Labour might grant assistance to the support of an employment office in cases where the office and, I think, the help were provided by the municipality. The Order in Council says:

> The Minister of Labour may establish and maintain offices at such points as he may deem necessary, provided the municipality supply office space and equipment required.

Now section three of the Act reads as follows:

> The minister is authorized and empowered,—
> (a) to aid and encourage the organization and co-ordination of employment offices and to promote uniformity of methods among them;
> (b) to establish one or more clearing houses for the interchange of information between employment offices concerning the transfer of labour and other matters;
> (c) to compile and distribute information received from employment offices and from other sources, regarding prevailing conditions of employment.

Now by section 10 the minister may make any regulations, not inconsistent with the Act, which he may deem necessary to carry this Act into effect, subject to the approval of the Governor in Council. That is to say the Governor in Council may make regulations. Consequently the Governor in Council may make regulations to aid in the organization and co-ordination of employment offices. Now the Governor in Council in pursuance of that does what? It passes a regulation that the minister may establish and maintain offices at such points as he may deem necessary—really the same meaning as the first clause—provided the municipality grants the office space and equipment required. Where does that exceed the bounds of clause (a) defining what the minister is empowered to do? The following clauses provide that the minister may as well, from a special appropriation provided by the Act, pay certain moneys to the provinces according to a certain rule and proportion. That is one power. Clause three contains another power that the minister evidently acted upon. There appears to be another Order in Council of the 18th December, 1918. The second Order in Council to which the leader of the Opposition refers contains a provision appropriating:

> $30,000 from the War Appropriation for the purpose of making subventions to various provinces on the basis stated, the said sum of $30,000 being over and above the appropriation of $50,000 named in the statute.

The statute was one providing an appropriation for certain well-defined purposes. It has no special relation to soldiers' demobilization or to the war at all—it is permanent in its character. This appropriation, which evidently came in March, 1919, the very time when most of the men were returning, was an appropriation designed to take care especially of returned men and to make special efforts under the provision of the Act, and also under the powers given the Governor in Council under the terms of the War Appropriation Act itself, to place returned men in suitable employment as soon as possible. I have not under my hand the terms of the War Appropriation Act, but I have not the faintest doubt that the Governor in Council was clearly authorized by Parliament to make an appropriation just for that purpose because the wording of the Act was very wide, and necessarily very wide, and I do not know what better use could be made of the war appropriation moneys than to facilitate the early absorption into useful employment of the returned men. But it is not under the authority of this Act, it is under the authority of the War Appropriation Act as I would understand from a hurried reading, that the second Order in Council was passed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister says he sees nothing inconsistent with the terms of the Act in the course which the Government has taken in passing an Order in Council which allows the payment of moneys under this Act to municipalities when the whole purpose of the Act is to restrict payments to the Governments of the different provinces.

Mr. MEIGHEN: To restrict?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, to restrict payments to the governments of the different provinces. Let me direct the attention of the minister to section five of the Act, "An Act to aid and encourage the Organization and Co-ordination of Employment Offices," chap. 21, 8-9, George V., which reads as follows:

> The moneys appropriated for each year shall be allotted and paid to the governments of the respective provinces——

Does the minister think that it is consistent, when the Act states that the money should be paid to the governments of the provinces, to pay that money to the municipalities when the provinces refuse to co-operate? As I understand, what happened was this: Several of the provinces undertook to co-operate with the Dominion Government in the matter of these employment offices and to meet half of the expense, but the Governments of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island decided that they would not open employment offices. On the other hand there were a few municipalities that had such offices, and the Government took authority on its own account by Order in Council to pay this money to the municipalities, not to pay it to the Provincial Governments. Now there may be reasons on the ground of meeting an emergency, or some sort of expediency, which would justify that, but when the minister says there is nothing inconsistent in using the moneys which had been voted by this Parliament to be paid only to governments, and paying them over to municipalities——

Mr. MEIGHEN: Where does it say that the money shall be paid to municipalities?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is exactly what was done with the money.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, why do you say that? Read it.

Mr. BUREAU: Isn't it the object to make an agreement with the municipalities?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The object of the amendment to this Bill is, but not the Order in Council.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Order in Council provides:

> The Minister of Labour may establish and maintain offices at such points as he may deem necessary——

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING (reading):

> —provided the municipality supply office space and equipment required.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is not supplying any money to the municipality.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But that is exactly what was done. The money was not paid to the provinces but to the municipalities.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How do you make that out.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Can the minister point to anything in the record which will show that the money has gone to the provinces?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It does not go to either. The minister maintains the office. No money goes to the provinces or to the municipality under that order. The minister maintains the office, but he is not allowed to maintain it unless the municipality provides the office. The municipality does that out of its own funds, and if it does, then the minister maintains the office under the powers given by section 3 that I have just read.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the minister, instead of trying to argue this matter on grounds that are indefensible, and trying to put things over the committee, would take the trouble to look at the Act he would not waste our time in the sort of casuistry he is resorting to. Section 2 of the Act provides as follows:

> In this Act and in any regulation made thereunder, unless the context otherwise requires— "employment office operated by any Provincial Government."

The whole Act relates to employment offices operated by Provincial Governments. The whole purpose of the Act, when it was passed, was to co-operate with Provincial Governments, and if the minister will take the trouble to read the debates that took place in Parliament at the time he will see that the ground on which the money was appropriated was that it was to be in co-operation with the provinces. Not one word was said as to assisting employment offices in different municipalities. If the minister's present interpretation is correct, why does he come to Parliament at the present time and ask for any amendment to the Act? What is the amendment for which he is asking? He is asking that we change the definition of "employment office" so that it shall mean, "employment office operated by any Provincial Government or any other employment office approved by the minister." What he is doing at the present time is asking Parliament to give power to do the thing that the Governor in Council has taken upon itself to do without the authority of Parliament. The only justification he has for the amendment is to be found in the circumstance that the law as originally drafted did not give the Governor in Council power to do what it has been doing with public funds.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am so accustomed to being scolded by the leader of the Opposition that it really has very little effect on me now. I will make one more effort to render this clear to him; if I fail it will be on account of my limited powers of expression.

The present Bill is to enable the Governor in Council to pay moneys to municipalities; he could not do so under the old Act. I hope that is clear. Unless this Bill passes, the Governor in Council cannot use a municipality as formerly under the old Act he could use a province. Under the sections commencing with section 4 the minister could pay to a province half the cost of maintenance of employment offices maintained in the province; he could not pay that half to a municipality. Now then, it is clear that to attain the end desired there must be an amendment. But the leader of the Opposition said: "You went in before this amendment was passed and you paid moneys to municipalities." That I contradicted; I said we paid no moneys to any municipalities. Why does he say we did? The Order in Council—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: You paid money for employment offices that were conducted by municipalities, not by the provincial authorities.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No. The Minister of Labour conducted them at the expense of the department. He was not allowed to do so unless the municipality supplied the office space and equipment. How would any money go to the municipality? Does the hon. member say that cheques were issued to the municipality? Employment offices were supported directly from the funds of the department. But I argue that it could be done under section 3, for the department there has power to aid and encourage organization. At all events whether that is so or not, the wording it seems to me is wide enough to cover it, and I apprehend that the minister, under the original Act constituting his department, has the power to establish employment offices and maintain them. I have not sent for the Act. But in any event he is acting here under Clause 3. The employment office that he maintains would necessarily from the context be his own employment office. In section 4 the wording is:

> Employment office maintained by the province to the support of which he contributes by issuing cheques to the province.

But he never issued cheques to the municipality; he maintained the office. He did not commence to maintain it unless the municipalities supplied the space and the equipment.

I have just had drawn to my attention the Appropriation Act of last year, and in the appropriation to the Department of Labour of $367,500 the following item, No. 243, appears:

> To supplement amount provided by statute 8 and 9, George V, Chapter 21, including $50,000 for the establishment and maintenance of employment offices in Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the said Act.

In addition to the powers under the War Measures Act and under the War Appropriation Act, here is definite authority.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What date is that?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Last year's Estimates.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Expiring on the 31st March, 1920?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am speaking about the Return laid on the table for the year ending March 31, 1919.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I presume the same clause would be found there.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No; that is just the whole point.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There was further power.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, there was not.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, the War Appropriation Act was in full force, as the hon. gentleman knows, and we also have the Estimates there. It certainly could be done under the authority of the War Appropriation Act, and I would be rather surprised if there was not a vote similar to the one I have quoted in the Estimates of the year before.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Was there any agreement between the provinces of Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick and the Dominion in regard to employment offices in those provinces?

Mr .MEIGHEN: As to their establishment?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not informed of any.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think my hon. friend will find there was none. But section 6 of the Act provides:

> The payments hereinbefore authorized shall as to each province be conditional upon an agreement between the minister and the government of the province as to the terms, conditions and purposes within the meaning of this Act upon and for which the payments are to be made and applied, and upon such agreement being approved by the Governor in Council.

The point I am making is—there was no agreement between those provinces and the Dominion. This money could only be paid conditional upon that agreement existing, and since there was no such agreement the Governor in Council have used the moneys in an unauthorized way.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member is leader of the Opposition. No money was paid to the provinces because no agreement was made.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is aside from the point altogether. Money was paid out, and it could only be paid out conditional on an agreement between the provinces and the Dominion.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The money could not be paid to the provinces except under this Act; but it could be paid for the establishment of offices directly under the minister, either under the War Appropriation Act in respect to the second clause, or under the Estimates, or under the powers establishing the Department of Labour. I have the Estimates here, but I have not yet got this matter traced for the year before. Certainly the Estimate for this year is very specific, and if the Estimate for the year before is the same, then there would be three authorities under which this could have been done. Whether the Estimate is specific or not, there are two authorities at least.

An hon. MEMBER: Carried.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No. I will not discuss that matter further. The clauses of the Act are plain, and any person who wishes to follow the matter up can do so and reach, I think, an accurate conclusion from what appears on Hansard.

In regard to the proposed amendment, it is suggested that the employment office, instead of being, as originally, an employment office operated by any Provincial Government, "shall be an employment office or any division of an employment office, operated by any Provincial Government, or any other employment office or division of an employment office approved by the minister." I think that is altogether too wide a power to give to the minister. There are all kinds of employment offices—offices connected with railway companies and steamship companies, and offices conducted by employment agencies for a thousand and one different purposes. The power which will be given to the minister under this clause would simply permit him to use public funds for a variety of purposes that possibly Parliament would not approve of. So long as the Act related to employment offices conducted by a province there would be some guarantee as to the standing of the office, but I certainly think this amendment goes too far. I hope the minister will agree with me that it would be a wise precaution—I do not want to deprive the minister of an opportunity of encouraging legitimate expansion—but it would be a wise precaution to make it subject to approval by the Governor in Council rather than leave the matter solely in the hands of the minister. Pressure may be brought to bear on the minister to assist various small offices here and there, and probably the minister himself would find it a wise precaution to have the section amended as I suggest.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I see the point of the leader of the Opposition. Although under clause 3 of the present Bill as I propose to move that it be amended, it is provided that before any employment office is assisted under the Act it must be apparent that the province has not established such an office and that it does not intend to do so, I have no doubt that the Minister of Labour will not object to the restriction that the leader of the Opposition suggests. If the committe is ready to accept it, I am willing that clause 1 be amended by substituting for the word "Minister" the words "Governor General in Council."

Amendment agreed to, and section as amended agreed to.

On section 2—powers of minister:

Mr. MEIGHEN: Just in this connection I think it worth while to observe that I really think Parliament goes too far in demanding the approval of the Governor in Council in details. It results in the clogging of the work of the Cabinet as a whole, and is, I think, in the detriment of the public interest. It is not that any minister has objection, but the inclination of Parliament is, I think, to go too far, not realizing the tremendous volume of matter that necessarily now comes before the Governor in Council for approval. However, I am not saying that with any desire to restrict the tendency in relation to this proposed Act.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No member of this House has a greater objection to Government by Order in Council than I have. I think that many matters should come before Parliament which are now dealt with by the Governor in Council. For the same reason I think that it is very wise to put some sort of check on or exercise some supervision over individual ministers by requiring the approval of the Governor in Council in regard to important matters. I agree that it should not be pushed too far, but when it comes to fixing penalities exceeding $100 and the like, it is very desirable that the Governor in Council should have a say as well as the minister.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—allotment of moneys appropriated:

Mr. MEIGHEN: When I read this section as it came from the Senate it seemed to me that it was not very well drafted; indeed, that it did not reach the end that was sought. I had it re-drafted as follows, and move that this be substituted for clause 3:

3. Section five of the said Act is amended by adding thereto the following subsection:

(2) Notwithstanding anything in subsection one of this section the minister may in any year set aside from the moneys allotted to a province such sum as may seem desirable for the maintenance of employment offices, where none are operated by the Provincial Government, provided that, before any such employment office is assisted under this Act the minister shall be satisfied that the Provincial Government concerned does not propose to establish employment offices in accordance with this Act within a reasonable time, and provided further that the sum so set aside shall be allotted to such employment offices, but in no case shall the allotment exceed one half of the amount expended for the maintenance of such offices.

Amendment agreed to, and section as amended agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

THE STAFF OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS—ORGANIZATION.

The House again in committee to consider the proposed organization of the staff of the House of Commons, as submitted to the House by His Honour the Speaker on the thirty-first day of March last, resumed from April 8, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Mr. SPEAKER: When the committee rose, the proposed organization as it affected the Journals branch of the House had not met with the approval of hon. members. Without wishing to withdraw the reasons which I gave at that time as being, in my judgment, sound reasons for the adoption of the organization as then proposed, I feel that in respect to a matter of this kind, which concerns the internal domestic arrangement and the proper working of the staff of the House of Commons, should be if not unanimous agreement more or less unanimity on the part of hon. members as to what the organization scheme ought to effect. For that reason I think, it might perhaps, be better to revert to the practice which obtained for some few years at least prior to the present year, and divide the Journals branch into two sections. I therefore, move:

That clause 'Journals Branch' be amended as follows: That the whole clause be stricken out and the following be substituted therefor:

Journals Branch.

(a) Chief of English Journals.
Assistant Chief of English Journals.
Four officials.
Sessional assistance as required.

(b) Chief of French Journals.
Assistant Chief of French Journals.
Sessional assistance as required.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

Hansard Branch—Editor of Debates and Chief of Reporting Branch, Associate Editor of Debates and Reporter, nine Parliamentary reporters, one assistant Parliamentary reporter and senior reporter of Committees, three assistant Parliamentary reporters, sessional assistance as required.

Mr. SPEAKER: In connection with this clause, without in any way altering the arrangement as proposed, but for the purpose of making this clearer, I move:

That the words "nine parliamentary reporters" be stricken out and the following be substituted therefor:
'Seven parliamentary reporters (English).
Two parliamentary reporters (French).'

Mr. PROULX: Has Mr. Desjardins, a former reporter, been superannuated? The other day I saw in the Gazette an advertisement for a French reporter to replace Mr. Desjardins. I thought he had been replaced two years ago.

Mr. SPEAKER: That refers to the retirement of Mr. Marceau, and not Mr. Desjardins.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

House Translation Branch—Chief of House Translation Branch:
(a) law and bluebooks; assistant chief translator,—law; assistant chief translator—bluebooks; 17 officials.
(b) Journals and Orders; assistant chief translator—journals and orders; one official, sessional assistance as required.

Mr. SPEAKER: In connection with this clause, I move:

That the letter "a" in brackets in front of the word "law" in the second line, the letter "b" in brackets, and the following words be stricken out:
Journals and Orders.
Assistant chief translator.
Journals and orders.
One official.
and that the word "sixteen" be substituted for the word "seventeen."

This amendment arises in consequence of a motion passed in respect to the division of the Journals Branch, because it will be borne in mind that it was the intention, under the organization as originally submitted, that the French Journals should come under the House Translation Branch. The reason for the reduction from seventeen to sixteen is that I will subsequently propose an amendment which will enable the transfer of one member of this staff to the Hansard Translation Staff.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

Hansard Translation Branch—chief of Hansard translation branch, twelve officials, sessional assistance as required.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is felt desirable on the part of hon. members representing a number of constituencies in Quebec that the words "Parliamentary Translators" should be used instead of the words "twelve officials." It is also felt that in order better to take care of the translation work of the Hansard branch, one more official should be available, not only to do the work from day to day, but to take the place of men who, from time to time may be ill during the stress of work of the session. I therefore move:

That the words "twelve officials" be stricken out and the following be substituted therefor: "thirteen parliamentary translators."

I might point out to the committee that this will not involve any additional expense to the public treasury inasmuch as it is proposed to transfer one man from the House translation branch to the Hansard translation branch. It will be borne in mind in that connection that the work of the House translation branch has been very much reduced in recent years owing to the great reduction in the size of the blue-books and other Parliamentary documents which are translated.

Mr. BUREAU: Do I understand that this man who is now translating various documents of the House during the session will be employed by Hansard?

Mr. SPEAKER: He will be transferred and become a member of the Hansard translation branch.

Mr. BUREAU: And receive the same privileges and salary as the other House translators do?

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

Miscellaneous Branch—(a) accountant's division: accountant and chief of branch, assistant accountant; (b) postal division, postmaster, assistant postmaster, one official. (c) stationery division: chief of stationery division, one official. (d) stenographic service division: chief of stenographic service division, such stenographic and clerical staff as required each session. (e) reading room division; curator of reading room, asistant curator of reading room, sessional assistance as required.

Mr. SPEAKER: There is one amendment that I desire to move here, and that is that at the bottom of page 109 I should like the words "one official" to be altered to "two officials." The reason for that is this, that there was attached to the staff of the post office, under an Act passed some two years ago, an old official of the House who for many years faithfully served the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier. He was transferred to that branch of the House, but in the list of officials in the proposed scheme of reclassification, provision was not made for his being allocated to that branch of the service. I, therefore, move:

That the words "one official" be stricken out and the words "two officials" be substituted therefor.

This involves no increased expense and no new appointment; it makes regular an appointment which already existed.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

Organization of the Department of the Serjeant-at-Arms, House of Commons—the Serjeant-at-Arms, Deupty Serjeant-at-Arms—filled by an official of the House during session in addition to his other duties; secretary to the Serjeant-at-Arms, chief messenger and housekeeper, assistant to chief messenger and housekeeper, steward joint restaurant, joint restaurant staff as required, two Parliamentary doorkeepers, sessional doorkeepers as required, chief page, seven confidential messengers, two Parliamentary messengers, two sesional bookkeepers, 38 sessional messengers, temporary sessional messengers as required, two foremen carpenters, three night watchmen, electrician (vacancy), supervisor of char service, Parliament Building; assistant supervision of char service: 15 permanent char women, or as required; temporary sessional char women as required, 20 sessional pages, or as required; temporary sessional servants as required.

Mr. BUREAU: I see that it states that the office of Deputy Sergeant-at-Arms is to be filled by an official of the House during sessions in addition to his other duties. Is he not a permanent official of the House, or do you take a man from amongst the officers of the House to fill this position?

Mr. SPEAKER: A few years ago there was a permanent official whose sole duties were to act as Deputy Sergeant-at-Arms; but the position has been filled, I think, to the satisfaction of the House, by the gentleman who has been the incumbent of the office for some time,—

Mr. BUREAU: I am not criticising; I am simply asking if this is the same man.

Mr. SPEAKER: There is no change at all, but I may point out to the committee that the fact that this position is not made permanent means a very considerable saving to the public treasury with no loss to the efficiency of the service.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. BUREAU: With reference to the nomenclature of the organization, I find at the top of page 109 under the heading "Officers of the House"; Clerk of the House, Serjeant-at-Arms, Assistant Clerk, Deputy Serjeant-at-Arms. Then on the next page there is the "Organization of the Department of the Serjeant-at-Arms, House of Commons," giving the whole list of officials. Has not the Clerk of the House also got a staff, Assistant Clerk, and so on? Are there not other departments besides the Department of the Sergeant-at-Arms?

Mr. SPEAKER: There is absolutely no change here from the arrangement heretofore existing. The first group on the top of page 109 are the chief officers of the House. There has always been a Department of the Serjeant-at-Arms, under whom are the Deputy Serjeant-at-Arms and the other officials mentioned on page 110.

Chief Messenger and Housekeeper:

Mr. SPEAKER: I beg to move to insert the word "Parliamentary" after the word "Chief." The Serjeant-at-Arms has pointed out to me that the idea underlying this proposed amendment is to make our wording conform with that of the Senate's organization, which has already been approved by the Senate.

Mr. PROULX: I thought titles were abolished last year.

Amendment agreed to.

Assistant to Chief Messenger and Housekeeper.

Mr. SPEAKER: I beg to move to amend this line to read "Assistant Chief Parliamentary Messenger."

Amendment agreed to.

Steward Joint Restaurant.

Mr. BELAND: I understand that the restaurant is under the supervision and direction of a Joint Committee of the House and Senate. Are the conclusions arrived at by that committee subject to revision, modification and approval by the House, or is the committee independent of control?

Mr. SPEAKER: Without having gone into the matter, and without wishing to give a final opinion, it seems to me beyond question that the work of any committee of the House is subject to the approval of the House.

Mr. BELAND: I do not remember that any report from this committee has been submitted to the House for approval or rejection or modification. Has such a report been made?

Mr. SPEAKER: I have to resort to my memory. So far as I can recall, I do not think a report of the Parliamentary Restaurant Committee has at any time been submitted to the House.

Mr. BELAND: I asked the question because some very important decisions have been reached by this committee, some of which, at all events, are not entirely satisfactory to some of the members of this House. I have often wondered what opportunity we might have for offering criticism and submitting proposed modifications of the conclusions reached by that committee.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the opportunity could be very easily afforded by having a report of the committee submitted to the House, and then there could be a discussion on a motion for concurrence in the report. I do not think there would be any difficulty in having that done. I should point out that while nominally the Restaurant Committee ought to be presided over by the Speaker, I found that in practice it did not work out very well. It might not be amiss for me to say that while some two years ago I did endeavour to act as chairman of the committee, sometimes when I was perhaps worried over some constitutional question or some matter of emergency in the House, I would be approached by a member complaining of the quality of the butter or the age of the meat being served. I found it impossible for me to give proper attention to the work of that committee, and I therefore asked that another member be appointed chairman, and for the last year and a half I have not been present at any of the meetings of the committee, and I have not been cognizant of or had anything to do with its workings. It is a matter which should be peculiarly in the hands of the members of the House itself. I mention this merely by way of explanation, so that hon. members will realize that I have no accurate or intimate knowledge of the detailed workings of the committee.

Mr. BUREAU: Do I understand from the statement made by Mr. Speaker that an opportunity will be given to discuss the conclusions arrived at by the Restaurant Committee? As my hon. friend (Mr. Beland) has said, there is a lot of dissatisfaction, not so much as to the food, but as to the rulings of the committee and the exclusiveness which is being attached to the restaurant. I should like to have an opportunity of voicing my views on this subject in the House. If a report from the committee is not submitted, I intend to bring the matter up on a motion for Supply.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think hon. members will have ample opportunity to discuss the matter fully, because not only is there an item in the Supplementary Estimates for the Parliamentary restaurant, but if it is thought advisable, a report could be submitted by the committee, and a motion made for its adoption would afford a like opportunity.

Mr. BELAND: I think it would be preferable that we should have the report as soon as possible because the Supplementary Estimates may be submitted for consideration during the very last hours of the session.

Mr. SPEAKER: I shall direct the attention of the chairman of the committee to the discussion here to-day and to the desirability of having a report ready to be submitted to the House.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Who is the chairman?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Steele).

Mr. McKENZIE: Money has to be voted for the Parliamentary restaurant at some stage or another. Which minister has charge of that vote?

Mr. SPEAKER: It has been the practice for the leader of the House to take charge of the Estimates for the restaurant.

Mr. BUREAU: Then we must hold him responsible for the conduct of this committee.

Mr. SPEAKER: It does seem to me highly desirable that the members of the committee ought to be responsible for the administration of the affairs of the restaurant, subject, of course, to the approval of the House. It is a matter peculiarly concerning the domestic housekeeping of the House of Commons itself and it is one which ought to remain within the hands of the House and of hon. members. It does not properly belong to any department of the Government.

Mr. McKENZIE: I quite agree with what the Speaker says but so far we have had no procedure of this House by which we have recognized the chairman of any committee. The committee reports to somebody and if the report is made it falls under the direction and control of some department of the Government. While it is well to have a committee responsible to the House it would be a matter of convenience and of better procedure if that committee were regarded as being under the supervision of some minister so that we would have the report presented to the House in the regular way.

Mr. BUREAU: The House should control it.

Mr. McKENZIE: It would be better to have the report presented by a minister or the Speaker, and make the procedure a permanent part of the machinery of the House. It is not like the ordinary reports of committees. This restaurant is likely to continue to be a part of the equipment of the House of Commons. It might be well to understand that it comes under the control of some minister. I have a recollection that when Dr. Pugsley was Minister of Public Works he used to exercise some control over the restaurant as being a part of the Public Works connected with the building. I am not very strong on that point but I think we used to look to the Minister of Public Works as the man who had control of the Public Works and consequently control of the restaurant. I am not sure but that is my recollection.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the recollection of the hon. gentleman is hardly accurate on that point. One of the things that Parliament has always been more or less sensitive about is that the control of this building shall rest entirely with itself. The committee dealing with this matter is a joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate, the same as the Joint Parliamentary Committee on Printing. As a matter of policy, and in order to procure the best service, it does seem to me that it would be wise for hon. members to take a keen and active interest in the welfare of the commiittee and in the proper operation of the restaurant. It could not only be a comfort to members of the House and of the Senate if properly carried on, but it could go a very long distance towards making it convenient for hon. members to remain on duty in the House for many, and long hours and sometimes very late hours.

Mr. McMASTER: Hear, hear.

Mr. SPEAKER: One of my purposes in not remaining as chairman of the committee was that hon. members should feel the responsibility resting upon themselves to try and have the restaurant more efficiently conducted.

Mr. BUREAU: I would suggest that the report made by the committee should be submitted to the House before it is finally acted upon, posted up, and becomes law. If that were done there would not be so much dissatisfaction. The restaurant of the House of Commons ought to be a credit to the country and if it costs a few dollars more let members put up the price and give them a chance to fill up if they feel like it. It is not a question of economising or saving a few dollars. We are going to have a fine large room, the view is superb, but what is the use of bringing a stranger there if they are going to give him something that he cannot eat.

Mr. BELAND: Let us pay for the scenery.

Mr. BUREAU: Let us pay for something that we can put inside of us. If we are going to use it as a smoking room, well and good but if it is going to be so that no hotel table in Canada can equal that of the Parliamentary restaurant then let them charge for it and let us pay.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think that perhaps we may have the machinery and the working of the restaurant perfected by another session. The proposal of the hon. gentleman that there should be an amendment of the rules of the House which would call for a report of the committee on the restaurant being submitted at a certain stage of the proceedings of the House in order that hon. members might discuss it properly is worthy of consideration.

Mr. BUREAU: Let us have the amendment.

Mr. PROULX: I do not share the opinion of my hon. friend from Three Rivers. If prices are increased it will be another reason for members to advance for asking for an increased indemnity. I think it would be cheaper for the country to keep to the present indemnity and not increase the prices in the restaurant.

Mr. BUREAU: I am glad I do not share your opinion. I am proud of it. If you think that the indemnity is enough for you then you are welcome to it. It is not enough for me.

Mr. PROULX: I do not want to discuss at any greater length the question of whether at any greater length the question of whether the indemnity is enough or not but if we are imposing new taxes on the country we should practise what we preach

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BUREAU: We are discussing the restaurant.

Item concurred in.

Two parliamentary doorkeepers.

Mr. BUREAU: Provided these messengers let the members of the press into the hall, I am for them; otherwise we do not want them.

Item concurred in.

7 confidential messengers.

Mr. BUREAU: Whose messengers are these and what do they do?

Mr. SPEAKER: I move that the word "seven" be struck out and the word "four" substituted. These messengers are attached to the offices of the Prime Minister, the leader of the Opposition, the Speaker, and the Clerk of the House.

Mr. BUREAU: What about us? Surely there ought to be one for No. 16 and one for the room of the Opposition.

Mr. FIELDING: Does the use of the word "confidential" imply that if they are not confidential messengers you cannot have any confidence in them? I think the word "confidential" is rather undignified. It has a strange look.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am informed by the Sergeant at Arms that this word is used in consequence of the verbiage employed by the Civil Service Commission in their classification.

Mr. VIEN: What is the number of confidential messengers now employed?

Mr. SPEAKER: There are none now but the messengers at present attached to the officers whom I have named, and the proposed wording is simply to conform to the classification adopted by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. FIELDING: Is the object to give them a higher salary by attaching the word "confidential" to them? I have great respect for the Civil Service Commission but I think that they, like all others, should be obliged to give a reason for the faith that is in them. I cannot see any reason why one messenger should be called confidential and another not.

Mr. SPEAKER: It gives them higher pay. It applies if they are in a class where they would receive a larger remuneration than the ordinary messenger.

Mr. VIEN: The number is reduced to four now, are you going to dismiss three other employees?

Mr. SPEAKER: There are no others. This is a skeleton organization to fit in with the Civil Service classification.

Mr. BUREAU: May I ask what is the difference between a confidential messenger, a parliamentary messenger, and a sessional messenger?

Mr. SPEAKER: I have already explained that, for example, a confidential messenger is provided for the Prime Minister, and he remains attached to that office.

Mr. BUREAU: And that man gets $200 more?

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes, $200 more.

Mr. BUREAU: What do the parliamentary messengers get?

Mr. SPEAKER: They perform the same duties that parliamentary messengers have performed since Confederation.

Mr. BUREAU: There are only two of them.

Mr. SPEAKER: I propose to move an amendment that the number be increased to seven.

Mr. BUREAU: There are 38 sessional messengers.

Mr. SPEAKER: The number has been precisely the same ever since Confederation. There is no change whatsoever in that regard.

Mr. FIELDING: I do not wish to restrict the appointment of any messengers that may be necessary, but the Prime Minister for example, has his own messenger in his own department (and so has each of the ministers) who is a "confidential" messenger, although I do not like the use of the term. However, I do not object to the number of messengers employed if the Speaker considers they are necessary.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am not in love with the phraseology employed, but doubtless it has to do with the nature of their employment. Ever since Confederation it has been the custom to allocate a confidential messenger to the leader of the Government, the leader of the Opposition, the Speaker, and the Clerk. In the case of the Prime Minister there probably also is a messenger in his department; but it has never been the practice for the departmental messenger to come and do duty in the House of Commons as well. There are good reasons for that as hon. gentlemen can well see. While the Prime Minister is at the House his office in the department must be left open and various duties there necessitate the attendance of a messenger.

Mr. McMASTER: I wish to make a suggestion although it may not be perfectly in order. Some of the pages have not been in bed at all to-day, and therefore the Speaker or the Serjeant-at-Arms should direct that they be sent home. Temporarily, in their absence, we can minister to our own necessities.

Mr. SPEAKER: The Serjeant-at-Arms informs me that the younger pages are sent home not later than 9.30 o'clock each evening. Last evening four of the older pages were on duty and to-day they had ample opportunity to rest.

Mr. McMASTER: The House adjourned this morning at half past six, and the pages had to report for duty before it reassembled. I think the little lads should be in bed. I say that as the father of a family.

Mr. SPEAKER: I move that the number of two be changed to seven in accordance with the explanation I gave a short time ago.

Mr. ANDERSON: I would like to know what action is being taken in connection with the messengers in the restaurant.

Mr. SPEAKER: This service is under the Serjeant-at-Arms and has nothing whatever to do with the restaurant.

Mr. ANDERSON: May I ask why the number of messengers should be increased from two to seven?

Mr. SPEAKER: "Two" was a clerical error. Provision was originally made for seven confidential messengers and it is now reduced to four.

ELECTRICIAN (VACANCY).

Mr. BUREAU: Who is to fill that vacancy?

Mr. SPEAKER: The Serjeant-at-Arms informs me that it may not be necessary to fill this vacancy. In view of the complicated nature of the electrical equipment of the House it is considered that it may be better ot continue its operation in the hands of the expert who is already in charge. The position may therefore remain vacant unless some occasion arises for filling it.

SUPERVISOR OF CHAR SERVICE—PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS.

Mr. BUREAU: Is this position held by a lady?

Mr. SPEAKER: No, it is held by a man, Mr. Letourneau.

Mr. McMASTER: I do not know whether I am in order—I think I am in this case—but in connection with the pages, ever since I entered the House I have not liked the spectacle which is always presented as the evening grows late, of little boys being on duty who certainly should be in bed. I do not know whether the Serjeant-at-Arms, or whoever is responsible, sees that the pages get their schooling properly, but I do not think that they should be on duty after ten o'clock. It is not proper for a country which has enacted factory legislation forbidding night work to juveniles, to have juveniles doing night work in our principal legislative hall, and I would like to express the view that no boys under sixteen at least should be on duty after ten o'clock at night. During the earlier hours we can avail ourselves of the services of the pages, which we highly appreciate, but after ten o'clock at night we could deliver our own notes and do for ourselves whatever else we require. I would strongly impress my own personal view—and I would imagine the view of most members of the House if they ever thought about it—that it is very unfitting to have little lads of sixteen and under working until midnight, and even later, and then going home in the dark. It cannot be a good thing for the boys themselves, and I am strongly of the opinion that the internal economy of this House should be so arranged that no children of sixteen and under would be on duty after ten o'clock at night.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have no fault to find with the remarks of the hon. member except that it involves laying hands upon a time-honoured institution more or less reverenced, and there is always some good reason why a system which has been in vogue for over fifty years should continue. It is true that on occasions, when the House sits late at night there is, perhaps, hardship for the pages, or at least a few of them. But this matter was gone over very carefully some two years ago by Dr. Putman, Supervisor of Schools in the city, who had some such idea as has been expressed by the hon. member, and after the most careful investigation he was satisfied that the system was as good as it could possibly be in the interests of the boys themselves, bearing in mind that all the younger boys leave at half-past nine.

Mr. McMASTER: What is the maximum age?

Mr. SPEAKER: Sixteen years. Perhaps it might be worth while to point out to hon. gentlemen that these boys have an excellent opportunity to grow up in the public service, and, indeed, many of them have reached the highest positions in the service. One of the highest officials of this House, a gentleman very much respected by all the members as well as by his brother officers, started as a page boy; I refer to the Acting Deputy Serjeant-at-Arms. Another gentleman although comparatively young is to-day in receipt of a salary of $25,000 a year from a large industrial corporation, and he started as a page boy. The Minister of Justice informs me that another of our former page boys is now a bishop. It might perhaps be better to change the system and to engage men of mature years. I may say quite frankly that while the boys on the whole behave themselves remarkably well, still they are young and have the characteristics of youth, and it is not always easy for the officials of the House to get the very best service from them. But after all this is purely a question of policy for the House to determine, and so far as I am concerned I shall be only too happy to carry into effect any change which the House in its wisdom may deem to be desirable.

Mr. McMASTER: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to take the ground that we should not employ page boys; what I want is to give them a chance to go to bed earlier.

Mr. ROBB: What about the girls in the gallery?

Mr. McMASTER: They are there by choice, and they are rewarded by listening to the eloquence of the hon. member for Huntingdon and other hon. gentlemen. I would draw the Speaker's attention to the fact that the argument that this is a time-honoured institution is not a very strong one, because 50 or 60 years ago the public looked upon child labour with a far more indulgent eye than it is regarded to-day. I am very glad to learn that the Inspector of Schools is satisfied that the boys' education does not suffer through the service which they render to this House, and I can quite understand that for a bright lad work in this House may have a very considerable educational value. But the point I was endeavouring to make is one which I think will recommend itself to every hon. member,—that these boys of 12, 13, 14 and 15 year of age should be in their beds by ten o'clock at night. It is true the younger boys get away at half-past nine, which is quite proper, but very often a boy of 15, large perhaps for his age, requires just as much sleep as a boy of 12 or 13. I know the sight of these boys here late at night struck me as improper when I first became a member of this House. But we get used to these things and after a time they cease to have any effect upon us —"we first condole, then pity, then embrace." But I think the ground I take is sound, and that most members of this House, if these little fellows were their own sons, would not wish to see them out of their beds after ten o'clock at night.

Mr. SPEAKER: There is one way of finding out whether our system can be improved, and I intend to instruct the Serjeant-at-Arms to have all the page boys retire at ten o'clock each night until such time as the arrangement does not work satisfactorily to hon. members.

Resolution reported as amended, and read the first time.

On motion of Right Hon. Mr. Doherty for the second reading:

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Before the motion is put, Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out that last night the right hon. the Prime Minister made no reference whatever to the subject under consideration in stating the order of business for to-day. I do not wish to in any way delay concurrence, but if there be some hon. member not now present who might wish to ask questions on the resolution I think he should not be denied that privilege.

Mr. SPEAKER: He would be able to do so on the Estimates.

Motion agreed to and resolution read the second time.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT (Sick and Distressed Mariners) AMENDMENT.

On motion of Hon. N. W. Rowell that Bill No. 127 to amend the Canada Shipping Act (Sick and Distressed Mariners) be read a second time:

Mr. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I regret to again have to bring to the attention of the minister in charge of this Bill its objectionable features. On a former occasion I spoke on the matter, and I then hoped that the minister might see his way clear to refrain from pressing this measure through, for I have received a large number of objections from Boards of Trade and other organizations and feel it is my duty to very strongly object to its passage.

First of all I would like to suggest to the minister that perhaps it would be a good idea for him to re-commit the Bill to the consideration of his colleagues and see if it would not be possible to carry on this work as it has been conducted in the past. I might point out to the House that the care of sick and distressed mariners has been attended to by the Marine and Fisheries Department ever since Confederation at a charge of one and a half cents a ton on shipping. Now it is proposed to increase that tax to two cents a ton, and to transfer the clerks from one department and create a new branch in another department.

When I was speaking upon this matter on a former occasion the minister replied that the figures I submitted were inaccurate. He said they did not include the cost of administration, and that if this was included it would be found that the work had been carried on at a loss.

Now, with the permission of the House, I am going to give some figures showing that under the 1½ cent tax there has been constantly a surplus and that it is quite unnecessary to increase the tax. I have the whole list before me from Confederation down to 1917, as follows:

For 1918-19 there was a loss, on account of the influenza epidemic, of $6,000. I am told that last year there was a surplus of $8,000, so that these figures are substantially correct down to the present time. In other words, we have a surplus under the present rate of taxation of about $300,000.

The minister stated to the House that I was inaccurate in the statement I made the other day referring to these figures, and pointed out that the cost of administration had not been deducted. Well, I find that the administrative staff consists of a gentleman named Doctor Godin—I do not know the gentleman—who has a stenographer and one clerk. These three officials, who administer the fund in Ottawa, have been transferred to the Health Department. It is not reasonable to assume that this small staff, which has successfully administered the fund up to the present time, should absorb the whole of this $300,000 surplus. The point I am making is simply this, and I think the House ought to take cognizance of it: that the 1½ cent tonnage tax has been ample in every year except one or two odd years—certainly it has been ample over the whole period—to cover the administration of this fund from Confederation down to the present time. Therefore, Sir, I protest against this measure providing for an increase of funds as being absolutely unnecessary and uncalled for.

My second objection to it is that we are creating in a new department a new branch. You, Mr. Speaker, have seen as I have that when a new branch is started almost the first thing done is to increase the number of officials and extend the expenditures. What we are going to do is, without question, to increase the expeditures in connection with the administration of this fund; that, I say, is unnecessary and undesirable.

Now, I wish to turn to another phase of the question, and this, I think, is the most significant point of all; apparently it has not been within the knowledge of the minister. I want to ask the minister not to argue this point away, because it is an important one. I ask him to let this matter stand over for another year until he has had an opportunity of really acquainting himself with the business aspect of it, the shipping side of the question, not merely the administrative side, because I have shown that that is a very simple matter. Now, the other phase to which I wish to refer is this: the effect of this tax in the past as 1½ cents has been to work against the interests of our shipping, and if it is increased to 2 cents the situation is aggravated. I go so far, Mr. Speaker, as to ask the Government to consider the advisability of entirely withdrawing the tax and handling the sick mariners on the same basis as they are handled in Great Britain. But I wish to direct the attention of the House to the effect of this tax on the cost of shipping. It not only means a direct charge of 1½ cents— two cents, if the amount is now increased—but it means a retaliatory charge on the part of, say, the United States. In this connection I wish to place on Hansard very briefly a statement showing how that works out, because the matter is a very important one as affecting the cost of our shipping:

> The United States law provides that upon satisfactory proof being given to the President by any Government of any foreign country, that no discriminating duties of tonnage or imposts are imposed or levied in the ports of such nation upon vessels wholly belonging to citizens of the United States, the President may issue a proclamation declaring that the foreign discriminating duties of tonnage and impost within the United States are suspended and discontinued, so far as respects the vessels of such foreign nation.

Now, this refers to a tax of 6 cents a ton imposed by the American Government against our shipping and against the shipping of other countries which impose similar charges. So that our shipping is compelled not only to pay 1½ cents, or the proposed 2 cents, but also 6 cents when they go into American ports.

To carry the point on a little further, I anticipate the reply from the minister that this law is not applied to the whole of Canada by saying that I admit that. I want to give a list of the countries the shipping of which is now exempt upon entering American ports and to show that we too can be exempt if we remove this particular impost or tax, because it was the cause of the application of the 6 cents tonnage tax by the United States against Canadian shipping. The countries exempt in United States ports are the following:

Certain ports in the Dutch West Indies; Copenhagen; province of Ontario; Colon and Panama; Greytown and Boco de Toro; Nicaragua; Montserrat, Gaudeloupe and Granada in the West Indies; Spain; Germany.

Here we have the peculiar situation that ships from one province in Canada, namely, Ontario, can go into ports in the United States free from this 6 cents tax, while shipping from other provinces, including Quebec, British Columbia, and the Maritime Provinces, must pay a 6 cent tax when entering American ports, simply because of this impost of 1½ cents on account of sick mariners' dues. I protest, therefore, against this tax in that it is increasing the cost of shipping to Canadian producers.

I object to the principle of this proposal because it includes certain provinces and excludes others. I see no reason in the world why it should apply to some of the provinces and not to others. Certainly if the Government insist upon the principle they should apply it alike to all the provinces in which there is any shipping. I have already referred to the method employed by the British Government. The British Government, instead of imposing this tax, gives to ship owners, under the terms and provisions of the Merchants Shipping Act, certain instructions which they must carry out. I will read one or two by way of illustration and to make clear my point to which I shall proceed in a moment. Clause 82 of the Merchants Shipping Act states:

> The master should pay the expenses of removal, subsistence, medical advice and medicine until the seaman returns to the ship, or until the officer endorses the agreement with a certificate that he is fit or unable to proceed on the voyage.

It further states:

> The officer will request hospital authorities to inform him within twenty-four hours of the admittance into hospital of any seaman from a British ship.

And so forth. There are many other clauses, all of which show that the Board of Trade of Great Britain care for their mariners just as we look after the interest of mariners in this country, but they look after them at the expense of the owners of the ships from which the mariners are taken. There is this matter which has escaped the attention of the minister and the Government. All these years we have been collecting this tax from all ships, including British ships which come into our ports, although there is a law whereby British ships are compelled to take care of their own crews. Referring now exclusively to British shipping, I say that this country is taking care of sailors of British ships although those sailors are already provided for by the Merchants Shipping Act under the control of the Board of Trade of Great Britain. That is another argument against the tax and a positive argument against an increase in the tax. I do not wish to delay the House; but for the reasons I have stated, I am going to ask the minister again, or as he is not listening very attentively to what I am saying, I will ask the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden), who is in his seat, if he will give this matter serious consideration. This is a serious matter as regards shipping generally; the increase in taxation will effect shipping considerably. The point I desire to make above all others is this, that the fee at the present time is more than adequate, and the increase in the fee will simply go into increasing useless machinery for handling and administering the matter. This matter cannot be overlooked and allowed to pass without strong protest. I presume it is regarded as a small matter by hon. members who do not thoroughly understand it; but the matter is of importance to shipping and shippers, because after all the cost of our ports reflects itself upon the imports and exports and upon those who are handling them. I wish to summarize my objections under these headings: first, it will increase the cost to shipping without a vestage of justification; second, since Confederation there has been a steady and substantial surplus making absolutely unnecessary any increase in the fee; third, it will increase the staff in Ottawa and the cost of administration; fourth, it is unfair, because it does not apply to all provinces alike, nor to all shipping; fifth, it permits of a particularly favourable treatment of ships coming from one province of Canada to ports of the United States, whereas ships coming from other provinces are discriminated against to the extent of six cents a ton. For that reason, I am going to ask the minister if he will stay this Bill for a time and give it further consideration. It will do no harm if he lets it rest for a year. I would suggest that he advise himself fully by consultation with the various boards of trade and shipping interests of the country as to its effect, and then if he still thinks it is necessary, he can let it go through the House and to a special committee in a manner similar to that in which we treat railway Bills and other Bills of importance to business concerns.

Hon. N. W. ROWELL (President of the Council): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: Before the minister exercises his right of reply, I wish to direct the attention of other hon. members to the circumstance that if he does so, the debate will be closed.

Mr. ROWELL: The matters raised by my hon. friend were discussed at some length when the Resolution upon which this Bill is founded was in committee. On that occasion my hon. friend brought these matters to the attention of the House, and I have since had an opportunity of looking into the principal points that he has raised by way of supplementing the investigation I made before. Let me deal in order with the points raised by my hon. friend. In the first place he says that this Bill creates a new branch of the Department of Health. My hon. friend is quite incorrect in that; no such object is in view, and under the legislation of last session the administration of this branch is now in the Department of Health. We do not contemplate adding a single person to the staff or adding a dollar to the cost of administration. When my hon. friend says that the result of the increased rate will go into the cost of administration, he is wholly misinformed, and I want to say very frankly to my hon. friend that there is no justification for such a statement being made. For a considerable period the rate was two cents a ton; some few years ago it was reduced to one and one-half cents a ton in the hope that the work could be carried on at that figure. What I stated to my hon. friend when the matter was before the committee on a previous occasion was quite correct. I said that the cost of administration did not appear in that account, nor the cost of the hospital buildings. At that time I thought that was the case and I have since found that it was. I do not think money contributed for that fund should be used for other purposes, but if you charge up the cost of the building of the hospitals erected plus the cost of the administration, I am advised by the officials of the department that the amount to which my hon. friend has referred will be more than absorbed, because this covers a period of over fifty years. That being the case, this is a question not of increased cost of administration, but of increased cost of hospital treatment. We have to pay increased rates in hospitals throughout the country.

Mr. STEVENS: What are the additional charges which are not included in this report? What is the amount?

Mr. ROWELL: I have not had figured out the whole cost of administration since Confederation. There has been a staff of three or four and there is their travelling expenses. It has been suggested to me that the amount would perhaps depend on the period. I presume the amount was not as great in the early years, when the work was small, as later; it might run from $5,000 to $7,000 or $8,000 a year, but it is a sum which will absorb the surplus according to my information from the responsible officers connected with the administration. Hospital charges have, as every one knows, increased during the war period, and we have to pay a higher rate than we had to pay two or three years ago in order to secure fair treatment in hospitals for the sick mariners. The whole question is this —shall the shipowners pay the cost of caring for these sick mariners in the hospitals, or shall the country bear part of the burden? I believe the shipowners have made, during the war, sufficient profits to enable them to pay the whole cost of maintenance of these sick mariners. In view of the desire to economize and not to spend money needlessly, it is only fair that we should expect the shipowners to pay the whole cost of caring for these sick mariners in hospitals. My hon. friend says that some other countries do not impose this charge. That is true; but that is no reason why we, who have been caring for sick mariners for fifty years, should not continue to do so. This is of great advantage to the fishing vessels on the coasts of the Maritime Provinces. I am told so by men interested in the situation, and I would think it would be of the same advantage on the British Columbia coast, although I have not been informed as to that, because wherever a fishing vessel chooses to pay the fee, and the fees are small, it gets the benefit of treatment for the mariners on the vessel, and that is of great value to these vessels. Under the Act the Government is obligated to take care of and provide treatment for a period as long as a year in the case of these sick mariners.

One word with reference to the situation as to the United States. I should point out to my hon. friend with reference to the clause he read from the American Act that the United States was only entitled to impose that tax against us if we imposed a discriminatory tax against them. This is not a discriminatory tax against the United States. It applies to our own vessels, it applies to English vessels—to all vessels entering our ports that come within the terms of the Act. It does not apply, as my hon. friend has said, to vessels of Ontario plying on inland waters or going from Ontario to the province of Quebec.

Mr. STEVENS: Does not my hon. friend know that the American Government imposed this tax of 6 cents against Canadian vessels because of this particular tax?

Mr. ROWELL: I believe my hon. friend is right that the American Government has imposed it. It is a matter which I am having the Department of Justice look into, and if the view which I entertain is confirmed that there is no just ground for its imposition, then we will make representations to the American Government. But this is not a new thing. As a matter of fact I turned up the record, and I find by memoranda on file in the department that as far back as 1891 ship-owners of Canada were opposing this tax on the very same grounds as my hon. friend has set out to-day. But what I point out is that it makes absolutely no difference, so far as the operation of the American law is concerned, whether this tax is 1½ cents or 2 cents. It is the fact of its existence at all that makes the United States impose their tax against our shipping. The whole question is, shall we impose on the country part of the financial obligation for caring for these sick mariners? The policy in the past has been to ask ship-owners to provide for the care of their own sick. That is the policy embodied in the Bill. The Government has considered it, and it thinks the Bill should go through.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and the House went into Committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 383—duty on all vessels arriving at certain ports.

Mr. CROWE: Why is the province of Ontario exempted?

Mr. ROWELL: In this respect the Act is the same as it has been ever since Confederation. I have inquired with the view of ascertaining, so far as there appears to be any record, why Ontario has always been left out, and the reason that I have been given is that Ontario navigation is inland—lake navigation. This legislation so far has only been applied to ocean navigation.

Mr. CROWE: Does the minister think that seamen on the lakes do not get sick as well as seamen on the ocean?

Mr. ROWELL: That is true. I am willing to say that there may be an argument made for their inclusion, yet I doubt whether it is wise for us to change the law which has been in force since Confederation. Another reason given is that vessels plying on the lakes are usually near the home port or town of these seamen, who may be returned home in case of illness. I quite agree that that would not cover all cases, but those are the grounds which for fifty years have apparently influenced the policy of all governments in not bringing Ontario under the legislation.

Mr. CROWE: You could use the same argument as to vessels being near the home ports of the seamen in the case of vessels plying up and down the coast, which have to pay this tax.

Mr. ROWELL: There is one slight amendment I wish to make to this section. Subclause (4) says that "such duty shall be payable on each ship three times during each calendar year,' but it does not specify on what occasions the duty shall be paid. To make the matter more clear and to avoid confusion I beg tom ove to insert after the word "ship" in the first line of subclause (4) the following words: "each time she arrives in any such port, but in no case shall it be oftener than."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS: I wish to say one or two words in reply to the minister, who in his explanation of the necessity for the increase of the tonnage due to 2 cents a ton, did not treat my argument quite fairly. I was not arguing that the American tax was imposed because of the 2 cent tonnage due here, and the minister knows I was not. I separated my argument. I knew perfectly well that the six cents a ton tax was applied whether we had a 1½ cents or a 2 cents tax here, and it was quite unnecessary of the minister to enlighten me on that point. I was objecting to the increase to two cents asked for when there is no necessity for it. The minister told us that there was an administrative staff in Ottawa and that there were certain expenditures on hospitals. The same ground was traversed a few weeks ago and the minister was unable to give us any information as to the amount of these administration and hospital charges. My information is that the total charge included in these figures is for a certain gentleman by the name of Dr. Godin, a stenographer and one clerk. I am satisfied after an investigation that Dr. Godin's services are quite unnecessary because you do not need a medical man in charge of the work which can easily be done by any ordinary clerk. The medical work in the administration of this department is done in all quarters of this country by the hospitals and doctors there. Although Dr. Godin's services are retained as a medical man you will not use a medical man once in a season and probably not once in ten seasons. I am not saying this with any desire to embarass the minister but I am quite sure that the minister was not alive to all the facts when the matter was first broached. This administration is such that it could very well be put in charge of a clerk and a stenographer. This year I am informed we have had an $8,000 surplus and there is no occasion to increase this charge to two cents in order to cover the work of these officials. As my hon. friend has transferred this work to the Health Department he should leave the fee for another year at one and a half cents in order to see if it is necessary to increase the rate and then let the House know whether it is necessary. The minister rather implied that I was here taking a stand against the sick mariner and in the interest of the shipowner. He said that his intentions were to protect the sick mariner, to see that he was taken care of properly and he believed that the shipowners could very well afford to pay for it. I had no objection, nor have I now, to that position. My position is this: First, do not disturb these fees at all or, second, do not charge this fee but make shipping responsible for the care of the individual sailors just the same as the board of trade of Great Britain makes the shipping of Great Britain responsible. Under the laws of Great Britain British ships coming into Canada are obliged to care for their sick mariners. We are simply covering the same ground in so far as British shipping is concerned. I rather resented the minister's suggestion that I am here pleading for the rich shipowners because that is not my position at all. My position is that the fee should not be changed and that in the next place these same rich shipowners should be compelled to look after their own sick sailors under proper Government regulations and provision. If that were done I submit that it would be possible not to increase this fee this year. Let the matter stand for another year.

Mr. ROWELL: Possibly my hon. friend (Mr. Stevens) is not aware of the fact that under a contract which we have with British Columbia we are bound to maintain marine hospitals, and we cannot be released from the arrangement which requires us to make provision with existing British Columbia hospitals for the care of sick seamen. The Government has concluded an agreement with the Government of British Columbia to make such provision and therefore it is not a case where we could turn over to the shipping companies the obligation to which my hon. friend has referred. I do not see how the companies could seriously suffer from this legislation. It does increase to some extent the dues. The charges would be increased on all the ships by approximately $15,000 a year according to the Estimates I have. I cannot see how $15,000 would seriously prejudice the shipping coming into our ports from all nations. It does not seem to me that it is such an additional charge as to seriously prejudice any shipping interests sailing into our Canadian ports. Our charges would not compare with those of any other ports and especially American ports. One complaint of my hon. friend is that the American Government takes advantage of this provision to impose a much higher tax on our ships going into United States ports.

Mr. STEVENS: That is not the only charge against shipping. It is only an incidental charge. There are other charges and many of them in different ports.

Mr. LOGGIE: Is this one-half cent increase per ton due to the increased cost of living or of maintaining these sick sailors at the hospitals. With the increased cost of food, clothing, etc., the keeper of the hospitals cannot get a fair return on their investment. I understand that is what the minister tells the House. I would like to say also to the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) that Dr. Godin is doing more than the work of a clerk because he supervises the expenditures of the hospitals all over the country from time to time and that work, I fancy, requires a man of some experience. I want to know whether the increased cost is due to the increased cost of living—the cost of food, clothing and other materials necessary in the hospitals.

Mr. ROWELL: The increase is substantially as my hon. friend (Mr. Loggie) has suggested. We maintain four hospitals. The cost of everything has gone up and therefore it costs us more to maintain these four hospitals than it did three or four years ago. Then we have agreements with about 35 hospitals in the parts of Canada where sick sailors come in. We have to renew our agreements at higher rates because the hospitals cannot afford to renew them at the old rates. I could give the rates which formerly prevailed and the present rates in all these hospitals. There is a very substantial increase in the charge. We cannot help it; we have to pay. Just one word in reference to Dr. Godin. He is the officer of the Government who must see that these four hospitals in different parts of Canada are properly administered and he must also see that the 35 other hospitals carry out their agreements for the care of sick sailors. That is an important office which he has filled for a great many years and filled very acceptably.

Mr. LOGGIE: I want to confirm what the minister has said because we have one of these hospitals which has received assistance for half a century. The allowance was so small that the keeper had to put his grievance before the department. I am glad to say that they met his views to some extent but nevertheless the amount which he receives is still very small and, considering the increased cost of living, I do not know but what his case should receive even further consideration.

Bill reported, and amendments read the second time.

On the motion of the Hon. Mr. Rowell that the Bill be read a third time.

Mr. SPEAKER: The Bill can only be read a third time now with the unanimous consent of the House.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read a third time and passed.

NORTHWEST GAME ACT AMENDMENT.

On the motion of Sir Robert Borden Bill No. 151 to amend the Northwest Game Act was read a second time, considered in committee, reported, read a third time and passed.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I understand that it is the general wish of hon. members that we should not sit this evening. I therefore beg to move that the House do now adjourn.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 6.30 p.m.

Friday, June 4, 1920.

The House met at Two o'clock.

PAPER TABLED.

List of lawyers in the province of Quebec, who act as Public Representatives. —Hon. Mr. Sifton.

DIRECTOR OF COAL OPERATIONS.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Minister of the Interior) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 153 (from the Senate), respecting the Director of Coal Operations. He said: I would like to defer giving an explanation of the object of this Bill until it comes up for second reading; but the passage of the measure will be expedited if it receives the first reading to-day.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read a first time.

SENATE BILLS—FIRST READINGS.

Bill No. 154 for the relief of Albert Ernest Bulley.—Mr. Fripp.

Bill No. 155 for the relief of Beatrice Booth Gendron.—Mr. Fripp.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Rt. Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): I should like to say to the House that on account of the Minister of Finance being very actively engaged in very important matters, apart from the Budget, he will not be able to go on with the Budget resolutions as the first order of business to-day. I spoke to the leader of the Opposition about taking up Order No. 12—which is merely for a reference to a committee—Order No. 25, the second reading of a Bill to amend the Yukon Placer Mining Act, and Order No. 10, concerning a Bill that has been unanimously reported by the Select Standing Committee on Agriculture. I do not think any of these matters are controversial.

Mr. JACQUES BUREAU (Three Rivers): May I ask the Prime Minister a question? Can he inform me whether or not electricity and gas will come under the heading of manfactured products in the new taxation? I ask the question because I have received telegrams from the firms that are selling electricity and gas in my town, who wish to know if they are to charge the one per cent tax on their bills which go out on the first of the month. I promised that I would ask the question the first thing at the opening of the House to-day, and I am now carrying out that promise.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Would my hon. friend be good enough to ask the Minister of Finance that question?

Mr. BUREAU: I thought perhaps the Prime Minister would know.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The subject is really one that comes under the Minister of Finance, and without having the resolutions before me I would hardly like to give an answer to my hon. friend.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT ACT—(FRENCH VERSION).

On the Order, House again in committee on Bill No. 131 (from the Senate) to amend the Criminal Code (French version).

Rt. Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): I beg to move with the permission of the House, pursuant to the understanding come to on Friday, that this order be discharged and that the said Bill be referred to a special committee for consideration and report, and that the Minister of Justice, and Messieurs Lemieux, Mackie (Edmonton), Vien and Denis be members of said special committee.

Motion agreed to.

YUKON PLACER MINING ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Meighen Bill No. 142 to amend the Yukon Placer Mining Act was read a second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 1—Prior Rights protected:

Mr. BUREAU: Would the minister make a general statement with respect to the whole Bill? Very few of us, of course, are familiar with the conditions in the Yukon —except perhaps the hon. member from Yukon (Mr. Thompson)—and therefore we should like to know what is the purport of the Bill.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I can make a general statement. There is little use explaining the first clause because it is rendered necessary in order to give full effect to the operating and substantial clauses that follow. The purpose of the Bill is this: Its design is to supply additional incentive to placer mining in the Yukon territory. When the Yukon was opened up, and for many years thereafter, placer mining was vigorously prosecuted because the awards under the then conditions were ample. They now are not so great as they were at that time, and it is sought by this Bill to amplify them in the following manner:

To adopt the practice of issuing leases—that is to say leases of territory along creeks where placer mining is carried on of considerable extent;—practically a reservation of that territory for the applicant in order that he may prospect it and if he finds that it is in his interest to stake claims, to do so. The territory proposed to be granted in respect of land already worked over—that is land already taken up, cancelled or abandoned—is five miles in length on any creek, and the time allowed is one year. The prospector is bound to expend at least a thousand dollars in that year on prospecting operations, and if he does so he is entitled to a renewal, if he desires, for another year, and under similar circumstances for a third. He pays $25 per mile, or fraction of a mile, rental for that prospecting lease. Then in respect of the class of claim already worked over, he is at liberty to stake within those three years any area he wishes, or rather as many claims as he desires. Each claim is about 23 acres in maximum.

Mr. BUREAU: In that particular location.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In that particular location. When he gets the claim he, of course, abides by the regulations in the usual way. Now as regards new areas—that is to say creeks not already applied for, forfeited or abandoned, or not worked over—he is entitled not to five miles but to one mile. He is entitled to renewals in the usual way—or rather in the way I have just defined as respects the other class—but he cannot stake the whole thing. He can only obtain a discovery stake,—that is to say three times the ordinary stake—the discovery stake being one that has always been given. Where a man is in the position of the discoverer of the area he gets three times the ordinary stake. So in this class of creeks already worked over, that is all he can obtain. He pays the same rental as I stated before for the other class, viz., $25 per mile or fraction of a mile.

Then the Bill provides as well for the method of measurement, a rather technical definition which could be explained much better by the hon. member for the Yukon. Indeed, greater detail could be given by him, if necessary, as to the main provisions of the Bill and as to the necessity therefor.

Mr. ALFRED THOMPSON (Yukon): Perhaps the committee will permit me at this stage to elucidate the object of the Bill a little further, although the minister has given the basic reasons for the amendments. It is now over twenty years since gold was first discovered in the Klondike. A very large area of the gold-bearing gravels has been worked, many creeks have been prospected, and many worked, and others prospected but not worked and subsequently abandoned, which claims have reverted to the Crown. Now we have quite a large area of ground in that country containing gold-bearing gravels of this character; ground that is not sufficiently rich in gold contents to be worked by the ordinary placer mining methods or by the individual miner by staking individual claims.

But by placing these gravels in larger groups it is hoped that it may be possible to have them prospected by what is known as the core drill method, involving the use of machine drills, as opposed to the ordinary shaft sinking method. These amendments were suggested by a non-partisan organization known as the Yukon Development League, and it is hoped that their adoption will give an impetus to the further prospecting of this low grade gravel on abandoned creeks. So far as virgin ground is concerned, as the minister has stated, the leases cover only one mile for a term of one year, and within that mile the prospector can secure at the end of the term only one discovery claim of the same size as he would be able to obtain if he were to make a discovery on any other ground upon which claims did not already exist.

Mr. BUREAU: Will the hon. member explain how he expects to get better results by allowing five miles to be included in a claim instead of the area allowed heretofore?

Mr. THOMPSON (Yukon): This low grade ground can only be prospected by the use of expensive power drills, and the gold contents of any one claim were not such as to warrant their continued operation, otherwise the claims would not have been abandoned. The idea is to give a prospector a larger claim so that he will be able to secure the necessary capital to embark on this somewhat expensive prospecting.

Mr. BUREAU: You allow him to consolidate the smaller claims?

Mr. THOMPSON (Yukon): Yes.
Section agreed to.

On section 2—Lease to prospect for gold, application and evidence required, etc.

Mr. BUREAU: Is the size of a discovery claim 23 acres?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Three times the ordinary size.

Mr. THOMPSON (Yukon): 1,500 feet along a creek.

Mr. BUREAU: I see that when an application is made for a lease the Gold Commissioner of the Yukon shall satisfy himself that the applicant has the means to carry on the necessary prospecting. Did that provision exist under the old law?

Mr. THOMPSON (Yukon): No. Under the present law a man may stake a claim 500 feet long, or if he discovers a new creek he may stake a discovery claim 1,500 feet long. The Gold Commissioner must satisfy himself that the people who apply for these leases are able to carry out the conditions so that the ground will be prospected, the underlying principle being that ground now idle may not be tied up.

Mr. BUREAU: But, on the other hand, power is left absolutely in the hands of the Gold Commissioner to determine whether or not leases shall be granted to any applicants. He is the sole judge and may refuse an applicant a lease by merely stating that the applicant has not furnished satisfactory evidence that he has the means to fulfil the conditions of the lease. Does not the minister and the member for the Yukon think that this is a rather absolute power to leave in the hands of one man, especially in a mining country?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Gold Commissioner already has other powers just as wide as this power. There is no other way of administering the Act. The Gold Commissioner is too far away for any appeal powers to be exercised over him, and those directly interested, as represented in the Yukon Development League, are quite ready to submit to this provision. As the hon. member is aware, the Gold Commissioner acted for many years as Commissioner of the Yukon.

Mr. BUREAU: But like ourselves he will have to get out some day—he will die, poor fellow.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then another man equally as good will be appointed as long as present conditions obtain.

Mr. BUREAU: I thought you were going to say "as long as the present Government continues." That is where I get suspicious!

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think any other method is possible, for we cannot maintain a court there for the purpose indicated; the Act has to be administered by one man only. As the hon. member knows, we reduced the officials there about two years ago, by more than half, I think.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): In my province, at all events, a man who goes out to engage in prospecting requires nothing more than his loaf of bread, a powder horn and a pick; the best coal mines in the province have been discovered by men so equipped. I would not like to see an Act passed which would have the effect of shutting out the gold prospector. Why is it necessary to confine the application to men of wealth or means?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It does not confine the application to men of wealth; it simply provides that before a man can get a lease he must show he is able to do something on the ground. It would be bad policy to grant to any applicant a lease, thereby tying the territory up, if he has no means at all of utilizing that territory. When the Yukon was new and the mining was carried on under the old method, the prospector did not require any capital, because the gold was there and could be mined by that method. But these worked-over claims can be mined only by the use of these power drills. It is not we who compel the presence of capital; it is nature; consequently, to avoid tying up claims by those who cannot work them we simply say: Show us that you are able to work them, or show us that you have associated with you men who can work them, and that is sufficient.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: That seems to be a very good reason. But the prospector has to come back to the commissioner and show that he has done something during the year; it does not occur to me that it is necessary to impose this condition in the first year. Very often men who have not much means can discover a gold mine. A great deal, of course, depends upon the administration of the Act. If it is rigid, some worthy people may be altogether shut out from this work; if liberal, the results may be more satisfactory. I am not opposing the Bill; I simply make these remarks by way of suggestion. I understand that this Bill applies to placer mining. Is any other kind of mining carried on in the Yukon?

Mr. A. THOMPSON (Yukon): Yes, we mine silver, copper and coal. We mined tungsten during the war and there are large antimony deposits there. This Bill refers only to placer mining and this particular amendment to ground that has already been prospected and abandoned, has reverted to the Crown, and has been lying idle for years. The amendment is intended to devise a method under which these areas can be prospected by the use of power drills and acquired and worked by larger groups where larger capital is required. It is the prospecting itself that requires the money. This ground has already been prospected by the ordinary methods, and enough gold has not been found to warrant the development of the property. By using power drills and making these drill holes at various intervals throughout these claims, possibly getting a group of claims together, it is hoped that ground which is now idle will be made to produce.

Mr. CAHILL: And how much money would it be necessary for a man to have before the commissioner would allow him to take up a claim?

Mr. THOMPSON: It is hoped that a group of placer miners will be able to say to the Gold Commissioner: We are willing to pay this $25 and to do $1,000 worth of work per mile on this ground. The power drills cost from $4,000 to $5,000.

Mr. CAHILL: Can they be rented?

Mr. THOMPSON: Well, some of these drills are not being used just now and in a limited way those who desire to engage in the work might be able to rent them. A group of prospectors might be able to use their own labour and sink shafts by the ordinary methods. It is not absolutely necessary that power drills should be used, but it is expected that they will chiefly be used for this purpose.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

INSPECTION AND SALE ACT AMENDMENT.

House again in Committee on Bill No. 104, to amend the Inspection and Sale Act (as amended by Select Standing Committee on Agriculture).—Hon. Mr. Tolmie—Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 1—sections prescribing sizes of apple barrels, fruit boxes, etc., penalty section, and section authorizing minister to appoint inspectors, etc., repealed.

Mr. FIELDING: I notice that clause 326 provides that the Minister of Agriculture may make regulations for purposes that are set forth in the section. The other day the point was taken that perhaps we are calling too often upon the Governor in Council to make regulations; but as in this section penalties are imposed and as these are regulations which really form part of the Criminal law of the country, I would suggest to my hon. friend that his regulations should be subject to the approval of the Governor in Council.

Mr. TOLMIE: I have no objection to that.

Mr. FIELDING: I am making this suggestion only because the clause is penal in its character. I notice also that in this clause the expression is used "packages containing fruit for sale in Canada." Is it quite certain, when a package is made, that the fruit is to be sold in Canada or elsewhere? There is no distinction. A man may make a box intended to contain fruit for sale in Canada and he may sell it in Europe, or he may make a box to contain fruit for sale in Europe and he may sell it in Canada. Will there not be a difficulty in carrying out the regulation?

Mr. TOLMIE: Under this Bill we control entirely the nature of packages for sale in Canada; but in the event of an exporter showing to the department that it is necessary to have a special form of package to meet the requirements of some market to which Canada wishes to export, then if his claim has merit, permission will be granted to him to ship in a special package to meet the requirements of the market in which he wishes to sell.

Mr. FIELDING: The minister has assented to a suggestion of mine—I did not move it—that his regulation should be subject to the approval of the Governor in Council. I understood the minister would make the motion.

Mr. TOLMIE: I move to amend clause 326 by adding after the words "Minister of Agriculture," in the first line thereof, the following words "subject to the approval of the Governor in Council."

Amendment agreed to, and section as amended agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS—BUDGET RESOLUTIONS.

The House again in Committee of Ways and Means—Sir Henry Drayton (Minister of Finance) —Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

CUSTOMS.

Resolved that it is expedient to amend Schedule A to the Customs Tariff, 1907, and to strike thereout tariff items 172 and 483, the several enumerations of goods respectively, and the several rates of duties of Customs, if any, set opposite each of the said items, and to provide that the following items, enumerations and rates of duties be inserted in said Schedule A.:

| Tariff Items | — | British Preferential Tariff. | Intermediate Tariff. | General Tariff. |
| 172 | Books, viz.:—Books on the application of science to industries of all kinds, including books on agriculture, horticulture, forestry, fish and fishing, mining, metallurgy, architecture, electric and other engineering, carpentry, shipbuilding, mechanism, dyeing, bleaching, tanning, weaving and other mechanic arts, and similar industrial books; bibles, prayer-books, psalm and hymn-books, religious tracts, and Sunday school lesson pictures. | Free. | Free. | Free. |
| 483 | Stereotypes, electrotypes and celluloids of books, and bases and matrices and copper shells for the same, whether composed wholly or in part of metal or celluloid..... | Free. | Free. | Free. |
| 698a | Typewriters and writing appliances specially adapted for use only by the blind, under regulations prescribed by the Minister of Customs and Inland Revenue..... | Free. | Free. | Free. |

2. Resolved that it is expedient to amend Chapter 3 of the Acts of 1915 and Chapter 47 of the Acts of 1919, and to strike thereout section 3 of Chapter 3 of the Acts of 1915 and sections 3 and 4 of Chapter 47 of the Acts of 1919.

3. Resolved that it is expedient to provide that the provisions of the foregoing resolutions shall be deemed to have come into operation on the nineteenth day of May, one thousand nine hundred and twenty, and to apply and to have applied to all goods mentioned in the foregoing resolutions imported or taken out of warehouse for consumption on and after that day, and to have also applied to such goods previously imported for which no entry for consumption was made before that day.

Mr. FIELDING: What is the effect of clause 2?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The effect of that is to repeal entirely the 7½ per cent war tax.

Mr. JACOBS: Were the articles mentioned in items 172, 483 and 698a not on the free list before?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No. The old section putting articles on the free list gave a preference to books and printed material in languages other than English and French. We are doing away with that preference and putting all the languages on the same footing.

[Mr. Tolmie.]

Mr. JACOBS: It puts them all on the free list.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It puts them all on the same footing. Everything you have on that list is absolutely free. The old section read:

> also including books printed in any language other than the English and French languages or in any two languages not being English or French or in any three or more languages.

The effect of this change is to limit the list of absolutely free articles in such a way as to place all publications in any language other than French or English on same basis as those printed in English or French.

Mr. FIELDING: You want to admit the German language.

Mr. JACOBS: The war must be over.

Mr. BUREAU: If I may digress for a moment; before the Minister of Finance came into the House I asked a question of the Prime Minister the reply to which I had been requested to send by telegraph or otherwise to a correspondent. My question was whether electricity and gas would be regarded as manufactured products. There are men engaged in the business of supplying electric light and electricity for domestic purposes, and this being the end of the month they want to send out their bills, but until they have this information they do not know where they are at.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My view of the resolution, and I hope the House will adopt that view, is that neither gas or electricity ought to be taxed, and that no tax will be levied upon them.

Mr. BUREAU: If in view of the statement of the minister these men send out their bills without the one per cent added, they will not be subject, if the House determines otherwise than as the minister has stated, to the penalty which may be imposed under the law.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No.

Mr. FIELDING: The change in the item respecting stereotypes is of the same nature, I presume, as the change in regard to books.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Absolutely the same.

Mr. FIELDING: It leaves out "English and French languages" and applies to all.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Sir Henry Drayton thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. , to amend the Customs Tariff Act, 1907.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

WAYS AND MEANS.

BUSINESS PROFITS WAR TAX ACT, 1916, AMENDMENT.

House again in Committee of Ways and Means, Mr. Boivin in the Chair, on the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend The Business Profits War Tax Act, 1916, and the amendments thereto, and to provide:

1. That the profits earned in any business during any accounting period ending in the year one thousand nine hundred and twenty which do not exceed ten per cent per annum upon the capital employed in such business shall be exempt from the tax prescribed by the Act;

That upon any such profits exceeding ten per cent per annum and not exceeding fifteen per cent per annum there shall be paid a tax equal to twenty per cent of such profits;

That upon any such profits exceeding fifteen per cent per annum and not exceeding twenty per cent per annum there shall be paid a tax equal to thirty per cent of such profits;

That upon any such profits exceeding twenty per cent per annum and not exceeding thirty per cent per annum there shall be paid a tax equal to fifty per cent of such profits;

That upon any such profits exceeding thirty per cent per annum there shall be paid a tax equal to sixty per cent of such profits;

That in the case of a business owned by an incorporated company with a capital of not less than twenty-five thousand dollars and under fifty thousand dollars employed in such business, there shall be paid a tax of twenty per cent of the amount by which the profits earned in such business during any accounting period ending in the year one thousand nine hundred and twenty exceeded ten per cent per annum;

2. That in respect to any business liable to taxation under the said Act having a capital of less than fifty thousand dollars the rates of taxation set forth in section three of the said Act as amended by chapter six of the Statutes of 1917 shall apply in respect of the 1917 and 1918 accounting periods, if twenty per cent or more of such profits have been derived from the manufacture or dealing in munitions of war or materials or supplies of any kind for war purposes;

3. That the period during which the said Act is to be in operation be extended for one year, and that section twenty-six of the said Act be amended by substituting the word "twenty" for the word "nineteen" in the third line thereof, and by substituting the word "seventy-two" for the word "sixty" in the fourth line of the proviso in the said section.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Owing to a typographical error in the sixth paragraph the words "owned by an incorporated company" have crept in. The original resolution did not contain these words. They add nothing to the meaning and I beg to move that they be deleted.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. FIELDING: The phrase "such profits" is intended to mean only the excess, I presume?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes.

Mr. FIELDING: I quite understand that that is the intention, but is it clear on reading the clause.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is the intention, and the Bill will make it absolutely clear.

Mr. FIELDING: I think it is capable of being misunderstood, and I am only drawing my hon. friend's attention to it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I thank my hon. friend. The Bill will make the intention absolutely clear.

Mr. FIELDING: The words "such excessive profits" might be helpful.

Mr. CAHILL: The tax is figured at each point, between 10 and 15 per cent, 15 and 20 per cent, 20 and 30 per cent, and upon the excess over 30 per cent?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is right.

Mr. JACOBS: The other evening in my remarks on the Budget I drew the attention of the minister and the House to the fact that in many cases the amount which is charged by the Government under the excess profits tax is very much larger than the amount charged on a business with a capitalization twice as large. I instanced the case of a business with a capital of $1,000,000, where a profit of 50 per cent, or $500,000, was made. The owner of that business would be required to pay to the Government, under the new proposals $185,000, while if the capital employed was only $500,000 the tax would be very much greater. I do not know whether I make myself perfectly clear, but my point is this: where a business with a capital of $1,000,000 is being carried on and a profit of $500,000 is made, the Government takes an excess profits tax of $185,000, whereas if the capital employed is only $500,000, and $500,000 profit is made, the amount to be paid to the Government under the new proposals would be about $250,000. So that we have this anomalous situation, that where two companies both make a profit of $500,000 each, the one which has a capital of $500,000 pays into the coffers of the Government $250,000 and the other with a capital of $1,000,000 pays only $185,000. I think that is a glaring anomaly which the minister should carefully consider with a view to affording some relief.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The hon. member has pointed out one of the anomalies and direct injustices of all these excess profits taxes. But they are all formed on the same basis. They are not formed with any regard to the amount of effort or anything else that is required in order to obtain a given result. In all taxes of this kind, the one consideration is the amount of money actually employed, and there is no doubt that where you have an active, energetic management which, by extra work and superior business acumen, turns over its capital four or five times a year as compared with another that turns its capital over only once or twice a year, the same amount of capital is utilized to a far greater extent and with greater advantage to the country; and while such a management must be penalized under any system, there is this to be said, that the anomaly is now far less marked than formerly.

Mr. JACOBS: May I point out to the minister a concrete case which I have in mind, it having been brought to my attention. A business in Montreal has a capital of $500,000. It borrows from the bank another $500,000, so that it is working on a million dollars. It makes on this million dollars a profit of $500,000. Fifty per cent of that is paid into the Government's coffers, that is to say, $250,000. Another business does not require to borrow a cent from the bank. It has a million dollars of its own, and because it has not to borrow from the bank it merely pays into the treasury $185,000. Why should a man who has only half a million dollars and borrows a like sum from the bank have to pay $65,000 more than the man who happens to have a million dollars of his own money invested. This is a glaring injustice. It is not right and it cannot be justified in any way by the Government, so far as I can see. Why not make both pay $250,000? I am not urging for a moment that the man who has to pay $250,000 should not pay it; but why should a man who has a million dollars of his own and is not under any necessity to borrow from the bank not pay $250,000 the same as the other man?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is another illustration of the difficulty of working out anything like an absolutely fair basis. There is, however, a real difference between the two cases. In the first instance the company have collected and invested permanently their own money; in the other case they are able to get hold of only half the amount they require to look after their business, and therefore in regard to the other half they have to make their business a direct charge to that extent upon the public credits afforded by the banks of the country. Loans are always changing and fluctuating. They do not represent money really invested in the business and therefore are not capital. Let me point out, however, that the business such as my hon. friend speaks of is protected to this extent, that the full amount of the interest which they pay is deducted from their profit, being looked upon as an expense. If they pay 6 or 7 per cent interest it is deducted.

Mr. JACOBS: That is to say, if they borrow $500,000 from the bank, $35,000 interest is deducted before a penny is paid to the Government. But what about the $250,000 of actual net profit made irrespective of the $35,000. My hon. friend does not seem to realize that the man who is able to get half a million dollars from the bank in these days of stress and strain deserves some consideration at the hands of the Government. He requires to be a clever man to do that, and after he has succeeded in doing it and has $500,000 in his possession, he is mulcted to the extent of $250,000. Surely the Government does not persist in this course, because to my mind it is one of the most glaring injustices of the whole Budget, and there should be some relief.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: He is a very fortunate man who manages to make such a large return upon the sum of $500,000.

Mr. JACOBS: Not on $500,000; on a million.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No; his own money is only $500,000.

Mr. JACOBS: The amount invested is a million.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Let me say that I do not attempt to defend the business profits tax as a matter of principle. It was an absolute necessity, and after all it afforded one rough and ready way, and a fairly effective way of recovering to the nation exorbitant profits. It would be entirely improper to change that tax this year, when every single thing that could have been passed on to the public has been passed on, and the business has been conducted as it was under the Act which is now in force. So far as next year is concerned, I think that hon. gentlemen will agree that we have gone a long way towards removing the objections that have been raised to the Act.

Mr. JACOBS: Do I understand that the minister promises that next year the statute will be repealed?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I never like promising anything which I know I cannot do. I am making no promises, but the taxes of next year, under these proposed resolutions, are on a materially lower plane than the taxes which will be collected this year or those that were collected last year.

Mr. JACOBS: I understand that the minister admits that the system is a rough and ready one.

Mr. LAPOINTE: In reading over the Business Profits Tax Act this morning I notice that there are certain exemptions which will be continued under the new Bill. For instance, all companies or associations, 90 per cent of whose capital is owned by a province or a municipality, are exempt from the provisions of this measure. I think that in certain cases this constitutes a discrimination which is unfair. Take the question of electricity, to which my hon. friend (Mr. Bureau) referred a few moments ago. In the province from which I come the service is performed by privately owned companies. It is not my intention to discuss the merits of public ownership or of private ownership; in my province we are satisfied with the system that is in force; and as was shown in an article published in Toronto Saturday Night of last week, the consumers of electricity in the city of Montreal who are served by privately owned companies are paying a less price than the consumers in the city of Toronto. What I wish to say is this: The advocates of public ownership generally contend, as one of their main arguments, that no privileges should be granted to anybody. Well, there should be no privileges in this instance. I say that the consumers or the sellers of electricity—in any part of the country whether the enterprise is owned by a province or by a municipality or by private company—should be treated in the same way, and should pay the same taxation to the federal treasury. I have nothing to say against the Hydro-Electric Commission of Ontario—on the contrary, I hope it will be very successful—but I submit that that commission which is selling the same article that is being sold by privately owned companies in Quebec, should be subject to the same taxation as those private companies are subject to. I think that it is only fair and just that it should be so, especially when we recollect the competition that is going on with a view of attracting industries. All sections of the country are inviting industries to come and locate in their respective localities, with the promise of power for their development, and there is no doubt that where exemption from taxation is in force it gives an advantage to that particular section of country. I say that taxation should be the same in all sections of the country; the same article should be taxed in the same way throughout the country, and the consumers of power, or of any other article, should be dealt with in the same way no matter in what part of Canada they may be. Therefore I submit that this exemption should be eliminated from the Bill.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. BUREAU: No, Mr. Chairman. In my opinion the remarks of my hon. friend from Quebec East are justified. We know that there are two classes of concerns distributing electrical power in Eastern Canada. There is the Hydro-Electric Power Commission, which is owned by the Ontario Government, and in the province of Quebec there are privately owned companies, and the patrons of the latter are supplied with the electricity at a cheaper rate than is the case in Ontario. Now, what do the respective consumers have to put up in connection with the excess profits tax? I am not desirous of arguing against publicly owned enterprises—there are arguments enough on other grounds—but let me point out that in round figures last year the Montreal Light, Heat and Power Consolidated paid to the Government $466,043.27, the Shawinigan Falls Company, $151,000, the Southern Canada Power Company, $4,000, the Laurentide Power Company, $31,000, and the Quebec Railway, Light, Heat and Power Company, $9,000. Here is practically the sum of $750,000 paid into the Federal Exchequer by these companies as excess profits whereas the Hydro-Electric Commission does not pay a cent. That constitutes a discrimination which is unfair to privately owned companies. Let me illustrate to you how it works. I remember that during the war the English Forgings Company went to Toronto and located, although the Shawinigan Power Company offered them cheaper power—power delivered at the outside wall of the proposed building— for nothing, whereas the Hydro-Electric made a charge of $80,000. Experts were also obtained to show what the salvage of the buildings would be at tide-water as compared with an inland port, and I think the difference in favour of the former amounted to from one million and three-quarters to two millions. There is a decided unfairness in such a form of discrimination when public ownership is competing against private ownership. I say it is not fair to exempt the producers of electricity in one province from taxation, and in other provinces make them contribute to the public exchequer. Suppose the capitalization of these companies were such as to entitle the federal exchequer to a million or two million dollars in taxation? Well, a provincially or municipally owned company would be exempt from this taxation, and the people in the rest of the country would have to make it up. I say that the burden of taxation in such a case as this ought not to be taken away from a particular province and imposed on other provinces.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think we are just a little at cross purposes in connection with this matter, and I fear my hon. friends do not quite appreciate the real position. There is no tax on electricity; there is no tax on any consumer or any producer of electricity anywhere.

Mr. BUREAU: Producers.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: At the present time we are talking about the excess business profits tax; and it makes no difference whatever, as a matter of fact, whether the exemption be retained or not. There will be no taxes whatever paid by the Hydro, they are not running it to make excess profits or, in fact, to make profits at all; they are merely running the enterprise so that the investment will be carried and the consumer obtain the electrical product which he consumes at cost. Let us remember that this tax that we are talking about is merely an excess profits tax, so that there is absolutely nothing that you could assess against the Hydro-Electric Commission.

Mr. BUREAU: Who benefits by it?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Further, it is not a question of benefiting this section or that section, nor does the incidence result in benefiting this section or that section. The only people that are benefited one way or another or that are hurt one way or another, are the shareholders who have been getting a profit, which has been defined to be an excessive profit, during the war period, and therefore have to pay something out of those excessive profits. Now there are no shareholders that can be hit in the Hydro-Electric—there are no shareholders obtaining any profits. Again, it is not any particular section that is hit. The shareholders of the Shawinigan Company do not live in Shawinigan, they live all over the Dominion, and there are probably as many, if not more, shareholders of that company in Ontario as in Quebec. But it is those individuals who are entitled to the excess profits who suffer rather than the consumers of electricity. Indeed, as the hon. gentleman pointed out at the commencement of his remarks, if it be true that power is supplied cheaper by the Shawinigan Company than by the Hydro, then if there is anything in the argument that the section which has the cheapest power is helped as against other sections the section served by the Shawinigan Company has the advantage.

Mr. BUREAU: My statement is from Saturday Night of May 29.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This tax does not enter into the cost of electricity to the consumer, because it is merely the excess profits that are subject to the tax. It is entirely in the hands of the directors of a company to say whether they are going to insist on getting excess profits out of which they will pay something to the general public. There is also no difference of taxation to the extent of discriminating in favour of any particular section, because all the consumer is interested in is the price he pays, and there is no tax on the current he buys. The costs of the Shawinigan Power Company are not advanced five cents by this tax; and the profits of the Hydro Commission would be no greater and no less whether the tax applied to them or not. If this tax were imposed on the amount of electricity used by the consumer, so that the cost to him was increased in these sections and was reduced in those sections, then I think my hon. friends point would be perfectly correct. But over and above all these considerations, I do not think that the Crown, acting in the right of the Dominion, has ever yet thought that it had power to tax the Crown in the right of the provinces.

Mr. BUREAU: The Hydro Commission could be taxed the same as the Intercolonial Railway Commission has been sued heretofore. It is only a fiction, anyway.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think my hon. friend will agree with me when I say that that commission—

Mr. BUREAU: The principle is right.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON:— acting as it does for the Ontario Government and supported as it is entirely by grants from the Ontario Government and by income received from the municipalities, has its property vested in the Crown in the right of the province.

Mr. BUREAU: Absolutely.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: And I do not think my hon. friend would suggest that this Parliament would have the right to tax such property.

Mr. BUREAU: But you could tax the commission itself. We had the same fiction about the Intercolonial Railway Commission some years ago. On the principle that the King can do no wrong we had to proceed by petition of right. But it became an abuse when a man who had a cow killed on the track or lost a bag of flour in transit had to come to the Governor in Council to get a petition. We got over that by substituting the commission for the Crown.

Mr. FIELDING: The excess profits of the Canadian National Railway Company will come under the operation of this Bill?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think they ought to.

Mr. FIELDING: The stock of that company is vested in the Crown, and according to my hon. friend's contention it cannot be reached because it is so vested. But perhaps we had better wait until the company earn some profits.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think my hon. friend is speaking ironically; but, if taken seriously, it would not be a very profitable matter for the stockholder to tax the stockholder, which would be in effect the result of bringing the company under this law.

Mr. BUREAU: Perhaps if we taxed the deficits we would get more revenue.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I quite realize that electricity as such is not taxed, and of course if it were taxed in one province and not in another the action would be indefensible. But my hon. friend says that the Hydro Electric Commission is not operated for the purpose of making profits. Of course, that means that the revenue is used to develop the property and, as a result, give cheaper power to the consumers. In that, it seems to me, there is a discrimination, because the stockholders of a private company cannot do the same under the Business Profits War Tax. Under subsection 3 of section 6 it is provided:

> No deductions from the gross profits for depreciation or for any expenditure of a capital nature for renewals, or for the development of a business, or otherwise in respect of the business, shall be allowed, except such amount as appears to the minister to be reasonable and to be properly attributable to the accounting period, and the minister when determining the profits derived from mining shall make an allowance for the exhaustion of the mines.

Another section provides that a company shall not sell its products or goods at a price below what the minister may consider to be a fair price. In this case there is a discrimination, because the Hydro Electric Power Commission not only has the right to do that, but its purpose is to employ its profits to lower the selling price of its electricity. Why should consumers in other parts of the country be deprived of the same privilege of having their electricity cheaper as a result of the good management of the company?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would like to ask the hon. gentleman a question.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am asking questions.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Can he tell me how it is feasible for this House to force the Hydro Electric Commission to make excessive profits, even if we wanted the commission to do so?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not think we can

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then the whole of this discussion is beside the mark.

Mr. VIEN: In what way would it be more subversive of the existing principle to tax the Hydro Electric Commission than to submit the National railways to municipal taxation? We have admitted the principle in regard to the National railways. It seems to me that the same principle could be applied to the Hydro Electric Commission by submitting it to the operation of this Act.

Mr. JACOBS: Hear, hear.

Mr. VIEN: The same principle applies.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the object of this Act but to tax excess profits? Is it to put a premium on excess profits and to raise the cost of carrying on business and the cost of living? Or is it to reduce those costs? The Act has a two-fold purpose: First, to try and get something back out of excess profits; second, to coax the people, if you will, so to run their business that they will not make excess profits, and therefore will not be subject to the tax.

Mr. VIEN: But the minister sees where we are driving to. We are trying to prevent the consumers in other provinces being called upon to pay an excess amount, because they will be charged so much more for current if the various corporations distributing electricity are called upon to pay the taxation that the minister proposes to impose. In other words, we are trying to put the consumers in the other provinces on about the same basis as that enjoyed by those in Ontario by reason of the exemption of the Hydro Electric Commission from this taxation.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does my hon. friend consider that a rate of 10 per cent is a fair profit for a public utility?

Mr. VIEN: Undoubtedly.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Very good. Then there is no tax. And if any of these companies realize more than 10 per cent on their investment, I would like to ask my hon. friend whether they should not be taxed?

Mr. VIEN: If you tax them, what will the result be?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If my hon. friend will bear with me a minute. He has very kindly answered my question and admitted that 10 per cent is a good return for a public utility. I ask him one further question, which of necessity follows the first: Is it unfair to have an excess profits tax on profits from public utilities which are realizing more than a 10 per cent dividend?

Mr. BUREAU: As a question of principle, I say yes, it is unfair.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am afraid that I have to take issue with my hon. friend.

Mr. BUREAU: The basic principle is that the burden of the taxation ought to bear evenly on all citizens of the country, and in the case of two business enterprises having similar amounts of capital invested, one should not be called upon to pay while the other is not. The idea of the Hydro-Electric is that the profits should be re-invested for the benefit of the consumer. In provinces where there is not such a system as the Hydro-Electric, the consumer of a similar product has to pay what the Hydro-Electric would pay if it were a privately-owned company.

Mr. BURNHAM: Does the hon. gentleman not say that the privately-owned company sells electricity at a lower rate than the publicly-owned company.

Mr. BUREAU: I took that from Saturday Night. I repeat that these publicly-owned systems should not be exempt from taxation; the burden of taxation should be apportioned evenly among all the taxpayers.

Mr. COWAN: Why does not this private company reduce its rates and thus escape the excess profits tax?

Mr. BUREAU: Because the company has not the country behind it; it has to assume all the risk, and it has to provide for the future. It is the same thing with your national railways. I was going to suggest that we tax deficits on these publicly-owned utilities; we would make more money that way than by taxing profits. The people who are imbued with the idea of public ownership do not realize that there can be profits; they come with a deficit at the end of each year.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not wish to be understood as saying anything against public ownership. What I claim is that when a province or municipality chooses to enter the business of trading or manufacturing it should be placed in exactly the same position as other traders or manufacturers.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I would direct the attention of my hon. friend (Mr. Bureau) to the experience in Winnipeg, where we established a publicly-owned electric power system.

Mr. BUREAU: What about your telephone system?

Mr. RICHARDSON: They cut the cost of electric power to the consumers in Winnipeg and vicinity about one-third, and are paying a handsome profit in addition. Moreover, they compel competing companies to reduce their rates.

Mr. BUREAU: Let them pay taxes to the federal treasury, then.

Mr. RICHARDSON: The idea is not to pay taxes; they try to give the consumers service at cost.

Mr. BUREAU: Us for ourselves.

Mr. RICHARDSON: No, they pay interest on the investment.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Sinn Fein.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I desire to make a slight amendment to clause 2. I move that the resolution be amended by striking out the word "and" in the fourth line thereof and replacing the same by a comma, and by adding after "1918" the words "and 1919."

Mr. FIELDING: Is that an additional tax you are imposing?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is to cover an accounting period with respect to profits on munitions.

Mr. FIELDING: Are you sure you do not need a new resolution?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not think it is an additional tax at all. No munitions operations were carried on in 1919, but there has been such delay in accounting in one or two instances that we want to make it clear that munitions profits for 1918, although accounted for in 1919, are taxable.

Mr. JACOBS: In many cases these munitions companies have already accounted and gone out of business. Does the minister propose to rake these over again?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Oh no, nothing of that kind is thought of. The Act of 1917 was designed to make manufacturers in the small class subject to the ordinary smaller rate of taxation, but manufacturers in that small class who took up munition work and made taxable profits out of it would be chargeable in the higher scale. Settlements have been made in almost all cases, but they are not entirely complete, and the issue is now being raised that the legislation of 1917 did not have the effect of applying to these unaccounted for operations. We think it had; the Department of Justice advises us that it had, and practically the whole matter has been closed on that basis. This will ensure that all will be treated alike; that those who have not yet completed their accounting will be treated exactly the same as others were treated.

Mr. JACOBS: Those who have already paid have been obliged to pay on this basis?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Absolutely.

Mr. JACOBS: This resolution is simply to make clear the law of last year?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes.

Mr. PEDLOW: Do the words "such profits" in the fifth line refer to gross profits or to net profits?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Net profits.

Mr. PEDLOW: It is not so stated.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I shall be glad to see that that is made right in the Bill.

Amendment agreed to.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (Minister of Finance) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 157, to amend the Business Profits War Tax Act, 1916.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

WAYS AND MEANS—INCOME WAR TAX.

The House again in Committee of Ways and Means.—Sir Henry Drayton (Minister of Finance)—Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend The Income War Tax Act, 1917, and the amendments thereto, and to provide:

1. That the taxes and surtaxes, including the tax upon corporations and joint stock companies, leviable and payable under the provisions of section four of the said Act as enacted by chapter fifty-five of the Statutes of 1919 shall each be increased by five per centum on incomes of five thousand dollars and upwards, such increases to apply to all taxes and surtaxes leviable for any income received during the calendar year nineteen hundred and nineteen, or the income of any accounting period ending in nineteen hundred and nineteen, as the case may be, and for each calendar year or accounting period thereafter;

2. That each person liable to taxation under the said Act and the amendments thereto for the calendar year nineteen hundred and twenty or any accounting period ending in the year nineteen hundred and twenty and for each calendar year or accounting period thereafter shall deliver to the Minister of Finance, with each annual return of his income prescribed by section seven of the said Act as amended, an amount equal to at least one-fourth of the amount of the tax and surtax, if any, payable by such person according to such return, and shall pay the balance, if any, of such tax and surtax in not more than three bi-monthly instalments thereafter, together with interest at the rate of six per centum per annum from the date prescribed for making such return up to the time of the payment of such instalment;

3. That any person making a return of income less than the correct amount shall pay the additional amount of tax and surtax due and in addition interest at the rate of ten per centum upon such amount until the same is paid.

If such deficiency exceeds ten per centum but is under twenty per centum, such person shall also pay an amount equal to one-half of the amount of such deficiency in addition, and if such deficiency amounts to twenty per centum or more such person shall pay an amount equal to the amount of such deficiency in addition.

Mr. DENIS: What is to be done in regard to those who did not make reports in previous years? There is in the law provision that those who did not make reports in previous years are liable to very severe penalties. I do not know of any such penalties having been imposed, although there is no doubt that thousands of persons in Canada have not made reports according to law. Recently, if I understand the matter aright, those who should have made their reports by the end of April and who did not do so were granted a delay until the end of May, and if they did not make their reports before the end of May, they are to be fined 25 per cent of the tax. Many people who should have made reports under the old law, did not do so, and I would suggest that the Government should take some steps to straighten out this condition of affair. I do not approve of imposing the penalties provided in the law on those who, for some reason or another, did not make their reports, because this is a law which the average man finds it hard to understand, and therefore, I would feel like being lenient towards such people. But this is a question which should be settled, because there are actually suspended over the heads of these people enormous penalties, although, as a matter of fact, these penalties have not been imposed. The Government should announce their policy as to whether these penalties are to be imposed or not, and as to what is to be done regarding persons who, according to law, should have made reports in past years and who did not do so.

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No attempt is being made to make these penalties retroactive. They are not.

Mr. DENIS: That is not the point I raised at all. I know the penalties are not retroactive. Under the old law a person who should have made a report for 1917, or 1918, or 1919, and who did not make a report, was liable to a certain penalty. There is no question that when the Government begin to delve into this matter, they will find out that thousands of people who should have made reports for those years did not do so. Consequently, according to the law in force at that time, those people would be liable to very severe penalties, and I think they should not be subjected to those penalties, because this is a new law very difficult of application; but in the meantime, these people should be made to pay what they owe to the Government.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We are endeavouring to collect taxes. I am afraid I shall have to take issue with my hon. friend. We must so frame the law that it is going to pay people to pay taxes rather than run the risk of what will happen if they attempt to evade taxation. The hon. gentleman asks what has been done in connection with these penalties. If I remember rightly, we commenced taking proceedings last August. There art two sets of proceedings: There are proceedings in the police court which are taken when a man does not make a report which he ought to make, and there are proceedings by way of action to force a taxpayer to pay moneys which his return shows, ought to have been paid to the Government, which payments he has not made. On the one hand it is obviously absolutely improper that the Act should be allowed to be looked upon merely as a polite invitation to make a governmental contribution, and on the other hand it is equally improper that the Act should be unduly harshly and improperly forced. What I mean by that is this. I hope it is not going to be necessary to sue and to prosecute every defaulter; it ought not to be; but it is necessary from time to time to issue these writs and these proceedings, and largely as a result of issuing writs and police court proceedings, the collection of income taxes last year increased by 100 per cent. I do not think that any undue hardship has been shown in what has been done. 120 writs have been issued throughout the whole country for the purpose of educating the people as much as possible in regard to the matter and making them realize that these taxes must be paid. Of these 120 actions, 40 are still in progress and may or may not go to trial, and 80 have been settled by the taxpayer paying everything he ought to pay in addition to all penalties and costs to date. Over and above that, police court proceedings to the number of 96 have been taken throughout the whole country with the same object in view, and out of them we have obtained 55 convictions, we have two acquittals, six cases standing on adjournments and 33 cases awaiting trial in the criminal courts.

Mr. PROULX: Have fines imposed by police courts been remitted to defaulters?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The department has remitted absolutely none, and, of course, that is not a matter for the department to do; that is entirely a matter of clemency on the part of the executive, and any action which might be taken would be taken through the department of the Solicitor General. My impression, although I may be wrong, is that none has been remitted. Certainly, if any fines have been remitted, the number would be very small, and such action would be taken only in exceptional circumstances. The fines collected in connection with these criminal prosecutions amount to $33,000. My hon. friend (Mr. Denis) asks what the policy of the Government is. The policy is to collect taxes with the greatest possible celerity. The policy further is absolutely to enforce the provisions of the statute. The hon. gentlemen asks whether the penalties are imposed for delays. They are. Under the Act of last year, if the return is late the penalty is automatically added to the Bill. If anything has been overlooked, I can assure the hon. gentleman it is an oversight.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think my hon. friend has somewhat mistaken the purport of the remarks of the hon. member for Joliette. I do not think my hon. friend from Joliette had in mind directing attention particularly to penalties or the enforcement of penalties. What he was anxious to ascertain was whether the Government has devised machinery that is complete enough to make perfectly sure that every person in this country who ought to pay an income tax does pay that tax, not for this year only but for the past one or two years, because it is pretty generally known that a good many people did not make returns in previous years. We are anxious to know what machinery the Government has at the present time for securing payments that should have been made in previous years, and whether a special effort is being made in that direction.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes, we are making efforts in that direction. Undoubtedly the returns for the 1917 assessment do not represent the full amount payable, and for that accounting period we have since collected the sum of $6,000,000, and we are following up every accounting period in the same way. Whenever a new citizen who ought to be a taxpayer is found, the tax is not limited to this present year, but is taken back to the very first accounting period. In every single list that I can think of, or that can be thought of—assessment rolls of municipalities, membership of clubs, automobile owners, stockholders in institutions, bondholders of companies, people who receive dividends from any source—all these are being made use of in order to find out who ought to pay the tax, and if we can make it more stringent we shall be happy to do so.

Mr. JACOBS: To give an example of the efficiency of the department, last year in the Budget debate I committed the egregious folly of saying the income tax was a joke. Well, within a very few hours I got my tax bill. This year hon. gentlemen notice that I do not complain of the income tax being a joke.

Mr. SHEARD: Is any provision made to cover cases of dispute between a taxpayer making his return and the department? For instance, a man might claim certain exemptions on account of taxes already paid, repairs to property deducted out of rents, and so on. It is provided here that a cheque for 25 per cent of the amount shall accompany the return. In case of a dispute is there any provision permitting that return to be subject to adjustment without penalty?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Cases of disputed assessment are taken up at headquarters, and the thing is checked over there again. If the matter cannot be adjusted in the light of the further information which head office is usually able to give the taxpayer then has the right of recourse to a court of revision, which he may have established at any time he likes. So far as the cheque is concerned, the idea at any rate is that while the taxpayer must make his returns promptly, an equal responsibility rests upon the department of immediately investigating the correctness of his statements and of returning any surplus which he may have paid.

Mr. SHEARD: Suppose the mistake is the other way and the taxpayer has not paid enough?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This provision refers, not to a mistake in calculation the taxpayer may make in getting at the tax, but to mistakes in showing his income, which he knows.

Mr. McKENZIE: I do not quite appreciate why such penalties are attached to the collection of this debt, because that is what this tax is. I think we might expect a little more leniency from the Crown and the Government than from the ordinary man who has a debt to collect. This tax is only a debt. It is not a fine. It is not imposed because of any infringement of the law. It is a mere debt, just as the taxes a man pays to a municipality or a town are a debt. If he does not pay those debts, he is subject to the law for the collection of debt. If he does not pay his taxes the minute they are due, he is not subject to imprisonment, and why should he be penalized because he happens to make default in the payment of this tax? I agree that this tax should be collected as expeditiously as possible, but why not provide simple machinery by which a man might perhaps give a short term note for the whole amount? Then if he did not pay the amount when due, he would be subject to be sued; but why a man should be subject to 6 and 10 per cent interest being added, and a fine of some thousand dollars, and imprisonment if he does not pay the fine, I do not quite understand. The minister boasts about the great number of prosecutions they have had as if it were a glorious thing. They have collected a great many fines, he says. They have been holding a bludgeon perhaps over the heads of some poor people of this country because they could not pay the tax. I repeat, this is a mere debt due from the individual to the Crown which should be collected as expeditiously and as cheaply and as humanly as possible. I do not think it is anything for the minister to boast about that, because he has Parliament behind him, he is imposing heavy fines upon people and bringing a lot of them into court. I do not think it is anything to boast about that he has collected in fines the sum of $32,000 from the people of this country. Income taxation is a new thing. The people are not accustomed to it, and I think the greatest possible leniency should be exercised in collecting the tax. The simplest kind of machinery should be provided, and the amplest notice should be given to the people, because lots of them do not understand this thing at all. I submit to the minister that instead of boasting about the machinery he has provided, he should adopt the simplest possible and the least expensive methods of collecting the tax.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I may say that, not perhaps for the first time, I find myself diametrically opposed to the spirited remarks of my hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie). I do not think this is simply a debt. It is a duty to the state; it is a civilian and financial duty to the state comparable to the military duty of the soldier, not in the matter of risk, but in the matter of duty. If a soldier in the ranks defaults, if he deserts, he is shot. What the people of Canada want at the present moment is to be inspired by the example of the soldier in the trenches. I think every civilian in Canada should bring to the work of reconstruction in Canada for a period of six years anyhow, as against the four or five years of the war, the same spirit the boys showed, and had to show, in the trenches. I do not think I need say another word in strong support and commendation of the attitude of the minister in this regard. There is no commoner criticism by the man in the street of this Government than that there has been laxity in the collection of the income tax and in the enforcement of the Act, and my hon. friend (Sir Henry Drayton), I am sure, will meet that criticism best by carrying out his duties in the spirit of the remarks he made a short time ago.

Mr. VIEN: Although I appreciate fully the remarks made by the hon. member for Red Deer that the duty of a taxpayer is very similar to the duty of a soldier who is called upon to serve, I must say that his remarks were not to the point raised by my hon. friend (Mr. Denis) and my hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie). These gentlemen do not pretend that it is not the duty of the taxpayer to pay the tax, but they do say that the taxpayer, like the soldier, should be instructed in regard to the nature of the duty which is expected of him. The soldier in the ranks is not called upn to fill any perilous post until he has been thoroughly trained in the work which his duty involves. The taxpayer of Canada is now charged with the responsibility of complying with entirely new regulations, and while he has no desire to evade that responsibility and escape paying his tax he certainly does want to know just what he has to do. I would submit to the minister, not critically but as a constructive suggestion, that pamphlets should be very widely circulated among the public, giving all the details in regard to the application of the law; and that on the forms themselves which the taxpayers are called upon to fill up complete information should be given so that no one may be taken by surprise. Personally, I did not know that 25 per cent had to be paid as a penalty if the statement was not made within a certain period. I realize quite well that ignorance of the law is no excuse; but when a new law such as this is introduced it seems to me that some consideration should be given to the public, who are not posted on matters that are passed in Parliament. I therefore suggest to the minister that these pamphlets be distributed in all post offices and other stations where forms are given for the taxpayer to make his return. I do not see why any one should be penalized to any serious extent because of some slight omission or some trivial error in regard to the making of returns, and before any drastic steps are taken I certainly think that the taxpayer, just like the soldier, should be fully instructed in his duty.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I entirely appreciate the suggestion of the hon. member, and I think that probably he more correctly understands the attitude of the Government than does the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie). The Government is not taking any delight in prosecutions, and there is absolutely no such idea in any one's head. Prosecuting is a nasty thing to have to do, but because it is nasty and undesirable is nevertheless no reason why it should not be done when the country has been defrauded of moneys which are properly payable to it. We welcome all constructive citicism, and I should like my hon. friend to supplement his suggestions. Now, what we have done this year is to advertise, in every single daily newspaper published in this country, the fact that these returns must be made. Furthermore, you will find the advertisements in every weekly paper in Canada. These advertisements have run for a period of six weeks, and they are to be found in almost every newspaper at least six times. In addition to that, tens of thousands of pamphlets have been distributed, and you will see them in shop windows, on billboards and in street cars. We have done everything we could possibly think of to advertise the tax and the penalty that will be imposed if the return is not made.

Mr. DENIS: The minister is inviting constructive criticism and I know that he is considering this subect in a broad and conciliatory spirit, and in that spirit I wish to submit to him a case that came to my notice some time ago. A rich farmer came to me and said that he had his report all ready but there was a question in regard to which he found himself in a quandary to make an answer. He was asked whether he had made his report for the year 1919.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: 1918.

Mr. DENIS: Yes, 1918. This question was asked in the report and he pointed out that if he had said "Yes" he would not be telling the truth, whereas if he gave an answer in the negative he would be placing himself in the hands of the Government officials who would immediately take civil proceedings against him. On the other hand, if he made no report now he might obviate the necessity for making the answer and would so avoid the consequences of his negligence. He wanted to know what he should do; it was a question whether or not he should make his report. The fact that he had made no report in 1918 was due either to his ignorance of the law or to a misapprehension as to its exact provisions, call it what you will. It is a fact, however, that when a new law such as this is enacted numerous mistakes of every description occur. This man said that his failure to make the report was not due to any desire to evade his responsibility, but he was now in a dilemma and he wanted to know what I, as a lawyer, would suggest in the circumstances. I replied that I would take no responsibility in the matter, but I pointed out that if he made no report now he might stand a chance of escaping; while, on the other hand, if he reported, he would have to tell the truth and put up with the consequences. I left him to take his choice. Perhaps some one will suggest that I was not doing my duty as a lawyer in putting the situation before that man as I did. Well, I have my own view so far as that is concerned; but now I shall do my duty as a member of this House and as representing that man among others and ask that in such a case some opportunity be given to a taxpayer to make a report without any apprehension in the matter. Will you not allow him to make his report for the past year when he does that? At all events surely you are not going to ruin him with the very heavy penalties which are being imposed by this law? Give him a chance to make his report and if you do so then I will call him back to my office and say, "Now is the time to make your report. Make your report and tell your friends in your parish, and in the next parish and everywhere, that they have to make reports—that the Government has afforded them the opportunity of making reports without being strangled." They will make their reports accordingly and in future the law will run smoothly. If a man who has once made a report should not continue to report he will be in bad faith, there is no question about it. But when it comes to making the first report, and when we come across a man in such a case as I have mentioned, I think the Government should afford him an opportunity to make his reports. In the meantime I say to the minister this is one of the reasons which prevents the collection of other taxes, because these people are afraid to make their first report for fear they will be called on to pay penalties in respect to it. I want it well understood: they do not refuse to pay for the past year, but they are afraid of the very heavy penalties to which they will be exposed the very moment they make their first report.

Mr. CROTHERS: I was very glad to hear the Minister of Finance state that he would welcome any suggestions that might improve the methods of collecting the income tax. I think the great majority of the people regard an income tax of any sort as an unwelcome visitor; and it is doubly unwelcome if the provisions are so complicated that the ordinary man does not understand how the sum that is required to be paid has to be made up. We have three statutes, or portions of statutes, in operation in regard to the income tax, and I suppose we will have another this session, which will make four. We have now in operation the normal, the super tax and the surtax. The last has always seemed to me most absurd; it is not a tax on something that is coming in, but it is a tax on something we are paying out. That is, the normal and supertax are added together and there is a tax put upon the aggregate of the two sums, which is called the surtax. I do not know whether there is any such tax as that in England. There is not in the United States. They have two kinds there. What we call the supertax they call the surtax; there they have only the two kinds, the normal tax and the surtax.

[Mr. Denis.]

Now the system is very complicated as it stands together; the man of ordinary ability cannot make it out at all. I want to confess that with the figures from the Finance Department before me, and taking up the three statutes—1917, 1918 and 1919—I laboured a whole half day and I could not for the life of me make out from those three statutes the authority for the figures sent me—I have no doubt they are correct—from the Finance Department. Now the ordinary man cannot make them out at all. I have spoken to a great many on the subject and they have said, "The whole thing is so complicated I cannot understand it. I accepted the figures of the department and said no more about it." That is all very well. The Finance Department, I take it, have sent out correct figures, but I, for one, want to take the statutes and see how those figures are arrived at. I think every man would like to do that, but as the statutes stand to-day he cannot do it. There are so many amendments and sub-amendments, so many clauses and sub-clauses, that you cannot figure out the authority for the sum they say you owe. What is the proposition now? It is that a man who is liable to pay an income tax shall not wait until he is notified by the Finance Department of the amount of this tax, and it is thought that is going to simplify matters. I venture to say that instead of simplifying matters, the work of the Finance Department is going to be doubled. I don't believe that one man in ten will be able to make out correctly the amount he has to pay. I confess I am not able to do it with the three existing taxes, and with a fourth I shall despair entirely.

Mr. PROULX: Your income is too large.

Mr. CROTHERS: What is going to happen? A man will make out the figures in a way—he is obliged to do that, otherwise he will be penalized—and will send them in to the Finance Department; but I will venture to say that in nine cases out of ten the figures will be wrong and the Finance Department will have to prepare the figures over again themselves, thereby greatly increasing the work of the staff. I want to suggest that these taxes should be simplified so that an ordinary man can understand what is required. How can that be done? To-day a married man is exempt up to $2,000. On the first thousand above that he is taxed 2 per cent, which is $20. I am not objecting to that, perhaps it is all right, but on the amount over and above $2,000, why not make it 2½ or 3 per cent; if it is $3,000, 4 per cent; if it is 4,000 or $5,000, 5 per cent—I just give these figures as illustrations; I do not mention them as the proper percentages—and carry them on right up to $50,000, $100,000, $200,000, $500,000 and $1,000,000. Then when a man has ascertained what his income is it is a very easy matter to determine what amount of tax he should pay; for example in the case of $3,000, it would be 3 per cent, after deducting $2,000 for exemption. It seems to me that would make the matter perfectly simple and in that way you could get after the man with a large income just as well as you can now. Figuring out my income it would be about 5 per cent on the whole sum. If your income is so many thousand dollars it will be a simple matter to apply the percentage to it, and there is the result at once; it would not require a Philadelphia lawyer, or any other lawyer, to figure it out for you. As I say, it is of greatest importance that the matter be simplified. I would consolidate these four statutes and express the purpose in a few words so that anybody could understand it; as it is now nobody comprehends these statutes. Why should you not make the law as simple as possible so that every man might know how the sum he is required to pay is made up, and then be able to figure it out himself and see if the amount asked for is right and verify it? Personally I am in favour of there being no exemptions whatever, except perhaps where incomes are less than $500, and for two reasons. I have previously suggested that a man whose income is $500 should be required to pay one-quarter of 1 per cent, which would be $1.25. That man has to go right down into his pocket and get $1.25. He realizes that his country is heavily in debt and that the income tax has been imposed for relieving the country, at least partially, of that debt. The payment of such a tax would exert an educative influence on that man. If the income is $1,000, I would have the tax on one-half of 1 per cent which would be $5 a year; if $1,500, so much tax; if $2,000, so much more. I am not arguing for a large sum to be collected on small incomes, but the tax should be so levied that every man who votes pays something on account of our national debt. It would also have a wholesome influence upon those who determine the expenditure of these moneys. The people are paying taxes now, but most of them do not know it. The wholesale man pays the customs duty at the border, and the consumer has to pay that duty, but he does not realize the fact. If he had to go down in his pocket for every dollar of taxes that he pays indirectly he would realize that he was paying a heavy amount of taxation, with the result that he would watch closely where that money went, and in that way I think it would have a wholesome effect on those who determined the expenditures here. I am sure the Minister of Finance would be very glad to simplify the matter so that every man would know exactly how the amount of taxation required from him is arrived at, and I hope he will see his way clear to put my suggestion into effect.

I repeat that to require a man to send in a cheque for a portion of his income tax when making his return will quadruple the work of the Finance Department, for I do not think that one man in ten will be able to figure out the correct amount to be remitted.

Mr. McKENZIE: I fully concur in the observation of the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Crothers) that the present law is very complicated. I do not know whether I am getting a better or a worse lawyer as I grow older, but I devoted all the morning to a study of these statutes, and, like my hon. friend, at half-past one I gave up the task in despair, for I found it hopeless to make any sense out of the original Acts and the many amendments thereto. For instance, the amendments of 1917 and 1919 are very complicated indeed, and I am thoroughly in accord with my hon. friend's suggestion that the four statutes should be simplified and consolidated so that all who run may read what are their tax obligations.

We thought we were fighting in the great war not only to safeguard the rights handed down to us by our ancestors, but to acquire the further rights of advanced civilization. I know there was a time in British history when a man was hanged for stealing a sheep, but I never heard of his being shot on the spot. Therefore I am surprised that a distinguished statesman like my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark), after the war is over, should propound the policy that any man who will not pay up the last half-penny under these complicated statutes—which ordinary lawyers cannot make out—should be shot on the spot; and I am further surprised to find the Minister of Finance bow his assent to the observations of the hon. member for Red Deer. I have no doubt that the minister made this mental note: Well, thank fortune, although the hon. member for Red Deer and I do not agree upon all things, there is at least one thing upon which we agree, that if any man under one of these complicated statutes comes short one half-penny in his tax returns, he shall be led out as a lamb to the slaughter and shot before the rays of the sun pierces the western horizon—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McKENZIE: Well there will be just a little glow in the eastern sky which will gradually extend towards the western horizon. We are told that Paul was executed at a very early hour, and I am quite sure that my good friend from the West is familiar with the grey dawn on the hill when the good old Apostle was done to death. That is the time when, in this twentieth century, my hon. friend wants to have these poor delinquents aroused from their beds at midnight—as they were at Winnipeg—and taken out and shot. I hope, indeed, that the hon. gentleman and the minister will change their minds, and that instead of introducing martial law in connection with the collection of these taxes they will be satisfied to fall back on the simple old method which has heretofore served our purpose very well. I think they will find it much more convenient in the long run, especially as they will not be able to collect the heavy taxes which the hon. member from North Ontario (Mr. Halbert) told us the other day were collected on coffins, for, according to tradition, people who are taken out and shot at down are buried where they fall. I think my good friend from Red Deer has come to a conclusion a little too speedily this time in advocating this new method of tax collection, and I hope he will reconsider his position.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I am not lawyer enough, Mr. Chairman, to be able to give an opinion as to whether my hon. friend's law has improved, but I am certain that his humour is getting heavier, and I do not know that his fairness is increasing. I cannot conceive of any one who listened with any care to what I said forming an opinion that I for one moment suggested that a similar penalty should be applied to a man for not doing his civil duty as was applied to a soldier in the trenches for desertion. I did not say a single word that would lend itself to such an interpretation, and it is almost a shame that a man should have to get up to disavow any intention to convey such a meaning. Neither the war, nor collecting the expenses of the war, Mr. Chairman, is, after all, a joke. I would commend that to my hon. friend who comes from Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie). We admire his humour on occasions, but a $2,000,000,000 debt is no joke. I would not like to charge my hon. friend with trying to make political capital along the line of misrepresentation, but he went very near the border line. I said nothing about shooting any one for not paying his taxes. I asserted a fact about military punishment, and in regard to the discharge of the civil duties of the minister in the collection of the taxes I used the word "spirit." I commended the spirit of fairness in which he had promised the House and the country that he was going to approach the collection of the income tax. I want to say to my hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie) that if he has any sympathy with rich men in evading the duty of paying their taxes, after the sacrifices that have been made and the lives that have been lost in the trenches, then I have precious little of that sympathy. My sympathy is with the poor who are taxed when they should not be; it is not with the rich who have large incomes and who try to avoid the payment of their taxes. I do not know that I should have risen for the purpose of replying to my hon. friend, because there was nothing to reply to; I rose for the purpose of stating my position so clearly that there could not possibly be any misapprehension of it.

Mr. McKENZIE: I still say that a tax is a debt. True, it is a debt to the Crown, and it is thus differentiated from a debt to an ordinary individual. My hon. friend (Mr. M. Clark) says that this tax is not a debt; that it is in the same category as a military duty. Well, I have a perfect right to suppose that it was running in my hon. friend's mind that the same line of action ought to be followed in case of default in connection with these taxes as is followed in case of default in military matters. The man who fails to do his duty when under military discipline must be shot; the man who fails to do his duty in furnishing the money for war purposes must also be shot. That is my hon. friend's line of reasoning, as I understood it. I do not want him, however, to take the matter too seriously, because I myself was not too serious. I am sure that he would be the last man to take part in any such gruesome procedure as he seems to suggest.

Mr. PEDLOW: The minister has asked for suggestions. Now, my suggestion is that all the words of the clause after the word "return" in the seventh line be struck out and something of this nature be substituted therefor:

Not later than April first in each year and shall pay the balance at the rate of six per cent per annum in quarterly payments on July first, October first and December first.

My reason for making this suggestion is that the clause should be more specific as to dates of payment. Under the present system, statements are sent out and returns sent in at varying periods; a man may receive his statement months ahead of his next door neighbour, and when they begin to compare notes there is dissatisfaction all round. The change which I suggest would, I submit, be of advantage to the Taxation Department as well as to the taxpayer, because it would be an inducement to the department to send out their tax bills on or before a certain date. If it is intended that the department shall not send out statements before the first payment is made, then the taxpayer may send in his return with his first instalment, or the entire amount if he chooses, on the first specific date named; or, if he pays only the first instalment, may pay the balance as set forth in the suggested amendment. It would be a great advantage to large corporations as well as to individuals of considerable income if the payments were spread over the entire year. I think that the adoption of this suggestion would be a decided improvement.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The hon. member for Joliette (Mr. Denis) cites a case of hardship which he has run across in his practice as a lawyer. He does not know whether he did the right thing as a lawyer, but I think he is quite of the opinion that he did the wrong thing as a legislator, and he now wants to get the right thing done. I hasten to set his mind entirely at rest in connection with arrears of 1917 and 1918. In those years very many people did not know much about the Act; it was entirely new, and there was much doubt about it. Consequently, we are not seeking to penalize any who have not made their returns, so long as they are honest now and tell us the truth. But the time has come when they ought to tell the truth, and if they do not tell the truth they will be hurt sooner or later. What I mean is this: There are still people who have not paid their taxes for the years 1917 and 1918. Perhaps not to-day or to-morrow or the day after, but sooner or later, they will be caught. If any man chooses to come forward, make his return for 1919 and tell the truth also with regard to 1917 and 1918, he will not be punished in respect of the arrears; he still has the opportunity to make the returns for 1917 and 1918 so that my hon. friend can without fear advise his client to do the honest and proper thing.

I agree with much that the ex-Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers) said. All tax laws are more or less technical and difficult to understand, and of all tax laws the graduated income tax is probably the most complicated, particularly when it is a new tax. There is no doubt that a certain amount of difficulty is experienced in arriving at exactly what amount of income tax ought to be paid. Parliament went some way last year in setting out in the Act of 1919 a pretty clear schedule, showing plainly how the percentages of payments increased, as I recollect the matter, in $2,000 spreads. I do not think a lawyer would find very much difficulty in figuring out the taxes under the Act of 1919. Perhaps I should not say that, because a good business man, certainly a good accountant, can handle a taxing statute much more easily than a lawyer can. There is no doubt a difficulty exists in connection with the matter, and we propose to get away from it in this way. We intend to have, either printed on the returns themselves that are sent out for next year, or attached to the returns, a list showing incomes of different amounts with the exact amounts of the taxes that ought to be paid on those incomes. Therefore, there will be no difficulty whatever for the taxpayer who wants to pay and who knows his income—and if he does not know his income, we cannot assist him in that regard—on looking at that list, to see just exactly what sum he ought to pay. It is true we shall not print on the returns copies of these Acts with their more or less complicated provisions, nor shall we go through the matter chapter and verse, showing how the computation is made up; but we shall see to it that the computation is right and that the list can be safely and easily followed.

I fully appreciate the suggestion made by the hon. member for Renfrew South (Mr. Pedlow). He is perfectly correct. Bills have been delayed and bills have gone out at different times. The reason for that is this: Under the former statute the department had absolutely no right to recall an assessment that had been made; an assessment once made stood. That meant that every man who was honest and zealous in his duties made no assessment until he had absolutely satisfied himself that he had checked up every single item that ought to be checked up in connection with a return that was made, and therefore the bill would go out only when that information was obtained. In connection with some incomes, that information could be easily and readily got at, and the bill went out promptly. In other cases, the bill went out perhaps only after a lapse of months, and in cases of incomes where investigations had to be made into excess profits earned by certain companies, such inquiries might last a year, and the bills would go out at different times with the result the hon. gentleman has pointed out. We are proposing to change that entirely; we intend to frame the law so that the duty is placed directly upon the ratepayer, who knows his income and who is given this list which will tell him exactly how much taxes he ought to pay on that income, of making, in the first instance, his assessment. The question of time is something which we give only for the convenience of the ratepayer. It would be very convenient if every one could afford to pay his taxes in full at once; but unfortunately some people cannot do that, and time is more or less wanted. Time is given by different municipalities, either in withdrawing deductions or in having ascending percentages of interest if payments are delayed, so that the municipality loses nothing by giving time. The ratepayer has a period of weeks within which to make a return. We do not want him to wait until the very last day on which the return ought to come in; it is a great deal better for the Administration that returns should come in just as quickly and regularly as possible. The idea is, after a ratepayer has made his return, to give him time in the manner indicated. This is a matter for each ratepayer, and I do not think any difficulty should arise, because this provision will apply automatically. If a man makes a return and sends in a cheque on the first April for only a quarter of the amount of the tax, he will have to pay another quarter on the first June, another quarter on the first August and another quarter on the first October. If his return is delayed and does not come in until the first June, his two-months' periods would run on just two months later. He would, of course, have the privilege of paying interest at the specified rate for that much longer.

Mr. CROTHERS: What is the objection to the simple process that I suggested of 2 per cent on the first thousand, 3 per cent on the second thousand, 4 per cent on the third thousand? There must be some reason or the minister would not have the tax as it stands. If there is any explanation I should like to have it.

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We have the tax now very nearly in the manner suggested by my hon. friend. Of course, we have to have, in connection with all graduated incomes, different scales of rates.

Mr. CROTHERS: It might be all one class.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is not in one class, because the classes here are divisions which can be arrived at only by having regard to the amount of the tax. The richer man must relatively pay much more than the small man with the small income. The tax as it now stands commences with the lowest rate of 4 per cent of normal tax on the small income; that is, 4 per cent on all incomes exceeding $1,000 in the case of unmarried persons and $2,000 in the case of married persons, and it runs from there to $6,000. After you reach an inome of $6,000, the tax on everything over that is 8 per cent, no matter how large the income is. That is the normal tax. Then there is a list of tables furnished showing how the surtax is to be arrived at. The first surtax starts with a tax of one per cent on the amount by which an income exceeds $5,000 and does not exceed $6,000; then the tax is 2 per cent on the amount by which an income exceeds $6,000 and does not exceed $8,000, and so the list goes on. I do not think the public should have much difficulty in finding out exactly what the tax is if the calculations are made by the department and the exact amount of the tax for different incomes shown on the return.

Mr. EULER: I understood the minister to state that in cases where men have failed, for any reason whatsoever, to make returns for 1917 or 1918, as the case may be, if they now confess their misdeeds or their lack of action, no penalty will be imposed. I have no fault to find with that at all; but supposing it happens now that a man has not made a return for 1917, or 1918, or 1919, and he now makes his return, is he going to be charged a penalty for not making a return for 1919?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes.

Mr. EULER: But not for 1917 or 1918?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No.

Mr. EULER: It does not seem to me to be altogether just to do that. Supposing a man made his return and paid his taxes for 1917, made his return for 1918, but did not make his return for 1919, let us say, by the end of May. I assume from an item I saw in the newspaper— and I think it is according to the law—that if he did not make his return for 1919 by midnight of May 31 last, he is liable to pay an additional 25 per cent of the tax. There you have the case of a man who after all has paid his taxes for 1917 and 1918, though he has been a little remiss in 1919, and he gets worse treatment than the man who has neglected his duty during all those years. It does not seem to me to be fair.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The hon. gentleman does not quite appreciate the position. The position is exactly the same for both so far as 1919 is concerned. We have expended so much money in advertising and have made the thing so public that at least so far as 1919 is concerned there is no excuse that I can think of which would justify default. As to the man who has made no return for 1917 or 1918, and who has made no return for 1919, while no penalty is to be exacted for 1917 or 1918, if he comes forward to-day with a return for 1919 giving the information as to 1917 and 1918, he will have to pay the penalty for 1919. So, as far as that year is concerned, the two taxpayers are in exactly the same position. Of course the excuse of ignorance, novelty, and the like, which might apply to some people certainly cannot apply to the man who made a return for 1917 and 1918 and therefore knew about the law.

Mr. PROULX: If a man marries at the end of an accounting period, say in the last month of the year, is he considered a married man?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If he marries any time during the year.

Mr. PROULX: He might reduce his taxes by marrying in the last month of the year.

Mr. McKENZIE: I want to bring to the notice of the minister a matter about which I spoke to him some time ago in connection with the exemption of certain persons. I understand the law to be that a single man has now an exemption of $1,000. Now there are men in this country who must be regarded as single, but who nevertheless have to keep house and have a housekeeper, servants, and so forth. I have reference to clergymen of the Catholic church. I do not think it would be the intention of the minister or the Government to regard these men who must keep house and have a very substantial class of servants as single men who have not the responsibility of housekeeping. I have had many letters from these men and I submitted this argument to the minister some time ago, and he was good enough to write me that he would give some attention to it. I do trust that the minister will give some consideration to this class of men. Certainly $1,000 seems a very small exemption for men of that class, who have all the responsibilities of clergymen who are married men with families and who keep house. I call this matter to the attention of the minister because I think from the very beginning it was an oversight not to have made an exception in the case of these men.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have a good deal of sympathy with the hon. member in this case, but there is some difficulty in further increasing exemptions. We have heavy exemptions now, and while it is perfectly true that the clergy of the country are, as a rule, very much underpaid, it is also true that the houses they live in are, as a rule, subject to no taxes at all. In other ways it would be somewhat difficult in a tax of this kind to make the exemption that is desired. It certainly could not be done upon the ground that some of our clergy were unmarried, or in the case of the clergy of the Roman Catholic church were prevented by their obligations from getting married. It could be done on the ground, I assume, that an unmarried clergyman should have an exemption of $2,000. It would be an exemption, therefore, of clergymen as a class, while other unmarried men would be differently treated. It might be that some consideration might be given to the question in the Bill, not upon that ground but upon the ground whether a man who really keeps house, and a woman who keeps house, whether married or single, or widow or widower, should not as housekeepers receive a certain exemption.

Mr. McKENZIE: Of course, I see that there are some difficulties in the way, but it seems to me the people generally would be satisfied that all clergymen should be exempt from this tax. Of course, the tax would be all right in the case of a wealthy man who had other sources of income besides his stipend, but in the case of those who have to depend on their stipend I think it would be quite proper under present conditions to exempt them from this tax without making any distinction as to denomination. What I said before I stand by, that these men I referred to must necessarily by reason of their calling be single, but at the same time they must keep a house with all that pertains to it, and I think their case should be taken into consideration. I would go further and say that all clergymen of all denominations should be exempt from this tax.

Mr. COWAN: Nothing doing.

Mr. DENIS: In the Budget Speech the Minister of Finance said:

> The returns will be carefully checked by the department, and in cases where it is discovered that overpayment has been made by the ratepayer a refund for the amount must be immediately made to him or applied on any instalment due or becoming due.

I fail to find any such provisions in the resolution. Is that simply an oversight?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It will be in the Bill.

Mr. DENIS: I understand it should have been in the resolution also.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It should be there.

Mr. PEDLOW: I should again like to refer to the suggestion I made a short time ago, which I do not think the Minister of Finance quite appreciated. Clause 2 seems to me to be rather indefinite, and it was with the object of making it more specific that I made my suggestion. Clause 2 reads in part as follows:

> That each person liable to taxation..... shall deliver to the Minister of Finance, with each annual return of his income prescribed by section 7 of the said Act as amended, an amount equal to at least one fourth of the amount of the tax and surtax, if any, payable by such person according to such return, and shall pay the balance, if any;

and so on. My suggestion is that specific dates should be mentioned for making the first return and the first payment on the tax. I think that my suggestion to let payments be made quarterly would not cause any hardship to the department, and it certainly would be a great convenience to the taxpayers. I would suggest that the first payment be made not later than April the first, and subsequent payments quarterly, on the first of July, the first of October, and the first of December of each year. The department would then know when to expect these several payments. In think the suggestion is worthy of consideration, and if it is not adopted, the clause might be amended to include a provision somewhat along that line, making it more specific.

The CHAIRMAN: Do I understand the hon. member to repeat this as a suggestion? He has sent me a copy in writing. Does he wish to be considered as moving this as an amendment?

[Mr. McKenzie.]

Mr. PEDLOW: It was not my intention to submit it in the form of an amendment. I understood the Finance Minister to ask for suggestions, and I simply suggest this for the minister's consideration.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 158 to amend the Income War Tax Act, 1917.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT AMENDMENT.

CLASSIFICATION TO DATE FROM APRIL 1, 1919.

On motion of Hon. Newton W. Rowell (President of the Privy Council) Bill No. 53 to amend the Civil Service Act, 1918, and the Civil Service Amendment Act, 1919, was read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 2—temporary employment outside of Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will the minister please explain the effect of this section?

Mr. ROWELL: The effect of the section is to extend the limit of time within which temporary or emergency appointments outside of Canada can be held without approval of the commission, from thirty to ninety days. Where emergency work arises and it is necessary to employ a person at once to do it, the appointment may be made by the officer of the department in the locality in which the work is to be done. Under the law as it stands, the appointment must be submitted to the Civil Service Commission for approval by them within thirty days. Hon. members will see that where emergency employment is outside of Canada it is physically impossible to submit an appointment to the commission within thirty days, and this makes it ninety days.

Mr. FIELDING: What is the present section in regard to this matter?

Mr. ROWELL: The present section reads:

> When employees are required on short notice for emergency work outside the city of Ottawa, the responsible agent or officer of the department requiring such extra assistance may engage the necessary employees, and the said agent or officer in each case shall forthwith report to the commission through the deputy head of his department the names of the persons so employed. No such employment shall extend beyond thirty days unless approved by the commission.

The effect of the amendment is to extend the term of employment, in emergency work that arises outside of Canada, to ninety days.

Mr. FIELDING: The thirty-day limitation remains so far as employment within Canada is concerned.

Mr. ROWELL: Yes.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): How many employees are there outside of Canada?

Mr. ROWELL: Two or three hundred altogether. They are principally in the Immigration service and in the High Commissioner's office. There are also Trade Commission offices under the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Are those temporary employees?

Mr. ROWELL: No, they are not temporary employees. This amendment applies to emergencies where it is necessary to engage temporary assistance for work which is required to be immediately done.

Mr. McKENZIE: What is the law in respect of employment in Canada?

Mr. ROWELL: In the case of any emergency employment of this kind outside the city of Ottawa, an arrangement may be made by an officer of the department in the district for the employment of assistance, but that employment cannot continue for more than thirty days without the approval of the commission. It must be reported at once, and unless the commission approves, such employment ceases at the end of thirty days. So far as employment outside of Canada is concerned, it will be obvious to hon. members that it could not be possible to report to the commission and obtain its approval within thirty days, and it is to meet that situation that the time is being extended to ninety days.

Mr. McKENZIE: I do not see what authority our agent in New York, for instance, would have in the employment of men, by reason of any law which we might pass. We cannot pass any law directing what shall take place outside of Canada. Our law could have no effect in the state of New York.

Mr. ROWELL: I think my hon. friend overlooked the fact that this Parliament can control its own employees, and that our own agents employed outside of Canada are subject to our jurisdiction.

Mr. FIELDING: I think that in another part of the Civil Service law there is a provision that temporary employment shall not exceed so many days in any one year. I merely offer that for the consideration of the minister.

Mr. ROWELL: There is a provision under the law as it stands which will apply to all these cases, to the effect that temporary employment shall not be made for a longer period than six months. I think there also exists a provision that the Civil Service Commission may grant an extension, but that extension is limited to six months, and would apply to all such appointments as are covered by this section.

On Clause 3—appointments of civil servants who resigned and went on active war service overseas.

Mr. PEDLOW: As I read this clause its application will be such that a civil servant who, in the early part of the war resigned his position and went overseas, upon his return is eligible only for the identical position which he vacated and at the very same salary. In the meantime young men who did not go overseas but remained in the service obtained promotion and an augmentation of salary from year to year and are four years ahead of the other man notwithstanding his valiant and laudable record. If my interpretation of this clause is correct it means that the young civil servant who went overseas to fight for Canada is discriminated against as compared with the young man who peacefully remained in the Government service at home. I know of a case in point where a youth resigned his position in the Civil Service in 1914, went overseas and remained there for four years. Upon his return to Canada he was re-admitted to the position he formerly held, but in the meantime those who remained had been advanced from year to year and were drawing a higher rate of pay. They were advanced both as regards status and salary, and this particular young man upon returning was given only about two-thirds of the salary paid to those who had stayed at home. I maintain that is discrimination against the young men who did their duty and fought for their country overseas.

Mr. ROWELL: I think my hon. friend is in error. He certainly is in error in his conception of the meaning and effect of this clause. The clause in question is to remove a disability that now exists in this sense: At present a man who resigned from the service to go overseas stands in exactly the same position as any other applicant for appointment to the public service—he has no preferred position. This is to give him a preferred position, so to speak, for eligible posts in order that he may be reinstated without having to compete with others who have not been in the service or did not go overseas, and it provides that he may be appointed either at the salary he was receiving at the time of his resignation, or the minimum salary of the class in which the position is classified, whichever is the higher. In other words, he may be appointed to a class higher than the one which he held when he went overseas, if he is qualified for it, and in that case he would secure a higher salary. If he is not qualified for a higher class, he becomes eligible for reappointment at the salary he was receiving when he went overseas. I have no knowledge of the particular case to which my hon. friend referred, but I do know that generally speaking the men who went overseas secured their promotions and increases during the period they were on such duty. That was the general rule and practice.

Mr. PEDLOW: I would infer from the minister's remarks that the clause implies a discrimination. As a matter of fact it is a discrimination against the young men who went overseas for the reason I have already stated. Those who went overseas in 1914 upon returning to Canada found that their associates who had remained at home had been promoted during their absence and were receiving a higher salary and enjoying higher rank than was vouchsafed to them. Then again there is the further point to be considered: Will these young men to whom I have referred—who resigned their positions and went overseas—obtain consideration in the matter of superannuation and retirement allowances? Will the years that they spent abroad be considered in the application of these features of the Civil Service Act?

Mr. STEELE: I would like to say a word or two in support of the point which my hon. friend from South Renfrew has raised. I was waiting until the Estimates came up to bring the matter forward, but seeing that it is already before the House perhaps we should express our views upon it. I quite agree with what my hon. friend (Mr. Pedlow) has said. There are a considerable number of young men in the service who enlisted two, three or four years ago, and went overseas, and who, on coming back, find that those who did not enlist but remained at home, have received promotion as regards both status and salaries—in other words, the relations of the two classes have been changed by the enlistment of the first mentioned class. Had they remained at home they would have received promotion, but owing to their being absent other men have been promoted and on their return they have had to take inferior positions as respects work and salary. I have had several cases brought to my attention, and I think the matter is one that should be looked into and rectified either by the Government or by the commission. We know that the civil servants who enlisted in the early days of the war received their salary as members of that service during their absence, but that privilege was not accorded to those who enlisted in 1916. They went overseas without any salary from the Civil Service and have returned to find that they were put back, as it were, in their standing in the service. While not done intentionally it results in their being penalized for having gone overseas to serve the country, whereas the men who did not enlist, or did not cross the Atlantic, have received any favours which were coming. From the information that I can secure I am under the impression that the fault is largely due to the head of the branch. Where the head of the branch was willing to do justice to these young men no difficulty has occurred, but it has been entirely different in other cases where the chief of the branch had control over the promotions of these men. I think where the head of a department has been anxious to do justice to the young men who enlisted no difficulty has arisen. I would strongly advise the Government to see that the cases I have referred to are adjusted. I think it most unfair that any patriotic young man should be penalized for doing his duty at the front, those who stayed at home being rewarded at his expense.

Mr. ROWELL: I entirely agree with the sentiments expressed by my hon. friend. There are two classes involved: First, those who resigned and went overseas; second, those who went overseas and retained their membership in the service. The great bulk of the civil servants who went overseas are in this second class. Those who enlisted early in the war received their full pay in addition to their military pay; at a later date those who enlisted got whichever was the higher of the two scales of pay; and those who enlisted after the Military Service Act came into force got their military pay only. But, so far as increases of pay are concerned, the men who went overseas got their statutory increases just the same as those who remained at home. My hon. friend shakes his head, but that is my information, and that is the settled policy of the Government. If a man did not get his statutory increase, the matter should be brought to the attention of the commission and the injustice will be righted.

The case of the man who resigned from the service before going oversesas is different; he stands in the same position as any other man applying to re-enter the service. But this section is designed to put him in a better position than he is in now by giving him a preference on re-entering the service. If such cases as those mentioned by my hon. friend from South Perth (Mr. Steele), are brought to the attention of the commission they will be very carefully investigated and remedied, because the settled policy of the Government is that no man shall be prejudiced in his position in the service by reason of having gone overseas. If my hon. friends who have spoken will bring to the attention of the commission the particular cases they have in view they will be very carefully investigated.

Mr. STEELE: I am aware that the statutory increases of those men were provided for; but they have been prejudiced in having lost their promotion. As I have said, the men who remained at home have been advanced to the vacancies which occurred during the war, and the returned men have had to take subordinate positions, and consequently they are suffering the greatest hardship.

Mr. ROWELL: I think those cases will be taken care of in the application of the reclassification, because under it a man is allocated to the class for which he is fitted by reason of his previous service, and no man is to receive less remuneration than he received under the old classification. But I repeat, if there are particular cases where any injustice has been suffered, the commision will, I am sure, thoroughly investigate them, if they are drawn to their attention, and will endeavour to find a remedy.

Mr. McKENZIE: I think this is a proper amendment and will serve a very good purpose. The only feature I would like to suggest to the minister is that in making up the lists, as there may be many applicants ahead of the returned man, he will be at a decided advantage.

Mr. ROWELL: Under the law as it stands and the regulations of the Civil Service Commission the returned soldier gets the preferred position, being placed at the head of all civilian applicants for the same position, no matter when he made application.

Mr. McKENZIE: That may be a practice of the department, but we know nothing about it and I would prefer to have it embodied in the statute. I would like to make it clear that the returned soldier is not to be secondary to any other man who may have passed the Civil Service examinations while the former was absent at the front.

Mr. FIELDING: The practice referred to deals with all returned soldiers so they shall have priority over civilians. At first that was an advantage to the returned soldier, but as time went on the returned men became so numerous that this priority ceased to be of any great value. This clause seems to deal with men who resigned from the Civil Service with the intention of leaving it; they voluntarily broke their connection; therefore they cannot stand in precisely the same position as the men who, by arrangement, retained their place in the service.

Mr. ROWELL: Those men are not required to pass any examination. They are to be put on these preferred lists. The fact of their previous experience of the work of the department would, I should think, entitle them to such a place on the lists as would practically assure their appointments when vacancies occur.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Does the minister mean that appointment is confined to the department in which the soldier was at the time he resigned? Or will the soldier be at liberty to apply for a position in any other department in the Civil Service?

Mr. ROWELL: He is at liberty to apply for a position in any branch of the service for which he is qualified.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Without examination?

Mr. ROWELL: Without examination.

On section 4—Annual increases unless classification provides otherwise.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): This section refers to temporary employees required "outside the city of Ottawa." Well, places like Shanghai, Nagasaki and Timbuctoo are among such "outside" places. The reference here is undoubtedly to temporary employees required in Canada outside the city of Ottawa. It is provided that the rate of payment to temporary employees outside shall not exceed the maximum rate of the class to which such employees belong, but there is no limit in the case of men employed outside the Dominion of Canada, except that the rate shall be the current rate in the locality where the men are employed.

Mr. ROWELL: In the case of men temporarily employed outside of Canada you must pay the prevailing rate in the locality; that is a necessary condition of securing the assistance. In points outside of Ottawa, in other cities in Canada, officers of the various departments have found themselves unable to secure temporary assistance at the minimum rate fixed in these schedules, and in order to secure the temporary employees absolutely necessary to the work of the departments, regard must be had to the prevailing rates of pay in these localities.

Mr. FIELDING: Would it not be well to insert the words "in Canada" after the word "required" in line 12?

Mr. ROWELL: Yes, I think that would meet the point, and I so move.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. ROWELL: With regard to subsection (6), I confess that it seems rather drastic and a little too cast-iron. There are cases where temporary employees are necessary, where you do not want to increase the permanent staff—in connection with the administration of taxation laws and other work of a temporary character, as that of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, soldiers settlement, and so on. You may have a person temporarily employed who is rendering thoroughly efficient service, and the result of passing this clause in its present form would be to prevent the possibility of any increase of his salary, though if he resigned you would have to pay a much larger sum to get an inexperienced person to take his place. My own impression is that while that provision has been put in to make the law clear—and there is some doubt about it at the present time—it would be only right to modify it so as to make possible an increase in order to retain a useful servant who has served temporarily.

Mr. FIELDING: It contemplates only short employment, does it not?

Mr. ROWELL: It contemplates limited employment, but the employment may be extended, with the approval of the Civil Service Commission. It is a question upon which I should like to have an expression of opinion from hon. members. Personally I think it would be in the public interest to provide that in cases where an employee has served for a certain length of time there may be an increase of salary. The clause as it appears in the Bill is in the form in which the commission submitted it to me, but my own thought is that it would be desirable to put in a proviso something like this: "unless he has been so employed for more than one year." Of course, that would apply only to exceptional cases where the employment is for six months and the commission, for reasons which appear satisfactory to them, decide to extend the employment.

Mr. FIELDING: Is the possibility of extension unlimited?

Mr. ROWELL: They can only extend the employment for six months at a time.

Mr. FIELDING: That means that it is unlimited?

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Does this question have any bearing upon the question of bonus?

Mr. ROWELL: It affects only the question of salary.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): I have been under the impression that a permanent employee is a man employed under Order in Council or appointed in the ordinary way by the Civil Service Commission. I think my hon. friend will find that in the various departments there are a large number of men who are classed as temporary employees—men who have been in the Government service for years, but are still on the temporary list. I have come across cases where men who had been in the service for many years were complaining that they had never been put on the permanent list. I do not know whether that is the case at present I know that it was the case some time ago.

Mr. ROWELL: The question raised by my hon. friend is undoubtedly an important one. As he says, there are in the public service a large number of persons who are classified as temporary employees. There have always been provisions in the Act for making temporary appointments, which have been renewed from time to time; and I believe that there are in the public service many hundreds who have been in the service for a very considerable period and are still classed as temporary. Under the reorganization which is now in progress, it is intended to straighten that matter out, and the Civil Service Commission will take up the question of those who have been in the position of temporary employees where the work they are doing is necessary and of a permanent character. I understand that their view is to recommend to the Government that all employees in that position should have their appointments made permanent, so as to get out of what I concede is an undesirable situation, viz: having in the public service a substantial number of persons, who are doing work really of a permanent character and who have been in the service for years, and are classed as temporary employees.

Mr. McKENZIE: Does subclause (6) not leave some discretion to the minister or deputy minister as regards promotion? If it is not intended to give the minister or the deputy, or whoever has to deal with the matter, some discretion, why is the word "deemed" inserted? If it is the intention that no discretion is to be exercised, why does the subclause not read?—

> No temporary employee shall be eligible to receive any increase of compensation under the provisions of this Act.

That is, he has no inherent right to claim promotion. If the deputy minister thinks it is right for him to get promotion, it is open to the deputy minister to grant it.

Mr. ROWELL: That clause was inserted to clear up a doubt which appeared to have existed under the law as it now stands, that temporary employees were eligible for an increase in salary; it was inserted to declare that they should not be so eligible. I quite agree with my hon. friend that it could be framed the other way and would, I think, mean exactly the same thing.

Mr. FIELDING: Temporary clerks whose services have been particularly meritorious should be the first ones put into permanent positions. These men were, in many instances, capable of filling the positions, but they were not prepared to take the examination. Hundreds of them have been in the service for years, and their case deserves a good deal of consideration.

Mr. ROWELL: Another class of case which I had in view in suggesting a possible amendment in this clause was this. Where the class of work a man is doing is of a temporary character, you do not wish to create a permanent position and put him in that position, because we all acknowledge that once a man is put into a position permanently, it is pretty difficult to get him out again.

Mr. JACOBS: He may die.

Mr. ROWELL: Yes, but not always. If the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean), who has had more to do with the framing of this legislation than any hon. member, thinks the amendment in the present form meets the case, I am quite willing to leave it just as it is here.

Mr. McKENZIE: The Minister of Railways (Mr. J. D. Reid) tells me that this is a misconstruction altogether; that there should be a period after the word "deemed," and that that word should read "damned" —"no temporary employee shall be damned". That is what the Minister of Railways says, and he is an older minister and member than the President of the Council. That should be a consideration.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): It is the Government that ought to be damned for making these numerous appointments of temporary employees. I understand the minister says that it is not desirable to have many of them, and if that be the case, I should like to know who was responsible for the appointment of 22,000-odd employees since the Armistice. Never before was there a period in the history of this country when ministers became so reckless in the matter of appointments. This practice of making so many temporary appointments is bad for the service. Some arrangement should be made whereby if a man is retained in the service for, say a year, he should be given a permanent position or go out of the service.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That would destroy the whole system.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): He should either go out of the service or become permanent. This is being used for all kinds of indirect and improper purposes throughout the country. An election comes along, and some man who has influence with the Government may threaten a temporary employee, saying to him: "You are a temporary employee and you had better do what you are told." It is a bad system, and it seems to be increasing year by year instead of lessening. I drew attention to this matter before, but I do not want the minister to overlook the fact that the Government seem, during the last two years, to have gone very far in the way of appointments of temporary employees. If it be bad practice, it ought to be stopped. I do not know whether the minister would entertain my proposal or not, but there should be some period of employment at the end of which a man should be entitled to the rights of an ordinary civil servant, if he is left in the service.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The committee will remember that the Civil Service Act provides a scale of compensation for all employees, and the purpose of this clause is simply to declare that temporary employees shall not participate in the different rates of compensation. Personally, I think that is a sensible provision, particularly at the present time. There are in the public service two classes of temporary employees. In years gone by, as my hon. friend (Mr. Sinclair, Guysborough) stated, persons were appointed to the public service temporarily, and they still remain in the service, but I do not think that there are a large number of that class. On the other hand, during the war a large number of persons were appointed to the public service temporarily, and within the next twelve months, I fancy between ten and fifteen thousand of these temporary employees will be released. These persons are to be found largely in the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment and in certain branches of the Militia Department. The appointment of such large numbers to these two branches of the public service was unavoidable, but this condition of affairs should come to an end some time soon. I quite agree with my hon. friend that at some time in the future some arrangement should be made where temporary employees appointed many years ago should be made permanent. There are in the public service persons appointed twenty years ago who are technically but temporary employees, and some consideration should be given to such cases. It would be unfortunate to drop this clause at the present time when there are in the public service so many temporary employees, a large number of whom must be retired within a year or shortly afterwards. It would be well, therefore, to continue the clause as it stands.

[Mr. Sinclair (Guysborough).]

Mr. McKENZIE: What is the necessity for this clause at all?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Some doubt has arisen as to whether or not temporary employees are entitled to the same rate of compensation as permanent employees. I did not know myself that there was any doubt about it. I suppose, however, that temporary employees have been claiming the same rates of compensation and the annual increase that permanent employees receive, and that this is merely to remove the doubt.

Mr. McKENZIE: Has the minister any idea of how many temporary employees there would be in any of the large departments—Public Works, for instance?

Mr. ROWELL: I have not the figures here, but I will try and get them and show them to my hon. friend. All the large departments have a large number of temporary employees, some of whom may be employed for years. Of course, the 22,000 employees that my hon. friend refers to covers all seasonal employees, those on the Welland Canal, for instance. Any one who is familiar with public works and the rate at which men go off and new come on would know that if you employ 22,000 men it does not mean that there are 22,000 new positions. On an important public work you may have a turn over two or three times in a season.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): My hon. friend does not think that labour on public works is appointed by the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. ROWELL: They have to be certified to by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Ordinary labourers employed on public works?

Mr. ROWELL: Yes.

Mr. JACOBS: Do they have to pass an examination?

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): My hon. friend does not mean that a gang of Italians employed for two or three days to dig a trench on some public work have to be certified by the commission?

Mr. ROWELL: Not unless they are required for a longer period than thirty days. Where the period of employment is longer than that, the names must be reported to the Civil Service Commission and the 22,-

000 employees that my hon. friend has referred to includes employees on public works throughout Canada who have been employed for short periods. They are included in the list of temporary employees.

Mr. JACOBS: Why is that?

Mr. ROWELL: Because the law as it stands requires it, and it has also this real function: If the Civil Service law is properly administered by the commission—and I am sure the commission is putting forth its utmost efforts to administer it honestly—this prevents the abuse, to which my hon. friend has referred, of putting on a large number of employees on a public work at election time. It is intended to be a curb on unnecessary employment in the public service in any form whatsoever.

Mr. JACOBS: So the Government at election time would know how many thousand men were employed on different public works throughout the country. In what way would that be a curb on the abuse?

Mr. ROWELL: The commission would have a complete record of these employees.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): There was always a complete record on the pay-roll of the departments, so they have no more complete record now than before. I am not sure that I quite understood my hon. friend. Say the Public Works Department are building a bridge, and that there is a stonemason there cutting stone. If he works more than thirty days, has he to have an appointment from the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. ROWELL: No. The appointment has to be reported to the commission by the department, and the man cannot be employed beyond thirty days unless the Civil Service Commission approves. It acts as a check upon employment of unnecessary labour on any government work.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): It does apply to such a man as I have mentioned?

Mr. ROWELL: Yes. If an ordinary workman is employed for more than thirty days on a government work carried on by one of the departments, it must be reported to the commission, and the man cannot be continued beyond the thirty days without the commission's approval.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): What do the commission do when they receive the report of his employment? Do they examine the man and see if he is capable, and then re-appoint him? Or what do they do?

Mr. ROWELL: I believe the procedure is this: Under ordinary conditions, unless there was some reason that would lead them to make a special inquiry, they would accept the certificate of the engineer in charge of the work that the man was actually required and was competent for the work he had to do.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is there any such provision in the Bill? I do not profess to be familiar with the Civil Service Act, but it would strike me as extraordinary that you could not get a few labourers or any number of labourers on a public building or some other work without having to go through this routine.

Mr. ROWELL: It is simply because they are in the public service. The Act is so broad that it covers all employees in the public service, therefore, as they are in the public service, they have to come under the jurisdiction of the commission in the way I have mentioned.

Mr. McKENZIE: Last year, I think it was, when we were dealing with the War Purchasing Commission, I asked my hon. friend how many employees there were in that branch, and if my memory serves me correctly, he replied that there were about 300 men and women. Is that commission still intact, and are these temporary employees still on the pay-roll of the Government?

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend is in error in his recollection. The figure I gave was somewhere between 200 and 300, as being the number employed in all the purchasing branches of all departments of the Government. I am not sure of the exact number employed in the purchasing commission, but I think it is somewhere between 30 and 40. The figure I gave last year related to all the purchasing branches of all departments of the Government.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am sorry to discover my memory is not quite correct, and equally sorry that the minister was not as explicit as he usually is in giving the number last year. Taking it as 40 or 50, are these still temporary employees?

Mr. ROWELL: Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE: When will the minister be able to dispose of them?

Mr. BURNHAM: What does the commission intend to do in the long run with regard to men who heretofore have been entitled to receive the pay prevalent in the district? Lately, it seems, a great many of the men who have been described as permanent or yearly employees of the Government, have had their pay cut down from what it was last year, and the explanation given by the commission is that on account of reclassification their pay had to be cut down.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT AMENDMENT.

House again in committee on Bill No. 53, to amend the Civil Service Act 1918, and the Civil Service Amendment Act 1919.—Hon. Mr. Rowell; Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Mr. BURNHAM: Would the minister be kind enough to explain why it is that the employees on the Trent canal for example, who are hired by the year—and have been hired year by year for several years—and have been replaced by many returned soldiers, now receive less than they received a year ago? They were notified this year that the pay would go down considerably. They complained to me, and I brought the matter before the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. J. D. Reid). The minister said he thought it was a strange thing, he did not understand it; but on considering the matter he came to the conclusion that it was not his business but was the business of the Civil Service Commission. Accordingly I sent a written complaint, together with the letter of the Minister of Railways and Canals, to the commission. The commission said that the reason of the decrease was that they were bound by the re-classification and the re-classification had nothing to do, so far as I can understand from their letter, with the current rate of pay in the district for similar work, but was altogether something settled by those who made that re-classification. That is to say that if a certain class of work in a locality, which the canal staff had hitherto been paid for at the rate of say $60 a month and the bonus, under the classification order was considered worth only $50 the latter amount was given, although the people employed on the general work in the locality were getting $60 or perhaps $80. The result of the reduction in pay is impairing the efficiency of the canal work and producing very great discontent, and I would therefore like to know what the minister, or the commission, propose to do about the matter.

Mr. ROWELL: I am not familiar with the point raised by the hon. member, and therefore cannot answer him specifically. I will, however, look into the matter and obtain the necessary information. My understanding of the law and the practice is that if the men are paid a stated salary—that is if they are not paid the prevailing rate of wages—while under the classification it may be that some are classified at lower salaries than they have hitherto been receiving, the Act provides that no man shall be reduced in his salary—that is that no existing employee shall have his salary reduced—by reason of the change in the classification. So that if any of these men have been in the employ of the Government and have been receiving a higher rate of pay than the new classification provides, the Act itself contains provision that they shall not be reduced in salary by reason of that fact. As to the particular case my hon. friend has in view, I shall be very glad to look into it and give the hon. member the desired information as soon as I obtain it.

Mr. BURNHAM: I may say for the further information of the minister that this is not an isolated case. There are a great many cases of the kind, and if I understand the minister to say that the pay of people who have been for several years in these positions cannot be reduced, nevertheless the effect is to reduce the pay of returned soldiers. When the returned soldier is appointed to fill a new job, or to replace a man who is not re-hired, he is taken on at reduced pay, and it results in great indignation and great hardship. This does not refer merely to those who are hired by the season, but to those who are hired and paid by the day for some continued time on public work of various kinds, and who are now to be paid at a very considerably less rate than others in the locality. Hitherto it has been the custom of the Government to pay the curent rate of wages and the men in the public employ were perfectly satisfied. But that is not the practice now, and the men are very much dissatisfied; I do not know of anything in fact that is producing equal discontent.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): The minister gave the committee the impression before six o'clock that the Civil Service Commission were appointing ordinary labourers. Now I am not able to find any authority in the Civil Service Act for such appointments by the commission. Section 23 of the Civil Service Act, which refers to temporary employment, reads as follows:

> When, from a temporary pressure of work, extra assistance is required in any branch of the Civil Service, the commission may, on the written report of the deputy head that such extra assistance is required, authorize the employment of such number of temporary employees as are required to carry on the work.

Then subsection 2 goes on to say that persons who have successfully passed the competitive examination will have an opportunity of being appointed to this temporary work, and such temporary employment in the Civil Service shall only be authorized for such time, not exceeding six months, as the commission deems necessary, and the authority by which the employment is authorized shall be mentioned in the certificate of qualification isued by the commission. That is all I can find in the Civil Service Act relating to the employment of temporary employees. I think the minister must have been mistaken when he told us that the hod carrier, the stone mason, and the ordinary labourer were appointed by the Civil Service Commission if their services were required for more than thirty days. If that is the practice of the commission, I would like the minister to tell us where they get the authority to make these appointments?

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend has not repeated quite accurately what I stated before adjournment in reference to the matter. What I said was that these men were taken on by the Government officers of the district, but that they could not be continued beyond thirty days without the approval of the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): There is nothing like that in this section.

Mr. ROWELL: The section to which my hon. friend refers provides:

> When employees are required on short notice for emergency work outside the city of Ottawa, the responsible agent or officer of the department requiring such extra assistance may engage the necessary employees, and the said agent or officer in such case shall forthwith report to the commission through the deputy head of his department the names of the persons so employed. No such employment shall extend beyond thirty days unless approved by the commission.

I understand that under that section the deputy head of the department reports to the commission the temporary employees taken on in connection with public works, such as the Welland canal, and that unless their employment is approved the department is not authorized to continue them beyond the thirty days.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): I do not yet understand clearly what duties the commission perform. How would the commission be able to judge of the qualifications of, say, a hod carrier who was working at Victoria, B.C., or at Sydney, N.S., to warrant his being continued in the service? I cannot see any purpose to be served by the commission dealing with a question like that unless they submit the man to some kind of inquiry or examination. Does the minister mean to say that some person on behalf of the Civil Service Commission attends at such distant places to see whether the hod carrier does his work properly and is a suitable person to be continued in the employment of the department? If it is only a formal matter, and the commission deal with it without knowing anything about the person employed, what service can it be to the country? That is the point I would like the minister to make clear. I can understand the advisability of a man engaged in clerical work or in a position of responsibility being appointed by the Civil Service Commission, but for the life of me I cannot understand why a man who is going to do pick and shovel work requires any endorsement by the commission. The payroll for each month shows the number of days the men have been working, the paymaster checks that, and it seems to me that that should be sufficient. If my hon. friend is keeping the Civil Service Commission busy at such work, I think they would be much better employed in the duties they were intended to perform. I would like to suggest to the Government—the Prime Minister is now here—that some member of the Government should be assigned to have supervision over the Civil Service. A year or two ago a certain member of the Government discharged the duty of looking after the service, and I have no doubt he performed it very well during the short time he was attending to it. From what I can learn there is now no member of the Government whose duty it is to deal with questions that are constantly arising in the service. Hon. members who are listening to me I suppose have had the same experience that I have had: Complaints made by civil servants that they are unjustly treated. I was told a few days ago by a civil servant in whom I have the utmost confidence,—a man who is perfectly satisfied with his own position and salary—that when a case of injustice arises in regard to classification and other matters coming under the Civil Service Commission there is really no one in the Government who takes enough interest in the service to deal with it. I do not want to give the man's name, but I am afraid there is a certain amount of truth in his statement.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: He should go to the commission.

Mr. SINCLAIR: (Guysborough): Some minister should be assigned the duty of dealing with questions arising in the Civil Service, and in cases of grievance he should be the man to go to and should be responsible for their adjustment. I would like that suggestion to be seriously considered by the Government.

Mr. ROWELL: I would point out to my hon. friend that any employee of the public service who has any grievance, imaginary or real, in connection with the classification or its application has the Civil Service Commission to go to. More than that, the commission, with the approval of the Government constituted what is known as a Board of Hearing. That board consists of two representatives named by the Civil Service itself, two appointed by the deputy ministers, viz.:—the Assistant Deputy Minister of Public Works and the Assistant Auditor General, and is presided over by one of the Civil Service Commissioners. Any complaints in reference to the classification are dealt with by that board. Any other complaints are dealt with by the commission. So I do not think any civil servant has any just ground to complain that there is no person to whom he can present his grievance. In addition, they all have their superior officers in each department, and in case they feel themselves unjustly dealt with they can appeal to those superior officers to have their cases investigated.

Mr. BURNHAM: Might I say that the minister's statement of the case leaves everything to be desired? Ninety-nine per cent of the employees have no more knowledge of how to go about making a complaint than they have of flying. They very properly have the idea that they should make their complaint first to their foreman, who in turn passes on the complaint to the chief engineer, but naturally the chief engineer does not want to get himself in wrong at headquarters and he passes on the complaint in a very perfunctory manner. The consequence is that as the much despised member of Parliament has no status in the matter, the employee in any particular constituency has no recourse to his friend the member. On the contrary, the employee is invited to climb to the top fifteen steps at a time, which he cannot do, and won't do, and does not understand how to do. Much as I respect the minister, I must point out another thing, that he has been able to deal with this particular thing only after being prompted by the man in front of him. I have nothing against the Civil Service Commission, I suppose they are working to the best of their ability, but this system which expects the poor humble employee along a canal or any other public work to sit down and formulate a complaint, and to know the devious ways of getting it to the various Boards of Hearing over the heads of his superiors, foremen, or superintendents or whatever they may be—this system, I say, expects too much, for that poor man never does what is expected of him, and the consequence is that until the discontent and murmuring becomes fierce there is nothing heard about it.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The minister referred a moment ago to the Welland Canal. I would like to know from him who makes these appointments of lock-keepers, and so on. Surely the Civil Service Commission cannot make these appointments; somebody other than the member of Parliament for the constituency must be responsible for them?

Mr. ROWELL: In the case of lock-keepers and men occupying positions of that kind, the procedure is to advertise locally for applications for the position. These applications go to the Civil Service Commission and the engineer in charge of the work is asked by the commission to make a recommendation in connection with the matter. Upon getting the applications, coupled with such information or recommendation as the local engineer in charge may submit, the Civil Service Commission makes the appointment.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I must say that I never saw one of those advertisements. I would be glad indeed to know where they could be found. It looks to me as if the so-called patronage has been handed over to some one in the country other than the member for the county. I am not opposed to the Civil Service Commission in any way, but I certainly do not believe that it is good policy to hand over to some one else in the county the matter of these appointments.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Does the minister say that appointments made to positions in the Department of Railways and Canals are under the control of the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. J. D. REID: All appointments to positions in the Railway Department, not including, of course, the Canadian National Railways, are made by the Civil Service Commission. If we want a common labourer or lock-master or a man to fill any position of that kind on one of the canals, the Chief Engineer of the Department of Railways writes to the secretary of the commission and tells him that he wants such a man. What procedure the Civil Service Commission adopts in filling those positions I do not know, but I do know that from the minister down, not one employee of the Railway Department has anything further to do with the matter or knows who the appointee will be until the commission advises that such and such a man is to fill the position.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): I am not familiar with the matter of the canals, but I understood that appointments to positions on the Government railways were made by the Minister of Railways—

Mr. J. D. REID: Oh, no.

Mr. SINCLAIR: (Guysborough):—or one of his officers; that such appointments were made by the Civil Service Commission. Never am I mistaken about that?

Mr. ROWELL: It has always been made clear that the Canadian National railways did not come under the Civil Service Commission. All appointments in that connection are made by the Board of Management.

Mr. J. D. REID: My hon. friend (Mr. J. H. Sinclair) has said, as I understood him, that all appointments on the Government railways were made by the minister. I can hardly understand the hon. member making such a statement, because he knows that the Canadian National railways are operated by a board appointed—

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): I did not mean to say that the minister was undertaking the work of the board.

Mr. J. D. REID: Appointments to positions on the Canadian National railways are made by the Board of Management. The department has not interfered with such appointments; they do not feel that they have any power to interfere.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I am not suggesting that anybody is interfering at all; that is not what I am speaking of. Let me make the matter clear: I am pointing out that men employed on the Government railways are not appointed by the Civil Service Commission. I think that is well known to everybody. Now I am informed that another class of men employed are not under the Civil Service Commission,—and I would like to get the information from the minister—that is, the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment.

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend is correct in that. By the Act of last session and on the report of the committee which considered the question of civil re-establishment, it was provided that the department might make appointments direct, subject to submitting to the commission a report of the appointments. That was done for the fairly obvious reason, I should think, that the administration of that department would be somewhat akin to that of the Department of Militia. There was the matter of hospitals and the care of the men being treated. There were the schools for vocational training and the other branches of service included in the work of this department. Immediate action was necessary to care for the men upon demobilization. The appointments were not of a permanent character, the department being a temporary one, and accordingly the House by express enactment made provision for the department making the necessary appointments and reporting these appointments to the commission.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Are any other departments besides Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment and the Canadian National railways outside the jurisdiction of the commission?

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend is aware that when the income tax was put into operation the employees in connection therewith were appointed under the authority of the minister of the department. In the Estimates for income tax each year there is a provision for the appointment of officials without requiring examination or selection by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. McKENZIE: I would like to remind the Minister of Railways that he seems to exercise considerable jurisdiction over the employees of the Government railways.

The CHAIRMAN: We are discussing a Bill to amend the Civil Service Act. The minister has already informed the committee that appointments to positions on the Canadian National railways are not made by the Civil Service Commission. I fear that if we do not leave the railway we shall soon be very far from the matter now under consideration by the committee.

Mr. McKENZIE: Perhaps the committee will permit me to ask the minister one question in reply to what he said.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member may proceed, but only with the unanimous consent of the committee.

Mr. McKENZIE: Last year when we were discussing the Grand Trunk Railway Bill some one suggested that the officers of the road might naturally be favourable to switching traffic to Portland. The minister immediately rose and said he would like to see the officer who would undertake to do any such thing while he was Minister of Railways; that if he found any such man in his employ he would make short work of him. Was it under the Civil Service Act that the minister expected to exercise that jurisdiction?

Mr. J. D. REID: Well, that was a long time ago. Before answering that question I would have to refresh my memory as to what I said.

Mr. CAHILL: Are the employees of the Marine and Fisheries Department all under the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. ROWELL: Marine and Fisheries Department, yes.

[Mr. Rowell.]

Mr. CAHILL: The sailors and all others employed by that department?

Mr. ROWELL: All except those in the merchant marine, which is operated in connection with the Canadian National railways.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That branch would employ the larger number, would it not?

Mr. ROWELL: Of course, a very large nnmber of sailors would be employed in the merchant marine, but the whole transportation system is carried on under or in association with the Board of Management operating the railways.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Could the minister give us any idea as to the number of employees under the control of the Board of Management of the railways and the Merchant Marine as compared with the number of employees of the department who are appointed by the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. ROWELL: I have no idea how many are employed on the railways.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They are very much the larger number, are they not?

Mr. CAHILL: Are any other departments than these four outside the control of the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. ROWELL: What does my hon. friend mean by the "four"?

Mr. CAHILL: Merchant marine, Railways and Canals, Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment and Income Tax.

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend is not correct when he mentions the Department of Railways and Canals. All appointments in that department come under the Civil Service Commission. Appointments to the national system of railways and the national merchant marine do not; they are made by the board of management. Appointments to the Income Tax branch and the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment do not come under the Civil Service Commission, and the Soldier Settlement Board is in the same position in this respect as the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment.

Mr. CAHILL: What is the medium of advertising for men who are required in different places now that the Official Record has gone out of business?

Mr. ROWELL: The usual form of advertising is first that an advertisement appears officially in the Canada Gazette. Then communications are sent to all the Great War Veteran Associations, because under our law the war veterans are to have the preference. Posters are put up in post offices, public schools and other public places in the district. In cases of local employment, such as I have mentioned, a poster that will reach the public is put up in local public institutions. I am informed that that is the procedure.

Mr. ARTHURS: Who puts up these posters?

Mr. CHAPLIN: It seems to me that advertising for such help as lock tenders is a very roundabout way of doing business. We have in Ottawa a commission who are appointing men whom they have never seen, never expect to see, have never examined and know nothing about. These men may be five hundred miles away from Ottawa, and they are recommended to the commission by somebody in the district. I certainly object to that way of doing things. It was not so contemplated, as I understand it, in the original discussions we had in regard to the matter in the House, and I want to put myself on record as being opposed to that way of doing business.

Mr. BURNHAM: I would suggest that a new examination be held, and that is, into the common decency and morality of the common ordinary man or member. It is quite evident from all the attacks made upon this system that all the wrongdoing is traced down, or supposed to be traced down, to the fact that every hon. member on this side is to every hon. member on that side of the House a wrongdoer and that every hon. member on that side of the House is to every hon. member on this side of the House under suspicion. The sooner we cut a great deal of this out the better, because at bottom it is only commonplace, vulgar partisanship. Let us trust each other, man as man, and have faith in ourselves, and we shall get work done. No work on earth will stand the test when a suspicion such as that exists.

Mr. McKENZIE: I wish to say a word or two in support of what the hon. member for Antigonish and Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) and the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Burnham) have said in reference to civil servants. They brought forward the argument very well that a civil servant who has any grievance has really no person to whom he can go with his complaint. We were told by the President of the Council (Mr. Rowell) that the deputy minister and the Civil Service Commission are at the disposal of the civil servant. Those are just the two parties against whom he would be likely to have a complaint. He might have a complaint that the deputy minister was not giving him a fair show, and in such a case what would be the good of going to the deputy minister? He would be turned down. He might have a complaint that the Civil Service Commission was not treating him rightly, and in such a case, what would be the good of going to it? What he really wants is to be able to lay his complaint before an independent person over whom the deputy minister or the Civil Service Commission has no influence at all. The only person who would be in that position is a minister of the Crown who would be supposed to act absolutely independently between the civil servant and the higher authority. Some minister should have general supervision over the Civil Service, so that they could come to him with their complaints. Then the minister would call the deputy minister, not necessarily of his own department, but of any department, and the chairman of the Civil Service Commission, and let this civil servant who had the complaint tell his story, with the deputy minister and the chairman of the commission present to see whether the complaint of the civil servant was well founded or not. The minister, after hearing the facts, would be in a position to deal with the case on its merits, and the civil servant would then be satisfied either that his grievance would be rectified or that he had no case. But under present circumstances he will always have a suspicion, if his complaint is against the deputy minister, that the deputy minister is not treating him rightly, or if his complaint is against the Civil Service Commission that the commission is not treating him rightly. It is surely desirable for the Government and for everybody else that that large body of civil servants should feel that they are being treated fairly and squarely and that if they have a grievance there is an absolutely independent court to which they can go. For that reason I support the contention of my hon. friends that there should be some minister—perhaps the Prime Minister has too much to do—to whom an appeal may be made in cases of this kind.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: A good many years ago I was informed that a certain Prime Minister was told by one of his ministers that he made a rule in his department that no civil servant holding a status lower than that of first-class clerk should have a right to speak to him with regard to his affairs or the business of the department. The then Prime Minister replied, "I know that perfectly well, because they all come to speak to me about matters that should have been submitted to you." I can inform my hon. friend that the grievance which he is expressing on behalf of civil servants is entirely a fanciful one. I have had some experience, for nearly nine years, of this matter, and I can assure him that civil servants at Ottawa and throughout the country have not the slightest difficulty in making their grievances known to the Government. During the past nine years, on numerous occasions, I have received civil servants who desired to express to me their view that in some respect or another they were not receiving the consideration that was their due. As a matter of fact, at the present time, they have more facilities than they ever had before in that regard. During the past three years we have had a minister who, so far as the duties of his department would permit, has devoted special attention to the claims of civil servants. Some time ago we established a board to which the President of the Council (Mr. Rowell) alluded, and I really think there is no serious difficulty in the way of a civil servant who desires to make representations to the Government. Such representations eventually find their way, not only to the minister of the department, but to the Prime Minister, and finally they come before the Government as a whole.

Mr. GAUVREAU: I want to say just a few words as to the way in which men working for the Public Works Department are chosen. Take the case of a wharf to be repaired in my riding, as happened last year. If the men are chosen by the resident engineer and by the chief carpenter, those officers, of course, are responsible for their choice. These are the men who will work if they are required for a period of less than thirty days. Of course, they should not be chosen in the first place if they are not able to do the work required of them. If they are required for a longer period than thirty days the chief engineer forwards the names picked out by the chief carpent 1 and sends them to the Civil Service Commission at Ottawa, and those are the men chosen for the longer periods. This matter is so simple that I cannot see why there is any opposition.

[Sir Robert Borden.]

Section agreed to.

On section 5—classification deemed to have come into force on, and salaries payable from April 1, 1919.

Mr. ROWELL: I beg to move to insert as subsection 2 this clause, an amendment which I shall now read, and the present subsection 2 will then become subsection 3. The reading of the clause will explain the reason for its insertion:

> Persons filling positions the compensation of which is or has been fixed at prevailing rates under the classification or any amendment thereof, and persons who have been retired from or have left the public service, shall not participate in any benefit resulting from the provisions of this section, making the classification retroactive to the 1st day of April, 1919.

Hon. members will see that if persons have left the public service since the first day of April, 1919, there is no reason why the country should pay additional compensation, and where persons are receiving the prevailing rates of pay there would seem to be no reason why any special benefit should accrue to them from making the classification retroactive.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Why has this change been made in the Act, making its provisions retroactive for one year?

Mr. ROWELL: We are making it retroactive because when this whole matter was under consideration in the early part of the year 1919 and various delegations of the Civil Service waited upon the Government, particularly representatives of the different branches of the postal service, the Government at that time believed that the classification would be sufficiently advanced to be brought into operation in the year 1919, and these representatives of the different postal organizations were assured that it would go into effect for the year 1919. It so happened that the classification was not sufficiently advanced to make it operative during the year 1919, and when the legislation was passed last autumn it was provided that it should come into force on the first day of April, 1920, because at that time it was believed that the classification would not be completed so that it could be applied before that date. The Act of last session was passed in that form. When the Act was before the House the question of making it retroactive was raised, and my hon. friend (Mr. A. K. Maclean), who was in charge of the Bill, said he would give the matter consideration and see whether in view of what had taken place it would be right to make it retroactive. The Government would consider the matter in the meantime, he said, and if they reached the conclusion that it would be right to make the legislation retroactive an amendment would be introduced this session to make it so. The Government, after considering the whole situation, and having regard to the representations that were made in the early part of the year 1919 to these representatives of the Civil Service, reached the conclusion that it was only fair and right that the classification should be made retroactive. Undoubtedly, these civil servants relied upon the Government's statement at that time, and believed that the Act would come into force as from the first day of April, 1919.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What was the ground upon which the Government thought it fair and right to make the Act retroactive?

Mr. ROWELL: On this ground. The Civil Service Commission in recommending to the Government a certain bonus recommended it on the basis of this classification going into effect, and not on the basis of the old classification. My hon. friend will see this set forth in the introduction to the classification submitted to Parliament. Therefore, in order to carry out the understanding with the Civil Service, the Government decided to recommend that the classification should be made retroactive.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In the Estimates that have been brought down, there is mention of the fact that they do not contain the necessary details because of the re-classification of the service not being ready. Can my hon. friend tell us if the re-classification has been completed, and if so, when Parliament will be favoured with a copy?

Mr. ROWELL: The re-classification is completed subject to certain appeals that have been made from it and which have not yet been disposed of by the Board of Hearing. Under the Civil Service Act the Civil Service Commission has power to vary the existing classification subject to the approval of the Governor in Council. Appeals can be made by any class of the Civil Service against their classification. These are heard by the Board of Hearing. From the Board of Hearing a recommendation goes to the Civil Service for approval and if approved it must come to the Governor in Council for approval before it becomes effective. If it involves any increased payment of money, it cannot go into effect until Parliament votes the money. Now, a large number of appeals have been heard and determined, but there are still some appeals pending. Subject to the determination of these appeals, the reclassification is complete. There is, of course, not only the reclassification itself, but the application of the classification to the service, that is, fitting each individual official in the service into his appropriate class. My hon. friend will see that that is an enormous undertaking where you have nearly 50,000 civil servants to be dealt with and each put into his appropriate class. I am glad to be able to advise my hon. friend that the application of the classification to the service is very nearly completed also. It is completed in the Departments of Agriculture, Archives, Auditor General, Civil Service Commission, Commission of Conservation, External Affairs, Finance, Indian Affairs, Insurance, Interior, International Joint Commission, Library of Parliament, Mines, Naval Service, Board of Pension Commissioners, Public Works, Railways and Canals, Royal Canadian Mounted Police, Secretary of State, Governor General's Secretary, Honorary Advisory Council, Marine, Post Office, Privy Council, and Trade and Commerce. It would have been completed also in Customs and Inland Revenue but for the illness of the deputy. It is almost complete in Immigration and Colonization. So my hon. friend will see that the application of the classification is rapidly approaching completion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We desire to have the classification when we come to consider the Estimates of these departments, and I would ask my hon. friend if it might not be possible for the Government to print what they have and bring it down so that we may have an opportunity to study the matter before we discuss the Estimates.

Mr. ROWELL: I shall be glad to consider the suggestion of the hon. gentleman, and I think that it may be possible to do what he proposes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Can my hon. friend tell us what expense the classification has involved?

Mr. ROWELL: There was the work of classification and its application to the service, and there was also the re-organization of the Printing Bureau, which was a distinct piece of work. Altogether, I think the expenditure amounted to approximately $140,000; that is, including the whole thing. I have not the figures by me, but I think that what I have given is near the mark.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister is under the impression that it amounts to $140,000?

Mr. ROWELL: Yes, covering both the re-classification and the re-organization of the Printing Bureau. That is my present impression.

Mr. MACKENZIE King: I think there were a number of experts retained by the Government in connection with the re-classification. Can the minister tell us what was paid to these men?

Mr. ROWELL: I have just given the figure. The full information has been given to Parliament already in answer to questions by some hon. members.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: A question was asked as to the personnel of this organization and where the experts came from, but I am not sure that the question I have just asked has been answered, and I should like to obtain the information.

Mr. ROWELL: That question was answered too. It was answered this session and at the previous session. The firm who were employed were Arthur Young & Company, whose headquarters are at Chicago.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The firm sent their men here. Who were the persons that came to Ottawa?

Mr. ROWELL: Mr. Myers was the man in general charge here throughout the period of re-organization, and Mr. Griffenhagen was the superior officer who came here and assisted from time to time in connection with the work. Under Mr. Myers there were, of course, the necessary associates to assist in carrying on the work.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does the minister know what Mr. Myers' first name is?

Mr. ROWELL: No; I cannot recall it at the moment.

9 p.m. The CHAIRMAN: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not yet, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN: The unanimous consent of the committee must be obtained if we are to enter upon a discussion which would be strictly relevant upon the Estimates but which is certainly irrelevant to the clause under consideration. The question as to who prepared the classification and what was paid for the work has undoubtedly no bearing on the clause now before the committee. The purpose of the clause is to make the salaries of civil servants retroactive.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall not press the question now, but I may intimate to the minister that we shall expect the information which is now sought when we come to consider the Estimates.

Mr. ROWELL: I shall be glad to give that information then. Had I expected that the question would be raised now I would have been prepared to answer it in detail.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): I do not like the construction of subsection (3) which says that any moneys required to be paid for the purpose of carrying out the provisions "of the next preceding subsection" shall be payable out of any moneys appropriated by Parliament for the purpose. I do not think this subsection is necessary because we already have a section in the original Act providing for the payment of these employees. Section 24 says that temporary employees shall only be paid out of the moneys specially provided by Parliament for the purpose. That gives Parliament considerably more control than it would have under this subsection, and it is quite sufficient to cover all cases. I quite understand that the minister is providing for a certain class of people appointed within certain dates, and I am raising no question so far as that is concerned; but in regard to temporary employees in general, I think that section 24 of the Act is sufficient. We should not substitute for it a section which means pretty nearly the same thing but which is indefinite and does not give Parliament the same control as section 24.

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend refers to section 24. He will see that the section with which we are now dealing covers more than temporary employees; it deals with all employees in the public service, and the effect of the section is to make the classification apply from the year 1919 so as to give all employees in the public service the benefit of any increases in salary which the classification provides. The commission, after considering the matter, deemed it desirable to include a clause such as this. By reason of the amendment this subsection will have to be amended to read "Under the provisions of this section", instead of "under the provisions of the next preceding subsection". In regard to the objection raised by my hon. friend, I see no harm in this clause. We have to come down with an Estimate and the money necessary to pay the additional amounts which will be called for will be paid out of any sum which Parliament may vote for the purpose.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is retaining the control of Parliament over public funds.

Mr. ROWELL: Absolutely. In the Civil Service Act of 1908 a section was inserted which authorized the payment out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of any increased amounts that might be payable by reason of the application of the classification. It was suggested we might insert a similar clause in the Bill but after consideration we decided to bring down an Estimate to cover any increased amounts even although we might not be able to tell the House just the exact amount required. But we decided, after consideration, to bring down an Estimate to cover any increased amounts even though we might not be able to tell the House the exact sum; we decided that we would ask Parliament for a lump sum to cover whatever these increases might be. This preserves the absolute control of Parliament over the money required.

Mr. CAHILL: Could the minister give us any idea as to the number of people that are affected by this change in the classification?

Mr. ROWELL: All the civil servants are affected by the change in classification, but that does not mean that all civil servants will get an increase in pay. I cannot say how many will get increased pay, because personally I have not gone over the application of the classification to the service. There are 48,000 civil servants, permanent and temporary, in all the departments of the service, inside and outside, exclusive of seasonal employees, the workers on docks, public works, etc,, the men who are paid the current rate of wages, and—

Mr. EULER: Does this Bill provide for the case of the postal employees who asked for consideration?

Mr. ROWELL: It does.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Will the minister, when he has leisure, give an exact statement to the House as to the number of employees in each of the departments. I understood him to question the criticism I made the other day, when I spoke on the Budget, in reference to the number of employees that have been appointed by the Government, or the Civil Service Commission, since the Armistice was signed. I asked some quesions on the subject some weeks ago and received an answer from the Secretary of State. It was not my statement, it was the statement the Government gave to me through the Secretary of State, that since the Armistice the Civil Service Commission have appointed 4,176 permanent employees and 22,954 temporary employees, making in all 27,130. The Secretary of State (Mr. Burrell) was present when I made the statement and offered no objection. I explained, when I read those figures, that the answer also contained the statement that certain of those employees were appointed for a short time. I followed the matter up by putting another question asking how many temporary employees were still on the pay-roll. I received an answer to that question only to-day, and according to that answer there are still 6,064 on the pay-roll. I am reading these figures in order that I may not be misunderstood in any way, because I want to be perfectly fair and do not wish to quote any figures that I do not believe to be correct. The minister, who is a very truthful man himself, hinted the other day that I was not adhering to the exact facts in regard to the matters that I referred to in my speech on the Budget, but I gave the information that had been supplied to me by the Government as plainly and honestly as I could; I was not going outside the figures that had been given me by the Government. Now I want to give the revised figures to show just what the Government say in their latest statement as to what the number is. The number is stated in the return furnished to me as 6,064, and the document goes on to say:

> In the above list the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment is not included, as that department is no longer under the Civil Service Commission. The number of appointments to this department in the original figures of 22,954 was 2,747, leaving 20,207 of which 6,064 are still on the pay-roll of the Government as temporary employees.

This is signed by Mr. William Foran, Secretary of the Civil Service Board, but the return is very incomplete. Now if you add together the 1,257 appointed by the Soldiers' Settlement Board, the 275 on the staff of the Pensions Commissioners and the 4,176 permanent appointments you get 12,004 as the number appointed since the Armistice. This is a very large number, yet it does not include the whole number that have been appointed, because we have been informed that it does not include the employees of the Government railways, the Government Merchant Marine, and the Taxation Branch of the Finance Department. So it appears by the revised statement of the Government that something in the neighbourhood of twelve thousand employees, temporary and permanent, have been appointed by the Civil Service Board to the various public departments since the Armistice. The minister now says that there are 48,000 employees altogether in the service of the Government. Consequently the employees have been increased since the date of the Armistice by 25 per cent. I would like to bring this matter to the attention of the minister, that if it is true that about 12,000 new civil servants have been appointed since the Armistice, it means an enormous addition to the Civil Service. As I said before if you credit them with $1,000 apiece each year, you increase the expenditure of this country by $12,000,000 a year; and if you allot them $2,000 apiece, which is nearer the mark, you increase that expenditure by $24,000,000 a year. I submit that that is a very large increase indeed, and that my hon. friend will have to do little more explaining before he will satisfy the people of Canada that it was necessary to make such an enormous increase in the staff of civil servants since the date of the Armistice.

Mr. ROWELL: I do not want to review the Budget debate; strictly speaking my hon. friend's remarks are out of order, but I did not want to interrupt him. The hon. member has referred to the answer which he received in the House when the question was asked as to the number of appointments that had been made. When the answer was given, the Secretary of State added that among those who were appointed temporarily, "many thousands were for short periods of less than thirty days." Notwithstanding that information given to my hon. friend he stated that he estimated at least 25,000 were continued in the public service and he figured the average salary would be $2,000 per individual per year, making an increase of $50,000,000 in the annual charge for the Civil Service. Now I gave the facts to the House the other night and showed that the hon. member's estimate was without any foundation in fact. It is quite true a large number have been employed since the Armistice but where the appointment is for a week or a month or two or three months, and bearing in mind the constant change in employees on public works, the wonder is that the number has not been larger. The departments are constantly demobilizing, are constantly letting men go and reducing the staffs. The personnel on Public Works is constantly changing. The question is not how many men have been employed, but what has been the actual increase in the Civil Service during the period. I gave the House the other night the number employed at the present time. I showed the difference between the two periods and I explained how many had been added and how many had been discharged. My hon. friend's statement was entirely incorrect and wholly beside the mark as can be ascertained by a review of the figures I gave in my address on the Budget.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): I have taken the statement from the figures which I received to-day from the Government. If I had received those figures before I made my speech on the Budget I would have used them. At the time I first asked the question I got a very prompt answer—within three or four days—of the number of permanent and temporary civil servants that had been appointed since the Armistice. But when I followed the matter up with a second question—because as my hon. friend said the information was somewhat indefinite owing to the fact that certain men had only been employed for a short time—and inquired how many of these twenty thousand odd temporary employees were still on the Government's pay-roll, I got no answer to the question. The matter went on from day to day, and finally the question was put down as an order for return. I only obtained that return this morning. So I think my hon. friend will admit I am treating him and the Government very fairly, and I am putting the return on record to show what the Government say now in regard to the number of appointments they have made. It is not cleared up. We know how many appointments they have made, and I still hold to the opinion I expressed before, that with an over-crowded Civil Service at the date of the Armistice these 12,000 new appointments cannot be justified.

Mr. CAHILL: Do I understand the minister will have to bring down Supplementary Estimates covering this item?

Mr. ROWELL: Yes.

Mr. CAHILL: How soon does he expect to submit those Supplementary Estimates to the House? It is now within ten days or two weeks before the end of the session.

Mr. ROWELL: It will be within a week or ten days before the end of the session at any event.

Mr. McKENZIE: I have had complaints from civil servants outside of the city of Ottawa, janitors of post offices and other public buildings, that they have not received any bonus for April and May of this year. Is there any explanation for this delay? Will those janitors benefit by the classification?

Mr. ROWELL: I cannot say at present whether they will get more or not, as I have not the classification before me. With reference to the bonus, as my hon. friend is aware, the bonus vote passed this House only last month, and the cheque going out for June will carry the bonus to which those men are entitled.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. ROWELL: I move to further amend clause 5 by striking out in line 48 on page 2 of the Bill the words "the next preceding subsection," and substituting therefor the words "this section."

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On the title:

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Before the title carries I would like to draw attention to the fact that this Bill is in the same category as the long list I mentioned the other day of legislation to amend legislation passed in the previous session, which legislation in turn was to amend legislation of the session still preceding. This is "An Act to amend the Civil Service Act, 1918, and the Civil Service Amendment Act, 1919." I am pointing this out in the hope that next session the Government will not bring in another amendment to this Act. Most of the time of this session has been taken up in amending legislation hastily prepared.

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend has said on former occasions that there are some men of Conservative or Tory characteristics on this side of the House, but I am afraid he is the greatest Tory of all. He is apparently one of those who think we ought not to move forward at all and that if legislation is once passed it must be like the laws of the Medes and Persians, unchangeable. As we move ahead we must have amendments to meet changed conditions.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am not objecting to change, but I do object to making this Parliament a sort of repair shop for defective legislation.

Title agreed to.

Bill as amended reported.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Rowell for the third reading:

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think the third reading had better stand.

Mr. ROWELL: We have promised that the Bill should be expedited as much as possible so that the service might receive the additional amounts payable to them under this legislation, but of course if my hon. friend has any objection I cannot ask for the third reading.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have no objection to the third reading at the next sitting of the House, but at present the attendance is not very large, and it seems to me it would be better now not to proceed further.

Motion stands.

SUPPLY.

House again in Committee of Supply. Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Public Works—Chargeable to Income—Public buildings Nova Scotia, $42,000.

Mr. FIELDING: I understand that there are no new buildings in this appropriation; it is all repairs and improvements?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes. Every appropriation for new buildings in the Estimates last year was struck out, and, so far as I know, what is before us now is simply for repairs or for completing work already started, such as in the case of the drill hall at Amherst. The building has been completed and this vote is for the sidewalks and grading around the building.

Mr. FIELDING: If it is the settled policy of the Government that they will not this year grant appropriations for any new buildings, I shall not bring forward some claims which I would otherwise make in that connection.

Mr. J. D. REID: That was the policy when these Estimates were made up, and so far as I know there has been no change.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister says that this vote is to pay for gradings and sidewalks. Twenty-five thousand dollars seems to be a good deal to pay out for gradings and sidewalks in connection with one building.

Mr. J. D. REID: This amount is required to cover the cost of waterproofing the basement walls, asphalt floors in the main hall, sidewalks and gradings, $21,500; superintendence, $3,500; total $25,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: When was this drill hall started?

Mr. J. D. REID: The building was completed in 1914. This work that we are now providing for has been held up during the war.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is it customary to put concrete pavings in drill halls?

Mr. J. D. REID: It is the custom to put in asphalt floors, yes.

Mr. McKENZIE: Was this building sufficiently advanced to be used during the war?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes, the Militia had it in use.

Mr. COPP: To what use is it being put now?

Mr. J. D. REID: It is under the charge of the Militia Department. In the re-organization of the Militia I suppose they will use it for militia purposes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This building, the minister says, was used for militia purposes during the war. To spend $25,000 now to put it into shape seems to be a poor sort of economy.

Mr. J. D. REID: The building was not completed owing to the large war expenditures, but it cannot be left in its present state; it will have to be completed.

Mr. COPP: A great many demands for public buildings throughout Canada have to be refused because of the lack of money. Now, here is a drill hall that was finished in 1914. If during the war, when troops weere quartered there, this building could get along without the grading and paving and sidewalks that are now proposed to be put in, it seems to me that this appropriation might well be devoted to the erection of public buildings in some other places where they are really needed. My hon. friend says that this building is being used for militia purposes. No soldiers are quartered there; there is no general militia work going on; there are no training camps in the vicinity. There seems to be no use for the building. Why spend $25,000 at this time to put down sidewalks and pavings around this drill hall? I think the minister should give the committee a little more information before this item passes.

Mr. J. D. REID: The Militia Department have asked that this building be completed. There is water in the cellar and if something is not done the building may be injured or destroyed. Besides, it is the custom to complete the sidewalks and grading around all public buildings. We are only completing work that must be done in connection with this building if it is to be used at all.

Mr. COPP: Does my hon. friend want us to understand that there is water in the cellar because there is no sidewalk around the building? Does he want us to understand that during the past six years there has been water in the cellar and no proper drainage was put in when the building was constructed? The town of Amherst adjoins my own town, and from the information I have it does seem to me that if for six years we could get along without a sidewalk and without cement paving around this magnificent building we might get along for a year or two longer and use this money in places where its application is badly needed.

Sydney Quarantine Station—repairs and improvements, $5,000.

Mr. McKENZIE: I understand that the minister has received a great many requests this year for the enlargement of this quarantine station. It has always been too small, and I hope that it will be made larger as soon as possible. As a matter of fact a new station would be much in the public interest.

Mr. J. D. REID: We have decided not to go on with any new works during the present year if we can possibly avoid it. We are merely putting in the votes for upkeep and trying to keep the buildings that we have in as good repair as possible pending the making of extensions or the erection of such new buildings as may be necessary.

St. John—Dominion buildings—improvements, etc., $7,000.

Mr. COPP: What are the buildings to which this vote is to be applied?

Mr. J. D. REID: Post office on Prince William street; customs house on Prince William street; old post office on Prince William street; savings bank on Princess street; St. John West post office on Union street.

Mr. COPP: What is the old post office building used for now?

Mr. J. D. REID: Customs, I understand, and Public Works Engineer.

Maritime provinces generally—Dominion public buildings—improvements, repairs, etc., $25,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I notice there is no appropriation specially for Prince Edward Island. That seems to me a great oversight. As this item relates to public works for the Maritime Provinces generally, I should like to say a word on behalf of Prince Edward Island. I appreciate what the minister said a moment ago about the Government's intention not to provide for any new pubic buildings this year. That being so, I should certainly take the same view as the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding); but I should like to call the attention of the minister to the necessity for a public building at the village of O'Leary and one at the town of Alberton in Prince County, Prince Edward Island. Both of these localities are important business communities and distributing centres, and there is considerable need for adequate facilities and accommodation. I should be obliged, when the minister considers estimates for public building in the future, should he ever have occasion so to do, if he would make a point of looking into the needs of both these localities.

Mr. J. D. REID: My memorandum shows that repairs in Prince Edward Island come out of this general appropriation.

Quebec—Granby public building, alterations and improvements, $18,000.

Mr. GEO. H. BOIVIN (Shefford) (Mr. Steele in the Chair): Mr. Chairman I may not be in order in referring to the Budget debate to answer the question then put to the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster). The query was: "Where is Granby?" I will not attempt to do so because hon. members know well where Granby is situated but they may not be equally conversant with the fact that the amount mentioned in the Estimates for alterations, repairs and improvements to the public building located in that city is very urgently needed. Before I ask the hon. the minister when the citizens of Granby may expect the long hoped-for and much-needed repairs to the local post office, I might be allowed to say that this building was erected in or about the year 1900 when the population of the village of Granby was less than 4,000. Since that time the village has become a city and now has a population of about 8,000 without taking into consideration the large farming community in the immediate vicinity. The post office has never been enlarged, and hundreds of our citizens, who desire to do so, are unable to secure and rent post office boxes. We should have a city mail delivery, but the citizens of Granby are patriotic and they realize that we must not ask for this convenience just at the present time. We have at Granby a large number of factories and the proprietors and managers of some of those more recently established have to apply to the general delivery wicket for their daily mail for the very simple reason that it is impossible for them to secure a box or drawer in the post office. The evening train arrives quite late and after the heavy mail is distributed, there is only about one half hour left to deliver the mail to the public before the wicket is closed for the night. Several merchants, and factory managers, and hundreds of citizens, are obliged to get their mail during that one half-hour with the result that the part of the building which is open to the public is absolutely packed and jammed at that particular time. It becomes absolutely unsanitary, and while our male residents fight their way through the crowd to reach their boxes or the general delivery wicket, our ladies and young girls are obliged to wait until the following day before they can secure any letters addressed to them. I cannot impress too strongly upon the department the necessity of making these repairs at once. I can assure the hon. minister that I was greatly pleased when the amount of $6,500 was voted last year for alterations and improvements to the building but I realized then, as the department has undoubtedly since ascertained, that the amount was not sufficient and I am glad that the work was delayed until the proper amount could be voted for the purpose. If the plans are not already made, I would suggest that the post office proper be extended to the entire ground floor of the building, that the stairway be removed and that the store-room for small parcels held in bond by the collector of customs which now occupies a large portion of the ground floor be placed in the upper part of the building. I feel that without enlarging the building otherwise than by adding an extra storey to the extension, the needs of the people of the city of Granby can be met for a few years and that we may live in hopes that as soon as the finances of the country are in better condition we may be entitled to the privilege which has already been granted by this and former governments to other cities much less important than the city of Granby, where the mails are delivered to the homes, offices and business places of their citizens. Now may I ask the minister what is the nature of the contemplated repairs, when will they be commenced and when may we hope to see them completed?

Mr. J. D. REID: Not only as regards this appropriation, but as regards all appropriations in the Public Works Department for repairs to public buildings and wharves, the requests were made in every case by the department in control of the building or wharf. The Public Works Department has looked into each matter very carefully, and there is no doubt whatever that the repairs are urgently needed and should be made. This appropriation is required for the building of an additional storey over the existing extension of the public building at Granby to provide increased accommodation on the ground floor for the post office and also for general alterations to the interior of the building, including the removal of the staircase and the installation of toilets. The size of the extension over which the additional storey is to be built is 21 feet 6 inches by 37 feet 6 inches. The estimated cost is as follows: One storey addition over extension, $12,000; alterations to interior fittings, $4,000; contingencies and superintendence, $2,000; total, $18,000.

These repairs are urgently needed in every case. A speech similar to the one my hon. friend has made could be made, I suppose, by any member of this House in connection with any of the Estimates I am asking the House to pass. I should like to have these Estimates put through, tenders called for, and the work started as soon as possible because if I have to wait for some time, half the summer will be gone. My intention is to instruct the deputy minister to call for tenders and proceed with the work at once so far as these repairs are concerned.

Mr. BOIVIN: I hope the committee will not construe my remarks as an attempt to obstruct the passage of this item and on behalf of my constituents I desire to thank the minister for having once more placed it in the Estimates.

Mr. COPP: I do not rise for the purpose of opposing the passage of this item, but I want to take this opportunity of asking the Acting Minister of Public Works to apply the argument that has been so well made by the hon. member for Shefford (Mr Boivin) to other post offices and public buildings throughout the Dominion, and particularly to the post office building in the town of Sackville. My hon. friend says that the post office that is going to be repaired at Granby was built in 1900, when the population of the town was something like 4,000. The post office which I have requested the department to have replaced or rebuilt in the town of Sackville was not built in 1900, but in the 1840's. It was an old store before Sackville was a town, when in fact it was the smallest kind of country village, and hardly a village indeed. After the town became incorporated and began to grow, this store was moved off on a temporary foundation and has now been used for several years as a post office which would be a disgrace to any village, let alone a town. The town of Sackville to-day has a population of about 4,000 people, and furthermore, it is the seat of the Mount Allison institution which during nine months of the year has an attendance of 1,000 students, and of course they go to this post office for their mail. My hon. friend from Shefford says that the lobby of the post office at Granby is filled with people at mail time, and that business men have to stand at the wicket half an hour. The patrons of the Sackville post office have to stand at the wicket two hours, and then cannot get their mail. They have no post office boxes there or anything of that kind, and I say to the minister in all seriousness and frankness that the post office facilities in the town of Sackville are a disgrace to this country, a disgrace to the Government, and to the Public Works Department which has charge of the public buildings of our country. I have been drawing the minister's attention to this matter for some two or three years, and the excuse was given to me and to a delegation that came here from Sackville that it was impossible to build post offices or any public buildings while the war was on, but that when the war was over these public buildings would be given consideration. Well, the war is over, and the very first item the committee is asked to vote is the amount of $25,000 for grading and paving streets around Amherst drill hall. Amherst has no more need of a drill hall at this particular time than this Chamber needs another marble walk around it to keep people outside. I say again to my hon. friend that when he asks us to vote public money for the grading and paving of streets around the drill hall at Amherst, and leaves Sackville and other towns absolutely without a decent and respectable place for the people to get their mail, it is a disgrace to the Public Works Department and the Government of this country. Our people have to pay their taxes, and pay handsomely at the present time, and yet the town of Sackville and other places throughout the country are left without decent postal accommodation. It is no more right to pass this item of $18,000 for the town of Granby than items to provide for decent postal facilities in the town of Sackville and other places throughout this Dominion where they are urgently required.

Grosse Isle Quarantine Station—new buildings and repairs, $200,000.

Mr. J. D. REID: This is for the construction of a superstructure for the new hospital at Grosse Isle Quarantine Station, the foundation of which was completed in 1915. It will comprise a medical building 40 by 34 feet, administration building 54 by 54 feet, five ward units each 126 by 40 feet, with passage connecting same. It is also proposed to build two wings at the present time.

Mr. DENIS: Will this item cover the cost of the whole work?

Mr. J. D. REID: It is proposed to build five wings at a cost of $100,000 each. That would make $500,000.

Ontario—Dominion public buildings—improvements, repairs, etc., $35,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is this for?

Mr. J. D. REID: It is for the purpose of keeping in repair the buildings throughout the whole province.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is it the customary vote?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes.

Hamilton Post Office—improvements, $8,000.

Mr. J. D. REID: This is for a mezzanine floor for the whole ground floor of the Hamilton Post Office and to provide increased accommodation for the postal employees. The building is overcrowded and in a very bad state. We had a report only a week or so ago. It is absolutely necessary that something be done to protect the health of the employees.

Mr. PEDLOW: Has the minister, in these Ontario items, an appropriation for an extension to the post office building at Renfrew?

Mr. J. D. REID: These items are not for new buildings or extensions. The $35,000 item is a general vote to be used for repairs to buildings throughout the whole province. When the item is passed, we shall not have power or authority to use any of that money for new work or extensions.

Mr. PEDLOW: I understand that application has been made to the department for an extension to the Renfrew post office. The accommodation at the Renfrew post office is entirely inadequate for the business that is done, and I understand that the postmaster has made application for an extension to the building in order to provide proper accommodation for the work that has to be carried on. I understand also that plans have been prepared by the department and that an inspector of the department has surveyed the situation and recommended that the work be proceeded with. The condition at the Renfrew post office is pretty much the same as the conditions as represented by my hon. friend for Shefford at the Granby post office. The present building was erected when the population of Renfrew was about 4,000 people; to-day the population is in the neighbourhood of 7,000 people, and in addition to the extra work necessitated by the increased population there is also the work that is made necessary on account of the rural mail service, Renfrew being the centre for a large district. In view of these considerations, the present accommodation is not adequate. If there is no item in the Estimates for this purpose I appeal to the minister for consideration of this request from the Postmaster at Renfrew for this additional accommodation which is required there, which I understand has been reported on favourably by an inspector of the department.

Mr. J. D. REID: I have had a request from Renfrew for such an extension as the hon. member advocates and we have a report which would justify proceeding with the work. When the Supplementary Estimates are under consideration I hope to be able to do something in connection with the Renfrew case, which is among very many other urgent cases that have come before us.

Mr. MANION: As it is in order now for members to say a few words in behalf of their constituencies, I think it is time for me to say something in connection with a post office in my riding which I have been pressing upon the Government now for about four years, or at least since the Union Government came into power. The town of Fort Frances has a population of about 4,000 and it has no public building of any kind. Its Immigration office, its Indian office and its post office and customs office are all located in ramshackle buildings which are entirely unsatisfactory. At various times I have taken this matter up, having brought it to the attention of previous ministers of public works as well as to the attention of the present minister, and they have all been very kind in promising early consideration of the question when spending any money on public buildings in the country, but nothing has been done. I should like at this moment once again to press upon the minister the desirability of doing something in this particular case, and I should like to have him give me an answer similar to that which he gave the hon. member (Mr. Pedlow). If any consideration is to be given to these smaller centres so far as the erection of new buildings is concerned, I insist that the town of Fort Frances, which is in dire need of attention, be not forgotten.

Mr. J. D. REID: I can assure the hon. member that in any consideration that may be given to the question of putting up new buildings the town of Fort Frances will not be overlooked.

Hamilton Postal Station "B", $25,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is this for?

Mr. J. D. REID: This $25,000 is required to complete the construction of the building for postal station "B," on the south side of Barton street, immediately east of Stirton street. Description of building: Brick structure, 58 ft. 8 in. x 40 ft. 6 in., with annex 19 ft. 3 in. x 32 ft. 8 in; two stories and basement.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Queen's): When was this work started?

Mr. J. D. REID: In 1919.

Kingston Royal Military College—Enlargement of Educational block, $265,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This is a large item. Can the minister give us some information in regard to it?

Mr. J. D. REID: This building is under construction. The total amount of the contract is $326,884. To complete the contract $210,000 is required; for fittings and furniture, $25,000; for sidewalks and concrete work, $10,000; for superintendence, $20,000, making the total of $265,000 which is now asked for I have seen the building, which is a wing of the Royal Military College, and it justifies the expenditure.

Mr. COPP: When was the contract let?

Mr. J. D. REID: The date of the contract is April 12, 1919.

Mr. DENIS: It seems to me that just after the war this huge expenditure might have been avoided. This is a very large contract in these hard times, and for my part I am not satisfied that sufficient explanation has been given to show the necessity for this expenditure.

Mr. J. D. REID: The matter was all discussed last session when the Estimates were up. The contract has been let and the work proceeded with. In a reply to a letter from the Deputy Minister of Public Works of June 7, inquiring as to the necessity of a list of works requested by the Department of Militia and Defence to be noted in the Supplementary Estimates, the Deputy Minister of Militia and Defence, under date of 23rd of June, states as follows:

> I have the honour to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 7th inst., and to inform you that the various items contained in your letter have been carefully gone into and it is requested that the following items which are urgently required be provided for in your Supplementary Estimates:
> Enlargement of Educational Block.. $150,000
> Complete new dormitory, adding two wings.. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. 100,000
> It is hoped that every effort will be made to provide these items.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is the date of that letter?

Mr. J. D. REID: June 7, 1918. There was an item in the Estimates in connection with this matter last year, and the building must be very nearly completed by now.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is the total cost?

Mr. J. D. REID: The total cost is $326,884.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would point out to the minister that that is about one-third of a million dollars and a very large sum of money to expend on a building that is primarily to serve military purposes. Can the minister give us any idea as to why the authorities require a building of this size at this particular time?

Mr. J. D. REID: I do not think there is any member in the House who will realize the importance of the Royal Military College in Kingston more than the leader of the Opposition. Personally, I think that the Royal Military College in Kingston is one of the best institutions in Canada, and it does not serve military purposes exclusively. The young men who are turned out of this institution are a credit to Canada, and it is important that the institution be enlarged. Of course, it is too late now to decide whether or not the work should be proceeded with, for the reason that $150,000 was voted in last year's Estimates, when the matter was thoroughly discussed. Parliament passed the item, the contract was let and the work is now pretty well completed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not wish to be understood as arguing that the contract should be cancelled, or as in any way reflecting on the Military College, because I entertain the highest opinion of the work being done at that institution. As the minister has said the services performed by the college extend far beyond the immediate work it does in connection with the militia, although in that connection also it has been very useful. The point I wish to bring out is that these expenditures seem to have been contemplated since the termination of the war. It is rather remarkable that public buildings, in the nature of a drill hall at Amherst and this extension to the Military College, should have been undertaken since the signing of peace, whereas public buildings of a different nature, and for other purposes, are neglected altogether.

Mr. DENIS: As the minister has just said it is too late to repudiate the contract, but the question I would ask is: Why were these Supplementary Estimates not embodied in the main Estimates last year? Why were all these Supplementary Estimates, including probably this particular item, brought down at practically the last minute during the dying hours of the session when $40,000,000 was voted in the course of three or four hours? That is the very practice I have always opposed—although I am not alone in that—and shall continue to oppose. These Estimates are passed by Parliament without any accurate knowledge of them; if Parliament did have sufficient knowledge the items would not be allowed to pass in the way they have been. The country has no money to spare for such outlays; and moreover when the cost of building has gone up a hundred and fifty and even two hundred per cent above what it was before the war it is no time to undertake new buildings unless there is absolute necessity for them.

Mr. PEDLOW: Before this item is carried I would like to ask the minister if the contract for this extension to the Royal Military College was let by tender, or is being carried out on the cost-plus basis; and who the contractors are?

Mr. J. D. REID: It was let by tender, $326,884 being the lowest offer. The contract was awarded to the Piggott-Healey Construction Company, Hamilton.

Mr. CAHILL: How does it come that only $150,000 was voted for the work last year and a tender was accepted for $326,000?

Mr. J. D. REID: The estimate that is submitted to Parliament is supposed to be the amount that would be expended during that particular year; it is never the custom to put in the Estimates the amount the work is estimated to cost. It was estimated that $150,000 would be expended during the year ending March 31,

Mr. CAHILL: Will the vote which is now being taken complete the work, or will the minister come back next year and ask for an additional appropriation? Personally, I would like to encourage education in Ontario as much as possible. Anything that will bring light to Ontario is to be welcomed as a good thing, but we want to know where the expenditure for this particular undertaking will end.

Mr. J. D. REID: Out of the $150,000 voted last year about $125,000 is all that would be expended. This year we estimated that $210,000 would be required to complete the contract. Adding this amount to the $125,000 would make 335,000. However, the work may not cost that much. Then there is: Fittings and furniture, $25,000; sidewalks, grading, etc., $10,000; contingencies and superintendence, $20,000. That is the estimate, and we feel that we have got sufficient to complete the whole work, and probably more.

Mr. CAHILL: Could the minister give an estimate as to what the cost of superintendence amounts to, exclusive of the contingencies?

Mr. J. D. REID: In submitting the Estimates we generally put in about 10 per cent of the cost, but it is estimated that 8 per cent would be ample for this particular work, and it may not amount to that.

Kingsville, Public Buildings, $1,700.

Mr. CAHILL: Where is Kingsville?

Mr. J. D. REID: In the county of Essex. An item to construct the public building in Kingsville first appeared in the Estiments in 1910. It reappeared in the Estimates of 1910, 1911, 1912. In the last-named year the Public Works Department expropriated the site which was part of the Windsor, Essex and Lakeshore Rapid Railway Company's property. The property was encumbered and legal proceedings have been in progress ever since. The proceedings as to title were only completed a few months ago and this amount is to pay the award for the property, $1,500 and $200 legal expenses, making altogether $1,700. It is not the intention of the Government to go on with the public building this year.

Oshawa, new public building, $5,000.

Mr. J. D. REID: This vote is required to complete the construction of the new examining warehouse at the existing public building. The items entering into it are: To complete the contract, $2,000; fittings and furniture, $2,000; sidewalks and grading, $500; contingencies, etc., $500, making a total of $5,000. The contractors are the Russell-Navin Construction Company, Toronto.

Ottawa Departmental Buildings; to connect with Central Heating Plant, $11,000.

Mr. CAHILL: What buildings are to be connected?

Mr. J. D. REID: The East Block, West Block, the Langevin Block, the Post Office and the Supreme Court Building.

Mr. CAHILL: Are the connecting tunnels not already built?

Mr. J. D. REID: They are already built, this is to connect them all.

Ottawa Department Building, fittings, etc., $100,000.

Mr. CAHILL: What is this vote for?

Mr. J. D. REID: The vote is required for the purchase and installation of steel filing cases, adjustable roller book shelves, steel drawers, and so forth, required for offices in the Parliament and departmental buildings, Ottawa. The increase of $25,000 in this appropriation is due to additional fittings necessary owing to the readjustment of offices, particularly in the Hunter building, the Daly building and the new Parliament Buildings, and also to alterations and additions to the fittings in the postal note division of the Post Office Department. The estimated cost of $15,300 was requested by the Post Office Department at different dates.

Mr. CAHILL: Where are those fittings usually bought?

[Mr. J. D. Reid.]

Mr. J. D. REID: These different fittings are made by two Canadian companies only. Of course, all this work is done through the Purchasing Commission, not by the department.

Mr. PEDLOW: Why is it that the department still insists on supplying the public service with steel cabinets? I had occasion to take exception to the purchase of these cabinets last year, when I pointed out that on a contract for 500 steel cabinets a saving could be effected of $7,000 by purchasing wooden cabinets of the same dimensions at $27 each, instead of $41 charged for the steel cabinet. I also obtained information at that time that the department had during the same year ordered about 2,500 of these steel cabinets at an average price of $49, entailing an increased expenditure over and above the cost of the same style of cabinets in wood of $55,000,—or in all an additional expenditure of $62,000 in that year As a result of the representations I then made the firm I interested myself in obtained a contract for a number of wooden cabinets, with a resultant saving to the department. I am at a loss to understand why the department still insists on buying the more expensive article. I made an investigation at the time of the claims made by the manufacturers of the steel cabinets that their product was fireproof, but I found that those claims were not well founded. Those cabinets are made of tin, and are merely a cooking apparatus for the documents contained in them. After the fire which destroyed the old Parliament Buildings it was found that the contents of the steel filing cabinets were charred beyond recognition, while the contents of the wooden cabinets were intact where the cabinets themselves were not entirely consumed, showing clearly that the wooden cabinet was preferable to the steel. But apart from that consideration is the enormous saving to be effected by purchasing wooden cabinets. I think that in the interests of economy the department should look into this matter and at all events give the wooden cabinets a trial in preference to purchasing the more expensive article, for I am sure that on investigation it will be found that the claims I am making on behalf of the wooden cabinet will be fully substantiated.

Mr. J. D. REID: This is the first time the matter has been brought to my attention. I will look into it and see if the saving suggested by the hon. member can be effected.

Mr. PEDLOW: On that item alone a saving of $62,000 could have been made on one year's purchases.

Mr. CAHILL: How much money was spent last year on these cabinets, and what price was paid?

Mr. J. D. REID: The deputy minister tells me that last year's vote was all spent. Tenders were called for, but I have not got them here. I can give them later on some other Estimates.

Mr. CAHILL: Perhaps we had better let this item stand.

Mr. J. D. REID: I promise the hon. member that I will supply him with the information.

Mr. CAHILL: That will be all right if my hon. friend does not forget.

Mr. J. D. REID: I will not forget.

Mr. FIELDING: The hon. member mentioned the Parliament Buildings among others. I thought it was understood that the fittings and furniture for these buildings would come under the special vote. Is not that so?

Mr. J. D. REID: The deputy minister tells me that some of these fittings are out of the general vote and some are out of the vote for the Parliament Buildings. These filing cases are kept in store and are handed out whenever they may be required in these or any other public buildings in Ottawa.

Mr. FIELDING: The hon. minister will remember that in the discussion which took place several weeks ago respecting the Parliament Buildings, the question was asked whether the furniture and fittings were included in the vote, and it was stated they were included. In fact, the question was raised whether or not the architect was not entitled to a commission on the furniture and fittings. It seems important that they should be charged to one vote or the other.

Mr. J. D. REID: There is quite a difference between the furniture of these buildings and filing cases installed at a later period. The former are really part of the fittings of the buildings, but these cases are only put in when they are actually required, otherwise we would have to pay a commission to the architect.

Mr. CAHILL: One hundred thousand dollars for filing cases seems to be an extraordinary amount of money. What departments did these cases go to last year, and under whose orders were they purchased?

Mr. J. D. REID: To all the departments.

Mr. CAHILL: What is the basis? How do you get such an item as $175,000 one year and $100,000 another year for filing cases?

Mr. J. D. REID: The filing cases purchased under this vote go to all the departments. The cases are bought in large quantities and are kept in store ready to deliver to whatever department requires them. They could not be ordered singly or in small quantities as it would take too long to get them delivered.

Mr. CAHILL: What do they cost?

Mr. J. D. REID: They cost $45 or $46 each.

Mr. CAHILL: Do I understand that if any department—say the Post Office Department—makes a requisition on the Public Works Department for 200 or 300 of these filing cases, the Public Works Department ascertains whether there is any necessity for the order? Or does it simply pass the requisition on to the half-defunct Purchasing Board and ask them to get tenders? Where does the check come in?

Mr. J. D. REID: I will tell the hon. gentleman the procedure. When the stock that we have on hand is reduced, tenders are called through the Purchasing Commission and the lowest tender is accepted. The filing cases required are then delivered and put in store under the control of the Public Works Department. If another department requires some of these filing cases, requisition is made on the Public Works Department, and the responsibility for the order rests on the head and deputy of the department making the requisition.

Mr. CAHILL: The matter, then, is dealt with as between the different departments. We ask the minister now for the prices that were paid the past year for these cases and the names of the firms from whom they were bought, but we are unable to get the information.

Mr. J. D. REID: I shall be glad to let the item stand until I can get the information for my hon. friend.

Item stands.

Toronto—Postal Station "A"—to complete, $425,000.

Mr. J. D. REID: This amount is required to complete the new terminal postal station

"A" forming part of the easterly wing of the new Union Station. The new Union Station is being built by the P. Lyall Construction Company, Limited, for the Toronto Terminal Railway company on a cost plus 3 per cent basis. Postal station "A" is a unit of the railway station, the Toronto Terminal Railway Company supervising its construction and charging the Government for the work. The Government also have an inspector there.

Mr. CAHILL: What is the work estimated to cost?

Mr. J. D. REID: Estimated total cost, $1,414,908.40; cost to date $1,079,341. Balance to complete $335,567.40; overhead charges, $10,000; fittings and furniture, $50,000; contingencies and superintendence, $30,000; total, $425,000. Hon. members will see that the work is pretty nearly completed.

Mr. MURPHY: Did I understand the minister to say that the work was being proceeded with by the P. Lyall Company on the basis of cost plus 3 per cent?

Mr. J. D. REID: They are building the Toronto railway station.

Mr. MURPHY: On that basis—cost plus 3 per cent?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes.

Portage la Prairie—enlargement and improvement of public building, $30,000.

Mr. CAHILL: What is the explanation of this item?

Mr. J. D. REID: This amount is required for the erection of an addition to the public building, situated on Ann street on the corner of Saskatchewan Avenue. The estimated cost of the addition is $25,000; alterations and fittings, $3,000; contingencies, $2,000.

Mr. CAHILL: Would that not be considered almost a new building?

Mr. J. D. REID: No, it is an addition.

Winnipeg—Postal Station "A"—improvements, $24,000.

Mr. J. D. REID: This is for the installation of an electric elevator to replace an escalator at the west end of the building, $12,863; marquees at the east end of the building to protect the mail trucks, $1,500; two tractors, $8,000; contingencies, $1,637; total, $24,000.

British Columbia—Kamloops new public building, $25,000.

Mr. COPP: What is this building for?

Mr. J. D. REID: This is an appropriation for the erection of a new public building for which a site was purchased during the present fiscal year.

Mr. COPP: Is it a new one?

Mr. J. D. REID: This is a new building, and I shall have to look into the matter. We shall let this item stand.

Item stands.

Vancouver Dominion buildings—improvements, repairs, etc., $10,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is the difference between "British Columbia Dominion public buildings" and "Vancouver Dominion public building"? This looks like a repetition of the same thing.

Mr. J. D. REID: We have a special appropriation for public buildings in a large city, and then we have an appropriation for public buildings in the province.

Williams Head quarantine station—land—including interest of 5 per cent from date of expropriation, $10,000.

Mr. MURPHY: What is the date of the expropriation?

Mr. J. D. REID: This amount is required to pay for 18¼ acres of land expropriated from Mrs. A. T. Watt, on the 13th May, 1918:

Experimental farms—new buildings and improvements, renewals and repairs, etc., in connection with existing buildings, fittings, etc., $200,000.

Mr. COPP: Explain.

Mr. J. D. REID: This appropriation is required for the erection of new buildings and for improvements, renewals, repairs and so forth to existing buildings at the several experimental farms and stations established throughout the Dominion, and it is asked for by the Deputy Minister of Agriculture in a letter dated 15th January, 1920. The $200,000 is made up as follows:

|---|---|
| Ottawa and Tobacco division | $ 53,235 |
| Charlottetown, P.E.I. | 6,450 |
| Kentville, N.S. | 8,600 |
| Nappan, N.S. | 6,500 |
| Fredericton, N.B. | 5,500 |
| Ste. Anne de la Pocatière, P.Q. | 8,750 |
| Cap Rouge, P.Q. | 15,250 |
| Lennoxville, P.Q. | 9,200 |
| Morden, Man. | 9,150 |
| Brandon, Man. | 12,900 |
| Indian Head, Sask. | 3,700 |
| Rosthern, Sask. | 5,600 |
| Scott, Sask. | 5,100 |
| Lethbridge, Alta. | 16,065 |
| Lacombe, Alta. | 5,400 |
| Summerland, B.C. | 17,150 |
| Inverness, B.C. | 1,950 |
| Agassiz, B.C. | 3,200 |
| Sidney, B.C. | 6,300 |
| Total | $200,000 |

A comparatively small amount.

Mr. COPP: This is a pretty large item, covering suggested improvements in the different branch experimental farms as well as the Central Experimental Farm at Ottawa. Building operations will be very expensive during the present and the coming year, and these experimental farms and stations all constitute a very large bill of expense to the country without considering the cost of erection of new buildings. If you go through the Auditor General's Report, you will find that these branch experimental stations cost from $40,000 to $75,000 a year without any returns coming in. Therefore, under present conditions when the department has to refuse requests for the erection, in many places throughout the Dominion, of public buildings such as post offices and so forth, that are required to give ordinary and proper facilities, the minister might well pause when he is requested to spend $200,000 for the erection of buildings in experimental stations throughout the country. I understand that last year a barn and a new cellar were constructed at one of the experimental stations at fairly heavy expense. When the roots were gathered from this magnificent farm, costing the public something like $50,000 with returns amounting to something like $3,000 a year, the roots were placed in the cellar and when the first touch of frost came, they were all frozen and destroyed. If that is the way in which the business of experimental farms is to be carried on, and year after year we are to be asked to vote these large sums of money, I would draw the minister's attention to the fact that the people are not looking for the expenditure of money along these lines at the present time. The word "economize" has been suggested to the country and particularly to hon. gentlemen on this side of the House as regards all things. If the Government is going to economize, the acting Minister of Public Works might very well cut this item from the Estimates. I am sure there is no very great demand nor need for the expenditure of $200,000 on experimental stations throughout the Dominion, and this is simply piling up a very much heavier loss to the country than we would otherwise have. Let the minister visit the different experimental stations and compare the buildings and barns used there for experimental purposes with the buildings the ordinary farmer has to use on his farm. Yet the minister is asking these farmers to pay exorbitant taxation on their farms to keep up beautiful exhibits here and there throughout the Dominion like the Central Experimental Farm which is used as a pleasure resort for certain individuals, and which is a very pleasant place in which to spend a holiday. This is a time when the Government is asking the people of the Dominion to delve down deep into their pockets, and deeper this year than ever before, for carrying on the operations of the Dominion and paying the interest on the enormous war debt that has been rolled up, whether rightly or wrongly, by extravagance or otherwise. This debt confronts us; the people have to pay it; they cannot build these fine showhouses; they cannot have conservatories filled with flowers for their enjoyment; and it is playing a little too much on the patience of the people of the Dominion to ask them to pay $200,000 so that few individuals may be able to visit these magnificent spots that are costing so much without a corresponding return to the revenues of the country.

Mr. J. D. REID: Requisitions were sent in to the Deputy Minister of Agriculture showing what it was considered was actually required for repairs and necessary works in connection with carrying on these farms. The Deputy Minister of Public Works and his staff took the matter up with the Deputy Minister of Agriculture for the purpose of trying to cut these items down to the very smallest possible amount. This is what the Deputy Minister of Agriculture stated in reply to a letter from the Deputy Minister of Public Works:

> In reply I would say that these Public Works' estimates, as originally sent in by the Director or Experimental Farms, amounted to nearly $700,000, but I cut down this sum to $200,000, and do not think I can possibly ask for less.

And so on. As regards the statement of the hon. member that the experimental farms are really of no benefit to the people of Canada, for that is really what his statement means—

Mr. COPP: I mean the benefit to the country does not correspond to the expenditure.

Mr. J. D. REID: There is quite a difference of opinion as far as that is concerned. I believe these farms are of great value and that they are appreciated by the people. Some, if not all, of the Provincial Governments are undertaking this kind of work, although probably not on as large a scale. My experience has been that the farms have been of great benefit, and we must certainly keep them in repair. I think when the Estimates of the Department of Agriculture are before the committee that would be the proper time to bring up the question whether we are receiving benefits corresponding with the expenditure involved in keeping up these farms. If the House thinks we are not receiving sufficient benefit the item, of course, should be struck out and the farms closed up, but personally I feel that the experimental farms are one of the last things that we should curtail expenditure on.

Mr. COPP: I can readily understand that applications have been made by the gentlemen who have charge of these farms. If all the managers and superintendents had the same viewpoint as the managers and superintendents of the farms I know, they would ask for $7,000,000 just as readily as for $7,000. What repairs are to be made to buildings on the experimental station at Fredericton, New Brunswick?

Mr. J. D. REID: Implement and feed storage shed, $3,000. I think my hon. friend will agree that that amount should be spent, if machinery has to be stored. Repairs to the superintendent's house $500, repairs to Peter's barn $500, general repairs $1,000, emergency repairs $500.

Mr. COPP: I think he might very well store his machinery in the cellar he built to store roots in. That might also hold grain. I repeat, these gentlemen would just as soon ask for $7,000,000 as for $7,000, and it would take no more postage to ask for the larger amount. If you gave them $7,000,000, they would squander it just as they squander what you vote for them. I still insist that the minister has not given the slightest reason why this item should pass the committee at the present time. The people of this country are not in a mood to vote money to be handed over to these gentlemen who are not in any way responsible to any person, and who will spend it in the lavish and extravagant way they have been spending money on these farms. My hon. friend says there is a difference of opinion as to the value of experimental farms. I have no doubt there is, but there is no difference, or should be no difference, in the minds of hon. gentlemen as to the necessity for economy in the operation of these farms, and I do not believe there is a member of this House who knows how these farms are operated who will say that there is not extravagance and waste in their operation. I do not believe the people are getting benefit corresponding with the amount of money expended. I do not say, close up these farms; but it seems to me at the present time we should get along for one year without expending $200,000 on a place to store machinery. The farmers throughout his Dominion have not stone warehouses in which to store their machinery. They have to put their machinery in their barn, which may not be quite so convenient, but nevertheless they have to do it. Any one who has seen these branch stations, and the machinery they have, knows that they can store the machinery in their present buildings. The experimental farm at Fredericton can take care of all their machinery in buildings they now have, and the superintendent's house might very well get along without these extraordinary repairs, just as other people's houses throughout this Dominion have to go without repairs, on account of the high cost of labour and materials at the present time. It is all very well for the superintendent of the farm. I know of some experimental stations where the land was bought and buildings erected just to give a man a job, and now we are called upon to expend $50,000 a year to keep a job for this gentleman. Now, he says: My house is not just as it should be; and perhaps I want oak floors in my house, and mahogany finish. So the people are called upon year after year to hand over $50,000 for this gentleman. Now we are asked to vote $200,000 to repair these stations and buy a little furniture and make their places look natty and neat at the expense of the country, while the ordinary people have to exercise economy and do without these things.

Flags for Dominion Public Buildings, $5,000.

Mr. CAHILL: Would the minister explain this item?

Mr. J. D. REID: The Public Works Department buys flags for all the public buildings throughout the Dominion.

Mr. CAHILL: What flag do they use?

Mr. J. D. REID: The Union Jack.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Not the Irish Republic flag?

Mr. J. D. REID: No, just the Union Jack.

Mr. COPP: Did you supply one for Sackville public building?

Mr. J. D. REID: Every public building is supposed to have a flag.

Mr. COPP: I would suggest that you send down a flag flying a signal of distress for the Sackville post office.

Mr. J. D. REID: We will send you two.

Port Hood—Wharf repairs and extension, $7,000.

Mr. CHISHOLM: Let me urge on the minister the importance of having this work attended to as speedily as possible. This item has been re-voted several times and I have brought the matter to the attention of the minister's predecessors. This is work that has been unduly neglected, and to put it in the condition in which it was five years ago will cost $30,000. Had the work been done when it first called for attention a few hundred dollars would have been sufficient. The longer it is neglected the more it will cost to put it in good shape. I trust the minister will attend to the matter without any delay. I want to inform him further that any work that is done on the shore must be done in June and July, otherwise it is useless to spend any money there. Thousands of dollars have been mis-spent in connection with work there which was inopportunely done.

Mr. J. D. REID: I agree with my hon. friend, and that is why I want these small items, which are urgently required, to go through as expeditiously as possible. I hope the hon. member will help me to get them through.

Shenacadie—wharf, $12,000.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is that contract let?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes. E. M. Dickson, of Louisburg, is the contractor. His contract was $11,831.30 and he was the lowest by a couple of hundred dollars.

Prince Edward Island—Harbours and Rivers generally—Repairs and improvements, $14,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I notice there is no special reference to the deepening of the Narrows and I have had some correspondence in connection with the matter. I should like the minister to give me an assurance that the work will be done. There is certain necessary dredging work to be done in The Narrows, in Prince county, to connect the deep water of Malpeque bay and Biddeford river with the deep water in Conway inlet, with the deep water in Conway river. Last summer the department made a survey of the locality.

Mr. J. D. REID: May I point out to my hon. friend that this is not the proper time to bring forward that matter. That item comes under "dredging."

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will my hon. friend give me an assurance now that he will do the work?

Mr. J. D. REID: I promise to give the matter very serious consideration.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Queen's): I would ask the minister if it is intended to spend any money on Graham's Run? There was a petition presented to the department last year asking that certain improvements be made there for the purpose of improving the boat harbour.

Mr. J. D. REID: It is under consideration for the Supplementary Estimates, it is not in this vote.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Queen's): Do I understand that it is in the Supplementary Estimates?

Mr. J. D. REID: It is under consideration in connection with those Estimates.

North Lake—Boat harbour, $27,000.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Queen's): Why was this amount not spent last year?

Mr. McISAAC: I may point out that the contract was let late last fall and the work could not be proceeded with then. They were prepared for the work and afterwards got the lumber. I understand that the work is now going on.

Mr. J. D. REID: It is under contract.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Queen's): What was the date of the contract?

Mr. J. D. REID: August 19, 1919.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): What was the amount of the contract?

Mr. J. D. REID: The contract amounted to approximately $25,500.

Wood Islands (P.E.I.)—repairs to breakwater, $800.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Queen's): Has a contract been let for the work?

Mr. J. D. REID: No, it is being done by days' labour.

Cocagne (N.B.)—repairs to wharf, $1,700.

Mr. LEGER: On what wharf is this money to be expended?

Mr. J. D. REID: There is a wharf one mile to the north called, "Cocagne Church Wharf." This is work that the hon. gentleman wished should be done.

Mr. ARGUE: I notice that the total vote for repairs to wharves, bridges, breakwaters, and so forth, in New Brunswick, is $172,525. A few minutes ago we listened to one of the representatives from that province expatiating on the expenditure of $200,000 upon experimental farms throughout the Dominion.

I wish to say that I do not believe the Government could expend a dollar anywhere in the Dominion more profitably than they do on experimental farms. But when we come down to the matter of wharves and bridges, and that sort of public works, in the East, you never hear one word of complaint; the representatives from that part of Canada are always asking for more. I think it is about time that as much money was spent on experimental farms as is being voted for wharves and breakwaters.

Mr. COPP: My hon. friend is a little late in speaking about experimental farms because the appropriation for that purpose has been passed. Still if he wants to continue the discussion on it, I am prepared to do so. With regard to the items under consideration I am not asking for any more expenditures. I did not even ask the Minister of Public Works to insert in the Estimates the appropriations that are now being passed. I should, however, say to him that in so far as regards the public works that are now under way he might very well devote some of the money to establishing post offices here and there throughout the province of New Brunswick. That would be much more appreciated than the votes which have just been sanctioned. While I am on my feet I would like to ask the minister whether the works for which large sums have been voted will be carried out by contract?

Mr. J. D. REID: In the case of every expenditure over $5,000 tenders must be called for.

Mr. CAHILL: Except in the case of ships.

Harbours and Rivers, Quebec, $519,400.

Mr. GAUVREAU: Before proceeding with these items I want to draw the minister's attention to the fact that there is no provision made for the completion of the wharf at the western end of Isle Verte. May I ask that the Minister of Public Works will look into the matter and insert $6,000 in the Supplementary Estimates for this purpose. Last session the then minister, Hon. Mr. Carvell, admitted the necessity for this work which is intended to help the islanders to transport their products promptly to the nearest market. These men are practically isolated and there is no means of transportation for them except by boat. Wharves have been started at both ends of the island, but at present it is impossible for the schooner which calls there to stop. The eastern wharf is under contract, and I was promised that the western wharf would be completed this summer.

Mr. J. D. REID: I have a great deal of sympathy for the people living on the shores and islands of the Gulf of St. Lawrence, who are far away from railway communication, and depend entirely upon navigation for facilities to carry their fish and other commodities to market. I know the place that my hon. friend refers to, and realize the urgent necessity for the work. I have a note to make provision for pressing this work forward when we are making out the Supplementary Estimates, and I promise the hon. member I will do my part with my colleague to have the item to which he refers included with the other Estimates.

Mr. GAUVREAU: If the other ministers do as well as the Minister of Railways I am sure I shall get the appropriation.

Ontario—harbours and rivers—North Bay—repairs to wharfs, $800.

Mr. HARRISON: I would like to know if there is a possibility of getting anything in the Supplementary Estimates this year for the shore protection at North Bay, in connection with which, I understand, an engineer was sent up to report. The whole of our park and the property of summer residents in that section will be washed away unless some protective work is undertaken this year.

Mr. J. D. REID: I sent an engineer to North Bay to make a report, and he is still there. When I receive his report I will see if anything can be done.

Mr. FIELDING: Now, Mr. Chairman, I think we have done our eight hours' work and ought to be allowed to adjourn.

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes. I move that the committee rise and report progress.

Progress reported.

On the motion of Rt. Hon. Mr. Doherty the House adjourned at 11.30 p.m.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (Cape Breton North and Victoria): I am sorry that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne) is not in his place, as I sent him a copy of a telegram which I received this morning, but probably the Prime Minister can give me some information in regard to it. This is the telegram:

Ascertain if the Fisheries Treaty will be submitted to Parliament for ratification present session and when.

I understand that some people propose to become interested in our Nova Scotia Fishery enterprises, and they are anxious to ascertain what is in the Treaty before taking action.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The Treaty has not yet reached us from Washington since its signature. As soon as we receive it early consideration will be given to what my hon. friend has advanced, the importance of which I quite realize.

COMMERCIAL FEEDING STUFFS.

REGULATIONS CONCERNING SALE AND INSPECTION.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Tolmie (Minister of Agriculture) the House went into committee to consider the following proposed resolution, Mr. Boivin in the Chair:

Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in a measure to regulate the sale and inspection of commercial feeding stuffs, bran, shorts, middlings and chopped feeds, and to provide,—

1. That in the following resolutions, unless the context otherwise requires,—

"Commercial feeding stuff" means any article offered for sale for the feeding of livestock and poultry, including feeds stated to possess medicinal as well as nutritive properties, but not including, (a) hay and straw; (b) whole grains of wheat, rye, barley, oats, corn, buckwheat or flax seed; (c) chop feeds; (d) bran, shorts or middlings when unmixed with other materials; (e) wet brewers' grains, roots or other materials containing sixty per centum or more of water;

"Chop feed" means the mixed or unmixed meals made directly from and consisting of the entire clean grains of wheat, rye, barley, oats, Indian corn, buckwheat and flax seed;

"Feeding stuff" means any commercial feeding stuff, bran, shorts or middlings and chop feed;

"Minister" means the Minister of Agriculture.

2. (1) That every sack, bag, bin, or other container of commercial feeding stuffs sold or offered, exposed or held for sale, shall have affixed thereto a tag or label in a conspicuous place on the outside thereof, containing a legible and plainly printed statement of, (a) the name, brand or trade mark of the contents; (b) the full name and address of the manufacturer; (c) the specific name of every ingredient contained in the feed; (d) the registered number; (e) the analysis as guaranteed by the manufacturer which shall show the percentage content of protein, fat and fibre.

3. That no make of commercial feeding stuff shall be imported into, distributed, sold or held for sale in Canada unless it has been registered with the Minister of Agriculture and a registration number assigned to it. Application for registration must be made by the manufacturer and must be accompanied by a registration fee of two dollars, a sealed representative sample of at least one pound of such feeding stuff, and a statement of the contents of such feeding stuff in such form and containing such details as the minister by regulation may prescribe. The registration shall be for a period continuing until the first day of October following the date upon which it is granted, but such registration may be renewed from year to year. The conditions for renewal shall be the same as those for the original registration.

4. (a) That the minister may refuse to register any commercial feeding stuff under a name or brand which in the opinion of the minister, would tend to mislead or deceive with respect to the materials of which it is composed, or when the statement of the contents is in the opinion of the minister incomplete or misleading. The minister may also refuse to register more than one commercial feeding stuff under the same name or brand.

(b) That the minister shall have power to cancel any registration which in his opinion has been made in violation of any of the provisions of the proposed Act or of any regulation.

(c) That no change in the composition of a registered brand of commercial feeding stuff shall be made without re-registering it.

5. That every sack, bag, bin or other container of chop feed made from and consisting of more than one kind of clean grain, when sold or offered, exposed or held for sale, shall have affixed thereto a tag or label in a conspicuous place on the outside thereof, containing a legible and plainly printed statement of the ingredients contained in the mixture and the percentage by weight of every ingredient.

6. That every lot of bran, shorts or middlings sold or offered, exposed or held for sale must meet the requirements as to quality and chemical contents established for them respectively by regulations under the proposed Act, or be registered and sold as commercial feeding stuffs as required by the foregoing resolutions numbered 2 and 3.

7. That no grain, screenings or any other ingredient which contains in excess of the quantity allowed by regulation, any seeds, damaged grain or other material designated by regulation of the minister as injurious to the health of livestock or poultry, shall be used as a constituent of any feeding stuffs.

8. That no feeding stuff shall be sold, or offered, exposed or held for sale, which contains any vital weed seeds in excess of the quantity allowed by regulation.

9. That if any make of feeding stuff imported into Canada be found to be adulterated or incorrectly or misleadingly labelled or named, or if in any way its sale constitutes an infraction of the proposed Act, its further importation may be forbidden by the minister.

10. That any purchaser of feeding stuff may have an analysis made thereof by an official analyst, and the certificate of analysis shall be accepted as evidence in any prosecution, and the minister may publish the result of the analysis or other examination of feeding stuff.

11. That any officer or person charged with the enforcement of this proposed Act shall have access to any elevator, warehouse or other premises where grains or other constituents of feeding stuffs are blended, or supposed to be blended, for the manufacture of feeding stuffs, and any premises or receptacles containing or supposed to contain feeding stuff, wherever they may be located, and may take any samples from any receptacle on payment of the value of such samples.

12. That the minister shall have power,—

(a) To appoint an advisory board which may at his request define for his guidance and recommend regulations that may be established under the proposed Act;

(b) To make regulations prescribing the maximum amount of whole or ground weed seeds and other substances which may be allowed in any grain or other ingredients used for the manufacture of feeding stuffs, without affecting the right to describe it as clean within the meaning of the proposed Act;

(c) To make regulations establishing a standard of quality and contents for, and fixing the limits of variability permissible in any feeding stuff or ingredient or constituent thereof;

(d) To designate the kind of damaged grain, seeds or other material which shall be considered as injurious to the health of livestock or poultry within the meaning of the proposed Act

(e) To make regulations prescribing the size, colour and character of the labels to be used for the purposes of the proposed Act, and the size and kind of printing to be used for any particulars required to be printed on such labels;

(f) To make regulations prescribing how samples of feeding stuffs are to be taken and analysed; and

(g) to make regulations for any other purpose deemed by him to be necessary for the carrying out of the provisions of the proposed Act.

13. That any person accused of selling, offering, exposing or having in his possession for sale any feeding stuff which does not comply with the requirements of the proposed Act or of any regulations thereunder, who proves that the feeding stuff respecting which action was taken was bought by him directly from a manufacturer or merchant domiciled in Canada, that it was neither opened nor the state of the feed altered while it was in his possession, and that he had no reason to believe that the said feeding stuff did not comply with the provisions of this proposed Act, shall upon disclosing the name and address of the person from whom the feeding stuff was purchased, the place purchased and the date of the sale, be liable only for the cost of the prosecution; and that every magistrate who has disposed of any such case shall within one month from the date of his judgment therein send to the minister a report of the case giving the name and address of the person who sold the feeding stuff to the accused, and the date and place of the sale; and any prosecution against any person pursuant to the report made to the minister under the foregoing provision may be commenced within six months from the date of such report and not later.

14. That except as provided in the preceding resolution a penalty for violation of these provisions not exceeding $100 for a first offence, and of not less than $100 and not exceeding $200 for a second offence, and for each subsequent offence of not less than $200 and not exceeding $500, together with the costs of prosecution, be enacted, and in default of immediate payment of such fine and costs, imprisonment for a term not exceeding twelve months unless such fine and costs are sooner paid, and the feeding stuff shall be liable to forfeiture to His Majesty.

15. That the penalty for obstructing any officer or person charged with the enforcement of the proposed Act, when entering any premises to make any examination of any feeding stuff, or refusing to permit the making of such examination or the taking of samples, shall be a fine of not less than $25 and not more than $500, or imprisonment for any term not exceeding twelve months.

16. That the penalty for forging or unlawfully using any manufacturer's registration number or any certificate of analysis or other examination hereunder shall be a fine not exceeding $200 for the first offence and not less than $200 and not exceeding $500 for each subsequent offence, or imprisonment for a term not exceeding twelve months or both fine and imprisonment.

17. That this proposed Act shall not apply to feeding stuff sold to a manufacturer for the purpose of cleaning or mixing, or to feeding stuff manufactured for any person from his own materials and for his own use.

18. That in any complaint, information or conviction hereunder, the matter complained of may be declared, and shall be held to have arisen, within the meaning of Part XV of the Criminal Code, at the place where the feeding stuff was sold, or offered, exposed or had in possession for sale.

19. That the Commercial Feeding Stuffs Act, 1909, be repealed, and that the proposed Act shall come into operation on such date as may be prescribed by proclamation issued by the Governor in Council.

Mr. TOLMIE: In connection with this resolution I purpose asking the House for leave to introduce a Bill to Regulate the Sale and Inspection of Commercial Feeding Stuffs, Bran, Shorts, Middlings and Chopped Feeds. It is proposed that this shall be a substitute for the Commercial Feeding Stuffs Act of 1909, which will be repealed. It will also replace Bill No. 32, introduced by the Minister of Health (Hon. Mr. Rowell) and will include amendments to the Commercial Feeding Stuffs Act. It is proposed to turn over the operation of this Act to the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. BUREAU: Does Bill 32 deal with honey?

Mr. TOLMIE: No.

Mr. BUREAU: What is the purport of Bill 32?

Mr. TOLMIE: It had reference to commercial feeding stuffs, and was introduced by the Minister of Health. It is now withdrawn and this Bill is substituted for it. Previously, the Commercial Feeding Stuffs Act was administered by the Department of Inland Revenue and now by the Department of Health. All hon. members will, I think, agree that as these feeding stuffs are being used in the feeding of livestock and as the Department of Agriculture is being constantly brought into contact with questions regarding feed, it is only proper and right that the latter department should administer this legislation in the future. Moreover, we already have, in connection with the seed branch, a trained staff that has been rendering valuable service in the inspection of seeds, and this staff can be used largely in the administration of the proposed measure.

The objects of the Bill are to secure a more efficient control of feeding stuffs and also to assure the purchaser that he is getting what he is paying for, so that he can purchase this material at a price that he considers reasonable and fair. For a number of years Canada has been the dumping ground of feeds from other countries, these feeds being adulterated with ground peanut shells, ground cocoanut shells and so forth. Under the proposed Bill, we shall have control of this. There have also been put on the market certain fake feeds, feeds not possessing any real value as feeds. These fake feeds are widely advertised by highly coloured advertising matter and they have been used to fool the Canadian cow and also the cow owner. Other feeds have shown a satisfactory chemical analysis, but they have proved unpalatable owing to the nature of the weed seeds contained therein. In other cases feeds have been found to contain black seeds from screenings, these black seeds being absolutely injurious and, in some cases, poisonous to livestock, particularly so to young hogs, and in some districts very serious losses have occurred from this cause. From experiments carried on at our experimental farms these black seeds have been found to be absolutely useless as regards feeding value, in addition to being poisonous under certain conditions.

In addition to inspecting these feeds at the point of sale and distribution, as was carried on under the old Feeding Stuffs Act, we purpose, under this new measure, to inspect the feeds where they are congregated and mixed, so that we shall have an inspection at each end. Further than that, analyses will be made as to the chemical contents of the feeds and a careful physical examination will also be made.

It is proposed, for the working out of this legislation, to classify these feeds into commercial feeding stuffs which will include any article offered for sale for the feeding of livestock, including particularly feeds stated to possess medicinal as well as nutritive properties, but not including hay, straw, whole grain, chop feeds; bran, shorts, or middlings when unmixed with other materials; wet brewers' grains, roots or other materials containing 60 percentum or more of water.

"Chop feed," which is another classification, will be composed of mixed or unmixed meals made directly from and consisting of the entire clean grains of wheat, rye, barley, oats, Indian corn, buckwheat and flaxseed, which may be used separately or in combination. It is proposed to attach tags to these bags containing chop feed showing clearly what they contain.

Regulations will be necessary for the purpose of giving the minister and the Department of Agriculture a certain amount of elasticity in working out the requirements of this legislation. It is necessary to have these regulations for the purpose of meeting new conditions without delay, in conneciton with certain feeds that might be more numerous in some years than others, seeds of such a nature as not to be suitable for feeding purposes, also in certain seasons in connection with the handling of damp grain used in these feeds. The power to change these regulations from time to time to meet requirements which may arise will render the Act much more efficient than it otherwise would be.

It will be necessary to register all feeds, whether imported or home grown, and a fee of $2, will be charged for this registration. The minister or the department may refuse to register in any case where the department is of the opinion that it is the intention of the manufacturer to mislead the purchaser, and registration may be cancelled at any time if a man is caught violating any of the requirements of this legislation. Moreover, no change in combination can be made without re-registration.

Many difficulties have arisen in the past through purchasers of feeds having to use certain feeds for feeding dairy cattle, hogs and other animals, with having proper knowledge of what those feeds contain. A great deal of deleterious material has been used and sold as good feed when it possesses almost no feeding value whatever. In this way the progressive dairyman has been under a great difficulty; he has been unable to balance properly his ration for his dairy cows, and he has been thus prevented from obtaining the best results. Under the old conditions, in selecting certain rations for growing stock, which rations are somewhat different from those which might be required for the production of beef or pork, he has been unable to balance a ration for the purpose required.

Some articles that have been used in the composition of these feeds have been found to have a very bad effect. This is the case where fish meat is used in preparing food for hogs, because, as hon. members are aware, fish that has not been properly deodorized gives a fishy taste to pork and makes it unfit for food.

This resolution has been presented to the Committee on Agriculture by whom it has been very carefuly studied and adopted.

It is proposed to eliminate the last eight words in section 5:

> And the percentage by weight of every ingredient.

Because it would be impossible to obtain by weight the exact quantity of any particular grain. Many farmers nowadays are growing grains in combination for feed purposes because a larger yield is obtained in that way, and in a case where a man brought in a certain quantity of feed consisting of peas, oats, wheat and barley it would be practically impossible to say how much of each particular grain was contained therein. I hope this resolution will be adopted by the committee and that I shall be allowed to introduce a Bill along these lines.

Mr. ROBB: I have no criticism to make in connection with the resolution as printed, and I am very much in sympathy with the idea of transferring the matter to the Department of Agriculture. When I rose first, it was my intention to point out to the minister the amendment that he has just suggested, that it is not workable that percentages of whole grain should be placed on the tags. That would lead only to confusion and irregularities. The minister may be adding additional expense to the purchaser of chop feed by compelling the man to place tags upon all bags of chop feed, and some simpler and cheaper way of getting over this might be devised. My experience is that large handlers of chop feed in many cases send out their own bags to the mill and have them filled. They buy this feed on sample and in most cases they are quite satisfied. I am not sure that there is any great demand amongst feeders throughout the country for tags on chop feed from whole grains, and in this connection I am speaking of whole grain only. That is the only comment I have to make upon that feature of the resolution.

I should like to draw the attention of the minister to clause 17 which reads:

> That this proposed Act shall not apply to feeding stuff sold to a manufacturer for the purpose of cleaning or mixing.

That particular clause will allow western elevators to sell, as they have been selling, all kinds of rubbish and weed seeds and escape the penalty. I should like the minister to say whether my understanding of the clause is correct.

Mr. TOLMIE: The tags referred to by the hon. gentleman will not involve a great deal of cost and they will afford the purchaser a good deal of valuable information as to the exact contents of the feed. When the stuff is sold in loose lots not contained in sacks all that will be necessary will be to place the label on the bin, indicating the exact contents so that the farmer may be fully apprised of the nature of his purchase. Clause 17 permits any farmer to purchase a carload of these feedstuffs and have it ground under his own supervision, and he knows exactly what he is getting under those conditions.

Mr. ROBB: But the miller is also permitted to grind the stuff.

Mr. TOLMIE: The miller will be caught by our inspectors the moment he offers the stuff for sale. In many cases we purpose to have inspectors on the ground visiting the mills from time to time to supervise the mixing and preparation of feed, both at the point of origin and at the point of distribution.

Mr. ROBB: That is quite correct. But why are you going to penalize the miller for buying and grinding these noxious weeds when you do not penalize the elevator man who first sells them?

Mr. TOLMIE: He sells to the miller, but we do not step in until the miller proposes to sell the stuff for feed. We make analyses from time to time in order to see that these feeds do not exceed in quantity the limit of weed seeds, etc.

Mr. ROBB: The minister has not yet convinced me that there is not a select class who will not come under the operation of the Bill and who will not be penalized for selling noxious seeds. I submit that there is no basis of equity upon which the minister can allow the grain elevator or cleaning house with impunity to sell these dirty, noxious seeds, and place the penalty upon the second person who handles it.

Mr. TOLMIE: I think it is desirable that the miller or the manufacturer, as he might be called, should have the right to purchase these screenings in bulk so that he may dispose of them in any possible way he sees fit so long as he acts in compliance with the law. In accordance with the Bill, he may extract those portions suitable for making feeds; he may take another portion suitable for sheep feeds, or what used to be called some time ago, seed screenings; or he may export those parts of the screenings that are not suitable for feed. He should certainly have these privileges, and as everything will be done under inspection, the moment he tries to make any misrepresentations he is not only liable to penalty but may have his license cancelled.

Mr. WILSON (Saskatoon): While I appreciate the purpose of the resolution, I think there are some phases of it that will be almost impracticable in actual operation. There is no doubt that there has been a good deal of abuse in foisting upon unsuspecting purchasers feeds that could not, when properly tested, come up to the standard advertised. I notice in clause 2 that every bag or container shall have affixed to it a tag giving the specific amount of every ingredient contained in the feed. That is to say, if there is 10 per cent of weeds, 25 per cent of oats, etc., you will have to state the different percentages that go to make up the 100 per cent. That is easily enough arrived at. But the last paragraph of the clause says that there must be an analysis, guaranteed by the manufacturer, which shall show the percentage of protein fat and fibre. Now, that is one impracticable feature of the resolution; from the standpoint of one who is somewhat interested in milling and who has had a number of years experience in the business. A large milling company will be able to comply with this requirement, but after all there are only a few large milling companies in Canada as compared with the number of small mills. To carry out this provision a milling concern would require to have a laboratory and a chemist in order to be able to make the proper test to ascertain the percentage of protein fat of every sack; and I think it will be almost impossible for the small mills in the country to retain a chemist to make a test of every sack of wheat put out. The large mills have their laboratories and chemists and this requirement will not impose any hardship on them; but it seems to me that if you insist on this clause you will drive the feed business from the small concerns—and after all it is of the greatest benefit to the farmer to be able to obtain feed close to his farm—and place the business in the hands of the large mills. That is one objection which strikes me and I wish the minister would consider this representation.

Mr. TOLMIE: With regard to the labelling, the tag can be placed right on the bag except in the case of commercial feeding stuffs. I understand that these mills do not put up feeding stuffs so much as they turn out bran, shorts and chop feeds, and this section will not interfere with that work. We have classified these materials as commercial feeding stuffs and chop feeds, two distinct kinds of feed; and I think that if the hon. gentleman will read the resolution carefully he will see that this provision refers to commercial feeding stuffs.

Mr. CRERAR: I commend the purpose of this Bill, for I think it is necessary to have regulations such as are provided in the measure we are considering. I do not think that the point raised by my hon. friend (Mr. Robb) is well taken. If we survey the history of the sale of screenings, concerning which there has been considerable discussion in the House for the last two or three sessions, we find that until a few years ago almost all of the elevator screenings from the head of the Lakes were marketed in the United States at prices varying in my recollection from $6 to $15 a ton. I am speaking of the period up to 1916. Those screenings, of course, were the general run of screenings at the elevators and the mills in question and were composed of weed seeds of different varieties, broken grains, buckwheat and similar stuff. There was no market in Canada for the reason that we did not have mills or manufacturing plants that were buying this stuff and which had the necessary machinery to make the separations, but in the United States there were large companies that specialized in this class of business, and consequently all these refuse screenings from these elevators and mills found their market in the United States, where they were put through as many as half a dozen separations, the various seeds and grains in the stuff separated and sold independently of each other. I recall quite well that a number of years ago there was a corner of mustard seed in the Minneapolis market, and that corner was largely broken by the mustard seeds extracted from screenings shipped from Canada to Duluth and other points.

The Bill, as I understand it, will throw on the mill or the factory buying these screenings the onus of making these different separations and extracting from the stuff the part that is useful for feeding purposes, and when they have done that they will have to display clearly the ingredients or feeding content of the stuff they are selling. That is not any hardship on the mill or manufacturer who is buying. After all, the essential thing aimed at in this Bill is that the purchaser of feedstuffs, no matter where he is located in this country, shall know what he is buying and shall be protected, as he has a perfect right to be, in that regard. We have had a very considerable increase in the use of these screenings in Canada since 1917. At that time there was a serious shortage of feed in Canada, and there was an urgent war need for production, particularly of hogs and cattle. The Government of the day, wisely, I think, put an embargo on the exportation of these screenings, at the same time compelling the elevators at the head of the Lakes to make the separation that would make them suitable for feeding stuff. That analysis of separation was agreed upon by the officials of the Department of Agriculture, and the Board of Grain Commissioners were entrusted with the responsibility of seeing that the screenings were cleaned up to the standard. At the time the order in question was made the price was fixed for these screenings at $35 a ton that is, for what was termed the recleaned screenings, but at that time so scarce was feed in the United States that they could be sold on the Duluth market for $42 a ton, and the embargo was put on simply to keep in the country for the use of Canadian farmers what was valuable in this feeding stuff. I think the purpose of the Bill is entirely worthy, although when we come to consider it clause by clause it might be improved in some respects. I wish again to commend the minister for introducing this legislation.

Mr. KAY: I am in entire sympathy with the purpose of this legislation and I must congratulate the minister on having wrested it from the designs of the President of the Privy Council. I am very much disappointed, however, to find that the minister intends to allow the use of screenings, which my hon. friend the leader of the Progressive party, the hon. member for Marquette, has just been discussing. I am very strongly of the opinion that these screenings should not be allowed to be mixed in any way with commercial feed of any kind. It is well known that the vitality of these noxious weeds cannot be entirely destroyed and the farmers in the East are unconsciously polluting their farms with these very bad weeds to the great detriment of agriculture. It is perhaps true that there is a certain amount of feed value in some of the weeds, but it is also true that some of them are poisonous and have killed many head of young livestock. I would urge upon the minister very seriously the advisability of prohibiting the inclusion of any of these screenings in commercial feeding stuffs. If there is a market in the United States for these screenings, by all means let them be exported to that country. With this one criticism I think the Bill is a very good one, and I trust the minister will be successful in passing it. We will be able to consider it more in detail when we are in committee on the Bill.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I am very pleased to find that the Act regulating commercial feeding stuffs will come under the control of the Department of Agriculture. For many years past this Bill has been, first, under the Department of Inland Revenue, then under the Department of Trade and Commerce, and next under the Department of Health. I think every one will agree, however, that a law of this nature should be under the Department of Agriculture, which has quite a number of well-trained men who are familiar with and competent to deal with questions regarding commercial feeding stuffs. Some hon. members may recollect that at the last session of Parliament we succeeded in putting on the statute books a Bill which endeavoured to regulate some of these feeding stuffs, particularly bran and shorts. I am a little surprised to find that in the various Bills that have been introduced this session dealing with these matters the legislation of last session has entirely faded away. It has gradually disappeared without anybody taking any particular notice of it, and I believe that to-day it is absolutely destroyed as to its intentions.

I am disappointed in the present Bill. I believe that it will result in a continuance of the conditions that exist at the present time, which enable the mixing of what ought to be pure commercial feeding stuffs with the offal screenings that accumulate at mills and elevators. There is undoubtedly an immense quantity of these screenings accumulating, and a very large proportion of them should be destroyed at those points and never be permitted to pass out of the control of the Grain Board. Neglect of this in the past has resulted in untold damage to agriculture in this country.

I was a little surprised at the remarks of the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) in alluding to the conditions that existed in 1917 when an embargo was placed on the exportation of screenings to the United States. I am a little surprised that such an ardent free trader as he is would favour an embargo on anything that we produce in this country, particularly a commodity of this nature. The excuse has been made in Parliament on a number of occasions that very little damage was being done to the farmers of this country by reason of the fact that these screenings were being exported to the United States. It is well known that immense quantities were exported to the United States for many years and were fed at the stock-yards at Minneapolis and many other places to which immense numbers of sheep were shipped from the ranges to be fed in the yards at those points on these screenings. Consequently these noxious weed seeds were not distributed throughout this country. But we have to-day professional mixers of commercial feeding stuffs utilizing these screenings, and there are companies placing stuff on the market to-day that should never be permitted to reach the farms or feeders of live stock of this country. I have no doubt that some of the provisions that will be found in the Bill will take care of some of these companies. I would be much better satisfied, however if the Bill was a little more clear and definite than this resolution, and did not leave so much to regulations to be made by the minister. I can see no reason why bran and shorts particularly should be mixed with anything else. I am satisfied that if the Bill embodies the clauses of the resolution as set out here, it will result in its being almost impossible to purchase bran and shorts in their pure state. You will find that this legislation will be used to bolster up other mixtures and enable them to be sold on the market. I believe the Bill contemplates the mixing of bran and shorts rather than to ensure their purity. The farmers of this country can do all the mixing, if they desire a mixture.

As far as chop feeds are concerned, those are very easy to regulate. I was somewhat surprised to hear the minister state in answer to the hon. member from Huntingdon (Mr. Robb) that the millers should be in a position to purchase these screenings. It is well known that the standard stock feed to which the hon. member for Marquette alluded was due to the desire of placing on the market a standard stock feed from those screenings, and it was contemplated at the outset that the stuff would be ground fine to destroy the vitality of the enormous proportion of noxious weeds contained in it. This thing has been played with to such an extent that one is inclined to look for the joker in legislation dealing with commercial feeding stuffs, and there was certainly a joker in the Order in Council of December, 1917, dealing with commercial feeding stuffs. After specifying that the mill-feed should be pure this clause was enacted. It is not a Bill; it is an Order in Council of December, 1917, and it reads as follows:

> The presence of presumably vital weed seeds in any form of feeding stuff shall be held to constitute adulteration under the Act, when more than twenty-five seeds per pound, as enumerated in the Seed Control Act, 1911, are present in the feed.

This Section 17 permits twenty-five vital weed seeds but Parliament, under the Seed Control Act, has provided for what are termed noxious weeds; consequently all the vital, non-noxious weed seeds that millers see fit to put in may be put in. There is as well no limit to the quantity of devitalized seeds they may put into their feed stuff. This is what took place when the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) was Minister of Agriculture, and it has resulted, I venture to say in more trouble and dissatisfaction among the agriculturists of this country in regard to feed stuffs than anything that has happened during many years. The prices which were received for screenings before the war according to the evidence of the general manager of the United Grain Growers which we have, were not the high prices which have been alluded to by the hon. member for Marquette. The average price paid for three years previous to the war was $4.91 and for the last six years the price was $8.84 per ton. This was after the Government placed an embargo on the export of screenings. The report which I read from the Dominion analyst at the last session in regard to bran and shorts was convincing evidence—I think it convinced this House and it certainly convinced the members of the committee on agriculture—that something was necessary to control the operations of the millers. Their contention was that it was perfectly legitimate for them to adulterate by reason of the legislation and the Orders in Council which have been passed. When they were up for examination on this question they said: "If it is so necessary and advisable to exclude these weed seeds, why does not Parliament take action in the matter?" Yet we have the Act of last year attempting to deal with this matter by standard and the other provisions of the Adulteration Act have been taken care of in two Bills which have been introduced by the hon. the Minister of Health (Mr. Rowell). The resolution before us this afternoon does not contain the provision which I think it should.

Just a word or two in regard to the regulations which may be enacted by the minister if the Bill to be introduced should go through in the form of the resolution. The resolution provides that the minister shall have power

> To appoint an advisory board which may at his request define for his guidance and recommend regulations that may be established under the proposed Act.

In referring to that to-day he stated there should be some elasticity to the Bill in order to allow the department to make such changes as might be deemed advisable. I am not sure but that there may be some force in that argument but I think it is advisable, in so far as it is possible to do so, to define in the Bill exactly what we want done in regard to matters of this kind because by the appointment of boards of that kind you are not going to bring about the desired result. I believe that the minister, with the expert assistance of the heads of his department, should be in a position to define what should be necessary and to propose legislation along that line in the Bill rather than that he should appoint boards or commissions of an advisory nature. You cannot shelve the responsibility. It must eventually rest upon the minister and his assistants in the department and I believe that in so far as it is possible the provisions of this legislation should be clearly defined in the Bill to be introduced. I have looked over the resolutions with a good deal of care and I am satisfied that you will find that under the definition of "commercial feeding stuff" the resolution contemplates a mixture of bran and shorts by those who secure the right to mix or adulterate. There is no provision to ensure the purity of bran and shorts. They are absolutely pure when the wheat is milled and when these commodities are turned out from the mill. Nothing can get into them unless there is an intention to do so on the part of the miller. The wheat is made as clean as it is possible to make it, before milling but the millers offer the excuse of saying: "We purchase this wheat and as there is a certain amount of weeds seed in it, we are justified in disposing of it in this way." We all know that wheat is graded and that a certain amount of dockage is allowed for dirt. If the miller has an accumulation of these screenings on hand, let him dispose of it as screenings, do not let him mix it with his mill feed as has been done in the past. I want to again emphasize the importance of making some provision for rescuing the Bill introduced last session to insure the purity of the commodities to which I have referred, and I would call the attention of the minister to the matter.

Mr. DECHENE: The minister is certainly doing his best to promote the interests of the farming community, and we must congratulate him. But at the same time it appears to me that the power contained in this resolution to make regulations and change them at any time the minister pleases is too wide a power to confer on him. It would also be difficult for the manufacturers of commercial feeding stuffs to keep themselves posted if changes are frequently made.

But what I want to especially refer to is section 4 (a):

> That the minister may refuse to register any commercial feeding stuff under a name or brand which in the opinion of the minister would tend to mislead or deceive with respect to the materials of which it is composed, or when the statement of the contents is in the opinion of the minister incomplete or misleading. The Minister may also refuse to register more than one commercial feeding stuff under the same name or brand.

This gives the minister discretion to register more than one commercial feeding stuff under the same brand or name, and I would suggest that the section should be changed by substituting "shall" for "may," so that he will have no option but to refuse to register more than one commercial feeding stuff under the same name or brand.

Section 11 provides:

> That any officer or person charged with the enforcement of this proposed Act shall have access to any elevator, warehouse or other premises where grains or other constituents of feeding stuffs are blended, or supposed to be blended, for the manufacture of feeding stuffs, and any premises or receptacles containing or supposed to contain feeding stuff, wherever they may be located, and may take any samples from any receptacle on payment of the value of such samples.

That allows any officer to enter premises where feeding stuffs are kept by a farmer for his own private purposes, and I think this power should be restricted.

Then by section 12 it is provided that the minister shall have power:

> (b) to make regulations prescribing the maximum amount of whole or ground weed seeds and other substances which may be allowed in any grain or other ingredients used for the manufacture of feeding stuffs, without affecting the right to describe it as clean within the meaning of the proposed Act;

The first section of this resolution gives an interpretation of "Commercial Feeding Stuff," "Chop Feed" and "Feeding Stuff"; but by section 12 (b) a certain quantity of whole or ground weed seeds and other substances may be allowed to enter into the grain or other ingredients used for the manufacture of feeding stuffs without affecting the right to describe it as "clean" within the meaning of the proposed Act. Those two provisions, it seems to me, are contradictory. A farmer or consumer buying commercial feeding stuff, chop feed, or feeding stuff will, under the first definition, assume that he is buying commodities that do not contain weed seed and other substances. If we are going to stand by the first definition I think section 12 (b) should be deleted.

Section 13 in effect incorporates a similar section contained in the Commercial Feeding Stuffs Bill which was introduced by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell) early in the session and subsequently withdrawn. This penalizes the storekeeper or dealer selling feeding stuffs which on analysis are found not to comply with the requirements of the Act unless he is able to prove that such feeding stuffs have not been tampered with while in his possession. But it is conceivable that in many cases it would be very difficult for the storekeeper to furnish the requisite proof, and it seems to me that the manufacturer should be sued in the first instance, as otherwise the storekeeper will not be able to rely on the manufacturer's certificate attached to the feeding stuffs purchased by him and will be liable to prosecution for what is really an infringement of the Act by the manufacturer himself. I think the section should be amended so as to make the manufacturer liable in the first instance.

Mr. TOLMIE: We have marketed in this country about 150,000 tons of screenings annually. While containing some grains which are useless for feed and injurious to livestock—and these constitute only a small proportion to the whole—a great deal of the screenings as originally turned out make very excellent feed. In experiments conducted at our experimental farms it has been proved that recleaned screenings are often more valuable as a feeding stuff than bran. Any hon. members who have been in the livestock business and have had to pay the extremely high prices for feed that have prevailed during the past few years will agree that every pound of feeding stuff that we can possibly secure is required in this country, and that if we are to put Canada's agriculture on a sound foundation we should use every pound of it for the feeding of stock rather than for export.

It is proposed by regulation to limit the impurities in bran to one per cent. Bran is usually worth more than the commercial feeding stuffs. It is necessary to have these regulations, as I have pointed out, on account of the changes that may occur from time to time. We had an illustration of that during the war, when the percentage of flour extraction from wheat was extended some seven or eight per cent, with a consequent immediate effect on the bran turned out from wheat milled in that way. The resolution says that the minister "may" appoint a board to consult with him in the preparing of these regulations. That board would probably consist of millers, farmers and consumers—representatives of those interested in the trade generally—the members of which would be called together in order that the benefit of their advice might be obtained. The idea is not to shift any responsibility from the minister or any of his officers to that board; the minister would still be responsible, of course, for any legislation carried out in connection therewith.

With regard to the suggestion that there would be an interference with the farmer on his premises in connection with the making or grinding of feeding stuffs, I may say that we do not interfere with him at all until such time as he proposes to sell the material. There has to be a certain amount of elasticity in regulations with regard to impurities in grain, because pure grain is something that does not exist. Any grain taken from the field contains a greater or less percentage of impurities. The matter of the payments of costs by the retailer has been very carefully thought out; that course was adopted in order to avoid collusion between the retailer and the manufacturer. As to the identification of any lot of feed arriving in bulk at a station, there should be no very great difficulty about that because we could have access to the bills of lading and could trace the car by its number.

Mr. KAY: I have listened attentively to the minister but have heard him make no explanation with regard to weed seeds whose vitality could not be destroyed in grinding. Does he not consider that an important aspect of the matter?

Mr. TOLMIE: Section 7 of the resolution provides:

> That no grain, screenings or any other ingredient which contains in excess of the quantity allowed by regulation, any seeds, damaged grain or other material designated by regulation of the minister as injurious to the health of livestock or poultry, shall be used as a constituent of any feeding stuffs.

The presence of a small quantity of that seed cannot be controlled, and it is proposed that every sack shall be marked so that a man shall know exactly what he is buying. If all the farms to which this feeding stuff goes were now in absolutely clean condition I could admit the force of the argument, but they certainly are not. In fact, it is very unusual to see an absolutely clean farm; they are all more or less weedy, I am sorry to say.

Mr. KAY: Is that not all the more reason why they should have no more weeds?

Mr. TOLMIE: It would hardly do, for the sake of keeping out a few weeds, to get rid of 150,000 tons of feeding stuff which can be used with very excellent results in the improvement of our livestock and in the consequent building up of the wealth of the country. By providing proper safeguards in the matter I do not think that any farmer will suffer very severely.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I am sorry that the minister has made no reference to the possibility of the adulteration of mill feeds. He states that it is the intention to provide that not more than one per cent of adulteration shall be permitted in bran and shorts. The interpretation clause of the resolution defines, "commercial feeding stuff," "chopped feed" and "feeding stuff." Now, bran and shorts undoubtedly come under the head of feeding stuff. You will note that the following is section 8 of the resolution:

> That no feeding stuff shall be sold, or offered, exposed or held for sale, which contains any vital weed seeds in excess of the quantity allowed by regulation.

That would imply that provided the vitality of the seeds is destroyed you can put an unlimited quantity of them into the feeding stuff, and that is the very interpretation that the millers have been making of the regulations that have been in force for several years. The following is section 12, (b) of the resolution:

> The minister shall have power,—
> (b) to make regulations prescribing the maximum amount of whole or ground weed seeds and other substances which may be allowed in any grain or other ingredients used for the manufacture of feeding stuffs, without affecting the right to describe it as clean within the meaning of the proposed Act;

"Used for the manufacture of feeding stuffs," which implies that the two articles of feeding stuffs to which I have referred are not complete until they go through another manufacturing process at the hands of the miller. So far as the 150,000 tons of weed seeds that are accumulating at the elevators are concerned, it would be worth millions of dollars to this country if every ounce of it was destroyed at the elevators rather than sent broadcast throughout the country. Thousands of animals have died as the result of the adulteration of feeding stuffs in the past, to say nothing of the untold loss that has otherwise resulted through the failure to obtain satisfactory results in the feeding of stock. The live-stock industry is the one upon which agriculture in the main depends. It is well known that the grain production per acre has been gradually falling off in every province, and we must realize where we shall arrive if the present practice is continued. The grain companies of the West may find it desirable to dispose of these screenings in this way. But there is no reason why any of these small seeds should reach the elevator; they could very well be separated from the grain on the farm. If they are sent to the elevator the farmer has to pay freight on them and he is docked for them when they arrive there, those who are handling the grain retaining up to three per cent of the dockage and are thereby reaping an immense profit. If anything in excess of three per cent is found in the grain it is disposed of for the farmer, but he is charged for the bringing of that stuff to the elevator. It is a very simple process to put a screen in the separator which will take out all the small seeds; that is done in Ontario and, I have no doubt, in many other provinces as well. If some contagious disease were brought into this country and it was found that the spread of the disease would be of advantage to some one, do you think that its disposition to that end, with the attendant risk of spreading the disease, would be countenanced by those in authority looking after the health of the people? I am disappointed to find a member of the Government or, indeed, any hon. member advocating that we must take care of this dirt that has accumulated at elevators in this way on account of bad farming. As regards the commercial feeding stuffs that have been disposed of since 1917, the evidence in the Department of Agriculture shows conclusively that the people who manufacture these feeding stuffs have not lived up to the regulations passed in regard to them, but have flagrantly violated them. This is borne out by answers to questions which I placed on the Order Paper this year, in those answers, it was shown that enormous quantities of this stuff was still being ground into mill feed. With regard to that matter I have here a report made by an analyst in the seed branch last session when this matter was under discussion. It states that:

> In 19 samples of "recleaned" screenings received at the laboratory on July 1, the average number of mustards per ounce is 201.

Two hundred and one mustard seeds per ounce in this standard stock feed which the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) lauds so highly and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Tolmie) refers to as being such a valuable asset in building up agriculture in this country. It is little wonder that we have the condition of affairs that exists; to-day of farmers moving into the towns and cities, and that we find the fields growing up with a crop of weeds that were unknown ten years ago. Is Parliament going to pass legislation which permits a condition of that kind to continue? The minister should take immediate steps to see that all these black seeds are taken out of the screenings at the elevators and destroyed.

It is true that there is in the screenings a great deal of small wheat and other grains, such as wild buckwheat, that have actual feeding value and these could be taken out, but the great bulk of the black seeds could be taken out on the farms at the time of threshing. The thresher, if the season is a bad one and there is a heavy crop of weeds, threshing by the bushel, the more dirt he has in grain the more he is going to get for his work. That is one of the causes of this deleterious material being left in the grain. This should be brought home to the people who are responsible for this condition of affairs, namely, the farmers who grow the stuff. Steps should be taken to see that this stuff is taken out of the grain before the grain is sent to the elevator at all, and in that way the millers will not have the temptation to mix this stuff with their commercial feeding stuffs as has been the case in the past. I do not like to speak in this way with regard to this matter, but the fact is that this has been going on and getting worse from year to year until to-day in Ontario, in which about 40 per cent of the livestock of the country is raised, progressive dairymen, during the lactation period, although bran and shorts are undoubtedly the most valuable feeding stuff that the dairyman can get for his cows, avoid feeding bran and shorts as they would the most deadly poison, because for years past they have been losing annually large numbers of their cows for some unaccountable reason, and they have reached the conclusion that this loss is due to the immense quantity of this stuff that is in the mill feed.

Special emphasis is laid on noxious weeds, and one of the most poisonous seeds that we have is what is known as worm seed mustard not classed as noxious. The evidence in the department shows conclusively that many complaints have been received from farmers who have lost large numbers of young pigs through feeding this stuff. I referred to this last year and it is not necessary that I should go over it again. The same report says:

> Of 32 samples of shorts, the records show 27 containing poisonous weed seeds, and 5 with unground seeds of noxious weeds. In the case of bran, 19 out of 28 samples show poison seeds, and 8 have noxious weeds.

The report of the Dominion Analyst, Dr. McGill, for 1919, states in regard to this matter:

> Bran is adulterated by mixing with oat hulls and all sorts of rubbish. Shorts, in many cases, is simply bran reground so as to make it fine.

[Mr. Sutherland.]

I am going to trespass on the patience of the committee for a moment or two in order to refer to some of the analyses made by Dr. McGill as shown in Bulletin No. 412 for 1918. An inspector in the Vancouver district states that in a sample of mill feed of which the Lake of the Woods Milling Company were the vendors, there were 8,608 lamb's quarters and 48 black bindweed in a single pound. Can hon. members realize that any miller, particularly one of the largest milling companies, the Lake of the Woods Milling Company, would dare to put such stuff on the market and endeavour to sell it as what is known in this resolution as commercial feeding stuffs? That is the worst instance I see in this report, although such adulteration is quite common. Another sample showed 1008 lamb's quarters, and I could go on all down the line quoting similar instances. In a sample of mill feed sold by the Quaker Oats Company of Saskatoon, there were 16 wild oats, 192 black bindweed, 1,344 lamb's quarters in a single pound. That is the sort of stuff that is being sent broadcast throughout the country. We have been assured from year to year that the Government were going to take steps to deal with this evil; but instead of that being done, I am satisfied, from the resolution that has been introduced this afternoon, we are going to perpetuate this evil in even worse form than in the past. The millers may make mild protests against having to fix tags to bags containing this commodity when it is placed on the market. I venture to state that the millers have already been consulted in this matter and that they will be prominent on any such committee as has been referred to by the minister in order to see that their interests are taken care of, because it is well known that the farmers have not taken steps along that line in the past. Hon. members who from what is known as the Farmers' group, or who appropriate that name to themselves in this House, instead of condemning the practice that has been going on in the past virtually countenance it and make excuses for the condition which existed when their leader (Mr. Crerar) was Minister of Agriculture.

We are entitled to some assurance from the minister that something more than granting power to make regulations will be contained in this Bill. I have absolute confidence that if some of the men who are in the Department of Agriculture are given a free hand, they will be able to deal with this matter most effectively. They have the evidence of what is going on, and the fact that 150,000 tons of screenings annually accumulate at the elevators is going to be a loss to the country if it is not disposed of, is as poor an excuse as could be advanced. If this stuff can be disposed of in the United States, then, for Heaven's sake, let us see that every pound of it goes there; otherwise, let us see that it is recleaned; that only the grain in it that is of any use is kept, and that the noxious weed seeds are entirely eliminated from it and destroyed. I do not believe it is possible to eliminate the noxious weed seeds entirely, because the commercial feeding stuffs that have been placed on the market during the last two years have contained at least 10 per cent of wild coats and this stuff has been shipped throughout the country with the result that wild oats are now a growing crop in the backyards of everybody who is feeding fowl or anything like that on a small scale. The consequence is that this stuff is scattered broadcast throughout the country. I have but mildly expressed my feelings in regard to this matter. I must again express my disappointment over what has happened with regard to the Bill of last session. Bill after Bill has been introduced in the House here, and finally the one with regard to commercial feeding stuffs was withdrawn and the legislation now comes under the Department of Agriculture, where it rightly belongs. I am heartily in accord with that, and I have advocated it for many years. When the minister takes the stand that the farmers of this country are so badly in need of this stuff as feed, I think he loses sight of the injury that it does. So far as the province of Ontario is concerned, where the value of the produce of livestock for a single year amounted to $369,111,000, the farmers, I am sure, will not feel that their interests have been taken care of if we are going to have a continuance of such a condition as we have had in the past. It is well know that to-day many farmers have not a hog on their farms who in the past raised hogs in large numbers. The same thing applies with regard to dairy stock. Many of the farmers are going out of that branch of farming, and it is in no small measure because of the unsatisfactory results from feeding commercial feeding stuffs and the mixtures that are being sold to-day. You can scarcely pick up an agricultural paper without seeing advertisements of commercial feeding stuffs on the market. The farmer as a rule is pretty well aware of what it is profitable to feed to his stock, and it is not necessary for some one to tell them what foods have the right amount of protein in them. The bran you find on the market to-day is so scoured that it is necessary to add some ground mustard seeds in order that it may increase its protein. It is by the addition of ground mustard seeds that they bring it up to the standard, one of the reasons why these people who are putting this stuff up are anxious to have this condition of affairs continue is to enable them to increase their profits.

Mr. TOLMIE: For the information of the hon. member from South Oxford I might say that what is known as the Sutherland amendment to the Adulteration Act is still in force, that is, with regard to bran and middlings. If what the hon. member said was true, that the 150,000 tons of screenings gathered at the head of the Lakes was all dirt, I would say: Send it to the United States if they want it. But it is not all dirt. Considerably more than 50 per cent of it is good feed material, consisting of broken wheat, oats, barley, buckwheat, flax and other material having a high feed value. As I pointed out before, it has been shown by experiments carried on at the experimental farm to have a greater feed value than bran. In addition to that, I know as President of the Western Canada Live Stock Union for two years prior to 1917? that farmers were clamouring for this feed from one end of Canada to the other. They wanted it all over the country, and under all conditions, recognizing its feed value.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: They do not want it to-day.

Mr. TOLMIE: With regard to the criticism of the Department of Agriculture with reference to the administration of the previous Acts, they were not under the Department of Agriculture, but we are now trying to make an improvement and bring this matter under this department. With reference to the hon. member's statement that there were 201 mustard seeds in an ounce of feed, that is less than 1 per cent. No. 3 Northern Wheat very often contains 2½ per cent, so right here by the proposed regulations we intend to make we shall have a most decided improvement in the quality of our bran.

There has been a slight implication that we propose to favour the miller. I have not been long enough in politics to favour anybody, and just as long as I have the honour to occupy this position I shall deliver the goods straight and to the very best of my ability, favouring nobody. The suggestion that so many men are going out of the hog and dairy business because of the sale of screenings is not well founded. Every one who is familiar with the hog business to-day knows that the present market conditions are very complicated; that our price in this country is set by the price and the demand in Great Britain, that there is a large accumulation of American bacon still on the British market, that there is a large amount of American bacon purchased in the United States and which still remains there, that the British are making every possible effort to get rid of this bacon which they have on hand before purchasing much bacon from Canada. The high price of grain has been very largely the cause of men going out of the hog business, for the reason that at present prices it is only just possible to turn out bacon at practically a little more than cost, so the inducements are not very great. A great many people have gone out of the dairy business principally because of the scarcity of help and the high cost of feed. If people in the country kept cows of good quality that would return a profit they would make money at present prices, but unfortunately a good many of them still stick to the old-fashioned dairy cow yielding from 4,000 to 5,000 pounds of milk a year, and a man who milks a cow of that kind twice a day and feeds her on high priced feed will find that at the end of the year he has been farming in a circle and has not got anywhere.

The hon. member has been good enough to refer to the staff of the Department of Agriculture, who are thoroughly posted in all matters relating to feed. Over ten careful consultations have been held by the staff, and the present Bill is the result of those consultations. We have gone into the matter very thoroughly indeed, and have at last arrived at something that we think will render very valuable service to the farmer and place him in a position to buy what he wants and pay for what he actually gets, and not for something that he does not get. We hope that the Bill will render very valuable service to the dairying industry and also to the hog industry of Canada.

Mr. J. E. SINCLAIR: Will the board to which the minister refers be paid or serve in an honorary capacity?

Mr. TOLMIE: Under the proposed legislation the minister may or may not form this board. If appointed, it would not be a salaried board, but they would have their actual expenses paid.

[Mr. Tolmie.]

Mr. J. F. REID: I am sorry I was not in the House all the time the hon. member for South Oxford was speaking. I agree that these noxious weed seeds should not be allowed in either bran or shorts, but I am afraid my hon. friend would give the country the impression that all these noxious weed seeds come from the western provinces. I want to tell my hon. friend from South Oxford that my first experience with noxious weed seeds in the West was with seeds from Ontario, and I have not got rid of them yet, and I suppose I never shall. I want my hon. friend to understand that the province of Ontario supplied the western provinces with the first batch of noxious weeds, and it is now coming home to my hon. friend.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Hon. Mr. Tolmie thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 165, to regulate the sale and inspection of commercial feeding stuffs, bran, shorts, middlings and chopped feeds.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

CUSTOMS TARIFF ACT, 1907, AMENDMENT.

On motion of Sir Henry Drayton (Minister of Finance) Bill No. 156, to amend the Customs Tariff Act, 1907, was read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 3—duties reduced.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is this section?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This is the 7½ per cent abolition clause.

Bill reported.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall the Bill be read the third time?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Now.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does the minister think it imperative that the Bill be read the third time now?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Not if my hon. friend desires to have the third reading postponed. I have no desire to press the third reading if there is any objection.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not imagine that any exception will be taken to the third reading, but the attendance is rather thin this afternoon and I think the third reading might stand.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Very well.

DIRECTOR OF COAL OPERATIONS.

Hon. Arthur Meighen (Minister of the Interior) moved the second reading of Bill No. 153 (from the Senate) respecting the Director of Coal Operations.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): This Bill comes from the Senate?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will the minister kindly explain the nature of it? Copies of the Bill have not been distributed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Bill, which is printed in English and French, is very simple. It maintains the effect of the Orders in Council that provided for the control of coal operations in district 18, under Mr. Armstrong. The Orders in Council are all referred to in the Bill, which confirms them and continues their effect in force until the end of the next session of Parliament.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve): From what I can gather, having followed the discussion the other day in the other Chamber, this Bill will render more secure the operations in the coal mines in the West. By virtue of the Orders in Council those operations were made easier and the threatened coal famine has been avoided, and it is considered, therefore, that this arrangement ought to be continued in view of the many strikes which are impending in the neighbouring part of the American Republic. I understand that there is a gentleman, a Mr. Armstrong, who has been appointed and given certain powers as regards employment of men and that under his direction the operations have been fairly steady and have given satisfaction. I take some interest in this matter. Two years ago I made a motion concerning coal operations. During the summer our people do not think about what may happen in the fall or winter, and I believe we lack any adequate comprehension of the danger with which we are always threatened in having before us a very cold winter. Two years ago, when I made that motion, I thought that the Government ought to take all necessary measures in due time in order to maintain as far as possible the production of coal in those western mines so as to give the settlers and others out there the proportion of coal which must be distributed to every family. I am always nervous at the beginning of winter when I read in the newspapers that there are strikes here and there and that there is not the proportion of coal which should be distributed in those far-away districts. There is no timber available for fuel purposes and therefore anything the Government can do to promote the operation of the mines in due season ought to be encouraged. I followed the discussion of the Bill the other day, and I approve of this measure.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Would the minister give an explanation of the Bill?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I really could not give as good an explanation as that which has been given by my hon. friend from Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux). I might say, however, that Mr. Armstrong has been the director of coal operations, and, by virtue, of an Order in Council, has been, in effect, the arbitrator between the coal operators and the men for the past two or three years. He has established a measure of confidence on both sides. I cannot say that the confidence is complete on either side, because I know both sides have complained, but nevertheless he has established a measure of confidence that makes him the best choice we know of for the work. If there is nobody to intervene then what the hon. member for Maisonneuve predicts is very likely to arise. Coal miners in that district are perhaps the most disposed of any of their class in this Dominion to have differences with the proprietors of the mines, and I would apprehend that we would very soon be in the position he describes unless some provision were made for a continuation of the control for a short time at least.

Mr. CURRIE: If I understand the matter correctly, the result of these Orders in Council is that the miners throughout a large section of the West persist in obtaining very large pay for the coal that is mined, and that the Government has been kind enough to pay them a certain amount for every day that they are idle. In this way these men have taken us by the throat. Is that policy still to be continued? Are the miners to work only an hour a day and get $2, or $2.50, or $1.50 from the Government for being idle the remainder of the day? Are no steps being taken to bring about a condition whereby the mines can operate during the off season and have 4 p.m. the coal stored? It must be apparent to the House that one of the difficulties in the way of getting this coal out for the western settlers is that of financing it. Could not the Government assist in financing coal operations in such a way that during the season when coal is not needed it will be mined and stored at various points? If the owners of the coal mines dig that coal during the season when there is no demand for it they will have to finance it in order to carry it. The coal miner is not able to continue operations, to ship coal during the spring and summer when it is not needed, unload it at the different stations and bear the carrying charges. That is too heavy a burden for him to undertake. We will never have conditions right in this country until some method is adopted whereby there will be a large storage of coal continuously through the summer and winter. The province of Ontario is in a condition now that makes this need very apparent. We cannot tell at what minute we are going to be entirely out of coal and yet the burden of storing and carrying coal is too heavy for private individuals. With coal at a high price, it is a highly speculative operation to store coal unless you know what you are going to get for it when the winter season opens.

Mr. LEMIEUX: In Montreal the big industrial concerns are experiencing a coal famine. The Gas Company—

Mr. CURRIE: So is the Gas Company in Toronto.

Mr. LEMIEUX: —is suffering from a coal famine. The gas distributed last week had a peculiar stench which, it was explained, was due to the quality of coal they had on hand. Why should this country be threatened in that way? We have the coal in the East and in the West and we must provide the means to operate these coal mines and be more independent of other countries. Why should we not?

Mr. CURRIE: I agree entirely with what the hon. member says. There is no reason why it should not be done. Now is the time to begin shipping Nova Scotia coal to Montreal. The Government has built a great many ships and some of them might be employed in this work. It is far more important that coal should be carried to Toronto and Montreal than that it should be sent to Italy because our industries will suffer unless this is done. The same condition exists in the West. The farmers cannot tell when they are going to get coal. The coal miner sits down and does nothing all summer when he should be digging coal. Everybody wants his coal at the same time. The condition is very serious in Ontario at the present time. The United States coal mine operators and the railways are determined that we shall not get any coal. They are going to starve us into giving them free pulp and they are apparently adopting that underhand method for the purpose of doing it. If we are going to carry on business in this country I do not see anything else for this Government to do than to make a start by putting ships on to carry coal from our own coal mines in the Maritime Provinces to Montreal, Toronto and the West. Every ship load of coal that goes forward will help to break the embargo of the American coal owners against Canada because after all Canada is the best market for hard coal that the miners of Pennsylvania have. We take the bulk of their hard coal. They do not sell any hard coal west of their mines. It is all soft coal that is sold in Chicago and the West. But if you do begin using soft coal in Canada you have some piker get up in a council and say that you must not do so because it will blacken the wash on the clothes line of some woman in the outskirts of the city. It is up to the Government to see that we get an adequate supply for next year and one of the ways to do that is to see that the mining of coal is carried on continuously. The Government might finance the miners in order to enable them to continue operations during the period when coal is not in demand so that the coal could be stored at different points throughout the country to be delivered to the people when required. This is a very serious matter. Many industries in Western Ontario will have to be shut down. Gas companies have been mentioned by my hon. friend from Maisonneuve. The gas company in the city of Toronto has not two weeks' supply of coal ahead. Efforts have been made to bring about a condition whereby large quantities of coal might be stored in Toronto. There was a proposition some months ago that coking plants should be established by the principal cities to supply the fuel required when hard coal could not be had. But if you ever propose anything of that kind in Ontario or elsewhere, there is always somebody to get up and start raising a row about it—I do not know why.

The fact remains that unless we get coal in Ontario at an early date most of our industries that depend upon coal for heating purposes will have to close down and I believe the same condition confronts the West. I would like the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) to tell the House how much money it cost us to bonus the coal miners in the West last year while they did no work. Such a condition of things cannot be allowed to recur in this country. Coal is one of our great key industries, and the Government should take control of the situation. There is no reason why our western coal should not be brought as far east as Port Arthur; our railways do not encourage this traffic simply because they prefer to haul coal to Winnipeg as return freight to fill their empty westbound cars.

This is the time for the Government to state whether they are going to see that Ontario is not starved for coal next winter. The lumber men—the timber wolves—have taken away all our timber, and to-day cordwood is twice as dear as coal wherever there is any supply, which is strictly limited. As a result the people in our towns and villages are suffering very seriously. But to aggravate this serious condition the Railway Commission some time ago passed a regulation by the operation of which the little towns and villages that are not on a competitive line of railway have to pay $8 a car more for their coal than do other places which are more fortunately situated. I brought this matter to the attention of the House last year, but nothing has been done by way of remedy.

This is the most serious question that confronts us at the present moment, and unless something is done there is no doubt that all our factories west of Montreal will have to shut down, and farmers and others will have to burn their furniture this winter to keep warm. It is up to the Government to see that some steps are taken to relieve the situation. Why should we have men idle all the summer long and be paying them when they ought to be at work? They ought to be getting out coal during the summer months. Formerly the coal produced in the summer used to be brought to Quebec and Montreal by boat, but that condition no longer obtains, and now we have to use American coal as far east as Quebec. Something must be done by the Government to free us from the domination of the coal barons of America, and it seems to me our mercantile marine could be put to no better use than in bringing in cargoes of coal from Nova Scotia to help make us independent of the American supply.

Mr. DEVLIN: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. BURNHAM: A few months ago I brought this whole matter before the House—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Mr. Devlin has the floor.

Mr. E. B. DEVLIN (Wright): While listening to the last speaker (Mr. Currie) I could not help remembering that for some years we (on this side of the House) were advocating the building of a canal which would have brought coal right down to the point sought by my hon. friend, and that that transportation would have been far cheaper than by rail. I am sorry that my hon. friend did not see fit at the time to support our efforts to have that canal constructed.

Mr. CURRIE: Which canal?

Mr. DEVLIN: The Georgian Bay canal.

Mr. CURRIE: How would it get coal to Toronto?

Mr. DEVLIN: Right straight from the Great Lakes.

Mr. CURRIE: You need to go and study your geography. There is no coal along the Georgian Bay canal.

Mr. DEVLIN: I am not saying that there is coal along the Georgian Bay canal. What I do say is that it would have helped to solve the problem by providing cheaper transportation from the Great Lakes because it would lessen the rail haul. Otherwise, Mr. Speaker, I am glad—

Mr. SPEAKER: I would remind hon. members that the debate before the House is the principle involved in a Bill which has for its object the ratification of certain Orders in Council in reference to the appointment of a director of coal operations. I am sure the House will agree that the Chair has not endeavoured to restrict the debate in any degree, but I think it would be rather unfortunate if we allowed it to be further widened to take in the Georgian Bay canal, and perhaps the hon. member will try to speak to the Bill before the House.

Mr. DEVLIN: I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I had no intention of discussing the Georgian Bay canal. I was simply giving expression to a thought that arose while listening to my hon. friend (Mr. Currie). I rose to say that I believed that the officials who have had to deal with the coal situation have done their very best to have Canada supplied with as much coal from the outside as was possible. I conceive that this is a question on which we can find common ground, for coal enters into the necessities of life, and I would like to support my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) in all his endeavours to get the West supplied with coal. Personally I would like to see our western coal come farther east and our Nova Scotia coal go farther west so as to make the commodity as cheap as possible for our people.

In looking over the coal statistics I was somewhat surprised to find that we have 111,169 square miles of coal areas, comprising 8,845,900,000 tons of semi-anthracite coal, 313,573,000,000 tons of bituminous coal, 932,053,000,000 tons of sub-bituminous coal, and 111,286,000,000 tons of lignite. In other words, we have within Canada all the coal necessary to prevent a shortage of fuel among our people, and the point to be emphasized is that it is one of our natural resources that should be developed to the fullest extent. Therefore, while supporting my hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) in his endeavours to get coal to the West, I do hope that the Government in its plans for the immediate future will see to the development of our coal resources to their fullest extent, in order that Canada may be independent of the United States in the matter of fuel.

Mr. J. H. BURNHAM (West Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, a couple of months ago I brought this question before the House by way of resolution, and on investigating the matter I was immensely surprised to find that, notwithstanding the fact that Ontario was in a most perilous position in regard to its coal supply, nobody had seen fit to investigate the cost of bringing coal into Ontario either from the West or from the East.

When I made some inquiries at headquarters I found that they knew nothing about it. Then I proceeded to carry my examination further, and at last I found out from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company that so far as they were concerned it would cost about $12 a ton to bring a car, say, from Calgary to Toronto. However, they said they could not say that if a very large business was developed it would not cost less. In any event, this fuel question has to be solved for Ontario. As stated by the hon. member who has just spoken we have immense supplies of coal, both east and west, yet here we are in Ontario on the very brink of perishing from lack of coal. The matter is extremely serious for Ontario. The people feel very keenly indeed about it; they are continually asking us why we do not do something with regard to it. We have the coal, but apparently we have not the brains to get it here.

Some time ago, in a resolution which I introduced with regard to the cost of the necessaries of life, I used the word "desperate." That did not please the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) and he moved an amendment to the resolution. I accepted the amendment and the resolution was carried, and we were to wait for revelations with regard to it. Now, in that resolution the fuel question was involved, and I think, with all due respect to the minister and his great administrative powers, that he ought to take up this question of the solution of the difficulty for Ontario, because Ontario—we cannot repeat it too often—is in a most serious position. Wood is altogether out of the question. In fact I was so discouraged with regard to coal that I began to turn to the alcohol question to see what could be done about that. No doubt in a few years we shall have alcohol as a fuel. The people of Ontario have been groping in the dark, as it were, to find out some means of furnishing themselves with heat and motive power throughout the year, chiefly in the winter, but they have not got anywhere. It would not be too much to say that some special legislation will have to be enacted or some special effort made to provide the people with fuel, because they have to have it. It is absurd, when you think of the vast stores of coal that we have in Canada, that we cannot do better than we have been doing. Lately the Research Council has found out that briquettes, which are about fifty per cent coal, and twenty-five per cent petroleum and so on, furnish something of higher efficiency than even anthracite coal. If so, why can they not have that industry developed? I have had letters from a great many people in the West, from coal users and coal companies, asking why it is that these things cannot be looked into and the development of the coal industry proceeded with. If the West concludes that it is possible, and the East wants it, it is about time that we proceeded to get it. Certainly something will have to be done.

Mr. W. D. COWAN (Regina): I would like to ask the Minister of the Interior (Hon. Mr. Meighen) if he can give us any information with regard to the opening up and development of what is known as the Sheep's Creek Mine located in District No. 18 with which he is now dealing? As I understand it, the Pat Burns Company, with headquarters at Calgary, have had a lease of this mine for a great many years—a mine, which it is said, contains millions of tons of the very finest anthracite coal that can be obtained anywhere in the world. They have been building a railway in connection with this mine, I understand, by a slow process for a number of years back, and we in the West have been looking forward to the opening up of this mine, because through the production of that coal we would meet the aristocratic tastes—and we have very aristocratic tastes in Canada when it comes to what we use—of Ontario and the West so far as anthracite coal is concerned. I would therefore like to know what is being done. If this company have a lease of this mine and are not making such progress as is necessary in the interests of the people, then a little pressure should be brought to bear upon them at this particular time with a view to having them get to work and get that mine opened up. So far as the cost of carrying coal to Eastern Canada from the West is concerned, if we have the grade of coal out there that the East requires it would be much more profitable for us to carry that coal to the East on our National railways, even at a low rate, than to pay that $47,000,000 deficit by means of luxury taxes and otherwise. We would thereby be keeping these railways busy and avoiding in the future such deficits as we have in the past, and at the same time we would be uniting Canada in such a way as it has never been united before.

Mr. R. J. MANION (Fort William and Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a word on behalf of the people from my section of Ontario to support the remarks of other hon. gentlemen from different parts of that province who have spoken on the coal situation.

During the past few weeks I have received a number of communications dealing with this question. It certainly is evident that the people of the western end of Ontario are going to find themselves in a serious condition this winter with regard to coal if some solution of this problem is not arrived at. I know that the Government have been dealing with the matter because I took it up unofficially with some of its members, who told me that they were looking into it. I feel quite sure that it has not been neglected, but I would like to impress upon the other members of the Government the very great importance of this question. It seems almost a tragedy that a country such as this, as the hon. member for Wright (Mr. Devlin) has pointed out possessing the second greatest deposits of coal in the world—taking second place only to the United States—should be dependent on outside countries for our coal. Ontario, being in the centre of the country, has to get coal either from the Pennsylvania fields, or from the far West, near the home of my hon. friend from Regina (Mr. Cowan), or from the Nova Scotia coal fields. It seems to me that it would be a very popular act and a very wise one if some scheme could be worked out whereby coal could be brought to the eastern parts of Ontario from the Nova Scotia fields, and to the western parts, my own parts of Ontario, from the western fields. This question is linked up with the development of the natural resources of the country, a matter which I brought up in this House on three or four different occasions,—the development of our iron, coal and oil supplies. As the hon. member for Regina has pointed out, it would help relieve the deficit on operation of our National railways if we could devise some means of utilizing our coal deposits. I simply desire to impress upon the House and upon the Government the gravity of the situation which faces Ontario in particular in regard to the securing of coal for the coming winter.

Mr. J. A. ROBB (Chateauguay-Huntingdon): Mr. Speaker, before the Minister of the Interior (Hon. Mr. Meighen) answers the inquiries that have been made, I should like to direct his attention to certain facts that were brought out during the last session in an investigation that was made in the Senate. The minister will remember that an old gentleman from California claimed to have secured very large areas of excellent coal fields in Alberta. For reasons which the minister will understand, the lease was cancelled and was subsequently taken up by one or two others, and I understand that afterwards that lease also was cancelled. I gathered from conversation with this man from California, who showed me all his plans—I knew nothing about them more than what he told me—that he was quite willing to surrender to the nation any rights that he had, provided he was refunded the amount he had spent in exploring these coal areas. If his statement is correct, there are in Alberta millions of tons of excellent coal that might be used to the advantage of the nation. I do not know whether the minister is in a position to make any statement in regard to the matter at this time; I am not pressing him to do so. But if he is in a position to make a statement, I think it would be well that the country should know just what rights Canada has in connection with that large coal area in Alberta, and whether it can be developed for the benefit of the Canadian people.

Mr. M. R. BLAKE (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words in regard to the coal situation, as it is a matter in which every one in Canada is deeply interested. Hon. members who have spoken in regard to the quantity of coal that exists in the western provinces, and in particular, Alberta, may not be aware that much of this coal will not stand long shipping, nor long exposure, without crumbling into dust. This coal may be stored in good cool cellars and when it will give reasonable satisfaction, but much of it is of inferior quality. Some of the coal in southern Manitoba—and there is only a small coal area in the southwestern portion of the province—contains 35 per cent of moisture. Further West the percentage of moisture is less, and the quality of the coal rises accordingly. I understand that a briquette-making plant is now in operation in southern Saskatchewan, which plant by compressing the soft coal derived from some of the soft coal mines, produces a coal of a higher heat value than the best anthracite coal.

I am informed that the coal in the Smoky river area which caused a great deal of discussion in the House last year, has a higher heating value and is equal to any anthracite coal, and the Government would be well advised to see that those coal areas are transferred to the Canadian National railways, as they would then become a national asset. This is the only really valuable coal field accessible to the National railways which has not yet been given to some private enterprise. By constructing a railroad about 65 miles long, connection could be made between the Canadian National railways and the Smoky river area, and as the coal starts in at the side of a hill, this would be probably one of the cheapest mining propositions that we have in this country at present. I hope the Government will use every endeavour to get the briquetting plant under way and enlarge it to the extent found necessary, thus solving our hard coal problem.

If, as the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Cowan) has said, a branch line of about 60 miles long will open up an anthracite area in the vicinity of Calgary, that matter should be given attention. The trouble is that most of the soft coal of Alberta will not stand shipping; it cannot be shipped for weeks and left in cars, say at the head of the Lakes, and then shipped by boat, without going to pieces and crumbling into dust.

The Minister of Railways (Mr. J. D. Reid) might also give attention to the matter of having a more reasonable rate of freight on coal from Alberta to Winnipeg and the rest of the West during the summer season when railway cars are lying idle on sidings. The big rush from the West is when the grain crop is coming out and we have to depend on anthracite coal to a large extent, because the railways carry wheat to the head of the Lakes and carry back coal. The railways have had a gold mine in hauling wheat east and hauling back coal from the head of the Lakes. If it be possible for a railway to pay by hauling goods one way and empty cars back, there are plenty of empty cars in the summer time and the railroads would be well employed if they would make a bid for bringing coal East in the summer season. If the Canadian National railways were to do this, the deficit on our railways might be greatly reduced. These are three matters that might well be taken into consideration by the Government with great benefit to the nation at large.

Mr. JAMES R. WILSON (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a few observations in regard to this matter. I do not think there is anything that the people of both East and West are to-day more interested in than the development of our coal resources. The object of developing our coal resources is two-fold: First, to keep our money at home, purchasing our own materials and supplying our men with work, and second to create traffic for our railways which at the present time, show a balance on the wrong side owing to lack of traffic.

As the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Blake) has stated, there is in Western Canada a great deal of coal that will not stand storing during the summer season. Some hon. members have suggested it will, but that is not possible because spontaneous combustion might occur. But we have hard coal, and I regret to say that up to the present time only one deposit of hard coal, known as Banff coal, has been worked, and this has been worked by the Canadian Pacific only to a very limited extent. Our experience in the West has been that while we could get a supply of this Banff coal, we did not look for Pennsylvania coal. But during the past four or five years it has been impossible to secure a supply of this Banff coal, because the Canadian Pacific Company have been producing from that particular mine only sufficient to supply their needs. There are two other known deposits, one of which has been referred to as the Smoky River deposit, and the other is the Sheep Creek deposit. The Smoky River deposit is located about 70 or 75 miles from the line of the Canadian National railways, and it is estimated that it would cost about $1,500,000 or $2,000,000 to connect that mine with the railway. I understand that that deposit belongs to the Government, as last year the mining right was cancelled. The other deposit, which is owned by Messrs. P. Burns and Company, is located to the southwest of Calgary in the foothills of the Rocky mountains and is about 60 miles from a railway. Mr. Burns has been making every effort to construct a branch line of railway to his mine, a distance of about 60 miles at the nearest point. I think he has gone even so far as to apply for a charter, but he has found it difficult to finance the construction of that railway.

I wish merely to bring these matters to the attention of the Government. By tapping one of these fields of hard coal the Minister of Railways or the Government could do a great deal towards putting the Canadian National railways on a paying basis, especially if it were possible to fix a rate whereby that coal could be transported to the Prairie Provinces and to Ontario so that it might displace Pennsylvania coal.

As regards coal mines in Western Canada, the coal of which is of a semi-bituminous nature and which will store, the operators are most anxious to mine this coal and the dealers are anxious to store it. They have been asking that, during the summer months, June, July and possibly early in August when there is very little traffic originating on the prairies, the railway companies should make the concession of reducing the freight rates say $1 a ton in order, in a measure, to offset the cost of carrying this coal in storage until it is required. I understand the matter came before the Railway Commission and this concession was refused. If the Government could do anything along this line, the storing of coal during the summer months would be encouraged.

Sir SAM HUGHES: For a number of years I have given considerable attention to the development of the coal industry in the West, and I have long since arrived at the conclusion that we can bring coal from the Rocky Mountains and land it at Liverpool and compete with English coal, especially at present prices. My policy would be to have a line, one already constructed or to be erected, controlled by the Government, from Crow's Nest Pass, another from the Kicking Horse Pass, another from the Brazeau coal deposits, another from the Yellowhead Pass, and another from the Smoky River district, traversing the country to the East. The coal industry is a most important one; it is of vital importance to our people. Last winter, in two towns that I happened to be in in the West the people were cutting green poplar bushes to keep themselves in heat till they could get coal delivered to them, and when the coal was delivered they could only get a carload at a time to the large towns. From the eastern part of the Northwest region one of the three great transcontinental roads might be utilized. It should be chosen for practically a coal road. It should have a low grade, very powerful engines, and the cars should be constructed with roller bearings and should haul from 60 to 80 tons each. It would be quite feasible for one of these engines to haul across the continent from 6,000 to 7,000 tons of coal, which could be brought to Ontario and the far East. Similar plans should be made to develop the coal areas in the East, and it should be done on a systematic basis. I have had a good deal of experience of the coal mines in the West. The only anthracite coal I came across in the West was at Anthracite, referred to by my hon. friend from Saskatoon. The other kind of coal is termed semi-anthracite. Pat Burns' coal, which I have had analyzed, is semi-anthracite, so is the Crow's Nest coal, the Brazeau coal, and the Yellowhead Pass coal. So far as my experience of the coal from the Grande Prairie and Smoky River districts is concerned, it also is semi-anthracite, but of a very high grade. It would answer all the purposes of bituminous coal and would certainly make a very good heating coal, because we know that people all over the British Isles use soft coal for fuel, and we can do it here just as well. I give that just as an outline of a proper Government policy with regard to coal. First, it would develop the coal industry for the people in the great Northwest and keep the people there supplied with coal; secondly, it would enable us to get the coal down East and distribute it through Ontario and Quebec. The Maritime Provinces could be trusted to look after themselves, and to ship their coal as far West as they could. I would not have this run as a Government controlled institution entirely. I would have it controlled by the Government, but I would also give the owners of private mines the opportunity to have their coal hauled over the Government roads at the same rates, in order to bring about competition and keep down the prices, even from the Government. I would suggest that the utmost freedom be given to private owners to ship their coal over these lines at the same rate as the Government coal. I will not say any more on this matter at the present time. I have given my views in public on more than one occasion. I am satisfied that the day is not far distant when the Government will see the necessity of initiating some such policy to develop the industries of the great Northwest.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am afraid the debate has travelled beyond the limits that I had come prepared to expect. There have been some phases of it, however, that have pertained directly to the Bill and I propose to refer to these first. The Bill provides merely for the retention of the powers of Mr. Armstrong until the end of the next session of the House. I can well recall that troubles in this coal district back over three or four years were about the most frequent and regular of the many difficulties that the Government of the day were confronted with from time to time. Just when things would seem to be going right for a few brief days, the news would come of another strike in district No. 18.

I do not know definitely what the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Currie) has in mind in reference to the Government paying men for being idle. There was never anything of that kind done even in the darkest days. I think he must have in mind an occasion some years ago, which can be more fully explained in committee by the hon. member for Elgin (Hon. Mr. Crothers), who at that time was Minister of Labour, when the situation in district No. 18 was pretty near the limits of tragedy, when homes in the West were without coal, a strike was on, and winter was approaching and indeed was upon them. There was a danger so immediate that anything we are confronted with to-day is small in comparison with it. The Minister of Labour of that day, the Hon. Mr. Crothers, went to the district, and after very difficult negotiations he made some arrangement by which the amount in dispute between the men and the operators, or a part of the amount, the extra wages that were claimed for the time they had worked, were for the time being advanced by the Government. The operators, including the Canadian Pacific, which I think was one of the largest, undertook to recompense the Government as time went on at a certain rate per man per day, or on some such basis, and the ultimate result was that the treasury came out nearly square, the money being refunded. I do not know what else can be referred to. Certainly we have never at any time put a premium on idleness, nor have we felt it was our duty in any way to put a bounty in the hands of the coal operators of this district. We have simply sought, and sought with very great success, considering what had to be gone through, by the interposition of Mr. Armstrong to bring together the operators and the men, to keep the mines going and the men working, in order that there might be the maximum production of coal. That has been the one aim, and that aim we have for the most part reached. The other phases of the discussion have no direct connection with the merits of the Bill, but, nevertheless, are of paramount importance to the country.

Mr. CURRIE: There was no agreement to give the men any money in case of idleness?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No. It is argued that we in Ontario and Quebec to-day are in a serious condition as respects the coal supply in the immediate future. That has been true to too great a degree, but I do not know that the circumstances to-day are of such immediate and dire peril as might be inferred from the remarks of some hon. gentlemen. We are not likely to freeze for want of coal in the first half of the month of June, not, at all events, in Ontario and Quebec. Nevertheless, bituminous coal is a vital necessity to the industries of this country even in summertime. A committee of the Government has had the matter in hand. I am not a member of the committee myself, but the minister whom I represent in this discussion, the Hon. Mr. Robertson, is a member. The Minister of Railways is also a member of that committee, and from him particulars as to the work of that committee may be given in committee. I may say though, after speaking with the Minister of Labour only lately, that he stated the situation had of recent days been much relieved, and that very considerable shipments of coal had been made and were forthcoming. His own mind seemed to be much more at ease than it had for some weeks on this subject.

References have been made to the duty of the Government to adopt some policy—the outlines of policies that have been given, I am afraid, are rather vague—that will make available for the people of Ontario and Quebec, the coal of Western Canada and of Eastern Canada. It has been urged that we might finance the operators of Alberta in order that there might be storage of coal from idle seasons that would carry us through the busy seasons. It is also urged that we might bring pressure on the railways to reduce the rates and thereby make the coal available to the more populated centres of Ontario. Referring to the latter phase first, I do not pretend to be in any way an expert on railway rates; but I am confident that this opinion is sound: that there is not very much room for reduction by any amount however small in railway rates in regard to any staple article at the present time. I do not think it is more than the truth to say that there are articles of transport—and coal may be one of them—the more of which the railways carry the less money they make; or rather, I should say, the more money they lose, and that applies to the Canadian National Railways just as much as, if not more than, it applies to the Canadian Pacific Railway. It is in the interest of the railway company just as directly as it is in our interest that they do not have cars travelling empty, and their efforts are designed to see that that condition does not occur, if by any reduction of rates, or by any other means they can profitably have the cars when travelling filled to capacity. The fact of the matter is that it costs more money to bring coal from those fields here than it cost to bring it from other sources. That is the great economic fact. It, of course, does not cost so much more now as it did when coal was much lower in price.

The next fact, which is an important one—indeed, the first statement means nothing except as the second is borne in mind—is that the coal that is nearest at hand is of a quality that cannot be transported, and that which is further away is subject more and more to the freight obstacle which I have defined. Now, those two circumstances together, the quality of the coal and the great distance, have made the economic transport to date impossible, and except by mere payments out of the treasury the Government cannot overcome this basic economic fact. There is coal of semi-anthracite and high bituminous quality in Alberta in almost unlimited quantity, at any rate, unlimited so far as is concerned the needs of Canada for some centuries to come. But to have the coal there and to have it here are two very different things. It is just because it is there and not here that the great difficulty arises; and the size of the market, the volume of consumption within the railway area is so small that the scale of production is kept down and consequently prices are kept up. The contracted market is the great factor in keeping down the scale of production and therefore keeping narrow the area of consumption. If we had ten times the number of people in Western Canada than we have, then western coal would economically reach much further east than it does to-day, because production would be on such a scale that, being cheaper, the coal could go further and further from the point of origin.

As to financing the operators, I really do not know that there is anything I could say upon that subject, but I would be rather inclined to think that the trouble was not a matter of finance. I know that the Canadian Pacific Railway are large operators in Alberta and they do not need very much help in the way of financing. I am sure that if there is any way by which they can keep mines going the year round and thereby have on hand through the slack season a supply for the busy season they are quite able to finance the operations. Probably there may be others to whom help may be necessary, but so far as I know there has been no application in that respect. Consequently it seems to me likely that this is not one of the fundamental difficulties. The difficulty is rather a question of cheap production and cheap transport. It is true, as the hon. member for Huntingdon (Mr. Robb) says, that there is an immense deposit of semi-anthracite coal in the Smoky River region. I cannot recall the number of millions of tons, but it is very high, and it is sufficient to supply all imaginable needs for very many years. But the coal is in the Smoky River district and there are not very many people near the Smoky river, nor, indeed, within many hundred miles of the Smoky river, while there are all kinds of coal mines with large sums of capital invested in them everywhere outside of that district. It is therefore quite easy for the imagination to run riot in relation to a very valuable deposit situate in the Smoky river. Mr. Hoppe and another gentleman, whose name I do not remember, obtained a lease in the regular way some time in the year 1915 or 1916. The terms of the lease were not lived up to by Mr. Hoppe and his partner and it was cancelled by the Department of the Interior in the year 1918, I think, while I was in charge of the department. The cancellation, as should always be the case, came within the purview of the minister, but the granting of leases is made under the regulations, and there is no specific reference to the minister in any single instance unless special circumstances make that course necessary. These lands, under the regulations, were subsequently granted, without reference to the minister, to a Mr. Barnard and, I think, Colonel Shillington, although I think the lease was in the name of Mr. Barnard alone. An investigation took place in the Senate following an appeal by the lessees asking for a charter to build a railway into the Smoky River district, and that investigation showed, or at all events it indicated pretty clearly to me, that those associated with Mr. Barnard had obtained certain advantages to which they had no right in the way of advance information and as a result had obtained the lease. It was clear from the evidence —and I believe the committee so reported— that Mr. Barnard himself had no knowledge of this advance information one way or the other and that his conduct in relation to the lease was honourable in every way. However, by reason of that investigation I felt it my duty by special Order in Council to cancel that lease also. It was cancelled and that coal area reverted to the Crown and all the acreage included in that lease, and many other acres—I do not recall the number—surrounding that particular area have since that time been specially reserved, not having been opened up for entry. What I have in contemplation is the reservation of that area until it can be economically used by the Canadian National railways. All that one can say yet is that it has been reserved and especially set aside and that no one now can enter upon it. The Smoky river is situate south of Grand Prairie and north of Park Gate, Grand Prairie being on the McArthur line running into the Peace River district and Park Gate being at the junction of the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian National railways. The Smoky River deposit is situated about half way between these two points—Grand Prairie and Park Gate. I think that ultimately there will be a road necessary to join these two points bringing the agricultural products of the Peace river down to the Smoky River district, joining the Canadian National railway at Park Gate and thence to the Pacific seaboard. There are many who say that this is the natural outlet for the products of that territory both mineral and agricultural. But as yet we have not been able to see our way to authorize an investment to enable the Canadian National Railways to build that line. It will necessarily be a most expensive piece of construction and I do not know if at the present time the coal freight traffic alone will be sufficient to warrant the tremendous capital investment necessary. Whether the joint agricultural and coal traffic will warrant it, it will take some one better informed than I am to pronounce upon it. But as yet we have not seen our way to authorize the immediate construction of that line of railway.

I think the hon. member for Huntingdon (Mr. Robb) had a question in his mind as to whether the original lessees of the deposit were fairly treated. The lease was cancelled for the reason that they were in default. They did not comply with the terms of the lease in that they did not pay the rental when it was due and consequently the right of cancellation was in the department. The department in no way went beyond its right in cancelling the lease. It is true that information reached the department that the holders of the lease were assuming an attitude antagonistic to this country in its war effort and on that account a more strict adherence to the terms of the lease might have been justified but it is sufficient for our purpose to know that the cancellation of the lease was strictly within the powers of the department and that it followed a failure on the part of the lessees to pay the rental for a considerable length of time.

As to the second lease, it was cancelled for the reason that I have given. The lessees contended, and are contending today vigorously, that the cancellation was illegal, but we cannot accept their legal claim on that ground. I think I have said all that is necessary with regard to the Smoky River lease and the prospects of obtaining coal from that source.

It has been alleged that sufficient progress is not being made in the utilization of the lignite deposits of Saskatchewan and Alberta. Hon. members have stated that the lignite in these deposits must first be carbonized and briquetted before they can be made available for use. I may say that they are not quite accurate in their statements as to the composition of the briquettes. The commission that was formed by my predecessor as Minister of Mines to go into the question of briquetting the lignite and to develop a commercial process if possible, have gone so far as to be assured that the carbonization—that is to say, to give a brief definition, the elimination of the volatile matter, is a practical fact and in their opinion can be carried out on a commercial basis. They have gone far enough to discover the binders which are required to hold the carbonized lignite together. They have discovered three such elements, and the binder which they suggest is a consolidation of the whole three. Twice as much of this article is required for the briquetting of western lignite as is required for the briquetting of German lignite. That is the impediment in the way of the commercialization of the briquetting system but it is not deemed to be an insuperable impediment. It transpired that further difficulties were in the way. The commission was capitalized jointly by the Dominion Government and the Governments of Alberta and Saskatchewan, the Dominion Government furnishing one half of the capital, or $200,000, and the Governments of Alberta and Saskatchewan each one quarter, or $100,000 each. On the basis of construction costs that obtained in 1917 when the commission was appointed that would have been sufficient to have enabled them to construct their plant. Costs have advanced fifty per cent and a little more; consequently they will require $600,000. They have sent a memorandum to me accordingly and I am in communication with the Governments of Saskatchewan and Alberta with a view to their co-operation with us in the same proportion as before in order to provide the necessary additional funds. It is the purpose of the commission, and indeed they have already, I believe, called for tenders, to erect a plant to try out on a large scale the briquetting process in the Estevan district in the province of Saskatchewan. Very considerable progress has indeed been made. It is altogether outside of the mark to say that this subject has in any degree been wanting attention at the hands of the department. It has received the most assiduous attention and of such a nature that very material progress has been made. It is one thing to say "Get a thing done" but it is another thing to be sure that the steps you are taking are scientifically accurate and commercially sound. We believe the progress we have made along the line of the utilization of the western output of lignite coal has been most encouraging. I believe I have covered, at least in as much detail as I have at my command, the various points raised by the hon. gentleman.

I should have made reference to the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Cowan) and the inquiry he has made as to certain deposits of coal operated by Mr. Burns in the foothills of the Rockies. I have no recent information on this subject and what I say is the outcome of an incident that occurred many months ago but I am pretty sure it is right. I believe Mr. Burns' deposits are not deposits that he obained under the leasing regulations of the present Government. Hon. gentlemen are aware that in 1914 the coal disposition policy of the country was changed. From that date on we no longer gave grants of mineral rights; we gave leases only, and leases upon terms of development and rental and royalty—not always royalty, but usually so. I believe Mr. Burns' deposits at the point referred to were secured under the former practice, and consequently there is no contractual obligation on his part with the Government in regard to development. I do not want hon. members to get the idea that Mr. Burns is withholding development, for I have no reason to think he is. On the contrary, I am inclined to believe the hon. member for Saskatoon is right and that Mr. Burns is doing everything in his power to secure an income on his investment. But so far as we are concerned I do not think his holdings are leasehold, and consequently we would have no jurisdiction to compel him to develop them.

Mr. CURRIE: Did Mr. Burns ask for assistance to build those roads?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am informed by the Minister of Railways that he has not asked for any. I would not be so bold as to say that he would not accept it.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the second time.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Meighen the House then went into Committee of the Whole to consider the Bill.—Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 1—Ratification of Orders in Council respecting Director of Coal Operations, etc.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is gratifying to see the evidence of a dawning consciousness on the part of the Government as to what is owing to Parliament in respect to many matters that heretofore have been carried out by Orders in Council. As I read this section, it is simply to have Parliament authorize the continuance in office of the officer referred to, the Director of Coal Operations, instead of having that authority continued by Order in Council. So far, so good. There is, however, one line in this section which I think might be improved. The section as it stands now reads:

These Orders in Council are hereby ratified and confirmed and continued in force and effect until the end of the next session of Parliament:

I doubt the wisdom of apparently denying Parliament the right to make any change between now and the end of the next session.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It does not.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It does not actually, but I should think the section might so be worded as to be more in keeping with what is owing to Parliament. For instance, it might be changed to read:

—unless further amended or repealed by Parliament shall continue in force and effect until the end of the next session.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That goes without saying. Parliament is always supreme. If nothing is done in the meantime these powers, duties, and rights cease at the end of the next session. Of course, Parliament this session can amend this legislation, but it would be surplusage to say so.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I agree with the statement of the minister. But as the section stands it does seem to be restricting the wishes of Parliament.

Mr. McKENZIE: If anything should hinge upon the statement that these Orders in Council shall continue in effect to the end of the next session, would it not be a breach of faith on our part to afterwards make a change before the expiration of the time stated? Supposing a man invested capital in business in connection with the matters mentioned in these Orders in Council, he would rest upon the assurance declared here that nothing will be disturbed until the end of the next session of Parliament. In the event of our taking action before the expiration of the time stated, such a man, if his interests were prejudiced, would have the strongest possible argumen in pleading that after this declaration he had good reason to believe that nothing would be done to interfere with those Orders in Council.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think any one would stake any money in business on the theory that these Orders in Council are stated to remain in effect until the end of the next session, come what may. He certainly would not do so if he first sought advice from a good Scotch lawyer like my hon. friend from Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie). My hon. friend should read the last clause of the section:

Provided, however, that the Governor in Council shall have power to repeal and cancel all or any of the said Orders-in-Council if at any time he deems that the same are no longer required.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

That is necessary, for the Governor in Council could not repeal any of these orders unless power to do so was conferred by the legislation; but, of course, Parliament can take action at any time. However, here is specific notice to everybody that these Orders in Council will remain in effect unless cancelled by the Governor in Council or until Parliament sees fit to repeal or amend them. That is all any one has a right to rely on.

Mr. McKENZIE: Why then make the statement at all that those orders shall continue in force until the end of the next session of Parliament? I think the language is unusual, and I cannot recall such a statement ever appearing in our legislation before.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh yes, there are many instances, and I will give a few in a moment. Before I do so, however, let me deal with this other point. Some date has to be fixed for the termination of these orders or else they are in effect permanently, and that we do not want. These are not the initial legislation of Parliament, these are Orders in council, and they fail now by reason of the War Measures Act, but it is in the interests of all concerned that they should remain in effect for a time at all events, and then perhaps legislation will take their place. Returning to the point mentioned by my hon. friend, similar language was used in the case of the newsprint control. The Orders in Council that gave the Commissioner, Mr. Pringle, his powers were continued until a certain date which was fixed in the legislation; I am not sure, but I think it was stated as "the end of the next session of Parliament." Then also there are many statutes which empower the Governor in Council to make regulations, and where those regulations are of major importance it has been the practice to provide that they shall be laid on the table of the House within so many days after the House opens at the following session. Unless we confirm them in the meantime by resolution or by legislation, they die at the end of that session. That has been the case in several instances. This just follows the newsprint precedent and these others that have been the law. In the Interior Department there are certain regulations that can only be made with that term of life. All that we are asking here is that Parliament continue these orders until the end of the next session so that at the next session Parliament can exercise its will with relation to the whole subject.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I agree that it is desirable to set a definite date in this regard, but leaving it until the end of next session is leaving it to an indefinite date. It certainly does appear to imply that the Government has some reason for not wishing Parliament to take this matter up during the next session; otherwise I see no object in providing that the order shall be made until the end of the next session.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What does my hon. friend suggest?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was about to suggest that it might be well to say "until the end of the present fiscal year." Whatever is necessary in the way of appropriation in this connection will be appropriated for the present fiscal year, and if it be desired to carry on this office beyond that time there will have to be an appropriation for another fiscal year. I should think that the substitution of the words "present fiscal year" for the words, "next session of Parliament" would be in every way advisable.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the Bill were being introduced in the first instance here, I am not sure that I would not agree to the proposal. Of course, Parliament is sure to meet before the end of the fiscal year, and by hurrying the matter we could get through both Houses, perhaps, such Bill as Parliament might deem necessary then. But the Bill has passed the Senate, and I do not think it worth while altering it and sending it back to the Senate for that purpose. The difference is simply this: Here Parliament will have all next session to consider whether or not action should be taken. If we think no action should be taken and that we should revert back to the conditions which obtained prior to the war, we simply do not need to do anything; if we think action should be taken, then we have all the next session to take it in. If I accept my hon. friend's suggested amendment, it would mean that whatever action we did take we would have to take before the 31st of March. As all members know, the time of the session prior to that date is pretty much occupied with the debate on the Address and with other functions of Parliament that precede the enactment of concrete and specific legislation. If we adopted this suggestion we would very likely be only hurrying ourselves at the next session with no very great object in view.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would like to say a word with regard to what the minister has said about the possibility of legislation not being much under way by the 31st of March next year. We on this side feel very strongly about the matter of granting the Government progress Estimates, so to speak—voting millions before the Estimates have been considered at all by the House. We met the Government this year and voted it two month's supply. I understand it is altogether probable that we shall be asked to vote another two months' supply in the course of the next day or so. We are getting away altogether from control by Parliament over public expenditures in permitting the Government to feel that it can bring on the session at any time in the year that best suits its convenience and then rush through legislation without giving ample opportunity for discussion of the Estimates. If I do not misinterpret the feeling of hon. gentlemen on this side, I may say that we shall not be as ready a year hence to make a concession of that kind to the Government should this Government be in office at the time. I might as well say that now as say it at some other time. Parliament ought to be called earlier; Parliament ought to be called before the Christmas holidays. The fiscal year was changed to end on the 31st of March so as to enable a few meetings of the House to be held before Christmas and the business of Parliament to be got well under way before the spring. If, as a result of the refusal of the Opposition to grant supply to the Government until opportunity has been had for the full and free discussion of these matters, business will be carried on in a more effective way and with greater control by Parliament over expenditures, we on this side will certainly take that position.

Now, the only objection that the minister has raised to the amendment I have suggested is that the Bill did not originate in this House and that it would have to go back to the other House for amendment. Well, that again is the fault of the Government in having the Minister of Labour in the Senate when he should be in this House. If there is one portfolio more than another that should be represented in the House of Commons it is the portfolio of Labour, and just because the Government have found it impossible to obtain a seat for the minister so that he might hold his position in this House is no reason why we should not exercise every precaution with a view to protecting the public interest that it is within our power to exercise. I do not see why we should give the Government power under any Act to continue any office beyond the time for which appropriation for it will be voted by Parliament, even if we do so only by implication. If the minister is not prepared to accept the suggestion, I myself will move that we substitute for the words "session of Parliament," in line 15 of the Bill, the words, "present fiscal year." I think that the minister will see the reasonableness of the suggestion, and I hope that he will accept it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not able to follow the hon. member. The fiscal year did end on the 30th June. In 1909 it was made to end on the 31st of March. The leader of the Opposition tells us that the change was made in order that Parliament would have some time before the fiscal year ended to conduct its work. One would think that Parliament would have had more time with the fiscal year ending 30th June than with the fiscal year ending 31st March.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend is quite wrong in that. What I said was that the time was changed so as to enable Parliament to meet before the Christmas holidays and to get through a great deal of its business by the spring. That was the thought I had in mind. The change to 31st March was to enable Parliament to be called in the fall rather than in January or February and to get through with its business by the beginning of June.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There was nothing to hinder Parliament being called in the fall when the fiscal year ended in June. Anyway, it was changed in 1909, and on account of the very many other duties Parliament has to perform since the change was made, it has frequently been difficult to get the Estimates through before the end of the fiscal year. If the hon. member will look back to the years 1910 and 1911 I think he will see that the Government of which he was then a member had to ask for interim appropriations in those two years. Why, in one year the Budget was not delivered by his colleague (Mr. Fielding) until the 26th day of June. So that though hon. members opposite may intend to be very reluctant to grant us any Supply, they will not get very much encouragement for that attitude in the history of the two years that they laboured under the same difficulties that we labour under now. However, that has nothing to do with this point. This Bill merely asks that these orders stand until the end of next session so that when Parliament meets it may choose its own time to alter them—or to let them die; for that is what will happen if Parliament takes no action. What has the fiscal year to do with it? Nothing at all. The end of the session has to do with it because that is the end of Parliament's labours. Why should not Parliament have the whole of the session within which to decide? Why should we seek now to hurry Parliament? If we keep forcing Parliament to take up this Bill and that Bill near the first of the session, we will make it just that much more difficult to get to the Estimates, and we shall be so much more likely to have to ask for an interim appropriation. We should simply be putting difficulties in our own way. The Bill is logically worded now; there is no principle at stake at all. What is the difference? Why should Parliament not have next session to decide on its action?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister asks a question and I will answer it. The minister says: "What has the fiscal year to do with the matter?" It has everything to do with it unless we go on the assumption that Parliament has simply to carry out the will of the Government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It has nothing to do with coal operations.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Director of Coal Operations must have an appropriation from Parliament to carry on his work.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think he has any appropriation. If he has it is very small.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister surely knows that he has an appropriation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I presume he has a salary.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Certainly he has.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That has nothing to do with the principle of this Bill, which is whether Parliament desires that condition of affairs to continue, and Parliament should have next session to decide whether it desires that condition of affairs to continue or not We should not say now that Parliament should in this respect deal with this matter before the 31st of March. There is no more reason for dealing with this matter before the 31st March than for dealing before the 31st March with any other matter that comes before Parliament. Why should we force Parliament to take this action in this case?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The only way it is possible to ensure the Government bringing down necessary legislation is the obligation upon the Government to seek appropriations for the purpose. If this clause is allowed to remain as it is, and we now assent to the powers, duties and rights of the Director of Coal Operations being continued until the end of the next session of Parliament, we shall be told by the minister as soon as we have got past the present fiscal year, that at this particular session we passed an Act continuing his rights and powers to the end of the session and that the Government have continued employing this particular officer in the position in which he now is, notwithstanding the fact that no moneys have been voted for his particular office. The minister knows as well as any other hon. member that the powers, duties and rights of the Director of Coal Operations should not be continued a day beyond the period for which Parliament appropriates money for the purpose, and he also knows that the present appropriation will expire at the end of this fiscal year, because we do not appropriate beyond one particular year. For that reason, I think we should seek to make our legislation conform with what, in the matter of control of public expenditures, is in the public interest. I would move that this clause be amended by striking out the words "next session of Parliament" in line 15 on page 1 of the Bill and substituting therefor the words "present fiscal year."

Amendment negatived.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—ratification of orders issued by director:

Mr. MEIGHEN: Carried.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, it is not carried. This clause will not carry if it is possible to prevent its carrying. We are asked by this clause to ratify and confirm orders of the Director of Coal Operations, although we do not know what a single one of these orders is. In the schedule attached to this Bill there is a list of order numbers, and I do not believe any hon. member, including the minister himself, can tell us at this moment what these orders are. Before the minister asks us to ratify these orders, I will make way for him to tell us what they are.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I can give my hon. friend pretty generally the nature of these orders; I do not suppose he would expect me to have them by rote. These are orders fixing conditions of labour, hours of labour, methods of compensation, a system of differentials, prices of coal and methods of payment. I think that would cover them all. They apply from time to time, just as Mr. Armstrong, who is the director, after hearing both sides in every case felt to be essential and, in his judgment, the fairest that could be done, and both sides have acquiesced in these orders. So far as I know there is nothing now in dispute between the parties. I do not suppose any hon. member would want to peruse these orders in detail any more than he would want to peruse various regulations of that kind which must necessarily be made by an executive, whether the executive is the Governor in Council or some other person, from time to time, if there is to be any government carried on at all. If there is any special order which the hon. member would like to see, or if he would like to see them all, copies can be got for him; but I do not think he, as leader of the Opposition, is going to put himself in the position of delaying merely for the sake of delay. These are orders made by the Director of Coal Operations as an arbitrator between parties who, from time to time, have different disputes, and both sides have acquiesced in these orders. I would not think that Parliament, after such acquiescence, would want to come in and seek to modify and thereby revive the dispute. That would be all that could be done if we seek in any way to modify or to leave out.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister is quite right when he says that I would not wish to delay for the sake of delay. That is not the question that is to the fore at the moment. What we are being asked by the ministry to do is to ratify a number of orders which, as the minister has just stated, relate to prices, to regulations on hours and wages of labour, etc., all of which are issued by an individual. We have only the minister's word that there is apparent agreement in the matter. If there is apparent or substantial agreement, why ask Parliament to agree to this? It is not the practice, where orders are made by an officer in the performance of his duties, to have those orders brought down to Parliament for ratification. It is assumed that the officer has power to make the regulations when that power is given to him by Parliament. If he is acting honestly and carrying out his duties consistently, there is no need for ratification. The only purpose I can see in asking Parliament to ratify a number of orders, none of which we have seen, is that by chance somewhere there is something which the ministry is not certain about and which they would like to have Parliament confirm. It is a great mistake for Parliament to be asked to legislate on anything in the dark and particularly on any matter which affects the relations of capital, labour, and the public in the relations of industry. We have here the question of hours and wages of labour, the question of prices paid for coal by consumers, the whole relations of capital to labour; orders to the number of over a hundred are issued by an officer, and we are asked to confirm and ratify those orders without seeing or knowing anything about them at all. If there is something amiss that the minister wants to have put right, let him tell us what it is, and if he gives us a satisfactory explanation, we shall confirm the action of this officer. But it is going too far to ask Parliament to confirm every one of these orders without any knowledge of what they are.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have heard of nothing amiss that requires any special ratification.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then why ask for ratification?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The matter is as plain as anything could be. These orders when made were all valid. They, perhaps, did not suit either side, and unless they had that validity, some parties on either side might not have lived up to them, and consequently the orders would have been valueless. If some did not live up to them, none could have done so. But as valid orders, they were acquiesced in by obedience on the part of both sides. With the fall of the War Measures Act, their efficacy vanishes. At all events the Justice Department takes the ground that they are very very doubtful, and consequently we have adopted the policy of legislative revivification in each case. That is what we are doing here. If they had not fallen they would have been in effect anyway, and would have been actually acted upon by both parties. Certainly the whole public is affected by the continued operation or the stoppage of the mines, but the parties immediately affected by the terms of the orders are the operators on the one hand, and the miners on the other. Now we ask that orders of that kind affecting immediately them only, settling disputes between them, in the settlement of which they acquiesce, orders that had validity during the currency of the War Measures Act, be continued in that validity until Parliament next session decides whether it wants them longer continued or not. I think all we need to know is that it is necessary now that the orders be continued. Otherwise there would be only friction and confusion in District No. 18. I do not think the executive, even a smaller body, would venture for a minute, after an order had been acquiesced in, to go to work and amend it saying: "We do not like that order; it is true you heard the case and settled it as between the parties and they acquiesced, but we know better than you; we will alter that order, and you must go to work under that altered order." The hon. member suggests that though the executive would not think of doing that, Parliament might do it and say: "You settled that order between the parties, and the parties acquiesced in it and are working under it; all is peace; but now we are going to change that order." Is that conceivable? I do not think it is. So to ask that the orders be brought down here and be examined is merely for the sake of delay, although the hon. member may not so intend it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am absolutely opposed to ratifying any order I have not seen that relates to a controversy between capital and labour. If the parties are in agreement, there is no necessity whatever for coming to Parliament for ratification of an order that has been made by an officer who has power to make that order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Though the parties may be in agreement, just as soon as there is no validity, is not somebody going to break the agreement? Of course there will be someone to do it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Exactly. The minister has the Tory point of view that all you have to have is the bludgeon of legislation or something of that kind to hold over the heads of labour to make them obey any orders that are given them. This compulsory method of dealing with industrial questions is not the method that is likely to produce good results in the long run.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Who is talking about compulsory methods?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister himself is talking about them—

Mr. MEIGHEN: You are dreaming.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:—when he speaks of having Parliament's authority for this or that. What he should be doing, instead of asking this Parliament to ratify a lot of orders and make agreements compulsory that ought to be voluntary in their nature, or else not exist at all, is to seek to get back on the statute book some of the laws for the freedom of the press and freedom of assembly which he has kept off the statutes up to the present time. I would ask the minister to bring these orders down before he asks the House to consider this section further. I think it is a proper request. I do not think we ought to be asked to go on with the legislation until we see what we are asked to do. Does the minister refuse to bring down the orders?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am prepared to have them all brought down to-morrow if there are other hon. members who would rather see these orders before proceeding further. I do not think it is vital at all. It appeals to me as a worthless delay, but if hon. members want to delay I am not going to go in the face of any substantial sentiment in that direction.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister may not think that the request of the leader of the Opposition, speaking in the name of the Opposition, amounts to anything, and if he likes to proceed in that high-handed and arbitrary manner he is quite at liberty to do so. I would like nothing better than to see him refuse to bring these orders down and get his following, who are ready to vote for anything he asks them to vote for, to support a series of orders, not one of which they have seen. I would like nothing better.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member might keep control of his temper a little better. I did not speak in the name of the Government in any way; I was simply giving my opinion. I did not know, and I do not know yet, that every hon. member on that side of the House feels with him any more than I know that every hon. member on this side of the House feels with me. I put myself in the hands of the committee. I do not think there is anything in the hon. member's request, but if it is the opinion of any substantial body of this committee I am quite prepared to defer the further discussion of this section.

Mr. ROBB: Is it possible that all the followers and supporters of the minister are now prepared to vote for a series of resolutions and orders concerning the price and hours of labour without knowing what they are voting for? Surely his supporters are not so subservient as that.

Mr. COWAN: These Orders in Council have been in effect a year or two and have given satisfaction to everybody. That is evidence enough for me.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We are not talking about Orders in Council at all.

Mr. COWAN: The Orders that have been passed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What we are discussing are orders given by the Director of Coal Operations, not one of which my hon. friend has seen or can tell us anything about.

Mr. COWAN: But I have seen the effect of them—and that is the important thing—and it has been mighty satisfactory to us.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am quite prepared to admit that orders that have been given at a particular time during the war may have had their beneficial effects, but it is one thing to pass an order to meet a particular situation and another thing to say that that order shall govern for a longer or indefinite period of time without giving the parties who are affected by it any apportunity to be heard.

Mr. COWAN: I would hate conditions to be upset out there at the present time. We have been getting along mighty well. The orders have evidently been entirely satisfactory, so why not let them continue until things get better settled?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If Parliament takes an arbitrary and high-handed attitude and says that certain orders shall have the effect of law and that men who do not obey them will be violating the laws of this country, if that is the way you are going to treat the working men of British Columbia or any other province I believe you will not have much rest out in the West or anywhere else.

Mr. McKENZIE: Those orders that have been passed before there was any question of the validity of the Orders in Council surely do not require any ratification at our hands. There may be some orders that have been passed since the war ceased and the validity of the Orders in Council might be questioned, but no ratification at all is required for the others, and I think the minister should distinguish between them. I have a very clear recollection of the legislation that was passed last year in connection with Commissioner Pringle's operations regarding newsprint. I took the ground at that time that legislation such as this was not necessary. The Bills were in charge of the then Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) and he agreed with me that the legislation was unnecessary but he said what the minister has just said, that the Department of Justice had decided otherwise, and he was therefore having the legislation put through. There must have been a period when there was no question of the validity of the Orders in Council, and perhaps that is true of three-quarters of the orders that we are asked to ratify. There may never have been any doubt as to their validity. I would not have so much objection to the minister asking us to ratify what has been done since the end of the war, and since the validity of the Orders in Council have been questioned, provided we have an opportunity of seeing at least some samples of these orders. I do not think it is fair to ask us to pass legislation when we do not know just what we are doing. Some of these Orders in Council may have been passed recently, and the workmen have no particular knowledge of their provisions. If they have not been tested by practical application, I think it would be unfortunate for us to pass an Act confirming those Orders in Council, or orders made by vitue of them, for they might be altogether unsatisfactory. Whether it is convenient or otherwise to the minister, I am sure the hon. gentleman will see the force and logic of the stand we take, and I do think that we should see samples of those orders so that every man on either side of the House, before committing himself in regard to this legislation, may know just what he is being asked to do.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I move that the committee rise and report progress.

Motion agreed to and progress reported.

SUPPLY.

House again in Committee of Supply, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Department of the Interior—salaries, $1,221,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Government has still to give us details of the Estimates in regard to Civil Government. I do not think we should proceed with this item.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Very well; we will go on to the Soldiers' Settlement Estimates.

Item stands.

|---|---|
| Soldiers' Settlement Estimate—Salaries of Board of Commissioners | $ 17,000 |
| Advances to soldiers settling upon the land and cost of administering The Soldiers' Settlement Acts of 1917 and 1919, including clerical assistance | 50,000,000 |
| | $50,017,000 |

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will the minister give the committee some explanation of these items?

[Mr. McKenzie.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: This matter was under consideration for nearly the whole of the afternoon on March 7th and a full explanation was given of the division of the moneys. The first item is for salaries, $7,000 and two amounts of $5,000 each. The sum of $50,000,000 consists of the following items:

|---|---|
| Expenses, supervising settlers, land appraisals, office contingencies, travelling and living expenses, etc. | $ 600,000 |
| Legal services and disbursements | 150,000 |
| Advisory Committees | 50,000 |
| Training centres, maintenance and general expenses including board prospective settlers, purchase stock, etc. | 150,000 |
| Printing and stationery | 50,000 |
| Advertising | 20,000 |
| Pay and Allowances | 100,000 |
| Salaries | 800,000 |
| Miscellaneous and unforseen expenses | 80,000 |
| Loans | 48,000,000 |

Mr. PARDEE: Do these loans cover land alone, or do they include cattle and implements?

Mr. MEIGHEN: They cover all. We hope to provide altogether for between fifteen and sixteen thousand men. The loans average from $3,000 to $3,500, inclusive of stock and implements.

Mr. PARDEE: What is the average advance per acre?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will give it by provinces:

| | Average cost per acre. |
|---|---|
| Prince Edward Island | 22.42 |
| Nova Scotia | 21.40 |
| New Brunswick | 16.69 |
| Quebec | 24.42 |
| Ontario | 33.02 |
| Manitoba | 22.31 |
| Saskatchewan— | |
| Regina | 18.53 |
| Saskatoon | 17.32 |
| Prince Albert | 17.98 |
| (Average for the province) | 18.00 |
| Alberta— | |
| Edmonton | 17.90 |
| Calgary | 18.38 |
| (Average for the province) | 18.13 |

For the whole Dominion the average cost per acre is $27.58 and the average acreage 140.5.

Mr. PARDEE: That is the average size of the farms held by the men?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. ROSS: In the statement which has been submitted there is an item of $800,000 for salaries. Is that in connection with the work of the board, and for wages to employees?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. ROSS: There is another item of $600,000. What is that for?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I could lecture for a long time on how few employees there are. Indeed, we are frequently criticised that we have not enough. It is very hard to get a basis to compare that with any other department. On a comparison of the number of men served by the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment it would only be a mere fraction. Of course the Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment is taking care of disabled men while the Land Settlement Board is taking care of men who are not disabled. We have 15,000 odd, or nearly 20,000 soldiers, to visit and supervise. One of the complaints dealt with by the Civil Re-establishment Committee during the last two weeks has been that our men do not visit them often enough. The hon. member will see that if we have nearly 20,000 men to locate and to follow in their farming operations from end to end of Canada we need some staff supervisors. I could give the exact number of each class but 1,500 is a very small number of men, including stenographers, and clerks of every kind in all the offices, and we have seventeen centres throughout the Dominion, and including the supervisors, valuators and so on. That number does not include the loan committees or advisory boards but includes every one else.

Mr. PARDEE: How many advisory boards are there?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There were seventeen, one for each of our offices.

Mr. PARDEE: Is that for the whole Dominion?

Mr. MEIGHEN: For the whole Dominion. There is not that number now. We have merged our advisory boards in our own executives at certain points, where we felt that we had an executive strong and capable enough to supersede them. We have done that at such places as Edmonton, Vancouver, Montreal and St. John.

Mr. PARDEE: Where in Ontario?

Mr. MEIGHEN: In Ontario we still have an advisory board at Toronto.

Mr. PARDEE: Just the one?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Just the one. We had two or three in Quebec but we have none at Montreal now. We still have an office there. We have an office at Sherbrooke and I believe we have an advisory board at Sherbrooke and one at Quebec.

Mr. PARDEE: Does the minister think that one advisory board is sufficient for Ontario? Taking the territory east, west and north of Toronto, can one advisory board discharge the duties properly? In Western Ontario there is a good deal of land not actually vacant but not cultivated to any greater extent than being used for pasturage. Does not the minister think that it would be wise to have an advisory board in Western Ontario that would encourage soldiers to make application for land of this character in that particular part of the province? Does the minister not think it would perhaps encourage applicants if there were a board closer at hand?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The expense of equipping an office is very great and you must have an office where you have your advisory board. If you could have merely an advisory board at an outside point the expense would not be so great but you cannot do that.

Mr. PARDEE: Why could you not have an office?

Mr. MEIGHEN: You are going to run off the track entirely if you have an advisory board, say, in North Bay and no office there in direct contact with the head office here. You must have your office wherever you have your advisory board. If not the inconvenience would be very great. In fact a man would have no advantage at all unless he had an office with which he was going to do business after the advisory board had made its recommendation and from which he could obtain assistance. The chairman informs me that it would be quite impracticable to establish another office as the cost of an office is very high. We are getting on pretty well in Ontario. Our office in Toronto is a good one. I would like the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) to call at the Toronto office. I do not care how early in the morning he gets there, he will find them open and hard at work. It is a most efficient office.

Mr. ROSS: How much has this Toronto office cost?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I can get that.

Mr. ROSS: I would like to know how these solicitors are chosen, from whom they are chosen, on whose advice, what fees they are paid and why only solicitors living in Toronto are paid to search land titles all over the province of Ontario.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I can get the figures of the cost of each office. The solicitors are appointed by the Department of Justice. They are returned men in every case, and they employ agents at different points in the country.

Mr. ROSS: I do not think they do that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Their bills are taxed by the Justice Department just the same as the bills for any other legal services. We adopt the scale of the Justice Department. We formerly had very lively controversies with some of the lawyers who thought they were not being sufficiently paid but we are departing from that system just as fast as we can and as a consequence we are reducing our legal expenses by a percentage that would almost startle the hon. gentleman. We are getting them down to a quarter of what it cost under the old system.

Mr. ROSS: Will my hon. friend let me know when he brings in his other items what the solicitors in Toronto were paid during the last fiscal year in connection with this year?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

At Six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess.

The committee resumed at Eight o'clock, Mr. Steele in the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Steele): When the committee rose at six o'clock we were considering item 275, Soldiers' Land Settlement, $50,017,000.

Mr. ROWELL: In the absence, Mr. Chairman, of the Minister of the Interior, who will not be able to be here for a short time, I beg to move that further consideration of this item be postponed, and that we take up item 271 relating to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Motion agreed to.

Royal Canadian Mounted Police, $4,674,066.40.

Mr. CAHILL: Was there a motion to go into Supply on this item?

Mr. ROWELL: Yes, Mr. Chairman, there was a motion to go into Supply on this item some three weeks ago—the night we discussed the appointment of a Canadian representative at Washington; and at the request of my hon. friends opposite further consideration of the item was postponed.

Mr. CAHILL: Will the minister explain why it is necessary to increase the Mounted Police and distribute them all over the Dominion?

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend will see that the vote proposed is not an increase on last year's vote. On the contrary, it is a decrease of that vote. But I am very glad to give my hon. friend information with reference to the position and work of the Force. The Act which was passed last year providing for the amalgamation of the Dominion Police and the Royal Northwest Mounted Police under the name of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police has been brought into force by proclamation since last session. That Act provided that the headquarters of the force should be moved from Regina to Ottawa, and on the 1st February, this year, the headquarters staff took up its work in this city. On the same day the amalgamation was completed, so that from the 1st February we have had one federal police force discharging its duties from the Atlantic to the Pacific and from the international boundary to the Arctic circle.

The strength of the force at present is 74 officers and 1,734 other ranks, making a total of 1,808; that is inclusive of the Dominion Police who are now members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. My hon. friend has asked as to the duties of the force. In the first place, it is the only police force responsible for seeing that the law is truly administered and enforced in the Northwest Territories, in the Yukon Territory and in the Dominion National Parks. In addition the force discharges important duties for all branches of the Federal Government in seeing that laws are duly observed in which the Federal Government is particularly interested by reason of those laws relating to the public revenue or to the other matters which I shall mention in a moment or two. First, in reference to the Department of Justice. If any Federal Government property is stolen, if any cheques on Government funds are forged,—any crimes in which the Government of Canada is directly interested—the case is turned over by the Department of Justice to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police for investigation and the bringing of the criminals to trial. Then, the members of the force on the international boundary have co-operated in the past, and are still co-operating, with the Customs officials in preventing smuggling. They are also working with the Department of Inland Revenue. This branch of the work, I have to admit, has somewhat increased during the past year or two.

Mr. CAHILL: From what cause?

Mr. ROWELL: The growth of illicit stills in certain districts.

Mr. CAHILL: The outcome of my hon. friend's legislation.

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend knows, like every other intelligent man, that wherever we have legislation dealing with the importation and sale of liquor there is a natural tendency to seek to evade the law by the establishment of illicit stills.

Mr. WHITE: Is the business of illicit stills increasing of decreasing?

Mr. ROWELL: At the present time I cannot give my hon. friend any information on that point,——

Mr. BURNHAM: It is at a standstill.

Mr. ROWELL: —but the Mounted Police are co-operating with the Department of Inland Revenue in preventing the violation of the law in connection with the establishment of illicit stills. They also co-operate with the Department of Indian Affairs in the enforcing of law on the Indian reserves, particularly the reserves in Western Canada. On almost every western reserve I think there is a detachment of the Mounted Police, and I am glad to say that the mere presence of members of the Force is in itself a guarantee that the law will be observed, for there is no class in the community which has a higher respect for the Mounted Police than have the Indians of Western Canada. From the time the Mounted Police went into Western Canada the Indians learned that they could trust the Force to deal fairly with them, and that the laws would be honestly and impartially enforced as between the Indian and the white man. The presence of the Mounted Police, therefore, in connection with the Indian reserves is very valuable in Western Canada.

The Mounted Police work with the Department of Immigration and Colonization on the international boundary during the past year of two has been of very considerable importance. Owing to the action taken in the United States with a view to deporting men whom they consider undesirable, there has been a natural tendency on the part of many of these men to seek an asylum in Canada, and for the protection of Canada against the coming in of men who would not be desirable, the Immigration Department have the assistance of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. The Force assist the Department of the Secretary of State in connection with an important branch of its work. Where application is made by aliens for naturalization in Canada, particularly in certain sections of the country, the application is referred to the Mounted Police for investigation, and they report on the facts of the case to the Secretary of State so that he may have full and accurate information in connection with all such applications. More recently —and this is a little departure from the general work that I have mentioned—the Department of Agriculture has asked the co-operation of the Mounted Police in enforcing the regulations which the department has recently adopted to prevent the spread of mange in Southern Alberta.

The foregoing will give the committee a general idea of the scope of the work of the Mounted Police in insisting upon the enforcement of federal laws. In addition to this, they constitute a reserve force available at the request of the provinces—and only at such request—to assist in the maintenance of law and order where the provincial authorities themselves are unequal to the task. Where the provincial authorities request co-operation and assistance for the preservation of law and order, the Mounted Police, as a federal force, is available to render that assistance. I think hon. members will agree that that assistance should be rendered by a police force rather than by the militia. I believe that in this matter that would be the general judgment of the people of Canada.

Mr. TWEEDIE: Have any cases arisen where requests for such assistance have been made?

Mr. ROWELL: Different cases have arisen, the most important case, of course, being the occasion when, at the request of the Attorney General of Manitoba, accompanied by the request of the Mayor of Winnipeg, the Mounted Police took part in the suppression of the riot which occurred in Winnipeg last summer. From other provinces also requests have come for the assistance of the Mounted Police, but the cases have not been of grave public moment as was the case that I have just mentioned. This brief statement will give the committee an idea of the work of the Mounted Police.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Do the Mounted Police act in connection with the Criminal Code in a province where there are provincial police?

Mr. ROWELL: No. In any province in connection with any matter outside the federal laws to which I have made reference they act only on the express request of the Attorney General of the province. In the absence of that request no action is taken by the Mounted Police. That is our understanding with all the provinces, because the provinces are responsible for the administration of criminal law. They should not be relieved from that esponsibility, and there is no intention on the part of this Government to relieve them from it. Therefore, if there is, in a given province, any defect in the administration of the criminal law, that province alone is responsible for it.

Mr. CAMPBELL: If, in a place where Mounted Police were stationed and there were no provincial police, an infraction of the Criminal Code took place, would the Mounted Police ignore the matter altogether?

Mr. ROWELL: In such a case it would be the duty of any ordinary civilian to assist in the detection of crime; to that extent it would be the duty of the Mounted Police officer to do so. But in respect to any offence such as my hon. friend has mentioned, no duty rests up the Mounted Police officer that does not rest equally on all other citizens in the particular community who have knowledge of the facts. I can quite conceive that my hon. friend might say: Well there is a policeman there; a crime has been committed; should he not undertake the work of arrest? But if that were done you would at once come in conflict with the provincial authorities who are responsible; you would either interfere with their work or relieve them from a measure of their responsibility. So the principle I have indicated is not departed from in the administration of the law.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: When the Mounted Police assist the provincial authorities on the request of the Attorney General of the province, is any proportion of the expense borne by the province, or is it met exclusively by the Dominion treasury?

Mr. ROWELL: So far, it has been met exclusively by the Dominion treasury. There is very little increased expense in that respect, because the force is in existence; their pay and subsistence must continue whether they are assisting the provincial forces or not. The Federal Government, therefore, has not felt called upon to demand compensation of the provinces in such cases.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In cases where the militia are called in to assist, the expenses are met, are they not, by the local or provincial authorities?

Mr. ROWELL: When members of the militia, composed of men engaged in their ordinary occupations, are called out for such service they must be paid, and as that is a new charge upon the federal exchequer, the province that requests their assistance pays the costs. That is the general principle, as I understand it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does my hon. friend not think that it might be advisable to adopt that principle, at least to a certain extent, with regard to this police force? It seems to me that unless that is done the provincial authorities may find it convenient to use the police to the exclusion of their own forces whenever it suits their convenience.

Mr. ROWELL: If we discover any tendency of that kind I think it would be a wise thing to do, because Parliament would not be justified in relieving the provinces from the responsibility that properly rests upon them for the administration of law and the preservation of peace within their respective territories. We have not found, however, up to date, any serious difficulty in that respect; the demands that have been made for assistance are not numerous.

Mr. MORPHY: As I understand it, there seems to be fear of clashing jurisdiction as between the Ontario—we will say— or Quebec, police, and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I think I heard the minister say that only upon the request of the Attorney General of a province would the Mounted Police act. Well, I can conceive of a situation where a crime has been committed; the Mounted Police officer gets word of it, but he has no responsibility in the matter; he has no authority to act.

It would be his duty, I presume, to remain silent, quiet. If that be the case, because of the Mounted Policeman lacking in the right to be a preserver of the peace, knowing that his duty was not to interfere with provincial officers and being doubtful about trespassing beyond his duty, the crime goes unpunished probably on account of the time within which some police officer who has the duty, would learn of the crime. It seems to me, that, especially in the East, where the Mounted Policemen are quartered, they would in many cases, be much more likely to be on the alert for criminal practices than some of our provincial police. If the full services which these men can render are to be taken advantage of, some arrangement should be made short of the Attorney General's request for their co-operation, so that the very fact that the Canadian Mounted Police are in our midst would be an additional safety to the public against crime, providing there was an understanding with the provinces that they should accept the kind offices of the Mounted Police,—if you like to put it that way—and permit them to have carte blanche to pursue and arrest a criminal and to do the work a policeman would have to do in any well-organized community. I do not know how seriously the Canadian Mounted Police are involved in arduous duties; but many, I think, would like an opportunity to do a little more at times, rather than do a little less. I do not think any extra expense would be entailed if this Government were to approach the Provincial Governments with a suggestion that, while the Canadian Mounted Police are intended for Indian Affairs, forgery, as one federal crime, enforcement of law along the international boundary, and such like, still there are many crimes which do not fall within these categories and in which the Mounted Police would be very useful. It would be very proper for the Government to approach the Provincial Governments and say: We offer you the services of these men for the better order of the community; in that way probably showing to the country at large the excellent services—excellent, I believe, beyond those of the average provincial police—that these men could render to the country at large.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I have nothing but words of commendation for the excellent services rendered by the Northwest Mounted Police since its creation in the Northwest. Subject to correction, however, I do not see why the Northwest Mounted Police was removed from the West to the East. It is true that, under ordinary circumstances, I would understand that anything which is dependent upon political control should be centralized at Ottawa; but the very name of the Northwest Mounted Police suggests that it is a body of men organized to maintain law and order in the far districts of the West. For over forty years, that body has rendered most valuable assistance, and the name and the uniform of the Mounted Police meant that law and order were under their safeguard and protection. In fact, the name of the Northwest Mounted Police has reverberated beyond our Canadian shores, and any one who travels abroad hears quite frequently of the efficiency of that body. One has only to read the reports published from year to year by the Superintendent of the Mounted Police to know the valuable services rendered by that body in the past. Whenever I meet those fine young fellows walking with a jaunty air on the streets of Ottawa, I ask myself why they have been taken from the plains of the West where they represented law and order and sent to Ontario where we have a strong body of provincial police, in addition to having a strong body of provincial police in Quebec, and similar bodies in the other eastern provinces. During the period of the war, when the Government had some drastic legislation to carry out in connection with military service and such business, I could understand that the Government would strengthen the arm of the law for the carrying out of such policies, and I would not begrudge the help that might, under such circumstances, be given by the Northwest Mounted Police to the federal authorities. But now that war is over and all such troubles are past, I do not see why we maintain at such a high cost, this body of fine young fellows at Ottawa. Their place is in the vast solitudes of the West, on the prairies, where they can maintain, as they have done heretofore, British law and order.

It is a source of surprise for many people that, now that peace is restored, the Government should not reduce expenditure. My hon. friend might, perhaps, say: Well, we are threatened with strikes, if not with riots resulting from strikes. Thank Heaven, in the East at least, we have passed through the ordeal of the last two years quite well. We had no strikes of such magnitude as that which took place, for instance, in Winnipeg —and I have the highest regard for the citizens of that city who took the law into their own hands when the days of danger came. But in out great industrial centres in the East—Toronto, Hamilton, London, even Ottawa, Montreal, Quebec, Sydney, Halifax, St. John—where has there been any necessity for maintaining law and order with the aid of the Northwest Mounted Police? Under former conditions, before the Mounted Police were called to Ottawa, they did their duty splendidly, and the provincial police and the municipal police were sufficient to cope with any difficulties which might arise in the East. Moreover, in case of a strike of great magnitude, or extensive rioting, the militia organization can always be relied on, and a municipality in which a strike or a riot takes place is responsible for the expenditure involved in calling out the militia organization. In view of the large expenditure that we necessarily have to face and the taxation measures imposed by this House in order to meet our war liabilities, I would ask my hon. friend if in his judgment—and I am sincere in appealing to his better judgment—we should not decrease the expenditure on the Northwest Mounted Police. In the East where we have law and order, where we have cherished traditions, and where we have no large bodies of foreigners who have to be kept in check at times because they ignore the law and perhaps import ideas which are not those of the East, the Northwest Mounted Police is not needed. Not that I disparage the efficiency of the corps or the high sense of duty of the men. I have paid enough compliments to the Northwest Mounted Police to justify me in saying that they are more needed in the far West where they are more likely to come in contact with and guide the foreigners who have gone out there. Once more on behalf of the taxpayers of Canada, I appeal to my hon. friend to reduce substantially this expenditure. I do not know that the Royal Northwest Mounted Police is needed in the East, but they are needed in the West, and I would welcome their return to the West. The centralizing of the Northwest Mounted Police at Ottawa involves a large expenditure which in my judgment is unnecessary.

Mr. COWAN: I never hear the Royal Northwest Mounted Police mentioned in this House but I feel that I ought to say something about them. I cannot agree with the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) in two objections he has taken to the Northwest Mounted Police and their re-establishment. He objects, first, on the ground of the expenditure involved. Let me say to him that I believe that the re-establishment of the Northwest Mounted Police on its present basis was one of the most economical things this Government has ever done. No matter what we may think of the situation here in the East, we have to continue the Royal Northwest Mounted Police in order to police the Yukon. It is utterly impossible to do without them. We could, of course, increase the subsidy to the Yukon so as to enable them to employ a number of men as reinforcements, but that would be saddling an enormous expenditure on a small population. Then there is the Athabasca country, which is now coming largely into population. There is already a stream of prospectors going into that oil country, and there is no question at all but what in a year or two the population of that territory will be substantially increased. We must maintain law and order there or abandon our attempt to uphold the traditions of the British Empire in this Dominion. It is therefore necessary for us to retain the Northwest Mounted Police. What does that mean? It means that headquarters will be at Ottawa as they always have been, because although we have had a headquarters at Regina, the city to which I am proud to belong, the Comptroller has always lived here, and Ottawa has been the real headquarters. So we must maintain the Royal Northwest Mounted Police, and a department here with a headquarters staff, no matter how the force is disposed, and that accounts for the major portion of the cost which has to be incurred. Having that force, and that department, and that cost, what could be more economical than that this Government should unite the force with the Dominion Police and thereby avoid duplication? We have had the Dominion Police in Eastern Canada. You people in Eastern Canada are not so desperately good that you do not need a policeman once in a while. We know you do. The only difference is that in the East the policemen go around as plain clothes detectives, because the people down there are a great deal more cunning in their crimes. Our redcoat in the West is a great deal more respected than any Dominion policeman in plain clothes in the East. As we have to maintain the Northwest Mounted Police why not combine the two forces and avoid duplicate expense, and have the one force perform all the duties which the President of the Privy Council has indicated, making it a Dominion force, with the name of Royal Canadian Mounted Police? To me it seems a real step in the direction of economy which had to be taken, and I am very glad the Government has taken it.

Mr. BUTTS: I am going to ask the minister to re-consider whether it is well to extend the Mounted Police at least to the province of Nova Scotia. I have been magistrate, sometimes I have been called judge, of a town of between 9,000 and 10,000 people. We never had need of Mounted Police down there, and we have no need of them now. I can remember distinctly sitting down one time and writing an article for the press showing that from the 1st of January until the 8th of the following December there had never been one person in gaol in my town of over 9,000 people. I remember also stating in that article that I knew of 21 foreign languages that were spoken in that town.

Mr. WHITE (Victoria, Alta.): There is no law against that.

Mr. NICHOLSON (Algoma): Gaelic, too?

Mr. BUTTS: Yes, Gaelic and all the rest. Why do we want the Mounted Police down in our country? We do not want them, and this House will be doing an injustice to Canada if they send them down there and pay them for nothing, for that is the way I regard it. They are to be sent down there, I am told, to watch smugglers, to prevent them smuggling booze in from St. Pierre and Miquelon. I suppose there is not one single Royal Northwest Mounted policeman that ever saw a supful of salt water, and they are to be sent down there to watch smugglers on the Atlantic seaboard. Childishness! I hope the minister will see the childishness of taking men from the plains of the West and sending them down to the breakers of the Atlantic. If you want Royal Northwest Mounted policemen down there for that purpose, let us get them in Nova Scotia and train them. Do not send hayseeds from away across the plains down to Nova Scotia.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BUTTS: I have been orderly too long. I have listened too long to that colony over there that has been charging us $15.75 a barrel for flour down in our country. Now, Sir, so far as the Northwest Mounted Police are concerned, I am going to ask the minister to "forget it." I hope he will send none of them down into our part of the country for they will not conform to our police customs, and I say this as a magistrate of seventeen years' experience in a town of 10,000 people. I know whereof I speak.

An hon. MEMBER: What town?

Mr. BUTTS: Sydney Mines. I say that it is dangerous to send them there. I speak for 73,000 people in Cape Breton, and I can say that they will not appreciate any such intrusion. If the Government sends the Mounted Police down there those men will not only be unappreciated but they will be regarded as intruders, and trouble will ensue. I want to remind my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) and my hon. friend from Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux), who were both members of the last Government, that we had a big strike on the part of the coal miners in Glace Bay, a town of some 17,000 or 18,000 people, and in addition there was what might almost be called a sympathetic strike in the city of Sydney, where there are some 25,000 or 26,000 people. At the same time there existed in Sydney Mines all the sympathy that could be evinced in a sympathetic strike. So that altogether there were over 50,000 people involved in the disturbance. Do hon. gentlemen opposite remember what happened? Do they remember Mr. E. M. Macdonald—what at the time was member for Pictou county—in connection with this affair? If hon. gentlemen do not remember this thing they can go into the library and Hansard will show them what Mr. Macdonald said, and they will find reference to Mr. Plummer of the Dominion Iron and Steel Company. I see my hon. friend from Maisonneuve smile; he will remember that. These are things which it is well that the country should recall from time to time. When all these matters are recalled my hon. friends opposite will think, and no doubt they will realize that the country is thinking.

Mr. WHITE (Victoria, Alta.): It is a new experience to find some one getting up in the House and making the statement that the Royal Northwest Mounted Police are not needed in Canada. However, I think there is a good deal to be said in regard to the remarks made by my hon. friend, (Mr. Butts), and although I am always glad to see that the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Cowan) always champions my old comrades of the Northwest Mounted Police, I cannot entirely endorse his remarks when he says that they are the most economic force that has ever been organized for the maintenance of peace in any country. My hon. friend knows as well as I do that long ago, when their duties were more numerous and arduous than they are to-day, when they kept the peace and looked after the safety and welfare of the country, maintaining the observance of all the laws of the Criminal Code, there were far fewer men in the force than to-day and the expense was less than one-tenth of what we are asked to vote now. I can remember that up to the year 1914 their duties included the work that is now done provincially in the three western provinces as well as in the Yukon. They discharged their federal duties as well as those duties which are now discharged by the provincial police, and the work was done with about one-third fewer men and at one-tenth of the present cost. The question to-day is whether they are needed. We know that so long as the Mounted Police are kept up in Canada under the present organization they will do their duty and do it well. But, as my hon. friend from Maisonneuve has asked, is it necessary at this time to add nearly $4,000,000 to the expense in connection with the maintenance of this organization while the duties of the men have been reduced by over one-half? That is an important question. Another thing about which not only I but, I think, all old members of the Mounted Police complain, is the fact that these men are now deputed to perform different duties from those which they should properly discharge, and instead of being maintained to enforce law and order, they are used as strike-breakers and put to other work which formerly they were never called upon to do. And after the splendid record which they have made for themselves during the last forty years they are in great danger of losing caste and having the honour which they won by reason of long and meritorious service detracted from. I think it would have been a great deal better, when the Government decided to have a constabulary of this kind, had they disbanded the old Mounted Police and allowed them to retire with the credit they had already established for themselves. The Government could then have organized a new force somewhat similar to the old one, so that there might be no danger, by reason of an amalgamation of veterans and new men, that the record of the old Mounted Police might be in any way dimmed. I cannot see any use in retaining the old name, and there have been more harsh criticisms of the Mounted Police in the last two years than there were thirty-five or forty years ago. My hon. friend (Mr. Butts) says that he does not see any necessity for it, and I agree with him. If one-third of the number of men now in the Force could control the West and do the work of the provincial police, besides maintaining law and order and looking after the business of the Justice and other departments, I do not see the necessity for increasing the Force or removing it to the eastern part of the country, where, according to my hon. friend, it is not wanted. It is a great expense to the country and there is danger that the Force will perhaps lose some of the credit that it now has all over this country for the good work that it has done in the past.

[Mr. White.]

Mr. ROWELL: There is one remark the hon. gentleman has made which I wish to deal with at once to prevent misapprehension. The hon. gentleman said that the Mounted Police had been used for strike work. That is not correct. The Mounted Police have not been used for strike work or as strike-breakers to my knowledge, which covers the last two and a half years, and I do not believe they were ever so used.

Mr. WHITE (Victoria, Alta.): All I can say to the minister, then, is that they have been badly reported. It was claimed that they broke the strike at Winnipeg.

Mr. ROWELL: I am quite aware that there are some who have made false statements in the press and on the platform in regard to the Mounted Police. I am glad my hon. friend has mentioned it because it gives me an opportunity of flatly contradicting the statement. They did not break the strike in Winnipeg. All they did was to suppress the riot and prevent most serious bloodshed and disturbance when called upon by the provincial police to do so.

Mr. WHITE (Victoria, Alta.): They dispersed the mob.

Mr. ROWELL: They did disperse the mob.

Mr. WHITE (Victoria, Alta.): That is what I meant.

Mr. ROWELL: —and saved the situation in the city of Winnipeg. Had it not been for the Mounted Police Force in the city of Vancouver during the troublesome months last year I do not know that that city would have been as quiet and peaceable as it was during that period. Our opinion is that the presence of the Mounted Police in Vancouver had a most beneficial effect, although they were not called upon to take any direct action in connection with the preservation of order. In addition to what I have said of the work of the Mounted Police in Winnipeg, they did protect the post office officials who stayed at their posts discharging their duty when efforts were made to intimidate them and to prevent them from discharging their duty and carrying out their oath of fealty to this country. The Mounted Police afforded them protection at that time. The Mounted Police did not act as strike-breakers in any city.

Just one word in answer to my hon. friend from Cape Breton South and Richmond (Mr. Butts). If we always had as good judges or even presiding magistrates as my hon. friend makes we probably would not need any police in any portion of the country. But that would be too much to expect. The fact is that we have no more federal police in the province of Nova Scotia now than we had in the past. The Dominion Police, with headquarters at Ottawa, have always had police in Nova Scotia, and the amalgamated force still have police there. The police in Nova Scotia are in the city of Halifax, where the military magazines and naval stores are, and this Government protects that property by Dominion Police.

Mr. STEVENS: I do not rise to criticise in any way the items before the committee nor to criticise this Force. In fact, I am only too glad to state that in my opinion the Government have done wisely in not only preserving but in extending the scope and influence of this magnificent body of police. I have watched them and their activities in Western Canada for the last twenty-five years, and I have no hesitancy in saying that there is no group of police officers which goes about its duty so coolly and so efficiently as does the Royal Northwest Mounted Police or the new force called the Royal Canadian Police. But I would remind the minister of the subject that I have brought to his attention, and the attention of the House on, I think, three different occasions, and that is the total inadequacy of the pensions to old members of the Force who retired some years ago and, indeed, in recent years. This very meagre pension, admitted by all, admitted in a former debate by the minister (Mr. Rowell) to be exceedingly small, has left a great many of these veterans in a hopeless and almost helpless position to-day. I mentioned this matter, as I have already said, in some detail on several occasions. I am going to remind the minister of the statement which he made on one occasion when I brought the question to the attention of the House, and I am going to claim from him now some effort to fulfil the assurance that he gave. I and other hon. members had spoken in regard to it, and on March 12 last the minister said:

> I appreciate what the hon. member has said, and what other hon. members have said in support of his suggestion,—

That is regarding increased pensions to the veterans of the North West Mounted Police.

> —and I am quite prepared to bring the matter to the attention of my colleagues and ask that it be further considered. Certain facts have been brought out this afternoon indicating conditions of greater hardship than had hitherto been presented to me in connection with this matter.

We have in this statement the admission of the minister that there was new information, new evidence of the need and fairness of this movement, and also the assurance that he would discuss it with his colleagues. I took the opportunity, on two occasions or more since then, to bring the matter personally to the attention of the minister and to ask that he give it his attention and consideration. In addition to that there was filed with the minister a petition or statement from the Northwest Mounted Police Veterans' Association of Canada setting forth very clearly the hardships they were suffering and making a request for a very reasonable increase in their pension. I do not wish to go over all this ground again but I am going to again request the minister to give us, if possible, a definite assurance at this time that an increase in pension, which is expected and for which an assurance has already been given, may be granted in the near future.

Mr. KNOX: I would like to add a few words to what has been said by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) with reference to the pensioners of the police force. I have been intimately in touch with these men for upwards of thirty years and I know that many of them, although they have borne the burden and heat of the day, have not had an opportunity of building up homes for themselves. To-day many of them have passed the stage in life where they can do very much work and the meagre pension which they are getting is insufficient to keep body and soul together. A number of these men are only getting fifty cents per day. Imagine a man trying to maintain himself on $15 a month in these days! At the time of the Northwest Rebellion these men did not get the land grant which was made to the military forces, and many of them think they were discriminated against in that respect. I do not wish to discuss the Force as it stands to-day further than to say that many people in the western provinces think that the old name should have been retained; but I do not want to put myself on record in that respect; rather I am trying to secure something for these men whom I know to be deserving, and I heartily endorse what my hon. friend has said.

Mr. WHITE (Victoria, Alta.): Is the minister bringing in a special vote for pensions at some subsequent date, or are they included in this vote?

Mr. ROWELL: The pensions are included in this vote.

Mr. WHITE: Then I might say a few words in support of my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens), who has taken the matter up on two or three previous occasions. Some years ago I communicated with the Government in connection with it, but I never succeeded in accomplishing anything for the men concerned. Since the matter was brought before the House some time ago by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre an ex-Sergeant-Major of the Mounted Police called on me here for assistance. He had served twenty years in the Force, most of the time as a Sergeant-Major, and to-day he was trying to live on a pension of $18 a month. He was willing to take any position, even that of door-keeper in this building, to supplement his pension and make enough to live on. Not only was he a member of the Northwest Mounted Police, but he was also a veteran of the '85 Rebellion, and he also served as a transport driver in the South African war, rendering splendid service on all occasions, as his rank would denote; yet here is this man at 60 years of age trying to live on $18 a month! His name is Desbarres, and he is at present employed by the Militia Department at Petawawa Camp, I believe, acting as telephone boy or something of that sort. I think it is a shame that a man who has given such good service to his country should in his old age be asked to live on such a mere pittance. That is only one case. I know of other men who have served just as faithfully, but were not fortunate enough to reach the rank of Sergeant-Major, and they to-day are trying to live on $8 to $12 a month—men who have arrived at the age of 60 or 70 years. We find those men all over the Territories. I know there are a good many of them in the constituency of my hon. friend from Prince Albert (Mr. Knox), and I know there are some in my own riding. In spite of all our attempts in this House we have never been able to secure for these men a decent pension or a bonus. To-day we are giving pensions as high as $700 a year to our returned soldiers, and in many cases these veterans are just as helpless as our disabled soldiers. I hope that the minister will take this into consideration and see if it is not possible either to increase the pensions of these men or give them such a bonus that they will be no longer objects of charity. As was pointed out by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, at the time of the Northwest Rebellion, when all the militiamen received scrip, although some of them never left the East, the Mounted Police were not similarly rewarded. They complain, and quite justly, that although they have been perhaps more highly praised than any other military organization in Canada, when it comes down to getting something tangible for their services, or even fair play, they have never succeeded in securing the same treatment as has been accorded to others serving in similar capacities. When the matter was brought up by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre on the Estimates last year, although it took the minister (Mr. Rowell) some three hours to describe the glorious record of the Force, it did not take him, I noticed, more than three minutes to assure the hon. member that his request for further assistance to the men could not possibly be met. It is no wonder that these fine old veterans are tired of praise and have reached the conclusion that something that will keep them out of the poorhouse would be more to the purpose.

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend in his later remarks has evidently been drawing upon a very vivid imagination. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre has correctly stated what took place when he brought the matter up a year ago. He has been indefatigable in presenting it to my attention and to the attention of the Government on behalf of these veterans of the Mounted Police, and other hon. members have also helped. I have taken occasion since the matter came up before to look into the question further, and I have come to the conclusion that there has been no sufficient ground why the Mounted Police should not have been treated in the same way as the members of the regular forces who fought in the Northwest. Requests have also been presented to the Government such as my hon. friend from Victoria, Alta. (Mr. White) has just referred to, the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Buchanan) and other hon. members on both sides of the House have presented the matter to me very earnestly. I may say that within the past two weeks I asked the Commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to report on both these questions. I received his final report on Saturday, and it is my intention to bring the whole matter before my colleagues when we come to consider the Supplementary Estimates for this session, to see if something cannot be done to remove what I think is an obvious hardship. I do not think I can say anything more than that to-night, because I have not yet had an opportunity of consulting my colleagues since I received the final report from the Commissioner.

Mr. CAHILL: While I have no objection to an increase in the scale of pensions to ex-members of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police, I have very serious objection to continuing this large force in Eastern Canada. In 1910 the pay of this force was $283,000, as compared with $2,355,000 to-day, and the increase in maintenance is in about the same proportions. We are spending to-day for this force over $4,000,000 more than we did ten years ago, and the force really has less to do now than it had then. The other morning I saw some ninety-five of these men, mounted, pass my house on Metcalfe street. They are a fine body of men, but it occurred to me that they could be more usefully employed planting potatoes than in riding around in red coats in Ot, tawa, Montreal, or any of our eastern cities. There is absolutely no need for them; no person has asked for them. The minister and the Government may have thought that they would need them when they brought down this Budget, but I think they can do very well without them. The minister should consider saving this $4,000,000 and let the Mounted Police go back to the work they were intended to do when they were organized, and the work they did do so well. Instead of hunting for worms, let them get back to the fishing that they are required to do. The minister tells that they are hunting for stills now. Well, that is not a proper occupation for these men; you can get other men for that work. The ordinary militia of Canada has largely increased over what it was in 1913-14; they are just as well able to look after the affairs of the country now as they were then. This wild rioting, and striking, and unrest, is more in the minds of the Ministry than it is in the minds of the people. All the people are clamouring for is an election which will enable them to get rid of the Ministry; if they could get rid of the Ministry they would be glad to get rid of the Mounted Police; we need neither very badly. You are wasting $4,000,000 of the people's money, placing a burden of taxation upon them that is absolutely unnecessary. I had hoped that instead of coming back with this item this year the minister would have decreased this force and demobilized it as fast as possible, retaining a sufficient number of men to carry on the work that the Mounted Police were intended for and in which they were so useful. Instead the Government is burdening the taxpayer with the cost of having these men ride around our eastern cities as a show proposition for the President of the Council. I hope that this item will not pass.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In the Estimates for the Public Works Department there is an item of half a million dollars for Royal Canadian Mounted Police building. This item was held over the other evening because the Acting Minister of Public Works (Mr. J. D. Reid) was not familiar with the details. Perhaps my hon. friend would give us now some idea of what is intended in that expenditure.

Mr. ROWELL: I did not know that the item had stood over as my hon. friend states. Perhaps it would be better to take it up after we have finished with this one.

Mr. FIELDING: Was there not at one time an arrangement between the Dominion and the Western Provincial Governments whereby the expenses of this force were divided?

Mr. ROWELL: There was such an arrangement, which continued from the formation of the western provinces until 1916 when, owing to the conditions then prevailing in the West, it was considered desirable that the arrangement should be terminated and that the force, which at that time was considerably depleted because of the number of its members who had gone overseas, should devote its whole time to the work of the Federal Government. At that time, which was before the United States entered the war, the patrolling of the international boundary and the exercising of certain supervision over elements in the alien population in Western Canada were considered of such importance that the agreements were terminated. Thereafter the Mounted Police ceased to exercise general jurisdiction in criminal matters and the western provinces then took over the enforcement of the criminal law.

Mr. FIELDING: I can see where the Government have experienced a difficulty in this matter, with which I have a measure of sympathy. There is no logical reason—if we are simply to be logical—why this force should exist any longer; yet I should hate to accept that as a conclusion, because, it is a magnificent force; it has played a splendid part in the history of Canada. I regretted even to see its name qualified in the recent legislation. So long as it was doing service in our unsettled country there was no question as to the need of its services or the value of them. But with the development of the country and the creation of the provinces a new condition arose, and I imagine that the Government found themselves faced with this problem: Why should we maintain a police force for Manitoba, Alberta, and Saskatchewan and not for New Brunswick and Nova Scotia? I imagine it is out of that difficulty that we have had that new legislation whereby the force is now amalgamated with the Dominion Police. I can even imagine that the Government have tried in some way to keep the force in existence, and in that connection I am sentimental enough to dislike the idea of its being demobilized. Yet, with the creation of the provinces and with the development of Municipal and Provincial Governments who have all the resources of civilization at their command there is no longer any need for the Mounted Police. The Yukon might need it, perhaps, but there is hardly room for a very large force out there, and in the Northwest Territories I suppose there is not enough population to require very much attention along that line. I wish that we could find some useful service for the Mounted Police. I recall an incident which illustrates the value of the work which they performed in the early days in Canada. On one occasion when I was in England I met a very distinguished Englishman who had just returned from Canada, and I was asking what had impressed him most during the course of his visit. After a moment's thought he said: "Well, what impressed me most was the manner in which British law and British justice had been stamped on that new country in the far West,"—and that was the work of the Northwest Mounted Police. I do hope that the Government can find some proper work for this force to do. I do not like to see them wasting their time around Eastern Canada because it is not the work they were intended for. It is not the work that the men themselves like. They are doing it because they are asked to do it, not because they love it; not because it is consistent with their splendid history.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In the items of other departments of Government the details are set out at much greater length than they are in connection with this item. When we are asked to vote $4,000,000 I think we are entitled to more details of expenditure than are given here.

Mr. ROWELL: The item as brought down is, I believe, in the same form as has prevailed for many years, probably from the time the force was established.

Mr. BUREAU: But there has been an increase of $3,000,000.

Mr. ROWELL: I shall be pleased to give my hon. friend the details. The item is made up as follows: Pay of force, $2,355,-929.15; subsistence, $554,982.50; billetting, $206,875; forage and dog feed, $339,687.25.

Mr. BUREAU: For dog feed—$339,000.

Mr. ROWELL: Forage and dog feed, that is, forage for the horses and food for the dogs required in the North country. Fuel and light, $116,782.50; clothing, $300,000; repairs and renewals, $144,200.

Mr. BUREAU: Repairs and renewals of what?

Mr. ROWELL: Buildings of the Mounted Police in various parts of Canada.

Mr. BUREAU: Are those buildings going to be done away with when we get the $500,-000 for new buildings at Ottawa?

Mr. ROWELL: No, this relates to other buildings entirely.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think this must relate to clothing, because there is an item further down for building repairs.

Mr. ROWELL: I will first give the main items that go to make up this amount and then I will give the details of repairs and renewals. Horses, $78,540.

Mr. BUREAU: Is that for the purchase of horses?

Mr. ROWELL: Yes. My hon. friend is aware that the Mounted Police, with the exception of the Dominion Police in Ottawa, is a mounted force.

Mr. BUREAU: I asked the question because the feed of the horses has been provided for, so that this item of $78,540 must be for remounts.

Mr. ROWELL: Purchase of remounts, yes. Ammunition, $5,420; stationery and drugs, $50,000; transport and freight, $250,-000; building repairs, $34,050; contingencies, $55,000; criminal investigation branch, $177,600; compensation, $5,000. That is compensation to men injured in the service.

Mr. BUREAU: It is very little.

Mr. ROWELL: It is a sum out of which grants are made in case a man is injured in the service. This makes a total of $4,674,066.40. The item of repairs and renewals to which my hon. friend refers relates to repairs of autos, trucks, motor cycles, motor boats, barrack furniture, horse equipment, etc. I will give the details if my hon. friend wishes.

Mr. CAHILL: Building repairs?

Mr. ROWELL: No. This is equipment. The building item is a separate one.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: How many autos?

Mr. ROWELL: Running expenses and upkeep of 28 autos and trucks. That includes trucks used for transport in connection with the force in the West.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Has the minister the details of the item "pay of force, $2,355,929.15"?

Mr. ROWELL: I will give my hon. friend all the details if he wishes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. ROWELL:

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is the minister reading what it is estimated will be necessary for the coming year?

Mr. ROWELL: Yes. As a matter of fact, that was the estimate at the time these estimates were prepared but I am in hopes that we will not require that amount by, perhaps, a couple of hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: One of the items was twenty acting assistant surgeons. What is an acting assistant surgeon and why have twenty of them?

Mr. ROWELL: Instead of appointing regular surgeons, that is, whole-time men, to the force at all the posts, it has been found more economical to appoint what is called an Acting Assistant Surgeon; that is, a man who is not required to give his whole time, but is required to render all the medical service required for the force stationed in that particular locality. He is paid $1,000 for that service.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does he need both titles, "Acting" and "Assistant"?

Mr. ROWELL: He is only acting. If he were Assistant he would be a full-time officer, of full commissioned rank, with all that pertains thereto. He would be entitled to be put on the strength with full pay and allowances.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I wish very briefly to emphasize the points made by my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's. I have the highest possible regard for the Royal Northwest Mounted Police, and I would be very sorry indeed if the old members of that force were not looked after by the Government, but I have not been convinced by what the minister has stated this evening of the necessity of maintaining the corps in Eastern Canada at least. My genial friend from Regina (Mr. Cowan) is right when he states that in the far Athabaska district and the Yukon there is urgent need for the presence of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police. This only emphasizes what I stated earlier this evening, that the corps is not needed at all in Eastern Canada, but should be sent back to Western Canada in reduced numbers, and of course reducing the numbers would decrease materially the expenditure. I am not at all satisfied with the explanation given by the minister. He did not even promise Parliament that next year the expenditure would be decreased. We are asked to vote an item of over $4,000,000 under this head this year, without any assurance that the amount will be materially decreased next year, although the people of this country are pressed so hard to-day by taxes and supertaxes in order to maintain our credit and meet the heavy financial commitments of the country. My hon. friend is not fair to the House. He does not justify this expenditure, at least as far as Eastern Canada is concerned. Four million dollars is a great deal of money. It could be applied, for instance, to the pension fund. Our soldiers are complaining bitterly that they have not received sufficient compensation from the Government for the services they rendered abroad. Their families are clamouring for an increase in the small pension which is being handed out to them. Every member of the House receives letters every day complaining of the small pensions, yet here we are asked to spend $4,000,000 and over, for practically no useful purpose as far as Eastern Canada is concerned. I repeat that in Western Canada, even in the organized provinces where the distances are so great, the presence of the corps is justified because law and order must be maintained at all costs, and of course, the force is also required in the unorganized districts. My hon. friend could cut this item in two if he were really imbued with the necessity of reducing expenditure, but the spirit does not move him. He asks us to pass this item of over $4,000,000 when there is such a crying need for reduction in expenditures, and he does not even state that next year he will materially decrease the amount. I am sorry the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) is not here. We all listened with rapt attention to his speech in delivering the annual Budget to the House, in which he distinctly promised that in view of the large taxation Bill which he was imposing on the Canadian people the expenditure of the Government would be reduced to the lowest possible point. If he were here, I should like to ask him what he has to say about this expenditure of $4,000,000.

Mr. CRERAR: I should like to ask the minister in charge of these Estimates how the force is distributed at the present time, the numbers in the different provinces, and the increase in the force that has taken place since 1912 up to the present time. The minister has informed us that there are over 1,800 of the rank and file in the force. That is a considerable increase if the statement of expenditure in connection with the force given by my hon. friend from Victoria (Mr. White) is correct. I think it would be of interest to the House to know where the force is located, the numbers in each province, and the increase that has taken place say from 1912 up to the present time, and if there has been an increase, why the increase has been made. I also wish to bear testimony to the excellent character of the force. There are thousands of people in Canada who have a vivid recollection of the manner in which the force maintained law and order in the western provinces in the early days. It has a standing and a record that is equalled by no similar force in the world, and it is with no idea of disparaging the force that I am asking for this information.

Mr. ROWELL: I am very glad to answer both questions, namely, that asked by my hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Crerar), and the question presented by my hon. friend from Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux). First, in reference to the question asked by my hon. friend from Marquette. I have not the figures before me for 1912, but I have the figures as on the 31st of May of the present year. At headquarters here in Ottawa there are ten officers and 55 of other ranks. That probably would not be greater, in fact, it is probably less, than the number at the headquarters at Regina plus the Dominion Police headquarters staff here and the staff of the Comptroller's office. There is no increase in the force in that respect. So far as there is any change, it would be a decrease. In the Yukon district there are three officers and 44 of other ranks. In British Columbia there are 9 officers and 274 of other ranks. That is wholly new. In 1912, the work of the force had not extended into British Columbia, and we had no men there at that time, but the work of the force has been extended to that province in the last couple of years. Alberta is divided into two districts. In Southern Alberta there are 10 officers and 293 of other ranks. In Northern Alberta, which extends right up to the Arctic ocean and includes all the posts up the Mackenzie river and two on the Arctic ocean—I may say in passing we have recently established a new post on the Arctic ocean at the mouth of the Copper Mine river, in the extreme north right at the heart of the continent—including all these we have in Northern Alberta 7 officers and 93 of other ranks. In Southern Saskatchewan, which includes Regina and the force there, we have 10 officers and 337 of other ranks.

In the Northern Saskatchewan district, which includes Prince Albert and the territory surrounding Hudson Bay we have 3 officers and 57 men. And it is not without interest to the House to know that we are about to establish a post at Port Burwell on the Hudson straits. Hon. members are no doubt aware that Canada claims the Hudson Bay as territorial waters of the Dominion of Canada, and it is the intention of the Government to establish a post at the point I have mentioned where customs revenues will be collected and sovereignty will be exercised in the name of the Government of Canada. In Manitoba, which, for the purposes of the administration of the police force, includes that portion of Western Ontario lying between Port Arthur and Winnipeg, we have 9 officers and 239 men. In Western Ontario, that is to say Toronto and points west of Toronto, principally on the international boundary—Niagara Falls, Bridgeburg, Windsor, Sarnia, Sault Ste. Marie, Sudbury and Haileybury —we have 2 officers and 23 men. In the eastern district, that is here at Ottawa, performing any duties that are required, we have 8 officers and 295 men, including the Dominion Police stationed here. In the city of Montreal we have 2 officers and two other ranks. And in the Maritime Provinces, at Halifax, where the headquarters are situated, we have 1 officer and 28 men.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): At what other points in Nova Scotia outside of Halifax are there men?

Mr. ROWELL: We have no men outside of the city of Halifax. There are one or two men who may visit other parts of the province as occasion may require. That gives the present distribution of the force throughout the different provinces.

I may say a further word in answer to my hon. friend from Maisonneuve, who says that there is no occasion for a force in Eastern Canada and that they should go back West. At least in recent years, and I presume ever since Confederation, we have had a federal police force known as the Dominion Police, of which Sir Percy Sherwood was for many years the efficient head; and when that force was amalgamated with the Mounted Police it was composed of about 182 men. We have always had a force in Eastern Canada, and there is no object in having two federal police forces with independent heads and all the expense incidental to a dual administration. No matter what the strength of the force may be, it is a matter of prudence and economy to have the federal police forces under one head with one administrative staff. While it is true that the official staff, the commissioner and his assistants, had their headquarters at Regina, the financial affairs of the force were always administered from Ottawa. The direction came from Ottawa, and, as my hon. friend from Regina has pointed out, the change is not so substantial in that respect as my hon. friend suggests. My hon. friend says that the duties of the force are not as great as in the past. Many of the duties which the force performed in the past are now being performed, it is true, by the provincial police forces, but there is a reason, which I think I made clear in my opening statement, why the force should be maintained at a substantial strength. In addition to the specific duties enumerated,

I mentioned the fact that the Mounted Police constitute a reserve force to come to the assistance of the province, if they so desire, for the preservation of law and order. The force was increased when the war was over by the return of men from overseas who belonged to it. It was also increased by recruiting, and the Government, for a reason which I shall state to the committee, takes full responsibility for that increase. The members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force who returned to Canada were exceedingly anxious to be demobilized at the earliest possible date. They desired to get to their homes in Canada, and the Government felt that it was its duty to permit their demobilization and allow these men to return to their families. The militia force of Canada had been disintegrated by the natural and inevitable operations of the war. Men had enlisted and gone overseas, and the militia units had been practically disbanded by reason of the complete disorganization. But one of the primary obligations resting on a government in a country such as this, extending from Atlantic to Pacific and embracing such a wide area, is always to have in existence a force, not very great but adequate to maintain law and order in the land in any emergency that might arise. That is the duty of the Government; and at a time when we had no effective militia, because the militia could not be reorganized at once, and when we had no effective permanent force, whose reorganization must be a matter of time, the Government believed that it was its duty to utilize the Mounted Police, with all its splendid traditions, by recruiting it up to the strength which Parliament had authorized, in order that we might have in Canada a force at the disposal of the Governments concerned for the preservation of law and order throughout the country. Now, I think that so soon as the militia is definitely reorganized and put upon a sound basis and the permanent force is put in shape, so that we may return to pre-war conditions, the strength of the Mounted Police can be decreased.

Mr. LEMIEUX: When?

Mr. ROWELL: Whenever the condition I have stated comes about.

Mr. LEMIEUX: You doubled the militia.

Mr. ROWELL: No; my hon. friend is mistaken.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Last year.

Mr. ROWELL: Last year Parliament authorized an increase in the permanent force. The militia throughout Canada, I am sorry to say, has not been fully reorganized. It takes time to build up what has fallen to pieces as a result of the war, but we shall have it reorganized in time. Provision has been made to this end, but so far there has not been any extensive reorganization, and until that time comes it is the duty of the Government to maintain an efficient force such as the Mounted Police as a reserve available in case of emergency for the preservation of law and order. My hon. friend asks when the amount of the vote will be decreased. I have not promised a decrease for next year though I hope it may be possible to come down next year with a smaller estimate, but I cannot give any guarantee that I shall be able to do so, because I do not know that the conditions to which I have alluded will be so changed within the year as to warrant a smaller vote. Certainly I look forward to a reduction within two years at the outside, and I hope that next year we shall be able to reduce the vote for the Mounted Police.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There are some figures here which I think it is important to bring to the attention of the committee. I have before me the Estimates for 1910-11 for the Royal Northwest Mounted Police. That is just ten years ago, and the amount voted then was $753,000. Today we have a vote of $4,674,000 in addition to $500,000 for the buildings that it is proposed to erect during the coming year. From $753,000 to over $5,000,000 is a tremendous increase.

Mr. PECK: Do the figures include the cost of the Dominion Police as well.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was just going to give that figure next. The amount required for the Dominion Police in 1910-11 was $55,000, which amount, added to the $753,000, makes a total of about $808,000 altogether for Dominion Police and North-West Mounted Police. Now the item jumps to over $5,000,000 including the $500,000 for the buildings to be put up this year. One can understand that during the war there may have been reasons for voting special sums for police and for increasing the police force, but I think the country should be definitely informed by the minister whether the Government contemplates increasing this force or very considerably reducing it. My hon. friend said a moment ago that he hopes in another year to bring down a decreased Estimate. That is hardly sufficient, because we shall be asked when we come to the Estimates of the Department of Public Works to vote half a million for buildings this year. Unless the Dominion Police are to take the place of the police of the different provinces altogether, it is very questionable whether we should enter upon these large expenditures particularly at this time. If the Government contemplates that this force will gradually be a diminishing body as the country gets more settled and each province looks after the maintenance of law and order within its borders, it is very questionable whether we should create a big establishment at Ottawa as a centre for the Dominion Police at the cost of the amount of money which we are being asked to vote.

There is another figure to which I would like to draw the attention of the Government. In 1910-11 the total amount asked for the Department of Militia and Defence, chargeable to income, was $6,876,700. That was all that the country was paying for Militia and Defence. Now we are being asked to vote for Mounted Police $4,678,000, or over two-thirds of what in 1910-11 was required for the whole militia of Canada. It looks as if the Government were trying to make a standing army out of this police force, only calling it police instead of militia or an army. It is under the direction of the Ministry, the Administration can use it in any way they like and send it here, there and everywhere as it suits the policy of the Government. This looks like a far-reaching addition to the public expenditure at a time when we ought to be economizing.

Mr. ROWELL: I would like to point out to the hon. gentleman the difference in the cost of all commodities at the date which he has mentioned as compared with the preseent time. At the time referred to by the leader of the Opposition the pay of the men was sixty cents a day; to-day a constable's pay is $2 a day. Will the hon. member say that the pay of the members of the force is too high. The cost of a constable's clothing, his preliminary outfit was $54 then; to-day it is $150. At that time the cost of the rations of the individual constable was 22 cents per day; to-day it is from 71 to 75 cents per day. At that time hay was bought for $7 or $8 per ton; this past year we have had to pay as high as $50 a ton, and the average was approximately $30 per ton last year. This enormous increase in the cost of everything accounts for the increased cost of the administration of the force, and it applies to the increased number of the force. My hon. friend has said that I should give some more definite assurance to the committee as to reducing the strength of the force. I have explained that one reason for bringing the force up to the present authorized strength, or for greatly increasing its original authorized strength was that, pending the return to more normal conditions when we should have a real militia force in Canada the Government did feel it essential to have a force in Canada which would be available for the preservation of law and order. We will come to the day when the force will be reduced. There is no intention of keeping the force permanently up to the high figures authorized last year. The force will be brought back to more moderate dimensions so soon as the conditions that I have referred to have again become normal. With reference to the future of the force, here is the question with which we are faced. It is essential to maintain a police force for certain purposes. It is essential to maintain it for the Yukon and Northwest Territories. It is necessary to have a federal police for certain important purposes that the federal police have served during all these years. In addition we must have some force as a reserve for the maintenance of law and order. We can choose between having a permanent military force of a certain strength which the Government might consider adequate to our needs in Canada, or of preserving this force at a substantial strength. I do not think any member of the House will say that we should have no force in Canada. We must have some force. The question is whether it is wiser to have a military force of a greater strength or to have a smaller military force and keep up the Mounted Police for the purposes of a reserve force as well as for performing the necessary police duties. My own personal view is that it is better to have a larger Mounted Police force and a smaller military force than we otherwise would require. Hon. members may not agree with that but that is my view and that is the view that the Government has acted upon. Another Government might reach a different conclusion. It might consider it desirable to make this force a part of the permanent military force. We did at one time discuss that proposal but we came to the conclusion that the Mounted Police is a better force for preserving law and order than either the militia or the permanent force. With the splendid prestige they have the fact that they are in a community—the very fact that they are there—tends to preserve law and order without their being called upon to exercise their functions as policemen.

Mr. VIEN: The minister gives us his reasons for the increase in the strength of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. The first is the social unrest that exists in the country; the second is the disorganization of the Canadian Militia and the necessity of having some organized body to maintain law and order; the third is the necessity of having an increased Mounted Police for service out West. I think that this information is not at all in accordance with the facts. The President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell) stated that since the war the Canadian Militia had been disorganized. May I tell the House and the hon. minister that at no time in our history has there been such a considerable military force in this country as at present. We always had 25,000, 30,000 or even 50,000 men training during the whole period of the war and for several months thereafter. As soon as the war was over the then Minister of Militia (Mr. Mewburn) asked the House to vote an increase in the Permanent Force, and eighteen months ago the strength of that Force was raised from 5,000 to 10,000.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. VIEN: Hon. members say "No." I want those hon members to stand up and tell me what was the strength of the Permanent Force in 1914, and what it was when we increased it about eighteen months ago.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We did not increase the Permanent Force; it was only the authorization that was increased. The Permanent Force to-day is not as much as 5,000 men.

Mr. CALDER: The last figures I obtained about three weeks ago indicated that the strength of the Permanent Force was in the neighbourhood of 3,500. As the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) says, while the Act of Parliament was put through authorizing an increase up to 10,000, no authority has ever been given to make that increase. If I am not mistaken, authority was given to recruit up to 5,000, but even on that authority only 3,500 men have been recruited.

Mr. VIEN: The hon. gentleman will see by a reference to the Militia List that the number of officers has been increased for a Force of at least 10,000 men, and in so far as the number of actual recruits is concerned, I take it for granted that it is the intention of the Government to bring the Permanent Force up to strength, otherwise they would not have asked the authority of Parliament for so doing.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, no.

Mr. VIEN: At any rate, the amount asked from Parliament in these Estimates for the maintenance of the Permanent Force is more than double what it was in 1914, and even if it was not actually carried out, it was surely the intention of the Government to increase it, since they asked authority for so doing. But even granting that the actual recruiting of the Permanent Force—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why does the hon. member assume that the Government intends going to the limit of its authority? That all depends on circumstances.

Mr. VIEN: I assume—

Mr. MEIGHEN: But why?

Mr. VIEN: —that when the Government comes to Parliament asking for authority it is serious in so doing.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly.

Mr. VIEN: And therefore it would not ask for authority which it does not intend to use.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly it might. It all depends on whether the circumstances require the authority to be used. It does not need to be used unless the circumstances demand it; they have not so far demanded it.

Mr. VIEN: The ex-Minister of Militia (Mr. Mewburn) when giving to this House the information required from him in asking authority to increase the Permanent Force, said—

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, he did not.

Mr. VIEN: Surely the hon. minister will not tell the House that the ex-Minister of Militia did not ask authority to increase the Permanent Force?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes?

Mr. VIEN: Well, that is what I am saying.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I thought you said he did not.

Mr. VIEN: And when the ex-minister asked authority to increase the strength of the Permanent Force, he said he was bound to increase it on account of the men discharged from the Canadian Expeditionary Force, who would have to be taken on the strength of the Permanent Force.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think so.

Mr. VIEN: He said so I was present at the time.

Mr. MEIGHEN: You misunderstood him.

Mr. VIEN: It was one of the explanations given by the ex-Minister of Militia to obtain authority to increase the strength of the Permanent Force.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think you misunderstood him.

Mr. VIEN: The hon. gentleman takes it for granted that I misunderstood the ex-Minister of Militia. I may take the same liberty and say that the hon. minister did not understand his former colleague.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, just quote him.

Mr. VIEN: At any rate, there was surely a purpose when the Government asked for such authority. The explanation given to the House was that it was necessary to increase the strength of the permanent force.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It might be necessary.

Mr. VIEN: All right, if the hon. minister likes that form better. I fail to see why it is necessary to have in Ottawa 8 officers and 225 men of the Canadian Mounted Police. The hon. minister (Mr. Rowell) says that in addition to the reason that the militia is disorganized, we must also provide assistance for the civil authorities when necessary. The hon. gentleman is aware that when any disturbance occurs the civil authority can call out any regiment of the active militia, and he is also aware that the civil authority can call upon the permanent force to come to their assistance. Therefore, I completely fail to see what was the necessity of stationing in Ottawa this detachment of the Mounted Police, and in addition building headquarters for the force at an expenditure of over $500,000. It seems to me that at this period of retrenchment and economy the action of the ministry is in absolute contradiction of the statements made by the Minister of Finance. In the old provinces the matter of police has been left to the provincial authorities, it being one of the duties of Provincial Governments to maintain law and order and to have a provincial police force for that purpose. I do not believe that the unrest which the hon. member described to the House has been manifested either in the Maritime Provinces, in Quebec, or in Ontario.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Except in by-elections.

Mr. VIEN: Maybe; but even in by-elections I think if only legal and proper methods were adopted there would be no necessity of organizing such a corps. Under normal conditions no federal mounted police force is necessary to maintain law and order in the older provinces; and I think the minister completely failed to establish to the satisfaction of this House that there is any urgent necessity for the organization of this force either in this city or in any other part of Ontario, or in the province of Quebec, or in the Maritime Provinces. The first retrenchment we could make would be that of saving the $500,000 which is now asked for a building for the Mounted Police in Ottawa. It would be easy also to economize at least a million dollars in the reduction of the force to the extent of all officers and men now in service in Ontario, Quebec and the Maritime Provinces. I for one will oppose the expenditure of $500,000 for a headquarters building in Ottawa and such amount as is asked for to maintain the force in the old provinces.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): My hon. friend is now asking for $4,674,066, whereas the expenditure during 1919, according to the public accounts, was only $719,142.73. I want to place myself on record as being opposed to this very large increase. It is unjustifiable; so far as we can judge from the sentiment of hon. members, no one wants this police in Eastern Canada. My hon. friend from South Cape Breton (Mr. Butts), who represents the most populous district in Eastern Nova Scotia, has put himself on record against the police operating in that province. The minister tells us there are twenty-one of these officers and men in Halifax. These men are not required in Halifax, and I think that is the sentiment in all the Maritime Provinces as well as in Ontario and Quebec. These police officers and men are forced on the people by the Government at a time when money is hard to get; taxes are being levied on the people to meet an expenditure which is absolutely unnecessary. My hon. friend has repeated over and over again that these policemen are required for the purposes of law and order. But as I understand the constitution of this country it is the duty of the provinces, not of the Federal Government, to preserve law and order in the provinces. The Federal Government are assuming a duty that they do not require to assume; that the provinces are not asking them to assume; that the provinces themselves are well able to take care of. My hon. friend has said also that the cost of maintaining the police has increased enormously during the last few years; that sixty cents was the daily pay of a policeman some years ago, and that the amount is now two dollars. Well, that is one reason why the force should not be increased. Why pay two dollars a day for policemen and all the expense of their maintenance if they are not needed? I repeat that this force is not required in Eastern Canada, and in all that the minister has told us to-night he has not justified the expenditure so far as that part of the country is concerned.

Mr. GRIESBACH: The hon. member (Mr. Sinclair, Guysborough), and the hon. member who preceded him (Mr. Vien) made it quite clear, as the fact is, that the maintenance of law and order is a duty resting upon the Provincial Governments. But aid to the civil power is a responsibility which is laid upon the Federal Government, that aid taking the shape of the furnishing of armed forces of some sort. Hon. gentlemen opposite have said that in the event of internal disturbances of any kind it would be the duty of the civil power to call upon the active militia or the permanent militia to render that aid which the civil power is entitled to expect from the Federal Government. Well, the war has resulted in complete disorganization of the active militia. The active militia was in due course drafted into the expeditionary force; the expeditionary force has been disbanded; there is no active militia in Canada to-day. There is not an organized unit in the active militia of more than one hundred men. There are not one hundred organized men in Ottawa to-day. The Federal Government, therefore, could not, if it had to depend on the active militia, respond to a claim for aid to the civil power. And notwithstanding the increase which has been authorized, the permanent militia is no stronger to-day than it was before the war. The responsibility is upon the Federal Government to respond with a force of some sort. It chooses to take this particular measure in order to be ready to respond to the demand which it is legally liable to respond to; hence this proposal.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Does not my hon. friend think that all the unrest in Canada has passed away and that we are now living under normal conditions? My hon. friend is a gallant soldier; he knows that many returned soldiers are anxious to get from the Government a better pension. I have letters in my pocket even now, one received this evening from a gentleman who rendered most valuable service during the war. I will read one sentence from that letter to show that there are crying needs elsewhere to which the money of this country could be applied rather than to the maintenance of a force which, honourable though it may be, traditional though it may be, is not needed, at least in this section of the country. Many members have received letters worded like this:

> Dear Mr. LEMIEUX:
> The call was given; our services sought, we answered and gave up everything; have suffered everything,—yes, sacrified our all, and now we have been left to suffer the tortures of hell through physical and financial exhaustion.

I shall not give the name, Mr. Chairman, but every member receives letters of this kind every day from returned soldiers, returned officers, from widows, from orphans.

Now, $4,000,000, or even $2,000,000, would go a long way towards helping those poor people who, as my correspondent says, have given their all for the flag, the King and the Empire. Yet, we are giving a picayune allowance to those returned soldiers and to the widows and orphans, and we are spending $4,000,000, for which my hon. friend cannot give a reasonable explanation and for the reduction of which expenditure he does not make any formal promise. We are called upon by the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) to exert our best efforts to incite the Canadian taxpayers to accept the last Budget with the best possible grace. He promises the Canadian people that he will survey the various items of expenditure and that every item will be subjected to the most careful pruning. Yet, with a little waving of the flag, my hon. friend tells the committee: We have to maintain law and order until normal conditions prevail. With all due respect to my hon. friend, I maintain that the period of unrest has passed and that Canada is living under normal conditions. In fact, this country is doing far better in that respect than most of the other countries which have passed through the war. Really, it is most discouraging to stand by the Budget and by the Minister of Finance, in inviting the Canadian people to accept the heavy taxation Bills, and on the other hand to have another minister of the Crown spending, without any good cause, $4,000,000 for a useless force in Eastern Canada.

Mr. VIEN: What is the average cost per man for the maintenance of the Mounted Police?

Mr. ROWELL: Between $1,700 and $1,800.

Mr. VIEN: What is the total force in Ontario, Quebec and the Maritime Provinces?

Mr. ROWELL: That is all included in the statement which I have already given and put on Hansard, and my hon. friend can see it there. My hon. friend (Mr. Sinclair, Guysborough) asks: Why is the amount so much higher than the expenditure for the year 1918-19? During the year 1918-19, approximately 1,000 of our Mounted Police were serving in the war, and the strength of the Force in Canada was reduced to its lowest point in recent years. I think it got down to about 300. The men who were serving overseas were paid as soldiers out of the moneys provided to pay our forces at the front, and, therefore, we did not have to provide the amount in this Estimate. The fact is that we are providing in this Estimate for a force at least four or five times as strong as the force that was maintained in Canada in 1918-19 out of this appropriation, not the total force, because so many men were overseas. The additional amount is due to the increased cost, higher pay and increased cost of subsistence since then. My hon. friend (Mr. Vien) states that I did not accurately represent the situation. I know the facts and I accurately represented them to the committee. The Minister of Immigration (Mr. Calder) and the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) have told my hon. friend about the strength of the permanent force, and the former Minister of Militia (Mr. Mewburn) if he were in the House, would confirm the statement. While he took authority to increase the permanent force, if necessary, to 10,000, he believed it was in the national interest to bring the Mounted Police Force up to a reasonable strength rather than to increase the permanent force as much as he was authorized to increase it. It was part of his recommendation that this force should be increased up to the strength authorized rather than that he should bring the permanent force to a much higher strength. He thought it was more in the interest of the country to have the police force strong than to have such a large permanent force.

Mr. DENIS: I was much interested to see the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Vien) take the place of the hon. member for Maisonneuve and Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux) when the latter sat down, but I should like to hear what the minister has to say in reply to the hon. member for Maisonneuve and Gaspé.

Mr. ROWELL: If my hon. friend had been in the Chamber, he would have heard my reply. It is hardly right, as each new member comes into the Chamber, that I should be asked to repeat an explanation which has already been given more than once. We are anxious to get through with the business of the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. VIEN: Some hon. members are calling "question." Will they be good enough to be a little patient until we are through with this? The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Griesbach) informed the committee that the militia had been disorganized and that it was very necessary to increase the strength of the Mounted Police so as to ensure the necessary help for the civil authorities in case a disturbance should occur. I might answer my hon. friend by stating that no disturbance has arisen since the war ceased, and it is almost an insult to the peaceful and law-abiding population of the older provinces to claim that there is a great unrest and that, unless this constabulary force is maintained and increased in strength, some uprising will occur which will imperil law and order and peace in our country. Moreover, supposing a local disturbance should occur, the permanent force of Canada, which is at present, if we take the figures given by the Minister of the Interior, over 3,000 in strength is more than enough to maintain law and order in the older provinces of this Dominion. If we take the figures given by the President of the Council (Mr. Rowell), if a Mounted Policeman costs to this country in round figures $1,800 per annum, the 300 men or more who are maintained in Ontario, Quebec and the Maritime Provinces, would cost this country $540,000 per annum. It would be good economy to cut this $540,000 item from the Estimates submitted to the committee as well as the $500,000 item which is asked in order to build headquarters for this police force at Ottawa. I would, therefore, suggest to the minister that he reduce the strength right away by the number which is maintained in the older provinces and that he should also do away with the item of $540,000 which is asked for the building of headquarters in Ottawa, thereby saving the country over $1,040,000 which could be applied elsewhere towards the reduction of our debt.

Royal Canadian Mounted Police Buildings, $500,000.

Mr. ROWELL: This item is in respect of buildings at Vancouver, and Ottawa. We have purchased a property in the city of Vancouver on Shaughnessy Heights, where the police are now stationed. There were not sufficient buildings on the ground for the full accommodation of the police and their horses, and we have to make provision for the erection of quarters for the officers and for the necessary stables. The estimated expenditure for the completion of the buildings at Vancouver is $98,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Have tenders been invited?

Mr. ROWELL: The matter is in the hands of the Public Works Department. They are proceeding in the usual way, but whether they have actually called for tenders or not I cannot say. The balance of the expenditure is for the quarters here in Ottawa. It will involve the erection of the necessary barracks for the men, an administration building, quarters for the officers and non-commissioned officers, and stables.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Where are the men quartered at present?

Mr. ROWELL: At Howick Hall. The balance or $400,000 is not an estimate of the exact cost of the Ottawa buildings because at the time we did not have a site available on which to erect the buildings, and therefore it was not possible for the Public Works Department to give us a detailed estimate of what the cost would be. Therefore, so far as the Ottawa buildings are concerned, it is a lump sum estimated at approximately $400,000. One naturally cannot say what the final expenditure will be until the places for the buildings have been finally settled upon and tenders called for, but that was the general estimate formed at the time as the probable cost of the buildings.

Mr. VIEN: Therefore it is the intention of the Government to maintain permanently in Ottawa 225 mounted police?

Mr. ROWELL: It is the intention of the Government to maintain a force here in Ottawa. Let me say that the Government has always had a force of federal police here. These they do not require to provide barracks for; they have not done so in the past. Every government of this country has had a federal police force in Ottawa. When my hon. friends talk about not having a Dominion police force in Eastern Canada they are going directly contrary to the whole history and policy of governments in this country. Is there any government in the world that has not a police force of its own? This Government has always had a police force at Ottawa, under Sir Percy Sherwood of late years. It is the Government's intention for the time being to maintain here a force of approximately 160 mounted police. The figures I gave to which my hon. friend referred included the old Dominion police and the new men who have come in.

Mr. VIEN: How many mounted policemen are there in Ottawa at present?

Mr. ROWELL: There are 160 men and 5 officers. That is the strength of the force at Howick Hall.

Mr. VIEN: Which was not maintained in Ottawa before?

Mr. ROWELL: Which was not maintained in Ottawa before. It is not the intention of the Government to maintain a portion of the permanent military force here. At least that is the present view. If the Government should ultimately decide not to have a squadron of the Mounted Police here, the buildings erected would be suitable for any portion of the Permanent Military Force that should be stationed here. The view of the Government is that there should be a company at least of the permanent military force or the Mounted Police here at the capital city. I do not know of any government that has not some force under the control of the federal authorities in proximity to the capital city. That is the reason why the Government decided on the erection of suitable accommodation for a force of 160 men.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Has any site been obtained?

Mr. REID (Mackenzie): Are the officers' and the married men's quarters at Regina still occupied?

Mr. ROWELL: Regina is the training depot for Western Canada and there is a squadron at Regina with its officers. My information is that the officers' quarters there are occupied by the officers.

As to a site at Ottawa, there is a site which I think the Government can probably secure from the Canadian National Railways. That would not involve the purchase of property from private individuals. It is on the Rideau River past the Isolation Hospital.

Mr. COPP: Is the purchase price included in the $400,000?

Mr. ROWELL: No. At the time that figure was put in, it was considered we would probably be able to get suitable Government property on which to erect the buildings.

Mr. COPP: When was the site at Shaughnessy Heights, Vancouver, purchased?

Mr. ROWELL: The arrangement was made in November of last year, and the transaction was closed in the early part of the present year.

Mr. COPP: What was the price paid?

Mr. ROWELL: It was $135,000 for fifteen acres of land with the buildings upon them, which accommodate 200 men.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think we ought to have an opportunity of asking the Minister of Public Works a few questions on this item before it carries. Questions have been asked with regard to the calling for tenders, for instance. This is really an item that belongs to the Public Works Department and it can only be voted in connection with these other items under the head of "Generally."

WAYS AND MEANS—THE INTERIM SUPPLY BILL.

On motion of Sir Henry Drayton (Minister of Finance) the House went into Committee of Ways and Means, Mr. Steele in the Chair.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON moved:

Resolved, That a sum not exceeding $68,159,519.23, being one-sixth of the amount of each item set forth in the Supplementary Estimates for the year ended 31st March, 1920, and the Main Estimates and Supplementary Estimates for the year ending 31st March, 1921, be granted to His Majesty for the years ending respectively the 31st March, 1920, and the 31st March, 1921.

The CHAIRMAN: I must point out that this resolution must have the unanimous consent of the committee.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This resolution, Mr. Chairman, as appears on its face, is merely a repetition of a resolution already adopted, with the exception that some of the items in the Estimates have been adopted.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This request of the Government is just another evidence of the delay which Parliament has had to endure in consequence of the ministry not having its business in shape so that we could meet earlier in the year and make progress. Rather strong exception was taken on this side when the Government asked somewhat earlier in the year for a sixth of the Estimates to be voted before Parliament had an opportunity of discussing the Estimates themselves. I think that the same exception might equally well be taken at the present time to granting any further advance to the Government, but I gather that if this amount were not advanced at this time it would only have the effect of considerably inconveniencing the Civil Service, not only the inside service but the service in different parts of the country. I presume that hon. members on this side of the House will acquiesce in permitting this amount to pass, but in saying this now I should like to point out to the Government, as I had occasion to do this afternoon when another item was under consideration, that this must not be regarded as a precedent for future years. Something was said, when the first advance was asked for, about there being precedents in these matters. Well, Sir, it has developed now from precedent into habit on the part of the Government to ask for these advances, and this is due largely to the fact that Parliament is called so late in the year. I was speaking a few minutes ago with the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) as to the reason why the Government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier fixed the fiscal year as it did, and my hon. friend assures me that I was right when I said this afternoon that it was to enable Parliament to meet in November rather than away on in January or February. It gave time to the Auditor General to audit the accounts necessary for the Auditor General's Report, and the departments time to prepare their estimates. When Parliament met in November and proceeded with its business with despatch, the items required for public busines could for the most part be passed before we reached the end of the fiscal year. I want to say, not by way of threat but simply that hon. gentlemen opposite will understand the position of the Opposition, that if the Government of the day should by any possibility be in office next year we shall not be willing to make these advances. We shall expect the Government to call Parliament earlier than was done this year and to have public business sufficiently under way to enable the due control to be exercised over public expenditures which Parliament ought to have.

Mr. DENIS: I can very well appreciate the motives of the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) but I am very much afraid that the reasons he has given will not convince the Government, because I do not believe that they are open to conviction. I have discussed this matter with quite a number of gentlemen on both sides of the House and without exception they all express the opinion that it is simply ridiculous to begin the session of Parliament towards spring and keep members here until the month of July. Yet the Government persists in this course, and they are so obdurate that I am afraid the leader of the Opposition has only spoken in vain in attempting to convert them.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am a new hand; I might be easily converted.

Mr. DENIS: Well, so far as the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) is concerned the remarks of my leader may prove effective. But I know that the other ministers do not take this representation seriously. They are not here to please hon. members but rather to do as they see fit and call upon their supporters, whether those gentlemen agree with them or not, to support them upon the floor of the House. But I challenge any one to deny that ninety per cent of the members on the other side of the House are not satisfied with the course which the Government obstinately pursues in calling Parliament together when it does. Every hon. member believes that it is wrong and unfair to call the session at such a time that the House is kept sitting till July. Some members have to leave for their fields and others have to attend to their various businesses. Is there any reason why the session should not begin early in January? I see no reason at all why it should not. Sir Wilfrid Laurier used to call the session in the month of November, and he was wise in doing so, notwithstanding the fact that he was criticised for bringing members to Ottawa a few weeks before the New Year instead of after. There is no reason in the world why Parliament should not convene between the 10th and 15th January each year. We quite understand that after the last general election, on account of the fact that the returns had to be brought from overseas under the law which was then in force, we had to wait until March. Consequently the Government were not to blame for beginning the session in March, 1918; it was the force of circumstances. But in the following year they had no reason to begin late. Last year there was no reason to begin the session as late as it was begun and close it on the 7th of July. This year there was no reason again for calling the session so late. We are going into the month of July very soon. It is not fair to hon. members that the Government should use their strength to adopt such a procedure against the will of ninety per cent at least of members of the House.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would like to have it understood that the Opposition in concurring in this resolution will still have the right to discuss all individual items.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Absolutely; every single item remains the same as if the vote had not been passed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING. Quite so. It does not take away from us the right to discuss any matter?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No.

Mr. DENIS: Before the resolution is passed can we get any assurance from the Government that next year the Government will not begin later than the month of January.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Steele): Is it the pleasure of the committee to adopt the resolution?

Mr. DENIS: No, I oppose the motion until we get an answer from the Government.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Steele): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the resolution?

Mr. DENIS: No, I oppose the resolution until we receive an answer. This resolution cannot pass otherwise than by the unanimous consent of the House. My question is a pertinent and reasonable one and it should be answered.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am quite sure my hon. friend does not want to do anything that is unreasonable. I am also quite sure that he is aware that I cannot give any promise that will bind anybody. I am at one with my hon. friend in wishing for a more expeditious conduct of the business of the House and for a shorter session. Anything I can do that will shorten the session without in any way jeopardizing that full and free discussion and consideration which the different subjects we have to deal with demands, I shall be only too glad to do. After all, the great thing is to get our business through. I regret just as much as the hon. member the length of the time we think it necessary to remain here.

I am not blaming anybody, I am not excusing any one, I am simply saying that it is unfortunate that we have to again ask for another supplementary vote. The fact is we have done a good deal of work, although we have done some talking, too. I entirely agree with my hon. friend that we should have shorter sessions and that members should be able to get away at an earlier date.

Mr. DENIS: I am not rising to oppose the motion, I will give my consent to it in a moment; but I want it to be well understood that my objection was not to the length of the session; the minister misunderstands me altogether. I said the session should be called earlier in the year, not later than January, and on this point I asked for an answer. No one but the Government is responsible. I know that the minister is acting in good faith and I excuse him from responsibility from the position we are in, but surely if the Government want to make some promise they can, without endangering their position, make some promise and say that next year the session will begin not later than the month of January.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I hope that next year the session will commence in the month of January.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Seeing that the minister is so well disposed, might I suggest that the bringing in of the Budget in the first month of the session would shorten the session?

Resolution reported.

CONCURRENCE.

The House proceeded to consider resolutions reported from Committee of Supply.

Government shipbuilding programme—amount required for the construction of vessels in accordance with Government programme, $20,000,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We are not taking a sixth of the whole, but we are taking just the items that have been passed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is this the usual form?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The House has already voted a certain number of items, and this is the formal concurrence in the Estimates which have been passed and recorded by the Clerk.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am sorry I am not as familiar with the procedure as I might be on this particular point. I would like to know from the minister before this concurrence is given if it has been the custom to include all the items that have been carried.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have been so informed. I am in exactly the same position as my hon. friend, but I am informed this is the proper practice.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I thought that the minister would be content for the present with getting one-sixth of the votes. That is as much as he should ask for.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am quite content to take a sixth, but I am told by the officers that this is the proper way. As far as the Government is concerned what it wants to get is the necessary sixth to carry on. If the hon. gentleman thinks that the Estimates ought to be considered as a whole and should not be concurred in as reported I do not think we would have any great objection.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We want to accommodate the Government but I would ask that the minister take the sixth.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I see no objection, but I do not pretend to know the technical rule. If we have a vote of one-sixth, that is all we want.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: You want us to give the Government a sixth to carry on?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We do not know whether or not the Government will last to the end of the session, but the indications are that it might be as well to allow them a sixth in the meantime.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE INTERIM SUPPLY BILL.

Objection having been taken to concurrence in these Items, the House went into Committee on Ways and Means, Mr. Steele in the Chair.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON moved:

1. Resolved, That towards making good the Supply granted to His Majesty, on account of certain expenses of the Public Service for the financial year ending 31st March, 1920, the sum of $3,175,199.81 be granted out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.

2. Resolved, That towards making good the Supply granted to His Majesty, on account of certain expenses of the Public Service for the financial year ending 31st March, 1921, the sum of $64,984,319.42 be granted out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.

Resolutions agreed to.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 166 for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the Public Service for the fiscal years ending 31st March, 1920, and 31st March, 1921.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the first and second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time, and passed.

SUPPLY.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON moved that the House do again go into Committee of Supply.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prince): Does not my hon. friend think we have covered sufficient ground to-day? We have certainly voted a good deal of money.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Minister of the Interior): I have waited a long time for this happy moment, and I would not like it to pass now. If we can go into Supply and deal with the Soldiers' Land Settlement Estimates—which have already been before the House on two previous occasions, once for half a day and this afternoon for an hour—I will not ask the House to sit longer.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is the item?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No. 275.

Motion agreed to and the House went again into Committee of Supply, Mr. Steele in the Chair.

Mr. MEIGHEN: When the committee adjourned at six o'clock the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) asked for certain particulars as to the fees paid to law firms in Ontario. I had explained that in Ontario the old system still prevailed of employing a firm of solicitors to report on titles, paying them according to a scale of fees fixed by the Department of Justice. The firm engaged in Ontario was Messrs. Jones and Leonard, and the total fees per title in respect of mortgages averaged about $14; in respect to purchases of land and subsequent loans thereon the fees averaged $31.70. I realize that on something over 1,000 loans the total is a very considerable sum, although it extends over a period of a couple of years. Nevertheless, Messrs. Jones & Leonard have on more than one occasion asked to be relieved of the work, claiming that it has not paid them to act for the board, and it has been only at the urgent request of the board that they have consented to continue. We hope, however, to install in Ontario the same system as we have in force in British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, New Brunswick and, I think, in Nova Scotia,—a system of departmental legal branches, by means of which we have got through our legal work at an expense approximating less than a quarter of what it has cost us under the old system.

Mr. PARDEE: Does the soldier or the Government pay that fee?

Mr. MORPHY: Do those figures contain the disbursements to the Registry Office and so forth?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No. In the first class of cases the disbursements are about $7 extra, and in the latter class of cases a little over $9 extra. The Government pays all the fees in respect to the search of title for the soldier.

Mr. CALDWELL: In regard to the amendment introduced to the Soldiers' Settlement Act, which was given its first reading on the 15th of April, according to the old Act the soldier settlers did not make any payment on interest or capital account on their stock and equipment loans until the end of the third year. Do I understand that under the amendment they will now pay interest from the date of their loans?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The board has power to exact that from the soldier settler who settles on improved land; but as respects the settler who brings new land under cultivation, he gets at least the equal of the two years, and a further concession in that his whole loan can be deferred for an extra year and no collection made upon it. That special advantage is given to the man who settles on unimproved land. But the board can, since the passage of the amendment, exact from the settler on improved land interest from the beginning, that is to say, there is no final remission of interest at all as respects that man, and though the board do not collect the interest at first, ultimately he may be called upon to pay the whole of it.

Mr. CALDWELL: Will this be retroactive and apply to soldiers who have already been settled by the department?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not at all.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): I suppose this is a suitable time for me to ask the minister what the views of the Government are with regard to the re-establishment of returned soldiers who are fishermen. The question was raised by me last year and I think that some rather favourable expression of opinion was given by a member of the Government, but nothing has been done. In Eastern Canada especially a large number of our soldiers were recruited from followers of the fishing industry. When these men returned—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Steele): This question would be more appropriate if put when the Estimates of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment were under consideration. We are now considering the matter of soldiers' land settlement.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): I think I can get an answer from the Government at this time, if the minister will permit me. It is well known that these men have not been given very much encouragement in the way of re-establishment. It does not take a great deal of money to re-establish a fisherman. I am told by men who are familiar with the expenditure required that something in the vicinity of $2,000 or $2,500 would be sufficient to equip a fisherman with a boat and all the nets and gear that he requires for his business. These men are not suited to farm work; they cannot take advantage of the land settlement proposals; their business is on the sea. The fishermen are a very important part of our population in Eastern Canada, and I think that some consideration ought to be given to them. They turned out to be just as good soldiers as the men who went from the farms, and they should not be deprived of the advantage of assistance simply because they are fishermen and not farmers. Every reason that exists for re-establishing a farmer on the land exists for re-establishing a fisherman on the sea. They are both producers; they are equally important to the future of the country; and the Government should take just as much interest in the one class as in the other. True, fishermen are not so numerous as the farmers, but man to man they are just as important. I would like to know what the views of the minister and of the Government are on this question. I am quite certain that the Government have considered the matter.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is no question as to the merits of the fishermen who are returned soldiers and as to the desirability of assisting them to re-establish themselves in their calling, if any practical means can be devised. So far the Government have launched upon a loaning system applicable only to those engaged in agricultural pursuits. That is not because those seeking to engage in agriculture are more deserving from the standpoint of the soldier than those seeking to engage in mechanics, or in fisheries, or in any other honourable pursuit; it is merely because a more practical method can be devised for assisting the first class than the latter; because more tangible and permanent security is obtained, better machinery is available and, as is generally admitted, agriculture is our basic industry. It may be pretty strongly argued that fisheries come next or very close to the next to agriculture, and that if any further branching out could be done it might well be in that direction. Consequently we have seen to it that the question of the admission of those desiring to go into fishing to the benefits of the soldier settlement scheme should be very carefully reviewed. I understand that the matter is now before the pensions and re-establishment committee of this House; that they have been and are receiving evidence and hearing the best opinion that can be heard on the subject. As that is the case and as the Government before deciding would like to hear their judgment in the matter, after full inquiry, I would not care to make any definite comitment at the present time. I would like to add this, though: that the board, though sympathetic toward the request of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne) who has urged upon us and upon the board the desirability of this venture, is naturally reluctant to go further at the present time, unless, of course, the demands in the public interest are overwhelming. The pressure upon the board for assistance in agriculture has been so great and is at the present moment at so high a point that they would not like to have the numbers multiplied any more than they can avoid. They are finding it difficult indeed properly to guard the public interest and keep their organization at such a degree of efficiency as will take care of so extreme and urgent a demand as now bears upon them and have regard at the same time to conserving the treasury of the country and the ultimate public interest when amounts so huge are involved. Nevertheless the Government awaits the report of that committee; we feel that Parliament cannot with advantage discuss the subject while that report is still outstanding.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): I am glad to know that the Government has an open mind on the question and that there is a chance of something being done. The minister is doubtful about the security the fishermen could give. I quite agree that the security of land is more stable; as some old legal authority has said: "You cannot run away with an acre of land." That is true, but if you insure a fisherman's boat and provide him with the necessary gear, the investment is a pretty safe one—safer, in my opinion than an investment on the security of an old, run-out farm. If the soldier fails on a country farm and cannot make a living on it, the farm is impoverished, and in that respect the security in many parts of Canada is not very good. You would find quicker sale in the Maritime Provinces for a fisherman's boat, if it was kept in good order and insured against accident, than you would for such a farm as I have mentioned. Moreover, the fisherman can begin to produce much quicker than the farmer. Suppose you give a fisherman a boat to-day. The summer fishing is on now. The mackerel will be here in shoals in a few weeks; the haddock will come in November. The fisherman can begin to pay back in six months, if he is successful, as he would likely be in many cases. The farmer takes a couple of years to contribute anything at all, so that the returns would come much more quickly in the case of the fishermen, and with proper care and insurance there would not be much more risk than there is in the case of the farmer.

Mr. CURRIE: Is it not the case that most of the fishermen in the Maritime Provinces still receive every spring a subsidy under the old Washington Treaty to help them with their equipment and nets? Does the hon. member wish to give them something in addition to that?

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): The subsidy is not worth talking about; it is a mere trifle, and it belongs to the fishermen themselves. It does not come from the Government. The history of the subsidy is that many years ago a lawsuit was brought by the Dominion of Canada against the United States for trespassing on the inshore fisheries of the Maritime Provinces. I think the award given was $3,000,000, although I am not sure as to the amount. At all events this amount was placed to the credit of the fishing industry and the interest of that money which was secured to the fishermen by the lawsuit is paid in bounties each year. A fisherman with an ordinary fishing boat receives only between three and four dollars a year. The amount is not worth talking about, and besides it is their own money.

Mr. EDWARDS: What has this to do with land settlement?

[Mr. Sinclair.]

Mr. CHAIRMAN (Mr. Steele): I think the committee will make better progress if we confine the discussion to the resolution before the committee.

Mr. VIEN: How many men are employed by the board for administration in the district of Sherbrooke?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Eighteen.

Mr. VIEN: And in Quebec city?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Eleven.

Mr. VIEN: How many loans were made in the district of Sherbrooke?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The total number in Quebec is 362; in the district of Sherbrooke, 297, and in Quebec city, 65.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Will the minister kindly give the same information for district No. 6, Halifax?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There were 319 for Halifax up to the 27th March last.

Mr. CHISHOLM: How many men has the minister employed in district No. 6?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Twenty-two.

Mr. VIEN: Does the minister not think that this staff could be reduced? My impression—and I say this not by way of criticism, but as a suggestion—is that the staff employed by the board in almost every city is too large and could be reduced without any loss of efficiency. I am informed, for instance, that in the district of Sherbrooke, eighteen men are employed who, for the eighteen months that they have been in service, have had to deal with 297 loans. The staff seems to be very large for such little business, and the same statement applies to a large number of other districts.

Another matter which I wish to bring to the attention of the minister is this. In many instances the vendor of a property has made an agreement with the prospective purchaser by which the value has been enhanced so as to allow the soldier not to make any payment on account and even to make a profit by the transaction. I have been advised from a most reliable source that when a farm was offered for $5,000, the soldier had to pay 10 per cent on $5,000, but he would go to the owner of the farm and say: "Ask $6,000." In this way the Government would advance $5,400 although the real purchase was only $5,000. In many instances speculation of that kind has occurred. I do not know what steps the Government could take to avoid that, but the Government could surely find some way out of the difficulty in the future, and at the same time, they should reduce the staff in many districts.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We are at the present time reducing the staff in the province of Quebec, and particularly in Quebec city. The amount of business in Quebec city does not warrant a continuation on the present scale, and we are reducing the status of that office to the rank of an ordinary supervision office, we are not making it a regular Soldier Settlement centre. As regards Sherbrooke, that cannot be done; there is considerable business at Sherbrooke, and such business as there is requires very close supervision. The staff has to deal not only with the 297 men who are settled, but with applications from many more. Just at the present time the number is higher than it will average generally, and a little later on the number will be reduced. We do not go in for keeping any staff beyond the absolute necessities of the time, and I do not think there can be found in any part of Canada a staff where the employees are not working on their tiptoes. That may be, perhaps, too strong as regards all the offices, but I do not think an office can be found where at least very satisfactory work is not being performed by all the staff.

As regards the hon. member's report that soldiers, in order to avoid the 10 per cent payment, have induced vendors to raise their prices, and, I presume, to give the soldiers fake receipts for the initial payments, thereby relieving them of that obligation, the Soldier Settlement Board and myself will be only too glad if the hon. member will furnish us with a single instance where that has been done. I am not saying this by way of challenge or by way of intimation that there has been no such case. When a board is dealing with 36,000 to 50,000 people, and is purchasing and lending money on 20,000 separate farms in every constituency in Canada, it would be only fatuous to contend that there could be no case where the ingenuity of the individual had not managed to beat out the board. I do not think there are many such cases.

Mr. VIEN: Is there a sworn statement?

Mr. MEIGHEN: We get statements from every vendor. We make him tell us where he got the land, when he got it, what he paid for it, and he has to certify to the terms at which he is selling and to the bona fides of it. In any case where there is a complaint—there is one at the present time. It has been heard before the Re-establishment Committee. We had in that very case an investigation going on before we had any report from any outside party at all. We had in that case, as we have in every case, a certificate from the man as to what he paid for the land and when he got it. I may say that in this particular case the vendor has managed to escape. I will consider it a service on the part of the hon. member if he will just give me a description of the land and the name of the vendor in any case where a soldier has managed, or is reported to have managed to have got the best of the board in such a manner as that or in any other manner, and I will give him my undertaking that it will be traced to the bottom and fitting steps will be taken to right the matter. I may say that in every case where I have endeavoured to get to details I have not always been successful. They have usually remained between heaven and earth and have not been made known to the board.

Mr. VIEN: What is the total number of officers and men on the staff of the board?

Mr. MEIGHEN: 1,321. On the 27th of March last the number was 1,321. It is about the same to-day.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: That does not agree with the statement made by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell). Discussing this question on the 1st of June, in accounting for the very large increase that had been made in the Civil Service, he said:

> There has been an increase of 1,257 in the Soldiers' Settlement Board, and it was absolutely essential that that board should be manned to carry on its important work. Does anybody question that? Then there were 6,296 appointed in the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-Establishment, which is so essential for the re-establishment of our soldiers in civil life; and 275 on the staff of the Board of Pension Commissioners. Thus there was an aggregate increase in those four departments of 8,485.

Those figures are much larger than the figures given by the minister.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They are smaller. The President of the Privy Council gave 1,257 as the number added to the Soldiers' Settlement Board. The total number I gave was 1,321.

Mr. CHISHOLM: That is an increase.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is an increase because the whole board has been created since that time mentioned by the hon.

member for Antigonish and Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair.) I must commend the President of the Privy Council for his usual accuracy in giving those figures.

Mr. COPP: How many travelling inspectors are there?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There are 190 on the staff of supervisors.

Mr. POWER: What becomes of free grants of land made by Provincial Governments? For instance, in the province of Quebec, and I presume in the province of Ontario, soldiers are allowed to take out 100 or 160 acres from the Provincial Government. Are they in any way helped by the Soldier Settlement Board?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh yes, just the same as any other soldier settler. As soon as he has a proposition that appeals to the board as one that he can pay for, and at the same time make a living upon, whether he got the land by way of grant from a Provincial Government or in any other way, the board is ready to assist him just the same as any other settler. That principle applies as to Provincial Government assistance in every province of Canada.

Mr. POWER: But the title to these lands obtained from the Provincial Governments is not vested in the soldier until he has fulfilled certain conditions, a residence of five years and certain payments, and so forth. Just what stand does the board take with reference to these cases?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Of course, under our Act we cannot assist any soldier by way of loan until we get a first mortgage on the lands. I understand that in the province of Quebec arrangements have not been come to yet by which the province agrees to turn over the title of the land to the board. Until they do that we cannot under our Act give any assistance to the soldier on that land, but just as soon as they will do it we are not only ready but anxious to assist the soldier on that land the same as on any other. But we annot do it until they turn over the title.

Mr. POWER: Suppose the soldier wants to settle on land in Abitibi, Metapedia, or any other part of the province. The province has already remitted the dues in the case of the soldier, which the ordinary settler has to pay. Of course, you cannot expect the province to say: We will give you a free grant of land. The soldier must fulfil certain conditions with regard to residence and duties. I think the minister and the department ought to be able to evolve some scheme whereby these men who have obtained help from the Department of Colonization of the province could receive assistance from the board. That is true colonization, because the man is taking up new land. It is not like the settlement we are getting from the board now, where a poor farmer buys out a good one. Here is a man who wants to establish himself on the land and clear it in true pioneer fashion. This is the man we should help, but apparently we are not able to do so. Cannot the minister evolve a scheme for assisting that man?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister has succeeded in evolving a scheme, but the Government of the province of Quebec has not succeeded in acquiescing.

Mr. POWER: What is the minister's scheme?

Mr. MEIGHEN: In the province of British Columbia, where the resources are owned by the province, the same question arises. After considerable difficulty we managed to make an arrangement, an arrangement that we are quite ready to make along similar lines with the province of Quebec, whereby the province turns the title of these grants, which they make subject to settlement duty, over to the board in order that the board may have the security which the Soldier Settlement Act compels it to have before it can give assistance; and the province leaves to the board the determination of the completion of the settlement duties. There is no other way in which it can be done. The Government of British Columbia has now acquiesced, I am informed, and we are therefore able to go ahead and give assistance to settlers on provincial homestead lands in that province. We will be only too glad to do the same in the province of Quebec, and I appeal to my hon. friend from Quebec South (Mr. Power) to use his well-known vast influence with the Government of that province to bring them to the viewpoint of the Government of British Columbia, so that we can do for the soldiers of Quebec the same as we do for the soldiers of British Columbia.

Mr. POWER: In order to use this influence I would like the minister to explain a little more fully. Suppose the soldier in the province of Quebec goes away at the end of two years, whereas the conditions require, say, a five-year settlement. I understand that the title to the land would then be vested in the Dominion, that the land would become Crown land.

Mr. MEIGHEN: To the extent of our claim, but I understand the province has the right to pay off the claim of the Dominion and have the land revert to the province.

Mr. POWER: That is hardly likely, because in no case would these lands be worth the amount which the board was willing to pay.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh yes, because our money has gone into the land.

Mr. POWER: But the province would hardly pay that money back to the Dominion. They have so much land that they want to settle that they would not pay $1,500 or $2,000 or $3,000 to get that land back.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What does the hon. member think we should do? Lose the money?

Mr. POWER: Suppose the province refuses to pay the money, what happens?

Mr. MEIGHEN: We have the land.

Mr. POWER: It is vested in the Crown.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. VIEN: How many men defaulted last year on the conditions of their contract?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Only 1.71 per cent of the number of farmers.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: When this item was up before, the minister took occasion to say that there was no foundation for the charges made by the Great War Veterans' Association of Canada with reference to the administration of the Soldiers' Settlement Act, and in that connection he made what has been interpreted as an attack upon one of the officers of the Dominion Executive. There has been a good deal of comment in the press upon what was said by the minister at the time in reference to this officer, and I wondered whether the minister had anything to say in regard to the subject.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister, being a lawyer, has such respect for cases that are sub judice that he would not venture to make further comment on it at the present time.

Mr. COPP: What salaries are paid the supervisors?

Mr. MEIGHEN: From $1,500 to $2,400 according to grade. We have assistant supervisors and chief supervisors. The latter, who are the best and most experienced, go up to $2,400.

Mr. COPP: And expenses?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. POWER: Has the board arrived at any decision with reference to the disposal of the Stewart farm near Quebec?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is a farm that has to do with the Civil Re-establishment Department; we do not own it.

Mr. POWER: I was under the impression that the Land Settlement Department was training men on that farm.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is not correct.

Mr. BUCHANAN: Has anything been done to enable the returned men to take up irrigated land in Alberta? The minister will remember that on the occasion of his visit to southern Alberta last year representations were made that assistance should be provided for soldiers to settle on irrigated land. And he will also remember that the Canadian Pacific railway had established a colony for soldiers on their irrigated section in southern Alberta, and it was meeting with success. I shall be glad if the minister will make a statement on the subject.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am glad to say that we have decided to go as far as, if indeed not further, than I intimated on the occasion of that visit. I was indeed impressed by visiting the irrigated farms of Alberta with the possibilities of farming there, and it appeared to me as wholly unjustifiable that we should adopt any entirely negative attitude toward irrigated land, even though the prices were much in excess of ordinary land. We are prepared to assist, in accordance with the provisions of the Soldier Settlement Act, men who desire to settle upon irrigated land or upon irrigable land, on one condition, and that is certainty as to water supply. Just as soon as the board is satisfied, not that there is water available at the moment but that a water supply is certain, and that the property is not merely an irrigable one but that provision is already made to bring a sure water supply to it, then we are ready to take the hand of the soldier and help him settle on that land and afford him the assistance of the Soldier Settlement Act.

Mr. POWER: Has any suggestion been made to the board that those undergoing training in agriculture should have their salaries or wages increased to the same amount as paid soldiers undergoing vocational training?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No; we do not contemplate that. These are physically fit men who after training are probably going to get something more substantial in the way of assistance from the State, and consequently we do not think that their scale of allowances should be as high as that which is accorded to disabled men who, after they undergo a period of training, do not receive this substantial assistance. We think that the present scale is fairly reasonable under the circumstances.

Mr. POWER: Is the present scale based on the cost of living?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It has relation to the cost of living.

Mr. POWER: Is it supposed to be sufficient to keep a man and his family during the period of training?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is not supposed to do that.

Mr. POWER: The man must have means of his own?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, but he must have energy of his own. For example, a single man who is put out to training, who is informed that he must go and learn farming, being hired with a farmer, does not get any assistance. He gets the help that the farmer gives him; he is supposed to earn his way when he is learning to be a farmer. The married man who is doing the same work gets $20 a month, and $6 for the first child and $5 for the others, not exceeding a certain total of, I think, $25. The married man gets that by way of supplementary assistance. Those receiving training in institutions get board and free training. The married men get $35 per month, $6 for the first child and $5 for each subsequent child. The single man gets $10 a month.

Mr. VIEN: What is the length of the training period?

Mr. MEIGHEN: We give a man three months. He does not get training in higher agriculture. He is simply taught the rudiments of farming, so that he may be some good when he gets on land. The agricultural college is intended to make a good farmer a better farmer, and the course of training that is given to the man who is put on the farm is intended to make a green farmer a real farmer. As to the man who works for a farmer in order to learn agriculture, he is usually given a month first at one of these training centres in order that he may be of some use when he is on the land. After he spends his time on the land, usually nearly a year, he is then given his finishing course of two months; so that he gets a course of three months in all.

Resolutions reported.

On motion of Rt. Hon. Mr. Doherty the House adjourned at 12 midnight.

Tuesday, June 8, 1920.

The House met at Two o'clock.

THE SPEAKER'S CHAIR.

OFFER OF GIFT FROM THE LORDS AND COMMONS OF THE UNITED KINGDOM.

Rt. Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): Some two weeks ago His Honour the Speaker received from the Secretary of the Empire Parliamentary Association in London the following telegram:

LONDON, May 19, 1920.

RHODES,

Speaker—House Commons,
Ottawa.

Lord Chancellor and Speaker, joint presidents and members of Empire Parliamentary Association in Lords and Commons, ask you to accept as gift to Canadian House Commons the Speaker's Chair as an abiding token of good will between both Parliaments. Suggested that chair should be replica of that in British House of Commons. Colonel Amery, Under-Secretary for Colonies, who will be in Ottawa about end of this month, is bringing photographs of British chair and will consult you.

DEGVILLE, Commons, London.

Since then Colonel Amery has arrived in Ottawa. He has brought the photograph, which I shall lay upon the table of the House, and which will indicate that the chair which it is intended to send us is beautiful, dignified and ornate. It is my duty now to move a resolution, which I hope my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) will second, setting forth our appreciation of this generous and thoughtful gift and authorizing the Speaker to convey the thanks of this House to the donors. It has been the custom in this House for many years in the past—I do not know how long—that the Speaker upon retiring should take with him as a memorial of his occupancy of the high office of Speaker the chair used during his term. Of course, if this gift is accepted, that custom could not very well prevail in the future.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Give him a photograph of it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My right hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce suggests that a photograph of the chair might be presented to the Speaker in lieu of the chair itself.

Mr. BUREAU: Give him a gold miniature.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: What may be done in the circumstances would be for hon. members to decide. It may be the pleasure of the House that some memorial, possibly a chair such as has been in the past used by the Speaker, be presented to each Speaker upon his retirement. But that question does not arise at the moment.

It only remains for me to say that since the Parliament House which stood upon this site was destroyed by fire a few years ago we have already been favoured with many indications of the good-will of our brethren in the great Mother Parliament beyond the seas. This further token of good-will is but another illustration of the spirit of comradeship which prevails between the members of this Parliament and the members of the old Parliament in the United Kingdom. We are united by the ties of common ideals, of like institutions and traditions, and of a common allegiance. I hope that it may be our purpose now and at all times in the future to work with them in the best of good feeling and co-operation for the fulfilment of the aims of advanced democracy.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I hope that the House will accept the resolution which I now propose, and which will be seconded by Mr. Mackenzie King:

That the offer of a Speaker's Chair to the House of Commons of Canada by the Lord Chancellor and the Speaker of the House of Commons as joint presidents and by the members of the Empire Parliamentary Association in the House of Lords and in the House of Commons of the United Kingdom be most gratefully accepted, and that Mr. Speaker do inform the donors of the high appreciation of this House for the gift and particularly for the sympathy and good-will which it expresses.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House it affords me great pleasure to have the opportunity of seconding the motion which has been made in such appropriate words by my right hon. friend (Sir Robert Borden). If there is one thing above another which we in Canada have reason to be proud of and to be grateful for, it is that our constitution and parliamentary institutions are to all intents and purposes a replica of the constitution and parliamentary institutions of the Mother of Parliaments in the Old World. A visible sign of this great invisible reality such as is embodied in the gift it is our privilege to accept, is one of the links of Empire which make for that unity we all desire in the things which are fundamental to liberty and to the preservation of it.

Motion agreed to.

ORDERS OF DIRECTOR OF COAL OPERATIONS.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Minister of the Interior): I beg to lay on the Table orders of the Director of Coal Operations. Numbers 1 to 144 inclusive, as asked for yesterday.

REPORT TABLED.

Annual Report of the Department of Public Printing and Stationery for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1919.—Rt. Hon. Mr. Sifton.

SENATE BILLS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill No. 159 (from the Senate), for the relief of Mary Oakley.—Mr. Fripp.

Bill No. 160 (from the Senate), for the relief of Margaret Elizabeth Cooper.—Mr. Mowat.

Bill No. 161 (from the Senate), for the relief of Catherine Burfoot.—Mr. Nesbitt.

Bill No. 163 (from the Senate), for the relief of Thomas Lindsay Thacker.—Mr. Blake.

Bill No. 164 (from the Senate), for the relief of John Durose.—Sir Sam Hughes.

TORONTO UNION STATION.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (York South): Is the Minister of Railways aware that the new Union Station at Toronto, which is being built largely at the expense, either directly or indirectly, of the people of this country, has been completed and is practically ready for occupation, but that for some reason or another the use of it is delayed? Is he also aware that the people of Toronto and of Ontario generally would like to see the splendid accommodation provided in that station for postal, express and passenger business, put at their disposal at the earliest possible date? If some legal difficulty stands in the way, I should like to know whether the Government are prepared to remove that and to give the public the use of the building?

Hon. J. D. REID (Minister of Railways): The work in connection with the new station at Toronto is not and will not be completed for some little time. The work has been delayed on account of strikes and shortage of material. The Terminal Railway Company, who are constructing this station, tell me that every effort is being made to complete it at the earliest possible moment.

S.S. CANADIAN INVENTOR—DELAYED IN SAILING.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (leader of the Opposition): I have in my hand a message sent on behalf of some British Columbia shippers complaining about the delay in sailing of one of the Government Merchant Marine vessels. May I ask the Minister of Marine if he can give to the House any information in regard to the questions asked. The telegram reads:

> Information that steamer Canadian Inventor booked freights March-April loading has not yet sailed or any indication of sailing. Shippers have had orders cancelled on them with tremendous loss. Understand that this boat held up owing to some dispute between Government and contractors over painting boat which means at most few hundred dollars and in any case would not prevent vessel going to sea. Owing to falling market, incompetency and delay on part of Government has made tremendous loss to shippers here. Suggest you make inquiries in respect to this matter.

I am sorry I had not an opportunity to show the telegram to my hon. friend before bringing the matter up in the House. If he has any information, I shall be glad if he will give it.

Hon. C. C. BALLANTYNE (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): At the moment I have only a slight knowledge of the matter, but I shall be very glad to give the hon. member a more complete answer to-morrow. The delay is not due to anything that could be avoided by the builders. I understand it is due to the fact that a strike has existed in the shipyards at Vancouver for some time.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Shelburne and Queen's): May I call the attention of the Government to a case in which they have, I presume, unwittingly, not complied with an Order of the House for a return? On the 19th March an Order was passed for correspondence exchanged between the Canadian and Imperial Governments, and that Order has not yet been complied with. My right hon. friend will find the Order in the Journals for the 19th March. I hope this return will be brought down.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: What is the subject of the correspondence?

Mr. FIELDING: In a previous session, the Government had intimated that a new channel of communication had been established between the Canadian Government and the Imperial Government. The object of the motion for a return was to ascertain if that channel had been utilized.

SUGAR EMBARGO.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. A. ROBB (Chateauguay-Huntingdon): I have in my hand a complaint from the representatives of some Canadian Mercantile houses that 80 carloads of sugar, shipped from the Acadia Refinery Company, of St. John, N.B., to Chicago, Ill., are now held up at Ste. Rosalie Junction, near St. John's, Que., and it is rumoured that they are held up on an embargo order of this Government.

Rt. Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): My hon. friend sent me a note in regard to this matter just a moment ago. I will make inquiry and give him an answer to-morrow. I may say, however, that neither at the present time nor for several months previously to this, have any export licenses been granted for the exportation of refined sugar from Canada to foreign parts.

Mr. FIELDING: There is probably a mistake in the name of the sugar company. The name of the Sugar Refining Company at St. John is the Atlantic Sugar Refinery Company; the Acadia Company operates at Halifax.

LANDING OF IMMIGRANTS AT MONTREAL AND QUEBEC.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. GEORGE PARENT (Quebec West): I am informed that quite a few hundreds of immigrants are presently landing at the port of Quebec, and that owing to lack of accommodation at that port, the shipping companies, like the Canadian Pacific and others, have been making representations to the Government that these immigrants should be allowed to land at Montreal. Is there any truth in that?

Hon. J. A. CALDER (Minister of Immigration and Colonization): Certain representations were made to the Government, not recently, but a considerable time ago, to the effect that instead of landing immigrants at Quebec, further facilities should be provided at Montreal. The reason for this was not on account of lack of facilities at Quebec, because we have very good facilities there. The matter is under consideration and as yet no decision has been reached.

MEN RELEASED ON HABEAS CORPUS RE-ARRESTED.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve and Gaspé): I notice in the press a report that two young men from somewhere near Sherbrooke in Quebec applied recently for a writ of habeas corpus. They had been sentenced to twenty-five years' imprisonment by Mr. Justice Desy of Three Rivers, who happened to sit as a judge of criminal jurisdiction at Sherbrooke. The two young men made application through their counsel, Mr. Cabana, K.C., for a writ of habeas corpus before Mr. Justice Duclos, and the writ was issued by him. I notice in yesterday's press that by order of the Department of Justice at Ottawa the two young men were re-arrested Saturday. Would the Minister of Justice kindly inform the House if the facts as stated are true, and if so, the reasons why the writ of habeas corpus has thus been ignored. This is a very serious matter.

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): As to the facts as stated by the hon. gentleman, I was not aware that these young men had been re-arrested.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I read it in the newspapers.

Mr. DOHERTY: I will inquire as to that. It is a fact that two men who had been found guilty of a very grave crime, and who had been sentenced to a long period in the penitentiary, were some little time ago ordered to be released upon a writ of habeas corpus by a judge of the Superior Court in the province of Quebec. Of the proceedings looking to that writ we had no notice, but I presume the Attorney General of the province was heard upon the application. The application was granted. The matter came to our attention and it was looked into. We were advised that a judge of the Superior Court sitting on a writ of habeas corpus was without jurisdiction to order the release of prisoners duly convicted by a court and duly sentenced by a court of at least equal jurisdiction. When the matter was last brought to my attention the question was then under the consideration as to what steps, if any, it was open for us to take for the purpose of having that question passed upon and determined. As I said, I was not aware that action had actually been taken, but I shall make inquiry and be in a position later to answer fully as to what has been done.

BOARD OF COMMERCE REPORT.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. C. A. FOURNIER (Bellechasse): I desire to ask whether the Board of Commerce, however disabled it may be, has made a report recently to the Government, and if so, when will it be tabled, and whether hon. members will be provided with copies.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: A report has been received. It is very voluminous, and will be laid on the table of the House as soon as possible. After that, we will reach a conclusion as to whether we should proceed to order that it be printed for the use of members.

NEWSPRINT.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. C. G. POWER (South Quebec): May I inquire whether there is any truth in the report, which has obtained wide circulation, to the effect that during the present week, or at all events before the end of the session, legislation will be brought down with regard to newsprint?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Any necessary announcement with regard to that matter will be made in due course.

JUDGES' SALARIES IN THE PROVINCE OF QUEBEC.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT (Chambly and Vercheres): May I inquire from the Minister of Justice if it is the intention of the Government to bring down legislation this session for an increase in the very inadequate salaries of the judges of the province of Quebec?

Mr. DOHERTY: The matter has had consideration. As soon as a conclusion is reached, it will be announced to the House in due course.

CIVIL SERVICE BONUS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. A. C. ETHIER (Laval-Two Mountains): May I be permitted to call the attention of the Government to the fact that the bonus voted by this House for the Civil Service over two months ago has not yet been paid to officials of the House of Commons and of other departments. There have been complaints in this respect. I understand that some of the branches of the Public Works Department, for instance, have not received the bonus for this year. I have been informed that the officials of the Senate received their bonus two months ago, while, as I stated, the officials of the House of Commons have so far received no bonus for this year. I should like to ask the reason for this delay, and I would urge the Government to see that all the civil servants are treated the same in this respect.

Hon. N. W. ROWELL: Evidently there are some members of the Civil Service responsible for the distribution of the bonus who are more industrious than others, judging by the situation my hon. friend has mentioned. My hon. friend will recall the fact that it was only last month that the bonus vote went through the House. I understood that all bonus cheques that had not already gone out would go out on the first of the present month, with the pay cheque for the present month. I do not know why some civil servants should not have received their bonus cheques on the first of the present month, if they did not receive them last month, but I shall make inquiry.

LANDING OF IMMIGRANTS AT MONTREAL AND QUEBEC.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. GEORGE PARENT (West Quebec): I am informed that representations have been made to the Government with a view to the landing of immigrants at the port of Montreal instead of the port of Quebec. Is it the intention of the Government to choose one port rather than the other for this purpose?

Hon. J. A. CALDER (Minister of Immigration and Colonization): In reply to the question of my hon. friend, which is very similar to the question which was asked before, at present immigrants are being landed at Montreal, but the great majority are being landed at Quebec. The question of providing further facilities at Montreal has been under consideration for some time.

MINISTERS' SALARIES AND MEMBERS' INDEMNITY.

L'ordre du jour étant appelé:

M. D. A. LAFORTUNE (Jacques-Cartier): Monsieur l'Orateur, je désirerais savoir du très honorable premier ministre si le Gouvernement a l'intention d'augmenter le traitement des ministres. Votre humble serviteur est d'opinion que les ministres ne se rendent pas justice—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I must ask the hon. member to submit that question after giving notice in the usual way. It has no element of urgency whatsoever.

M. D. A. LAFORTUNE: Monsieur l'Orateur, je désirerais aussi savoir du très honorable premier ministre s'il a l'intention d'augmenter le traitement des députés et des juges. Je crois que c'est absolument nécessaire et urgent.

Mr. SPEAKER: This question is not of a character which can properly be submitted on the Orders of the Day. I have no objection to its being put if the Government chooses to answer.

Mr. BUREAU: Answer in the affirmative.

Le Très Honorable sir ROBERT BORDEN: La question que l'honorable député a posée n'est pas très urgente.

M. R. LANCTOT: Tres bien, très bien.

WAR MEMORIAL.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (leader of the Opposition): The War Memorial Board recently presented to Parliament a report in regard to a memorial building to be erected in this country. I have been asked on behalf of the Canadian architects to inquire as to whether a report which has appeared in the press to the effect that the contract for this building has been awarded to an Old Country architect is or is not correct.

Rt. Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): I have no information on the subject at the moment, but if my hon. friend will let the matter stand for the time being I shall look into it.

CUSTOMS TARIFF ACT, 1907, AMENDMENT.

On motion of Sir Henry Drayton (Minister of Finance) Bill No. 156 to amend the Customs Tariff Act, 1907, was read the third time and passed.

BUSINESS PROFITS WAR TAX ACT, 1916, AMENDMENT.

On motion of Sir Henry Drayton (Minister of Finance) Bill No. 157 to amend the Business Profits War Tax Act, 1916, was read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Steele in the Chair.

On section 1—amount of tax charged.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Do the words "capital employed" in subsection (2) mean the original capital invested?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is no change in the main provisions of the Act relating to capital employed. The change has reference to the rate, so that the tax, so far as the question of capital is concerned, will be levied exactly as it has been in the past.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Has the tax been levied on the original capital invested?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The actual cash capital invested. This question is covered under section 7 of the main Act which provides that the capital employed in a business or an incorporated company shall be the amount paid up upon its capital stock.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—operation of Act extended for another year.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is the change here?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The effect of the whole section is to extend the time for the operation of the business profits tax twelve months.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I wish to emphasize the point I raised the other day in regard to the exemption from taxation of companies ninety per cent of whose capital is owned by a municipality or a province. This provision undoubtedly constitutes a discrimination, and notwithstanding anything which my hon. friend may say to the contrary, its effect will be that the operations of one particular business in my own province will bring to the treasury of the country over three-quarters of a million dollars per year, while the same business in Ontario will not contribute a single cent to the public. I say that taxation should be the same in all parts of the country, and there is no reason why corporations or companies, a portion of whose capital is owned by a province or a municipality, should be exempt. When a province or a municipality enters business it should be treated in precisely the same way as an individual or a private corporation is treated. The minister says that the reason why these corporations in regard to which I complain are exempt is that they will not make any profits. Well, if that is so why put an exemption clause in the Bill? There is a clause which exempts them from paying when their profit does not exceed a certain sum. My hon. friend says that they will not have any profit because they are not conducted for the purpose of making profits. Then why do you put an exemption in the Bill? On the other hand, privately owned companies are forbidden by a section of the original law to decrease their rates, as was suggested by an hon. member the other day. Those companies cannot decrease their rates without the leave of the minister; if the minister finds that the price they are charging is too low they can be prevented from decreasing their rates. I do not see why there should be a difference between privately owned companies and public concerns.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): I would like to say something in regard to that particular point and in regard to the operations of the organizations to which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lapointe) has directed attention. Our organizations in Ontario are based on the idea of public service and not profit and if they have profits they distribute them amongst those who are associated with them. If the Hydro-Electric Commission of Ontario makes any profits it distributes them amongst the municipalities by means of a reduction in the rates charged for electricity. Because of that, there are practically no profits. They do not desire to build up profits but they do seek to give a public service at cost price and if that is the case why should they be taxed or interfered with under legislation of this kind?

Mr. PARENT: I have nothing to say in answer to my hon. friend from South York (Mr. Maclean), except that if the Hydro-Electric Commission is what he says it is, to the extent that they call it a company instead of a commission, I am inclined to believe that that organization in Ontario would be practically a private concern. The Government of Ontario had a right to give away whatever powers they deemed it advisable to give to a particular corporation. If it is no longer the province of Ontario that is distributing electrical power, I see no reason why this company should not be taxed the same as any other company doing business in a similar way. The province of Quebec has also a good many companies distributing power and electrical energy. The people who have invested their money in such projects paid taxes to the Government at the rate of $740,000 last year, while in Ontario, just because the Government has created a special corporation, depending to a certain extent on the province, that company will not pay a cent into the federal exchequer. That is unfair competition. If the Government of Ontario has seen fit to create a special corporation, that corporation should be a corporation like any other and be liable to pay taxes the same as any other. The answer to that contention is that such a corporation is not looking for profit. That is no reason in my opinion because if you take the profits and invest them in your own business again—which private corporations are prevented from being done by law—there is no reason why a corporation like that in Ontario, having a right to do that, should be exempted from taxes. The fact that in Ontario this corporation have a right to put their money back into the improvement of their property is no reason why they should be exempted from taxation. Take the capital they have put into the proposition, take whatever profit they have made since and then find how much they should pay into the public exchequer the same as any other private citizen or corporation.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): The municipalities of Ontario and other portions of the Dominion have the right to use their money and their organization for the distribution, say, of water. They never seek to acquire profit in that manner. They do a large business in that way, and they have a large income. If a city owns its own water system it gives a public service but the money turn over is not profit and such an organization is not called upon to pay taxes on profits.

Mr. LAPOINTE: If they are not going to make any profit, what is the use of exempting them from the Excess Profits Tax? If they are making no profit they will have no Excess profits tax to pay.

[Mr. Parent.]

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): But the hon. gentleman is trying to make them pay whether they have any profit or not.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, but I do not want them to be treated in a manner different from any other corporation.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not know that I can usefully add very much to what I have already said on this subject. Rightly or wrongly, certain municipal and governmental activities are looked upon as being in a different position from the activities of a private corporation, one set of activities being carried on for gain on the one hand and the other for service. This question is not merely one between what is perhaps the largest example of that doctrine in the concrete, the Ontario Hydro-Electric system and private owned companies, but it is a question between private owned companies and a very great number of our municipalities throughout the whole country. Winnipeg for example, has a very excellent electrical plant, it has a large turn over in connection with the supply of electrical power, it is carrying its investment and carrying it properly out of its rates and it is providing for a sinking fund. It is carried along exactly in the same way as the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario. I do not know that it is really necessary that the exemption should be put in but now that the question is raised, it certainly, I think, ought to stand.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Why?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Because I have never heard of legislation in a province taxing by right of the province the property of His Majesty as represented by the Dominion; nor have I ever heard of legislation by His Majesty as represented by the Dominion taxing the property of His Majesty as represented by the province.

Mr. PARENT: Does the hon. gentleman not realize that the minute the Government of Ontario, or any other government, parts with its rights by handing them over to a private corporation, his argument falls to the ground?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would entirely agree with my hon. friend if that were the case. But that is not the case. By no stretch of imagination could a municipality be regarded as a private corporation or could the Hydro-Electric Power Commission be referred to as a private company.

It has absolutely none of the adjuncts of a private company.

Mr. PARENT: Could action be taken against the corporation itself?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No action could be taken against the Hydro-Electric Power Commission except on a fiat because it is recognized that it is part of the machinery of the Government of Ontario. It is not in the same position as a company. It has never been found feasible for the Crown as represented by the Dominion to tax the Crown as represented by a province or vice versa. That is a fundamental principle which I am sure will commend itself to every hon. gentleman. It is well that it should be made clear at once that concerns which are not incorporated for the purpose of profit, or concerns set on foot by reason of the action of municipalities or provinces, not for the purpose of making profits, need not do any accounting under this system. There would be no use in doing it if they never could have profits. They ought not to make profits. If they make profits it is against the whole policy which is to give the cheapest and best service after providing for a sinking fund. It can hardly be said that there is any real discrimination between a company on the one hand earning dividends in excess of ten per cent, and a municipality or a government, or a governmental commission that earns no dividends at all. the matter I think, as I said before, is entirely in the hands of these people. With much deference to the representations made by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) I am still of the view that companies need not earn excessive profits unless they want to, and they are not taxed unless they do earn excessive profits. I know of no provision of the Act which prevents them from reducing rates. Perhaps my hon. friend could refer me to the section.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, subsection 6 of section 6 of the original Act, 1916.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But that does not do it. Perhaps I had better read the section:

> Where an incorporated company conducts its business, whether under agreement or otherwise, in such manner as either directly or indirectly to benefit its shareholders or any of them or any person directly or indirectly interested in such company by selling its product or the goods and commodities in which it deals at less than the fair price which might be obtained therefor, the minister may for the purposes of this Act determine the amount which shall be deemed to be the profits of such company for any accounting period, and in determining such amount the minister shall have regard to the fair price which, but for any agreement, arrangement or understanding might be or could have been obtained for such product, goods and commodities.

There is nothing in the world to say that these people, in the carrying on of their business, cannot reduce their costs to what the Act itself looks upon as a fair price—namely a price which will result in a gain which cannot be called excessive, a gain which will not exceed ten per cent.

Mr. FIELDING: Is the Hydro-Electric Commission of Ontario—my hon. friend of course will know—declared by the legislation concerning it to be a body corporate or is it not?

An hon. MEMBER: That is the point.

Mr. FIELDING: I am not considering the question of whether or not it earns dividends or profits. If it is declared to be a corporation, with all the powers, privileges and responsibilities of a corporation, I think it should be taxed. If it is not a corporation, if it can only be assailed by fiat as the Minister of Finance says, I think it changes the situation. If the Hydro-Electric Commission is a body corporate it is going to stand in the same position as the Canadian National Railways Company, and in the latter case, although the Canadian National Railways Company is owned by the Government, assurances have been given to municipalities, that when the Government takes possession of the Grand Trunk, under the arrangement recently made, the right of taxation by the municipalities will remain. In that case they are going to treat the Canadian National Railways, with the consent of the Government, as a private corporation, or if you like it, a public corporation. Whether it earns dividends or profits or not does not touch the point, it seems to me; the whole thing turns on the name. What is in a name? Sometimes a good deal. If this commission is declared by the legislation of Ontario to be a corporate body politic I think it should be taxed..

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The Hydro-Electric Commission is merely a governmental commission charged with a trust in favour of the municipalities.

Mr. FIELDING: And the Canadian National Railways Company is charged with a trust by the Dominion Government.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I submit, with all due deference, that at any rate that is not the way in which the directors of ordinary companies regard themselves, whether they be a railway or anything else. I have an idea that they are looking towards the fruits of an investment in which they are particularly interested, and that is something they never allow to escape their attention. In connection with the Hydro-Electric Power Commission, the real question, after all, is whose property is it. The property certainly does not belong to that commission but belongs to the Government and will become the property of the municipalities when they have paid the whole amount of the moneys which were necessary in order to create the property. The property is the property of His Majesty in the right of the province.

Mr. FIELDING: If the question is only one as to whom the property belongs, I must again use the illustration of the Canadian National Railways. The Grand Trunk railway is now virtually the property of the Crown but inasmuch as the Government have declared by legislation that it belongs to the Canadian National Railways Company, a corporation, the cities and towns of Canada are going to tax the railway property. So I think myself the minister cannot get back to the general question of whose property this is, because if he takes that view he will not allow any city or town in Canada to tax the Grand Trunk.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: With all due deference, taxation is a matter of strict legal enactment. Ownership also is something which is determined by strict legal enactment, or contract, as the case may be. Now while it is true that the Crown may only own a share of stock in an incorporated company it is true that the company, so long as it is continued as an existing entity —owning and administering the property— may be taxed; and in the same way the principle is not offended when the Crown, instead of owning one share in a company, owns all the shares; the operations are still carried on as in right of the company. Ownership is owned by that company, and the Government are merely owners of the stock. I admit it is a technical distinction but most distinctions are technical.

Mr. BUREAU: This is a restriction.

Mr. FIELDING: I repeat my question: Is or is not the Ontario Hydro-Electric Power Commission a body corporate?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That commission is specifically declared to be a body corporate—

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear.

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON:—for the purpose of carrying out the trust set out in the document. I know of nothing which vests the property in them. I know of nothing which places them in the same position as a company which would give them the right to set up a claim to the property.

Mr. BUREAU: There is a special provision in the Hydro-Electric Power Commission Act of 1917 which exempts that body from taxation. Section 12 (a) says:

> Notwithstanding anything in the Assessment Act contained, land owned by and vested in the Commission shall be subject to assessment at the actual value thereof according to the average value of the land in the locality.

Here the commission are taxed for municipal purposes. The Act goes on to say:

> (2) Subsection 1 shall not apply to or include buildings, machinery, works, structures, substructures, superstructures, rails, ties, poles and other property works or improvements owned, used or controlled by the commission, nor an easement in land not owned by the Commission, but all such buildings, machinery, works, structures, substructures, superstructures, rails, ties, poles and other property, works or improvements, owned, used or controlled by the Commission, and every such easement or right, shall continue to be exempt from assessment and taxation as heretofore.

It would appear that the land surrounding the line that they use for transmission purposes is taxed municipally; and if the municipality has the right to tax the commission why would not the Federal Government have the right to do the same thing?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would have thought that there is a clear distinction. My hon. friend will see, in the first instance, this body politic has absolutely no moneys of its own whatever. It gets all its moneys—here I speak subject to correction, I have not read the statute over for a long time—from the Ontario Government. Those moneys are voted to it, or else they are moneys which are raised by bonds of the municipalities with the assent of the Government, the proceeds of which go to this commission, but of ownership, similar to the ownership of the company it has none. Its sole ownership therefore—if you like to call it ownership—is subject to the trust of the province, or the trust of the municipality. Now it is perfectly true that in so far as local lands which are in the possession of this commission are now taxable they were not there made specially taxable on the same theory that lands belonging to the Canadian National Railways are made taxable in the different municipalities through which they pass.

It would be unfair to these municipalities if they should get nothing out of it. For years they did get nothing out of it; they are now allowed to get something out of it. The province can make any law it likes imposing charges upon its property for the benefit of the municipality; we can make any law we like charging our property for the benefit of the municipality. We did so this year in connection with Ottawa. But that is a very different thing from the proposal that because a province thought fit to tax its property for the purpose of helping some of its other institutions, we for our purposes can tax provincial property.

Mr. BUREAU: The Legislature has the power that my hon. friend has mentioned. It also has the power to make itself a body corporate. When it does that it comes under the general rules applicable to all corporations. They may legislate that they will pay certain taxes on certain things, and having done so they are not exempted under the General Assessment Act of Ontario, section 12A of which provides that land owned by the company shall be assessed at its actual value, taking into consideration the value of surrounding property. Now, the Legislature of Ontario has chosen, having the power to do so, to abandon its rights as a legislature in respect to certain matters and to hand over those rights and powers to a company. If they want to finance that company or to endorse its notes, that is a different thing. If the company cannot pay its obligations the Provincial Government has to come to its rescue. But that does not do away with the fact that this commission comes under the company law of Ontario to all intents and purposes, except as regards the restrictions imposed in the statute creating the commission.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I should have thought it was quite clear that this commission could not possibly come within the provisions of the Joint Stock Companies' Act of Ontario. I do not think that a company which is without capital would be recognized as such by any of our companies Acts. Here there is absolutely no capital, absolutely no issue of stock.

Mr. LAPOINTE: We are not discussing the Hydro-Electric of Ontario exclusively. My hon. friend says that there is no issue of stock in that instance. Well, section 5 of the Business Profits War Tax Act exempts the business of any company, commission or association not less than ninety per cent of the stock or capital of which is owned by a province or a municipality. So there is certainly some stock there, because it is stated to be owned by a municipality or a province. Now, my hon. friend says that the fact that a portion of the stock is owned by the Crown or by the province should prevent us from taxing.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Oh no, it does not unless we say so.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Why should the Bill establish an exemption where ninety per cent of the stock or capital is owned by a province or municipality? If only eighty-five per cent of the stock is so owned, the tax provided for by this legislation cannot be applied. Surely my hon. friend will admit that when a company is specially incorporated for the purpose of carrying on a particular trade, whatever be the proportion of the stock owned by a province or municipality, that company is still an incorporated body absolutely independent from and different from the province or the Crown.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I agree.

Mr. LAPOINTE: As to the other argument of my hon. friend that this does not constitute any discrimination, I wish to point out that section 6 of the Act provides as follows:

> No deductions from the gross profits for depreciation or for any expenditure of a capital nature for renewals, or for the development of a business, or otherwise in respect of the business, shall be allowed, except such amount as appears to the minister to be reasonable and to be properly attributable to the accounting period, and the minister when determining the profits derived from mining shall make an allowance for the exhaustion of the mines.

As to the other section read by my hon. friend, I fail to interpret it in the same way that he does. The publicly owned company, as stated by my hon. friend from South York (Mr. W. F. Maclean) instead of making profits, reduces the rates or employs the profits in the development of its business, while a privately owned company cannot do that without the approval of the minister. So the consumers are suffering,—and that is the point I emphasize. The consumers of a certain article in one part of the country are deprived of a benefit which consumers of a similar article in another part of the country enjoy. My second point is this: after all, it does not speak very favourably for the publicly owned companies that the federal treasury should get three-quarters of a million dollars out of the carrying on by privately owned companies of a certain trade in the province of Quebec, whereas in Ontario corporations which are carrying on the same business do not pay one cent to the federal treasury. On its face that is unfair.

Mr. MACLEAN (York South): While I am not a lawyer and cannot go into the intricacies of this discussion, I may point out that there is a great movement in favour of public ownership. Public ownership is designed to give service, not to afford profit, the Ontario Hydro-Electric Commission have taken over a number of private companies. Take the case of the Ontario Power Company which, before it was taken over by the Hydro-Electric, would have been liable to pay under this law a contribution in the shape of taxes. The remedy for my hon. friend's friends in Quebec, if there be discrimination, lies in the province of Quebec following the example of the province of Ontario. I make the prediction that within the next ten years the province of Quebec will own its power just as Ontario does, and we intend to acquire more power plants and to develop and administer them for the purpose, not of making a profit but of giving service, and if in giving that service there be any surplus, of devoting that surplus to a reduction of rates. Each section of the community that undertakes to consecrate its capital and efforts towards giving a public service at cost, is justified in doing that, and it ought to be encouraged. That is largely the direction in which the world is moving, namely, to turn public services over to the State or to the municipalities.

Mr. LAPOINTE: And escape taxation.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): Perhaps to escape taxation; but to do something better, to give service at actual cost, to eliminate profits. The hon. gentleman wants to change that tendency which has manifested itself in Ontario in a number of municipalities and which it is perfectly right for those municipalities to follow. If somebody be hurt in the matter or if there be any discrimination, the fault does not lie against those municipalities or public organizations that undertake to give this public service. It is open to Quebec to do the same thing.

Mr. BUREAU: We are doing better and we do not want to go back.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): You now are trying to lay down a law. If the people, in their organization as a municipality, or as an association of municipalities, as is the case in Ontario, undertake to give this service without profit, in order to reduce the cost and to give the entire profit to the people, they should not be subjected to a tax of this kind. If there be a discrimination, it is not their fault.

Mr. ROBB: The debate seems to be drifting into a question between public ownership and private ownership, and listening to the debate, I think that had the Government carried out the policy enunciated by the predecessor of the present Minister of Finance, there would be no room for such a discussion to-day. My recollection is that in presenting the business profits tax last session, the then Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) gave the House and the country clearly to understand that the business profits tax would not be renewed this year, but that it would be replaced by an income tax. An income tax is absolutely sound; every person pays; but a business profits tax does not work out to the advantage of this country. Only last week, we listened to the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) delivering his Budget Speech, in which he clearly intimated that activity and production had been lessened during the past year. Why? Because the money that would have been used to extend business and enlarge industries was gathered in by the Government, and there was no incentive for industries to go on and extend their business. That is one reason why to-day the Minister of Finance is compelled to acknowledge to the House and to the country that there has been a lessened activity throughout Canada during the past year. The best way to avoid this controversy as between public ownership and private ownership is to get back to the promises made by the predecessor of the Minister of Finance and to do away with this business profits tax which is an injury to our industries and to Canada. Capital is very timid, and I ask the Minister of Finance how many new industries have been established throughout Canada during the past two or three years; how many new industries are being established to-day and how many industries are being extended to meet the ever increasing trade that we boast of?

Mr. BUREAU: You must except Three Rivers.

Mr. ROBB: There are practically none, and there is no justification for the argument advanced by our friends from Ontario who oppose the suggestion of my hon. friend (Mr. Lapointe). If the publicly owned and operated utilities of Ontario are not making profits, there will be nothing to pay. All we ask is that you put them on the same basis as similar industries in the other provinces. But I go further and suggest to the Minister of Finance that at this session he should make a reassuring statement to the people of Canada that he is going to do away with a tax that is preventing the formation of new industries and the extension of old ones. The sooner that statement is made, the better for Canada, if we intend to continue developing our industries so as to meet the increasing trade that is open to the world.

Mr. BUREAU: After the statement made by my hon. friend (Mr. W. F. Maclean) about the advantages of the system that obtains in Ontario and discriminates against the other provinces, I do not want my hon. friend to think that we are specially pleading for Quebec. If, by any process of law, you are going to exempt Ontario from the payment of taxation, somebody else has to make up the amount. Supposing under the capitalization of the Hydro-Electric Commission of Ontario, they would have to pay a tax of half a million dollars, if they are exempted from paying it, that sum has to be found somewhere else. If hon. members want to speak about unfairness, there is another thing that is unfair. This commission, posing as a provincial institution, goes outside of its province and induces manufacturers to come in, with what result? I have here the report of the Canada Cement Company for the 31st December, 1919. This is what they say:

As advised in our last Annual Report, we were unable in 1918, to operate your No. 8 plant, situated at Port Colborne, on account of the failure of the power company to supply power. Since March, 1919, The Ontario power Company, which is owned by the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario, has resumed the supply of power to this plant, but we regret the power company is not delivering power in accordance with the terms of its contract, and the service given is so poor that the output of your No. 8 mill is only about 60% of normal, and therefore, its operation is not profitable. This matter has been repeatedly taken up with the power company, but, as yet, the service has not been improved. Until the power company improves the service and supplies power in accordance with the terms of its contract, we cannot look forward to the profitable operation of this mill.

If my hon. friend wants some more examples of the great success the Hydro-Electric Commission have had, let me tell him that a Mr. Cousins went to England, where he advocated the great superiority of the Hydro-Electric system of Ontario. He returned to Canada and he wanted the power. What answer did he receive? I have here a clipping from an Ontario paper, The Times, which reads:

A. M. Russell, President of Baldwin's Canadian Steel Corporation, announces that orders have been issued to Roger Miller and Son, who have a million dollar plant construction contract, to cease operations as the result of failure to secure a contract from the Hydro-Electric Commission guaranteeing an adequate supply of power to operate their plant.

Mr. BURNHAM: What has this to do with the matter under discussion?

Mr. BUREAU: This is to show that, from start to finish, the business works a disadvantage and a hardship on the other provinces, and that the law ought to be amended so that these companies should pay a tax on their capitalization, the same as any ordinary company.

Mr. BURNHAM: The only subject now before the committee is an excess profits tax. If we are going to fight out the question of private versus public ownership, let us take a day off and do that.

Mr. BUREAU: No, we had better go outside and fight it out. We are talking generally about the tax on corporations. My hon. friend was telling us that Quebec ought to follow the example of Ontario. I say: No; as long as privately-owned companies can give us as good service and perhaps better than you are getting, because our companies are never short of power, and we get it at a lower rate than you are paying. why should you want to get the Crown mixed up in this business in order to forego taxation? Where is the Government going to get its revenue if every public utility is going to be put under the control of the State? Supposing the Canadian Pacific were owned by the State, where would their tax of $6,000,000 go to? The Government would not get it, and my friends and myself and the masses of the people throughout the country would have to make up the amount.

Mr. BURNHAM: Does not the hon. gentleman prove too much when he says that the people of Quebec by reason of reduced rates from private companies get power at less cost—that is one end—and then get a profit—that is the other end? $100,000, say, for the decreased rate, and $100,000 for excess profits; that makes $200,000. In Ontario it is not the same at all.

Mr. BUREAU: You get no end because in Quebec to get a cheap rate and a profit you must have good management and economy. I have nothing to say against the Hydro Electric. They can run their business as long as I have not got to pay for it, but the moment they are exempt I have to pay, and I say it is not right. You should not expect the other provinces to pay for the Hydro Electric of Ontario.

Mr. LEMIEUX: We have lower rates in Montreal than in Toronto.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I am sure the people of Ontario will appreciate the apparent solicitude shown in their behalf by the hon. member for Quebec East and the hon. member for Three Rivers. Those who recall the initiation of the Hydro Electric Power Commission by the government of Ontario will recall the many arguments that were then advanced similar to those that have been made here this afternoon. It is rather remarkable that while the hon. member for Quebec East and the hon. member for Three Rivers apparently started out with the same objective, the hon. member for Quebec East is considerably in advance of the hon. member for Three Rivers, in that he admits that the consumers are going to reap the advantage in Ontario, while the hon. member for Three Rivers claims they are going to suffer by reason of public ownership. I can hardly reconcile those two views. My hon. friends need not get so worked up; Hydro Electric in Ontario cannot become liable for taxation under the Bill before the House, because there are no profits to be taxed. Consequently, it is an absolute waste of time to discuss this matter this afternoon. I think the suggestion of the hon. member for Peterborough was a good one. If hon. gentlemen opposite cannot contain themselves but have to boil over on every occasion where Ontario is in advance of Quebec. I think if we had a day off to discuss where favours are shown we could show that Ontario has contributed very generously towards enterprises in the province of Quebec. Railways, for instance, experimental farms, and some other things I might mention. The hon. member for Huntingdon pointed out that capital is nervous in this country. Oh, how much we heard about the nervousness of capital eighteen years ago when this scheme was first launched in the province of Ontario. I can tell my hon. friends that the people of Ontario are pretty well satisfied with the Hydro Electric. It is not perfect by any means, but they are endeavouring to carry out the project, and it has proven to be a great asset to this province.

The hon. member for Three Rivers referred to the lack of power for certain companies—the cement company at Port Colborne, and Roger Miller and Son Company. It is true they are short of power. Why? Because before the Hydro-Electric Commission was organized, private corporations secured control of nearly all the power that was available at Niagara Falls. There was embodied in the contracts which were made by the Government of the day with these private companies a provision that the Government of Ontario could not enter into competition with them in the development of power at Niagara Falls. These companies have been exporting, as they had a right to do, under their contracts, thousands of horse-power to the United States, and the people of Ontario suffer as a result of private ownership in this province. I believe that the Hydro-Electric has been the greatest benefit the province of Ontario has ever experienced, and notwithstanding the arguments that have been advanced by those who are opposed to public ownership of public utilities in this country it is going to continue to be a success, and a much greater success in the future than in the past. By reason of this provision that was inserted in the contracts with private companies the Ontario Government has been forced to develop power at Chippewa Falls and other places at an expenditure of many millions of dollars.

Reference has been made to the municipalities taxing the commission on the land. These lands were expropriated from the municipalities, the municipalities under the British North America Act have power to levy taxes for municipal purposes. The municipalities were originally the owners of these lands and they are simply continuing to assess the properties that have been expropriated. The Government of Ontario are simply furnishing and expending the money and charging it up to the various municipalities concerned in the undertaking, which so far has been mainly transmitting power to municipalities. I cannot see any object in continuing this discussion here this afternoon, unless it be, as I believe it is, an attempt by certain hon. gentlemen opposite to discredit public ownership in this country. They do not want to give it a fair chance. From the outset public ownership has encountered stiffer opposition possibly than any other development that has ever been attempted in the interests of the people. I admit that Hydro-Electric is not perfect; nothing is perfect; you cannot expect perfection. If the hon. member for Three Rivers and the hon. member for Quebec East, who, I understand, had this matter up at a previous sitting of the House, are determined to go on and discuss the pros and cons of public ownership in this country, if they are going to encroach on the good nature of the House, because their attitude cannot be considered otherwise—

Mr. LAPOINTE: You are speaking much longer than I did.

Mr. SUTHERLAND:—we might just as well understand the situation, because it is certainly not the Bill before the House that has been occupying so much of their time.

Mr. LAPOINTE: You are occupying the time; I am not.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: You started it and have taken your time.

Mr. ROBB: Is the minister prepared to make a statement as to the continuation of this tax?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I endeavoured to make myself pretty plain on this question. The taxation was a war taxation. It was a taxation whose incidence was not capable of being applied without a good deal of unfairness. That has been developed in the debate in committee the other day, and again to-day. The tax was a rough and ready way of getting revenue at a time when rough and ready methods were necessary, and, after all, it did bring into the treasury a large amount of the profits which were unnecessarily large. It is a tax which you cannot drop at the moment, but it ought to be dropped just as soon as possible. If hon. members are helpful in seeing that measure go through that will get the Government lots of revenue, there will be not much danger of the tax being continued.

Mr. ROBB: May I suggest to the minister that we on this side will willingly assist him in measures that will tend towards economy instead of the extravagance we have had during the past few years.

Mr. VIEN: Might I suggest that the minister drop the idea, for instance, of erecting expensive buildings for the Mounted Police at Ottawa at a cost of $500,000, to keep 225 mounted policemen in Ottawa just for the purpose of parading our streets. I think there is ample room there for economy.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member is out of order in discussing that question at this stage.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—capital in case of merger of companies:

Mr. McKENZIE: Will the minister explain this section?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It means that in this day of mergers we are endeavouring to see that companies shall not escape the taxation which ought to be paid by reason of the introduction of water into the capital of merged companies. We are endeavouring to see that the taxation which ought to be paid will not escape exaction by reason of the introduction of water into the capital of the merged companies. In other words, when company A is incorporated into company B, the capital is not increased by that merger beyond the addition of the two capitals.

Mr. ROBB: This section refers to two or more incorporated companies merged or consolidated at any time after the first of January, 1916. Does the minister intend this to be retroactive, and will he collect additional taxes from that time?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Not at all. It simply carries out what we have done; we think every one should be treated in the same way.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

INCOME WAR TAX ACT, 1917, AMENDMENT.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 158 to amend the Income War Tax Act, 1917.

Mr. DEVLIN: Explain.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The present Bill carries into effect the taxation changes as to incomes as proposed by the Budget Speech and as covered by the resolutions that have been passed, with certain minor amendments which I shall refer to as they are reached.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Steele in the Chair.

On section 1—dividends.

Mr. LEMIEUX: May I remind my hon. friend of the remarks made the other day by the ex-Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers)? The Income Tax Act is practically incomprehensible by reason of its many amendments, and I would suggest to my hon. friend that this is an opportune moment for him to consolidate the various provisions of the Act.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Next year, I think, will be the proper time to consolidate them. The Act in England has been amended from time to time; it is amended every year. I think we may consolidate the different provisions of our Act next year.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will the minister explain the effect of this amendment?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In the administration of this tax we have always treated stock dividends as income, exactly as if money were paid in actual cash. Where companies do not pay dividends but issue stock, which is really a bonus, to their shareholders the stock dividend is treated the same as money. The Finance Department of the United States has always treated stock dividends in the same way, but since they adopted that principle the Supreme Court of the United States has declared it bad law and taxes paid on stock dividends have had to be returned. We have always treated stock dividends as taxable and we shall continue to do so, but it is considered better, so far as we are concerned, that the matter should be made free from all doubt by the inclusion of the words:

—"dividends" shall include stock dividends.

Mr. PARENT: What will be the basis of taxation on stock which is issued at 100 but which when put on the market is sold at 50?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The justification of the dividend is the distribution of surplus. The question is, how much was that surplus reduced by issue of the dividend? To the extent that you take money out of surplus account, whether by payment of dividend or through the issuing of stock, you lift it from one column and put it into the other and to that extent you are taxed.

Mr. PARENT: Suppose a company issues to its shareholders stock which is afterwards quoted on the market at 50. Will the shareholder be taxed on the basis of 100, the value of the stock when he received it, or on the basis of the market quotation?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The price has nothing to do with it. The question of what is paid outside has nothing to do with it. It is a question of the change in the company's surplus and the percentage by which that particular shareholder benefits by that change.

Mr. PARENT: We are now discussing the income war tax?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes.

Mr. PARENT: Is that applicable to a company or to an individual?

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is applicable to a company in so far as it is a direct tax to the extent of ten per cent.

Mr. CURRIE: There is undoubtedly a misunderstanding in connection with this matter and we might as well clear it up. We will take the case of a company that has a large surplus. The surplus of that company is not taxable and it may, and invariably is, invested in plant, machinery and stock. If the company pays a stock dividend it reduces that surplus by so much and issues stock against it. The company has got its surplus capital invested in additional plant and machinery and it has issued stock against that. That is quite clear; anybody can follow that. In the United States they undertook to tax these stock dividends that had been issued by large corporations. The surplus is taken and re-invested and capital stock is issued against it. That is exactly the procedure that an ordinary individual follows if he increases the capacity of his mill. He takes his surplus earnings, makes an addition to his factory and puts in more machinery. The United States Government undertook to tax stock dividends. The question was argued before the Supreme Court and the court held that this was surplus of the company and that although stock was issued against it, it was not taxable. That is the condition of affairs in the United States. This Government wants to see whether we can tax further than they do in the United States. They are not going to leave Canadian companies in the same position as American companies. Of course we want a lot of American companies to come in here and develop our resources and this will be a very great inducement for them to come in. I do not think it is good policy to say that stock dividends are taxable. As a matter of law that was argued in the United States and the Supreme Court decided against that policy. Regardless of what the minister tells the House that is a fact. It is a question for the House to consider whether we are prepared to go further than the United States have gone. I think the more gracious procedure for this Government to follow would be to accept the American precedent and declare that stock dividends shall not be taxable. I think hon. gentlemen understand the point. The surplus capital is invested in plant and machinery and stock is issued against that capital. That becomes the property of the stockholders of the undertaking and it gives them that amount of additional capital.

Mr. DuTREMBLAY: Do I understand that depreciation will be taxed by this new clause?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Depreciation cannot be distributed if it is properly charged.

Mr. VIEN: May I draw the attention of the minister to the construction which may be put on those words "stock dividends"? The minister has given us, very properly, the policy of the department which is to tax the actual money which is taken and distributed but which instead of being distributed to the shareholders goes to the treasury of the company and stock is issued in lieu thereof. That is the policy of the department but the law does not say that. The law does not say that the tax is due on the face value of the shares given in dividends or any money which is actually taken from the treasury as liquid assets and put back into another account in the books of the company. There may be a misunderstanding as to the interpretation of the law. The minister has given the department's construction of the law but the law will be submitted to the interpretation of the tribunals and it is possible that they may put upon the terms of the law a different construction and may take the face value of the stock as the amount of dividends distributed instead of the actual amount of money which, instead of being distributed as a cash dividend has been put back under a different heading in the books of the company, shares for that capital investment being issued and distributed in lieu thereof. I think the wording of this provision might be improved.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I would like to ask how this clause would operate if the dividend shares paid happened to be shares of no par value such as are being issued in the United States very largely and likely in this country also.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not think there will be very much trouble in that regard. What is done is this: You must have a surplus in a properly managed company, in order to enable you to have a stock dividend. The theory of a stock dividend is that a company, having money or assets in its hands which it would not desire to distribute to the shareholders but would require to keep in its own possession, issues in place of that money or cash a stock dividend. It would make in practice no difference whether you gave dividends or gave specific shares. The amount that is realized, or that is taxable, is the amount of the surplus which ceases to be the property of the company as a company and becomes the property of the shareholders as the result of the issue of that new stock.

Mr. McCURDY: I would like to ask if these surpluses, to which allusion is made, and against which additional stock is issued, have not already paid a tax in the form of the special tax on corporations? As I understand, a company pays the corporation tax on its earnings during the year and if it achieves a surplus, that surplus has already paid a tax in the form of the corporation tax.

Mr. NESBITT: As I understand it, stock dividends are treated, when received by individual shareholders as cash dividends, in calculating the income of an individual shareholder?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes.

Mr. NESBITT: It therefore increases the issued stock of the corporation.

Mr. CURRIE: I would like to hear from the minister whether he proposes to follow the American practice or go them one better.

Mr. FIELDING: Do not talk about "trade with the Yankees."

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is proposed is to continue what we have done and to make no difference between the earnings which are distributed as cash dividends on the one hand and the earnings which are distributed as stock dividends on the other. In so far as the American situation is concerned it was obvious, of course, that they would do just exactly what we have been doing and as a matter of fact—although their Supreme Court, as I stated in opening, said that the Act was unconstitutional, —legislation, as I am at present advised, is now pending which will get away from the defects of the former Act and allow the tax to be levied.

Mr. VIEN: What I am afraid of, Mr. Chairman, is that if a question should go to the courts the courts may take as a basis of the taxation, not the actual cash which is disposed of by the company but the face value of the stock issued in dividends. There is nothing in the Act which says that the actual basis of the Act shall be the cash so distributed. The cash is not distributed, I understand—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is all that could be taken, the hon. gentleman will see.

Mr. VIEN: No.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is only what the company gives up to the shareholder that could be taxed.

Mr. VIEN: No, because you say that the tax shall apply to stock dividends. If you issue stock at the par value of twenty-five, for instance, you can tax on the face value of the stock issued, and you are still within the application of the law. There is nothing stated to the effect that it is the cash which is the basis of the dividends distributed which is going to be assessed.

Mr. NESBITT: I think that if the minister will say that the stock dividend is supposed to be distributed on the par value that will meet my hon. friend's point.

Mr. VIEN: But supposing there is no par value mentioned? There are in Canada some provinces—the province of Quebec among the number—which authorize the issue by companies of stock with no par value, and there is no par value attributed to the shares. Here again is shown the double interpretation which may be given to this Act. Suppose that these shares issued, taken at their par value, are at 40, and that the cash which represents these shares is not of the same amount. Then a double construction will be possible. It will be possible either to tax the shares at their par value, or to tax the money which represents the shares that have been issued. I do not know whether I have made my argument clear.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I cannot quite follow my hon. friend. There is no thought here of taxing stock as stock. We are not taxing stock as stock; all we are doing is to say that a company cannot cheat the revenue by paying stock dividinds instead of cash dividends—that is all we are doing. There is no taxation on a share as a share; that is where my hon. friend mistakes the point. This is merely enlarging the definition of income to say that to the extent that expenditure has been plussed by bringing in in that one year—and only in that one year—stock dividends paid out of profits by the companies that it shall be considered as income; and the amount of that income—just in the same way as the amount of the cash dividends—must be the amount by which the company has depleted its surplus or other cash reserves.

Mr. ROBB: While I do not for a moment retreat from the position I took a while ago that nothing should be done to tax business and prevent its expansion, it seems to me that the minister here is on sound ground when he is placing incorporated companies on exactly the same basis as partnerships. It is unfair to partnerships that they should be taxed up to the limit and that incorporated companies should be allowed to escape in respect of stock dividends.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I would like to direct the attention of the minister to another way of escaping the payment of income tax. I have noticed that of late—to be correct, ever since this legislation has been in force, —huge advertisements, advertisements of inordinate size have been published in the newspapers, especially in the automobile world. Evidently these companies have been doing an immense business during the war and since, and they are spending on advertisements profits which ought to be taxed by my hon. friend.

Mr. CURRIE: They are American companies.

Mr. LEMIEUX: And Canadian companies too. This is a way of evading the payment of taxation, and I call upon my hon. friend the minister to reach these companies.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—determination of deficits and losses:

Mr. NESBITT: Will the minister explain what is the purpose of this amendment? The amendment itself is there but not the clause which is proposed to be amended.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There are certain deductions which are allowed to be made from income, and the particular clause which is amended is clause (f) of Section 2 of the Act of 1919. That is to say, supposing a lawyer, making $10,000 a year, goes into some side venture and loses $2,000 he cannot deduct that $2,000 from his regular income.

Mr. VIEN: He cannot?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No, he cannot. In order to make it clear so that there can be no doubt as to what is or is not a debt or loss, having regard to that main business, it is proposed to add this section:

—and the minister shall have power to determine what deficits or losses sustained in transactions entered into for profit are connected with the chief business, trade, profession or occupation of the taxpayer, and his decision shall be final and conclusive.

In the previous legislation the principle is laid down. Here the machinery is provided for seeing that the principle is lived up to.

Mr. CURRIE: In other words, it means that when a man has two or three lines of business and earns an income from one and loses more than he makes in another, he does not get any reduction on the losses that he suffers. That is exactly what the provision means and I do not think it is fair. Suppose a man is interested in two lines of business; he makes on one and loses on the other. He pays income tax in respect of the business which yields him a profit, but for the loss that he incurs in the carrying on of the other business he gets no allowance.

Mr. NESBITT: If a man makes a profit in one business and incurs a loss in another, it is probable that his income will be nil, and if he has no income he should not be taxed. It is immaterial what he makes it out of so long as he pays the tax according to his income.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Take the case of a man who is interested in three different manufacturing companies. His main business is manufacturing, and he would be taxed on his net income from those three companies.

Mr. ROSS: Suppose a professional man has stock in two lines of manufacture, making a profit in one and losing in the other. Would he be taxed in respect of the business which yielded him a profit, or would the whole thing be taken together?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There, of course, it would be different; that is where the amendment would come in. The question would be whether he was a professional man or a manufacturer. It would seem to me that in the case mentioned he would be a professional man having stock in these companies. If there was a loss in these companies, of course he would get no dividends, but on the other hand he would not be allowed to charge up against his professional income, income derived from the carrying on of his main business, losses incurred in that venture he took in the manufacutring business.

Mr. ROSS: I suppose it would depend on what decision was arrived at as to what was his chief business?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That would be the point to be determined.

Mr. FIELDING: Is it important to draw a distinction between one business and another? It is not a crime for a professional man to put some money into a manufacturing business; I do not see why he should be obliged to declare which is his chief business. Take the case of a medical man who engages in the manufacture of medicine, is he a professional man or a manufacturer? I do not see what difference it makes to the minister how the income is derived. If a man gets the income, he should be taxed; if he does not, I do not see how you are going to tax him.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I agree in large part with my hon. friend. But the real issue is not the question of manufacturing on the one side and professional work on the other. The real issue is this: Once a man actually gets an income from his main occupation or source of revenue he should be taxed, and he should not be allowed to subtract from that main income losses which he runs into in other directions. Let me illustrate. In all our large cities, particularly in Toronto, there are a lot of agriculturists, if I may use the word, as distinguished from farmers. I refer to men who make their money in the city, but who have farms just outside the city in connection with which they lose money. I have known such men to contend that while the income from their profession or from the carrying on of their business was $25,000 a year, it was unfair to tax them on that basis because they were losing $10,000 to $15,000 a year in the running of farms a few miles out of the city. It is to prevent that sort of thing that the amendment is introduced. That man really is not a farmer. He has his main net income, and if he chooses to spend it in carrying on this outside activity, he is in the same position as the man who spends it on automobiles or anything of that kind.

Mr. FIELDING: These cases cannot be very numerous. I am inclined to think that if a man has made money in his profession and sees fit to carry on farming operations as a hobby, he cannot lose a great deal in that connection without doing some good to the community. If my hon. friend makes a fortune in his capacity as Minister of Finance, which he is pretty certain to do, and wants to invest some of it in a farm, I am not sure that we should penalize him for doing so. If it is a fad, it is a worthy fad, one which makes for many good things for our country. But the point is this: At the end of a year you ask a man how much his income was from all sources. If he has not the income, how are you going to make him pay? If he has a professional income of $10,000 and has lost $15,000 in the operation of a farm he is just $5,000 in debt to some one; where is he going to get the money to pay the tax? After all, the rough and ready way of putting it is this: Has a man the income? If he has, let him pay the tax; if he has not, he cannot pay the tax. It is not to be assumed that a man goes into a business on the side merely for amusement; he goes into it for legitimate purposes, and if he loses money, I think it is one of the laws of trade that he should not be penalized for it. But you cannot make a man pay if he has not the money.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Income under our Income Tax Act is not net income; it is income before any charge is made against it, and the effect of what we are doing here is simply to carry that principle out in its general application, not only to the things that you may choose to do with, perhaps, no particular object in view, but to the things that you have to do or desire to do for a very particular purpose. It is true that the man with an income of $10,000 a year has to maintain a household and supply his family with the necessaries of life, and so on. He has a lot of charges to make against that income; probably he even has no net income. Now, we are saying that these essential expenditures will stand in exactly the same position as an expenditure of the kind that he need not go into; that a loss in connection with another activity than that from which he derives his main income cannot be deducted from that income any more than can his other unescapable expenditures.

Mr. BELAND: This brings us a little nearer to the question of the taxing of the indemnity of members of the House. I understand that amounts expended in the earning of an income may properly be charged against that income. Let us suppose that a member of this House has a total income of $2,500 a year, which is the indemnity, and that in order to earn this indemnity he spends $2,000 a year,—all in connection with the fulfilment of his public duties as a member of Parliament. Is not this expenditure properly chargeable against the total indemnity, just as expenditure ordinarily incurred in the earning of income is chargeable against that income for the purposes of the tax? I wonder if the minister sees the point I am making.

[Mr. Fielding.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have it exactly, and as a matter of fairness I entirely agree with my hon. friend.

An hon. MEMBER: Then why don't you do it?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Well, I may do it. In the first instance, I should have thought is was very debatable whether members of Parliament should be taxed or not on their indemnity, because it is not supposed to be an income, it is supposed to be an indemnity; but Parliament itself decided that it wanted to be taxed. Apparenty, members of Parliament, with wonderful unanimity, determined that they would like to be taxed.

Mr. BELAND: Not at all. I may remind the minister that this was a straight declaration made by his predecessor without anybody calling for it.

Mr. BUREAU: I asked to be exempted.

Mr. NESBITT: I brought this matter up the first time the income tax was introduced, and the minister's predecessor said, just as my hon. friend has said, that he thought that, properly speaking, the indemnity should not be taxed. But it was taxed, and at that time I put up a fight with the department that if we were to call this indemnity an income, we should be allowed our necessary expenditures in earning that income. The next year the former Minister of Finance, as the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Béland) says, deliberately put in the Act a clause that we should pay on the full indemnity without any allowance. As an individual is allowed to deduct, not personal expenses, but office expenses incurred in earning an income, members of Parliament have an equal right to be allowed to deduct expenses incurred in earning what is called our sessional indemnity. I quite agree that if that were done, there would, in many cases, be no income to be taxed.

Mr. LAPOINTE: We would have a claim against the State.

Mr. NESBITT: My hon. friend (Mr. Lapointe) says that we would have a claim against the State. But either the indemnity ought to be exempt from taxation or we ought to be allowed to deduct necessary expenses in earning the income. It was only because of the delicacy of the matter on the part of hon. members that it was not opposed at the time. It was a mistake that it was not opposed.

Mr. BELAND: I do not want to appear before the committee as claiming that that part of the indemnity which is net income should not be taxed, but I claim that whatever expenditure is incurred in connection with the fulfilment of our public duties should be charged against the total indemnity—

Mr. BUREAU: Including election expenses.

Mr. BELAND:—and in that case, I am sure the minister's department would not get very much money out of the members.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does the hon. gentleman think that contributions for election expenses or anything of that kind should be deducted?

Mr. BUREAU: We do not expend anything for that.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think the proper thing would be that a fair per diem allowance, which would represent the expenses of a member while in Ottawa and while the House is in session, should be deducted before the amount is assessed.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps that is something which we might regard as a matter of administration. As the Bill is a fairly long one I do not suppose that we shall finish it to-day, and the matter will not be lost sight of.

Mr. BUREAU: Could not some means be devised of collecting income tax from people who are not actually resident for twelve months in Canada?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That matter is dealt with later on.

Mr. STEIN: Does not the minister think it is too drastic to make the decision of the minister final and conclusive? If any difficulty arises between the department and the ratepayer, the matter should be submitted to the Exchequer Court of Canada, which is a court provided expressly for the purpose of arbitrating between the Crown and its subjects.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—income from an estate or accumulating in trust:

Mr. NESBITT: If a man is a beneficiary and certain moneys accrue in a certain year and they are not paid in that year, why should they be taxable in that year? Supposing I am an executor for an estate, and certain moneys that should be paid into the estate during a certain calendar year, are not paid in during that year but are paid in the next year, if they are taxable in the previous year, a mix-up will occur in the accounting of the estate.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is thought—and this is the result of the experience of the department—that it is a great deal better for accretions to be taxed regularly; that you should not have delayed taxes, because when taxes are delayed, too much must be paid all at once. It is really in the interest of the beneficiary himself, that when he cannot draw his income, the proper charges against that income which, after all, is actually earned—and what we should get is a tax on money when earned, whether distributed or not—should be paid.

Mr. NESBITT: He might not get the money at all. Very frequently we do not get money that properly should be paid into an estate.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In that case, the tax would not have to be paid. That would not be income, because it would not be received.

Mr. NESBITT: The clause reads that if the income accrues in that term, the tax must be paid. Such an exaction is an injustice.

Mr. PEDLOW: I should like to refer to the returns made by members of Parliament. Many members of Parliament who are in business take stock each year on the 31st of January or some time during that month. They are expected by the department, I understand, to include their sessional indemnity in the return for the accounting period. For instance, if the accounting period for the year 1920 is arrived at in the month of January of that year, the department has ruled that the return must include the indemnity for 1920, before it has been received. Suppose a member of Parliament sends in his return in January and includes in it the indemnity he expects to receive during the year, and that in the meantime a general election comes and he does not receive the indemnity, he will have to pay taxes on an indemnity he has not received. I think in a case of that kind the member should include only his returns for the accounting period ending on the 31st of January or on the date mentioned in the schedule.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I should like this section to stand.

Section stands.

On section 5—Patriotic and Red Cross funds:

Mr. CRONYN: I wish to suggest to the committee that instead of repealing paragraph (c) it should be amended in such a manner as to allow the exemption of amounts paid by the taxpayer during the year for charitable purposes. Paragraph (c) reads as follows:

—amounts paid by the taxpayer during the year to the Patriotic and Canadian Red Cross funds, and other patriotic and war funds approved by the minister;

It is quite clear that war funds are no longer in existence, so they should not be considered. It is quite true that the Patriotic fund is still in existence, and gifts might still be made to it. The Red Cross fund is also in existence, as it has been for many years. My suggestion would be that the paragraph should be allowed to stand and that in place of the word "war" the word "charitable" should be inserted, so that amounts paid to any of the above named funds and to charitable funds during the year will be exempted. The Act by paragraph (d) of section 5 now exempts the income of charitable institutions, but it does not exempt gifts to such institutions when made by the ordinary taxpayer. In the province of Ontario, where there is an ever increasing succession duty payable on death, the Act has always exempted from the tax legacies for charitable, religious and educational purposes. Nor do I think there has been any great loss to the province or any harm done by reason of that law. The American Act specially exempts such gifts up to the amount of 15 per cent of the taxpayer's entire income. Their clause is much wider than the one I have suggested, it reads:

Contributions or gifts made within the taxable year to corporations organized and operated exclusively for religious, charitable, scientific, or educational purposes, to an amount not in excess of 15 per cent of the taxpayer's net income.

And so on.

I think this is a matter which might receive the favourable consideration of the committee. We all know that these charitable institutions must be kept up, and are largely kept up, by voluntary contributions, and that most of these contributions come from a limited number of people in each locality. It is not altogether the wealthy man who supports these charities. It is the man of moderate income, who is called upon time and again throughout the year, and who wishes to, and who does subscribe to the fullest extent for the maintenance of these institutions. It is a little hard and I think ungenerous for this country, after that subscription has been made, to force the giver to pay an income tax thereon. I do not know that one can elaborate or add anything to this plea. I would suggest the following amendment moved by myself and seconded by the hon. member for North Perth:

That paragraph (c) of subsection 1 of section 3 be amended by substituting the word "charitable" in the place of the word "war" in the last line of the said paragraph.

Mr. FIELDING: Does my hon. friend move that as a substitute for section 5?

Mr. CRONYN: Yes.

Mr. FIELDING: My hon. friend is referring to the Act as it now stands, and not to the Bill, and he may have to change his amendment slightly.

Mr. CRONYN: Yes. Unfortunately, having just come down from a committee meeting, I had not seen the Bill.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The section which the hon. member desires to amend is paragraph (c) of subsection 1 of section 3 of the Act of 1917, which reads as follows:

(c) amounts paid by the taxpayer during the year to the Patriotic and Canadian Red Cross funds, and other patriotic and war funds approved by the minister.

I understand that he desires to substitute the word "charitable" for the word "war." I suppose that everybody likes to encourage charity, but after all charity sometimes begins at home. We have a very heavy task in raising the necessary revenue. I do not know just exactly how much the charitable people of this country, and there are many of them, would have their hands stayed by the fact that they had to pay their share towards the country's expenses, or how much more or how much less would be given in consequence of our action in this matter. I do not like, so far as I am concerned, to say no directly to my hon. friend's suggestion. It is a subject which deserves consideration. I would at any rate suggest to my hon. friend that he limit the exemption as provided by the American legislation, which limits it to an amount not in excess of 15 per cent of the taxable income. That is, the American Government says:

If you want to do your duty as you see it, and look after charitable objects to the extent of 15 per cent of your taxes we will help you to do it. The charity is at the expense of the Government to the extent of 15 per cent only. I would suggest that if we substitute Government aid for the generous and spontaneous action of charitable persons we ought to have at least some limitation, as exists in America, to the extent that that aid should be given.

Mr. NESBITT: Say 10 per cent.

Mr. CURRIE: I have in mind a charity that is very much affected by this tax. When the late John Ross Robertson died he was proprietor of the Telegram in the city of Toronto and he made a will whereby certain bequests were to be paid annually out of the income of that newspaper, and the residue was to be paid to the Sick Children's Hospital. That newspaper earns something like $350,000 per annum and the Government takes a large proportion of that amount off as excess profits tax, thereby reducing by thousands of dollars the sum which the Sick Childern's Hospital should receive. In the whole province of Ontario there is no greater charity than the Sick Children's Hospital in the city of Toronto. Maimed and sick children from every part of the province are taken to that institution where they receive the very best attendance from highly qualified physicians, the best men in the medical profession in Canada, and as a result of the treatment given them many of those children, who go to the hospital in a weak and emaciated condition, are eventually saved. Everything possible is done to promote their recovery, and no man could leave money to a worthier or nobler charity than that. As a matter of fact, the Telegram of Toronto belongs to the Sick Children's Hospital, because after those who are now receiving annuities from it die the whole of the revenue of the paper will be devoted to that charity. To my mind it is not right to exact a profits tax from a charity of such a character, and I quite agree with the hon. member for London that the Government should take this matter into very serious consideration. That charity to which I have referred appeals to the sympathy of people all over the province. The children in all the public schools and in the remote sections of the province contribute their pennies and many as high as 25 cents and 50 cents towards its support, and I think that some provision should be made to exempt charities of that nature. We have a great many of them in the country, and it is not very encouraging to rich men, who are disposed to leave their money for benevolent purposes, to know that after they are gone a hard-hearted government will tax the money which they have bequeathed to support some object which is in dire need of assistance and devote it to useless things around the country. I hope the minister, who is an old friend of Mr. Robertson, will take this matter into consideration, because I do not think that hon. members sympathize with any scheme for taxing charitable bequests of this kind.

Mr. VIEN: Much as I sympathize with the hon. member for London (Mr. Cronyn) and the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Currie) in their desire to encourage charitable grants, it seems to me that there are two great objections to the motion of the hon. member for London, and the first objection is given by the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton), who says that this is a charity at the expense of the State. The first duty of every citizen is towards the State, and no money of which the country stands so much in need should be diverted from the aid of the State to charitable institutions, which undoubtedly are deserving of every consideration but which must be subordinated to the interests of the country. Charitable institutions are deserving, it is true, but there is no institution which should appeal more to the consideration of the citizen than the State. The second objection I have to the motion is the difficulty which it creates for the Minister of Finance in determining what are charitable institutions and charitable objects. There are a thousand and one charitable funds and institutions throughout Canada, and we are to give to the Minister of Finance the discretion to determine which of them will, and which will not, be favoured. Grants to some of them will be deducted from income and grants to others will not, and I think that if the motion is adopted the position of the Minister of Finance will be made very difficult indeed. Broad minded and fair minded as he is, we can readily understand that his position would be an invidious one under such circumstances, and I therefore think that it will be best to stand by the general law. As the minister has pointed out, I do not think any one will be hindered from making grants to charitable institutions which deserve assistance from wealthy people.

Mr. BURNHAM: It might be inferred from the hon. gentleman's lucid remarks that he desires charity to contribute to the war. The Sick Children's Hospital will pay this tax; the sick children will be the payers.

Mr. VIEN: Does the hon. gentleman think that the determination not to deduct grants from the income will deter rich people from making such grants?

Mr. BURNHAM: I do not know that it will; I am not prepared to say so. But I understand that this will be deducted from the amount given to charity.

Mr. VIEN: No, from the income.

Mr. BURNHAM: It is the same thing.

Mr. VIEN: No.

Mr. BURNHAM: Is there no loss to charity under this?

Mr. VIEN: Not at all.

Mr. BURNHAM: What is the hon. gentleman's argument?

Mr. VIEN: The argument is that under the motion of the hon. member for London a man who has an income taxable will have the right to deduct from that income whatever grants he makes to charitable institutions. If we accept that motion it will not be the charitable institution that will be called upon to pay the tax; the man that makes the grant will have the right to deduct from his taxable income whatever he has given as a grant, and therefore I say that it will not prevent a rich man from making a grant to charitable institutions.

Mr. BURNHAM: It certainly will deter a man from making such a grant. It is to be supposed that in making the grant he is giving as large an amount as he can, and therefore if he has to pay the tax it will reduce the grant by that much. In this case, therefore, the loss will be that of the sick children, and in the final analysis they pay the tax.

Mr. VIEN: In the example given by the hon. member (Mr. Currie) which prompted my hon. friend to rise,—I refer to the charity left to the sick children—it is not the grant itself that will be taxed but the balance of the estate.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: I think the members of the House would favour the amendment made by the hon. member for London (Mr. Cronyn) providing they were perfectly sure of the construction that would be given to the words "other charities." In the section amended, which he mentioned are the Patriotic Fund, the Red Cross and other charities. If "other charities" means, applying the rule of law, ejusdem generis, of a like nature, I am quite willing to have the amendment passed but if it is going to be construed in such a way that it may include religious institutions of all kinds or institutions that deal with other matters than bodily infirmities and the like I am inclined to think that it would be very ill-advised to make such an exemption because it would place on the shoulders of the Minister of Finance the delicate responsibility of deciding which should be regarded as a charity. We might have contributions to churches that would be claimed as being exempt from income tax. I think it would be well that it should be construed as the Patriotic Fund, Red Cross, and other charities of a similar nature. I should like to hear the view of the minister as to what charities along these lines should be exempt.

Mr. ROBB: Reading this clause in the Bill, it occurs to me that there must have been some truth in the statement published in the daily press during the years of the war that certain parties in Canada had subscribed generously to the Patriotic and Red Cross funds, but had never paid and the consequence was they were enabled to escape the assessment made by the Department of Finance. I have it in my mind now that the minister is going to guard against that in this Bill.

Mr. McGIBBON (Muskoka): It appears to me that the object of this committee is to find means of getting revenue to run the country. Instead of making loop-holes to lose revenue we should rather tighten up the provisions of the income tax law so that this country will have sufficient money to pay its debts. It appears to me that the amendment as submitted is a dangerous one. What limits would you put on it? It opens the way to all kinds of false declarations and it puts the minister in the awkward position that he has to take the responsibility of deciding what should be exempt and what should not be exempt from taxation. I would rather see the minister go a little bit further and wipe out every exception. A man who gives charity gets enough credit for it without wanting to have his contribution exempted from taxation. Every man should be willing to pay his just share of taxes towards running the business of the country and I am not in sympathy with making loop-holes to let any man evade his fair share of taxes. I would rather tighten up, make it as equal as we can and make every person in the country large or small, bear his proportionate share of the expenses of the country. It should be put on a business basis and I am glad the Minister of Finance is trying here to make us pay our way the same as any business man, or honest man would pay his way and to enable us to run this country on a business basis.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Steele): Shall the amendment be adopted?

Mr. NESBITT: I would like to suggest that the paragraph stand to let the minister have an opportunity of looking it over. I am quite sympathetic with any real charity. It looks as if it might be quite feasible for some things to be brought under the head of charity that really are not charity. I am quite in accord with the proposal that the word "charity" shall be added. I have not a memorandum here of the original clause. The Bill just says that a certain clause shall be struck out. I would like to suggest that the word "patriotic" be dropped. That does not apply very frequently now. What would you call a patriotic association? When the war was on there were certain things that could easily be described by the word "patriotic" but these organizations are unnecessary now. I do not think it would be hard to define what "charities" are. That is why I suggest the minister allow the paragraph to stand, give it some thought and see if the word "charities" could not be so defined that it would include only what the hon. member for London has in his mind; that is a real, actual charity. I do not agree with the statement that a man who generally gives to charity is a man who is getting any advertisement out of it. A man who generally gives to charity gives for charity's sake and gets no benefit or advertising. I assume that he gives it secretly and that he gives it out of the goodness of his heart.

Mr. FIELDING: I quite agree with my hon. friend from Lotbinière (Mr. Vien) that this provision would not prevent a rich man from giving to charity if he wished to do so. There are many rich men—and we all rejoice that it is so—whose hearts are as big as their fortunes, and I have no doubt that they would still give. But what the hon. member for London states is true that after all, the multitude of those who contribute towards charity are not rich men. They are mostly men of very moderate means and it is that class of contributor who would benefit by the amendment proposed by the hon. member for London. The man who has a fortune and gives a few thousand dollars does not miss that amount, but the man of very moderate income who receives every week of his life some application for a contribution to a worthy charity, in the aggregate gives quite a percentage of his ordinary income in that way. If he could be exempted from the payment of taxes on those contributions it would rather encourage him to give. I am sorry for the Minister of Finance, who is going to be in a very difficult position if he has to determine what is a charity and what is not. But he has lots of difficulties these days and adding one more to his troubles is only a small matter. There is much to be said on both sides, but I think that the weight of the argument falls on the side of the hon. member for London.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How would the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) propose to check the payments made for charitable purposes? How could you have the word "charity" in the Act and not give it an elastic meaning. Suppose it had an elastic meaning? There are very few churches that do not carry on a good deal of charitable work. How would you find out what was given for charitable work in connection with a church? One man might go to church and put $5 on the plate and not advertise the fact while another man might. I see great difficulty in ascertaining what is the meaning of the word "charity" unless you tie it down to certain organizations. By leaving it general and wide open I doubt if we would ever get anywhere.

Mr. McKENZIE: Do I understand the minister to say that the amendment as it stands in the Bill does away with these exceptions?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE: I entirely agree with that. I do not think there should be any cheese-paring at all. I think it better to strike them out altogether.

Mr. CROTHERS: There is still another objection to extending the exemption to contributions to charitable institutions, although it may not be a very formidable one. The objects mentioned in the Act of 1917 were of a national character and one making a contribution to the Patriotic Fund was making a contribution to a fund for all Canada. If you alter that and exempt the sums paid to charitable institutions, a man, to take an illustration, might reduce his income tax by $10,000. That $10,000 belongs to the people of Canada. He would very likely if he were prompted to give aid to a charitable institution give it to an institution in his own town. Thus he would be taking the money of the people of Canada and giving it to the people of his own city or town. It is not a formidable objection but it is an objection I think.

Mr. CALDER: I might mention another illustration along the same line, that came up for discussion this morning in another way. In the province of Saskatchewan, for example, our municipalities pay the entire cost of hospitals; the hospital management does not appeal to the public at all. The burden of carrying the expenditure in connection with our hospitals is always borne by the people as a whole in the way of taxation. Consequently there are no contributions of this kind to charitable institutions of that nature. But I understand, for example, that in the city of Toronto the hospitals there are maintained to a very large extent by private contributions. Well, why should a man in Toronto be partially exempt from his income tax if he makes contributions to an institution there, whereas in Saskatchewan our people do not make contributions of that kind to the hospitals and have to bear the whole income tax. You will find all sorts of such anomalous situations. I think the illustration given by the hon. gentleman who has just spoken should not apply unless the charitable institution is national in its scope and has national work to do. Otherwise I think you will have all sorts of anomalies in the working out of a provision of that kind.

Mr. FIELDING: If the people of Saskatchewan escape claims for a hospital they are called upon to make good in other respects. I do not imagine that among the many inducements that are offered to people to settle in that province we could hold out to them the expectation that they would not have to contribute to charities; in one form or another they will get at them.

Another point occurs to me. Let me say that I think nine men out of ten who will claim an exemption of this kind can be trusted to make an honest return. I think the cases in which this privilege would be used to evade the law are very few indeed. The man who gives liberally to these institutions is not the man who is likely to make a false income tax return.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I entirely agree with my hon. friend. It is not the man who does the right thing who is likely to evade the Act. It is the man who would not give anything at all to charity, and he is the one that I want to look after.

Mr. CURRIE: I think possibly the amendment could be modified so as to cover cases where the grant is made to an institution that is recognized by the State. As drafted the amendment possibly leaves the door too wide open and would cover an organization which would not really be recognized as a charity. But I think that if the Government took the clause under their consideration the sense of the House is largely to the effect that in the case of charities that are recognized by law a man might be allowed to make contributions which would be free from the income tax. With respect to the province of Saskatchewan they, of course, are starting out new and are beginning in the right way by making the State take care of all their charitable work of that kind. Unfortunately, however, in the province of Ontario, and the other older provinces, the old system of a man bequeathing money to charity in his will, and of the public supporting these charities to a large extent by individual contributions, prevails. In Ontario there are hospitals in every town of any size which hospitals are maintained by grants from the province and from the local municipality, and largely by contributions from kind-hearted people. The same system obtains in the province of Quebec, and the amount of revenue that will be lost to the Government through this exemption would be very small. In the case of the Sick Children's Hospital in Toronto, unless there was an exemption the institution would lose something like forty or fifty thousand dollars a year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It would not turn on this at all.

Mr. CURRIE: At the same time I think the clause should be changed so as to cover a case of that kind. Otherwise some $50,000 will be taken directly out of that hospital which is one of the greatest charities in the Dominion. For that reason the clause should be amended so as to relieve the situation. I would suggest that rather than have the matter voted on and encounter any trouble—seeing that we are all concerned in doing the best we can to meet the situation—the Government should reconsider the clause and see if the proposed amendment cannot be so changed that the door would not be left open too wide, and have it so that if an individual makes contributions at all he should contribute to a national charity.

Mr. FIELDING: I think if the minister and the member for London would spend a few minutes together they would reach a conclusion, and I for one would willingly submit to their judgment.

Clause stands.

On section 6—Income tax and persons liable thereto:

Mr. NICHOLSON (Algoma E.) I would like to ask the minister whether he has considered the question of extending the income tax exemption to "householders" in paragraph (a) of subsection 4 of the original Act. It specifies that 4 per cent shall be collected upon all income exceeding $1,500 in the case of unmarried persons and widows and widowers without dependent children, and exceeding $3,000 in the case of all other persons. By the amendment of 1919 the tax was made applicable to income exceeding $1,000 in the case of unmarried persons and widows or widowers without dependent children, etc., and exceeding $2,000 in the case of married persons. There are a number of unmarried persons and widowers who have households to maintain and have to bear all the responsibilities of married persons. Included among these are a large number of workingmen, and I would ask the minister if he has considered the advisability of making the exemption apply in the case of "householders," that is to say using the term "householder" instead of "unmarried person.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is a good deal of difficulty in finding out what a householder is. Looking at other tax laws this, so far, seems to be the only way of providing for the exemptions. However, consideration of this Bill may not be finished to-day and the point might be considered a little later on.

Mr. NICHOLSON (Algoma): The Ontario Act uses the term that I have mentioned.

Mr. McKENZIE: I support the view of my hon. friend with respect to any man who is a householder and is getting exempted up to $1,000. I supported the same view yesterday, although upon a different matter, and the minister knows what I have particularly in mind. There are many persons not married who are obliged to maintain households, and upon whom devolve the same responsibilities and expense as devolve upon the man who happens to be married.

Mr. ROBB: I should like to hear how the minister regards this section. Does this mean a dual tax, that is to say that a person residing either in England or the United States and paying taxes to the government of either country will also have to pay a tax in Canada?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The object of subsection 5 is to cover the case of such men as mining engineers who, having their address outside of Canada, spend five or six months of their time in this country and derive a very substantial income from work which they do here. We think that they should pay a tax on that income. We have an arrangement at present under which people who come from the United States into Canada and engage in work from which they derive an income may have credited to them by the United States authorities in respect of income tax any amount which they pay to us on that account. The same thing applies to Canadians who engage in temporary work in United States.

Mr. McKENZIE: That must be by international arrangement.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is so provided by statute. We give a rebate in respect of taxes collected by foreign countries from persons who derive an income from work in Canada and who pay income tax to us in respect thereto. This applies, of course, to persons from foreign countries which have a similar statutory provision.

Mr. ROBB: Does that apply to investments? If persons residing in the British Isles and having investments in Canada pay income tax to the Canadian Government are they exempt from taxation in the British Isles?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is a question that has given us a great deal of trouble and to which we have given much consideration. The whole matter is now being considered by a Royal Commission in the Old Country, and we hope to make some satisfactory progress in the matter. At present no such relief is given as my hon. friend suggests.

Mr. ROBB: The minister must see the importance of having this straightened out at an early day; otherwise investments in this country will be prevented.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is most important.

Mr. BUREAU: Is there any particular machinery for collecting the tax from persons who have resided in Canada for six months only? We could not get at a man once he left the country.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is no special machinery.

Mr. BUREAU: Would it not be well to provide that the person who employs the mining engineer or the technical man who gets very high wages and who is only temporarily employed in Canada shall deduct the amount of the tax from his remuneration and make a return thereof to the department?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Most of these men return to Canada. But there is a great deal in my hon. friend's suggestion; we will see what can be done in the matter.

Mr. NICHOLSON (Algoma): A large number of men in Canada who constitute our floating population are, I believe, entirely escaping the income tax. I want to be specific; I will refer to the part of the country in which I live. Employers of labour in the newer parts of Canada are asked to furnish to the department a list of all their employees who earn the equivalent of $1,000 a year and who work in Canada for six months or longer at a time. This means a very considerable burden on the employer in the keeping of records, and my judgment is that the department is getting nothing as a result in the way of revenue, because these men are moving around from place to place in such a way that the income tax collector cannot catch up with them. Some of the people, returned soldiers, for instance, feel that they are not being justly treated in this matter. We have a large number of foreigners in Northern Ontario. Recently I happened to be in a bank in a town in Northern Ontario. Two foreigners came in to draw out their money before going home to the old country; between them they had accumulated over $7,000. A returned soldier who was standing by said to me: "Is it fair that these men should wholly escape taxation while we who have just come back from the war and are getting into employment are being taxed on our incomes over $1,000?" What answer could I give? I made a suggestion to the department, and I give it now to the committee for what it is worth: that these employers, instead of being asked to send in elaborate returns giving the names of foreigners whom they would not know on the street if they met them, be called upon to collect the tax out of the wages of such classes of employees as I have indicated. That may seem a drastic method of collecting the tax on a man's income. But I submit that if these people are to be reached at all some means of that kind will have to be adopted; otherwise they will go on earning substantial incomes, as they have been year after year, without contributing a nickel to the national revenue.

Mr. BUREAU: Do I understand my hon. friend to mean that these men should have paid a tax on the amount which they withdrew from the bank?

Mr. NICHOLSON (Algoma): No, I do not meant that.

Mr. BUREAU: They may have earned less than $1,000 a year.

Mr. NICHOLSON (Algoma): Well, if they did, they should not be taxed, but the majority of them earn much more than that and are escaping taxation. I am prepared to say that 10,000 men between the Ottawa river and the boundary line between Manitoba and Ontario who are earning more than $1,000 a year are wholly escaping income taxation simply because no method has so far been adopted of collecting from them. I have no method to suggest, unless you catch them at the time that they are receiving their wages.

Mr. BUREAU: You would have to say to the ordinary labourer who works thirty days in one place and fifteen in another: "You are earning so much per day, which is so much more than $1,000 a year," and then you would have to force the employer to collect the money for the Government.

Mr. MANION: I wish to support the remarks of my hon. friend (Mr. G. B. Nicholson). In my city a great deal of piece work has been going on during the last few years, and it has been the complaint of the people there that many men of outside or alien nationalities were earning large wages on piece work, even as high as $10, $15, and $20 a day, and contributing to this country absolutely nothing by way of income tax. I wish to support the remarks of my hon. friend (Mr. G. B. Nicholson) in that regard, because I think his remarks are well worth considering by the Minister of Finance as a new method of securing revenue for the Dominion treasury from men of this kind.

Mr. BUREAU: The machinery is hard to work.

Mr. McCOIG: There is a great deal of truth in what my hon. friend (Mr. G. B. Nicholson) has stated. Many foreigners are coming into this country and earning large wages, and they are, to a large extent, doing what the hon. member has stated. While they are in this country they spend practically nothing; they save up their money and they send their savings to the country from which they came, thus getting out of paying one cent of taxes or contributing in any way to the upkeep of this country. In the constituency which I have the honour to represent there are many Mexicans who earn large wages, who live on practically nothing and who send their savings back to their own country, thus evading any responsibility for the upkeep of this country. The hon. member is not trying to find any fault; he is suggesting that this is a matter that should be looked into seriously by the Government, and if we can get a revenue from this source, I am satisfied that every hon. member will heartily approve such action on the part of the Government.

Mr. FIELDING: I want to offer the very smallest kind of criticism. If the minister will turn to subclause (5) at the bottom of clause 6, I think his purpose will be made clearer if he will strike out the comma after the word "Canada" in line 26 or insert a comma after the word "Canada" in line 27. We know what the purpose of the minister is, but it would be made plainer by that change.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I move that amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

M. J. E. FONTAINE (Hull): Monsieur le président, je désirerais bien avoir une copie de la version française du bill. Où pourrais-je me la procurer?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. J. M. Douglas): The hon. member is asking for a French copy of the Bill?

Mr. FONTAINE: Oui, Monsieur.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. J. M. Douglas): The French copies are on the way from the Printing Bureau, but as the Bill has been read a second time, no exception can be taken at this time.

Mr. BUREAU: The hon. member is not taking any exception; he is asking for a French copy.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. J. M. Douglas): The French copies are on the way from the Printing Bureau.

Mr. NICHOLSON (Algoma East): Will the minister take into consideration the matter to which I have referred, because it is of vital importance in many parts of the country?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I will do so, and I should be very much obliged if the hon. member and any other hon. member who is interested in the matter would come and see me about it.

Mr. ROBB: In considering that matter, the minister should also take into consideration the position of Canadians who are now moving into the United States. More young men are at present going into the United States and seeking work there than during the past fifteen years. There should be a reciprocal arrangement between the United States and Canada as regards citizens moving from one country to the other.

Section agreed to.

On section 7—5 per cent added to tax and surtax on incomes of $5,000 or more.

Mr. NESBITT: Why does the minister make this retroactive, and what will he do in cases where the tax has already been paid for 1919?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No income tax has yet been paid for 1919. The tax is not levied; the returns were due only on the 31st of last month, and in one sense this is not retroactive at all. The tax is to be paid this year, and we are getting the extra 5 per cent on the taxes to be paid this year because we need the money.

Mr. NESBITT: I quite appreciate that. But when the minister says that none has been paid, I understood from one corporation that they had paid their 1919 taxes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The commissioner informs me that it is quite impossible that they should have done that. No assessment has been made at all. The assessment is held up on account of this Bill.

Mr. NESBITT: I do not like to doubt the word of the minister.

Mr. PROULX: Does this mean 5 per cent before exemptions are deducted or after they are deducted?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This means taxes on incomes of $5,000 and upwards.

Mr. CURRIE: How can the minister justify his action in starting to impose such heavy taxation on the people in addition to their present taxes? I have read his statement to the public as to expenditures and the amount that he expects to collect, and as nearly as I can figure the matter out, he is going to show a surplus of about $150,000,000 this year. Therefore, I cannot see any necessity of imposing further taxation on the people. The newspapers state that 80 per cent of the members do not pay taxes, so that those who have to pay taxes say that members of Parliament who do not pay taxes want those who pay taxes to be taxed still further. I must be very dull on figures, because I cannot understand the necessity for this additional taxation when most of the expenditures we have this last year, such as Soldiers Civil Re-establishment and so on are going to be dropped this year. As regards the $50,000,000 that we have to pay on account of the railways, we must secure some one to manage the railways in such a manner that the revenue will cover the expenditure, because we cannot be always making up deficits. The minister has dropped one expenditure of $30,000,000 and another one of $35,000,000. What then are we going to tax people so much for? The proper procedure would be to cut off taxes instead of adding to them.

Mr. BUREAU: We shall be dead before they are cut off.

Mr. CURRIE: That is my view of the matter, and I want to know if the minister expects to have any unforeseen expenditures this year.

Mr. BUREAU: There is a deficit.

Mr. CURRIE: There was no deficit this year.

Mr. BUREAU: What about the railways?

Mr. CURRIE: The operation of the railways was paid out of current revenue. The hon. member does not read the statements of the affairs of the country or he would not make such statements. The interest on the bonds were paid out of current revenue and after we had paid for the railways and the bonds and everything else, we had $30,000,000 odd this year over. This imposing of heavier taxation is a mystery to me unless the intention is to tax everybody to death.

Mr. NICHOLSON (Algoma East): I should like to know whether the words—

> The addition of 5 per centum to the amount of each of the said taxes and surtaxes.

—mean that 5 per cent will be added to the normal tax and 5 per cent to the surtax as well?

[Mr. Currie.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: 5 per cent to the total of all the taxes.

Mr. NESBITT: If you mean to add this to the normal tax and then to the surtax, that would be 10 per cent, and the minister might as well tell us whether that is the case or not.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No, it is 5 per cent on the total of the taxes. For example, the tax on $5,000 is $120. If you add 5 per cent to that, that means $6, or a total of $126, and the same will apply throughout.

Mr. NESBITT: That is very relieving.

Mr. McKENZIE: This clause reads:

> The several taxes and surtaxes prescribed by subsections 1 and 2 of this section are hereby increased by the addition of 5 per centum to the amount of each of the said taxes and surtaxes payable—

And so forth. A certain amount is now payable under the present law. Does this mean that 5 per cent should be added to the amount that the man is now called upon to pay.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Five per cent of the total amount he has to pay under the present law.

Section agreed to.

On section 8—partnerships:

Mr. NESBITT: Would the minister read the clause as amended?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The present Act reads:

> Any persons carrying on business in partnership shall be liable for the income tax only in their individual capacity; provided, however, that a husband and wife carrying on business together shall not be deemed to be partners for any purpose under this Act. A member of a partnership or the proprietor of a business whose fiscal year is other than the calendar year shall make a return of his income from the business, for the fiscal period ending within the calendar year for which the return is being made, but his return of income derived from sources other than his business shall be made for the calendar year;

The whole change made here is that the taxpayer not only makes the return but the computation on that return. That does not come into force this year, but next year. Under the Budget proposals the taxpayers are in future to assess themselves so as to save time and get the money in at once.

Section agreed to.

On section 9—income from pensions:

Mr. BUREAU: What is the change here?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Paragraph (j) of section 5 of the present Act reads:

—the military and naval pay of persons who have been on active service overseas during the present war in any of the military or naval forces of His Majesty or any of His Majesty's Allies.

There seems to be no reason for that to be continued, so it is struck out. Paragraph (l) reads:

—income derived from any pension granted to any member of His Majesty's military, naval or air forces..... and the income derived from any pension granted to any dependent relative of any person who was killed or suffered any disability while serving in the said forces in the said war.

As it reads now, it says that the "income from pensions" shall not be taxable, but it is the pension itself that should not be taxable, and so we say that no pension so earned shall be taxable. Instead of reading "income derived from any pension," it will now read: "any pension" granted to any member of His Majesty's military, naval or air forces or to any relative, and so forth. It would be manifestly unjust to tax those pensions. They are used annually; they are not invested. The idea is to make it clear that the soldiers' pensions are not taxable.

Section agreed to.

On section 10—one-quarter tax to be forwarded with return; balance may be paid by instalments with interest:

Mr. BUREAU: Why is the taxpayer required to forward one-quarter of the tax with his return? I think it is only fair that a man should first get his bill certified by the authorities before he pays any instalment.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps it is a good thing that the painful process of extracting the tax should be started as soon as possible. It is really a good thing for the taxpayer. There have been any number of complaints by taxpayers that they did not get their bills soon enough.

Mr. BUREAU: They are superpatriots.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Nevertheless, that is a fact. These complaints have been made. Furthermore, there is no reason why the money should not be paid at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. BUREAU: I agree, but I want to get my bill before I pay.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: You make out your own bill.

Mr. BUREAU: I may not agree with the man who receives it at the other end.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That may be, but we feel that it is important that the money should be paid at the earliest possible moment and that the department should not waste a lot of time determining what the real income is.

Mr. FIELDING: I see a difficulty in the direction indicated by the hon. member for Three Rivers. A man will be obliged to be his own assessor in this matter and very many men will not be able to determine what their taxable income is. The hon. minister says that there must be an investigation, and that very fact shows that the innocent taxpayer himself may be in doubt. I agree that once a man has received his bill the sooner you can get the money the better. But the ordinary man will have some difficulty in deciding what his taxable income is. He will put items in one way or the other which the department may not approve of. How is he to know what his actual tax is until he gets his bill? I sympathize with the minister in his desire to get the money as quickly as possible and to reduce the labour of the tax gathering authorities, who will have a troublesome job, but at the same time there is something in the criticism of the hon. member for Three Rivers, and until a man has received his tax bill I do not see how he can make a payment on account.

Mr. DuTREMBLAY: I think the contention of the hon. member for Three Rivers and the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's is absolutely correct. Under the present law it is extremely difficult for ordinary people to determine the amount they have to pay each year. The collectors will tell you that in Montreal thousands of people are faced with this difficulty and want to know what this or the other item means, and there is great room for error and misunderstanding. I think that the Government should send the bill to the taxpayer. It is very unfair to put the people in such a position as to be liable to a penalty if they do not pay up within a certain time, when they have no means of properly complying with the law.

Mr. NESBITT: The tax for 1919 has not been paid. Have the statements been sent out to the people?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes.

Mr. NESBITT: Are they supposed to send in those statements in accordance with the clause?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No; this section does not come into force until next year.

Mr. NESBITT: It applies to 1920.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It applies to incomes received in 1920 which are to be returned in 1921.

Mr. ROBB: The situation is somewhat complicated by the multiplicity of taxes. For instance, there is an allowance for business profits tax and also an allowance in regard to taxes already collected on dividends. If there were only one tax, the income tax, the matter would be simpler, and it would be sound business for the debtor at once to make payment. But the minister himself, by the multiplicity of taxes, is going to make the situation difficult; and later on, before the clause passes, I shall direct his attention to the question of penalties. It seems to me that the penalties are rather extreme in view of the dangers which threaten people who may innocently make mistakes in rendering their accounts. Even the minister realizes this, because he anticipates, according to the clause, that there will be many bankruptcies on account of this taxation and he makes provision for such cases. This clause needs revision.

Mr. DENIS: I observe that in his Budget Speech the minister says that in all cases where it is discovered that over-payment has been made by the ratepayer, a refund for the amount must be immediately made to him or applied on any instalment due or becoming due. This would to a considerable extent relieve the severity of the law now under discussion; but so far as I can see, no cognizance has been taken of this statement in the legislation we are now considering.

Mr. McCOIG: Might not the minister allow this clause to stand? There will be many objections from different members of the House to its passing, and the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's and the hon. member for Three Rivers have already expressed opinions which the minister should take into consideration. I think the minister might let it stand.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Until eight o'clock.

Mr. McKENZIE: A certain questionnaire is now sent out and questions are to be answered by the taxpayer. That form is sent back and the rest of the work is done by the department. The amount is ascertained and the bill is sent to the taxpayer. Speaking for myself, I should think that it would be better to continue that form. The people in the last two or three years have become accustomed to it, and I would suggest to the minister that he stand by the old method of having the amount ascertained in the department and sending the bill direct to the individual. I venture to say that this new proposal is only duplicating the work; hardly one man in a hundred will be able to ascertain the proper amount he has to pay, and it may be discovered in the long run that the whole thing is wrong and has to be done over again. I do not say that any taxpayer will intentionally give a wrong return, but this will happen, and the department will discover that there are errors and a duplication of work, and possibly the taxpayer will be subject to a fine because he innocently failed to make a correct return. I seriously bring this matter to the consideration of the minister, and would suggest that the amount be ascertained by the department itself. After the department has obtained the facts it can send the bill direct to the man. As to what terms the department may make with the taxpayer as to instalments and so forth, that is a matter for their consideration. I do say that the amount of the bill should be ascertained when the proper machinery is present for ascertaining it.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): The minister might make it plainer for the people if he put on the margin of the form a table showing the tax. Most people have not the statutes before them. Some of the banks have published a little pamphlet with a scale showing what the tax would amount to on certain incomes and that is very handy. Many people have not got that. When the minister is making a new form it would be easy to put on the margin something that would let people know the amounts that they would have to pay. That is all the more necessary owing to the fact that the minister is asking the people to advance 25 per cent of the tax when making their return.

Mr. LOGGIE: It strikes me that in the end it would be much more satisfactory if the minister would continue having the returns made as they have been made. Let the taxpayer, when he is sending in his return to be approved, send in 25 per cent of the approximate amount and then make the tax due and payable after the return has been passed upon by the department.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Twenty-five per cent cash?

Mr. LOGGIE: Twenty-five per cent in cash and the balance after it has been passed upon by the department.

BANKRUPTCY ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Acting Solicitor General) moved the second reading of Bill No. 126 to amend the Bankruptcy Act. He said:

The House is aware that during the first session of 1919 a Bankruptcy Act was passed by this Parliament. That Act did not go into force at the passing thereof but by its provisions was to go into force upon proclamation being made therefor by the Governor General in Council. Early in the present session the proclamation was issued bringing the Bankruptcy Act into force on the 1st of July next. The Act itself is rather a comprehensive measure and somewhat intricate. One object in allowing a lapse of time between the passage of the Act and its coming into operation was to give the people an opportunity of understanding it, and during the past year there have been certain criticisms levelled at it. A number of suggestions have been received from Chambers of Commerce, from mercantile associations, from judges and from Bar associations suggesting certain amendments which had not occurred to any member of the House when the Bill was in committee last year. These have now been examined and passed upon by the law officers of the Crown, and it is felt that a number of them should be incorporated in the Act for the purpose of simplifying and making it generally more workable. It would be a difficult thing on a motion for the second reading of the Bill to discuss these matters as they appear in the Bill itself—they are somewhat technical,—but most of the amendments I think are rather clerical than otherwise. I would ask the House to pass the second reading and allow the Bill to go into committee when the various amendments proposed can be more fully explained.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the second time, and the House went into committee on the Bill, Mr. Steele in the Chair.

On section 2—"debtor."

Mr. GUTHRIE: The only change made by clause 2 as printed in the Bill is to insert the words, "except by leave of the court" in line 21, and also the words, "or afterwards by leave of the court" in line 25. The reason for the amendment is simply this., By the Act passed last session all corporations were placed under the jurisdiction of the Bankruptcy Act for the purpose of winding up. It has been suggested that some of the provisions of the old Winding-Up Act, as to assets and as to the rights of creditors and the rights of contributories, might in some rather indefinite cases be useful for the court in settling the assets of an estate or the rights of contributories. It has been suggested by some of the judges of Canada that if any of these special cases should arise, by leave of the court the aid of these clauses in the Winding-Up Act might be invoked under the Bankruptcy Act, but it would only be in special cases, and therefore the words inserted in the amendment are, "except by leave of the court." I see no objection to the amendment, though personally I thought the section was good enough as it stood.

Amendment agreed to, and section as amended agreed to.

On section 3—"Locality":

Mr. GUTHRIE: The only change in that is with regard to the term of six months during which the debtor carries on business. In the Act as passed the language was:

> —within a bankruptcy division or district where at the debtor has carried on business for the longest period during the six months immediately preceding the date of the presentation against him of a bankruptcy petition.

The proposal now is to strike out the words, "for the longest period during the six months" and insert the words, "whereat the debtor has carried on business at any time during the said six months immediately preceding the date of the presentation against him of a bankruptcy petition."

It may be hard to ascertain just where an insolvent debtor has carried on business for the longest period during the last six months, and it has been suggested it would make it more definite if the enactment were in the form suggested by this amendment.

Mr. TRAHAN: Have the bankruptcy divisions or districts been established by the Government?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am under the impression that they have. The operation of the Act is now under the Department of the Secretary of State. I have discussed the matter with the Under-Secretary of State, who is very familiar with the whole matter, and my information is that the rules have been prescribed, the bankruptcy divisions established, and I think probably the list of trustees has been more or less completed; I do not think it is finally completed, and will not be, until this amending Act is passed. My information is that all the machinery is well under way for the coming into force of the Act on the 1st of July next.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The proclamation has been issued?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Were the districts created by that proclamation?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, they are prescribed by rules and regulations.

Mr. TRAHAN: Will these rules and regulations be printed and distributed before the 1st of July next?

Mr. GUTHRIE: They are practically ready for distribution; I think my hon. friend could get a copy of them to-morrow. They will be slightly amended in consequence of these amendments.

Mr. TRAHAN: These rules have been made by the Under-Secretary of State?

Mr. GUTHRIE: By the Governor in Council.

Mr. TRAHAN: In order that they shall come into operation is it not necessary that they shall be submitted to the approval of Parliament?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, I do not think that is necessary.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—affidavit:

Mr. GUTHRIE: In the original Act this section reads as follows:

> The petition shall be verified by affidavit of the creditor or of some person on his behalf having knowledge of the facts.

The manner of the service and the manner of the verifying are prescribed by the rules; it is considered that the amendment is better drafting than the clause as originally drawn.

Mr. TRAHAN: But these rules may be changed by the Governor in Council?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes, the rules of practice may be changed.

Mr. TRAHAN: And the Governor in Council may change the procedure in connection with the affidavit? Would it not be preferable to leave the clause as it stands? Why leave this question of procedure to the Governor in Council?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The memorandum which I have says that the judges who have gone over the Bill suggest that we do not change the old form prescribed in the Winding-Up Act—a form which has been in force in this country for thirty or forty years.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—proceedings taken in wrong court:

Mr. GUTHRIE: Subsection (11) is a new provision. The proceedings should not be nullified, simply because a man files his petition in the wrong court. In this provision the court is given power in such a case to transfer the proceedings to the proper court.

Mr. COPP: I assume that "wrong court" would mean a court without jurisdiction?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The right court would be the court having jurisdiction. The judge in bankruptcy would have the right to transfer the proceedings to the proper court.

Mr. TRAHAN: He should have not only the right but the obligation.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am not a master of the English language, but it seems strange that the expression "wrong court" should be used. Why not say, "a court not having jurisdiction?"

Mr. GUTHRIE: The petition might be filed in a court having jurisdiction in the province of Quebec whereas it should have been filed in a court in Ontario. The words "wrong court" here mean, I think, courts which are not bankruptcy courts; I think they are intended to cover any court; if a petition is filed in the Supreme Court of Ontario and should not be there, it may be transferred to the proper court.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Does it mean that if the proceedings are instituted in Ontario they may be transferred to the province of Quebec?,

Mr. GUTHRIE: The bankruptcy judge would have that power. Bankruptcy courts are federal, not provincial courts.

Section agreed to.

On section 6—receiving orders and assignments to take precedence of attachments, executions, etc.:

Mr. GUTHRIE: This is a rather peculiar change, but it is one which I do not think objection can be taken. In the Act as passed we had a provision at the end of subsection (1) which was inserted having regard to the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, although it did not name them. In those two provinces a different practice obtains from that prevailing in the other provinces in regard to judgment debts. There judgments are looked upon as securities; a man taking a judgment will keep it in force for a great number of years, keeping it more as a mortgage than as a judgment, and obtaining annually his interest from the debtor. I understand that a good deal of money is thus invested in those two provinces, and to protect such judgments the House inserted this provision in the Act of last session:

> Provided that this paragraph shall not apply to any execution or other process issued against real or immovable property under or by virtue of a judgment registered prior to the coming into operation of this Act, which judgment, as the result of such registration, became, under the laws of the province wherein it was entered a charge, lien or hypothec upon or of such real or immovable property.

It has been suggested that this provision be struck out and that a clause be inserted in the terms of clause 7 of the Bill now before us, limiting the application of that provision to Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

Section agreed to.

On section 8—avoidance of preference in certain cases:

Mr. GUTHRIE: This clause has a history. In the form in which it appears in the Bill before the committee, it was practically in the Bill which went before the special committee in the spring session of 1919. It is an embodiment of the Ontario statute, and I think it is the law if not in all, in many of the provinces of the Dominion of Canada. The special committee which dealt with the Bill in 1919 saw fit to change it, and we thought we had improved it. When it came before the House it was passed in the form in which the committee submitted it. When, however, it came before the Senate, it was again amended in the form in which it now appears in the Bankruptcy Act. As it appears in the enactment of to-day it is the law neither of the province of Ontario nor of any of the other provinces. There is no great variation, I am bound to say; but there are some slight changes in language in this clause which is one of the important clauses of the Bill, and I think the result will be that all judicial decisions which we have had the benefit of in Canada heretofore will not apply to this section as passed by the House last session. Consequently, those who take a deep interest in this measure have come to the conclusion that it would be far wiser to adopt the Ontario law upon the subject which is, as I say, the law in a majority of the provinces of Canada at the present time. The amendment now proposed is practically an adoption of the Ontario clause. It does not make much change in the clause as originally passed; it strikes out these words:

> If made, incurred, paid, taken, or suffered, with such view as aforesaid.

That is, with a view of giving a preference. It inserts subclause 2 in the Bill before the committee:

> If any such conveyance, transfer, payment, obligation or judicial proceeding has the effect of giving any creditor a preference over other creditors, or over any one or more of them, it shall be presumed prima facie to have been made, incurred, taken, paid or suffered with such view as aforesaid whether or not it was made voluntarily or under pressure and evidence of pressure shall not be receivable or avail to support such transaction.

Where such a transaction as that is impeached, it shall be presumed prima facie to have been a preferential transaction and consequently, void as against a trustee in bankruptcy.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Void, ipso facto?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Not as between the parties, but only as against the trustee having a prior claim. I think it is wise to put in the well-understood clause of so many provinces and so to remove any doubt which may exist by virtue of the Senate's amendment of last year.

Mr. ROBB: The minister would not care to alter the clause to this extent, that if a party who secured a mortgage had delivered goods within, say sixty days of the demand for bankruptcy, then the mortgage or guarantee might stand good?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not quite understand the question. Three months is the term limit of the clause. Your six months' mortgage, if not fraudulent, if a bona fide transaction, would be good.

Mr. LEMIEUX: But nothing prevents a trustee, even if the transaction be of older date, to prove fraudulent intent?

Mr. GUTHRIE: It might be fraudulent, no matter how old it is. There is no question of the presumption.

Mr. LEMIEUX: There is no bar to proving fradulent intent?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Not at all.

Section agreed to.

On section 9—recovery:

Mr. GUTHRIE: The change in this clause is very slight. Under the Act as passed under the circumstances stated, the section provided that—

> The trustee may, with the approval of the inspectors of the estate, institute in a court having jurisdiction in debt to such amount, an action or other proceedings for the recovery thereof.

This clause is much simpler; it reads:

> If at the expiration of thirty days from the date of the service of such demand the contributory has not paid to the trustee the required amount, the trustee may take proceedings against the contributory for the recovery thereof in the manner provided by General Rules.

The distinction is this. The manner provided by general rules will be in a bankruptcy court. In the Act as passed, the proceedings could be taken in any court of competent jurisdiction. It has been thought that bankruptcy matters should be dealt with, in so far as possible, in a single court, in a federal court, and if a contributory is ordered to pay money and does not pay it, the trustee would go to the bankruptcy court in order to take proceedings.

Mr. COPP: May I be permitted to ask the minister a question in regard to section 31, which reads:

> Every conveyance or transfer of property or charge thereon made, every payment made—

And so forth? Supposing a man conveys a transfer by way of mortgage to another man who may be a creditor and the latter advances him more money, what position would that creditor be in?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am afraid that would be regarded as a preferential claim and would be set aside. If the transaction is made "with a view of giving such creditor a preference over other creditors" or has the effect of doing so, "if the person making, incurring, taking, paying or suffering the same is adjudged bankrupt on a bankruptcy petition presented within three months after the date of making, incurring, taking, paying or suffering the same," the same shall be adjudged a preference.

Mr. COPP: That is going a pretty long way.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think that is the law in my hon. friend's own province.

Mr. COPP: Only as regards personal property, not real estate. It has that effect in the case of a bill of sale, but not in the case of a mortgage.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not see any reason for the distinction between a mortgage and a bill of sale. Property is property, and creditors have the right to get after it. I do not see why it should be impeached in the one case and not in the other. I know that in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick they have laws more or less favourable to creditors in regard to real estate. Those judgments which I spoke of a few moments ago are but instances of that. I think the proper principle is to place all creditors as far as possible on an equal footing, and to abolish as far as we can all preferences between them.

Mr. COPP: The difficulty will be this. A man might be a creditor and someone in need of money may go to this same creditor and borrow $5,000 giving a mortgage on real estate for security. The creditor has the title searched, finds it is all correct, and takes the mortgage. The real estate is clear of all encumbrances so far as he knows. He advances the $5,000 to enable the man to carry on the business and at the end of three months he may be out the $5,000.

Mr. GUTHRIE: He would not lose it; he would be an ordinary creditor for it.

Mr. COPP: He would only rank with the other creditors irrespective of his security. I am afraid it would have the effect of interfering with legitimate business.

Mr. McKENZIE: Are these General Rules referred to in subsection 8 new rules that are to be passed? Why should not the minister adopt the practice in the different provinces? In Ontario, for instance, they have the Judicature Act, just as we have in Nova Scotia, and a well-established practice, and the same is true of all the other provinces. It would be rather awkward for a man who is getting well up in years like myself to have to learn a new procedure and practice. The Judicature Act is the procedure in all the courts in England, and I do not see why it should not be applicable in collecting a debt in this court.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The Judicature Act is not the practice in bankruptcy proceedings in England. The rules there are just as we propose to pass them here. My hon. friend was probably present in the House last year when that question was raised, and he will remember there was a pretty full discussion on it. One reason for passing these rules is to simplify the practice and make it uniform throughout the whole of Canada. At the present time we have different forms of practice in the courts of the various provinces of the Dominion. A man may wish to invoke the aid of a bankruptcy court in British Columbia, and may reside in Nova Scotia. There is only one petition, only one procedure. The idea has been to make this as simple as possible, and to make it uniform. I am satisfied that my hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie) will have no difficulty in following this practice. I took the opportunity a few days ago of reading through the practice, and I think it much more simple than any practice we have in the Ontario courts. I think the chief thing to be gained is uniformity and simplicity. This, I think, will be obtained in the rules when they are issued. They have been printed and are practically complete. There may be one or two changes necessary in consequence of these amendments, but otherwise I am assured by the Under-Secretary of State they are about ready for distribution.

Section agreed to.

On section 10—distribution of estate of bankrupt after notice:

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is a very slight change in this section. The note I have on it is that this amendment is asked merely to correct a mistake in the wording which crept into the Act of last year. So far as I can find out the only change is that they have inserted the words at line 43 "as provided by section 42, subsection 2 of this Act," and in line 46 they have used the word "regulations" instead of the word "notice." I think these are simply clerical errors, and I do not see any objection to them all.

Section agreed to.

On section 11—not to exceed 5 per cent.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This clause was suggested by my hon. friend (Mr. Jacobs). It deals with the question of remuneration of trustees. Certain representations have been made to the Government that the absolute limitation of a trustee's fee to 5 per cent in every case would undoubtedly work a hardship in some cases, particularly where the assets were small and the amount of work to be performed by the trustee was abnormally large. It has always been the custom in Canada for the creditors themselves or the inspectors to decide on the amount of the trustee's fees, in cases where the trustee asks for more than 5 per cent. This practice we think should continue except in cases where the trustee is able to pay the creditors one hundred cents on the dollar, in which case the debtor would have an equity and the court should then decide. As the Bill passed last session 5 per cent was the limitation in all cases, great and small. We deliberately took it out of the hands of the creditors. It has been pointed out to us, how ver, that in cases of small estates 5 per cent may be too small a fee. The proposed amendment will leave it in the hands of the creditors and inspectors—I think it is only the creditors—to fix the amount in the case of small estates.

Mr. PARENT: This section does not seem to show that the creditors are going to fix the amount of indemnity to be paid the trustees.

Mr. GUTHRIE: We have another section on that. This is merely striking out that 5 per cent limitation.

Section agreed to.

On section 12—inspectors' fees.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The former enactment provided that each inspector might be paid his actual and necessary travelling expenses "in and about the performance of his duties, and such sums only." The committee that threshed this matter out and also the committee of the House were inclined to think that the inspectors should be paid actual expenses. That was the view of the House when the Bill went through, and we so provided. However, this is the suggestion of my hon. friend from George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs), and after giving the matter fuller consideration than was given it last year I have come to the conclusion that the proposal is not unreasonable. It fixes a fairly modest fee for inspectors, having regard to the amount of the estate, and I arranged with my hon. friend that I would take no exception to the clause being introduced. It was introduced in a public Bill brought forward by my hon. friend at the beginning of the session.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is there anything in the Bill to limit the number of meetings that can be held? I followed the Bill closely last year but I do not remember its terms. Some unscrupulous man might have too many meetings.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not know that there is any actual limitation. Clause 42, which is rather lengthy, provides for the meetings that are to be held. The first meeting shall be held immediately after assignment and subsequent meetings may be called at any time by the trustee if he is requested to do so by a certain number of creditors. I do not see any power for inspectors to call meetings; that power rests in the hands of the trustees and creditors.

Section agreed to.

On section 13—proofs of debts.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The old section is very much like this. It reads:

Every creditor shall prove his debt as soon as may be after the making of a receiving order or after the date of an authorized assignment.

Mr. PARENT: Is there any form of procedure provided in regard to evidence?

Mr. GUTHRIE: He just makes his affidavit. A majority of the creditors may dispute his claim and, of course, he will have to prove it in court.

Mr. LEMIEUX: "As soon as may be" is rather vague, is it not?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think not; it means as soon as possible or convenient. You cannot very well impose a time limit on a creditor, because he may not be in the country. You have to be reasonably careful of the claims of creditors. So long as the estate has not been actually distributed a creditor may come in under the Act we passed last year. The object is to expedite the matter as much as possible and get all creditors before the trustee at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is there no time limit?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Not for the proving of a claim. If the estate has been distributed then, of course, the creditor's claim is barred.

Mr. COPP: Is there any provision limiting the time in regard to the distribution of the estate?

[Mr. Guthrie.]

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is.

Section agreed to.

On section 14—partners and separate estates.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The change here is in the last clause. Subsection (3) reads:

If there is a surplus of the joint estate, it shall be dealt with as part of the respective separate estates in proportion to the right and interest of each partner in the joint estate.

The section as passed last year read:

If there is a surplus of the separate estate, it shall be dealt with as part of the respective separate estates in proportion to the right and interest of each partner in the joint estate.

We have just reversed it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: A man may be a bankrupt in connection with a business in which he was a partner, and might be solvent as regards his own private business. Personally he is responsible for any debts incurred in connection with his own private business, but as a partner in a business he is responsible only in so far as the business is responsible. How do you treat that situation?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I quite understand the question. The defect in the section as printed was due to the fact that the printer left three lines out, and I was not aware of that fact until I looked at my memorandum which the Under-Secretary of State prepared. He says that the object of this amendment is merely to insert three lines omitted by the printer. I think that the languages of subsection (3) answers my hon. friend much better than I can answer him.

In the case of partners the joint estate shall be applicable in the first instance in the payment of their joint debts, and the separate estate of each partner shall be applicable in the first instance in payment of his separate debts.

That is the declaration of the common law. If after using the separate estate a man still has money left it can go to pay the partnership debts.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Even in the case of a limited business?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am not familiar with limited partnerships. There is a law in Ontario permitting limited partnerships, but I have not heard of one.

Mr. JACOBS: There is a law in regard to limited partnerships in Quebec also. In Quebec, the partner is only liable for the amount of money he agrees to contribute, and nothing further. He is merely like a stockholder in an ordinary joint stock company, and I assume that this law will not interfere with that rule. When the partnership is registered, notice is given to the commercial public that the limited partner is liable only for a certain sum and nothing further, and I presume that he could not be held under this section for any further sum.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This section would not hold him liable.

Mr. LEMIEUX: That is the point I had in mind.

Section agreed to.

On section 15—penalty for failure to attend for examination.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is only one change; in the eleventh line of the old Act, the word "debtor" is changed to the word "him." But rather than have the section amended we repeal it and put in an entirely new section, so that when the Act comes into force it may have as few small amendments as possible.

Mr. JACOBS: Is the punishment of twelve months the same as under the English Bankruptcy Act?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not know. We threshed these penalties out pretty well when we passed this particular section last year, but I do not know whether it is the same as the English Act. I am inclined to think it is.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is the party who fails to appear treated as a criminal or does the person at whose instance he is put into jail contribute to his maintenance?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think he would be treated as any other prisoner in the jail; his maintenance would be paid for by the municipal or provincial authorities. His imprisonment would be imprisonment for contempt of court.

Mr. LEMIEUX: In our practice in the province of Quebec—I am not familiar with the practice in the other provinces, although I was Solicitor General for a time—in a case of contempt of court, say, or of action for damages, the court may declare that a certain sum be paid or in default the person be sent to jail. A debtor remains in jail so long as a stated sum per week is paid by the creditor. If the creditor fails to pay for the maintenance of the prisoner, who is placed in what is known as the debtors' ward, the debtor walks out and is free. Is it the same in this case when the debtor fails to appear after being ordered to do so?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I would not think so. The law which my hon. friend speaks of was at one time in force in England, but that was many years ago. I do not believe that that law was ever in force in Ontario; at any rate, not in my time.

Mr. JACOBS: It is still in force in Quebec.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I remember a discussion on that point last year, and in certain actions for damage in that province, I believe, a man can be imprisoned. But in this section the man would be punishable for contempt of court for refusing to obey the summons of the court, and his maintenance would be at the expense of the municipal or provincial authorities.

Mr. JACOBS: If in the meantime the debtor shows his willingness to give satisfactory answers to the questions, could he not by application be brought before the court and, after having given those answers, be freed? That is to say, as we say in Quebec law, if he purges himself of his offense, would he not be released forthwith? That would be the rule under contempt of court proceedings in our province.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Under this provision he has a fairly good remedy in his own hands. If he refuses to attend and give evidence they have to summon him and bring him up again, so that he has ample opportunity.

Then after his second refusal:

—the court may, by warrant, cause him to be apprehended and brought up for examination—

He may first of all be brought up for examination.

—and may order him to be committed to the common gaol of the judicial district in which he resides for any term not exceeding twelve months.

Mr. JACOBS: Supposing the debtor has seen the error of his ways after serving six months?

Mr. GUTHRIE: He may make application for clemency.

Mr. JACOBS: Application to the executive clemency of the Solicitor General? May the Lord have mercy on his soul!

Mr. McKENZIE: Reading beyond line 20 there seems to be some doubt as to the protection afforded to one who refuses to answer a question. It is well known that if a man is asked a question which tends to incriminate him, he is not bound to answer it. There seems to be a statement here to the effect that if there is any impediment in the way of producing a book or an account he is excusable. I think it is very doubtful if that applies to a man who refuses to answer a question. It is not sufficiently plain to me that if he has any excuse for refusing to answer a question he is excused, whereas if there is any impediment in the way of producing a book or an account he will be excused. The general rule is that a man is not obliged in a civil proceeding to answer any question that tends to incriminate him.

9 p.m.

Mr. JACOBS: Or in a criminal proceeding.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The section covers the point raised by my hon. friend Mr. McKenzie if he will read it carefully. The section reads from line 20 on:

—or, if attending, refuses to make satisfactory answers to any questions asked him or refuses to produce any book, document or other paper,

There is a comma.

—having no lawful impediment made known to the examiner at the time of his sitting for such examination and allowed by him.

I think that qualification applies to his refusal to answer a question as well as his refusal to produce a book or paper. I think that the word "impediment" would cover either ground of privilege that a witness might urge.

Mr. McKENZIE: If the minister thinks it is clear that "impediment" is common to both grounds, of course I will be satisfied, but I never saw the word "impediment" used as an excuse for not answering a question. There might be an "impediment" in the way of producing a book—some one else might have the book and the witness might not be able to get it—but the use of the word "impediment" as applied to a condition under which he may refuse to answer a question is new legal phraseology to me.

Mr. GUTHRIE: If it is an impediment recognized by law a man would be able to claim privilege under it.

Mr. JACOBS: Does not the Acting Solicitor General think it would be wise, in view of the importance of the question to be decided under the section, to insert a declaration that nothing in section 15 shall take away the right given by the Criminal Code to any person who claims to be allowed not to answer a question on the ground that it might incriminate him?

[Mr. McKenzie.]

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think the Criminal Code itself would do that.

Mr. JACOBS: These are two statutes side by side.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The language is taken directly from the English Act.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 16—solicitors' and witness fees.

Mr. GUTHRIE: In the clause of the Act which was passed last session we provided:

All attorneys, solicitors and counsel acting for the trustee or for the estate of a debtor in respect of proceedings under this Act, shall be paid out of the assets of such estate their reasonable costs and fees as fixed in a tariff provided by General Rules; but, except as hereinafter provided, the aggregate amount of such costs and fees so payable out of the assets of estates whereof the gross proceeds exceed five thousand dollars shall not exceed five per centum of such gross proceeds.

We have struck out the "five per centum" and the "gross proceeds."

Mr. JACOBS: Hear, hear.

Mr. GUTHRIE: My hon. friend says, "Hear, hear." Well, this is at his own suggestion. I think the amendment is a good one and I have no hesitation in saying the committee ought to accept it.

Mr. JACOBS: When the Bill left this House last year the section was pretty much in the shape proposed in the amendment, but when the Bill came back from the Senate it had this objectionable clause which we are now seeking to remove.

Section as amended agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Section 17—undischarged bankrupt obtaining credit.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Before you read that section may I ask the committee to consider these sections: Since the Bill was introduced two very eminent judges of Canada have suggested two sections. One is an amendment to section 65 as to the powers of the registrar of the court. They merely ask to add this clause:

Any person dissatisfied with an order or decision of the Registrar may appeal therefrom to a Judge in the manner prescribed by General Rules.

I do not see any very great objection to that. Another amendment I may mention now is to section 71, as to the enforcement of Orders of Court throughout Canada. It has been suggested that clause 3 be added there:

The court may direct any issue to be tried or inquiry to be made by any judge or officer of any of the Courts of the Province and the decision of such judge or officer shall be subject to appeal to a judge in bankruptcy, unless the judge is not a judge of a Superior Court when the appeal shall be under section 74 of this Act.

That is a matter of convenience. If, for convenience, in any case, it is deemed proper to refer any particular questions to the decision of a judge, even if he be not a judge of bankruptcy, such a course may be pursued. I should not have thought the suggestions were essential to the proper carrying out of the Act but as both of the judges who have made them are, in the provinces where they reside, of the very highest reputation, I think perhaps the Act might be improved if these amendments were included. If the committee is willing I will move them.

The CHAIRMAN: Mr. Guthrie moves that section 65 of the said Act be hereby amended by adding thereto subsection 4.

Mr. JACOBS: I suppose that would mean that if the trustee or receiver is dissatisfied with the decision of the registrar he may also appeal.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think that is broad enough to include anybody. I may say that Mr. Justice Middleton, of the Ontario Superior Court, and Mr. Justice Maclennan, of Montreal, have gone very carefully over the Act and these amendments are brought here at their suggestion. They think the amendments will greatly improve the working of the Act.

Amendment agreed to and section as amended agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Mr. Guthrie now moves that section 71 of the said Act be amended by adding thereto subsection 3. Shall this amendment carry?

Mr. JACOBS: I think that rule might very well apply to the provinces outside the province of Quebec, but it seems to me unreasonable that judges of courts of inferior jurisdiction should be asked to try any of these questions in bankruptcy. For instance I may point out—

Mr. GUTHRIE: It is only where the judge of a bankruptcy court would direct, and I think such a judge would be very careful about whom he should refer a question to. In the meantime I would not hesitate to trust them with the power.

Mr. JACOBS: What I wish to point out is this: The province of Quebec is divided into seventeen or eighteen districts in each of which a judge of the Superior Court sits. Now we also have judges of the inferior courts who try cases under $100. It would not be well to have these judges of inferior courts pass upon questions of bankruptcy at all.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I quite agree with my hon. friend, but I think the way the matter will work out is that in each province a judge or judges will be designated to attend to bankruptcy matters, and I have no doubt they will be very careful with the administration of this law.

Mr. JACOBS: Will there be one judge for an entire province?

Mr. GUTHRIE: There may be one or more. One may be sufficient at first, but as time goes on more than one may be required. I can understand that where a number of minor applications come up for decision a judge may find it necessary to refer something, but I think he will be very careful as to whom he refers it to. We may as well see it tried out and if any wrong results, at the next session of Parliament we can change the law.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Are there to be special judges appointed for the administration of this Act?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, the judges of the superior court are charged with the administration of the Act, but as between themselves I believe that in arranging their judicial duties they are going to make the apportionment in such a way that, to as large an extent as possible, one or two judges shall deal with bankruptcy matters, for the beginning at all events, until we get a uniform practice.

Amendment agreed to and section as amended agreed to.

On section 17—undischarged bankrupt obtaining credit:

Mr. GUTHRIE: In the Act passed last session, it was provided that any person who obtained credit to the extent of $50 or upwards from any person without informing that person that he was an undischarged bankrupt was liable to heavy penalties. The change now proposed is to fix the amount at $500. In the English Act the amount is £100. This matter received careful consideration from the Retail Merchants Association, who were quite insistent upon the amount being $50. They took the ground that a man who was a discharged bankrupt may go into certain communities and obtain credit without disclosing the fact that he is an undischarged bankrupt, and they thought $500 was entirely too large an amount to fix; that if he ran an account of $50 or $100, under such circumstances, he should be liable to heavy penalties for doing so. It was for that reason that the amount was reduced from $500 to $50. I have no particular view on the subject, but I do think that the running of an account up to so small an amount as $50 should hardly render such a man liable to a year's imprisonment. Of course, he is guilty of concealing a most material fact, because if he did disclose to the dealer that he was an undischarged bankrupt he would not get the credit. I think that $500 is too high and that $50 is rather low. However, I shall be guided by the view of the committee.

Mr. JACOBS: The Acting Solicitor General will remember how vigorously we on this side opposed this clause when it was presented last year. We pointed out that the marking of a man practically for life for an offence of this kind was not quite in the order of things according to present-day ideas. The Acting Solicitor General has now agreed to raise the amount to $500; that is an improvement over the provision of last year. It does seem to me, however, that it is for the trader to get a report upon these people before he deals with them. To take from a man the right to do business at all in his own name and then place him under a penalty of a year's imprisonment for failure to disclose certain things is, to my mind, like "seething a kid in its mother's milk." However, if my hon. friend raises the amount each year in the same ratio as he has raised it this year, I think we shall soon agree. Last year we were opposed to this section and this year the Acting Solicitor General has come round to our view.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not know that I have.

Mr. JACOBS: Well, he has expressed his view in the amendment, which is supposed to contain the combined wisdom of himself and of the Government in this matter. I am glad to know that he comes round to our view, even if it takes a year for him to do it; as we say in French, "mieux vaut tard que jamais."

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is a great deal to be said in favour of the small amount. I can well understand the position of a retail merchant who is approached by a stranger with a request for credit—a man who has come from some other town where he is an undischarged bankrupt. Now, his asking for credit without disclosing the fact that he is an undischarged bankrupt is fraudulent concealment, though $50 does seem to be a small amount in respect of which to render a man liable to a year's imprisonment. I thought that $200 would be more appropriate; however, if the committee is content with leaving it at $500, as in the Bill, I shall not raise objection.

Mr. JACOBS: Without this clause at all, such a person could be proceeded against under the Criminal Code, could he not?

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is a general clause to cover that, yes.

Mr. JACOBS: That is one of my chief reasons for objecting to the clause.

Mr. STEIN: Does this law do away with all provincial laws respecting bankruptcy? I was not here last year when the matter was under discussion.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Any provincial law heretofore in force which dealt with the question of bankruptcy or insolvency will be superseded by this one.

Mr. JACOBS: Unless the Privy Council decides otherwise.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think my statement is in accordance with the decisions of the Privy Council so far as we have had them.

Section agreed to.

On section 19—repeal of section 97:

Mr. GUTHRIE: Section 97 is a peculiar section. It provides that:

> Any person who maliciously institutes or carries on against any person who has not done or suffered any act of bankruptcy proceeding in bankruptcy under this Act shall be guilty of an indictable offence and liable to a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars or to a term not exceeding two years imprisonment, or to both such fine and such imprisonment.

It was to prevent the institution of bankruptcy proceedings maliciously against any person. We had quite a heated discussion on this clause last year; I think that my hon. friend (Mr. Jacobs) divided the committee upon it. I remember that the then Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White) took quite strong ground in the matter; he contended that the public should be protected against malicious proceedings. There is no such provision in the English Act. The present Bill proposes to strike out that provision, but I leave the matter entirely with the committee.

Mr. JACOBS: I must congratulate my hon. friend upon his coming to his senses twelve months after we brought the matter to his attention. The clause was a foolish one; it was not drafted by a lawyer.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Oh, yes it was,—by an excellent lawyer.

Mr. JACOBS: Well, it may have been drafted by a lawyer, but it did not originate in the mind of a lawyer. It originated, I understand, in the minds of the Retail Merchants Association. I can quite understand, therefore, why it should have read as it did. "A shoemaker should never go beyond his last." But what I particularly regretted was that that association should have had sufficient influence with the then Acting Prime Minister to cause this provision to be put in the Act. It was all right enough for discussion outside the House, but solemnly to adopt it in this House as part of a statute was a piece of nonsense. Before this Bill was introduced this year I had introduced a Bill which had for its object the repeal of this clause together with a number of other clauses which have been dealt with by the Government. I shall now have much pleasure in withdrawing my Bill. It was just because I thought the Government had not awakened from their lethargy that I brought in my Bill, and, perhaps, that was the reason the Government brought in theirs. In any event, I am pleased to withdraw mine, and I congratulate the Acting Solicitor General (Mr. Guthrie) on introducing these amendments which, I think, will improve the Act in many respects.

Mr. McKENZIE: Do I understand the minister to say that the Bill will be reprinted? And when does this legislation come into force?

Mr. GUTHRIE: It comes into force on the 1st July by proclamation. The Bill will be reprinted in order that the clauses may appear without amendment. A few changes will be made in the rules, but I think in a few days they will be ready for distribution.

Mr. PARENT: Are they printed?

Mr. GUTHRIE: They are printed in a separate pamphlet at the present time, and in all probability they and the Bill will be bound together.

Mr. PARENT: Have any trustees been appointed up to date?

Mr. GUTHRIE: That matter is in the hands of the Department of the Secretary of State. The Under Secretary of State informed me that a very large list of applications had been received, and I think he said that the applications of certain men had been approved. I have never seen the list, nor inquired about it, but I understand a satisfactory list has been received.

Mr. PARENT: Is the field open to any one?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes.

Mr. BUREAU: Except a Liberal.

Section agreed to, Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

Mr. BUREAU: I thought there was an understanding that the Bill was to be reprinted. It has gone through third reading and is now out of our hands.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not think the hon. member would ask that the whole Bill be reprinted now.

Mr. BUREAU: Was not that the understanding.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, the Act consists of 150 pages. These clauses are to be reprinted in the Bill in order that they may appear without amendment, and the Bill will have to go to the Senate before that can be done. I think somebody had better watch it there.

Mr. ROBB: I notice in the Supplementary Estimates there is an item of $50,000 applied on account of an epidemic of smallpox and other diseases. Is that in addition to this?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is a supplementary item, not for this fiscal year, but for the last fiscal year. It is to cover a Governor General's warrant for extra money that had to be provided to fight the "flu."

Mr. BUREAU: How many reserves does this item cover in the province of Quebec?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Twenty, and 138 in Ontario.

Mr. ETHIER: Does that include the Oka Reserve?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. ETHIER: Is there a specific item for the Oka Reserve in regard to relief, medical attendance and medicines, out of the $42,700 mentioned?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The doctor's salary is specified, but there is no specific appropriation for that reserve. This is divided amongst the reserves according to their needs.

Mr. ETHIER: Does it cover the Indian agent's salary?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. ROBB: Some time ago, a complaint was filed by the farmers of the municipality of Chateauguay in regard to the drainage on the reserve, and I understood that the department was to send officers there to attend to the drainage if it was found that the Indians were responsible. Under the law of the province, they are required to attend to drainage on their property. I should like to know if this matter has been attended to.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is a fact that a complaint was received and that officers of the department went down. The report is to the effect that a very considerable sum would be required. The sum is not provided for in the Estimates, but the deputy minister informs me that he has the matter on his agenda to take it up with me at the earliest possible date.

Mr. BUREAU: Are any officers' salaries provided for outside of the present item? I see that there is no item for salaries for Ontario and Quebec. There is no item for salaries for Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and the Northwest Territories, but there are items for Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and British Columbia.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The salaries and expenses of the agencies are all included under the item "General Expenses" of $51,875.

Mr. BUREAU: How much is for salaries?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I can give that in a minute.

Mr. BUREAU: What is the object in not showing salaries separately for the western provinces, except British Columbia, and Ontario and Quebec?

Mr. MEIGHEN: We are just following the custom that has come down to us through the years, so as to make the Estimates more easily comparable with other years.

Mr. ROBB: With reference to the drainage at Caughnawaga, I gather from the minister's statement that the report of the officers who were sent down there is to the effect that drainage is required and that the department recognize their responsibility for the drainage. It is perhaps a little too late to have the drainage attended to for the spring seeding this year, but the same trouble will arise again this fall and next spring. Does the minister hope to have that drainage attended to during the summer so as to prevent the land in the adjoining municipalities being flooded through neglect of drainage on the Indian reserve?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not say that the report fixed responsibility upon the Indian Department, but that it was to the effect that were we to take care of the requirements a large amount of money would be involved. I said that the deputy minister had a note made to consult me on the subject at the earliest possible date. There is no item in the Main Estimates for drainage. As to whether there is an item in the Supplementaries I cannot say. Indeed, the subject has not been directly discussed with me. We are constantly in receipt of claims that the Indian Department should do this and that because there is a reserve in the district, but there are not many of these claims that are acceded to. This may be one that we should accede to, but I could not give any statement now as to whether it is such an one or not.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I wish to take this opportunity of publicly thanking the minister and the officials of the department for the work they have done at Caughnawaga. I am interested in a way in the little hospital which was founded down there at Caughnawaga by a pious lady who gave up her little savings for that purpose in order to give some relief to the poor Indians. She bought a building on the reserve, but, unfortunately, according to the laws of this land, in spite of the money she spent she cannot be declared the proprietor of that hospital building because the land belonged to the Indians and the Indians are the wards of the Government. At all events, the property is there and the hospital exists, and an excellent arrangement has been made by the department by which this elderly lady with her companions are giving the poor Indians the hospital service which one might expect in a civilized community. I understand that the department is well satisfied with the services rendered by these good ladies, who receive no remuneration whatsoever. I would ask the minister to send at the earliest possible moment one of the department's experts who look after these institutions down to Caughnawaga, because there are some repairs needed at that hospital. They will entail an expenditure of about $2,000, not more, and with that expenditure this hospital which has been of such service to the Iroquois of Caughnawaga would be made up-to-date. Of course, the good ladies are doing all this work gratis, and as I said, although the building has been paid for out of their own savings, when they pass out of this life it will revert to the department and the Indians. So by making this small advance of $2,000, to be spent under the direction of the officers of the department, the department will in reality be working for itself and the Indians.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I may say on behalf of the deputy minister that I appreciate the words of the hon. member. The appropriation per diem has been adjusted on a satisfactory basis, and on that account it is not the intention of the department to bear the expense of the repairs that are necessary. I am informed that a letter has been received from the hospital authorities intimating that they are prepared to spend $1,200 in improvements, and the department contemplates assisting them to the extent of $400, which is expected to be sufficient to meet present requirements.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Will my hon. friend send Mr. Cheney down there at the earliest possible moment?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. I can now give my hon. friend (Mr. Bureau) the salaries for Ontario and Quebec. The amount is $19,370.

Mr. BUREAU: How much for each province?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will give that in a minute.

Indians—Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and Northwest Territories, $556,414.

Mr. POWER: May I ask why special treatment is meted out to one tribe of Indians? The Sioux get $7,545. Why should they be singled out from the other tribes?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Because they are non-treaty Indians.

Mr. POWER: They have no reserve?

Mr. MEIGHEN: They are not natives of Canada. They came from the United States, and consequently are not included in the treaty arrangements.

Mr. JACOBS: They are aliens.

Mr. POWER: Alien Indians.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They are not aliens, but they are non-treaty Indians, not being originally natives of Canada.

Mr. BUREAU: Again in this item I see a quarter of a million dollars under the head of "general expenses." The item of salaries for Ontario and Quebec, the minister said, was $19,000 odd, while the item under general expenses, which includes salaries, is $51,875. As to the western provinces, how much of this item of $259,000 under "general expenses" is for salaries? There is quite an enumeration here—implements, tools, etc., field and garden seeds, livestock, supplies, for destitute, hospitals and medical attendance, triennial clothing, surveys, grist and saw mills. Unless the salaries are very high, that leaves quite a big margin unaccounted for under "general expenses."

Mr. MEIGHEN: The salaries in that item of $259,006 account for $136,155, rations $37,365, fuel, feed and light $17,536, livestock $15,000.

Mr. ETHIER: There is a separate item for livestock.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is for driving horses for the agents. Equipment $9,073, buildings 13,906, miscellaneous $43,471. That makes up the total.

Mr. BUREAU: What does miscellaneous cover, anything and everything?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Usually it covers travelling expenses of agents, up-keep of motors, ice, telephone expenses, telegraphing, postage, stationery, etc., in all agencies in these provinces.

Mr. BUREAU: What is the Indian population of the three provinces?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It totals 34,348 inclusive of 3,769 in the Northwest Territories. Manitoba has 11,935, Saskatchewan, 9,962 and Alberta, 8,682. The total number of reserves is 218.

Mr. BUREAU: Manitoba has the largest number?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE: What is the situation of these Indians? Are they earning anything, or do they depend entirely upon the assistance they get from the Government? I should imagine that they ought now to be in a position to help themselves to a great extent.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They not only help themselves, but they are practically self-sustaining. With the help which the department gives them, not financial but supervisory, they are almost self-sustaining. The Indians of these provinces are not so far advanced toward maturity of citizenship as, generally speaking, the Indians of the eastern provinces are. They have been in contact with civilization for a less number of years, but they keep gradually improving and those who graduate into citizenship and get away from the reserves and get on their own responsibility very rarely fail. That is a remark of some importance in connection with the legislation that will be before the House later on. The great difficulty is the tendency to keep to the old habits in the reserve. When they get away on their own responsibility—of course they should not be put there too soon—they rapidly, and in most cases certainly, make good citizens. In the three provinces they are virtually self-sustaining, with the supervisory assistance which they get at considerable expense from the department.

Mr. JACOBS: Have these Indians been thoroughly Christianized?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Inasmuch as that work is not distinctly ours I am not ashamed to confess that it has not been quite perfect.

Mr. JACOBS: It is the Lord's work.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is largely in charge of the missionaries of the various churches, who have succeeded to a substantial extent, and I must say that the whole Indian administration of Canada would be far from the success it is to-day were it not for the co-operation of the evangelical churches. There is no doubt about that. Not only would the expense be much greater to the Dominion, but the character of the work could not be of the same advantage to the Indian if we did not have that co-operation. The work that is being done by the evangelical churches in all the provinces is very considerable indeed and very burdensome to those churches, and to them Canada in that respect is unquestionably under a debt of gratitude.

Mr. JACOBS: Does the minister include the Roman Catholic church?

[Mr. McKenzie.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly; there is no church more active in the work than the Roman Catholic church.

Mr. JACOBS: How is the work on these reserves apportioned to the Methodists, the Baptists, the Presbyterians, etc.? How do they divide up the poor Indian?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Anglican, the Presbyterian, the Methodist and the Roman Catholic are the chief bodies which do this work. They all have their respective spheres, and the policy of the department is to delimit those spheres of activity so as to avoid overlapping and a consequent additional expense. They all agree to that and work along those lines. As a rule they are not situate side by side at some point competing with one another for proselytes.

Mr. JACOBS: In that respect they differ from the white man.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am speaking of the churches.

Mr. JACOBS: The churches in their treatment of the Indian differ from the white man, civilized, so-called, in the matter of overlapping.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have not experienced any embarrassment from the competition myself. I do not know that there is such a difference.

Mr. McKENZIE: The hon. member for George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) is evidently looking for the Mosaic dispensation but I do not believe he will find a very strong footing among the Indians. I am glad to say that in the province I come from we have quite a number of Indians. They receive very little support but they are very religious indeed—highly religious. Training in religion was given by the Catholic missionaries who went through the wilds two hundred years ago teaching the Indians, and it is to the credit of the Indians that they have never in the slightest degree departed from the early teaching which they received. It would be a curiosity to see amongst the Indians of the Maritime Provinces anything but a Roman Catholic.

Mr. JACOBS: In answer to my hon. friend let me say that I am not looking for a sphere of influence for the Mosaic dispensation as he seems to infer. If I were doing so I would be looking for greater mentality than is shown by the poor Indian.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I would like to ask the minister if there is an amount in the Estimates for building a new school on the Gordon's Indian reserve in the province of Saskatchewan.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No.

Mr. JOHNSTON: If that is the case I feel it my duty to bring to the attention of the minister some correspondence I have had with the principal of that school with respect to the condition of the school and the need for a new building there. In the spring of 1918 I received a letter from the principal of the school asking that I should have this matter brought to the attention of the Government. The war being on, I replied to the effect that I did not think it would be possible that the Government would take it into consideration at that time and I did not feel like asking them to do so. During the past winter I again received a communication from the principal of the school outlining the need of a new building. The letter reads in part as follows:

GORDON'S INDIAN BOARDING SCHOOL,
PUNNICHY, SASKATCHEWAN,
February 3, 1920.

Sir,—Permit me to call your attention to the following facts:—

(1) The main building of this School was erected of prairie stones, about the year 1892, and consisted of a basement divided into kitchen, dining-room, pantry and cellar so called.

The ground floor is subdivided into an office, a sitting room, a girls' wash room, and a room used for a sewing room; also, a boys' play-room, and a wash-room, all of which are too small.

The second floor furnishes two dormitories for girls (large and small girls) and three staff-rooms.

Prior to 1914, two years after I was appointed principal, no drainage had been provided, although the building was situated at the foot of a slope, and the water, when it rained soaked into the basement, and undermined the walls, which settled, and made the building so unsafe that heavy iron rods had to be run from one wall to another, opposite to keep them from falling apart.

(2) In 1913, the department proposed to add a lumber story to the present stone structure, and a concrete addition to the rear, and plans were sent me for approval, but the Indians, on hearing of the project became alarmed, lest the additional weight would cause the collapse of the old building.

In 1914, plans for a new building on a larger scale were prepared, and sent for approval; the proposed new building was to be erected immediately in front of the old one, which was to be utilized for different purposes; tenders were to be advertised for at once, and the new building completed by October of that year.

That was in 1914.

In 1915 the Government had a frame addition added to the rear of the old structure 40 ft. x 18 ft., the ground floor of which is used for a class room, and the second floor for a boys' dormitory. This addition enabled the department to increase the number of pupils from thirty to fifty.

In 1916, the department provided for the building a laundry, a small frame structure, but no reservoir was added, and not even eave-troughing was supplied.

(3) The condition of the old building, ever suitable for an Indian school, should engage the attention of the Department. The floors are worn out, the basement, so long without drainage (up to 1914), is unsanitary, the window frames are decayed, the roof leaking, the chimneys unsafe; there is no heating system, eleven stoves have to be kept up, there is no water supply, water for laundry, baths and scrubing, having to be drawn from a lake two miles distant, about fifteen barrels a week; water for cooking from a well half a mile distant; there is no room in building for isolation of a pupil suffering from any infectious or contagious disease, a staff-room having to be given up for that purpose when occasion requires.

During the Flu epidemic in 1918, there were fifty-one pupils lying ill in the dormitories, and there was not one sanitary closet in the building; a man had to be hired to empty pails and disinfect them, from the boys' dormitory, and the ladies of the staff, in addition to nursing and care of the sick, had to do this work in the girls' dormitories.

In order to keep the school going, I have expended all that could be spared from farm and W. A. receipts in improving conditions. I have had a frame granary built, at a cost of $400; a storehouse, at a cost of $200, an extension of the 1915 addition connecting it with the main building and thus providing another staff-room, at a cost of $300; and in general repairs have expended upwards of $300, some of my small salary from the Diocese having been used from year to year in this way, always looking forward to improved conditions.

It is a shame to deprive the Indian children whom we cannot accommodate of their opportunities, and it is an outrage to expect ladies of education and refinement, who, having devoted themselves to the work, were sent here by the Woman's Auxilary, to continue year after year working under such conditions as I have brought to your notice. As a Canadian, familiar with western life since 1884, and more or less in touch with Indian work, I cannot regard with complacency the fact that such a small matter as the expenditure for an Indian school should prove to be such an insurmountable obstacle to the Government of Canada.

I beg to ask you, sir, for a definite answer, as to whether or not the new building for Gordon's School will be provided this year?

An average of at least eighty children can be maintained as soon as the accommodation is provided; we are constantly refusing applications, and do not feel justified in having the full number authorized by the department, in view of our experience last year during the epidemic.

The new building should include infirmaries for boys and girls, unless the department contemplates utilizing the old building, as the commissioner suggested, for hospital purposes, with provision for a trained nurse.

Some few weeks ago I placed a question pertaining to this matter on the Order Paper. The question dealing with this particular matter was

Is it the intention of the Government to erect a new school building on Gordon's Indian Reserve, Saskatchewan, this year?

The answer to that question was

Final decision has not been made.

A year ago last winter, during the epidemic of influenza, there were some fifty cases in the school and they did not have a spare room for isolation of cases of this kind. There were three deaths from this disease. Later on they had an outbreak of typhoid in the school. I have here the report of the Inspector of Schools for the province of Saskatchewan addressed to the Bishop for the district. It reads as follows:

Sir,—Through the courtesy of the principal I inspected the above school, and am pleased to report on the good order and excellent discipline throughout the school generally. The kindly Christian spirit prevailing is very evident, as also the cordial relations between the pupils and the staff.

On inspecting the work in the schoolroom I found the pupils well up in the different grades, comparing very favourably with the pupils in the public schools. Miss Elizabeth Atwater, the teacher, is doing excellent work, and I have recommended her to the Department of Education for a Permanent Certicficate.

As one interested in Indian work I would call the attention of your Lordship to the fact that the buildings and equipment are quite inadequate for the purposes of the school. The school at present is filled to capacity, yet I am credibly informed that the number without any special effort could be increased from fifty to eighty.

That is a point that ought to have some weight with the minister and with the committee. This school building, besides being unsanitary, is wholly inadequate to accommodate nearly all the children who desire to attend. There are other reserves close to the Gordon's reserve without school buildings and the children from these reserves would attend this school if there was room to accommodate them. These children are growing up without a chance of getting an education.

This means that many Indian children on the neighbouring reserves are being deprived of the opportunity of a Christian education, thus growing up in ignorance—a menace to the common weal.

The danger of fire in the present building, lighted as it is by kerosene lamps and heated by stoves and without an adequate water supply is very great. It is providential that no tragedy has so far occurred. The Federal Authorities should be vigorously informed that a new and up-to-date school building is absolutely necessary for the carrying on this important work.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

Yours faithfully,

J. G. McKECHNIE,
Inspector of Schools.

[Mr. Johnston.]

This matter has become one of local interest in that district. The people in the adjacent towns know the condition of this school, know that the principal and staff are giving excellent service, and doing all they can under the circumstances with a building that is not fit for school purposes and not large enough to accommodate the children who would otherwise attend it. I think the minister should give the committee some assurance that while provision has not been made in the Estimates, a sum sufficient to provide a new building will be placed in the Supplementary Estimates. An amount was placed in the Estimates in 1914 but the work was never carried out. The war intervened, and nothing has been done up to this time. I hope the minister will be able to give the committee some assurance that the work will be looked after this year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The school to which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Johnston), refers, is not the property of the department. It is the property of the Church of England and is conducted by them. The direct obligation of the department is to provide the measure of sustenance per pupil that we provide generally in such cases.

That is done in this case. It is true that the church is anxious that we should take over the capital proposition and build a new school. I fear the letter the hon. member has read is not a very recent one. As regards the description of the lighting system as being coal oil lamps, I am informed that the department has replaced that and has installed—

Mr. JOHNSTON: It is so stated in a letter of February 3, 1920.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Since that date the department has installed the Delco electric lighting system in the school at its own expense. It is true that other things are not modern and a new school would be much better, but I am by no means convinced that there are not others in a similar position. It is our intention to have Mr. Graham, the commissioner in the West, visit the school very shortly and report on its present condition. I cannot make any statement as to whether an item can be placed in the Supplementary Estimates this year or not.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Am I to understand that the department will, in no case, build schools on these Indian Reserves?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not say that.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I know very well that you did not say so.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The church owns the school. If it were our school the obligation upon us to keep it in repair, or to rebuild it, would be much more immediate and direct than is the case when it is a church school owned by the church. Of course we sometimes do take over a proposition when the church is not able to carry it out, and build a new school which would be our property; but we cannot be held directly responsible for the maintenance of a school which is not our own. Now as to when we may be able to take this school over and reconstruct it I cannot say. I believe an estimate was submitted to the department with that intention at a time when we had far less obligations on our backs than we have at the present time. We want to treat all alike as nearly as possible. We are building one Anglican school, one that was much more necessary, according to the information at our hands, than was this one. We try to distribute these schools amongst the various denominations having regard to the immediate necessity of the case and just as fairly as possible.

Mr. JOHNSTON: With the permission of the committee I desire to place on record a telegram which I received a couple of days ago from the Archdeacon of that diocese. It reads as follows.

REGINA, Sask., 4th June, 1920.

J. F. JOHNSTON, M.P.,
House of Commons, Ottawa.

The Synod of the diocese of Qu'Appelle in Synod assembled desires to place on record its sense of the serious situation created in our Indian work by the delay of the Government in building Gordon's Indian Boarding School at Punnichy for a period of over six years. In view of other buildings having been built during that period the Synod feels that a great injustice has been done to this diocese and to the Indians. The Synod therefore expresses to the authorities of the department the hope that this matter will receive immediate attention and that the contract will be let and the building erected at once.

ARCHDEACON KNOWLES,
Sec'y. of Synod,
1611 Sixteenth Avenue.

Now it seems to me that the department must have considered doing something in the direction of taking this property over and looking after it, when it placed an item in the Estimates for 1914 providing for the erection of a new building there.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Just before closing the matter I might suggest to the hon. member that he take the subject up with his leader (Mr. Crerar) who has been urging in rather mandatory tones a most ruthless reduction in these Estimates. I think his missionary work might very well be done there as well as with the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), to whom he gives pretty good support, who makes the same demand.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Under different conditions there might be something in the minister's suggestion. As it happens, however, my leader is not handling the purse strings at the present time, and neither is the leader of the official Opposition. The responsibility in this matter does not devolve upon either of these hon. gentlemen, and I am much surprised at the minister directing my attention to them. He knows as well as I do that this is a matter of public business which rests in his own hands, not in the hands of the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) or the leader of the Opposition, and the fact that the minister should burden the committee with any such suggestion is ridiculous to me. His department, and those who preceded him in the administration of the department, considered this matter of sufficient importance to place an amount in the Estimates for 1914. It is not enough for him to say at this time that we have not got the money for the purpose. A glance through the Estimates for the present year will disclose to any one where enough could be saved to build this school and give these Indian children, who are wards of Canada, a chance to obtain an education.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not intimate that the leader of the hon. gentleman had his hands on the purse strings. I only intimated that he is crying out to the Government to cut these Estimates down. We cannot cut them down and raise them by the same stroke. The hon. gentleman himself is also pretty strong on economy, but I see that his principles are changed when the matter is one which affects his own constituency.

Mr. JOHNSTON: My principles are not changed at all. I stand for economy, and I claim we could easily pare enough off the other Estimates to erect this school building.

Mr. NICHOLSON (East Algoma): Perhaps while this matter is being discussed I might say a word to the committee that would throw some light on this question in direct relation to what is known as the Gordon School as well as many other schools of like character. I happen to have the privilege of being a member of the committee that has been working on matters of this nature indenominationally for the past ten or fifteen years, and I know something of the situation in connection with the Gordon School as well as many others. What happened, perhaps a decade or two decades ago, was that different denominations went into different sections of the country and erected school buildings rather indiscriminately, the Anglican church, of which I happen to be a member, along with the rest. The result was that we have a number of schools in locations where schools should not be, and there are many locations where schools should be where we have none. It is true that provision was made in the Estimates in 1913 or 1914 for the Gordon School. Provision was made at the same time for other schools within the Anglican communion, and I understand within other communions. But the war intervened and made it necessary for the Government to cut out these buildings. Now, my information is that the department is again beginning to take care of the most emergent cases. At the present time correspondence is passing between the different communions—Roman Catholic, Anglican, Presbyterian and Methodist—with a view to reaching a common view, so to speak, as to just the locations where the schools should be placed from one end of this country to the other, and to put that whole comprehensive scheme before the Government so as to get the whole Indian population into the position that will enable them to get the education they should have. I sympathize with everything that has been said in the correspondence that has been read by my hon. friend (Mr. Johnston) from the principal of the Gordon School, from the Inspector of Schools, and from the Archdeacon of the Diocese of Qu'Appelle, but I also know that the Missionary Society of the Anglican Church has represented to the department that there are still more urgent cases within their communion, without saying anything with regard to other communions. A situation has arisen, for instance, on the Blackfeet reserve that demands immediate attention unless the whole tribe of Indians is going to be wiped out on account of tuberculosis and other ills of this character. The bodies that are dealing with these Indian schools— industrial schools, in the main—are endeavouring to push the Government ahead as fast as possible, but they feel that having regard to the conditions with which the country is faced to-day they cannot expect the Indian Department to go ahead very much faster than it is going. As the minister has stated, they are erecting one new school which has been recommended by the Missionary Society of the Anglican church and they are erecting others for other denominations and providing additional per capita grants to take care of them. There is no larger question than this before the people of this country to-day, and it will continually get larger. Without doubt, within a short time, Parliament will be called upon to vote more money than it is voting now if the Indian population is taken care of as it should be.

I thought that it would be well to give the committee a general idea of what this school situation is, as I have had the privilege of studying it from the inside, so to speak, in conference and in conjunction with the interdenominational bodies that are endeavouring to carry on this work. Right here may I say that in many cases the Indian Department are erecting the building, providing the per capita grant for the maintenance of the children at the schools, and the missionary bodies of the different communions to which the Indians belong are carrying on the practical work of education. I am sorry that my hon. friend (Mr. Jacobs) is not here at the moment; I heard him make a remark that I feel disposed to resent. Perhaps he said it thoughtlessly, but he remarked that if he was going to undertake the work of proselytizing any particular class of the people he would go to a class with a higher mental capacity than that possessed by the Indians. Well, I suggest to him that he will have to go somewhere else than to Central or Eastern Europe to find that class. The native Indians of this country, given a fair chance, will make just as good citizens as any other men, white or black, that come within our borders.

Indians—Nova Scotia—salaries, etc., $28,300.

Mr. DENIS: How many Indians are there in Nova Scotia?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There are 2,031. Number of reserves, 45.

Mr. McKENZIE: How many superintendents are there?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Just one, Mr. A. J. Boyd, of River Bourgeoise, salary, $1,800. The salaries of the other agents are in amounts like these: $100, $150, $200, and so on, reaching a total of $4,400. These small salaries are not on any maintenance basis; it is simply an allowance for the work done.

Mr. McKENZIE: I think there are four schools in Cape Breton; is there a teacher at each of them this year?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There are fourteen day schools in Nova Scotia, of which five are in the island of Cape Breton. The number of pupils enrolled in Nova Scotia is 255. The day schools on the island are at Sydney, Eskasoni, Middle River, Salmon River, and Whycocomagh.

Mr. McKENZIE: There was a school at a place called Malagawatch, but I think it is closed this year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The attendance could not be kept up at that point. The school was not successful and it has been closed.

Mr. McKENZIE: As a result of an investigation held some years ago it was decided, I understand, that the Indians in the neighbourhood of Sydney were to be removed to some other location and that the lands were to be taken over by the Government. What has been done in that connection?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is the intention of the Government to move these Indians. I intend to submit to my colleagues an estimate for the purpose. If approved, it will be in the Supplementary Estimates.

Mr. McKENZIE: Has any place been decided upon as the new location?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not yet.

Indians—New Brunswick—salaries, etc., $19,284.

Mr. LEGER: Application was made by the Indians of Big Cove, New Brunswick, for a small grant to assist them in the building of a bridge. Is there anything in the Estimates in that connection?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I believe that without any special appropriation to that end we shall be able to build the bridge. My information is that the officers of the department favour its construction.

Mr. LEGER: How many Indians are there in New Brunswick?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There are 1,846.

Mr. DENIS: How many reserves?

Mr. MEIGHEN :Twenty-six.

Mr. LEGER: There is a school building at Big Cove; is it in operation?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think it is.

Indians—Prince Edward Island,—salaries, etc., $3,225.

Mr. McISAAC: How many Indians are there in this province and how many reserves?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There are 292, on two reserves. The salaries amount to $750, an increase of $150 this year. The miscellaneous item is $150 less than last year, so that the total estimate is exactly the same.

Indians—British Columbia—salaries, etc., $176,050.

Mr. PECK: I should like to ask the minister if the Indian agents will participate in the advantages of the Civil Service re-classification and what their salaries will be. Hitherto their salaries have been extremely small.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They do participate in the advantages of re-classification, and this means, generally speaking, increases in pay. The grade they go into is No. 5. I can give the hon. member the salary of any special Indian agent about whom he may desire to ask.

Mr. PECK: I should like to say a word or two in commendation of the work of the Indian Department in British Columbia, especially in Northern British Columbia. I represent a constituency which has six Indian agencies and 6,000 Indians, and I wish to commend the work of this Government and former Governments which have done wonderful work as regards education and the general improvement of the Indians, hospital work and so on. Great credit is due to the department in this regard. We do not have opportunities of giving commendation as often as we should do. The whole history of the Indians in Northern British Columbia is a strange and grand romance which does the utmost credit to the Indian Department and the missionaries of the various churches. As regards the question of denominational divisions, I may say that in British Columbia, we have little if any religious strife; the people there live in amity, one with another, and they allow their neighbours to have such religious opinions as their consciences dictate. Their action in that regard might be very well copied in other parts of the world. The same principle has pervaded the missionary divisions, and it has not been the policy of the different denominations for any denomination to invade the area of another. For instance, the Roman Catholic church came through following the Hudson Bay posts from the East as far as Hazelton in the northern part of British Columbia. Coming up from the coast, that famous missionary, Father Duncan, established English church missions along the whole seacoast. Later on the Methodist church with characteristic enterprise, took over two or three fields. But I can say from personal knowledge that there has never been any animosity or trouble between the various churches; in Northern British Columbia, they simply look after the Indians in their own areas, and they do not bother proselytizing in other areas. In that regard I wish to commend very strongly the people who have done so much in the way of missionary work in Northern British Columbia.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The number of Indians in that province is very large, viz., 25,698, and there are 890 Indian reserves there.

Indians—Yukon—relief, medical attendance and medicines, and general expenses, $15,000.

Mr. McKENZIE: How many people besides Indians are there in the Yukon?

Mr. MEIGHEN: In the Yukon, there are a large number of good, very intelligent people, judging from the election.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am not questioning their intelligence; I want to know the number.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have not the population of the Yukon before me, but I should think it was in the neighbourhood of about 4,300.

Mr. BUREAU: Indians?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, Whites and Indians.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am not speaking disparagingly of the Yukon; but from the report made about a year ago while we were making some adjustments of courts, I understood that the population was very small.

Indians—general,

| General legal expenses | 5,500 |
| Total | $128,000 |

Mr. MOLLOY: What are the provisions of section 89 of the Indian Act?

[Mr. Peck.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is the provision that enables the surrender of land for sale upon such terms as provide for the payment of a percentage of the proceeds to the individual Indians. This is an appropriation to do that.

Mr. CAHILL: An Indian reserve in Ontario was surrendered some time ago. Was the transaction completed, or is it still hanging fire?

Mr. MEIGHEN: A surrender of a reserve or part of a reserve occurs about once a week in Ontario. Does the hon. member remember what reserve this was?

Mr. CAHILL: At Sarnia.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am informed that the purchase has not yet been completed. The money is not yet paid.

Mr. CAHILL: It is being held for purchasers until what time? Until such time as they choose to pay for it? What are the general conditions governing a sale of that kind?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Indians have surrendered the reserve. We are not holding it at all. If the prospective purchasers go through with the purchase, all right, they get the land; if not, they do not get it.

Mr. CAHILL: The Indians have surrendered it to whom?

Mr. MEIGHEN: To the Crown for purpose of sale.

Mr. CAHILL: How long will the Crown hold it if they are not paid for it?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Until they sell it.

Mr. CAHILL: That might be fifty years.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It might be. We cannot make anybody buy it, but we have to sell it in accordance with the terms of the surrender. We have no reason to think the company—it is a steel company, is it not—some company that is establishing a big industry there—is not going ahead with the purchase; but if it does not, of course it will not get the land, and the land will be available for somebody else.

Mr. CAHILL: What are the terms of the surrender?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have not the terms with me. They are very lengthy, and I shall be glad to lay them on the table of the House if the hon. member so desires. The Indians of that reserve are a very intelligent class of Indians; they have a very shrewd knowledge of their business, and they looked carefully after their interest in fixing the terms of the surrender.

Mr. CAHILL: If the minister will put the terms on the Table to-morrow, that will be satisfactory.

Mr. McKENZIE: In this appropriation there is an item of $10,000 to prevent the spread of tuberculosis. I am sure that throughout Canada a great deal of sympathy is felt for the Indians on account of the ravages that tuberculosis and smallpox are making amongst them. I was going to suggest to the minister that this is a possible opportunity of handing over this branch of the work of the Indian Department to the Health Department, unless that has been done already. I do not know that there is any phase of the work of the Health Department that is more important than that of making proper provision for the health of the poor Indians. I understand that frightful ravages are being made amongst them by tuberculosis, and their conditions of life are certainly not such as to preserve them from the ravages of that deadly disease. I should be pleased to know that at the earliest possible moment that that branch of the department was going to be transferred to the Department of Health and that proper steps would be taken to look after these Indians. I am sure that even though we are striking hard for economy now, if more money is wanted for this purpose the people of this country would be willing to spend it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Health Department has no power to take over the matter of the health of Indians. That is not included in the Act establishing that department. It was purposely left out of the Act. I did not think, and I do not think yet, that it would be practicable for the Health Department to do that work, because they would require to duplicate the organization away in the remote regions where Indians reserves are, and there would be established a sort of divided control and authority over the Indians which would produce confusion and insubordination and other ill effects among the Indians themselves. However, we get every possible assistance from the Health Department. The deputy minister advises me that Dr. Amyot, the Deputy Minister of Health, and his officers have been enthusiastic in their co-operation with the Indian Department in connection with the recent ravages and health matters generally.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am not so much concerned, nor are the people of this country, as to which department does this work, as that it be done. I am not speaking for myself but for a great body of Canadian people.

Mr. ROSS: What is the policy of the department in regard to the employment of medical attendants for the several reserves throughout the country? Is the policy the same in every province? If not, what is the policy in regard to this matter in the province of Ontario? Are the medical men who are employed paid fixed salaries? Who appoints them? Upon whose recommendation are they appointed, and what is the policy generally?

Mr. MEIGHEN: They are usually, though not always, paid a fixed salary. It depends upon the circumstances, the amount of work there is to do, and the availability of a man to do it. There may be a man available whom you can get to do the work incidentally, and not a man available whom you can get to do the work on salary. These two factors control. The Civil Service Commission in every case appoints the salaried men.

Mr. ROSS: These medical men?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. ROSS: Since how long?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Since the Act came into effect. There is no patronage.

Mr. BUREAU: The second item under the head of "General" is "relief to destitute Indians in remote districts, $65,000." There is a similar item for all the provinces where provision is made for the Indians. For Ontario and Quebec I find an item of $42,700 for "relief, medical attendance and medicines," and for Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and Northwest Territories an item of $149,000 for "supplies for destitute." Then there is an item of $11,000 for "relief in Nova Scotia, $10,000 for "relief" in New Brunswick, $13,000 for "relief and seed grain" in Prince Edward Island, and $22,000 for "relief to destitute" in British Columbia. Now I understand that in all the provinces except the Northwest Territories there is a regular organization to take care of these Indians. The remote districts would only be in the Northwest Territories, I presume, where the Indian population, according to the figures that have just been given, is only 3,369. Yet we find the sum of $65,000 allotted for relief to destitute Indians in remote districts. That relief work seems to be covered by item No. 263.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not exactly. This item is intended to look after the Northwest Territories and also Northern Ontario, Northern Quebec, Northern British Columbia, and the Ungava District of Quebec. There is no item under the provincial headings for these districts. In these remote regions the destitution is often severe and the cost of provisions very high, and it is necessary to vote this amount to meet the expenses. In the northern parts of Ontario and Quebec, particularly Quebec, the Indians have suffered extreme hardships owing to the failure of the fur trade, and distressing tales of suffering and hardship have reached headquarters. It is necessary to make provision for the hunting Indians. This vote applies to the districts where we have no agents.

Mr. BUREAU: Lumbering operations extend pretty far north in Quebec now, and I would think there would be very few Indians who would not be able to take care of themselves, right up to the lake St. John region.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They are away north of there. In the Ungava district the Indians are stretched pretty nearly up to the Hudson Straits. I have had a talk with the Rev. Mr. Walton, who has lived among the Indians for many years, and the tales of distress he brings are really excruciating. The difficulty is that the caribou or reindeer, upon which the Indians live—these are hunting Indians—were either destroyed or driven farther east and south by the great fire about thirty-five years ago. Owing to the virtual extinction of that source of supply, the Indian has not had means to sustain himself, and he has become more and more inclined to get into tents and huts and depend upon assistance from the department and the Hudson's Bay Company, and the like. In that way his health has deteriorated. We are now attempting to establish some reindeer herds up there to give them employment that will keep them outside, and provide them with food at the same time. I only rose to say that the Indians to whom this vote applies are farther north than the hon. gentleman has in mind. I cannot give the exact details as to where each dollar went, but that will be found in the Auditor General's report. The actual expenditure for the year 1917-1918 was $85,577.35, and for 1918-1919, $65,286.67, or about $20,000 less than the year before.

Mr. BUREAU: How do these cases come to the notice of the department, and how are they taken care of?

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: Through traders, the Northwest Mounted Police, and the Hudson's Bay Company.

Mr. ROSS: Can the minister tell me what was paid in the last fiscal year to the medical attendant for the Indians in the south part of Middlesex, at Muncey? How much was paid in salary, and how much in extras, if any? If there is more than one attendant, who are they?

Mr. BELAND: I see under the head of "general" an item of $10,000 to prevent the spread of tuberculosis. Would the minister tell me—I was not present earlier in the evening—how this money was spent? Is it paid to physicians who go to the reserves? Are there sanatoria in different parts of the country where the Indians who are supposed to be suffering from tuberculosis are received and treated?

Mr. MEIGHEN: This money is spent in the providing of hospital treatment for those who can avail themselves of it, and also in providing methods of sanitation, the destruction of infected houses, and rebuilding to combat the spread of disease. There was spent in 1916-17, $10,792.19; in 1917-18, $10,196.35; and in 1918-19, $13,498. Wherever possible the Indians are taken to hospitals.

Mr. BELAND: Is tuberculosis increasing or decreasing among the Indians, or is it stationary?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am afraid I cannot give a very encouraging answer to the question. It is the one dread disease of the Indian. We are not convinced that it is increasing, but it is not decreasing.

Mr. GAUVREAU: Is it the policy of the department to appoint agents as near as possible to the Indians whom they have to take care of? In my riding we have certain Indians in Rivière du Loup, and the agent is at Cacouna. Living in Rivière du Loup, I am naturally the intermediary between the Indians and the agent and I receive many complaints. The agent is an old well-to-do farmer and he does not care much about the Indians. I have approached the department more than once in the matter and the deputy minister is aware of the fact. I would urge upon the minister the necessity for dispensing with the services of this man and appointing an agent at Rivière du Loup so that he might be among the Indians and be able to take care of them properly. It would be an easy matter, and the man who is at present filling the position at Cacouna does not need the salary for his living.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I shall take into consideration the observations of my hon. friend. There would be an advantage in having the agent at Rivière du Loup.

Mr. McGIBBON (Muskoka): What power has the Indian agent or the medical adviser to order treatment in a case of tuberculosis breaking out among the Indians?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The agent has no final power in himself, but the Superintendent General, under the Act, has power to make an order authorizing the placing of any infected person, or any person who should be treated in a hospital.

Mr. McGIBBON (Muskoka): What would the medical attendant have to do in the matter?

Mr. MEIGHEN: He would simply report by wire or letter to the department at Ottawa and get an order. An hon. member asked for the name of the medical attendant at Munsees, and his salary. His name is Dr. W. H. Woods of Mount Brydges, and he attends the Chippewas, the Munsees, the Oneidas of the Thames Reserve, and also all the pupils of the Munsees Institute. He is allowed a salary of $1,700 per annum, of which $250 is chargeable to school fund and $800 to band fund. There is no record here of any additional sums.

Mr. ROSS: How many Indians are there on these reserves?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am informed that there are about 1,200 or 1,500.

Mr. ROSS: Does the medical attendant get anything for extra attendance on individual Indians, or is that his full salary?

Mr MEIGHEN: He gets something extra in the case of epidemics. I have given his regular salary. I have no record of extra payments; in normal conditions this is all he gets.

Mr. ROSS: Is his salary increased from year to year?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No; it has been stationary for some years. I do not know what it would be under the re-classification.

Mr. McGIBBON (Muskoka): Is it the intention of the department to sell the timber on the Indian reserve in Gibson, and if so what disposal will be made of the money?

Mr. MEIGHEN: In the case of that reserve, the department has been giving Indians permits to take out timber themselves. It has not been decided to sell the timber yet.

Indian education, $1,064,415.

Mr. McKENZIE: In our part of the country we find that the Indian's capacity for education is rather circumscribed. The Indian child is able to read and write pretty well and has a fair knowledge of arithmetic, but the teachers tell me that beyond that, in the field of English grammar, composition, history. etc., it shows an aversion to concentrated study. I should like to know how the Indians in the West get on, and what results are obtained from their educational training.

Mr. MEIGHEN: As regards the day schools in the West, I fear there has not been any great success. The chief difficulty has been to get the Indian child to attend with sufficient regularity to make progress. The boarding school is the proper system of Indian education for Western Canada. In the boarding school I have never heard of any special class of subjects in which the Indians are deficient or in which, indeed, they are not the equal of the white children, if they would attend with the same regularity and give the same attention to their studies. I have discussed the matter very frequently with teachers in those Indian schools and they speak in the highest terms of the capacity of the Indian children as a general rule. But the great trouble is that just as soon as the child gets out his tendency is to revert back to the reserve. Those of his own blood are not earning their living out in the world and he has not his own class with whom he can associate outside; consequently his tendency is to go back to the reserve, and in a short time the value of his education is largely lost. That fact also has a bearing on the question of the wisdom of encouraging and enabling the Indian to the utmost extent possible, consistent with his own fitness, to be enfranchised and be out away from the reserve fighting his way in the world like other people. Undoubtedly, the education will help the Indian children when they come out of the Indian school for they will be equipped, so far as education goes, to make a living.

Mr. BUREAU: A question was asked by the hon. member for Last Mountain (Mr. Johnston) as to the appropriation for a particular school, and the letter which he read showed a pitiful condition of things in that school. Now, the amount we are asked to vote is $1,064,415 for 34,000 people.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Over 100,000.

Mr. BUREAU: The total population of the Indians?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. BUREAU: Are these schools built on the reserves? I had the impression the schools were on the reserves?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Boarding schools usually are on the reserves but not always. There is an Indian boarding school at Portage la Prairie and that is not on a reserve, but they usually are on reserves.

Mr. BUREAU: The policy, as I understand the minister, of improving the condition of the Indian is to take him away from the habits and environment he has on the reserve would not ssem to help to improve the Indian very fast, if the idea is to take him away from his environment. Suppose a white child were to go amongst Indians and to live with them. Although he is supposed to be superior to the Indians he would have a hard time of it if 11 p.m. he were not allowed to go back among white people again. It seems hard—I will not say cruel—to take an Indian child away from his people and to mix him up with white people in one of these schools. If it is necessary, in order to improve the condition of the Indian, to take him away from his environment and to place him in one of these schools, it would be well that the school should be outside of the reserve. But on the other hand, from a purely humanitarian point of view it would be cruel to take that child from the reserve and put him among white people without giving him a chance to go back to his people and choose the life he would like to live. Does this amount of over a million dollars that we are asked to vote include buildings, or the improvement of the schools? Or is it just for the purpose of carrying on the schools and paying the teachers and the various staffs? If so it seems to be rather a large amount for the number of schools under the control of the department.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is exactly the same as last year, and certainly it is none too much; we would like to be able to afford more. There ought to be more Indian boarding schools built and we would like to build the one in Last Mountain if we could afford to undertake it with the money in hand, as well as others equally urgent.

Mr. BUREAU: How many are there? Take Manitoba where the population is the largest.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In Manitoba there are 39 day schools and 8 boarding schools; in Quebec 28 day schools and no boarding schools. Day schools seem to be a success in Eastern Canada at all events.

Mr. BELAND: Is the school at Qu-Appelle a boarding school?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is an industrial school. It really is a boarding school.

Mr. BELAND: Is not that one of the best Indian schools you have now?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is out of the Qu'Appelle school that the File Hills colony has come. The File Hills colony is undoubtedly a phenomenal success. The number of day schools in the Dominion is 248, boarding schools 58, industrial schools 16, total 322. This is a vote for the maintenance of these schools.

Mr. BUREAU: It is not too much.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And for the construction of such school buildings as are contemplated for next year.

Mr. BUREAU: And the maintenance of the old schools?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The maintenance of the whole of them.

Mr. BUREAU: Is it not possible to comply with the request of the hon. member for Last Mountain (Mr. Johnston) under the conditions existing there? It seems a pitiable state of things if the letter contains the truth.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It was not altogether right; it was not up to date in some respects.

Mr. BUREAU: Out of this amount will there be any money which can be used to improve the condition there?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No.

Mr. BUREAU: Is there any other amount which will be used for that pu - pose?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Before passing from the question of the education of the Indians, I would like to make a few remarks in regard to the Indians in the county of Brant. We have there the largest number of Indians to be found on any one reserve in Canada, or in North America—I think about 4,500. The hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) raised a question about them being circumscribed in their education. I have been in very close touch with a good many of the Indians and I think that does not apply to this tribe. The Six Nation Indians are amongst the most intelligent, if not the most intelligent, on the North American continent and they are capable of a very fine education if they have the opportunity. I know that in several instances they have taken very important positions almost immediately after they have passed out of the public schools. I heard of one last week who entered on a commercial course and, just fresh from school, received a salary of $20 per week for her services. That goes to show that if the Indian has a fair chance he is capable of very substantial advancement. I would like to know if there is any fund, or whether there can be any fund, provided for those Indian boys and girls, who wish to push on beyond the common school and take a high school course. There are some few in our city who are taking the high school course at the present time. There has been a contention between the city and the county as to who shall pay the fees of these children coming in from the Mohawk institution and from the reserve and completing their course in the high school of the city. The city keeps up the high school and it is customary to charge country pupils for the education they receive. It appears to me that if the department wishes to advance the education of Indian children there should be a fund provided that might be drawn upon in order that these boys and girls who have got as far as they can in the common school should have an opportunity of prosecuting their studies farther in the high schools of Ontario particularly. I am not sure that any fund of that kind exists; I have not heard of it. But I know that recently there has been quite a sharp controversy in the county of Brant on that very point. I would like the minister to say whether or not there is an opportunity for those who wish to take the higher branches that are taught in the high schools and collegiate institutes, where the parents are not able to pay the fees, and whether the department has a fund out of which it can pay a whole or a part of the expenses of those students while they pursue the higher branches of education. I feel certain that if these facilities were extended and if such a fund were provided, a very large number of children on the Six Nations Indian Reserve would take advantage of it, and that a large number of them would take a place among the most advanced of the white population. I am sure they have the capacity to do that and we only need to look to what has been accomplished in the last generation for confirmation of my statement. One Indian at least became one of the foremost citizens of Toronto and received a salary of $12,000 a year as head of the Independent Order of Foresters.

Dr. BELAND: Oronhyatekha.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: He was a well known Indian, a credit to the country and to the reserve from which he came. I mention that case in order that the committee may realize that there are sons of the soil among our own original population who are capable of the highest education. I certainly think that the department, if they desire to encourage higher education, should make it easy for these scholars who wish to press on from the common schools of the reserve or the country schools which they attend, and to go to collegiate institutes and high schools and that, if necessary, a fund should be provided to help them while they are passing through. I believe in many cases you will find that no inconsiderable number of Indians have made their way in the world by reason of the education they have received. I know several of them from our reserve that have gone to New York, and other great cities of United States, and hold very high positions indeed at very fine remuneration. I feel confident that the Six Nations Indian is capable of higher education to a considerable extent, and if the minister would give us assurances that they would be treated a little more liberally with regard to the fees in these higher branches of education I feel confident that more of them would take advantage of it.

An hon. MEMBER: Have they got a vote?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Some of them have the vote. I believe that of the number that went overseas nearly four hundred had the vote, and that nearly all of them voted at the last election. That is a matter, though, that does not particularly concern myself as they belong to the North Riding of Brant. I am speaking now on behalf of the Indian, and I trust the minister will give that feature to which I have alluded his serious consideration so that those Indians who desire to pursue the higher branches of education should be induced to do so.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There are quite a number of Indians, particularly of the Six Nations reserve, who do desire and do obtain a high school education. With respect to that reserve, the Indian parents for the most part, are quite capable financially of supplying their children with that education, and as to them the department has merely encouraged the attendance of those children at school by awarding scholarships to help them through. But there are others, fewer in number, who are not in the same position, and in those cases the department has always sympathetically received any application for help, and a large number of pupils are being helped by the department in the securing of a high school education at the present time. The ear of the department has been sympathetic to the ambitions of any pupils whose parents are not able to provide them with the fees and the necessary books for the purpose.

Mr. BEST: I realize that many of these Indians are capable of a very high education, but in view of the conditions in which the finances of the country are to-day I hope the minister will not for one moment think of laying aside tens or hundreds of thousands of dollars for any such purpose. I have brought to the notice of some of the departments instances where the parents of young white men,—young men who went overseas and fought for this country—were poor and were not able to put their sons through the high school; these had to do the best they could to get through. Why then should we set aside hundreds of thousands of dollars to give higher education to young Indians when our own white people cannot put themselves through? I realize that many Indians went overseas and fought for the Empire and we ought to treat them just the same as we would any other class of people, but we are not in a financial position to do what has been suggested; and to my mind no hon. member should get up here and advocate that we pay out a lot of unnecessary money for this purpose. I believe in fair play to every one in the Dominion, but I am also of the opinion that if we were to do more to assist our white people we would better serve the interests of our country. There is no doubt whatever that the sons of poor people are just as capable of learning as the sons of the rich; but in many cases they have to do without the education they need because they are not able to put themselves through. I hope the minister will not for one moment consider laying aside hundreds of thousands of dollars for any such purpose as suggested.

[Mr. Cockshutt.]

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Who is asking for hundreds of thousands of dollars?

Mr. BEST: Well the hon. member advocated the expenditure of money for this purpose.

Mr. GOULD: If the educational aspect of this matter is disposed of I would like to introduce another, which perhaps more particularly affects the Indian reservations in the West. I have at present in mind the White Bear reservation located on the southern slope of the mountains of Saskatchewan. It is tributary to a large preserve on which wild game abounds, and I have wondered if the Indian, in a location such as that, is permitted to hunt all the wild game that comes there. I believe it is the custom, whether it is the law or not, and I wondered if the Dominion Government permits the Indian to do that, or whether it is a privilege granted by the Provincial Government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Indian outside his reserve must comply with any provincial restrictions with respect to hunting or the preservation of game. The Indians have sometimes resisted the imposition of these restrictions by the provinces, but the policy of the department has been to get them to comply. On the reserve itself, I am disposed to think, the Indian is not so restricted, and his aboriginal rights to hunt in that reserve are quite free from any provincial law. I do not want to give that as a final opinion, but that is my impression.

Government of the Northwest Territories—$7,000.

Mr. McKENZIE: What is this money used for?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is the entire amount expended on the whole government of the Northwest Territories of Canada, an area I suppose as big as Europe. The Interior Department administers the whole territory for the sum of $7,000, and the minister does not make any extra charge.

Mr. McKENZIE: What is the population?

Mr. MEIGHEN: According to the census of 1911 it was 17,196. I doubt if it would be any more than that now. Owing to the extension of the provinces of Quebec and Ontario a deduction would have to be made, but the figures do not include all the Eskimos on the Arctic.

Mr. McKENZIE: Are we providing for the government of Eskimos?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE: Are we providing them with schools or anything of the kind?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, there is an item of $3,000 for schools included in the $7,000. It only takes $4,000 to govern them outside of the cost of the schools. Last year the appropriation was $8,000, so there is a saving this year of $1,000.

Mr. McKENZIE: Where is the area embraced in the Northwest Territories? Is it the region between the northern boundaries of Alberta and Saskatchewan and the Arctic circle?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, north of Alberta, Manitoba and Saskatchewan and south of the Arctic ocean. The area is 1,242,224 square miles, two-fifths of the whole area of Canada, and a rich territory it is. Negotiations are now proceeding, which will almost certainly eventuate successfully, for the lease for commercial purposes of practically the southern half of Baffin's Land. It is a great mistake to assume that the area of the Northwest Territoriese is wholly —or, indeed, in any substantial degree— barren. The time will undoubtedly come when it will be a prized portion of the Dominion.

Mr. McGIBBON (Muskoka): Have the Government taken any steps toward finding out whether there is oil in these regions?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Government, of course, are not themselves prospecting for oil. The Geological Survey, under the Mines Department, has general charge of the geological investigations carried on throughout the Dominion. The regulations respecting oil throw the opportunity of prospecting and discovering open to every person, and many are availing themselves of the opportunity. In 1913-14 it was generally felt that we were on the eve of very great oil discoveries. There have been none yet of any major importance. I am not sure when these discoveries will be made or whether they will ever be made, but the prospects are indeed bright. I have no doubt that those engaged in the work anticipate that it will not be long before discoveries are made. The Government are merely laying the scientific basis and in that way enabling these investigations to proceed along sound and sensible lines.

Mr. McGIBBON (Muskoka): Do you afford any assistance to those who are looking for oil?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No; if they discover the oil they get their own reward. Very large sums of money have been spent in the search, but it has been private capital, not the capital of the Government. I believe that one company has already spent almost a million dollars, so far without success.

Mr. McGIBBON (Muskoka): The oil resources of the world are nearing exhaustion. Great efforts have been made by the British Empire during the last few years to secure a sufficient supply of oil for the future. I think it would be well if this resource were kept under Government control.

Government of the Yukon Territory—salaries and expenses connected with the administration of the territory, etc., $200,000.

Mr. DENIS: What is the total population of the Yukon?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I estimated it a few minutes ago at 4,300; I do not think I am very far out. Anyway, it is between 4,000 and 5,000.

Mr. DENIS: This appears to be a large appropriation for a population of 4,300. Has a like appropriation been made each year for several years past?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, no, the appropriation that has been made yearly for several years past has been far more. In the last two or three years the appropriation has been very much reduced, somewhat to the indignation, I fear, of the population of the Yukon. I did not feel that the numbers there warranted the expenditure that was being made. It is only a short time since the expenditure was twice the amount we are asking now. Of course, the Yukon is a very expensive territory to administer, owing to its location, its climate and the general configuration of the country. The roads are difficult and expensive to maintain; the whole administration costs much more than that of other portions of the Dominion. It will be seen that even this year there is a decrease in the appropriation of $15,500; the reduction last year over the year before was $190,000. The expenditure in 1910-11— ask the hon. member to note the year—was $303,674.94. The actual expenditure this year will doubtless be less than the $200,000 asked for in this item.

Mr. DENIS: What was the population in 1910?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Practically the same as now; possibly a little more.

Mr. DENIS: Does the Government receive any revenue from that region?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, the Government gets a revenue in royalties; I will give my hon. friend the figures in a moment. But the country gets the benefit of a very large production there. The output of the Yukon —I speak from memory—is valued at about $4,000,000 a year, so that it is a territory of some importance. The output per capita is very high.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is there any chance of making this territotry part of the province of British Columbia some day and putting this administration under the machinery of that province?

Mr. MEIGHEN; The subject is not under immediate consideration. I do not know what the attitude of the province of British Columbia would be. The hon. member will remember that, two years ago I think, I put legislation through amending the Yukon Act so as to simplify the local machinery of administration. There used to be twelve members of the Local Council and that was cut down to three. Consequently, provision is made for salaries for three instead of salaries for twelve, and the salary of each was, I am pretty sure, reduced. We have simplified the machinery of government and thereby greatly reduced the cost. It seems to me that we would not be gaining much by adding this territory to British Columbia. There would be complications; there is some debt on the province of British Columbia; there is no debt on the Yukon Territory, and I do not know what the attitude of the people of either British Columbia or the Yukon Territory would be.

Mr. McKENZIE: I would imagine this would be an advantage to the Yukon. Every province has its educational and other facilities which it is impossible to have in the Klondike if it is administered as it is now, and all improvements which the people of British Columbia have would, in a measure, be extended to this territory if it were within the province and had representation in the Legislature of British Columbia. In that way, it would be an advantage for the people of the whole Yukon Territory to be attached to a province and subject to governmental administration like any other department of the province.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The revenue is about $97,000.

[Mr. Denis.]

Mr. DENIS: I see an item "Grant to Local Council, $90,000." Is there any possibility of reducing the expenditure through reducing these grants? I may be altogether mistaken, but I see no particular reason why the administration of the Yukon Territory should be sustained by grants from the Federal Government. Each province pays its own expenses and the Yukon Territory, as part of the Dominion of Canada, should be under the same provisions as other parts of the Dominion and should pay its expenses. Why should we have to give the Local Council a grant of $90,000 a year?

Mr. MEIGHEN: We give every province in the Dominion a grant each year.

Mr. DENIS: But if we take into consideration the respective populations, there is no comparison between the grants that we give to the people of Quebec and Ontario which have populations of from over 2,000,000 each, and the grant that we give to the people of the Yukon Territory.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know just exactly how they would compare. Of course, we get a revenue from the Yukon; we do not get a revenue from Quebec or Ontario. From the Yukon we get a revenue of $97,000. That leaves about $100,000 that the treasury itself is at a loss of. The hon. member must remember this, the Yukon is a far distant territory, and the cost of administration there is bound to be much greater than the cost per capita in a more thickly settled part of Canada, where the climate, soil and methods of living are different. I have in my hand the balance sheet of the Yukon Territory, and I may say, if I have erred at all, as Minister of the Interior in the administration of the Yukon, it has not been on the side of prodigality. I have received a good deal of criticism in respect of that administration, but this is the first intimation that I have been in any way too generous as regards the Yukon.

Mr. DENIS: I am not going that far; I just want to get the information.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I may possibly have erred the other way. The balance sheet shows a loss of $10,439.88. The cost of upkeep of roads, bridges and public works is $62,000; grants to libraries, etc., $13,000; hospitals, charities and public health, $28,000; schools; $41,695. Schools have to be maintained in the Yukon and they are managed by the local council, but they are supported by the governing body, that is to say, the Department of the Interior. Then there are travelling expenses and salaries, $9,785. Those are local salaries. Then there is Yukon Council, indemnity and travelling expenses, $4,320. If you put against that the $90,000 Dominion grant, and the Dominion grant for roads of $50,000 and all their sources of revenue, they still had a loss of $10,439.88. Notwithstanding that, we are not increasing the grant.

Dominion lands and parks, $4,546,770.

Mr. FOURNIER: I see part of this item is for Canadian National Parks, $666,000. This is an increase of $100,000. Will the minister please explain?

Mr. MEIGHEN: This increase is due practically altogether to the increased cost of labour and material. We administer those National Parks. The Dominion of Canada—not federally speaking—that is, not speaking from the standpoint of the treasury, but the people of the Dominion—derive great advantage from these National Parks, advantage not only in having recreation grounds for the whole Dominion, but in the tourist traffic, the returns per acre being figured by the officers of the department as being more for the rocks and waste lands of our parks than even for our wheat fields. Undoubtedly, speaking from the whole national standpoint, it is good public business to maintain these parks. Of the increase, $55,000 is due to increased cost of labour. Since the submission to the House of the Estimates of 1920, there has been an increase in the cost of labour in the parks ranging from 12½ per cent in the Albert aparks to 25 per cent in the British Columbia parks. The amount due to increased cost of material is $16,500. The Dominion Parks appropriations for the last six years has been as follows: In 1914-15, $681,730. It was not much below that for some years previously; in fact, in some years previously to that year it was much more than that. With the outbreak of the war, the appropriation was cut down. In 1915-16, the appropriation amounted to $349,670; 1916-17, $349,670; 1917-18, $300,000; 1918-19, $300,000; 1919-20 $566,000; 1920-21, $666,000. There is no increase except such as is caused by increases in cost. The amount this year is $15,730 less than the appropriation for 1914-15.

Mr. ROBB: Has the minister had suggested to him by his officials the advisability of oiling the roads in the western parks? The tourist traffic is becoming so heavy that at certain seasons of the year the roads become somewhat dusty. I agree with the minister that we have no greater source of wealth than the national parks equipped to take care of tourists, who bring an immense amount of wealth to the country. It occurred to me that instead of sprinkling, the minister might make a permanent job of it by oiling the principal roads in the parks.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Harkin, the head of the Parks Branch, a very competent official indeed, favours that being done. It is only a question of cost. The hon. member will recollect that this year we are engaged in a project of some importance, certainly of some expense, and that is the completion of the Banff-Windermere Road. An agreement was made with the province of British Columbia whereby the Dominion Government took over the completion of that road between the Banff National Park and the provincial road that runs down to the Kootenay and then northeasterly within fifty miles of the limits of the province. The province gave us in turn five miles on either side of the road, quite an extensive territory, which has been added to the national park and which was very essential for the purpose. On account of that expenditure we are not going into any other capital expenditures that we can avoid at the present time. I am informed that we oiled some roads last year, and that we are providing for oiling some additional roads this year. The head of the Parks Branch favours the extension of that method just as rapidly as we can do it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is the herd of Buffalo owned by this Government materially increasing?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Very rapidly. We have now about 5,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: How many were there formerly?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There were 700. We have a herd of very great value indeed. The hon. member may have noted that at the recent fur auction sales in Montreal some buffalo heads and robes and some furs were offered there with very encouraging results. The three buffalo heads that we offered sold for $1,025, $610, and $315 respectively. We sold 38 robes at an average of $76. The total amount realized from the small offerings that we put up at the sale was $4,838. Arrangements have also been made for the disposal of the meat of such buffaloes as we find it the part of wisdom to kill, that is, males that we think are sufficiently far on that they should be killed.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am very much interested in the details given by my hon. friend.

I think it was a wise suggestion that was made some years ago to re-stock our national parks with Buffalo. A fact which is not generally known, but which I happen to know, is that the idea of bringing back that herd, which was somewhere in Mexico, originated with a younger brother of the late Premier, Sir Wilfrid Laurier. Sir Wilfrid Laurier was very much interested in that herd. His brother was one of the agents of the Government somewhere in Michigan, and had met the owner of this herd of buffalo, and that is how it came about that Canada purchased it.

Referring to the far away northern regions of which we were speaking a moment ago, may I ask whether the Government have accepted the idea which was propounded by Stefansson, the famous Arctic explorer, of utilizing reindeer herds for the supply of meat in Canada? I have noticed by the press, and especially by lectures given by Stefansson, that he is very much taken with the idea that the reindeer herds, which are very numerous in the Far North, might be utilized for food in the civilized districts, but I do not know whether this idea has taken root with the department or whether anything has been done in connection with the matter.

There is another matter I wish to bring to the attention of the minister. Some years ago the then Minister of Marine, the late Mr. Prefontaine, and later Hon. Mr. Brodeur, sent an expedition to the northern waters of the Atlantic, and reports were made about some very valuable coal deposits in those northern regions. Has anything been done by the department with a view to exploiting those coal areas? Has any definite information been ascertained about their location, and whether they would be worth developing as a commercial proposition?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Replying to the first inquiry as to the utilization of the northern caribou for food purposes, some months ago, on my recommendation, the Government appointed a commission composed of Dr. Rutherford, as chairman; Mr. McLean, the manager of the Harris Abbatoir; Mr. Harkin, the head of the Parks Branch; and Mr. Stefansson, to investigate and report first of all as to the feasibility of the idea, for which, of course, Mr. Stefansson has been the chief sponsor, and secondly, as to any practical steps that might be taken to that end. The commission has held many sittings and has devoted itself assiduously to its work. I may say that the members of the commission have taken the greatest possible interest in it, a much greater interest than they ever anticipated they would take when they undertook the task. They have not made a report as yet. In the meantime some practical ideas in Mr. Stefansson's mind developed, and he felt it his duty to withdraw from the commission. Subsequently, he made application himself for a territory in the North. I may say that before that was done, on the recommendation of the commission, three islands in the northern part of Hudson Bay were reserved and set aside for utilization in this way by the Government later on as it might be advised. Then this application came for the lease of what might be roughly described as the south half of Baffin's Land, or more accurately, all the land in Baffin's Land south of the sixty-eighth parallel, and including a strip ten miles wide along the north shore of Lake Nitilling, in the centre of Baffin's Land, which no white man has yet seen. The application was for a lease of thirty years, renewable, of the grazing rights only, for the purpose of the establishment there of a domesticated reindeer herd brought from Northern Europe or such other place as a herd could be obtained. The lease is not signed, consequently I would not care at the present moment to go further into details. In so far as the Government is concerned the authorization of execution has gone through and we await Mr. Stefansson's return here. I believe he has even succeeded in interesting capital. He has interested capitalists who are not strangers to this country but are just that class who would be most likely to succeed in this venture, those of the experience that would warrant a prediction of success, if such could with confidence be predicted of any. So that very marked progress has indeed been made. Having entered into the arrangement with Mr. Stefansson along the lines of this lease, which is prepared and completed, though not executed, and ratified and commended by the commission to which I referred a few minutes ago, we have made rapid progress, and it really looks as though a practical step was soon to be taken for the development in Baffin Land of a domesticated reindeer herd such as has been developed in Alaska with really astounding success. There seems no reason why similar success should not attend the enterprise here. The intention is to enlarge the number of domesticated animals year by year by incorporating a limited percentage of native caribou. Of course, proper provisions are made for the protection of the rights of the Eskimo; all rights of shipment, etc., are taken care of; and the Government is endeavouring to provide for receiving itself certain numbers of these domesticated animals, mainly with the idea of utilizing them for the assistance of the Eskimo and northern Indians who are now suffering very much indeed through the loss of their hunting preserves in certain portions of Ungava and other parts of Canada.

The hon. member (Mr. Lemieux) referred to certain reported coal deposits in Northern Canada. There undoubtedly have been some discoveries of coal in the islands of the Arctic, but I really do not feel in a position to express an opinion as to whether or not they are commercially valuable at the present time. I do not know that the officers of the department have any opinion on that question at least, not the officers of the department of the Interior.

Mr. BELAND: What are the present regulations governing the hunting of big game in the parks? Is the policy of the department as regards the next few years one of prohibition?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Absolute prohibition.

Mr. BELAND: Does the department intend that after a certain number of animals have been acquired through the protection afforded it will permit hunting to some degree?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The time may come in the not-too-distant future when hunting may be permitted by reason of the increase which the prohibition will effect. But for the present the policy of absolute prohibition is being maintained, and there is no intention, in the near future, at any rate, to depart from that policy.

Mr. BELAND: What number of buffalo will satisfy the minister as being sufficient to warrant a certain amount of hunting?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The buffalo are not to be hunted in any case. We do not intend to expose them to the hunter, no matter how numerous they become. We rather intend to utilize any excess which we think might be got rid of by the sale of the robe, the head and the meat. That is the use we intend to make of them; we will not expose them to the hunter.

Mr. BELAND: Only the official hunter.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Neither the official nor the unofficial.

Mr. POWER: I would call attention to an item of $4,000, a grant to the Canadian Forestry Association. I should be the last to ask the minister to indulge in any extravagance, but it seems to me that if there is one association in the country which deserves well of the country and of the Government it is the Canadian Forestry Association. Since its inception some years ago it has called the attention of the public of Canada to the fact that our forest resources throughout the country were very rapidly diminishing and that if we did not within a very short time take some action we would be in the same position as the United States; and not having a weaker neighbour I do not know whether we could use any big stick to pass Underwood resolutions. Anyhow, we would have no more wood.

Mr. MEIGHEN: So that we could have no stick.

Mr. POWER: Exactly. Since this association has taken up its work it has, by means of lectures and an exhibition car, instructed the people throughout the length and breadth of the country, both the children and the grown-ups, many of whom were in sad need of instruction in this respect, in the necessity for forest conservation. The association has lecturers who tour the country at considerable expense. It is true that their members are fairly wealthy, but to my mind this is a work which should be materially helped by the Government of Canada, and I am sorry to see such a small sum as $4,000 provided for it. You could easily raise the amount to $10,000 and do $10,000 worth of good to Canada.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The amount is the same as in previous years. I believe that the Forestry Association, speaking generally, does very excellent work, and I enthusiastically believe that the work it is undertaking now in the way of public education in the matter of forest conservation is one of great importance. Possibly, if that work develops, we may consider an increased appropriation next year.

Mr. POWER: Is the Forest Products Laboratory included in this?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, we support that ourselves. The hon. member must bear in mind that the Forestry Association is made up of men who for the most part have a great deal at stake in forest preservation. It is a fairly large body of men including some more than fairly well-to-do men. It must also be remembered that the forests are privately owned in large degree, provincially owned in considerable degree, and federally owned in considerable degree as well. Consequently the obligation is not wholly on the federal Government in this regard. Indeed, the Federal Government goes to very considerable expense in forest preservation itself. We have felt all along that we were doing our fair share in making this grant to the Association because, while the federal interest undoubtedly is great, the private interest is great as well.

Mr. BELAND: The Government is subsidizing to quite a large degree the Conservation Commission which was created some years ago and which was headed for a number of years by Sir Clifford Sifton. This Commission has interested itself extensively in the preservation of forests and in their preservation particularly against fire. Their findings and recommendations have been adopted, I think, by the Railway Commission and regulations have been issued to the railways. I am not in a position to give the details but I intend at some time when this item is under consideration to supply the House with more information in that regard and especially with reference to the preservation of forests.

Mr. ROBB: There is in this item a sum of $500,000 for seed grain advances:

Seed Grain Advances—amount required to meet uncollected portion of advances of Seed Grain made in the Western Provinces by the Chartered Banks to holders of unpatented Dominion lands under the guarantee of the Dominion Government, also including commission payable to banks for collections, fees to Sec.-Treasurers of Municipalities and officers of the Provincial Departments of Agriculture and clerical assistance, etc., $500,000.

Does that represent the total grain that was advanced? I suppose that was for last year, I figured that on the basis of the prevailing prices at the time and at a very conservative estimate there is seed grain enough to seed at least 166,000 acres. Are we to understand that seed grain sufficient to seed 166,000 acres has been supplied and that the purchasers have defaulted in their payments to the banks?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. The drought in Alberta and southern Saskatchewan was so extensive and malignant that they were not able to pay. Indeed, the amount of suffering entailed on the farmers of these districts last year is, I think, scarcely apprehended by this House. I went through Alberta and southern Saskatchewan in August last and the condition of virtual destitution that obtained in many parts was distressing. It was not a case of unwillingness to pay; it was a case of no crop at all and a struggle to bring the stock and the family through the winter. That is the reason the amount is so substantial. This is to pay the banks in respect to the advances made by them and not repaid by the farmers. The amounts advanced were very largely in districts which last year unfortunately were drought-stricken, but the promise this year from all indications now—and indeed the worst of the peril is past—is that the crop will be very prolific. The amount advanced to the banks in 1919 was $632,238.31, and the amount repaid to the banks up to date is $78,026.11, leaving the amount still owing of $554,312.20. That is for last year. We had $575,000 set aside to meet that. It was more than sufficient by about $20,000. For this year there has been advanced: Wheat $387,707.50, oats $228,073.71, barley $15,420. All these articles are at such high prices that it does not take a great many bushels to make up a large amount. The total is $631,201.25. We are asking for $500,000, believing that the excess will be paid. These Estimates were made up some time ago but the weather conditions since have been excellent so that it would look now as if we would not need this amount.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Is this for seed for the present year?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): I asked some time ago how much was overdue and owing to the Government on account of the advances made on purchases of seed grain for the use of the Prairie Provinces to the 31st December 1919, and the answer I got was: $1,493,121.11. It would seem that the western provinces are getting into the habit of asking the Government to buy their seed grain. It would appear to men coming from Eastern Canada that the time had almost arrived when the western provinces should be able to finance themselves in so far as seed grain is concerned. I would like to know why we in Eastern Canada are required to advance money for this purpose any longer to wealthy provinces like the Prairie Provinces of to-day. No part of Canada is making money so rapidly as the Prairie Provinces are, and this is getting to be a very old story. Some of the Canadian papers published things that happened 25 years ago. Some days ago I came across an item in the Montreal Gazette:

TWENTY-FIVE YEARS AGO.

(The Gazette, Feb. 9, 1895.)

Ottawa.—Mr. Nicholas Flood Davin, M.P., is urging that a grant of seed grain be made to settlers in the Moose Jaw and Regina districts. It is questionable. however, whether the request will be granted, as the impression is general that the settlers in the Northwest have done very well in this respect in the past, and it is about time to call a halt.

That was twenty-five years ago and the halt has not been called. I would like to know if matters are in such a condition that it is necessary to continue to make advances to western farmers in order to finance their seed grain.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We simply finance the homesteaders. I disclaimed all responsibility in connection with privately owned lands two years ago when I came into the department first, taking the ground that it was the duty of the province to provide for all necessary cases of seed grain and relief with reference to private lands. But where we have men on homesteads they are our especial responsibility. The lands, in the first place are not taxable by the provinces and on that account it is always assumed that they are the special responsibility of the Federal Government. Now that was not always the case. In 1914 was it not?—yes 1914—there was such widespread distress throughout all that country, on account of the total failure of crop the year before, that the Federal Government assumed the obligation as respects private land and homestead land, and an amount of $12,309,607.36 was advanced in all. There were many at that time who said—in this House and out of it—that the money would never come back, that it was gone; and it was argued then that even if it was gone the amount that could be expected in the way of production would be of greater advantage to the country and be better for all than if the destitution were allowed to continue and consequently there be no crop at all throughout this acreage of Western Canada. Anyway the money was advanced, most of it for seed grain, $7,560,000; but for relief alone, to simply relieve distress, $4,748,000. Now of that sum of $12,309,000 up to a very recent date there had been returned on principal $9,444,391.38 and on interest $889,387.55. The total repaid was $10,333,778. Now that is returned notwithstanding the fact that in those very districts in the last three years there have been what you might call two complete failures and one semi-failure—in the same districts where all this was advanced—consequently there has been very little that could possibly be repaid in those three years. If this year turns out as it now promises there should be a very small balance left after that and, of course, we have security for this money. Consequently there cannot be the slightest doubt of the wisdom of the help given in 1914. However, all we are doing at the present time is this: We provide through the banks for advances to homesteaders to obtain the necessary seed where they cannot get it any other way. I do not think we are supplying any relief at all other than seed grains. The province has to take care of the rest, and they do it with very much the same machinery and by very much the same method as ourselves. We guarantee the banks money but we only guarantee them five per cent to get their bank interest, and they are only allowed to charge seven. They must collect the money themselves. Unless they collect it themselves all they can ask us for is the five per cent, and if we pay it we take over the security and have the same lien that they have.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): The Government do not collect it then, they pay it to the banks?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, and that is what this vote is for.

Mr. RICHARDSON: Before the item carries I would ask the minister if anything has been done with reference to the setting aside of some territory along the Winnipeg river for a national park; also whether Elk island has been set aside as a game preserve? I would urge the desirability of a park set aside in the province of Manitoba. I do not think we have a park in that great province, and since the boundaries of Manitoba have been extended it would seem particularly desirable that park accommodation should be provided.

M.r MEIGHEN: There has been discussion, and suggestions have been made to the department to set aside territory along the shores of lake Winnipeg as a national park, but no step has been taken to that end. We have power to do it under the Parks Act, but as yet the idea has not been favourably considered. Elk island has been disposed of under a long term lease for summer residence purposes and therefore could not be made a game preserve at the present time.

Mr. ROBB: Reverting to the seed grain question, I quite agree with the minister's statement as to the conditions prevailing in a certain section of the western country, from a point west of Moosejaw and continuing along up. I witnessed those conditions myself. But what I would like now to know from the minister is this: The Government knew of these conditions in September last; was the seed grain purchased at the initial price established by the board, or did the Government wait until the price had been advanced seventy or eighty cents a bushel and make the purchases this year?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The grain is bought locally, but it is first inspected by the seed commissioner and all orders given can be filled only after such inspection. The bank provides the money. The man first goes to the Dominion Lands Agent and has his application O.K'd or viséd by that agent who knows just what farm he has and takes evidence as to what land is ready for cultivation. From the land agent he goes back to the bank. Then there is seed provided, locally inspected seed, which he can obtain. He gives his security and his note to the bank and goes and gets his seed.

Mr. ROBB: I think the minister has misunderstood my question. The minister himself, as the head of the department, acknowledges that in September last he realized the conditions then prevailing and knew that that section of country required seed. What I want to know is, was the seed bought at the prevailing price in September, October or November, or did the Government wait until the last prices that were put in in the month of March?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not sure that I can answer that question. Perhaps some hon. member is present who would know the facts, but my recollection—I fear I have to depend on newspaper reading for this—is that the seed was provided by the Wheat Board at a price of possibly $2.45 a bushel.

Mr. ROBB: Two dollars and forty-five cents a bushel at the lake port or in the interior?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think that would be the Fort William basis; it was less than that in the interior.

Mr. ROBB: Is the minister sure of that?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, I am not sure of it at all. I depend on newspaper reading for that. I do not know whether there is any hon. member of the House present who would be more familiar with the subject than I am. However, it does not pertain to this particular item. In this vote we figured on an average of $2.50.

Mr. POWER: With regard to another item—not being on the ministerial side of the House I seem to be among the small items—of $1,000 for the Alpine Club of Canada. Now we have just been told that $4,000 is a great deal to encourage one of our greatest national industries and help us to conserve our forests. If $4,000 was enough for that purpose, it strikes me that $1,000 is altogether too much to help people to attempt to commit suicide on our Canadian Alps. Unless there is another reason for this vote, I do not think we should give the organization in question $1,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If every investment this country makes produces the return on $1,000 that the grant to the Alpine Club does we will soon be a very wealthy people. The Alpine Club is a voluntary organization which, corresponding with the Alpine Club in Switzerland, explores the mountains of Canada and induces tourists from all over the world to take an interest in the Canadian Rockies and in exploration generally of an alpine character in the Dominion. We could not get that work done as cheaply in any other way. We could not get the interest taken and the tourists to come unless we had some such voluntary organization as this—except, of course, at very great expense. This is just the kind of organization to encourage, because we get the results with the least possible delay. They make exhibits at the Alpine Congress, which has lately been held at Monaco, and are thereby instrumental in exciting interest in the Canadian Rockies among those who gather there and who are devoted to mountain climbing and to exploration.

Mr. POWER: Is that the best reason that can be given for the expenditure of $1,000 for advertising? I understand the minister to say that by making this contribution to this particular club we direct the attention of European climbers to the mountains that we have here in Canada.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We get their money.

Mr. POWER: Yes, but the people who get the money are the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the steamship companies. Why should not these corporations pay for this advertising in order to bring the tourists here?

Mr. MEIGHEN: They spend a lot more than that.

Mr. POWER: They probably do, but it seems to me that it is their duty to do it, not the duty of the Government. After all, we are not advertising the scenery of our country. If you will come down to Quebec I will show you good scenery. Give me a couple of thousand dollars and I will advertise it for Quebec; we will form a club and spend it, if you like—we will do anything like that to please the minister. This club is, I assume, composed of wealthy men; mountain climbing is a sport which requires wealth as well as strength and some foolhardiness. Under the circumstances, I think that this money is badly spent. If the minister will devote this $1,000 to forestry purposes, I shall be satisfied.

Mr. PARENT: There is an item here of $256,000 for surveys and investigations of water and power resources and for administration of water-powers, etc. I would like some information as to the purposes for which this money is to be spent.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is the expenditure of the Dominion Water-powers Branch. There is an increase in this item of $39,000. I would like the committee to note that taken all through there is a decrease of about a million and a half dollars in the amount of this vote. The increase of $39,000 is due principally to the following causes: Increased cost of living and expenses of surveys; considerable additional cost arising from the return of many members to the staff from overseas service whose salaries were not paid while absent; certain new work arising under the agreements which have been executed pursuant to the Dominion Water-powers Act with the provinces of Ontario, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. Although these provinces own their own water-powers they have sought to obtain the assistance of the Dominion Water-powers Branch in the classification and securing of uniform data with regard to all these water-powers.

Mr. PARENT: How many years ago did they ask for that assistance?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Nova Scotia about four years ago; New Brunswick about a year and a half ago; Prince Edward Island and Ontario about a year ago. Only a few weeks ago I received a letter of appreciation from the premier of New Brunswick with regard to the services rendered by the Dominion Water-powers officials in relation to New Brunswick water-powers. Representatives from Prince Edward Island have rendered like testimony, and I know that the Government of Nova Scotia are of the same opinion. There is no doubt as to the value of the work done and of the services rendered to these provinces. That is the main cause of additional expense in the last two years, and it has been an expenditure that has undoubtedly been of great advantage to the country.

Mr. PARENT: I should think that the provinces would know what water-powers they respectively possess. It seems to be taking a long time for the Dominion Government to find out what water-powers there are in Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. Surely the country should to-day be in possession of the facts with regard to the water-powers of each of these provinces. Every year we have an Estimate of this sort; yet it is safe to say that the water-powers are not increasing or decreasing. What are we paying for? If there is no answer to that—

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not want to interrupt the hon. member; I was waiting until he had finished.

Mr. PARENT: Has any amount been spent in the Ungava district so far as water-powers are concerned?

Mr. MEIGHEN: We have not had any request from the government of the province of Quebec to do for that government what we have done for the governments of the other four provinces named. Should we be requested to do so we would be quite prepared to co-operate with that province as we have with the others. Now, it is not a matter of finding out what water-powers there are in a given province. It is a question of getting all the facts about the water-power and getting them on such a reliable basis that they are of some use to intending investors. It is necessary to get stream-flow data extending over a number of years and over different periods of each year so that any one who seeks to acquire a water-power with a view to developing it and establishing an industry based thereon will know just what he is getting and what he can depend on and thus avoid the wasting of capital. In many cases—indeed, I have a case in mind at the moment—capital has been invested on supposed data as to stream-flow; the data has subsequently proved to be unreliable, and great waste has consequently been incurred. Capital is getting more and more careful in the matter of investment in water-powers. The value of this material can scarcely be overestimated. Moreover, it is essential that there be uniformity in the method of estimating water-powers and the various essential factors of water-powers. A uniform system has been devised, a system that was tested out recently in a conference in Great Britain on the subject of the whole water-powers of the Empire; it was ascertained to be the best used anywhere, and it is now being copied in all the countries that were present at that conference. By means of the systems of the federal Water Powers Branch, the provinces are enabled to get their data, not only reliable gatehered, but made to fit into this uniform system, so that a water-power at any point in British Columbia may be compared with a water-power in New Brunswick in every factor that goes to make up the value of a water-power. That is what has been done, and the results are apparent and are becoming more and more apparent all the time. Applications are coming in for these water-powers, and the water-powers of Canada are to-day actually developed to a greater percentage, I think I may say, having regard to population, than those of perhaps any other country in the world. We have now something over 2,000,000 horse power developed on the water-powers of Canada. I think that is over 10 per cent of the whole developable water-power in what might be described at habitable Canada.

Mr. PARENT: I understand from the remarks of the minister that possibly a report has been made to the department by the engineers who have made investigations and surveys. If such a report has been made, I wonder why it has not been published, so that the public would have the information.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The reports are published. I will give the han. member before ten o'clock to-morrow morning more information as to Canadian waterpowers than he will be able to read in two weeks.

Mr. PARENT: That is going pretty far.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And absorb.

Mr. PARENT: That is better. The minister, in referring to the Commission of Conservation—

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is the Water Power Branch that has all the material. That has been published somewhat by the Commission of Conservation, but the material has been gathered by the Dominion Water Power Branch.

Mr. PARENT: Who is in charge of that particular branch?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Challies is in charge; Mr. Johnston is next in order.

Mr. ROBB: Are these gentlemen hydraulic engineers?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, they are both hydraulic engineers.

[Mr. Meigben.]

Mr. PARENT: Have these engineers made a special survey of the St. John river in New Brunswick, and if so, what is the result of their investigation?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Smith is engineer in charge down there, and I would be only too pleased if the hon. member would write to the premiers of each of the Maritime Provinces as to their opinion of Mr. Smith's suitability and capacity for the work.

Mr. PARENT: I am not discussing that at all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He has made a special survey of the water-power of the St. John river. I do not know if it is completed or not; but I have no doubt a considerable amount of information could be abtained at our branch, or perhaps more fully up to date information could be obtained from the New Brunswick Government itself, because Mr. Smith works immediately in cooperation with the Government of New Brunswick.

Mr. PARENT: If this estimate was being presented in the New Brunswick legislature, the remarks of the minister's would apply properly. If I were applying to the Premier of New Brunswick, I could probably get more information than I can from the minister now. But this Estimate is for $256,000 spent by the Dominion Government on surveys of different water-powers in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. I ask the minister if his department out of this sum of $256,000, has spent any amount in surveying the St. John river in New Brunswick, and if so, what is the result of that investigation. My question is addressed, not to the Premier of New Brunswick, but to the Minister of the Interior whose Estimates are before Parliament.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This money is not spent yet; it is to be spent.

Mr. PARENT: Has nothing been spent in the past?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, but not this sum.

Mr. PARENT: What has been spent in the past?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Money has been spent, and as I informed the hon. gentleman, some of it has been spent in respect of an investigation into the waterpowers of the St. John river. But the result would be very meagre if it were such that a minister, especially a minister who is not an engineer, could from his place in the House give the result to an hon. member opposite.

It would not be any good at all, if it was of that character. The report is compiled in such shape that a layman can understand it all right. I do not know just how far the investigation has progressed in relation to the waterpowers of the St. John river, but the report is compiled and the hon. member is quite welcome to it. He can obtain it most directly by going to the Waterpowers Branch; and I said as well that it would be available in the offices of the provincial Government of New Brunswick. The hon. member, however, does not need to go there; he can take his choice. The report is available there for any intending investor.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Steele): Shall the item carry?

Mr. PARENT: I should like to get an answer before I decide on this item. It may be all right for the minister to make the remarks he has made, but I believe the committee is entitled to find out where and how this money has been spent. When we are told during the last four years Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick have been using that money to find out what waterpowers they possess in their respective provinces; we ought to know what they discovered in those provinces and whether that amount of money was spent to some useful purpose.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. member want me to tell him how many waterpowers there are on the St. John river, what the best method of development is, what the stream in low water season is, what the best reservoir system is, and so on? Is that the information which he thinks I ought to give to the committee?

Mr. PARENT: If the department has done some work on the St. John river, I should like to know what it has done. If no result has been obtained, why spend money in this way?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There are results. Does the hon. member mean that I should put the report on the Table of the House before this item passes, or does he want me to read over all the report?

Mr. PARENT: If the minister has the information, I have no objection.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then, we shall be here for a week. What is the hon. member trying to do? He surely does not mean that I should read over the reports of our engineers in regard to the St. John river. Those reports are available for any member of the House. If the hon. member desires that they be put on the Table, there is no objection to that. Does he expect me to give the committee in detail all this scientific information?

Mr. PARENT: My question is very simple.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, the hon. member asks me if this is all for nothing. Certainly, it is not for nothing, far from that; it is for the most useful results.

Mr. PARENT: What are those results?

Mr. MEIGHEN: They are embodied in those reports.

Mr. PARENT: Let the minister give us an idea of what those reports are and what the engineers find.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Steele): Shall the item carry.

Mr. CANNON: No. I think the hon. member is very fair. This is a large item. Work has been done in the past, and the hon. member asks the minister what work has been done and what results have been obtained. The minister says that is a difficult thing to do. That may be so, but the minister is surrounded in this Chamber by his officers, and if he cannot go into every particular detail, he can give a summary to the committee. After all the minister, even though he is a minister, has to give information to the House when he wants money. We are not going to vote money without knowing the purpose for which it is intended. What is going to be done with this money this year? If the minister says that it is for scientific purposes, let us know for what scientific purposes. I think the inquiry by the hon. member (Mr. Parent) is very fair and the minister ought to give us the information.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the hon. member will ask for any detail I will endeavour to get it.

Mr. PARENT: How many water-powers are there on the St. John river, and on what particular ones have the engineers been working?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The two I recall offhand are the Grand Falls site on the St. John river, about 50,000 horse-power, and the Great Falls site about 50,000 horsepower. On the Indian river in Nova Scotia the province of Nova Scotia is expending approximately $1,000,000 in development, based on the data obtained through Mr. Smith and the Water-powers Branch. I do not know just what British Columbia purposes doing, but I do know what the opinion of the Prime Minister is as to the work. Of course, everybody knew that these two falls were on the St. John river. It is not to find out whether the falls are there that the Water-powers Branch is working. The information they gather is as to the minimum and maximum stream flow over a number of years, the best method of developing that water-power, the best utilization to make of it, the best system of reservoirs, so as to make the maximum flow of the high season available in the low season, and all such data as that, best understood by enginers, but which is so prepared, though in very detailed form, that anybody can understand it after study.

Mr. PARENT: I gather from the minister's remarks that now they have all this data concerning the falls on the Indian river in Nova Scotia, and Grand Falls in New Brunswick, which I understand to be the most important water-powers of these two provinces, that he would have no objection to reducing this item this year, as the most important work of the engineers must be over.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The investigations proceed from the more important rivers to the less important rivers. I do not think they are complete even as to the powers on the St. John river. The investigations certainly are not completed as to the other water-powers of New Brunswick, and they are being undertaken for the first time in Ontario. It is only about a year since we made our agreement with Ontario, so that is one extra account this year. The main cause of the increase, of course, is not only this co-operative work with the provinces, but the increased cost of surveys and materials.

Mr. PARENT: What kind of agreement has been entered into between the Dominion Government and the Ontario Government in regard to this matter?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I can lay a copy of the agreement on the Table. It is just the same in substance as the agreement we made with Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. It provides for the supply of a certain number of men, by hours, under the Water-powers Branch, and for equipment. They undertake to provide certain supplies, provisions to the men, and so forth.

Mr. TRAHAN: How much will be expended in New Brunswick next year?

Mr. MEIGHEN: About $9,500.

Mr. TRAHAN: In Nova Scotia?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Also $9,500. Prince Edward Island $1,000, and Ontario $41,000.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. TRAHAN: That does not amount to $256,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, because we have our own water-powers. It was the hon. member for Quebec who said it was all being spent there; I never said it. We have our own water-powers in Western Canada and in British Columbia. We have no agreement with the province of Quebec, but we are just as ready to make an agreement with them as with any other province. Included in the water-powers of Quebec, of course, are the powers of the St. Lawrence river. There is considerable information on that now, and these powers are being pretty much developed, but there is no question that a very great deal of valuable work could be done in that province.

Mr. TRAHAN: What surveys of water-powers will be made in New Brunswick next year?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The basic work is the stream measurement, not of any special river, but of all the rivers. That goes on concurrently. The staff is also engaged in gathering other data, first, as regards the major water-powers, and next as regards the minor water-powers.

Mr. TRAHAN: Under the agreements the minister has referred to do the provinces pay a part of the expense of the surveys and investigations, and if so, what part?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The division is something like this: The Water-powers Branch does the main basic fundamental work in order that it may be done the same in all the provinces, and in order that the information may be related to fixed standards. Then the province does the special detailed work.

Mr. PARENT: Has this department anything to do with the protection of fish where a water-power is being developed on a river?

Mr. MEIGHEN: In Western Canada, where we own the water-powers, when we are making an agreement with the party who develops the power we insist that he provide a fishway, and I have no doubt that the provinces would similarly provide with respect to their water-powers in any agreements made by them.

Mr. PARENT: I am calling this matter to the attention of the minister because all the provinces are not following the same practice. The requirements as to the construction of a dam and fishway are not the same in all the provinces. I would impress on the minister and the department that if they would draw up plans and specifications which would be distributed to every province, so that we would have uniformity in the building of dams and fishways, they would be rendering a good service to the country at large.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think that is especially the province of the Department of Marine and Fisheries. We comply with their regulations in connection with all our water-powers in Western Canada, and I would expect the provinces would comply with the same regulations, this being a fisheries matter, so there should be uniformity.

Mr. CANNON: I have seen in the papers that it was the intention of the Government to hand back to the western provinces their natural resources. If that is correct, will the water-powers be included in those natural resources?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I cannot say whether they will or not. It would depend on the final result of negotiations. I have taken the ground that it would be better not to include them, for the reason that the rivers upon which the water-powers appear are interprovincial rivers; and the control of those rivers, as regards the water-powers as well as irrigation, would seem to me to be better within the purview of the federal authorities. It would have been better for Ontario and Quebec had that rule applied. I have heard many authorities say that there would have been much better development of the Ottawa river, for example, had it not been for the divided authority on either side. However, it is not for me to say whether the water-powers would go with the other resources or not. I only express my individual opinion when I say that I think it would have been better for all concerned if this were not the case.

Investigations, triangulations, precise levelling, topographic and field astronomic work, etc., $291,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is an increase in the Geodetic Survey Branch. We have 21 men back from overseas, and last year's vote was cut down to such an extent that we could not keep the men in the field. We were paying them salaries but had to bring them in before the season was nearly over because we had not money to supply the equipment to go on; and at the same time we were called upon by other departments to prosecute geodetic surveys, for several of the departments depend upon us in that respect. We have these men back from overseas, and unless there is an increased vote we shall either have to dispense with them, although their services are required, or else utilize them half of the time and pay them all the time. That is the reason I ask for this increased vote. We desire to use the men all of the time to good advantage.

Mr. PECK: Does the minister not consider that the work of the different survey departments of the Government might be concentrated and centralized under the Geodetic Survey Branch, as in the United States? In the minister's department there is a Topographic Survey, and there is a Tidal Survey in the Marine Department, and it seems to me that there may be some duplication of work. Perhaps it might be in the interest of efficiency and economy to have this survey work centralized.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The matter has been brought to my attention, and I gathered the surveyors together one day and discussed it. I remember that my chief impression was that there had not been nearly so much duplication as I thought there had been. There is, of course, some duplication, and possibly reorganization under a single head would be better, but there are difficulties in that direction. However, I intend to go further into the matter in the coming year.

Expenses connected with the survey and demarcation of International Boundaries, including $1,000 to J. J. McArthur as International Boundary Commissioner, $45,700.

Mr. PARENT: What is this money required for and where will it be spent?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The International Boundary survey has been going on for years and years. It is nearly complete, and that is why we are contracting the expenditure each year. It is reduced this year by nearly $18,000.

Mr. PARENT: What part of the country is the work being performed in now?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am informed that this is nearly final; there will not be much next year. I can tell the hon. member where the money is spent. It is for more complete marking of the boundary line between Alaska and British Columbia in the neighbourhood of Portland canal and the Unuk and Stikine rivers, this territory having been surveyed fourteen years ago, when monuments were placed at irregular intervals. Great mining development has taken place in those districts close to the boundary within the last few years. The mines are near the boundary, and fortunately for Canada they are on the Canadian side. In my opinion, there will have to be a permanent commission whose duty it will be to maintain these monuments. I do not think we can get along without it, and there will have to be a convention between the two countries to provide for the permanent maintenance of the monuments now virtually completed all along the 5,000 odd miles of boundary.

Mr. CANNON: If this commission is appointed, is it the intention of the Canadian Government to make the appointments, as regards the Canadian commissioners, without consultation of the Imperial Government?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know what the practice is, but I should think that whether there would be consultation or not, the selections would virtually be made by the Canadian Government. The boundary commission is now composed of officials of this Government alone, Mr. McArthur being at the head of it.

Mr. CANNON: I asked the question because, as the minister has mentioned, a part of the work for which this Estimate is asked will be done in Alaska. I suppose that work is to put into force the conclusions of a famous Alaskan Boundary Commission, the result of whose investigations was most unsatisfactory to all Canadians. As the minister knows, on that commission there were two Canadian commissioners who refused to sign the conclusions arrived at by the majority. The Canadian commissioners were over-ruled by the American commissioners, with whom the British commissioners joined hands. I infer from the past, therefore, that whenever questions arise as to the determination of boundaries between Canada and the United States the Imperial Parliament has always made appointments. If, in future, the suggestion expressed by the minister to-night were adopted; that is to say, if the commissioners were solely appointed by the Canadian Government, the results might be more satisfactory.

Mr. McKENZIE:

1. Has any person been appointed Fishery Officer for Isle Madame, or for Isle Madame and the western portion of the county of Richmond, Nova Scotia? If so, who accepted such appointment?

2. Was a qualifying examination set for applicants for such position? If so, how many wrote such examination?

3. Did any returned soldiers belonging to the county of Richmond write such examination? If so, what are their names?

4. Has any request been made by returned soldiers for another examination?

5. What are the names of the returned soldiers, if any, who made such request, and on what ground was it refused?

6. Why has not a resident of Richmond county been given the appointment?

Hon. Mr. SIFTON:

PARLIAMENT POST OFFICE.

Mr. TOBIN:

During what hours of the day is the Parliament Post Office supposed to be kept open for the convenience of members during the sessions of Parliament (a) on days during which the House is in session; (b) on days other than holidays when the House does not sit or when the House is adjourned at or before 6 p.m.; (c) on Sundays and holidays?

Rt. Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Days the House is in session: (a) from 6.30 a.m. to adjournment of the House; (b) on Saturdays from 6.30 a.m. to 10.00 p.m., other days from 6.30 a.m. to 11.00 p.m.; (c) on Sundays from 9.00 a.m. to 2.00 p.m.; 4.00 p.m. to 6.00 p.m.; 8.00 p.m. to 9.00 p.m.; on holidays from 6.30 a.m. to 2.00 p,m., and from 6.00 p.m. to 9.00 p.m.

CANADA WHEAT BOARD.

Mr. STEVENS:

Having reference to the following despatch published in the Montreal Gazette:

"Ottawa, June 3.—The Government, in answer to the telegram from the Canadian Council of Agriculture, urging that necessary steps be taken to have the powers of the Canadian Wheat Board continued at least for another year, sent a reply promising earnest consideration of the request."

1. (a) Is it the intention of the Government to deal with the proposal of the Canadian Council of Agriculture by legislation this session, or (b) has the Government power under any existing statute to deal with it by Order in Council, and (c) if so, will such powers be utilized?

2. Is the Government aware that control of marketing of wheat has been abandoned by the United States Government?

3. Under the powers given the Canada Wheat Board is it the duty of said Board to secure for the seller the highest possible price for wheat in the world market?

4. Has the marketing of the Canadian wheat crop by the Canada Wheat Board resulted in the farmers receiving the highest market price for their wheat?

5. Has the marketing of the Canadian wheat crop by the Canada Wheat Board resulted in lowering the cost of flour to Canadian consumers?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER:

1. The matter is now being considered by the Government. Legislation will be necessary if the crop for the succeeding year is to be controlled, as was the crop for the past year.

2. Yes.

3. It is the duty of the Canadian Wheat Board to secure the best possible market prices for wheat according to prevailing rates in the world market.

4. Yes.

5. This is largely a matter of opinion. In order to come to a reasoned judgment, one would have to know what would have been the cost of flour to the consumers if the crop had not been controlled, and what would have been the price paid by the millers for wheat if prices had not been controlled. It is impossible to give an answer to that.

UNOPPOSED MOTION FOR PAPERS.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough):

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, petitions and other papers and documents in the possession of the Naval Department and of the Board of Civil Service Commissioners relating to the appointment of a fishery overseer in the municipality of Guysborough, N.S.

ST. LAWRENCE NAVIGATION.—ILE d'ORLEANS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. H. E. LAVIGUEUR (Quebec county): I should like to draw the attention of the Government, and particularly of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne), to the dangerous state of affairs which exists on the Island of Orleans near Quebec. In the fall of 1918, great damage was caused to the wharves at St. Jean, St. Laurent, Ste. Famille, and St. François, on the Ile d'Orleans. A sum of $200,000 was voted for repairs on those wharves. It was reported to me some days ago—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member is in effect making an argument. Would he summarize any question he wishes to put.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: I will do so. It was reported to me that the lighthouses had suffered great damage on account of the wharves not having been repaired; that those lighthouses are liable to be destroyed by the high tide at any time, which would constitute a great danger to navigation on the St. Lawrence. I, therefore, warn the Government of the serious state of affairs which exists in regard to navigation on the St. Lawrence.

MEN RELEASED ON HABEAS CORPUS RE-ARRESTED.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve and Gaspé): Is the Minister of Justice now in a position to give me the information in regard to the case to which I referred yesterday?

Rt. Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): I think I may give the information now. The fact is that the Attorney General of the province, acting in co-operation with the officers of the penitentiary and an officer representing the Department of Justice, did arrest the two men referred to, and they have been returned to the penitentiary. As I said yesterday, we are advised that a judge sitting on a writ of habeas corpus has not jurisdiction to override the judgment and conviction of the Court of King's Bench upon an indictable offence which ordered these men to be confined to the penitentiary for a long period of years. I am not aware whether it was suggested that there was any irregularity in the way the men were conveyed to the penitentiary at the outset. But even if there were, the sentence against these men stands just as though the intervening incidents had not taken place; there is the judgment of the competent court imposing that sentence upon these men, which sentence has never been satisfied. As I have said, we are advised that there is not jurisdiction in a judge upon a writ of habeas corpus to override a conviction by the Court of King's Bench and nullify a sentence imposed by that court. That would involve an appellate jurisdiction in one judge over the formal judgment of the Court of King's Bench, the highest court in our province dealing with criminal matters. Both the provincial authorities charged with the enforcement of law and ourselves are fully prepared to take the responsibility for what has been done to vindicate the authority of law, and to justify it before any tribunal.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Mr. Speaker, if you please, I do not question the facts as related by the Minister of Justice; he knows them better than I do. But does it not strike him that if an error has been made by the judge who granted the writ of habeas corpus, an appeal lies from that judgment?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. DOHERTY: An appeal does not lie; that is the point.

Mr SPEAKER: The hon. member (Mr. Lemieux) has put his question and received an answer; that is as far as he may proceed on the Orders of the Day.

Mr. BUREAU: Do I understand the minister to say that the Department of Justice have expressed an opinion confirmatory of the action taken by the Attorney General of the province of Quebec?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes. The action was taken by the Attorney General of the province of Quebec in co-operation with our officers. It was necessary that our officers should intervene so that the men should be identified as those who were in the penitentiary. Moreover, the view entertained by the provincial authorities is the view entertained by our law officers. Of course it belongs to the provincial authorities to enforce the judgment of the court, but we were quite prepared to take the responsibility of co-operating with them in returning these men to the penitentiary.

Mr. BUREAU: You must have taken it as a war-time measure.

Mr. DOHERTY: We took it as a peace-time measure, for the vindication of the judgment of the courts in the proper administration of law.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Does not my hon. friend believe that this is purely a question of law and that redress could be obtained—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

[Mr. Doherty.]

REPORT OF STATISTICAL DEPARTMENT.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. FRANK CAHILL (Pontiac): In view of the fact that the Statistical Department are not ready to submit their report for 1919-20, may I ask the Government whether members of this House are permitted to go to that department and obtain information?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): My hon. friend is perfectly at liberty to do that. I will issue a formal invitation to him, if he requires it, to go and bother the Dominion Statistician for any statistics he wants. I think he will find them there.

Mr. CAHILL: I was refused certain information there; that is why I wanted to get a statement from the minister on the point.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Of course, it depends somewhat on the information that my hon. friend requires. The Statistical Department gathers its information under oath of secrecy in respect of a great many things, and there are certain matters which it cannot disclose. But my hon. friend may obtain the general run of statistical information there.

INCOME WAR TAX ACT, 1917, AMENDMENT.

On motion of Sir Henry Drayton (Minister of Finance), the House resumed from June 8, consideration in committee of Bill No. 158, to amend the Income War Tax Act, 1917, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN: When this Bill was last before the committee the first nine clauses had been read and considered, and section 10 had also been read and was under consideration.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Do I understand that section 2 has been carried?

The CHAIRMAN: Sections 4 and 5 stand. The other sections, from 1 to 9 inclusive, have been carried.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I was under the impression that section 2 had been allowed to stand. Will the minister allow me to refer to section 2?

The CHAIRMAN: Mr. Archambault moves that the committee do now revert to the consideration of section 2 of the Bill.

Motion agreed to.

On section 2—determination of deficits and losses.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I believe that the minister wishes to treat the committee with fairness and that he is even prepared to accept suggestions made by the Opposition. I am sorry that the minister was not in his seat when I made a few remarks on the Budget. On that occasion I suggested that the exemption in respect of each child be increased from $200 to $500. Everyone who is blessed with children knows that it costs much more than $200 for the upkeep of a child in these days. I have made an offhand estimate of what it costs for the yearly upkeep of a child of ten or twelve years of age, and the figure which I have arrived at is $563.30. Everyone knows that one of the causes of race suicide and voluntary sterility is the high cost of the upkeep of children. If a married man has an income of $4,000 and no children he pays income tax on $2,000, the assumption being that the $2,000 upon which he is taxed is that part of his income which is not absolutely necessary for the ordinary needs of life. On the other hand, if he has children he needs that $2,000 for the upkeep of his children, so that, as a matter of fact, he pays tax on income that is necessary for the upkeep of his family. I am sure that the minister realizes the unfairness of limiting the amount of exemption of each child to $200. I therefore move that the following clause be inserted immediately after clause 1 as clause 2 of the Bill:

Paragraph (b) of subsection 2 of section one of the said Act as enacted by chapter fifty-five of the statutes of 1919, is hereby amended by replacing the words "two hundred" in the first line of said paragraph by the words "five hundred."

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There are some difficulties in meeting the suggestion of my hon. friend. One of the chief objections raised by many people to the basis of income taxation as carried on in Canada is that the right to tax is not made sufficiently general and that existing exemptions are higher than they ought to be. It is held that the burden should be spread to a somewhat further degree so that every citizen would feel to a larger extent that he was contributing to the expense of the country and was interested in proper and economic government. The exemption for children is a provision which applies in different countries. It applies in Great Britain, where the exemption for the first child is, if I remember rightly, $200, with a smaller exemption for each subsequent child. So that Great Britain's basis of exemption on the score of children is the same as ours for the first child, being less than ours for subsequent children. It must also be borne in mind that the exemption limit on incomes in Great Britain is lower than it is in Canada. In the United States the exemption is exactly the same as our own, and the initial exemption granted for all incomes is also higher than that of Great Britain. I would point out to my hon. friend that if we were to increase the exemption for children in the manner contemplated it would mean that a man with three children would be exempt from all taxation until his income was in excess of $3,500 a year, and the man with six children would be exempt until his income exceeded $5,000.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: He deserves it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Probably he deserves it, but, on the other hand, I think he is likely to be much happier than the man who has no children. The married man who has ten children would have to have an income of $7,000 before he could be called upon to pay five cents to the treasury.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Hear, hear, for him.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is a class of exemption of such a character that it would make grave inroads upon the public revenue. It would so tremendously increase our present scale of exemptions that I must ask the committee to reject the proposal.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I suppose my hon. friend will admit that $200 is not sufficient for the upkeep of a boy of ten or twelve or fourteen years of age.

Mr. EDWARDS: What were the figures my hon. friend gave?

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I could give the details; the total is $563.30. Does my hon. friend want the details?

Mr. EDWARDS: I have had sufficient experience to be conversant with the details.

An hon. MEMBER: That is why you were smiling a moment ago.

Mr. EDWARDS: I was smiling because I wondered why my hon. friend (Mr. Archambault) omitted the $63.30 in stating the amount. He would have been more logical if he had asked for exemption to the amount of $563.30.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: The precise amount is $563.30, but in order to make the task of collection easier I suggested the round sum of $500. Every member except my hon. friend understood that.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: I heartily support the motion of the hon. member for Chambly-Vercheres. I think I have sufficient warranty for speaking on this subject, for I am the father of twenty-eight children. It will be conceded, therefore, that I know what I am talking about. I heard the minister state that the father of three children would have to have an income of $3,500 before he would pay the tax; that the father of six children would have to have an income of $6,000—I may be wrong, but that is what I understood him to say—and that the father of ten children must be in receipt of $7,500 before being taxable. I submit to the minister that a man with an income of $7,500 cannot reasonably support and educate ten children if he is subject to income taxation. It is as much as he can do to bring up such a family, as it ought to be brought up, on that income; and I would supplement the motion of the hon. member (Mr. Archambault) and suggest to the minister that the father of ten or twelve or eighteen children should be entirely free from taxation.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: He should receive a bonus.

Mr. STEIN: As seconder of the motion I suggest that if the minister is not disposed to accept it in its entirety he should at least make some concession and raise the amount of exemption from $200 to $300. The minister has spoken of similar exemptions that exist in Great Britain and in the United States. I believe, from what I have read in the press recently, that the exemptions in France are much higher than they are here or in the United States and Great Britain. My hon. friend (Mr. Archambault) suggests a bonus, and I think that bonuses are given in France to the fathers of large families. I have here a copy of The Montreal Gazette of March 9, 1920, on the new inheritance tax in France. In that paper the following appears:

> Paris, March 8.—France's new inheritance tax will be a novelty. It will be based upon the principle that the more children man has the less estate should be taxed, and vice versa, the fewer children he has, the more tax should be levied. If a man dies without children, the state will take fifty per cent of his estate. If there is one child, the state will take 33 per cent. If there are two children to be provided for, the tax will be 25 per cent. Should there be three children the tax will be 18¾ per cent. In the case of four or more children there will be no inheritance tax. Fiscal experts estimate this new tax will bring in 3,000,000 francs annually.
> The French Government statistics show that half the French army in the world war came from families having four or more children. The same statistics show that one family in five has as many as four children. Further, more families whose estates are the largest are not those who have four or more children as a rule.

I think the minister should raise the amount to $300; this would be acceptable to hon. members on this side.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Mr. Chairman, I am in sympathy with the amendment drawn up by my hon. friend from Chambly and Vercheres (Mr. Archambault). I am surprised that this Government, or any Government, should refuse to encourage large families, and this is a proper means of encouraging large families. We are advertising our country abroad to get immigrants, but after all there is nothing like the Canadian-born. He is preferable to the American, Australian, or even British. The asset we most require in this country is the Canadian-born. The principle embodied in the amendment has existed for all time in the history of nations. I would not care to delve into ancient history, but I might recall to my classical friend, the right hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), that in the laws of old Rome, Augustus, the Emperor, enacted legislation by which the fathers of twelve children were exempted from all taxation and were given lands out of the public domain. This legislation existed all through the Middle Ages in Europe. It was enacted by Louis XIV in France. Coming to more modern times in America—indeed in Canada—the Government of the late Honoré Mercier in the province of Quebec enacted similar legislation. Grants were made in our province to the fathers of twelve living children. They were made out of the Crown lands and they consisted of 100 acres, if I remember well, to each father of twelve children.

In France, unfortunately, the birth rate has been decreasing for many years. Indeed, one of the regrets of French patriots at the beginning of the war, and before the war, was to notice that each year at least one great city was lost by the falling off of the birth rate in France. What made the apparent superiority of the German nation? In 1870 Germany had the same population, or about the same population, as France; forty years later Germany had nearly doubled its population. In view of this appalling result, the patriots of France, laymen, priests, free thinkers and practising Catholics, have joined hands of late in order to promote a higher birth rate in the old Mother country. Premiums have been given by wealthy Frenchmen, and by patriots through some of the academies of France to fathers of large families, and the French Government at last has awakened and through its legislation has quite substantially encouraged a higher birth rate by exempting from taxation the fathers of large families.

This is a very important topic. It may not so appear when you consider the amount involved in each individual case, but it is a most vital problem for Canada. We have a large country—a beautiful country. The resources of the country have been hardly scratched. We have the potential wealth within the grasp of our hands, but we have not the population. Should we not by all means promote the growth of a healthy and strong population?

We are advertising Canada throughout Europe. I see in the papers every day that American immigrants are beginning afresh their peaceful invasion of the Northwest provinces. Well and good; I am delighted to hear it. The American immigrant is an excellent immigrant. He understands the conditions in Western Canada perhaps better than any other immigrant in the world, but, after all, the best, the most desirable of all citizens is the Canadian-born. Let us through our legislation encourage the increased birth rate of the Canadian.

I said something the other day to the House which I would like my hon. friends to bear in mind just as an illustration of what a steady increase in the birth rate must mean for Canada. Perhaps it is a little selfish on my part, being a Canadian of French descent, to make boast of the fact, but I do make boast of it because the homage is due to the patriotism of our mothers and grandmothers and to the wisdom of our legislators and clergy. I said, and I repeat to-day, that at the time of the Conquest, or if you prefer, at the time of the cession of French Canada to Great Britain, there were in Canada at most 80,000 people of French blood. In 1840, according to statistics, there were barely 1,000,000 French Canadians in Canada. To-day there are in Canada 2,500,000 French Canadians at least, and I do not take into account the French Canadians across the boundary. I am told on the best authority that there are no less than 2,000,000 French Canadians in the United States. If it is true, Sir, that a population will double every thirty years, I invite your attention, Mr. Chairman, to this fact that if our people are God-fearing, as they are and as they have always been, if they follow the precepts of the Lord, if marriage is encouraged and divorce discouraged, in thirty years from now, speaking from a French Canadian point of view, and it is not a narrow or sectional point of view, you will have 5,000,000 Canadians of French descent in Canada. In sixty years that number will again be doubled, and what is a period of sixty years in the history of a people? This statement is based on the best authority. Leroy-Beaulieu, who is known as the highest authority on political economy in Europe, once said that the birth rate of French Canada was simply astounding, and he attributed it to the simple life, to the religious life of my fellow countrymen. I do not speak in disparagement of the other races, I know, as a matter of fact, that in the old families in England the children are numerous. I know, too, that in Ireland and in Scotland children are many. I regret to say, and I base my opinion on what a former president of the United States, the late Theodore Roosevelt said, that in the American Commonwealth they have followed another course, and to-day we have the result of race suicide. By promoting divorce before the courts, by living a wild life in the cities, by distracting and luring the farming population from rural life to the cities, they have abolished the old time-honoured family life, which was the pride of the Pilgrim Fathers. This is a very serious problem, Mr. Chairman, and it has a bearing on this taxation measure. I say to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance that he will be a good Minister of Finance if first he practises economy, and if second, by the distribution of the taxation in this country, he takes the proper view of this national problem, namely the growth of the Canadian born. By his taxation measure he could indirectly—indeed he could directly—promote the increase of our population. I have said enough, Mr. Chairman. I am in earnest, and I say to the Minister of Finance that he will get a halo from this Parliament if he promotes the growth of Canadian-born population in Canada

Mr. EDWARDS: I want to enter my protest against any change in the law as it is now, or against the acceptance of the amendment as proposed by the hon. member for Chambly-Verchères (Mr. Archambault). If we were to accept in all seriousness, as of course we should, the arguments and the statements advanced by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat we might sum up those arguments in one sentence—it is the advancing of a plea—perhaps an indirect plea but nevertheless a plea—to exempt from taxation the French Canadians in this country.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, no.

Mr. EDWARDS: That is practically what it amounts to.

An hon. MEMBER: Not at all.

Mr. EDWARDS: Now there have been many means devised at different times to avoid the payment of taxes. For hon. gentlemen to get up and to deliberately and coolly suggest this way as a means of getting out of paying taxation is to say the least of it somewhat unique.

An hon. MEMBER: It is a good way.

Mr. EDWARDS: That is about what it amounts to.

Mr. MICHAUD: Try it.

Mr. EDWARDS: I will leave it to my hon. friends opposite who boast of their abilities along that line. Now in all seriousness, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me we should regard this matter of taxation at least from this standpoint: that the people of this country must realize that we have incurred a large debt as a result of the war and the lesson conveyed by this taxation is that every person should, as far as possible, get his shoulder under that debt and help to lift it. There is something which I think we should not now entirely overlook in the practical application of the tax. Take in the province of Quebec which is largely a rural province—that is the most of the population are engaged in farming. I venture to say that very few of the farming population in that province will be affected by the tax as it stands to-day. They are exempted up to $2,000, and if they have five children that means a further exemption of $1,000. If hon. gentlemen opposite will tell me that the farmers in the province of Quebec are enjoying incomes in excess of two or three thousand dollars I will be very glad to hear it. I can assure them that is not the case so far as the farmers of Ontario are concerned, and it is certainly not so as regards my constituency, very few of them are affected by this taxation. I think the exemption on $2,000 is suitable recognition. I think it goes far enough, and that we would be making a mistake if we accepted the amendment of the hon. gentleman which I have no doubt is presented in all good faith.

Mr. BURNHAM: I should like to say that the reason I wish to support the Minister of Finance is, that I am against the proposition which is being urged here to-day since it is not the principle which has been adopted in taxation in Canada. It would be all very well if this principle had been discussed in a resolution earlier in the session, but it cannot be used, I should think, by the Minister of Finance as a basis of taxation at the present time. We must be logical. While it is true that people should not be penalized for having children, according to our present idea, nevertheless that is not the basis of taxation, and the Minister of Finance, I should think, has no discretion in the matter. While I am on my feet let me say that a moment's thought will show that if the mere multiplication of progeny had been the Creator's idea He would have arranged, as He does with the lower animals, that parents should have a dozen children a year.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BURNHAM: This idea of making a sort of market for produce for humanity is to me revolting. Statisticians like the French gentleman referred to by my hon. friend from Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) all agree that no man can properly bring up more than a certain number of children.

Mr. MICHAUD: How many?

An hon. MEMBER: Eighteen.

Mr. BURNHAM: It is said that some gentlemen like my hon. friend would be embarrassed with even one.

The CHAIRMAN: Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer): I do not know that this is a discussion upon which we should waste very much time at this period of the session, and I feel very much hesitancy in even saying half a dozen words because I think the minister said all that was to be said on the question. There was very much force in his argument that the man who has the children is the blessed man. I think that as my hon. friend from West Calgary (Mr. Tweedie) is not present I may perhaps be permitted to quote Scripture to the extent of saying that "Blessed is the man who has his quiver full." The proposition contained in the amendment is also scriptural if it be right that,

"Unto him that hath shall be given"; but it would be a very free interpretation of that passage to say, that we shall remit the taxation of men who have large families and the blessedness that comes from large families. I quite agree with the minister that a childless home is a frightful thing to contemplate. But I do not know that my hon. friend from Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux)—to whom one always listens with great interest—helped his argument by some of the statements he made with regard to what the Romans did. I am not disposed to draw many of my ideals in this twentieth century from mediaeval or primitive times. The Romans had their day, and they went. They wanted large families for the purposes of militarism; and we have had enough of militarism not only in primitive and mediaeval times, but in times far more recent.

I was not very much impressed by my hon. friend's statement as to the possible growth of the French Canadian population in this country. It is a matter of comparative indifference to me what section of our population increases so long as we have laws which are equal and just between all our inhabitants, and which will make good citizens of them whatever may be their racial origin. But my hon. friend went on to say that there are 2,000,000 French Canadians in the United States. Now, in making his estimate of what the French Canadian population will be in the years immediately in front of us, he would also have to be able to predict how many of them will go to the United States. If the movement of the immediate future has any resemblance to that of the immediate past, then the effect of this amendment would be to exempt people from taxation to build up the population of the United States, and that would be a very serious proposition for me to give my assent to.

As a matter of fact I think the whole question can be summed up in this way: That the amendment fails to distinguish between a man's parental duties and his duties to the State. A man's parental duties are primary duties which he ought to be proud and pleased to discharge, and the more he discharges them the better off he is in the possession of his children. But a man's duties to the State are entirely different, and to say that he ought to be helped in his parental duties by being exempted from his State duties is a proposition to which I could not honestly give my assent. Our parental duties are, I think, providentially imposed, and it is a primary duty to see that our sons become good men and our daughters good women as far as it is in our parental power to bring that about. But our State duties are equally incumbent on us, and I certainly think the present exemption is sufficient.

Amendment (Mr. Archambault) negatived on division.

Section agreed to.

On section 10—One-quarter tax to be forwarded with return; balance may be paid by instalments with interest, etc.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I desire to move an amendment to clause 10 in respect to the question which was brought up by the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. Denis). In the proposals that we are making we want the payment of this tax to be left in such a position that no tax-payer will run the slightest risk of loss by making an immediate return, but he will know absolutely that if he has paid too much he will get it back at once. Under the present law there is a provision for refunds provided in subsection 4 of section 10 in these words:

> That the minister may refund any tax or penalty wrongfully or illegally assessed and collected, but no refund shall be allowed because of any alleged error in the assessment, unless application therefor is made within twelve months of the date of payment or penalty.

I do not propose to interfere with that subsection, which is quite enough to look after the situation generally; but in connection with the new provisions the position I think ought to be, that no one need make application for a refund, but rather that it is the duty of the department to properly check the assessment and the remittance, and if there has been an over-payment to remit the money without delay, instead of waiting until the individual—who probably would never find out that he has made an overpayment—sends in a claim for a refund. Therefore I propose to move the following amendment as a new paragraph, making it subsection 12:

> The returns received by the minister shall be with all due despatch checked and examined and in all cases where such examination discloses that an overpayment has been made by a taxpayer the minister shall make a refund of the amount so overpaid by such taxpayer except in cases where any instalment or instalments are either due or falling due by such taxpayer when the amount of the over-payment shall be applied on such instalment or instalments and notice of said action given such taxpayer accompanied by the payment of the balance if any of the amount overpaid.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. ROBB: In view of the possibility that a person making out his income tax return might very innocently commit a mistake and come within the penalty clauses, which are rather drastic, I would like to know if the minister will make some provision whereby mistakes made in good faith may be generously dealt with by officials of the department.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The clause really does not deal with the matter in the way that the hon. member thinks it does, although I quite understand his receiving that impression at the first glance. The taxpayer does two things; first, he shows what his income is. The amount of his income is something which the taxpayer ought to know; it is something that the department does not know. The next thing the taxpayer is invited and has to do is to send in the amount of the assessment which he thinks ought to be made upon that income. As regards the making of the assessment, I entirely agree with the hon. gentleman that this is open to error, and no penalty is provided for that. The penalty is not one which has to do with the amount of the assessment a man makes, because that may be full of errors; it has to do with the statement he makes as to his income which he himself alone knows about. Even as regards his income, if he makes a mistake of only 10 per cent, there is absolutely no penalty. Therefore, he is not asked to pay anything for any mistake which could in any way arise from the construction of these statutes or from the imposition of conflicting or cumulative taxes. If a man is honest in stating the amount of his income, there is no penalty. If he is dishonest and makes an improper return on a subject which he alone knows all about, he then becomes liable to a penalty.

Mr. ROBB: The understanding is that if the person making out a return puts in correctly, or nearly so, his total income, he is not penalized for any deduction which he may make, and to which he imagines he is entitled.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Not at all.

Mr. NICHOLSON (Algoma East): Having that statement of the minister in mind, I should like to know how that harmonizes with the first paragraph of clause 14.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I will deal with clause 14 when we come to it. Clause 10 is intended to cover only the income.

Mr. ANDERSON: Did I understand the minister to say that a man might make an error of ten per cent in his income without being liable to any penalty?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Clause 10 at line 31 reads:

> If the amount of the income omitted from his return exceeds ten per centum of the correct income.

That is the first time when you have any penalty in the nature of a fine imposed. The penalty there is one-half of the amount of the deficiency.

Mr. LOGGIE: If the amount is less than ten per cent, he has to pay 10 per cent interest per annum?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes.

Mr. LOGGIE: There is some penalty?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not look on that as a penalty.

Section agreed to.

On section 11—demand for additional information.

Mr. DENIS: I do not think this Bill provides for the examination of a person who owes the tax. I do not know whether it would not be wise to insert such provision in the Bill, as such provisions exist in many statutes. For instance, the law in Quebec provides that where a person has in law a right to go into another person's business in order to find out if this person can or cannot pay a certain debt, the law entitles the creditor to call and examine his debtor. While I am not ready to say that a provision of this kind should be inserted in this Bill, it has been recognized through experience that the most proper, direct and satisfactory manner of knowing a man's business, is to examine him under oath.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The officers of the department are of the view that, up to the present time at any rate, they have not met any difficulty which will require that to be done. As much as possible, the endeavour is to collect the tax in an administrative way, with as little recourse as possible to law and consequent legal expenses, and with as little harassment of the taxpayer as possible. In connection with arriving at the amount of a tax, as long as it is quite clear that the department can get all the information they desire to get—and the hon. member will see that that provision is added this year—and if in addition to that they can check the different sources of information, they can generally do just as well as if they examined the man.

Section agreed to.

On section 14—penalties for short payments or not making payments:

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: When we were considering clause 10 I had it in mind that it would be desirable to consider this clause in connection with it, because I did not want to have a penalty for a mistake in the assessment itself visited upon the taxpayer. But I find that this point has already been covered,—not in the first draft, but in the amendments made before the printing of the Bill. It is provided that if the taxpayer does not pay the amount, or one-quarter of it, estimated by him as the amount that he ought to pay, he is subject to penalty. Then, under section 14 he is again subject to penalty if he does not pay his taxes as provided by the new section, but he is not liable to penalty simply because the amount that he returns is subsequently found to be incorrect. The question of penalties, therefore, turns entirely upon the subject matter that the ratepayer himself knows all about,—the amount of his income and the amount that he himself says he should pay.

Mr. ROBB: As I read the section, the taxpayer is penalized if he fails to make any payment at the time of his return. Suppose his understanding is that he owes nothing and that, accordingly, he makes no payment?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If his estimate shows no liability to tax, then there is no liability to penalty.

Mr. ROBB: He is liable to penalty "should he fail to make any payment at the time of filing his return."

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That means, of course, if there is any payment to make.

Mr. ROBB: It does not say so.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If the hon. member thinks there is any doubt about that, there is no reason why it should not be amended. But there must be something to pay; if the taxpayer assesses nothing he is not liable to penalty under this section for non-payment.

Mr. FIELDING: In this section the words "the tax as estimated by him" are used, but there is no such expression in section 10.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The whole of the work done under section 10 is done by the taxpayer. He makes the assessment, and when we come to the penalty we put in the words "as estimated by him" in order to make it absolutely clear that so long as he pays his instalments as estimated by him he is subject to no penalty.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Is any provision made to cover the case of a man who is out of the country and cannot take care of any of these notices within the required time?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We do not extend the time in individual cases. It is the business of taxpayers who are away for any considerable length of time to have some one look after their returns. But the time is sometimes generally extended; we did this year extend it for a period of one month. There is a provision that the minister may at any time enlarge the time for making an individual return, but we try to get along without any individual extensions of time.

Mr. BUREAU: Subsection (2) of section 10 provides that if the minister suspects that the taxpayer is about to leave Canada he may, "for that or any other reason," by registered letter to the taxpayer, demand payment of all taxes within ten days. If the minister were looking after these things personally I would not have any fear concerning them; but matters of this kind are left to his officers in the various localities. It may be well to take such action if a man is leaving the country, but it seems to me that the use of the words "for that or any other reason" makes the provision a rather drastic one.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is drastic, but not as drastic as the similar provision in England, where the length of time within which payment must be made in such circumstances is five days, I believe. It is essential that the public revenues should be protected. So far as administration is concerned, this action cannot be taken by an ordinary officer. The matter would be the subject of report to the head office, and action could be taken only by the minister or by the Commissioner of Taxation.

Mr. BUREAU: On the report of the officer; it is the same thing.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Oh no; I assure the hon. member that the commissioner is not merely a rubber stamp. Moreover, to what country would a man go in order to avoid the tax? I do not think he would go to Great Britain, where he would find conditions worse. I do not think he would go to the United States where, as I am instructed, they have precisely the same provision.

Mr. JACOBS: Subsection (2) provides that:

Non-payment of the said tax within the specified time shall render the goods of the taxpayer liable to seizure by the sheriff of the city, county or district in which the goods of the taxpayer are situate.

Is it the desire of the minister, by this Bill 158, to amend Magna Charta, which says that no citizen can be dispossessed of his property without due process of law?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does the hon. member not think that this statute is "due process of law"?

Mr. JACOBS: The seizure of a man's effects without giving him opportunity of placing his case before the court would be due process of law if that law were Lynch law as applied in remote portions of Mexico, or, perhaps, in distant parts of Texas.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am afraid that I cannot follow the hon. member to Mexico.

Section agreed to.

On section 16—retroactive effect of sections of this Act.

Mr. FIELDING: I suppose the object is to enable the minister to recover the sums of past years; but I understand that he does not intend to apply the penalties for the delays.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is correct. We have had some clauses which entirely interpreted what the law was. So far as the new clauses are concerned, those that we have been discussing recently as to the assessment being made by the individual himself, and the penalties provided for, these do not come into effect this year.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I desire to ask the minister a question in regard to the returns called for in this section.

An hon. MEMBER: Which section?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: This refers to three or four of the sections that come into force at a certain date. There are many companies whose year terminates on December 31st. A company's year ended, say, on December 31, 1919; the dividends were earned in that year's business, but the annual meeting and the declaration of the dividend do not take place until the books are all audited and the accounts are in for that year. The result is that it is perhaps six or eight weeks after the end of the fiscal year before the dividend is declared. I had a slight argument with one of the collectors in that connection recently, and it appears to me that it is impossible to estimate the dividend before it is declared, even though it may have been earned. What is the ruling of the department on that point? Is it the intention that the dividend shall be charged to the year in which it is paid or the year in which it is earned?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The point is perfectly well taken. We have cleared up any doubt in the matter by section 3 of the present Bill, which reads:

Dividends declared.....shall be taxable income of the taxpayer in the year in which they are declared or voted.

Mr. FIELDING: Take the case which my hon. friend from Brantford has mentioned. The year may close on December 31st and the accounts are made up at a later stage, and as a matter of fact the dividends are only collected in the following year. Would they not be part of the income of the shareholder in that year?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The dividends are only declared when the accounts are made up and when the meeting is held.

Mr. FIELDING: The declaration of the dividend does not create an income; it is the payment of the dividend that makes the income. If my hon. friend is going to take the declaration and not the payment of the dividend I think he will encounter some embarrassment. The income is what the man receives, and the year in which he receives it should be the proper accounting period into which it should enter.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I confess I thought that the trouble really was that companies having earned their dividends were not in a position to bring their books down and declare those dividends within the accounting period. I think that the tax ought to be paid, as closely as possible, upon money when it is earned. The dividend is an accretion to the taxpayer during the year it is declared.

Mr. FIELDING: No.

Mr. COPP: It may be declared payable in so many months' time.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: There is no doubt that dividends are frequently declared months before they are paid. I am aware of a recent case in which it was four months after the declaration of the dividend before anything was actually received. It is the time between the declaration and the payment that may cause all the trouble.

Many companies do declare dividends far in advance of actual payment, and sometimes the dividends are not paid in cash but by stock. I know of a case where dividends were paid in fully paid-up stock, because there was not the actual cash.

Mr. FIELDING: The minister has dealt with that point.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Stock might not be received until some time after the dividend is declared. I am sorry I was not here when clause 3 was adopted, but it seems to me that we should have a clear understanding as to whether a stock dividend, which is not money at all, is treated exactly as a cash dividend.

Mr. FIELDING: The minister dealt with the question of stock dividends yesterday, and the hon. gentleman's point has been covered. I am afraid, however, that the minister's view that a dividend earned is to be credited up to one's income when it is declared may be embarrassing. Suppose a man is engaged at a salary of $5,000 a year and through some mishap he does not receive that amount. He has earned it, but in the settling up of affairs it is found that something has gone wrong and he does not get that money. Would you tax that as his income? It is the same thing with dividends. A dividend is only an income when a man gets it. I would ask my hon. friend to give some consideration to that point because he may find it a difficult one.

Mr. BELAND: There is a further point. A shareholder may cease to be such between the time the dividend is declared by the board of directors and the date at which it is paid. A meeting might take place in December and the directors might declare a dividend payable on the first of February to all shareholders on record on the 15th of January. In the meantime, between the date of the meeting and the 15th of January the shareholder might, if he chose, dispose of his shares, and in that case I do not see that he should be taxable so far as those shares are concerned.

Mr. FIELDING: He would get the benefit of the disposal of the shares.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes.

Mr. BELAND: He might dispose of the money in such a way that it would bring him no immediate return. He might invest it in some enterprise which might not be profitable at all.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would like to leave it entirely to the committee. It is a question whether the ratepayer should be relieved or not. What we have proposed is entirely in easement of the ratepayer. We have thought it fairer not to accumulate dividends. There are cases where dividends are paid that represent dividends for a series of years. A company has been in such a position that the money cannot be taken from it. The effect of this provision is to prevent a larger penalty being imposed on the shareholders. We have not sought to tax the shareholder on money that he has not actually received. Apart from this clause perhaps three or four years' income would be received in the one year.

Mr. FIELDING: Then it surely would come in the return for the next year if he actually received it?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No. Take the case of a company that are in the position of not being able to distribute earnings for three years. They had been making earnings each year, but they were not distributing them because they were required to keep the money in the business. Under this section, when the payment was made, the department would distribute those dividends over to the proper years when declared, although not paid because they could not afford to pay them. Apart from that section, when the money was received by the taxpayer, it would be part of his taxable income for that one year, and it would put him in the higher brackets as far as taxation is concerned. It may be that it is quite unfair that he should be put in the higher brackets because he has been at a loss in the other years. It would be unfair to place him in the higher brackets and the income should be considered as taxable in the year in which the dividend was declared though not paid.

Mr. FIELDING: I could understand that if you were dealing with the business profits tax there might be something to be said in support of the proposition, because you are dealing with the operations of a company for a given year. But surely on a question of dividends there is no room for debate that a man's income is that which he receives. If it is not collected, it remains to his credit and it may be paid to him next year. Suppose I were a shareholder in a company and I did not collect my dividend in a given year; I would get it next year, and if I were an honest man I would account for it next year. Surely income is that which a man receives, and if he does not get it in a certain year, there is no income.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have no feeling one way or the other. It means more money for the department to accept this suggestion and we want to get all the money we can.

If I can secure unanimous consent, I desire to move that the committee return to the consideration of clause 3, which has been agreed to.

Motion agreed to.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I beg to move to amend clause 3 by striking out the last three words of the said clause and substituting therefor the following words: "paid or distributed."

Mr. FIELDING: Will my hon. friend need this section at all? It seems to be specially designed to apply to income of the year that has passed. It appears to me that this clause is not necessary.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This is to make it clear.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I think the suggestion of the minister would cover the point I desire to draw attention to. I have known dividends to be declared that were not paid and were not allowed to be paid by the bank. The financial position of the company was such that the bank thought it was not desirable to withdraw the money, and therefore the dividends were not paid. That is the reason why the minister has thought it right to clear up that point, and it appears to me that the words he has suggested cover the case. I think it is quite proper that they should be inserted.

Mr. PEDLOW: Would it not be well to use the words "in that accounting period" instead of "in that year" in the last line of subsection 5?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That would not do.

Mr. PEDLOW: In connection with the sessional indemnity the accounting period of members of the House who are in business falls, say, in the first or second month rather than at the end of the month of December. This accounting period would run through each day until the 31st January, thus overlapping two years. The rule of the department is that the sessional indemnity should be included in the return for the year in which the return is made, but the indemnity has not yet been received by the taxpayer. In that case it is a hardship, because a member might send in a return of his taxable income to the 31st January and it might include his prospective sessional indemnity which he might never receive.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think that by far the greater number of cases are better served as we have it now. There are not many returns made in advance.

Mr. BELAND: I understand that the Canadian Pacific and the Government have come to an agreement as to a flat rate that is being paid by the company to the Government yearly, and that it accounts for all the taxes that should be paid by the shareholders of the company as income taxes. Does that agreement apply to other companies?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is no agreement. The Canadian Pacific pays on the basis of the statute.

Mr. BELAND: I understand the company pay $6,000,000 a year to the Government, is that correct?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No.

Mr. PEDLOW: I am sorry the minister failed to comprehend the force of my argument. To put the case in another way, take the situation last year; a man in business whose accounting period ended January 31 made up a statement for that accounting period and he included in his return his prospective indemnity of $2,500. But during that year there were two indemnities. Would he be penalized under this new Act for the omission of the two indemnities?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No.

Mr. PEDLOW: He received $5,000 for the year, but he could only know of one indemnity; consequently he would only include one indemnity in the return; therefore he would be sending in an incorrect return.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If a member makes up his return in advance in connection with his indemnity that, of course, is something we cannot object to because we want to examine returns that come in as quickly as possible. But the Act does not require him to. All the Act requires to be done is a return to be made on the income during the past year. He is not to take into consideration anything that may accrue to him in the future during any portion of the year in which he is making his return. You do have a little difficulty, though, in partnerships and mercantile businesses where the accounting periods differ, and there is an express provision of the Act dealing with that one particular thing:

> A member of a partnership or the proprietor of a business whose fiscal year is other than the calendar year shall make a return of his income from the business, for the fiscal year ending within the calendar year for which the return is being made, but his return of income derived from sources other than his business shall be made for the calendar year.

Mr. PEDLOW: This Bill leaves the matter in an indefinite shape. The person whose accounting period is not in line with the calendar year, is in the position if he has an indefinite income from another source, that he cannot include that in his return for the accounting period. I know that the department has rules—it has ruled in my own case—that the amount of the prospective indemnity must be included in the return for the year. Now it is impossible for men in the retail business to balance up their books for the year by December 31, and so come in complete alignment with the calendar year. Consequently they balance up their affairs on January 31 or February 31, as the case may be. Nevertheless they are required by the department to do as I have stated. From my own personal experience that has been insisted on.

Mr. SHEARD: Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question. He spoke of February 31; I would like to know to what year he refers?

Mr. PEDLOW: I meant to say January 31, or the last day of February.

Mr. SHEARD: That is putting it correctly.

Mr. PEDLOW: I thank the hon. member for correction, but my argument is not influenced by it to any great extent, the point is quite clear. I think there should be a definite ruling on the point even though the case may be an exceptional one. When a member of Parliament is required to include all his prospective income in his return there may be a thousand and one reasons which will militate against his receiving that income. For instance death might occur or Parliament might be dissolved. We know for example that in 1919 there were two sessions in the year. A member might include only his indemnity for the one session and then would be subject to a penalty, under the statute, for sending in a false return.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Of course generally all these taxation matters are expressed with more or less difficulty, and I admit that the subject is intricate to a greater or less extent. I think, however, that it is quite clear, from the section I have just read, what the real situation is. At any rate it has worked out very well in other countries where it has been in force for a good many years. Now let us be quite clear as to how matters stand. In the first instance, what is called for, ordinarily, is a return of income received during the year that is past.

Mr. PEDLOW: The accounting period.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Not the accounting period. Let us forget that for a moment. Under ordinary circumstances the return calls for the income received during the year that has passed, the preceding year. Now then as to where you have a broken accounting period. Take for example the case of a business whose accounting period ends on January 31, as the hon. gentleman pointed out. In the case of such a business it would be the duty of the manager of that business, in making his return, to include in it the actual receipts or the actual income of that business down to the 31st of January. Take for example this year: the ordinary taxpayer gives the whole of his income up to the end of 1919 in his return, and he makes that return in 1920. The manager of the business of the class I am referring to, instead of making a return for 1919 only, would base his return on the accounting period which ended the 31st January, 1920. I beg pardon, the Commissioner of Taxation tells me that I am wrong, too. I think that should be the case, myself, but I am told that the department, instead of doing that, go further in ease of the hon. gentleman than I would. All that you need do, according to what the commissioner says, is to make a return as of the 31st January, 1919. I think it should be the 31st January 1920, but apparently that is not the fact. Instead of having to make a return in advance, instead of running the danger of being fined,—as the hon. gentleman is pointing out—for an error in connection with something that may happen in the future, you are apparently allowed to go back as far as the 31st January of the year previous. The section apparently is quite clear, and the commissioner is right, for it says:

> —whose fiscal year is other than the calendar year shall make a return of his income from the business for the fiscal period ending within the calendar year for which the return is being made.

Now that ends in 1919.

Mr. PEDLOW: And what about anything outside of that?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: As to anything outside of the business he is in exactly the same position as any other taxpayer, he would have to pay on exactly what he received during the year.

Mr. PEDLOW: I still submit that it is confusing in connection with the accounting of any business to require any person in business to make two returns—one return for his business accounting period ending January 31 each year, and another return for income received outside that business. Take a specific illustration, my own case. My accounting period ends January 31 each year. I was compelled to send in a return for 1919, and I was also compelled to send in another return and include in the accounting period which ended January 31, 1919, my income of which the sessional indemnity formed part. The department insists upon that. My contention is that only what a man actually receives from all sources in the accounting period should be included. That is my argument.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: It appears to me that my hon. friend is contending about a point that is very clear in so far as the Government is concerned. The accounting period that the Government sets ends on the 31st December in each and every year. If the hon. gentleman's accounting period is January 31, he does not make the return for that year at all. The hon. gentleman will have the privilege of holding on to the funds for eleven months if his accounting period is the 31st January; but he must make his return for all the money he has received up to the 31st December. Suppose the Parliamentary session were on and he had received the indemnity for November and December he would have to make a return of that in his statement for the year. If the Parliamentary session were on and he received part of his indemnity for, say, November and December, he would have to make that in his return, but his indemnity for January, February, and March would appear in his statement for that year; in other words, he would split his indemnity into two parts. The same prinicple would be followed in regard to any other income, and anything received on the 2nd of January, although belonging to the previous year, would be included in the next year's return. I fought that out with the inspector, and it was ruled finally that my returns were correct because I included all moneys received up to the 31st of December.

Mr. PEDLOW: There is no ground for misunderstanding in that statement of the situation. But you do not understand the position I am placing before the House. Your accounting period ends on December 31, therefore—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. member should address his remarks to the Chair.

Mr. PEDLOW: I apologize, Mr. Chairman. My hon. friend is certainly in error in thinking that the two cases are parallel; they are altogether different; and that is where the difficulty occurs. There are many men in business whose accounting period does not end on December 31, and if placed in the position which I myself and many others are in, they will find a difficulty in complying with the ruling of the department. The department has ruled that it is necessary to include in the returns all that might be anticipated. I have had to fight out with the department.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If that is the only trouble, Mr. Chairman, I have much pleasure in assuring the hon. gentleman that it will not occur again. No taxpayer is called upon to anticipate anything in his return.

Mr. BUREAU: Except his bill.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It was a mistake made by the department.

Mr. PEDLOW: I am very glad to have that definite assurance from the minister, which settles my difficulty for all time to come. I can assure the hon. member for Cockshutt—

Mr. BUREAU: Hear, hear.

Mr. PEDLOW: I mean the hon. member for Brantford—

Mr. BUREAU: The hon. member for the Six Nations.

Mr. PEDLOW:—that it is not with the object of hanging on to the money for eleven months longer than I am entitled to that I raised the question; it is merely to have it squared away.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

On clause 4—income from an estate or accumulating in trust.

Mr. FIELDING: My hon. friend (Sir Henry Drayton) made a motion to amend this section by substituting—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: By substituting the words "paid or distributed" for the words "declared or voted."

4 p.m.

Mr. BUREAU: Why was this clause held back; what was the trouble.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It was held back because one hon. gentleman said the effect of the clause was to get something paid by some one who never benefited. It is quite clear that his anxiety was not well founded, because it is a tax against income in the hands of trustees and not in the hands of beneficiaries. What the section does is to cover accretions of income although not distributed.

Mr. DEVLIN: But the beneficiary must pay the tax as well as the fiduciary.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The hon. gentleman is quite right, if the income is distributed; but all we are dealing with here, Mr. Chairman, is undistributed income.

Section agreed to.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Before the Bill goes out of committee, Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. There is still clause 5 to be carried.

On clause 5—Patriotic and Red Cross funds.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is a clause in which the hon. member for London (Mr. Cronyn) is very much interested. As he is attending a committee of the House this afternoon, I do not think it would be fair that the clause should be considered in his absence. That is the only clause left for consideration.

The CHAIRMAN: The Bill might be reported and the clause struck out on the third reading.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Clause 16 has not yet been adopted, has it?

Mr. FIELDING: It was left with the understanding that the minister and the hon. member for London might be able to agree upon an amendment. I presume that has not yet been accomplished?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No.

Mr. FIELDING: It is not because they have differed; they have not had time to attend to it?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: He has made further suggestions which I have not yet had time to consider.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: The hon. member for London (Mr. Cronyn) will be here in a few minutes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The clause suggested by the hon. member for London is different to the clause which he submitted yesterday. I will ask the committee to bear with me while I place my hand on the suggested amendment.

The CHAIRMAN: While we are waiting, the hon. member for Charlevoix-Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) might take advantage of the opportunity to place his views before the committee.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I would like to draw the attention of the Minister of Finance to a certain matter which the hon. member for Chambly-Vercheres (Mr. Archambault) and myself referred to in the Budget debate; the taxing of earned and unearned incomes. At present under our law there is no difference in taxation depending on where the income comes from. In England I am told a distinction is drawn between incomes derived from real estate and securities and those which are earned and are absolutely extinguished on the death of the person earning them. For instance, a professional man as the manager or director of a big institution might take fifteen or twenty years to work up to an income of $15,000 or $20,000, which will immediately stop on his death, whereas the income from investments or real estate does not cease on the death of the owner, but inures to the benefit of the family. Has the minister considered the suggestion of distinguishing between the rates of taxation on earned and unearned incomes?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I took the question up some time ago when I first started to consider the income tax. I may say that my first impression was the same as the hon. gentleman's. A distinction is drawn in some countries. It is not drawn in the United States, nor in Australia nor in New Zealand as I recollect. It is drawn in part in Great Britain. There the income in the smaller amounts are distinguished, and the result is that income from investments is subject to a somewhat higher tax than other income, but the difference is not very great. The manner in which it applies in Great Britain is not exactly as I think the hon. gentleman would expect, because while it applies to the small, it does not apply to the large investor. For some reason, probably having regard to the cost, the value of money and the demand made on investors for money, the Parliament in the Mother Country make that difference only on incomes up to £2,000. I would have thought that it would be better to have it on the heavy incomes rather than on the small incomes. Nevertheless, I find that to be the fact in the Mother Country. On looking into the matter further, having regard to the fact that after all we in Canada require outside capital, new money, probably as much as any other country does, because we require to develop all our resources and our position is different from that of Great Britain where the resources are well developed and the necessity for new capital is not as great as it is in Canada, I came to the conclusion that it was better to follow the example given by other countries which were seeking development, such as Australia, New Zealand and the United States. Another reason was that we are losing a great deal of money on account of delays in getting returns for income taxes. We think we would get money in very much more quickly and save a great deal of interest if the people assessed themselves. If we were to have two scales of assessment, it would be almost hopeless to expect a proper return to be made by a ratepayer.

Mr. CASGRAIN: In view of the fact that it is not certain at present whether there is going to be any increase in the indemnity of members of Parliament or not, I should like to know if the Government has considered the matter of exempting the indemnities of members from taxation.

Mr. BELAND: That matter was discussed yesterday.

Mr. CASGRAIN: It was left in abeyance.

Mr. REID (Mackenzie): What is the maximum exemption in Great Britain?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If the hon. member will read the report made by the Royal Commission, I think he will find that they are going to raise the exemption somewhat. The former exemption, as I recollect it, was £130, and as soon as an income of £130 is reached, the income is liable to taxation.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): That was probably in war time. When I was familiar with what was going on in the Old Country, the exemption was £160.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes, the exemption of £130 was during the war. It is quite likely that the exemption will be put back to the pre-war figure.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Has the minister any information to give us regarding the exemption from taxation of indemnities of members?

Mr. BUREAU: I thought it was suggested that members should be allowed to deduct a per diem allowance to cover their expenses? An amendment would be necessary to the clause which says that the indemnity shall be taxable.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The matter is one which I hoped to be able to look after in administration of the department; but I find this addition was made, I think, in the Senate, to one of the Bills:

> In determining the income, no deduction shall be allowed in respect of personal living expenses, and in cases in which personal and living expenses form part of the gain, profit or remuneration of the taxpayer, the same shall be assessed as income for the purposes of this Act.

My personal view, as I frankly told the committee, was that, as members have to be something out of pocket in order to earn the indemnity and as this is intended as an indemnity, not as a salary, if it be an indemnity, a fair per diem allowance for expenses for the time hon. gentlemen are in Ottawa engaged in their parliamentary duties, ought to be given.

Mr. BUREAU: All right.

Mr. LEMIEUX: In order to be fair to the minister, I should like to say that the question of the indemnity was brought up a year or so ago in a moment of hysterics. The word "indemnity" itself suggests the idea that it has for object the recouping of expenses made in order to perform a certain duty. As my hon. friend very well said a moment ago, it is not a salary; it is not a fixed income; therefore it is not a revenue, and should not be taxed. But if it be so taxed, if we are such super-patriots that we must super-tax even our indemnity, then let us make an allowance for the expenses we have to incur in order to attend to our duties at Ottawa. There should be no false pride in the matter.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I should like to have a definite ruling from the minister on this point.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am afraid I cannot do anything more than quote the law as it now stands. This is a matter that could be dealt with only by an amendment.

Mr. CASGRAIN: So far, the department has asked that we pay on the amount of our indemnity, and we are not given any allowance or credit for the expenses we incur at Ottawa. If it be the intention of the minister to interpret the law in the way he suggests, we should have a decision of the matter now and an amendment inserted in the Bill.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The minister does not interpret the law. He is not the author; he regrets it.

Mr. BUREAU: Now is the time for an amendment.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: If the minister is able to give a decision, it is proper that it should be given now. I quite agree with my hon. friend across the way that an indemnity surely cannot be called such until the expenses incurred in connection with receiving it have been met. That takes, according to a man's spending power, anywhere from 25 to 50 per cent, sometimes 75 or 100 per cent. Therefore, a fair average might be struck, and I believe the minister is disposed to do that. But he says that the clause which he read does not leave any option in the matter. Without wishing to embarrass the minister at the moment, if this requires amendment—and I want to back him in this—I think if a modus operandi can be reached whereby a certain exemption may be made from the amount of the indemnity to cover what is spent by members while in Ottawa and while coming to and from Ottawa with all the other accessories in connection with our attendance here, that would be only a fair amount. I am not arguing for this for myself, because I can do without it, but I know that this tax is oppressing many members, and inasmuch as it is oppressing many members, it is a fair matter for consideration. I believe the intention in the first place was that the contention of my hon. friends across the way was to be the rule observed, and that the tax would fall only on such portion of the indemnity as we actually receive in hand after the work of the session was over. If a decision were arrived at in the matter, that would be very desirable.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would suggest that the consideration of this matter be left open until the third reading, when I will undertake to bring the matter up and advise hon. gentlemen what it is open to me to do under the circumstances.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—Patriotic and Red Cross funds.

Mr. CRONYN: Following the suggestion of my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) I endeavoured to draft a new paragraph (c) of subsection (1) of section 3, which I submitted yesterday to the minister. I am not aware whether it has received his approval, but I would like to read it. The effect is to amend clause 5 by adding thereto the following words:

and the following substituted therefor:—

Subject to such regulations as may be made by the minister, amounts paid by the taxpayer during the year to corporations organized and operated exclusively for hospitals, orphan asylums, and other charitable purposes, no part of the net earnings of which enures to the benefit of any private stockholder or individual, to an amount not in excess of ten per cent of the taxpayer's net income, as computed without any deduction being made therefrom under the provisions of this paragraph.

I would ask for leave to withdraw the amendment which I previously submitted and to move this one instead.

Previous amendment withdrawn.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Hon. members have long been accustomed to make contributions to good causes, in their own constituencies at least, and they should not be denied that privilege by reason of the operation of the income tax. But if a very large portion of our income is taken from us by taxation we may be denied the privilege of making charitable donations to various good causes. The intention of the Government, is, I am sure, not to prohibit contributions to charity on the part of hon. members or citizens generally who are charitably inclined, and the minister would be well advised to accept this amendment or a similar one—I am not tied to the words; I have it just now for the first time. The amount of income which may be so contributed has been set in the amendment at 10 per cent. That is a modest amount, because many persons give more than 10 per cent of their income to charitable causes. The effect of this amendment would be to enable citizens to continue their contributions to certain well-established charitable institutions in their own immediate neighbourhood. I personally have for many years taken a considerable interest in an orphanage. I shall not be able to continue to assist in that work if my income is considerably depleted by taxation, and these charitable institutions will suffer. The people generally should be encouraged rather than discouraged in this connection. There is no doubt that charity covers a multitude of sins.

Charity makes the giver feel better and happier. No money is better spent than that which is contributed to a good cause, the welfare of which the donor has at heart. I have much pleasure in seconding the motion.

Mr. EDWARDS: I appreciate the motive of my hon. friend (Mr. Cockshutt) in his advocacy of the amendment when he points out that charity covers a multitude of sins. His argument seems to amount to this: that those who are in a position to contribute to this or that institution shall exercise their judgment as to whether they shall give to that institution or whether they shall contribute by way of taxation to the revenue of the country. For my part, I do not think that any person should be allowed to deduct from his income that which he gives to charity or to any charitable institution and thus escape taxation on that amount. I hold that view just as strongly as some hon. gentlemen hold the other view. Certain taxes have to be raised in this country. Let those gentlemen who are blessed with considerable wealth and who are sensible of the enormity of their sins and transgressions, after paying their taxes, cover up the multitude of their sins by contributing to charitable purposes to such extent as they feel disposed.

Mr. NESBITT: The assisting of charitable institutions is not by any means confined to people of wealth. Charitable institutions may be generously assisted by wealthy persons, but as a rule they are largely maintained by persons of very moderate means, —maintained because it is absolutely necessary that they should be maintained.

Mr. BUREAU: Persons of small means and big hearts.

Mr. NESBITT: Quite so. I do not think we should be carried away with the idea that these institutions are entirely maintained by the rich. If charitable institutions are properly defined in the amendment I think it would be a good thing to allow amounts so contributed to be deducted from the net income for the purposes of taxation.

Mr. FIELDING: I am heartily in sympathy with the purpose of the amendment of my hon. friend (Mr. Cronyn), though I wonder whether he is wise in specifying hospitals and orphan asylums; whether a reference to charities generally would not be sufficient. Then, the minister is to make regulations; I assume that they would define what these charities should be.

[Mr. Cockshutt.]

In connection with the War Charities Act the Government had to accept the responsibility of determining what were war charities and what were not, so that the duty on the part of the Government of arriving at such a decision is not absolutely new. However, in its general purpose I cordially support the amendment of the hon. member for London.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): On this occasion I am absolutely in agreement with my hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards). Charity, to be worthy of commendation either in this world or in the other, ought to hurt the person giving it. If the State is to see that a man is carefully protected in connection with what he gives away, I cannot see where the charity comes in. A case of giving was discussed on one occasion by the Highest Authority. We were told that the rich out of their abundance gave, and they did not seem to receive much commendation. Then a widow came along who had only two mites; these two she gave and she was the one who received the praise. In order to make that gift she had to hurt herself; she had to scimp. I do not put myself up as a man who does it, but I do not want to talk buncombe or to listen to buncombe. I repeat that in my view the only charity that is worthy of commendation is charity that hurts. If it does not hurt it is not charity; it is that which is described, as I have just said, by the Highest Authority as giving out of our abundance.

I should be sorry to describe as charity on my part anything that was carefully protected from being taxed by the State. We are living in a period when we should realize something of what the world has been going through. We must be prepared as civilians to emulate to some extent the sacrifices of those who have given to the tune of 60,000 men all that they possessed and were—themselves. That is my view of the question and if it comes to a vote I shall have to take the same course as my hon. friend from Frontenac.

Mr. HALLADAY: This gives a loophole to some people who may not desire to pay their taxes. Some man might claim exemption on the strength of contributions, real or alleged, to the Red Cross or the Patriotic Fund or some other charitable institution. I am afraid that there are many people in Canada who would be ready to seek exemption and press their claim, because they had contributed to such funds as these.

Mr. RICHARDSON: My view is that if you adopt the amendment the taxpayer will be given the option of contributing to the State or contributing to charitable institutions. If the contributions could be limited in the future to the same proportion as existed in the past there might be some safety valve; but with my knowledge of human nature I think there would be a grave danger, if the amendment were adopted, that thousands of people, influenced by the idea of making themselves solid for the future might be disposed to cheat the State of their legitimate contributions to the public revenue.

Mr. SCOTT: In discussing this matter I see no reason why we should confuse the question of taxation with matters of charity. When it comes to paying other taxes than this particular one there is no consideration of charity. Why, therefore, should we make any distinction between the payment of income tax and municipal, provincial or any other taxes? When we are called upon to pay our municipal or provincial taxes we do not introduce the question of charity as a plea for exemption, and whatever we may see fit to give to charity has nothing to do with our duty so far as the payment of taxes is concerned. For my part, I see no reason at all why charity should be brought into this discussion, and I feel I must vote against the amendment.

Mr. WILSON (Saskatoon): I have had a good deal to do in soliciting subscriptions for one good cause and another in the country whenever charitable and benevolent institutions were being promoted or aided, and my experience has shown me that after all the bulk of assistance comes from those people whose income is exempt from taxation for the reason that it is small and barely sufficient for their needs. It is from such people that, to a great extent, contributions come for the upkeep of churches, charitable institutions, and other organizations that are supported by philanthropy; and if you grant this exemption to men whose income is large, you will be met with this argument, by those whose income is exempt from taxation: "John Jones has a larger income than mine and he is exempt on his charity, while I am not because I am exempt from income taxation." That is the argument that will be put forward by those whose income is below the exemption limit, and I think it would be unwise to accept this amendment.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have a great deal of sympathy with the objects of the hon. member for London (Mr. Cronyn), but so far I have been unable to see my way to accept the amendment. I look upon the matter, however, as one entirely for the committee, in whose hands I think it can safely be left. I do not desire to add anything except to make an observation or two. I want to be absolutely fair about the matter. It is not a question of the ratepayer electing whether he will contribute to the country or to charity, because the exemption is on the amount of taxable income, and no matter what a man may give to charity we exact taxation on his income which varies from 4 per cent, 6 per cent, 8 per cent up to 34 and 56 per cent in the higher registers. My objections to the amendment still stand. I am afraid of difficulty arising, not from charitable persons but from the man who does not like to pay taxes; and I do not think that in the majority of instances, or indeed in any instance, charity would derive any great assistance from a man of that class. We have all kinds of returns made and there is a great deal of checking that has to be done. Unfortunately, there are people who think it perfectly right to cheat in their income returns, just as there are those who cheat in passing the customs barrier, and if he adopted the motion we would only be giving further scope to such people. In the second place, I think we require all the revenue which we can derive.

Mr. FIELDING: I think it is a mistake to treat this as a question of exempting the individual. It is not a question of favouring the individual; the question is not, why this man should be exempt and another man not exempt. The real question is whether we are going to do something helpful or something injurious to the charitable institutions of the country. That, in my opinion, is the correct view of the question. We have not yet in Canada reached socialism, communism, nationalism or any of the other numerous "isms" that exist to-day. We still do a thousand and one things by individual effort in this country. There is a vast amount of good done in Canada every day through individual action. A great deal of charitable work is not done by governments, either provincial, municipal or dominion, but by individual effort on the part of the people; and unless we can encourage this individual effort, the charitable institutions of the country may suffer. I do not think it is worth while discussing the interests of the individual. We should not look upon the question as one of individual exemption, but we should certainly ask ourselves this question: Are we or are we not going to help those institutions which are doing so much good in the country? If the effect of the new taxation is to put a check on the outcome of generosity on the part of the people towards these institutions, then that is a fact well worthy of consideration. I am not pleading for the individual but I am saying a word for the thousand and one institutions throughout Canada which I think ought to be encouraged and which might probably be affected by this proposed taxation.

Mr. McGIBBON (Muskoka): I hope for the good of the country that this amendment will be voted down. After all, it boils itself down to this: This is a request from the wealth of this country to be exempted from taxation. I have nothing to say against them or what they have done but I want to say that some 400,000 or 500,000 men served for a good many years at a very low price and they are not coming here asking to be exempt from taxation. If the wealth of this country is going to fall down unless a certain amount is deducted from their taxation and if they are going to withhold their contributions to charitable institutions, so much the worse for the wealth of Canada. I do not believe they will do that, I do not believe they will ask for exemption and I do not believe the members of this House should exempt wealth when they are not exempting those who served the country at the front.

Mr. CRONYN: There are just one or two questions raised that I would like to make clear in regard to the wording of the amendment. It says: "Subject to such regulations as may be made by the minister." That is a phrase very commonly used in other taxation measures. In my mind it seemed that under that phrase the minister could make a regulation, for instance, that in the case of any gift to charity the receipt for that contribution must be attached to the return of the income so that there might be no possible question of fraud, as has been suggested. The addition of the words "hospitals, orphan asylums and other charitable purposes" is due to the suggestion of the parliamentary counsel that by using the introductory words you practically define what charitable institutions are under the well known legal rule. The minister then would have a definite line to determine what were and what were not charitable institutions. I believe that since the war among people of moderate incomes the practice of "giving till it hurts" has prevailed. I know that in our own city we had this year a general campaign for all charitable purposes and it was a pleasure to note that the man of medium income was giving in proportion far more than the wealthy man. Some of these men, in discussing at the time their subscriptions said: "We look at our budget carefully; we know what we have and what we can spare for purposes of this kind; this one campaign is to cover everything for this year; we are going to give every dollar we can but if we are called upon in addition to pay a tax on this subscription we must either deduct that tax from our subscription or we must cut off something else." Of course it may be said that it would be a fine thing to deny yourself some other need of living. I do think, however, that an amendment of this kind would result, whatever the motive, in a more hearty support of charitable institutions and I need not add now to what has been so well said by other hon. members on behalf of these charities.

Mr. McKENZIE: I fully agree with the statement of the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) and others who say this amendment should not be carried. The tax that anybody pays on his charitable givings is entirely too small to bother with. If a person is willing to give to charity I do not think he should be worrying about whether or not he is going to be exempt from the small amount of taxation that would be charged on that contribution to charity. I think it might well be left to the charitable instincts of the people of this country who support the institutions that must live by charity, I wish to state most emphatically that I am opposed as a matter of policy to any public institution being dependent on charity. That should not be the case. There are a great many very excellent institutions maintained by charity. In the province from which I come there is a hospital absolutely independent of charity. The provincial hospital is absolutely independent of charity. The support of the sanitarium in the province of Nova Scotia is entirely independent of charity. The best form of support for institutions of this kind is to tax the people in the proper way so that those who are in charge of institutions of this kind will never have reason to be afraid that sufficient money will not be raised for the maintenance of the institutions. Those who are dependent on these institutions and those who are running them will have no anxiety as to whether the money will be forthcoming for their maintenance. I am bound to vote for the minister's amendment and to oppose the amendment of my hon. friend from London.

Amendment (Mr. Cronyn) negatived on division.

Section agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the title carry?

Mr. DENIS: When this Bill becomes law the income war taxes of Canada will be embodied in four different statutes, the original statute and the three amending statutes that have followed from year to year. Is it the intention of the minister to have these four laws consolidated so that the public can understand them and lawyers may be able to study them in an intelligent and comprehensive way? Otherwise, as everybody knows, we would have to take the four laws and compile them ourselves in order to form an accurate opinion on the subject.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: A consolidation of the Acts may be brought about next year; it is not intended to do this year.

Section agreed to.

Mr. NICHOLSON (Algoma): Before the committee rises I would ask the minister whether any further consideration has been given to my suggestions with regard to the exemption of householders instead of married persons, and the taxation of a class of men throughout the country who are entirely escaping taxation on account of the inability of the department to reach them.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am very glad the hon. gentleman has drawn my attention to that fact. I wanted to see the hon. gentleman and some others in connection with the people that are escaping taxation. I shall therefore not move the third reading to-day, but merely that the Bill be reported.

Mr. CRERAR: There is a point to which I wish to invite the attention of the minister. I was unavoidably out of the Chamber when clause 10 was under consideration. Paragraph 7 of clause 10 provides that each person shall make his own assessment as to the amount of the tax, and paragraph 8 provides penalties for understating the true amount of the income. Now it occurs to me that an individual might, through ignorance or wrong interpretation of the law, make a return that was not correct, and still be in the best of good faith.

Mr. DENIS: I rise to a point of order. I understand that the hon. gentleman needs the unanimous consent of the committee in order to move the reconsideration of this section.

The CHAIRMAN: I did not ask that the committee give its unanimous consent to a return to the consideration of section 10. I intended to tell the hon. member that the clause has been amended in his absence by the addition of sub-paragraph 12. Was the hon. member aware of that?

Mr. CRERAR: That, Mr. Chairman, does not cover the point I have in mind. I am quite aware that the clause has been passed and that I have no right to again refer to it now. But I would like the unanimous consent of the committee to bring this point to the notice of the Finance Minister.

The CHAIRMAN: Is it the unanimous consent of the committee that the hon. member have leave to refer to clause 10 in order to ask a question?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I can assure the hon. member that the matter was considered in his absence; the point was brought up by several members. A person is not liable to penalties for anything he does not know. He is not liable for mistakes in his own assessment. He is liable if he makes a misrepresentation as to his income. He is liable to a direct penalty if he makes a mistake of over ten per cent in his income, and that is a penalty which is on the ascending scale. He knows about his income and nobody else does. He is not liable for errors in the assessment he makes on that income because that is something that any one may make errors in connection with. The penalty merely covers first the misstatement in connection with the income and that means the amount of his own income and not the tax; and second, where the man does not pay, according to the assessment that he himself has made, the amount that he ought to pay.

Mr. CRERAR: As I understand it the clause is at variance with the statement which the minister has just made. Paragraph 8 states:

> Any person liable to pay any tax or surtax under this Act who, in the return of the income liable to taxation, makes a return in which he states the income to be less than the true amount——shall be subject to the penalty.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is what I have just told the hon. member. It is the income not the tax. A person knows what his income is, or should.

Mr. CRERAR: He may not. He may not correctly interpret the provisions of the law and may not make the return correctly under the Act. I would suggest for the minister's consideration the insertion of the word "knowingly" in the third line of paragraph 8, so that the provision shall read, "in which he knowingly states."

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the clause carry?

Section agreed to, Bill reported with amendments, and amendments read the second time.

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT, 1915, AMENDMENT.

EXCISE TAX RESOLUTIONS CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE OF WAYS AND MEANS.

On motion of Sir Henry Drayton the House went into Committee of Ways and Means to consider the proposed resolution precedent to the amendment of the Special War Revenue Act, 1915. Mr. Boivin in the Chair:

Mr. FIELDING: I think we might well take these item by item, because the criticism applying to one item might not apply to all.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would suggest that the committee might take the resolution as read. No one can remember it all, and here it is in writing.

In introducing these resolutions I do not know that I need add very much to what I said in my Budget Speech, except this; that we invite the careful attention of the committee to these different items. The Government stands absolutely on the question of principle, that revenue is required, and can be got out of expenditures of the character designated; but in so far as the different items are concerned, the last word certainly has not been said in so far as some matters of value are concerned; indeed, some amendments will be proposed. What we desire is to have the assistance of a full and frank discussion, bearing always in mind that revenue is urgently required, and that these expenditures are, in the main at any rate, entirely of a character that can largely be resorted to as a source from which that revenue ought to be obtained.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): I thank the Minister of Finance for his invitation to hon. members to give him their assistance in connection with these very important resolutions. Before we discuss any of the items, I think in a departure of this immense importance and, so far as this country is concerned, immense novelty, a number of general considerations ought to be taken into account. Now, if I may say so without offence, I am very much impressed with the way in which my hon. friend the Minister of Finance has conducted his duties in this House. I understand—although I am not any longer in the secrets of my friends on the other side of the House—that there have been discussions regarding the filling of a possible vacancy in the leadership over there—

Mr. BUREAU: Hear, hear.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): —and if that is the case—of course, I do not want to pry into the secret at all because there is no vacancy at present and none seems likely in the immediate future—if that is the case, in racing parlance I would be inclined to "put a little money" on my hon. friend as a "dark horse" in the race. Therefore, it is with considerable confidence that I appeal to him on a preliminary matter. He did me the honour and courtesy of listening to what I said on the second reading, when I pointed out very clearly, supported by the strongest authority, that, in the first place, these taxes or imposts, or whatever they are, are not excise taxes at all. I would like to ask my hon. friend whether he has thought of the suggestion which I threw out in all courtesy, that before we go any further he should re-christen these taxes? I supported myself by authority, which I do not want to quote until I hear what the minister has to say on the subject. But I do hope he will get himself further into my good graces by agreeing to my suggestion and re-christen these taxes at once, for they are not "excise" taxes.

Mr. LAPOINTE: What name would the hon. gentleman give to them?

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): The baby is not mine.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): Pardon me. I should like an answer from my hon. friend the Minister of Finance to what is a very courteous question.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am afraid, Mr. Chairman, that I have been more concerned with trying to raise the money in the way in which it would perhaps do the least amount of harm and from the class that can most easily pay it, rather than to finally determine just exactly what those taxes ought to be called. I am of the view, in so far as their name is concerned, that I would pay, and do pay, a great deal of attention to what my hon. friend from Red Deer has to say. I realize that he knows much more about the names of taxes and the general system of political economy than I do. I am inclined to think therefore that probably I will be better able to answer my hon. friend's question when these taxes are better understood after the helpful discussion which I am sure the whole subject will receive at the hands of this committee.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): Mr. Chairman, I must go a little further in this question, and I shall end, if I have only the support of a seconder, by moving an amendment. These taxes, I repeat, are not "excise" taxes—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer):—and I think it is discreditable to the Government, to this House and to the country
5 p.m. that it should go forth to the world that we do not know what excise taxes are and that we allow this thing to sail under a name which it has no right to bear.

I quoted unimpeachable authority on the question, including Webster's Dictionary.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): Of course, I can understand a certain proportion of my hon. friends opposite not having regard to any such authority, but I cannot understand my hon. friend the Minister of Finance not having regard to it. Webster's Dictionary says:

> An excise duty is an inland duty or impost laid on articles produced and consumed in a country.

Does my hon. friend pretend for a moment that that definition applies to these taxes to be collected under the schedule as it reads now? As these taxes stand at the present moment a man goes into a retail shop to buy an article, and if it exceeds a certain price he is held up at the point of a revolver and made to pay a tax to the retailer, who for the purpose is appointed, willy-nilly, a tax collector by the Government, and has to pay a license for the honour. That is not an excise duty. I would reinforce myself further by an authority which ought also to carry very great weight with any one dealing with taxes. The Encyclopaedia Britannica defines an excise duty as:

> A duty charged on home goods either in the process of their manufacture or before they are sold to home consumers.

The essential feature in the first place about an excise duty is that it can be levied only on home goods. There is no pretence that that is so in the case of these particular duties. I protest for the honour of Parliament and the government of the country that we should call these things by a name which they would reasonably bear. They are not excise duties, and no member of the Government can prove that they are. My hon. friend (Sir Henry Drayton) has just spoken on the subject, but he has given us no enlightenment. After I spoke on the second reading, two of the ablest debaters in the Government spoke,—the President of the Council (Mr. Rowell) did not refer to the matter at all; the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen), after parodying my definition of an excise duty immediately turned to me and said: "Is that the kind of duty that my hon. friend from Red Deer would put on? Then, there would not be many suits of clothes made in Canada." If my hon. friend were in his place, I should reply to him by saying that he knew very well that it was not the kind of tax that I would impose, and in the second place I should reply to him by saying that the kind of tax that I would impose in the country has nothing whatsoever to do with the true meaning of the words "excise duties." May I add that in the intellectual sphere I have as much respect for a quibbling sophism of that nature as I have for a mosquito in the domain of nature? The point in debate at that time was what was an excise duty according to the well-accepted meaning of the English language. This Government, by Orders in Council and otherwise, living beyond its mandate, as I believe, has done a number of wonderful things; but it has not yet the power to change the meaning of the English language, and it should recede from the attempt. My proposition is made in very good faith. I gave some illustrations, and I do not want to extend the remarks I made on the second reading further, although what I am saying is absolutely apposite to the point under debate or the chairman would, I know, be on my track. I want to submit in the most emphatic language that I can use that a majority of 26 for a Government which was elected less than three years ago by a majority of 70, is a very precarious and fragile instrument to stand behind these taxes, but it is a much more precarious and fragile instrument to upset the well-established findings of Webster's Dictionary and the Encyclopaedia Britannica.

Mr. SHEARD: I rise to a point of order. The hon. member's remarks have nothing whatever to do with the subject of the resolution.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): On the point of order, I may say that the first words in the resolution are "excise duties," and I have not been discussing anything else.

Mr. SHEARD: I contend that a review of the majority of the Government on the vote on the general principles of the Budget or a discussion of a question of terminology is not in order to be discussed on this resolution.

Mr. VIEN: It is incidental.

The CHAIRMAN: The point or order, as I understand it, is that the hon. member for Red Deer is at the present time reviewing the entire Budget debate. I would not so judge. I think the hon. member for Red Deer is perfectly justified in putting forward any argument which he may desire to submit in an endeavour to convince the committee that it should change certain words which he finds in the resolution. I, therefore, must decide that the point or order is not well taken.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): I most carefully guarded myself from using a single sentence which would come under your censure, Sir, and the point of order was all the less necessary because I had almost finished what I had to say. I have quoted unimpeachable authority to prove, and I have proved that these are not excise duties. You may call them trade imposts. You may call them "borrowings from the United States," and very bad imitations they are, because they go much further than they do in the United States. I called them "internal tariffs," but what they really are is "sales taxes." They are taxes on men who dare to make purchases along certain lines. I have proved that they are not excise duties, and I defy any member of the Government to upset my proof, unless, indeed, they are imbued to an extent that I do not believe they are, with the spirit of the description that was given of the Centurion of old. The Centurion described himself in this way. He said: "I also am a man under authority; having soldiers under me; and I say to this man, Go, and he goeth and to another: Come, and he cometh." But I submit to my right hon. friend (Sir Robert Borden) and to the members of that Government with him, for all of whom they know that I have personally a great deal of respect, that though they have done a good deal of saying "Come" and saying "Go," they should not prematurely, without due thought, say, "Go," to the English language accompanied by Webster's Dictionary and the Encyclopædia Britannica.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to supplement what the hon. member (Mr. M. Clark) has said about the advisability of using exact terminology in respect to taxation at a time when a variety of taxes are about to be considered.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): If I may intervene, I omitted to move my amendment. I move to amend this resolution by substituting the words "sales taxes" for the words "excise taxes" wherever the said words appear in the said resolution.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think it would be well, in considering the amendment, to have before us as many authorities as it is possible to cite on such an important matter. The hon. member has given very substantial authorities in support of his contention that the word "excise" is not rightly applicable to this particular form of tax. If there be one authority above another that is assumed to be reliable on matters of political economy, it is Palgrave's "Dictionary of Political Economy," and I have in my hand the volume which contains a chapter referring to the excise. I shall not recite the entire article, but the first paragraph of it is clear and explicit and, I think, will form a strong argument in support of the amendment. The definition of the excise, according to Palgrave's Dictionary of Political Economy, page 786, is as follows:

> The excise is the name given collectively to those duties which in the fiscal system of the United Kingdom are levied upon commodities produced within the kingdom itself, as distinguished from customs duties which are levied at the ports upon commodities imported from abroad. The word excise (latin excido) signifies etymologically something cut off; as an excise duty may in effect be considered something cut off or deducted, for the benefit of the State, from the price of the article as paid by the consumer. If there were no duty the consumer would pay a lower price for the article. The price, therefore, that he actually pays includes the duty; whence it follows that the duty itself is something deducted or subtracted from the actual price paid. The price in fact is divided into two parts, one part being subtracted from the whole for the benefit of the State, and the remainder going to the vendor.

Duties of this character, whether levied on articles produced at home or imported from abroad, were at first equally known as excise duties, but in revenue parlance the word has long been restricted to duties on native commodities, those on foreign articles being known as the customs.

Then the article goes on to state:

An excise duty properly so-called belongs to the category of indirect taxes.

This tax is certainly a direct tax, not an indirect one, and in that regard, the word "excise" should not be used. Clearly the authorities on political economy generally are at one in agreeing that the word "excise" is used in contrast with the word "customs" to distinguish duties on articles produced at home from those on articles imported. I think that Parliament would do well, in its terminology as well as in its legislation, to follow a well established precedent so far as it is wise to do so.

Mr. EDWARDS: So much a gallon is collected on brandy or whiskey; would my hon. friend not consider that impost as coming under the definition of excise?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the article were manufactured in Canada, it would be excise duty; if imported, it would be customs duty.

Mr. EDWARDS: I hold the same veiw that my hon. friend does in regard to the application of the word "excise" to liquors manufactured in Canada. Manifestly, then, the amendment of the member for Red Deer must be wrong, in part at least, because he would eliminate the use of the word in its application to those very things that the leader of the Opposition says it may be correctly applied to.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is the title that is in part wrong.

Mr. EDWARDS: The amendment would seem to be wrong; we should say "excise and sales tax."

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): The title I suggest would be a true and accurate title, whether it applied to home produce or to foreign produce.

Mr. ANDERSON: The title of this particular clause which we are now considering is "excise and sales taxes."

Mr. LOGGIE: Nearly all the goods enumerated in this schedule are domestic made goods. I venture to say that not one per cent of the boots and shoes used in Canada are imported goods. Practically the same applies to hats, men's and boys'; caps, men's and boys'; hose or stockings, silk; neckties and neckwear. In Toronto a few days ago I bought fifty dozen men's neckties, domestic made goods, none of them sufficiently high in price to come under this provision.

Mr. FIELDING: If all the goods numerated were domestic made, my hon. friend's argument would hold good, but if some are not, clearly his argument fails. If these things are all home-made, "excise" is the proper word, but to apply the word "excise" to imported goods is incorrect. "A rose by any other name would smell as sweet." What the minister wants is to get his money, and, with certain limitations, I would like to help him get it. But the use of the word "excise" is unhappy. The view taken by the hon. member for Red Deer is, in my judgment, sound, and should be sustained.

Mr. PEDLOW: These taxes will be no sweeter and no pleasanter to the person who has to pay them simply because of their being designated in any particular way. My suggestion would be to call this a commodity tax. That expression would have general application and would, I think, meet the situation admirably.

Mr. BELAND: Does my hon. friend consider that whiskey is a commodity?

Mr. PEDLOW: Yes.

Mr. BUREAU: No, it is a convenience.

Mr. PEDLOW: It depends on the brand that the hon. member uses.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am sorry that what is evidently considered by some as an unfortunate use of words on my part has led to all this difficulty. My idea, though, is probably the idea of most of the people who are going to be hit by these taxes.

An hon. MEMBER: "Hit" is right.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes, we are hitting them; we have to hit them. We have to make a lot of the people understand that the war has to be paid for, just as it had to be won. We have on the one hand the customs taxes—the tariff, which a great many people object to—and, on the other hand, excise duties; that has been the rough and ready division into which taxes in Canada have fallen. It is true that many definitions may be given of the word "excise." I notice that my hon. friend (Mr. M. Clark) relies upon an American dictionary for his definition. I also notice that the American authorities use the same designation in dealing with the same sort of things. But this American dictionary rather leaves the matter open. It defines excise, first, as "any commodity, toll or tax"; second, as "an inland duty or impost levied upon the manufacture, sale or consumption of commodities within the country." On the authority referred to by my hon. friend (Mr. M. Clark), therefore, we can say that an excise taxe is an inland duty or impost levied upon the manufacture,—that is one thing—and upon the sale, —that is another thing—no matter where the article comes from.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): Does it say that?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is what I am saying. The definition does not restrict the application of the word to a duty or impost on the sale of an article manufactured within the country. It is a broad tax. It is a tax upon pursuits; upon the following of certain kinds of sports; upon certain trades. Some people will say that these taxes are a tax on certain trades; that it makes people engaged in certain trades act as collectors of public revenue and enforces upon them an obligation to which they were not subjected before. So that the authority referred to by my hon. friend shows that the use of the word "excise" as it is here used is a proper use. It is also a word which can be used in regard to license tax; exactions for licenses can be termed excise taxes.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): You would not import licenses.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is true, but I do not think that that has very much to do with the question. Further than that, it is a tax:

> —applied to duties or fees levied upon makers of, or dealers in, excisable commodities, and finally to various taxes levied for permission to practise or conduct certain sports, trades, occupations, etc.

The English authority, the Imperial dictionary, goes further in support of my hon. friend's proposition than does the American dictionary on which he relies. The Imperial dictionary says:

> An inland tax or duty imposed on certain commodities of home production and consumption, as malt spirits, etc.

But in England it covers many other things. It covers all kinds of taxes that are really interior taxes as against customs taxes. For example, it covers the right to keep dogs, to carry a gun, and to deal in certain commodities. The fact of the matter is that so far as custom is concerned, not only in Canada but also in England, the word "excise" is loosely used to describe any kind of tax that is not a customs tax, and I should have thought this a rather happy word for this particular tax. After all, as my hon. friend points out, "excise" means something cut off, and I am not sure that it is not a good name for this tax.

Mr. FIELDING: I do not attach as much importance to this matter as some other hon. members, but it is worth while to be right about it. My hon. friend in quoting the authorities appears to raise a possible conflict between the English and the American dictionaries. He gets a little comfort from the American authority, but I want to warn him that there are certain well known reasons why we cannot afford to deal with Americans. I do not want to repeat those reasons, and if there is a choice we had better take the English authority. The authority quoted by the leader of the Opposition distinctly shows that an "excise" tax is so called to distinguish it from "customs" tax. But I want to set aside both the American and the English authorities and choose one that is better than they, and that is, a Canadian authority. We have had a practice of our own. We know in Canada what "excise" and "customs" mean; they mean two distinct things, and if you want evidence of it, my hon. friend has a document for which he is responsible and which will be helpful. If he will take up his Estimates he will find that we have one branch of the public servic which is known as excise and another branch known as customs. That has been the distinction all through the history of Canada. It is a distinction we all understand, and inasmuch as it is familiar to all Canadians and has always been followed in this country, we might safely put aside the English and the American authorities and follow the Canadian example. I think the point raised by the hon. member for Red Deer is well taken. While I do not attach the utmost importance to the matter—no matter what we call the tax it will be just as disagreeable—at the same time, it is just as well that we should be right. We cannot help if we find years afterwards that our statutes have been wrongly translated, but in this matter we might very well be right at the outset.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I entirely concur in the opinion of the hon. member (Mr. Fielding) that people who must pay the tax will not lie awake at night because of anxiety as to what we call it. It may be perfectly true that the political economists of the United Kingdom have use the word "excise" in a restricted sense, but it by no means follows that such has been the case on this continent. In fact, I hold under my hand a definition of the word excise by a high legal authority in the United States—I am referring to Mr. Bouvier's work—in which he defines the word excise in a wide sense. There is no restriction at all as to its application to goods that are produced in the country. And after all why should there be? If Parliament in its wisdom sees fit to impose a tax, which you may call a commodity or a sales tax or an excise tax, upon all goods produced in Canada when offered for sale, and upon all goods imported into Canada when offered for sale, is any great violence thereby done to the English language? I might quote what my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's has said, that the Canadian authority is best of all; and if the Parliament of Canada in its wisdom sees fit to enact that a tax upon goods sold in this country, whether produced in the country or brought into the country, having paid duties upon importation, shall be called an excise tax, I really do not think that ony one, however much interested he may be in preserving the purity of the English language, could take exception to that course.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): I am always impressed by an argument on the part of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, and I also appreciate the ability of the Minister of Finance; but I cannot agree with the statement that this matter is not one of importance to the people. The thing that we have to bring home to the people is the fact that these are new taxes, and they should have a new name. We want the people to understand exactly what the Government is doing, and I think there is importance in that. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance said just now that we must bring it home to the people that they have to pay the money. I quite agree with him, and I have expressed that opinion again and again; but I would bring that fact home most severely to the people who have the most money, and when we turn round and take the other course I want the people to understand what it is that is being done. Now, my right hon. friend the Prime Minister says that no great violence is done to the English language if the Parliament of Canada enacts that this shall be called an excise tax. That was the precise point; what he stated as the Act of the Canadian Parliament in altering the meaning of English words. I cannot describe the proposition as other than one which is startling and takes my breath away. It is not the function of this Parliament to alter the meaning of simple English words. That is all the answer I really need to make to my right hon. friend. It is not the function of this Parliament and still less is it the function of this Government. I question if they have a mandate to govern—indeed the recent by-elections have shown that they have not—but certainly they have no mandate to alter the meaning of simple English words.

In regard to the speech of the hon. the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) —he has come very recently to the study of the dictionary and he was interpreting his definitions as he went along. I am sorry for his own reputation that he stopped to emphasize the word "sold" in one sentence that he read. The sentence referred to articles "manufactured and sold in Canada." He says—mark this—"sold" as well as "manufactured." Is it not apparent to a third form school boy that the word "sold" refers to articles which have been manufactured and therefore to those which have been manufactured and sold within Canada? The whole sentence refers to the same set of articles. I can only classify his interpretation as I classified an argument from another source a short time ago. Clearly and manifestly the sentence refers to an article "manufactured and sold" in Canada. The Minister of Finance says that the word "excise" is loosely used. There is no possible justification for that statement. The word has been precisely used for a century. When the hon. gentleman says that I based myself on dictionaries it is only because I was dealing with one who was new to financial subjects, and I fortified myself with dictionaries. I had to give him what its meaning was from the knowledge I had possessed from my school days.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): I care nothing about these exclamations from hon. gents; there is the result of knowledge, the result of a hundred years of practice in the Old Country and at times my hon. friends opposite accept precedents from the Old Country readily enough. The word has had a precise meaning. It applies in every case to something that this country produces, manufactures and sells—to articles or commodities offered for sale. It is applicable only to articles produced and sold in the country. It is not a loose word it is a precise word having a meaning a century old and I contend that the arguments of my right hon. friend and of my hon. friend have done nothing whatever to weaken the position I have taken.

What is the objection? Is the term "sales tax" not a precise description of what my hon. friends are doing? Is it not perfectly precise? Is it not perfectly accurate to say that if we want to do a new thing in this country we are doing it by introducing this tax? It would be perfectly natural to do a new thing but in so far as describing new taxes are concerned, you would not alter the meaning of the words "sales" or "tax" if you applied these expressions to these things. When you apply the word "excise," whether it is a duty or a tax, to this sales tax you are doing violence to the English language, you are doing violence to the practice of financiers on both sides of the Atlantic and you are doing violence to the history of your own country. I do not need to pursue the argument.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The hon. gentleman says I am doing violence to the history of the country. Why, I am following what the hon. gentleman supported in this Parliament. I am following the language that he used as a supporter of the Government, and a prominent supporter of the Government, in 1918. I am following the legislation which was passed then. The legislation of this year is but an extension of what was done then. There is no difference in principle. Take for example what was done in connection with automobiles and jewelry, where the hon. gentleman is dealing with an imported article directly, where he is dealing with a home article directly and where in reference to both of them the excise tax is precisely the same. Where the article is imported such war excise tax would be paid by the importer and where the article is manufactured and sold such war excise tax would be paid by the manufacturer. I am following just what this Parliament has done and the manner in which this Parliament has described a similar tax.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think this matter might be considered apart altogether from the question of authority and in relation primarily to what will be of greatest convenience to the public in studying and understanding fiscal matters. One may admit that authorities differ. I think, notwithstanding, the authorities quoted this afternoon are pretty well agreed that the distinction of importance is between customs and excise. The point I should like to make is that in future financial discussions we will have occasion to consider what revenue is being derived from customs, what revenue is being derived from excise, as we have used that term heretofore, and what revenue is being derived from the taxes that are now being imposed for the first time. Without some such separate classification, I am sure my hon. friend (Sir Henry Drayton) will find it difficult to make necessary distinctions clear to the House when he speaks of revenues derived from excise duties as the term has been used heretofore and revenues derived from excise as that term is being used in reference to this sales tax. If words have any use at all it is simply as vehicles for conveying thought and ideas from one mind to another. I would submit to my hon. friend that he will be conveniencing the public and every public speaker in endeavouring to interpret these taxes to a public audience by using words that have a common acceptation without any further definition of them. One hon. gentleman has suggested the words "commodity tax." That would seem to be a general and descriptive phrase by which the meaning could be easily and quickly grasped. When one uses the word "excise" the public mind is going to think of the word " excise " as it has hitherto been used as applied to existing excise duties. If the words " sales tax" were used, the public mind would not suffer confusion when this particular tax is under consideration. I think it will save confusion in the future and make for a clearer comprehension of important differences, if the suggestions made are considered in a broad light and not from the point of view of what position has been taken by one side as opposed to the other.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie King) seems to overlook the fact that we have already given parliamentary recognition to the word "excise" in the sense which it is proposed here. By section 19 of chapter 46 of the Acts of 1918 the word "excise" was simply and unequivocally defined, as a duty levied not only upon articles manufactured in Canada but upon articles imported into Canada and put into consumption.

If we propose to depart from that use of the word now we ought to go back and amend the statute of 1918 in which the word, as I have stated, was most distinctly used in the sense now attached to it in the resolution. I repeat once more that I cannot conceive, nor have I heard of any detriment to the public interest from the use of the word in that sense in 1918, and equally I believe no detriment to the public interest can result from the same use of the word in the legislation now proposed by the Minister of Finance. Customs duties are one thing. Excise duties, whether levied on goods produced in Canada or on goods imported into Canada after the customs duty has been paid, are perfectly plain, perfectly distinct, and this use of the word need arouse no criticism whatever in the mind of any person.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: A point to be borne in mind in regard to the matter to which reference has just been made is that these duties, whenever they have been collected by the State, have been collected—whether on imported articles or on articles produced at home—from the importer or manufacturer, or the producer; they have not been collected direct from the consumer. They have not been an extra tax levied upon the consumer which he, through the importer or the merchant, has transferred to the State. There is a real distinction between the method of collection of taxation we have heretofore spoken of as in the form of excise and the method of collection of the taxation that is being proposed at the present time; and if there is a distinction as wide as that it would seem, if terminology can assist us in making the distinction clear, that advantage should be taken of it.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: It appears to me that a very large amount of fuss is being made about a very small matter.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: My hon. friend from Red Deer is particularly exercised with regard to the words "excise duty," and he says we are really setting aside the English language in using them here. Now the hon. gentleman himself was not so careful in the use of language as applied to these particular articles in his speech during the Budget debate, if my memory serves me rightly. I would like to ask my hon. friend if he can recall the word that he applied to these taxes during his speech on the Budget? Mr. Chairman, he applied the word "tariff" to these taxes, and that is what he is trying to clear the ground for at the present moment; he wants to bring in the word "tariff" a little later on. My hon. friend stated in his Budget Speech, if my memory serves me correctly, that this was not a luxury tax, that it was not a sales tax, but an addition to the tariff. I think I am right in that; I do not wish to ascribe to my hon. friend anything that he did not say. My recollection is that he stated it was an addition to the tariff and should be so characterized. Now whether the tax is an excise or not it is properly designated in the speech of the Minister of Finance as it has been reprinted and distributed. The heading of that speech is, "Excise and Sales Tax." Whether or not the designation should have been repeated in each particular case I will not say. I think perhaps the minister would have been well advised to have done so because there is something in my hon. friend's contention, and we do not want to have in operation a mis-named tax. However, the heading upon the speech is, "Excise and Sales Tax," which evidently pleases my hon. friend. Therefore it is apparent that whatever in the resolution is not an excise tax—and it is admitted there are some excise taxes in it—is a sales tax, and there you have the whole thing. Now if the minister would repeat the designation in every case that is apparently all that is needed; and apparently all the difference between the two hon. gentlemen, as far as I can see, is that the heading of these articles is "Excise and Sales Tax" and therefore in the resolutions themselves those words should have been repeated to have been absolutely accurate. But surely my hon. friend is not going to condemn the whole thing simply because of the insistence upon a name which when used is living up to the economic theories of Adam Smith, Cobden and Bright, and all those great economists of the past who were great authorities on taxation as well as language, and on language as well as taxation. There is no reason, Mr. Chairman, why any fuss should be made about this characterization. There are a great many more important things connected with this matter than the mere name. Of course there is smething in a name, especially if it is a bad name. The tariff, with my hon. friend, is a very bad name. Therefore he wants to attach these luxury taxes to the tariff and then condemn them from the start in common with all free traders; but he cannot by any process of reasoning add these taxes to the tariff or make out that they increase the tariff, so far as I can understand the English language. I think if the minister simply employs the words that are printed at the head of his speech in connection with these resolutions I am sure that my hon. friend from Red Deer, who is at all times most reasonable, would not kick about a matter so small as this when at the same time he is getting in use his words "Sales Tax" and the minister is using the words, "Excise Tax." Then all parties will be satisfied for it will be apparent that what is not covered by the word, "excise" is covered by the word, "sales."

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): I have only a word or two to say if I may reply to my hon. friend's speech with three-quarters of which I agree entirely. When he described me as saying that this was in its nature an internal tariff I absolutely agree—he quotes me accurately. The reason I figure that this in its nature is an internal tariff is that just as an external tariff takes so much money out of the consumer's pocket when levied—levied at the sea-shore so this tax takes so much out of the consumer's pocket when applied inland. If something is taken out of my pocket,whether at the seashore or inland, I can assure my hon. friend I am so constituted that in the nature of things I cannot see the difference in the two operations—I am hurt in the same place. I am perfectly agreed as to his accuracy in quoting me, and I am still convinced of the correctness of my views as to what would be an accurate description of the real nature of this tariff.

Now my hon. friend and another hon. gentleman behind him have referred to the editorial heading of the speech of the Minister of Finance. Well, I am sure the minister will not attach so much importance to the heading of his speech that he would want that to set the seal upon the discussion we are having at the present moment. Where I differ from my hon. friend from Brantford is in this: He says these duties may be classified as excise and sales taxes. Now what I do most emphatically wish to point out to my hon. friend is, that as there are excise taxes and as there are sales taxes it is really rather a foolish procedure to apply the term "Excise Taxes" to what are "Sales Taxes." So that he really made a very strong speech in support of my amendment. I only asked very modestly that the words "excise duties" or "excise taxes" should be changed for "sales taxes" in the resolution which we are now considering, if the tax on clothing, and other commodities mentioned therein is to be collected by the vendor at the time of sale. So that I submit to my hon. friend—for whose intelligence I have as much respect as he has for my reasonableness — that if there are both excise duties, or excise taxes, and sales taxes, in these resolutions, as the first resolution refers only to the sales taxes then let us call them sales taxes and not excise taxes.

Amendment of Mr. Clark (Red Deer) negatived: Yeas, 39; nays, 66.

At Six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess.

The committee resumed at Eight o'clock, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN When the committee rose at six o'clock we were considering resolutions to amend the special War Revenue Act, 1915.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): May I call attention to the fact that the minister in charge of these resolutions is not in his seat?

The CHAIRMAN: The minister is in the Chamber.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have left my seat for a moment.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): I am glad to see the minister has joined the right side of the House.

Mr. NICHOLSON (Algoma): I should like to say a word or two with regard to the method of collection of these taxes. In the main, under the provisions of the resolutions as submitted to the committee, the taxes are to be collected by the retail merchant at the time of sale to the ultimate consumer. While having in mind the question of bringing home to the ultimate taxpayer just what these taxes are going to mean to him, and while there is doubtless something to be said for that argument, nevertheless I think the principle contained in thes eresolutions as to the manner in which the taxes are to be collected is going to bring about an almost impossible situation. I take it for granted that the aim of the Minister of Finance is to secure revenue, and my judgment, after considering the matter with some degree of care, is that the minister, by collecting in the method that is suggested to the committee at the present moment, is not going to get the revenue that these taxes should produce. There are many reasons for that. So many individual transactions have to be covered in securing a definite sum of money that, in the first place, it will be almost impossible to keep a record of the transactions. In the second place, where there happens to be a man who is in business for himself or employing those who may not want to follow this method of taxation honestly, a means is opened up for defeating the very object of the tax and creating, if I may use the term, almost a generation of that class of people who always like to "beat the Government" if they can. During the past two weeks I took the trouble to inquire closely what this means as regards the work involved on the retailer. I may say at once that I am not in the retail business, and the suggestion I have to make before I sit down, if it hits at any one, will hit at the class of people with whom I happen to be associated. I took what I think would be recognized as a not-above-the-average retailer, a man doing a retail business in a town of 3,000 people where there are seven other retail stores. I found that in one day's business, that man had 807 sales' slips, charge and cash sales, involving sums all the way from one cent up. Of those 807 sales' slips, approximately 100 were for sales that would come under the resolutions and for goods that would be taxable. I submit in the first place that if the department are going adequately to check the sales to see that the taxes are properly collected, they would require to check the whole 807 sales. I reduced this as nearly as I could to figures in order to see what this meant for the whole Dominion of Canada. There are upwards of 200,000 retailers in business in Canada; and assuming that this man is an average retailer, and assuming that you could get accountants to check these slips at the rate of 10 a minute, it would take 8,000 people working seven hours a day continuously to do nothing but check the slips, provided that all the slips are checked—and if the department are going to see that all the sales that should be taxed are taxed then every sales' slip, whether cash or credit, should be checked. But if we reduce this simply to 100 sales in that particular man's case, it would still take 1,000 people to check all the sales' slips of all the retailers in Canada. When that retailer to whom I have referred comes to make out his monthly statement to the department, the statement that he must make out will cover 43 sheets of foolscap paper. If you multiply that by 200,000, you will find the volume of returns that the department will have to check in order to get this sum of money. Besides all this, you, are imposing on the retailer a burden that he should not be compelled to carry. You are putting him in a position in which it is not fair to put any class of man, in relation not only to his customers, but to carrying on his business. I do not wish to weary the committee by going into any more of these details. After carefully reviewing the whole situation and discussing it with men who are themselves anxious to assist in working out some practical method of getting the additional revenue the country must have, I have come to the conclusion that this is an almost impossible method of collecting this tax. The suggestion I have to pass on to the Government and to the minister is this, that after having modified the details of these taxes, as I have no doubt they will be modified in relation to some of the articles, they should then collect the tax on the specific goods that it is finally determined shall be taxed, at the point of manufacture of the finished article and at the point of importation of the finished article. That method can be worked out so that the department will have an infinitely smaller number of transactions to deal with; they will get more revenue, and they will relieve a deserving class of people in this country of a burden that, I think, should not be imposed upon them. I am not at the moment going to move any amendment; I pass this on simply as a suggestion, and I trust the Government and the Minister of Finance will take it into their very serious consideration.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): I am very glad my hon. friend (Mr. Nicholson, Algoma) has raised a question which must have been in the minds of every hon. member who has given serious attention to these taxes, the question of the machinery for the collection of these taxes. It is a most important question. We have, in effect, in power in this country at the present time a Cabinet of lawyers. I wish the Government had in their ranks one or two business men such as the hon. member who has just spoken; because they would have saved the Government from getting into trouble such as they have got into. I have listened with the utmost care to what the hon. member has said, and he has pointed out some of the difficulties connected with the machinery for the collection of these taxes. What is happening at the present moment in regard to these taxes? Men in business along certain lines in this city—indeed, this applies to the whole of Canada—find that they are suddenly compelled, by reason of these proposals, to employ a bookkeeper where they did not need one before. Why? Because they have to keep track of all the sales in connection with the new taxes proposed under this resolution. What is it that we actually propose to do under this resolution? We propose to make almost every retail trader in Canada a collector of Government taxes, and make him pay a license fee for the privilege of collecting those taxes. He has been doing his ordinary business, with his ordinary staff, under the principles of freedom, but under the principles of coercion, which are the secret and the heart of this taxation, he finds that in many cases he has to put on a bookkeeper. Who pays the bookkeeper? The consumers of Canada. Before we go into any detail in the discussion of these taxes we must get to know what they mean in bulk. It is a fact that business men in Ottawa have already had to employ a bookkeeper where they were previously doing their own business. That bookkeeper, call him what you like, is practically an increase of the Civil Service of Canada. It is true that the Government will not have to pay his salary; his salary will come out of the consumers of Canada. If we go along this line, where shall we get to? I am grateful to my hon. friend from Algoma East (Mr. Nicholson) for raising this question of the machinery of taxation. I should like to know whether the minister can give us any general ideas, before we go into details, as to the machinery by which he proposes to collect these taxes, from Halifax to Vancouver, from the northern seas to the American border.

Mr. BURNHAM: I would be derelict in my duty if I did not voice the sentiments of my constituents. Their protests have been long and loud in connection with this matter; they object to having to collect the taxes. There may be an explanation; I have no doubt that there is; it would be absurd to suppose that this complication is to be set upon the people and left there for them to fume over. I am satisfied that the minister and the commissioners will between them evolve some plan. I am also satisfied that the hon. member for Red Deer, who is a doctor, is not the man to lecture a cabinet of lawyers. Much as I respect the medical profession, I would—

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): I am a farmer.

Mr. BURNHAM: When a man goes into business he prepares the way through a lawyer; when he goes out he prepares the way for his funeral through a lawyer.

Mr. PEDLOW: Before we proceed further with the general discussion of this subject I think it would be in order for the minister to explain this resolution. I understand that since the resolution was proposed in the Budget Speech, certain modifications of the schedule have been determined upon. If these modifications, together with any other information that the minister wishes to furnish, are communicated to the committee now, matters will be simplified and a good deal of discussion may be avoided.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am glad to comply with my hon. friend's suggestion. I will say a word first with regard to the matter that has been spoken of by the member for Algoma East (Mr. Nicholson) and other hon. gentlemen. There is no doubt that it is easy to turn away from the duty that is unpleasant; it is easier to borrow money than to impose taxes; it is much easier to drift than to row against the stream. It is very much easier for the retail merchant if he is specially protected in connection with this matter, and if there is any way of specially protecting him without loss to the State or inconvenience to the community, he shall be protected. On the other hand, if the economic necessities of the situation demand that he should be conscripted, if you like, in his country's service, then he ought to be conscripted in that service. I am not saying at the moment that that is necessary; I shall be pleased to take this suggestion and every other suggestion that is made into my most earnest and careful consideration. What we want to do is to get a maximum of revenue with a minimum of inconvenience, and a maximum of revenue from those classes of people that can best afford to pay. One of the main objections to most forms of taxation is not only that the taxation itself is passed along, but also that profits are predicated on that taxation. What we all try to get at is a tax which will be borne by the men best capable of paying it, a tax so designed that it will not be possible for the person who should pay it to make somebody else pay it for him, and at the same time to charge profits on that tax as part of his expenses. That is the main reason why the burden of collecting the taxes has been placed upon the retailer; that is the main reason why similar action was taken in the United States. We have had very marked drops in prices since this taxation was introduced. Would hon. gentlemen expect similar drops in prices if, instead of the purchaser knowing what the tax was, the manufacturer and the wholesaler had been put in the position of paying that tax in the first instance and then charging a profit upon it? So far as collection is concerned, our task is indeed easy; if we put the tax upon the manufacturer and upon the wholesaler we shall have little or no trouble; we shall get a larger revenue, and we shall stop a leak here and there which otherwise would not be stopped. But what about the man on the street? What about the man who makes the purchase? We are trying to think of him; we are trying to work out something which will bring down rather than multiply costs. Most taxes are brought into the cost figures of the concern and have profits placed upon them. This tax cannot be so treated. Everybody knows what the tax is when called upon to pay it, but he need not pay it unless he wants to. Now, that leaves the very important question for consideration and for ultimate determination whether it is in the public interest to collect the maximum of taxation, or whether we should not, on the one hand, seek revenue, and, on the other hand, seek to bring down the cost of commodities, to bring down the general high cost of living. Every purchaser should know that when he is buying an unnecessarily expensive article he is paying a little bit for his extravagance, and is paying to some extent for something that is not an intrinsic quality of the article. We have to consider whether it is worth while that this should be realized. As I have said in connection with all these resolutions, bearing in mind always the condition of the country and the fact that we propose to pay our way as we go, to raise proper revenue and, as far as possible, reduce the high cost of living, all these proposals are submitted to the House in the hope that we may be able materially to improve our condition. The hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Pedlow) has asked me what concessions it has been thought possible to make in connection with the taxes proposed, and I have much pleasure in taking the matter up in answer to that inquiry. The first taxes which we have are the taxes on boots and shoes. There is no question that boots and shoes are an absolute necessity; the only question is that of reasonableness of price.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): I asked the minister to give us some idea of the machinery by which he is going to collect the taxes, and he proceeds to discuss the details. Is this to illustrate that machinery, or am I to understand that he refuses to answer my question? I want to know something about the machinery. What machinery does the Minister of Finance propose to institute from Halifax to Vancouver for the collection of the taxes? This question has a most important bearing on the whole subject, because if you put into force machinery which is a duplicate of the customs staff you increase the Civil Service and throw away the taxes at the same time.

Mr. BELAND: Before the minister passes to a consideration of the individual items, I desire to express my concurrence in the view of the hon. member for Red Deer, that we must first of all know, before we discuss the items, what is the exact machinery that will be employed to collect the taxes. It is now stated in a general way that the taxes should be collected by the retailer. Has the minister realized what it would mean in actual practice for country retail merchants to collect the duty on every yard of ribbon that they sell? Let me illustrate this point. There are five persons in a country store in the morning each of them seeking to buy, let us say, a yard or two of ordinary ribbon, which is not a luxury. Some ribbon retails at fifteen cents a yard.

An hon. MEMBER: Fifteen cents?

Mr. BELAND: Let us say fifteen cents; that is the average price. The little girls going to school wear this ribbon on their hair, and I do not think you would call that a luxury article. However, the merchant sells a yard of this ribbon. Do I understand that he is to make a duplicate sheet for the fifteen cents and one for the cent and a half duty he is going to collect, and that he is going to keep track of that sort of thing from the first hour to the last hour of the day; and that every two weeks or every month, as the case may be, he is going to supply a report to the department? This is one illustration amongst a thousand. If a retail merchant wanted to carry out the provisions of this resolution he would have to get additional assistance that would entail an expenditure of perhaps a thousand dollars a year. Do hon. members realize what a thousand dollars means to an ordinary retail merchant in a country store? This is a most serious question. Cannot the minister find a way to collect through the wholesale dealer these taxes on all the articles mentioned in the resolution. The retail merchant in a country town buys a hundred dollars' worth of ribbon from a wholesale dealer in Montreal, say, who makes an invoice for $100 and $10 of excise duty. This is collected from the merchant, who can then fix his price so as to cover any loss in connection with the tax imposed upon him. Could not the minister devise some such scheme? I have consulted a good many retail merchants, not in any attempt to prejudice them against the tax, but simply to ascertain their views; and they all to a man agree that it is almost impossible for them, with the best will in the world, to carry out the provisions of this law. As my hon. friend from Red Deer has said, it would require machinery that would be more expensive than the collection of the customs duty in Canada, whereas if the minister could attain the same end through the agency of the wholesale dealer the work would be much simpler. The only argument the minister can advance against collecting the taxes through the wholesale dealer is that he wants every customer who buys one of these articles that are designated as luxuries to know that the country is collecting a tax from him. Is it so important that a man who is in need of a ten-dollar pair of shoes should know he has to pay a dollar on them? I do not want to go into details, but ten-dollar shoes are not luxuries in my district, where so many ordinary workingmen who are at work in the forest, in the driving of logs, require boots and shoes that cost from $12 to $14 and $15.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): As I understand it, the hon. member for South Renfrew asked the minister a question. The minister was attempting to answer it and to give the changes he intends to make to these resolutions. Why not allow him to put them on record? Possibly he was dealing with the question that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Béland) was talking about.

Mr. BELAND: My hon. friend is quite mistaken. The minister was referring to the machinery. He apparently had disposed of the question.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): No.

Mr. BELAND: Yes, my hon. friend need not say anything to the contrary. The minister had entered upon another point, was considering another article; he was not specifying the way in which the tax would be collected, because he had disposed of that.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): I understand he was dealing with the changes he intended to make.

Mr. BELAND: Changes? Yes, as to the minimum amount at which a specified article should be placed. He disposed of the question with a wave of the hand, as it were. He was speaking of the machinery. The people must know, he said, that there is a tax on a pair of shoes; they must know when they are paying it. He had disposed of that. He said that he was disposed to consider the suggestions that would be made in regard to the change in the minimum price for one particular article. But as to the machinery, he appeared, at least in so far as I could understand him, to be unwilling to consider any proposal to collect the tax in any other way. I cannot too much insist upon this point. I think the minister should have adopted a simpler way of collecting the tax. The retailers would be better satisfied; he would get his revenue; and we will tell the people that they pay the tax.

Mr. McCREA: Most of them know it now.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The hon. gentleman (Mr. Béland) is entirely in error. If I said what he thinks I did I improperly expressed myself. I did not refuse any discussion or consideration of the method proposed, but on the other hand, I interrupted and said I would be very glad to go into it and personally to give it my best and most careful consideration. Further than that, I used words to the effect that while it was my duty and the duty of the House as I conceived it to see that the necessary revenues are raised, if this whole talk about raising taxes and paying our way as we go is not idle chatter, it was also our duty to see that these taxes were collected in the very best and most economical way, in the way which would lead to the least friction and place the least burden upon any section or class in the country, be they retail merchants or any other. My hon. friend from Red Deer has asked what is proposed to be done. In the first place what is proposed to be done is to take advantage of every constructive suggestion which hon. gentlemen are kind enough to make with that end in view. Apart from that, what would ordinarily be proposed to be done, and what will be done, is to arrange through the Department of Inland Revenue, which department already has the matter in hand, for a proper and systematic way of collecting the tax.

Let me say one thing right here. Whatever hon. gentlemen may say, I think that in so far as the great mass of the retailers of the country are concerned, they do not need hon. gentlemen at their elbow all the time telling them what they should do. I do not believe it is going to require an army of men to look after the tax. I believe the great majority of the retail merchants are anxious to co-operate in the collection of this tax. They told me so themselves. They take the view that if this is the only way and the best way the money can be got, while they do not like it, they are yet prepared to do their bit, and they are doing their bit. I do not believe they are a class of men who are going to try and see how much they can knock out of the treasury or how much they can filch from Canada. Therefore, I repeat, we are not going to require any great army of men to look after this tax. We ought not to. While my political experience is short I have had a lot of knocking around Canada and my experience of the Canadian generally is that where there is an honest way of doing a thing he does it honestly and that the crooked man is indeed an exception in this country. We do not propose to employ an army of detectives; we propose to have a very limited number of men to instruct rather than to prosecute or intimidate.

The method by which these taxes can be collected is of course a matter of regulation. It may be that the whole of the taxes can be collected through the medium of the stamp tax, and if they are collected through the medium of the stamp tax there is no necessity for the book-keeper that the hon. gentleman speaks of. As I said I do not want to pass finally upon everything. No one is more conscious than myself of the fact that this is my first session in this House; no one is more conscious than myself that I require instruction even from the hon. member for Red Deer. But, also, no one is more conscious of the fact that revenues have to be raised and that, inasmuch as this is possible, that we can do it. it is the direct duty of this House to do everything it can not only towards the raising of the revenues but in regard to the method to be adopted for the raising of the revenues, and to assist in the gradual process of deflation which is so greatly to be desired.

The hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Béland) says I am dodging the question. Why? The question of the cent and a half a yard on ribbon is something that can only be dealt with by treating it in the way the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Pedlow) desired it should be dealt with. It so happens that I agree with the hon. member for Beauce that cheap grades of ribbon should get recognition and that it should not be necessary for the merchant to make a deduction, or a collection, of a cent, or a cent and a half, per yard on ribbon sold. Boots and shoes certainly are necessities. My hon. friend from Beauce has made an argument in connection with boots of a character which would be entirely unnecessary in view of the changes to be made. Clothing and the different articles which go to make up coats and the usual attire are also essentials. Representations have been made by manufacturers of boots and clothing, by wholesalers and by retailers. The retailers do not at all occupy any individual position here. They are not objecting any more fiercely or any more strongly than are the manufacturers or the wholesalers. The objections are general, there is no question about that, so far as all these classes of people are concerned.

An hon. MEMBER: Sure.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: An hon. member says, "Sure." He will not find the same objection from the man who, during the last two weeks, has been able for $8.50 to buy a shoe that formerly cost him $12 or $16, or the man who gets for $45 a suit for which he formerly had to pay $60. There has been a lot of talk about the Budget. It has been described by hon. gentlemen opposite as a Budget of the Interests, and not a Budget of the poor people or for the poor people. I would like them to have been around when the gentlemen whom they describe as "the Interests" were making their representations as they have been for the last three weeks. Then they would at least know that they are entirely wrong, or that the manufacturers and the wholesalers—"the Interests" that they from time to time talk about—did not know their business.

Mr. COPP: I would like the minister to inform the House where he can buy for $8.50 a pair of shoes that formerly cost $12.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes, at Gales', here in Ottawa.

Mr. COPP: I am glad to get this information.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I should not single out that firm—

Mr. COPP: I am glad to know there is one place.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: You will find that condition all over.

Mr. COPP: There will be a run on the market.

Mr. BELAND: What assurance has the minister that $12 shoes have been reduced to $8.50?

Mr. NESBITT: If the minister will allow me to answer I will give the hon. member an instance. I have a young lady—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. NESBITT: What's the matter with you fellows over there?

Mr. LAPOINTE: There is nothing the matter with us.

Mr. BELAND: All the matter is with you.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. NESBITT: The trouble with you people is that you have young ladies in a different manner to what I have.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. NESBITT: That's not so funny is it?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Do you buy boots for her?

Mr. NESBITT: I know a young lady who bought a pair of boots in Toronto for $12. They did not fit her and she sent them back. It happened that the Budget came down in the interval and she bought exactly the same kind of boots, only of a different size, for $8.75.

Mr. PEDLOW: I would like to correct a wrong impression that might be left on the House and the country. It is absolutely unfair to the retail trade of this country, and I speak advisedly on this subject—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Order, this is not asking me a question. I would like the floor if the hon. member pleases.

Mr. BEST: The statement to which the hon. member has referred is absolutely true. The hon. member need not deny it, because everybody knows it is a fact.

[Mr. Copp.]

Mr. LAPOINTE: Order.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not think that any attack should be levelled at the retailers; they do not deserve it. I am not making any attack on them; I am saying that prices have come down, and we all know it to be true.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, no.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am not saying that prices are going to stay down permanently; I am not saying that the goods can be reproduced at the same price; all that I am saying is that prices have come down.

An hon. MEMBER: That is merely to evade the tax.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Representations have been made in connection with clothing and boots and shoes, and I admit that clothing and boots and shoes do occupy a position different from that occupied by many of the articles mentioned in the resolutions. I think also that is quite clear to hon. gentlemen; and I am quite sure that as a whole they are just as anxious as any one could be to reduce the high cost of living. I am sure that they would agree that a low figure over which taxes would be charged is something which would at least tend to bring down the cost. It at least affords an incentive to manufacturers and merchants to try and get hold of an article which can be sold without tax; to try and get hold of an article which, while lacking perhaps in refinements of style, will at least be a proper and serviceable article. I think that is something we would all agree about. If we do not I really think we ought to because, after all, it is only common sense. Now it will take a little while to do that but when you have your figure fixed as a goal for merchants to strive to reach, you are getting a good long way towards that goal. So that I think hon. gentlemen will agree that a large raise in the minimum prices that have now been proposed is really against true public interest however greatly it may be desired by those directly interested in the business. I am not blaming them for it; it is their businesss; they are perfectly right in taking the stand that they do; but I do not think it is a matter in the general public interest—that is, if we are serious in what we are always saying from time to time, that the cost of commodities is excessive and that prices are extortionate. Now, on the other hand, while it may well be that the limit ought not to be greatly increased, other representations are made. These representations are to the effect that, at present, at any rate, it would be impossible, after the first flurry is over and the goods that are now selling at lower prices have been sold, to maintain those prices; that it will mean that the better class of goods will disappear and cheaper—and in some instances shoddy—goods will take their place; and that the two objects that we ought to have in view can be obtained if, instead of charging ten per cent on the whole cost by way of a tax, that a rate should be charged upon the excess value, that is, on the difference between the minimum set and the actual sales price. For example a pair of boots, instead of being sold for $9 is sold for $12. Well, the suggestion is that the tax should be calculated on the $3 of excess instead of on the whole $12. The same idea runs through the regular clothing list. I should not say the "regular clothing list," because there are some articles of clothing which are entirely accessories and in the purchase of which a man may be extravagant or not just as he pleases. But the idea runs through the ordinary clothing list, that is, suits, coats and the like, and the suggestion I desire to make to the committee, Mr. Chairman, is that having in mind the principles I have mentioned there should be a modification of the tax on boots, clothing—including trousers, coats, overcoats, waistscoats, waists, dresses, women's and misses' skirts separate from dresses, suits and women's coats. In connection with boots, the special kinds which are necessary in lumbering, mining, river driving, and other work of a similar character are to be taken care of, because it was never intended to put a special tax on the boots that lumbermen and others have to equip themselves with in connection with their work. Therefore it is proposed that there shall be a tax of 15 per cent on boots, shoes, pumps and slippers of any material (not including shoes or appliances made to order for persons having a crippled or deformed foot or ankle, or top-boots of less than twelve inches in height, such as are used in lumbering, mining and fishing industries, or river driving boots fitted with caulks on the soles thereof in excess of $9 per pair.

Mr. PROULX: And surveyors' boots?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: They would come within the same category I should think.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): Will my hon. friend exempt cripples' boots?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: They are still exempted.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): Are the profiteers always crippled?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Well, the present process is descriped by some as crippling them very severely, so much so that they say they will not be able to carry on business in the near future with any profit. I do not know whether that it so or not, but if it is any satisfaction to my hon. friend I am very glad indeed to give him the information.

Then trousers, sold separately from suits, in excess of $12 per pair; coats, men's and boys', sold separately from suits, (not including leather coats lined with sheepskin) in excess of $25 each; cloth overcoats, men's and boys', women's and misses', in excess of $50 each; waistcoats, men's sold separately from suits, in excess of $5 each; dresses, women's and misses' (except silk) in excess of $45 each; skirts separate from dresses, (except silk), in excess of $15; suits, women's and misses' (except silk) in excess of $60 each; coats, women's and misses', sold separately from suits (except silk) in excess of $35 each. Hon. members will see that we have included in that list practically everything which would fall within the general description I was dealing with before, that is absolutely essential articles of clothing, in so far as suits, coats, boots and the like are concerned, and we reduce the tax from ten per cent on the full cost to fifteen per cent on the excess.

Then there is a further stipulation in connection with that, which was in the original schedule; that on articles of clothing the prices of material and cost of manufacture are to be combined for determining the selling price.

We do not propose any change at all in the tax on articles the purchase of which may be regarded as an extravagance entirely within the control of the purchaser. For example, we do not think it is any hardship for a man to pay a tax on any hat he wants to buy over $5; so we leave on the $5 limit and the tax at ten per cent on the whole amount. Hats, caps, men's socks, neckties, shirts, ladies' hats, ladies' stockings, corsets in excess of $5, kimonas and waists, petticoats,—all these are left just as they were with the exception of what I have pointed out in the suggestion made, because it is entirely a matter of volition whether a purchaser indulges in an expensive article or not. A good hat can be purchased at less than $5, and if a man wants a cap he can get one for 50 cents or $1, unless he wants a fancy one—and I admit they are chiefly of that class—and then he should be able to get a good one at $2.

Walking sticks were not covered before while umbrellas were, and I am quite sure that hon. gentlemen will agree that they should be included.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): Does my honourable friend mean to include walking sticks?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Walking sticks are now in. We propose also a change in an important item, having regard to representations made, particularly from the West. The original resolution put a limit of $100 on the cost of fur coats, and I am frank to admit that that limitation was entirely too low—not too low as prices were at the time I bought the coonskin coat I still have, and which I think is a pretty good coat, but I find that I could not replace it to-day at anything like the price I paid some years ago. So it has been determined to double the minimum on fur coats and make it $200. That action is taken in view of the necessities of the climate and the way in which the cost of furs has gone up,—although I am very glad to be in a position to inform hon. gentlemen that furs will be coming down in price very soon.

Mr. COPP: What is the tax on the excess?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is ten per cent on the total amount. You can get a good coat for $200.

Mr. CRERAR: Has my hon. friend made any distinction between men's and women's fur coats?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No, we have made no distinction. There is a less amount of fur in the ladies' coat, but I admit there is generally more style.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): On this question of clothing, will the Finance Minister let us off being taxed by night? I notice he has a tax on night-gowns and night-shirts. If we are taxed by day, that is quite sufficient

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am quite sure the patriotism of the hon. gentleman is such that he would like to pay taxes, though sleeping. In the same way we should increase the price of driving gloves, winter gloves. We have raised that to $15. We have raised the price of fur caps to $15. We have made the price of muffs and neckpieces to $35, and the price of robes and rugs, $50.

Mr. NESBITT: The minister said "gloves". Does he mean fur gloves?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Fur gloves.

Mr. McKENZIE: It would be unreasonable for the minister to expect the committee to pass the resolutions with the changes that he is making. The resolutions are being changed almost in every particular; for myself I cannot hear what the minister is saying, and I do not know what the changes are. The resolutions should be recast and reprinted and distributed as amended amongst the members. Then we shall have a few hours to look over them so as to see what the changes are. I can assure the minister that he will make no progress if he continues in that manner of putting the matter before the committee.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I had not for one moment the slightest thought or expectation of asking hon. gentlemen to pass these resolutions to-night. I am desirous of giving the fullest information I can at the earliest possible minute. Perhaps it will be sufficient to put these changes on Hansard, but I shall have much pleasure in bringing down a reprint, as the hon. member suggests, giving a new schedule for the guidance of hon. members. It is advisable to do that because, as I have told hon. gentlemen, we want constructive suggestions. It may be we are not getting all the money we should get; it may be we have left out something we should put in, and I am quite sure hon. gentlemen desire to assist the country at the present time and will be fruitful of constructive suggestions, looking towards larger revenues. This list may help them in that regard.

Mr. CRERAR: Has the minister's department made any estimate of the amount of money that will likely be secured under these taxes? That is a matter of very much concern to the House and to the country. These taxes are new ones entirely, and while I sympathize fully with the aim of the minister in securing as much money as possible, I cannot, by any means, agree with the argument he has made in support of this resolution. I certainly commend him for inviting constructive suggestions from the committee. While I am on my feet, I might state that I have had personally many protests against the application of this tax, particularly the proposals to make country and retail merchants throughout Canada tax collectors for the Government. I might cite one case particularly that comes to my mind at the present time.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I gave way to my hon. friend as I thought he wanted to ask me a question.

Mr. CRERAR: I beg my hon. friend's pardon; I thought he was through.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No, I have only commenced. In answer to the question of my hon. friend as to the revenue, my hon. friend will see at once that, as regards the great bulk of these luxury taxes, if we get saving instead of extravagance, if expenditure is curbed, we are not going to have a very great amount of money raised. On the other hand, if the people continue to spend in the way they have been doing in the past, these luxury taxes will be very productive, but it is guess work to say what will happen..

Mr. CRERAR: Quite a reputable business man, in whose judgment I have considerable confidence, stated to me that he had estimated that these taxes would bring into the treasury at least $300,000,000. Does the minister agree with that?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No, I do not agree with that at all. I think that is very much higher than anything we can hope for. Knitted sweaters and knitted sweater coats were not included in the original resolution, and at the appropriate time I am going to ask leave of the House to introduce a resolution covering them.

Mr. LOGGIE: Before the minister proceeds, may I ask him a question? In his list, I understood he did not include leather coats used by woodsmen. I should like to remind the minister that the coats commonly used by woodsmen are known as mackinaw coats. Is it not the intention to exempt that class of garments from taxation as well as leather coats? The leather coat is much more expensive than the mackinaw coat, but the latter is much more commonly used by woodsmen.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is something that I shall be pleased to take up with my hon. friend.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): I do not wish to interrupt my hon. friend, but what is the course we are following in this debate? We come to discuss certain specific proposals which were submitted in the Budget Speech, which were attached in printed schedules to the Budget Speech. Are we listening now merely to alterations which the Government propose to make in those, and are we going to discuss the alterations at a subsequent date, or are we to take the Budget proposals as serious proposals of the Government for Parliament and the people of this country? What are we doing? We have been here for four months; we waited for the Budget; we have it, and we have it in printed shape. Now the minister is giving us a whole list of alterations in detail. We have not yet settled, as regards committee discussion, the principles of this legislation. Are we listening to a set of alterations upon which we have to recast all the legislation at a future date? I should like to know what the procedure is that we are embarked upon, and I think I am in perfect order in asking that question.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I hasten to assure my hon. friend that the Budget is not a joke and that anything that has been done has been done merely to relieve cases where it is thought that a proper case has been made out for relief; that the further changes —and there are not many—are made to include articles of luxury which ought to have been included in the first resolution and which were omitted; that there is no change whatever in the principle of the Budget, which is a tax on expenditure, most of which is avoidable. What we are doing now is this: I have asked for suggestions, and I still think it is a proper thing to do in connection with new and novel legislation to ask hon. gentlemen for constructive suggestions. If I am wrong, then that kind of suggestion is altogether wrong, and all the minister should come down to Parliament for is to logroll something through irrespective of what hon. gentlemen may be able to add to his information or lack of information on the subject. Further, what I am doing is endeavouring to answer a perfectly proper question put by the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Pedlow) and I intend to proceed to answer that question.

We also propose a modification in connection with games and sports. What we propose to do there is to make a concession in the matter of popular games, such as baseball, lacrosse, hockey and football. We are removing these from the list of commodities subject to the general tax, but a price limit is being applied, so that if any one wants to get anything particularly fancy in connection with these games, some payment by way of taxation will have to be made.

Mr. EULER: Is the minister making an exception of baseball supplies?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes.

An hon. MEMBER: What about skates?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Baseball bats and baseballs will be exempt up to $1.25 each; baseball mitts and gloves up to $1.50; skates—here I am thinking of children's skates, not of expensive skates used by adults—up to $2; footballs—again, the kind used more particularly by children—up to $3; lacrosse sticks up to $1.50; hockey sticks up to 75 cents. Then, an addition is proposed so far as clocks and watches are concerned; that is one of the things referred to in connection with which there is a certain amount of extravagance, which was not mentioned in the original proposals. Then, a limitation is proposed in connection with velvets, velveteens, etc. We find that a lot of material is cheap in price; that it is used largely by people of small means, and that it is not entirely a luxury. We have fixed a price in that respect; instead of making the whole of these articles taxable we merely say that velvets, velveteens, plush and silk fabrics, selling at a price in excess of $2 a yard, shall be taxable. Then, instead of all lace and braid being taxable, we say that only lace and braid in excess of 25 cents a yard shall be taxable, and ribbon in excess of 50 cents a yard.

A great many representations have been made in connection with carpets. We have had a fairly thorough investigation made since the Budget was brought down as to the cost of carpet materials, the actual cost of manufacture and the actual prices paid, and we propose to double the minimum in that case. The former figure was $3 a yard, we now propose to make that figure $6.

Mr. EULER: Is the minister abandoning entirely the principle enunciated in the Budget Speech that the tax is to be on the whole price of the article, and providing that it shall be only on amounts in excess of certain figures?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The tax there is to be on the whole price of the article.

Mr. EULER: In only one or two instances are the taxes to be paid on the excess only?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Just in the few instances that I have mentioned.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): In cases where purchasers have already paid taxes on the whole purchase price of some of these articles, will there be a possibility of getting a refund?

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I hope that they will all be refunded; we will see to that if we can. Then, the same reasons which led us to increase the minimum in respect of carpets have led us also to decrease the tax on oriental rugs to 15 per cent.

There was nothing in the original resolutions with regard to extravagant furniture. The suggestion made in that regard is as follows:

A tax of 15 per cent on all antique furniture, of walnut, mahogany, rosewood, ebony, primavera, or oak; carved ebony or teak wood and lacquered furniture; all furniture finished in gold leaf, verni martin or with ornamental or expensive inlay such as mother of pearl or hand-painted decorations. All tables made specially for cards, checkers, chess or other games; all liquor cabinets, smokers' cabinets, tea-wagons, sewing cabinets, work tables, piano lamps or stands, table lamps or stands, ferneries jardinieres, pedestals and bric-a-brac made of rosewood, primavera, solid mahogany or ebony, or lacquered or decorated.

You will see that all the cheap forms of furniture in that list are left out; only upon the expensive woods is there any tax.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Strathcona): Will that apply to auction sales?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The resolutions are not drawn to apply to auction sales. Perhaps that is something that we should cover.

Mr. BELAND: Do I understand that the tax will apply to veneered furniture of rosewood, mahogany, and so on?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I should think it would depend upon how much rosewood, and so on, there was in it. Personally I think that expensive veneered furniture ought to be included. Any one who can afford to buy a rosewood table, whether it is veneered or solid, ought to pay the tax.

Then another thing was changed. We had no tax on expensive china and crockery; such a tax is now proposed.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Our suggestion.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The hon. member will see that we are serious in asking for suggestions; I hope that hon. gentlemen opposite are as serious in making them as we are in adopting them.

Mr. CASGRAIN: We want to get credit for it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There are other minor changes, but I have said enough to answer the question of the hon. member for South Renfrew, and to make it perfectly clear that we are sincere in asking for suggestions and in our desire to meet any difficulties that have arisen.

Mr. RINFRET: May I ask the minister whether this new Budget, if I may call it so, is to take effect immediately, as is usual with Budget resolutions, or only when a Bill with regard thereto is introduced and passed? Or will these taxes be retroactive? I am simply asking for information.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not think we can make them retroactive. So far as any new things are concerned—and there are not very many—I take it that they will become effective upon a measure in regard thereto being introduced in the House.

Mr. BELAND: To-morrow these changes now proposed will be in force throughout the country?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No.

Mr. BELAND: By what are the retail merchants thoughout the country to be guided to-morrow?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: By the resolutions already tabled.

Mr. BELAND: How are retailers in general to know what these resolutions are?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Through the public press; it is quite impossible to get information to every retailer in any other way.

There is no idea of being unfair with anybody; just as soon as we get our resolutions confirmed we intend to issue regulations of the plainest possible character so that every one will understand exactly what the position is. We ought not to be unfair to any one. We desire to be more than fair to everybody, but at the same time we ought to be very vigilant to punish direct cases of deception.

Mr. BEST: I understood that the question before the committee was whether the taxes should be collected through the retailer or through the wholesaler. I hope we shall have that question settled to-night. I do not see what that has to do with the different levies that are to be put on the various articles. I believe that the minister is making an honest effort to raise as much revenue as possible with a minimum of injury to the poor and middle classes, and I will say, having gone home and travelled on the trains, and having been in a few towns, I am satisfied that there has not been any measure in the last five years that has done as much to reduce the cost of living as the present Budget. When hon. gentlemen opposite say that boots and shoes and clothing have not been reduced since the Budget was brought down I think they are making a great mistake. Retailers have told me that the boots which previously sold at $10 have gone down to $7.50 and those which sold for $12 are now selling at $9. I am now wearing a pair of boots—I am not talking about ladies' shoes—to my personal knowledge they were selling before at $10, and I paid $7.50 for them. I believe that many of the retailers throughout the country have been charging too much, and this will be the means of bringing down prices. I think that the majority of the retailers of Canada are honest; of course, there are a few exceptions, and I do not want to see anything done that will make the honest merchant dishonest; there are a few dishonest ones in different places. Let me give an example of what I am afraid may happen if the taxes are collected through the retailer. A purchaser went into a store in our own village to buy a suit of clothes. The merchant asked $50 and the customer was perfectly satisfied, but the moment he was told that there was a government tax of $5 on the suit he refused to take it. He went to another store and bought a suit of clothes but did not pay the percentage. That honest merchant that tried to carry out the law to the letter was losing a customer and there was a temptation for him to do with his other customers just as the other merchant had done. I am told that a merchant in this city, when a lady went to buy a pair of boots for $12, informed her that the tax amounted to $1.20 and upon her refusing to take the boots he said that he would fix the matter. He gave her a bill for one pair of boots at $8 and a bill for another pair at $4, thereby defeating the Government. I realize that there are millions of dollars of goods in the retailers' hands throughout Canada to-day, but I believe that if the tax were put on the wholesaler and the manufacturer, at the end of twelve months the Government would have received very much more revenue than they would by putting it on the retailer. I asked a shoe manufacturer last week how many customers he had and he told me he had between twelve hundred and thirteen hundred. Just imagine thirteen hundred retailers sending in little statements to the Government every two weeks, and you will realize the objection to this method of collecting the tax. On the other hand, if it were put on the wholesaler there would be only one man sending in reports. As an hon. gentleman opposite pointed out, a merchant selling a yard of ribbon would have to make out a statement for 1½ cents to be sent in to the Government, and you would have thousands of merchants all over Canada sending in statements ranging from a few cents to a few dollars every two weeks. I do not know how many civil servants it will take if the retailers have to collect these taxes.

Mr. BELAND: One for every store.

Mr. BEST: Here at Ottawa we have an army of civil servants now and I understand that some committee is to be appointed to reduce their number, but I firmly believe that it would double the number of civil servants to carry on the business if the tax were collected through the retailers. Merchants tell me,—and I believe it is true—that while they are making an honest effort to carry out the law as well as they possibly can, there are very many, as has been stated on the other side, who will have to pay a bookkeeper from $1,000 to $1,500 a year, and there are many small merchants throughout Canada to-day who cannot afford to do that. If they had to employ such expensive assistance it would injure their business, and in the long run the consumer would have to pay. I do not say for a moment that for the wholesaler the minimum price of boots to come under the tax should be $9, because the retailer would probably sell them for $12 or $14. But if the retailer is called upon to collect a tax on boots that he now sells at $10, the limit should be reduced in the case of the wholesaler or manufacturer to $6, and in regard to clothes, if a suit of clothes were put at $27 or $30 for the wholesaler it would about even up with the price of $45 which the retailer charges. We would get very much more money in that way, and I believe that is the only proper method of collecting the taxes. The minister has said that all the people are willing to pay their share of taxes. I want to tell him that about eighty or ninety per cent of the people of Canada are willing to pay when the law makes them, and not until then. If a merchant asks them $50 for a suit of clothes they are willing to pay, but the moment he tells them that there is a tax of $5 on it they refuse to buy it. If they were asked $55 for the same clothes and there were no mention about taxes they would say not a word. All the merchants to whom I have spoken are ready to stand by the law but they all are of the opinion that the tax should be collected through the wholesaler or manufacturer instead of through the retailer. I hope the Government will see its way clear to adopt this method and that we shall not have an army of officials kept here to keep track of all the accounts coming in. The hon. member for Red Deer complained of the taxes put upon the poor. I say that if a man in fair circumstances wants to wear a pair of boots that cost over $9 he should pay the tax. You go along the streets in Ottawa and you will see suits of clothes displayed at $45 that are good enough for any man to wear, and I do not think that the limit should be raised at all. I think it is all right as it is. But the method of collecting the taxes should be as I suggest? We would then go back to the English method of paying an inland revenue tax in place of having protection.

Mr. LOGGIE: There are two, and only two, ways in which we can collect the taxes. One way has been supported by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Best) who has just taken his seat. If luxuries are imported you can put a luxury tax on them and pay through the custom house. Then they just collect from the consumer through the ordinary channels. The excise tax may be placed on a luxury of domestic make and it also is collected through the ordinary channels.

I want to say a word in favour of the position of the minister. If I import goods that come under the luxury tax of ten per cent on which I have to pay $1,000, that $1,000 is locked up goods on the shelves of my store, and when I sell these goods to the consuming public I get a profit on my $1,000. I cannot afford to wait for six months to turn those goods into cash unless I make a profit on my $1,000. By that method of collecting the tax the consumer must necessarily pay a profit on what the Government receives in the way of taxation. The object of introducing the mode of taxation that the minister proposes is to free the customer from the necessity of paying a profit on the tax. If I import the same value of luxury goods as in the other case, put them on my shelves and sell only fifty per cent of them within a year, I do not have to invest in the luxury tax until I sell the goods, and therefore I can afford to collect the tax for the Government without any extra profit because I have not made any investment in the meantime. But if I make an investment it is certainly reasonable that I should get a decent profit on the money invested. There is a distinct advantage in the proposal of the minister.

Another object of collecting the tax in the manner the minister proposes is that you impress upon the buying public that if they buy an expensive article, something we will say that some rich person can purchase, they are paying a direct luxury tax to help to defray the war expenditure. You are impressing upon the people the importance of buying less expensive goods and so reducing the use of goods which are called luxuries.

To me, Mr. Chairman, there are but two ways of collecting these taxes. If I were asked which of the two I would prefer to avoid friction, I would say by all means collect them through the custom house on imports and by excise from the manufacturer. But that must increase the cost to the consumer and the minister has told us that that is the reason for introducing the resolution to provide that they shall be collected in the manner that he suggests. For that reason I feel I ought to support the minister in his proposition in the interest of the consuming public.

I want also to congratulate the minister on the changes he has made regarding clothing and boots and shoes. He now proposes to collect the tax on the amount in excess of the price named. While I have said that much, I want to draw the minister's attention to another phase of that question. You must remember we have what I would call two classes of manufacturers supplying the people of Canada with clothing. First of all you have the wholesale clothing manufacturers the bulk of whom make up a cheaper class of goods than perhaps the ordinary man in this Chamber wears. Then we have the other class of manufacturers known as the tailoring class. It strikes me that the tailoring class are hit to some extent in the resolution before the House. The manufacturing class will not come in for any tax whatever whereas the customs tailoring class. Let me read a statement showing what was done in the United States regarding the luxury tax on tailored garments:

SPRINGFIELD, ILL., May 21.

To C. B. LOWE,
Chairman of practical work,
Merchant Tailors Association of Halifax,
Halifax, N.S.

Merchant tailors pay no luxury tax on any thing they produce, except fancy vests, sold as such over five dollars. The original Bill in Congress provided a ten per cent tax on suits over fifty dollars, but by presenting our case in Congress, it was stricken out as it was proved that tailors clothes was not a luxury.

L. A. DANNER,
Secretary.
The Merchants Tailors Designers' Association of America.

Mr. BUREAU: Is the maker of clothes to determine whether they are a luxury or not? He says they are not a luxury because they are made by him. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that the wholesale clothier who makes a suit of clothes for $50 is manufacturing a luxury while the tailor is not?

Mr. LOGGIE: I was simply stating what this writer representing the tailor's association alleged.

Mr. BUREAU: The writer is off.

Mr. LOGGIE: I am not raising the question personally; I am only drawing the attention of the minister to the fact that this class of garments was taxable on the proposals before the American Congress but that as a result of the representations which were made, clothing made by tailors does not come under the luxury tax at all. It is just a question with me whether it is wise to have men's clothing come within this class. However, the minister has made the proposal that we have only to pay on the excess over the minimum price named and therefore I do not think there will be the same feeling throughout the country regarding this tax as there was. I have not very much objection to it, and if we are to have a tax I do not see how we can do any better than collect it in the manner the minister proposes. Unless we are prepared to pay the distributing house or retailer a profit on his investment, surely there is no better way, because no investment is made until the purchaser buys the article and pays the tax. The retailer is out no money. When he receives the money he puts it to credit in his day-book, and pays it over to the department either every two weeks or every month.

Mr. BEST: What actual difference is there between the retailer holding that over and the purchaser paying the duty? When a purchaser buys goods and is required to pay the duty on them he has to pay that money down. In the case of the retailer he pays the percentage and must wait until he sells to get a return.

Mr. LOGGIE: I quite agree with the hon. gentleman, but he must remember that any merchant who pays the duty and waits for his money must get it back with profit from the consuming public. The duty is collected in this way, as I understand it, to avoid that profit.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to speak for a moment or two on the item:

Articles commonly or commercially known as jewellery, whether real or imitation, for personal use or for adornment of the person.

I have a letter here from one of my constituents who lives in a small town containing a population of not less than a thousand people, and he puts the matter in this way:

To single out the jewellery trade for destruction is surely not a policy that you will endorse. The effect of the new taxation will be to drive purchasers of high-class jewellery to United States, where the tax is ony five per cent and where jewellery can be purchased more cheaply than in Canada.

I do not know what the luxury tax on jewellery in the United States is, but I do know that very much of the cheap jewellery that is sold in the country stores in Canada is imported from the adjoining republic under a fairly high ad valorem duty, and it does seem to me a very extreme rate to impose twenty per cent on top of that. I do think the minister might very well reconsider that rate.

Mr. BUREAU: That is a luxury, a superluxury.

Mr. LOGGIE: If you buy a fifteen or twenty per cent brooch, or cuff link, or something of that nature, it is not much of a luxury.

An hon. MEMBER: What about an engagement ring?

Mr. LOGGIE: If you buy an engagement ring it is a different matter.

Mr. BUREAU: Tin is good enough these days.

Mr. LOGGIE: I respectfully ask the minister to reconsider the rate he proposes charging on cheap jewellery. I have already explained that in the United States the rate is only five per cent. I have also explained that on most of the American-made jewellry that is bought in this country there is a stiff ad valorem duty. It seems to me that these articles are essential and the tax proposed here is increasing the cost of living unduly. I therefore hope the minister will reconsider the rate of duty imposed on cheap jewellery. With that hope I have put the matter frankly and fairly before him on behalf of my people.

[Mr. Loggie.]

Mr. CAHILL: I wish to make some suggestions to the minister and to ask him a question, seeing that he has asked for suggestions. First I would suggest that he have the schedule embodied in Hansard in the form in which he now has it so that it will be available in the morning for distribution to the members. My question is what will be the tax to-morrow to the retailers? The minister proposes, under this new regulation, to tax only the surplus above a certain price, that is ten per cent on anything above $9. The regulations, apparently, are now being changed. That being so, I would like the minister to make it clear what the change is. The minister has asked for suggestions as to the possibility of getting taxes and reducing the high cost of living. I can make one suggestion to him that I think will appeal to the majority of the people throughout Canada. In order to reduce the high cost of living and lower the cost of clothing and shoes I would take the tariff off. If the minister is not willing to do that let him reduce the duty very materially. Then, in order to obtain revenue, I would tax the wealthy people instead of the poor. It is time the wealthy were paying their due share.

The CHAIRMAN: I must remind the hon. member that he must not now enter upon a Budget debate and that the discussion must be strictly relevant to the resolution unuder consideration.

Mr. CAHILL: Can you tell me what resolution, together with amendments, is under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN: The resolution with amendments under consideration is a resolution to amend the Special War Revenue Act of 1915, and to impose certain excise or sales taxes on certain goods.

Mr. CAHILL: The minister asked for suggestions, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN: If the suggestions deal with the method of collection or any change in the amount of the taxes, or anything relevant to the resolution, they would be in order, but to enter into a tariff debate would surely not be permissible.

Mr. BUREAU: Here are the resolutions.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CAHILL: I am only following strictly along the lines pursued by the minister. He has already included in these proposed resolutions new forms of taxation, and he has asked for suggestions regarding them. I am simply complying with his request. When I said that it was time to tax the rich I merely wanted to point to my hon. friend what he and the Government already know. That is, that $1,300,000,000 of tax-exempt bonds were placed in the hands of the friends of the Government whereas the man who is buying his clothing and shoes is not exempted from taxation in any way.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I can hardly think that the hon. member is serious in what he says. His remarks, of course, are made for a purpose. He says that tax-exempt bonds were distributed among the friends of the Government. He knows, and knows very well, that one of the greatest aids in carrying on and in financing Canada's part in the war was the aid which was given by people irrespective of position and irrespective of taxes, and that one of the best—

Mr. CAHILL: In reply to the minister, let me say—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CAHILL: Well, the minister interrupted me.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CAHILL: I think I have the right to ask the minister a question.

The CHAIRMAN: I must point out that only one hon. member can be in possession of the floor at one time. The minister has the floor and unless he is willing to make way for the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Cahill) the latter has no right to interrupt, not even for the purpose of putting a question.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am inclined to think that both the hon. member and myself were out of order. I think his remark was entirely out of order, and my reply probably was also out of order; but I suppose that a remark out of order sometimes merits a reply, although only a partial one at that. Now, in connection with the question my hon. friend raises, we cannot of course to-night change the resolutions, and this discussion does not in any way affect the rate of taxation.

Mr. CAHILL: It only confuses it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not think so. I will make it as clear as my hon. friend likes, Mr. Chairman. If he does not think what I have said is quite clear, let me repeat it: Nothing we have done to-night changes the present situation. I think my hon. friend's suggestion that the list of changes mentioned should be given to Hansard to-night is excellent, and in view of that suggestion, and my previous determination, that will be done.

Perhaps I should make a further suggestion in view of the statement made by the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie), that some time should be given for considering the proposed amendments. I would suggest that hon. members should have to-morrow for the purpose of looking over the list which will appear in to-day's Hansard, and that the resolutions be taken up again at eight o'clock to-morrow night. In the meantime I move that the committee rise and report progress.

Mr. FIELDING: I hope the hon. gentleman will not press his motion.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Not at all.

Mr. EDWARDS: I have waited for some time in the hope that I might avail myself of the privilege so kindly afforded by the Finance Minister to make a few suggestions. He has gone pretty well over the list. I merely wish to ask him to give consideration to the item in regard to the proposed tax of 20 per cent upon "mechanical piano-players, graphophones, phonographs, talking machines, music boxes and records used in connection therewith or with any musical instrument." That is double the tax on pianos, and it is regardless of price. I think the hon. minister might very well take into consideration the fixing of a price above which these phonographs would be taxed. After all, the phonograph is the poor man's musical instrument, and there is a great deal to be said on behalf of it as an educative influence. I do not ask that these instruments be exempted entirely; but the cheaper instruments, it seems to me, might be exempted from taxation, and, following out the principle laid down in other cases, a tax might be imposed on the very high-priced instruments, because phonographs can be bought at as high a price as pianos.

Mr. FIELDING: I would like to offer one or two suggestions to the minister and, perhaps, ask a question before the committee rises. First, let me say that I have a degree of sympathy that I am afraid the committee may not have with the view expressed by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Loggie) in regard to jewelry. In a sense jewelry is a luxury. We might ask: Why do people want jewelry at all? But I think there are degrees of luxury, and I am going to suggest for the consideration of the Minister of Finance whether he might not properly make a distinction between different classes of jewelry. There is a cheap class of jewelry which lends itself to personal adornment, and I do not think it should be deemed an extravagance if the young ladies of Canada want to adorn their beauty—although beauty unadorned is adorned the most—but if they see fit to add to their charms with a bit of inexpensive jewelry, I do not think we should regard it as a crime. It seems to me that the minister might very properly make a distinction between the several classes of jewelry. Jewelry of an elaborate character is unquestionably a luxury, but jewelry of a simple character is certainly not a luxury. I would ask my hon. friend: Is a wedding ring a luxury?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would say, "No',' at once to that question.

An hon. MEMBER: Sometimes it is.

Mr. FIELDING: Then I hope my hon. friend will draw the line between the two classes. Make expensive necklaces dutiable, but distinguish in favour of the cheaper articles of jewellery. There is another thought in the matter, and that is that a large portion of our trading community are entitled to consideration, and even in the good cause of trying to raise money, although we all ought to appreciate the difficulties the Government has to face, we must be careful that lots of our traders are not driven out of business. All over the country there are scores of people doing a moderate jewellery business, and as the hon. member from Northumberland has pointed out, they have already paid a stiff duty on the importation of their stock; and if we are going to add another stiff duty on the retail price, we are going to make their wares so expensive as practically to ruin their trade. I am not suggesting that jewellery be exempt from taxation, but rather that a distinction should be drawn between the cheaper and the more expensive articles. I think that is worthy of my hon. friend's consideration.

Might I ask a question: If a man sells a ship, does the buyer under this Act pay a tax?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think ships are now exempt.

Mr. FIELDING: If my hon. friend is clear on that point I do not wish to press it further. I have a communication from a shipbuilder who evidently has a different impression. If my hon. friend has given the subject consideration, and says that ships are not to be taxed, I am content.

On the question of the mode of imposing these taxes, the argument advanced by the hon. member for Dufferin (Mr. Best) is enforced very strongly by a resolution, although I do not think it has been presented to the House, passed by la Chambre de Commerce, of Montreal. Let me read it to the committee:

> Whereas it is desirable that taxes be economically and thoroughly collected and with the greatest facilities as to work and control, la Chambre de Commerce respectfully suggests to the Minister of Finance that the taxes on sales by manufacturers, wholesalers or on importations, be levied only at sources: at the Customs for imported articles, and from the manufacturers for domestic goods.

The hon. member for Northumberland has argued against that on the ground that the retailer pays this tax only at the moment the transaction is completed, and that there is a saving of interest in that way. But is there not a danger under the present system—and I am only offering this as a suggestion—that the tax will be paid two or three times? Take, for example, the first item in the list, boots and shoes. The manufacturer sells to the wholesaler, and the tax is paid. The wholesaler certainly is not going to be content to pay that tax without recouping himself, and he will add it to the price he charges the retailer. The retailer, in turn, will pass it on to the consumer, and in that way the tax will be paid two and perhaps three times. There may be strong reasons against this suggestion of the Montreal Chambre de Commerce, but I am bound to say that I have not yet heard them. It seems to me there is very much to be said in favour of imposing the tax at one stage and leaving the rest to be worked out in a natural way. I am only desirous of drawing this to the attention of the minister and I am content to leave it to his judgment.

Mr. PEDLOW: I have been waiting for a considerable length of time to say a few words at this stage of the discussion. Several members made the claim that the Budget is responsible for current retail price reductions. Now, as hon. gentlemen who have spoken on this subject to-night have given their impression of the situation from hearsay evidence, possibly the committee to-night will permit me, as one who has had considerable experience and can speak from inside information on the subject as to the real application of this tax, to say a few words on the matter. These gentlemen might just as well claim that the price reductions that obtained in the months of November, December and January last were induced by the Budget announcement on the 18th of this month as to claim that the reductions made during the past two- weeks, concurrent with the announcement of the Budget proposals, were made on account of those proposals. Any one who knows even the A, B, C of retail merchandising, either in this country or elsewhere, knows that there are times in the life of any business concern when, for many various reasons, it is absolutely necessary to unload merchandise. This is made necessary from month to month and from year to year. A merchant may be optimistic and his buyers may be even more so than he is. They go to the market months before the merchandise is required for distribution and place their orders. This merchandise is purchased with the idea that the coming season will be normal, and consequently the distribution of merchandise will also be normal. During the past season, no doubt, buyers everywhere purchased merchandise with the expectation of having normal conditions of weather. They bought heavily of a certain kind of boots, a certain kind of ladies suits, dresses, coats and so on, expecting to have a normal season in the months of March, April and the early part of May. I need not remind the committee that we did not have normal weather during those months of this year, and consequently merchants throughout the country were left with stocks loaded on their shelves. As a result of that condition, in order to unload the merchandise before the season had completely passed, they were forced to put that merchandise on their counters at reduced prices. That is the absolute reason for the general price reductions. No doubt there are exceptional cases such as those referred to by the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) and the hon. member for Dufferin (Mr. Best). Those exceptional cases are liable to be found at any season of the year and in any year. I do not need to speak from hearsay; I have known of many instances where people in Toronto bought boots at a certain store in the early part of the week and during the subsequent days of the week they found those same boots were advertised at reduced prices for sale on Friday as bargain day. They took the boots back to the store, got their money on Thursday and went back and purchased the boots on Friday at a lower price than they had bought them at earlier in the week. This was not because of any Budget announcement or any influence the Budget exerted on market conditions; these are normal conditions from week to week the year round.

A great deal of discussion has taken place in the press, not only of Canada, but of the United States, on the same subject. Hon. gentlemen who have already referred to this Budget as being responsible for price reductions that have been current during the past two weeks might as well say that the Budget announcement in this Parliament was responsible for price reductions in the United States. For instance, a large concern—I will not mention the name, but it will occur at once to any one who has visited Washington or New York—instituted a horizontal or flat price reduction of 20 per cent on everything contained in their warehouse from the topmost storey down to the basement. I ask hon. gentlemen who have referred to the matter—do they claim that the Budget announcement made in this Parliament last week was responsible for the price reductions in Washington and New York? It is absurd to think of such a thing. Those reductions are the normal, regular, legitimate outcome of market conditions that obtain, and the Budget has no more to do with such price reductions than the man in the moon.

The hon. member for Dufferin (Mr. Best) intimated that in his constituency there were good merchants and bad merchants. I hope the committee will pardon me if I admit the possibility of that; but are there not, in all classes, professions, businesses and callings, good citizens and some bad ones too? That is a contingency that is admitted, and it cannot be avoided in any class of the community.

I do not wish to delay the committee very long at this juncture; but I might remind the committee that the country is at present face to face with an enormous obligation, and the money must be raised to meet that obligation. The Minister of Finance has decided on a certain method of collecting these taxes. It does not meet with my approval and I would suggest some other method, but he is the man in charge of the ship and he is responsible. It is true we can criticise the method, but he has determined to adopt that method and to push it through to a conclusion. I claim, therefore, that it is the duty of this committee to assist him in framing the resolutions and schedules along the best possible workable lines, and I am willing to give him all the information that it is possible for me, with the technical knowledge I possess in that connection, to render.

It has come to a case of "put up or shut up." We have to raise the money, and if the Minister of Finance has decided that that is the best way in which to raise it, we have no alternative but to submit and try it out. We can criticise or object; but I do not think our objections will amount to very much, because the majority behind the minister will carry the proposals in any case. Therefore, it is for us to try to adjust the matter along the best possible lines. I know that, as a matter of fact, the retail merchants of this country are, to a man, willing to help the Government in every possible way, not only in adjusting these schedules, but in collecting the revenue. Doubtless this will mean a large expense on them and on the Government under the method adopted by the minister of collecting the revenue. I should like to persuade him to try another method, but I understand that is impossible. I have here a resolution which was presented to the minister by the Retail Merchants' Association on the 21st May last in the city of Ottawa. I will read just the concluding paragraph which expresses in a nutshell the attitude of the retail merchants of the Dominion. I might add that there were over 200 retail merchants present at Ottawa on the occasion on which this resolution was presented to the minister. The concluding paragraph reads:

> We desire in placing our views before you to say that we fully appreciate the many difficulties under which the Government is labouring, but, as Retail Merchants we desire to offer our services, through our Association, in any manner whatsoever whereby we can give to the Government all the information and assistance that may be required regarding the Retail Trade in Canada.

While preserving the right to criticise schedules when finally printed and presented to the committee, I have very much pleasure in offering whatever assistance I can render to the minister, from my technical and personal knowledge of the matter, in framing and completing the schedules to the satisfaction of the committee and the country.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: The minister stated that he is prepared to receive suggestions, and it seems to me that now is the time to make them, in order that he may take them into consideration between now and to-morrow when he comes down with his new proposals in concrete form.

The most important point that has been raised to-night is that with regard to the means by which this taxation is to be collected. I was a merchant for thirty years, —though I am generally accused of being a bloated manufacturer—and I know a little about merchandise. The suggestion of the member for Algoma East (Mr. Nicholson) should receive serious consideration. The minister will avoid a peck of trouble if instead of collecting this tax from 200,000 merchants in Canada he collects it from the wholesaler, the manufacturer and the jobber. I make that suggestion only as a business man. I want to co-operate with the minister, but I want him to think seriously of what has been suggested in this regard. To collect from the fountain head—the wholesaler, manufacturer and jobber—would be cheaper; would be a more business-like method of procedure, and would bring about actual results within the shortest possible time. Now, it has been intimated that the luxury tax is supposed to have the effect of reducing the cost of living, and that we lose that advantage if we cause it to be paid by the wholesaler, manufacturer or jobber. But if it is going to reduce the cost of living in such a way as to bring the prices down below the figures which are taxable, the minister will not get the revenue that he needs. It has been argued that the imposition of these taxes has brought down the prices of several commodities; if so, these commodities are not going to be reached by this luxury tax. But if the tax is paid by the wholesaler, they will be reached. If, therefore, the Government wants to avoid trouble, if it wants to get the quickest and best results, it should have this tax paid at the fountain head of supply, and paid only once; for if you do not do that you are going to have the tax passed down the line; there will be one, two, or three collections on the same goods if we are not careful. Then, another serious aspect of the matter is the opportunity which exists, under the method of collection as proposed, for avoiding the tax. If there are any dishonourable merchants—though I believe there are very few—there is room for evasion of the tax. For instance, a suit which sells at $45 is taxed, but if the coat is sold to-day and the rest of the suit a week hence, the tax may be avoided. What is the position of the retailer? Twenty-five or fifty per cent of the merchandise sold in Canada is sold on credit; from ten to twenty per cent of it, perhaps more, is sold over the telephone. The retailer becomes responsible for the tax the moment the sale is made. He not only gives credit on his goods; he has to guarantee to the Government that the tax on those goods is going to be collected. It goes down on his books. Some of it will never be collected. Well then, the result is that the merchant is liable to be out of pocket not only in respect of the goods, but in respect of the tax on the goods. But he is not permitted to put any profit upon the tax, even though it goes on his books and stays there, perhaps, for thirty, sixty or ninety days. I submit that that is not fair to the merchant. When I was in business I gave six months' credit to many farmers; accounts were rarely paid within three months. So that the merchant becomes responsible for the tax whether or not he collects it from the customers. The minister will be well advised to avoid this very serious difficulty.

I have only one or two other suggestions to make. The Brantford merchants have sent me a telegram which is in line with what the minister has proposed,—that is, they ask that the tax be paid on the excess, not on the whole value of the goods; they propose also that the tax be increased in that respect, and that a one per cent tax on all sales be imposed. I do not vouch for the soundness of that suggestion; I do not know whether it is practicable, or even in line with what I have suggested. Then, there is the matter of electric fixtures. The minister has taken into consideration several items that are to be changed. I submit that electric fixtures are a necessity in the homes of workmen in our cities to-day. Surely an electric fixture with two bulbs on it cannot be called a luxury; yet if such a fixture costs $5 there is a 20 per cent tax on it, which adds another dollar to the cost. Having regard to the high cost of building and of all kinds of materials that go into the construction of houses, I ask that the minister consider this matter of electric fixtures. I do not ask him to exempt the fancy chandeliers that cost anywhere from $50 to $1,000, but I do say that the cheap chandelier costing from $5 to $10, that is necessary in every workingman's hou e where electric lighting is used, is not a luxury. The matter of furs should be considered; I believe that the minister is doing something in that regard. I have several protests also with regard to the present proposals affecting jewellery. But all these matters are of minor importance compared with the necessity of devising some better way of collecting these taxes. I repeat that the minister and the Government will be well advised if they have these taxes paid by the wholesaler, manufacturer or jobber.

Mr. BELAND: On no occasion have I listened with greater pleasure and gratification to my hon. friend from Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) than I have this evening, because I find that for the first time I am able to agree with him on an economic subject. I entirely agree that these taxes should be collected from the wholesale trade. I assure the minister that the criticism that comes from hon. members on this side is criticism of a constructive nature. I have listened with close attention to the statement of the proposed alterations in the resolution submitted a few days ago by the minister. I failed to observe any proposed change with regard to medical supplies for hospitals.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is a change in that respect.

Mr. BELAND: Well, I am glad there is. I know that the minister has received delegations from the hospitals. It would be a great hardship if the cost of medicines to the hospitals were increased by these taxes. Now, I desire to obtain some information in regard to a particular subject. Some people are in the habit of procuring their clothes in a different way from that ordinarily adopted by most people. They buy the cloth separately from a dealer and pay, let us say, $30 for the tweed or whatever it may be. They then pay $20 to a tailor to make the suit, making the total cost $50. I wonder if a man who gets a suit of clothes in that way is subject to taxation and in what manner the minister proposes to collect the tax from him. I should also like to know whether ham and bacon as subject to taxation.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: They are not taxable; they are foodstuffs.

Mr. BELAND: I ask the question because it was stated in some newspapers that they were taxable, I wondered at the statement, because I knew that all food was supposed to be free from taxation. Now, Mr. Chairman, that is all I propose to say. Let us be short, and sweet if possible.

Mr. BUREAU: Suave.

Mr. NESBITT: Before the Committee rises I want to say a few words with reference to the mode of collection. My hon. friend from Brantford said that the ordinary merchant had to charge to a certain extent the goods he sold and therefore he would have to charge not only the price of the goods but the amount of the duty, and he therefore wanted to collect through the wholesaler or manufacturer. I should like to know if he would not have to pay the wholesaler or manufacturer the price that he would have to charge, and if he would not have to charge that just the same as though he added it to the price in his store.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: He gets a profit in one case and not in the other.

Mr. NESBITT: My hon. friend says he will get a profit in one case and not in the other. That is exactly what the minister wants to avoid. Not only would he have to pay the profit in one case but he would pay a pyramid of profits. That is to say, he would pay a profit to the manufacturer and pay a profit on that profit to the wholesaler. He would pay two profits, one to the manufacturer and one to the wholesaler, and besides, there would be lost the very excellent result that the person purchasing would know exactly what duty he was paying so that he would be careful the next time to buy goods that were cheaper and by that means lower the cost of living not only to himself but, by the influence it would have on others, to his neighbours as well. As to the cost of collecting the tax, I have not much hesitation in saying that the cost to the Government would be less through the manufacturer and wholesaler. I have not much doubt about that. I do not know exactly how the minister proposes to collect the taxes through the retailer, but he has hold us that it will be through the Inland Revenue Department. Let me say that the suggestion that has been thrown out by a good many members to-night that it would materially add to the expenses of the retailer to keep track of this tax is purely imaginary and is offered for the express purpose of trying to shift the responsibility to someone else instead of the retailer.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: That is not right.

Mr. NESBITT: Well, I have had all sorts of petitions from retailers who want to avoid it. Every one wants to avoid paying taxes if he can, and I have no doubt that there is a similar anxiety on the part of most people to avoid being made the instruments by means of which the tax shall be collected. But as to the excessive cost to which the retailer will be put, that is purely imaginary. Nowadays every retail business in Canada gives a counter slip to the purchaser. It is proposed, as I understand it, to enter the duty separate from the cost of the goods on the counter slip, and any girl in two hours could add up the sales of an ordinary establishment of $1,000 a day. There would be a column for the tax and a column for the price of the goods, and that I imagine will be invented almost immediately by almost all retailers if they have not got it already; and any ordinary young girl who is smart and quick would be able to add that sales book in two hours. So that there is no earthly necessity for any one to hire an extra clerk if he is doing a reasonable amount of business in a day. As to the ordinary country merchant, he also nowadays gives counter slips, and if he is doing a business of $100 a day it will not take him fifteen minutes to add up at night the amount of tax that goes with those sales. He would have no necessity whatever to employ extra help to do that.

Mr. BELAND: I do not agree with you.

Mr. NESBITT: I am not in the retail business at the present time, but I was in it for several years and I know what I am talking about. From experience, I can tell you that what I have said is absolutely correct; it will not necessarily add to an ordinary retail business $5 a year of excess cost.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Nonsense!

Mr. NESBITT: There is no nonsense about it.

Mr. BELAND: It is a long time since you were in the retail business.

Mr. NESBITT: Any merchant who does a thousand dollars and upwards of business in a day keeps a clerk purposely to check these sales. Go into any store in Ottawa and you will find in the cash desk a girl who checks these bills passed in from the sales clerk. She checks those bills and adds them in her sales book, and if she has a tax column she can add that column at the same time. Every decent merchant in the country that does business of $500 a day keeps a sales book and at night it must balance with the cash that is turned in. I make this statement only because there were a good many on the other side who spoke on the subject, and I want the minister to take that into consideration at the same time that he is considering the statements made by my hon. friends that the tax should be collected through the manufacturer and wholesaler. It is all right to collect the sales tax through the manufacturer and the wholesaler. I was a strong advocate of the sales tax myself, but I thought it should stop at the manufacturer and the importer. It is doubled to a certain extent when it goes to the wholesaler, and I would not want to see it go to the retailer, because that would be treble. It is proper to collect the turnover tax from the manufacturer and the wholesaler, but I believe that collecting the excess tax or the luxury tax, so-called, through the retailer is probably the very best system that could be adopted because of the results that will be obtained. That is a part of the cost of living. The hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Pedlow) suggested—and I have no doubt he is perfectly right—that the reduction in the price of boots was probably because there was a sale on that day. I only stated the fact exactly as I knew it, that it happened at the same time as the Budget was announced. Nearly every witness that came before the committee that investigated the cost of living last year said that there was too much spread between the price that the merchant paid for boots and shoes and the price he sold them at. The average was sixty per cent, and that is too much profit in any retail business.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: Is it the intention to charge the 20 per cent on mechanical player pianos on the whole piano or on the player action alone, as before?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have been asked to give Hansard, for the benefit of hon. members, a list of the changes to be made in order that members may see what is proposed in tomorrow morning's Hansard. I have much pleasure in complying with the request that the list of the proposed changes, some of which may be the outcome of the suggestions we have received to-night, be published. I would therefore move:

That a list of the proposed changes be placed upon Hansard.

Motion agreed to.

The list of suggested changes is as follows:

In the case of boots and shoes, etc., clothing (men's and boys'), including coats, vests and pants, whether sold separately or together; women's and misses' dresses, skirts, suits, and coats, a change is proposed to be made by charging 15 per cent on the excess over the prices fixed instead of charging the 10 per cent on the whole value.

For the purpose of preventing the tax being evaded by the purchase of parts of suits or dresses, the cost exempt from taxation is fixed at $12 on trousers, $5 on waistcoats, and $25 on coats. In like manner the cost exempt from taxation is fixed at $15, on skirts, except silk, and at $35 on women's coats, except silk.

Besides changing the tax on boots so that it applies only on the excess, it is also proposed to extend the exemptions to topboots not less than 12 inches in height, such as are used in lumbering, mining and fishing industries, and to river driving boots fitted with caulks on the soles thereof.

It is proposed to raise the exempt value of fur coats from $100 to $200, and to reduce the exempt value of fur robes from $100 to $50. Under the original proposals the whole fur list, except coats and robes was placed in the 20 per cent class, and without any exemption. It is proposed to drop this provision and to make the following additions to the 10 per cent list (paragraph 1, sub-section (a)).

Gloves, the component material of chief value being fur, in excess of $15 per pair.

Caps, the component material of chief value being fur, in excess of $15 each.

Muffs and neckpieces, the component material of chief value being fur, in excess of $35 each.

Other wearing apparel, not otherwise specified, the component material of chief value being fur.

The following additions to the same list are suggested:

Corsets, in excess of $5.

Walking sticks.

Knitted sweaters and knitted sweater coats in excess of $15.

Ebony and imitation ivory toilet ware.

Note: Ebony and ivory toilet ware were included in the 20 per cent list. Ebony is struck out of that list and transferred to the 10 per cent list. Under customs rulings imitation ivory being subject to the same 20 per cent tax, imitation ivory is also placed specifically in the 10 per cent list.

The item of plated ware in the 10 per cent list is proposed to be changed so as to confine the item to articles plated with gold or silver not otherwise provided for household or office use, as a result the tax is dropped on articles plated with nickel.

Clocks and watches in excess of $10 each are added, and the tax on velvets, velveteens, plush silk and artificial silk fabrics applies to articles sold in excess of $2 a yard.

It is suggested to change the provision as to lace, including collars or collarettes and all manufactures of lace, and to provide a tax on braid, as follows:

Lace and braid in excess of 25 cents per yard;

Collars and collarettes of lace and all manufactures of lace in excess of $1 per yard;

Ribbons of all kinds and materials, except typewriter ribbons, in excess of 50 cents per yard;

The changes proposed in the 20 per cent class, paragraph (a) sub-paragraph (b), are as follows:

As already noted, ebony toilet ware is carried into the 10 per cent class.

Fur wearing apparel n.o.p. is dropped.

The tax on oriental rugs is proposed to be reduced from 20 to 15 per cent.

It is proposed to take carpets from the 20 per cent list and provide for a 10 per cent tax on the amount paid for carpets and rugs in excess of $6 per lineal yard of 27 inches in width.

Articles usually sold by jewellers, covered by the different resolutions, are combined so as to fall within the 20 per cent list, with a limitation as to license,, as follow:

Cigar and cigarette holders and pipes in excess of $2.50 each; cigar and cigarette cases; ash trays and match boxes of gold or silver; humidors and smoking stands; hunting and bowie knives; gold and silver handled pocket knives and pencils, and gold fountain pens; gold, silver and ivory toilet ware; articles of silver not otherwise provided for in this resolution adapted for household or office use; silver or gold deposit ware; articles commonly or commercially known as jewellery, whether real or imitation, for personal use or for adornment of the person.

Any person, firm or corporation, including the jewellery branch of a departmental store whose chief business is the selling of jewellery by retail, shall obtain a special license to sell jewellery and other articles specified in this resolution, in which case the tax payable shall be 10 per centum on the value of the total sales of such establishment or branch, under regulations to be made by the Minister of Customs and Inland Revenue.

It is proposed to abandon the present tax on chandeliers at 20 per cent, and provide for a tax of 10 per cent to be paid by the manufacturer as in the case of articles falling under section 3 of the resolution as follows:

Chandeliers, except for churches, in excess of $12 each; wall brackets, in excess of $3 each; gas and electric light fixtures, in excess of $3 each; not elsewhere provided.

The changes proposed in paragraph 3 are as follows: Confectionery which may be classed as candy or a substitute for candy. A tax of 10 per cent on all candy, except in original packages and original labelled pieces, bearing the name of the manufacturer on the packages or labels, retailing for 10 cents or less; also confectionery described and known as "gross goods" as sold to children at one cent each. These exceptions not to apply to candy at any time when sold by the manufacturer in bulk.

On chewing gum or substitutes therefor, the tax is reduced from 10 to 3 per cent.

Further suggestions will be made later with reference to pianos, organs and other musical instruments.

It is proposed to increase the tax on automobiles adopted for passenger use, retailing at $3,000 each, from 15 to 20 per cent.

It is suggested that the tax on playing cards be changed as follows:

For every 54 cards, or a fraction of 54 in each package, when selling at $24 or less, per gross packages, 15 cents per pack. When selling in excess of $24 per gross packages, but not in excess of $36 per gross packages, 25 cents per pack. When selling in excess of $36 per gross packages, 50 cents per pack.

According to customs decisions, the resolutions providing for an increased tax of $2 per gallon on spirits, lime juice or fruit juices, tinctures and medicines, means a tax of $4 on lime juices, medicines and perfumes, as the tax is held to be cumulative. It is proposed that this tax shall not be cumulative; that there shall be only one advance on the present rates for the alcoholic contents in lime juices, patent medicines, etc., of $2 in place of $4.

A reduction is also proposed to be made on imported medicinal or medicated wines, vermouth and ginger wines, and patent proprietary medicines containing not more than 40 per cent of proof spirits, from 30 to 20 per cent.

Reductions are also proposed in connection with the sporting goods list. Under that list at present, children's toys, games, etc., are exempt as are articles not over 50 cents in value. The exemptions are extented as follows so that the tax applies to baseball bats and baseballs in excess of $1.25; baseball masks and gloves in excess of $1.50; Skates in excess of $2.00 a pair; toboggans and hand-sleds in excess of $3.00; footballs in excess of $3.00; lacrosse sticks in excess of $1.50; hockey stocks in excess of 75 cents.

It is proposed to abandon the present stamp taxes now collected on patent and proprietary medicines perfumery, etc.

Progress reported.

POST OFFICE ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Hon. Martin Burrell, (Minister of Customs and Inland Revenue) the House went into committee on the following proposed resolution, Mr. Boivin in the Chair:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Post Office Act, chapter sixty-six of the Revised Statutes, 1906, and to provide,—

1. That paragraph (k) of subsection one of section nine of the said Act be amended so as to provide that the maximum registration fee on letters and other matter passing by the mails shall be increased from five to ten cents for each letter or article.

2. That section fifty-two of the said Act be amended so as to provide that the rate of postage on newspapers and periodical publications printed and published in Canada, and issued less frequently than at intervals of one month, and on all specimen newspapers, be increased from one cent to two cents for each pound weight, or any fraction of a pound weight.

3. That subsections two and three of section fifty-three of the said Act, as amended by section five of chapter fifty-three of the statutes of 1908, be repealed, and the following substituted therefor:—

"(2) Newspapers and periodicals required to be transmitted by mail within a distance of forty miles from the place of publication, the publication of which is of no greater frequency than once a week, which have a circulation by mail of not more than one thousand copies per issue, and which are published in any city, town or village which has a population of not more than five thousand persons, shall be transmitted free of postage within such area.

"(3) Newspapers and periodicals which are required to be transmitted for a greater distance than is mentioned in the last preceding subsection, or the publication of which is of greater frequency than once a week, shall be subject to postage at the rate of one cent on and after the first day of January, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-one, and until the first day of January, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-two, and one and one-half cents thereafter, for each pound weight or any fraction of a pound weight, and such postage shall be prepaid by postage stamps or otherwise as the Postmaster General from time to time directs."

4. That sections seventy-five, seventy-six, seventy-nine and eighty-one of the said Act be repealed, and the following substituted therefor:

"75. All letters and other mailable matter sent by the Governor General or by any minister or department of the Government at the seat of Government, shall be free of Canada postage under such regulations as are from time to time made in that respect by the Governor in Council; and the provisions of any other statute inconsistent with the provisions of this Act, or conferring any greater powers of sending or having sent mailable matter free of postage than are conferred by this Act, are hereby repealed.

"76. (1) Letters and other mailable matter sent by the Speaker or Clerk of the Senate or of the House of Commons at the seat of Government shall be free of Canada postage, and letters and other mailable matter sent by any member of either House at the seat of Government during any session of Parliament shall be free of Canada postage. Provided that such letters relate wholly to the affairs of such member of the Senate or of the House of Commons of Canada, or to official or public business of the Government of Canada, and that all such mailable matter other than letters in their usual and ordinary form relates wholly to the official or public business of the Government of Canada.

"(2) All letters posted for transmission under this section must be franked by the personally written signature of the member of the Senate or of the House of Commons sending the same. All mailable matter other than letters sent under this section may, however, be franked by the facsimile of the signature of such member as well as by his personally written signature.

"(3) If the signature or facsimile thereof of a member of the Senate or House of Commons be employed for the purpose of franking any letters or other mailable matter except those mentioned in the foregoing section, the person so improperly using it shall be liable to a penalty of three hundred dollars for each offence, to be recovered upon summary conviction.

"79. Members of either the Senate or the House of Commons may, during the recess of Parliament, send by mail, free of Canada postage, all papers printed by order of either House."

Mr. FIELDING: I suppose the minister will give a general statement of the purpose of the changes?

Mr. BURRELL: In answer to my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) I may say that the resolutions practically explain themselves, and I presume that any lengthy discussion of them may perhaps better take place on the second reading of the Bill when it is introduced. But I will make a running comment on some of the sections. The first section is to alter that clause of the old Act which provides for a five-cent registration fee. It is proposed that ten cents shall be substituted. Last year there was a loss of something like a quarter of a million dollars on that portion of the postal service, and this year that will be seriously augmented by the fact that there is an increase in salaries and bonuses, etc., which would probably reach something like $1,500,000.

Mr. FIELDING: Will the hon. gentleman say what he means by a loss in the registration branch?

Mr. BURRELL: There was an actual loss of a quarter of a million dollars in carrying on that special branch of the service.

Mr. FIELDING: Is there any other expense beyond that of the extra clerk for registration in each office?

Mr. BURRELL: According to the return which I have here, the expense of 1918 was approximately three-quarters of a million dollars, the total revenue obtained from the fees collected from this service was approximately half a million dollars there being a loss as between revenue and expenditure to the Post Office Department in the administration of the registration system of approximately a quarter of a million. I am afraid I cannot explain at the present moment the details of the practical administration that would put the expenditure up to that figure. Those are the figures that are given to me as to the cost of administration and the revenue, and the loss entailed is something like a quarter of a million dollars. It was proposed therefore to put the fee up to ten cents which is the same as that in the United States and practically the same as in England, although England runs from a smaller figure up to as high, I believe, as forty cents according to the compensation. I might also add that this will be a benefit to, and will be welcomed by, the rural postmasters inasmuch as it will increase their basis of revenue and therefore increase their remuneration.

The next section provides that instead of one cent on papers published less often than once a month, that is quarterlies, and on specimen newspapers, the rate shall be raised from one cent to two cents a pound. I may say that this increase is largely for the purpose of getting a better revenue out of the very large number of specimen newspapers that are sent around through the country, and which are, in effect, a species of advertising by the paper for the purpose of getting new subscribers. I am not aware that there is any very logical objection to the proposed change.

The next section is that dealing with numbers 2 and 3; with the substitution first of all in number 2 of a rate on weekly newspapers which hitherto, within a radius of forty miles selected by the newspaper itself, were allowed to go free. It is proposed now that the centre of the forty-mile range shall be the place of publication. This was designed to overcome what was previously open to criticism, a newspaper selecting its point in the forty miles between two large cities in which case it could take advantage of those two large cities. The object of this section when placed in the old Act was to encourage the very small weekly newspapers throughout the country, and certainly was not intended to be abused in the way I have suggested. Therefore it is proposed in the first place to make the forty miles start from the actual place of publication, and for those papers that have a circulation of less than a thousand to go free and those over a thousand circulation to pay the same rate that an ordinary newspaper would pay, limiting also the place to a five thousand population to encourage the smaller newspapers and not to encourage in any way or to benefit those weekly newspapers that are published in cities.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Is the place of publication the place where a paper is printed? For example it is customary in certain parts of the country to have the paper printed at some distance from where the editor and the office of the paper are located. There are papers in the province from which I come that have no printing press but they arrange with the press, perhaps a hundred miles away, to do the printing. The copy is sent to that place and the papers already printed are sent back and distributed from the point where the editor and proprietor happen to live. What would happen in such a case as that?

Mr. BURRELL: Well, I should think there could not be any doubt about it. It would be the place from which the newspapers are distributed, that is where the editorial rooms are, because under the old Act it is obvious they would not have got the advantage of free distribution, because the radius was forty miles. I assume that the point of distribution would be the place of publication.

The next clause is that which raises the rate of newspapers of more frequent publication than a week—that is of the daily and semi-weekly papers—from a quarter of a cent a pound up to a cent a pound, going into operation on January 1st next, and one cent and a half on the following January. I may say in regard to this that it was to be half a cent in Canada some time ago, and for some reason, about which I am not quite clear, it was put down to a quarter of a cent. There are something like 87,000,000 pounds of newspapers carried in this country at a quarter of a cent a pound constituting about fifty-four per cent of the total weight of mailable matter. The revenue derived from that quarter of a cent is about $290,000 whereas the total revenues are $25,000,000. That is to say, newspapers, which constitute fifty-four per cent of the total weight pay one per cent of the cost, and the department has estimated that it was losing well up towards $5,000,000 a year by carrying newspapers at a quarter of a cent a pound. They are actually out $2,000,000 in the cost of equipment and necessary material—the actual disbursements—and considering this and the different expenses in the way of salaries and other items they estimate that the loss would probably run up to $5,000,000.

Mr. NESBITT: Does not the minister think it is a pretty big jump from a quarter of a cent a year until that one cent is arrived at? The newspapers are in trouble now owing to the price of newsprint and other reasons.

Mr. BURRELL: I need hardly tell my hon. friend that I hope I have sufficient sympathy with the point of view taken by the newspapers. I am quite aware that they feel their position very difficult at the present time in regard to the cost and difficulty of obtaining newsprint. I will admit that it seems a pretty big jump from a quarter of a cent to a cent. On the other hand I think it is only fair to point out to the House the fact that the Railway Commission has recently given the railways power to raise the rates on mailable matter; and if—as I have no doubt will happen—they raise their rates at least a hundred per cent, even if we made a raise of only half a cent we would be still in exactly the same position that we are in to-day with respect to loss to the department. It should also be pointed out that one cent—even though it may seem big calculated in percentages—will be hopelessly inadequate compared with the expense of carrying the newspapers. Newspapers in United States, as a matter of fact, to-day are charged one and a half cents for their carriage, whereas we only propose to charge one cent. However, in respect to this—which I know is a very debatable matter; several members of the House have already spoken to me and said they would like to discuss it and put their remarks on record—I would suggest that the subject can be very well discussed at greater length when the second reading of the Bill takes place, and as to any suggestions the Government, of course, will give consideration whatever may or may not be done.

Mr. McGIBBON (Muskoka): Is there any legitimate reason in the public interest why all newspapers should not pay the actual expense of transportation? Why should not newspapers, even under a thousand circulation, pay for their carriage and let them charge that cost up to circulation?

Mr. BURRELL: I have no doubt there are other hon. members who could answer that question. Of course the view of the Post Office Department generally would be, putting it as a matter of principle, that all service should pay for itself. If we did it in this particular case the newspapers would certainly have to pay a vastly bigger rate of increase than we have even suggested. Of course it is not up to that rate now. Then, one is bound to point out that conditions are somewhat different from what they are in the United States, on account of the enormous stretch of country in Canada and the comparative sparsity of the population. I suppose, too, it would be urged by the newspapers that a newspaper is almost regarded as an absolute necessity and is a great educationl factor, and to charge to the extent that my hon. friend suggests would practically, I have no doubt, put a very large percentage of the newspapers of the country absolutely out of business.

Mr. McGIBBON (Muskoka): Not if they increased their rates. It is a matter of business.

Mr. BURRELL: Yes. It is a matter of business.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): Would it not be possible for the minister, before the second reading of the Bill takes place, to consider the advisability of increasing the distribution from one thousand to two thousand? Perhaps in the western provinces the proposition might meet with the general approval of a large number of the weekly papers, but when you come to the older provinces like Ontario and Quebec you will find that the bulk of the weekly papers have a circulation of from 1,500 to 2,000, and many even more than that. I certainly think the suggestion is worthy of the serious consideration of the minister. I would also call his attention to the fact that he is now increasing the rate on the other weekly papers and magazines, not one hundred per cent, but four hundred per cent. That is a tremendous jump to make, and I would ask if it is not possible to consider a more reasonable increase at present.

Mr. MICHAUD: Before the minister makes his reply I would like to read a statement which I have received from the Graphic Limited, a newspaper published at Campbellton, N.B. The letter is from Mr. H. B. Anslow:

> We ask you to press for the substitution of the following for the above section:
> "(2) Local weekly newspapers which have a circulation outside their own town or village of not more than 2,000 copies each week, shall be transmitted by mail free of postage within a distance of forty miles of office of publication."

I understand that under the resolution only 1,000 copies are allowed to be distributed. The writer of this letter adds:

> The lot of the weekly publisher is yearly becoming more difficult, until many of us will be crowded out and much good work being done by this class of papers will be lost to the Dominion.

I am advised that the publisher of this newspaper will have to close down his business if he is not allowed the higher circulation.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I shall await the Bill as printed before discussing at any length the subject matter involved in this resolution. But at this stage I wish to state that if the Post Office is in need of a larger revenue there are other means than the present one which might be found to achieve that result. Let me say at once, Mr. Chairman, that the Post Office Department before 1896 was an institution not worthy of the time as regards business methods, and huge deficits followed in succession year after year. But when Sir William Mulock took charge he introduced business methods, and we all know with what result. I may say that in his day he thought of establishing the zone system in order to prevent what were merely advertising agencies benefiting by the low rate of newspaper postage. However, he finally concluded that we might perhaps continue the system, but he cut down the waste as much as possible, and succeeded to such an extent that the department soon became conspicuous as a place where sound business methods were practised. I claim no merit when I say that I followed in the footsteps of Sir William Mulock, and that year after year we had surpluses instead of deficits. We established, I think, a fair rate of postage on newspapers and magazines, and I gave a preference to British magazines and newspapers by barring out the yellow press and yellow magazines from the neighbouring republic. I am sorry to say that that system which gave so much benefit to our settlers in the West was abandoned somewhere round 1912. Now, in order to provide more revenue for the Treasury my hon. friend comes before this committee and proposes to materially increase the revenue of the department by cutting down the privileges of the press and by establishing the zone system. If he wishes to get more revenue I would advise him to chop off the heads of useless officers in that top-heavy staff which he has in the various post offices. The population of Canada has not increased so materially in the past ten years that in cities, for instance, like Quebec the post office staff should be increased from 90 to over 300. In the city of Montreal the post office staff in 1911 was something like 700; I am informed that to-day it numbers over 2,000. I make bold to say, Mr. Chairman, that at least 200 of those employees in the Quebec office could be discharged, and at least 2,000 at the Montreal post office. I am not speaking of Halifax, or of Toronto, or of Winnipeg, but I daresay that there the same wasteful system has been established by the administration of the department.

But this is beside the mark. We are speaking of the new methods which it has been thought wise to introduce in order to increase the revenue. I have no love to waste on the press of Canada, as members of this committee know; but I put my grievances aside and I stand here this evening as an opponent of any tax on freedom of thought. You can tax my shoes, you can tax my vestments, you can tax my investments,—if perchance I have any,—you can tax almost anything I possess; but, Mr. Chairman, do not tax freedom of thought in this country,—and that is what is being done under this proposal. And besides, you are making no distinction between a real newspaper and a sheet which under the name of newspaper does not convey news, does not disseminate ideas, but is merely a medium for certain fortunate firms who are investing their excess profits in advertising their wares extensively before the public. Let me read the protest of a young Canadian author on this subject. It appeared in Saturday Night some days ago and is as follows:

> I wish somebody would explain just why the Government of this Dominion is so intent on playing Herod to those luckless infants of arts and letters which lie within reach of its broadsword. At a time when Canada is struggling to express herself through her own distinctively Canadian periodicals, and is doing her youthful best to become something more than what the botanists might term an "obligate parasite" on the United States, it seems doubly unfortunate that the life of many of our native publications should be nipped out by a Postal Zone Bill which carries the threat of an increase of 400 per cent.

As my hon. friend from Lambton has just said:

> —in mailing charges within a distributing range of 300 miles, and an increase of at least 800 per cent for still wider areas of distribution.

You have there in a few pointed sentences the effect of this legislation which is introduced this evening. You are increasing by 400 per cent and in some cases by 800 per cent your tax on the press of Canada. He continues:

> We want to be something more than a back-door neighbour of Uncle Sam. We want a voice of our own, and a literature of our own. To have these we must have those publications which remain less involved with the crowded events of the hour than is the daily press. Our authors have survived, it is true, without the protection of that respectable copyright legislation which most countries extend to toilers in the garden of the imagination. They may even survive a cutting down of their home market. But postal impositions which tend to restrict the disseminations of thought to merely sectional dimensions is retrogressive, and governmental economies which are bound to hamper the diffusion of culture are going to prove repugnant to the open-minded Canadian. It may cost a little more in the bulking up of budgets to encourage our magazines instead of sabering them. But they are trying to make themselves worth the cost. And in the end it is money well spent—as our older and wiser neighbour to the south of us discovered before she went through her own low fever of postal reform.
> ARTHUR STRINGER.

Let us put the question on a higher plane, if I may so express myself. This country extends from ocean to ocean. We have been told repeatedly in years gone by that our business is from East to West and from West to East, not from North to South. We have been told that we should be satisfied with interchange of commerce between the various provinces of this Dominion; we have been told that what we need most is a healthy national sentiment from the Pacific to the Atlantic and from the Atlantic to the Pacific. That is a sound policy. We must build a Canada in which the man from the East will, on broad issues, think alike with the man from the West. There must be interchange of ideas between those distant provinces. What are you doing by this legislation? By this postal rate you are preventing the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Buchanan), who is an excellent journalist, whose paper I like to read even when it is against me, from sending his newspaper into Eastern Canada, and papers published in Montreal, papers published in Quebec, papers published in Halifax, will not circulate in the various provinces west of lake Superior. Is that a healthy condition for this country to establish? I ask my hon. friend to pause and to think seriously before putting this legislation through. You are dividing this country; you are creating the very sectional sentiment which every true patriot must combat to the best of his ability. You are complaining of having three political groups. My good friend the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Currie) carries with him the claymore of his ancestors whenever he meets the gentlemen who represent the Farmers' party in this House. He complains bitterly about this evidence of a purely sectional group in Canada. He does not want to see those farmers and their farmer associations thinking only for themselves and of themselves. He wants them to be imbued with the thoughts, ideas and principles prevailing in the industrial centres of Ontario. He is not far wrong in that, so far as ideas are concerned.

Mr. CURRIE: First of all, I should like to know when I said all this. The hon. member cannot point to a single word that I said this session or last session against the Farmers' group. The hon. member is framing all this up out of his imagination, but it is so beautiful that I cannot help listening to it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I must remind my hon. friend that I have been a journalist, and perhaps some stretches of imagination are permissible. But is it not a fact that this legislation is sectional legislation?

Mr. BURRELL: In what respect?

Mr. LEMIEUX: You are going to close the avenues between the East and the West.

Mr. DOHERTY: By what provision of this legislation are we closing the avenues and making the thing sectional?

Mr. LEMIEUX: By creating a zone system and giving them a special rate.

Mr. DOHERTY: Has the hon. gentleman read the resolutions, and if so, does he not see that there is no zone system in them?

Mr. BURRELL:: I must say to my hon. friend very confidently that while the zone system was discussed and considered, the idea was abandoned, and there is in the resolution no zone system except the old regulations which obtained even when he was Postmaster General.

Mr. CURRIE: I might also say for the benefit of the hon. gentleman that when the Bill comes down I will try to take occasion to remind him of a few things that happened during his regime as Postmaster General, when we used to have a few words to say in the House.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am quite ready to wait until the Bill is printed, but at first sight, I say that you are increasing the rates per zone. That is how I read the resolution, and whilst a certain rate will prevail in one zone, the same rate will not prevail in another zone.

Mr. BURRELL: That is not so.

Mr. LEMIEUX: So much the better if I am mistaken, but I read the resolution that way, and I will wait until the Bill is printed. But if I am in error, I am in error in company with many journalists, because, as former Postmaster General, I have been showered with protests from all parts of Canada against the resolution which has been presented this evening.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Probably they are reading your own papers.

Mr. FIELDING: How does this resolution affect the transportation of magazines?

Mr. BURRELL: A magazine is not regarded specifically as a magazine; it comes under the newspaper class. Has my hon friend (Mr. Lemieux) concluded his remarks?

Mr. LEMIEUX: No. My hon. friend says that the rate is not raised.

Mr. BURRELL: I never said so at all. I explained that the rate was raised, and I thought I explained it in fairly clear English. I said that no zone system was established except in so far as it has always been established, even during my hon. friend's regime, in the forty mile limit for weekly newspapers.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Clause 3 reads:

That subsections two and three of section fifty-three of the said Act, as amended by section five of chapter fifty-three of the statutes of 1908, be repealed, and the following substituted therefor:—

(2) Newspapers and periodicals required to be transmitted by mail within a distance of forty miles from the place of publication, the publication of which is of no greater frequency than once a week, which have a circulation by mail of not more than one thousand copies per issue, and which are published in any city, town or village which has a population of not more, than five thousand persons, shall be transmitted free of postage within such area.

But without such area, what will be the rate?

(3) Newspapers and periodicals which are required to be transmitted for a greater distance than is mentioned in the last preceding subsection—

Is not that another zone?

—or the publication of which is of greater frequency than once a week, shall be subject to postage at the rate of one cent—

There is an increase there.

—on and after the first day of January, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-one, and until the first day of January, one thosand nine hundred and twenty-two, and one and one-half cents thereafter, for each pound weight or any fraction of a pound weight, and such postage shall be prepaid by postage stamps or otherwise as the Postmaster General from time to time directs.

My expression may be loose, but I am, in essence, absolutely correct. You are raising the rate for passing from one district to another, if you prefer the word "district" to the word "zone", and you are adding six times the rate for passing from one district to the other. My hon. friend is playing upon words, and that is unworthy of him. I say that he is creating a zone system, and for passing from one zone to another he increased the rate. The journalists and newspaper proprietors know what they are talking about and they are protesting against this resolution, because they know that in the end they will have to pay the piper. What I am saying this evening—with some warmth, I agree—is on behalf of the real newspaper, the torch-bearer, not the advertisement monger. I am speaking for the real journalist, the real newspaper, the disseminator of news and knowledge as the word is defined in the Post Office Act. I agree that, for many years, many so-called newspapers have been transgressing the law, but it is the duty of the Postmaster General to prevent that. I regret that the Postmaster General is not in the House, and again I say that, precedent or no precedent—perhaps this is a hobby of mine—ministers who have a seat in the other chamber should, by the rules of Parliament, be allowed to appear before this assembly to explain their measures, just as ministers having a seat in this House should be allowed to appear in the other chamber to explain their measures. I think that reform has to come some day. As I said a moment ago, when the Bill is printed we shall have occasion to discuss this question further; but I regret that the Government has come to the conclusion that knowledge, thought and education should be taxed. If was under the impression that having taxed almost everything they could think of, they would at least respect those untaxable ethereal things such as knowledge, genius, art and public opinion as expressed by the writers in the press. I think that on the whole, with very few exceptions, we have a clean press in Canada. On the whole, the periodicals of Canada are quite a credit to the country. In Toronto, in Montreal, in Halifax and in the West there are periodicals which are a credit to this country. From what I can gather, the Canadian periodicals have an elevating effect on the public mind, and I cannot resist the temptation to read a letter which I have received bearing date May 12, 1920 from the "Woman's Century, a national journal of education and progress by Canadian women, and official organ of the National Council of Women of Canada." I should like my hon. friend to listen to this letter, because it is most important and has a special bearing on this question. With the cost of newsprint as it is, and with the high cost of living and the increase in wages, the task of publishing a newspaper or periodical to-day bears very heavily on the shoulders of the poor publisher. The letter I have received is as follews:

Dear Sir: I see that the Hon. Mr. Burrell, Minister of Customs and Inland Revenue, has given notice of a resolution to be moved in the House regarding an increase in postage rates on newspapers, magazines, etc.

As President of the Womans' Century, I wish to point out certain things which I would beg you to take into very serious consideration on behalf of this publication and of the work that it is doing.

The magazine was launched in 1914 and has gone steadily forward in spite of the serious years of war and reconstruction. It is the organ of several national and provincial women's organizations throughout the Dominion and has a large circulation amongst women of all types. Its great object has been to educate women along social lines, to give them a good, stable understanding of public questions, and to put before them certain ideals for the nation. To this end such methods as "Made-in-Canada" programmes, child welfare, public health, Canadianization and many other kindred subjects have received very constant and careful attention.

During the reconstruction period we have had articles appealing to the women to use their influence in steadying our national life and in opposing any form of unconstitutional movement or Bolshevism. That the paper is doing fine work is proved by constant letters of appreciation and interests from people all over the Dominion and outside it.

If this bill should be passed, this good work would be very seriously hampered, and I feel one of the contributions that women are giving to the national life would suffer a kind of defeat.

I trust that you will be able to give your serious consideration and do all in your power to help such magazines as this over the threatened danger. I might add that should magazines of this type be cut down, then there would be an incoming of American magazines with non-Canadian ideals, which in my opinion would be most dangerous to our country.

Yours sincerely,

Constance E. Hamilton,
President, Woman's Century Limited.

I trust my hon. friend will pay attention to this appeal and take into due consideration the statements which are made in the letter. Now, let me tell my hon. friend that this increased tax on newspapers and periodicals will reduce the circulation of our Canadian periodicals and may bring some of them under the hammer. This tax may drive them to the wall, and it certainly will prevent this campaign of Canadianization which is mentioned in Madame Hamilton's letter, while the wealthy newspapers of the United States, including the Hearst publications, will flood our country. Already, Mr. Chairman, the people of Toronto are protesting vehemently against the inroads of such publications as the Hearst journals. The United States can dump their newspapers into Canada just as before the anti-dumping legislation of my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding), they dumped their excess goods here. They can dump their newspapers and their periodicals, and jam the postal cards with their yellow literature. Of course, Mr. Chairman, I am not speaking of such newspapers as the New York Post and the Tribune, or such periodicals as The Century, the Atlantic Magazine or Munsey's. I do not refer to such publications, but I am speaking of the ugly, yellow American magazine. By this legislation you are precluding our own people from publishing and circulating clean Canadian literature and clean Canadian thought and ideals, while you are opening the door to a flood of Yankee yellow literature.

Mr. BUCHANAN: I may as well confess at once that I happen to be personally interested in this resolution and I think it might be well if I placed before the committee the view of the Canadian daily newspapers. First of all, I will admit that when the question of postal rates came up they proposed an increase of their own which they were prepared to accept. The daily newspapers of Canada throught their association are in favour of a certain increase in postal rates, for the reason that they do not feel that the newspapers of Canada should be blamed for any deficit that might exist in the Postal Department. They do not claim that the increase will overcome that deficit, but they do not want the newspapers to be regarded as one of the causes of the deficit. The association met a month or more ago and conferred with the Postmaster-General and the Deputy Postmaster-General and proposed that the first increase should be from one-quarter cent to one-half cent. I know that the present proposal is not agreeable to many newspapers because they cannot meet such a heavy increase at once. They would rather have the increase from a quarter to a half in the beginning of next year, then an increase to a cent, and then an increase to a cent and a half if necessary. They take the ground that they do not want to be treated by the Post Office Department or the country as a charitable institution.

An hon. MEMBER: That is the case now.

Mr. BUCHANAN: I may point out that a newspaper that has to meet an increased cost of this character cannot place it immediately on their customers. Subscriptions have been taken from the 1st of January this year up to the present time, and they apply for two years, and until that time the rates cannot be raised in respect of persons who have subscribed so far. These increased costs will eventually mean increased subscription rates; there is no doubt about that. In Alberta at the present time, owing to the rising cost of newsprint and the proposed increase in postal rates, the newspapers of Calgary and Edmonton have increased their rate to 25 cents a week for papers delivered in those cities, a matter of $13 a year, and to outside points the subscription has been raised from $5 to $8. They are starting out to meet the increased cost that will surely have to come to all the newspapers in Canada. These rising costs they must meet by increased subscription and advertising rates. I am not asking the Government not to make any increase at all; I am quite agreeable to an increase, but I think it should be graded a little differently from what is proposed here. I would not object of the cent rate were put into effect later but newspaper men think that a 300 per cent increase is pretty heavy to start with. If we were to start with a half a cent, then increase to a cent and then to a cent and a half later, they might make it up on their extra costs.

I might say in behalf of the newspaper publishers that the situation is extremely serious among the newspapers of the country largely due to the increased cost of newsprint. Prior to the war newsprint was selling at $40 a ton. It will be $80 to the end of June, but it is going up to $120 the beginning of July. These costs, postal rates and all, have to be met. If the burden were made a little less at the present time and were increased gradually I do not think there would be any objection from the Canadian daily newspaper publishers. They did meet the Postmaster General and were agreeable to an increase of half a cent. They would like that increase to be put into effect first and that the other rates should be imposed in six months or a year if necessary. I thought it might be worth while for the committee to understand the attitude of the daily newspaper publishers and that is the reason why I have made this statement on the question.

Mr. McGIBBON (Muskoka): I am thoroughly in accord with the spirit of this resolution. Although I am directly, or indirectly, associated with the publication of newspapers I do not see why the Government should carry my newspapers or any other people's newspapers for nothing. It is an absolute business transaction and we have the postal department running behind to the extent of $7,000,000 a year. This is not business. We could stand it probably in pre-war days and have some excuse for it but to-day, when we have to exert ourselves to the very utmost, and to impose taxation to the limit, I do not see why we have any reason to carry on a department of this Government in such an unbusiness-like way. If it is true, as has been said, that there are hundreds of employees in different parts of this department that are useless, for goodness sake, let us get down to the time when we can run every department of this Government on a business basis—lop off the mouldering branches, get new methods if necessary and new men and let us put this country on a paying basis. Probably I have not the same respect for free thought that some hon. members have. I am very doubtful if the newspapers of this country contribute very much to it. The Associated Press is a great distributor of news and that goes over the wires. It is not transmitted by the mails. As far as the editorials are concerned, I think they reflect to a great extent the opinions of one man and that man is the editor, whoever he may be. This is a public matter; we are here to look after the business of the people of Canada; and what right have we to carry newspapers to the extent of $6,000,000 or $7,000,000 a year for nothing, at a time when we are imposing taxation on the people? If newspapers cannot carry on at the present rates they have their remedy the same as any other business man has; let them increase their advertising and circulation rates and not come down here and ask this Government to dole out charity to anybody. We are here to conduct the business of Canada in a business way and I hope the minister will go farther than the resolution specifies. I do not know why weekly newspapers should be carried free. They should carry a legitimate charge for transmitting their knowledge. Newspaper publication is a business; the publishers are conducting that business for a personal gain and profit. I have never yet seen any great philantrophy among the newspaper men and publishers of this country; it is absolutely cold business; and it is up to this Government to conduct the business of this country in such a cold-blooded manner as to make the business of the country pay as we go. Canada is heavily in debt. The Lord knows we have to impose burdens enough on the people, and I do not think any appeal to charity is at the present time in order.

Mr. PARENT: I want to say a word now, reserving until later whatever remarks I shall have to make on this subject. I understand that the purpose of this resolution is to get revenue, and such being the case probably the service of the department could be improved. I would call the attention of the minister to the fact that when a holiday falls on Monday the distribution of the mails in the cities is not made from Saturday noon till the next Tuesday which causes a good deal of damage to trade generally. My attention has been called by associations of merchants and all kinds of persons to this matter and I hope the minister will take it up with the department, and that the public in general will have reason to appreciate his intervention.

Mr. BURRELL: In answer to my hon. friend from East Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) who brought to my attention the fact that a thousand in regard to the weekly newspaper was a somewhat low figure for circulation free and that it should be extended to two thousand, there is a good deal in what he says. Now, I shall be personally very glad to give the matter consideration and I think we may take that up when the Bill is introduced. My hon. friend from Restigouche and Madawaska (Mr. Michaud) touched on the same question but he went somewhat farther and argued that as a matter of principle papers such as those that he referred to should be allowed free mailing privileges altogether. I do not know on what principle we could lay it down that newspapers of any kind should be allowed to pass through the mails free. If we carried that out to its logical conclusion, as my hon. friend from Muskoka (Mr. McGibbon) has pointed out, the rest of the people who are not interested in these papers would be subsidizing them out of their own pockets. However, I shall be glad to give consideration to the question of the weekly newspaper and take it up on the second reading.

I would like to say a word or two in answer to the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux), whose remarks, I must confess rather astonished me. I am not going to follow him in his remarks about what was prior to 1896 the excellence of the administration of the department and the unfortunate depravity since that time, because I do not think it would be worth while going into that question. All the reforms which my hon. friend, or his predecessor, put into effect ought to make us rejoice, and if there was a complete absence of all kinds of abuses during the administration he can take comfort to his soul that such was the case, although I think that probably I could pick some flaws,—however, I shall not go into that question. I can say, however, that if there is a tremendous extension and an increase in the number of employees far in excess of what is absolutely justified by the service. I am sure that every member of this House, I do not care on which side he sits, will feel that such an increase should be wiped out of existence and that the service should be put upon a basis of business efficiency. In that the hon. gentleman does not feel any more strongly than I do myself.

May I say a word about my hon. friend's remarks, the tone of which I thought was entirely uncalled-for. He speaks about this part of the resolution being a "tax on free thought." It is not a question of a tax; it is a question of trying to make up from the users of the mail something of the enormous deficit which imposes a burden on the whole country. It is not a question of taxing free thought, it is asking the newspapers whose business results in a loss of some four or five million a year to the Government to bear a somewhat heavier share of the cost in order that we may at least do something towards making up the deficit. If my hon. friend can construe that into an attempt to tax thought we will never agree on a definition of what a tax is. My hon. friend asked us to seriously consider before we take that step, but I wish he had considered this thing a little more himself. He is absolutely wrong when he talks about a zone system in referring to the forty-mile district in which a weekly newspaper may be carried free.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What would you call it?

Mr. BURRELL: That is the forty-mile district for a weekly newspaper, but what my hon. friend has in his mind is that the newspapers which have been writing to him and to me were afraid that there was going to be what is known generally as the zone system, namely, that beyond a 300-mile line there was going to be an additional charge. That is what is known to the newspaper men as the zone system. That zone system is not in this resolution, but the forty mile limit for weekly newspapers is precisely as it was under the old administration, except that we ask that from the central point of publication the distance shall not exceed forty miles.

Mr. COWAN: That does not apply to dailies.

Mr. BURRELL: Not to dailies. There is some misapprehension as to that. My hon. friend talks eloquently about the sword of the ancestor of the hon. member for North Simcoe and so on. I am not going to follow him in anything of that kind. But there was one other thing the hon. member said he would like to touch on. He said that he himself was here as an advocate of those high exemplars of thought in the newspaper world, the torch-bearers as he called them, and he seemed to have some extraordinary idea that we were encouraging all the worst forms of the press and were suppressing in some mysterious way the "torch-bearers" that he alluded to. Well, I will just say that our definition of the press is precisely what was in the Revised Statutes in 1906 and was in effect in my hon. friend's regime. Paragraph (a) of section 53 of the old Act reads that:

> A newspaper is known and recognized as a newspaper or periodical in the general sense of the word, and consists wholly or in great part of political or other news, or of articles relative thereto, or on other current topics, and is published regularly at intervals of not more than one month.

Now it is no good for my hon. friend to talk about "suppressing" the "torch-bearers." There is a definition of a newspaper that existed in the Act when my hon. friend was Postmaster General, and it is precisely that definition under which we are working to-day, and there is no proposal to change it. I may say that we do require a reasonable and proper amount of reading matter and political and other news, before the publication can be classed as a newspaper, and get the benefit of these rates, because it was not thought desirable that papers should go out with an overwhelming mass of advertising and a minimum of news.

Now in reference to this whole matter, if my hon. friend has any other thoughts that would bear more directly on the question than those he has expressed to-night, or any suggestions to make, I need hardly say—as the minister who is piloting the Bill through this House—that I would be only too glad to give them the greatest consideration. I must, however, take a strong exception to his view of this proposal to try and see that the newspapers of the country pay at least a little more than they have been paying towards the very heavy load which we have been carrying for them, and I must deprecate his citing that as "attacks on free thought" in any shape or form.

I may say in answer to my hon. friend from Lethbridge (Mr. Buchanan) that I know the views he has placed before the committee to-night are the views that have been expressed from a great many quarters in Canada to me—and I suppose to the Postmaster General—during the last few weeks. I am quite aware that the newspapers are facing somewhat hard conditions in regard to their supply of newsprint and its increased cost. At the same time whatever is finally decided—whether we adhere to the provisions of the resolutions and the provisions of the Bill which is to be founded upon those resolutions or whether there is any modification—what I have stated before must not be forgotten, that even whatever amount we do advance these charges by, owing to the necessary increase in the railway charges which is bound to come, the department and the country—because the department represents the country—will be facing an enormous deficit even if you charge up to one cent. However, I think that matter could better be discussed at a later stage.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I would like to get the figures of the cost of carrying these newspapers, and what revenue we propose to get from that. The minister has stated that we are carrying 87,000,000 pounds of paper at the present time, and the revenue derived therefrom is $290,000. He proposes to impose a rate of four times the present amount, and even that increase will not pay the cost of handling. I would like to get the exact figures.

Mr. BURRELL: It would be difficult to give the figures with any absolute exactitude to-night. I have given a rough estimate for the purpose of explaining the general sense of the resolutions. I could give the figures more accurately when the Bill which is to be founded on the resolutions comes up for second reading. It is right, as my hon. friend states, that we charge a quarter of a cent a pound for carrying newspapers at present. The revenue from this source has been about $291,000, and the extent of the loss entailed by the carrying of these newspapers is estimated to be pretty close to $5,000,000. Under the terms of the resolution the rate for carriage is increased from a quarter of a cent to one cent per pound, but even if that proposal is carried out it will certainly be very far from meeting anything like the expenditure involved.

Mr. CURRIE: Is the minister prepared to give the committee the amount that is lost on the distribution of catalogues and also on the carriage of parcels? I understand there is an annual loss of from twenty to thirty millions in the carrying of parcels for the departmental stores, figured on the same basis as that for the carriage of newspapers?

Mr. BURRELL: If my hon. friend will permit me I will give that information upon the second reading of the Bill. I will say in passing that I am quite aware that while there may be differences of opinion with respect to certain provisions in these resolutions there is no necessity for altering the resolutions now. Nor is there any grave reason why the passage of the resolutions should be delayed. I am giving a running explanation of their purpose in order that when the Bill comes before the House all the varying views that members may entertain may be advanced perhps with greater effect. I will finish, therefore, with a comment on the other clauses.

It is proposed to repeal the old sections 75, 76, 79 and 81 which deal with the question of franking, and to substitute certain other clauses which in the main amount to this: Whereas in the past it was customary not only for all departmental literature and letters, and mailable matter of all kinds, to be sent from the seat of Government by departments, and by members and senators, it was also customary for all mailable matter and letters addressed to any department of government by a member to come in free. That part is deleted, and while the privilege is retained of franking departmental literature and government publications, and members' mailable matter and letters, being still franked out they will not come in free. I think myself that this is a wholesome reform because there has been a tremendous abuse of the franking privilege generally, and certainly a very great loss of revenue. The franking privilege hitherto enjoyed by the provinces for the distribution of all their government publications is also cut out. There are hundreds of tons of government publications in the various provinces going out free, and the department thought there was really no reason why the Dominion Government and the people of Canada from a federal standpoint, should carry free the mails of a province, when, after all, each province is perfectly able to attend to that matter itself.

I might mention that a penalty is provided for the franking of matter that does not deal with the personal affairs of a member or senator. I think I am well within the mark when I say that the franking privilege by members has been abused, not so much willingly by the member himself as by all sorts of pressure from other people who got him to frank their letters and he himself was not in the position—without being extremely ungracious—of refusing them, although the course in question certainly was not justified. This simply gives him a reason by which he can say to anybody, "I am not permitted under the law—a violation of which will lay me open to a penalty—to frank your letters, or the letters of your friends' friends at the public expense simply because you are my friend." The changes proposed will cut that practice out. I need only give an illustration of the abuse of this privilege by saying that years ago when members of the Civil Service were allowed to frank their letters a boarding house in Ottawa advertised its advantages as such by reason of the fact that it had civil servants there, and that those civil servants would frank all the letters of the people who came to the house. There were also times in the old days when members came to Ottawa and found that it was a very expensive business to do their laundry here and so franked their washing home, got it done there and then brought it back. I remember an instance related by the late Sir Hector Langevin that when he was Minister of Public Works at one time they could take down to the station in a small bag the mail matter franked from the Department of Public Works. Suddenly there was an enormous increase and they found there were merchants and other people coming into the department and unloading whole truck-loads of stuff there because all the departmental matter went through the mails free. In England the abuse was equally flagrant, in fact the system was abused to such an extent that members were known to frank even pianos down to their constituencies. It led in England to the wiping out of the whole privilege. Although that policy has since been reversed, the privilege has been greatly restricted. Here, in the public interest, we are going to at least wipe out the greater abuses in connection with the franking privilege. I think that is all I need say in comment on the resolutions.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is it proposed to preclude the franking of campaign literature?

Mr. BURRELL: I would not say that, because as I understand the resolutions anything to do with the business of the Government, or public business, goes free. I take it for granted that my hon. friend would not send out as campaign literature anything that did not deal with public business.

Mr. THOMPSON (Yukon): I would like to ask a question of the minister with reference to the franking privilege. I notice that in subsection 2 of section 76 it is declared:

> All letters posted for transmission under this section must be franked by the personally written signature of the member of the Senate or of the House of Commons sending the same.

Does that mean that we shall not be permitted to frank by our initials?

Mr. BURRELL: I would not like to speak positively on that point. I think the view of the department is that the initial franking has been very much abused; and, strictly speaking, a frank should be a signature. The latter method is a very much greater protection to the department. On the other hand, I think the question might well be dealt with, and I will find out further about it.

Mr. CURRIE: The written signature is specified here in the same clause. Lots of members have often in the neighbourhood of 200 letters a day, and to have to sit down and sign that number of envelopes is a nuisance. In addition it would preclude issuing a number of circular letters to a member's constituents. Why not change the wording so that a member's personal stamp could be adopted in lieu of his signature?

Mr. BURRELL: The facsimile can be used on all mailable matter.

Mr. CURRIE: That is only on open mail other than letters.

Mr. BURRELL: Yes. It may be a hardship. On the other hand, I know when I was Secretary of State I personally had to sign my signature to far more than 200 or 300 certificates of naturalization, company charters, and so on.

Mr. FIELDING: Is printed matter enclosed in an envelope a "letter"?

Mr. BURRELL: I presume it would be if sealed.

Mr. FIELDING: Most of the printed matter that goes out is in closed envelopes.

Mr. McKENZIE: When the stamp rate was raised from 2 to 3 cents as a war tax, the question of whether or not a constituent sending letters to his member would have to stamp them was raised, and I have a distinct recollection of the then Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) holding that it was in the public interest that the communication with a member should be kept free. I am disappointed to find that the privilege is being removed. I do not know why this change of policy has been adopted by the same Government.

Mr. BURRELL: Is my hon. friend drawing a distinction only so far as letters addressed to members are concerned? He does not suggest that letters addressed to all departments of government should be free? My hon. friend will understand that an enormous number of inquiries are sent in to the various departments, and in ordinary cases it would be worth a man's while if the information he is inquiring about is of any value to him at all to affix a three-cent stamp to his letter. The floods of correspondence of that kind entail a very heavy loss of revenue. However, this point can be taken up.

Mr. McKENZIE: That point was raised on the occasion I refer to.

Mr. BURRELL: It can be given consideration.

Resolution reported without amendment and concurred in.

[Mr. Currie.]

Mr. BURRELL thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 167 to amend the Post Office Act.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

On motion of Rt. Hon. Mr. Doherty, the House adjourned at 12.10 a.m. (Thursday).

Thursday, June 10, 1920.

The House met at Two o'clock.

BOARD OF COMMERCE REPORT PRESENTED.

Annual report of the Board of Commerce of Canada, together with a copy of the Order in Council submitting the same.—Rt. Hon. Sir Robert Borden.

IRRIGATION ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. Arthur Meighen (Minister of the Interior) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 168 to amend the Irrigation Act.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING: Explain.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This Bill provides for expropriation, where necessary, of inferior water rights for the benefit of superior water rights. In the original Act domestic, municipal, commercial, and irrigation water rights are given orders of preference in the order named. It has been found that in practice where the first or second or third, as the case may be, develops to be more essential than the second, third or fourth, there must be power to expropriate the inferior rights, paying for them what may be necessary, in order that the higher and more essential rights may not suffer. That is the main object of the Bill. One other purpose is to provide that water derivable from springs shall be in the same position as to federal control as other waters.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CLASSIFICATION OF DEPARTMENT OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE.

Mr. POWER:

With reference to an inquiry of the ministry by Mr. Power, answered by the Minister of Militia as follows:—

A classification of the Department of Militia and Defence has been submitted to the Civil Service Commission. In every case where a returned soldier is holding a position which it is proposed to make permanent, his name has been submitted for appointment.

With regard to the other positions, it has been suggested to the Civil Service Commission that these positions should be thrown open to competition, thereby giving returned soldiers an opportunity of obtaining appointment to the same.

1. Does the phrase "other positions" in the first line, second paragraph of reply, include all positions now temporarily held by other than returned soldiers?

2. If not, what are the exceptions?

3. In connection with positions thrown open to competitive examination, will returned soldiers be given the preference, that is, will returned men who pass with the minimum qualifications be appointed in preference to better qualified civilians?

4. Will an examination of "Military Qualifications" be one of the subjects included in the competitive examinations?

Hon. Mr. GUTHRIE:

1 and 2. On the recommendation of the heads of branches, three officials were recommended to the Civil Service Commission for special appointment, viz., the Director of Separation Allowance and Assigned Pay, the Assistant Chief Accountant, and the Assistant Director of Records.

The heads of branches reported that, if these officials were not continued in their present positions, it would completely disorganize the branches, and, therefore, a recommendation ad hoc was made to the Civil Service Commission.

3 and 4. This is a matter which rests entirely in the hands of the Civil Service Commission.

COLONEL H. A. CHISHOLM.

Mr. MANION:

1. Is Lieut.-Col. Chisholm of the P.A.M.C., who was second in command of the Medical Forces under General Foster in London, still an officer in the Medical Forces of Canada?

2. If so, what position does he hold?

3. Is it the intention of the Government to keep this man in the Permanent A.M.C.?

Hon. Mr. GUTHRIE: It is presumed that this question refers to Colonel H. A. Chisholm, C.M.G., D.S.O., who was recently employed as Deputy Director of Medical Services, Overseas Military Forces of Canada, London. If so, the answers are:

1. Yes.

2. At present employed under the Overseas Ministry in connection with winding up the Medical Services, Overseas Military Forces of Canada.

3. Yes. He is a highly efficient and experienced medical officer whose retention is in the interests of efficiency, as his record shows.

IMPORTATIONS FROM GERMANY AND AUSTRIA.

Mr. RINFRET:

1. What is the chief nature of the goods imported from Germany and Austria in 1919?

2. What is the character of these goods for the first three months of 1920?

Hon. Mr. BURRELL:

1. From Germany.—Articles of chief value:—Articles of metal, when for use exclusively in mining or metallurgical operations. Machinery composed wholly or in part of iron or steel, and iron or steel integral parts thereof. Musical instruments. Precious stones not mounted or set.

From Austria.—Articles of chief value:—Insulators, electric.

2. From Germany. Articles of chief value:—Garden and field seeds in packages; tools, hand; penknives, etc.; articles of glass and manufactures of glass; manufactures of wood; labels for cigar boxes, etc.; photographs, chromos, etc.; manufactures of paper; braides, cords, etc.; toys of all kinds; musical instruments; precious stones.

From Austria.—Articles of chief value:—Hops; lamp chimneys; jewellery.

CANADIAN REPRESENTATIVE AT INTERNATIONAL LABOUR CONFERENCE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. H. S. BELAND (Beauce): May I ask the Prime Minister whether there is any truth in the report that the Hon. Mr. Roy, the High Commissioner for Canada at Paris, has been appointed to represent Canada at the International Labour Conference at Genoa?

Rt. Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): Yes, it is my recollection that he has been appointed. I am not quite sure whether there is any other Canadian representative or not.

SS. CANADIAN INVENTOR — DELAYED IN SAILING.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): On Tuesday last my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries promised to give some information on the following day as to the delays which have occurred in the sailing of the steamship "Canadian Inventor" owing to some trouble between the company and its employees. Can the minister give us the information today?

Hon. C. C. BALLANTYNE (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): I would have given the information yesterday but that my hon. friend did not happen to be in his seat when the Orders of the Day were called. As I stated the other day, one of the causes of the delay was a strike of the painters. Happily, that has now been settled. I have also ascertained that the Coughlan Shipbuilding Company did not make the ship's shaft according to specifications, and therefore the inspection by Lloyd's and by one of our inspectors of the Marine Department has been withheld until the shafting has been adjusted. I understand this also has been attended to. The vessel is now in dry dock, owing to her having been in the water since January last. One of the clauses in the specifications provides for the docking of the vessel if the Marine Department finds that is necessary. I do not anticipate that there is anything wrong with the bottom of the ship, but inasmuch as she has to make a very long trip to Australia it was thought wise to have her docked. As far as I can judge at the moment, she ought to be ready to sail within two weeks, and probably less.

DIRECTOR OF COAL OPERATIONS.

House again in committee on Bill No. 153 (from the Senate), (from 7th June), respecting the Director of Coal Operations, Mr. Steele in the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN: When this Bill was last before the committee section 1 had been considered and adopted. Section 2 is now under consideration; shall the section carry?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Chairman, when this Bill was before the committee at a former sitting I took strong exception to the minister asking Parliament to ratify and confirm matters of which the members of this House have no knowledge, and have had no opportunity of considering. This section is as follows:

> The orders heretofore issued by the Director of Coal Operations set forth in the schedule hereto attached are hereby ratified and confirmed and shall be deemed to have been lawfully made on the respective dates when they were signed by the said Director of Coal Operations.

Then there follows in the schedule not the text but the numbers of orders numbering from 1 to 144. Several of these orders are alphabetically subdivided, so that in fact there is a total of about 170 orders. The Bill was held over, that the House might have opportunity to see the orders, and I have in my hand the volume of orders which were issued by the Director of Coal Operations. It is a volume very much larger than any compilation of statutes which might be made as a result of the labours of four or five sessions of Parliament. I have gone through the orders in a hurried way and I find that they relate to all manner of subjects, the fixing of the rates of wages to be paid in different mines, the prices at which coal is to be mined, and the classes of labour to be employed; in a broad way they resemble the kind of legislation one finds in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, when the State undertook to regulate matters relating to wages and prices in accordance with the spirit of that age. I shall not take up the time of the House more than to illustrate the danger there is in Parliament attempting to ratify and confirm these orders, and to give them the force of legal enactment; I shall quote one or two sections of one order to show hon. members the kind of thing they will be enacting if they pass this clause. Order 141 contains the following:

> All men who work in and around the mines who are eligible to become members of the United Mine Workers of America must join that organization and agree to sign check-off for all dues, assessments and fines, and the management of the mines agree to forward deductions made to the Acting Secretary of the District or such other persons as that official may designate.
> The foregoing clause to become effective whenever the officials of the United Mine Workers of America appear on the ground in each locality and co-operate with the operators in arranging details.
> It is agreed that no man will be employed or be permitted to remain in the employ of the company unless he agrees to comply with the foregoing conditions.

If we enact into law these various orders it means amongst other things that this Parliament is providing that in these mines in the West no workers can be employed unless they belong to the United Mine Workers of America. That may or may not be advisable—I am not raising that question one way or the other—I should however, like Parliament to understand what it is doing, should it blindly endorse and ratify and thereby transform into permanent legislation orders issued to deal with a particular situation. I think this one clause is quite sufficient to illustrate the danger of enacting into law a great mass of regulations and orders which no member of this House has seen. If the Director of Coal Operations has been acting within the scope of his authority in issuing these orders no exception can be taken to them. If, as stated by the minister in introducing the Bill, the parties are agreed in reference to these orders, why not leave them in agreement and allow that mutual understanding to decide matters? To give legislative force and sanction to these orders is simply to introduce into this country a system of compulsory arbitration which thus far we have not felt justified in instituting in Canada. These orders will have all the force of a statute once Parliament confirms and ratifies them; the parties to them will become liable to penalties at law, and the labour of the country will be brought into the position occupied by labour in countries where compulsory enactments govern the relations between employers and employees. I do not think that such a departure is wise; I believe it is departing from sound principle and, I hope the minister will not find it necessary to press this particular clause.

There is one other feature which might be considered and that is, whether or not this Parliament has the right to legislate in matters of contract such as wages and prices and other questions arising between employer and employee, and whether such matters do not properly come within the scope of provincial rather than of federal jurisdiction. There is at least, a doubt in the matter, and I think that where a doubt exists, the objections being as strong as they are to this kind of wholesale legislation, the Government would be well advised to let the Bill rest with confirming the Orders in Council giving power to the Director of Coal Operations to do what he has hitherto done, and not attempt to give legislative force to all of the orders he has issued.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If there is anything in the principle which the hon. member urges, it would be just as effective against the portion of the Bill which he purposes to allow to pass as against the portion he opposes. If the Orders in Council are confirmed, then undoubtedly legislation is passed of the character to which he objects. The only effect of the last clause is to still any possibility of litigation as to the effectiveness of the various orders of the Coal Director, which were based on the Orders in Council. It simply obviates the possibility of dispute, and that is all. Certainly, if the Orders in Council are ratified, then a measure of compulsory arbitration, under the circumstances that existed when the orders were passed and that still exist, is ratified. Unquestionably there was a measure of compulsory arbitration; unquestionably it was essential; and just as unquestionably it was called for by both parties to the dispute. There was no other way of getting the coal. What is the use in one breath of crying to the Government to see that coal is mined, and then in the next breath saying to the Government: "Don't do anything yourselves to get the coal mined"? This is the step that was taken. It proved effective and is proving effective to-day. Why therefore upset it? We are only asking that the course that has been pursued at the request of both parties be legalized in order that all parties, not merely through their representatives but individually on both sides, may be bound by it. That is essential. All we are asking is that what has proved a successful means of getting coal be ratified by this House until next session. If Parliament next session chooses in any way to modify them Parliament is free to do so and if Parliament does nothing, then the whole legislation dies at the close of the session. The order which the hon. gentleman read does apparently just what he says. It provides that employees shall be members of the United Mine Workers of America. There may be some objection in principle to that—I do not know; but I do know that had it not been for these very orders we would not have had any coal mined. It may have been that there was lacking reason and moderation on one side or the other; doubtless it was lacking on both sides, but we did the very best we could and got the best man we could get to go out there and see what was the best thing to be done. He went out there, did his best and succeeded. We do not want any litigation to arise over what has been done. We do not want any difficulty to be created by isolated, discontented parties, perhaps when the public interest is best served as well as the general interest of all the parties to the dispute.

Mr. FIELDING: This is the most amazing Bill that has ever been submitted to this Parliament in my memory. The whole Bill is bad. If the hon. the Minister of the Interior desires to confer certain powers upon this coal commissioner, he should come forward with distinct authority by statute to confer these powers. Irrespective of any Order in Council, he should bring in a Bill in the same way as he does in any other case. We are legislating here and legislating in a most marvellous way. We are supposed to have certain well defined procedure to guard against hasty legislation. In certain cases you must first bring forward a resolution, it must stand on the Order Paper for a while, and then you must discuss it in Committee of the Whole. Then you must proceed to get a Bill and that Bill must go through its first reading, it must go through its second reading and it must go through its third reading. All these are parts of the machinery devised to enable an intelligent Parliament to deal intelligently with important questions. Every one of these principles is disregarded when we are asked to declare by Act of Parliament that 144 regulations, not one of which has ever been read in this House, are legal and are declared to be legal. It is the most amazing proposition that was ever made. I cannot imagine the Government are serious in asking us to do such a thing. We have been asked to do a good many things and to confirm a good many acts which have lacked authority, but this is the worst of all. The only section of these regulations that we know anything about is the one section which has been read by my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, dealing with the delicate question of the relations between capital and labour, and declaring for a principle which may be good or bad, but one that this legislature has never hitherto declared for—that a man shall not be permitted to work anywhere unless he joins a particular trades union. That is a fair question for the labouring men themselves, but we have never before been asked to declare in this House that a man must be obliged to join a trades union in order to be permitted to work. We have no knowledge of this extraordinary budget of laws except the sentence that the leader of the Opposition has quoted. It is too difficult to argue. The idea that this House shall be deliberately asked to pass these laws, not one of which has ever been submitted to the House, and not one of which hon. members know a single thing about, is so extraordinary that one cannot understand how it ever came to be suggested. I do not hesitate to say that this is the most amazing proposition that has ever been made to the Parliament of Canada.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I would like to tell my hon. friend that he was for many years a member of a Government that did in effect precisely what we propose now. This is not the first time that this course has been pursued. The same course was taken by his Minister of the Interior on more than one occasion. I myself, some fourteen or fifteen years ago, induced the then Minister of the Interior to provide that the very numerous regulations which were enacted by his department under authority of law should be laid upon the table of this House and of the Senate within a certain period after the commencement of the session and that they should have force and effect until the end of the session and no longer unless by resolution of both Houses of Parliament they were affirmed and approved. I venture to say that on more than one occasion a budget of regulations was brought down by the then Minister of the Interior which was quite as lengthy as that which has been laid on the table of the House by the present Minister of the Interior. I recollect very well that I had, when leader of the Opposition, to detail a strong committee of my side of the House and that they had to devote their attention for a week or ten days at a time in order to gather some idea of the substance of the scores of regulations that were brought down. My hon. friend thought it was all right then. What is the difference between what he then supported and what he now condemns? According to my humble comprehension, there is absolutely no difference whatever. There is a certain responsibility cast upon the ministers of the Crown in connection with this matter as well as a responsibility cast upon Parliament and I desire to emphasize what has already been said by my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior, that if it had not been for these Orders in Council, passed under the War Measures Act, and if it had not been for the unremitting attention and devotion of the Director of Coal Operations, if it had not been for the most anxious consideration day and night given by the Government to his representations when matters were in a most critical state, there would have been intense suffering inflicted upon a very large proportion of the population of this country. It was only by a very narrow margin on many occasions that we succeeded in preventing such conditions in the operation of these coal mines as would have inflicted that suffering. Now the Minister of the Interior, after these regulations have been acted upon for years, simply desires that any doubt shall be removed as to their validity and that no one shall have any ground for technical objection or obstruction in a court of law. They are not new orders; they are orders which have been acted upon and which have been put to the test of experience.

Mr. FIELDING: Hear, hear.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen), has but one purpose and that purpose he has communicated to the House—the purpose of preventing any trivial or technical objection being raised to the operation or validity of these orders.

Mr. FIELDING: I do not wish to discuss the merits of the actions of the Controller of Coal. It may be that what my right hon. friend (Sir Robert Borden) says is correct, that what was done had a very beneficial effect. I have not raised that question at all. If all that my right hon. friend says be true, and although he may prove that I have been somewhat inconsistent—suppose that may be admitted for the moment, although I do not admit it—does that alter the merits of the question, does it affect the question of the responsibility of other hon. members of this House? They are not responsible for what I did years ago if I did what the right hon. gentleman says. I have no recollection of the particular orders to which my right hon. friend refers, but according to his own statement these orders proposed to make certain regulations and they were submitted to this House for the approval of Parliament. It was not a case where we were not submitting them to the House for approval. But here is a case where regulations have been passed for months and things have been done under them, some of which may not have been legal, and we are asked now to declare that everything that was done under these regulations was legal. The right hon. gentleman says that their object in proposing this legislation is to prevent any question arising hereafter. If they acted lawfully why do they want a whitewashing Act of this kind? If they acted unlawfully, why do they want a whitewashing Act?

If it is lawful then they do not need this thing. I again say to my hon. friend that I have no recollection of the cases mentioned by the Minister of the Interior. I assume that what my hon. friend says in that respect is correct, although I think even as he states it the minister brought down, under authority, a body of regulations which were to be approved if they remained on the table of the House for a given period and were not condemned. However, I do not want to dwell on that. The hon. member may perhaps be right, if it serves any good purpose in saying that I am inconsistent, although I do not think I am. However, that is not the point to-day. The point is, that this Parliament ought not to be called upon, not only to authorize these things in the future, but to authorize those things that have been done in the past when they may not be legal. Are we going to set aside all thought of legislative power by this Parliament and allow the Government to lead us blindly not only in endorsing everything as to matters about which we are informed, but also as to things that we do not know anything about?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: In reply to my hon. friend I have to say that the distinction which he has attempted to draw does not exist. The Orders in Council to which I have alluded were not passed by the Minister of the Interior but by the Governor in Council upon his recommendation, and after having been so passed they came into immediate operation and continued in operation until the end of the following session of Parliament, but no longer unless they were approved. I do not think that very much fault can be found with such a practice because the regulations are of so minute a character and so exceedingly numerous, that it would have been utterly impossible for Parliament to occupy its time properly in dealing with administrative orders of that character; it would be utterly impossible for Parliament to undertake administration in that way. But inasmuch as important matters of administration might be involved, inasmuch as matters of policy in some cases might be involved, I persuaded the Minister of the Interior of that day to depart from the practice which had prevailed before and to have these Orders in Council operate only until end of next session of Parliament, unless ratified in the meantime by resolution of the House. But what is this situation? Precisely the same. The Government had power under the War Measures Act to make certain Orders in Council. Under these Orders in Council a Director of Coal Operations was appointed. He has done his work and I think he has done it well. I think his work has prevented a great deal of suffering which otherwise might have been inflicted upon the people of this country. The War Measures Act is no longer to be acted upon. Therefore we come to Parliament asking it, from the very necessity of the situation, to continue these Orders in Council until the end of the next session, and no longer, just as the regulations of the Minister of the Interior in the old days were continued until the end of the next following session and no longer.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And now?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: And the same practice prevails now in the legislation of the Minister of the Interior. Therefore I hope my hon. friend will not think that under the circumstances there is any divergence in this respect from the practice that has been pursued in the past. I alluded to the action of the old Government merely for the purpose of showing the established practice in respect of administrative orders which had to be brought to the consideration of Parliament but which could not be enacted, or dealt with in the first instance by Parliament itself. What was the practice in those days continues to be the practice still in the Department of the Interior; and in dealing with this matter as we did under the War Measures Act, and in bringing the matter to the attention of Parliament as the Minister of the Interior has brought it to-day, we are simply carrying out a principle embodied in that practice and acted upon not only by this Government but by the Government which preceded it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has spoken of the Orders in Council that were passed conferring authority upon the Director of Coal Operations and from his remarks I would judge he feels that we are proposing in some way to take away the power that has been given the Director of Coal Operations under these Orders in Council. We have no intention of doing that. As a matter of fact the powers, duties and rights given to the Director of Coal Operations under Orders in Council are expressly continued. Now we are going a long way, I think, in ratifying those Orders in Council, and continuing them for another year. If we had taken exception to giving these powers under Order in Council, and had required them to be expressed in legislation through a Bill brought into the House and discussed in all its stages, we would have perhaps been taking a course more consistent with the protection of public rights in the matter. What we are taking exception to now is that having granted certain rights to the Director of Coal Operations by Order in Council, we are being asked by section 2 to confirm as legal everything that that Director of Coal Operations has done, whether or not he has gone beyond the powers given him by Order in Council. If the Director of Coal Operations has not exceeded any powers given him by Order in Council then all these orders which have been issued by him will be perfectly valid. But if he has exceeded those powers and has gone further than he was authorized to do by Order in Council, why should not the parties who may be aggrieved have the right of redress? This measure proposes to deprive of redress any man who believes that his rights have been infringed by virtue of the Director of Coal Operations having exceeded his power.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think my hon. friend perhaps does not quite realize the extraordinary ingenuity, on some occasions, of members of my own profession in taking exception on very technical grounds to Orders in Council —or to Statutes for that matter—even if great care has been taken in framing them. These orders have been acted upon for years, and the only purpose of the Minister of the Interior, as expressed by him, is to prevent the possibility of unnecessary and vexatious litigation, upon some minor technical point, whenever some ingenious member of the legal profession would see fit to question the exact validity and the conformity of any one of these orders of the Director of Coal Operations. The Director of Coal Operations is not a lawyer himself; he is a business man. He has had to make these orders offhand, and to couch them in his own language, and I think it would not be conducive to the public interest that minor technical objections should be raised to them on some occasion by any lawyer with an exceedingly acute mind. As I understand it that is all my hon. friend, the Minister of the Interior, has in mind.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my right hon. friend's remarks mean anything they mean that the person who has been appointed to this office is a man who may or may not make blunders, and that if he has made blunders there is to be no mode of redress in regard to those blunders. I would ask the Minister of the Interior if any exception has been taken by any one to any order that has been issued. Has any one of them been called in question?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Before the Minister of the Interior answers the question I would ask my hon. friend whether he knows of any human being in his acquaintance who is not liable to make blunders some time?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would answer my right hon. friend by saying that I do not, but inasmuch as human nature is apt to err it is necessary to take precautions to see that when that does occur the rights of third parties shall not be prejudiced thereby. We believe that the Director of Coal Operations, being human, may have exceeded his powers in a manner which may have injured third parties, and we on this side are asking that Parliament should not take from any person who has been deprived of his rights the recourse to that redress which the law of the land affords. I am quite prepared to admit with my right hon. friend that lawyers may be fond of technicalities—

Mr. McMASTER: Question.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —but the law means something and justice means something, and we have the law to see that justice is done. I do not think we should take away from individuals who are not lawyers the right of getting redress to which under the principles of ordinary justice they are entitled.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have no difficulty at all in answering the hon. member. The Director of Coal Operations has been discharging his duties for, I think, three or four years. At the present time I am not aware of one single objection on legal grounds to anything he has done; so far as I know the Minister of Labour has never been informed of any; certainly there is no substantial matter in dispute. Undoubtedly all the director's decisions were questioned on grounds of policy and of fairness by both sides, but they were acquiesced in generally. Now, is it going to be a matter of justice or injustice to pass this legislation? Suppose the ingenuity of the legal profession can find that some excess of power was exercised and acquiesced in under an order made, say, three years ago and acted on ever since; is there going to be more suffering and injustice by upsetting the whole thing and injuring rights that accrued by virtue of the order,—unscrambling the whole state of affairs, than by quieting and settling matters as acquiesced in by both sides? Which course is going to most conduce to order and justice? If a person can find something technically wrong with any of these orders, that person may not have suffered at all, the defect may be something really trivial and technical in character; but if he upsets the order, who else is going to suffer but innocent parties everywhere? And there will be confusion in control, and parties who ought not to suffer at all are sure to suffer. In a word, there will be a thousand times more suffering by upsetting any of these orders than could possibly follow by Parliament quieting and settling matters as they are at present. I admit that if some substantial question of law were in dispute between the parties it would not ordinarily be right for Parliament to come in and get on the side of either party in an endeavour to settle the dispute. But that is not the case here at all; there is no question in dispute that I know of. I do not know whether there is likely to be any dispute, but clearly as both sides have acquiesced in everything to date, if there be any dispute it must be purely technical or we would have heard of it.

And look at what would happen if that question when raised should be upheld by the courts. That is the reason for our taking this course. It is not that we are getting on the side of any litigant, it is not that we are seeking to do injustice; we are seeking to stop a process that might lead to great injustice.

Mr. FIELDING: I am sorry that the hon. the Minister of Finance is not present as he might gather from the observations of the Prime Minister and of the Minister of the Interior that he would have an opportunity to save a great deal of money if he could just simply abolish the courts, because that is what is proposed to be done here. Both the Prime Minister and the Minister of the Interior have spoken of the ingenuity of the legal profession. Do they imagine that that ingenuity is likely to be confined to seeking flaws in legislation of this character? Do they not know that that ingenuity can be applied to questioning every Act we pass here? I venture to say that for a $500 fee you can engage an able lawyer to raise doubts as to the propriety of any Act of Parliament. But we do not consider that a sufficient reason for validating everything that has been done. The Minister of the Interior says that so far as he knows there is no question in dispute between the parties. If that is so, what is the necessity for this legislation? And if there is any question in dispute, why should we undertake to turn out of court any man in this Dominion who has or imagines he has a grievance? You can dismiss any man's case by saying it is of a trivial or a technical character; but no point of law is trivial or technical to the man whose honour, person or property is affected. And I say that all the arguments advanced by the Prime Minister regarding the ingenuity of the legal profession furnish no sufficient reason why we should turn out of court any man whose interests may be affected by these orders.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think what is proposed by the Minister of the Interior is very mild indeed compared with some legislation to which my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) committed himself in days gone by, because I can recollect that he caused to be passed by the Legislature of Nova Scotia an Act taking away the right of action from individuals. Surely this is a very mild dose of Parliamentary ratification compared with that Act.

Mr. FIELDING: My right hon. friend shows the weakness of his case when he undertakes to refer to some alleged legislation which I was connected with in times past. I do not know to what the right hon. gentleman refers, and I do not think he has good ground for what he states. But surely to argue that because I did a wrong some years ago is good reason for the action of the Government in this instance, shows the inherent weakness of the position now taken.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The member for Shelburne and Queen's rose in his place and pronounced this legislation the most amazing in character and principle that he had ever heard of.

Mr. FIELDING: I think so.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then it is not at all relevant to show that he was himself a party to like legislation on other occasions?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. McMASTER: Two blacks do not make a white.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But is this the most amazing legislation if he himself has put through legislation of the same character? If he had not himself made the comparison, perhaps he might shield himself behind the fact that two wrongs do not make a right. But he stated to the House that there had never been anything like this since the days of Confederation. We have shown that he is wrong.

Mr. FIELDING: No, you have not.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We can show the same thing on the pages of every statute since Confederation.

An hon. MEMBER: All right; show it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Only last year what was done when the Newsprint Control was continued? Why did not my hon. friend pronounce that to be an amazing innovation? Newsprint Controller, first of all stalled by Order in Council under the War Measures Act, was confirmed in office, his actions were approved, and litigation was stopped. The regulations that the Prime Minister refers to were brought into this House and had to be approved by this Parliament. Never have they been written out in the law, they have always been laid on the table of the House, and therefore one might say that they have been approved in the aggregate. Would any one suggest that we ought to embody that whole volume of Orders in Council in a statute?

Mr. BUREAU: Why not?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is no other way of doing it than the way we are following now. It is the proper thing to do, and certainly will conduce to less injustice than any other course we might take.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Chairman, I have ventured to cite only one of these orders, but I think perhaps it would be well to give the House some further information as to the nature of others. If the minister looks at regulation 124 he will find it provides that nine hours' pay shall be given for eight hours' work. I want to ask my hon. friends opposite: Is that a principle that we as a Parliament wish to endorse? If it is to be adopted for the miners in British Columbia, why should it not be adopted also for the miners in other provinces? Why should we legislate to give nine hours' pay for eight hours' work to one body of men who happen to belong to one particular trade union, and at the same time enact that no man shall get the benefit of that increased pay unless he belongs to that particular union? It is not consonant with the defence of individual rights and liberties for Parliament to enact such legislation. Then take order 136, which gives boys over eighteen years of age the pay of a man. If a boy of eighteen is to receive a man's pay in these particularly favoured regions, why should he not get it in other parts of the Dominion?

The real point at issue is not the particular local situation in British Columbia, because the laws of this Parliament are made for the whole Dominion; it is whether Parliament itself shall be brought into contempt by enacting a mass of legislation of which it is wholly uninformed. Here is a mass of typewritten orders of practically 1,000 pages, fixing the hours of wages, the rates to be charged for the different mining operations, the price to be paid for coal, and providing for all kinds of special conditions which may or may not arise. Now, if the Director of Coal Operations has exercised his powers in an honest and fair way, no one is going to suffer by allowing matters to stand as they are. Hon. gentlemen opposite have on previous occasions said that we should let well enough alone. When my hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) tells us there is no dispute or disagreement regarding these particular regulations, I reply: Leave well enough alone, but do not ask this Parliament to enact legislation which will require nine hours' pay to be paid for eight hours' work; which will allow a workman to work in certain mines only if he belongs to a particular union; which will fix a definite price for coal which cannot be changed either way whether the operator wishes to change it or not; which changes the rate of wages, the hours of labour, and other matters affecting the miners irrespective of whether they wish it or not. There are principles that are fundamental in this matter. It is bad enough to carry on industy in that fashion under Orders in Council, it is wholly inexcusable for Parliament to give its sanction to that kind of paternalism and favouritism.

Mr. ROBB: It is clearly pointed out by the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) that under these regulations which we are now asked to confirm the principle is laid down that in certain mines only members of a certain union may be employed; that before a man can obtain work in order to take care of his family he must join a certain union. It has also been pointed out that men are allowed nine hours' pay for eight hours' work in certain particular mines. The Prime Minister has told his supporters and told the committee that in this issue now before us a question of principle and of policy is involved. Does that mean that we are invited to legislate that men must belong to certain unions before they can obtain work; that possibly to-morrow it will be provided that men must belong to certain unions before they can obtain work in manufacturing or farming industries throughout the country? I submit that a very wide policy is involved in this question, and for that reason I am not prepared to support the legislation proposed by the minister.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The point raised by the hon. member is well worth a moment's discussion. Parliament, by ratifying these orders, does not support any principle such as the hon. member calls in question; it does not take any side one way or the other. In this emergent case, in order that coal might be produced and that people might live rather than freeze, it was found necessary to make orders of this character. It is in the public interest that these orders as between these parties be confirmed; that is all. Parliament takes no stand in favour of nine hours' wages for eight hours' work or for eight hours' wages for nine hours' work, nor does Parliament take a stand in favour of the closed shop or anything else of that kind. Parliament simply says that a settlement of a dispute which, had it not been settled, would have brought great hardship on the people of Western Canada, shall stand as made under the circumstances prevailing at that time. No academic question is involved; we are simply confirming settlements that have been made of disputes in a particular area for a particular purpose.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What we are doing now does not relate merely to the past. We are making these orders binding for another year, until after the next session of Parliament. When clause 1 was before the committee I suggested that instead of making these Orders in Council binding until the end of the next session we should provide for their expiration at the end of the present fiscal year. But the minister refused to do that, he was so keen on extending the period that much longer. So what we are doing now is to legislate on these matters of wages, hours or work and prices for the period of another year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member is not quite right. We do not fix wages or hours of work; we say that orders so made were good and that they shall stand as good. But under the powers of the Orders in Council which we ratify, they are alterable at any time by the man who made them. If they are found not to work well between now and the end of the next session of Parliament, they can be altered. We are simply holding the situation and determining that what has been done is legal, subject to the same powers of alteration as have all along existed.

3 p.m.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): My hon. friend says that this proposal does not support any principle one way or the other, but he will admit that if we adopt this legislation we are creating a precedent which will be relied upon in the future. For example, if the employees on the Government railways or of the Public Works Department ask for nine hours' pay for eight hours' work, the Government or Parliament cannot very well refuse their request because they have already made a similar arrangement with the miners in British Columbia. That is the point which I find some difficulty about. I would like the minister to explain how he is going to get rid of the precedent if Parliament adopts it in this Bill.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Parliament does not adopt a precedent. Parliament simply ratifies something that has been done. In itself it may have been right or it may have been wrong, but in the circumstances under which it was performed it was right and served an essential purpose. Even were a closed shop wrong, it would be far better to have a closed shop than frozen homes; we chose the one in place of the other. Now we say: do not let that be called in question; if you do there will be great confusion and great injustice. There is no precedent about it. It may have been, as a matter of principle, right or wrong; but as a matter of emergent action it was undoubtedly right and effective.

Mr. MACKENZIE King: Does the minister see where he is getting to in the matter of future disputes? If the argument is to prevail that there must be either a closed shop or frozen homes, we may expect a good deal in the way of industrial controversy in this country that we have not hitherto experienced. Why imagine a situation when there is no ground for so doing? But my purpose in rising was to ask the minister if he has copies of the Orders in Council themselves.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, I will send them across to my hon. friend.

Mr. CROTHERS: Prior to 1911, when the present leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) was Minister of Labour, he experienced great difficulties in dealing with labour troubles in that part of the country that we have been talking about,—part of Alberta and the southeasterly part of British Columbia. He did everything possible to allay the unrest that prevailed and to overcome the labour difficulties that had been experienced for some years. When we came into power in 1911 we experienced difficulties, perhaps not quite so serious as those which my hon. friend had to deal with, but difficulties just the same. Subsequently we came to the conclusion that it would be in the interests of the country to appoint a competent man to be on the ground and to give him power to deal with these difficulties as they arose. We thought then and we think now that we found a man, in the person of the present Director of Coal Operations, who was exceedingly well qualified to deal with such matters; a man who had had large experience in dealing with labour men, who had a business of his own, and who sacrificed a great deal, at our earnest solicitation, to accept this position. We could not have found in Canada a man better qualified to deal with such matters. A man of kindly disposition and conciliatory temperament, we felt sure that he would succeed in getting the employer and the employees to look at things from the same viewpoint, in the interests of the country. At that time we had authority under the War Measures Act to do certain things. To that War Measures Act Parliament agreed in August, 1914, without a dissenting voice, if I remember aright. It conferred certain powers upon the Governor in Council because it would have been impossible to deal through Parliament with conditions that might arise from time to time while we were engaged in the Great War. It was under this power given to the Governor in Council that these orders were passed after August, 1914. The Coal Director was given jurisdiction over the whole province of Alberta and that portion of British Columbia from its easterly boundary to the summit of the Rocky Mountains. During the time Mr. Armstrong has been Director of Coal Operations in that vast area where there are about fifty different companies operating and producing coal, he has made all these orders. His function generally was to get the miners and their employers together and reach an agreement as to an infinite number of things—wages, hours of labour, and other conditions. The conditions differ in the fifty different companies that are operating mines in the whole province of Alberta and the southeasterly part of British Columbia. It has been said here that 144 agreements have been entered into and sanctioned by order of the Coal Director. What happens if these orders go by the board? Some of them may extend for another year. I fancy that there are agreements entered into under orders made by Mr. Armstrong that will not terminate for another year, until the end of the next session of Parliament. You can see in a moment that if those orders are all to be done away with and we are to start in and scrutinize all these orders that have been made affecting the fifty different companies in that vast territory, we could not do it during this Parliament because we would have to hear both sides. It strikes me that it would be a very serious matter indeed to interfere in any way with these orders that have been passed by Mr. Armstrong. It would probably bring about chaos in the mining operations in that whole area. Therefore, I regard it as of the utmost importance that sanction be given now not only to the Orders in Council touching the appointment of the Coal Director, but to the orders which he has made, the setting aside of which would bring about very serious labour troubles in that whole area.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: These Orders in Council should have been brought down along with the orders of the Director of Coal Operations. I say further, they should have been laid on the table of the House as soon as Parliament met.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not sure but what they have been laid on the Table. Undoubtedly they were published in the Gazette.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Now that the Orders in Council have been produced I should like to read a paragraph or two setting forth the powers given to the Director of Coal Operations. I think Parliament will feel that with these powers about enough is being done in the way of arbitrary enactment. The Order in Council of the 25th of June, 1917, reads in part as follows:

2. The Director shall have power to make all necessary investigations and inquiries respecting wages, holidays, hours of labour, and other labour conditions, and respecting all other matters necessary to, connected with or affecting the cost of and the production of coal and coke, the resumption of the production of the same, and the continuance of such production in the said district during the present war, and for three months after the end of the said war.

3. The owner, agent and manager of every coal mine and the owner, agent and manager of every coke producing plant within the said District 18 and where the owner of any such mine or coke producing plant is a Company, every director of the Company shall comply with the orders and direction of the Director in respect of the matters specified in the last preceding paragraph and generally in connection with the management, operation and use of the mine or of the coke producing plant as the case may be and if he fails to do so he shall be guilty of a summary offence against these regulations.

Then in the Order in Council of the 15th of November, 1917, there is this additional power:

And whereas it is deemed expedient that the said obligations should be imposed upon the said employees, and that the Director of Coal Operations should be authorized to notify the Commissioner of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police of any failure to observe his orders and directions on the part either of said owners, agents and managers or said employees, and that the said Commissioner should be instructed to enforce the observance of such orders and directions;

Therefore,

Certain changes are made, of which the following is the last one cited:

Upon the failure on the part of any such owner, agent, manager or employee to comply with any of the orders and directions aforesaid the Director shall notify the Commissioner of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police of such failure, whose duty it shall then be to take such means as he may deem expedient for the enforcement of such orders and directions.

Here we have powers given by the Governor in Council to the Director of Coal Operations to do almost anything he pleases and to authorize the Northwest Mounted Police to come in and compel obedience to his orders not only by the managers, but by all the workmen in these particular mines. I think that is going about the limit by way of arbitrary enactment in dealing with industrial questions; and to come now to Parliament and say that in addition to all those powers which have already been given, and which may be exercised at any time, we should give legislative sanction to every order that has been made, whether it is in accordance with these general powers or not, is simply making Parliament a mere echo of the will of a single man who has been put in the position of an autocrat over a large portion of the industrial properties of this country.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The House at this stage may not appreciate as keenly as some of us do who were very close to the difficulty, the circumstances that obtained when these orders were passed. Undoubtedly the powers given were wide. Although I was not the minister directly in charge—indeed, I am not now the minister who is responsible initially for this Bill—still as a member of the Government I very well recall the anxious periods that we did go through just arising from and in relation to these coal disputes in Western Canada. It is easy at this distance of time to look back and say that these are wide autocratic powers, and that this man was put in a position of absolute control, and surrounded with the Mounted Police to do his work. That was done, but if the hon. gentleman had had before him the perils we were faced with at that time, he would have thought it was a time for real action instead of a time for disputation and nice academic discussions about power. The steps we took had to be taken. It was a question whether they would prove effective. We were abused at that time chiefly by the coal operators, the owners of the mines, and the rulings of Mr. Armstrong were not only impugned but ridiculed as leaning altogether on the side of labour. But Mr. Armstrong felt as we did, that the thing that had to be got was coal, and we got the coal. The miners acquiesced and the operators acquiesced in Mr. Armstrong's orders, and surely it is the part of wisdom now to see that the question is settled, although it is not all through yet. The difficulties are not all passed by any means. I think if the leader of the Opposition went through those mines it would not take very long to convince him that just some such system of operation and of settlement of disputes as has been installed must be continued for some little time, at all events. I do not think it would take the miners themselves long to convince him or anybody else that that is essential. What I want to impress upon the committee is this, that standing here two thousand miles away—and also in warm weather—and two years distant from the most crucial time, it is very easy to under-estimate the emergency that really confronted the Government at that time, and not only once but times almost without number. One trouble followed in the wake of another, and the very gravest apprehensions filled the minds of the people of Western Canada as to what ultimately would be the result. A government does not very often get credit for the errors that it does not commit. Here is a case where the result was as we sought, where grave danger and grave suffering were avoided by this means. The only question now is whether or not some one yet unknown is to be allowed to frustrate the good that has been done. So far as I am aware there is no question in dispute; there certainly cannot be any substantial question in dispute, and it is in the interest of the whole community that no one shall be allowed to go back and rip up the whole proceedings right from the beginning and throw the country into chaos.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The minister says that the difficulty is far from being settled and that there is still need of such legislation as was enacted by those Orders in Council. Now, Mr. Chairman, we are passing legislation here for which we shall be responsible, and we are doing it without knowing exactly what is its character. That is what I complain about. The rules of Parliament require that every piece of legislation that is passed must have three readings; the principle of the measure which is enacted must be discussed on the second reading and the details considered in committee, so that the public may be properly safeguarded. It is but right that this should be so, and I say that the rules of Parliament must now prevail. This country, among other misfortunes, has suffered from a dangerous disease, that of being ruled by Orders in Council. We thought that the period of such government was over, and it is over, at least so far as the determination of the people is concerned. The legislation which will be enacted in this Bill should follow the ordinary course of parliamentary enactment, and Parliament must be supreme in the future. The fact that this particular thing may have been done in the past does not alter the general principle at all. We are being told too often that the same things have happened in the past. Well, Sir, there are many people in this country at the present time, in all the provinces of Canada, and particularly among the younger generation, that are not going to endorse and approve of things that have been done or made in the past simply because they belong to the past. The tu quoque argument is a weak one.

Mr. BELAND: It is worn out.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is a weak argument and it has never been used in so cynical a manner as this afternoon.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I find no fault with the principle which the hon. member urges, but I do not see what application it has to this case. Has this Bill not to be read three times in the Senate?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Certainly.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Has its principle not been discussed on the second reading? Why, this Bill has passed through several stages. It was introduced and a debate was precipitated at that stage. It was read in the Senate a first time, a second time, and a third time.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The minister knows very well that I am referring to the Orders in Council and not to the Bill.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know that, and I shall come to the point in a moment.

Mr. VIEN: The Bill does not say anything.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It was considered in committee in the Senate, read the third time and passed. Here it has been introduced, read the first and second times and now is in Committee of the Whole. Now, the hon. member says that the Orders in Council have not been read. Does he want them read?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I want to read them, surely.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, they have been two days on the Table.

Mr. VIEN: They have not been distributed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If hon. members want to read the Orders in Council and are in earnest about it no one has ever denied them the right to do so. They have never asked for them, and if they are in earnest about wanting to read them I will not stand in their way. So what point is there in the hon. member's contention? Why, in the legislation passed before, all that was required to ratify the regulations was a resolution. All these preliminaries on which the hon. gentleman lays such stress, namely, the first, second and third readings, did not have to be gone through at all; the matter was passed by a resolution in the House. This Bill has to go through the various stages of every Bill, and while it is in progress hon. members surely have an opportunity of reading the orders of the coal director or the Orders in Council if they so desire. Consequently the indignation which my hon. friend simulates is poorly based. If he wants time to study these orders I do not think that any one is going to deny him that right; but I fancy that after he has done that he will come back in about the same disposition as he is now in, having a grievance of which there is no justification.

Mr. BUREAU: The answer which my hon. friend has given is his customary reply. He dances so well around a point that we see nothing; we just hear a whizz and lose sight of the point altogether. This is only quibbling. There are certain things which we have to ratify, but the substance of the Bill, which consists in 150 orders which were issued by the Fuel Controller, is not printed. My hon. friend from Quebec East has raised a point which I think is well taken. I say, Mr. Chairman, that either the Government had a right to make these orders or they did not. If they had the right to pass these Orders in Council, and there is nothing improper about the matter, why should there be any necessity for legislation now? If the orders issued by the Fuel Controller are equitable and perfectly satisfactory, and there is nothing of which the Government need be apprehensive, what objection is there to having the whole matter freely studied? Why come before Parliament and ask hon. members to ratify orders about which they know nothing? The contention of the hon. member (Mr. Lapointe) is that the Bill does not properly present to Parliament the real purport of the legislation which we are asked to pass. We are called upon, without having had any opportunity to study them, to pass upon some 150 orders touching all sorts of subjects, and I submit that Parliament is entitled to have attached to the Bill, as so many schedules or whatever you may choose to term them, the various orders that were issued, and we ought to know precisely what they are. Is Parliament going to lay down as a principle that when the Governor in Council has authorized a man, under a measure of expediency, to do certain things, without any examination we are going to ratify what is done even though we may deprive of any redress some one who has been wronged? I think the principle is vicious and I for one cannot support it. These Orders in Council were either necessary or they were not at the time they were made. If they were necessary and the extraordinary circumstances of the time at which they were issued justified them, even though perhaps they may have been somewhat autocratic, the Government ought to have nothing to fear, and no court in the country, taking into consideration the peculiar conditions that called for them, would condemn the issuing of them. On the other hand, if a wrong was done to any one, this Parliament cannot under any circumstances commit itself to any act that will deprive that person of the right of redress. My hon. friend says that these orders have been on the Table for two days. Well, Mr. Chairman, we have been sitting here very late at night. We were here until one o'clock night before last and until midnight last night and the House now meets at two o'clock in the afternoon. Furthermore, we have been attending the Railway Committee at ten o'clock. Does my hon. friend, in view of that fact, seriously suggest that we could find time to read such a multitude of orders? It is not fair. Besides, only one copy has been tabled. These orders ought to be printed and the people should know what rules were made by the Fuel Controller; We are asked to ratify those orders now; you ask that the authority of the Fuel Controller be continued for a further period.

The orders which we are now asked to ratify were issued under Orders in Council passed in June and July in 1917 and February, 1918. At that time conditions were abnormal. The minds of the people were unsettled, and the necessity for prompt action might have existed. It is now two years since the signing of the Armistice, however, and we are asked that the Fuel Controller, who was given powers under extraordinary circumstances in a time of great emergency, shall have his authority continued for another year. There must be some reason for this. We are not in a state of war to-day, and the same emergency does not exist. Parliament is now in session, and if there are any particular cases which the minister knows of or which he expects may arise in the near future why should he not inform Parliament of the fact so that we may know what the authority of the Fuel Controller ought to be in these cases. I submit that the point of my hon. friend (Mr. Lapointe) is absolutely well taken, and that it is not an answer for the minister to say that this Bill will follow the usual procedure. What we want to analyse and to study are the orders issued and I content that the substance of those orders should be made known to the people. They ought at least to be attached, as a schedule or as exhibits, to the Bill and they ought to be discussed in committee before they are approved of.

Mr. BURNHAM: Did not the leader of the Opposition say in his speech this afternoon that he would have agreed to the Government's proposition in regard to this matter if it had not been that they proposed to carry it on for another year?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I said that we had gone very far in allowing the first section to pass which extended the powers given the Director of Coal Operations under the several Orders in Council mentioned; that we had gone quite far enough in giving him an opportunity of continuing orders which he may have issued, but that we are going too far in seeking to legalize any orders which may not have been in accordance with the powers given him.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I would like to be as clear as to whether the validation of this order will have any bearing whatsoever upon the powers of this official. For this purpose I see these orders are continued in operation until the end of the next session of Parliament.

[Mr. Bureau.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the orders are in every sense, technically and otherwise unimpeachable they will have validity through the sustenance of the War Measures Act. But they would not after the War Measures Act had passed out of existence; consequently they would be of no value now. The Justice Department has never affirmed that as a matter of law but the better opinion is that their validity rests upon the War Measures Act and that when that Act passes out of existence they must be renewed. It is represented that we are past the war, past the Armistice and there is not the same necessity as formerly existed. It is not more than three days since that hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House drew the attention of the Government, most forcibly and rightly so, to the rather serious coal situation at the present hour. Is it well in face of that situation, that everything should fall to the ground in district 18 and that we should be precipitated back into a condition where we will have strikes instead of work, idleness instead of labour? Is it not better that we should continue that formal control which all along has been responsible for coal production in the tremendous coal area of Western Canada? That is what the Bill does. I do not find any objection to hon. gentlemen wanting every opportunity to study the orders but hon. gentlemen who resist this Bill are seeking to bring us back into that condition. That is at all events the goal towards which they are moving whether they intend to or not. It is urged that these orders should be printed as an appendix to the Bill. Why do we not do that with all regulations that are made? We would hardly be able to get the volume of our statues through the door if we were to follow that practice. These Orders in Council in themselves would make a pretty cumbersome statute. It is only right that hon. gentlemen should be able to see them to find if there is anything they can add to them. I do not believe they think they can. These orders are orders which have proved effective. Prima facie, that is sufficient for the House. If there is anything that could be called attention to, any litigation, any dispute that ought to be decided, Parliament should not get on one side or the other to the dispute. But there is nothing of that kind, we must ask Parliament to remove the possibility of any one, on trivial or technical grounds, tearing the whole thing down, obliging us to go way back to the beginning again and bringing chaos and confusion. That is the only purpose of the Bill? I am introducing it as representing the Minister of Labour. I do not think there is any one in Canada who has as intimate a knowledge or appreciation of the difficulties in that district as the present Minister of Labour. I do not believe that we could ask that this Bill be passed if we were not thoroughly convinced that it was essential to take care of the conditions now prevailing.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If section one is allowed to stand, would the Director of Coal Operations not have power to continue all these orders?

Mr. MEIGHEN: He could continue certainly until Parliament legislated the other way. That is what he has been able to do right along.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We are asked to approve of orders which the Director of Coal Operations could continue without legislation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No. He could under the War Measures Act but his powers under that Act have lapsed; he cannot do anything now unless we give him power to do it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We have given him power by section one of this Bill.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That still leaves this point: that if in any way unknown to himself—and unknown to us as far as that goes—he may have in a technical sense exceeded his powers or not particularly followed them, then some one by proceedings in court might go right back to the whole institution of that order, throw into confusion all that has been done, and set up contentions here and contentions there that would bring the whole coal district into a state of paralysis. Anybody can see that. Consequently we want to confirm what has been done, not because it was wrong but because it has been acquiesced in, and because it is in the public interest that it should remain.

Mr. BUCHANAN: As member for a constituency which is affected by the measure which has been discussed I would say that during the period the commissioner has been in existence there has been more industrial harmony in the southern Alberta coal field than at any time previous. The mines have operated more regularly, and there has been less conflict between the employers and the employees than in any similar period of years in the past. It is true that there is a difference of opinion on the part of some of the employees over some of the orders that have been issued; but I make this statement: That if there had not been any coal commissioner in existence that same trouble would have arisen, because the operators themselves, in their association and as individuals, would have demanded that similar orders apply in their mines. A rather peculiar situation has arisen. Prior to the appointment of the coal commiissioner there was a great deal of hostility on the part of the operators towards the United Mine Workers of America; but owing to difficulty that arose a few years ago, and when there was an attempt to form a new association, the operators practically ran into the arms of the United Mine Workers and they now demand that there shall not be any other organization in the mines but it. Therefore I say that even without the order from the coal commissioner, concerning the United Mine Workers, that has been mentioned the operators would have demanded the same thing even if they had been operating apart from the commissioner altogether.

It must be remembered that this order does not apply to all the coal mines in the province of Alberta. It only applies—I think I am safe in saying this—to the mines within the Operators' Association, because I know of a mine in the Taber field east of the city of Lethbridge, that is not under the control of the coal commissioner. The mines within the Operators' Association are under his control. Now what has happened under the rule of the coal commissioner? We had very little trouble in the coal fields of Alberta at the beginning of the winter season—in the late fall and the early winter. I only know of one case since the coal commissioner was appointed where there was serious trouble in the mines. That was over an order that was issued affecting the mines of British Columbia, but that particular trouble, according to my recollection, did not take place during the critical season. There has been under this system an assurance of a coal supply that was not guaranteed to us in the years before the coal commissioner was appointed. I confidently assert that the mines have operated more regularly during the last four years than they have ever operated before, and there has been less conflict of opinion than previously over the question of wages. What has happened in connection with the question of wages? There was an investigation under this system, in regard to the cost of living in the communities where the mines operate, and as a result of that inquiry an increase was granted to the employees in nearly every case, and I think I am safe in saying that the miners themselves were satisfied with that increase. The chief difficulty over any orders that have been issued have been in regard to hours and in regard to the recognition of a certain union; but I repeat that that difficulty would have existed even if there had not been a coal commissioner, because the Operators' Association itself was determined that only one main organization would be recognized in those mines, and even in the absence of a coal commissioner they would have demanded that that union should be recognized. I do not think we could have overcome that difficulty by the coal commissioner not issuing any order in that connection. The difficulty in Alberta is peculiar to that province, and is a conflict between two groups of men in the labour world. The operators are strongly in favour of one organization, and there is a group of men who are in favour of another. It is true that the commissioner interfered and issued an order that dealt with that particular situation, but even if he had not done so, even if he had refrained from dealing with the situation, the operators would still have persisted in their demand that that particular union be recognized.

On the whole I am not disputing the points that have been raised, particularly by the leader of the Opposition, in order to give full publicity to these orders. What I am saying is that according to my experience and my knowledge—coming as I do from a coal field that is largely affected by this legislation—there has been more peace and harmony since we have had a coal commissioner than there was prior to the appointment of that official.

Another point I would like to make is this: Usually when there is hostility to legislation that is being introduced into Parliament we hear about it both from the miners and the operators. This Bill has been discussed in the Senate, it is generally known that it is before Parliament, and I have not received one single protest from a miners' union or from an operator in my constituency or in Southern Alberta.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I listened with the very greatest care to the arguments on this clause. With regard to what I would call giving this official reasonable legislative sanctuary from acts taken in the emergencies of war I think the argument of the Government would carry me along with them. I do not think that it would be wise to leave an official, who acted under the pressure of war conditions, liable eighteen months after the Armistice to litigation now that the war has happily ended in our favour.

With regard to the continuance of these powers my mind, I must say, till an advanced period of the debate was in doubt. I think the committee knows what my general attitude is on this question. The sooner we get away from boards, controllers, commissions and other things appointed in war time, as a general principle, the better; but perhaps one needs to add that the sooner people get quite sane again the better. I cannot help thinking and feeling that the continued existence of these abnormal controls is an irritant upon the public mind. In Anglo-Saxon countries we have been used to live in an atmosphere of freedom, and as a general principle I do not recede from that point. However, I have a very large amount of faith in my hon. friend from Lethbridge (Mr. Buchanan), and I must say that I have been tremendously impressed by what has just fallen from him. Here is an hon. gentleman living in the locality where these troubles have existed, and where they might exist again, who tells us that the operations of the commissioner and the state of affairs that existed during the war and up to the present time have led to the greatest harmony in that country that he has ever known. Well, Mr. Chairman, I for one would have very great hesitation at this juncture in voting that we should run any risk in this matter. For some period during seven successive months last winter we had zero temperature in that province. That is the time when coal is needed, and I should hesitate in taking any steps which would, as my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior put it, perhaps throw the whole business into a state of chaos. If this question comes to a vote I shall therefore with a clear conscience be compelled to support the Government.

Mr. BUREAU: My hon. friend from Lethbridge (Mr. Buchanan) argues that the coal controller has become necessary. If so, and he is to become a permanent official, why should not this Parliament pass legislation defining his powers? This is not the proper way to do it. The war time is over. These Orders in Council were passed to meet emergencies arising during the war. If we find that the experimnest we made at that time to meet emergencies ought to be continued, let us cut out the Orders in Council and bring in an Act of Parliament providing that a fuel controller shall be appointed, and defining his powers.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Let us get back to normal.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the Government were convinced that this was a permanent situation clearly it would be the act of wisdom to adopt the course my hon. friend suggests; but the Government is not so convinced. We feel that it is essential to hold the situation for the time being and leave Parliament next session either to legislate its permanence or to let it go out of existence. For myself, I hope the latter course will be possible—a hope that I am sure is shared by every hon. member. But surely the right thing to do now is merely to hold on and leave Parliament free.

Mr. BUCHANAN: I made the statement that the operations of the Coal Commissioner applied only to the operators within the Coal Operators' Association. I have heard the statement made that the commissioner had power to rule that the operators of a mine that did not want to be linked up with the Coal Operators' Association, and did not want to comply with his orders, must accept his orders. But my understanding is that his orders apply only to the mines that are within the Association, not to all mines in the province of Alberta.

Mr. CROTHERS: I think my hon. friend is mistaken as to that. By a subsequent Order in Council the jurisdiction of Mr. Armstrong was extended to take in all the mines in province of Alberta and in that portion of British Columbia between the easterly border and the summit of the Rocky Mountains.

Mr. BUCHANAN: I might point out that some operators of mines that have been in the Coal Operators' Association for a number of years broke away from it either last spring or late this winter and were acting independently of the Association. I know of one mine, the Western Canada Coal Company at Tabor, where the men were not expected to fulfil the order as to joining a particular union; it was practically an open shop, and if the men organized another union they were allowed to join it. Seemingly they were not affected by this order. I would make this statement from my knowledge, that the order has not been applied in the way that is mentioned here, that is, to all the mines in the province of Alberta.

Mr. MEIGHEN: To district 18.

Mr. BUCHANAN: Some of the mine operators have been willing to accept this order, among others the operators association. There are other mines in the province that did not come under that order at all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The order was apparently made to apply on the 20th of February, 1918, to all coal mines and coke producing plants situated in the province of Alberta and also those in the province of British Columbia eastward from the summit of the Rocky Mountains.

Mr. BUCHANAN: My point is that I do not think the Coal Commissioner should be given such drastic powers as to compel a mine operator to do something that he does not want to do in respect to the employment of men. If he can operate his mine successfully with certain men, although they do not belong to a union, he should be allowed to do it. The coal operators belonging to the Association are agreeable to the order that has been issued, and I am speaking of those outside the Association.

Mr. CROTHERS: I think I am speaking within the mark, Mr. Chairman, when I advise my hon. friend that the Director of Coal Operations never interfered where the employer and the employee at any particular mine got on agreeably.

Section agreed to on division: Yeas, 99; nays, 50.

Bill reported.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall the Bill be read the third time?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Next sitting of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. Meighen moves that the said Bill be now read the third time. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Mr. FIELDING: Does the hon. gentleman intend to press that motion?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not know that it was objected to. I shall not ask that the Bill be now read the third time, if there is objection.

Motion for third reading stands.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS.

On motion of Hon. J. D. REID (Minister of Railways) the House went into Committee on Bill No. 141, respecting Canadian National Railways, Mr. Steele in the Chair.

On section 1—short title:

Mr. McKENZIE: I have not had an opportunity to study this Bill very closely. If we are building and extending lines in the West, what are the chances of their paying? Will they pay any better than the roads that the Government are now running?

Mr. J. D. REID: This is the Bill which was referred to the Railway Committee a few days ago. Charters are being asked for the extension of three lines, one is from Prince Albert north; another from a point near the American border, and the third an extension of what we call the Turtleford Branch. The mileage in each case is about fifty miles. The extensions are to provide newly settled districts with necessary railway facilities. Hon. gentlemen will remember that when the legislation respecting the Canadian National Railways was put through it was understood that no further extension should be carried out or no new lines built in connection with the Canadian National Railways without charters being first granted by Parliament. This is not to provide for the building of some new line that has not been considered before; it is simply to provide for these three small extensions. Probably about half the work will be done on each of the three extensions this year.

Mr. FIELDING: Since my hon. friend is going to provide for the building of extensions amounting to about 150 miles in the West, I want to take advantage of the opportunity to ask him not to forget that very little line of three miles, practically a siding, which is necessary to connect the town of Lockeport, in the county of Shelburne, with the main railway line. I may use the words that my hon. friend has used: this is not something new or unknown; the line which is needed is simply an extension of three miles in order to reach the centre of population at Lockeport. I do not want to say more than to ask the minister to give the matter consideration.

Mr. CALDWELL: While the minister is on the subject of the extension of railways, I wish to direct his atention to a matter which I believe has been already favourably considered,—that of the building of a short line of railway in New Brunswick to connect the Canadian National Railway system in the Maritime Provinces and Eastern Quebec with the Maine Central, which is our natural outlet from the Maritime Provinces. Practically three-quarters of the freight that originates on the Canadian National railway in the Maritime Provinces and Eastern Quebec is destined for the New England States. To-day we have either to pay the Canadian Pacific a large toll,—they have the connecting link between the Canadian National railways and the Maine Central—or ship via the north shore of New Brunswick, which is a very long route indeed. The route to which I refer has been surveyed. The line would be 22 miles long, and I believe that the estimated cost of construction is $1,000,000. But the line would pay for itself in ten years, if not less. Moreover, the St. John and Quebec railway, which the Government took over recently and are operating, is carrying on at quite a heavy loss every year. If this connecting link was built, all the freight originating on the Canadian National railways in the Maritime Provinces would be routed over the St. John and Quebec railway to reach this connecting line, so that the St. John and Quebec railway would be made a paying instead of a losing proposition. The building of this short line would be a good proposition from the point of view of the Government. I know that money is scarce and that we are all talking economy, and, I hope, trying to practice it. At the same time, it is often more economical to spend money that will bring you a return than not to spend it at all. While I do not know the merits of the lines proposed to be extended under this Bill, I do know the merits of this line which I am now advocating, and I think that the minister knows them as well. I hope that while he is on this subject he will give this matter very earnest consideration.

4 p.m.

Mr. J. D. REID: I am familiar with the proposal to which my hon. friend (Mr. Caldwell) refers. About four years ago it was suggested that he Government should build that connecting line; it was shown that its construction would result in a great saving in the matter of traffic originating in the lower province and destined to the Eastern States. On account of the financial situation, action was delayed. There is no doubt that the construction of this line should be carried out. But just at present the people in that district are not suffering actual lack of transportation facilities, though they may have to pay a little more for freight. The Canadian Pacific as well as the Canadian National Railway Company will for some years be compelled to build extensions of lines in the western provinces. People are going into unsettled districts forty or fifty miles from the railway, on the basis of the promise or the expectation that railways will go into that part of the country. It is a new country; we are trying to get settlers there, and we must provide them with railway facilities at the earliest possible moment. I have no doubt at all that when we get back to normal conditions the Government will take up a scheme such as the one suggested and deal with these matters in the way that it is practically understood by the department and the railway officials that they should be carried out.

Mr. PARENT: I was under the impression that the Canadian Northern had gone out of existence when the Government took over the property, but here we find the name cropping up again. This Bill is to empower the Canadian Northern to build branch lines. Who are the directors of this company that is called the Canadian Northern Railway Company?

Mr. J. D. REID: The incorporation of the Canadian National Railway system does not put out of existence the Canadian Northern Railway. Its stock will be transferred to the Canadian National Railway system when the necessary Order in Council has been passed, but the Canadian Northern will still be kept alive. It will be a subsidiary company of the Canadian National Railway system. The directors of the Canadian Northern are the directors of the Canadian National Railway system. Their names have already been given to the House but I will try and recall them to my hon. friend: D. G. Hanna, President, A. J. Mitchell, Vice-President, Mr. Graham Bell, Sir Hormisdas Laporte, Mr. Riley of Winnipeg, Mr. Hobson of Hamilton, Mr. E. R. Wood of Toronto, Mr. Cantley of Nova Scotia, and Mr. Barnhill of New Brunswick.

Mr. PARENT: Those are the directors of the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. J. D. REID: It is the same thing. They are also the directors of the Canadian Northern. Whoever are the directors of the Canadian National Railway will be the directors of all the subsidiary companies when we bring into force by Order in Council the legislation which has been passed regarding these railways.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Who appoints these directors?

Mr. J. D. REID: They are appointed by the shareholders. The Canadian Government appoints them for the people. Whoever the Government names for the directors of the subsidiary companies are appointed at the annual meeting.

Mr. PARENT: Was there any special reason why we should say in this legislation the Candian Northern Railway Company instead of the Canadian National Railways?

Mr. J. D. REID: These are really extensions to the Canadian Northern Railway, which owns the road running through that particular part of the country. We have in Nova Scotia, for instance, the Halifax and Southwestern Railway, a subsidiary of the Canadian Northern. The stock of that railway is all owned by the Canadian Northern and will be owned by the Canadian National Railway system, but if we wanted to build an extension of fifteen miles to the Halifax and Southwestern railway we would ask for an extension for that particular railway, not for an extension of the Canadian National Railway system.

Mr. ROBB: Inasmuch as on this Bill the minister has widened out the scope of inquiry to include the Canadian National Railways, may I ask that when he brings down his Estimates he be prepared to make a statement to the House of the amounts paid to each transportation company for the carrying of mails from Halifax, St. John, N. B., Quebec, Montreal, Toronto and Winnipeg to points west and in the case of all except Halifax also to points east.

Mr. J. D. REID: If the information can be got out in that form I will give instructions this afternoon to my department and the Post Office Department to have it prepared.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Do I understand that the minister is building new lines of railway in the West ?

Mr. J. D. REID: These are not new railways, but extensions to present lines.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): My hon. friend will remember that there is a railway in Eastern Nova Scotia about which representations have been made to him for many years. At the present time twelve miles of that railway have been completed and are in operation, and the whole question now is in regard to the extension of the railway, in which some 40,000 people are interested. Some families have lived in that part of the country since the American revolution and are still without railway accommodation. My hon. friend is anxious and rightly so, to provide railway accommodation for new settlers in Western Canada, but I would also urge upon him that the old settlers, some of whom and their forefathers have been in this country for 150 years are also entitled to some consideration. Does my hon. friend think it is more important to extend railways in Western Canada to give accommodation to new settlers than to extend railways in the part of Nova Scotia to which I have referred to accommodate the large population who have occupied that country for so many generations?

Mr. J. D. REID: I would not say that it is more necessary to provide railway accommodation for new settlers in Western Canada than for the people the hon. member speaks for. I am not as familiar with the situation in that part of the country as my hon. friend, but if they have been without railway accommodation for so long a time as he says, and it is so urgently required the hon. member should have got it for them during the seventeen years he sat in this House as a supporter of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and then he would not be appealing to me to-day. I have had no one pressing me for a railway in that particilar locality. As to these extensions in Western Canada, there is no doubt at all that the Canadian Northern, the Canadian Pacific and the Grand Trunk as well, I suppose, promised branch lines to the people who settled in the western provinces. Furthermore, we have encouraged immigration to this country for many years. We have been advertising the fact that in our western provinces there was a great field for immigrants to come and settle. All Governments, not simply the present Government, but the previous government, and the Government before that, have encouraged settlers to come to Canada and have promised them railway accommodation if they will settle there. Having promised these people that we would build railways as fast as settlement justified it, I feel that we should carry out that promise. The Canadian Pacific are certainly carrying out that very policy. I feel that when it is shown to us that settlement has progressed to such an extent that it will pay to build a railway to allow these settlers to get out their wheat and other products, the railway accommodation should be provided.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): My hon. friend is right in saying that in Eastern Nova Scotia we should have got this railway built while the late Government was in power, but he has not told the whole story. During those years there was great opposition on the part of both political parties to undertaking the construction of branch lines anywhere on the Intercolonial railway. During the period that the Conservative party were in power prior to 1896, the attitude of the Government was that they could not afford to begin to build these branch lines. I believe the reason generally given was that if they commenced to do so they would be swamped with applications. There was therefore no branch line policy adopted by either party up to the year 1910. In 1910 when a resolution was brought forward by my late hon. friend from the county of Westmorland, Mr. Emerson, the Government of that day accepted it and adopted the policy of building branch lines for the first time. Immediately after that, at the very next session of Parliament, provision was made for those branch lines I refer to. It was acknowledged on all sides that the Guysborough branch should be the first to be built. A million dollars was voted in 1911, immediately after the decision had been arrived at by Parliament to begin the construction of branch lines on the Intercolonial. A contract was then made to build that line. Tenders were called for, surveys were made and two branch lines were projected, one in the county of Halifax and one in the counties of Guysborough and Pictou. Another was projected in the island of Cape Breton, of which my hon. friend who sits near me (Mr. McKenzie) has often spoken. Advertisements were published and tenders were received, and a million dollars was provided by Parliament for the building of each of these branch lines. Then, when the business was at that stage, there was a change of government. The county of Halifax was represented by the Prime Minister and one of his colleagues, not now in this House, and the county of Guysborough by your humble servant. The contracts were exactly similar, a million dollars having been voted for each. They were executed at the same time and everything was done before the change of Government took place. Thereafter, what happened? The Government repudiated the contract for the building of the branch line into the county of Guysborough but continued the contract for the railway into the country represented by the Prime Minister. It is not creditable to the Government that they should have treated one county differently from another simply because the county of Guysborough happened to be represented by a member of the Opposition. That is what happened, however, and I had hoped that my hon. friend would have redeemed the record and wiped out the reproach of the Government. He has not done so. I have on various occasions obtained hopeful promises from my hon. friend that he would reconsider this matter. I quite understand that it is difficult at the present time to get money to build railways anywhere, but if railways are to be built I submit that there is no part of Canada where the need is so urgent as in that locality. There are great natural resources to be developed there; there are great fishing, lumber and mining industries, and that part of the country has been kept back all these years because this railway has not been built. There is no other way of obtaining railway facilities for this locality except as a branch of the Government railways, because it is not possible as a commercial enterprise to build short branch lines such as this. I submit that my hon. friend should now deal with this question. I would not press it at the present time were it not for the fact that he is building railways in other parts of Canada; and when he undertakes to construct railways in Western Canada for new settlers who have been in the country only a short time, and denies the same right to people who have been here for generations, I think it is eminently unfair and the Government cannot defend such a policy. I contend that they cannot fairly build new railways in Western Canada if they refuse to do the same thing for Eastern Canada.

Mr. COWAN: I agree with the proposal to make these three extensions provided for in this Bill. The hon. member (Mr. Sinclair) speaks about new localities that are now being served by these railways. The locality that is being provided for by No. 3 has been longer settled than the district in Nova Scotia to which my hon. friend referred. Thirty-five years ago Willow Bunch and Wood Mountain districts were among the oldest settlements in the country. The settlers have lived there for years and years and have to cart their produce thirty, forty and fifty miles to the nearest centre. There is another thing that makes the third line necessary. It runs within five or six miles of the international boundary line and the settlers there are largely American in sentiment and during the past number of years have been taking all their produce across to the United States. They have been taking all their wheat and other things and selling it there and doing all their purchasing on the American side. As I said in the Railway Committee the other day, so far as these two tiers of townships along the Montana boundary line are concerned they might as well be in the United States, for they are not a part of Canada as regards their trade. We can only expect that condition to continue so long as they are nearer the American railway than the Canadian, and the only way in which we can make these two townships a real part of Canada is by giving them the railway facilities they so much need. I trust therefore that not only will these railways be built as quickly as possible, but that it will be a settled policy that the line shall be continued further west from year to year until the whole of the townships abutting Montana are served by the Canadian railways and brought into touch with Canadian centres. There is one thing that has puzzled me and I should like the minister to make a statement on the point. Is it his intention, or does he promise, that these three branches will not only be graded but will be steeled this year? I ask this question because last year we provided for a branch line further east running from Peebles to Lampman for a distance of some twenty miles and we were hoping that it would be built this year because it taps a magnificent coal mine which we want to reach. Although the Government has made all provision necessary in the way of charter, money, etc., I find by a letter that I received the other day from the manager of the Canadian National Railways that they will not be able to complete it this year because they cannot get the steel. How can they get steel for these three branches and not for a branch already authorized? I contend that the line already started should be finished and steeled before further extensions are made, because the one already authorized is a very important one to the people of the city of Regina and to thousands of people who want to get this coal. A company with $500,000 capital is now operating and it is completely stuck because it is eight miles away from a railway. This branch has been promised and these people are waiting for it. I would like to know if the steel is going to be provided for this road this year?

Mr. J. D. REID: In reference to the question of doing grading work and providing steel for these three branch lines, and also why we did not put the steel on this Willow Bunch-Wood Mountain, line last year. I may say that in the first of the year the board of directors lay down their construction policy for the year. That was done last year and it was decided that 350 miles was the outside limit that could be constructed. Parliament voted the money necessary to do the work on 350 miles. But there is no use of saying that we can guarantee to build 350 miles. If we cannot get the rails, ties and labour we cannot do the work. We were not able to do the 350 miles because we could not get the labour or the rails. This year we have laid down a construction policy of about 350 miles. The Canadian Pacific have also laid down a construction policy of 350 miles. Early in the year they believed they could do that amount of work and we believed we could do the same. But there is a shortage of labour and of rails. Every effort is being made by the Government and the Canadian Pacific to get the labour necessary to complete the 350 miles. If we can get the rails we will complete all we decided to do last year. That will have the preference in so far as the rails are concerned. Then we will follow that up with 350 miles that we have decided to go ahead with this year if we can get the rails and labour. Part of this mileage is included in the three lines I am now asking charters for. The charters are for about fifty miles each or 150 miles in all. We do not intend to grade or lay the rails on the 150 miles this year but probably 15 or 20 miles of each of these three lines is all we can expect to do this year. Contracts for grading will be let and tenders are now waiting for these charters to be put through. If we can get the rails and the men, which we are trying to arrange for now, we will have the steel laid and the grading done on 15 or 20 miles of each of these branch lines.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Can the Minister tell us what is the population of the district traversed by these railways?

Mr. J. D. REID: Parties from these localities stated what the population was in the Railway Committee the other day. They said that there were large settlements in each district. In the Prince Albert district there is a population of 40,000. A large population has been settled there for some time and there has been a very largely signed petition from all the people in the locality. We have also had deputations to the Government and the board of management not only this year but last year urging the construction of these roads.

Mr. CAHILL: I was in the Railway Committee the other day and I did not hear any one say what the population was in the territories that these railways will traverse. When the hon. member at the back of the Minister suggests to him that there are 40,000 people, it shows a woeful lack of accurate information because there are not more than 40,000 people in the whole district of Prince Albert which is already served by two large railways. The country is well served to the South and the only question it as to the North. That is an indication of the kind of information we are getting here in regard to the railway situation. I want to bring to the attention of the Government what appears to be the most important matter in connection with the whole question. That is: who recommends the construction of these railways? Is it recommended by the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways? If so, what promises have been made to the Government as to the possibility of earning a revenue on these extensions? What promises have been made to the Government as to their ability to pay the interest on this investment? Before we get too deep into this proposition I would like to remind the Minister of Railways that the Minister of Finance on the 18th day of May informed the House that he had practically written off $140,000,000 of advances to the Canadian Northern Railway Company. What were the advances for? For the construction of railways, for the building of branch lines and such work, I presume, because it is stated that the whole amount is represented by assistance furnished by this Government to the Canadian Northern. Where do we get to by this policy? What is the policy? We are at both ends of this question. We are representing the people who owned the Canadian Northern railway. Our directors on the one hand come to us and say: "We want to build certain branch lines". We, on the other hand, represent the people who must pay and we are entitled to ask the directors, or the Government: "What do you expect to accomplish by building these branch lines?" This is no longer a philanthropic proposition. We are not in a position to continuously hand out money to these people. What is the policy of this railway company? What is the policy of the Government in regard to the railway question? Are we going to build where the greatest pressure is brought to bear? Are we going to build along the boundary line because somebody is selling his wheat and buying his sugar in the United States, or because somebody is trading with the United States? We are trading with every country in the world. Surely that is no excuse for building a railway. We are not going to build railways to stop people from trading with the United States. We want to know whither we are heading? We cannot go on indefinitely spending money with one hand and having the Minister of Finance coming down and writing off the investment with the other. The people of the whole of Canada are paying for these railways. Each district throughout Canada will want its pro rata share of its construction of railways. It is all very well for the Minister to say that these railways are going to earn interest but the man who is in a position to give us an opinion says that this investment is a bad asset and that these railways are not in a position to earn interest. He writes it off, dismisses it and no longer counts it as an asset. How much longer are we going to continue this policy? Have you determined on what ground you are building these western lines? Is it on the ground that pressure is being brought to bear for their construction. What kind of pressure is it—political or otherwise? Is it on the ground that this section of country will develop traffic that will earn money for the railway company or is the motive purely political? This committee is entitled to know where we are heading for and what we are driving at in regard to this 350 or more miles of railway that the Minister talks so freely about building this year. We should understand where we are heading for. The minister and his colleagues in the Cabinet should sit down and come to some conclusion about this railway policy. They should adopt a railway policy. They should have a real railway policy before they come and ask for charters to build more railways when they have absolutely no idea as to where the money to pay for those railways is coming from other than it is coming out of the pockets of the already heavily burdened taxpayers of Canada. In the absence of exact information this is not a good, sound, proposition. The Government should ask themselves these questions: Is it necessary to build these roads? It may be necessary to open up the territory in question, but would some private railway company build the lines required to serve that territory? Is that territory so valuable that if the Government lines were extended into it the result would be to yield such dividends as would help to reduce the existing deficit? We have not had any information with respect to these lines in the railway committee, that is any dependable figures with respect to the territory proposed to be served and the population which it contains. When these charters came up in the railway committee, for example, no member, not even the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Knox) could give a rough estimate of the number of people that wolld be advantaged by the line running north of the city of that name. Neither did any person attempt to give an estimate of the population in the Willow Buttes district, or in the district being served by the line running northwest from Radisson. It is not only that we are asked to grant these charters. As a matter of fact we have to find the money with which to build the railways in question. Can it be that the Government are so callous, and so used to doing things that no person with a conscience would attempt to do, that they propose to go ahead without furnishing the detailed information that is necessary? I can tell them that the time will come when they will be answerable to the people; their mandate has long since expired. They will soon have to account for their deeds and will have to make fitting explanation to the people. I repeat the Government of this country should have a policy regarding the railway situation. I venture to say that not a man in this committee has asked what the expenditure per mile is going to be in connection with these branch railways. I asked that question in the railway committee, but I only received an evasive reply. I was told the cost might be $30,000, or $35,000, and even $45,000. The Government really have no correct conception of what the construction of these lines is going to cost, or where they are going to get the necessary money to build them—in fact they do not know where they are heading for.

Mr. J. D. REID: The hon. member is afraid there is some political move behind the construction of these railways, but he need not be worried to the extent of one particle in that regard. The Government have a policy, and that policy has been explained not only in this House but in the railway committee as well. The hon. member wants to know whether these lines will pay if they are built. Let me tell him that the Government do not intend to build one mile of railway until it has been shown and demonstrated to them that it will pay. The policy of constructing railways that will parallel other lines, or encroach upon the territory which the existing lines already serve while it has been one that has been followed by all Governments ever since Confederation has been discontinued so far as the present Government is concerned. They will only build such lines, or agree to their extension, when it has been shown that they will pay. Now let me demonstrate to the hon. member that so far as the Canadian Northern railway is concerned there would not be any possible chance of its paying in the West unless it were furnished with these branch lines.

Mr. CAHILL: Which branch lines?

Mr. J. D. REID: All the branch lines in connection with the Canadian Northern railway, feeders to the main line. In the case of these particular fifteen miles of line, the products of the territory through which they will pass will be such as to well pay the main line for their carriage. Let me say to the hon. member that in the three western provinces not only the main lines but the branch lines of the Canadian Northern already in existence, have always paid. They paid last year, they will pay this year, and they will continue to pay. The loss on the operation of the Canadian Northern was owing to the several governments concerned allowing them to build a railway westward from Port Arthur where there were no feeders; but the lines to which I have alluded have always paid and will continue to pay. The hon. member was present in the railway committee, and heard the discussion there. He will therefore agree with me that the policy determined upon of building these branch lines is fair, just and right, and that when the lines are constructed they will greatly add to the success and profit of the main systems of which they will be feeders.

Mr. CAHILL: The Minister has stated that the Canadian Northern railways in the West, both main line and branch, have always paid?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes.

Mr. CAHILL: Then I presume he will be able to substantiate that statement when the railway estimates are up for consideration.

Mr. COWAN: If the hon. member is not willing to accept the statement of the Minister of Railways, perhaps he will accept the statement of the Hon. Charles Dunning, Liberal minister, in the province of Saskatchewan. That province has guaranteed millions of dollars—I do not know how many million—for the construction of branch lines in connection with the different railways of that province, and Mr. Dunning stated, within the last year that he would not be at all sorry if he had to take over all those branch lines that had been so guaranteed because every one was a paying investment. The authority of a Liberal minister in a Liberal Government ought to be sufficient authority for the Liberal member of Pontiac.

Mr. CAHILL. That fact would go a long way to recommend them, but it is not a question of somebody thinking or saying so. The facts should be available, and all I want is that the facts be produced before the committee showing the earnings of the main line throughout the western country and of the extensions that have been built.

Mr. CURRIE: There is one feature in connection with this matter which the minister has brought up, and it is this: Reference has been made to the directorate of the Canadian Northern Railway. Now as far as this railway is concerned we find that every year we are going into the hole about $50,000,000 and that all our other railway securities—

Mr. J. D. REID: The hon. member has just made the statement, if I understood him right, that so far as the Canadian Northern Railway in concerned I stated that we were going into the hole every year $50,000,000.

Mr. CURRIE: No. I am saying that the Government railways are going into the hole about $50,000,000. I want to point out to the minister something very serious that the people of this country have taken into their consideration in connection with this matter. In the United States, in the case of every great railway, the executive officers and directors are composed of railway operators, men who understand their business. The presidents, vice-presidents, and directors are all men who are experts in their line of business. But this Government railway is managed by a lot of men that I consider are nothing but political profiteers. They are merchants and brokers, and men who sell coal to the Government, and I think the time has come when that has got to stop. Further, I have got to say this—and I am speaking, perhaps, on behalf of the East rather than of the West—I think the time has come when this quarrel between the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Government railways should end. Because a few of the officials of our Government system and the minister have a quarrel with the Canadian Pacific Railway, that is no reason why the people should have to make up a deficit of $50,000,000 a year. The people are demanding that the minister shall put our Government railways on a paying basis within a few months' time. And that is a very easy thing to do. It is only a question of increasing the rates. Why should we have to continue paying annual deficits of $50,000,000 unless the Government want to make public ownership of railways unpopular? I am speaking on behalf of public ownership. I think we cannot avoid it, and the only proper course to pursue is to see that our national railways are made to pay. Any business man inside of twenty-four hours could arrange a tariff by which those railways could be put on a profitable basis, and we would not be confronted every year with these deficits. It is a black mark against the financial reputation of this country that those deficits should occur year after year, and it influences other nations against us in so far as our credit is concerned.

With regard to the building of branch lines in the West, that is a question which the minister has fully considered. He has explained, and it is no doubt true, that the branch lines of our national system in the West are paying. But so far as the East is concerned any further building of branch lines would to a large extent be merely a needless duplication. I am sorry that the hon. gentleman who referred to a certain branch line in Nova Scotia is not in his seat.

An hon. MEMBER: He is.

Mr. CURRIE: Oh, yes, I see him now. I have a distinct recollection of a charter being granted for that railway in 1908, when a carload of wheelbarrows and shovels was taken up there on the eve of the election just so that he and his friends could carry the riding; and the same thing occurred in 1911. He and his colleague were two of the strongest men in this House from Nova Scotia, and if they had had any real intention of building that railway they could have done so between 1908 and 1911. But, Mr. Chairman, that charter was obtained purely for political purposes, and for that reason I think the Minister of Railways before going ahead with any such branch line would be well advised to take into consideration the local conditions. Of course, if he wanted to carry the riding against the hon. gentleman at the next election he might go down there and have a carload of shovels and wheelbarrows dumped on the location on the eve of the election.

Mr. VIEN: That would not be sufficient.

Mr. CURRIE: Then the story might be repeated that he would not come back. But that branch line has been purely a political venture, and I think it is a great waste of time to deal with it here.

This question of seeing that our national railways pay for themselves is a very vital question, and the only way to make them pay is to increase the freight rates. So far as I have heard there is but one argument advanced against such an increase: That the Canadian Pacific railway would benefit. Well, there are methods by which that could be prevented. But even if the Canadian Pacific railway did make some money out of an increase in freight rates, what about it? The Canadian Pacific railway is one of our foremost institutions, its credit and standing are international, and at the present moment its securities are lower than they have ever been for the last fifteen years. That does not speak well for this country in our period of reorganization when we need more population and more capital. But the tide of immigration has entirely stopped, and although the statistics for the last few months are not yet available, I think I am safe in saying that we have been losing rather than gaining population If we are going to make this country attractive to immigrants we must reduce taxation, and we cannot do that if every year the Minister of Railways (Mr. Reid) asks us to make good a $50,000,000 deficit on the operation of our national railways. That condition of affairs prejudices us in the eyes of the world, and naturally it is said: Oh, Canada is a poor country. Look at its Government railways comprising over 20,000 miles, they are in a hole every year to the extent of $40,000,000 or $50,000,000. The people of this country are now demanding that the Minister of Railways of this or any other Government shall see to it that the deficits on the operation of our national railway system are changed into surpluses. I have no quarrel with the minister about building branch lines. No doubt he has figures to show whether or not those branch lines will pay. I am speaking of the whole system. There must be a change in management, new men must be put in charge and held strictly responsible for the profitable and efficient operation of the system. Any business man would demand that the system be operated so as to show a surplus rather than a deficit. The Government has it in his own hands to make public ownership of railways a success, for it can control freight rates, and it is absolutely contrary to public policy that we should continue to operate our national railways at rates which entail steady and increasing losses. Those who use our railways for the shipment of thousands of tons of freight should not ask our working men and factory girls to make up that deficit; they should be prepared to meet it by paying freight rates which will not only cover the cost of operation but leave a profit for the benefit of the Treasury.

I think the Minister of Railways should be ready at an early date to assure this Chamber that he is putting his house in order, and that the rates are to be immediately increased to a paying basis. There is no quarrel with the Canadian Pacific railway, there is not quarrel with public ownership, which will justify these continued deficits, and the time has come when the Parliament of Canada, irrespective of political affiliations, should put its foot firmly down and say: We must have an end of these deficits, and there must be a new form of management to bring that about.

Mr. REID (Mackenzie): Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN: Before the hon. member proceeds, I must remind the committee that the principle of this Bill was adopted on the second reading, yet hon. members have been indulging in a second reading debate. Hon. gentlemen have been going even further and discussing the Estimate of the Department of Railways and Canals. The rule is quite clear: that discussion in committee must be relevant to the clause under consideration; and unless the committee gives its unanimous consent that this discussion may continue, I must ask hon. members to confine themselves to the subject matter of each clause as it is reached. Is it the unanimous consent of the committee that this general discussion be continued?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE: I understood that the policy of the Government in regard to building branch lines in other places than the West was open for discussion. I would not like to follow the trend of the argument opened up by the minister himself, and followed by other speakers—

The CHAIRMAN: It is always very regrettable to be obliged to call any one hon. member to order after other hon. members have been allowed to enter upon a general discussion, but I have just given my ruling, and before giving that ruling I asked for the unanimous consent of the committee, which consent was refused. I can do nothing now but hold hon. members strictly to a discussion of the branch lines mentioned in this Bill.

Mr. REID (Mackenzie): Mr. Chairman—

Mr. McKENZIE: I was going to observe—

The CHAIRMAN: Mr. Reid has the floor.

Mr. REID (Mackenzie): Mr. Chairman, I could not quite hear your ruling. Do I understand that I have to confine my remarks to these particular branch lines?

The CHAIRMAN: To the branch lines mentioned in the present Bill.

Mr. REID (Mackenzie): I can speak for the branch lines in the northern part of the three prairie provinces. The hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Currie) stated that the branch lines of our national system in the West were a paying proposition; in that statement he is absolutely correct. It is a fact that about a month ago the grain crop of last year was not moved out of Northern Saskatchewan on lines tributatry to the Canadian National system, and if our National railways are to be made to pay they must be fed by branch lines in the most productive part of the Dominion, and that is the northern part of the prairie provinces. I do not know about conditions in the East, and therefore I shall confine my remarks to that part of the West with which I am familiar. I have this information from a railway official, that if we have this year a normal grain crop in Western Canada we will have the biggest grain blockage that we have ever experienced in that country.

It is time for the Minister of Railways to get the necessary rolling stock and have the road beds put in first class condition so that when the crop goes on the market our railway system, branch lines as well as main lines, will be able to keep the traffic moving. If this is not done, there is no use in our building branch lines. I am prepared to give the Government and the Minister of Railways my hearty support in the construction of branch lines on the Canadian National Railway system in Western Canada wherever they are needed. Branch lines must be constructed if we are to reach the outlying settlements and give those who settle in our country a chance to get their produce to the market.

Mr. McKENZIE: Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. McKENZIE: Oh no, we are not ready for the question. Hon. members opposite make their speeches, and when it comes to somebody else's turn they say: "Question". Just as much time will be saved and just as much progress will be made if hon. gentlemen show some degree of fairness and if the minister lets everybody have his say. I do not propose at this time of my life to be turned off as easily as hon. gentlemen may think when I have some remarks to make.

Mr. J. D. REID: I take issue with the hon. member. I have no objection if he takes a week on this Bill. But he knows that the Estimates must come up and that on those Estimates the general railway policy may be discussed. If, however, he wishes to take up the time of the committee in discussing a matter which is really not before us, I am willing that he do so; hon. members may take up as much time as they like in a discussion of the whole railway policy.

Mr. McKENZIE: The minister spoke on this Bill; the member for Antigonish and Guysborough (Mr. J. H. Sinclair) spoke on it, as did the member for Pontiac (Mr. Cahill); the member for Regina (Mr. Cowan); the member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie). All made long speeches along lines of a general character. Now, when the member for North Cape Breton and Victoria wants to speak, it is alleged that he is improperly taking up the time of the committee. That is the ruling of the minister.

Mr. J. D. REID: No, it is not the ruling of the minister.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. That was not the ruling of the minister; it was the ruling of the Chairman. The hon. member who was called to order was not the member for North Cape Breton and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie), but the member for Mackenzie (M. J. F. Reid), who had the floor when the ruling was given. I am sorry that the hon. member for North Cape Breton and Victoria should be deprived of the opportunity of making his speech, and once more I am willing to ask for the unanimous consent of the committee that he be allowed to make that speech. But if the Chairman remained seated and allowed each member of the committee to make the same kind of speech as that made by each of the hon. members mentioned a moment ago by the member for North Cape Breton and Victoria, the Chairman would certainly not be doing his duty.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am not finding fault with the ruling. There was a time in my life when I presided in a court, and if a lawyer tried to give me law that was bad I would tell him so at once; I would not let him waste a whole day in giving bad law. With all due deference, I submit that when we begin to drift from the proper line, the thing to do is to stop it at once, and not give an advantage to half a dozen members to make their speeches before shutting another member off. I stand by the ruling, but I submit that the ruling should be made whenever the digression occurs. I have no desire to depart from the rules, but I think there is necessity for information in connection with this Bill. The minister has said that no action was taken until there was assurance that the building of these extensions would be a business proposition. What assurance has the Government to that effect? What survey has been made? Is the minister in possession of a report from Mr. Hanna? Is there a report from the Chief Engineer giving the assurance that this is a business proposition and that there will be no loss to the people if they put their money into this new venture?

5 p.m.

Mr. J. D. REID: Before the board decided to ask for these charters they had their officials go over the territory with a view to seeing whether these lines should be built. Mr. M. H. MacLeod, assistant to Mr. Hanna,—in fact, the gentleman who laid out the whole of the Canadian Northern lines in Western Canada—is in charge of extensions and the construction of lines in that part of the country. Hon. members who have been in the West will agree that the Canadian National or Canadian Northern lines in the West are well located and are all on a paying basis. Now, Mr. MacLeod, with his staff, examined this territory and recommended, in his report to the management, that these extensions be made. Mr. MacLeod and his engineering staff came to Ottawa and I went over the whole matter with them. Subsequently a sub-committee of the Cabinet, composed of Sir Henry Drayton, Mr. Calder and myself, went to Toronto and discussed the extensions proposed to be made during the coming year. Only after we spent two days in Toronto with Mr. Hanna, Mr. Mitchell, Mr. MacLeod, Mr. Hungerford and other officials did we come to the conclusion that the extensions now proposed were not only necessary and in the public interest, but should be proceeded with at the earliest possible day. I only mention this to show that we are not going on with this work simply because we have received a letter or something of that kind from the railway officials. Everything that could be done by the Government to ascertain the facts in connection with these extensions was done. It was shown that settlement in these districts was ahead of the railways and that the extensions should be built. As to the roads being profitable, we have the statement of the officials. There is no doubt about their being profitable. They will run into a splendid section of the country, where the settlers will furnish a sufficient quantity of traffic in farm products to make them pay. My candid opinion is that extensions such as this, which produce more traffic for our main lines and promote settlement, will help reduce the deficits on the Canadian National railways. We have been informed by the officials that owing to the high cost of rails and labour the roads will cost from $30,000 to $35,000 a mile. Of course, we shall have more traffic the second year than the first, because settlement will proceed much more rapidly when the railway accommodation is provided.

Mr. McKENZIE: Does the minister mean to say that he has no written report at all from some responsible officer with regard to these extensions?

Mr. J. D. REID: We have a statement from the president, after the discussions we had. There is an official report as to the necessity of the extensions we are asking for and the conditions of the country through which they will run. I do not want the committee to think I am trying to rush this Bill through in an unreasonable manner. There will be another opportunity to discuss these extensions when the Estimates are up, and if the committee want a report on each extension I will have the reports brought down. I am trying to get this legislation through because I think, and the Government thinks, that these extensions are absolutely necessary.

[Mr. J. D. Reid.]

Mr. McKENZIE: This country is divided into two camps as far as public ownership is concerned. On the one side we have the people of this country and the Government, and on the other the Canadian Pacific. Now we, the representatives of the people, sitting here, have the same responsibilities as the directors and managers of the Canadian Pacific would have if they were projecting new lines, and I venture to tell my hon. friend that the president and the executive of the Canadian Pacific would not plunge into the building of a road into practically uninhabited sections of the West without a report from a responsible engineer as to the feasibility of building the road, and a report from the traffic manager as to the prospects of the road paying. All that is done in this case is that the Minister of Railways goes on a little excursion to Toronto and while there he has the pleasure of sitting down and smoking a cigar with Mr. Hanna and Mr. MacLeod—

Mr. J. D. REID: I do not smoke.

Mr. McKENZIE: He takes his whiskey while they smoke.

Mr. J. D. REID: There is prohibition in Ontario.

Mr. McKENZIE: We have no report, no plan, no estimate. We are not told whether bridges will have to be built to cross streams, whether there are any rock cuttings to be made, or anything as to the nature of the road. All we have is this solemn gathering of two or three friends discussing matters generally and reaching the conclusion that it would be a nice thing to extend lines in certain parts of the country. Then the minister comes home and calls this easy bunch of members around him and asks them to give him any quantity of money to build this road. I submit to the minister and to this House that that is not the way to do business. Before one dollar is voted for this proposition and before a charter is granted we should ascertain the facts in a business-like way. I am not talking from an opposition standpoint or with any idea of blocking this project. I am only asking that the proper line of business be followed, as I understand it, and which hon. gentlemen opposite who are business men would follow if they were investing their own money. We are the trustees of the money of the people. The people are losing by the National railways something like $49,000,000 or $50,000,000 a year, and now we are telling the people of this country that notwithstanding the fact that we, the trustees of their money, lost something like $50,000,000 on the railways last year, we are going to continue to spend money on the railways without consulting them, and with no hope of doing better in the future than in the past. If that is the way we are going to wield our power under the policy of Government ownership, the enemies of public ownership and those who criticise it, of whom I am one, will have a splendid opportunity of finding themselves justified by the facts. Has the minister any working profile of these extensions showing the number of bridges and cuttings and so forth, and also an estimate of the probable expenditure involved? Has an Order in Council been passed approving the location of the different lines? All this information would be given if it was any one but ourselves who was building these roads. We are simply dealing with ourselves under the name of this company. It is somewhat of a fallacious position to be in. We are calling ourselves the Canadian Northern Railway, whereas it is ourselves who are building these roads. We have all the powers under the Railway Act to enable us to build a railway, and in view of that Act on the statute books it is anomalous that we should be here asking power of ourselves to build our own road, and talking of the road as if it was anybody else's but our own. I think I have made myself perfectly clear, and I am sure my argument must appeal to every business man in this House. I think the committee should be given the information I have asked for. I am not a business man myself; I am a mere lawyer, but whatever may be said of lawyers, after they have been a long time in practice they learn something about business. I have learned business ideas. I think it is only plain common sense that we should be given the information I have asked for before we are asked to launch upon this very doubtful enterprise.

Mr. KNOX: I think if my hon. friend took a trip out West and saw conditions for himself he would change his mind as to the necessity of building these roads. I wish to say a word in regard to subclause (a), as the line mentioned therein is in the constituency I represent. The country lying to the north of Prince Albert is thickly settled for the reason that when settlers went in there the odd number homesteads were open for entry the same as the even numbers, which was very different from what it had been in former years. We therefore have more settlers to the square mile there than in the greater part of the West. For some twenty-five or thirty miles this thick settlement continues north of Prince Albert, and the settlers have been in that country for a good many years, some for a very long period. They have been looking forward to railway facilities but up to the present time they have not been able to secure anything. Beyond that, twenty-five or thirty miles, you still find men growing wheat and raising cattle, and their produce has to be transported in many instances thirty and even forty miles. At Prince Albert we have just recently had provincial stock yards opened and they are promising to be very successful, and there is a large abattoir operating at the same point. The hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Reid) mentioned the difficulty of getting wheat out of the northern district last year, and I can vouch for what he says in that respect. I would point out that on general principles it is necessary to build these branch lines, because if you want to make the railroad pay it is essential to open up just such a district as this line will go into. I therefore most heartily endorse the principle laid down here.

Mr. ROBB: It might be interesting to the committee to know who owns the land along this particular section. In am not particularly interested in regard to what is owned by settlers who have located, but it would be interesting to know what companies own big tracts of this country in which the railway is to operate, and how much the Crown owns.

Mr. J. D. REID: I will endeavour to have that information when my Estimates are under consideration. I believe that that particular section from Prince Albert north was Government land that has been settled by soldiers. There is a large settlement of returned soldiers in that particular locality. The other districts, I understand, are nearly all settled by private settlers. However, I will get the information which my hon. friend desires. I have not heard of any large company owning any land there. So far as I am aware it is owned by private settlers interested in the locality.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): I think the minister will have to revise his figures in regard to the population. I may remind him that the last census taken in Saskatchewan only four years ago showed that there were only 42,000 people in the whole district, and the population of the southern part of Prince Albert district must be subtracted from that number in order to give the true population of the northern part of the country. I think that the minister must be misinformed in regard to the number of people who will be served by the new branches in that territory, and if he could get the exact information for us it might be useful. I believe he could obtain that information because a census was taken there a few years ago.

Mr. J. D. REID: An hon. member asked me if I knew what the population was and I replied that I could not make any authoritative statement myself, but I thought it had been mentioned in the committee. I think that an hon. member sitting behind me said it was 40,000. If I remember rightly it was the hon. member who lives in Prince Albert that made that statement. This railway, of course, would not serve the whole of that 40,000, but it would serve a large proportion of them. I did not make the statement on my own responsibility.

Mr. KNOX: It was I who said that the population of the constituency was forty thousand. It may be considerably more than that at the present time. As to this particular district, it would be difficult to estimate what the difference is, because the settlers have been going there continuously for some years, and since the establishment of the Soldiers' Settlement Board there has been a large influx into the northern part of this district. The soldiers have settled very extensively there, and it would be difficult to state the exact population.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. CAHILL: What clause are we on Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN: We are discussing section 2.

Mr. CAHILL: I understood we were on clause 1.

The CHAIRMAN: We have passed clause 1. We are now on clause 2.

Mr. CAHILL: Did you read that clause Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN: Only the marginal note was read.

Mr. CAHILL: I asked the question because an amendment was made in the Committee.

The CHAIRMAN: The clause was amended. Shall clause 2 carry?

[Mr. Sinclair.]

Mr. McKENZIE: There are no distances given here in any one of the sections. Hon. gentlemen who come from the West think, Mr. Chairman, that I am opposed to railways in that part of the country.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. McKENZIE: Nothing of the kind; let those hon. gentlemen express themselves as they will. Nevertheless, we must build railways in a business way, and we must not be sensitive, when a proposition comes from the West, if we desire to find out anything about it. If it is necessary, in order, to retain the friendship of hon. gentlemen from the West, that I shall refrain from asking questions about any business proposition that comes before the House from that part of the country, then I am afraid I must forego that friendship. Whether a question appertains to the East or to the West makes not the slightest difference to me; I shall inquire concerning it just the same. Has the minister any idea as to the length of these different lines A, B and C in this Bill? The Bill does not mention anything about it.

Mr. J. D. REID: The Bill does not mention the mileage. It says, in (A):

> A line from a point at or near Prince Albert thence northerly to a point at or near township fifty-seven range twenty-five, west of the second meridian.

It defines the two points between which it is to run. On the profile that we had in the railway committee the distance between these two points was shown to be in the neighbourhood of 50 miles. The next one is shown to be about 40 miles in length. It runs from a point on the main line of the Canadian National railways between the crossing of the North Saskatchewan river and Radisson; thence in a general northerly and northwesterly direction to a point on the company's authorized line at or near Meeting lake. That does not say the exact mileage but it gives the two points between which we are going to construct. It is shown on the plan as being about 40 miles. With regard to the Maryfield branch, 50 miles is shown to be the outside limit. It is possible that the mileage could have been mentioned in the Bill but the draftsman put it in that way.

Mr. ROBB: The hon. member and his supporters voted for the proposition that the coal used for the Canadian railways carrying freight shall be taken out on the basis of nine hours pay for eight hours' work. Is it the intention to build these railways on the same basis?

Mr. J. D. REID: The railways will be built under contract. Tenders will be called, and the contractor will have to arrange with those whom he may employ to construct the railways. I cannot say whether he will employ them for nine hours or ten hours.

Mr. McKENZIE: We are evidently dealing with Mackenzie and Mann because they are synonymous with the Canadian Northern and being synonymous with the Canadian Northern they are going to build this road. Our experience is that Mackenzie and Mann, as railway operators, always lost money and that to make up the vacum in their purses they used to come to the Government of Canada. While they always lost money as operators they always made money as contractors. Mackenzie and Mann made themselves millionaires by building roads for themselves. That ridiculous anomaly has existed in this country for the last twenty-five or forty years. I would like to ask if Mackenzie and Mann are going to be permitted to make a contract with the Mackenzie and Mann Construction Company for the building of these roads in order that they may make millions for themselves and if when they come to run the roads they will run into the treasury of this country.

Mr. J. D. REID: I can hardly think that my hon. friend is fair in the manner in which he puts the matter. He states that this road is really the property of Mackenzie and Mann. It is now the road of the people of Canada.

Mr. McKENZIE: Why do you use their names?

Mr. REID: I explained a minute ago that any construction that has to be done for subsidiary companies must be done under the name of the parent company. But even if we continue the name the hon. member must admit that this is government property and not the property of Mackenzie and Mann. The management call for tenders for each particular piece of road that is to be built and a number of people tender. The lowest tender is accepted in every case. I do not think that there is any fairer way of doing it or that it could be done in any other way. It is not Mackenzie and Mann at all. The hon. gentleman states that Mackenzie and Mann made millions out of the Canadian Northern. I hardly agree with him. I do not think that Mackenzie and Mann are the millionaires the hon. gentleman states them to be. However that has nothing to do with the matter; the board of management call for tenders, the lowest tenderer will be given the contract and it will be carried out under the supervision of the railway employees who are in no way connected with Mackenzie and Mann.

Mr. McKENZIE: Last year we put through a Bill consolidating all the Government railways to which the Bill was attached a schedule containing the names of twenty or thirty different roads that were to be built afterwards.

An hon. MEMBER: Forty.

Mr. McKENZIE: Some one says forty; it was a large number anyway. Will the minister tell us how many of these different branches have been built since and if any of the branches mentioned in this Bill are identical with any of those mentioned in the schedule to the Bill which was passed a session or two ago.

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes; these charters are parts of the subsidiary companies. In Saskatchewan there was the Canadian Northern Saskatchewan Railway Company and in Alberta the Canadian Northern Alberta, both subsidiary to the Canadian Northern railway. These are extensions of the lines that were built under those charters. They will be a part of the several hundred miles of railway already built. The Canadian Northern Railway system has about 9,000 miles of which there are probably 1,000 miles in Eastern Canada and in British Columbia and about 7,000 in the western provinces. This in each case adds about fifty miles to the lines that were mentioned in the schedule to the Bill which was passed by Parliament.

Mr. FIELDING: Those who are familiar with the geography of the country will have no difficulty in forming an impression of the extent of the obligation we are assuming, but after all there are only a few who are so blessed as to have that knowledge. It would be a convenience to have some indication of the mileage expressed in this Bill. My recollection is that in all our railway Bills the mileage is mentioned. There may be cases in which you cannot be precise. My recollection is that in all our railway appropriations we would indicate the mileage at so many miles, more or less. That is convenient to put in your Bill. Here you do not say whether you are going to build a thousand miles or twenty. I suggest that until the minister has had a careful calculation made he would be proceeding on a safe basis to indicate the probable mileage of the road in order to help anybody who reads the Bill on a future occasion.

Mr. J. D. REID: It was stated in the committee by me, as well as by the railway officials, in each case, that the distance would not exceed fifty miles. I have no objection, if the committee wishes it, to carrying out the suggestion of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's and adding in each clause, "Not exceeding fifty miles".

Mr. FIELDING: I would not put in the words, "not exceeding", because the points are designated, but I would say so many miles more or less. I do not want to restrict my hon. friend at all, but if somebody—who is not familiar with the country—reads the Bill in future he ought to be given some idea as to the mileage in each case.

Mr. McMASTER: Might I point out another emendation to this legislation which would help the ordinary reader in time to come? The Bill is entitled, "An Act respecting the Canadian National Railways", and it is stated that it may be referred to as "The Canadian National Railways Act 1920". Then the Bill proceeds to refer to the Canadian Northern Railway Company. The sooner the minister, who is responsible for the railway administration and policy of this country, will put the different roads which form part of the National Railways system into the possession of the National Railway Company and call them by their proper names, just so soon will he confer a real benefit on any one who wants to study our railway situation now and in the future. It is not really a question of names, it is a question of being able to understand the situation thoroughly; and this habit of calling systems of railway, or branch lines of railway, which properly belong to the National system, by their former names breeds confusion, and makes it less possible to understand the railway situation which exists at the present time.

Mr. J. D. REID: If I understand the hon. member he wishes to eliminate the name, "Canadian Northern Railway" and adopt the title of "Canadian National Railway"?

Mr. McMASTER: I understood from the minister at an earlier part of the discussion that this part of the system now referred to has not yet been vested in the Canadian National system, and that was the reason why the name, "Canadian National Railway", was not employed. If this system itself now falls under our National system I see no reason why the name should not be changed by the committee now.

Mr. J. D. REID: I explained a few minutes ago that in the case of the Canadian Northern or of these extensions of a subsidiary company even when the Canadian Northern stock is transferred to the Canadian National Company those extensions have to be asked for in the name of the Canadian Northern, or the subsidiary company. I have been in the railway committee for a good many years, and during that time—and even as late as the present session—whenever the Canadian Railway Company applied for an extension of its charter they did so in the name of the subsidiary company, although they would do away with that plan if they could. I am informed by the legal authorities of the railway that this is the proper plan to pursue—that the name of the company or the subsidiary must be employed.

Mr. FIELDING: I can understand that as the law now stands the minister's position is right when it is a case of continuing charters possessed by subsidiary companies and operating under them. But that difficulty could be overcome and the point raised by the hon. member for Brome could be met by legislation—passed either at this or another session—transferring all the powers of these various companies to the Canadian National Railway Company. After that there would be no need of continuing the name "Canadian Northern". It would be a proper thing to do and we should not have the confusion which results from using the terms "Canadian National" and "Canadian Northern" which confusion is all the greater because the initials are the same in both cases.

Mr. COPP: Before the clause carries I desire to say that this discussion would not have been so long drawn out had it not been for the unfair action taken by hon. gentlemen opposite in refusing to allow members on this side to discuss this measure, and the matters connected with it, as freely as they have taken the opportunity of doing themselves. The character of this Bill is such as to encourage members in other sections of Canada in need of branch lines, or extensions, to ask why they should not be granted the same privilege. When that line of argument was followed, the Chairman ruled it was out of order, and he asked the House to give unanimous consent in order that the discussion might be continued. Hon. gentlemen opposite, however refused to give that consent, and thus restricted the scope of the debate as regards members on this side. Hon. gentlemen opposite did that despite the fact that every session the Opposition agree to deviations from the rules—when the session is well advanced—in order to expedite business.

The Minister of Railways is asking permission to build lines of railway along the following routes:

A line from a point at or near Prince Albert thence northerly to a point at or near township fifty-seven, range twenty-five, west of the second meridian, with a branch line commencing at a point on above line at or near township fifty-two, range twenty-five, west of the second meridian, and running in a generally easterly direction to range fifteen west of the second meridian;

The CHAIRMAN: I do not know whether the hon. member was in the House when this matter was brought up before, but I would point out that the clause has been amended and that it is not now exactly in the form in which the hon. member read it.

Mr. COPP: What change has been made?

The CHAIRMAN: All the words after the word "with" in the third line in subsection (a) have been stricken out, so that it now reads:

A line from a point at or near Prince Albert thence northerly to a point at or near township fifty-seven, range twenty-five, west of the second meridian.

The paragraph stops there.

Mr. COPP: I read two or three more lines than I need have read. But in reference to the line of railway my hon. friend (Mr. J. D. Reid) is asking this committee to grant a charter for. I think he said a few moments ago, in answer to an inquiry by my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fieilding), that it would be something like 50 miles in length, and I also understood him to say that the estimated cost of construction would be about $35,000 per mile. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that that is not sufficient information. I think the hon. minister, as representing the Canadian Northern railway, which is asking for this charter, should be in a position to give this committee information regarding the territory through which this railway will run, the population in the settlements along the route, and the traffic possibilities, so that hon. members will be able to decide whether or not it be in the interests of the Canadian National system to grant this charter. This line is going to cost a large amount of money to build, and, as has been pointed out, other portions of the Canadian National Railway system have cost this country a great deal of money. The question that naturally arises in the minds of every hon. member is: Whether this construction is going to be in the interests of Canada and of the system as a whole, and of public ownership? Some information, I submit, should be given by the Minister of Railways before he asks this committee to accept his proposition.

I take the next branch line:

From a point on the main line of the Canadian National railways between the crossing of the North Saskatchewan River and Radisson, thence in a generally northerly and northwesterly direction to a point on the Company's authorized line at or near Meeting Lake;

What is required in regard to the railway suggested in section (a) is also required in regard to this railway: we should have accurate information. It is all very well for the Minister of Railways to say: "We have all this information in the vaults of the Canadian National railway in the city of Toronto." But what good is that to hon. members? The information should be brought before this committee. It is of no interest to hon. members to know that Mr. Hanna says that this is going to be a paying proposition, nor is it of any interest to me, Sir, to be told that the Board of Directors of the Canadian National railways believe this will be a paying proposition. If they have that information available, it should be here, not in the city of Toronto.

Mr. LONG: I would like to ask the hon. member if he does not know in regard to that particular section of railway that the information given to the Railway Committee on the points he mentions convinced every member of that committee from his side of the House of the potential value of the road and they wanted to give the route to their particular friends, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company?

Mr. COPP: Loud and prolonged applause! I may tell my hon. friend that I know nothing about what took place in the Railway Committee—and a great many hon. members on this side of the House are in the same position. If that information was brought before the Railway Committee, then, Sir, I say that is all the greater reason why it should be brought before this committee. And if that information was before the Railway Committee it surely would have been easy enough to bring it down today. I would suggest to my hon. friend that possibly that information has not yet gone back to Toronto, and if so, we ought to have it produced here. I am not arguing against the building of these roads, but against the manner in which this Bill is brought before us and treated by hon. members on the opposite side of this House. I contend that hon. members should have this information, and if my hon. friends opposite had not been so particular about shutting off other hon. members when discussing this Bill, it probably would have resulted in our obtaining more information and this Bill would go out of committee sooner. I accept my hon. friend's assurance that the information he refers to was before the Railway Committee. But that information must have been collected by the officials of the Canadian National Railways, and that being so, I again submit that it should have been placed before hon. members by the Minister of Railways while this Bill is under consideration.

The next branch line is:

From a point on the Maryfield Branch of the Canadian National railways at or near Bengough thence southerly and westerly to a point at or near Fife Lake, in township, three, range twenty-nine, west of the second meridian.

I do not know whether the Minister of Railways has given us the mileage of the last mentioned branch lines, but I understood him to state that only about 15 miles of each line will be built this year. I also understood him when replying to a question put by my hon. friend from Regina (Mr. Cowan), in regard to another branch line on which the steel has not yet been laid, that it had been impossible to get the steel there, but that that steel would be laid first, and then if they could get more steel they would continue this construction. Now, I understand my hon. friend to say that tenders have already been called for the building of these branch line? Am I right as to that?

Mr. J. D. REID: Tenders have been called for, but no action will be taken until this Bill is passed and the money voted by Parliament. Even if we put this Bill through, there is another opportunity of not allowing the work to be proceeded with and of requiring full explanations,—that is, when I bring down the estimates for construction. So if we do pass this Bill it does not follow that these branch lines will be built.

Mr. COPP: It is going a long way to advertise for tenders even before the Bill is brought down to this House by the Minister of Railways. I would ask my hon. friend, between what points on the different branch lines suggested here has he called for tenders?

Mr. J. D. REID: The points where the roads start.

Mr. COPP: How far?

Mr. J. D. REID: I cannot give that information now; I do not happen to have it before me. Of course, the hon. member is entitled to all information in connection with the matter, and I will not ask that the Bill go through if hon. members do not want it to go through without this information being furnished. But these Railway Bills are sent to the Railway Committee so that all this detailed information may be submitted to and considered by that committee. That procedure was followed in this case; the railway officials appeared before the committee; the information was obtained, and the committee unanimously passed the Bill. If the hon. member wants all these files and details I have no objection to getting the information for him; no hon. member will be able to say that I withheld information. If it is his intention to hold up the Bill in the absence of this information, of course, I must submit. But the fact that the money must subsequently be voted for this purpose would seem to justify the passing of the Bill, particularly in view of the fact that all the details were considered by the Railway Committee.

Mr. COPP: My hon. friend should not suggest that it is my purpose to hold up the Bill. I have only occupied about ten or fifteen minutes of the time of the committee; the minister has taken an hour or two in discussing his side of it. It is not my intention unnecessarily to delay the Bill, but I do think we should have more direct and accurate information in regard to it. If the information was before the Railway Committee, surely it would not take long to place it before this committee.

Section agreed to.

On the title:

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the title carry?

Mr. McKENZIE: I do not see the force—

At Six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess.

The Committee resumed at Eight o'clock.

Mr. McKENZIE: Before six o'clock I asked the minister for certain information. I presume that in the meantime he has had an opportunity of consulting his officials and is now prepared to tell the House something more about these railways. He told us that he did not wish to withhold any information he possessed, but the trouble is that he does not possess any. Otherwise, I am sure he would be willing to part with it. Will these roads when built be Government-owned?

Mr. J. D. REID: Government-owned, entirely, because the total cost will have to be voted by Parliament.

Mr. McKENZIE: Being entirely Government owned, will they be subject to municipal taxation in the province or provinces in which they are built?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes, because the property will be in the name of the Canadian Northern railway. These extensions will be Government-owned entirely also because there are no bonds against these extensions. The outstanding bonds, of course, are only on the roads so far completed. The Canadian Northern system in Ontario and other provinces is subject to taxation by the municipalities, and the only parts of the Government system that will not pay taxes, until further legislation on this subject is brought down, will be the Intercolonial and the Transcontinental, or any other road purchased outright in the name of the Crown.

Mr. McKENZIE: The minister will remember that we had this subject up last year. In the provinces of Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Quebec we have a large mileage of Government owned railways, and these roads pay no taxes at all. While we derive no advantage, from a municipal standpoint, from the existence of these railways we of course, have to pay our taxes just as much as the people who live in Ontario and the West. Now the amount of municipal taxation that might be paid on the Grand Trunk and other roads is enormous. Does the Government think it is fair that some provinces should be allowed to tax for municipal purposes the Government roads, while other provinces cannot? Does not the minister think that there should be a uniform system throughout all the provinces, and that if a Government road in Ontario pays municipal taxes, Government roads in Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick should be in exactly the same position.

Mr. J. D. REID: That is a very important question, and it has been brought to my attention forcibly by the small towns along the Transcontinental, some of which are practically railway towns and need assistance in building their schools and churches and municipal institutions, but to which the railway pays no taxes. I cannot see why there should not be some arrangement whereby the railway should pay taxes to the municipalities. But it is a pretty big question and would take a whole day to discuss. My own opinion—I am not expressing the Government's opinion at all—is that these railways which run through the towns and villages and municipalities should pay taxes. I do not see any reason why they should be exempt. But they have been exempt since Confederation. It is a matter that must be taken up and decided by the Government one way or the other in the near future, but it would be impossible for me to bring this matter up and have it decided during the present session. Of course, an Act of Parliament would be required for the reason that all Government property in the name of the Crown at the present time is exempt.

Mr. McKENZIE: The minister says it has been so since Confederation. Quite so. Until the Canadian Northern was taken over by the Government, none of the Government roads in Canada paid any taxes, and they were not assessed. The Intercolonial never paid a cent of taxation in our province; nobody ever thought of it. We in Nova Scotia have no objection to conditions continuing as they are, provided that the same system is in vogue everywhere else. But when Government roads are paying taxes in other provinces we do not want the roads that run through our provinces in the East to be exempt from taxation, because the people of these provinces, of course, are obliged to pay their share of taxation.

Mr. J. D. REID: I do not think it would be fair to exempt from taxation a private road that is taken over by the Government. These roads, such as the Canadian Northern, for instance, are taxable because they are not directly in the name of the Crown, but were acquired by virtue of the country holding the stock. In other cases, the deed is directly in the name of the Crown. In order to make the Intercolonial, the Transcontinental, and the Hudson Bay railways pay taxes a special Act would have to be passed declaring that all Government roads should pay taxes. The question is a large one and I could not bring it up this session, but it is such a live issue, especially along the Transcontinental, that something will have to be done to give assistance to the municipalities, and I think the law will have to be changed to bring all of the Government roads on the same footing. In the Lower Provinces the Canadian Pacific pays taxes all the way down to St. John, and I suppose on the Dominion Atlantic Railway also, while the Intercolonial does not. It is not fair that one road should pay taxes and the other roads should be exempt.

Mr. McKENZIE: The whole Intercolonial was not always a Government-owned road. The Eastern Extension was owned by the Eastern Extension Railway Company and paid taxes until it was taken over by the Government, when no more taxes were paid, because the identity of the property as the Eastern Extension Railway disappeared. That, of course is what we expected. That is the theory. There is considerable Government property also in the city of Halifax on which there is no municipal taxation. I think that all Government-owned property throughout the country should be treated alike. If a Government-owned railway pays taxes in the West or in Ontario let Government-owned railways in the East pay taxes, and vice versa. The railways should be all on the same basis so far as taxation is concerned, and I would urge that principle on the minister.

Mr. J. D. REID: The hon. member is absolutely right in his view, but in acquiring the roads in New Brunswick which we took over last year a deed was given to the Crown directly so that the company disappeared. In this case we merely took over the stock. I agree with the hon. member that all railways entirely owned by the Government should be treated in the same way so far as taxation is concerned.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): The minister should consider the view of the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie). He is an able lawyer and he has stated it as a principle of law that property of the Crown is not liable to municipal taxation. If these railways are the property of the Crown will the minister explain why they are to be subject to taxation? I presume he must have looked into the law appertaining to the question.

[Mr. J. D. Reid.]

If the title of the Government to these various roads is good, then they are the property of the Crown and should be exactly on the same basis as the Intercolonial railway and the Transcontinental.

Mr. J. D. REID: I have consulted the legal authorities of my department. If any one had a claim against the particula road which my hon. friend has mentioned, or one of the roads we took over last year in New Brunswick, the road having been deeded to the Minister of Railways representing the Crown, the suit would have to be brought against the Crown. In this particular case of the Canadian Northern, we took over the stock. We did not take a deed in fee simple of the whole railway, and if any one were bringing a suit against that railway to-day he would have to enter it against the Canadian Northern railway and not against the Crown. I have taken legal advice in the matter, and am informed that the taxes must be paid. But apart from that, as it is a line running in opposition to the Canadian Pacific railway, my opinion is that they should both be placed on the same basis, and if one is not subject to taxation the other should also be exempt. I think they should all pay taxes in the future.

Mr. McMASTER: What the minister has said is no doubt correct, but his remarks after all bear upon legal technicalities. As a matter of fact, whether we own these railways in company form or directly as Crown property, they are the property of the Canadian people, and the Government should make up their mind whether the railways should all be free from municipal taxation or should all pay taxes. Although you can draw a legal distinction between the Canadian Northern railway running through Manitoba, say, and the Intercolonial railway running through New Brunswick, they are both the property of the Canadian people, and it would be fairer, more equitable and more businesslike if the Government decided that all the railways should be free from municipal taxation rather than leave some free while others are subject to taxation. But I am inclined to believe that it would be fairer if all Crown property, the property of the people of Canada, bore its fair share of municipal taxation. It is largely a matter of bookkeeping, and in the long run it will be found that the Canadian people pay. Where you have a railway running through a town and that railway pays no taxes, the inhabitants of that town have to pay what the railway should pay, and the present system does not equalize the burden as I think a system of taxing all railways would equalize it. I call this matter to the minister's attention. I think he largely partakes of my view, and it would be well to come to a decision on one ground or the other.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

COMMERCIAL FEEDING STUFFS.

REGULATIONS CONCERNING SALE AND INSPECTION.

Hon. S. F. Tolmie (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of Bill No. 165 to regulate the sale and inspection of Commercial Feeding Stuffs, Bran, Shorts, Middlings and Chop Feeds.

Mr. DONALD SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Before this motion is carried, Mr. Speaker, this being the only opportunity we shall have of discussing the merits of the Bill, I should like to make a few remarks with reference to matters dealt with in it. The minister gave us an outline of what he deemed to be the scope of the Bill in introducing the resolution, which really embodied the Bill; and so far as I could gather from his remarks, he was very anxious to take care of the accumulation of screenings at the various elevators and mills throughout the country, which, he stated, amounted to something in the neighbourhood of 150,000 tons per annum. He went on to refer to the great value of these screenings as feeding stuff and pointed ont the advantage it would be to those engaged in agriculture in Canada to have this stuff placed at their disposal, adding that it was the intention of the department to see that proper safeguards were enacted to remove the most objectionable qualities of this stuff:

This question is not a new one by any means. The average citizen has but a very faint idea of the extent of the great wealth that some people are accumulating as a result of their operations in what was at one time considered refuse, or something that the average farmer in the past, when he cleaned his grain on his own farm, took good care to absolutely destroy. Some members of the House may recall that a good many years ago I took this matter up with the Government on a number of occasions particularly in reference to the Grain Board. When the regulations providing for the control of grain by the Dominion Grain Board were before the House, I considered that it was advisable that some provision should be made in the Grain Act to take care of this stuff and guard against the danger of having it scattered broadcast throughout this country. I would like to quote a statement that was made by the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) as far back as 1914 when the matter was before the House. I will quote a few words which he uttered in answer to the argument I advanced on that occasion. They are as follows:

> Whatever can be done by the Grain Board, and—after they have mapped out their work in this matter, whatever can be done by Dominion legislation to diminish this pest will de done. And I hope to be able at the next session of Parliament, to give a fairly clear idea as to what we think can be done by the Grain Board and through Parliament in this direction.

That was a fairly encouraging promise to receive six years ago but from that day to the present time instead of making progress we have been taking retrograde steps and conditions to-day are worse than they were at any time in the past. Notwithstanding that this Bill has some good features, on the whole I believe that it is a further retrograde step and that it does not attempt to deal with the great difficulties that we have to contend with and which ought to be taken care of by legislation. The minister made some reference to the remark which I made when the resolution was before the House in regard to the Bill that was passed by Parliament at the last session. I claimed that the Bill had disappeared in some mysterious manner and that it was inoperative and absolutely destroyed. The minister, in replying, said, for my information, that the Bill was still on the statute book, and in effect and that consequently I was mistaken. I want to repeat what I said on that occasion. In moving the second reading of the Bill, I made this statement in reference to the various departments which have had control of this question in the past:

> We find that the Department of Inland Revenue was annexed to the Department of Customs and that the branch having to do with the work of the Dominion analyst was turned over to the Department of Trade and Commerce.
> Now we have it turned over to the new Department of Public Health. Notwithstanding all the information that is available, I do not believe that in the Department of Public Health you will find any one particularly interested, or who has a direct interest through his association with the agricultural interests of the country.
>
> I believe that the seed branch, the veterinary director general and the livestock branch through the Department of Agriculture should have control over the matter.

And so on.

If, as is pointed out by the Dominion analyst, shorts are simply ground up bran and are not shorts at all and if it is only, as the manager of one of the milling companies pointed out, by the addition of screenings that it is brought up to the required standard, I hope that a stop will be put to this at an early date.

These were my views on that occasion, and for that reason I was very much pleased to see that this matter was taken over by the Minister of Agriculture to be administered by his department. You may recall that early in the session there were a number of Bills introduced by the hon. Minister of Public Health (Mr. Rowell). Among them was one dealing with commercial feeding stuffs and another known as the Food and Drugs Act. Bill No. 32 was the one which had reference to feeding stuff and it was introduced on March 23. Bill No. 27 was introduced on March 22. Bill No. 27 has already passed both Houses of Parliament and it removes from the statute the Adulteration Act, Revised Statutes of Canada 1906, chapter 133, chapter 4 of the statutes of 1907 and chapter 4 of the statutes of 1913. These latter were amendments to the original Act of 1906. It also removes from the statute books chapter 19 of the statutes of 1914 and chapter 9 of the statutes of 1915. These were all cancelled when this Bill was passed by Parliament. I would like to call your attention to the original Act which was known as the Adulteration Act. The interpretation clause reads:

In this Act, unless the context otherwise requires: (a) "minister" means the Minister of Inland Revenue; (b) "food" includes every article used for food or drink by man or cattle, and every ingredient intended for mixing with the food or drink of man or cattle for any purpose whatsoever.

It goes on to mention different things and proceeds as follows in section 3:

Food shall be deemed to be adulterated within the meaning of this Act,—

(a) If any substance has been mixed with it so as to reduce or lower or injuriously affect its quality or strength;

(b) If any inferior or cheaper substance has been substituted wholly or in part for the article;

(c) If any valuable constituent of the article has been wholly or in part abstracted;

(d) If it is an imitation of or is sold under the name of another article;

(e) If it consists wholly or in part of a diseased or decomposed or putrid or rotten animal or vegetable substance, whether manufactured or not;

(f) If it contains any added poisonous ingredient or any ingredient which may render such an article injurious to the health of persons or cattle consuming it;

(g) if its strength or purity falls below the standard, or its constituents are present in quantity not within the limits of variability fixed by the Governor in Council as hereinafter provided;

(h) if it is so coloured or coated or polished or powdered that damage is concealed, or if it is made to appear better or of greater value than it really is;

(i) in the case of milk or butter, if it is the produce of a diseased animal or of an animal fed upon unwholesome food.

The Act of last session was simply an addition and came under paragraph (j). Now you will observe that all these different sections— (a), (b), (c), down to (i)—have been cancelled by the Act that was put through this session. There are several pages in the statute from which I have quoted dealing with matters connected with the operation of the Act. I may say, penalties were provided; the penalties have also been cancelled. While, in a sense, the Act of last session may remain on the statute book it is only a fragment containing four lines which have absolutely no meaning and will undoubtedly be removed. Leaving it there must have been an oversight on the part of some one, bearing in mind that the whole Adulteration Act has been absorbed in other Acts and the clauses which I have referred to have been cancelled. Consequently it is not correct to state that the Act of last session is still in force and effect, because there is no machinery for putting it into force, nor are any penalties provided. Therefore, there is virtually no statute at all in existence except a fragment, and if that should remain in force it will be devoid of meaning.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out that in the Bill which was introduced on the 23rd March, the day before the Pure Foods Bill was brought in, there was embodied in the Pure Foods Bill a section which contained the Bill of last session, viz., section 12. That section read as follows:

In the case of bran or shorts or middlings, it shall be considered to be adulterated if it contains anything that is not a product of wheat, or, in the case of corn bran, if it contains anything that is not a product of maize or Indian corn.

This was identically the same as the provision of last session which was embodied in the Bill referred to and remained in it for several weeks. It was, however, withdrawn when the measure came up for second reading, and the new Bill that is before the House to-night was substituted for it. You can see therefore that instead of making an advance along the line which we have been endeavouring to follow—to promote which, in accordance with the desire of the committee on agriculture, and of the House the legislation of last session was enacted—the attempt is made by the present Bill to cancel all that we had accomplished under the Bill of last session and to revert to a condition of affairs that will be much worse than the state which existed previous to that time.

Let me point out that in 1917 something happened with regard to the adulteration of mill feeds that has absolutely destroyed the feeding qualities of those feeds,—when I say "mill feeds" I am referring to the products of wheat in the milling of flour. You may think, Mr. Speaker, that I am taking this matter too seriously. I want to point out—notwithstanding the statements that were made in the House the other night by the minister when he said that he had been President of the Western Livestock Union for two years prior to 1917 and that the farmers were clamouring for this feed from one end of Canada to the other—that the farmers in the county from which I come are using mill feeds possibly to a greater extent than they do in any county in Canada. The average farmer, instead of selling the produce of the farm in a raw state, is really, in a sense, a manufacturer because he not only feeds what he raises himself but buys immense quantities of this stuff and uses it for feeding purposes. I want to remind the minister that the factory output of dairy products of the small constituency which I represent—although that constituency is nearly one-half urban —has been for the past few years equal to that of the whole province of British Columbia from which he comes, notwithstanding that within that province there are about two hundred and sixty million acres. The factory output of the county of Oxford, on the whole, has nearly doubled that of the province of British Columbia; and I may therefore be a little more in touch with the effect of these mill feeds than those other hon. members who come from constituencies where they do not specialize in the feeding of livestock to the extent that we do in Oxford. I have pointed out and called the attention of Parliament on a number of occasions—not only last session but this session as well—to the state which we are getting into by neglecting to enact proper safeguards with reference to the development of agriculture in Canada, and the importance under present conditions of increasing the output to the greatest possible degree. I have pointed out that to increase the prosperity of this country and to overcome the difficulties which are facing us at the present time, which difficulties have been, and are, receiving the attention of Parliament at the present session, we must depend more upon the agricultural output than upon anything else. To confirm what I say all you have to do is to look at the weekly reports of the Department of Agriculture. The statistics given in those reports, show an almost appalling decrease in the output of dairy produce, and of many other things on the farm; and you are going to find before the present year closes that, instead of increasing our output as we should, there is a marked decrease in those products. Furthermore, the livestock industry of this country is receiving a setback to-day that demands the attention of Parliament. Everything that possibly can be done should be done to encourage rather than to retard the development of agriculture. I know that if I make any reference to conditions in Western Canada somebody will get up and say that the people in the East are very much interested in what is taking place in the West. Now I have seen demands for legislation made to Parliament, —not only during the present but during previous sessions—by representatives from Western Canada and other parts of the country, and I will venture to state that rarely, if ever, has any objection been raised by the members from Ontario with respect to doing anything to develop the industries or the natural resources of any of the other provinces.

I was somewhat amused this afternoon and this evening while listening to some of the arguments advanced against the Bill that has just been disposed of with regard to branch line railways. Ontario had to undertake work of that kind, and year after year there has been a deficit in the operation of their colonization railway, but there is no clamour from the province that the Dominion Government should come to their assistance. All we asked was the usual subsidy which was denied for many years. We are glad to see railways built into the newer districts in order to develop the resources of the Dominion. But at the same time I want to remind hon. members that the fertility of our rich farm lands in Western Canada cannot be maintained under the present methods of farming, and that the present unsatisfactory condition will certainly become worse unless methods are adopted to arrest the depletion of the natural fertility of the soil. To-day the progressive farmer in Ontario realizes that in order to maintain soil fertility it is absolutely necessary and essential that he should feed to his stock not only all he grows on his farm but a great deal more besides. I know some hon. gentlemen will say: But how can you farm those large areas in the West under such conditions? I admit that there is a great temptation to bring under cultivation those large areas and to "mine" them, but it will be conceded by those who are more familiar with conditions in the West than I am that already the result of the policy that has been pursued for some years past is deplorably evident in the luxuriant crops of weeds that always follow such farming methods. I remember that when I was a young lad our Ontario farmers considered the Canada thistle one of the greatest pests we had. But I believe that weed has rendered a greater service to the province in an agricultural sense than anything else I know of, for it has been in no small degree the means of forcing the farmers to adopt better methods. There is absolutely no trouble with the Canada thistle to-day because under a proper system of farming it has no chance to overrun the land.

But the successful feeding of livestock requires certain satisfactory conditions. I may say to some of my friends from the West that it has been a common thing for farmers in my constituency to buy store hogs in the West, particularly in the vicinity of Calgary, to prepare them for the market on mill feed brought from the West, and to dispose of those animals at a profit in connection with their dairy operations I pointed out during the present session that I did not believe there was to-day a cheese factory in my constituency manufacturing cheese, nor a creamery where a pound of butter is being manufactured. Some hon. members may say that this has no relation to the Bill before the House. It has a very direct relation to it. If the farmers of the county of Oxford and other constituencies can purchase pure mill feed at a reasonable price they can prepare their hogs for the market at a fair profit even under present conditions. But after paying a very high price for this feed, if they have to frequently throw out of the pen pigs that have died as a result of the poisonous weed seeds contained in the feed, is it any wonder that these farmers have become discouraged and now ask Parliament to take steps to protect them? Is it any wonder that they are discouraged when they find the best animals in their dairy herds take sick and die after being fed large quantities of bran, which under ordinary conditions is the best feed for cows when they are freshening? For a long time our farmers were puzzled to account for their losses, but are now satisfied that the trouble is due to the poison contained in these mill feeds, and in consequence they refuse to feed their stock any quantity of mill feed at that particular time. Abundant evidence of the adulteration of these mill feeds is in the possession of the Department of Agriculture, and why such a Bill as this should be introduced under present conditions is something that I am unable to understand.

If you read the definitions contained in the context of the Bill you will find there is a distinction made between commercial feeding stuffs and feeding stuffs. The Bill provides:

> (1) "commercial feeding stuffs" means any article offered for sale for the feeding of livestock and poultry, including feeds stated to possess medicinal as well as nutritive properties, but not including,—
> (a) hay and straw;
> (b) whole grains of wheat, rye, barley, oats, corn, buckwheat or flax seed;
> (c) chop feeds;
> (d) bran, shorts or middlings when unmixed with other materials;

"When unmixed with other materials." But if it is mixed with other materials, it comes under the class of commercial feeding stuffs. Then clause 3 provides:

> (3) "feeding stuff" means any commercial feeding stuff, bran, shorts or middlings and chop feed.

It is quite evident that section (d) of clause 2 contemplates the mixing of bran and shorts with other stuff to make a commercial feed. Section 6 of the Bill provides:

> 6. All bran, shorts or middlings sold or offered, exposed or held for sale must meet the requirements as to quality and chemical contents established for them respectively by regulations under this Act, or be registered and sold as comercial feeding stuffs as required by sections three and four of this Act.

Now, I do not wish to refer to this Bill clause by clause; the committee stage will be the proper time to do that; but I do want to point out the clause which provides that the minister may by regulation do certain things. On several occasions during this session and other sessions I have pointed out that there is no necessity to have so many of these regulations, but that wherever possible they should be embodied in the Bill. Provision is also made for the appointment of an advisory board under clause (a).

(a) to appoint an advisory board which may at his request prepare and recommend to him such regulations as it is of opinion should be established under this Act;

The minister may appoint a board to furnish him with information as to what regulations should be framed. Well, we have been discussing this matter for a good many years, and I fail to understand why hon. members should not be consulted and have their views embodied in this Bill rather than that some board should be appointed and consulted by the minister for that purpose. I believe there are enough members in this House with such broad experience in this matter as to warrant their views being placed on record here rather than that we should empower the minister to go outside and select a board whom he may desire to consult with regarding these regulations.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): That is the way they do with the Budget.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: And it is the way they do with some other things. I could remind my hon. friend (Mr. M. Clark) that we put a similar clause in a Bill about three years ago. When the Military Service Act was being put into force we empowered the Minister of Agriculture of that day to appoint a representative of the Department of Agriculture on the exemption tribunals in every military district. Well, what was the result? We very honestly and innocently thought that the men selected for that purpose would be in sympathy with the enforcement of the Military Service Act and with the Government which had just been elected. But we found that in every military district in Ontario men had been selected by the then Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Crerar) for this post who were not only opposed to compulsory service but also to Union Government and had stumped against them in the election. These were the kind of men appointed in the London, Toronto and Kingston military districts. This was under a provision similar to the provisions of this Bill. Yet we are again asked in this Bill blindly to place a power in the hands of the minister to make a selection regardless of what the opinion of members of this House may be. I will read to you one of the objects of having a board of this kind:

The minister shall have power,—

(a) to appoint an advisory board which may at his request, prepare and recommend to him such regulations as it is of opinion should be established under this Act; . . .

(e) to make regulations prescribing the size, colour and character of the tags or labels to be used for the purposes of this Act, and the size and kind of printing to be used for any particulars required to be printed on such tags or labels;

When the resolutions were under consideration I referred to a report of the Department of Agriculture tabled during the last session. I will read from this report, made by H. B. Sifton, analyst in the Seed Branch, who furnished me with this memorandum. Referring to weed seed contents of bran and shorts, he says:

Two hundred and thirteen samples have been analysed in connection with the investigation of Canadian feeding stuffs. Of these one hundred and three have been found to contain weed seeds authoritatively stated to be poisonous. Eighteen more have seeds suspected of having poisonous properties but not yet fully investigated. Of thirty-two samples of shorts the records show twenty-seven containing poisonous weed seeds, and five with unground seeds of noxious weeds. In the case of bran, nineteen out of twenty-eight samples show poison seeds, and eight have noxious weeds.

Complaints have been received of many lots, especially of shorts which produce harmful effects when fed to pigs, and of others which the animals refuse to eat. The loss of faith in screenings as feed, reflected in the Farmer's Advocate editorial of last week, is becoming widespread. This is doubtless due to two causes —the sale of uncleaned screenings for feed, and imperfect work in recleaning. In nineteen samples of "recleaned" screenings received at the laboratory since July 1, the average number of mustards per ounce is two hundred and one. The cleanest sample contains seventy-nine per ounce, and the dirtiest has two hundred and seventy-nine.

It seems urgent that prompt action should be taken for the protection of farmers from harmful and unpalatable feeding stuffs. It is also necessary to improve the purity of recleaned screenings if faith in them is not to be entirely lost by the public.

The minister stated the other night that 201 mustard seeds in an ounce of feed is less than one per cent, the maximum amount of impurities which he proposes to allow in these mill feeds under the regulations he intimated will be enacted. Which means that he proposes to permit the presence of 3,216 mustard seeds in a pound of mill feed. It is perfectly clear to every one who understands anything about this matter that there is no justification for having any of this deleterious matter in mill feed, such as bran and shorts. It is perfectly clean and pure when it is milled. The millers admit that they pipe the screenings back into it after the milling process is completed. Under the regulations now in effect it is permissible for them to put as much of that stuff in the feed as they see fit, because of the fact that the amendment to the Adulteration

9 p.m.

Act of last session was dismembered and made of no force or effect. In December 1917 it was provided by Order in Council that while heretofore bran and shorts should be clean and free from impurities, it was provided that they would be considered pure if there were not more than 25 vital noxious seeds in a pound of it. That would imply—and the millers admit it—that the millers could put as many non-noxious weed seeds in as they saw fit. One of the most poisonous weed seeds found in mill feeds is what is known as worm seed mustard, a small yellow seed the vitality of which it is practically impossible to destroy by grinding. It is not considered as a noxious weed, though more pigs have died as a result of feeding them this stuff than from the feeding of the other noxious weeds. It is quite permissible for the millers, under the legislation which is at present on the statute book, to run this stuff into their bran and shorts. Last session, when this matter was before the Committee on Agriculture, notwithstanding the fact that the millers had an opportunity of appearing there and that there was considerable opposition by certain persons in the committee to doing anything in the matter, the following resolution was moved in that committee and carried, but for some unexplained reason was not submitted to the House:

> That in view of the serious results from the adulteration of bran and shorts by adding thereto great quantities of weed seeds, both ground and unground, annually resulting in the death of many animals and serious injury to the health of others besides distributing harmful weed seeds throughout the country to the detriment of those who engage in agriculture, this committee would respectfully recommend that immediate action should be taken to deal with this question by passing and putting into effect at the earliest opportunity Bill No. 7, an Act to amend the Adulteration Act.

The minister told us in introducing these resolutions that the Committee on Agriculture had looked over the proposed Bill and that they were favourable to it. I was not present when the matter was before the committee and I do not know what consideration was given to it. But I have read the resolution which was adopted last year by the Committee on Agriculture with regard to the Bill which was then before it, embodying a provision which was made law at the last session of Parliament but has since been removed from the statute book and has not been incorporated in the Bill now before us.

[Mr. Sutherland.]

Mr. CRERAR: Has the legislation passed last session to which my hon. friend refers been repealed?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: As the hon. gentleman was not in the House when I referred to it, perhaps I may be pardoned for referring to this matter again. The Act of last session has most undoubtedly been repealed. Bill No. 27, which was known as the Act respecting Food and Drugs, was passed and a good many sections of the Adulteration Act embodied in this Bill. The Act says: "The acts mentioned in the schedule hereto are repealed." That included the Adulteration Act of 1906 and the amendments of 1907, 1913, 1914 and 1915. For some reason or other the amendment of last session has been left on the statutes, and the Act which it amended has been repealed. There is no sense or meaning to it as it is. There is no Act to amend, the penalties also are repealed. Bill No. 32, introduced by the Minister of Health, entitled "An Act respecting Commercial Feeding Stuffs" had embodied in it a section containing the Act of 1919 with regard to the adulteration of bran and shorts reading as follows:

> In the case of bran or shorts or middlings, it shall be considered to be adulterated if it contains anything that is not a product of wheat, or, in the case of corn bran, it contains anything which is not a product of maize or Indian corn.

This Bill which I referred to was withdrawn by the minister, and the Bill which is now before the House has been introduced with a view to taking its place.

The minister referred to the fact that there are about 150,000 tons of screenings that must be taken care of. I could not help thinking that he was much more concerned about taking care of the screenings at the elevators than about the livestock interests of the country and agriculture generally. I do not like to say that, but I can come to no other conclusion in view of the fact that in referring to the screenings the minister stated:

> No. 3 Northern wheat very often contains 2½ per cent, so right here by the proposed regulations we intend to make we shall have a most decided improvement in the quality of our bran.

The millers contend, and it was actually stated, I believe, by Mr. Black, of the Ogilvie Milling Company, that in some sections of the West where the grain does not pass through terminal elevators as much as 10 per cent of wheat they purchase are screenings and dirt, and that they were justified in disposing of it in the way they do. The millers made no bones about it. They even said: "If it is as bad as represented to be, why does not Parliament act in the matter"? Well, Parliament did act last session, and we thought we were taking steps to provide against what has been going on, but you see the conditions with which we are confronted to-day.

With reference to the board with which the minister is going to consult I made the statement after looking over the resolutions that I thought the millers had been consulted with reference to the matter, and not the farmers of this country. The minister rather resented a statement of that kind, but I venture to state that there was some substance for such a suspicion from the fact that he stated that when the board was appointed the millers would have representation on it and their interests would be looked after. Now there is absolutely no justification at all for having the millers consulted as far as bran and shorts are concerned; it might be advisable with respect to other commercial feeding stuffs. I believe that there are provisions in this Bill which will enable the department to provide safeguards against what has been going on with regard to other commercial feeding stuffs. I am not objecting to those provisions of the Bill. I think they are very desirable, but I do want to impress on the House and on the minister that if this Bill goes through in its present form, it will do more than possibly anything else could to discourage farmers in the live-stock and dairy business. We have been appropriating money for scientific research and other purposes of that kind, and it is well to do so. I want to say, however, that I do not believe we are getting satisfactory results from the money that has been and is being provided by Parliament for our experimental farm system in Canada. I believe the system has failed to produce the results it should, and failed utterly to lead in regard to the question dealt with in this Bill. Is it any wonder that many of the provinces have had to step in and take over this work themselves, and that they do not rely upon the experiments conducted by the federal experimental farm system? Yet we expend over $1,200,000 annually on experimental farms. We have in the vicinity of Ottawa, in connection with the Central Experimental Farm, a park where the citizens can enjoy themselves. It is one of the features of Ottawa. During the war there was more money expended for labour on that farm than there was any justification for, in order to provide a park for the entertainment of visitors to the city and the citizens of Ottawa. As far as the province from which I come is concerned, and we are credited with the benefit of its expenditure at the farm at Ottawa, we depend almost entirely upon what is being done by the provincial government along experimental lines. As far as experimental work is concerned the province of Ontario has been forced by necessity to do this work itself, and establish her own farms, notwithstanding the fact that the people of the province contribute about 50 per cent of the expense of all the experimental work that is being done in the other provinces. In view of that fact, and that we are producing about 52 per cent of the total dairy products of Canada I think we are entitled to some little consideration under this Bill. We have endeavoured in the past, to carry on in a way that would be profitable. I know what is taking place; I come in contact with evidences of it every day in the week when I am at home. I find many farmers disposing of their dairy herds and going out of the business. You often hear people referring to the farmers as profiteers and of the enormous prices the farmers are getting for dairy products—milk, butter, cheese, and so forth; and it has been thought necessary for this Government to appoint a Board of Commerce and turn it loose on the farmers. One of the first things the Board did was to attack the farmers of Ontario along these very lines, and you can already see the effect of it. There will be millions of dollars lost to the people of this province and the Dominion as a result of what we did at the last session of Parliament. Yet to-day there is not on that Board, nor has there been, a man who had any interest in or any sympathy with those engaged in agriculture.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I must draw the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that we are not now discussing the appointment of the Board of Commerce. I fear he is wandering far from the subject matter of the Bill.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I do not wish to transgress the rules of the House, but I have been endeavouring to show the connection between mill feeds and dairy products, and I have just incidentally referred to some of the other handicaps under which the dairymen of the province of Ontario are labouring.

There is something rather significant in connection with the accumulation of screenings at the elevators. We have in this country what is known as the Board of Grain Commissioners, and I have here a return which was brought down to tthe House with reference to its operations. There are five terminal elevators under the control of the Board of Grain Commissioners. The quantities of screenings that are shipped out of these elevators are really enormous. At Port Arthur, for the crop year 1914-15, the screenings taken in at that elevator amounted to 357,780 pounds, and there was shipped out 6,193,560 pounds. For the next year 445,740 pounds was taken in and 12,697,400 pounds was shipped out; for the year 1916-17, 68,800 pounds was taken in and 5,603,940 pounds was shipped out; and for the year 1917-18, which is the last year for which I was able to get information at the time, the amount taken in was 923,000 pounds and the amount shipped out 8,260,895 pounds. There is a similar condition of affairs at Moosejaw, Saskatoon and Vancouver, though the quantities are not so large in these places as in Port Arthur. Now, the Government, through the Grain Commissioners, have been operating these elevators and it is a rather remarkable fact that enormous profits have been made by these elevators which have been worked by the Government. Outside of the salaries of the Board of Grain Commissioners, the profits for these five years at the Port Arthur elevator alone amounted to $1,177,940.05, and at the other elevators the amount was also very large. I am satisfied that it would be greatly to the advantage of the farmer of Western Canada if these screenings were taken from the grain before it ever reached the elevators. He is paying freight on them both ways very often, and the material is being disposed of by the Government Grain Commissioners with the result that large profits are going somewhere. I do not know where they have been going, are the Government partners in it, but I do know the farmer who furnishes the material has not received the profits. I want to repeat that it is not a matter of so great concern that the last available cent may be received for these screenings, as it is to see that their impurities are not placed in the mill feeds that are sold at high prices to the farmers of the country to say nothing of polluting the farms with weeds. I would judge that the purpose of the present Bill is to permit the manufacturers of commercial feeding stuffs to mix feeding stuffs rather than to provide, as we endeavoured to do last session, means to ensure the purity of the bran and shorts that are being disposed of. It is well known not only to dairymen but to the men who raise pure-bred stock for commercial purposes, that bran is one of the most valuable feedstuffs, an essential for young and growing stock. Yet, to-day it is harly safe for him to feed it at all. He cannot afford to pay the high prices and also take the risk of the effect it will have on his stock. We have a Wheat Board who have been handling wheat, and one of the results of their operations has been that they have not encouraged the milling of wheat in Canada but rather the opposite or the exportation of whole wheat, which has been shipped out to such an extent that very little mill feed has been available in the country of late. Mr. Speaker, it may seem an imposition on the good nature of hon. members for me to take so much time, and were it not for the fact that it is many years since I first endeavoured to have Parliament deal effectively with this question which is getting more unsatisfactory from year to year, I would not presume to encroach on the patience of the House. But I am satisfied that if this Bill goes through in its present form it will spell blue ruin to the agricultural interests of the country. The livestock industry will receive a further setback, and the plea that we have been making for a general practice of economy and efficiency throughout the country, and our advocacy of everything that will encourage thrift and promote industry, would appear empty and meaningless. It is somewhat significant that Bill No. 32, which received its first reading and remained on the Order Paper week after week until all the provisions of the Adulteration Act were disposed of, should quietly disappear, this Bill taking its place. The Bill which was withdrawn was a hundred per cent better than the present Bill inasmuch as it provided for the things which the Bill of last session sought to remedy but which are absolutely ignored in the present Bill. But clause 17 of the grain regulations still remains, enabling the miller to sell bran as "pure bran," though it has in it all the devitalized weed seeds he sees fit, provided there is no more than twenty-five vital noxious weed seeds in a pound. I should think, in view of the reports from the offices of the various branches of the Government, that something would have been done to improve this condition. It is only a short time ago that I received an answer to some questions I placed on the Order Paper with regard to standard stock feed. This is the re-cleaned screening of which we have heard so much and which the minister claims, by experiments conducted at the experimental farm, proved to be more valuable than bran for feeding stuff. In answer to a question I asked on March 31 in regard to the analyses of stock foods there appears the following result of the examination:

Your have heard the report of the analyst of the seed branch, Mr. Sifton, who has since, by reason of his ability, been induced to leave the Department of Agriculture and to become associated with Toronto University. I know the officers of the department were very much discouraged, that their hands were practically tied, and for that reason I was anxious to see this Bill come under the control of the Department of Agriculture in order that proper safeguards might be provided, because I expected there would be sympathy on the part of officers of the department in regard to the matter.

I feel, however, Mr. Speaker, that the attention of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Tolmie) has not been directed to this matter to the degree it should have been. I am satisfied that he must have been so busied with various other matters in connection with his department and with the business of the session that he has not had sufficient time to carefully examine the Bill, otherwise it would not have been lacking in the provisions to which I have referred.

I do not wish to take up any further time of the House in connection with the matter more than to again point out how seriously it affects the old provinces of Ontario and Quebec where the dairying and livestock industry and winter feeding are developed to a greater extent than they are at the present time in Western Canada or its other provinces. But I am satisfied that, notwithstanding all these things, if there is proper provision in the Bill you will find that the farmers in the West will see that the threshers put screens in their separators that will take all these small seeds out of the grain at the threshing and in this way remove the great temptation which now exists to put these seeds back into the mill feeds and dispose of them at a high price to the farmers.

Mr. E. W. NESBITT (North Oxford): Mr. Speaker, there is a great deal in what my hon. friend from South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) has been telling us both as regards the danger of feeding stock with these poisonous seeds and, what is the worst feature, the distribution that takes place by the seed passing through the stock, getting on the land and therefore covering our farms with weeds that it is almost impossible for us to keep down. One of the difficulties in buying feed for your stock is that you never know what you are buying, except you buy pure grain and have it thoroughly cleaned and ground up. That is the only way you can avoid getting these poisonous and other weed seeds on your land. Everything my hon. friend from South Oxford has said in reference to feeding this stuff is no doubt correct. I was going to make a suggestion to the minister. Section 7 reads as follows:

> No grain, screenings or other ingredient which contains in excess of the quantity allowed by regulation, any seeds, damaged grain or other material designated by regulation of the minister as injurious to the health of livestock or poultry, shall be used as a constituent of any feedings stuffs.

Why not prohibit that class of feed altogether in place of allowing a certain amount of these seeds to be used by regulation? If it is injurious to livestock I suggest to my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture that he prohibit it altogether and not allow it to be sold under regulation. That is all I have to say in reference to this matter, because my hon. friend from South Oxford has covered it very capably.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Before the Minister of Agriculture exercises his right to reply, it is my duty to inform hon. gentlemen that in doing so he will close the debate. If any other hon. gentleman desires to speak he may do so now.

Mr. TOLMIE: Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to what the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) had to say in regard to the proposed Bill. This Bill is the product of the very best experts of the department of Agriculture who have carefully consulted the stock men, mill men and every one else whom we knew of as taking an interest in the feed business. There are about 150,000 tons of screenings at the head of the Lakes each year as a result of the cleaning process carried on in the elevators at that point. For several years feeds for livestock have been extremely scarce. Our American friends, being keenly alive to the value of these feeding stuffs, have been very glad to import them into the United States. But on account of the scarcity of feed on this side, we deemed it advisable to utilize every possible pound of feed for caring for our stock. In actual experiments, as was mentioned by the hon. member for South Oxford, it has been proven that screenings are often better than bran in nutritive quality. I consider that we would not be doing our duty in sending these screenings out of the country or destroying them.

The objects of this particular Bill are to so guard against noxious weeds and to place these feeds before the public in such a condition that the farmer may know exactly what he is getting and so may be able to buy something that he knows all about. Heretofore these feeds have been adulterated to a very great extent, they have been sold and advertised very freely, and in many cases the farmer did not obtain what he thought he was getting. He paid a high price for feed which was in many cases very poor in quality, consisting of a mixture of oat hulls, ground straw, etc. By this Bill we propose to guard against that as far as possible.

My hon. friend from North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) wanted to know why we do not keep out these seeds altogether. I may say that it is impossible, with the machinery which we have at our disposal at the present time, to entirely remove all seeds. In the case of bran, if the bran is turned out pure, consisting of the product of the wheat grain, with the small amount of seed that it is impossible to remove, it may be sold for bran, but the moment weed seeds are added to the bran it comes under the heading of commercial feeding stuffs and under the control of our inspectors.

In regard to black seed occurring in these screenings, I may say that our experiments have shown that as feeding stuffs it has almost no value at all, in addition to which it has been proven poisonous to small pigs. Under the regulations which it is proposed to make in connection with this Bill, we will control the actual amount of these black seeds, so that when the farmer buys a bag of commercial feeding stuffs he will have clearly stated on a tag the percentage of different grains contained therein and also the percentage of weed seeds. He will therefore buy it with his eyes entirely open and be able to judge for himself. It it very wide of the mark to say that the sale of screenings in this country has had any effect whatever on the reduction of our dairy products. We all know that owing to high wages and also to the high cost of feed, the man who keeps an inferior cow on his place finds it utterly impossible to pay these prices and carry on dairying at a profit.

However, there are other men who maintain herds of higher quality who are making dairying pay well under present conditions. As far as prices are concerned I cannot clearly understand how the hon. member for South Oxford can possibly expect to buy cheap bran and cheap shorts produced from wheat that is ranging in price around $3 a bushel.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I am sure the minister would not misquote what I stated. I do not think I made any reference to the price. It was pure bran, not cheap bran, that I was advocating. I realize that the price of the commodity must be regulated by the price of the grain, and by supply and demand.

Mr. TOLMIE: I may have been mistaken but I thought what the hon. member stated was that it was owing to the quality of this feed that dairy men were almost afraid to feed it to their cows—

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Certainly.

Mr. TOLMIE: —and that therefore our dairy production was much less than it should be.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Exactly.

Mr. TOLMIE: I think the hon. member will find that the falling off in dairy produce has been due rather to the lack of feed than to the quality of it.

With regard to this board which the minister is empowered to call under the proposed Act, I may say that it will probably be composed of one milling man, two of three livestock men probably, two or three men from the Department of Agriculture, and perhaps one dealer in feed, so that each section of the business will be fully represented. We are calling in their assistance so that we will arrive at a proper set of regulations that will be practicable and will work out well in all directions.

While the hon. member for South Oxford takes a rather pessimistic view of the present livestock conditions in this country, his brother farmers in Ontario apparently do not feel that way. It was only yesterday that I, along with the Minister of Militia (Mr. Guthrie), had the pleasure of speaking at a picnic at Guelph where we celebrated the purchase in the Old Country of a bull for which $34,000 was paid, the highest price ever paid in the British Empire for a bull. Then, last week, two more Holstein breeders of Ontario went down to Minneapolis and purchased a two months' old calf for $50,000. Apparently, therefore, all the farmers in Ontario do not feel pessimistic regarding the future of the livestock business. Now, Mr. Speaker, as I have already said, this Bill has been carefully prepared. No doubt it is not perfect, it is quite likely that some improvements can be made in it, but it has been given very careful consideration by a set of experts in the Department of Agriculture who have carefully consulted many of the livestock men, and they think it is just about as perfect as it can be made under present conditions. Certainly it is an improvement on any of the legislation which has been enacted in the past. It will insure purer feed and will enable the farmer to know exactly what he is getting when he buys feed for his stock.

Mr. BOYCE: I would like to know what provision has been made in the present Bill with regard to the use of bran and shorts for feed.

Mr. TOLMIE: Under this Bill as long as a man sells bran and shorts in a pure state, or as nearly pure as is possible, he is permitted to do so, but the moment he adds any weeds not in compliance with the regulations it becomes "commercial feeding stuff" instead of bran, and he can be prosecuted.

I should add, in addition to what I have already stated, that this Bill was given very careful consideration by the Committee of Agriculture of the House, and was adopted by it unanimously.

Motion for the second reading of the Bill agreed to, and the House went into committee, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 2—definition:

Mr. ROBB: I suppose the minister understands that the term, "entire clean grain" would mean grain as delivered by the farmer to the mill. But supposing there was some pigeon grass in it?

Mr. TOLMIE: If it did not contain too large a proportion of poisonous weed seeds it would then be suitable for chop feed; but if it contained a large quantity of those it would come under the head of "commercial feeding stuff."

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I see that under paragraph 1 of this section commercial feeding stuffs is defined as meaning "any article offered for sale for the feeding of livestock and poultry." Under paragraph (d) it is held not to include bran, shorts or middlings when unmixed with other materials. Then subclause 3 contains this definition:

> "feeding stuff" means any commercial feeding stuff, bran, shorts or middlings and chop feed.

Then I notice that in the balance of the Bill "feeding stuff" is referred to instead of "commercial feeding stuff" when one would almost infer that commercial feeding stuff was intended, and that bran and shorts would be referred to as feeding stuff. What is the object of these variations? What is the meaning of having bran and shorts when unmixed with other materials defined as commercial feeding stuffs? Is it contemplated that bran and shorts are to be mixed by the mixers of feed, and that only whenever they see fit bran and shorts are to be sold as bran and shorts? I am satisfied that is about the effect of it, because if people cannot buy the bran and shorts they will certainly have to do the next best thing, and buy a mixture containing, maybe, a very large proportion of bran and shorts, and some other materials that have been added. It is absolutely impossible to carry on without having mill feeds of this kind. What is the effect of the two terms used?

Mr. TOLMIE: Just as long as bran and shorts are named bran and shorts they are sold as such. If they are mixed with any of these seeds or other feeds, then they are classified under "commercial feeding stuffs." The term "feeding stuffs" in this Bill applies to all of those feeds.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Even to "commercial feeding stuffs"?

Mr. TOLMIE: Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Consequently there is in the following section no distinction between mixtures of this kind and pure bran and shorts, because you say the term "feeding stuff" covers both.

Mr. TOLMIE: Pure bran and shorts under section 6 will be sold as bran and shorts; but immediately they are mixed, as I have already pointed out, they are considered to be "commercial feeding stuffs."

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The effect of this clause will be that mill feeds of this kind will be mixed, and you will get but a very small proportion of pure bran and shorts. This clause is a departure from the old

Act, and instead of being an advance along the lines which we desire it is going in the opposite direction. It is making provision for the mixing of all these feeding stuffs and having the mixture disposed of to suit the convenience of the mill feed men.

Mr. TOLMIE: On the contrary, Mr. Chairman, there are no restrictions at all on pure bran and shorts, so there is every encouragement for a man to sell them as bran and shorts; but the moment he mixes them with other grains the mixture is classed as a commercial feeding stuff and has to be so described on the label.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I do not notice any strong desire on the part of the millers or anybody to-day to sell pure bran and shorts; it is absolutely impossible to find them offered for sale. Safeguards to insure their purity should be provided. That is why I take objection to this Bill, in that it does not provide the safeguards which are necessary.

Mr. TOLMIE: Those who sell bran and shorts nowadays are certainly encouraged to mix other ingredients, because there is no such legislation as this in force. That is why they mix cheaper feed with bran and shorts. The aim of this Bill is to insure that the farmer shall know what he is buying and shall get what he pays for.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry and Stormont): In this clause the minister does not define what is meant by "bran, shorts and middlings." We who are feeding these feeds to our stocks every day have good reason to suspect that what we buy as bran, shorts and middlings are not of the quality they used to be. Would it not be possible to define bran, shorts and middlings in such a way as to prohibit the mixing of weed seeds or anything of that kind with them? Perhaps I am reading the Bill wrongly, but I fail to see anything in it that covers this point. I quite understand that immediately weed seeds or similar ingredients are mixed with bran and shorts the mixture becomes a "feeding stuff," and of course comes under the jurisdiction of the inspectors of the department. But even that might not attain the end sought. I think it would be better to prohibit the mixing of anything at all with bran and shorts, because we look upon these articles as being standard and something we can rely on.

Mr. ROBB: I was going to suggest that the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) is absolutely right in his view of how the legislation may work out, providing conditions are continued as they have existed in this country since 1917. If the hon. gentleman will a little later on in the session support the continuation of the Wheat Board, giving it power to fix the price of bran and shorts away down below the market price of the world, he will have the same experience again as he had in the past; there will be a scarcity of bran and shorts. No legislation will make bran and shorts more plentiful in this country; that is the whole secret—and I am speaking from experience as a man in the milling business. The only way to get a plentiful supply of pure bran and shorts is to leave the trade to regulate itself and sell these articles at the prevailing market price of the world. Under such conditions we in Canada would not have to pay more than bran and shorts are worth anywhere else. But if we attempt by legislation to fix the price at $10 or $15 a ton below what pure bran and shorts are really worth, and, on the other hand, enable the same board to place a tax of $1.50 to $2 a barrel on flour to distribute among the men who have grown the wheat from which that flour was produced, we are going to have in this country a continuation of the same experience that my hon. friend has been complaining of for the last hour and a half—a scarcity of mill feed.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I do not know that the matter referred to by the hon. member for Huntingdon (Mr. Robb) has much to do with the subject matter of this clause. As far as I am personally concerned I am not in favour of fixing the prices of anything; I believe the law of supply and demand should govern, and if mill feeds are worth a certain price, that price should be paid rather than an arbitrary price fixed by the Government. But I want to refer again to the phrase "commercial feeding stuffs" which is defined in this clause. The clause continues:

> "commercial feeding stuffs" does not include bran, shorts or middlings, when unmixed with other materials.

Then subsection 3 says:

> "feeding stuff" means any commercial feeding stuff, bran, shorts or middlings and chop feed.

To my mind those two provisions are absolutely contradictory, I fail to understand what object is desired to be attained by these contradictory provisions. I think that the suggestion of the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Kennedy) is a very good one, and that we should define what constitutes bran and shorts. We are empowering the minister by regulation to do a whole lot of things, and we are somewhat mystified by the definitions contained in this Bill, which, as I have pointed out, are apparently absolutely contradictory.

Mr. TOLMIE: I think the Bill is quite clear, Mr. Chairman. "Feeding stuffs" in the working out of this Bill is a general term applied to all feeding stuffs dealt with herein. In regard to the definition covering bran and shorts, I may say that it will be necessary in the regulations to distinguish several feeds, not only bran and shorts, but also cotton seed cake, oil meal, fish meal, oat hulls, and many of those other ingredients that are used in the manufacture of feeding stuffs It is better to have that matter controlled by regulation, for the reason that from time to time a certain amount of elasticity may be necessary to meet prevailing conditions. For instance, during the war flour extraction from wheat was increased 5 or 6 per cent, and this was done at the expense of bran, so that bran before the war was quite a different article from that which was produced under the new wheat regulations.

On section 3—labels on commercial feeding stuffs:

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry and Stormont): Subsection (2) provides:

> In the case of car lots in bulk, the provisions of this section shall be held to be complied with if the statement required by this section is attached to the invoice or bill of lading delivered to the purchaser.

The feeder who goes to buy from the dealer at the car may not have access to that statement, which is in the possession of the dealer. Will the minister insert a provision there to the effect that the statement required by this section must be made available to the purchaser in such a case?

Mr. TOLMIE: A dealer who buys such material in bulk and who retails it in sacks must attach to each sack a tag upon which is clearly shown what the contents of the bag are.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry and Stormont): When the dealer gets a carload of material in bulk the farmer usually goes to the car with his own sacks, and the material is bagged and sold directly out of the car. I doubt whether the dealer would be willing to attach a tag to every sack put up in that way.

Mr. TOLMIE: He violates the provisions of the Act if he does not. If the purchaser is not certain as to the actual content he may secure a pound of the material and send it to our analyst at Ottawa. A careful analysis of the feed will be made and if it is not in accordance with what it is represented to be, prosecution will follow.

On section 4—registration:

Mr. ROBB: Why is not the registration period made to run concurrently with the fiscal year?

Mr. TOLMIE: It was considered that the arrangement as set forth in the section would be most convenient to the trade.

On section 7—use of injurious ingredients prohibited:

Mr. SUTHERLAND: In this clause we should be a little more definite; there should be some statement as to what the regulations are to be. The committee are surely entitled to know what the views of the minister are in respect to the quantity of weed seeds, damaged grain, and so on, which may be used as a constituent of any feeding stuffs.

Mr. TOLMIE: In the merchandising of re-cleaned screenings, the standard sample which formed the basis for contract delivery contained less than one per cent by weight of "black seeds" that are capable of passing through a screen with perforations one-fourteenth inch in diameter. These "black seeds" are not all harmful, but contain practically all of the weed seeds that are injurious to the health of stock. It is better to handle this matter by regulation, owing to the changed conditions which prevail from time to time. In some years more of these screenings are contained in the grain than in others. Certain varieties of seeds are not as large in some dry seasons as they are in ordinary seasons. In the making of these regulations, producers, millers, consumers and experts of the department will be consulted, so that information will be secured from every possible angle. It is not the aim of the department to make regulations that we shall not be able to carry out or which will not be beneficial. By consultation with these different interests it is contemplated that the regulations made will be applicable to the conditions and will render good service.

10 p.m.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I appreciate the fact that a sieve with a certain kind of mesh will take out the most objectionable seeds, but I can hardly appreciate the force of the argument that the variability of the seasons would affect the size of the seeds. I think that the size of the seeds varies very little indeed. I am still of the opinion that we should incorporate in the Bill such provisions as the minister intends to embody in these regulations.

Mr. TOLMIE: I do not think that nearly as good service could be rendered in that way. It is better to enable the making of regulations to fit the situation from one year to another.

Section agreed to.

On section 8—to be free from weed seeds:

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Here again this matter is to be dealt with by regulations that we know nothing about. We must take it for granted that some experts somewhere who know all about this are going to embody in the regulations legislation for the people of Canada. As far as I am concerned, I do not consider that that is why I have been sent here. If there is such wisdom in the minds of these people, I think the minister ought to submit it to the House in concrete form, rather than to ask us to empower him to deal with this matter by regulations that we are not acquainted with to-day. It is proposed to let the clause pass without any explanation. In view of the fact that so many clauses of this Bill empower the minister to deal with these matters by regulation, in view also of the fact that the minister has entirely ignored the statement I made on the second reading of the Bill, and that he stated that ample provision would be made for safeguarding the purity of these mill feeds and that the Act of last session was still on the statute book, which Act I have shown clearly and conclusively was repealed by the Bill introduced by the Minister of Health, and further, as there is no provision in this Bill to ensure the purity of bran and shorts, I think it would be advisable to strike out this clause entirely which permits the minister to deal with the matter by regulation after consulting with very wise people in the East and in the West it may be. In view of these considerations and the fact that no explanation has been made by the minister I beg to move, seconded by the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. McGibbon:)

That clause 8 as printed in the Bill be struck therefrom and the following substituted therefor:

"In the case of bran, shorts or middlings, it shall be considered to be adulterated if it contains anything that is not a product of wheat, or, in the case of corn bran, if it contains anything that is not a product of maize or Indian corn."

This Bill is far from complete, and we shall be much worse off than at any time in the past if it goes through in its present form. I am therefore moving that the provision passed at the last session be embodied in the Bill, instead of empowering the minister to consult somebody who will by some process of reasoning embody something in the regulations that we do not know anything at all about.

Mr. HENDERS: I am of the impression that the definition of bran and shorts should come under section 6, where provision is made for dealing with bran and shorts. I do not think the definition should be inserted in section 8.

Amendment negatived.

On section 11—certificate of analysis as evidence:

Mr. J. W. KENNEDY: Who pays the cost of analysis of samples?

Mr. TOLMIE: It is free so far as the working of this Bill is concerned.

Section agreed to.

On section 12—analysis, etc., may be published:

Mr. SUTHERLAND: What is hoped to be accomplished by this section, and why is the word "may" used instead of saying that the minister "shall" publish?

Mr. TOLMIE: It was thought better to leave it to the discretion of the minister whether to publish the results or not. Take the case of a large dealer who can stand a fine of $200, or $300 or $400 without feeling very much injured. If it is published throughout the country that he is selling feed that has been adulterated, he would suffer to a much greater extent than by the fine. That is why it is left to the discretion of the minister.

On section 14—regulations:

Mr. SUTHERLAND: We all appreciate the fact that instead of using the employees now available in the various branches of the Government, the Civil Service is being added to continually. I understand from the remarks the minister made the other night that he does not contemplate appointing a permanent board, but merely a board with whom he can consult from time to time with reference to this matter. I again wish to repeat that I am disappointed that Parliament is being absolutely ignored in this matter of regulations. The minister asks Parliament to let him consult with and act upon the advice of men whom he says will know much better than the people who will be held responsible for this legislation by the people of this country. As far as I am concerned, I am absolutely opposed to such a procedure. I object to the passing of this section.

The CHAIRMAN: Carried.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I ask that the yeas and nays be counted.

The CHAIRMAN: Mr. Tolmie moves that clause 14 stand as part of the Bill. Is it the pleasure of the committee to adopt the motion?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: No.

The CHAIRMAN: In my opinion the yeas have it. I declare the section agreed to.

On section 17—innocent purchaser protected:

Mr. McKENZIE: In regard to the question of costs I think an extraordinary principle is introduced here. This is a criminal offense, and while it is not very serious, nevertheless it must be dealt with as a criminal offense, and the principles of criminal law must be applied. The question in a criminal action is whether a man is guilty or not. If he is guilty he should be punished, and if he is found not guilty, whatever may have happened is by that very fact proved to have been due to no fault of his. He is declared not guilty and is therefore entirely innocent of any offense, and there can be no reason whatever why he should be mulched in costs. The provision of this Bill is a new doctrine to me and, I have no doubt, to every lawyer in the House. If a man is not guilty he should not be subject to any penalty, and the costs in a criminal proceeding are part of the penalty. In this clause you provide that although a man may prove himself absolutely innocent, although he may know that he had no knowledge that there was anything wrong in the transaction, did not know that there was any deleterious substance in the stuff, and considered that everything was all right, being confident that he was not violating the law; and although the court may have found him not guilty, nevertheless he shall "be liable upon conviction for the costs of the prosecution only." I do not know what advice the minister has received on the point, but it seems to me to be a new departure in criminal law procedure.

Mr. TOLMIE: It is not an entirely new departure, for it has been a part of the Seed Control Act for the last fifteen years and it has been found to work very smoothly. All that is necessary is to ask the retailer to go before a justice of the peace and make a sworn statement which will cost from fifty cents to a dollar, and this is essential before we can begin prosecution of the manufacturer who sold the goods.

Mr. McKENZIE: There is another peculiar feature about this section. The magistrate can, without a hearing, pronounce judgment upon the information laid before him. Surely that is an extraordinary line of procedure. Before a man can be pronounced innocent or otherwise evidence must be taken and the person who lays the charge must be called upon to substantiate it. But as I understand the situation, some one can go before the magistrate and make an affidavit and without a hearing of the other side, the case is decided. That seems to be another new departure.

Mr. TOLMIE: I have no legal training, and I can only say that this provision has been working very smoothly for fifteen years in the Seed Control Act, from which it was taken.

PENITENTIARY ACT AMENDMENT

On motion of Rt. Hon. C. J. Doherty (Minister of Justice) Bill No. 138 to amend the Penitentiary Act was read a second time and the House went into committee on the Bill, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 1—Minister to have power to make regulations for administration, etc., of penitentiaries:

Mr. FIELDING: Is it proposed that the minister himself shall make these regulations without the assent of Council?

Mr. DOHERTY: Under the law the administration is, by the clause to which these words are to be added, placed in the hands of the minister. These regulations are not regulations in the way of laws to govern the people of Canada in general; they are regulations dealing with the administration and discipline of the penitentiaries of Canada.

Mr. FIELDING: No penalties attached?

Mr. DOHERTY: No penalties attached.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Was there not a commission appointed to investigate the treatment of the prisoners in the various penitentiaries, and was there not a report made to the minister?

Mr. DOHERTY: We have not had any recent investigation.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT.

On motion of Rt. Hon. C. J. Doherty (Minister of Justice) Bill No. 137, to amend the Criminal Code was read a second time and the House went into committee on the Bill, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 1—Definitions of appeal court amended to meet changes in title of courts:

Mr. FIELDING: Did the minister, on the first reading, explain the general purpose of this Bill?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes, in so far as there is a general principle, but as there are amendments to different articles of the code it can hardly be said that there is any principle running through the Bill. The first section is for the purpose of making the names of courts conform to the changes which have been made in the names of those courts by provincial legislation.

Mr. McKENZIE: For the purpose of naming the appeal courts?

Mr. DOHERTY: In regard to the first paragraph, there is no change, and the reason they came to be included was that we desired to include all the provisions about the courts. With reference to the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and British Columbia the Code says that the appeal court shall be the "supreme court en banc." In New Brunswick and in British Columbia the legislatures have altered the constitution of their courts and instead of having one court with an appeal to that court sitting en banc, they have constituted a court of appeal and a court of first instance. In order to have these proceedings, which are proceedings intended to go to the court of appeal, go to the court of appeal of the province, we have to make this modification. There is no longer a court that sits en banc to hear appeals. This is simply to meet the change in the constitution of the provincial courts as brought about by provincial legislation.

On section 2—permit required for firearms and certain weapons:

Mr. FIELDING: Wherein does this provision differ from the existing law?

Mr. DOHERTY: It differs by extending the provisions so as to make it cover all classes.

Mr. FIELDING: Additional weapons?

Mr. DOHERTY: All firearms. Heretofore it was limited to arms that could be concealed upon the person. The Criminal Code was amended last year, and in order to show the precise difference I must refer to the Statutes of 1919.

Mr. FIELDING: Never mind doing that, the general purpose can be stated.

Mr. DOHERTY: That is the purpose.

Mr. McKENZIE: A British subject is only relieved from the necessity of obtaining a license in respect to any shot gun which he owns, but if such a person were to buy a shot gun the license provision applies. If a man now has a shot gun he is all right; but if his neighbour thinks it proper to purchase a shot gun in order to shoot partridge, duck or the like, he must obtain a license. That is making a discrimination of which I do not quite see the force.

Mr. DOHERTY: I may say it was considered desirable under existing conditions that we should have a control over the trade in firearms generally. Reports coming from the police, and coming also to some extent from information reaching the military authorities, indicated that in certain localities at different periods there was what looked like an extraordinary movement in the acquisition of firearms. It was thought desirable that we should have a control over them, and therefore we have the system established which existed previously in the case of a certain class of firearms, and which existed previously as regards aliens. Now it is extended so as to cover the acquisition and possession of firearms generally. It did not seem right, however, that a British subject—who under the law as it stood was under no restriction as regards this class of arms—should be controlled as regards those arms that he had already acquired. This is in order to make the law operative—in so far as it imposes any restriction in regard to shot guns—only with respect to the future. That is the purpose of making the distinction.

Mr. DUFF: Is it necessary for the owner or captain of a ship to procure a license before he can purchase firearms to take on board his ship? It is sometimes necessary for the captain of a vessel to take firearms on board a ship in case of any trouble. Furthermore, it is customary to have on board a fishing vessel a swivel, or small cannon, to be discharged in a fog in order to let the fishermen when out in their boats, know in which direction to go to reach the vessel. Is it necessary for them to obtain a license in order to place this firearm on board the vessel?

Mr. DOHERTY: There is no exception for that class of persons, and therefore I think they would come under the law. I may point out that no respectable person will have any difficulty whatever in obtaining a permit. If the hon. gentleman will refer to the sections of the existing law which cover the granting of permits, he will find that the officers empowered to grant these permits are so numerous that certainly nobody at any port from which a vessel requiring to carry a firearm would have to leave will have the slightest difficulty in obtaining a permit.

Mr. FIELDING: By whom are the permits issued?

Mr. DOHERTY: The list of officers authorized to grant permits is numerous. It includes magistrates, mayors, officers of the Northwest Mounted Police and commissioners of police. The numeration was extended at the time the Act was passed so as to include every officer that within reason could be suggested as a person who might be entrusted with that authority, the view being to insure that in practically every part of the country every respectable person would have easy access to the officer authorized to grant the permit.

Mr. FIELDING: Is there any fee to be paid?

Mr. DOHERTY: No.

Mr. DUFF: Is there a penalty in case of not obtaining a license?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes, there is a penalty for a person having the arm without a permit, and there is a penalty for the man who sells the arm if he does not satisfy himself that the party purchasing has a permit.

Mr. DUFF: There must be a permit for every individual purchase?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes.

Mr. DUFF: What about the question of jurisdiction on the high seas outside the three-mile limit?

Mr. DOHERTY: As to jurisdiction we are not purporting to legislate in this Act to make it an offence to carry a firearm on the high seas outside the three-mile limit. What our power is in that regard would perhaps be a question connected with one of the resolutions on the Order Paper. At all events, power or no power, we are not pretending to exercise any such right by this legislation.

Mr. POWER: Do I understand that a British subject who is now the possessor of a shot gun may still keep it without obtaining a license?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes.

Mr. POWER: What about the child who owns an air rifle at the present moment, what becomes of him?

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not know whether you could describe—

Mr. POWER: Are you afraid of his Bolshevist activities?

Mr. DOHERTY: I would assume that this law, like all other laws, would be applied with some degree of intelligence. I fancy that a child who might own an air gun would not be in very serious jeopardy if he did not obtain a permit. I want to be perfectly frank. The purpose is as I have explained, and we do not think it is imposing any hardship upon anybody, when we make it possible for any respectable person to obtain a permit without any difficulty. The purpose is to enable us to obtain knowledge of the trafficking in dangerous firearms, and keep control over persons who have them in their possession. Police reports at different times have urged the great importance of this knowledge and control. In connection with applications for clemency it is astonishing how much crime is attributable to the ease with which people obtain firearms and the indiscriminate way they use them. We do think that the very slight inconvenience imposed upon respectable citizens is more than justified by the importance of our being able to control the possession of these dangerous weapons.

Mr. POWER: I do not see the logic in refusing a permit to the owner of a rifle and granting it to the owner of a shot gun. It seems to me that a shot gun at short range would do just as much damage as a rifle, probably more.

Mr. DOHERTY: It was pointed out that there is a much wider field of use for the shot gun for purposes entirely disconnected with violence. If we are a trifle too severe on the man who owns a rifle—

Mr. POWER: But how many respectable citizens who go hunting every autumn have rifles at home? They will never think of applying for a permit, and they will be liable to great annoyance by some officious magistrate,—and his type is frequently met with in the country.

Mr. DOHERTY: This law, like every other law, will become known, and I do not think any respectable citizen will resent being called upon to take out a permit. On the contrary, I think all respectable citizens will realize the importance of control in this matter, and will be glad to contribute to that control at the slight inconvenience of applying for a permit. Of course, it is a most unfortunate thing, but law cannot be administered except upon the assumption—a very violent assumption I know—

Mr. POWER: That a man thinks.

Mr. DOHERTY:—that men know and think.

Mr. POWER: Provided the law be reasonable; but this law does not seem to be reasonable.

Mr. DOHERTY: I have stated what seems to me to be reasonable.

Mr. POWER: But the men I have in mind have used rifles all their lives perhaps, and because the hon. minister and the Government for some reason or other have got it into their heads that Bolshevism or some other "ism" is rampant in the country they are going to force such men to run round for a permit. The most reasonable and law abiding citizens will not think of such a thing.

Mr. DOHERTY: I have a larger faith in the capacity for thought of the reasonable law-abiding citizens of this country.

Mr. POWER: But this is not a reasonable law.

Mr. DOHERTY: So far as I am capable of judging of what is reasonable and what is unreasonable, I think this is a reasonable provision. Reasonable citizens who drive in automobiles—

Mr. POWER: The automobile is more dangerous than the rifle.

Mr. DOHERTY: Perhaps it is. But automobile owners are required to obtain licenses; and I might instance numerous other cases in which licenses are required. I think the hon. gentleman will find that his apprehensions will not be justified in the practical working out of this legislation. It cannot be reasonably suggested that because we have a law against the carrying of concealed weapons we are all liable at any moment to be stopped by a constable on the street and searched. How often does that happen to respectable citizens? On the other hand, this is a most invaluable safeguard in respect to citizens who do not happen to be reasonable or worthy to have in their possession arms of this kind.

Mr. POWER: My principal objection is that by this law a shot gun is excepted and a rifle is not. What distinction can be drawn between a shot gun and a rifle I do not know. Supposing I have a rifle in my possession at home, and before going away shooting I apply to some magistrate in the country for a permit; for some reason or other he refuses to issue me one; what becomes of my rifle? Do I give it to the magistrate? Do I throw it away? Or is any provision made for compensation for the confiscation of my property?

Mr. DOHERTY: I can only suggest that in that case the hon. gentleman should take the trouble of finding a reasonable magistrate,—and there are lots of them.

Mr. FIELDING: What meaning would the minister attach to the word "shot gun" in the tenth line? A British subject is not required to obtain a permit to own a shot gun which he already possesses. But in the list of things banned shot guns are not mentioned. I would think that "shot gun" was intended to cover all forms of guns and rifles.

Mr. DOHERTY: The preceding word covers every kind of machine gun, rifle, gun, revolver, etc.

Mr. FIELDING: But not the shot gun?

Mr. DOHERTY: It does not say "shot gun," but it covers every gun, and we make an exception for the shot gun already owned. "Shot gun" is already included among the weapons mentioned, and moreover would be included among "firearms," for it is a firearm. What was urged upon us as a reason for making this exception was the very widespread extent to which farmers in this country, and particularly in certain sections, own shot guns and consider them as practically part of their equipment. It was thought that we should not make this law operative in respect to weapons of that kind already owned by them. The difference between the two situations is that in regard to that particular kind of weapon the law is to apply only to those firearms which are hereafter acquired.

Mr. FIELDING: Why should this provision not read?—

Provided that no British subject shall be required to obtain a permit with respect to any gun now owned by him.

What is the object of using the word "shot gun?"

Mr. DOHERTY: It was thought that that expression would best cover the case of those persons who are already in possession of a weapon of this kind the principal purpose of which is for use in hunting. I do not say that the rifle is never used for hunting, but that is not its primary or principal purpose, as I understand it. On the other hand, it was reported to us that the shot gun is the weapon which the farmer keeps in his house and uses, more particularly in the western part of the country. The idea was to avoid withdrawing from a large class of the people a privilege which they had hitherto enjoyed. I can offer no fruther reason for the distinction. Perhaps it is not absolutely well founded, but there seemed to be good reason for making it. If experience should show that it is desirable to extend these requirements to other weapons, we shall be able subsequently to amend the law in that regard. In the meantime we have the general provision on the subject.

Mr. DECHENE: Will the permit be good all over Canada?

Mr. DOHERTY: There is no restriction upon the place where a permit issued by a competent officer may be used.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Does this clause apply to obsolete arms or arms that are used for purely decorative purposes? I know of several public places and dwellings where articles enumerated here are used for decorative purposes only.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Panoplies.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Some of these weapons are hundreds of years old; they are collected by people who make a kind of hobby of that sort of thing. To require a permit for each arm of that kind would work considerable hardship. I do not know what the permit costs; it may be free. But some of these articles might be difficult to name. We do not want to do injustice to a very large number of our citizens who are already in possession of many of these articles.

Mr. DOHERTY: I have to confess that I had not considered that possible event. I think it would be an extreme interpretation to say that a man who had a gun such as is used for decorative purposes would be in possession of a firearm in the sense of this statute. If the hon. member thinks that the cases are so numerous and the probability of the law being interpreted to cover such cases so great as to necessitate an exception, I have no objection to making an exception to meet the case. I think, however, that we may safely count upon the word "firearm" being interpreted as being an arm susceptible of being used today as a firearm. We have had this sort of legislation for years, and I do not know that people who preserve, say daggers, as curios or mementos or objects of historical interest have ever been troubled under it. I think we may safely let the law stand in its present form, and if it gives rise to any cases of that kind we may take care of them. It is difficult to anticipate all the cases that might be conjured up as coming within the section.

Mr. McKENZIE: Does the word "person" in this section include a corporation?

Mr. DOHERTY: The general Interpretation Act, and, I think, the interpretation clauses of the Criminal Code, make the word "person" include a corporation. I see no reason why a corporation should be entitled to have weapons of this sort without permit any more than an individual person. Of course, possession on the part of a corporation must be possession on the part of some individual person; a corporation cannot act except through persons.

Mr. McKENZIE: I think the minister is right in saying that the word "person" includes a corporation. I note that cannons are being distributed all around the country to corporations, who are accepting them as gifts from the Government. Will these corporations be obliged to go to a magistrate and get a license to hold those guns?

Mr. DOHERTY: I think they will; I do not see why they should not. I do not see why a corporation or a person should not be required to get a permit to possess a cannon when we provide ample facility for the obtaining of a permit. Corporations as well as individual persons could help us out in that regard.

Mr. REID (Mackenzie): I would inform the minister that out West the rifle is just as common as the shot gun in the farmer's home. I look upon the shot gun as a more dangerous weapon than the rifle. I think both the rifle and the shot gun should be allowed, as a concession to the farmers.

Mr. DOHERTY: Of course, the hon. gentleman has a more intimate knowledge of western conditions than I have, but I may say that from inquiry I made on the subject the impression that remained with me and with my colleagues—because we made inquiry on the subject that we thought was sufficient—was that the shot gun was the more usual and the more necessary weapon. It is difficult for us, in passing a law of this kind, to begin differentiating between different classes of people. In the circumstances in which weapons of this sort are sources of danger, we do find that the rifle figures more frequently than the shot gun and that therefore there is a greater need for control of the possession of the rifle than there is for control of the possession of the shot gun. That is the result of our inquiry. The argument may get this far; that because we do feel that we ought to control the possession of the rifle, if hon. gentlemen persuade us that there is no distinction to be made between the rifle and the shot gun, we shall have to consider whether we ought not to withdraw the exception made in favour of the shot gun. I think that outside of weapons that can be concealed the rifle is perhaps the most important weapon for us to see, as far as we may, that it is only in the hands of proper people. I would sympathize with my hon. friend's objection if there was any real difficulty for any respectable man to get a permit, but, as I have said, we have provided to make it the easiest thing in the world for a respectable man to get a permit. At the time the statute went through the House, I accepted suggestions from everybody who could suggest to me an officer that might be authorized to give this permit, because I recognized, and I recognize still, that we ought not to make this a burdensome thing, and it is not a burdensome thing.

On section 3—signing pretended affidavit or declaration:

[Mr. Doherty.]

Mr. McKENZIE: Was it not the intention to limit this to improper use of an affidavit in the case only of judicial proceedings? There might be some tomfoolery about something that looked like a declaration that was not in a judicial proceeding at all. I would think that the intention of the Act was that if a person uses such a declaration or affidavit in any judicial proceedings he shall be subject to a penalty.

Mr. DOHERTY: The intention was to make it an offence for any person to send a man out in possession of something that on its face is an affidavit sworn to before a proper officer, when it never was so sworn. There have been brought to my attention quite a number of instances where this has been done, and where, outside of actual judicial proceedings, it has been used to perpetrate a fraud. For instance, it has been brought to my attention that in certain parts of the country there is a widespread practice among certain gentlemen authorized to issue marriage licenses, and who in the issue of the licenses, have to take affidavits from the person applying for the license, to leave with their clerk or lady stenographer the necessary form, and when any man came along and wanted a marriage license the lady would fill in the form with his name and so forth, and when our issuer of marriage licenses got back, without ever having seen the man, he certified at the bottom that that man had sworn to it. Now that is a serious offence. Any man who is authorized to administer oaths should certainly realize that he is not entitled to certify that a man swore to a certain thing when he did not swear to it.

The second paragraph deals with the offence of the man who puts the affidavit forward as being a proper affidavit. Many and many a transaction has been put through, quite outside the courts, upon the faith of an affidavit. It seems to me that the practice of going out and palming off these documents as affidavits which are really not affidavits calls for repression, and if we limit it exclusively to judicial proceedings we shall fail to reach a large number of cases that ought to be reached. I do not know why it should have happened, but there seems to have been a sort of outbreak of this thing. I have had communications from different sources calling my attention to the abuse made of these pretended affidavits, and as it happens these cases were not in judicial proceedings. In a judicial proceeding you have a judge and some authority to take pains to verify the affidavits.

But take the case with regard to marriage licenses. Certainly that is a very great abuse, if it prevails to any widespread extent, and in the particular cases which came to my knowledge, the gentleman who issued these licenses was surprised at the suggestion that he did wrong, and the young lady who had been employed in that particular instance was surprised to learn that she was doing anything wrong. She says " Why, for years I was in the employ of Mr. So-and-So, and Mr. So-and-So, and Mr. So-and-So, all of whom were authorized to issue marriage licenses—"

Mr. FIELDING: Does the false affidavit affect the validity of the marriage?

Mr. DOHERTY: No, but the requiring of the affidavit is for the protection of the other consort, or any other people who may be interested. It certainly is a very grave evil, even if it should not go so far as to affect the validity of the marriage, that people should be enabled to avoid the consequences of perjury,—for if they did not swear to anything they cannot be convicted of perjury,— by making use of what purports to be an affidavit but which they know is not an affidavit. The purpose was not to confine the offence to judicial proceedings. If anybody gets into trouble, because he wants to get into trouble by sending out sham affidavits I do not think he is entitled to a great deal of sympathy, and if it be simply a joke, I have no doubt the magistrate will mete out the proper punishment. But it is a serious thing, and people ought to have it impressed on them that the oath is not a thing to be fooled with in reality or in appearance.

Mr. J. F. REID: Referring for a moment to the section we have just passed, where there are several sons in a farmer's home will each member of the family who wishes to use the rifle have to have a separate permit?

Mr. DOHERTY: Oh, no. The rifle is, properly speaking, in the possession, I would take it, of the home. If the individual wants to take that rifle away in his own personal possession and use it, I think he would be required to have a permit, and that is for the purpose of keeping a check upon the people who use these weapons. Any one who wants to carry a firearm of that kind must get a permit.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—seduction of girls between 16 and 18 instead of 14 and 16.

Mr. PROULX: Is this the same clause as that passed last year and the year before?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes. This and several of the following clauses were passed last year. In fact, this one was passed in 1918 and 1919, but the Senate did not look with favour on it. We propose to send these clauses back.

Section agreed to.

On section 7—betting, pool-selling and book-making.

Mr. McKENZIE: Does the minister become sponsor for this remarkable section? I do not profess to understand it myself but I take it that the minister knows all about it.

Mr. DOHERTY: The section reproduces the law as it stands, with all the existing restrictions upon the permissibility of organized betting. The reason it is so long and complicated is the fact that it repeats all the restrictions that already exist, and it adds certain further restrictions. In the first place, the organized betting is to be exclusively by the operation of the parimutuel machine; the bookmaker is gone. In the second place, the profit to be taken by the association or person conducting a race meeting is limited to the percentages mentioned in the section as follows:

|---|---|
| Where the total amount staked or deposited on each race is under $20,000.. | 7% |
| $20,000 but not exceeding $30,000.. .. | 6% |
| Over $30,000, but not exceeding $40,000. | 5% |
| Over $40,000 but not exceeding $50,000.. | 4% |
| Over $50,000.. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. .. | 3% |

In addition the machines are to be subject to the approval of the officer of the Minister of Agriculture; the operation is to be carried on under his supervision. The machines are to be locked before the horses can be started, and if the proprietors of the race track do not devote what in the judgment of the Minister of Agriculture is a proper proportion of the moneys so derived from these percentages to giving prizes for the encouragement of horse breeding, the minister is empowered to require them to discontinue the use of the machine or in other words to prevent any organized betting on the race track. The purpose is to create a situation where no association will have the privilege of organized betting on its race track if the association is one that is in the business for what it can make out of it. It will prevent there being any big haul for the gentlemen who want to engage in this organized betting as a business, and we expect that it will reduce the race tracks to those which are controlled by people who bona fide, carry on their racing for the sake of the sport and to whom the betting feature is purely incidental, something, which, according to the testimony laid before Mr. Rutherford the Commissioner, is, by a large number of people at all events, believed to be essential to keeping up a state of interest in the meetings and inducing people to support them. We think that the clause surrounds the privilege with every restriction with which it can be surrounded if it is to be allowed to exist at all.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is this machine that the minister has spoken of capable of fraudulent manipulation? I do not know very much about these things but I have heard it said that some of the machines that are used, slot machines and that sort of instrument, can be so adjusted as to be made unfair to the man who is betting. I suppose the minister is satisfied that there is no such device in connection with the machine that is used on the race track?

Mr. DOHERTY: We have provided as an additional precaution that the machines used have to pass the inspection of an officer appointed by the Department of Agriculture for the purpose of seeing that there is no trick about them.

Mr. FIELDING: What is the object of making a distinction between trotting races and others?

Mr. DOHERTY: The distinction is not new; it exists in the present law and has existed in the past. Our information is that the great evils that are claimed to have resulted—and I think it cannot be questioned have resulted—from the abuse of the betting privilege have, whatever may be the occult reason, been more in connection with running races than with trotting races. I understand furthermore that trotting races very largely take place in connection with fairs, agricultural exhibitions and gatherings of that kind, and I am informed that the experience is that they do not generate the grave evils that have unfortunately surrounded the running race tracks. In regard to trotting races we are making no change in the law. Additional restrictions are being put on running races and I may say that a large number of restrictions had already been put on the running races which are not made applicable to trotting races.

Mr. PROULX: How many race tracks are there in operation?

[Mr. Doherty.]

Mr. DOHERTY: I have not that information before me now, but they have grown considerably and that is one of the things that we hope this law will kill. We have reason to believe that quite a number of race tracks have sprung up as money making things pure and simple, and it is in connection with these race tracks and moneymaking by persons running race tracks that we expect that the effect of this law will be to disinterest this class of people in racing associations, and that in the future we may hope to have racing controlled by people who are interested only for the sport and for the encouragement of the breeding of good horses and to whom the betting is a mere incident as the profit which they may get out of it is a mere incident.

Section agreed to.

On section 9—carnally knowing girl between 14 and 16:

Mr. PROULX: What is the maximum punishment now?

Mr. DOHERTY: This is to create a specifiv offence in regard to a girl between 14 and 16. As the law is at present it is an offence to have carnal knowledge of a girl under 14. There is no protection to a girl of 16. We are raising the age to 16 and making the punishment in the case of a girl between 14 and 16 not as severe as it is in the case of a girl under 14.

Mr. PROULX: Consent is not material now?

Mr. DOHERTY: Consent under 14 is entirely immaterial. Consent under 16 will be immaterial in the future, but the punishment of a person committing an offence with a girl between 14 and 16 is not made as heavy as it is with regard to a girl under 14. In the case of a girl under 14 a man is liable to imprisonment for life and to be whipped. While we have extended the period of protection it has not seemed to Parliament in both instances in which it has dealt with it that the punishment should be as great in the case of this new offence as it was in the case of the old one.

Mr. PROULX: What is the maximum punishment under the Code in the case of a girl between 14 and 16?

Mr. DOHERTY: The present section, 301, reads as follows:

> Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for life, and to be whipped, who carnally knows any girl under the age of fourteen years, not being his wife, whether he believes her to be of or above that age or not.

So that if the girl is under the age of fourteen the man is liable to imprisonment for life. Where the girl is between fourteen and sixteen the man is liable to imprisonment for five years. There is a substantial difference between the penalties.

Section agreed to.

On section 10—Unlawfully wearing decorations or uniform, or unlawfully possessing certificate of discharge, or unlawfully making alterations in such certificates.

Mr. PECK: I entirely sympathize with this section, but I would like to ask for an explanation from the minister in regard to subsection 2 dealing with the onus of proof. It is the easiest thing in the world for a man to lose his discharge papers, and unless he were given ample time to prove his identity he might suffer hardship.

Mr. DOHERTY: Of course it would be the duty of the court to give him every possible opportunity to present proof. The only purpose of the section is to relieve the prosecution of proving the negative, that is proving that he had no right to wear the uniform. I think in the great bulk of cases a man who is lawfully wearing a uniform, or the decorations referred to in the subsection, will have no serious difficulty in proving his right; the mere loss of his discharge papers would not make it impossible for him to prove it.

Mr. PECK: He could prove his identity and get a duplicate?

Mr. DOHERTY: I have no doubt the court would give him every reasonable opportunity of bringing that proof.

Section agreed to.

On section 11—Process not to issue for the arrest or summoning of a person outside a province without approval of Attorney General or a judge.

Mr. PROULX: Will that not cause delay in having the process served. In Ontario the judges of the Supreme Court of the province all reside in the city of Toronto.

Mr. DOHERTY: It may cause delay, but it is to be borne in mind that this is a clause applicable in the somewhat exceptional case where a warrant issued in one province is to be executed in another province and the accused brought out of his province for trial. Now it has been urged that it is a very great hardship that it should be in the power of any irresponsible individual who goes and swears out a warrant to bring a man from Gaspé in the province of Quebec to, if you like, Vancouver, there to find that there is an unfounded charge against him. He will be put to very heavy expense in returning, and so forth. It has seemed under those circumstances that, if the party complaining is not willing to go to where the accused is and have him arrested and tried there, it is not imposing an unfair requirement to demand that some responsible party should justify that man being brought out of his own province. I may say that our attention was specially called to this in connection with prohibition legislation. The hardship of subjecting a man to be taken out of one province to be tried in another was very strongly urged, and this very objection made—that a man is liable to be brought out of his own province and nobody is responsible. This safeguard was adopted in that particular legislation, and it has been urged upon us that it would be desirable to make it of general application.

Mr. PROULX: In a province where there are county court judges those judges could be added.

Mr. DOHERTY: I think there would be no objection to adding the words "or a county court judge."

Mr. FIELDING: It would be better to add the words, "or a county court."

Mr. DOHERTY: Then the section would read: "or a judge of the superior court or of a county court." I move that the section be so amended.

Mr. McKENZIE: How will the section read as amended?

Mr. DOHERTY: It will read as follows:

No warrant or other process shall be issued in any province for the arrest or summoning of any person residing in another province without the approval of the Attorney General or a Judge of the Superior Court or of a County Court of the province where it is sought to issue the process.

Mr. McKENZIE: It is quite possible that in criminal proceedings a man might be wanted merely as a witness. In the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick we have two towns very close together, Amherst and Sackville, and if you want a Sackville man over at Amherst you have to go to the county court judge at Pictou or to the Attorney General at Halifax before you can issue a subpœna.

Mr. DOHERTY: I take it that the provision would not apply to the subpœnaing of a witness. The words are:

No warrant or other process shall be issued in any province for the arrest or summoning of any person residing in another province—

The hon. gentleman of course knows that on a charge or complaint being laid against a man there issues a warrant for his arrest or a summons for him to appear, and I take it that the process in question is the process for the arrest of any person accused of an offence. I do not think the words cover the subpœning of a witness.

Mr. McKENZIE: If the section was amended to read, "no person shall be summoned or arrested upon a criminal charge," I think that would meet the objection I am taking. The Minister of Justice is aware that if I go before a magistrate and make an affidavit that I have reason to believe that a witness will not attend on an ordinary subpœna, I can get a warrant for his arrest. In a case of that kind a man would be arrested when merely wanted as a witness.

Mr. DOHERTY: There is nothing like making things clear, and I will be quite happy to accept the suggestion. I beg to move that section 11 be amended by inserting after the word "summoning" in the nineteenth line the words "upon a criminal charge." The section will then read:

No warrant or other process shall be issued in any province for the arrest or summoning upon a criminal charge of any person residing in another province—

Mr. PROULX: But there are certain laws which are considered to be penal and not criminal, such as the Ontario Temperance Act. Would that cover it?

Mr. DOHERTY: We have nothing to do with those laws; this is the Criminal Code.

Mr. PROULX: That is right. In the western provinces I believe they call their courts "district courts" instead of county courts; and in Ontario there are certain district courts.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. DOHERTY: I move that section 11 be further amended by inserting after the word "Court" in the twenty-first line the words "or of a County Court or of a District Court."

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 12—appeals in summary convictions in Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Mr. DOHERTY: I move to amend this clause by inserting after the words "District Court" in line twenty-seven the words, "of the district in which the cause of the information or complaint arose." I may say that this amendment is being made at the request of the Attorneys General of the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta in order to remove a doubt which existed under the present legislation as to what court an appeal should be taken to from a magistrate's decision. Under the present wording it has been argued that a convicted party was entitled to take his appeal to the nearest district court, when that was the district court sitting at the place nearest to where he was convicted, without regard to whether it was within or without the judicial district. Both these law officers concur in the view that, it being desirable to avoid confusion, it should be made clear that the appeal must be to the district court in which the cause of action arose. As the present printed wording might still leave some doubt, I move that amendment.

Mr. McKENZIE: Sometimes we have confusion in our county of Cape Breton because we have two places at which the County Court sits, and it is rather doubtful which of those the appeal should be taken to. In civil and quasi-criminal matters the provincial law is that the appeal shall be to the court sitting at the nearest place to where the trial magistrate sat; but I do not think there is anything like that in the Criminal Code. There I think the rule is that the appeal shall be heard at the next sitting of the County Court, and that may not be nearest to the place where the magistrate tried the case. It seems to me it would be well to have it stated that the appeal be to the court sitting nearest to the place of the first trial. Witnesses should not be taken away from home further than is necessary.

Mr. DOHERTY: The provision now seems to be for the province of New Brunswick precisely what we are trying to make it for the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan. The provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Manitoba are dealt with in subsection (c) of this section 749, and the provision is that the appeal shall be to the County Court of the district or county where the cause of the information or complaint arose.

Mr. McKENZIE: What I have in view is this: When the county court sits in more than one place in the same district, under that law you have to go to the first sitting of the court whether it is the nearest court or not. Under our provincial law there is a provision that you may go to the court sitting at the place nearest to where the magistrate tried the case. In our county the court sits at Sydney, but it also sits twice a year, for the hearing of appeals and other matters, at North Sydney, on the other side of the water. If a case is tried at Sydney Mines or North Sydney the appeal must be heard, under the present law, at the first sitting of the court at Sydney, although that is not the nearest place.

Mr. DOHERTY: This particular provision does not impose any obligation with regard to the place at which the appeal shall be heard when the court sits at more than one place in the same district. Does this provision oblige the person appealing to go at the very next sitting? I ask that question for this reason: In these matters of procedure we have made it a practice not to modify provisions of that kind without consultation with the law officers of the province affected. Unless the hon. gentleman is absolutely clear that there is a substantial necessity for modifying this provision I would rather not do so without consulting the law officers of the province.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am not asking the minister to do it on the spur of the moment. But there is a provision in the Criminal Code which says that if the magistrate's trial takes place more than fourteen days before the sitting of the higher court, then the person appealing must go to the first sitting of that court, regardless of whether or not it is the nearest or more remote from the place where the magistrate's trial was held. We find it inconvenient in our county because one court sits very much farther away from Sydney Mines than the one which sits at North Sydney. We are always careful that we do not give the notice of appeal to the wrong court. However, I do not ask the minister to change the provision now.

Mr. DOHERTY: I shall take it up with the Attorney General of the province with a view to further action.

On section 15—provision that no prisoner may re-elect later than 30 days before jury trials commence not to apply to county of York, Ont.

Mr. McKENZIE: What special provision is this?

Mr. DOHERTY: The proviso referred to, embodied in the statutes of 1919, was for the purpose of preventing an abuse that had grown up in different parts of the country with regard to cases where the accused had an option whether he should be tried by jury or take his trial before the magistrate or the judge of Sessions in different parts of the country. The abuse had grown up on the part of the accused, especially in Montreal and the province of Quebec, of making options for trial by jury upon being arraigned, and then, when the grand jury found, if it did find, a true bill against him, of withdrawing the option and declaring for trial before the Court of Sessions. The result was a very long delay between the arraignment of the accused and his trial, giving rise to many inconveniences,—the detaining of witnesses, and so on. Last year the law was amended doing away with the privilege, once the option had been made, of withdrawing that option and choosing to be tried before the magistrate or the judge of Sessions. It has been represented, however, that in the county of York the operation of that law has been such as unduly to encumber the Courts of Sessions and to cause other material difficulty in the administration of justice. It was thought proper to meet the request of the law officers of the province and except that particular county from the operation of this section.

Mr. McKENZIE: As I understand it, the law previously provided that the accused could elect to be tried by a jury instead of by a judge and that he could later reverse that decision any say that he would prefer to be tried by the judge without a jury. The minister tells us that under the amendment of last year the prisoner could only elect once for all. Are we now going back to the old law so far as the county of York is concerned?

Mr. DOHERTY: It will withdraw the county of York from the effect of the provision of last year's Act. Here is the proviso. It did not go as far as I suggested, but it limited the time within which a man might make his option. The proviso reads:

If an indictment has been preferred against a prisoner the consent of the prosecuting officer shall be necessary to a re-election, and in such case the sheriff shall take no action on being informed of the prisoner's desire to re-elect unless such consent is given in writing.

This, I think, is the particular proviso:

And provided also that no prisoner shall have a right to re-elect later than thirty days before the day fixed for the next sittings of the court at which trials by jury can be had, unless the prisoner was committed for trial within forty days before the said date, in which event he must re-elect not later than ten days before the day fixed for the next sitting of the court at which trials by jury can be had.

The purpose was to prevent a man waiting until he gets to his court where he was indicted, and finding out whether any true bill would be found, and if there was a true bill found against him, withdrawing his option and re-electing. It is only the last proviso that is being made inapplicable. That is the one that was added last year. So the proviso that prevents a man within thirty days of the sitting of the court where he might be tried by jury altering his election will not in future apply to the county of York, and he will be entitled to alter his election up to the holding of the court. The proviso was made to facilitate the administration of justice, but it appears that in one particular district it did not operate to produce that result. As I have said, in deference to this authoritative expression of opinion and the desire of the Attorney General and the law officers of the province, it did not seem to us there could be any objection to meeting their request.

Mr. McKENZIE: I have no particular objection to limiting one's power to go before a county court judge, because we are not by so doing depriving any one of his right to trial by jury, but I would hesitate to throw any obstacles in the way of a man's electing to be tried by jury at any stage.

Mr. DOHERTY: This imposes no obstacles to his having trial by jury. What we are doing now is giving the prisoner greater liberty, because we are withdrawing the restriction which prevented his re-electing within thirty days of the coming on of the court. The prisoner in York has really a wider liberty than prisoners elsewhere.

Section agreed to.

On section 16—Attorney General of Quebec given power to apply for change of venue as well as accused when no criminal terms in district where accused is.

[Mr. Doherty.]

Mr. McKENZIE: I do not know whether there are any Quebec lawyers here to-night, but in the province from which I come we are very strongly opposed to a change of venue in a criminal court case.

Mr. DOHERTY: I might explain the situation, which is perhaps a special one. I might say that this is being done at the request of the Attorney General of the province of Quebec. There provision is made for the holding of the term of the Court of King's Bench, criminal assizes, in each of the rural districts of the province, and it happens in numerous instances, because we are a very virtuous province, that when the time comes around in a district to hold a criminal term there is perhaps only one criminal, and that may be the case in three or four districts. Under the law as it stands, the Attorney General has no option but to involve himself in all the expense of summoning juries, and all that goes with it, to hold a criminal term at the chief town of that district to try that one man. The same thing might happen in two or three other districts, where, if there was only one prisoner, each man would have a court unto himself. The Attorney General has represented, and I think the good sense of it must appeal to everybody, that under those circumstances he should have power to transfer these cases to some one district where the trial would be held, so that one court might dispose of a reasonable number of cases. It would relieve the province of very heavy expense to no purpose, and it would also relieve the prisoner from being exposed to being kept in gaol for a long time waiting for his term in his own particular district, because naturally under these conditions terms are not held very frequently in such districts. On the one hand, it reduces the expense to the province, and on the other, it affords more speedy opportunity for trial of the accused, which to a man being held in gaol is a very important thing.

Mr. STEIN: Does not the minister think it would be an economy to do away with jury trial in petty cases of theft for a few dollars? I understand that the accused often chooses trial by jury in order to gain time, and with a chance perhaps of seeing witnesses disappear or die and the evidence vanish, and then when the time comes to undergo trial before jury he chooses a trial before a magistrate. I think to do away with trial by jury in petty cases of this kind would save a great deal of money to the province and even to the Dominion.

Mr. DOHERTY: One would want to go slowly in the face of such a proposal as to deprive a British subject of his right to trial by jury. I think, however, my hon. friend is mistaken in saying that people are entitled to trial by jury for thefts of very trifling sums. I do not know just what the amount is—

Mr. PROULX: Ten dollars.

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes. As to the abuse which the hon. member complains of, of a prisoner making option for a trial by jury to gain delay, and then withdrawing that option, by the provision of last year which I have just read, and which has been withdrawn from operation in the county of York—it remains in operation in the province of Quebec—the privilege of re-electing must be exercised at least forty days before the jury trials commence. So the prisoner is confined to a very short period within which he can exercise the privilege of re-election. If he has elected for trial by jury, he must in a limited time alter his choice, or adhere to his choice of trial by jury. I should be glad to consider, when we have lots of time to give to it, whether there ought to be further restrictions on trial by jury, but I should not like to decide hastily this evening to cut off a man's recourse to trial by jury.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am glad to hear from the minister that the great province from which he comes is so free from crime of any kind, but I am shocked to recall the fact that yesterday—I think it was yesterday—he was very severely brought to task for arresting two persons who were trying to escape a sentence of twenyt-five years for some extraordinary crime. I am rather disposed to think now that the men should have been left at large. It was a mistake.

Mr. DOHERTY: They are among the exceptions that prove the rule in our province.

Mr. McKENZIE: There is another thing. Trivial criminal offences are always bailable, and the argument which the minister puts forward that offenders might be awaiting trial for a long time is of course answered by the fact that they can always get bail and be at large until a convenient time comes for trial. There is a provision in the code that if it is represented to a judge or the Attorney General that a man cannot obtain a fair trial in the county in which he has been arrested and is awaiting trial, if it is shown that there is danger that either the Crown or the prisoner will not have a fair show, there can be a change of venue to be named by the judge with the advice of the Attorney General. The code also provides that the judge who changes the venue must provide for taking the witnesses of the defence to the more remote place, if it is far from the place in which he is arrested and it is more expensive to the prisoner to take his witnesses there. There must be provision for his expenses in getting his witnesses to that place. I do not notice anything in the law which the minister is putting into effect to-night to provide for a case of that kind. If a man is taken from the place where he should be tried to some other place he may not be able to pay for his witnesses, if he is a poor man; and if he is to be switched around, there must be provision for his witnesses' fees.

Mr. DOHERTY: My hon. friend will observe that the sections empowers the court to order a change of venue " in the manner hereinbefore provided," and the manner "hereinbefore provided" for changing the venue is that the order shall be made upon such conditions as to the payment of any additional expenses as the court or judge thinks proper to prescribe. So that in this case where it is decided "by competent authority" that a change is desirable, the accused will have the same protection which he has in the case where the change of venue results from apprehension that there will not be a fair trail in the district in which the accused is arrested.

Mr. McKENZIE: I have a strong objection to any change of venue except for certain reasons. A man is living in some town in the province of Quebec, say, where he has been a carpenter, or blacksmith, or merchant. He has been there for thirty years and every one knows him. Possibly he is well and favourably known. Now, the doctrine of trial by jury is that the criminal will always get the benefit of his reputation, whatever it may be. He may have sinned against the law and fallen short in many ways. But the jury, who know him, notwithstanding any hard-and-fast evidence that may be brought against him, cannot help giving him the benefit of his life's reputation. If you take him away from that place where he was brought up, where he has been a merchant perhaps for twenty or thirty years, and put him into a court in a strange part of the province, there is nothing before the jury except the cold facts which are presented in the case, and you are depriving that man of the benefit of the acquaintances which he may have formed during his lifetime and the good effect he may have created in the community in which he has lived. For that reason, I have always been strongly in favour of the principle of a man being tried in the place in which he has lived, where he is known, and where he is able to obtain the benefit of his reputation, whatever it may be. On the other hand, of course, he may have been a bad man and his reputation in the community might be against him. If that is the case, it is only proper that he should be tried by men who are acquainted with his general reputation. I do not want to press the point further, but I cannot allow this Bill to pass without putting on record my view; I am dead against a change of venue in criminal cases unless it is absolutely necessary for two reasons, first, that the Crown cannot obtain a fair show, and second, that there is such a prejudice against the accused that justice will not likely be done to him.

Section agreed to.

On section 17—appeal to Supreme Court of Canada where judgment conflicts with the judgment of any other Court of Appeal:

Mr. McKENZIE: What does that mean?

Mr. DOHERTY: It has happened that the courts of Appeal of two provinces have pronounced, in each case unanimously, upon the same question arising under the criminal code, in absolutely diametrically contrary senses, and inasmuch as there is no appeal in criminal cases where the judgment of the Court of Appeal is unanimous —there is no appeal to the Supreme Court —there is no method of getting that jurisprudence settled. Now, the purpose of this section is to make it possible to get the jurisprudence settled, and I think the hon. member will realize that it is a highly undesirable condition, if we cannot find a remedy for it, where jurisprudence in courts applying one and the same law of Dominion-wide application, shall be left to differ in different provinces. I may say we have had representations from the judges of the different courts in the different provinces pointing out this anomalous condition of affairs. The remedy that is given provides that in such case hereafter the right of appeal is to the Supreme Court either on the part of the Attorney General or the accused, the purpose being to secure a determination which will settle the jurisprudence in the same sense for the whole of Canada in cases where it happens that courts of final jurisdiction, as the law now stands come to different conclusions upon the same question and under the same law.

Mr. FIELDING: Does the clause refer to the Attorney General of the Dominion or of the province?

Mr. DOHERTY: The Attorney General of the province where the question arises.

Mr. FIELDING: There is nothing to indicate that.

Mr. DOHERTY: Let me point it out.

Mr. FIELDING: Do not point it out; it is all right; let it go.

Mr. DOHERTY: I would point it out.

Mr. FIELDING: I am quite content if the hon. gentleman is satisfied.

Mr. DOHERTY: It will only take a few moments. The parties to the suit are the Attorney General of the province on the one side and the accused on the other. I have no objection to adding a few words to make it clear, but I would understand it to be the Attorney General of the province because it is the Attorney General who is a party to the prosecution.

Mr. FIELDING: I do not ask that it be changed. I will be content with calling my hon. friend's attention to it.

Mr. PROULX: Leave must be asked for in every case?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes, because the Supreme Court must be satisfied that it is a case where there is a conflict.

Mr. McKENZIE: I think that my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) has raised a reasonable point. It means the Attorney General of the province but it should be made clear because we have nine provinces.

Mr. DOHERTY: We have a saying in our province that "Many things go without saying, but they none the less go better when said." I beg to move that section 19 be amended by inserting after the words "Attorney General," in the 32nd line, the words "of the province."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. FIELDING: Would the minister say "of any other court of appeal." He means the court of appeal in any other province?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes.

Mr. FIELDING: That is not stated.

Mr. DOHERTY: As it happens, there is only one Court of Appeal in each province, and it is known as the Court of Appeal. I think the wording should stay as it is. It does not necessarily mean that the court must be in another province, because if it happened that there were two Courts of Appeal in one province the appeal provided for in this clause could be taken.

Mr. FIELDING: Are there such?

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not know of any.

Mr. McKENZIE: Unless they exist in Quebec there are no provinces with two Courts of Appeal.

Mr. DOHERTY: Then "any other Court of Appeal" must necessarily mean a Court of Appeal in some other province. It seems to me that it is better as it is.

Mr. McKENZIE: I think it is better as it is.

Bill reported and amendments concurred in.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: When shall the said Bill be read a third time?

Mr. DOHERTY: Now.

Mr. PARENT: No.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Does the House give its unanimous consent that the Bill be now read a third time?

Mr. PARENT: If it must have the consent of the House, I would say, no.

Mr. DOHERTY: I offer my sincere and warm congratulations to the hon. gentleman upon the exercise of his great power.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Next sitting of the House.

On the motion of Rt. Hon. Mr. Doherty the House adjourned at 12.35 a.m., Friday.

PAPERS TABLED.

Copy of Order in Council dated December 18, 1919, regarding the distribution to the provinces of the sum of $200,000 which was placed at the disposal of the Department of Health—Hon. Mr. Rowell.

Report of the Printing Bureau in French. —Hon. Mr. Sifton.

QUEBEC AND SAGUENAY RAILWAY—ST. IRENEE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. P. F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, I beg to draw the attention of the Government, and particularly of the Minister of Railways and Canals, to a fact which I discovered the other day when I happened to be in my county. I hold in my hand the time table of the Quebec and Saguenay Railway, and I find at page 2 a certain reference to all the special summer resorts along the line of that railway. All of these stations are mentioned except St. Irénée, and I am surprised at this omission.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The statement which the hon. member is making is not of such character as ought properly to be brought to the attention of the Government on the Orders of the Day. Only matters of general application, which are of country-wide interest and of urgent importance, can be brought to the notice of the Government on the Orders of the Day, and the hon. member is therefore not in order at the present moment.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I bow to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, but I beg to submit that the matter is one of the utmost urgency by reason of the fact that the time table has already been printed and has been distributed all over the country.

Mr. SPEAKER: It will serve the purpose of the hon. member equally well if he will communicate with the Minister of Railways.

WORK ON LACHINE CANAL.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. A. LEDUC (Westmount-St. Henry): I should like to know from the Minister of Public Works whether it is the intention of his department to continue the work already started on the Lachine canal in connection with the syphons that convey the water from the little river St. Pierre. This work has already been commenced and I should be glad if the minister would say whether he intends to proceed with it this summer. Furthermore, I would ask if the Government will pay part of the damages caused by the flood last spring in my constituency.

Mr. SPEAKER: Questions of this character should be submitted when the Estimates of the department are under consideration. They are not of sufficient general public importance to warrant their being raised on the Orders of the Day. However important they may be to those directly concerned, they are of purely local application.

Rt. Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): In the meantime, Mr. Speaker, I shall direct the attention of the minister to what my hon. friend has stated.

TORONTO POSTAL EMPLOYEES.

THREATENED STRIKE OF LETTER CARRIERS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. CHARLES SHEARD (South Toronto): I desire to ask whether the Government has received any communication in regard to a threatened strike amongst the postal clerks and letter carriers in the city of Toronto and other places and, if so what answer they have made or intend to make in reply.

Mr. McMASTER: This is purely local.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is a strike in Toronto.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Purely local.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Write to the Post Office Department.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question submitted by the hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Sheard) has general application to letter carriers throughout the country.

Mr. BUREAU: Toronto is just a village.

Hon. N. W. ROWELL (President of the Privy Council): While neither the Post Office Department nor the Government has recently received any direct communication from the letter carriers themselves in reference to the matter, communications have been received from other bodies in the city of Toronto. So far as one can judge from those communications and from the newspaper despatches, the complaints appear to be based on three grounds: First, there is some complaint about the present Bill, and I am at a loss to understand what it can be, because the Bill which was passed through this House and which went to the Senate is wholly in the interests of the Civil Service employees and carries a classification which will increase salaries, dating back to the 1st of April, 1919, instead of from the 1st of April, 1920. If there is any objection to that Bill and the employees do not wish it, some millions of money would be saved to the country if the measure were not put through. The second complaint is that the Government changed the classification. The Government has not of its own motion made any change whatever in the classification pertaining to the postal service. In so far as there have been any changes, they have been due to appeals made by certain classes of the postal employees against the classification as approved by Parliament. These appeals have been heard by the Board of Hearing, upon which the civil servants are themselves represented, and among their representatives is one of the trusted employees of the Post Office Department. These appeals have been heard by the Board of Hearing and subsequently passed upon by the Civil Service Commission, and the Government has in every case approved the decision arrived at. So that if there have been any changes they have been made on the initiative of the postal employees themselves and have been recommended by the Board of Hearing, on which, as I say, the civil servants are represented. The third complaint seems to be in reference to the compensation of letter carriers. They seem to think that there should be some better compensation than that which is now provided, and I purpose giving to the House a statement of what the letter carriers will receive this year on the basis of the Bill which passed through Parliament the other day. Under the old classification the range of salaries for letter carriers ran from $626 to $939, plus allowance in respect of clothing and transportation. The new classification is $780 to 1,260, plus bonus, because the classification itself recommends that the bonus should be added. There is also allowance for clothing and transportation. Under the new classification any letter carrier who was at the maximum of his class on the 1st April, 1919, will this year receive the following pay and allowance: If he is the head of a household he will receive salary and bonus, $1,560 plus allowance, covering clothing, boots and transprotation. So that the House may appreciate what that means I will point out that each letter carrier receives a new serge suit every year, that is coat and trousers; a pair of cloth trousers every year, a cloth coat every second year, a new overcoat every second year, and two pairs of boots every year.

Mr. BUREAU: Do the boots he gets cost nine dollars a pair?

Mr. ROWELL: No, $8 a pair. And he receives many other articles, such as a cloth cap every second year, a felt hat every second year, a fur cap every four years, etc. He has street car transportation to and from work and at his work. These allowances for clothing and transportation to and from work constitute a substantial addition to his salary, which estimated at what they would cost him a day if he had to buy them himself would, I understand, increase his salary by over $100 per year, some would say at least $150.

If a single man he will receive $1,322 salary and bonus plus the same allowance in respect of clothing, boots and transportation.

If the letter carrier has been in receipt of the maximum under the old classification for five years, and is the head of a household, his salary will be $1,656, plus allowance for clothing, boots and transportation, which considering such allowances would make his pay over 80 cents per hour's work If a single man, $1,422 plus allowance for clothing, boots and transportation.

If under the new classification he was at the minimum of his class on the first of April, 1919, and if he is the head of a household, he will receive $1,320 in salary and bonus plus allowance for clothing, boots and transportation. If a single man he will get $1,152 plus allowance for clothing, boots and transportation. These letter carriers. have (1) a forty-four-hour week (2) permanency of employment; (3) sick leave with pay and (4) three weeks holidays each year without loss of pay.

Mr. BUREAU: May I ask the hon. the President of the Privy Council if this is merely giving an answer to the question asked by the hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Sheard)?

Mr. ROWELL: It is and my hon. friend will see the relevancy of it in a minute.

Mr. BUREAU: Have we to wait as long as this to see the relevancy of it?

Mr. SPEAKER: I should point out to the House that when a question is submitted to the Government the practice has always been that the Government should have latitude in giving a reply.

Mr. LAPOINTE: In this case it is longitude.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must say that the character of the reply that is being made by the President of the Privy Council is in the nature of making out a case and it is questionable whether, if that practice were carried out to any wide extent, we would be able to proceed with the business of the House expeditiously so much time would be taken up with the answers of ministers of the Crown. But I do not feel that I would be justified in curbing the minister in making his reply in view of the practice already alluded to.

Mr. FIELDING: Has the hon. gentleman permission to occupy so much of the time of the House at this stage?

Mr. ROWELL: Without having the particulars before it the House would not be able to appreciate the statement of the policy of the Government. I will conclude by stating the policy of the Government in reference to the matter.

Mr. FIELDING: The Government's policy can be declared in some other form than in reply to a question on the Orders of the Day.

Mr. ROWELL: This is a statement of what the Government intends to do in connection with the proposed strike. The conclusion of the Government based upon reports from the Civil Service Commission and the Labour Department is that, having regard to the character of the work and the conditions of employment, the letter carriers are paid at a higher rate than any others doing a similar character of work under similar conditions in this country and if, in view of this fact, the letter carriers go on strike, their action will be treated as resignation of their positions, their places will be filled, and they will not be reinstated.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

THE FRENCH TREATY.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve): I would like to ask the right hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) if he is aware that the French Treaty is practically denounced and will terminate the 16th of this month. Is he aware that the French Government is ready to extend the provisions of the Treaty until the revision of the tariff has taken place?

Rt. Hon. SIR GEORGE FOSTER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I am aware that notice has been given for the termination of the Treaty. The term of this notice expires on the 19th of this month, and the Treaty provisions will then become null and void.

An hon. MEMBER: By whom was the notice given?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Given by the Canadian Government in respect of the three months' notice. The House should know that the French Government gave notice of the denunciation of the Treaty itself some fifteen months ago. After that an arrangement was made at the instance of the Canadian Government by which the Treaty should go on temporarily subject to three months' notice by either party to the arrangement. In view of the possible denunciation of the Treaty on three months' notice, it was not possible to carry on business because more time is required in the usual making of contracts and arrangements for the interchange of produce between the two countries. In view of the contemplated tariff legislation of this Parliament the Canadian Government decided to give notice of termination which, as I have said, will expire on the 19th of this month. The French Government has been informed that the Canadian Government is ready to take up negotiations at any time circumstances are opportune therefor.

IMMIGRATION ACT AMENDMENT—REJECTION OF BILL BY SENATE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): May I ask whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce legislation in this House for the purpose of repealing the most drastic amendments to the Immigration Act which were made last session during the time of the Winnipeg strike?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend knows that a Bill was introduced into the Senate which has not met with very good fortune there, I believe. Is that the legislation to which my hon. friend refers?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am under the impression that where a Bill has been dealt with in Parliament and disposed of by the determination of Parliament, it is not competent under the Rules, to raise the question again during the same session.

BOARD OF COMMERCE.

Mr. I. E. PEDLOW (South Renfrew): I would like to ask the right hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) a question. I notice the report laid on the table of the House by the Board of Commerce is in some respects a fifty-fifty report, rather a majority and a minority report. One section of the report suggests the advisability of placing in the report the correspondence that ensued between the chairman of the commission and the Minister of Trade and Commerce. That has not been included in the report. I want to ask the minister if he has, in view of the report laid on the table of the House, decided to place that correspondence before the House. I would like to ask also if it is the intention of the Government, in view of the ultimatum delivered by one of the commissioners, to allow the Board of Commerce to cease functioning from the present time onward.

Rt. Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): In respect to the recommendation contained in the report as to legislation dealing with the abolition of control by the Civil Service Commission, there has not been a sufficient opportunity since the report was received to give full consideration to what is suggested. When a conclusion is reached on this question it will of course be announced. As to the other matter which arose during my absence, my right hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) will reply to the hon. gentleman's question.

Rt. Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER: In so far as the correspondence is concerned, the really important correspondence has been laid on the table of the House. There is other correspondence which is more or less subsidiary—a good deal of it much less subsidiary—which is now under consideration as to what portion of it, if any, will be brought down.

LIST OF GRAND TRUNK SHAREHOLDERS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT (Chambly-Vercheres): Might I inquire from the Government if they have completely abandoned the idea of laying on the Table the list of the Grand Trunk shareholders so ordered by the House about eight months ago, and promised about eight times since, which order has never been complied with?

Mr. J. D. REID (Minister of Railways): I have the list of the Canadian shareholders, but the hon. member, I think, wants the list of the shareholders on the other side. I understand it would take seven or eight months—some months at least—to make the list in accordance with the order of the House, so that it will be a long time before the list will be ready to submit.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: If I remember correctly the nature of the order it was for the list of the shareholders on the books of the company on the 3rd October last. Surely it would not take seven or eight months to copy that list; a typist would copy it within five hours. Eight months have elapsed since this list was ordered.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The question of the hon. member is perfectly proper but he may not make an argument now as to why the order ought to be complied with. He can only do that at another stage of the proceedings of the House.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I bow to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, but I am not trying to make an argument, I am simply answering the Minister of Railways.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is not in order in doing that.

BOARD OF COMMERCE—CORRESPONDENCE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. R. L. RICHARDSON: I intended to make somewhat the same sort of interrogation with regard to the Board of Commerce as my hon. friend the member for Renfrew (Mr. Pedlow). I was going to urge the presentation of the correspondence that is being withheld in order to set at rest some very disturbing rumours with regard to the reasons why—

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Question.

Mr. RICHARDSON:—Judge Robson retired from the board.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT ACT—THIRD READING.

DISCUSSION RE RACE TRACK BETTING.

On motion of the Rt. Hon. C. J. Doherty (Minister of Justice) for the third reading of Bill No. 137, to amend the Criminal Code.

Hon. T. W. CROTHERS (West Elgin): Before this Bill receives its third reading I would like to say one or two words respecting it. I was not present last night, or rather early this morning, when the measure was read a second time, and I have a few observations to make with regard to it although I realize that a large number of members—probably the large majority—will not share my views I think that generally speaking gambling in any form is regarded as a serious evil; and I want to protest—though I may have no one to support me—against this Parliament endorsing any form of gambling. I cannot for the life of me understand why gambling a few miles out from the city of Ottawa should be legalized by Parliament and regarded as highly respectable while gambling on Sparks street is pronounced illegal and disreputable.

Mr. J. H. BURNHAM: Will the hon. member please define gambling?

Mr. CROTHERS: Oh, it is not necessary to define gambling. My hon. friend knows what gambling is.

Mr. BUREAU: That is a bad insinuation.

Mr. CROTHERS: Everybody knows that the provisions of this Bill, No. 137, recognize and endorse a form of gambling. I am not objecting to individuals, if they so desire, indulging in betting—it would be impracticable to attempt to stop it, and I would not make any such attempt. I do not claim to be specially qualified to advocate "uplifting." But I understand that every State in the United States has made this species of gambling illegal, with the exception of two—Kentucky and one other. Michigan has prohibited it entirely; and those who desire to take part in this form of gambling instead of doing so in that State cross from Detroit to Windsor and give us the benefit of their presence there during a race meet. I simply want to protest against this Parliament recognizing and endorsing what is admitted by everybody to be a great evil. The only reason I have ever heard advanced why it should be encouraged is for the production of thoroughbred horses in Canada.

Mr. BUREAU: Hear, hear, that is all right.

Mr. CROTHERS: Well, I have read the opinions of men who are experts in that line who deny that there is anything in this contention whatever. How is it that draft horses are produced in this country at a profit? Because there is a demand for them. And if there be any demand for roadsters in this country, breeders of thoroughbreds will find a market just as do the breeders of draft horses. I merely want to express my protest against this Parliament endorsing, recognizing, and legalizing this special form of gambling.

Mr. A. R. McMASTER (Brome): I would not like the member who has just taken his seat to feel that in the views which he has expressed he is alone in this House. I believe in fair play to all.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Freedom.

Mr. McMASTER: Occasionally when I have been in the police court—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McMASTER: —in a professional capacity, which, Mr. Speaker, has not been very often, I have seen a large number of very hard looking Orientals brought before the court because they have played fan-tan.

An hon. MEMBER: What is that?

Mr. McMASTER: Fan-tan is a game of chance, I understand. I am not an adept in it myself but it is a gambling game.

Mr. BUREAU: What about auction whist?

An hon. MEMBER: How does it work?

Mr. McMASTER: I cannot explain that myself, because I am not conversant with the details of the game; I will leave it to other members to fill in the details. I do not wish to detain the House unduly but I would say this: For Parliament to enact legislation which means that when certain classes of the community gamble they are drawn befor the court and fined while other members of the community may enjoy the benefits of fresh air and of gambling at the same time, is not British, is not Canadian, is not fair, and it should not be done.

Now, is it correct that the breeding of fine horses is only possible in conjunction with gambling? I have always understood that the stock-raising business was a respectable one—I believe there are members of this House who agree thoroughly with me in that, and I do not think the success of that business depends on gambling. If horse-racing requires to have gambling as a concomitant we should be able to get on without it. But I do not say that because you eliminate gambling you of necessity do away with horse racing. There are some other people in Canada who are prepared to race their horses for the fun of the thing.

Mr. WHITE (Victoria): Did you ever own a race-horse?

Mr. McMASTER: I never owned a race-horse, and judging by the class of people whom I see coming from race meetings, I have no desire to own race-horses, nor to associate with those people.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McMASTER: My hon. friends say "Oh, oh." Do they imply by that tone of voice that they agree with me? I say that race tracks usually draw the riff-raff and undesirable element of our own population and of outsiders.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Not at all.

[Mr. McMaster.]

Mr. McMASTER: Horse race tracks are also frequented by a very desirable class of people no doubt. I conclude my remarks by saying that to make a criminal offence of certain types of gambling, and to recognize other types of gambling, is not fair and such discrimination should not be continued. I wish to raise my feeble voice in support of the words uttered by the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Crothers).

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Is my hon. friend of the opinion that speculation on margin on the stock exchange is gambling?

Mr. McMASTER: Yes, decidedly so, and a very evil form of gambling. In fact, in such gambling you do not have the benefit of the fresh air and the pleasure of seeing the horses run, and as a rule you lose your money in larger sums and with greater certainty.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): When I opened my morning paper to-day I noticed with great pleasure that the right hon. the Prime Minister, when receiving a certain deputation yesterday, said that the Government had gone as far as they could along these lines. While I endorse the remarks of my two hon. friends in regard to discrimination, I cannot do so from the lofty moral altitude which they seem to occupy. Looking at this matter philosophically, I doubt very much whether it is possible to describe in such drastic terms an evil which is so widespread in human nature. A boy the moment he can own a marble risks it against another boy's marble, and he is a gambler to that extent. If he is a better shot, he wins a marble from the other boy. There is a certain element of skill in the contest but no general good accrues to the community. I am told that the society ladies of this capital and of London play a game called auction bridge for high stakes. I never was present on such occasions and do not know anything about it from personal knowledge, any more than I know anything of the game, but I am told such things go on. Perhaps there are some hon. members here who can either contradict or confirm this information. The other day on Epsom Downs—where I am sorry to say I have been—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): I am glad to say I have been—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): —His Majesty the King accompanied by the Queen and fifty or sixty others went to see the Derby, and I have no doubt, if I were in His Majesty's secrets, that he had a little flutter on the race. But, Sir, I come nearer home. I have not the least doubt that many of the elders who waited upon the Prime Minister yesterday are interested in real estate. I know that in the little town nearest my farm all the leading men in the churches are real estate agents, and I have been long enough in Canada to know that something a good deal like gambling goes on in real estate offices. Then there are places called "stock exchanges" and "wheat pits,"—gambling goes on there too.

Now, from the moral point of view I want to say to my hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) that the people who make money in any of these spheres of activity might just as reasonably be described as "riff-raff" as the somewhat tough but nevertheless very often human beings who frequent race tracks; and with due deference to our common human nature—which in the case of any individual among us has its faults, however well we may succeed in hiding them—I think it would be well for us not to use such strong language, and to take the method of the Creator by going slowly in our attempts to improve human beings according to our narrow outlook. After all the world is inhabited by a large number of different people. I am not now playing the role of a preacher,—

Mr. LAPOINTE: Quite the opposite.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): I am as a legislator talking of what it is possible for Governments and Parliaments to do; and the distinction between Governments and Parliaments and preachers is, that while preachers have the high and unapproachable role of improving human beings according to their highest ideals which is their undoubted province and duty, Governments and Parliaments have to do with all classes and conditions of men, and have to harmonize one portion of society with the other. They have perhaps the much more difficult task, and therefore they ought to go cautiously in the methods they pursue for the improvement of society. That is my view upon this question. I rose, however, merely for the purpose of endorsing what I think is the sound view, that we should not discriminate. I do not know that it will impress my hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty), but I am sure he would shrink at the idea of having to regulate rich companies or rich individuals, or even boys playing marbles, although he is found in the apparently congenial sphere of activity of curbing the old-fashioned sport of horse-racing. I think it would be just as well to leave that sport alone.

Mr. NICHOLSON (Algoma): I desire to put myself on record as favouring the position taken by the hon. members for West Elgin (Mr. Crothers) and Brome (Mr. McMaster). I hold that it is out of harmony for this Parliament to enact legislation endorsing gambling in any form. If we must endorse it let us treat all gamblers alike, let us not punish one man and allow the other to go free. I am not going to follow the argument of my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) any further than to say that when he classes boys shooting marbles with men betting on horse racing he is going a long distance to find an argument. Boys throwing marbles are engaging in a contest of skill, be it ever so primitive, just the same as two men shooting at a target. But in betting on a horse race we are doing practically the same as if we sat down to a game of poker or fan-tan. I desire to register my protest, in the first place, against this Parliament endorsing gambling; and in the second place, against any discrimination if gambling is to be endorsed at all.

Mr. McGIBBON (Muskoka): I would like to endorse the sentiments of the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark). On many occasions I have in this House opposed restricting the liberties and the privileges of the people, and I was glad to read in this morning's paper that the Prime Minister had had the courage to tell a deputation which waited upon him yesterday that he and his Government were not going to pass any further legislation restricting race track betting. I think our people in all classes of society are quite capable of looking after their own morals. Whether you describe them as high or low, or in the words of the hon. member for Brome describe them as "the riff-raff of the country" — which expression I do not agree with—I think they are entitled to exercise their liberties as British subjects in this country—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Canadians.

Mr. McGIBBON (Muskoka)—and they are entitled to spend their money in the way that gives them most pleasure. I am opposed to any further restrictions being placed upon the people of this country.

Mr. BUREAU: Hear, hear.

Mr. McGIBBON (Muskoka): I think they are intelligent enough and honest enough to conduct themselves as good free British citizens. If they do that, I think this House and the country should not ask anything further.

Mr. EDMOND PROULX (Prescott): Mr. Speaker, Parliament settled about twelve years ago that race track gambling should not be done away with in this country. For some years afterwards there was quite an abuse of gambling at certain race tracks in this country, especially in the province of Ontario. Several of the states on the other side of the line prohibited gambling at race tracks, and in consequence these American race track operators came over to Canada and established race tracks at Fort Erie, Windsor, and other places. These were not genuine race tracks, but simply tracks for making money for the operators. I believe this legislation will have the effect of curbing this evil, and will tend to make racing a legitimate sport instead of a mere money-making venture. I fully endorse the principle of this Bill. If you are not going to have pari-mutuels, but are going to allow people full liberty to bet, the gambling evil will continue and increase, because so long as New York, Michigan, and other states prohibit race track gambling, the gamblers from the United States will come over to Canada. I think the House should adopt this Bill. The consensus of opinion in this country seems to be against doing away with racing altogether. Horse breeders maintain that it is necessary for the breeding of thoroughbred horses. I do not know whether they are right or not. That was a much-disputed point when the question was raised in this House twelve years ago. I think my hon. friend from South Ontario (Mr. Smith) would be in favour of racing, and would be of opinion that it improves the breed of horses. He knows more about it than I do; I am not a horse breeder myself. I condemn the race track gambling evil, and I will do whatever is in my power to curb it, and as I think this Bill will have the effect of curbing it, I shall support it.

Mr. F. S. SCOTT (South Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I think this is a move in the right direction. The hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Crothers) has stated that in the United States the great majority of the states have prohibited race track gambling, and I believe that statement is correct. Nevertheless, it is a fact that gambling at race tracks goes on to a very large extent in practically all the states of the Union. The fact is that gambling at race tracks in the United States is tolerated. An effort is made by this legislation to bring race track gambling under some sort of control, and from what we have seen in the United States I believe that is a move in the right direction. It is perfectly true that gambling at race tracks in the state of Michigan, for instance, has been stopped, but, nevertheless it is a fact that gambling at race tracks in that state is carried on week after week, and it seems to me that legislation along the lines proposed by this Bill is what we need in this Dominion in order to put the business on a proper basis.

While I do not bet at races myself, I confess that there is no sport I enjoy so thoroughly as a race meet, both running and trotting meets. I think it is the finest sport in the world, and should be encouraged in every country. I cannot agree with some speakers that it is a sin or something very wrong to place a bet on a horse race.

Mr. BUREAU: A virtuous sin.

Mr. SCOTT: An owner who enters his horse for a race pays his entry fee, say five per cent. If he wins the purse, he receives fifty per cent of the purse money. In other words, he bets one to ten that his horse is going to win. Now it is a well-known fact that the men who engage in horse racing, even if they are rich, cannot maintain stables on the purses that are given, and I cannot see anything wrong in the owner placing an additional bet through the machines or the bookmakers and in that way increasing his winnings. I should like to emphasize that point. I do not see any difference between a man paying an entry fee to win a purse and the man who places a bet on an entry which he may have. The great criticism that has been made of this sport is due to the abuses that have crept into the conducting of it, and I think that to regulate this sport, as this legislation proposes to regulate it, is a step in the right direction. It may be that the percentages that have been struck are not quite right, but after we have had experience of them we can govern ourselves accordingly. I cannot but believe that if in this country, just as in Great Britain, we have horse racing cleanly conducted, it will work to the advantage and betterment of our people. I am strongly of the opinion that this legislation is a move in the right direction.

Mr. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I have very little sympathy with those who wax indignant about restrictions of their personal liberty I think we have heard too much along that line in this House. We are here as representatives of the people to make laws for this country, and laws are restrictions. You would think to hear some people talk that we ought to have everything wide open and let everybody do as he sees fit, regardless of whether it is in his own interest or in the public interest to do so. No one enjoys watching a horse race more than I do. I have not a word to say against the racing of horses, but I do say that horse racing has been carried on in the province of Ontario, at all events, to an extent which has been detrimental to the general welfare of the people of the province. Just so soon as the state of Michigan and the other states on the other side of the line stopped race track gambling, the operators come over into the county of Essex and established race tracks there, and it was not very long before it became evident that those who were conducting the sport were making a mint of money out of it. Then restrictions were imposed as to the length of time racing could be conducted on one track continuously. The operators got over that difficulty by arranging for another track. They now have two or three tracks at Windsor and they carry on race meets there week after week, and according to the representations which have been made, and which cannot be disputed, the operators of these race meets take in millions and millions of dollars. I believe it does any person good to take a holiday once in a while, but it is a different thing to spend week after week at race meets. I maintain that no man should have personal liberty to the extent of being allowed to spend three or four weeks or a month and a half of his time in following up racing in that way.

It is a waste of his time, and he has no right to be allowed to waste his time in that way. What are we doing by this Bill? This Bill says, in effect, to the promoters of or those who own and operate a race track: It is all right for you to carry on your racing, but you have been taking too much of the money for yourselves; we have no objection to your carrying on betting operations, but we think you should not take any more than 7 per cent if the amount of the stake is under $20,000, and if the people who are patronizing the race course put up $30,000, you should not take any more than 6 per cent. That is to say, in the past a person who has ventured a bet on a race has been up against this, that those who are running the race track have been taking too large a percentage of the money. This Parliament steps in and says: We do not think that is fair, and we shall arrange this matter so that a person who makes a bet will get a larger percentage of the money staked on a race. That can mean only one thing; it means simply that this Parliament is saying to the general public: We believe this is a good thing for you to have; we think the promoters have been taking too much money to themselves, and we are going to arrange the matter by legislation, so that you will have a better chance of winning on the money you put up. That is encouraging more people to bet money. Figures have in the past been placed before us showing that millions of dollars have been made by persons conducting these race tracks in Ontario, and those millions have come out of the pockets of the people. I know you cannot stop human beings from taking a chance, because that is inherent in every person from childhood on through life. But when we place ourselves on record, as we are doing in this Bill, as legitimatising gambling, as saying that we believe that gambling at race tracks is a proper thing, but that we think the percentage allowed to the promoters of race tracks should be cut down and the amount allowed to the man who puts up the bet increased, we are taking a course which I do not believe is a proper one for us to take.

It has been said that race track gambling is necessary in order to encourage the breeding of horses of a certain class in this country. I do not believe that is an argument that has any ground whatever. That argument is put forward by men who are interested in racing for one reason only, namely, to make easy money and to make it in large quantities at these race meets.

I am opposed to recognition by this Parliament of the principle of legitimatising gambling at race tracks, because I think as they have been conducted for the length of time they have been allowed to be carried on in this country in the past, they have had a very bad effect on the general public of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. JACQUES BUREAU (Three Rivers and St. Maurice): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) prefaced his remarks by saying that he had no use for men who remarked that we were putting too many restrictions on people through legislation, etc. If we were to have in Canada or anywhere else only those things and those men for whom my hon. friend has any use, there would be ample room for them to move around, because there would be practically no one left. From his remarks, he has apparently use for very few things, and I cannot agree with him as regards those things for which he has use.

Be that as it may, there are two classes of men in this country. First, there are men who love sport, who want their liberty and to be able to use their time three days a week or, to use the words of my hon. friend, to spend their time as they see fit for a week or two weeks. I do not see why we should put any limitations on the way a man may spend his time if he does not spend it in committting crimes, illegalities or nuisances. Who is going to prevent me from going to a club in the Laurentian mountains and sitting there—although the apparent purpose is fishing—and smoking for two or three weeks if I choose to do so, as I would be doing a perfectly legitimate thing?

Mr. PROULX: The hon. member would not be doing any good for the country.

Mr. BUREAU: I might be doing just as much good as the hon. member for Prescott, if he was sitting here going full speed.

Mr. BELAND: I think my hon. friend would be doing a good thing for the country by taking a rest, because then he would be fresher for next session.

Mr. BUREAU: The newspapers have made an announcement that compels me to disclaim any freshness in any way you may interpret the meaning of that word. There are people who live in this country who claim the right to enjoy liberties as long as they are not committing crimes, nuisances or illegalities. Then there are others who think, by preventing men from following their inclinations and tastes, they are doing good for the country. I say: No. The hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) says that he enjoys a race. Very few men do not enjoy a race, but how are you going to have a race if you do not have some inducement to people to breed horses and bring them there? The hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster), following the argument of the hon. member for Frontenac, says that he does not believe in racing as an inducement to improve the breed of horses. It is the only inducement. Why do we have exhibitions, or fairs, as we call them, in every county. To get all the breeders together. Those breeders compare notes and endeavour to improve the breed. Those fairs, bring around people who play with three shells—I do not know what the game is— the same as people do on race tracks. Nevertheless, you see at these fairs the best men from the farming communities.

Mr. McMASTER: Not "rigging the thimble."

Mr. BUREAU: People get into a corner and "run the thimble" or the roulette wheel. A fair is a place where everybody in the community will go in order to get some fresh air, and at the same time to educate themselves and, perhaps, have a little fun. They are entitled to that. If I were to take any exception to this law, I would say that it is too restrictive, and I am not ashamed to say that. At race tracks you meet as good people as you will come across, perhaps not in the police court, but in the Superior Court or in the court of King's Bench. I have never degraded nor contaminated myself by attending a good horse race; and if I lost a little money before I went home, I did not worry over that and I do not think anybody suffered on account of it. As regards the man who cannnot afford to bet, who is scandalised at the idea of going to a race track, let him stay at home. That is an easy way for him to get out of the difficulty, but why should he deprive his neighbour from a sport which I consider is just as legitimate as boxing, golfing, hockey, baseball or lacrosse?

Mr. McMASTER: It is cruelty to animals.

Mr. BUREAU: Those animals are trained to endure things that other horses are not trained to do. I may be told that it is cruelty to a man to have him box two or three rounds. I contend that that makes him more limber; it makes him a better man, a better citizen. There is an old latin saying: "Mens sana in corpore sano" —"A sound mind in a sound body." These sports contribute towards making sound bodies and sound minds. That is my view on the question.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I think it requires only a short time to express one's opinion on this subject. I do not purpose following the discussion which, it seems to me, has in many cases been very wide of the mark. The question is this—are we to decide that a certain thing at one time and under certain circumstances is illegal and an exactly similar thing under other circumstances is all right. I am not going to discuss the question of restriction further than to repeat what the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) said, namely, that all laws are restrictions. That does not mean that you have to restrict a man wherever he goes, or that all restrictions are good or all bad. You must use discrimination in the restrictions you put upon people. I fail to see how we can consistently say that certain things are legal and should not be punished by fine or imprisonment if they are done in a certain place but must be punished if done in another place; that it is wrong and sinful, and therefore must be punished by fine or imprisonment for people to put up stakes in a contest of skill and endurance of persons, but that when it comes to a question of skill and endurance of animals, that is perfectly legal. Let us be consistent; let us either allow the holding of stakes and depositing of money in all cases of this kind, or make it illegal in all cases. We are as inconsistent as it is possible for any people to be if we are to allow this in certain things and not in others.

3 p.m.

I have not heard any good argument raised in support of the contention that gambling, if you like to use that term, or the holding of bets, which is practically what we are aiming at here, is necessary at race tracks in order to encourage the breeding of horses. We are told by one gentleman that it is necessary to allow the owners and breeders of horses to bet on a horse race in order that they may make some money. Does the man who bets on a horse race always win?

No less an authority than Sir John A. Macdonald said that there was nothing more uncertain than horse-racing and elections. This question of betting, Mr. Chairman, is exceedingly uncertain and a man who engages in it is as likely to lose as to gain. The chances are ten to one that he will lose more than he gains; and I do not see how are you going to encourage horse-racing and the breeding of horses by this measure. It seems to me that if there is any profit in this business it should be put in the way of those who breed horses. They should hold the stakes. If we are going to pass this legislation, let us be reasonable and confine the holding of stakes to the men who are breeding horses. If you do that you will encourage horse-breeding, but not otherwise. As it is, you leave matters so that the man who is betting is on the average behind, because he must pay his percentage besides taking his chance of losing. I do not think that we can hope to promote the breeding of horses by this means. We should try to be reasonable, and this is certainly not reasonable. This Bill provides that where any person or association becomes a custodian or depository of the stakes the percentage deducted from the total amount deposited shall not exceed certain sums. Where the total amount deposited on a race is $20,000, the percentage is 7 per cent, which means $1,400, and a man is going to be the loser if he is to pay 7 per cent of the money invested. I do not think this will operate to the advantage of horse-breeders.

Rt. Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN: This subject has been before Parliament on many occasions within my experience, and I recall particularly a very considerable debate, after inquiry by a committee of the House, which resulted in what was known as the Miller Bill. I remember on the occasion of that discussion that my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Lafortune) made a very interesting and witty speech. Some hon. gentlemen who have spoken in this debate seem to have an entire misapprehension as to the object and purpose of this legislation. It does not recognize anything that has not been recognized for many years. The law upon the statute book as it is at present recognizes the very thing which is supposed to be recognized for the first time by this legislation. It has been on the statute and has been acted upon for fifteen or twenty years at least. Therefore when any hon. gentleman suggests that Parliament is asked to recognize something that was unlawful before, either he has not given due consideration to the subject, or he has not clearly expressed himself; because any such statement is absolutely contrary to the fact. The Government recognized, as was recognized everywhere, that there were some evils which ought to be remedied and which it might be practicable to remedy in respect of betting upon race tracks. We realized that at certain points in Canada near the frontier race meetings had been held too frequently and that large amounts of money had probably been taken out of the country. Further than that, there has been an allegation, whether true or false I do not know, that the betting at some of these places was carried on under not absolutely fair conditions. The Government did take into consideration on the one hand the necessity of restricting that evil as far as possible, and, on the other hand, of presenting to Parliament legislation that would command the assent of both Houses. I suppose that every hon. gentleman in this House will agree that it would be of very little use for us to bring down to this House a measure that would not probably command the assent of both Houses. If it was undesirable to leave the law as it stood before, without any restriction whatever calculated to diminish the evils to which I have alluded, ordinary common sense would indicate that the Government would have to take into consideration first the character of the existing evils, and then the possibility of cutting them down to a minimum by legislation that would command the assent of both Houses of Parliament. At least, that is the way it struck us, whether our impression with regard to the matter was right or wrong. And what we determined to do was to impose such further restrictions upon the law already existing as would prevent unscrupulous people from coming in from abroad and engaging in this country in the practices I have mentioned. It was stated that vultures came into this country and robbed the young men of their money. Well, then, the purpose of the Minister of Justic in preparing legislation was so to frame it that the evil-doers could not seize their prey, so to legislate that it would not be a paying proposition for them to conduct these meetings as they have been conducted in the past. That was the purpose and object of the legislation, and no other. It is restrictive and not enabling. It was designed by the Government from the standpoint I have already mentioned, and with the sincere desire to minimize as far as possible by legislation the serious evils to which allusion has been made. No one denies that these evils have to some extent existed. For my part, I share the view entertained by my colleague, the Minister of Justice, who has prepared this legislation, that it will do much to remove those evils. You cannot eradicate from human nature a certain innate desire to bet now and then and to indulge in games of chance. This desire exists in every civilized nation, and, for that matter, among uncivilized people too; and I would not be quite sure that some of the gentlemen who have spoken so eloquently this afternoon have not occasionally made a bet upon the result of an election. Well, other people desire sometimes to bet upon a horse-race, and as my hon. friend who has just spoken (Mr. Thomson) has stated, a very eminent authority laid down the dogma in days gone by, that the result is about as uncertain in the case of an election as in the case of a horse-race. I hope that what I have said, and I have endeavoured to put the matter as plainly as I can, will indicate to the House that the purpose which animated the Government in the legislation was entirely in the line of minimizing as far as possible an evil that was recognized and to do so by means that would be fairly certain of attaining success.

[Sir Robert Borden.]

Motion agreed to and Bill read the third time.

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT, 1915, AMENDMENT.

EXCISE TAX RESOLUTIONS CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE OF WAYS AND MEANS.

On motion of Sir Henry Drayton the House went into Committee of Ways and Means (from June 9) to consider the proposed resolution precedent to the amendment of the Special War Revenue Act, 1915, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN: When the House was last in Committee of Ways and Means, this resolution had been discussed and the Minister of Finance had given notice of certain amendments which it was proposed to move at a later stage. Shall the resolution carry?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (Minister of Finance): We have already had a pretty fair and full discussion of the principles of the resolution. What I would now suggest is that the resolution be taken up item by item and the items discussed separately.

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend The Special War Revenue Act, 1915, and to provide:—

1. That the following excise taxes be imposed, levied and collected on the total purchase price of the articles hereinafter specified, and on articles of clothing the said tax may be imposed upon the combined selling price of materials and cost of manufacture when sold separately:—

(a) A tax of ten per cent on,—

Boots, shoes, pumps and slippers of any material (not including shoes or appliances made to order for persons having a crippled or deformed foot or ankle) in excess of $9.00 per pair;

Mr. BUREAU: I think there was an amendment as to the price.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Before we proceed with the items in detail, I rise with a great sense of responsibility to ask your leave, Mr. Chairman, to make one or two general observations. Speaking in the presence at least of one member of this House of unrivalled experience in the matter of budgets and questions of this kind, the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding), I would submit to the members of this committee through you, Sir, that we find ourselves at this moment in a situation almost unprecedented in any British country in regard to budgets.

What is the ordinary procedure in regard to a budget? I claim, in view of the changes, in view of the tremendous alterations that are involved in the resolution, although I shall not trespass at any great length, a little latitude. The method of procedure in regard to the introduction of a budget which, in so far as I know, has been universally followed in all civilized countries, certainly in all British countries, has been that the Government brings down its budget proposals after the most careful consideration not only of the principles of the budget but of the machinery by which these principles are to be given effect to. The facts in regard to the principles, the details and any change in the machinery, are kept absolutely secret until the Budget is laid before Parliament. After they bring these proposals down in that way, the raising of the finances for the running of the country is so vitally important a matter that the government almost uniformly,—I will say uniformly—have taken the position: "Those are our proposals arrived at under the greatest sense of responsibility to raise the finances for the running of the country and by those proposals substantially we stand or fall." I appeal to you, Sir, if that has not been the universal procedure in regard to the Budget.

Why has it been so? What is the reason for it? The reason is this: The secrets are kept and the Government stands or falls by its proposals because it is of vital necessity that the moment the Budget proposals are known the machinery of the Finance Department should be ready to apply them on the one hand and the business of the country should not be nearly upset on the other. That seems to me to be elementary financial history in all British countries. What have we here? I venture to think—the newspapers take this view—that we have had practically a second Budget introduced in the committee stage of these proposals. It is not an alteration in detail; it is an alteration in principle. We have changed on a number of articles from the method of collecting the percentage on the whole price of the article to the American plan of only collecting the percentage on the excess, making an enormous difference in the amount we shall collect on any given article, this being tantamount to a change in the principles of the Budget. This is a very serious state of affairs, and I am bound to say that from my reading of the financial history of the Old Country such a state of affairs would, under ordinary circumstances, require a very drastic remedy and would certainly call, not only for the resignation of the minister who was particularly involved, but for the resignation of the administration as well. I asked the other night what the machinery was for the collection of this tax and my hon. friend the Minister of Finance did not have any answer. He said that he might employ stamps, oblivious apparently of the precedent that is absolute that some of these taxes were already being paid and were being collected in the most slipshod and unprepared manner apparently because the hon. gentleman could give no description of the machinery by which he proposes to collect these taxes. The Government have been unduly firm concerning the title of their taxes under which their administration would have a second argument for interfering with the business of the country but they have been irresolute and vacillating,—and they have been attacked by the press—in regard to the vital principles of their Budget. I am very sure the minister will agree with me when I say that I have no desire on personal grounds to see his resignation but I think the committee is entitled to full information and at once—and not only the committee but the country—first as to whether these taxes are to be immediately collected or not, because I want to tell my hon. friend the minister that from correspondence which I have had—and I have no doubt every member of this House has had—in remote districts and in near districts of the country some retail merchants are collecting the taxes—others are not. There is a beautiful state of affairs as a result of the Budget: Slipshod, haphazard, no directions. In some cases, I repeat, to my knowledge, the taxes are being collected, in some they are not; and other people are at a loss and are writing for information as to what they have got to do. The ordinary procedure in regard to Budgets is departed from just one hundred per cent in this—that absolute confusion is to be introduced into the business of the country, and the gathering of the so-called excise taxes is being carried on haphazard. Now, we are entitled at once to information from the minister upon two points. There is this important matter, that a great deal of money has already been collected under the provisions as they were originally introduced, but those provisions are being reversed by the hon. minister himself. What is to become of the money that has already been collected? The people have paid it; they have paid it under a law from which the author of the law is receding. What is to come of that matter? This is a very important matter for the people that have paid the taxes. It is a very important matter for the merchants that have collected the taxes. My hon. friend will not disagree with me on terminology in this case when I say that it is a case of absolutely utter confusion and chaos.

Now, what the people of this country, from Halifax to Vancouver, want to know is: Are the Ministry now so prepared to stand or fall by their proposals that they are prepared to give them information as to how these taxes are to be collected, how they are to be taken care of, and what the machinery is to be; and I have no doubt that very important discussions will yet arise on that very question of machinery. I wonder if my hon. friend has noticed—he must have noticed it, probably it has been brought to his close notice—that in the papers last night it was stated that the retailers of this country say that if these taxes were all collected at headquarters only nine thousand firms would be concerned. They say that collecting them in the way of sales taxes—as they ought to be called, I stick to my point—250,000 firms will be concerned. That is the statement of the retail traders. I need scarcely point out to the committee that that statement, if it has a grain of truth in it, has a bearing of the utmost importance on the machinery that is to be used, the expense of collection, the usefulness of the taxes, and the amount of money that will be raised by it. I submit these elementary considerations; but the point I do want to impress upon the minister is that he must now have arrived at the point—which is the usual procedure, I repeat, in Budget matters—that he and the Government of which he is a member will stand or fall by their proposals, and they will give the people of this country, and the Parliament of this country, absolutely reliable and detailed information as to the machinery by which the taxes are to be put in operation.

Mr. EDWARDS: Those of us who had the privilege of listening to the hon. member for Red Deer when these resolutions were first brought down, and having regard to the attitude which he assumed on that occasion, will not, I think, be disposed to take too seriously his representations now. A Budget has been brought down and certain resolutions have been placed before the committee in the ordinary course, as has been done on former occasions. On former occasions there might be an item in the Budget proposing to make a reduction, we will say, of 2½ per cent on implements or on something else. Until that finally passed the committee it was liable to be changed by the committee, and might be changed at any time, just as any item in the present Budget might be changed. We are simply following the procedure which has been followed in the past. No person in this House—at least no person on this side—will expect the hon. member for Red Deer to be satisfied no matter what is done. The day for the hon. member to experience satisfaction at what the Government does has long since passed. There was a time in his existence, since he entered Parliament, when he was ready to accept anything. Though he preached free trade from the housetops he was prepared to accept and did accept, a Budget brought down by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I rise to a point of order. We are now discussing the Budget resolutions, and I submit to you, Sir, that discussion of my views upon free trade, and of my history in regard to free trade is not apposite to the question under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN: I would ask the hon. member for Frontenac if he has anything to say on the point of order before I give my ruling.

Mr. EDWARDS: No, Mr. Chairman, I have nothing to say.

The CHAIRMAN: I must therefore rule that the point of order raised by the hon. member for Red Deer is well taken.

Mr. EDWARDS: That, Mr. Chairman, is a ruling which I expected that you would give, and it is one with which I entirely agree.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. EDWARDS: I might say, Mr. Chairman, but of course it is really unnecessary to do so, that while the hon. member for Red Deer is very free on certain occasions with his fulsome flattery and with his criticisms, on other occasions he is extremely sensitive to a little bit of criticism when it refers to himself. When the hon. member was endeavouring to justify the position he took at the time of his exception to the use of the word "excise," he told us and grew wonderfully eloquent—or rather somewhat boisterous—in his language that great violence had been done to the English language by the misuse of the word. I contend that the word "excise" as applied to these duties is correctly applied. These duties are collected, in the main, on things produced and sold in Canada. I might—it will only take a moment, notwithstanding the wonderful knowledge possessed by the hon. member for Red Deer I think there is still room for him to gain a litttle information—I might just quote an authority which I do not think even he will question, even no less an authority than Adam Smith, in regard to this. Now Adam Smith says:

"The duties of excise are imposed chiefly upon goods of home produce destined for home consumption."

If Adam Smith had intended that the application of the words should exclusively be to goods produced in the country where they were consumed he would have left the word "chiefly" out. The use of that word by Adam Smith must mean, and can only mean, that the word "excise" while it applies generally to goods made and consumed in the country applies also to like things when imported and consumed in the country. That is an authority which I presume the hon. member for Red Deer will be disposed to accept. He will hardly charge Adam Smith with doing violence to the English language.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: He lived a century and a half ago.

Mr. EDWARDS: Yes, that is very true. The hon. member says that Adam Smith lived a century and a half ago, but that has not prevented my hon. friend from quoting Adam Smith, as an authority, on many occasions in this House. Indeed he has not been limited by a century and a half in making his quotations; he has gone into the dim and misty ages, hundreds and hundreds of years ago, when he could quote some person—now long since dead and gone—who had at some time in his life made use of expressions which suited the views of the hon. gentleman. In regard to this particular matter, which my hon. friend thought of sufficient importance to make the subject of an amendment to the Budget, he tells us that Adam Smith lived a century and a half ago and therefore I should not quote him as an authority. The hon. gentleman has been in this House for twelve years, and this is the first time that he has taken occasion to move an amendment to the Budget.

Now, Sir, what has been the attitude of the hon. gentleman (Mr. M. Clark) in regard to this Budget? The Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) told hon. members with the utmost candour that he was facing a serious after-the-war situation which required the raising of large sums of money. He gave us full details of the situation, and he invited hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House as well as hon. gentlemen on this side to come forward with helpful suggestions towards meeting this national difficulty. Some hon. gentlemen sitting opposite responded to that appeal. But what has been the attitude of the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark)? He was not following in the footsteps of Cobden and Peel and Bright, nor was he wearing the mantle of Gladstone, when he greeted this Budget with sneers and jibes. That is the way the hon. gentleman from Red Deer met the appeal of the Minister of Finance for the assistance of all hon. members in going over these regulations with a view to amending them so that they would cause the least inconvenience to the public while at the same time providing the much needed revenue.

I have sat in this House for twelve years and have seen Budget after Budget introduced. I have seen those Budgets criticised, sometimes from the standpoint of party advantage—and we must expect a certain amount of such criticism—but never have I seen any Budget received in the manner in which this Budget has been received by the hon. member for Red Deer. What has that hon. gentleman done in the way of suggesting anything helpful? Not one single word. His whole attitude has been one of hostility, of carping criticism, of jeers and sneers and jibes, which ill becomes a gentleman who has posed for years past as a disciple of Pitt and Peel and Gladstone, and of Lord This and the Duke of That in the Old Land, and who has offered us the benefit of his wide experience and knowledge of political affairs. Not one helpful suggestion has the hon. gentleman made, but from the very beginning he has put himself in an attitude of hostility towards assisting the Minister of Finance in raising the revenue which he is honestly and sincerely desirous of raising to meet the pressing needs of this country.

I have no objection to the hon. gentleman from Red Deer expressing his views in this House. He can scatter all the flattery he likes, and follow it up by the most narrow criticism he is capable of, but for my part I care as little for his fulsome flattery as for his blows. I ask no quarter from him; he receives none from me. But I would ask him from the standpoint of a member who has sat in this House for twelve years to throw aside politics for the time being, and if he has any helpful criticism, to proffer it instead of offering only jibes and sneers.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): Mr. Chairman, I do not rise to delay the committee by following my hon. friend (Mr. Edwards) in all his very delicate references to myself. I rise for two purposes, and two only. My hon. friend has made a direct charge against me in regard to my attitude towards the Minister of Finance. He said that I had met the minister's proposals with nothing but carping citicism. I call my hon. friends attention to the fact that on the proposals for increased income tax I never opened my mouth when the Bill was going through committee, but on the second reading I did take the liberty of saying that I thought the minister might have further increased that tax. I offered no opposition except to taxes which, in the exercise of my undoubted privilege, I have my own views about. After all, I am only a human being, but I am entitled to as much respect even from the hon. member for Frontenac as God Almighty might be expected to give to a black beetle! I submit that to my hon. friend's view. That is my first object in rising.

My second object is to meet my hon. friend's quibble—because I must term it a quibble—in regard to my having quoted Adam Smith with approval on some things while not approving him on this particular thing. As a matter of fact I do approve of Adam Smith's views in this instance. I told my hon. friend and the other hon. members who listened to me on the second reading that these excise duties did exist in England 150 years ago, and I told how they were characterized at that very time by Doctor Johnston. Doctor Johnston and Adam Smith were contemporaries. I carefully guarded myself by saying further that the term "Excise Duty" had had a precise meaning for a century. My hon. friend's complaint is that I object to taking Adam Smith, who lived 150 years ago, as an authority upon the meaning of the words current in the last 100 years, during the whole of which period he has been dead. That is the point of my hon. friend's argument.

I do not follow him further, because I remind myself from time to time that while a medical man in the person of Doctor Harvey discovered the circulation of the blood, my hon. friend has for some time held a patent for the circulation of bile.

[Mr. Edwards.]

Mr. EDWARDS: In reference to that last remark, I might say that even Doctor Harvey might have revised his theory in regard to the circulation of the blood if he had examined the anatomy of my hon. friend from Red Deer. If we may judge by his political and tariff views it would puzzle the greatest anatomist on earth to follow the circulation of the hon. gentleman's blood.

Mr. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Chairman, having due regard to your ruling, and bearing in mind that we are not dealing with physiological questions, or whether some economist 150 years ago said this or that, I wish to address one or two words to the Minister of Finance on a very practical matter. May I preface my remarks by stating to the House at large that these taxes being of an entirely new character, necessarily, I think, demand from the House very careful consideration, and that where, after due thought, it is found desirable they should be modified or changed. With all due deference to my hon. friend from Red Deer, I take the stand that the hon. minister (Sir Henry Drayton) has been exceedingly wise, after hearing the criticisms from hon. gentlemen opposite and from this side of the House, and after receiving suggestions from practical men in various lines of business, to acknowledge the desirability of in some degree modifying these schedules.

I wish to make direct reference to the schedule, and before the minister—if he intends so to do—makes that definite reply so forcibly demanded by the hon. member for Red Deer, I would like the minister to consider the advisability of adding to the amended schedule hats and caps as coming under the same category as clothing; that is, that this tax shall be levied against the amount in excess of $5, or $2, as the case may be, as against the full amount above those two sums. I think I make myself clear in my request to the minister. I shall now give him very briefly one or two reasons for my request. I would like to point out first that hats can scarcely be considered a luxury until they get into a class where they are of so expensive and odd a character that the average person does not buy them. Now any felt hat under $5 is not an economical hat to buy. I am told by those who know the business thoroughly, and I had occasion some years ago to acquaint myself with this business, that it is impossible to produce under present conditions a felt hat under $5 which will be an economical purchase, that is to say, which will bear re-shaping and cleaning, which is a very common practice amongst a great many of our citizens. Of course, you can buy a hat cheaper than that, but after a few months it is perfectly useless and cannot be re-shaped or cleaned. Upon that I base my argument that it is not desirable to discourage the purchase of let us say a $6 or $7 hat, which in the long run may be much cheaper. Now I want to make one or two direct references as to cost in support of this limit which I have mentioned. Upon investigation I find that the cost of the material entering into the manufacture of felt hats—and this applies also to cloth caps—has gone up anywhere from 200 to 700 per cent. This is something that is not controlled in Canada. It is not a case of some group of persons controlling this raw material and making an abnormal profit on it, because nearly all the raw material entering into the manufacture of felt hats is imported. The same remark applies very largely to the trimmings of a felt hat. I would bring this very strongly to the attention of the minister and urge him to bring hats and caps within the same list that he has so wisely, I think, provided covering clothing. That is my direct request, and I trust the minister will give it his favourable consideration before making final answer.

Before taking my seat I would say again to the House that I think the minister has been wise in amending the schedules. As the hon. member for Red Deer has said, we have all been deluged with requests from business people throughout this country. I have in my desk at this present moment perhaps fifty telegrams from very important business concerns in Canada, and after analysing these telegrams and considering them in the light of the amendments suggested by the minister, I find that the requests made by these gentlemen and the reasons, many of them very logical, put forward have been very largely met by the minister. So the House, I think, would be well advised to give the minister very earnest support in his effort to bring this rather difficult undertaking into proper and workable shape, rather than taking the stand, as was suggested, I believe by the hon. member for Red Deer, that the whole proposals should be swept aside and perhaps some new scheme of taxation devised. I submit that the minister has not changed the principle of his Budget, but he has very wisely conformed to what was clearly in the public interest in this particular form of taxation.

Mr. EULER: When the minister stated the other day that members on both sides of the House might assist him with suggestions, I had hoped that he referred not only to the various details of the taxes, but also to the method by which they should be collected. I regret very much, however, that he made it somewhat plain the other day that, so far as the method of collection was concerned, he was not disposed to make any change. I realize the difficult position in which the minister is placed in raising the necessary revenue. He has to raise a great deal of money. He is facing an unprecedented situation, and it is quite natural that in the circumstances he must adopt unprecedented, and perhaps more or less experimental means for raising the money which he has to find. He has laid down the principle that the money should largely be paid by those who can best afford to pay it, and that the taxes should be collected with as little inconvenience to the people of Canada as possible. I think it is the general opinion throughout this country that there is a great deal of money in the hands of a few people. Ordinarily we like to speak of these men as profiteers, and the general demand is that the enormous profits of the profiteers be taken from them and put in the coffers of the country. For my part, while I subscribe to that in a general way, I think there is a good deal of nonsense talked about the profiteers. I hold no brief for them at all. As a matter of fact, I believe that a great many people, including members of this House, are not profiteers, perhaps simply because they have not had the opportunity. There are many Pharisees amongst us.

The minister has adopted the plan of raising the necessary revenue largely in the form of luxury taxes and income taxes. In that way he expects to get the money from those who can best afford to pay. Personally, I do not like very much the term "luxury taxes." I think if the luxury taxes so-called, were really luxury taxes they would very largely overlap the income tax; that is, that the men who pay the income tax would also very largely pay the luxury tax. For my part, I do not believe in calling them luxury taxes. I would call them sales taxes, or excise taxes; it does not make much difference to me which term you choose. While you may get a good deal of money from the wealthy people, I do not believe it will be possible to obtain all the revenue that is required from that class, and I think that the plain people of this country might just as well face the fact now as later that after all the costs of this war will have to be paid by them and by nobody else, because although the wealthy man may pay in the first instance, ultimately the taxes will be passed on to the great mass of the people. If that be true, that the common people of this country will pay the great mass of the taxes, then I say let us make our method of rising the taxes just as simple and easy as possible, without trying to carry out any impossible or improbable theories. I would urge upon the minister that he do not close his mind altogether as to the best method of collecting these so-called luxury taxes, and that he do not necessarily insist now that these taxes shall be collected through the retailers of this country. I think he should take this very reasonable attitude, that the members of the committee should discuss pro and con the arguments relating to the method of collecting and then he and the Government could decide which arguments have the preponderance of logic behind them, and then let the minister adopt the best method without necessarily laying down in advance any definite rule as to how these taxes shall be collected. I do not think the minister would be stultifying himself by adopting that procedure or be necessarily called upon to resign from office, although personally I would like to see the whole Government resign. In support of my statement that he would not be stultifying himself, I say that the minister has already in effect altered some of the principles which he enunciated the other day. Reference has been made to that by other speakers. For instance, he first stated that the tax upon clothing and other articles was to be collected upon the whole purchase price, if the article exceeded a certain price.

He has now altered that attitude, and quite rightly so, in that he purposes collecting certain taxes only on amounts in excess of a certain figure. But I cannot see why the minister was not consistent in following that principle all the way through. The matter of hats has already been referred to by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens). I have no particular interest in the manufacture nor in the retailing of hats; but if the minister is laying down the principle that articles of clothing shall be taxed only on certain excess values, surely hats and caps come within that category and should be treated in exactly the same way as any other article of clothing. While food and clothing may be bare necessaries of life, it does not follow that all other things are luxuries and should, therefore, be taxable. "Man," it is said, "does not live by bread alone." Besides the bare necessaries of life such as there are, in our civilization, many things without which we cannot possibly live any sort of complete life. In our houses we need furniture, carpets, rugs, electric fixtures and many other things which may occur to the mind of any hon. member. These things are absolutely necessary to the comfort and happiness of the Canadian people. While I admit that, after a certain point as regards prices, many of these articles take on the nature of luxuries, I contend that up to the point where they take on that nature, they should not be taxed any more than food and clothing.

I should like to examine, very briefly, the reasons upon which the minister bases his opinion that the taxes should be collected through the retailer. First, I will mention his least weighty reason, namely, that he would like to have the public realize that the war must be paid for as well as won. I do not think that is quite worthy of the minister, because the people of Canada realize in the very fullest sense that they have to pay for this war. I put that aside as an argument of no great weight.

A second argument he makes is that he has already made prices come down, and he cites instances in the city of Ottawa where prices of suits of clothes have been reduced. I have walked up and down the streets myself, and have noticed in the windows, suits priced at $45, and in other cases at less; but in many cases they have the magic number "45" attached to them, and he assumes that prices have been reduced from $55 or $60. I doubt whether he is justified in that assumption. I am not particularly suspicious of human nature; but I think our business men, retailers and others, are very shrewd, and they are apt to take advantage of almost every opportunity that presents itself. Personally, without casting any reflection on the retailers of this or any other city, I would not be surprised if in some instances the prices of those suits of clothes had been actually less than $45 before the Budget was announced. The temptation is at least there, so that the argument is not very strong.

The minister advanced one argument which made some impression upon me and which is the only one that can possibly support the method of collection which he proposes. He feared, if the tax were collected at its source, through the importer or manufacturer, the pyramiding of profits which would result all the way down from the manufacturer or importer through the jobber to the retailer, and that the actual result would be that the consumer 4 p.m. would pay more than he would if the method which the minister favours were adopted. There may be some truth in that, but the other disadvantages of the method favoured by the minister so far out-weigh the advantages of other systems which could be applied as to make it advisable to discard the method now favoured by the minister. The objection to collecting the taxes through the retailer is, I think, briefly this—the great expense, to both the Government and the merchants concerned, of making those collections. The hon. member for Oxford North (Mr. Nesbitt) stated the other day that he did not think there would be any great expense attached to this method of collection. I come from a city which has many retailers, many merchants, and one and all seem to think that it places upon them an enormous burden of work and care to collect that tax honestly and fairly and to pay it into the treasury. The minister also stated that, as regards cost of collection to the Government, he did not purpose going to any great expense; that he thought he could trust the retailers to make their returns honestly and fairly. I am not going to take any great issue with that statement; but the minister has lived long enough to know that there is no class of people in Canada, nor probably in any other portion of the world, who willingly pay taxes, I do not care how patriotic those people may be. Those of us who know anything with regard to statements made in connection with the income tax, know there are very few men who deliberately pay that income tax except as they know they must pay it. Perhaps I am wrong in that; perhaps I am misjudging human nature; but I believe I am right in saying that, as a general principle, people will not willingly pay taxes, no matter what the form of those taxes may be nor for what purpose they may be imposed, and if the Government wishes to get the tax, it must adopt some means of seeing that it actually receives that which it expects to receive. I believe in many cases the merchants will not collect all the taxes, nor will the Government receive the taxes collected in all instances. In all this I am making no reflection upon the retailers as a whole.

Again, there is so much lack of information on the part of the people and on the part of some of the merchants as to commodities upon which these taxes shall be applied, that, in many instances, taxes will be collected from people entirely illegally because the commodities on which those taxes are collected are not taxable at all. I happened to hear yesterday of an incident which illustrates that point. A traveller who came from the city of Montreal went into a confectionery store in order to buy a box of candy priced at $1 or $1.20, and the retailer insisted on collecting from that man what he called a luxury tax, although the collection of it was not legal. I am afraid a great deal of that sort of thing will occur. Further, even if this method of taxation might be in the interest of a large mass of the people, it is not fair to put one section of the public, such as the merchants, to all the inconvenience and expense consequent upon this method of collection.

The other method of collection suggested is that the tax be collected at its source from the manufacturer or importer. If the minister decided to adopt that plan, he would not be violating any principle already laid down by him, because, as a matter of fact, he has already adopted that plan in other instances. I for one do not believe musical instruments, pianos, phonographs, are entirely luxuries. In the case of musical instruments the minister is collecting from the manufacturer; the retailer of musical instruments does not collect the luxury tax as such at all. If the principle be right in the one case, I am at a loss to understand why a departure is made from it in another case. Therefore, it would not involve any departure from a principle laid down by the minister if he desired to adopt one principle and observe it all the way through. If that method is adopted, he can simplify the whole process to almost as great a degree as possible. Every manufacturer, every importer, every wholesaler, in fact every merchant, if he does his business in an up-to-date way, keeps a sales book or at least has some record of his sales, and it is the easiest matter, at the end of every two weeks or every month, to ascertain exactly what the sales have been and then calculate the tax upon them. And if the Government desires to verify the returns it is a much more simple way than to go from retail store to retail store and search through thousands, and indeed hundreds of thousands, of sales slips which the merchants are expected to keep. In addition to that, I contend that the tax will not be felt as a tax. I maintain that the manufacturer or the importer will merely add that tax to his overhead expenses the same as any other overhead expense, and it will be absorbed into the general costs of doing business.

I rose to make one other suggestion and I am rather surprised that it has not been made before. Another method of collecting this tax has been suggested in the press and in discussions of this matter, but I have not yet heard it made in the House. In passing, I may say that I prefer the method just mentioned. But if the minister has objections to collecting the tax from the wholesaler or the manufacturer at the source of production because of a fear that the consumer will pay more, then I would ask him to consider the suggestion that the tax be collected upon the entire sales of the retailer as well as those now paid by importer and manufacturer. That method will have almost all the merits and advantages of collection through the manufacturer and importer. The books are there and the sales are shown, and there will be very little inconvenience and expense either to the retailers or the Government in making the collection, while it will remove the dangers which the minister sees in the pyramiding of profits all the way down from the importer or manufacturer to the retailer. The retailer will simply add the one per cent, or whatever the percentage may be, to his overhead, and it goes out to the consumer with very little added cost as compared with the method proposed to be used by the minister. You would, I believe, obtain almost exactly the same amount of money by employing that method of collection as by the present method, and with much less inconvenience. A retailer of this province who has been carefully collecting the tax for a period of ten days under the present system found that during those ten days the sales amounted to something like $4,400, or $4,300 and that the luxury tax amounted to exactly $43. That is just as close to one per cent of the total sales as you could arrive at, and I make the deduction from that that if that method were adopted of placing a tax of one per cent on all sales, except foods, you would obtain just about the same amount of revenue as if you adopted the method proposed. I do submit that it would be much simpler, would cost a great deal less and would be less inconvenient. I make this suggestion for the consideration of the minister, and as I said on rising, I hope he has not made up his mind firmly to adhere to his other plan. I simply want to see the money obtained in the least burdensome manner, and with the least amount of inconvenience to the public and expense to the Government.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My delay in rising to reply to the impassioned series of questions which the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) threw at me with more or less, chiefly more, vehemence, is not owing to any lack of respect for the hon. gentleman. It is due simply to the fact that I was waiting to see what would be the result of his Macedonian appeal for help, in the plight in which he was, from the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding). But help cometh not. I do not think that the attack was one which that hon. gentleman would like to associate himself with. I waited for some time to see if he would ally himself with it, but apparently he does not desire to do so. I do not want the hon. member to think that I in the slightest degree take his attack as personal; I do not. I do not want him for one moment to believe that so far as I am concerned it is in the slightest degree resented. It is not; it is welcome. After all, when you have a good case there is nothing like seeing all sorts of attempts made—attempts which I say ought never to be made—to upset it. I say "ought never to be made," and I mean what I say when I apply those words to the hon. gentleman. What is all the trouble in connection with this Budget, so far as the hon. gentleman is concerned? Is it that he must plow his furrow absolutely and entirely alone? Is it that he has absolutely no faith in the dogmas he has preached day in and day out in favour of direct taxation? Is it that he thinks that the Government have taken from him something which he would fain keep for himself, although perhaps he may think it would be of benefit and advantage to the people? Or is it that he wants an election cry with the untried formula of the hon. member (Mr. Fielding)? Direct taxation! This Budget, which is so fiercely attacked, does more in the direction of direct taxation than any other Budget ever introduced in this House. Direct taxation! Why, so far, I think the hon. gentleman is the only member of his party who has attacked these taxes in principle. I may be wrong, but at the moment I can recall no other. On the other hand, I can recollect many commendations from members of his party who were glad to see that a tax was being imposed directly; that it was not being put where extra profits could be made through it, but rather directly and in accordance with the principles of their own platform. Of course, it is quite true we often hear the statement that platforms are things made not to stand on but to get in on, something to trick the people here and to trick them there. Nevertheless, some people believe in their platforms, and some of these hon. gentlemen, certainly in no mistaken terms, welcomed the dawn of at least an honest attempt to institute direct taxation and an honest attempt to pay our way as we go and thereby discharge our obligations. I do not know exactly why this particular attack is made unless it has something to do with what I have suggested. But, there are two alleged reasons advanced by the hon. gentleman in connection with the point he seeks to make. In the first place, while he is preaching excise taxes in season and out of season while the excise as direct taxation is the means of salvation for the country until this Budget is brought down, while it is the right thing for this country, he to-day says that these are not excise taxes. I wondered what he thought when he was talking about excise taxes. He was talking about a tax called excise collected from a people that had been accustomed to paying excise taxes. He was talking to Canadians not having regard to the definitions given by Adam Smith, by Webster, or any other dictionary, but having regard to a class of taxes that they knew and had been paying. As I have pointed out before the kind of taxes he has been talking about when he has been talking about excise, must have been those which he himself had to do with. I referred shortly to the excise taxes which the hon. gentleman had had to do with. I am going to refer more particularly to the Act. This is something that he has so far overlooked in his renewed attack. I refer to the Special War Revenue Act which was assented to on the 8th April, 1915, as amended by the legislation of 1918. The hon. gentleman will remember the great point that has been made—the tremendous point—on which this long suffering Government is to be turned out of power. If it would do any good to turn them out, but that it would be a good thing I do not know, but I do not see how any one could get any where or that the slightest amount of concrete good would come to anybody except some people who want office because of the Government being turned out. However, the main point is this, that an excise tax cannot apply to a tax on any commodity which is manufactured in the country. That is how the hon. gentleman, when he was supporting excise taxes, when he had no other object in view except seeing that a measure of direct taxation was placed upon the people of this country, and a measure of direct taxation which he, only a few days ago in this House said was not nearly enough, but a measure that he would support, viewed the matter. The Act reads:

> There shall be levied, collected, and paid on each of the articles mentioned in the Schedule to this Part, when imported into Canada after the 30th day of April, 1918, in addition to any duty or tax that may be payable under any other statute or law, a war excise tax equal to ten per centum of the duty paid value of the same.

The hon. gentleman then is voting to put an excise tax on top of the customs tax on an imported article and there is nothing wrong. The distinction is again so clearly drawn that it is impossible that the hon. gentleman can be mistaken. The Act goes on:

> And there shall also be levied, collected and paid, when any such article is manufactured and sold in Canada after the 30th day of April, 1918, a war excise tax equal to ten per centum of the price for which the same is sold.

Both classes are treated exactly the same; it is the same thing in each case as the hon. gentleman will find if he takes the trouble to look into it in connection with any of our legislation.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: What the hon. gentleman has just read is the exact definition of an excise tax if I understand it. It was an excise duty imposed on goods manufactured in the country.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The hon. gentleman has a way of listening with one ear and closing the other. He has a way of shutting his ear when the argument is against him just in the same way as he sometimes clouds and closes his intellect when the argument is against him for in the very preceding sentence I read, exactly the opposite thing was done. The excise was put plainly, straightly and strictly upon the imported article and not only on the imported article but on the value of the imported article duty paid. The point really is too plain to labour, and I only labour it because I have the greatest respect for my hon. friend and I am sure he was sincere in the first instance when he approached this subject. But he sees how the taxes are described in this Act. If further light were required I would invite him to consider the automobile tax. If he looks at that tax he will find that it is called an excise tax equal to ten per cent of the duty paid value of the imported article or equal to the manufactured cost if manufactured at home. I know my hon. friend always understood that there was no tea grown in Canada and that the excise tax on tea was certainly a tax on an imported article. That is what he called it when he voted for an excise tax. I refer him to the section dealing with the tax on tea. He will find the same thing in regard to cinematographs and other things. The thing is really too plain, too clear, for further argument. It is a quibble that is unworthy of my hon. friend.

There is one other ground advanced by my hon. friend. He says that not only in the first instance did I shatter the English language, the dictionary and everything else but that to-day I am absolutely shattering and ruining all proper parliamentary procedure.

On the subject of parliamentary procedure I yield with the greatest deference to my hon. friend I do not know much about parliamentary procedure but I had hoped that when I came into this House I was going to learn a great deal about it from my hon. friend. One of the things I am suffering from at the present time is the greatest sense of disappointment because I know my hon. friend could give me that instruction, I know that he knows the subject well, but again I am afraid that my hon. friend was not entirely sincere in the manner in which he approached the point. For example, he appealed in connection with the Budget debate, or rather in connection with the point he was making, to the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) for help, for assistance and for light. Well, of course, it was not forthcoming. Why? Because the very thing that is being done to-day was done in this House in November 1896. It is no new thing to change Budget resolutions in Parliament. It is no new thing to change the duties when taxes have gone into effect. It is no new thing, after all, to try—never mind at what minute you attempt it—to try and do the right thing, and it was done in November 1896. Why, the tariff was introduced by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's, when he was Minister of Finance, in November of 1896. It was approved in March 1897; and there the same question came up, that has to come up here when changes are being made. For what reason? In the public interest and to make the scheme of taxation proposed a better scheme, changes were there also made. In that case the section respecting the date of rates going into force provided that in cases where rates were reduced—and rates were reduced with the Government staying in office, as my hon. friend knows very well—refunds would be made dating back to November while increases—and increases were then made after the Budget had been introduced —only came into effect on the date the resolutions were adopted in March. So, Mr. Chairman, as far as the precedents of this House are concerned at any rate, what we are doing at the present moment is covered by precedent.

There is really one claim made by the hon. gentleman, and it is that the Government should come down to the House with an adamant face, shove their proposals through with the force of their majority irrespective of those merits which arguments and discussions here may substantiate. After all, the Government's responsibility is of such a character that in order to do the right thing and the honest thing the tax in the first instance can only be considered, as the hon. gentleman well knows, privately and without the intimate knowledge—under our methods of Parliamentary procedure—the intimate knowledge that an inquiry would give. Notwithstanding that, notwithstanding that an error may be made, in the opinion of my hon. friend there must be no change in the Budget but it must be forced through whether it be in the public interest or not. Well, Mr. Chairman, I do not know what the House thinks of that as a principle, but it would seem to me to be a very extraordinary one. I should have thought that no matter what legislation may be introduced, it can be improved by discussion in the House and that unless measures are to be improved here from time to time there is not an awful lot of justification in having a House. It seems to me to be most extraordinary that the silver-tongued orator of democracy—who preaches democracy in the highways and the by-ways—does not, after all, understand its meaning, and that that silver-tongued apostle of democracy has today become the brazen-mouthed trumpet of absolutism and autocracy.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. LEMIEUX: This is not an academy, and it seems to me we have gone far afield this afternoon to define a word the meaning of which has been practically decided a day or so ago. I wish to call the attention of the committee, in a few brief sentences to another aspect of the case, and I invite the attention of the Finance Minister to the amendment I am about to move. Let me say at once that I have received several letters and resolutions bearing on this subject. Personally I am quite ready to do my share to help this country to carry on. I have already formulated my objections to my hon. friend's resolutions. I consider that his taxes on luxuries are more or less taxes on necessities; but on this point we expressed our respective opinions when the Budget Speech was delivered and in the discussion which followed. I have no doubt that the House and the country will have to face the passing of these resolutions with their attendant consequences, although from now on perhaps a few amendments may be made. For my part I repeat that I am ready to face the situation, to help the country to carry on, provided my hon. friend will amend his resolutions so as to give a living chance to the poor man, and see that at least the necessities of life are not made taxable.

But I am rising this afternoon with a different object in view. As I stated a moment ago I have received several resolutions and letters bearing on the amendment which I intend to offer. When our boys left for the front, they left with the blessings of their parents, and also with the solemn promise made by Parliament and by Canada as a whole that their dependents would be cared for and that they themselves, if they returned, would be cared for by the country. In my humble judgment, no country in the world did as well as Canada for the dependents of the soldiers during their absence at the front. The Patriotic Fund, the Red Cross Society and the various private organizations in the country, did fairly well by the dependents of our soldiers during the time the latter were at the front. But the soldiers have returned—at least the majority of them have—and in the case of those who have not returned and will never return the country has been providing for their families. Has the country provided in an adequate manner for those families? This is not the time to say. Speaking of those who have returned to Canada, speaking of those who constitute the Great War Veterans, there has been, I am bound to say, a sad experience. They have been refused by the Government the gratuity which in other countries has been paid to returned soldiers.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: May I ask my hon. friend a question? I would very much like information regarding those other countries to which he refers, and the amounts of the gratuities they granted to their returned men.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am not saying that this country has not done something for its returned soldiers. But as regards gratuities paid by some other countries, I will be able at a later stage to give my hon. friend full particulars. It is quite possible that Canada was not in a financial position to give the returned soldiers all that they demanded. I remember a very forcible statement made by my hon. friend's predecessor (Sir Thomas White) before a Select Committee of this House, and I am bound to accept it as an accurate statement of the case. However, I state the plain, bald fact that our returned soldiers, who had been promised that they would be cared for on their return, were refused the gratuity they asked from the Government.

But this is not the most serious difficulty which faces those men. On their return they are confronted with the extremely high cost of living. While this is very serious for the ordinary citizen, I claim that it is far worse for the returned soldier, for the former has not had his nervous energy depleted nor his earning capacity impaired; but the latter is not yet himself again. It will take the returned soldier who spent five, four, three or even two years at the front many years before he regains his normal state of health, although he may not have been wounded. I invite the attention of the doctors who sit in this House as to the correctness of my statement.

It is true that Parliament has done something to help the returned soldier re-establish himself in civil life by giving him the benefit of vocational training; but still he is not on a footing of equality with his neighbour who remained at home to face the struggle for existence. It will be generally admitted, I believe, that the most difficult period for the returned man is this very period of re-establishment, for he has practically to start life afresh. Generally he is blessed with a family, and with the present high cost of living and handicapped by his impaired vitality, he finds himself unable to stand the strain of the economic struggle.

Therefore with the new Budget resolutions materially adding to the burdens of the tax payer, I appeal to my hon. friend (Sir Henry Drayton) to extend to the soldier and to his dependents the hand of fellowship,—to be generous and at the same time to be grateful to the returned soldier. But my hon. friend will ask me: How can we create an exception? The law of the land must apply to every person, and the returned soldier should not be exempt from its operation. My answer, Mr. Chairman, is very simple. And let not my hon. friend believe for one moment that I am appealing to popular passion in what I am about to state; on the contrary, I am trying to help him. Yes, the law of the land must be applicable to every citizen and no one should claim exemption from its operation. Yet may I remined my hon. friend that during the war, while the soldier was at the front ready "to go over the top," to give his all for his country and for the great principles of democracy, under the stimulus of the most ardent patriotism, yet at home, when asking the people to fill the Treasury with their savings, the Government was giving to a special class of the community exemption from taxation. Loans were floated at a very high figure, and those loans, known as "Victory Loans," representing immense sums of money, mostly profits made out of the war, were issued with a special label "exempt from taxation." To-day I know of some war profiteers and of some very wealthy men, patriots at large, who have invested, and rightfully so, their savings and profits in those loans, and who are therefore absolutely exempt from taxation. Let me say, en passant, to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance that if there is one thing which has thrilled this country, it was his first administrative act of last fall when in his drive for the last Canadian domestic loan he refused to exempt the bonds from taxation. I give this credit to my hon. friend: He was bold and patriotic when he took that firm stand, which was in strong contrast with the stand taken by his immediate predecessor. We have been told that this country was intensely patriotic during the war. Well, Sir, as an evidence of our patriotism during the war let us never mention the Victory loans, except the last one, which was launched after the war, and which showed the loftier spirit and the nobler instincts of the Canadian people. All honour to my hon. friend. I have given him an example, and I have given him a precedent, the exemption from taxation of the Victory loans issued during the war when our boys were at the front exposing their lives. I say to my hon. friend that the returned soldier and his dependents will have to pay part of the price of the enormous advantages secured by the bonded aristocracy of Canada. The high cost of living may be assigned to various causes, but I am quite sure that one of them is the fact that so many millions and millions of dollars invested in Victory loans are to-day exempt from taxation and do not yield a red cent to the needs of the country. As a result the returned soldier after exposing his life at the front, finds when he returns to this fair land of his and ours that he has to pay for the financial blunders of my hon. friend's predecessor. Would you allay the feeling of unrest which exists among the soldiers? Would you prevent sedition? Would you call a halt to any unhealthy agitation in Canada? Would you put an end to this claim for a gratuity which the country cannot afford to pay? If you would, I can suggest a remedy to my hon. friend at once. I can assure him that the returned soldiers will ask no favours from the Government in the way of exemption from ordinary customs duties and the other taxation burdens which Canada has imposed upon her children, but as my hon. friend is to-day asking Parliament to endorse a resolution which in his own words is temporary, and preeminently an after-the-war measure to meet a war contingency, I say to him, let the soldier and his dependents be exempt from the taxation which you are imposing by this measure. Mr. Chairman, the churches of this country are exempt from taxation on certain articles which they import for use in divine service. The Government accedes to the request of the churches because it respects the object which the churches have at heart—the morality, the Christianization and generally the uplifting of the people. But patriotism is also a religion, and I believe there is no higher form of patriotism than the one which was exemplified on the battlefield by our soldiers.

I conclude my brief remarks in order to bring forth from the lips of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance an acquiescence to the principle of my amendment because he is too good a patriot himself not to stand, by the returned soldier. I therefore beg to move to amend the present resolution by inserting after the word "that" in the first line of the first paragraph the following words:

—except in the case of returned soldiers who have seen active service overseas and their dependents who shall be exempted from the said taxes for a period of five years from the date of the sanction of the Act to be based upon the present resolution.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not know at the moment whether an amendment of that kind is in order, but I should not like to raise any question of order on a matter relating to the returned soldier. I can tell my hon. friend at once that of all His Majesty's subjects who could have any claim to exemption the claim of the returned soldier is greater than all the others put together and multiplied many times over. It is just a question how the returned soldier should be helped. It is just a question how he can best be helped. It is just a question whether or not—and this is a matter which has had attentive and anxious consideration—the returned soldier would like to be placed in a special class having regard to his purchases to the amount of a few dollars in the half year and to the amount of not many dollars in the whole year. It is a question whether he would rather not be put in that class of taxdodgers or something else. Would he not rather that the country should obtain as much revenue as possible even although he paid $1 or $2, yes, perhaps, $10 a year in luxury taxes? After all, what do these luxury taxes amount to? Would he not sooner pay, perhaps, $25 or $30 a year in order that the country should obtain as much revenue as possible? It may well be that this returned soldier would say: "I, who am in a position to pay, would rather pay my honest share so that my country may be in a position to help my less favoured comrade to have just a little bit more for pensions, yes, that my country may have a little bit more for the disabled man and for the widow of my fallen comrade."

I do not want to treat the returned soldier question in any slushy way, and by a pretence of helping him with a small exemption, to seek to curry favour, and so far as I can see, that is what I would be doing, if I were to do as is suggested. This matter is receiving very careful consideration; and if we give the returned soldier any exemption, I am inclined to think we should not do it in connection with a few luxury taxes, as the amount of exemption would be of little consequence in comparison with the sacrifices the returned soldier has made, but we should, perhaps, do something larger and bigger, maybe by giving the returned soldier absolute exemption on income. That whole question, however, is in the hands of a very capable committee. I hasten to assure my hon. friend that any feasible suggestion he can make as regards exemption which will really amount to something will be taken into consideration. We cannot, however, consider suggestions which, if put into effect, might be taken advantage of by traders who were not honest, because after all, how could you check the shops? When I considered this matter, the point that bothered me was this. Here is a shop which happens to be the black sheep in the hundred. In that shop the merchant has sold goods on which luxury taxes ought to have been paid; but he says: I sold that to returned soldier So-and-so, and I sold this to returned soldier So-and-so, and the effect would be that you would not be giving exemption to the returned soldier, but, to a very large extent, you would be putting the dishonest trader in a position where he could exact the tax and, having exacted the tax, could put it into his pocket. That is the difficulty. There is no trouble at all about meeting my hon. friend on the question of what one can do for the soldier. We cannot do too much for him within the ability of the country to do and to pay.

Just one other thought. I would suggest to my hon. friend, in a spirit of the greatest kindness—should we not, for the time being, stop worrying about what was done during the war? That is done. Why say that Sir Thomas White was the only man in the world who ever sold tax-exempt bonds when tax-exempt bonds issued in the United States make the issue of tax-exempt bonds by Sir Thomas White look as absolutely nothing. Moreover, the statement was made in this House only yesterday that one of the reasons for trouble in this country was that the Government had surrounded themselves with a favoured few to whom they had given tax-free bonds. Of course, if that statement had not been made in this House, one would wonder very much where the gentleman who made it came from and what his mentality was. But the hon. member for Maisonneuve and Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux) should remember that every citizen, every white man left in the country, formed part of that band that is described as the band supplied with bonds, everybody from the highest to the lowest, from the poor man who could afford, out of his savings for the whole year, to buy only a little fifty dollar bond, up to the Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier. No more effective appeal was made, no nobler sentences were penned than those of the Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid

5 p.m.

Laurier when he asked his fellow countrymen to do their duty by subscribing to these bonds, thus becoming a part of the Governmental favoured few as described in this House yesterday. Everybody was in it; everybody was then doing as he thought best for Canada. Not a Canadian newspaper, worthy of the name, was not dedicating space to this appeal to buy bonds. When we are all in it, is it not time that we should stop quarrelling about it? Moreover, those bonds may be very readily obtained in the market at the present time, and although they are free of taxation, they may in some instances be bought today at less than par. That of itself is surely a sufficient answer. But the soldier's case does not rest upon that rope of sand suggested to support it; the soldier's case is such that, on his own merits, we in this House ought to do everything we can for him.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): There are three grounds on which I find at the present time that I cannot support the amendment of my hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux) although, perhaps, he may be able to remove my difficulties. It would be an act of supererogation to profess sympathy for the returned soldier. I take it that every man in this House has sympathy for him. But the first objection I see to my hon. friend's amendment is that some returned soldiers are excellently well able to pay these taxes, and not only would they be excellently well able, but, as the minister has said, they would be very willing to pay them. How would my hon. friend proceed in a case of this sort? Would he exonerate those men whether they were willing and able to pay or not? That is a practical difficulty of great importance. The second point, which seems to me to be also of practical importance, is that there would be a very large opening for fraud. The practical difficulty of collecting which applies to these taxes generally and all around, would be intensified in this particular case; you would need to go around the country marking your returned soldier, and every retail salesman would have to have the mark. That is only incidental to the third difficulty. My third difficulty in regard to voting for this particular amendment is that if I voted for an amendment in favour of exempting somebody from this tax, I am afraid I would be misunderstood as being in favour of the taxes generally, and I want still, in spite of all that has fallen from the minister, to say that I am entirely unrepentant upon that point.

I think I shall be speaking within the bounds of the amendment if I take just a minute or two to pay some little return attentions to my hon. friend (Sir Henry Drayton) in regard to the remarks he devoted to me a few minutes ago. He started out with an assurance which I was very glad to receive, that he did not take my opposition to these taxes as a personal thing. I am bound to say that his manner did not agree with his words, because I was rather glad, when he was getting back at me, that a couple of benches were between us for he seemed to be almost on the point of making a pounce upon me. We shall however, rub out his manner and accept his words. I was surprised to hear from the minister that I was ploughing a lone furrow in regard to my opposition to these taxes. I had an idea that he had been receiving deputations night and day on this subject. If I am ploughing a lone furrow in this House there are plenty in the furrow outside, as my hon. friend knows very well. One of his followers told us that he had under his hand some fifty telegrams of protest at the time he was speaking.

Mr. STEVENS: The hon. member is hardly correct. I said I had about fifty telegrams suggesting changes and improvements which I commended to the consideration of the minister.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): If they want changes and improvements they can hardly be in favour of the original thing.

Mr. STEVENS: They want to make a good thing better.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): Now, in regard to the question of direct taxation, my hon. friend (Sir Henry Drayton) has charged me with inconsistency. Let me say that I have been in favour of direct taxation, but "direct" is not the only word to qualify a good tax. I never said I was in favour of direct taxation without regard to its incidence, its ease or its difficulty of collection, and a number of other considerations. Directness is not the only quality we must consider in a tax. There are two other qualities that occur to my mind as given by Adam Smith, and he has never been contradicted in regard to them. The first point is that a tax ought to be levied, as far as possible, in proportion to the ability of the people to pay them.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Hear, hear.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): That is why Germany and the United States followed the example of Sir Robert Peel and Mr. Gladstone in finding the easiest method of collecting direct taxes in the shape of income taxation. But a greater than Germany, a greater than the United States, a greater than Peel and Gladstone is here and says he discards the income tax, and introduces a lot of brand new things in the shape of sales taxes, although he evidently does not know exactly how he is to get them, because he forgot, before he sat down, to answer the most practical question I put to him as to how he was going to deal with those who had already paid, and how he would collect the taxes that remained. He does not answer the practical questions, which after all are all-important in the committee stage of business. Another elementary quality of good taxes is that, in addition to being direct, they should be easy of collection. That is another of Adam Smith's cardinal principles, and as my hon. friend has asked me for some lessons in political economy he is welcome to these primer suggestions in that direction. Has my hon. friend found this tax easy of collection up to now? The great majority of the people concerned want to prevent him from starting to collect them at all.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): My hon. friend will have ample opportunity of expressing his opinions: we are in committee.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I simply desire to say that they are not easy of collection. They are almost as difficult as the income tax, and I only hope they will not be as bad.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): My hon. friend has a short experience of the collection of income tax. After all, it has been found in those countries I have mentioned that the income tax is at any rate absolutely certain and well defined in its incidence, and that is also a point to be considered in a good tax. About the incidence of these taxes there is no certainty whatever; if a man does not buy he does not pay. He avoids taxation altogether, and there are a number of people who are taking full advantage of that avenue of escape at the present moment. But let me draw the attention of my hon. friend to the fact that if he took the advice offered to him by the hon. member for East Elgin and sharply graded the income tax up from the minimum, gradually grading down the sum at which he collected the tax, its incidence would be absolutely fair. And if he will condescend to learn something from the countries that have been imposing income tax for generations he will find that it is vastly easier to collect than this tax. I am glad to have the admission that my hon. friend does not find these taxes easy of collection.

Now, I have met his main point, and the only other point I want to meet is one in which his argument was shared by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister the other night. The thing that rather bothered me in the discussion, which I am reluctant to revive, is the contention, in support of the title, that it had been allowed to escape the notice of Parliament two years ago. Well, I would say to both my hon. friends that they do not go far back for their precedents, and if we made a mistake on a small scale two years ago that would hardly be a reason for continuing it upon the present scale of magnitude. For one thing, I have not a very great deal of respect for precedents set by this Parliament. Perhaps my right hon. friend and his colleagues would like me to tell them why. Well, if this Parliament only gets time enough it runs away from its own precedents, and so does the Government. The Government, in the person of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), introduced a resolution in favour of daylight saving and carried that measure almost nem. con. There were a few voices crying in the wilderness in protest against it, but my hon. friend the Minister of Finance was not then in the House. There were some of us who told the Government that they were getting into a sea of trouble over the matter, but they paid no attention to us. They never heed any warning until they are in trouble, and they therefore disregarded the representations that were made to them. The next year, what does this Parliament do, the Parliament that I am asked to accept as one entitled to set precedents? Parliament, by a vote of two to one, rubs out its almost unanimous vote of the year before; and I think I am therefore giving a good reason why I should not accept with any great heartiness precedents set by this Parliament, especially precedents of such recent origin as two years ago, in contradistinction to the well-established practice and knowledge of the last hundred years. My hon. friend was not in Parliament, but he was a handy man at the time. Of course, he was chairman of the Railway Commission, and the real fact of the matter was that neither Parliament nor the Government had anything to do with the setting of the time of the country. It was being set by the railways of the United States. When it was necessary to have a precedent in this matter the hon. gentleman (Sir George Foster) changed the time. Now, clearly when the first law was established it must have been a federal law, otherwise so old a parliamentarian as my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce would never have introduced the measure and commended it to Parliament. But when the United States railways ruled in a contrary way, my hon. friend comes down, and he says to Parliament: "This is all wrong. The precedent of Parliament and of the Government is all wrong. This is a municipal matter, and you had better rub out last year's doings and proceed differently this year." And now we are proceeding two ways and Parliament is having nothing to say about it. The municipality stands on one side, the railway stands on the other. Parliament stands in the middle of the Pleiads, looking at one clock and at the other, while the Government says: "You are in the middle; you pay your money and take your choice." I hope I have given my hon. friend sufficient reason why I have not a great deal of respect for his precedents. I do not want to renew the argument upon this question of title, nor do I desire to hold up these taxes. I do not want to be misunderstood. I understand the responsibilities of the Government,, but a certain amount of parliamentary criticism is proper, and no man of the courage of my hon. friend resents it. He is able to retort in fair good style, and if he had a good case he would be a first-rate debater. He will find it is a great help to his debating powers to get his case as good as he can but I am afraid that before this thing is through he will find that his case is a very bad one. I do not want to hold this up. My hon. friend displayed some little heat. I like a man to be able to get mad once in a while even in Parliament. You remember that the Scriptures say "Be angry and sin not". But I do not like a debater to be so forgetful that he does not think of answering a practical question. I want to know what is to become of the taxes that already have been collected under his first method of procedure because I apprehend he is not going to stick to the money and keep the rest of it as well. Could he give us any idea of how far he will accede to the appeal which I have made, supplemented by my hon. friend from Waterloo (Mr. Euler), and which I dare say will come from other parts of the House? Is he disposed to respond to the appeal that these taxes shall be collected at the centre instead of from the retailers?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I must confess that I find it altogether difficult not to answer the appeal made by my hon. friend. I think he really wants an answer this time. I thought before that he did not. I thought before that he was not very anxious to get an answer. Perhaps I should not speak for the Government because we have not had a chance for consultation over this question which has been brought up, but personally, I am not convinced that the method proposed is not the right one. Personally, I am not convinced that our first duty is not to the customer in the shop, to the ultimate consumer rather than to the gentlemen who are in business. Personally, my feeling is that we should leave the end of the string just where we leave it whether, as my hon. friend says, the tax may or may not be paid. Just where we leave it so that the customer has the right to make an extravagant purchase if he pleases, just where we leave it so that the full incidence of the tax will fall where we believe it will fall and there is no doubt where it falls and who is paying it, and just where we leave it so that it is impossible for the merchant to make a profit on the tax. I am perfectly free to admit that the method which we propose is the easier. It is a question whether the Government should consider ease of administration, its own comfort—yes, more than that, its own popularity. It is a question whether it should consider its own popularity or whether it should consider the needs of the people and the necessity of doing everything it can to reduce cost. I know these taxes are very unpopular but I never took up the position of Finance Minister with any idea that I could be popular and at the same time act decently towards the country. I know I am making enemies every day, but I care not how many I make if I can do anything in my humble way towards pulling down costs, bettering conditions and advancing the welfare of Canada. After all is not the sense that one has done his duty to his country really better than popularity gained by doing otherwise? I do not pretend to know it all. I have been greatly impressed by a number of the remarks which have been made. As to the collection of these taxes, we have the Department of Inland Revenue with offices to collect them all over the country. The Department of Inland Revenue will look after the collection of these taxes. The ordinary way of collecting a tax of this kind would be to treat it just the same as we treat the excise tax which manufacturers have to pay and as we treat the excise tax collected from the people that are selling whiskey. We would get from them a monthly or a bi-monthly statement. It is not suggested that the statement should cover all the sales. That statement should only cover transactions involving the payment of the tax. That would be the ordinary way of collecting the tax. It is certainly true that we would have to engage more people—a lot more people—there is no doubt about that. There is that objection to it. There is another way that is being considered to see how it would work out practically and which, if possible, would do away with the accounting question, and that is by using stamps. The merchant would have to have stamps on hand and an arrangement could be made by which he could buy them readily at the post office at any time. These stamps would have to be affixed to the Bill and cancelled. Whether that will be done I really at the moment could not definitely say but that in brief will be the method under which these taxes will be collected.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): With a view to helping my hon. friend on that question of stamps may I remind him that we have been collecting taxes by stamps and he himself is making an alteration in the case of drugs because of the difficulty he has had in getting the money. I heard of a case the other day where a retail druggist got $10 worth of stamps at the beginning of the imposition of this tax and he showed them to a man in his drawer still unused, the result being that the Government got nothing. In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred druggists forget to put the stamp on. If the retailers are going to forget to put the stamps on to anything like the same extent the minister is not going to get as much money out of this tax as he expects.

In regard to his courage and determination to be unpopular, let me remind him that Mr. Gladstone once said that a Chancellor of the Exchequer who was not prepared to face unpopularity in the discharge of his duty is not worth his salt because he is the custodian of the public finances and his first consideration ought to be the public good. But, in my hon. friend's extraordinary desire to be unpopular, which is somewhat abnormal amongst politicians, he should not lose sight of the necessity of getting an easy method of collecting the tax—or rather not easy but inexpensive. That is his first duty. In spite of his intense desire to be unpopular he must get the most money he can for the Government at the least possible expense.

The CHAIRMAN: This exchange of opinions between the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) and the hon. the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) is very interesting indeed but I must remind the committee that the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) has been entirely lost sight of. There is an amendment before the committee and under the rules the discussion must be relevant to that amendment until it has been disposed of.

Mr. FOSTER (York): I quite realize the enormous debt of over $2,000,000,000 that we have to meet consequent upon the war. We know that it is necessary to adopt special measures, and in some cases extreme measures, in order to obtain the revenue necessary to meet that debt. We were not satisfied with the Budget as it was originally introduced, but the Finance Minister now proposes many changes in connection with it. Whether or not that is the proper and logical thing to do is for the House and the people of this country to decide. The Finance Minister proposes changes in the taxation in connection with the boot and shoe trade, the tailoring trade, ladies' wearing apparel and other trades. He proposes to do that by taxing the excess over a certain amount—

The CHAIRMAN: I must immediately enforce the rule that has been laid down. I would ask the hon. member, for the present, to confine his remarks to the amendment. When that has been disposed of he will be perfectly in order in discussing the proposed changes.

Mr. FOSTER: I would like the chairman to read the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN: Mr. Lemieux proposes to amend the present resolution by inserting after the word "that" in the first line of the first paragraph, the following words:

Except in the case of returned soldiers who have seen active service overseas and their dependents, who shall be exempted from the said taxes for a period of five years from the date of the sanction of the Act to be based upon the present resolution.

In other words the amendment provides that returned soldiers shall be exempted from these taxes.

Mr. FOSTER (York): While this amendment may appeal to many members, and to many people throughout the country I do not think it will appeal to the majority of Canadians as a whole. We are prepared to assist the returned soldiers in every way that we can, and we have gone a long distance in that direction. In fact I think this Government has been more than generous in assisting the returned soldiers and their dependents in many ways. But when it is necessary to raise a revenue for the purpose of carrying on the business of the country, and to assist in its development, it is a question whether to grant and exemption, which will be so far-reaching in its scope, is the proper thing to do. Members have not had time to carefully consider whether they should support this amendment or not. On the face of it, however, it does not seem reasonable that we could accord the amendment support when it will have such far-reaching effect upon the revenue that we are trying to raise. I am afraid this amendment would deprive us of almost fifty per cent of the revenue that we are aiming at, and we would have to make up that deficiency from other sources. Therefore I do not think it would be in the best interest of the country to support an amendment of such a nature at this time. At the same time we all sympathize with its objects and if the financial position of the country warranted us in granting this exemption we would all be delighted to do it.

Mr. PEDLOW: I do not propose to enter upon an academic discussion of the principles of the Budget, or indeed to participate in the pleasing discussion which took place between the Minister of Finance and the member for Red Deer, but will confine myself to the amendment before the committee. There is no need, as the hon. member for Red Deer very correctly said, for any one to protest against the proposition when his sympathies are with the returned soldier and his dependents. But the amendment of the hon. member is altogether impracticable; in actual working out it would prove quite impossible. I remember very well a practice which at one time obtained in the retail trade of this country that will serve to illustrate the difficulties which would attend the operation of such a proposition. The practice in question was to give a special discount to certain privileged classes in the community. The retailers accorded a discount of ten per cent to dressmakers, to clergymen, to charitable institutions, and to the clerks in all the retail stores. Even had the privilege stopped there it would not, perhaps, have been an unmixed blessing. But unfortunately the dressmaker and her friends and her friends' friends obtained the discount and the same thing happened in the case of all the other classes who enjoyed the privilege. From my own personal experience I figured that ninety-five per cent of the retailers' customers enjoyed the privilege while the remaining five per cent, who lined up and paid the full price of their purchases and never obtained the discount, were discriminated against. The practice was discontinued and now no special favours of this kind are granted by the retail merchants. I am afraid that the same conditions that obtained when this discount was in force would be created if the attempt were made to put my hon. friend's amendment into operation. As a result of my experience in the case of the retailers' discount I cannot see my way to support the amendment.

Mr. LOGGIE: I am of the opinion that it is impracticable to put the amendment into execution. If you do not apply the taxation law to returned soldiers I presume you would have to grant a similar exemption to their families, and also to the relatives of deceased soldiers. It would be unfair if you did not carry out the exemption to that extent. Imagine, if you will, a customer buying a suit of clothes, or a dress, or a blouse, or some other garment in a large departmental store—

Mr. DUFF: Corsets.

Mr. LOGGIE: Very well, a pair of corsets. The customer notifies the clerk, "I am the wife of John Jones, a returned soldier" or she says, "I am the daughter of a returned soldier", or "I am from Vancouver and a returned soldier". Just imagine, if you please, the practical impossibility of executing such a proposal. In my judgment under all the circumstances it is not worth considering.

Mr. McKENZIE: Of course, the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Loggie) has said that this is an unspeakable and impracticable proposition, and I suppose that is the end of it. However, occasionally we have to differ from the hon. member and decline to follow him slavishly. But the hon. member from Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) was for many years a Minister of the Crown, and in experience and service in this House, although not older in years, he is a much older member than my hon. friend from Northumberland, and with all his experience and ability he has thought it advisable to put this amendment before the committee. I take the responsibility, therefore, of following in the footprints of my hon. friend from Maisonneuve and of saying that this proposal is not only worthy of favourable consideration at the hands of this committee, but that an effort should be made to carry it out. The men who served at the front and won for us the liberty which we now enjoy have earned for themselves for all time to come every possible freedom, and especially freedom from taxation of this kind. If at the date of his enlistment any soldier had made it a condition precedent that upon his return home he should be exempt from all war taxation, would not every one in this House and in the country have at once said: "Certainly, you go to the front and do your part, and on your return you shall never be called upon to pay any war taxes, for we acknowledge that you have done your part and deserve to be exempt from paying any of the expenses of the war"? Would not that have been regarded as an absolutely reasonable proposition? The Minister of Finance states that possibly the returned soldiers do not want to be exempted. Since his Budget Speech was delivered a gathering of returned soldiers in the city of Toronto considered this question and passed a resolution to the following effect:

—whereas the returned soldier and his dependents have already borne their share of the burdens of war, and contributed in invaluable services to the preservation and prosperity of the state, and whereas the recent raise in taxation as set forth in the Budget will increase the difficulty of getting re-established in a productive capacity by greatly augmenting the cost of living, all returned soldiers who have seen overseas service should be exempted from the new taxation for a period of at least five years. That the production of a discharge certificate be considered sufficient evidence of a right to this exemption. That legislation to this effect be enacted by the Parliament of Canada.

That, Sir, is a sufficient answer to the suggestion of the Minister of Finance that our returned men do not want this exemption. We have a right to suppose that this gathering of returned veterans in the city of Toronto—which contributed so much to the success of the war in men and money—expressed the true sentiments of the soldiers generally.

I am not going to labour the question, for it is clear to every one. We say that the soldier has done enough in winning the war, and that we who stayed at home should at least pay his bills while he was away. That is what we are asked to do—to exempt him from contributing towards the payment of our war debt. I have much pleasure in supporting the amendment of my hon. friend.

Amendment (Mr. Lemieux) negatived on division.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. PROULX: Before the resolution carries, Mr. Chairman, I desire to endorse the views of my hon. friends from Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark) and North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) that the tax could be more easily collected from the manufacturer and the wholesaler. There will be no less evasion if this method be adopted, and I cannot see that there would be any difficulty in putting it into practice. The Minister of Finance has spoken about stamps. Well, some retailers live quite a distance from the Inland Revenue Office, and as on some sales they will have to put thirty, forty or fifty cents they will have to keep a big stock of stamps on hand for each day's business. I favour collection of the tax from the wholesaler and the manufacturer instead of from the retailer.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Strathcona): I wish to support the contention raised by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) as to the feasibility of collection of certain of these proposed excise taxes. He raised the question of hats. A hat is an absolute necessity to every one in this country, but there is no distinction in the schedule between felt, straw, or canvas hats. My information is that no hat manufactured in Canada can be retailed to-day at $5; so that all Canadian made hats will come under the operation of this tax. If a man buys an imported hat—which may be economical in the long run—he cannot buy one under present day prices at less than $10 or $12, so he pays a very high price. There is another item of interest to which I desire to call the minister's attention, and that is underwear. The tax does not affect summer underwear at all, because summer underwear is made of cotton and is reasonably cheap and would therefore come within the exemption, but winter underwear will be taxed. This is a country that demands wool in the winter and the limit which the minister has placed on underwear will, in my judgment, compel everybody who wants to wear woollen underwear to pay this tax. Woollen underwear is not a luxury at all but an absolute necessity in this country in winter time. I notice that the minister has raised the exemption in the amended schedule to $3 a garment, but he has left the union suit at $5. Now, no one can buy a union suit that has any wool in it for $5. It might be called partially wool, but I doubt very much if there would be any wool in it. The consequence will be that every one who wears a union suit will be forced to pay this tax. So as far as that item is concerned the idea of this being a luxury tax is absolutely wiped out; it is a tax on a necessity. Now the purpose of the tax, as I understand it, is to tax luxuries only, or to get as close to luxuries as possible. As to articles of necessity, such as woollen underwear, I think the minister would be well-advised to revise his exemption list so that the people can wear woollen underwear in this country in winter without being mulcted for a fine of ten per cent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If the hon. gentleman will pardon my interrupting him, I would suggest to him that we will probably gain time, and information as well, if we take up the schedules item by item, confining the discussion to one item at a time. We have had a good deal of general discussion, and perhaps the hon. gentleman will agree that that is the best plan to adopt.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Strathcona): I am quite prepared to agree to that, but I thought the whole resolution was called.

The CHAIRMAN: I hope the hon. member for Strathcona will give way to the hon. Minister of Finance for, strictly speaking, the hon. member for Strathcona has the floor and the minister cannot interrupt him without his permission.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Strathcona): I will be glad to do so.

The CHAIRMAN: Sir Henry Drayton moves that this resolution be now considered section by section, paragraph by paragraph, and item by item, and that the debate be confined strictly to the item under consideration. Is it the pleasure of the committee to adopt the motion?

[Mr. Douglas.]

Mr. FIELDING: I quite agree that there will come a moment when we can better deal with this resolution item by item. In the meantime there has been a general discussion with regard to the method of collecting these taxes, and I do not think we should be shut off at this stage from this general discussion. If my hon. friend's object is to confine the discussion to one item at a time, I think he ought to wait until a later stage and let the general discussion proceed.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Might not a general discussion be had after we shall have considered the items separately? It well may be that such changes will be made when we are considering the items separately that the general issue will be somewhat changed.

Mr. BELAND: Is there any likelihood that there will be more alterations?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: You never can tell. Some hon. gentlemen are singularly persuasive.

Mr. BELAND: We understood these schedules were final.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There may be wisdom on the other side of the House that has not yet been uncorked.

Mr. BELAND: I have not yet spoken.

The CHAIRMAN: The motion could be amended to the effect that after the items have been separately considered a general discussion concerning the method of collection and the mode of taxation would be then in order.

Mr. FIELDING: I would not ask for a motion if my hon. friend so understands it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Quite.

The CHAIRMAN: With that understanding, is it the pleasure of the committee to adopt the motion?

Mr. DAVIS: Would it not be better to have that discussion first?

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): I endorse what fell first from my hon. friend for Shelburne and Queen's. These are new taxes of immense magnitude and of immense importance to the life of the people, as I think they will be so found in their application. Perhaps I have taken too much of the time of the committee myself, but there are other members who want to engage in a general discussion, and I do not think there should be any disposition to check it. This is not a divorce case. We are considering taxes that affect the whole people of Canada, and I strongly support the first suggestion of my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's that the general discussion should not be curtailed.

The CHAIRMAN: Perhaps the committee will allow the chairman to say a word. His position in connection with the resolution, if he is to assist the committee in making progress, is a very difficult one indeed. The rules provide that when we are discussing an item in committee, the speeches must be strictly relevant to the item under consideration. When we are discussing a Bill, the speeches must be strictly relevant to the clause under consideration. When a resolution is before the committee, the discussion, unless some motion to a different effect is made, may wander from one end of the resolution to the other. If a motion is made to the effect that the general principle of this resolution shall first be debated and that speeches be limited to a discussion of that general principle we shall make just as good progress as by adopting the motion which is now before the committee. The trouble is, however, that without a motion of this nature, an hon. member will give his ideas concerning the tax upon boots and shoes, another his ideas concerning underwear, and a third his ideas concerning watches and jewellery, and all these hon. members will, under the rules, be strictly in order. I think that the discussion should be limited to the general principle of the resolution, or it should be perfectly understood that we shall first go through the list item by item, and that when that has been done, the debate will be resumed upon the general principle of the resolution before the Chair.

Mr. BUREAU: May I be allowed to say a word? Mr. Chairman says that one member will rise and discuss boots, another watches, another hats, and so on. He stated the rules perfectly correctly that when we are discussing a Bill we discuss it clause by clause. As I understand it, clause No. 1 of this resolution is equivalent to a clause of a Bill, and (a), (b), (c), (d), etc., to subclauses, and therefore under the rules any articles mentioned in a subclause of clause 1, say, could be discussed when clause 1 was under consideration, and so on with clause 2 and the other clauses. The rules do not say that a clause shall be discussed phrase by phrase, and the items in these subclauses correspond to a phrase in a section of a Bill. It would be very difficult indeed to confine the discussion to only one of the many items enumerated in a subclause, such as hats, for instance. We are discussing the imposition of a tax on certain things, and I think, as a part of that and inherent in that, there is the way in which the tax shall be collected. These are all items which are supposed to form part of this tax. Would it be considered within order to discuss the mode of collection of this particular tax, or shall we have to confine ourselves to boots and shoes, pumps and slippers, and so on, and then discuss the mode of collecting the tax?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I thought we had already discussed at some length the mode of collecting the tax.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I have been waiting for an opportunity to say a word on that matter.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I sympathize with my hon. friend; but at least my hon. friend will think the best word has not yet been said on that matter, and I do not want the committee to be disappointed for one minute. The whole thing is that we should make some progress, and there is no good going round in a circle, arguing one minute on a principle and another minute on items having regard to particular commodities or cost. I am entirely in the hands of the committee. It does not make the slightest difference to me whether we start with items now and try to get all the items into our head, to understand each of them and the point at which the value shall be left with each of them, and then perhaps, with that additional information, deal with the question of principle, or whether we agree to discuss no items at all now, but merely the principle. We must make up our minds to discuss either one thing or the other, or the discussion will be interminable.

Mr. FIELDING: I do not think it is possible to draw a sharp line of demarcation between the principle and the details. While discussing the principle, one may have to draw illustrations from the details. I do not think it is possible to avoid that.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not think so.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): A general discussion will shorten the discussion in committee on the details.

Mr. FOSTER (York East): The members should have an opportunity of discussing the principle in the amended Budget.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I withdraw the motion for the moment.

Motion withdrawn.

Mr. McKENZIE: The other evening I called attention to the fact that it would be difficult for us to make progress on these resolutions with the numerous changes proposed. I have in my hand a copy of the Budget Speech in which the original resolutions appear, but they have been very materially changed. The minister may have a copy of the resolutions as amended, but I have not, and he is speaking of one thing and I have before me another. Every member should have in his hand a printed copy of the resolutions as amended. In that way we would get along faster.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I refer the hon. member to Hansard, page 3446.

The CHAIRMAN: The amendments were printed in Hansard of June 9, in detail, and they are also to be found in the Votes and Proceedings of yesterday.

At Six o'clock the committee took recess.

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE.

EXCISE TAX RESOLUTIONS CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE OF WAYS AND MEANS.

House again in Committee of Ways and Means, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN: When the committee rose at six o'clock the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Maisonneuve had been disposed of, and Mr. Douglas had the floor.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Strathcona): At six o'clock I was dealing with what I considered to be the inequalities in connection with the exemptions in the proposed Budget resolution now before the committee. I was calling attention to the fact that underwear of woollen texture could not be regarded as a luxury in this country; yet under the resolution every one wearing woollen underwear will have to pay. I think we ought to consider the question as to the way in which the exemptions will work out in practice. I am not criticising the Budget when I suggest to the minister that certain changes might be made in regard to the values which he has placed on these several goods for exemption purposes. When we come to the question of woollen goods we find that an article of woollen manufacture, namely, a sweater coat, is subject to the tax from $15 up, and yet a combination suit made of wool is taxed from $5 and upwards. The question of luxury does not enter into the case at all, and I suggest that that is a great inequality. Then we come to the question of suits of clothes. A suit of clothes is exempted up to $45, while an overcoat is exempted up to $50. There is more cloth contained in a suit of clothes than there is in an overcoat, and there is more expense entailed in manufacturing a suit of clothes than in manufacturing an overcoat. I am just pointing this out so that the minister, when he brings in his Bill, will not have to amend it after it is brought forward. There may be some other items of the same character and, as I understand that the minister proposes to discuss the resolutions item by item, I will defer any further criticism along that line until the items are taken up seriatim.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Mr. Chairman, I merely wish to submit the views of the Quebec Board of Trade and the Retailers' Association of Quebec as to the collection of these taxes. These views are along the line of the argument expressed and set forth by my hon. friend from Waterloo (Mr. Euler) this afternoon. I have heard many members since the beginning of this debate express the opinion that the best method of collection would be that the tax should be paid by the manufacturer or importer. The hon. the Minister of Finance has not given any answer to these representations and has not presented any argument why this system should not be adopted. The only hon. member who has expressed himself as opposed to that method of collecting the tax is the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt), and I must say I have not been much impressed with the soundness of his argument in that regard. I think the proposed mode of collecting the tax will hit the poor consumer more heavily than the wealthy consumer. The poor consumer usually buys from the small trader. The goods generally pass through three or four hands before reaching the small trader. The manufacturer sells to the jobber; the jobber to the wholesale merchant, the wholesale merchant to the retailer, and the tax of one per cent must be collected every time; so that at the end, in many instances, the consumer will have to pay three or four per cent instead of one per cent. On the other hand, the wealthy consumer buys in large stores where the trader usually buys directly from the manufacturer. Moreover, there are many merchants—I know there are some in my own riding—who manufacture many of the articles they sell, and in these cases the tax which will be paid will certainly be less than the tax which has to be paid by those who buy from the country merchant. I wish to read the resolution adopted by the Quebec Board of Trade. It is in the French language but, as the Minister of Finance is a scholar and is versed in both languages, I think it may be read in French, only he will have to listen to me if he wants to know what I read. It is as follows:

THE SALES TAX.

A resolution of the Quebec Board of Trade.

Thursday, May 27, 1920.

Whereas the Government, by their new sales and luxury taxes, are only anxious to lower the cost of living and to restrain extravagance, and at the same time increase their revenue;

The Quebec Board of Trade, after duly considering the new fiscal policy of the Government and without the least intention of protesting against the levying of new taxation, which it deems pressing and unavoidable, has nevertheless made up its mind to respectfully represent to the federal authorities that should they fail to bring in such changes as indicated by the board, they will certainly fail to attain those two laudable objects, and moreover unconsciously countenance fraud to their own detriment:

1. Because, all things considered, the one per cent sales tax hits only the poor consumer who usually buys from the small dealer alone. Now it is known that goods pass through the hands of at least three classes of middlemen before reaching the small dealer; the manufacturer sells to the jobber; the jobber to the wholesale merchant, the wholesale merchant to the retailer, and the tax of one per cent must be collected at every stage, so that at the end, the poor consumer has to pay a tax of four per cent upon the goods he buys.

As for the rich consumer the conditions are not the same; he buys generally in the large stores, and the big merchant buys as a rule from the manufacturer directly;

2. Because the collection of these duties will certainly necessitate, in the store as well as in the Finance Department, employment of a large supplementary staff of clerks and accountants; and as there is at present a great scarcity of labour, merchants will be forced to draw new hands from the country at a time when production is everywhere so much needed; this will bring inevitably a new increase in wages and salaries and a consequent increase in the cost of living.

As we already have pointed out the new taxes on sales and on luxuries, under the present circumstances, will certainly tend to stimulate the peddling trade and encourage fraud. It is a well known fact that the small country merchants and the peddlers do not keep books; therefore it will not be an easy task for the officers of the Government to get an accounting of the sales made by these people and to collect the duties: then, they will have to meet with deception on the part of peddlers and country store-keepers.

It is a well known fact too that many merchants manufacture, themselves, goods which they retail in their own stores; these merchants will escape the 1 per cent tax on these goods to the great detriment of their less fortunate brethren who have to get the same goods from the wholesale merchants.

Therefore the members of the Quebec Board of Trade respectfully suggest to the Government to collect directly from the manufacturer or from the importer, at the port of entry, as the case may be, the taxes on sales and on luxuries. They suggest moreover to the Government to increase from 1 to 2 or 3 per cent the special duty on sales if it has reason to believe that the tax of the 1 per cent collected from the manufacturer alone will not bring sufficient revenue.

By collecting the tax on sales and on luxuries at the source of supply, or at the port of entry, as the case may be, the said duties will then strike equally every class of buyer, the collection will certainly be more efficient, and trade will not be paralyzed by the impediment and the costly annoyance of a supplementary staff of clerks and accountants.

T. LEVASSEUR,
Secretary.

The Retailers' Association of Quebec has also sent a resolution in which the same principle is enunciated. It reads:

Quebec, May 27, 1920.

At a general meeting of the Retail Merchants' Association, specially called to consider how the retail merchants will fare following the imposition of a Federal Government tax on goods called luxuries, the following resolution was adopted unanimously:

After having studied this important question affecting seriously the retail trade and considering everything carefully and realizing the duty of every one to help this Government make good Canada's financial obligations, and animated by the best of dispositions, the Retail Merchants' Association respectfully suggest the following amendments to the proposals contained in the various resolutions of the Minister of Finance of Canada, and which are just now before the House of Commons.

Whereas there are over 500 retail merchants for every manufacturer, wholesaler or jobber, the luxury tax should be collected by them and charged to the retail merchants when they make their purchases from the manufacturer. This system would be less cumbersome, doing away with a lot of accounting and would imply less collection expenses for the Government and be easily the surest way to obtain the best results from taxation.

In the event of the Minister of Finance not granting the above suggestions, that the following changes be made on the maximum fixed prices:

No tax on muffs not exceeding $35; from $35 to $125, 10 per cent; over $125, 20 per cent. No tax on neckpieces and scarfs not exceeding $50; from $50 to $150, 10 per cent; over $150, 20 per cent.

That the prices fixed by the existing law should be made higher with the object of facilitating taxation on luxuries. We suggest that the prices should be as follows:

| | | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| Shoes (with the exception of working shoes) | $12.00 | instead of | $9.00 |
| Men's hats | 8.00 | " | 5.00 |
| Caps, men's and boys' | 3.00 | " | 2.00 |
| Silk socks for men | 2.00 | " | 1.00 |
| Neckties | 2.00 | " | 1.50 |
| Mufflers and scarfs | 5.00 | " | 1.50 |
| Suits | 60.00 | " | 45.00 |
| Coats and cloaks (men's and women's) | 70.00 | " | 45.00 |
| Shirts | 4.50 | " | 3.00 |
| Silk stockings for women | 3.50 | " | 2.00 |
| Smoking jackets and dressing gowns | 12.00 | " | 3.00 |
| Gloves (without fur) | 4.50 | " | 3.00 |
| Dresses and gowns | 55.00 | " | 45.00 |
| Ladies' suits | 70.00 | " | 60.00 |
| Fur coats | 100.00 | | |
| Velvet and silks, from | $2.00 | per yard. | |
| Lace | .25 | " | |
| Ribbon | .50 | " | |

That patent medicines are not luxuries, but in the contrary are of first necessity for the poor who are sick and for the working class. Patent medicines should not be subject to a luxury tax.

As stated in that resolution there are more than five hundred retailers for every manufacturer or wholesaler. There is no doubt that it would be a much simpler, much fairer and more practicable method of collecting those taxes if they were collected from the manufacturers or importers rather than from the retailers. In addition to that, there are in the country districts small traders who do not keep books, or only to a very limited extent, and there are peddlers who go from township to township selling to the farmers. I would like to know how the tax is to be collected from these peddlers? Most obviously these people will have all opportunities to evade this taxation. I think the representations of the Quebec Board of Trade are fair and just, and that it would be much better to collect these taxes at the source, viz., from the manufacturer or importer. I would like to know what are the reasons for the contrary, for the Minister of Finance has not yet given any argument against this mode of collection which is favoured by so many people?

Upon Sir Henry Drayton and Mr. Foster rising at the same time.

The CHAIRMAN: Mr. Foster has the floor?

Mr. FOSTER (York): I will yield to the Minister of Finance.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think my hon. friend from Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) was probably out of the Chamber when this matter was discussed before. The reasons why the obviously easy method of collection was not adopted are: First, it was felt that taking the tax from the manufacturer and from the wholesaler, rather than from the retailer, directly added to the high cost of living; and, second, the purchaser would not know he was paying the tax in connection with any article he might happen to buy. For example, if he bought boots of a certain quality he would not know that he was paying a tax on those boots. He would not know, if he bought less expensive boots that not only was he saving money but he was also escaping the tax. That the tax be put on at the source is really what the Board of Trade of Quebec suggests,—as I gathered from the resolution which the hon. member kindly allowed me to read. Although I could not quite follow it in all its details, it seemed to me that their idea was that the tax in each case should be collected at its source. Now, our experience has been that if you collect it at its source, not only is the tax passed on but a large profit on top of it. Let me illustrate. We put a tax on cigarettes, following exactly the line of action that is now proposed by hon. gentlemen. That tax was only three cents, but because it was put on at the source, instead of being collected by the retailer from the purchaser, ten cents additional had to be paid by the purchaser for every package of cigarettes he bought. Instead of increasing the high cost of living we would like, if possible, to reduce that cost; and we know that if the tax is put on at the source, instead of being paid by the purchaser at the time he buys an article, these taxes will tend to inflate rather than to reduce the high cost of living.

Mr. EULER: Could the minister explain why he adopts this principle in some cases and not in others? For example I quoted this afternoon the matter of phonographs, pianos and musical instruments in general, and I might have added other things such as chewing gum, candy, confectionery and cameras. Why does the minister collect at the source the tax on these articles while pursuing a different policy in other cases. If it is a good plan to follow in the one instance one would think it would be a good plan to adopt in the other.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The hon. member's question is a perfectly proper one. But he will agree with me that there is a difference in respect to the articles themselves. There are things you have to have; there are things you can get along without. Now with respect to things you can get along without you obviously adopt the easy method which is going to get you your money without trouble. Pianos and other musical instruments, candy and chewing gum are not essential.

An hon. MEMBER: Automobiles.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In the same way automobiles are not essential, so we have taxed them at the source. They are things which people can get along pretty well without if they want to, and they are taxed at the source. But when you come down to essential things such as boots, clothing and the like, the situation is entirely different. Now it may be that we have not sufficiently observed that principle throughout this list of commodities. I would suggest, however, to hon. gentlemen that in considering the question of the incidence of the tax the distinction should always be borne in mind. If in these proposals we have not kept these distinctions properly in mind I think we should do so. The broad, general principle which we are trying to get at is this: To raise money in the easiest way, if you like when the raising of the money in that way is not adding to the inescapable cost of living; but when you have to raise money out of articles which are essential we think there should be no added profit placed on those articles. We think that the man who buys should know he can get an essential without paying any tax at all; and that he should have the option of paying a tax for the more expensive articles if he likes, and should then pay that tax without any added profit—either to the manufacturer, to the wholesaler or to the retailer—on that tax.

Mr. McMASTER: Might I just say a word in reply to the argument advanced by the Minister of Finance?

The CHAIRMAN: Mr. Foster, who a few minutes ago gave way to the minister, has the floor.

Mr. FOSTER (York): We know the tremendous debt which has been created in this country by reason of the war, and that we must of necessity seek fresh channels for getting a revenue to meet the demands of that debt. We also know that some of the Government's taxation proposals have created a tremendous feeling. Nevertheless, in spite of that feeling, the Minister of Finance must do his duty and collect, if possible, the necessary Revenue. For my part I do not entirely concur in his methods of raising revenue. The minister has modified his Budget to some extent in regard to the excess taxes on certain lines of business and this no doubt will be appreciated by many merchants, but in taking this action has he not created a prejudice in the minds of merchants engaged in other lines of business, for naturally they will feel that they too should be granted a similar concession and should pay tax only upon the excess price? I think the minister's action is not popular.

It has been suggested by the retail merchants that as there are only 8,000 manufacturers and wholesalers in this Dominion the collection of the luxury tax might be confined to them, in preference to spreading the collection over some 200,000 retail merchants. By imposing the collection of this tax on the retailer the minister has created a distinct hardship, and any hon. member who has been in the retail business will readily appreciate what I say. The majority of retail merchants are not in a large way of business, and many of the smaller merchants run their stores with very litttle help. But by imposing on them the duty of collecting this sale tax you oblige them to employ extra help to keep track of this collection, and those merchants cannot afford the extra expense. The result will be that thousands of them will be forced out of business and their trade will fall into the hands of the larger merchants, who will, and can, take advantage of the public in many ways that are impossible to the smaller dealer. It is a material advantage to many small consumers to be able to do business with these smaller stores, and I have noticed that in many cases their lower overhead expenses enable the small retailers to dispose of their goods to the public at more favourable prices to the consumer than the same goods can be bought for from the larger dealers and the departmental stores. It is apparent therefore that one tendency of collecting this sales tax from the retailer will be a restriction of the retail business to the larger retail stores and the departmental stores. The latter have a decided advantage already over their small competitors, for they are able to buy in large volume and their quick turnover enables them to sell at a very small margin of profit.

I think the minister should give this part of his Budget proposals very serious consideration, and if he will take into his confidence some of these small retail merchants I am sure they will be able to convince him of the necessity of shifting the collection of this sales tax onto the manufacturers and wholesalers. The latter can very well place the amount of the tax on the price of their goods, so that the retailer will not have to tell his customers that he has no set price, but that it varies according to the amount of war tax any particular line of goods has to bear. As things are, the public will blame the retail merchant, not the Government, simply because they do not understand the situation. By making the change I suggest a great hardship would be removed from these 200,000 retail merchants as well as their customers, and no disadvantage would accrue to the Government, because there can be no doubt that the collection from the manufacturers and wholesalers will be absolutely effective and will bring in to the treasury the maximum amount of revenue at a much lower cost of collection.

Through the imposition of this sales tax the Government is the most unpopular that Canada has had since Confederation. It is unpopular because of the composition of the Cabinet and because of its doing the wrong thing at the wrong time. It has shown much extravagance at a time when there should be rigid economy. The Budget and the method of collecting these new taxes will I am afraid, wreck this Government unless modifications are made in time. The unpopularity of the Minister of Finance and of his colleagues is going to create trouble, and it is just as well that we should talk plainly and warn the Government in time before it gets on the rocks. We know from the large deputations coming to Ottawa that our business men generally are dissatisfied with the excise and sales taxes, and by this time surely the minister ought to be convinced that some other method should be adopted which will bring into the treasury a revenue equal to the amount that he hopes to get under this system and at a much less cost.

The biscuit manufacturers have made representations to the members of this House and to the Government against the imposition of a special tax on sugar-coated or powdered biscuits, which will affect only a part of the biscuit industry. It may seem a small matter, but to the biscuit manufacturers it is of great importance, and they say that if the tax is enforced it will throw hundreds of their employees out of work. They have suggested, and I think it is a reasonable suggestion, that instead of confining this tax to a particular line of biscuits it should be applied to all sweet biscuits, so that there would be no discrimination against certain manufacturers, and at the same time a larger revenue would accrue to the treasury.

Then we have the manufacturers of musical instruments who have made representations to the minister in regard to the manner in which their business will be prejudiced by some of his proposals. Already in Toronto two large musical instrument factories have been closed down. There are hundreds of men out of employment to-day on account of the Government adopting this method of collecting the revenue. The exemption is up to $200, but to limit it to that will mean the manufacture of a very cheap instrument of much inferior quality and of less service to the public. If the exemption were increased up to $400 a far superior instrument would be manufactured. It is contended that any piano costing more than $200 is a luxury. I do not consider a piano a luxury, but a necessity, in the homes of the working people. Every member of this House who has visited the homes of working people of this country knows that ninety per cent of them have musical instruments in their homes, either a piano, an organ or some other instrument. I have known many families with three, four and five partly-grown children spending the most entertaining part of their lives in enjoying music in their homes. Take the music away from their homes, and what becomes of these young boys and girls? We all know how music charms and how a musical evening will keep young people home. All of us who have heard the excellent music at a church service or at public gatherings know how soothing it is. How we all praise it! I say that if you take music out of the homes of the working people, these four or five half-grown children without that attraction in the home will go out and spend the evening in the streets and at cheap picture shows and other places that do not tend to the moral welfare of the family so much as having a gathering of the neighbour's children and your own at a musical evening in the home. I trust that the minister will take into consideration the advisability of making some change in this tax. If he goes on as he proposes to do, he will drive the manufacturers out of business, and therefore he will have no opportunity of collecting this revenue. It might result in cheaper instruments being manufactured, but that would be a disadvantage to the people. I trust, therefore, that the minister will raise the exemption to not less than $400, so that he will not drive out of Ontario and the city of Toronto the working men who are engaged in these industries.

The Electrical Supply people have also put forward very strong arguments why they should not be taxed 20 per cent. I do not know whether the minister has been convinced by their arguments, but I certainly sympathize with these people as well as with other manufacturers. The poor man who has built his home must equip it with electrical fixtures, especially in the large cities where electricity is supplied so cheaply and where it is such a convenience to the householder. This tax will mean that the electrical fixtures for the ordinary home will cost from $30 to $35 extra. Now, that is a very great hardship on a poor man, and he will have to go back to the old antiquated method of lighting by gas or candle. We should help the working men to progress, not go back. This Government should assist these people to get the modern methods of lighting in their homes, rather than impose this tax upon electrical fixtures.

The fur manufacturers have also put forward very strong arguments. We know how necessary it is in this northern country to have furs for our comfort in winter. Last year we had a severe winter of four or five months. What a hardship this taxing of furs will be to the people of this country who need furs in winter time. This is another matter which should be given serious consideration. It concerns raw materials produced in our own country, and I trust the minister will reconsider the tax he has imposed on these articles.

The Minister of Finance remarked that we must conscript the business men of Canada to collect the excise and sales taxes for the Government. It is one thing to conscript them, and another to get results. The Government has had experience of conscription in the past, and I think this latest form of conscription will be just as unpopular. The minister should have got away from that method, but if he must conscript the business men of this country he should have required only the manufacturers and the wholesalers, not the retailers, to collect the tax.

Here is another instance of the tremendous effect these taxes are going to have on industry and the development of our country:

> The Canadian Columbia Graphophone Co., Limited, which, in good faith, believing that Canada offered ideal conditions for the manufacture of grafonolas, graphophones and records, bought the plant of the Canadian Aeroplanes, Limited, located in Toronto, on Dufferin and Lappen streets, which occupies 235,000 feet of floor space, for $600,000, paying Canadian people this money.
>
> They are spending $2,000,000 on an equipment; and were planning to spend $3,000,000 for materials, when, like a bolt from the blue, came the announcement of the removal of the 7½ per cent special import tax, and the imposition of an excise tax, that, when examined, clearly defined all the instruments and articles produced by the Canadian Columbia Graphophone Company as luxuries, thereby handicapping the firm by an excise tax of 20 per cent.
>
> Realize what this means!
>
> This great Canadian undertaking is halted to see what will be done.
> Orders have been cancelled for thousands of instruments, and labour is being laid off; and a great Canadian plant, which would soon have been in full blast, giving employment to 4,000 people and a living to 10,000 people, with a pay roll of $120,000 per week, or $6,000,000 per year, held up indefinitely, and Canada, the land which has in the past made special pleas for the establishment of just such an undertaking as this, loses a large and paying industry, and Canadians are thrown out of employment. * * * The wages in Canada are higher. Take, for instance, the Columbia companies pay the following:

In U.S.A., carpenters, 65c per hour; Canada, 80c per hour.

In U.S.A., millwrights, 65c per hour; Canada, 75c per hour.

In U.S.A., toolmakers, 90c per hour; Canada, $1.10 per hour.

In U.S.A., labour, 42c per hour; Canada, 48c to 50c per hour.

In considering the carrying on of this industry in Canada, these facts must be borne in mind. It only goes to show more clearly the necessity for protection.

We see now the great disadvantage that concerns of this kind will be under which purpose spending some $6,000,000 a year in wages. We are handicapping that industry, possibly driving it out of business. We see the disadvantage this is to the progress and development of this country, and we do not want to do anything that is going to hinder or prevent that progress and development. We are always boosting, praising, advocating, methods of development and encouraging manufacturers to come into Canada and invest their capital in order to help build up and develop this great country and make use of its millions of dollars' worth of raw material. This is a concern of that character which wants to use raw materials of various kinds in order to supply the people of this country with instruments which will create pleasure and enjoyment in their homes and promote contentment and good citizenship. Therefore, in considering the various matters that have been presented to the members of this House, the Minister of Finance should seek to do away with anything that might be the means of hindering the development and growth of this country or of creating further unrest, and to do everything that will assist in making the people of Canada peaceable and happy. I trust the minister will take into consideration the various arguments and suggestions that have been drawn to his attention in connection with the Budget. There is no doubt that he must have been convinced to some extent by the arguments of hon. members and the various deputations who have presented their cases to him, because he conceded a very great point, namely, the "excess" tax on many articles. In doing that, however, I am afraid he has created a prejudice along other lines, because he has not made that principle apply generally. It should have been made general or the method should have been changed completely. I would advise a change in the method of collection from the retailers to the wholesalers and manufacturers, or that some better proposition be worked out, but we should get away from the present method. As I have said, it is unpopular, and if we were forced to the country at this moment, the impression this tax has created might have a considerable effect on the result.

Mr. EULER: A few minutes ago I asked the minister to explain why he adopted the plan of collecting taxes at the source of supply in some instances and from the retailer in others. He said that that was a fair question and he answered it in this way, that those taxes which were collected at the source of supply were taxes on non-essentials, and perhaps the word to some extent applied to the commodities which he mentioned. I would not, however, for one moment admit that at least one item included in the list of articles which he classed as non-essentials is a non-essential, and that one is medicine. But I am not going to dwell on that except in so far to point out an inconsistency there. But if it be true that this tax is to be collected on what the minister calls non-essentials, I suppose it ought to follow that the method which he adopts in taxing the retailer is to be applied to things which are essentials. The minister nods in assent to that. I should like to ask him whether in this list upon which taxes are collected by the retailer in order to avoid pyramiding of profits, he considers the following articles essentials:—embroideries of silk, velvets, velveteens, plush and silk fabrics, cut glassware, ivory-handled cutlery, clocks, cigar and cigarette holders in excess of $2.50; oriental rugs, gold and silver-handled pocket knives and pencils; gold, silver, ebony and ivory toiletware. Perhaps that is sufficient for the purpose of my argument. I contend that those articles are not at all essentials, and I cannot see any reason why those, as being non-essentials, should not be included in the same list on which taxes are collected at the source of supply. I would go just a step further. The minister has now adopted the principle of collecting a tax only on the excess value of certain articles, that is, he makes the tax apply at the point where those articles become luxuries, as I think they have been termed. If the tax is to be applied only on things which have become luxuries, such as trunks in excess of $40 each, purses and pocket-books in excess of $2 each, and many other things, even including wearing apparel after it reaches a certain point, I do not think that ought to be any consideration as regards the method of collection, namely of collecting the tax through the retailer.

I should also like to point out to the minister that the final cost to the consumer will become greater than it otherwise would be if this tax is collected on goods at the source of supply. I am strongly of the opinion that the retailer who is going to be put to all this expense and trouble will see to it that he is reimbursed for that expense and trouble, and the article will cost just so much more to the consumer.

Mr. BALDWIN: If I am any judge of the arguments that have been advanced, the hon. member for Algoma East (Mr. Nicholson), the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt), and the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Béland) gave the best evidence that I have heard in this House why this tax should not be collected from the retailer. There are, let us say, 200,000 retail merchants in this vast country, more than half of whom are very small traders keeping general stores. Probably 50 per cent of them are endowed with keen minds, but are deficient in bookkeeping. I have been in trade for forty years, and I know something of what the small country store is. There might not be in such a store any article that will be taxable with, perhaps, the exception of ribbons. The hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Béland) mentioned that the sale of a yard of ribbon costing fifteen cents will compel a merchant to make out a monthly report for a cent and a half. That will be a great effort for the merchant, and the Government will secure very little revenue.

There are ways of avoiding this tax. Who is going to collect the tax from the pack-pedlars, the one-horse pedlars, the four-horse pedlars, who are going throughout the country now selling clothes, shoes and other commodities and who do not pay anything for the upkeep of schools, even for the upkeep of the roads on which they travel?

9 p.m. There is another person who will endeavour to evade this tax. I refer to the favoured few. The wealthy person will go past the retailer down to the wholesaler or manufacturer and will purchase expensive goods there. It can be proved to-day that in the city of Toronto a lady was seen in a wholesale drygoods store buying large quantities of silk by the yard.

Let us see how this tax will affect those 200,000 retailers if they have to make monthly reports. I will ask the minister if this report is supposed to be made at the end or the beginning of every month? The minister gives me no answer. I say, Mr. Chairman, that the collection of the tax in the way the minister proposes will necessitate the employment of an army of clerks in Ottawa and the amount of revenue that will be derived from these retail merchants will not be enough to pay the expenses in connection with the auditing of the accounts. This is going to add thousands of employees to the Civil Service, to say nothing of the enormous scale on which evasion will be practised. I see that the minister is not paying very much attention to the discussion and I suppose it does not amount to much, so far as he is concerned. Let us consider what a vast number of clerks it will take to audit these two hundred thousand monthly accounts, and we can easily form some idea as to the expense the collection of this tax will involve. Do you imagine for a moment that fifty per cent of these people will contribute enough to the treasury to pay the clerks who will be engaged in auditing the accounts? The minister's colleague, the Minister of Marine (Mr. Ballantyne), has built up a business, and he must know that what we need in business more than anything else is to see that our revenue is not eaten up by overhead expenses. The hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) referred the other night to retail merchants doing business of $1,000-odd a day. Why, Sir, apart from the large departmental stores in Canada, there are not a score of merchants in the country who do business of such dimensions. Indeed, many merchants do no more than a thousand dollars' worth of business a month, and they handle everything from a needle to an anchor, including grindstones. I can only see a mass of trouble ahead of the minister if he is going to collect the taxes in this way. Every wholesale house throughout the country has a good accounting system. It keeps a bookkeeper who has a perfect system of accounting, and it is in every way equipped to keep every sort of record. And the importer has a bonded warehouse and can easily add the taxation to his invoice. In this way you would get your money in a lump sum, and while it would be considerable its collection would require only one-tenth of the time and clerical work on the part of the civil servants which would be necessary if the proposed system is followed.

I would suggest to the minister also to lower the valuation of the goods on the manufacturers and importers say 25 per cent more than on the retailer; and possibly there might be exemptions in regard to goods going to hospitals. I have listened attentively to all that has been said in the discussion of this subject and I have so far failed to hear one argument that really justifies the minister's proposal in regard to the collection of the taxes. The minister says that we need money. We all know that, and I do not think that any one has attempted to gainsay the fact. I have not heard any one advancing the argument that there should not be a system of taxation. Matters of detail may have been discussed, but I have not heard any one contend that we do not need to raise money. But the question in dispute is as to the method of collecting that money, and I say that if this proposed system of collection is put into operation it will be the greatest mistake ever perpetrated in this country. I was told that a lady went into a store to buy a $12 hat, but when the merchant said that she had to pay $1.20 upon it she declined to have it; and the same thing applies to shoes and boots.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the minister should realize that it is important to have retail merchants throughout the country, because people will not be induced to go into back settlements unless they know that there are stores in those places where they can obtain their necessities; therefore nothing should be done to hamper those merchants. When the Act was passed imposing on certain merchants the obligation of affixing stamps by way of duty to the goods they sold, a great deal of trouble resulted and there was a great attempt on the part of many people throughout the country to evade the law. Now this is a monstrous mistake and the minister would de well to consider the representations that have been made to him before putting his proposal into effect. The retail merchant is prepared to bear his share of the burden, but this system will entail a considerable hardship on him. As I have said, it will require a tremendous overhead expenditure to collect this tax. As the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) has pointed out, the retailers of the country, under this proposed scheme, would virtually be in the employ of the Government, doing work for which they would not be paid, and you could not blame them for being antagonistic to such a proposal. If the minister is anxious to put money into the treasury, let him impose a tax on the manufacturer and the importer, and that will cover all. But this is a most stupendous and stupid piece of business, for the reason that the overhead expenses in the collection of the tax will consume all the revenue derived.

Mr. FIELDING: If the minister has definitely made up his mind to adhere to this method of collecting, I do not suppose that it is of much use to discuss the matter further. But if as he said this afternoon —and I commend him for the expression— he is still keeping an open mind to learn whatever can be learned, I respectfully say that I hope that even yet he will reconsider this matter. It seems to me that the arguments that have been advanced in favour of the present system are not strong, while the arguments in support of a different system appear to me to be almost unanswerable. There is one reason my hon. friend might advance for his present system; I wonder if it has been in the back of his head all the time and he has been too bashful to express it. If he collects this tax at the source, the source being either the manufacturer, the wholesaler or possibly the importer,—at all events the wholesaler,—he will not get the tax once but under the system that he is adopting he is going to get the tax at least three or four times. He can multiply this tax to the consumer. For my hon. friend to argue that by this system he is going to prevent an increase in the cost of living is quite beyond my comprehension. I think it is entirely a mistake on his part. Let us take an illustration. Suppose a large manufacturer is about to sell $400 or $500 worth of high class goods to a wholesaler. Of course, the tax is not imposed on the whole value of the goods. The tax is only on the excess and it is only the excess that we are now taking into account. That excess will be, say, $100—it is possible that on goods of a value of $400 or $500 there will be $100 of excess. On that excess there will be a tax of $15 when the wholesaler buys the goods. There is a tax on the profits piling up all the time but we need not stop to consider that because that is something that is created by the tax. The wholesaler pays $115 for the taxable portion of the goods. Adding to that his profit before he sells to anybody else he will sell at an advance, I will say, at the moderate rate of ten per cent. That ten per cent enters into the selling price and it is on the selling price that you are levying the tax. The wholesaler will sell those goods at $115 plus a profit, and the tax, when the goods get into the hands of the retailer, will be at least $17.25. Thus the goods pass to the retailer. The retailer also gets his profit, and he fixes his selling price after he has added his profit. You will find that in that transaction on goods passing only through three hands—it may be through four by including the jobber—under your system, you will collect at least three taxes. But, instead of getting 15 per cent as my hon. friend proposes, the tax on these goods, passing through the hands of these three different parties, will amount to about 60 per cent, and if you put the jobber in between the manufacturer and the wholesaler, instead of that parcel of goods paying 15 per cent, it pays nearly 100 per cent into the treasury. If my hon. friend wants to get the money in that way, I admit at once that he is going to get it by collecting three or four taxes instead of one. And it all comes down in the end to the consumer. Does any one imagine for a moment that the manufacturer, the wholesaler or the retailer is going to pay that tax without adding it to his price? What was urged by so many hon. members here to-day, what was urged by the French Chamber of Commerce of Montreal in the resolution that I presented last night, what was urged by the Quebec Board of Trade in the resolution read to-day by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe), what was urged by the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) and by the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Baldwin) are all arguments why the tax should be levied at the source. I admit that if my hon. friend adopts that plan he will only get the tax once, but if he says frankly that he wants to get it three or four times I can understand what he is driving at. If that is his idea, do not ask the people to believe that they are only paying 15 per cent when they are paying 60 or 70 per cent and possibly even more. I believe that is a mistake. If my hon. friend says that he has to have it, that is an argument that is understandable.

My hon. friend from Standstead (Mr. Baldwin) has not exaggerated the case when he speaks of the irritation, worry and unnecessary expenditure that will be caused to retailers by the system which my hon. friend proposes. I do not want to dwell on the situation longer. It seems to me that there is everything to be said in favour of direct taxation at the source unless my hon. friend says that he cannot get enough at the source and that he must get it over and over again in order to get his revenue. But he has not put it on that ground and I do respectfully ask him before this Bill is finally through to give consideration to the views which have been so strongly expressed to-night by hon. members of this House.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would like very much to be able to follow the argument of my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding), but I confess that I am at a loss. I dare say that it may be entirely my own fault. I know he will bear with me because I desire to fully comprehend the different positions that are taken. After all, the great thing to do is to try and get at the right thing in connection with this whole question. My hon. friend starts at the source with a 15 per cent tax, he runs it down from the manufacturer or importer, to the wholesaler, jobber and retailer; and instead of it being a 15 per cent tax, the hon. gentleman says it will be more like 60 per cent. I would have appreciated that argument if my hon. friend had been arguing in favour of the proposal which has been brought down because precisely what my hon. friend says, is what would happen if we did tax at the source. It is pyramiding that my hon. friend speaks of, and I am not saying that he is not right in illustrating it. But you cannot pyramid unless you go back to the source. If you take the very last transaction, there is no room for pyramiding. I do not want to get that 60 per cent. I do not want to multiply taxes in the name of a single tax. As I understand it—I may be entirely wrong—there is no way of working the tax back from the retailer to the jobber or the wholesaler or the manufacturer. The transaction is concluded with the retailer; it is finished; it is done. It commences and ends in that one single transaction. But, on the other hand, if it commences at the source and works down to all the different forms, my hon. friend is absolutely correct; it does multiply.

Mr. FIELDING: Under the system proposed by various speakers of taxing at the source, my hon. friend would get one tax in connection with that transaction on $100. Under the system he proposes he will get four taxes, or at least three. There is no dispute about that, is there?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is where I do not follow my hon. friend.

Mr. FIELDING: Each one of these transactions pays the tax?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No.

Mr. FIELDING: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Not with the luxury tax.

Mr. FIELDING: I am only dealing with the excess. I take a parcel of boots or shoes worth $400 or $500 of which $100 is excess. Of the value of that whole parcel you take $100 on which the tax is levied. When the manufacturer sells to the wholesaler there is a tax of 15 per cent, but when the wholesaler sells to the retailer there is another tax paid. When the retailer sells to the public, there is another tax paid. Am I right in that?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend is wrong. I quite understand how the mistake occurred. Just at present we are only talking of this so-called luxury tax.

Mr. FIELDING: Boots and shoes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Quite so, fifteen per cent on the excess over the prices fixed. Now there is only the one tax paid under the proposition made by the Budget, because the tax only commences when the sale ends, with the retailer. There is nothing else.

Mr. McMASTER: It doesn't say so, does it?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think it does say so.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: What about the one per cent?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Now we are getting to another question entirely. The one per cent tax is entirely different from the taxes we are now discussing.

Mr. DUFF: Not at all.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: An hon. gentleman says "not at all" I would ask that hon. gentleman—

Mr. DUFF: The one per cent is added to the price.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think, Mr. Chairman, we had really better try to stick to one resolution at a time. We are having a great deal of difficulty in dealing with that one resolution, long as it is, and we will have very much greater difficulty if we run into others. There is nothing in this resolution as to the one per cent tax. It does not touch this question at all; but to the extent that it does touch it, you multiply taxes if you bring taxes back to the source. It is perfectly true, with respect to the one per cent, that although there is a provision that tax shall not be brought into the ordinary costs of the manufacturer, it is cost to the wholesaler and it is cost to the jobber—you cannot get away from it.

Mr. DUFF: What about the cost to the retailer?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: To the extent that it is cost to the wholesaler and cost to the jobber it is an item on which some profit will undoubtedly be charged. That being so—and I do not think there can be any room for debate about it—the other incident is also true: That if you carried back this fifteen per cent to where you start with your one per cent you get the exact result described by my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding). We have absolutely only the one tax on luxuries. It is true we have a multiple of taxes on sales on the one per cent; we have got our one per cent from the manufacturer, and we have got our one per cent from the wholesaler; and in effect what is asked —when it is suggested that we should change the species of taxation—is to take this fifteen per cent and place it first where the first of the one per cent commences, having the exact effect the hon. gentleman has pointed out. But we do not want that. That is one reason why, so far, we have not attempted to go away from the tax on the retailer, because the results pointed out by the hon. gentleman would follow.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: What about the expense of collection in the two cases?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There I agree with my hon. friend we would save, absolutely save money on taxing the source. It is just a question which is the right thing to do.

Mr. McMASTER: Might I point this out to the minister: It seems to me what the hon. member (Mr. Fielding) has said was due to the fact that he did not realize —I did not realize myself—the signification of the words "when sold separately" found in the concluding line of the first resolution before the subsections appear. But that is hardly as clear as it might be. I think you should say "when sold separately to the ultimate consumer". For instance, if you take a very expensive fur garment—I understand there are some fur garments sold at a price as high as $20,000—you could easily imagine that one of these would be sold separately by a wholesaler to a retailer, and then there would be ten per cent or $2,000 collected. The retailer might sell that garment again and then there would be—even under the wording of this clause— another $2,000 added and the argument of the hon. member (Mr. Fielding) would absolutely fit the case. The hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Henders) shakes his head; I think he is wrong and that I am right. The wording of the clause is:

That the following excise taxes be imposed, levied and collected on the total purchase price of the articles hereinafter specified, and on articles of clothing the said tax may be imposed upon the combined selling price of materials and cost of manufacture when sold separately.

Now let us take my fine fur garment costing $20,000. Such garments are probably not often bought in the West, except perhaps in Winnipeg, but they are sold sometimes in Montreal. Now I can imagine a fur manufacturer selling a $20,000 garment to a wholesaler, and on that sale he would charge $2,000, that is to say the wholesaler buying from the manufacturer would have to pay $2,000 on the purchase.

Mr. CHAPLIN: At what rate would that be?

Mr. McMASTER: At the rate of ten per cent. I will quite frankly say that I am taking an extreme case for the purpose of making my argument perfectly clear. Now when the fur manufacturer sells to the wholesaler, on that sale the wholesaler will have to pay $2,000, that is ten per cent in addition.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Would the hon. member allow me one moment—because I know that he does not wish to pursue a phantom? There is no luxury tax whatever against the wholesaler, absolutely none, and if the hon. gentleman would take the trouble to read section No. 2 also, any possible doubt which might be conjured up by a very astute lawyer like my learned friend is set at rest entirely. The luxury taxes are only on sales for consumption.

Mr. FIELDING: On the retailer only?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: On the retailer only or the sale by the retailer to the public. "Every sale for the purpose of consumption or use." It is exactly the wording of the section. Let me read it:

That the excise taxes as imposed by the preceding resolution shall be paid by the purchaser to the vendor at the time of sale for consumption or use, or on importation for consumption or use other than for re-sale—

There is no thought of putting a luxury tax on the wholesaler.

Mr. FIELDING: In that clause the words, "for consumption or use" appear. If it means that, all I can say is that one part of my criticism is defective. There are two objections to what the hon. member proposes: One is the annoyance, irritation and trouble that will result. The other is the increase, as I thought it was, in the tax, and I think my hon. friend has not made it clear, if he means that. The expression, "for consumption" when used in the customs law means when a man takes an article out of the customs house into the warehouse. I think he will need to make that part of the resolution clear because there is a widespread opinion that "consumption" is not limited to the act of the retailer.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If I may be allowed one minute. I want to make that just as clear as hon. gentlemen desire. We ought not to have any dispute about it that "consumption or use" is consumption or use by the purchaser. In order to make the thing absolutely clear the words, "other than re-sale" are added. If there is anything further that hon. members desire to add to make it perfectly clear that we are only asking and only proposing to take the one tax I will be very glad to add it.

Mr. CAHILL: What is the minister reading from?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am reading from the second resolution at page 34.

Mr. CAHILL: I find that under this excise tax ten per cent will also be payable at the time of the sale by the Canadian manufacturer in respect to such things as fur garments, and so on. Is that still in operation?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is entirely different, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Euler). There are two different kinds of taxes here, some of which are brought back to the source, to which it was felt they could be brought back without real public injury and without raising the cost of living in relation to essentials. That stands, in connection with those items; it never had the slightest application to the items we are now discussing—boots and shoes, etc.

Mr. BALDWIN: If it is implied that no tax has been charged by the wholesaler since the 19th day of May, I may state that any wholesale merchant from whom I have purchased goods has charged the one per cent on the total amount of the invoice.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is just exactly what I say: the one per cent sales tax. At present we are discussing the luxury tax.

Mr. PEDLOW: I submit that there is a difficulty where the manufacturer is also the retailer, and it should be cleared up right now. It is a discrimination against the retailer. If the manufacturer has the right to sell direct to the consumer—for instance, we will say a manufacturer of furs—I contend that he should at least pay the one per cent manufacturers' tax and the ten per cent luxury tax.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Quite right.

Mr. PEDLOW: That is the difficulty the member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) referred to.

Mr. J. E. FONTAINE (Hull) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of detaining the House very long; yet, taxation being levied upon necessaries of life, taxation which caused such an upheaval throughout this country and was the occasion for such loud protests, I feel it to be my duty to offer some observations on behalf of the constituents I have the privilege of representing.

There is in the city of Hull a retailers' association, a most important organization of which our foremost merchants are members, which last night, at a special meeting, passed a resolution in condemnation of the method advocated by the Government for the levying of taxation. I was confident that, having altered the system of taxation as to some commodities, the hon. Minister of Finance would agree to change the method of gathering those taxes.

The retail merchants are rightfully complaining about the trouble and expenses it is going to entail to them. To my mind, it would be fairer to have those taxes collected at the fountain head, from the manufacturer. A few moments ago, I heard the hon. Minister of Finance state that certain commodities would be taxed at the very fount of production because they are not necessaries of life, for instance, pianos, phonographs, and so forth. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that such articles as cut glass, velvet, silk, laces, are not essentials, and yet the hon. Minister of Finance will cause the retail merchant to collect the tax upon them. His reason for so doing is by no means conclusive, since in the case of patent medicines which, far from being luxuries, are absolutely necessary, he has the tax collected from the manufacturing establishment itself.

I think that the Government ought to grant the request of all the retailers of this country. After all, Mr. Chairman, it cannot be out of stubbornness that this association ask that the burden of collecting these taxes should not rest upon them. As it was said by many hon. members who spoke before me, it might favour fraud and force the consumer to pay higher prices for, say what you may, it will always be an easy thing to humbug him.

Once again I wish to act as the spokesman of the Association of Retail Merchants of Hull who have requested me to place their case before the House; I do so with pleasure and I ask the hon. minister, in their name and in the name of all the citizens of this country, to give heed to their representations and to find a way for collecting these taxes which will not be such a heavy burden on the retailer. If the tax were collected from the manufacturer 15 or 20 per cent would be added to the price of the goods and the tax thus paid by the wholesaler at the time of his purchase; he in turn would include the tax in the price of the goods when selling them to the retailer. Of course, in the long run, the consumer would pay the duty, but he would not notice it, and besides the retail merchant would be relieved of all this load of responsibility.

Mr. Chairman, I humbly submit that the hon. minister should accede to the requests of the many hon. members, who are only voicing the sentiments of the country when they ask that a different system be devised for the collection of this tax. We are not criticising the tax itself at the present time; we understand that it must be imposed, that it is absolutely necessary as things stand to-day; however, it is unfortunate that the Government should have led the country into this position—I understand that this question cannot be discussed in committee. Besides I mentioned this in my speech on the Budget, when I reproached the Government with having put us in a position where the imposition of these taxes is a matter of necessity. If there had been more economy, less extravagance, less scandal, we would not find ourselves in this position to-day; however, since the thing is done, I think the Government should at least do its utmost not to make things so hard for certain classes of the community and not to overburden the retail merchants whose time must be given entirely to their business and who should not be forced by the Government to act in the capacity of tax collectors.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: It appears to me that the minister is quite correct in his description of the collection of the tax, that is, through the method he proposes it is obviously to be collected only once, and that from the retailer. There can be no doubt of that because the words "sold separately" occur in the first clause, and the second clause makes that even more distinct. So I think my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding)—with whom I agree on some other points—is not correct in saying that the tax would be passed on three or four times before the final sale. I suggest to the minister, however, that I am still very strongly of opinion that it is highly desirable for him to change the mode of collection. I stated that the other day, and when the member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) challenged me on the point of my proposed change raising the cost of the commodity to the consumer, I said undoubtedly it would, because if the tax is collected at the fountain head it would have to be passed on, and it would be passed on on each invoice. But instead of being collected from 200,000 people, as is proposed here, the tax would be collected from 7,000 or 8,000 people. The accounting system of these 7,000 or 8,000 would obviously be accurate, and the department could walk in there and be sure they were getting all that was coming to them, because all these people are almost obliged under the laws of the country to keep an accurate account of every sale, and everything has to be audited by competent men. But these conditions do not obtain with the retailer. As my hon. friend has pointed out, there are tens of thousands of merchants in this country who are not doing $1,000 worth of business a day, or even a week, and many of them not even in a month, and it is unfair and unreasonable in my judgment for the Government to impress 200,000 men into the service of the country to collect taxes for which work they receive no remuneration whatever. They will be put to a very great expense. My hon. friend from North Oxford said $5 would cover it. If he had said $500 he would have been short of the mark, and so far as the large establishments are concerned it will be nearer $5,000. I say it is scarcely right to impress these men all over the country, and some women—for there are women shopkeepers—into the Government service without any remuneration. Further, it puts every one of these vendors into the position of possibly offending their customers, and that is a very undesirable thing. If there is one thing above another that a merchant tries to avoid, it is to offend anybody who is trading with him. He would do almost anything rather than that, because an offended customer means a loss of trade. It is a very unpopular thing to be a tax-collector; that is admitted by all. It is bad enough to pay taxes, but I believe it is worse to collect them. From the abuse I have heard some tax-collectors get around different parts of the country, I am sure their position is no sinecure. The minister has made it clear to my mind that there are some valid reasons why this tax should only be collected once, and if it could be done by the wholesaler I think that is the most desirable way. I admit that if the tax is collected at the fountain head it will be passed on and the result will be that the customer will pay more than the Government will receive. There is no doubt about that. It is very much like a man buying a barrel of spirits and instead of paying a duty of $2 a gallon on the forty gallons, collecting the tax over the bar on every glass sold out of that barrel. That is practically the principle the minister proposes to follow. We are going to have 200,000 tax-collectors. The retail merchants, who have gone on record in this respect, have stated that they do not think they should be impressed into the Government service in this way. They say they are willing to do all that is reasonable, but I submit to the minister that it is not in accordance with British fair play to impress 200,000 people, who have their living to earn—I was a merchant for a good many years and I know that they do not get their money any too readily—into the Government service in this way without any remuneration. These retail merchants lose a great deal that is on their books and some of these luxury taxes will be lost on the books of these firms as soon as they are put on. The Government will also want a statement from every retailer. Now that cannot be prepared readily. Some merchants are not expert accountants. In the old days many of them did not keep books so far as cash was concerned. If they had money in the bank and in their pockets they did not worry. The larger establishments, making up about ten or fifteen per cent of all the stores in the country, have very good accounting systems. That remark, however, does not apply to the average retailer. Therefore, we cannot expect them to comply with the requirements of the department very readily and without a great deal of trouble and considerable expense. Though by this method I am suggesting the taxpayer would pay a little more, he would pay it without knowing it, but under the method proposed by the minister he is going to be confronted with the tax every time he buys. The minister says that that is what he wants. Well, he will certainly bring it home to the buyer, but it will not be very palatable to him. There is many a man who takes a dose without knowing what is in it, and what the results will be, who would have hesitated to take it if he had known the consequences. It is the same with this tax. It is going to be unpalatable in its present form, and it is going to be difficult to collect. It is going to put on those who pay the tax into the treasury the obligation of collecting taxes from their clients, whom they want to be their best friends. The minister has expressed himself as having an open mind on this question, and I believe he has. That benign smile of his shows that he has a very warm spot in his heart for the argument we are putting up. I do not want to use any undue pressure, or to make any threats, or do anything of that sort, but I do appeal to the minister in the interests of the people as a whole, and of the merchants in particular, and their customers too, to reconsider the method of collecting the tax. I believe my hon. friend from Red Deer will admit that if a man is paying a tax that he does not know he is paying, it is not half so unpalatable.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): I always know.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: There are some who do not. I have paid a good many taxes without knowing it, and I say that is the most palatable way to pay them. I submit that in all justice this should have the serious consideration of the minister and the Cabinet. I believe that if they will weigh the pros and cons carefully, they will come to the conclusion that the wholesale method of collecting the tax is better than the retail, and that the smaller the number of people to whom they have to go, the less trouble they will have. These larger firms have accounting systems on which the Government can rely, and they will collect the tax once for all, so far as the Government is concerned at the fountain head, which seems to me the proper place.

Mr. PEDLOW: I am sure the House must be delighted with the minister for bringing on this discussion, if for no other reason than to hear the confession of the hon. member for Brantford of his conversion from his protectionist ideas. He has declared himself without doubt and beyond question to-night, and I sincerely trust that he will not have reason to change his attitude on some other occasion. I remember an occasion not long since when he appealed to the former Minister of Finance to "have a heart." To-night he almost looked as if he was asking the present Minister of Finance to "have a heart," though in another direction altogether. I shall not attempt to give the reasons for this.

In the Budget speech the Minister of Finance defined very clearly his attitude in regard to these taxes. In this printed copy of the Budget speech, in the part which the editor has headed "Luxury Taxes" I find this opening sentence, which is very convincing to me at least:

> Not only is more revenue necessary but extravagant and luxurious expenditure ought to be checked. Just so long as expenditure on non-essentials and extravagant expenditure continues, just so much longer will the drop in the value of essentials be postponed. On those having income more than necessary for properly maintaining themselves and families, there rests a special duty of saving whenever possible and in this manner adding to the available financial resources for development and for industrial undertakings. Extravagant buying should stop.

Since these Budget proposals have been brought down the minister has stated many times in the House and elsewhere that he is prepared to stand or fall by them as introduced. That is the principle of collecting from the retailer on certain specific articles and from the wholesaler on others. I may say at the outset that I am sorry the minister has taken that stand, because I would have preferred a different method of collecting the tax. Just the same, it is my desire that the minister shall get down to business as soon as possible, and it is not my intention to delay the committee very long on the present occasion. I may assure the committee at once that it is my intention to give the minister all assistance necessary in order to put this schedule into workable operation. I want, however, to go on record at the same time as to the method I would suggest if I had the say or if I had been consulted in the matter before it reached this stage.

The hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) has taken exception to this method, as have also many other speakers who have preceded me in this discussion. Some of them have claimed that one method would be preferable and some, another, for reasons assigned. I am sorry I cannot see eye to eye with my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) in the method he suggests, and the same method has been suggested by the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt). The argument will not stand analysis to any great extent. The proposition made by my hon. friend is that the tax shall be collected at the source of supply. Let us see what that means, taking the simple tax of one per cent on sales. I take for my illustration a raw material, say wool. The wool broker imports a quantity of wool, on which quantity he pays to the Government a tax of one per cent, and I will take the figure of one dollar. The broker passes that on to the manufacturer, and, of course the broker will charge a reasonable profit on that one per cent tax; he will add it to the price of the material. That means that the manufacturer will pay the broker $1.25 for that one dollar's worth of tax. The manufacturer, of course, will add on one per cent he has to pay to the Government plus his profit. That means $1 on to the $1.25, or $2.25, plus the manufacturer's reasonable profit which will be 56 cents, making a total cost from the manufacturer to the wholesaler of $2.81. The wholesaler adds on his one per cent which goes to the Government, plus his profit, which, on a moderate estimate will be at least 25 per cent, and sometimes it is more than that. The wholesaler finds that he has an item of $3.81 to account for, to which he adds his 25 per cent profit, or 95 cents, making a total of $4.76, the cost to the retailer. The retailer in turn will pass that on to his customer with his profit added. I can speak from experience and I know with certainty that the retailer who adds a mere bagatelle of 25 per cent to the cost of his commodity—in the case I have assumed that would represent $1.44—will find that an item of one dollar which the broker paid to the Government in the initial stage has risen, through the process of transmission from one stage to another, to the total sum of $6.20 when it reaches the consumer. This, in a nutshell, means that the Government will receive the sum of $3 which amounts to $6.20 by the time it reaches the consumer. In other words, out of $6.20 paid by the consumer for the tax item on the merchandise purchased, the Government will receive only the sum of $3. That is a good argument against collecting the tax back at the source of supply, because if you collect the other tax as well as that at the source of supply, it will also multiply in geometrical proportion as it goes from one stage to another. I am not, therefore, in favour of this system of collection. I know that this system has been endorsed by the Retail Merchants Association, 10 p.m. but they are only a body of men who perhaps have not considered this matter as fully as they might have done. A few weeks ago they were in favour of another system, and perhaps tomorrow they will be in favour of a different system from the one selected to-day.

I might say at once that I am in favour of a "tax on turnover" or "a tax on sales," and that would undoubtedly be the ideal system. It would be simple in operation and inexpensive to collect, and it would give the Government the maximum of returns for the minimum cost. Further, the maximum of collections would be received by the Government at the least cost to the consumer.

The proposition as it is before the committee at the present time embodies several systems of collection. The principal method of collection which has engaged so much attention since the Budget was announced was the excise tax collected by the retailer from the consumer; but we have, too, a tax on the total amount of the specific item, also a tax on the amount in excess of a specific amount, and a tax on the total amount of certain specific articles, as well as a tax collected by the retailer from the consumer, and a tax collected from the importer or manufacturer on certain other items on the list as the case may be. We have all these systems embodied in this amended resolution; but, notwithstanding all this, the minister has determined that he is bound to stand or fall by the system; that conclusion he has enunciated before the committee. There is no use wasting any further time with this discussion; but nevertheless, I wish to show further the reasons why I prefer the "sales tax" or tax on "turn-over" to the tax on so-called luxuries and so forth, when collected either from the importer, manufacturer, or retailer.

The United States have had a luxury tax in force during the past year from the first of May last, and their experience should be some guidance to us. I may say that the system adopted by them is somewhat different from that adopted by the Minister of Finance. Their system applies entirely on the amount in excess of a specific amount named in their schedule and their list of items is not nearly as large as the list of items named in the resolution under consideration. They estimated that their collections from this source would amount to the large sum of $203,750,000 in a year's operations; but instead of that, the total amount received by them in the first five months was only $7,604,029.67, so that the luxury tax system in the United States is a complete failure and not a success from any standpoint. I find, too, at the present time that they are about to repeal that system and to adopt the sales tax, the system that I am in favour of. I have in my hand a copy of the "Dry Goods Economist" of New York, the issue of May 15, 1920, in which reference is made to that point. It says:

> Excise sales tax is discarded. A definite decision was reached by the Ways and Means Committee this week to abandon entirely the proposed sales tax as a means of raising revenue.

I also find that several other publications in the United States and Canada have made reference to the same point. I find a very excellent article in the Ottawa Citizen of April 19, on this subject. It refers to a Bill that was introduced in the United States Senate by one of the senators from the State of Utah, and as this article is worthy of being placed on Hansard, I will beg the patience and attention of the committee while I read it. It is illuminating, and it covers the ground so thoroughly and in such a brief space, that I think it is worth while placing it before the committee. This article reads in part as follows:

> That there will be radical changes in the incidence of taxation is not likely in the British budget. On the other hand there is arising a strong agitation in the United States for the imposition of a form of direct taxation known as a "sales tax". This involves a tax of one per cent on retail sales, a definite tax on consumption and use. The rate would be so low that no attempt would be made to abuse or defraud the consumer. Senator Smoot, of Utah, who is introducing the measure in the senate, declares the sales tax to be simple and definite in its application. Its collection would require no complicated system of bookkeeping, no maintenance of attorneys and experts and comparatively little expense. It would not necessitate any new army of government employees. The Utah senator outlines the results of his plan as applied to commodities as follows:

This is illuminating and it should be of interest to the committee, if not immediately, at least in connection with subsequent Budget discussions.

> "I have said that a sales tax on retailers sales to the consumer at 1 per cent would produce at least $1,000,000,000 per annum. But if the same 1 per cent were imposed on all turnovers, from producer to wholesalers, and on through distribution, then the amount produced is calculated at fully $3,500,000,000, and probably $4,000,000,000.
> "Add to that a tax of 1/10 of 1 per cent on all real estate sales and stock exchange transactions and $1,580,000,000 more would be produced.
>
> "If additional taxes are required, it is at least worth while to consider some of the possible sources of more revenue. Here are some items:
>
> "A tax of 3 cents a pound on coffee would raise $120,000,000.
>
> "A tax of 2 cents a pound on sugar would raise $190,000,000.
> "A tax of 3 cents a pound on coffee would raise $45,000,000.
>
> "A tax of 2 per cent, on gross receipts of interest, dividends, rents and royalties would raise $90,000,000.
> "Increased taxes on cigars, cigarettes and tobacco, say 66⅔ per cent increase on cigarettes, 25 per cent on cigars and 33 per cent on tobacco, would raise $114,000,000.
>
> "Beyond that, to abolish the $2,000 exemption in the corporation tax, would raise $58,000,000."
> Realizing that such a tax is a radical departure from any other system of taxation now in use in the United States, a campaign of education is deemed necessary by its advocates. This is already under way and such noted financiers as Mr. J. S. Bache, the New York banking authority, and others, are advocating the adoption of the sales tax and explaining how it operates.

I shall not read the rest, which is merely eulogistic of the United States finances. Let me say, however, that these various sums added together come to a total of $6,197,000,000. Now, the population of the United States is, I understand, roughly speaking, 100,000,000, and we have a population of 9,000,000.

An hon. MEMBER: Eight millions.

Mr. PEDLOW: Perhaps it is eight millions, but let us say 10,000,000 for the sake of convenience in calculation. Suppose we took one-tenth of the returns of the United States, we should have a revenue of $619,700,000. So that you can easily see why I am enamoured of a proposition of that kind. It looks to me like easy money, and we all know how earnestly the Minister of Finance has tried to impress on us the need for money in this country. We do not need his forceful arguments in that respect, however, we need only the facts to convince us that money is an absolute necessity and that the country must have it, and I think the shortest method we can adopt should be the best.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Would it do for this Government to have so much money to spend?

Mr. PEDLOW: Well, it would be a good thing for the country to have that much money. Now, Mr. Chairman, in looking over the Budget Speech of the Minister of Finance, I find at page 16 of the report as printed by the department that the revenue anticipated during the current year is $381,000,000 odd; the expenditure is $549,000,000 odd, and the deficit $168,000,000. These are the figures, roughly. They may not be absolutely correct, but that is my reading of them and if I am wrong I trust the minister will correct me. Now that seems to me to present a huge problem for the Government and the country to face, and if we could adopt a system such as is described in the article I have read I could see daylight through the difficulties that are now facing us. I shall not detain the committee much longer, but I desire to refer to one or two of the main objections that have been advanced by some hon. gentlemen. The Minister of Finance has been kind enough to admit that the explanation which I gave to the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) was correct; that is to say, that where a manufacturer sells direct to a consumer then the tax of one per cent and the excise tax, or whatever else you choose to call it, is paid at the same time. There is another proposition that might be considered in that connection, and I gather from what the Minister of Finance has said that he either has dealt with it or intends to do so. I refer to the case where a manufacturer sells direct to the retailer. In cases of that kind, the retailer who is in a position to buy direct from the manufacturer or import direct from the original sources in the manufacturing centres of the Old Land will be at an advantage of two per cent over the smaller retailers throughout the country. That feature should be considered and attended to. There are a few items in the schedule to which I would call the attention of the minister, and I shall run over them briefly so that the committee may know what they are. I find in the list originally prepared—whether it is correct or not I am not sure— that the Minister of Finance has placed a tax on ham and bacon while he is placing sausages on the free list. So far as this article of food is concerned, I must say that I differ from Mark Twain. Mark Twain said he liked sausages because he knew what he was eating, and for the same reason I do not like them. I should like to know why the department decided to make sausages free, while taxing ham and bacon. Then I find that baby foods and breakfast foods are taxable, while food for cattle and hogs is free. That seems remarkable. Then there is an amendment in regard to ribbons. Ribbons are changed and an exemption is provided in that case. He exempts typewriting ribbons.

Mr. McMASTER: Will that apply to the ribbons worn by stenographers?

Mr. PEDLOW: I am coming to that. A certain lawyer in the town of Renfrew was going to the city and he made up a list of his requirements before he left home. Unfortunately he left his note-book on the dresser and went away without it. His wife discovered it and amongst the entries was "ribbon for typewriter." It is easy to understand that he got in wrong.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): Explain.

Mr. PEDLOW: Perhaps the hon. member for Brome can explain that. I am merely stating a situation that occurred in Renfrew, and I am sure that lawyers there are not different from lawyers in Montreal or elsewhere. I notice in the amended schedule a great many items that have had the attention of the Minister of Finance since the resolution was first introduced in the House, and which I think require close consideration. Perhaps I had better leave those until we come to the several items. I approve of the appeal made by the hon. member for Centre Vancouver (Mr. Stevens), and the hon. member for Strathcona (Mr. Douglas) in regard to hats. That is a matter that deserves the serious attention of the minister. Hats should be classed among the things that are really essential articles of clothing in this country. A man may wear a straw hat like the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) and the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) in summer time, but these would not be very comfortable on the western plains in winter time. They will want to buy felt hats of a good quality.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): My hon. friend did not find the western plains very comfortable when he went there.

Mr. PEDLOW: I do not know. We left Ottawa in the month of October, in summer weather, when straw hats and light clothing were in vogue, and on our arrival in Assiniboia we got a very warm reception, though there were some chills connected with it. The hon. member for Brome and myself went out there prepared to enter into a warm political contest, but unfortunately we found it was only a family quarrel, and we found what a man generally finds when he engages in a family quarrel; we were up against it on both sides of the House. However, I can assure my hon. friends from the West that we enjoyed every minute of our experience, notwithstanding the atmosphere that obtained during our sojourn in that country.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): "Sweet are the uses of adversity."

Mr. PEDLOW: There is one consoling feature in connection with the contest, and that is that at almost every point where the hon. member for Brome and myself appeared the results were in favour of the Liberal candidate.

Mr. EDWARDS: I rise to a point of order. I maintain that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Pedlow) is not in order in discussing a political campaign out in Saskatchewan under the heading of this resolution.

The CHAIRMAN: I have had some difficulty in hearing the hon. member but if he is discussing a political campaign he is not quite in order.

Mr. PEDLOW: I, as usual, have very great pleasure in bowing to your ruling, Mr. Chairman. I was not aware that my musical voice was so soft as to produce a condition of slumber during the course of my remarks. I was answering a question asked by the hon. member for Red Deer. I have much pleasure in associating myself with the position taken in regard to hats by the hon. member for Centre Vancouver and the hon. member for Strathcona. There is a great deal in what both these hon. gentlemen have said on that subject. I have here a resolution passed by the manufacturers of hats and addressed to the Minister of Finance. I have no doubt he is fully aware of the substance of that communication. In brief, the proposition put up is this: There are six or seven fur hat makers in Canada. These hat makers have got a foothold in the business within the last five or six years, and they employ a great many people. While the material that goes into the manufacture of a hat has increased 700 per cent since 1914, the manufacturer's price has increased only 400 per cent. A hat that was selling in 1914 at $2.50 or $3 has only been advanced 400 per cent which means that the retailer cannot sell a hat of that class at less than $10. It is really out of the question for any person to buy a hat to-day that will give him any service at all for $5 or $6. As a matter of fact I know that hats have advanced since springtime 45 per cent. They are costing 45 per cent more than they did for the spring business. There is no such thing as a $5 hat on the market except old styles and old stock that nobody wants to buy unless he is very economical and wants to economize as much as possible. I hope the minister will give consideration to the representations of the hat manufacturers of this country, and that he will be able to comply with their request.

Mr. BALDWIN: There has been considerable discussion as to what the tax means to the retailer, and the opinion has been generally expressed that goods will cost the consumer much more. I noticed during the discussion that hon. members overlooked the fact that the great departmental houses send their catalogues to the more remote parts of Canada, and as these great houses buy their goods, I believe, cheaper than most of the wholesalers, as country merchants have to conform their prices to the prices of the departmental houses—and I believe that the hon. member for Renfrew (Mr. Pedlow) is no exception to the rule—it is not at all probable that the conclusion at which many members have arrived will prove to be the correct one. Competition is very keen in the section of the country in which I live, not only between neighbouring merchants but between country merchants and departmental stores, because these catalogues go into every household. I think I am safe in saying that there is not a household in Canada that does not receive a catalogue at least from one of the great houses, and many receive them from several houses. Competition is such as to maintain reasonable prices. Trade is growing keener and keener, and harder and harder, for the retail merchant. Merchants who are actually engaged in business will find that is true.

Mr. NICHOLSON (Algoma): I am going to presume to ask the committee to allow me to say one or two more words before we pass from the principle of this resolution, as I think perhaps I was the first member of the House, or one of the first, to raise the question as to the wisdom of the minister proceeding on the principle evolved when the Budget was brought down, of collecting through the retail merchant the taxes imposed under the excise law suggested. As the minister has pointed out he has in mind two specific objects. One is to raise revenue. The country needs revenue—everybody acknowledges that. Associated with that is the desire to curtail extravagance, to reduce costs to the consumers, to bring home to the people who purchase the goods the fact that they are buying goods upon which there is a luxury tax levied. Without question I admit the first reason, that it is necessary to have the means of raising revenue; and I agree wholly with the method suggested in getting a large portion of it out of luxuries. I also agree with the sentiment that it is desirable to curtail expenses. It is desirable to bring home to the people of this country that they have got to pay taxes—to put it before them as clearly as we can that we have all got to pay taxes. We cannot pay for the war, we cannot meet the obligations this country has to carry unless we pay taxes. But, Mr. Speaker, in relation to that my judgment is that in the main the Canadian people are sufficiently clear-headed to realize that when the Finance Minister puts a tax on a specific article and they buy that article—whether the tax is placed on the manufacturer, on the wholesaler or by any other method—they are buying a taxable article. I do not go very far on the assumption that you must say to a man: "Here is a pair of boots that we will give you for $9, but if you buy a $10 pair of boots we are going to tax you for it." You may say that a pair of boots costing $10 or $11 or $12 will be taxable, and that the cheaper boot will not be taxable, but surely when a man goes to buy those boots he knows when he is buying a taxable article. I believe that the taxes, as suggested, applied to the goods above a certain value will tend, as the minister has suggested, to bring down prices. They will tend in that direction to a certain degree, but not, I think, to the degree that has been suggested, because in the final analysis the cost of production is what regulates in the main the cost which the consumer has to pay for the article he is purchasing. But there will be the tendency for producers and manufacturers to get a grade of articles that will come below the taxable level, and to that degree it will reduce the cost. But let me repeat: The purchaser, in the main, without having this constantly kept before him, will realize that he is purchasing taxable goods, and to that degree the desired effect will be gained.

The next point is that if you apply this tax at the source, if you apply it on the manufactured product or the finished article, when it leaves the factory, and only once, or if you apply it on the finished article when the importer brings it into the country, you are going to have the pyramiding of taxation, because the manufacturer or the importer is going to add his profit. That is perfectly true, and you cannot get away from it. But as against that, you are going to save the enormous cost involved by the proposed method of collecting through the retailer. What is this taxation going to mean to the retailer? What is it going to mean to carry out the enormous detail work that this taxation is going to involve? If you assume that when a retailer takes an extra accountant into his business he is not going to apply that as part of his cost of carrying on the business, why, all right; tax the retailer. But my judgment is that when the retailer has to add any cost to his business he passes it on to his customers. If he does not pass it on in the case of the specific article that is taxed he must pass it on through some other article. That is the only way in which he can get the funds to pay the expense of his business. Again, let me say the pyramiding of taxation that has been suggested means greater cost to the manufacturers, but the saving to the consumers of this country will be many times more than any possible sum that will reach them from the pyramiding of taxes from the manufacturer, or by his placing a percentage of profit on the sum of money he has got to expend on the luxury tax in the first instance.

There is one other suggestion that has been made: That if you apply this taxation at the point of production, the point of manufacture, the point of importation, you are going to bring the scale to a point where you will not get any taxes at all, or else you are going to bring up prices so that again the purchaser will be penalized. With regard to that any man who has given the question even a moment's thought must recognize at once that if we are going to apply these taxes at the point of production, or at the point of importation the basis must in some way be changed. That is only in the final analysis a detail in the working out of this whole large scheme —the largest scheme in anything of the nature of direct taxation that has ever been introduced into this country.

Now, touching that question of direct taxation for a moment. It was stated in the House this afternoon that the easy way to collect taxes, if the Finance Minister wanted to follow that way, was to collect them through income. Well, we have as large an income tax now as they have in the country to the south of us; the ordinary man in this country has to pay a fairly high income tax. But, just touching that question of the easy way by which we can collect income tax. They have been collecting income taxes for a long time in Great Britain, I have not at the moment the exact number of years, but it is admitted that they have been trying out the collection of income taxes for a long time and they have got their system perhaps about as perfect as any that could be evolved. Less than a year ago a Royal Commission was investigating the question of income taxes in Great Britain, and this was what they reported: That notwithstanding the system they have developed, notwithstanding the fact that they had forty or forty-five millions of people,—all collected in an area that you could lose in one province of Canada,—they were still losing between seventy-five and eighty million pounds, annually, of income tax that they had not yet been able to devise a means of collecting.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): They have been collecting income tax for seventy-eight years.

Mr. NICHOLSON: My hon. friend reminds me that in Great Britain they have had their income tax system worked out for seventy-eight years. Yet this Royal Commission reported they have been losing between seventy-five and eighty million pounds annually that they have not yet been able to find any means of collecting. Now, let me give you a homely illustration with regard to that. Go into the smallest city that you can find in the Dominion of Canada and ask the tax collector if he finds it very easy to collect the income tax equitably from all the people who pay it simply for the maintenance of the public school in that village, and see what answer you will get. He will tell you at once that the most difficult thing to be equitably collected is the income tax, and the only way you are going to do it equitably at all is to have an absolute head tax which everybody shall pay. That is what the collector will tell you. However I do not wish do dwell upon that. I believe the plan of collecting the luxury tax through the excise method is a good one. I believe if put into proper operation it will yield a large revenue and will have the very result that the minister hopes for.

But just a word about the details. The last time I spoke on this subject I gave the House some figures I had worked out in connection with a certain retail store, which figures I claim are not over the average. I found there were 100 transactions in one day's business, and that it would take 43 pages of foolscap to contain the monthly statement to be transmitted to the department. On the same average that that retailer was collecting on his sales—and he sells about the usual kind of goods retailed throughout this country—in order to collect $1,000,000 in taxes 10,000,000 entries would be necessary on the statements transmitted to the department. Every single one of those statements will have to be checked against the accompanying slips if the department is to be certain of the correctness of the returns. This will mean, on the one hand, adding enormously to the retailer's costs, and, on the other hand, clogging the department with extra officials to do this work.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): In view of the changes made in the tariff in regard to ribbons, laces, and similar commodities, the hon. member would not attempt to argue that there would now be as many entries in a store such as he describes?

Mr. NICHOLSON (Algoma): There might be some reduction in the number of sales of ribbons and similar articles, but if the revenue is to be derived in this way it is going to be collected in cents instead of dollars, and in dollars instead of lump sums of tens of thousand of dollars. I will at once admit that I am dealing with the original resolutions and have worked out the details accordingly.

There is one way by which this detail work can be avoided, and I favour it as a second choice. I believe the minister would be well advised to abandon the idea of collecting these taxes through the retailer, and to go back to the source of production—the manufacturer or the importer. But failing that, I am in favour of inland revenue stamps being used. I know there is an argument against my suggestion. It has been stated that druggists did not affix the inland revenue stamps to their goods, but merely kept the stamps on their shelves, and that there was collusion between the customer and the salesman not to affix the stamps. No doubt such collusion is possible. But when the salesman does not have to enter into a contract, so to speak, with the purchaser, will he not himself defraud the Government by failing to account for the duty? When an inland revenue stamp is used two people must be brought into agreement before any fraud can be perpetrated; by the other method all the salesman has to do if he wants to defraud the Government is to ring in the sale in two parts, or ring in the purchase price and put the tax in his pocket.

Another phase of the question is that the man who wants to "play the game," if I may use the expression, is brought into competition with the man who does not want to play the game; and notwithstanding the fact that we all recognize, as the minister stated the other evening, that our retail merchants are honest, yet some people are not honest when it comes to paying taxes, and they will avoid payment if they possibly can. I may repeat the homely illustration I used on a former occasion when discussing this matter. There are not very many members in this House who would not trust any fellow member's name on a note; but if any of those members were over in a border city of the United States and saw some article of apparel that appealed to their taste, they would not hesitate to buy it and wear it across the border and so defraud the customs.

Mr. BUREAU: Are you talking from experience?

Mr. NICHOLSON (Algoma): You have all those things to contend with. I say again that as a first choice I urge upon the minister and the Government to go back to the point of production and importation for the collection of the tax; but failing that, I would advise the employment of inland revenue stamps to get away from the mass of work and the temptation to defraud in connection with the other method of collection.

The hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Pedlow) stated that he understood the minister to say that he intended to stand or fall by the resolution. That is not my understanding. I gathered that he was dealing with the subject with an open mind. I have only one desire—to assist if I can. Perhaps I am wrong; if I am, I am ready to stand corrected. I am simply giving my ideas to the minister for what they are worth, and I hope he will take them into his serious consideration before coming to a final conclusion on this method of tax collection.

Mr. DAVIS: It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that there must be some misunderstanding as to the number of retail storekeepers in this country, for if there are 200,000 or 250,000, that is equivalent to one storekeeper to every 45 or 30 people, which does seem unreasonable. Basing my estimate on districts I am familiar with, I would say that there is about one store to every 250 or 400 people. But even that means that we have to go back to something like 40,000 storekeepers to collect this tax. We all know that tax collection is not too easy, and that the fewer people you have to deal with the more productive the tax will be, the more economically it will be collected; and as some one has said, you will "get your feathers with the least squawking possible." The very fact that this tax has caused so much commotion is a warning to the minister to get it, if possible, at the point of production as the member for Algoma (Mr. Nicholson), has suggested. I fully agree with him that that is the point at which this tax should be applied. It seems to me that the minister said he believed that would be the most economical for the Government, and probably the most productive. Then what are the objections to that method? Following his mind as nearly as I can, I judge that it is because the tax, not being taken directly out of the consumer's pocket, becomes an indirect tax. That will apply mainly to the luxury tax. I have understood that the department is not calculating that a very great sum is going to be derived from this tax, perhaps $10,000,000 or $15,000,000, but that the bulk of the amount that will be raised by these new taxes will be raised by the one per cent tax. I very much fear that the luxury tax will practically put out of business many firms. In trying to get some ideas on this tax I ran across the fact the other day that in Spain they had a tax on sales of 14 per cent. It was afterwards reduced to 10 per cent and later to 6 per cent. Both Spanish and English economists agree that that tax was the cause of the ruin of Spanish industry and Spanish agriculture. Now this tax on luxuries is going to exceed on the average this 14 per cent tax in Spain. I agree that taxes should be collected where there is ability to pay, but at the same time you must have regard to the existence of businesses, and some businesses are sure to be greatly hampered and very likely ruined by the excessive amount of these taxes. Hence, I judge they will exist for only a very short time. After they have been applied for a year I believe they will be ameliorated, if not entirely wiped out.

Now the department has had some experience in the collection of a tax of this kind—experience in two ways. I have understood from members of the department that the tax on matches, amounting to over $1,500,000, is being collected by about three men. On the other hand, the stamp taxes have caused untold anxiety to the department, very much expense and a great deal of perturbation. There have been prosecutions all over the country for violations of the Act respecting this tax which is collected from the consumer. It seems to me that this should be a warning to the Government as to what is likely to happen when this luxury tax is applied, if it is placed on the consumer instead of at the point of production.

There are other things I might say but I think those are the most important.

Mr. DUFF: There is a little information I should like to get from the Minister of Finance. I should like to know if he or his department has made any estimate as to how much it is going to cost the country to collect this tax from the retailer; how many officials will be employed at headquarters at Ottawa to check the returns as they come in; and how many will be employed all over the country to see that the retailers make out the returns properly and record the sale of every article which should pay a tax. It seems to me that it will take an army of officials, anywhere from 5,000 to 10,000, to look after the collection of this tax. That means not only a great initial expense to the country, but I presume that when we get through with our present financial difficulties this tax will be dropped, and that these 5,000 or 10,000 officials which the minister proposes to take from the farm, the fisheries, the mines, and lumbering camps, will be added to the already overmanned Civil Service. If there is any possible way of collecting this tax without appointing more officials, it should certainly be done. I think I understood the minister to say this afternoon that practically no officials had yet been added to the department. My information from a reliable source is that the very first day after the minister made his Budget Speech fifty new officials were taken on by the Inland Revenue Department to make out the proper forms in connection with this tax. It seems to me that to take men out of productive industry and put them into a position where they are not producers, but drones, especially in view of the country's finances, is to do the very opposite of what we should do. We should be getting men out of non-productive employment into work where they would be real producers. I would strongly urge on the minister that the proper place to apply this tax is at the source of the goods.

The minister said in answer to a question that this resolution should be considered separately from the one dealing with the one per cent tax. But the three taxes dovetail so into one another that we cannot discuss them separately: the one per cent tax must first be got from the manufacturer selling to the wholesaler, secondly, from the wholesaler selling to the retailer, and thirdly comes this luxury tax which is collected by the retailer. I repeat that the proper place to apply this tax is at the source of supply, where the article is imported or manufactured, instead of having an army of officials added to the present staff to look after the collection of the tax. Then the Government would not have to have these officials going round seeing that the retailer made up a proper statement. By this method they would get every dollar of taxation that was due, and would get far more revenue than they will under this method proposed by the Minister of Finance.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does the hon. gentleman want the information he asked for before he went on and made his speech?

Mr. DUFF: I am not going to allow the minister to insinuate that I cannot make a speech if I want to. Perhaps my remarks will be listened to just as attentively as some of the remarks he made this afternoon.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I did not know whether the information was desired.

Mr. DUFF: It is desired; I asked for it in the form of a question, and I want it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I want to give it.

Mr. DUFF: Don't talk so much about it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I could not tell the hon. gentleman just how many men are working on this particular matter at the present time. As I have told the House several times, the collection is by the Department of Inland Revenue, and the latest information I have on the subject, which I cannot vouch for personally, is that one man, who was borrowed from another department, is employed on this work with two stenographers. If I was asked to make a guess as to the number of men to be employed here at Ottawa for the purpose of checking, I should say about one hundred.

Mr. DUFF: I did not ask the Finance Minister to do any guessing. The people of this country expect him to do more than guess. It seems to me that if he is going to deal with this matter in a businesslike way he should have had some idea before he brought down the Budget how many officials it would take to collect the taxes under his proposals, and the probable cost. It is not very creditable for the minister to give out to the House and the public that he has no information as to how many officials will be required or the probable cost of collecting the tax, but can only "guess."

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I should like to ask the minister a question or two in elucidation of the point raised by my hon. friend, (Mr. Duff). Does the minister regard these taxes as likely to be temporary or permanent in the country?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would regard these taxes as taxes which will be permanent if they work out properly. I do not know how they will work out. I do not know that I am any better prophet than anybody else as to their working out. The money is required and this seems to be one way in which money may be obtained. We hope these taxes will work out properly, we have no particular reason to doubt that they will work out properly; and if they work out properly, with the tremendous liabilities the country is under, I would think they would have to be retained. If they do not work out properly, my hon. friend probably knows what would happen.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: As to their working out, can the minister give as to how many retailers in any portion of Canada beginning at Ottawa, are collecting these taxes and how many are not? I have correspondence from some who are not collecting them; I have correspondence from others who are. Has he given any direction to the retailer which gives him any guidance as to the scientific method of collection? We want this information so that we may know whether the minister has control of his department.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The hon. member knows perfectly well—and there is no good repeating it—that I am not collecting these taxes. That is not in my department, and it is idle at the present time, with a matter as new as this, to expect anything like a definite report upon what either John Jones or John Smith is doing and what the percentage of payments here or there may be. We do not know. It is impossible to tell.

Mr. DUFF: We should have this information before we go very much further. The minister says that some one else is responsible for the collection of the taxes. In that case, we should have the Minister of Inland Revenue here to give us the information, or the minister should have it himself. A large amount of expense is going to be entailed in collecting these taxes, and yet the minister is asking the committee to suggest to him the best method of collecting them when he does not know what expense will be entailed in collecting them. If the minister cannot tell us how much it is going to cost to collect the taxes, some other minister should give us that information, or some estimate should be given before we go very much further.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Does my hon. friend not think that it is a frightful state of confusion for the affairs of this country to be in that in various localities some retailers are already collecting these taxes and others are not? I want to bring that home to my hon. friend, because I know what I am talking about, and probably every other hon. member in the Chamber knows that in certain localities some retailers have now accepted the position imposed upon them of being involuntary collectors of taxes for this Government and others have refused the position; some retailers are collecting the taxes, others are not. I should like the minister to tell us whether he does not think that an awful state of confusion for these taxes to have reduced the country to.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would be very much obliged to my hon. friend if he would give me the names of those retailers who are breaking the law. It would assist very much if he would do so. But I should like to say this to the hon. gentleman, that he cannot put into operation any new method of direct taxation without trouble and difficulty, and there is one way in which that difficulty, annoyance and uncertainty will stop, and that is by adopting these resolutions at the earliest possible minute. What is the use of talking of getting up machinery and having prosecutions at the present moment, before these resolutions are adopted? You cannot possibly expect to put into force new methods of taxation without trouble, and I certainly do not expect to be able to do so. It takes some time for people to understand what they have to do, and it may be that some of the retailers to whom my hon. friend refers do not know what they ought to do. I do not know what my hon. friend's suggestion is in connection with a man who honestly does not know —whether my hon. friend thinks he should be prosecuted or not. My view is that, in connection with a new law and a matter which is the subject of so much debate as this is, reasonable treatment ought to be accorded. But it is idle to hope for any definiteness in the country until this House has passed upon these proposals. It will be unreasonable, further, to expect that prosecutions will take place until the House has acted in the premises.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: My hon. friend asked me for names. That is very cheap. I shall be glad to give him the names of my correspondents,—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I shall be glad to have them.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: —and every hon. member in this House who has similar correspondence would be glad to do so. If I do give them, according to his own showing, the minister would not prosecute. Would he give directions? Has he given directions? Have directions been issued from Halifax to Vancouver as to how these taxes are to be collected? It is a far cry from prosecutions, which I am the last man to call for in connection with new taxes, to directions how the taxes are to be collected. Has my hon. friend's department or any other department of the Government given directions? The facts are as I have stated them,—and the minister knows that and other hon. members know it,—that some retailers are collecting the taxes and others are not; and some have written to us asking whether they have to collect them or not. We can only come to the minister for answers to those questions.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I shall be pleased to answer the question. Instructions were given. They went out the night of the Budget Speech.

Mr. DUFF: A few minutes ago the minister said that, if we allowed these resolutions to go through quickly, he would be able to put into motion the machinery to collect these taxes. I must disagree with that statement. As I said before, the minister has not his department properly organized or the other minister upon whom my hon. friend has tried to shove the blame has not his department properly organized to collect this tax, because it is a well-known fact that if the first resolutions as introduced by the Minister of Finance on May 18 were not changed at this late date, he would not be able to make that statement. Is it not a fact that the taxes went into effect the moment the minister made his Budget Speech on May 18? Why does the minister now tell the committee and the people of Canada that when he made the Budget Speech he had no machinery by which to put his tax proposals into effect, either to see that the retailer makes the proper statement or to see that officials are appointed to look after the returns? Does the minister want it to go out to the country that he had no machinery to collect the taxes when they went into effect on May 18?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am afraid I expressed myself loosely and improperly. I am sure that is not the hon. gentleman's fault; the error must be mine. I said that instructions went out the night the Budget Speech was delivered.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: In what form did they go out? Did they go out to every retailer in the country?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: In what form did they go out, because we have a right to know that?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The notification went out to every single collector of inland revenue in the country, with instructions to notify people selling in his district. Further than that, of course, the announcement was made and pretty well covered in the press. It is just as quick a notice as is ever given or ever has been given.

Mr. DUFF: Would the collector of inland revenue know the names of the retailers in his district?

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): In answer to the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff), I might say that last week it was my privilege to go in the direction of my home. I spent Thursday afternoon in the city of London where I purposely visited a number of stores, large stores as well as small ones, and made inquiries in regard to this tax. I found also that the Inland Revenue Department in that city were actively engaged in collecting the taxes, and the managers of several of the stores that I visited were frank in telling me the manner in which the taxes were being collected,—they said that on the whole they were well satisfied with them, and especially since the minister has made his changes in connection with this Budget, I feel confident that the people in those districts are well satisfied and are ready and willing to pay over the money. In fact, they have been collecting the money and paying it into the Inland Revenue Department. If you go further, to the town in which I live, a place of four or five thousand people, you will find that the Inland Revenue officer not only notified all the stores in that little district but sent his assistant into every place where an automobile was located that had not been disposed of and collected the tax. I certainly was agreeably surprised to see the manner in which the tax had been collected and to learn the very prompt way in which the people had carried out the instructions that had been sent to them the day after the Budget was delivered.

Mr. COPP: If I understand my hon. friend correctly, he said he visited a number of towns before the changes were made by the Minister of Finance and found the dealers were perfectly satisfied with the Budget and the collection of the taxes.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): I did not say they were perfectly satisfied with the Budget as it existed at that time; but with the changes made by the Minister of Finance, I feel confident that the bulk of them are satisfied, or at least as well satisfied as you can expect people to be when you are collecting a direct tax from them.

Mr. COPP: I understood my hon. friend to say that on Wednesday last they were well satisfied with the arrangement. Perhaps I was wrong in representing him as having said they were perfectly satisfied, because you could not expect any one to be absolutely and entirely satisfied with a new piece of legislation. I am prepared to grant that. But if I understand this matter correctly, judging from my own experience and having received numerous telegrams and letters not only from individuals in my own constituency but circular letters enclosing statements which the writers said were copies which they had filed with the minister protesting earnestly and vehemently against the arrangement for collecting the tax, then the hon. gentleman is not quite right.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): Have not a number of those people been satisfied by the changes made?

Mr. COPP: I am coming to that. I understood my hon. friend to say that the people to whom he referred were well satisfied prior to these changes. If that is so, it does seem to me that the minister's position is somewhat strange. Realizing the great responsibility that rested upon him for the raising of taxes in order to provide the money requisite for carrying on the affairs of the country, realizing that he was in a position of high responsibility, he came down deliberately to a deliberative Parliament and presented his Budget after months of consultation, and no doubt anxious study, for I am prepared to admit that he must have devoted considerable study to the preparation of his task. On the 8th of May he presented his Budget, after serious consideration; and now we have to understand that this was only a hodgepodge affair, not properly considered, not properly conceived, and not properly informing the public of what they would be expected to do. He made his speech in this House and we were all very much pleased, I have no doubt, to hear the hon. gentleman; and for two weeks the eloquence of hon. members resounded through the Chamber telling of the great courage which the Minister of Finance had displayed in the manner in which he had brought down his Budget asking the people to dance to the tune that he at that time was playing. He had thousands of copies of that speech prepared for distribution. I did not ask the minister why that speech was printed, but I take it for granted that the object was to permit hon. members to send it broadcast over the country in order to instruct the merchants, retailers and wholesalers, and all those engaged in business transactions from the Atlantic to the Pacific, as to what would be expected of them. That speech has been distributed; it is in the hands of all business people. For ten days they have "carried on", and I have no doubt the statement that has been made is correct, that a very large number of merchants have been collecting the tax. Whether it was proper or improper was not a question for them; they had to obey the law. They have collected this money, and notwithstanding that my hon. friend from East Lambton says that the people in his town were well satisfied, the minister comes and says: "I am going to change all that. We were all wrong. The retail dealers, the business men who sent telegrams and circular letters, the boards of trade who sent petitions are all right and I am all wrong, and therefore I am going to change this thing". I would ask my hon. friend if he is going to stand by the Budget he has brought down or whether we are to expect that in a day or two, after he has received some letters and telegrams from different parts of Canada, he is going to say again: "I am wrong; I have been misinformed and I want to come down again with different proposals in order to collect the money that is needed to carry on the affairs of the country". I do not profess to be a wizard of finance, but I do say that when the Budget Speech was brought down it should have been the embodiment of very careful and mature consideration. Very heavy taxation is placed on the people and though they may be prepared to bear it, naturally they feel it keenly, because no one wants to pay taxes if he can help it. But when my hon. friend laid his proposals before Parliament on the 18th day of May they should have been so considered and so properly worked out as to be satisfactory to the people. My hon. friend says that the people were satisfied on Wednesday last, but now we are asked to accept changes on a few hours' consideration. We studied the Budget for two weeks, and hon. gentlemen opposite told the House and the country that it was a proper Budget. They said that the people were satisfied, but now we find that the minister himself is not satisfied, the Government is not satisfied, and numerous hon. gentlemen opposite are not satisfied. I had the pleasure of listening to the hon. member for East York (Mr. Foster) tonight saying that it was the most unpopular arrangement that had ever been made; and that is the way we find things to-day. When, in Heaven's name, shall we get down to something sane and proper and carry through something in which the people of the country will have confidence, in which the Government will have confidence, and in which the supporters of the Government will have confidence?

Mr. McKENZIE: It appears to me from the speeches that we are hearing not only from this side of the House but from the Government side that the most important point to be settled by the minister is how he is to collect this tax. I think everybody is of the opinion that the fewer men who are engaged in collecting the tax and the fewer places where it is to be collected the better. The greater the amount of money the Government will get, and the less the number of officials to be employed, the less the difficulty will be. Quite a number of hon. gentlemen supporting the Government — strong supporters; not milk and water supporters; not Liberal-Unionists, but the straight, old-fashioned Tory type—have been telling the minister that the Government are all wrong in the method they are proposing to adopt for the collection of this tax. I am sure that the strong, if not unanimous, consensus of opinion on this side of the House is that this tax should be collected at the fountain head and not in the way the minister expects to do it. If the minister can get the money that he requires in a thousand places why should he be looking after 400,000 or 500,000 places in order to get the same amount of money?

The minister says that he must protect the people for fear that the prices of goods will go up. He need not think that he is going to regulate the prices of goods by the manner in which he collects these taxes. The price will go on the goods, and if we have honest merchants in this country, as all seem to think we have, we will have to trust to competition between the people who are selling the goods as to what the price will be. The thing for the minister to do is to look after his own particular business, or after this business, with the least trouble and expense. If the minister would give out to the House and to the country that he is going to collect the taxes in this way I think he would get along very much faster with his own friends who are supporting him, and I am sure that his course would be more satisfactory to us on this side.

The minister is willing to change his mind on everything else except on this one thing. There is no item in this Budget but what he seems perpared to turn over five or six times, and to give it as many turnovers as some people wish to turn their business over in order to give them a profit. But on this one thing he seems to plant his two legs at an angle of 45 degrees and say: "Thus far I shall go and no farther."

I do not propose to repeat what I think was so eloquently and well said by his own friends on the other side of the House. I think the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) has put the case for all it is worth. He has given us, as a retailer and a business man, not only the benefit of his own experience, but the experience of others in his own city or town. He tells the House exactly what he thinks. The hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt), another business man of thirty or thirty-five years standing, as he told us yesterday, agrees with the hon. member for Algoma. The hon. member for Dufferin (Mr. Best) spoke in the same way yesterday. The hon. member for Nepawa (Mr. Davis) did the same thing. I do not wish the minister to pay any attention, if he please, to what we say on this side, but we expect him to listen to his own friends and to learn wisdom from people who are in business and who are giving him the benefit of their very best judgment.

I have a letter from a large firm of persons in my riding. They are doing a large wholesale and retail business, and they write me to say exactly what has been expressed so well by the hon. member for Algoma. They want to know how this tax is to be collected, and they ask me to say to the minister that they want it to be collected at the fountain head. I wish the minister would settle this question once for all. If he is not going to take our advice, or the advice of his friends, let him say so absolutely and finally. Then we would get along and not bother him with any more speeches. But we have discovered that he is subject to change, that he will change his Budget, and sometimes change his mind. We think that by keeping at him he may change the method and go back to a better system of collecting the taxes. If he tells us once and for all that there is no hope, that the die is cast and that the system that he has announced to the country is going to be the system ultimately, I am willing to give up and I will not say anything further. But, while there is life there is hope—

> While the lamp holds out to burn
> The vilest sinner may return.

And until the last flicker is gone I am prepared to keep on trying to persuade the minister to come to his senses and use the system in connection with this matter which business men are urging upon him.

Mr. CRERAR: I wish to urge upon the minister a reconsideration of the position that he has taken in reference to this matter. I desire, with entire candour and honesty, that we should arrive at the best solution of the question. I am convinced that the machinery of collection proposed will not only prove very expensive but entirely inadequate to achieve the purpose that the minister has in view. I cannot see the sense of adopting an expensive and cumbersome system of collecting a tax that simply takes from the public revenue, in the expense of collection, a great deal that should go to the treasury. The hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) has made a very strong case against collection by retailers. I think perhaps the figures he gave as to the number of merchants in Canada are large. I am rather inclined to take the opinion expressed by the hon. member for Neepawa (Mr. Davis). But if we assume that we have 50,000 retail merchants in Canada, and that each of these merchants makes on an average of forty sales a day, we have 2,500,000 sales slips. We must consider these taxes in their practical application. I think my hon. friend the Minister of Finance will agree with me that it will be necessary to check the collection of these taxes very closely. I do not believe for a moment that there is any large amount of dishonesty among the retail merchants in Canada, but notwithstanding the honest merchant who is collecting the tax and remitting it to the treasury department is entitled to be assured that no one of his brother merchants is escaping the tax. Consequently that will involve this: The remission and checking daily of 2,500,000 invoices. Now the Minister of Finance states that he has estimated that 100 officials at Ottawa can attend to this work. I have had considerable practical business experience, and I will venture the statement that the Minister of Finance will find nowhere within the four corners of Canada 100 employees who will check 2,500,000 invoices a day. It is out of the question. Consequently, if that cannot be done, the thing falls to the ground. We can be certain of this, Mr. Chairman, that if there is looseness in the collection of these taxes, if there is looseness, or inadequacy, or inefficiency in the system of administration, it will lead to a growing and continuing violation of the law, and the purpose for which my hon. friend has devised these taxes—which I think in very large degree are bad in principle and will be so demonstrated—will prove ineffective.

Then there is another thing. The reason the Minister of Finance urges for the continuance of this method of collecting these taxes is, that it may be brought home to the taxpayer in Canada that he must pay for the war, and that he must contribute to the revenue of the country. Well, I do not think there are very many people in Canada who fail to appreciate that fact now. They have failed in the past because of the indirect method of raising taxes we have had; but they are appreciating the fact to-day that this country has to raise $300,000,000 to $400,000,000 a year.

Now as to the cost. My hon. friend admits that the system he has devised is an expensive system, or at least not the most economical system that could be used, for the collection of these taxes; but he justifies it on this ground: that if the taxes are collected from the manufacturers, or the wholesaler, or the importer—as it is my opinion they should be—that will mean added cost to the consumer because that expense will ultimately reach the consumer. I am not so sure that he is right in that regard. The first thing that a merchant, in the country or in the city, will have to do will be to make additions to his staff to look after the extra clerical work necessarily involved in the collection of these taxes. A few days ago I had representations from a merchant in my constituency—out of many I have had—who has three retail stores. He tells me that not only will the added expense to his business be very great, but that he practically will have to scrap his whole sales system and introduce a new plan in order to furnish the Finance Department with the extra invoices they require. The whole of that expense will be added to the cost of the business done by the merchant and it will simply mean an addition to the price to the consumer. I am therefore not so sure that the method of collecting from the manufacturer, the wholesaler or the importer will prove more expensive in operation than the method proposed by the Minister of Finance. And even if that result did follow, the economy that could be secured in the administration of these taxes at Ottawa—and elsewhere throughout Canada where offices would have to be established by the minister—would justify the method of collecting these taxes from the importer, the manufacturer and the wholesaler. It is essential, Mr. Chairman, that these taxes be paid if we are going at the business seriously. There is nothing that will prove more demoralizing to the people of this country than for the impression to grow in the public mind that these taxes can be evaded; and I am very certain of this—that the minister cannot devise machinery that will adequately insure their collection by all the retailers. That, to my mind, forms one of the strongest justifications for a change in method.

I would therefore urge, in the best of good temper, that my hon. friend should reconsider the matter, and that he accept the suggestions that have come—not only from hon. gentlemen on this side but even with greater force from members on his own side. We all want to arrive at the best solution of this question; I am sure of that. I for one appreciate the difficulties that confront the Finance Minister—but after all I am convinced that this method of collecting taxes from the retailers will not only be unpopular throughout the country—which perhaps does not matter so much—but will prove expensive, and inadequate, and will lead to wholesale violation of the law. That is not to be desired in any system of collecting taxes. We have discussed the matter now, Mr. Chairman, for a couple of hours, and perhaps, my remarks might more properly come under section 2, but I understand that I shall be in order in moving an amendment. I therefore move:

> That the resolution be amended by striking therefrom the second paragraph of the said resolution and substituting therefor the following paragraph:
> "That the excise taxes as imposed by the preceding resolution shall be paid by the manufacturer, or wholesaler at the time of sale, or on importations at the time of importation in addition to the duties of customs already imposed; and by the manufacturer or wholesaler, to His Majesty in accordance with such regulations as may be prescribed."

Mr. LOGGIE: I wish to say a word or two regarding the amendment just submitted, and to give some further reasons why I think the proposal of the minister is the better plan. First of all we must not forget that we have a vast sum to raise annually, and this money must be obtained through the customs and by direct taxation. The proposal to collect luxury taxes through the retail merchants is, I admit, surrounded with difficulty; but no great reform or change in the mode of collecting taxes could ever be undertaken without difficulty. The minister has told us how these difficulties will be overcome, but he has not all his plans formulated.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: That is a good word.

Mr. LOGGIE: However, he tells us what taxes will be collected, that they will be collected from those who are best able to pay them, and the method of collecting them. Now I want, if I can, to point out the advantages that are involved to the people of Canada, and when I speak of the people of Canada I speak of them as represented by the Government. The Government of Canada represent the people of this country.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, no.

Mr. LOGGIE: Well, this Parliament represents the people.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. DUFF: Not this Government at any rate.

Mr. LOGGIE: I want, if I can, to point out some advantages that accrue to the people of Canada in connection with raising the necessary revenue. The tax on luxuries, collected through the retail merchants as proposed, will on the original value of imports give the Government about 87½ per cent more revenue, without any extra cost to the consumer. If it does that, is it not a fair guess that it will save the consumer taxes from some other source? But it does more than that. It impresses buyers of luxuries with the fact that they are directly paying some of our war expenditures, and it fosters the buying of goods that are not classed as luxuries. The proposal is definite and clear that goods coming under the class of luxuries are passed on to the consuming public on the basis of the retailer putting his profit only on the cost of the goods under the regular tariff. Then the retailer says to the consumer: In order to pay interest on the war debt the Government requires an extra ten per cent on any high class article that is designated a luxury. And the whole of that tax goes into the coffers of the people of Canada, represented by the Government.

Now, in order to illustrate to hon. gentlemen opposite in the clearest manner possible what I have been stating, I have here two tables illustrating the results. I take an invoice of silks and laces valued at the custom house at $10,000:

| Luxury tax paid by importer and absorbed in sales:— | |
|---|---|
| Invoice of silks and laces | $10,000 |
| Add luxury tax if by customs tax | 1,000 |
| Cost of goods to wholesaler | $11,000 |
| Add wholesaler's profits, 25 per cent | 2,750 |
| Cost of goods to retailer | $13,750 |
| Add retailer's profit | 6,875 |
| Cost of goods to consumers | $20,625 |

Mr. COPP: Would the hon. gentleman permit me a question? Is that fifty per cent retailer's profit real or fictitious?

Mr. LOGGIE: That is the average profit of a retailer selling silks. I do not think he could afford to sell silks at less than fifty per cent profit.

Mr. DUFF: That is a pretty good profit.

Mr. LOGGIE: Now, the point I want to make is that on those goods which cost the consumer $20,625 the Government gets only $1,000 if the tax is collected on the principle of the amendment before the House. But let me now point out what tax will accrue to the treasury if the Government's proposal is adopted:

| Luxury tax collected by the retailer:— | |
|---|---|
| Invoice of silks and laces | $10,000 |
| Add wholesaler's profit, 25 per cent | 2,500 |
| Cost of goods to retailer | $12,500 |
| Add retailer's profit, 50 per cent | 6,250 |
| | $18,750 |
| Add 10 per cent luxury tax | 1,875 |
| Cost of goods to consumers | $20,625 |

In this case the cost to the consumer is $20,625, or exactly the same as if the tax were collected through the customs house and the Government got only $1,000, whereas in this case they get $1,875, or 87½ per cent more. That is positively correct as far as I can figure it, and if hon. gentlemen opposite can point out any error I shall be glad to hear from them.

I have another table which is practically the same in principle, but I put the profits at a different rate, that is to say, I have made the wholesaler's profit 10 per cent and the retailer's profit 25 per cent. Here the amount paid to the Government through the customs would be $1,000, but if paid through the retailer would be $1,375. Remember, Mr. Chairman, the cost to the consumer is the same, but these profits are not as they really would be, that is to say, they are much less than what the consumer would pay. However, the point I want to make is that allowing a profit of 25 per cent to the wholesaler and 50 per cent to the retailer the Government would get 87½ per cent more money, and the consumer would not pay a dollar more, under the proposals of the Minister of Finance. So far as I am concerned, therefore, I am prepared to vote against the amendment.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Mr. Chairman, one or two things ought to be pointed out before the vote on the amendment is proceeded with. Rightly or wrongly, a good many things have been said on the question of checking extravagance and waste, and I wonder if we are at all sincere in what we say. I wonder if we realize that what is proposed is that the poor man's boots shall be taxed with the cost of the rich man's luxuries. That is what this amendment amounts to. What is proposed is that instead of this tax being paid by the man who can afford to pay it when he makes the expenditure, it should be levied on the manufacturer or wholesaler as the case may be. Is anyone green enough to imagine for one minute that the goods on the shelves of the wholesaler or in the warehouse and factories of the manufacturer are going to be taxed from time to time in connection with this luxury tax? Under the amendment the luxury tax will become part of the general cost of that manufacture, and you ask us to say that the poor man shall make up that cost. In a boot factory you have workmen's rough boots at say $4 or $5 or $6 a pair, and also boots costing $18 and $20 a pair. The whole effect of the amendment is to say that to that cost of the workmen's boot shall be added the costs to which the manufacturer is put because he carries on the manufacture of more highly priced lines. The taxes would not be luxury taxes at all in that case. They would be taxes on expenditure. They would be added costs to the manufacturer, which he could place just where he pleased, and if he found it easier to charge the whole of it on his cheaper lines of goods, leaving it off the more expensive he could do so. I do not believe that the hon. gentleman intends any such result, but that can only be the result. There is another thing, which I am absolutely sure was not intended at all, which goes to show how easy it is to make errors of this kind. The amendment seeks to replace section 2 with the following:

> That the excise taxes as imposed by the preceding resolution shall be paid by the manufacturer or wholesaler at the time of sale, or on importations at the time of importation in addition to the duties of customs already imposed;

Now, mark it, mark it.—

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): Well.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Mark it well. There are only two interests that are called upon to pay that tax, the manufacturer or the wholesaler. The retailer can import as much as he likes without paying any tax, because the word "importer" does not appear in the amendment, but simply the manufacturer or wholesaler.

Mr. CALDER: What about the individual?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: And there is nothing in the amendment to prevent the individual bringing in the highest-priced motors and automobiles without paying taxes. I am sure that the hon. gentleman could hardly have intended such a result as that. I am sure that the insinuation, which could be easily made, that this is a studied worked-out policy in the interests of some retail concern would be false. It might be insinuated that this is something which has been worked up to enable some particular backers of my hon. friend to get in their automobiles free or that is something under which the grain growers, selling as they do direct to the public, and therefore being neither manufacturers nor wholesalers, could entirely escape the tax; but I do not believe for one minute that any of those considerations was present with my hon. friend. I simply desire to point out to him just what his amendment means—just what its effect would be. For what reason? The reason is manifest.

I have been charged with changing my mind. I have changed my mind. I change my mind when it is shown to me that I am wrong, but I do not change my mind upon pressure or influence. Hon. gentlemen talk about the number of retailers in this country. Several speakers have mentioned 200,000. My hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie) got it up to between 400,000 and 500,000, while my hon. friend (Mr. Crerar) got it down to a much closer figure. If there are 200,000 retailers, there are 200,000 reasons for changing one's mind if pressure or influence is to be a reason why one should change one's mind. If any hon. gentleman can show that this amendment will help the common people of this country, and by that I mean all those who buy goods, and who are not manufacturers, not wholesalers, not retailers, and will not add to their costs, I will change my mind. But I am not changing my mind because 50,000 or 200,000 retail merchants want me to change it. I appeal to my hon. friend to forget for one moment that he and I do not agree. I would ask him to try to remember some of the principles for which he says he can honestly stand. I would ask him to remember what he thinks about a tax that can be made the source of an added profit to a manufacturer as against a suffering consuming public. My words are not quite the same as his; but the idea is exactly the same. And to-day he is faced with an opportunity of placing that tax direct, of seeing that not one single cent is paid more than the Government gets; that no profits whatever comes upon it; that that system of direct taxation which is to him so dear shall be maintained. But the suggestion is that that shall be all forgotten. Why, he says, there are 50,000 retail merchants who are objecting—and the indirect tax method is to be applied, and not one but two different sets of profits are to be made available on it. The issue is very plain and I do not know that I can usefully say anything more in connection with it.

Mr. CRERAR: I will take but very few minutes to reply to some of the observations made by the Minister of Finance. It is at any rate quite clear that he persists in his desire to become an unpopular gentleman in Canada. I want to make my position clear at the outset. I have objected to these taxes because many of them are absolutely unsound. The minister persists in calling them luxury taxes; but they are not luxury taxes at all; for the greater part they are taxes on absolute necessaries of life in this country. If my hon. friend is so desirous of looking after the poor man and the cost of living to the poor man then I would very seriously commend to him that he reconsider this whole tax business and cut out many of the taxes he has imposed on the necessaries of life. My hon. friend states further that one result of the adoption of my amendment will be that retailers will be able to import goods into Canada and thus escape the tax. I think I understood my hon. friend aright; but I cannot for one moment believe that he made that assertion in all seriousness because if he turns to section 7 of the resolution dealing with the one per cent tax that he is imposing under that section, and examines the language, he will find that it corresponds identically with the language I have used in my amendment. I was very careful to do that.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will the hon. gentleman allow me a moment, because I am quite sure we should not be at cross purposes? It is quite right that the retailer there was not to be taxed; it was only a sales tax.

Mr. CRERAR: The amendment states that the tax shall be paid on importations into the country. Does that mean that a retailer can buy goods in another country and import them into Canada and thus escape the tax? If a retailer goes to the United States and buys a carload of goods for distribution amongst his different stores, does he pay the customs tax? I do not think he escapes that, and if he does not escape the customs tax, how is he going to escape this tax? The idea is absurd, and my hon. friend will realize that if he thinks it over for a moment. My hon. friend made, shall I say, an insinuation, which, I think probably when he considers the matter in the sober light of to-morrow, he will rather regret. He rather hinted that I might be interested in this because I was connected with a certain company that is making importations into this country. I rather regret my hon. friend made that insinuation. I think I am well enough known in this House to have my word accepted when I state that that thought was never in my mind for a second.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I gave my hon. friend absolute credit for that. I said that I was sure he had not that thought in mind.

Mr. CRERAR: That furnishes an additional reason why the minister should not have made reference to the matter. But he says further—what good reason is there for changing this? I gave the reasons and I will give them again. If this tax is to be collected by the retailer, it will, in large measure, be evaded. My hon. friend can scarcely get house room enough in Ottawa to house the invoices and returns he is going to compel these retailers to make. If he gets a staff that is adequate to check the returns as they should be checked, a very large proportion of the tax that he will collect will be eaten up with expense. His method is an expensive one and will result in evasion of the tax, as is evident to-day. I have in my desk downstairs a letter which states that already pedlars and vendors of that kind are evading this tax as regards jewellery, drygoods and other commodities. If I had the letter here I would read it. How is my hon. friend going to collect the tax from these people? He is going to hurt the business of the retail merchant in this respect, and his system will inevitably result in evasion of the tax, with a consequent loss of revenue and a great deal of inconvenience to every retail merchant in Canada. I make the appeal to my hon. friend and to the members of the House in the best of good faith, that my hon. friend will find the strongest arguments in support of my amendment came from his own side this afternoon from reputable business men who knew what they were talking about. My hon. friend knows that this tax is an expensive operation and he will not get the revenue he expects to get from it. For that reason, if for no other, the amendment should be adopted by the committee.

Amendment (Mr. Crerar) negative; yeas, 25; nays, 39.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): I understood that we were going to discuss this resolution in sections after the general discussion.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Quite so. I move that the committee do now proceed to a consideration of the resolution paragraph by paragraph, and item by item.

Mr. BUREAU: This is a very slim House and some hon. members might like to have a discussion on the general principle on Monday afternoon.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Hon. members will have that privilege when the different paragraphs and items have been separately considered and amended.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are marked with an asterisk.)

CANADIAN NORTHERN ARBITRATION.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough):

1. How much was expended by the Department of Justice in connection with the Canadian Northern arbitration proceedings?
2. Was any money expended on account of the Canadian Northern arbitration proceedings by any department of the Government outside of the Department of Railways and Canals and the Department of Justice?
3. If so, by what departments and how much was so expended?

Hon. Mr. REID:

1. The Department of Justice say that nothing has been expended by that department.
2. I cannot find from any of the other departments that they have expended any money on this arbitration.
3. Answered by No. 2.

CREDIT ADVANCE TO ROUMANIA.

Mr. EULER:

1. When did interest fall due on account of the credit extended by the Canadian Government to Roumania?
2. Has the Roumanian Government paid such interest?
3. If not, why not?
4. What is the amount, if any, of such interest in default?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON:

1, 2, 3 and 4. No interest yet due by Government of Roumania.

In connection with Roumania a bond for $25,000,000 has been deposited with the Bank of Montreal, London, subject to the order of the Minister of Finance. Each month a statement of the advances, including interest from the date of the advance to the end of the month at 5½ per cent is sent forward and the Bank of Montreal endorses on the bond the total amount of such account. When all payments for contracts entered into previous to December 31, 1919, have been made this bond will be exchanged for dollar debentures of the Government of Roumania carrying interest at 5½ per cent payable half yearly. These payments are expected to be completed by August 1 and interest will not be due until such exchange has been effected.

INTEREST IN ROUMANIAN ADVANCE.

*Mr. ARCHAMBAULT:

1. Are the interests on the Roumanian bonds given to Canada as guarantee for loans now past due?
2. Were said interests paid to Canada, and when?
3. What were the amounts of said interests?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON:

1. No.

2 and 3. Answered by No. 1.

ADVANCES TO ROUMANIA AND GREECE.

Mr. RINFRET:

1. Are there any sums of interest coming due during 1919 and since then on the amounts loaned by the Canadian Government to Greece and Roumania?

2. If so, have these sums been paid, and on what date?

3. If not, by which country have they not been paid? And on what date were they due?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON:

1, 2, and 3. No interest payable in 1919. First payment of interest from Government of Greece due June 30, 1920.

In connection with Roumania a bond for $25,000,000 has been deposited with the Bank of Montreal, London, subject to the order of the Minister of Finance. Each month a statement of the advances, including interest from the date of the advance to the end of the month at 5½ per cent is sent forward and the Bank of Montreal endorses on the bond the total amount of such account.

When all payments for contracts entered into previous to December 31, 1919, have been made this bond will be exchanged for dollar debentures of the Government of Roumania carrying interest at 5½ per cent payable half yearly. These payments are expected to be completed by August 1, and interest will not be due until such exchange has been effected.

SUPERANNUATION OF MR. A. D. DECELLES.

*Mr. GAUVREAU:

1. What are the reasons put forward by the Hon. the Prime Minister to require the superannuation of Mr. A. D. DeCelles, and replace him by Mr. J. de L. Taché?

2. What is the salary attached to the position of Librarian of Parliament, and what will be the amount of superannuation to be granted to Mr. DeCelles?

Rt. Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN:

1. The retirement of Mr. A. D. DeCelles, C.M.G., as Parliamentary Librarian, who was appointed in 1880 and who had arrived at the age of 76 years, had been under consideration for some time before it actually took place. Mr. DeCelles was not required to retire and the date of his superannuation was left to his own good judgment, as it was thoroughly realized that his services as librarian had been conspicuous and worthy in very sense. In the reorganization of the Printing Bureau it was found unnecessary to continue the office of King's Printer in view of the necessity for the appointment of a director with special qualifications of training and experience. As Mr. Taché possessed in an eminent degree the literary and other qualifications for appointment to the office of librarian it was decided to offer him that position which he accepted.

2. Salary of the Librarian of Parliament, $6,000 per annum.

Superannuation granted to Mr. DeCelles, $3,772.22 per annum.

TAX ON CINEMATOGRAPHIC FILMS.

Mr. ETHIER:

What is the amount collected by the Government, by virtue of the Income Tax Act, on cinematographic films during the years 1917, 1918 and 1919, for each year separately.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think that question should be re-framed. It cannot be answered as it now stands because there is no tax placed on cinematographic films under the Income Tax Act. The hon. gentleman could get the information as to the tax that was paid for cinematographic films under the special War Revenue Act.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

LOSS OF GOVERNMENT VOUCHERS AT SEA.

*Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough):

1. With reference to the statement of the Honourable President of the Council, page 3094 unrevised Hansard, that two shiploads of vouchers have been sunk by German submarines, on what dates respectively were the said shiploads sunk?

2. What are the names of the ships, their tonnage, and also the names of the captains of said ships at the dates on which the sinkings took place?

3. If these lost vouchers related to expenditures of the Department of Militia and Defence overseas, to which branch of said department did they relate?

4. Were duplicates preserved?

5. Have any of these two shiploads of vouchers ever been recovered?

6. Can the Government give an approximate estimate of the total amount of the expenditures covered by the lost vouchers, and if so, what is the amount?

7. How many tons of vouchers were lost?

8. If the weight of the lost vouchers is not available, how many cubic feet of space did the boxes or packages containing these vouchers occupy?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON:

1. Shipments of Chief Paymaster's vouchers were lost in the ss. "Arabic" on 19th August, 1915, and in the "Hesperian" on 7th September, 1915.

2. Names of ships "Arabic" and "Hesperian,"—the department has no record of their tonnage or the names of the captains.

3. The vouchers related to the expenditure made by the Chief Paymaster overseas generally, and not to any particular branch.

4. Yes.

5. No—but this was only an inconvenience, as duplicates were retained in England.

6. $3,000,000.

7 and 8. Not known.

TAX PAID ON INCOMES OVER $100,000.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer):

How many incomes of over $100,000 paid income tax in Canada in the last fiscal year?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Individuals—forty-eight.

SUPERANNUATION OF CHARLES EUGENE TACHE.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL:

1. Has Charles Eugène Taché, District Engineer of the Public Works Department for Bonaventure and Rimouski, been superannuated?
2. If so, who replaces him? Is the appointment merely temporary, and does the Government intend to make a permanent appointment?

Hon. Mr. REID:

1. Yes.
2 (a) L. G. Trudeau; (b) temporary; (c) matter under consideration.

BRIDGE BETWEEN CAMPBELLTON, N.B. AND CROSS POINT, QUE.

Hon. Mr. MARCIL:

1. Has a deputation waited upon the Government lately asking for the construction of an interprovincial highway bridge over the Restigouche river between Campbellton, N.B., and Cross Point, Quebec?
2. If so, what answer was given to the application?

Hon. Mr. REID:

1 and 2. Request was made for this work but the reply made was that owing to financial conditions, the Government could not entertain the matter this year.

PROVINCIAL SALARIES AND INDEMNITIES TAXABLE.

Mr. SEGUIN:

1. Are the salaries paid by the provincial governments taxable under the Income Tax Act?
2. Are the indemnities granted to provincial ministers and members of the legislative assemblies, the salaries paid to sheriffs, protonotaries, registrars and clerks of the courts taxable under the Income Tax Act?
3. Are the salaries of judges of all the courts of this country, and also the superannuation allowances granted to said judges, taxable under the Income Tax Act?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON:

1. Yes.
2. Yes.
3. Yes, except the salaries and retiring allowances of judges covered by the Judges Act who were appointed previous to the 8th July, 1919.

PAPER TABLED.

Copy of the surrender of certain Indian lands near Sarnia.—Hon. Mr. Meighen.

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

UNOPPOSED MOTION FOR PRODUCTION OF PAPERS.

Mr. Archambault—For a return showing the names of the societies which have filed copies of policies complying with the provisions of the Insurance Act, 1910, Geo. V., chap. 157, section 115; the names of the societies which have neglected to file copies of policies as required by said Act, and to whom licenses have been issued for the current year; and names of any societies from whom licenses have been withheld.

GRAND TRUNK ARBITRATION.

RUMOURED APPOINTMENT OF FORMER PRESIDENT TAFT AS GOVERNMENT ABITRATOR.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve): I notice in the press this morning the statement that former President Taft has been appointed an arbitrator in the approaching arbitration proceedings between the Grand Trunk and the Government. May I ask the Government if this is true?

Rt. Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): I think that was stated in the press merely as a rumour. There has been no appointment made.

RACE TRACK LEGISLATION.

ATTENTION DRAWN BY THE PRIME MINISTER TO REPORTED STATEMENT BY REV. DR. SPEER IN METHODIST CONFERENCE, TORONTO.

Rt. Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): Just as I entered the House this afternoon my attention was directed to an extraordinary despatch which appears in today's Ottawa Citizen, and which purports to emanate from Toronto. It is as follows:

EXPECTED THE RACE MEN TO WIN OUT.

Toronto, June 13.—Rev. Dr. Chown, general superintendent, informed the Methodist conference yesterday morning that he had sent letters to Ottawa declaring the position of the Methodist church on race track gambling.

Rev. Dr. Speer stated that letters were of no avail in this case, "but money in the lobby. We hadn't the money. I hope the department did something. It was a foregone conclusion that these men of the race track would get what they wanted."

As far as my knowledge goes, and according to my firm conviction, the suggestion or implication contained in the words of Dr. Speer, if he is correctly reported, is a most outrageous and scandalous libel.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I sincerely hope he is not correctly reported. Since my return to Parliament some five weeks ago I have not seen a race track man around the lobby of this House, and I have not heard of one being here.

An hon. MEMBER: Nor have I.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The reflection upon Parliament by this gentleman, if he is correctly reported, is so serious that I thought it my duty to mention the matter openly and publicly, and to request His Honour the Speaker to consider what would be the appropriate action, if action be deemed advisable, for Parliament to take in the matter.

Some hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING (leader of the Opposition): May I say that I believe the action of the Right Honourable the Prime Minister in drawing attention to any statement which reflects upon the independence of members of Parliament, will be approved by every member of the House. I join with my right hon. friend in the hope that the despatch as it appears in the press is not a correct report.

Mr. SPEAKER: I also hope that the despatch is not true but so far as I am concerned I shall feel it my duty to take such action in the matter, if it be true, as will properly preserve the honour and the dignity of Parliament

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear.

Mr. SPEAKER: Not only is the honour of members of the House of Commons involved in a statement of this character, but there is likewise involved the question of sapping and undermining public confidence in the representative institutions in a democratic country. It seems to me, therefore, that if the statement has been correctly reported it cannot be allowed to go unchallenged.

Mr. BUREAU: May I be allowed to offer a suggestion? I would ignore absolutely the fellow who indulged in such slander. To do otherwise would be giving him too much publicity. I would not bring him before the Bar of the House because that would be disgracing the bar. I would meet the statement with silent contempt.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The practice of indulgence in statements of this character is all too common throughout the country. If this man has any data to support such a statement he should come forward and acquaint the public with it. If he has not then his conduct should be stigmatized in the manner which such conduct deserves and he should be required to prove his words.

POST OFFICE AND CUSTOMS DEPARTMENT.

RUMOURED INVESTIGATION BY A UNITED STATES FIRM.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX: I notice in the Montreal Gazette of this morning a long editorial concerning the appointment of a United States firm to investigate the Post Office and Customs Departments of Canada, which firm, it is said, has been engaged at a figure of $10,000 per month. Is that a correct statement? If so, for what purpose is that investigation to be held?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) has a motion on the Order Paper in regard to the matter. I think it would be undesirable to enter into a discussion in his absence and in advance of the motion itself.

PICTOU HARBOUR.

On motion of Hon. C. C. Ballantyne (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) Bill No. 121, respecting the harbour of Pictou in Nova Scotia, was read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. BUREAU: I understand that this harbour used to be administered by a commission the same as the harbour of Three Rivers—

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member's remarks are not in order on clause 1, which is merely the "short title" of the Bill.

Mr. BUREAU: For once you are right, Mr. Chairman, I apologize. I thought it was clause 2.

Section agreed to

On section 2—Property and rights vested in His Majesty.

Mr. BUREAU: I understand that the harbour of Pictou has heretofore been administered by a commission in the same way as the harbour of Three Rivers, and that hereafter all liabilities and expenditures are to be assumed by the Government, and that a department of the Government is to administer the harbour. Will there be any particular officer in Pictou to look after that administration? Will the Government hereafter charge any wharfage or dockage dues to ships using this harbour, or will it be treated the same as our other harbours? Or is the fact that it is going to be administered by the Government an indication that the Government will assume the responsibility of improving the harbour without charging the expenditure against the harbour itself, this expenditure being paid from the Dominion Treasury? If that be the case, I would ask the minister to put the harbour of Three Rivers in the same position, because we require a lot of improvements there.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: My hon. friend has judged the situation correctly. The revenue from the port of Pictou has been decreasing year by year until at the present time the expenditure is about $450 in excess of the revenue. It is not the intention of the Government to undertake any new work there; the purpose of this Bill is simply to transfer the administration of the port from the Harbour Commission to the Department of Public Works. There have been many precedents for this action, and the transfer will not involve any extra expense to the Government that I can see. The question of liabilities was raised when the resolution was under discussion some weeks ago, and I have since ascertained that the Harbour Commission does not owe any money, but will be turning over to the department, if this Bill passes, about $186. With regard to the very important port of Three Rivers, I shall be very glad to give every consideration to the suggestion made by the hon. member for that constituency (Mr. Bureau).

Mr. LEMIEUX: Have you an estimate of how much money will be required to put the harbour of Pictou in good shape?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: As far as I understand, no expenditure will be necessary, the wharves being in a sufficiently good state of repair at the present time.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Are any repairs asked for?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: None.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I accept my hon. friend's word, for I know he is a business man and understands the value of figures. But, Mr. Chairman, I view with alarm the taking over by the Government of any of these public works. I have been surprised of late to receive from a firm of brokers a circular wherein the name of the Dominion is being paraded as endorsing the scheme for the improvement of the harbour of St.

[Mr. Bureau.]

John. It will be remembered that this harbour was taken over by the Government, but how I do not know.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: It has not been taken over yet.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Bonds are being issued to meet the expenditure on the harbour works, and those bonds are endorsed by the Government.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Would the hon. member allow me a question?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I will conclude if my hon. friend pleases. I notice that those bonds are endorsed by the Dominion, and the name of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell), as Acting Minister of Public Works, is made use of in that circular. I have the greatest possible objection to the credit of the Dominion being used to assist enterprises of this nature. The public will be surprised when it becomes known that the treasury is being involved to the extent of millions of dollars for the St. John harbour improvements. I do not know if this has escaped the attention of the Government, but I was appalled when I saw that our national credit was being pledged in that way.

The CHAIRMAN: Before the hon. minister replies—and I think a reply would now be quite in order—I take it for granted that this reference to the harbour of St. John is only by way of comparison.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Yes.

The CHAIRMAN: Because it will be entirely out of order to enter into a general discussion concerning the harbour of St. John in connection with this Bill.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am afraid of the prospect of any further dealings with harbour commissions in the Maritime Provinces. We were assured when the subject of the St. John harbour works was before the House that everything was above board. Now we find that gentlemen at St. John are selling harbour bonds,—and it is quite easy for them to get the money when the name of the Dominion appears as the guarantor of those bonds. We are taxed beyond the human limit, and the people of this country are quite willing to be so taxed, but only in a legitimate way, and they will not tolerate any such incursions on the Government Exchequer.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: It is true that a year ago authority was given by Parliament for the taking over, under conditions clearly specified in legislation introduced for that purpose, of the port of St. John and placing it under a commission. But effect could be given to that legislation only after the city of St. John held a referendum in which the majority of the people declared themselves in favour of nationalizing the port and placing it under a commission. Such a referendum has not yet been held; therefore the port has not been nationalized—

Mr. LEMIEUX: Has my hon. friend seen the circular—

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Just allow me to finish. The Government, accordingly, did not guarantee any of the debentures for the city of St. John, so far as my knowledge goes. They will do so only after a referendum is taken and the harbour passes under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Marine. At present the city of St. John do their own financing for the port; the Dominion Government do not guarantee any of their debentures.

Mr. CAHILL: When the resolution was before the committee I asked why special treatment was given in this particular case. For instance, I have a communication from residents of Fabre, on lake Timiskaming, who claim that their dock was damaged by the ice last winter and that they have been obliged to land their goods on the shore; yet they are paying wharfage dues. Why are these people treated differently from the people of Pictou? What is the policy of the Government in regard to wharves where dues are being paid but where the necessary accommodation is not being furnished? Will it be necessary for the minister to bring in a Bill for each one?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: This procedure has been followed on more than one occasion. For instance, under my predecessor, Sir Douglas Hazen, the harbour of North Sydney was transferred from the Department of Marine to the Department of Public Works. I mention only this instance now, but I could cite many other similar cases. I would suggest that my hon. friend (Mr. Cahill) should write me in regard to the particular harbour that he speaks about. If the revenue there is not sufficient to keep the wharf in a satisfactory state of repair, it would be quite in order for me to bring the matter to the attention of this House, as has been done in the case of Pictou harbour.

Mr. DUFF: If this Bill passes will the business of the port be conducted by the harbour master or by an engineer of the Department of Public Works when repairs are necessary?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The business of the harbour will be conducted by the harbour master, who will be under the Public Works Department.

Mr. McKENZIE: I would like to know definitely from the minister what the policy of the Government will be after the authority which has hitherto been vested in harbour commissions has been done away with. How will the works that are now in existence be maintained? Under present conditions, whatever money these commissioners get is used for the building of wharves and breakwaters and their maintenance, as well as a little dredging. The minister mentioned the harbour of North Sydney. We have a few works in that harbour which were built by the commission. The breakwater near the north end of the harbour is so old that I cannot tell the minister whether it was built by the commission or not. I do know that while the commission were in existence they used to repair the breakwater and keep it in shape. During the last two years, since the commission went out of existence, the whole of the harbour and its works have been under the control of the Government, and I have been instructed by men interested in the conditions at North Sydney that this breakwater, which is a very useful structure, affording protection to the whole harbour and particularly to the coal and iron ore piers of the Nova Scotia Steel Company, is falling into decay or disrepair. Very little money will keep it in repair, but if it is broken up or destroyed by the action of the sea it will cost a great deal to put it in good condition. I bring this matter to the notice of the minister with a view to his seeing that this useful breakwater is not allowed to be broken up or destroyed.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—obligations assumed by His Majesty:

Mr. DUFF: The minister has said that there were no obligations or liabilities; yet this section provides:

> All proceedings in any court either instituted by or against the said Commissioners may be proceeded with as if this Act had not passed.

That would seem to indicate that there are liabilities and obligations.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: This is merely put in for legal purposes so that if any one should resurrect a claim that we do not know of at present, action shall lie against His Majesty the King instead of against the harbour commissioners of Pictou.

Mr. DUFF: There are no liabilities, then?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: No.

Mr. McKENZIE: I understood the minister to give his assent to what I suggested in regard to the harbour of North Sydney, though he did not say so; and that he is willing to look after these works and keep them in repair. The people of North Sydney, who will be watching Hansard in order to see what it has to say in regard to the matter, will not be able to obtain from Hansard what is in the mind of the minister. I should, therefore, like him to declare in a general way his policy as regards those works that are being taken over. I am sure the policy will be to maintain them, and that being the case, it will be more satisfactory to our people who are now at the mercy of the Government as regards the maintenance of those works, if the minister puts a declaration of his policy on Hansard.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The reason I did not make a direct answer to my hon. friend is due to the fact that the port of North Sydney comes under the Public Works Department and not the Department of Marine. I see the Acting Minister of Public Works is not in his seat, but I shall be very glad to bring to his attention the representations made by my hon. friend in that regard.

INLAND REVENUE ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Hon. Martin Burrell (Minister of Customs and Inland Revenue), the House went into committee to consider the following proposed resolution, Mr. Boivin in the Chair:

15. That section 366 and 367 be repealed, and in lieu thereof it be enacted that acetic acid may only be sold under the name of acetic acid, and no manufacturer, vendor or other dealer in the same shall be permitted to sell or offer for sale acetic acid under the name or as a substitute for vinegar, and that the penalty for violation of this provision shall be not less than $200, and all acetic acid found on the premises wherein any such offence is committed shall be forfeited to the Crown, and shall be seized by any officer of Inland Revenue and dealt with accordingly.

16. That section 251, relating to the supply of wood naphtha, wood alcohol, or methylated or other denaturalized spirit to be used for manufacturing purposes in Canada, and Part X of the said Act, as enacted by chapter 34 of the statutes of 1908, respecting the manufacture of wood alcohol, be repealed, and that in lieu thereof a new Part X be enacted to provide:—

(a) That "denatured alcohol" shall mean alcohol in suitable admixture with such denaturants as to render it in the judgment of the Minister non-potable, and to prevent recovery of the ethyl alcohol; and "especially denatured alcohol" shall mean alcohol in suitable admixture with such special denaturants as have been approved by the Minister;

(b) That denatured alcohol and specially denatured alcohol which is intended for use in the arts and industries, or for fuel, light or power, or for any mechanical purpose, may be manufactured in Canada, free from excise duty;

(c) That except as provided by this Part no alcohol shall be manufactured, denatured or recovered in Canada except in distilleries thereto licensed;

(d) That denatured alcohol shall be sold, delivered and transported without restriction to dealers, manufacturers and other persons, but specially denatured alcohol shall only be sold or delivered under a departmental permit to dealers and manufacturers, to be used in the arts and industries in cases where denatured alcohol would be unsuitable, and shall only be moved or transported under such conditions as the Minister may, by regulations, prescribe;

(e) That no alcohol shall be manufactured or sold under the provisions of this Part for beverage purposes;

(f) That the recovery of alcohol after it has been used for industrial purposes, and its redistillation and purification shall only be done on the premises in which the alcohol was used or at a duly licensed distillery, and all alcohol recovered on the premises aforesaid must be used in the same manufacturing establishment in which it was originally used;

(g) That labels on vessels containing wood alcohol or denatured alcohol shall bear the words "Methyl-Hydrate-Poison" in black letters on white ground not less than one-fourth of an inch in height.

(h) That as respects wood alcohol a license shall be required to carry on its manufacture, approved by the district inspector, and the manufacturer shall, jointly with a guarantee company approved by the Department, enter into a bond to His Majesty in the sum of $4,000, conditioned for the rendering of all accounts, inventories and returns required by law, for the payment of all penalties incurred by the licensee, and for faithful compliance with the requirements of the Act; and the person in whose favour a license is granted shall pay a license fee of one dollar upon receiving such license;

(i) That any person who holds in possession, sells, exchanges or delivers any alcohol or specially denatured alcohol contrary to the provisions of this Part shall be liable upon summary conviction, to a penalty of not less than two hundred dollars and not exceeding five hundred dollars; and all the provisions of Part II of the said Act respecting bonded manufacturers, licenses, and the obligations of persons holding them, the keeping of books of accounts and the making of returns, and all provisions respecting penalties, so far as applicable, shall apply to the manufacture of wood alcohol, the manufacture, denaturing, special denaturing and recovery of alcohol, and the persons licensed as herein provided.

Mr. STEVENS: I wish to bring to the attention of the minister a matter I have already taken up with his department and to ask that before the Bill is finally passed the request I am going to make be given consideration. Owing to the increased tax on alcohol, the cost to hospitals will be considerably increased. I am informed by the Vancouver General Hospital, for instance, and the same will be true in varying degree of all hospitals, I presume, that the increased tax will result in additional cost to that one hospital, which is a very large institution, of upwards of $3,000 per annum. As there are many hospitals, the cost will be increased to them very, very materially in the aggregate. I would suggest to the minister that when the Bill is brought down it should contain a provision that spirits used exclusively in hospitals for medicinal purposes shall be exempt from taxation.

Mr. BURRELL: My hon. friend will doubtless appreciate the difficulties that face the department in the control of alcohol after it leaves the distillery. It is quite true that under the present Act alcohol used for any purposes whatsoever and whether it went to hospitals or elsewhere would have to pay the excise duty of $2.40 a gallon. When it was proposed to amend the Act last year there was quite a strong appeal made by the various hospitals and by scientific laboratories in the country to have alcohol which was used in hospitals and in laboratories for research purposes exempted from the tax. The matter has been given some consideration. In respect to the particular point my hon. friend raises I may say that to grant his request would in effect be giving the hospitals another form of subsidy. With the additional duty of $2 hospitals will pay for the alcohol they use for medicinal purposes a duty of $4.40 a gallon. It is quite true that if the additional $2 was not imposed in the case of hospitals, or if the whole excise tax was not imposed in their case, it would be a great benefit to the hospitals, but it would, of course, entail that much loss of revenue to the Government. In effect, therefore, it would be giving the hospitals a subsidy. Let us assume for the sake of argument that the excise duty paid by the Vancouver General Hospital to which my hon. friend has referred, on the alcohol it used during the year was a little over $2,000. To meet my hon. friend's request would simply mean that the treasury of this country would be practically foregoing $2,000 for the benefit of that hospital. It is an arguable point whether hospitals should be subsidized by the noncollection of that revenue. It is a question whether the additional money required for the payment of that alcohol should be given as a direct subsidy by the Government or should be subscribed by those who at the present time support the hospital. I need hardly say that I have a great deal of sympathy personally with the view expressed by my hon. friend, and which has been put before the department from many different sources in Canada. I shall be quite willing to give the matter fuller consideration before the Bill is brought down. In the meantime I would suggest that my hon. friend let the matter stand.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): It has been represented to me that the imposition of a tax on alcohol and the numerous restrictions placed upon its use by the department have made alcohol very expensive and have hampered scientific men in their investigations requiring its use. I am not familiar enough with the subject to judge whether these criticisms are valid or not, but I just wish to direct the minister's attention to this matter, which has been called to my attention by a college professor, and I should like to know if there is any reason for the imposition of these restrictions.

Mr. BURRELL: My hon. friend's point touches to some extent the point raised by my hon. friend (Mr. Stevens). It is true that as regards commercial work we are making a great advance because under this Bill we are providing for the elimination of the excise duty on the ethyl alcohol when converted by the addition of wood alcohol into methylated spirits; but I do not think that is exactly the form of alcohol to which my hon. friend refers. The point raised by my hon. friend from Guysborough is more in relation I think to the ethyl alcohol used for scientific purposes. It is true that it would be a great benefit to have this exempt from the tax, but I must point out the objection that exists in the case of all these exemptions from the duty, and that is in connection with releasing the alcohol from the distilleries into other people's hands in a form in which it can be used for beverage purposes. With the recently added duty the total duty on alcohol will be $5 on the imported and $4.40 excise. My hon. friend will understand the frantic desire of gentlemen of a bibulous temperament, of whom there seem to be still a great many in the country, to get hold of this alcohol, and the great difficulty of control when once out of our hands. Under the present prohibitory legislation of this country—and I am not pronouncing an opinion upon it from a moral standpoint, but simply looking at it in a cold-blooded business-like way so far as operating the department is concerned—the result has been that owing to the high and mounting costs of spirits of all kinds, where about two years ago we were only prosecuting a score or so of people for manufacturing spirits by illicit stills, the number last year amounted to nearly nine hundred, and I venture to say we have only touched the fringe. Every form of alcohol that can be used for beverage purposes becomes increasingly difficult to control directly it leaves our hands.

It cannot leave our hands until the duty is paid by the distillery but directly we give it into other people's hands to be used for different purposes, it is going to make it an exceedingly difficult matter to control. It is rather a serious question for the department to consider. As the matter stands at present I have not been disposed to grant freedom from the excise duty to ethyl alcohol used for the purpose which my hon. friend speaks of although, I repeat, we have made a very great concession by permitting denatured alcohol to be free of excise duty and that, I think, will give a great impetus to commercial and industrial work.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (East Lambton): What duty does this law impose on ethyl alcohol when imported for industrial purposes and what is the excise duty on alcohol manufactured in this country?

Mr. BURRELL: Methylated spirits can only be imported by the department under the Act as it stands. The department itself, under the law, has been the sole maker and dispenser of methylated spirits. There is a duty on wood alcohol that is brought in, and, of course, on alcohol, but up to the present time we have been the sole makers and dispensers of methylated spirits. The Bill would give us the power to grant licensees the privilege of importing. On wood alcohol, the duty, I think, is twenty cents a gallon.

Mr. ARMSTRONG: And the excise?

Mr. BURRELL: There would be no excise duty on wood alcohol.

Mr. BELAND: Does the department import any methylated spirits?

Mr. BURRELL: No, we make them all. The department has been purchasing ethyl alcohol and wood alcohol, and then making the methylated spirits, the methylated spirts when ethyl and wood alcohol are mixed together being such that the alcohol is non-recoverable for drinking purposes.

Mr. BELAND: No excise duty is being paid on ethyl alcohol?

Mr. BURRELL: Yes, on ethyl alcohol.

Mr. BELAND: It makes the methylated spirit pretty high for the department to dispense?

Mr. BURRELL: We do not pay the duty and therefore we do not calculate the duty as being a part of the cost, but even at that it is urged that the department cannot make it as cheaply as people would be able to get it if they were allowed to go into the business of making ethyl alcohol and also methylated spirits. But there has been some dispute about that. I do not think that the anticipations some of them have as to cheaper industrial alcohol will be realized in the future. It is a somewhat difficult matter, however, to keep up to the requirements unless we enlarge our plants, and this Bill will allow others to go into the business.

Mr. BELAND: What is the price of methylated spirits?

Mr. BURRELL: I think we got it down as low as ninety cents a gallon one time; it is somewhere between that and $1.20. I will give my hon. friend the precise figures in reference to this. Before the resolution is carried I might refer very briefly to one or two other provisions. There are several clauses in the resolution which very much increase the penalties in connection not only with illicitly distilling, but also with the selling of liquor illicitly distilled. Under the old Act a man who distilled without a license was only fined $100 for the first offence. This is increased to $200, it being quite manifest that if he illicitly distilled a barrel or two the product would be worth more than the fine and therefore we have thought that we ought to double up on the fine in order that he will run a very much greater risk. Similarly, under the old law, the penalty for a man who got the liquor that was illicitly distilled and then sold it was almost nominal. The fine imposed on that man is heavier than the fine imposed on the man who illicitly distills. I think the House will be thoroughly in accord with the amendment. The resolution deals with another important matter that I would like to take up a little more explicitly when the Bill comes down and that is the complete change in the administration of the Act in respect to vinegar and acetic acid. Last year this Bill was brought up and there was very strong opposition to it on the part of certain firms who had been manufacturing acetic acid by a new process and who objected very strongly on the ground that it was a deterrent to a lot of our manufacturing processes to tax acetic acid at the rate of four cents a gallon. When the Act first came into force they charged the vinegar man not on the spirits that were used in the making of the vinegar but on the acetic acid contained in the vinegar when it was manufactured, four cents a gallon. There was another clause in the Act which imposed a duty of four cents a gallon on the acetic acid produced from wood alcohol. Subsequent to this time and during the war there has been a process devised by which they can get acetic acid in very much greater purity from other sources and consequently we found it necessary to consider whether we should impose that four cent duty on all forms of manufactured acetic acid or leave it off altogether. On giving the matter very full consideration we have decided to revise the method of taxing the vinegar men and we have decided to tax them on the spirits and not on the acetic acid contained in the vinegar and then to free acetic acid altogether from taxation. I think that in so far as revenue goes the thing will about balance and it will give a very great impetus to a whole lot of manufacturing processes.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (East Lambton): Was it the manufacturers or the producers of leaf tobacco who asked for the change set forth in section 2:

That the definition of "Standard Leaf Tobacco" in paragraph "C" of Section 8 be amended so as to include the provision that "Standard Leaf Tobacco" as applied to any kind of tobacco means that which contains ten per cent or more of moisture.

Mr. BURRELL: That is a matter that has been deemed extremely desirable by the department itself. At the present time the law in reference to standard leaf tobacco says tobacco "which contains ten per cent of water and ninety per cent of solid matter." On raw leaf tobacco that comes in some will have ten per cent of moisture, some twelve, some sixteen and some perhaps eighteen. This tobacco is tested and dried, and if it has ten per cent of moisture they are charged on ninety per cent of tobacco; if it goes to sixteen per cent, they are allowed six per cent for moisture. If on the other hand it goes only eight per cent they are charged on ninety-two per cent. The consequence is that it involves not only a great amount of work but results in a confused lot of tests. We have considered it would be only fair to cease the practice altogether and to say that tobacco shall be taken to mean tobacco containing ten per cent moisture and no more. If it is above ten per cent, say twelve per cent, importers are penalized to that extent. The matter will adjust itself immediately because what will happen will be that the man who is shipping tobacco will simply dry it to ten per cent. It will mean the release of a large number of our men for the purposes of other work and permit the operations of the department to be conducted expeditiously and without inconvenience to those concerned.

[Mr. Burrell.]

Mr. McKENZIE: I may not have caught the full force of the minister's statement in regard to some sale that he mentioned. I understood him to say that he was providing against the sale of illicit liquors. I may be wrong in that but if so I think it is practically new ground for the Dominion to cover. I understood that when what we call liquors get into the shape of being commercial commodities they came under the jurisdiction of the province entirely, and that the provincial authorities would have the say as to what the punishment would be for selling anything in the shape of intoxicating liquors. I do not think that we have the power to make laws of that kind.

Mr. BURRELL: Section 185 of the Inland Revenue Act provides as follows:

Every person who sells or offers for sale, or who purchases any spirits, or has any spirits in his possession, knowing them to have been unlawfully manufactured or imported, shall, for first offence, incur a penalty not exceeding fifty dollars, and not less than ten dollars, and for each subsequent offence, a penalty of one hundred dollars; and all spirits so unlawfully manufactured or imported, wheresoever they are found, and all horses and vehicles and other appliances which have been or are being used for the purpose of removing the same, shall be forfeited to the Crown, and shall be dealt with accordingly.

It is considered necessary for the Inland Revenue Department to have the entire control of all manufacture of spirits and this legislation not only increases the penalty against those who manufacture liquor illicitly, but with respect to those who try to sell it and are detected the fines are greatly increased.

Mr. McKENZIE: Has that been the law heretofore?

Mr. BURRELL: Yes, it has been the law for years.

Resolutions reported and read a first and second time; thereupon Mr. Burrell moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 178 entitled an Act to amend the Inland Revenue Act, chapter 51 of the Revised Statutes of 1906.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

NAVAL DEFENCE OF THE EMPIRE.

STATEMENT BY HON. C. C. BALLANTYNE, MINISTER OF NAVAL AFFAIRS.

On motion to go into Supply.

On the motion for the House to again go into Committee of Supply:

Hon. C. C. BALLANTYNE (Minister of Naval Affairs): Mr. Speaker, before this resolution carries I would ask to be permitted to give some details to the House regarding the naval expenditures of the Government, and also, so far as I am in a position to do so, in reference to matters of future policy. First let me say that at the Imperial Conference in London which I attended, in company with the Prime Minister (Rt. Hon. Sir Robert Borden) and others of my colleagues in the Government, the question of naval policy, either for Canada or the Empire, was not discussed.

Mr. DUFF: To what year has the minister reference?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: 1918. Certain negotiations, however, took place between the British Admiralty and the overseas representatives who were in London at the time. I myself, on certain occasions, discussed the naval defence of Canada with the First Sea Lord of the Admiralty, Sir Roslyn Wemyss, and also with the First Civil Lord, Sir Eric Geddes. I also had the good fortune to have my right hon. friend the Prime Minister accompany me on one occasion when we reviewed the whole situation frankly and fairly. As a result of these conferences with the Admiralty a meeting of the Overseas Prime Ministers was held at the Savoy Hotel, London. Sir Robert Borden occupied the Chair at that meeting. and after a full discussion a memorandum was prepared, passed upon, and sent to the Admiralty, its date being 15th August, 1918. Before I read that memorandum I might be permitted to submit a letter accompanying it which was sent by Sir Robert Borden:

Imperial Conference, 1918.

Decision of Dominions' Ministers re Naval Policy of Dominions.

Offices of the War Cabinet,
2 Whitehall Gardens, S.W. 1.
15th August, 1918.

Dear Sir Eric Geddes,—

I am afraid the brevity of the time at my disposal will prevent me bringing up in the Imperial War Cabinet the subject dealt with in the Admiralty memorandum.

I have, however, consulted the Prime Ministers of the Dominions, who (with the exception of the Prime Minister of Newfoundland), have expressed their approval of the accompanying memorandum.

The Prime Minister of Newfoundland has been requested to communicate with you direct on the subject.

Faithfully yours,
(Sd.) R. L. Borden.

The Right Honourable
Sir Eric Geddes, K.C.B., C.B.E., M.P.

The memorandum, which received the approval of all the Overseas Prime Ministers, with the exception of Dr. Lloyd, Premier of Newfoundland, reads as follows:

Memorandum.

The Dominion Ministers, having considered the Admiralty Memorandum of May 17, 1918, on the Naval Defence of the British Empire, which was circulated to the Imperial War Conference, 1918, submit the following conclusions and observations.

1. The proposals set forth in the Admiralty Memorandum for a single navy at all times under a central naval authority are not considered practicable.

2. Purely from the standpoint of naval strategy the reasons thus put forward for the establishment of a single navy for the Empire under a central naval authority, are strong but not unanswerable. The experience gained in this war has shown that in time of war a Dominion Navy (e.g. that of Australia), can operate with the highest efficiency as part of a united navy under one direction and command established after the outbreak of war.

3. It is thoroughly recognized that the character of construction, armament and equipment, and the methods and principles of training, administration and organization, should proceed upon the same lines in all the navies of the Empire. This policy has already been followed in those Dominions which have established naval forces.

4. For this purpose the Dominions would welcome visits from a highly qualified representative of the Admiralty who, by reason of his ability and experience, would be thoroughly competent to advise the naval authorities of the Dominions in such matters.

5. As naval forces come to be developed upon a considerable scale by the Dominions it may be necessary hereafter to consider the establishment for war purposes of some supreme naval authority upon which each of the Dominions would be adequately represented.

In consequence of the foregoing memorandum the Admiralty sent a highly technical and distinguished naval officer in the person of Admiral Viscount Jellicoe to visit the overseas Dominions.

Mr. DUFF: Before the minister proceeds, would it be a breach of confidence on his part to tell us what the suggestion in the memorandum was to which the Prime Minister of Newfoundland refused to agree?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I desire to make it abundantly clear that the Prime Minister of Newfoundland did not refuse to agree to the suggestions contained in the memorandum. He did not happen to be present at the Conference between the overseas Prime Ministers, for what reason I am unable to state now, but I have no ground to suppose that the then Prime Minister of Newfoundland would have raised any dissenting voice to the memorandum I have just read.

Mr. DUFF: Has he agreed to it since?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: No. I was proceeding to say, Mr. Speaker, that as a result of this memorandum submitted on behalf of Canada, South Africa, Australia and New Zealand, Admiral Viscount Jellicoe was instructed by the British Admiralty to visit the overseas Dominions, to consult with their governments, and to make reports to them as to what in his opinion would be the best policy for their adoption. Hon. members are quite familiar with the very lucid and useful suggestions offered to the Government of Canada by Lord Jellicoe whose report I tabled some weeks ago.

This Government carefully considered the suggestions contained in that report, but in view of the conditions which I mentioned to this House some weeks ago we decided to defer taking any action on them for the present. With the kind permission of hon. members I will again read to the House that memorandum in order that my remarks on Naval Affairs may appear in consecutive order in Hansard. This is the memorandum which I read on a previous occasion:

> The Government has had under consideration for some time the question of the naval defence of Canada and the suggestion of Admiral Viscount Jellicoe in reference thereto.
>
> In view of Canada's heavy financial commitments and of the fact that Great Britain has not as yet decided on her permanent naval policy, and of the approaching Imperial Conference at which the question of naval defence of the Empire will come up for discussion between the Home Government and the Overseas Dominions, it has been decided to defer in the meantime action in regard to the adoption of a permanent naval policy for Canada.
>
> The Government has decided to carry on the Canadian Naval Service along pre-war lines and has accepted the offer of Great Britain of one light cruiser and two torpedo boat destroyers to take the place of the present obsolete and useless training ships, the Niobe and Rainbow.
> The Minister of Naval Service, in order to be free to thoroughly reorganize and place the present service on an economical and efficient basis, has issued orders for the demobilization of all officers and naval ratings and for the discontinuance of civilian help at headquarters and at the Naval Dockyards in Esquimalt and Halifax. The Canadian officers who are in the Imperial fleet and who are now being paid by the Canadian Government will be recalled and placed on duty with the Canadian Naval Service. The Naval College will also be continued. After reorganization has been completed, only those officers and other ratings and civilians will be taken on who are absolutely necessary and possess the qualifications desired.

I have nothing to add to that except to say that it is the Governments official statement on naval affairs at the present time.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I did not hear exactly what my hon. friend said about the offer of some ships from the Mother Country to replace the Niobe and Rainbow. Has the Government accepted those ships?

[Mr. Ballantyne.]

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The Government has not officially taken them over. Captain Hose, the Acting Director of Naval Service, is in England at the present time looking into the details, but the Government has officially notified the Admiralty that we do gratefully accept the offer of one modern light cruiser and two modern torpedo boat destroyers. I will have something more to say in regard to that offer as I proceed.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Are any conditions attached to it?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I must remind hon. members that the House is not in committee, and that therefore the minister should be allowed to place his remarks on Hansard in consecutive form without interruption.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Mr. Speaker, I wish it very clearly understood that any reference I may make during the course of my remarks on naval affairs will not be partisan, but will, I trust, be made from the national viewpoint, and that alone. It has been a matter of great regret to me, and I think to Canadians generally, that such a vital question as our naval defence should have been cast into the political arena. I express my regret that that has happened, and it shall be my endeavour to refrain from saying anything that would cause hon. gentlemen to think that I entertain any partisan views on the question of our naval defence.

I think it well, Mr. Speaker, that the House and the country should be once more reminded that in the year 1910 the Government of the day under the right hon. the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier placed upon the statute books what is known as the Naval Service Act. By so doing Canada notified the Old Country that thenceforward she would undertake to the best of her ability the defence of her own shores, and would also bear whatever expense might be incurred year by year in maintaining a Naval Service for the Dominion. I might briefly cite a few of the salient points of that Act; they are:

(a) The establishment of the Department of the Naval Service, full control of naval affairs being vested in the minister of that department.

(b) The placing of the Naval Service of Canada under the Naval Discipline Act and the Kings Regulations and Admiralty Instructions, so far as applicable.

(c) The appointment of an officer to be called the Director of the Naval Service, who shall, subject to the regulations and under the instructions of the Minister of the Department, be charged with the directions of the Naval Service.

(d) The Act further provides that the Governor in Council may appoint a Naval Board to advise the minister in all matters relating to naval affairs, may organize and maintain a permanent naval force, and may authorize the engagement of officers and seamen in the Naval Service, and may, at any time, relieve from duty any such officers or seamen.

(e) The Act also provides for a Naval Reserve Force, to consist of such persons as join the said reserve after naval service, or after undergoing such training as may be necessary, all members of the said reserve being liable for active service in emergency.

(f) It provides also that the Governor in Council may organize and maintain a Naval Volunteer Force.

(g) It also provides that the Governor in Council may place the Naval Force, or any part thereof, on active service, at any time when it appears advisable so to do, by reason of an emergency.

(h) Also in case of emergency the Governor in Council may place at the disposal of His Majesty for general service in the Royal Navy, the Canadian Naval Service, or any part thereof.

(i) Whenever the Governor in Council places the Naval Service, or any part thereof, on active service, if Parliament is adjourned or prorogued, and will not meet again within ten days, a proclamation shall issue for a meeting of Parliament within fifteen days, and Parliament shall accordingly meet and sit, and shall continue to sit.

(j) The Minister of the Department has the powers when the Governor in Council declares that an emergency has arisen, to empower, in the name of His Majesty, some one person to take over the control of any facilities existing in Canada that may be deemed necessary, such as docks, shipyards, etc.

(k) The Command in Chief of the Naval Forces is declared by this Act to continue and be vested in the King, and shall be exercised and administered by His Majesty or by the Governor General as his representative.

I need not refer in detail to the other important clauses of the Naval Service Act, except to say that the Government of the day undertook to maintain and to keep in a proper state of efficiency the naval dockyards at Halifax and Esquimalt, also the Royal Naval Hospital, Commander-in-Chief's house, grounds, etc., at Halifax. The Government also, on behalf of Canada, obligated themselves to keep the dockyards at Esquimalt and Halifax in such condition that they could repair, coal or store any of His Majesty's ships that might have occasion to use them.

I shall not go into the question of what the late Liberal Government proposed to provide at one time in the way of naval defence for Canada; I do not want to take up the time of the House unnecessarily. I have their programme here in detail; it was quite an extensive one, and if carried to completion would have involved a very heavy annual expenditure,—with which I find no fault whatever—an expenditure which in these days would probably amount to $20,000,000 or $25,000,000 a year. I cite these facts merely to show that as Canada undertook in 1910 the defence of her coasts and harbours and the maintenance of these dockyards, the Government must recognize at all times Canada's solemn obligations and carry out the main policies of the legislation that was placed on the statute book in 1910, although perhaps on a much reduced scale.

I may also be allowed to mention that when the "Niobe" was purchased, she cost Canada $1,171,687.62. She carried a complement of 677 officers and men. She was built in 1899, and was armed with sixteen 6-inch guns; twelve 12-pounder guns, five 3-pounder guns and two submerged torpedo tubes. The "Rainbow" cost $280,097.80; she was built in 1891. The estimated cost of maintaining the "Niobe" in full commission at that time was $617,335 a year, and the "Rainbow", $277,884. The "Royal College" cost $91,629 a year; in 1910-11 the cost of maintaining these three establishments amounted to $986,848. If we were maintaining the same personnel to-day as was maintained in 1910-11, having regard to the increased rate that we have to pay the officers and men and the increased cost of coal and everything else, the annual expenditure involved would be $2,247,198. The expenditure for naval purposes for the fiscal year 1911-12 was $1,223,456.08. On the same basis of operation it is estimated that the Naval Service would cost to-day approximately $2,500,000.

When war broke out the "Niobe" and the "Rainbow" were put into commission. They remained in commission for from a year and a half to two years. The "Rainbow" performed splendid service on the Pacific Coast. On instructions from the Admiralty she went to Mexico and brought safely to the port of Victoria the small British gunboats, the "Shearwater" and the "Algerine." While she did not meet any enemy ships, she was stripped for action and ready and anxious to meet them at any time, whatever the result might be. The "Niobe" was put in commission and steamed some 30,000 miles. On instructions from the Admiralty she and the "Rainbow" were finally taken out of active service. All their guns were removed in order that they might be placed on merchant vessels and both these ships were used from that time until the close of the war as depot ships. The Naval Service performed very excellent work also in providing patrols, especially on the Atlantic. In addition they maintained a regular mine-sweeping service on the trade routes and at entrances to harhours, and on more than one occasion succeeded in sweeping out enemy mines.

A very active recruiting policy was carried on to get the necessary officers and men, as a result, 6,452 of all ranks were enrolled for the Canadian Naval Service, while 1,700 were enrolled in the Royal Canadian Naval Volunteer Reserve (Overseas Division), and sent to England where they served in the Imperial Navy. This was done at the request of the Imperial Government. In addition, 82 were recruited for the Royal Canadian Naval Air Service; 376 for the Imperial Motor Boat Patrol Service; 382 for the Royal Naval Air Force, a total of 8,992. The recruits were trained and placed in service with the greatest despatch consistent with efficiency. As fast as vessels could be procured and got ready they were put into commission.

The casualties suffered during the war totalled 26 officers and 158 men, including the 5 college graduates previously mentioned. One officer and 39 men of the Overseas Division of the Royal Canadian Naval Volunteer Reserve lost their lives. The Naval Service of Canada had to provide all the supplies necessary not only for their own ships but also for the ships of Great Britain and her allies operating in the vicinity of the Canadian coasts. The purchases for stores alone amounted in 1917-18 to the large amount of $10,074,643. They also carried on at Halifax and Esquimalt what was known as an examination service. This service was established shortly after the outbreak of war, all shipping on the respective coasts being intercepted and examined before entering and leaving port.

I should like to say that the radiotelegraph service was found to be most efficient.

I should have failed in my duty if, before concluding my remarks regarding the Naval Service, I did not refer to the Naval Intelligence Department. While their work was secret, it was very necessary, and they performed their duties to the entire satisfaction, not only of the Naval Service of Canada, but of the Admiralty as well.

The total expenditure for naval purposes in the year 1918 amounted to the large sum of $33,367,433.09. The number of naval officers and ratings enrolled was 4,853, and the number of civilians employed was 1,375. The net cost, however, to the Canadian Government was only $11,527,727.48. The difference between the expenditures and the net cost represents the value of services rendered to the Imperial and Allied Governments, and illustrates forcibly the extent of that service.

As regards the Naval College, it might interest the House if I gave just briefly the number of our young Canadians who have joined this service since the college started in 1911. One hundred and thirty-five joined all told, 68 of whom served in the Imperial service and 23 withdrew altogether. The number of Canadians now in the college is 45, and the Canadian Government have agreed that each year we shall send at the expense of Canada, eight of those cadets to be trained in the Imperial Navy, so that from time to time as occasion arises, when we require officers on our own ships, we shall be able to recall from the Imperial service those young Canadian officers who will have received a thorough training in the large fleet of the Home Government.

I might be permitted to refer to two of our young Canadian officers who have distinguished themselves in a signal manner in the Imperial Navy. I refer to Lieut. Brodeur, son of a former Minister of the Naval Service, who has been selected to specialize in gunnery and who at the present time is studying at the Royal Naval College at Greenwich. Besides him we have Lieut. Gauvreau, son of the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Gauvreau), who is presently serving in the Intelligence Branch at headquarters. Both of these very gallant and able young Canadian officers, as also the other young Canadian naval officers will be employed at headquarters or at Halifax or on board the cruiser or destroyers. All of our Canadians who have served in the Imperial Navy have, I have been informed by the Admiralty, most excellent records. Therefore, the Government thought it the part of wisdom to continue to send, each year at the expense of the country, eight of our bright young graduates from the Naval College to receive training in the great home fleet and to be on call whenever the Canadian Government requires their services.

I should like to refer to the re-organization of the service. I have given the maximum number of officers, all ratings, and civilians employed in the Naval Service when the war was at its height. So that I might have a free hand to re-organize the entire Naval Service of Canada, with the consent of the Government I issued general demobilization orders to all naval ratings and to all civilians at headquarters, Esquimalt and Halifax, that their services would not be required on and after the 15th May. I did that so that I, as responsible head of the Naval Service, and my technical officers associated with me, might re-engage only those naval officers, ratings and civilians who possessed the necessary efficiency. Furthermore, my instructions were that only those who were absolutely needed and who possessed the requisite efficiency would be taken on. At the date those orders were issued we had, of naval ratings, 484, and of civilians, 819. Naval officers serving in the Imperial navy and officers and men at the college were not affected by those orders. The naval ratings consisted of 47 officers and 233 men attached to the Niobe at Halifax; 14 officers and 2 men attached to headquarters, and 23 officers and 107 men attached to the Rainbow at Esquimalt. Of the civilian staff, 376 were employed at Halifax, 203 at headquarters and 240 at Esquimalt. This number has been reduced to 18 naval officers, 25 other ratings and 478 civilians. Therefore, the net reduction affected, both naval and civil, amounts to 782. In other words, I have reduced the personnel of naval officers and other ratings and civilians to the number of 521, as compared with the number of 1,303 naval officers and other ratings and civilians when demobilization orders were issued on March 25. The naval officers and civilians who are now in the employ of the Government are all men who possess the necessary knowledge and efficiency, and we certainly have not two men where only one is necessary.

I wish to refer to the generous gift of the Mother Country to Canada. I am sorry I cannot at the moment mention the name of the new cruiser that the British Government has been good enough to allocate to us. I expect in the course of a day or two to get the name of that cruiser, but I have been informed by the Admiralty that she will be a modern cruiser, and her armament and speed will be as follows:

Displacement, 4,800 tons.
Length, 453 feet.
Breadth, 47 feet.
Draught, 16 feet, 8 inches.
Speed 25½ knots.
Fuel capacity, 1,345 tons coal, 260 tons oil.
Armament, two 6-inch guns, ten 4-inch guns, four 3-pounder guns, four .303 Maxim, two .303 Maxim field guns, one 12-pounder field gun, two torpedo tubes

She will carry a full complement of approximately 20 officers and 384 men, or a total of 404.

The two modern destroyers that were built in 1916 are called the "Patriot" and "Patrician." They are vessels of 1,004 tons displacement:

Length, 271 feet.
Breadth, 27 feet, 6 inches.
Draught, 11 feet.
Speed, 35 knots.
Fuel capacity, 253 tons oil.
Armament, three 4-inch guns, one 2-inch pounder Pom Pom, four torpedo tubes.

They will carry full complements of 6 officers and 74 men, or a total of 80 each.

Some months ago the right hon. the Prime Minister accepted with thanks from the Admiralty the gift of two modern submarines known as H14 and H15. These vessels are of 364 and 434 tons displacement respectively. Their dimensions are as follows: Length, 150 ft. 3 in.; breadth, 15 ft. 9 in.; draught, 12 ft. 4 in; speed, 13 and 11 knots respectively; armanent, 4-18 in. bow tubes. They were built in 1918 and carry full complements of three officers and nineteen men, or a total of twenty-two. The total personnel of the two torpedo destroyers and the two submarines will amount to 608.

I think it might be in order for me to say here that although the Main Naval Estimates provide for an expenditure of only $300,000, the Supplementary Estimates will contain the further sum of $2,200,000, making a total expenditure for naval defence for the present fiscal year of $2,500,000. The reason that only $300,000 appears in the Main Estimates is that the Government were anxious to table the Estimates and our arrangements not being at that time completed with the Admiralty, we did not know just what we would be able to get from them in the way of ships. The House will bear in mind, then, when considering the Naval Estimates, that the total expenditures for the present fiscal year is $2,500,000.

These vessels will be manned exclusively by Canadian officers, except the senior officers on the light cruiser. The crews will consist of men recruited in Great Britain from the Imperial Navy up to about two-thirds of the complement, the remainder being recruited in Canada. When hon. members are considering this very small expenditure for the naval defence of Canada, I hope they will bear in mind that in pre-war times we paid an able-bodied seaman only $1.10 per day, whereas now we have to pay him $1.65. In addition to that, coal and supplies of all kinds, I am safe in saying, are fully 50 per cent higher than in pre-war times.

The very small nucleus we have at the present time, consisting of one cruiser, two torpedo destroyers, and two submarines will be absolutely efficient. They will be kept part of the time on the Atlantic coast and part of the time on the Pacific coast. They will not be in harbour much of the time, except to take on supplies and stores. They will be kept at sea in order that the men may get the training they must necessarily have. Arrangements have also been made with the Admiralty for the interchange, as time goes on, of our ships, and of our officers if necessary. So that at all times small as is our Canadian Navy, it will be kept up to the standard of efficiency of the home fleet. Hon. members, I am sure, will agree with the view of the Government and of the Admiralty that overseas naval units would be of very little value in actual warfare if their training was to be confined all the time to their own waters. It would only be natural to suppose that under those circumstances they would retrograde instead of keeping up to date as they should. This interchange both of officers and of ships, which will include manoeuvring with the home fleet and following the same drill in every respect, will keep the efficiency of the Canadian fleet up to the standard of the home fleet. I recognize that this is not a time to discuss war, and it is not my intention to do so. I do not want to think of war any more than any other hon. member of this House, but if Canada is going to spend a certain number of millions each year on her Naval Service, it is her bounden duty to see that that Naval Service is efficient, and that it is kept up to the standard of the home fleet, and it is the policy of this Government and of the Naval Service Department to see that that is done.

[Mr. Ballantyne.]

Another distinct advantage which these modern vessels will have over the depot ships, the "Niobe" and the "Rainbow," is that they will be in active service and at sea, whereas the "Niobe" for instance was tied up at the docks at Halifax and was simply a depot ship, the annual cost to maintain her amounting from $425,000 to $450,000. The "Rainbow" also was not able to be put into commission, and cost from $225,000 to $250,000 to keep her as a depot ship alone. Instructions have been issued to offer for sale by public tender the "Niobe," the "Rainbow," and the "Canada" and the "Grilse." As these ships are obsolete and are of no further use for training purposes, tenders have already been called for, and the Government will dispose of the ships to the very best possible advantage.

There is another very important work that our small Canadian Navy can do, and that will be to look after fishery protection. I hope, if I have the honour of being minister a year hence, to show a reduction in the cost of the fishery protection of Canada, which will in part a least be looked after by these ships which we are accepting from the Mother Country.
