CHAPTER XXV. THE SCHOONER FREES HE RSELF.

All day long the weather remained sullen and still, and the swell powerful. I was on deck at noon, looking at lengths distant, and I could distinguish an iceberg half a league distant when no more than that. I peered over the it overset. It was a small berg, though lee bow, but could see no ice. The large compared with most of the others; yet such a mighty volume of foam boiled up as gave me a startling idea of the prodigious weight of the mass. The sight made me very anxious about my ice up, for she had floated on a sudden, own state, and to satisfy my mind I got and the noises which attended her reupon the ice and walked round the vessel, and to get a true view of her vessel, and to get a true view of her detailed that she had been forced through a channel. posture went to the extreme end of the rocks beyond her bows, and finally second deluge, and looked over the second deluge, and looked over the quarter; no ice was there visible to me. The vessel rolled horribly, and I persides so as to cause the weight of the schooner to render it top-heavy, her buoyany on touching the water would buoyany on touching the water would what was in her when the ice came certainly tear her keel out of its frosty setting and leave her floating. Indeed, so sure was I of this that I saw, next to was this heel that brought the sea washway, the best thing that could happen an instant to look over the side, when other fashion fixed. I perceived the very block of ice on which I had come to a halt break from the bed with a smart clap of noise, and hand, prized open the hatch and completely roll over. Only a minute before had I been standing on it, and thus had sixty seconds stood between me and death, for most certainly must I have been drowned or killed by being beaten against the ice by the swell! I fell upon my knees and lifted up my hands in gratitude to God, feeling extraordinarily comforted by this further mark of His care of me, and very strongly persuaded that He designed I should come off with my life after all, since His providence would not work so many miracles for my preservation if I was to perish by this adventure.
