It being three minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, April 21, 1953

The house met at eleven o'clock.

POST OFFICE

Third and final report of special committee appointed to consider Bill No. 107, to amend the Post Office Act, and also the regulations, general administration and operation of the rural mail delivery service.—Mr. McCubbin.

REQUEST FOR REOPENING OF OFFICE IN HOME OF WILLIAM ROSS, WINNIPEG

Hon. Alcide Coté (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted to do so, I should like to answer a question put to me on the orders of the day last Friday by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), when he asked whether I had received from the historical and scientific society of Manitoba a request for the reopening of the post office in the old home of William Ross in Winnipeg.

I did receive such a request, but on account of the limited prospective business, it was not found possible to re-establish a regular post office at this point. However, an effort was made to meet the wishes of the historical and scientific society of Manitoba, and as a result a stamp permit was issued and a letter box erected at Ross House in which outgoing mail can be posted. As a further measure of assistance, the department has also authorized a special cachet to be placed on outgoing mail.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the Postmaster General if he can indicate the effective date of these provisions?

Mr. Coté (St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville): I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but I cannot say at the moment. If my hon. friend will be patient I might phone him this afternoon as to when it would be possible for them to be put into effect.

Mr. Knowles: Thank you.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STRIKE OF GRAIN HANDLERS AT VANCOUVER—REQUEST FOR FURTHER INFORMATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, can the Minister of Labour bring the house up to date with regard to the strike in the terminal elevators on the west coast?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, since the matter was discussed in the house last, discussions have been going forward at regular intervals in British Columbia; and in close co-operation between the departments of trade and commerce and of labour, it was arranged that the controller of transport should go out there a few days ago. He has been out there. My officials have been working in the closest co-operation with him and discussions are continuing. Beyond that I cannot report today.

Mr. Green: When is it expected that there will be a report from him?

Mr. Gregg: I cannot say, Mr. Speaker; soon, I hope.

THE CORONATION

CIVIL SERVANTS ATTENDING AS MEMBERS OF RESERVE UNITS—SERVICE PAY

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State, notice of which he received about ten days ago. Will the government permit members of the civil service who are also members of the reserve forces, and are attending the coronation as representatives of their units, to draw service pay in addition to their civil service pay while they are out of the country attending the coronation?

Hon. F. G. Bradley (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I have not yet received the answer to that question, but I presume that it will arrive in due course.

TRADE

REPORTED EMBARGO BY UNITED STATES AGAINST OATS AND FEEDS—DAIRY PRODUCTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): A week ago, on April 14, I asked a question of the Prime Minister with regard to a reported United States embargo on agricultural products. Since that time President Eisenhower has asked the tariff commission to give consideration to the continuance of the embargo against certain Canadian dairy products, such as flaxseed, linseed, and the like. What reply has the United States given to the two notes of protest to which reference was made at that time? What further action does the government contemplate in order to remove what appears to be an injustice by the United States toward Canada?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The Minister of Trade and Commerce is prepared to answer my hon. friend's question.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, in answer to my hon. friend's question of a week ago, reports have been received of discussions in the United States of possible restrictions upon the importation of oats and feeds. It is understood that these reports have arisen out of the appearance of the secretary of agriculture before a subcommittee of the Senate where general proposals are at present being subjected to study and investigation. To the best of my knowledge, no conclusions or recommendations to congress have as yet emerged nor is this subject dealt with as yet in draft legislation. In these circumstances, it is not appropriate at present for the Canadian government to make official representations or protests. I am, of course, fully aware of the importance to Canada of the trade in oats and feed grains. The numerous hearings before various committees of the United States congress, which are studying agricultural programs, are being closely followed here. The United States government is well aware of Canada's concern and of the importance of trade between the two countries in agricultural products. The Prime Minister is planning to visit the United States in the near future. When he is in Washington he will have occasion to refer to some of the important questions of trade relationships between Canada and the United States as well as to some of the questions affecting world trade and financial relationships.

With respect to embargoes and restrictions on the importation of dairy products into the United States, the government of Canada has made official representations to the government of the United States on a number of occasions, which have been publicly announced in both countries. These representations have taken the form of notes to convey the Canadian point of view, but so worded as not to require replies. The most recent of these representations was a note delivered on February 10 of the present year which referred explicitly to Canada's serious concern respecting import restrictions in the United States upon dairy products. This same subject has been raised by Canadian delegations to successive sessions of the contracting parties to the general agreement on tariffs and trade. In addition, official Canadian representatives in Washington have frequently had occasion to refer to these restrictions.

I think that answers the second question of my hon. friend as well as the first question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I ask a supplementary question? I noticed that in the minister's statement, which was full, he said that the notes in protest were couched in such language as not to require replies. What was the reason that the notes were couched in that way? I ask that question as a matter of interest. I wondered why the United States was not asked to clarify the situation.

Mr. Howe: These notes had reference to the current legislation, and I think that if we were to receive a note from another government about legislation that we were contemplating we would not answer that note. It was felt the subject was one about which we could not expect an answer, but about which the Canadian views should be forcibly presented.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Did I understand the minister to say that the last communication with Washington was on February 10?

Mr. Howe: Oh, no; as a matter of fact, representations are being made almost every day. For example, at my request our chief delegate to the international wheat conference called on the Department of Agriculture and made protests on the subject matter that I have just discussed. He discussed the matter very fully with officers of the Department of Agriculture and also ways and means of correcting a situation that is disturbing to the Americans. The two countries are in such close contact in these matters that a formal note is not the only means of communication. Our ambassador and our officials are in constant touch with their opposite numbers in Washington.

Mr. Adamson: Has the government considered any legislation similar to the "Buy American" legislation?

Mr. Howe: No.

INQUIRY AS TO PROTEST BY CANADA RESPECTING TENDERS IN THE UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I notice that the British government is making a protest against the manner in which a tender by the English Electric Company was dealt with in the United States. I also understand that at about the same time tenders for ships to be built in Canada were treated in somewhat the same manner. Can the minister tell us anything about that? Is a protest or a representation to be made in that regard as well by Canada on ships?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Yes, Mr. Speaker, there was a case where a Canadian firm was low tenderer on some small boats, and it was decided in the United States that the order would be placed in that country, owing to a slack situation in their shipyards. I think each country has the privilege of deciding its own purchasing policy. I can think of no grounds upon which Canada should protest the method by which the United States navy places its orders.

Mr. Coldwell: The government does not regard it as being in the same category as tenders submitted by the English Electric Company?

Mr. Howe: It may be in the same category, but whether the government of the United Kingdom is justified in protesting as to how the United States buys its electrical equipment I cannot say.

GANDER AIRPORT

INQUIRY AS TO CLOSING OF RUNWAYS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Is the minister aware that only one runway at Gander airport, No. 14,132, is open; that its taxiways to the terminal building are closed, and that Gander as a result has been designated as an alternate airport operationally by the air lines? Is anything going to be done in the matter?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): The condition that my hon. friend refers to is due, I presume, to the break-up in the spring. In order to prevent that, we have already constructed one large runway at Gander, and we propose to build another one this year. Provision is made in the estimates for that purpose, and I am sure that something can be done about the present condition. I shall be glad to bring it to the attention of the officers.

ARMED FORCES

ASSISTANCE FOR HIGHER EDUCATION OF CHILDREN OF CERTAIN DECEASED MEMBERS

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved the third reading of Bill No. 336, to provide assistance for the higher education of children of certain deceased members of the armed forces and of other persons.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

FOOD AND DRUGS ACT

REVISION AND CONSOLIDATION

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved the second reading of Bill No. 48, respecting food, drugs, cosmetics and therapeutic devices.

Mr. Blair: Can the minister explain the bill?

Mr. Knowles: Is the minister going to make a statement?

Mr. Martin: This bill, which seeks a revision of one of the older statutes in our country, provides for a revision of the act and the consolidation of some of the sections and introduces some new features that will strengthen the measure. The bill was first introduced in the other place, and has had a full hearing in the committee on health and welfare of that place, giving an opportunity to industry generally to make representations in connection with some proposals that are now embodied in the measure before the house.

The Canadian Pharmaceutical Manufacturers' Association, the Canadian Manufacturers Association, the Allied Beauty Equipment Manufacturers Association and the Ottawa Truss Company were among those national trade organizations that made representations in connection with this measure. The present bill, as I say, is a revision and consolidation of certain provisions; and it seeks to remove certain anomalies which, in the light of experience during the last twenty years, it has been thought desirable to introduce.

The purpose of the bill of course is to protect the Canadian people in matters of health, as well as against fraud in the manufacturing and sale of foods and drugs. The administration of the measure depends upon the co-operation that the officials of the department are able to enjoy with industry. I cannot speak too highly of the co-operation we have had from industry generally in the administration of this act. There is no basic or essential difference in the present measure from the existing act except in a few particulars, one or two of which I shall point out. The bill is concerned with the prohibition of things that are injurious to health and that are unfit for use, and with the prevention of deception in the manufacture and sale of goods consumed by the public.

One important provision I should like to outline is the one to remove from ministerial power the discretion that now exists with respect to the forfeiture of goods. At the present time the powers of the minister under the act are great, and I have felt for some time that there should be a limit placed upon those powers, and that any interference with the use of property should be only after the exercise of judicial processes.

For example it frequently happens that goods having a substantial financial value are seized and forfeiture ensues, not upon a ruling by a court, but first through seizures by inspectors, followed by a decision of the minister in the exercise of this discretion, and based upon analyses made by an analyst. It has been thought that hereafter, except by the consent of the owner, no forfeiture of goods should take place unless there has been determination by judicial process as to whether or not the goods are in conformity with the act, and as to whether or not under the circumstances the forfeiture should be undertaken.

I think this is an important change in administration, and follows the due process of law clause in corresponding legislation in other countries.

This act is one of the important measures on our statute books. It affects the welfare and health of every person in this country, and I commend the measure to the house.

Mr. W. G. Blair (Lanark): Mr. Speaker, I think the minister's explanation has cleared up the situation. While we agree with the principle of the bill I would suggest that those parts we wish to criticize should be taken up clause by clause in committee.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we welcome the introduction of this measure, and feel that its importance merited a longer statement than the minister has given this morning. No doubt he will make up for that when we get into committee on the various clauses.

As he has pointed out, it is extremely important for the protection of the health of the Canadian people that there be legislation of this kind, and also that its administration be carried out effectively. We wish to join with the minister in the tribute he paid to those who have had charge of the enforcement of this legislation. We are glad to note that the bill does in fact include provisions that will strengthen the hands of those who have that task.

I note in a number of places in the bill a new phrase which reads: "manufactured, prepared, preserved, packaged or stored in unsanitary conditions". While I have quoted it from only one point in the bill, it appears in several places. My interpretation would be that the inclusion of that new phrase in a number of places in the bill would seem to give the inspectors who operate under the legislation wider powers to make sure that foods, drugs, cosmetics, appliances or devices which could be injurious to the health of the people because of the conditions under which they are produced, will not be allowed on the market. It is made clear in the bill not only that foods, drugs or devices themselves must not be impure or adulterated in any way, but that they must not come from any place which in any way could be considered unsanitary.

We are glad to note this attempt to tighten up the administration of this legislation. We feel that those in charge of it have been doing a good job, and we are glad to give them the further provisions contained in the bill.

We are also glad to note that there is a new phraseology in some sections of the bill dealing with the question of deception. As I understand it, once this new bill becomes law it will be unlawful for persons to advertise drugs, appliances or devices as having therapeutic or healing effects. Indeed the whole aim of the legislation as I understand it is to make sure that people who are suffering from certain diseases or disorders will not be deluded by false advertising, and as a result of that delusion be induced to stay away from physicians or doctors whom they should see.

We think this is all to the good. We are pleased with the progress science is making in all branches, particularly in the medical field. But we do believe that the people should be protected against any false assertions made in advertising. We know there are many occasions when the sellers of certain products are tempted to make all they can out of those products by advertising in very glowing terms.

I would hope that when we are discussing the sections of the bill the minister would speak in greater detail. At this point however I wish to say simply that we welcome these steps.

One other thought occurs to me—and with this I shall have concluded my remarks at this stage of debate—and it is that in view of the fact that this measure provides for a clearer and greater supervision over drugs, appliances and devices to be made available, the Department of National Health and Welfare should extend the list of drugs and appliances it recommends to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) or to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) for income tax deductibility.

I have no intention of developing that subject into what Your Honour might classify as a budget speech, and therefore would rule out of order. But it does seem to me that the subject does go along with the one now before us—and I am glad to note that the minister nods his head affirmatively. As parliament specifies greater control over drugs, appliances and devices, I am suggesting that on that basis the list of those allowed as deductible for income tax purposes should be greatly extended.

With those remarks, I conclude by saying that we welcome this bill and, so far as it goes, we heartily support it.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I have taken a great interest in this subject for a number of years and I want to say how pleased I am to see this bill being introduced by the minister. However, like the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), I was somewhat surprised that the minister's statement on such an important piece of legislation was conspicuous for its brevity.

Mr. Martin: The minister does not usually enjoy that reputation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: That is what made it such a surprise.

Mr. Herridge: It was the exception that proved the rule. This indicates a definite stiffening of the pure food and drugs laws of this country and as such we in this group certainly welcome it. Since the major amendments of 1927 there have been great changes in manufacturing practices and procedures, in packaging and so on. Many new drugs and synthetic compounds have been put on the market and I think it is high time that this legislation was introduced.

Like the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, we want to pay a tribute to the excellent work done by the officials of the pure food and drugs division of the department. A great deal of scientific and painstaking work is carried on by this division behind the scenes, quite often with little public recognition. However, I think more and more people are becoming aware of the excellent pure food and drugs division we have in Canada at this time.

The minister's department has received excellent co-operation from the Canadian Association of Consumers. These women have taken the time to carry out investigations in the various cities and small communities of this country and they make their recommendations and complaints to the division and have contributed a great deal toward the improvement and administration of the act. The development of this act and its amendments have been the result of considerable co-operation between the minister, his officials and the consuming public.

I have noticed a growing interest in these matters. I remember when I first came to Ottawa in 1945 there seemed to be few people who had any knowledge of this act and of the work being done by the division. I find that that situation has changed. Letters that I receive indicate an intelligent and widespread interest in the work and I have no hesitation in saying again that the minister's officials in this department are doing an excellent and an increasingly important job for this country.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Interpretation.

Mr. Blair: The definition of "analyst" is given as follows:

(b) "analyst" means any person designated as a food and drug analyst under subsection (2) of section 24.

Section 24, subsection 2, reads:

The governor in council may designate as an analyst or inspector any person on the staff of the department for such time as that person is employed in the department or for such time during the period of such employment as he may direct.

There is nothing there to indicate that the analyst must possess certain qualifications.

Mr. Martin: I think my friend will appreciate that no one would be appointed as an analyst who did not have the qualifications. I think that implication is carried in the measure.

Mr. Blair: Would it not be better to have the word "qualified" or something of that nature in there?

Mr. Martin: It is not usual in legislation of this kind to put in such an adjective. This was cleared by justice. No one would be appointed who did not have the necessary qualifications and to have the word "qualified" would not of itself provide any guarantee. I assure my hon. friend that this is the usual draftsmanship.

Mr. Higgins: Is it the intention to have an analyst in each province? At the present time there is no analyst in Newfoundland. If medicines come in that have to be analysed, they must be returned to Halifax for analysis and then sent back to Newfoundland. It is very awkward and causes considerable delay.

Mr. Martin: That matter is under consideration.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): What has happened to the food and drugs act in Newfoundland since 1949? That act was based on the English law and we had inspectors operating under it.

Mr. Martin: We have carried on there just as we have carried on in the rest of the country. We have appointed inspectors.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Will there be any difference when this bill is passed?

Mr. Martin: It will make this difference: We think the measure is an improvement over the existing act, although we think the existing act is an excellent measure. The advantages that will accrue to the rest of Canada will accrue to Newfoundland.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The minister is going to take the power under this act to make regulations that will cover many varieties of things.

Mr. Martin: He has that power now.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Those will continue in force?

Mr. Martin: Yes.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Paragraph (j) reads:

> "Minister" means the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

I cannot understand why that definition is put there when it does not mean anything. The minister cannot be ubiquitous and be in every province at the same time. Prosecutions may be going on in every province at the same time.

An hon. Member: Paul gets around.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Should not the definition include the deputy minister, the assistant deputy minister and so on? I notice that when we were dealing with the foot-and-mouth disease the word "minister" was used when the minister did not know anything about it for two months. Is not the general interpretation section in conflict with this, in that it provides that the minister means the deputy minister, during the minister's absence, or his assistant or any other person who may be designated.

Mr. Martin: I can only say that this is the usual practice. The minister in charge of a department is responsible for the acts of his officials as well as his own. This is the formal designation that is usual in Anglo-American communities and I am sure on reflection it will commend itself to the high legal attainments of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I do not think that that explanation covers it. Perhaps I may be permitted to refer to section 12, which reads:

> No person shall sell any drug described in schedule C or D unless the minister has, in prescribed form and manner, indicated that the premises in which the drug was manufactured and the process and conditions of manufacture therein are suitable to ensure that the drug will not be unsafe for use.

That does not mean that the minister is going to look at every premises where foods or drugs are being manufactured or displayed.

Mr. Martin: The word "minister" is used in the same sense as the word "crown" is used for other purposes.

Mr. Higgins: I understand that at the present time there are quite a number of patent medicines coming in from the United States and other countries.

Mr. Martin: Could we deal with that under the appropriate section?

Section agreed to.

On section 3—No food, drug, etc., to be advertised or sold as a treatment, etc., for certain diseases.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): This section reads:

> No person shall advertise any food, drug, cosmetic or device to the general public as a treatment, preventative or cure for any of the diseases, disorders or abnormal physical states mentioned in schedule A.

In looking over schedule A, I see a number of diseases and so-called diseases mentioned there about which I have often seen advertisements. One in particular is obesity, and we need not look far for an example of a person who has responded to treatment. But we frequently see advertisements, especially in movie magazines and that sort of thing, addressed principally to young ladies and telling them how they may reduce their figures and get a more admirable one. Is it going to be an offence to recommend that a person should adopt the practice of slimming, eat Hollywood bread and more vegetables and adopt a change of diet?

I want to make a reference to some less conspicuous diseases. I notice that in the schedule venereal diseases and sexual impotence are mentioned. There is a provision in the Criminal Code which makes advertisements of cures for these particular conditions punishable. Another one is influenza.

I am very glad to see it referred to here because I remember reading an article in the Reader's Digest two years ago about a certain brand of pills that were a sure cure for influenza. I remember recommending them to one of my colleagues and taking some myself. I fell asleep with the window open and the temperature at 10 below zero and woke up with a more severe attack of influenza than when I went to sleep. I certainly think that the proper thing for a person to do is to go to a doctor when he feels ill and not rely on articles, even in such a prominent publication as the Reader's Digest.

Mr. Martin: This is an important section. In many respects it is perhaps the most important in the bill. My hon. friend has referred to one of the diseases mentioned in schedule A. I must say first of all that the particular item was in the schedule long before the recent historical developments in my own person took place. But apart altogether from my own achievements in that particular —and I do not want to be personal except for the fact that my hon. friend has referred to me as exhibit A—I simply want to say that obesity is included in the schedule on the advice of my technical people.

Mr. Knowles: The minister used to be a fairly substantial exhibit.

Mr. Martin: I am sure the hon. member for Lanark will be pleased to give my hon. friend some advice. Obesity is a very serious thing. All sorts of advertising are being carried on in this country telling people how to reduce, and as doctors know that can be a fairly serious matter if not properly done and under proper supervision. No one should resort to the process of dieting without first consulting his doctor. There are pills and other things being advertised that are very dangerous. It is for that reason that obesity is included along with other diseases like cancer.

The main purpose of the provision is not to discourage initiative in industry or in professional activity but, having in mind the public interest, to make sure that no one shall advertise any food, drug, cosmetic or device as a treatment, preventive or cure for any of the serious diseases and conditions described in schedule A. This measure does not seek to disturb people advertising their wares, but they shall not advertise them as a treatment for those conditions. For instance, there are certain bodies in this country advertising preparations as a treatment and cure for cancer. That is a fraud on the public, and this measure seeks to prevent that. It does not mean that medical men may not recommend certain things, but vendors of nostrums shall not be permitted to carry on that practice. I know of the case of an official who works on the staff of the House of Commons and whose wife died of cancer a year ago. She was taking a certain pill that had been recommended to her by a practitioner who was not carrying out the responsibility of his high office. He recommended it to her. It was advertised as a treatment in a little publication that came to our attention. This woman did not go to see a doctor who might have given her assistance, although I do not know whether he could have in the light of her condition. The section will deal with this kind of situation, and I am sure the importance of the provision will commend itself to every hon. member.

Mr. Blair: I think the list is very well chosen. I went over it carefully yesterday. Some of the diseases included in the list may look rather innocent, but there is a reason behind every single one. For instance, obesity may appear to be rather innocent. I am not going to refer to anybody who has received treatment, but I remember very well that a certain type of pill was sold, particularly on the other side of the border, which caused a lot of trouble and brought about some fatalities in this country. The list is well chosen.

Mr. Martin: It caused blindness and cataracts.

Mr. Blair: Yes. There is an inclination to advertise a cure for almost everything, and while some of these diseases may appear innocent there is a real reason behind their inclusion in the schedule. I congratulate the department on having gone so far, and in the future I think that the list can be enlarged. I do not say this as a physician opposed to certain cures. These are things for which I know it is impossible to advertise a cure, and it is a dangerous practice to do so.

Mr. Knowles: Can the minister say where the line is drawn with respect to this matter? I would think it would be clear that any advertisement that said specifically that such and such was a cure for such and such a disease would be illegal. What about the type of advertising that indulges in the before and after technique? Suppose some firm advertised by simply publishing two pictures of the minister, one before and one after, and said that he had done so and so. Would that be unlawful? Where is the line drawn?

Mr. Martin: That might be embarrassing but it certainly would not be unlawful. If a company advertises a particular product as a treatment, cure or preventive, that is contrary to this section. There are clever devices used in advertising but our officers are very much on the alert. I may say that industry in Canada co-operates almost 100 per cent. We have companies that come to us and say: Here is the proposed advertising upon which we intend to embark. Does this offend? As long as that kind of co-operation prevails there is no difficulty, and generally speaking that is the case. Unfortunately there are some exceptions, and it is those with which we are seeking to deal in this measure.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Prohibited sales of food.

Mr. Blair: With respect to the word "adulterated", there does not seem to be a clear explanation.

Mr. Martin: Perhaps I could explain. In the old act adulteration included (a), (b) and (c) of section 4 as well as (a) in section 24. The word "adulteration" as used in section 4 is to be given the usual grammatical definition, the definition that would be found in any dictionary. If a court were called upon to construe what was meant by adulteration in this particular section it would give it the ordinary meaning. That is according to the rules of interpretation in law. This particular method was arrived at in the light of the experience we have had in some of our cases. If my hon. friend will look at section 24 (1) (a), he will see that by implication adulteration as used there means adding something that is a prescribed substance or withdrawing something that is a prescribed substance. The present arrangement arises out of our experience in the administration of this measure and it follows the practice in certain other countries.

Mr. Blair: The old definition, Mr. Chairman, is very good, but subsection (a) of section 24 does not fully cover the matter. The minister has cited the dictionary definition of adding or omitting something but I would suggest that the definition there be something like this: That an article would be deemed to be adulterated if something were added, subtracted or omitted lessening its therapeutic value or rendering it dangerous for human consumption.

Mr. Martin: That would be all right but we consider adulteration as something not so severe as that. In our effort to maintain and operate standards there is not only the question of whether something is injurious to health but also the question of whether it is contrary to certain prescribed standards within the over-all plan. My hon. friend has asked that we give careful consideration to this, but may I assure him this represents the best thinking in food and drug law experience at the moment. I will give it further consideration in the light of further experience as suggested.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—Deception.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, I would like to bring up, under this section, a matter which affects a Hamilton processing firm with which the minister is thoroughly familiar. It concerns the sale on the market of a product known as oilless mayonnaise as against another article known as salad dressing. These people have been marketing this product for 16 years and it has popular acceptance on the market. It says:

> Oilless mayonnaise—made of eggs, cream, sugar, vinegar, mustard, salt, spices and condiments.

There is no attempt there at any deception whatsoever. Anyone can read what is in the article and it has popular acceptance. I would like to protest very strongly against the department's action in trying to remove from the market an article which has popular consumer acceptance.

There was another Hamilton firm, as a matter of fact, which made oilless mayonnaise some time ago, but owing to pressure from the department they changed the name of their particular product and called it "Dressing Supreme". Mr. Chairman, that is just a lot of nonsense. If an article is a popular article and if it does no harm and is a wholesome product I cannot see any difference whether you call it a rose or a violet. It is still healthy. For the department to take the stand that under the term "mayonnaise" no product can be marketed unless oil is included is a lot of nonsense. As a matter of fact, I think that if you went back to the term "mayonnaise" in the broad sense you might describe it as something that was manufactured at the whim of a woman. There are no two cooks in the country who have exactly the same recipes for the foods which they prepare for their families.

I have had a good many cook-books in my house which had recipes for mayonnaise and for salad dressing and which required no oil whatever. There are some products on the market at the present time, under various trade names, which do not include oil and those apparently have the full approval of the department. I cannot see that the department has any right to force a manufacturer to remove from the market a product of this nature—particularly when you consider the amount of money which must go into the build-up of a trade name and the advertising which was necessary in order to promote the sale of that article. In this case, after 16 years, the department decides that the description is a misnomer and they ask that the product be removed from sale. It does not seem to me, Mr. Chairman, to have anything to do with the health of this country whether any article is called salad dressing or mayonnaise, and if the public is fully aware of the ingredients I cannot agree that the department is correct in making such a stipulation. Apparently it has no such stipulation for other dressings but only on mayonnaise and salad dressings. They come in under B.07.034 and B.07.036, respectively, in the one case with 65 per cent vegetable oil and in the other case 35 per cent vegetable oil. I understand that these regulations were not enforced during the war for the simple reason that there was not sufficient vegetable oil. We do not know but what we will have to face that situation again. The department's stand seems to me to be entirely wrong and I want to protest most vigorously against their action in trying to force the manufacturer to remove from the market a healthful product which has had public acceptance for 16 years.

Mr. Goode: Mr. Chairman, I am taking into account the experience of the hon. member but she will remember that some of us also have had experience in marketing these products. I would like to say that she knows from her experience and I know that the definition of mayonnaise in the retail grocery trade in Canada is an uncooked dressing with a preservative of oil to 65 per cent. Salad oil is not necessarily that. It can come in two classes, one with 35 per cent of oil and the other is a cooked dressing. As the hon. member very well knows, some people put out salad dressing under a peculiar name as a low-priced product. You can put out salad dressing in this country at 25 cents for an 8-ounce jar and market it very well under any peculiar or particular name, and some unscrupulous manufacturers are doing just that. They are trying to kid the public into thinking that they are buying a quality article at a cheaper price.

The department is absolutely correct in laying down these regulations. When you market mayonnaise in Canada you say to the public that you are putting a distinct amount of good oil in that mayonnaise. In selling salad dressing you do not. You may say to the public that you are selling this salad dressing under a particular name and the ingredients may be on the label, but I would rather think that very few women buying salad dressing in this country read the small print. I have sold many millions of jars of salad dressing and mayonnaise in my time and I would doubt whether 1 per cent of the women who buy it know what is on the label—other than the large print.

The hon. member is entitled to present her views in this house, as I am, but I would ask her to reconsider the matter of the department telling the manufacturer to take an article off the market. I would be in agreement because in British Columbia where it has happened many times it has been for the good of the grocery trade.

Mrs. Fairclough: I cannot agree. In the first place the hon. member says that salad dressing is a cooked dressing, yet the regulations of the department call for 35 per cent vegetable oil. I do not know how he can reconcile that. It means that no one can put salad dressing on the market unless it has 35 per cent vegetable oil. This label says "oilless mayonnaise". I disagree, and I am not talking as a representative of the grocery association; I am talking as a woman and as a cook, and I know what I am talking about. We have been calling this type of thing mayonnaise for a good many years.

Mr. Goode: May I correct the hon. member? I did not say that all salad dressing had oil in it nor that it was all cooked. I said that there were two qualities of salad dressing as you will see if you read Hansard tomorrow. I should take into consideration the experience my hon. friend has had, but she must remember that there are others in the house who have had just as much experience.

Mr. Higgins: I am not getting into this discussion about cooks. I want to discuss another matter which is equally important, I believe, to those who are not cooks. It is the question of rum or the description of rum.

Mr. McCann: Does the hon. member know something about that?

Mr. Higgins: I have had experience. In the days prior to the time when Newfoundland joined this great nation—when rum was rum, I may say—we had a fine rum known as navy rum and it was sold under a trade name. On the bottle there used to appear the words "approved by the faculty". I never did find out who the faculty actually were. It also said that it was good for the prevention of chills and that it aided the circulation of the blood. Actually, I think it did both. Would the minister say whether or not that would be misleading advertising? There is another rum that we also have had misleadingly described by our friends of the United States forces as screech. I do not know whether that would be misleading advertising or not. I do not even know whether the minister is competent to pass an opinion in these matters.

Mr. Martin: With regard to the latter, I am certainly not competent. I think that is well known. I think, however, we must maintain a little sense of humour in these matters. There is a difference between that kind of representation and the representation when it is seeking to sell something that it is not. The best example of the value of section 5 is this. The committee will remember that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre raised with me about a year and a half ago the question of whole-wheat bread. The fact that whole-wheat bread was being advertised but which in fact, in many instances, was not whole-wheat bread, was not necessarily injurious to health but it was deception and people were buying bread thinking that in fact they were getting whole-wheat bread but in a great many instances they were not. Our regulations have been changed, and now no one can advertise whole-wheat bread unless it is in accordance with the prescribed standard and contains a certain percentage of whole-wheat flour.

That principle applies throughout the measure. I was myself one of the victims of this constant use of whole-wheat bread. I was eating whole-wheat bread thinking that as a result of doing so I was eating less of carbohydrates, only to find out that I was eating the same kind of bread with a different colour. Now it is not possible for that to happen under these regulations.

With regard to the case mentioned by the hon. member for Hamilton West, I can only say this. Mayonnaise does have, in the dictionary meaning, a definite standard. Any English dictionary will show that there has to be a certain amount of vegetable oil, and it has to be a substantial amount. It is not mayonnaise unless oil is in it. That is in the very nature of the product. To advertise mayonnaise as oilless is to advertise something that is not mayonnaise and to give to the public the impression that they are buying in fact mayonnaise. This particular problem did confront us. As my hon. friend knows, I went into the thing carefully and I did once think that perhaps we were being needlessly strict. We called together in Ottawa representatives of the Canadian Association of Consumers. Mrs. Walton came down here and there were two other ladies from Ottawa who came in to the department, listened to the representations on both sides that were then made, and they agreed with the stand that we were taking.

[Mr. Higgins.]

Mrs. Fairclough: Is the minister sure of that? I understand that Mrs. Walton was not here.

Mr. Martin: Mrs. Walton was here, and Mrs. Kent and Mrs. Weir, representing the association, and they fully agreed with the stand taken.

Mrs. Fairclough: That is not the information I got over the telephone.

Mr. Martin: I am giving that information now.

Mrs. Fairclough: They told me they definitely wanted oilless dressing.

Mr. Martin: How did we arrive at this standard? This was not a standard arbitrarily imposed. It was the trade itself which came to us in the first instance in 1936. We sat down with all of the people who were manufacturing mayonnaise and they all agreed that there had to be a prescribed standard in order to avoid misconceptions and deceptions that were being perpetrated, and we arrived at this one; and now the prescribed standard is that 65 per cent of oil must be used. That is the standard. As a result of that we feel that the public now, when they come to buy mayonnaise, will be in fact getting mayonnaise which in its very initial etymological meaning means the use of a substantial amount of oil. I cannot profess to be at all an authority on cooking. I do not know anything about cooking except that in my heyday I knew something about the value of good cooking. I knew whether food was good or not.

I have before me a cook-book that my wife gave me this morning and I looked up mayonnaise. Here is what mayonnaise is:

> This is a thick uncooked emulsion of edible vegetable oil, egg yolk or whole egg, vinegar or lemon juice, or both, seasoned with salt and other seasonings that are commonly used in its manufacture. It contains at least 50 per cent of edible vegetable oil. The oil content of the average high-grade mayonnaise is about 65 per cent, while the egg content ranges from 5 to 15 per cent.

The technical books all indicate that. Webster's dictionary, which I looked at this morning, indicates that there must be a substantial amount of vegetable oil. However, the particular case that my hon. friend has raised so ably this morning is one that is based on regulation. We feel that our contention is sound. I should be happy at any time to discuss the matter further with my hon. friend.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, it is true that the trade was consulted back in 1936. I draw to the minister's attention the fact that that was 17 years ago, and a great many of the people who were making mayonnaise at that time are no longer making it today. A great many of the people who were making mayonnaise without oil at that time have since gone out of the market. Today, as far as I know, this is the only product in Canada which is marketed under that term "oilless mayonnaise". You can bring in all the dictionaries in the country and out of the country, but when a term has popular acceptance as meaning a certain thing, I cannot understand why it should not be allowed. The minister knows right well that in a few years the dictionaries even may have a different definition of that particular term. That has happened before and it may happen again. It seems to me wrong that there should be notice of a regulation back as far as 1936, that nothing is done for 15 or 16 years, and then all of a sudden they dump it in the lap of the one remaining manufacturer in that field. It is discrimination of the highest order.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I was interested in what the minister had to say with respect to the question of brown bread. As he indicated, this matter was raised in the house a number of times, starting back about two years ago. I pointed out to him frequently that deception was being practised. I am glad to know that the regulations which are made under this section were changed a short while ago so far as the labelling of whole-wheat bread is concerned. I think it is also good that the trade has gone in for vitamin enriched white bread. I personally still think that it is not as good as whole-wheat bread, but maybe that is a matter of taste. In any event, in a country like Canada where wheat is one of our most important products it does seem to be a shame that so many of our people, in the bread that they eat, should not get the full value that is in the wheat itself.

However, this is the question I want to put to the minister, even under the revised regulations. He seems to be quite satisfied that there can now be no deception. I recognize that is the case where brown bread is wrapped and labelled. But what about the case of unwrapped, unlabelled brown bread? Most people, when they buy a loaf of brown bread —whether it is wrapped and labelled or not— assume that they are getting whole-wheat bread. My point in raising this matter a couple of years ago—and repeatedly during the last two years—was that unwrapped, unlabelled brown bread could be, and was in some cases, simply white bread dyed brown. I made it clear that the colouring used to dye the bread was not in itself harmful or injurious to health. The point was, as the minister indicated this morning, that that was a case of deception. Has any change been made in the regulations so as to require that any bread that is brown must have in it a certain percentage of whole-wheat flour?

Mr. Martin: Well, one of the reasons of course is that we have our inspection service, which has to deal with the things that cannot be dealt with by regulation, and we are following that aspect of it very closely. As my hon. friend knows, we have an inspection force—I would not want to say how many, because in the very nature of things it is a very important service and we try to keep as much information to ourselves as possible in so far as our detection service is concerned. We have inspectors going around continually, and that is one of their jobs.

Mr. Knowles: I take it from what the minister has said that the matter has not been completely cleared up yet. I take it it is still possible for certain firms to put on the market—

Mr. Martin: I do not want to say any more at the present time.

Mr. Knowles: That is an admission that it is still happening; that brown bread is still being put on the market which, when it is not wrapped and not labelled, is not necessarily whole wheat bread. At the moment the only protection the consumer has is to buy wrapped and labelled bread. I think the consumer is entitled to full protection. I think the people who are working on this should see to it that all bread that is brown in colour is whole wheat bread.

Mr. Martin: I think the public should feel that they are getting the fullest protection that it is possible to give them. I would not want to give any other impression.

Mr. Charlton: Are the margarine manufacturers going to be entitled to use the words "pasture sweet"?

Mr. Martin: That is a matter to which I should like to give further consideration before replying.

Mr. Hansell: I have one question in connection with the struggle that the minister has had with whole wheat bread. Do I understand that when the manufacturer of whole wheat bread puts a wrapper on his loaf and advertises it as whole wheat bread the actual wheat germ is in the flour?

Mr. Martin: When a man sells bread and he advertises it as whole wheat bread it must conform to the prescribed standard, which is that it must have a percentage of whole wheat flour. If it has not, he has no right to advertise it as whole wheat bread.

Mr. Higgins: There are two points that I should like to bring to the attention of the minister. I believe the essence of this offence is sale in Canada. Does the minister feel that it might be advisable to include the word "export" as well as "import"? I think it would be necessary; otherwise you would be selling products that you would not want to go out of Canada.

Mr. Martin: This point arises in another section. I am not saying this boastfully—it was long before I had anything to do with this thing—but we have I think what is regarded as an exemplary Food and Drugs Act, the best of its kind in the world. Our act preceded the United States act by some 32 years. All countries do not have the same standards, and obviously if a country's standards are different from ours there is no reason why we should not sell in that country a product that conforms to their standards. And likewise it may be that there could be conflicting standards, so one is faced with the only alternative that the goods should conform to the law of the country to which they are consigned.

Section agreed to.

Section 7 agreed to.

On section 8—Prohibited sale of drugs.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I note that this clause is described as being new. It says:

> No person shall sell any drug that > (a) was manufactured, prepared, preserved, packed or stored under unsanitary conditions; or > (b) is adulterated.

There must have been some similar provision in the law before this.

Mr. Martin: There was not.

Section agreed to.

Sections 9 to 20 inclusive agreed to.

On section 21—Powers of inspectors.

Mr. Blair: In the matter of taking samples, the section says that the inspector may take samples and examine them. No provision is made in section 21 for leaving the sample. Later on in the bill we are going to come to the point of a court case on the analysis of a sample.

Mr. Martin: When an inspector takes the sample he pays for it, of course.

Mr. Blair: The sample taken should be sealed by the inspector, because there will be a case on it afterwards.

Mr. Martin: That is done by regulation.

Mr. Blair: Where in the regulations?

Mr. Martin: The regulations are not in the bill. The regulations are contained in a very thick document which I table every year.

[Mr. Higgins.]

Mr. Blair: That is covered?

Mr. Martin: Yes, it will be.

Mr. Blair: The sample is sealed by the inspector?

Mr. Martin: Yes.

Mr. Blair: And left with the firm?

Section agreed to.

Sections 22 and 23 agreed to.

On section 24—Regulations.

Mr. Blair: With regard to the preparation, there is nothing here which says that a firm may devise a new method of preparation instead of the old method and produce a quality that is equal in potency and has sufficient therapeutic value.

Mr. Martin: There is the most continuous consultation. I would be very happy if my hon. friend, particularly because of his professional interest, could find time to come down to the laboratory where he could see the great consultation that goes on daily between our laboratory people at the food and drug laboratory and the trade. There is a continuous series of exchange of views on all sorts of developments.

Section agreed to.

Sections 25 to 28 inclusive agreed to.

On section 29—Certificates of analysis.

Mr. Blair: This is one of the most important clauses of the whole act. It has to do with the matter of evidence. It seems to me that this is peculiar as regards the law of evidence. As it stands, the man who makes the analysis on behalf of the department does not need to appear in court. His certificate of analysis is accepted by the court. It seems to me that the defendant, who may be a pharmaceutical house or a drug company, should have the opportunity to cross-question an analyst in the court regarding the analysis he has made.

Mr. Martin: I should have indicated that I propose introducing an amendment. I completely forgot. I am glad my hon. friend has spoken of it. I think the point is covered now. I would ask my colleague, the Secretary of State, if he would be good enough to move that in line 36, after the word "certificate", the following should be inserted:

> The party against whom it is produced may require the attendance of the analyst for the purpose of cross-examination;

That is done at the request of the Canadian Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association who thought that this should be in. This is put in so that there will be no misunderstanding.

Mr. Bradley: I move accordingly.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Blair: I want to be sure of this, Mr. Chairman. The minister has explained that the amendment gives the defendant in the case the right to ask for the production of the analyst.

Mr. Martin: The analyst, yes.

Mr. Blair: And he is subject to cross-examination?

Mr. Martin: Yes.

Mr. Blair: I am quite satisfied.

Section as amended agreed to.

Section 30 agreed to.

On section 31—Coming into force.

Mr. Knowles: Since this is the last clause in the bill I wonder whether I might just say a word or two, and urge upon the minister the point which I made when we were at the second reading stage of the bill. This legislation, when it is on the statute books, will give the Department of National Health and Welfare greater control and supervision over drugs, devices and appliances. I am thinking particularly of those in the medical field. In view of that, I hope that the minister, on his own initiative, without waiting for requests from the Minister of Finance, will look at and reconsider the list of drugs and appliances which are scheduled for income tax deductibility. It seems to me that list could be greatly extended. As the minister knows, in my view it should include all drugs prescribed by doctors. The Minister of National Health and Welfare could do a great deal along this line if he would make stronger representations in connection with this matter to his colleagues, the Minister of National Revenue and the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Martin: The hon. member may be assured that the minister in charge of this department, and the government as a whole, are always alive to the interests of the public in these matters.

Mr. Knowles: This government may soon be dead.

Section agreed to.

Schedules A, B, C, D, E and F agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Knowles: By leave.

Mr. Martin moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

INCREASE IN APPROPRIATION FOR LOANS

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the National Housing Act, 1944, to increase the appropriation provided by section 7 for loans under part I from $300,000,000 to $500,000,000, and the appropriation provided by section 13 for loans under part II from $150,000,000 to $250,000,000, also with respect to grants in aid of slum clearance and to certain other matters deemed necessary for the proper administration of the act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, the resolution before the house seeks authority for the government to introduce certain amendments to the National Housing Act. I will at this stage confine my remarks to the subject matter of the resolution.

When the present National Housing Act was passed in 1944, $100 million was authorized for home ownership loans under part I and to take care of possible losses under the previous housing acts of 1935 and 1938. In 1949 this amount was increased to $300 million. It is now proposed further to increase this appropriation by $200 million, making a total cumulative statutory vote of $500 million for home ownership loans under part I of the act.

For rental housing under part II of the act the original appropriation was $50 million. This was increased to $150 million in 1945. It is now proposed to increase this appropriation by $100 million to $250 million, making a total cumulative statutory vote of $250 million for rental housing loans under part II of the act.

Since 1945 over $1 billion of loans have been approved under the National Housing Act for residential construction in Canada. Of this amount the share of the federal government, including loans made by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation on direct account, is $379 million.

The reason for asking for increased appropriations at this time is that, of the $300 million appropriated for part I loans, $285 million has been committed, including the amount held to the credit of lending institutions under the pool guarantee arrangement. As hon.

members know, when a loan is made jointly with a lending institution under the act a certain amount is credited by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to an account held by the corporation in the name of that lending company. This account is for the purpose of making provision for losses that the company may in the future sustain in respect of its share of joint loans. Commitments for rental housing loans under part II, including that credited to the pool guarantee account, approximate $126 million. The balances remaining would not be sufficient to carry the operations of the act through the year 1953.

During the last session the standing committee on banking and commerce examined the annual report of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation which administers the National Housing Act. That committee, after its deliberations, recommended that the slum clearance provisions of the National Housing Act be amended. It is now proposed to broaden section 12—the slum clearance section —to provide that the slum area when cleared may be developed under section 35 of the act as a federal-provincial housing project. Under the present legislation the area may be developed by a limited-dividend company, as provided by section 9 of the act, or a life insurance company operating under section 11 of the act. The amendment will further provide for the development of a housing project on an alternative area to be provided by the municipality. This alternative area may be developed by a limited-dividend company, a life company or as a federal-provincial project. There is a condition imposed in the proposed amendment, to the effect that the cleared area must be used for a municipal, provincial or federal public purpose. In other words, the provision relating to the use of an alternative area will apply only if the slum area is designated on the master plan of the municipality for public use. The committee recommended also that the cleared area might be used for commercial or other purposes. It is considered that if land is to be acquired and cleared for commercial or industrial uses the responsibility for its acquisition and clearance should rest with the commercial or industrial interests concerned, and authority to make the cleared land thus available is not being sought in the proposed amendments.

Other amendments contained in the proposed legislation are of a procedural or technical nature. I will at this time refer briefly to them.

It is proposed to include a clause in the act that will remove any doubt that lending companies operating under the act have the corporate power to make and administer loans on an agency basis on behalf of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

The government is by the proposed amendments also seeking authority for the corporation to make supplementary advances in connection with existing loans which it has made on its own account. This will allow the corporation to advance borrowers' charges where it becomes necessary to do so. At the present time the corporation has this power jointly with a lending institution in respect of a joint loan, but it does not have the same authority with respect to direct loans.

The section under which the integrated housing plan was operated and under which the arrangement in respect of defence workers has been made is being amended. The proposed amendments will require that a builder pay a premium for the undertaking of the corporation to purchase from him any house that he is unable to sell on the market. The section is also being amended with reference to the class of persons to whom a builder must first offer a house for sale. The present provisions refer to veterans. It is proposed to add specifically defence workers.

Finally, an amendment is proposed regarding rental insurance. As hon. members know, there is a three-year rental control on projects financed under the rental insurance plan. This control is imposed by the builder in his agreement with Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. Pursuant to the present legislation, such three-year period runs from the completion of the whole project. This imposes a hardship on builders of large projects where upwards of a year may elapse between the renting of the first units and the final completion of the project. The proposed amendment will have the three-year period running from the completion of each unit or group of units.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, this, rather strangely, is the first time in the course of the entire present session of parliament that there has been a debate on housing. We have been in session since November 20, 1952, yet this is the first occasion on which housing has been the subject of a debate in the house. There were some comments on it during the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne and on the budget, but apart from that housing has not been the subject of debate during this session.

This is a resolution looking to the introduction, as I gather from the minister's statement, of what will be a rather extensive bill amending the housing act. It is not my purpose this morning to discuss at any length the contents of the minister's statement nor the type of amendment that he has indicated. On the motion for second reading, when we have the contents of the bill before us, we shall have a much more suitable opportunity for that discussion.

I intend this morning to content myself with some brief observations concerning the housing problem in general. This problem has not receded in importance; it is still a prime problem facing all of Canada. On the last occasion when we had a debate on this subject in the house, on July 3, 1952, I reviewed the evidence that had been given before the committee on banking and commerce in the 1952 session. At its meetings during that year the committee had made an extensive inquiry into housing and the administration of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. I summed up the evidence which had been given to the committee, for the years 1946-1951 inclusive, as will be found on page 4176 of Hansard of July 3, 1952, as follows: For the six-year period the totals are these: net family formations, 513,000; new housing units completed 495,887.

That means that in the six-year period we had not even kept abreast of new housing needs, let alone make any reduction in the very substantial backlog of housing needs which existed at the conclusion of the war. In other words, house construction in Canada had fallen behind current family formations in the same period to the extent of 17,113 units.

We have had no authoritative estimate of the extent of the housing shortage in Canada. Mr. Mansur, president of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, stated before the banking and commerce committee a year ago that he was not prepared to commit himself to any estimate on that subject. He did indicate that he had reservations concerning the estimate of housing shortage by the Curtis commission in 1944, but he himself was not prepared to commit himself to any estimate in that regard.

Whatever may be the best estimate, the fact is that there is still a great and pressing backlog of housing need in Canada. I have said "housing need" because there seems to be something of a change in emphasis as between housing need and housing demand. Housing need is not to be measured simply in terms of effective housing demand. When we speak of effective housing demand we are speaking in terms of economic demand on the part of those who have the means to satisfy their need if houses were available.

Of the various factors which over the post-war period have been responsible for retarding house construction, these have been mentioned from time to time: shortage of labour, shortage of materials, high prices, shortage of mortgage funds, shortage of serviced land and others. Under present-day conditions there has been a change of responsibility as between those different factors. Today it cannot be said that a shortage of labour is responsible for any retardation of house construction in Canada. As a matter of fact, while the minister has not given figures on expected house construction as estimated for this year, as I followed his statement, the figure that will be attained this year, according to estimates of officials of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, will be substantially below the capacity of the Canadian construction industry which competent officials of that industry have claimed, namely, a total of 130,000 housing units. Whether that figure be accepted, or some figure closely approximating it, the fact of the matter is that it is abundantly clear that the capacity of the Canadian construction industry is very substantially in excess of the rate of construction of houses.

The next factor deserving of comment is the supply of materials. Happily we are no longer faced with a shortage of materials; no longer can a shortage of materials be regarded as a factor delaying house construction. In a recent publication of the Department of Trade and Commerce entitled "Supply of Building Materials in Canada. Outlook 1953" we have a review of the 1952 position and a sketch of the outlook for 1953. The 1952 position is summed up in these words:

> The supply of building materials in relation to requirements was better in 1952 than in any previous post-war year, and such shortages as did exist did not affect to any great extent the overall volume of construction achieved. Even so, with construction at an all-time high, a few strategic materials remained very scarce and a number of small projects for which supplies had not been obtained in advance were delayed. At the same time the decline of house building activity during the first six months of the year brought on a sharp drop in demand for a wide range of materials, forcing manufacturers to cut back production.

Then the publication proceeds to comment upon the extent to which shortages appeared during the year in cement and heavy structural steel beams, and it continues:

> Despite these shortages, 1952 saw a fairly general movement of building materials into good supply. In fact, for the first time since the war, the production of a large number of building materials was cut back early in the year due to reduced demand and to temporarily inflated inventories. Thus, of the materials covered in this report, the production of 20 declined while the production of only 12 increased. Moreover, some of the shortages which appeared following the upswing in house building were due more to the fact that stocks had been unduly depleted by mid-year than to insufficiency of productive capacity.

That is its review with respect to building materials during 1952. What of the outlook for 1953? This publication sums it up in these words:

The outlook for the supply of building materials in 1953 is distinctly favourable. While the volume of construction is expected to be even larger than in 1952, its composition will be more balanced from the standpoint of the Canadian building materials industries.

That is an encouraging outlook with respect to building materials.

Commenting on prices in a recent speech to the house builders' association in Toronto on March 24, Mr. Mansur said that in 1952 the prices of houses were relatively stable. It is a happy circumstance if the cost of housing has ceased its upward climb. Whether that proves to be too optimistic an estimate we shall not be long in learning. Nevertheless it is, if this statement is justified, a hopeful augury that at least we have achieved stability in house building costs. The fact remains, however, that house building costs are extremely high, and in all fairness this is the factor which has created that difference that I mentioned earlier between housing need and effective economic housing demand, because unquestionably if the cost of construction of houses were lower they would be within the economic reach of many more people than can purchase them today.

Now, sir, I should like to say a word about mortgage funds. The minister did not make any comment on this subject in his statement. He asserted several days ago, in reply to a question, that there was no justification for the charge that in one particular municipality there had been a strike on the part of the lending institutions. In fairness, Mr. Chairman, it is a fact that must be recognized that there has been very general co-operation on the part of the lending institutions with respect to the policy that parliament has approved and which is written in the terms of part I of the National Housing Act. It is a fact that many people have not been able to obtain loans to the extent that or in the localities where they desired them, and for that reason some have sought to criticize the lending institutions. The fact of the matter is that in this country today the financial resources of the lending institutions are being used to their limit in assisting house construction under part I of the National Housing Act.

Because of the rise in the cost of house construction, the investment of the same amount of money today in loans under part I of the National Housing Act does not provide as many loans as was the case two years ago or even one year ago. The fact of the matter is that the average amount of mortgage money committed per loan is higher than it has been previously. Therefore the same total of investment through part I of the National Housing Act on the part of the lending institutions has not made available as many mortgage loans even though the total of money so made available is as large as and actually larger than in the previous year.

The present system under part I has many satisfactory features about it. On the other hand, there are unquestionably very great strains today upon the resources available for house construction through part I of the National Housing Act. One is the physical limit that exists on the resources of the lending institutions available for lending on mortgage security. Others take the form, and naturally, of a selective approach on the part of the lending institutions. We will look with interest for a report from the minister on the extent to which Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has itself attempted to step into the breach in the case of municipalities up to 50,000 population where adequate mortgage loans from lending institutions have not been available under part I of the National Housing Act.

I should like to draw attention to this fact, and I think it is a fact that either is not generally known or is not generally appreciated. When the lending institutions under part I of the act are called upon to provide a loan it means a tremendous amount of detail work on their part. I am told that there are no fewer than 45 pieces of paper that have to be handled in placing every loan by one of these lending institutions under part I, and these 45 pieces of paper do not include the mortgage itself. Therefore it is not unnatural that the lending institutions, faced with a load of administrative work of that kind, are seeking to reduce the work that is thrown upon them in that regard, and it is not unnatural that their approach should become selective in this field in the face of a very great demand. I should like to hear some statement from the minister as to the policy that the government proposes to offer in the face of that admitted problem.

I come now to a brief statement of what is today unquestionably the most serious and difficult of all the problems contributing to the retardation of house construction in Canada. I refer to the shortage of serviced land. The great need for housing today is in our urban areas, and the acceleration of the program of defence production has contributed greatly to the sharpening of the need of more homes in the large urban areas, particularly those industrial centres where defence production has been a noticeable factor in the local economy. It has reached a point where indeed, Mr. Chairman, some municipalities are so overwhelmed with the burden of providing services for land that they are doing what is within their power to discourage house construction within their municipal borders. In some cases this takes the form of requiring the builder or subdivider of land to pay in advance the costs of installing all services. The burden on our municipalities today, particularly on fast growing urban municipalities or those suburban municipalities that surround the great metropolitan centres, is very great.

They are still working under the handicap of a very limited tax base, a tax base which has remained virtually unchanged since 1867, a tax base that is utterly inadequate to enable municipalities to cope effectively today with the problem which has in part at least been left on their doorsteps by senior governments. If we wish to make an effective contribution to meeting the housing problem in Canada today we will need to do something effective to assist municipalities. I tried to sum it up in these words in the last housing debate on July 3, 1952, as found at page 4178 of Hansard:

> If we want to help the housing problem in Canada, we cannot have a better slogan than this: Help the municipal governments!

We are not helping the municipal governments enough under the terms of this legislation. The minister has indicated that there are going to be some amendments with respect to section 35 of the act. The extent to which they are going to bring any help at all to municipalities was not clear from his statement, and I am not going to comment upon that subject until we see the text of the bill. It may well be that in some respects the effect is going to be to increase the burdens on municipalities, but I shall not attempt to venture comment on that subject until I see the bill. But the fact remains that the municipalities today, particularly the fast growing metropolitan and suburban municipalities surrounding industrial centres, are simply not financially able to cope with the housing problems that are being thrust upon them. And what is needed today, as imperatively as ever in this country's history, is a dominion-provincial conference to work out an understanding with respect to taxation sources which will assure to the municipalities sources of revenue in this respect that will assist them adequately to meet whatever share of the burden of the housing problem may be left to them to discharge.

Sir, slum clearance is a problem of great importance. Progress has lagged lamentably in this respect. Hopes that were held out in this house in 1949 when section 35 of the act was enacted have been disappointed. Much needs to be done in this respect. It is difficult of course to make the scheme of section 35 work when it requires co-operation with respect to each project on the part of the three levels of government involved. In that respect the section is cumbersome in its operation and I hope that the amendments to section 35 that are to appear in the bill will hold out some measure of hope that some of the difficulties which now surround the operation of section 35 will be met and removed. There certainly must be a more effective marrying of sections 12 and 35. I know it is a matter that the minister has had under study since the committee on banking and commerce made its recommendations on this point a year ago. I look for effective amendment in this respect when the bill is introduced.

There are just two other matters, Mr. Chairman, which I shall mention briefly in closing. There is one subject which has not been adequately examined in this house or justified. It relates to expenditure of a kind which is not of itself calculated to assist the housing problem in this country very much. On December 17, 1952, at page 820 of Hansard the minister brought in answers to certain questions asked by the hon. member for Wentworth concerning the cost of construction of the handsome new head office of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. Let me say at once that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has itself to be housed adequately. It has to carry on very important business and I should be the last one to say that it should not be properly accommodated. However, Mr. Speaker, in times like these when the levels of government that are greatly concerned with the provision of municipal services for housing are faced with very great difficulties, and when the provision that has been made by the federal government to assist in meeting the housing problem has not always been generous, I ask, Mr. Chairman, if the taxpayers of this country will regard it as justifiable that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation have constructed in this building—

The Chairman: Order. I must point out to the hon. member that matter is not contemplated by the resolution and the bill to follow. We are studying amendments to the housing act and I do not think that the hon. member can bring in the construction of a building to house the services of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. That is not allowed.

Mr. Fleming: With respect, Mr. Chairman, in these post-war years, whenever we have had a resolution in this house looking to the introduction of legislation or amendments to this act there has been permitted at the resolution stage a very free discussion of all aspects of housing. Normally, or at least until recently, that discussion has taken place in the house at the resolution stage. That stage, as far as opportunity for discussion is concerned, is now virtually eliminated by the recent ruling of Mr. Speaker. In committee, however, I understood that we were to be accorded the same freedom of discussing the problem in general as we were formerly accorded in the house.

I was not proposing to make an extended comment—

The Chairman: Perhaps I might make a comment. My recollection is that by general agreement in the past all matters pertaining to housing have been left to a time when a resolution was to be introduced. That was when the main legislation was introduced or when substantial amendments were brought in. This act has been in operation for some time and I would like the hon. member to bear in mind that the estimates of the minister will soon be before the house, at which time, on the first item of administration, hon. members will be perfectly in order in discussing housing questions—particularly that one.

Mr. Fleming: I will come back then on the estimates to what I conceive to be an extravagance in constructing the dance floor in this building.

The final matter I would mention at this stage, Mr. Chairman, concerns a housing project in the immediate vicinity of Ottawa. It is the Merivale road project which has come to the fore again as a result of some current action being taken by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. The project consists of 428 homes, all of which are occupied and are either owned or rented by ex-servicemen. They are married ex-servicemen in all cases. Those houses have been occupied by the residents for periods of up to seven years.

When they were first constructed they were all rented and then, in keeping with the general policy, the corporation in 1951 offered those homes for sale to the tenants and a number of the tenants purchased.

The Chairman: Order. I am afraid that this is another matter which the hon. member can bring up when the estimates are before the house. In other words, there is no general agreement at this time that the whole of the housing question will be debated on this resolution. There was no such undertaking given at any stage and therefore I would ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to the resolution now before the committee.

Mr. Fleming: If you are in the process of making a ruling on this subject I would ask an opportunity of saying a word about it and of making a submission to you.

In the first place I wish to say that it was in no sense by general agreement in previous sessions that there was a general discussion on the housing question at the resolution stage. It was not as a result of any agreement that it was permissible but, in my submission, it was in order under the rules of the house. When Mr. Speaker made his ruling recently that on a resolution contemplating the introduction of a money bill there was to be no opportunity for discussion in the house he did not in any way purport to curtail freedom of discussion in the committee at the resolution stage. Mr. Chairman, I submit to you that to attempt to curtail discussion regarding the housing problem and to say that it must relate specifically to some words in the resolution under discussion is not only quite contrary to the course and practice that have been followed in this house, but I say with respect, it would be an unwarranted confinement of the rights of members to discuss this matter in this house.

After all, this resolution is a very brief statement, Mr. Chairman, of the intention of the government with respect to the contents of the bill that is to follow. It is exceedingly brief, and the statement made this morning by the minister indicates how utterly brief it is as a synopsis of the provisions of the amending bill. He referred to numbers of matters that were to be dealt with in the bill to be introduced and therefore, Mr. Chairman, to base a ruling now on the terms of the resolution, when that resolution is simply the barest kind of synopsis—to the effect that certain amending legislation is to follow—is in my submission going to result in a very serious and unwarrantable interference with the freedom of members to discuss this question in this committee.

May I add this in connection with what I was going to say. I was discussing a situation in this particular housing project. It is something that relates directly to the housing problem, and it is something that relates very directly to the financial provisions which the minister proposes should be made in the amending legislation by way of addition or supplement to that which is provided for in the housing act. In my submission they relate directly to the request that the minister is making for a financial supplement to the provision made in the act today for the assistance of house construction whether under part I, of owner-occupied houses, or under part II, of houses constructed for rent. The project that I wish to refer to—and I had no intention of being lengthy about it; as a matter of fact I would have been through before this—

Mr. Knowles: It is now one o'clock.

Mr. Fleming: —began as a rental project and has, in the course of time, been turned into an owner-occupied project as a result of sales made by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to the tenants, the ex-servicemen. I am not going to be long about it and, with respect, I think it is quite in order.

The Chairman: As the hon. member is explaining what he wants to talk about, I understand he is making his point.

Mr. Fleming: Not yet.

The Chairman: I want to assure the hon. member that there is no attempt on my part to curtail the discussion; but if he looks at Beauchesne's third edition, citation 439, he will find the following:

> The object of the resolution recommended by the crown is to give the house a first opportunity to discuss the advisability of making a certain expenditure. The details of the projected measure are not then disclosed and debate is confined to the resolution which should not be lengthy, although care must be taken that the terms used are sufficiently wide to cover the whole of the bill which will be subsequently introduced.

This is a resolution preceding an amending bill, and it stipulates that it is to amend the National Housing Act in certain particulars, namely to increase the appropriation provided by section 7 for loans under part I and the appropriation provided by section 13, and also with respect to grants in aid of slum clearance and to certain other matters deemed necessary for the proper administration of the act.

It is difficult of interpretation. When the hon. member begins to discuss a certain problem, it is difficult for the Chair to know exactly whether it falls within the specific terms of this amending resolution. If the hon. member is of that opinion, I should like to hear what he has to say. I think he has said enough to convince me that perhaps it is relevant. I should like him to know that if, in the past, under a limited resolution of this kind the whole of the National Housing Act has been discussed or if housing problems in Canada have been discussed, it may be that the chairman had been the victim of his generosity and that it is not necessarily to be the course followed on every occasion. The hon. member should not be surprised if, on this occasion, I feel that the rules should be observed. As I said before, the hon. member will have another opportunity to discuss housing when the estimates of the minister come before the committee, and that should be shortly. At this time all we have before us is a resolution to precede not the National Housing Act but a bill to amend the housing act in only certain particulars. I should therefore like the hon. member to observe the rules.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, I was seeking to bring my remarks to a close with respect to the matter I was last discussing, namely, the Merivale road project in Ottawa. I had mentioned that, in keeping with the policy which Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation was following in a good many of these projects, in 1951 they offered these houses for sale to the occupants of them.

Mr. Winters: On a point of order, I am not at all sure that the subject being discussed by the hon. member for Eglinton is covered by the bill which will be introduced as soon as this resolution is disposed of. I am inclined to think it is not within the scope of this resolution. I would therefore make two suggestions: One is that the hon. member defer his remarks on this point until the bill is introduced, at which time he can decide for himself whether or not his subject does fall within the scope of this legislation. Second, there will be, as you mentioned earlier, Mr. Chairman, an opportunity very shortly to discuss this and other matters when the estimates of the Department of Resources and Development are before the house. I wonder whether on that basis the hon. member might defer his discussion on this point until later, to save time.

Mr. Fleming: The last three words that the minister used were: "to save time". May I assure him and you, Mr. Chairman, that I would have concluded this subject a long while ago, before lunch, had it not been for the interruptions. It is not a matter that I intend to discuss at great length. It is my submission that it is relevant to the resolution. The minister does not hold out any hope that it would be relevant to the bill. I cannot therefore accept his invitation to defer my observations on this subject until we reach the bill when he tells me almost in the same breath that he does not think the discussion would be relevant on the bill. I shall be very brief, Mr. Chairman.

A number of the veterans who purchased their houses from the corporation, as I have indicated, about 160 of them, continue to pay rent. On March 30 of this year, while still paying rent, they received a notice from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation which I think is not a model notice to be followed by landlords in such cases. On the contrary, it seems to me to be couched in very harsh terms as applied to these veterans who have obviously been satisfactory tenants. The notice is signed for the corporation by F. J. Melvin, administrator. It is dated March 30, 1953, and reads as follows:

Dear Sir:

We hereby give you notice to quit and deliver up to this corporation on the 30th day of April next, quiet possession of the premises situated at now held by you as our tenant.

We offer to lease to you these same premises at a monthly rental of $ commencing on the first day of May 1953.

Included in your present rental payment for the house you occupy is an amount of $84.84 per annum which is turned over to the municipality as payment in lieu of taxes. In accordance with a request from the corporation of the city of Ottawa, we have now agreed to collect full taxes from the houses remaining unsold in these projects and this necessitates the new rental stated above. This, we think, is only fair since those persons thrifty enough to purchase their homes earlier have of course been liable to full taxes from the date of purchase.

A new lease, at the new rental, will be ready for your signature at our office any time after May 1, 1953.

If the corporation is now under legal obligation to pay the city of Ottawa the full taxes on these properties, and they are no longer covered by the kind of agreement under which first of all Wartime Housing Limited and later Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation were making payments to the municipalities in lieu of taxes and at a rate usually lower than taxes, whatever they may be, and whatever considerations ought to arise out of that, it seems to me that is a very harsh way to proceed. I should like to ask the minister, as the minister responsible for the administration of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, whether instead of taking this harsh course he does not think that this is a matter to be proceeded with on the basis of conference and an attempt to bring together those 160 veteran tenants.

They resent, and quite naturally, the suggestion that they were not thrifty because they did not purchase their homes. I think the minister will agree that is a very invidious sort of comparison to put in a letter of this kind. A notice to vacate or a notice to treat for a new lease or new rent is one thing, but to suggest to the recipients that they have not been thrifty is I think an insult to many of them. As a matter of fact, many of them have not bought because they were not in a position to do so. There is this further fact. I am told that many of them say that they were orally assured by officials of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation at the time when the tenants were invited to purchase their homes that whatever they paid by way of rent would be taken into account in establishing the price in the event of purchase. They are now told that the corporation does not acknowledge that in the case of those who did not buy at that time; that no right arises in their behalf in consequence of having paid rent.

I say to the minister with respect that that is something he should look into and make sure that justice is going to be done to these veterans. Certainly there is no occasion for giving summary notice to a group of worthy veterans, 160 in number, who have obviously been very satisfactory tenants. Therefore if the tax position is changed, if it is costing the corporation more to carry these properties, then that of course must be taken into account, but it is not a justification for treating these veterans harshly and summarily in the tone of this letter.

I bring that matter to the minister's attention and ask him to delay proceedings of this kind and to negotiate with these veterans and find a better way of meeting the problem than is indicated in the way it has been handled heretofore.

In conclusion may I ask the minister for a fuller statement of policy than he gave the house this morning. The house and the country are entitled to know what proposals the government has to make to the house for making more progress in meeting the housing problem than is being made at the present time. Whatever may be said of these amendments—and there will be fuller opportunity to discuss them when the bill is before the house—the house is entitled to some clear statement of policy that will indicate that something more effective is going to be done than is being done at the present time.

Mr. Noseworthy: I make no apologies for speaking at some length on this resolution. Housing is still one of Canada's most baffling social problems. This resolution has been on the order paper since December 5, and I submit that if the government had assigned to it the place and time that its seriousness merits it would have been called earlier. It would not have been hurried through parliament in the last week or two of a parliamentary session. It would have been passed on to a committee where ample opportunity would have been given for the study of this very serious problem.

With the single exception of national defence there is no subject today of any more vital importance to great numbers of Canadian people than is that of housing. Every year since I came to parliament we have had a debate on this subject. In session after session hon. members on this side of the house, as well as hon. members on the other side, have put forward suggestions to the government as to how this problem could best be met. But we have gone on year after year without being any closer to reaching a solution than we were some years ago.

The amendments which will be introduced as a result of the legislation before us may help, in so far as they make more federal funds available. To that extent the measure will help the situation. But I submit that although for years Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has been trying to work with private lending organizations, with real estate boards, with associations of speculative builders and with provincial governments, it has not yet reached any solution to our housing problem. The situation today is as bad as it was at the end of the war.

There are no official figures as to just what the need is; but officials have estimated that today in Canada we need anywhere from 600,000 to 700,000 homes. The 500,000 which have been built since the war have not provided for the new families created in that time. The backlog has increased, and under today's policy nothing is being done to catch up with that backlog.

Housing is something more than just the process of obtaining places in which to live. As I have said, it is a social problem. In a special issue on housing dated December 15, 1952, the Canadian Welfare Council has much to say about the effects of poor housing upon our community life. In part the article states:

> It has become well known from studies made in large and small cities that the rates of juvenile delinquency, disease, retardation and other difficulties at school, serious home accidents and fires, are higher in neighbourhoods of poor and overcrowded housing than in others.

Newark, New Jersey, has made a study, published under the title "Social Effects of Public Housing" in which the following conclusions are reached:

> The disease, accident and juvenile delinquency rates, which could be measured exactly, were better among the re-housed groups than among the control groups. In the things which could not be measured exactly, and in which the re-housed group could not be compared statistically with the control group, the study had to rely on reports from the mothers: The majority of the mothers said their children had improved in their school work, were easier to keep clean, had better places to play; that their families were happier, and had been able to save money or purchase equipment for their homes. One hundred per cent reported no fires or serious home accidents.

That report goes on to look at the other side of the picture, housing as a social problem.

> What is the other side of the picture? When housing is poor, health suffers, there is friction among members of families; budgets are thrown out of gear, families are often separated, social agencies find that they are frustrated in their efforts to help, children cannot play properly, new Canadians get fed up, and the costs of health and welfare services are too high.

And then are set out page after page of details from investigations held in Montreal, Hamilton, Toronto, Halifax and other Canadian cities, pointing out the disastrous effect upon society of bad housing conditions.

I believe the trouble with our housing policy under this government is that the government has placed the cart before the horse. In its anxiety to bolster private enterprise the government has placed the interests of lending institutions before the interests of the community at large. As a result we are not getting housing at a price that the majority of Canadians can afford, either to purchase or to rent. We must recognize that housing is a social problem, and that the provision of government assistance in housing for people who cannot afford either to buy or to rent accommodation is no more socialistic than the provision of hospitals, schools and pure water on a community basis.

I think we must change our entire point of view in connection with this whole business of government assistance in housing. This is not a field that should be left free for private enterprise to exploit. It is of far too great importance in the life of the community to be left to exploitation for profit by private enterprise. It is one field in which the government is justified in giving a public service through the provision of homes at prices people can afford to pay.

The social cost involved in government subsidies for low-rental housing, or the cost which would be involved in a government policy which would make loans at a much lower rate of interest than offered by the private lending companies, would be more than offset by the savings that would be effected in other services communities are called upon to give, by reason of the fact that there are poor and overcrowded housing conditions.

Let us look at the results of the government's housing policy to date, so that we may realize just how far short of providing a solution this resolution falls. Since 1950 there has been a decline in the actual number of houses being built. I submit that a successful government policy, a realistic policy designed to meet the needs of the people instead of the interests of the lending institutions, would be a policy that year after year would bring about an increase in the number of houses being built.

The second indisputable fact is that the backlog of housing which existed at the end of the war has increased. We have not been able to close the gap between the need which existed at the end of the war and the supply. As a matter of fact, we have not been able to provide enough houses to house the new families of Canada.

The third fact that must be recognized is that as a result of the present government policy the cost of houses today places them beyond the means of most Canadian people. We have it on the authority of Mr. Mansur that only those with incomes of $3,500 a year or more can avail themselves of the benefits offered under the National Housing Act, that only those with incomes of $3,500 and more have sufficient income to meet the carrying charges on some of the cheapest houses, those costing in the neighbourhood of $10,000 which is the cheapest house being built under the National Housing Act.

The fourth fact which I think we must recognize is that there is a desperate shortage of rental housing. Mr. Mansur again tells us that $85 per month is the lowest economic rent that can be charged for a 4-roomed fully serviced dwelling house. Eighty-five dollars a month is just more than the average workingman can afford to pay today. Any housing policy that is designed to meet the needs of the people of this country will make some provision for rental housing because we are told on good authority that at least one-third of the people of Canada cannot buy or expect to pay for homes.

I know that section 35 of the housing act provides for rental projects being undertaken in co-operation with the provincial and municipal governments, but for some reason these projects are not making very much headway. They are not meeting the needs of the people. They are not meeting the situation. The government says that the initiative must be taken by the local municipality. Surely there is a place here for more dynamic leadership on the part of the federal housing authorities. Surely there is room here for the federal housing authority taking steps to encourage municipalities to get into this field in co-operation with the provincial and federal governments so that low rental housing may be provided.

Next, we have not as yet had any comprehensive planning on a community basis. What work the government's housing authority has done has been on a piecemeal basis. It has been project by project, street by street, and a bit here and there to relieve the direct conditions. There has not yet been evolved by the government or the housing authority any comprehensive housing plan on a community basis to meet this problem.

There is another aspect of this matter which is sometimes lost sight of. Over the last few years tens of thousands of Canadians have bought homes and assumed mortgages. Should we have a business recession, should there come some unemployment or reduction in wages, these people will lose the homes they have acquired and into which they have put their savings, just as surely as they lost them by the thousand in the early thirties.

This is not an impossible situation. Only a few days ago when the first news of a possible peace came there was a slump on the New York stock exchange which indicated how sensitive modern business is to present conditions. As a matter of fact there are those who wonder whether we can afford peace and maintain prosperity under our present economic system. People by the thousand have assumed mortgages over the past few years on houses costing $10,000, $11,000 and $12,000 which they will be able to hold only so long as we maintain prosperity, full employment and high wage levels.

I submit that the present situation with regard to housing is all the positive proof that is required that some radical changes in the government's policy with regard to housing is necessary. The present policy, whereby the federal government agency, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, enters into contracts with private lending institutions to make loans available to builders, has not proved to be a workable solution to our housing problem. That approach to the problem may be good for the lending institution but it is not getting homes built at prices at which most Canadians can afford to buy or rent. I submit that the supreme test of any housing policy is not its financial benefits to the private lending institutions, it is whether or not it gets houses built at prices at which people can afford to buy or rent. Judged by that standard the government's policy in connection with housing since the war has failed, and failed miserably.

Interest rates on loans are one of the most important factors in carrying charges on homes. We hear a great deal about the increased cost of labour, the increased cost of materials and so on, but we hear little about interest charges. Mr. Nathan Strauss in "Seven Myths of Housing" tells us that a reduction in financial charges, interest and amortization by one-half would effect a greater reduction in annual cost than cutting in half the cost of both material and labour. The reduction by one-half of interest and amortization charges would reduce the overall cost of a house more than it would be reduced by a one-half reduction in the cost of both material and labour.

Catherine Baur, another housing authority, tells us in the International Labour Review of July, 1945, and she gives a statistical table to support her statement, that a reduction of 2 per cent in interest rates will mean a bigger saving in the total cost than a 20 per cent reduction in the cost of the structure itself. In my opinion it is not reasonable to expect the private lending institutions to lend their money for housing projects at interest rates which would bring the cost of these houses within the reach of those who need them. I submit that is the function of government. The private loan companies exist for the express purpose of making a fair return on their investment for the benefit of their shareholders. There is no one criticizing them for doing that. It is not their function to provide a social service to the community. I submit that is the function of government.

Another drawback to the government's policy on housing, in addition to the high interest rate which is required by reason of the government's policy, is the burden which is thrown on the municipalities. Mr. Mansur has told us that one of the great drawbacks is the lack of serviced lands. The municipalities are loath to provide serviced land, to provide school facilities and so on for the new communities where large housing projects are undertaken. It has been estimated that, under such circumstances, a municipality is called upon to be responsible for about $2,000 per home through the provision of serviced land, various other services, school accommodation, and so on. Today, the municipalities are loath to undertake that responsibility. That is one aspect of the housing problem which this government's policy fails to meet entirely.

In order to help the drastic housing problem, I want to place on the record a few suggestions advocated by the C.C.F., suggestions that have been approved by our national organization and which may be considered as official C.C.F. policy on the matter of housing. I shall outline these briefly and comment on them later. In our opinion a policy that is to meet the needs of the Canadian people regarding housing must, first of all, provide a reduction in interest rates to 2 per cent by having Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation solely responsible for the issuing of these loans. We recommend that the federal government should set up a special fund for this purpose, and that money from this fund should be available not only in the industrial centres in which lending institutions now lend money, but in the small communities and farming districts where private lending institutions will not lend money at all for these purposes.

Secondly, we suggest that there be an increase in loans from 80 per cent to 90 per cent of the lending value of the housing project. Third, we recommend an increase in the amortization period. Most of the current loans now run for twenty years. There have been some forward steps taken recently whereby the period has been increased to twenty-five years. We recognize that good housing authorities now maintain that that amortization period should be extended to thirty or thirty-five years in the case of houses of brick or similar construction.

The fourth suggestion is the inauguration of rental subsidy funds on condition that only municipalities or public housing authorities should receive the subsidy. Such a subsidy would be granted on condition that the municipality or recipient would comply with the requirements of a comprehensive housing program. This subsidy would permit a sharp reduction in the present high rents so that the low income dwellers, who cannot afford to build homes under even the most favourable conditions, would benefit. The fifth point we suggest is that the federal government make grants to the provinces to be turned over to the municipalities for the construction of schools and other public facilities which are presently a heavy expense charged to the municipality when a new housing site comes into being. On this point I am in complete agreement with the hon. member for Eglinton when he suggests there should be a conference of federal, provincial and municipal authorities in an effort to work out some plan whereby the federal government will come to the assistance of municipalities in meeting the cost of school construction and the provision of other facilities.

We submit that housing is of sufficient national importance to warrant the federal government taking some action in this connection. Finally, we submit that there should be an increase in the number of scholarships provided under the National Housing Act to train a larger number of badly needed administrators in the housing field. We commend what is being done already in that field. I understand that somewhere between nine and ten scholarships are granted annually. Our suggestion is that the number of scholarships should be increased and that more housing administrators should be trained.

We put forth these suggestions on the premise, as I said before, that housing is a social problem. It is not just an economic problem, but it is a social problem of great national importance. It is not simply a matter of finding a place in which people may live. It is a matter which will have a direct bearing upon the lives and upon the happiness of our Canadian people.

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, this is not the first occasion upon which I have had the privilege of speaking about housing. I do not think there is a question which is of greater interest to the Canadian people than housing, because nothing gives greater dissatisfaction to the people across this country than living in poor housing accommodation.

On many occasions, Mr. Chairman, I have condemned the type of housing which the government has built in the past. That goes back from the very inception of the national building program. After the war when we started to build wartime houses some of the most terrible structures were built in the name of houses. We come to the veterans' housing, V.L.A., and that too, a government-sponsored affair, was a disgrace across the country. I know that it did provide some shelter for the returned men but I said at the time that it would not be long before that kind of house would be a disgrace to the community in which it was built. Even now you can go through the city of Ottawa, the city of Winnipeg, the city of Calgary or any other large city and you can pick out those V.L.A. houses as far as you can see them. People are somewhat reluctant to buy property in the vicinity of V.L.A. houses because they are eyesores in the community in which they are built.

Mr. Prudham: They are all right in Edmonton.

Mr. Johnston: Well, perhaps you had something to do with building them, I do not know—and I do not know whether contracts for them were let out to tender—and that is just a passing reference.

Mr. Cruickshank: Where are these houses?

Mr. Johnston: I am serious, Mr. Chairman; they are not a good thing for the communities in which they were built. They do serve a purpose, which is shelter, but surely in this day and age we can build more than shelter for our people.

Mr. Cruickshank: We are mighty proud of them.

Mr. Johnston: It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that our attention is being centred too greatly on apartments and rooming houses and such like rather than having the main emphasis put upon private homes. I am not overlooking the necessity for having low-rental projects, I think they are necessary; but it seems to me that the greatest effort should be put upon building homes for families. It is not a good thing in my judgment to have a number of families housed in a rooming house project. That is not conducive to the good bringing up of children. There is no adequate place for the children to play and the grounds are not adequate for beautification of the structure after it is built. I think that one of our big mistakes is that we are not paying sufficient attention to home structure for the single family unit.

Again, Mr. Chairman, the housing programs which we are undertaking now are not doing the job they were intended to do. We are not building homes for the people who need them. It is senseless to say that you have to have a Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation set-up costing over $80 million a year, and that you have got to have a lending institution to lend money to a man who is drawing $15,000 or $20,000 a year. He can look after his own problems and so can the fellow who is getting $7,000 or $8,000 a year. The people we are concerned with are those who are not in a financial position to have available that kind of money. The minister himself realizes this, for when he was speaking not long ago at the banquet of the Appraisal Institute of Canada, as reported in the Ottawa Citizen of Thursday, April 2, 1953, he had this to say —and I wholly agree with him though I am amazed that he is not doing anything about it. It is headed, "Low Rent Aid":

> Mr. Winters said that not more than one-third of Canada's families could afford new houses—

I heartily endorse that.

> —either to rent or to own. In the past, this had been overcome by families living in houses that were second, third, fourth or even fifth hand.
> But if enough new houses weren't found, he stated, it would affect the people at the bottom of the scale—the people who were living in dilapidated and obsolescent housing.

I would not dispute that for a moment. I think it is exactly the case, and those are the people whom the National Housing Act is supposed to be assisting.

What are we doing about it? Not a thing. We cannot use the excuse that there is a shortage of material because all of the builders' organizations in the country, and the department too, have stated on many occasions that there is ample building material in the form of lumber, plumbing equipment and so on. In days gone by, there might have been the excuse of shortage of materials but that condition does not exist today.

I have here a clipping from the Ottawa Citizen of Monday, February 16, 1953, headed: "The Government's Modest Housing Target".

With labour and materials again in good supply, it has become physically possible to start building more homes than at any time since the start of the Korean war. Yet the government's program does not seem over-ambitious. Speaking in Winnipeg, Mr. Winters, the resources minister, said merely that 1953 construction might reach the "high" levels of pre-Korea years. In 1950, 92,000 dwelling units were built. This construction about kept pace with new demand, but did little to reduce the backlog. Since then, home building has fallen. In 1951, only 68,000 new units were started. Last year, the figure was 76,000. Yet the need is greater than ever, for family formation and immigration have continued at a high rate.

So once again the minister says that we are not doing the job as it should be done.

In speaking of materials and how we are keeping our program up with the times the National Housebuilders Association in a circular dated February 25, 1953, gives "Facts and figures for your use in the debate on housing".

House production is dropping. Despite an upward trend in the last half of 1952, production for the year was only 75,000 units, 10,000 less than in 1951 and 17,000 less than in 1950.

Those are dominion bureau of statistics figures.

Our backlog of unbuilt housing is growing. The total is now 490,000 units made up as follows:

Backlog, 1944 (Curtis report):	320,000
Excess, net families formed over houses built, 1944-52 (DBS):	50,000
Allowance for obsolescent houses not replaced, 1944-52 (Curtis report):	120,000

That certainly does not indicate that we are making any progress in this housing field. The minister has pointed out on many occasions, as have others, why the condition exists. There are apparently some obstacles in the way of home building but certainly labour is not one of them, because I remember seeing a report put out not so long ago by the contractors organization where there were something like 40,000 or 50,000 unemployed carpenters looking for jobs. One of the obstacles that have been brought forward is the lack of serviced land which is said to be holding back our building program. I do not think that should be a serious problem, but I will discuss it later on. The second obstacle to home building is the down payment; and the third is the shortage of mortgage money.

Let me speak about the serviced land for a moment and see whether that should offer such a great obstacle to our house building program if it is properly conducted. Here is what was done in the province of Alberta; and you will excuse me if I keep referring to the province of Alberta because it is one of the most outstanding provinces. When you are talking about progress you just cannot help referring to it. It was in 1950 that the province of Alberta started what they called a program of self-liquidating projects. Under that program of self-liquidating projects they included such things as water systems for municipalities, electrical supply for municipalities, construction in part of schools and so on. They set up a $5 million revolving fund and they lent that money to the municipalities at 2 per cent. As far as my figures go, up to the present time of that money $460,000 has been paid back and they have not lost a penny of it yet. The fund was established in 1950 and since that time $17 million has been placed in it.

I do not see what better security you could have, under the heading of a self-liquidating project, than a man's home. If a man gets into fairly tough straits, he will even sell his car in order to keep his house intact. He will cut down his standard of living to make his monthly payments on his home. It forms the very basis of security. This year, in 1953, the province of Alberta has budgeted for a little bit over $174 million. Out of that amount there has been set up an additional fund of $25 million to further assist the municipalities. I have heard some talk here this afternoon about the municipalities being overburdened. I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that they are overburdened; but I also suggest that the province of Alberta is assisting the municipalities in developing self-liquidating projects at an extremely low rate of interest.

An hon. Member: They have oil.

Mr. Johnston: Oil is not the main factor at all. In 1951—and my mind goes back to those figures because they are given by the dominion bureau of statistics—if I remember correctly our total income on oil that year was $121 million. That did not begin to equal the revenue which was obtained from cattle and hogs in the province of Alberta. It is true that oil has been of assistance to us, but it has not been the main factor of our prosperity by any manner of means. Agriculture is by far the leading and basic industry of western Canada and it is the backbone of Canada as well. Let nobody say, "Oh well, it is because you have oil out in Alberta." Certainly oil has helped us, but our plans were laid a long time before oil began to be produced in any large amount.

I think if the provinces were to assist the municipalities, as I have indicated, by setting up a revolving fund for self-liquidating projects such as sewers, light, roads, schools, streets and water, it would go a long way towards solving that problem of servicing land.

Mr. Prudham: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Johnston: Yes.

Mr. Prudham: Is that revolving fund still in operation in Alberta?

Mr. Johnston: As far as I know, yes; and they have increased it to $25 million now. That was according to the 1953 program. But the $25 million was an additional aid to the municipalities. If my memory serves me correctly, I think the rate of interest was 2½ per cent on that $25 million but 2 per cent on the $5 million. I suggest that the federal government should take a lesson from that example.

Mr. Cruickshank: God help us.

Mr. Johnston: I beg the hon. member's pardon?

Mr. Brooks: He said "God help us".

Mr. Johnston: My hon. friend was looking for divine aid? Maybe a little bit of it would do them good.

The next obstacle to housing that I mentioned a moment ago was the down payment. That was the big trouble according to the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters) when he was speaking to this Appraisal Institute of Canada on April 2. The problem that was in his mind was the fact that we are not doing anything to assist these people who are in the low income brackets, and well it might be, because there is where the difficulty lies. But I do not think as yet he has solved that problem. He might say to me that there are instances where the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is lending money at a cheaper rate in some localities; and I think over there in Hull was one of them, if my memory serves me correctly. But under the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation loans are guaranteed up to 80 per cent of the lending value. That does not mean for a moment that they are financing the construction of that house.

The big question that comes in there is the lending value. For instance, a house might cost $15,000 but the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation does not value that house at $15,000. They might say that the lending value of that house is only $10,000; and I think that in 90 per cent of the cases that is exactly what they do, because they are making themselves doubly sure when they set the appraisal value of that house. Then they lend up to 80 per cent of that value. Then the lending institutions come along and charge 5¼ per cent, for interest on the loans which they make. How can people who are so poor that they cannot afford the down payment on a house pay 5¼ per cent interest on a loan? It just cannot be done, and the obvious truth is that they are not doing it. Therefore they are not getting homes. The minister can go out to these institutes and preach all he likes, and he can say, "There is where our trouble lies"; but what is he doing about it?

I well recall, Mr. Chairman, just after the war or in the last part of the war, what took place when there was no place for the mortgage companies to lend their money; the farmers were getting out of debt and so were the others. The government came to their aid and put up to them this housing proposition whereby they could lend their money out at a good rate of interest. Then just as soon as other fields become more attractive they cease lending for home building and put their money out on those other projects. I do not think it should be the purpose of a national housing plan to assist financial corporations. If we are going out to build houses, let us build houses and not go into the financial field.

Under N.H.A. a house may cost $11,600. The maximum loan on that house, under the present set-up, would be about $7,906 and the down payment would be $3,154. According to the bureau of statistics, about 75 per cent of the people of Canada earn less than $3,000 a year. Just where is the ordinary man going to get a down payment of $3,154 on a $11,000 home? When he does not even earn that amount in the full year, where is he going to get the money? For us to stand up here and say that this class of society can build homes is just nonsense, when they do not earn that amount for a full year's work.

According to the dominion bureau of statistics, 1951 census report, about 75 per cent of 2 million families earn less than $3,000 a year. Nineteen per cent of these earned between $2,500 and $3,000; 25 per cent between $2,000 and $2,500; and 22½ per cent between $1,000 and $2,000 and 7 per cent of these earned less than $1,000. The number in the last group consists of about 132,000 families. When you find people with incomes within these brackets you ask yourself, just how are they going to get a down-payment of $3,150 to build a house? So far as I know, any plans the government has will not meet that problem.

The next obstacle I mentioned was the shortage of mortgage money. Last year we used about $175 million. This year it is expected we shall use about $225 million.

When it comes to these mortgage companies lending money we find that they are not taking much risk. In the first place, their appraisal value is down below the actual value of the house. In the next place, the government guarantees them 25 per cent loss. What have they got to lose? But yet, according to the public accounts of this year, the government lost $686,837.04. That is quite a loss and it came about because of their guarantee. That information may be found on page 34 of the public accounts.

What is going to happen because the lending companies have refused to lend this money? Somebody suggested that they were on strike. That was a very good term to use, but the minister objected to it; therefore I will not press the point. The fact is they are not lending the amount of money that they did before, and they are beginning to tighten up still further.

If that is the only source of money, and they refuse to lend it, how are you going to build these houses for the people in the low income brackets to whom the Minister of Resources and Development referred a while ago?

I suppose it would not be right to criticize the government, the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation or the lending companies if I did not have something to suggest. It is common practice in this house to criticize the government and then not offer some solution to the problem. I have some suggestions. I would suggest first that you get rid of that white elephant, the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. It has been riding on the backs of the already overburdened taxpayers long enough. It may have had a purpose in days gone by, but I think that purpose has been served, and we could get on very well without it. One of the main purposes of Central Mortgage and Housing was to see that the building standards laid down under the National Housing Act were followed out. That has never been done in the majority of cases.

I can recall when these projects first started. Wherever you found difficulty it was in the lack of proper inspection. Mind you, Central Mortgage and Housing never did take the attitude, so far as I know, and certainly the officials to whom I have been speaking never interpreted their duties in that way, that they were to supply inspectors and see that the house was built according to the plans and specifications. What they were to do was to see that the house was built to their satisfaction. They thought that was all that was necessary. When I pointed out on many occasions that inferior cement, material and workmanship were employed in a house, Central Mortgage and Housing authorities said: "Well, it is to our satisfaction."

The hon. member for Red Deer spoke of a project in Namao, Alberta, the other day. The difficulty arose there where Central Mortgage and Housing was supervising. The inspection was poor. I have said on many occasions—and I have said this to the minister—I do not think the federal government can supervise building construction all over Canada. It is just too big a job. Experience has proven that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is unable to do the job as far as proper building inspection is concerned.

I am told—I do not know how true it is—they have even fired some of the good inspectors.

An hon. Member: They were too honest.

Mr. Johnston: I am not going to argue that point.

Mr. Hansell: They did their work too well.

Mr. Johnston: I did talk to an inspector who passed a house for the government. The plans called for No. 1 flooring. The floor was covered with paper, and it was a poor No. 2 flooring. He passed that house for the government. I said to him: "Did you not see the floor?" He said: "It was covered with paper."

An hon. Member: They paid for No. 1.

Mr. Johnston: Yes. That fellow was never fired. He should have been booted off the job. An old trick like that has whiskers on it. It is an old trick to have a floor covered with paper, have the government inspector come in, walk over the paper and pass the house. That was not an isolated case at all. There has never been proper inspection in the many cases that I can recall. I am going to suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that we get rid of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and in its place set up another type of organization. I recall that not long ago—

The Chairman: I have been searching the records long enough now to have accumulated some evidence on what has really happened in the past in the discussion of the resolution amending the National Housing Act. Before one o'clock, while the hon. member for Eglinton was speaking, a lot of argument took place on the latitude which had been allowed in the past on a resolution of this kind. Therefore I did not see fit to stop any other hon. member until I could ascertain for myself what had been the practice. I have had all the Hansards since 1949 brought in to me and I have looked them all up to see what the procedure had been in the past on the resolutions preceding an amending bill of the National Housing Act. I find that a discussion wide in scope covering the whole of the national housing problem in Canada took place only when the minister himself chose to make general observations as to the problem before he commented specifically on the measure which was to follow the resolution. I find, too, that in committee I had to intervene and ask the hon. member for Eglinton to confine his remarks to the subject matter of the resolution. Of course at that time debate was permitted on the motion for Mr. Speaker to leave the chair to go into committee of the whole on the resolution.

In the second year the bill was introduced in the Senate. It was not a money bill, and therefore when it came here it received first reading, and there was hardly any debate at all. The minister just made an explanatory statement. There was not much debate on second reading either, and a few observations on third reading. Therefore I think it would be quite proper for us now to agree to limit our observations to the resolution before the committee.

In this connection I would refer hon. members to page 1767 of Hansard for November 15, 1949, where the minister, moving second reading of Bill 142 of that session, said:

> Before commenting upon the proposed legislation I should like to make some general remarks, including a few references to what has been achieved in the field of housing by the aggregate efforts of all who have concerned themselves with this important activity.

At that moment, although we had before us only an amending bill, because the minister chose to make a general statement on the problems of housing in Canada, we had a general debate. But, later on in committee, that debate was restricted to the terms of the resolution itself. My words on that occasion were to the following effect, that, as the resolution before the committee dealt with amendments to the National Housing Act, I must ask the hon. member who was then speaking to confine himself to that resolution.

In other words, these records show that in the committee on the resolution, so far as possible the debate was confined to the subject matter of the resolution. But when Mr. Speaker was in the chair, on the motion that he leave the chair, the debate had been general in scope because the minister had made a general statement.

Mr. Johnston: I understood the objection taken when the hon. member for Eglinton was speaking was that he was referring to a specific case. I have not been referring to specific cases at all. The resolution under discussion is that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the National Housing Act, 1944. That is the language about which I am arguing.

[The Chairman.]

The Chairman: The hon. member will have to add that it is to amend the National Housing Act, 1944, in certain particulars. I stopped the hon. member for Eglinton this morning when he was referring to the cost of the building which now shelters the National Housing Act administration and, secondly, when he referred to a certain project now undertaken by a lending institution and, I think, guaranteed by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

I stopped him in those two instances. Since that time I have been checking the record to ascertain whether or not in committee on these resolutions debate of the whole national housing problem has taken place. I find to my satisfaction that that has not been the case.

One opportunity for debate is now eliminated because of Mr. Speaker's ruling of recent date which states that on the motion for Mr. Speaker to leave the chair there shall be no debate. Therefore in committee we must follow the procedure which has been followed in the past, at least since 1949, and that is that discussion must be strictly relevant to the resolution, and the proposed amendments contemplated by the resolution and the bill to follow.

Mr. Graydon: Mr. Chairman, perhaps there may be cases when the ruling you have just made would be applicable, and would prove the point you have now attempted to make. It seems to me, however, that this resolution is in an entirely different position from most of those to which you have been referring, because as I see it this one does allow for a general discussion, and for the simple reason that in this resolution we are dealing with an increase in the appropriation in respect of loans provided by section 7 of the act, such increase to be from $300 million to $500 million. Then, in addition to that, there is provision whereby under part II there shall be an increase from $150 million to $250 million.

I suggest that when the minister introduces these increases in the appropriation, at the same time he opens the way for debate on matters which would be covered by that increase. It seems to me this opens the subject matter pretty wide, and I suggest that the chairman ought to be very careful in not trying to restrict discussion, in view of the fact that these appropriations are being made for those very things hon. members have been discussing.

The Chairman: I do not wish to prolong discussion on a matter of procedure. I fully realize that if we do not have the co-operation of hon. members—in other words, if hon. members have made up their minds that they are going to make general speeches in respect to housing on this resolution—I do not see how I can stop them. I am free to confess that; because in debating a similar resolution in the past I have known occasions where, for instance, certain hon. members have argued that unless they were given a statement of policy in the matter of rent control they were not prepared to proceed with a debate amending the National Housing Act.

Any number of arguments can be made. If hon. members wish to discuss national housing problems generally on this resolution, then I do not think I can stop them, because we will just keep on arguing every time an hon. member rises. We will hear the argument that what he has to say is relevant, and that it has to do with what takes place under the National Housing Act. But I would ask hon. members to remember this, that so far as the performance of my duties here is concerned, I am tied by two directives, the first of which is found in that standing order which says that discussions in committee of the whole shall be strictly relevant to the resolution under debate. The second is the citation from Beauchesne's third edition, to which I referred this morning, and which says that the resolution in committee is merely indicative of what the bill is going to be, and that at this stage we are merely deciding as to the advisability of making certain expenditures.

Confined within those limits, all I can do is to ask the co-operation of hon. members. If they feel they should discuss cases concerning contractors who have not built properly, or if they feel they should discuss the building of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation on the Montreal road, or if they wish to cover the whole field covered by the National Housing Act, all I can say is that I will hold in my mind the view that they are going far afield from the amendments suggested in this resolution.

Having said that, I shall ask hon. members to carry on the debate, having in mind that they should restrict rather than increase the latitude of discussion.

Mr. Johnston: I shall try to keep within your ruling; I always do. Indeed, I thought I was doing exceptionally well, and that I was staying within your ruling by not referring to any special cases. I had plenty of them in mind, I may say.

One of the things the Prime Minister indicated some time ago was that he did not think the federal government should become landlords for the people of Canada. I agree with him wholeheartedly. But I think we are rapidly approaching the position where we are going to be landlords, unless some changes are made.

I suggest there is a way out of that difficulty. My first suggestion would be to get rid of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. If they have performed a duty in the past, then that duty has been fulfilled, and we should pension them off, or take whatever procedure would seem to be best fitted to the process of getting rid of them.

The second thing I think should be done is that the government should set up a revolving fund of, let us say, $500 million—and I am not saying what the exact amount should be—and that these sums of money should be lent to the municipalities at a rate of interest not exceeding 2 per cent. I mentioned a moment ago that Alberta had had outstanding good luck in the repayment of money to the revolving fund they had set up. Something like $460,000 had been paid back, and up to date they have not lost a cent.

Mr. Winters: Does the hon. member know what the Alberta government has done by way of restricting their legislation this year in that field?

Mr. Johnston: As I indicated a moment ago, the only information I have is from a report of the budget speech by the premier of Alberta. It seems to me that he has gone even farther than that. I should like to quote from the Ottawa Citizen of March 7, 1953, where they give an account of Mr. Manning's budget speech, which reads in part:

> He also had good news for those municipalities finding it hard to keep their services in step with their growing population. He gave details of a plan for a $25 million revolving fund, part of a broader scheme to share Alberta's increasing revenues with the municipalities.

That is in addition to the $17 million I was speaking of a while ago in connection with which they had already received back $460,000 from the self liquidating projects. If a province like Alberta can put aside $25 million from their budget to provide a revolving fund to assist the municipalities in these self-liquidating projects, the federal government could set up a revolving fund of, say, $500 million to be loaned to the municipalities, through the provinces of course. I recognize immediately that there has to be some control over this money and the proper control would be through the province to the municipality.

It seems to me that that would immediately relieve the federal government of the burden of having to supervise the construction of these houses. That would then become the responsibility of the municipality. That would mean that municipalities—I am thinking particularly of Calgary—would not permit the type of construction that has been allowed under the National Housing Act. I think the best thing that could happen would be to have the responsibility of seeing that these houses are properly constructed according to the plans and specifications, laid down by the federal government if you like in conjunction with the provincial governments, placed on the municipalities. The onus would be taken off the back of the Minister of Resources and Development, and I imagine that he would like to get rid of that responsibility.

On the other hand, the municipalities could set up construction committees. There is not a municipality in Canada where competent contractors and builders could not be found. Competent construction committees could be set up and would be right on the job to see that the plans and specifications were carried out in the interests of the person who was going to buy the house. You would then not have the outrageous examples we have had of poor inspection. Certainly under a system like that the government could not possibly lose more than they lost last year, when according to the public accounts they lost $686,000. Alberta lost nothing with their revolving fund. I do not think we would lose any money at all, and the responsibility would be on the municipality, where it should be, to see that the construction was carried out according to the plans and specifications.

That brings up the problem mentioned by the minister when he was speaking to the Appraisal Institute of Canada. How are you going to make it possible for people with small incomes to get houses? As I said a moment ago, the home is the best security you could have for money. The down payment could be made as low as $500 and there would still be sufficient equity in the house to cover what was owing on it at any time. Then a small monthly payment could be set to take care of the upkeep and deterioration of the property, unless the government was intending to go into a money-making scheme, and I do not think that is its intention.

I have just been handed a clipping from the Edmonton Journal of March 3, 1953, which states that last year the city of Edmonton received a loan of $1 million from the fund. In the three years the fund has been in existence Edmonton has borrowed $3,900,000. That answers the question the minister asked a minute ago. It would appear that the fund is being continued.

Let me get back to the other point. I think the monthly payment could be made quite small, possibly no more than $25, $30 or $35 for low-priced houses. That is only an estimate. The amount would have to be figured out over a period of years. That would meet the difficulty we have been running up against over the past few years. It would certainly meet the difficulties mentioned by some of the speakers this afternoon. It would give definite relief to the municipalities; it would increase home building by the lower income groups, which is what we all greatly desire; it would result in the building of better homes; there would be a smaller loss by the federal government; we would get away from the tremendous cost of keeping up Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation; the federal government would get rid of a terrific headache and the people would get better homes. It seems to me that it would be a better plan all the way through.

I do not suppose the federal government will pay any attention to this. I may be entirely wrong in what I have said, but at least the government cannot say that we have not offered some alternative. This is not something that has been tried and has failed. Quite the contrary, this revolving fund idea has been found to be of the greatest success. As I suggested, the home is the last thing that a man will let out of his grasp if he can possibly hang on. It is one of the first things that we should see the Canadian people have. I believe that with a proper organization to carry this out we would have much greater success in our national housing program.

Mr. Winters: I would like to deal with one or two of the points raised by the hon. member for Bow River. I think there are misunderstandings which led to several statements he made. The amount of the loan under the joint loan technique is no longer related to the lending value; rather it is related to the agreed sales price. That was one of the points upon which the hon. member based an argument.

Mr. Johnston: Is that the present sales price? If so there still is no difference.

Mr. Winters: The agreed sales price at the present time, yes. Builders in Alberta and elsewhere are building and selling houses at prices lower than the agreed sales price, the agreed sales price being the figure agreed upon in the first instance by the builder and Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, jointly with the lending institution, before there is qualification for the 80 per cent loan.

There are some areas in Canada where difficulty is being experienced with the agreed sales price, but with most builders and in most areas in Canada the technique is working satisfactorily and it has proved to be a good weapon in the fight against inflation.

The hon. member dealt today, as he has on many occasions—I am always glad to receive his criticism—with the inspection of houses, and he related his remarks to the standards under the National Housing Act and said they were too low.

Mr. Johnston: I did not say they were too low; the point was that they were not being lived up to, no matter what they were. I think the standards set by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the National Housing Act are fairly good provided they are lived up to.

Mr. Winters: I am glad the hon. member has cleared up that point, because most of the criticism we hear is that we are requiring people to build to too high a standard rather than too low a standard. Regarding inspections under the joint loan technique it is for the lending institution to satisfy itself that the mortgage value is there in respect of the money it is lending.

Mr. Johnston: Where does Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation come in? I quite understand that it is for the lending institution to satisfy itself that the value is there, but where does the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation inspection come in?

Mr. Winters: Under the joint loan technique, inspections are made by the lending institution. Central Mortgage, of course, are concerned to the extent that they put up 25 per cent of the mortgage money. They inspect in order to see that their participation in that mortgage money is protected, but it is not their responsibility to make an architectural or construction inspection. Under that arrangement, such is the responsibility of the owner of the house.

Mr. Johnston: I do not like to keep interrupting the minister all the time, but I should like to get this point cleared up. Whose responsibility is it, then, to see that the houses are build according to the plans and specifications set out under the N.H.A.?

Mr. Winters: It is the responsibility of the home owner to ensure that he is getting what he has bought from the builder. We have discussed this point on many occasions in this house.

Mr. Johnston: The owner has no say.

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member then dealt with aid to municipalities. I do agree with him that this is a very important matter if we are to have a large program of house building in this country. It was for that reason that we put section 35 on the statute books. We did that only after talking to all provincial governments. The hon. member holds up Alberta as the criterion and says we should take a lesson from that province. Well, Mr. Chairman, the last thing I would want to do is be critical of any provincial government. I would say, however, that if we took a lesson from Alberta in the field of housing, I think there would be many people in Canada who would not be too happy about the housing policy.

Mr. Johnston: I did not suggest you take a lesson from my province in the matter of building houses, because that has not been their function. It has been the function of the federal government to do that. What I did point out was the experience Alberta had in regard to this revolving fund for self-liquidating projects.

Mr. Winters: Obviously the hon. member is under a considerable number of misapprehensions, and this is another one of them. I do not think we should get into a debate on the matter at this particular time. I would be glad to deal more specifically with this point on my estimates, which should be under consideration very soon.

It is not the responsibility of the federal government to build houses. Under the British North America Act housing is the responsibility of provincial governments, because it is a matter of property and civil rights. The basic policy of the federal government is to enable people to build houses by making available the proper economic climate, and by doing what it can within its own sphere of influence to make credit available.

Now, the Alberta government has a revolving fund. One of the techniques the federal government has at its disposal is co-operation with the provincial governments, and we do that under section 35. As I understand it the Alberta legislation was amended this year to discontinue having money from that revolving fund flow into municipal works through section 35. If a municipality wishes to benefit by the co-operative plan under section 35 it must now go into the open market to get its money. The Alberta revolving fund is no longer available. I do not wish to be critical of the government on that point. They probably did that because they felt it was in the best interests of the people they served. I merely cite that as a matter of fact.

The hon. member is critical of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. I am not denying him that right to be critical. The Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation was set up to serve the interests of the people of Canada, and to the extent it is doing that I think the people of Canada will approve. So far, it is a fact that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has put some $343 million into the financial stream to assist housing in this country. I am satisfied in my own mind that this amount would not have gone into housing had there not been a Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

I think all hon. members know that under the joint loan technique, which is the major operation under the National Housing Act, the basic loan is 80 per cent of the agreed sales price and the amortization period can run to 30 years. The lending institutions, if they were operating alone, would make a loan of 60 per cent as the maximum; that is, there would be a down payment of 40 per cent required. The amortization period would be of the order of ten years. The interest rate instead of being 5¼ per cent as it is now, because federal money goes into that partnership arrangement on a 3¾ per cent interest rate, I am satisfied would be at least 6 per cent. The lending institutions put their money in now at 5¾ per cent on an 80 per cent basis because the pool guarantee is there for their protection. If there were no pool guarantee and each loan were made on what is called the conventional basis, I am satisfied the interest rate would be a minimum of 6 per cent as I have said.

Through the government's operations under Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, and in addition to this vast amount of money that has flowed into housing, there has been a substantial saving to each householder in Canada or each tenant in Canada who is living in accommodation which was built under some arrangement in which Central Mortgage and Housing participated. I consider that the corporation has done a good job. It is natural I should feel that way because I am responsible to parliament for the operation of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. The more I see of their operations, the more I am satisfied that they are doing a good service for the people of Canada and that the taxpayers are getting their money's worth from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. I feel that the corporation is being administered in a manner that is eminently satisfactory to the vast majority of the taxpayers in this country.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that even by the widest stretch of imagination could this government really believe that it is dealing adequately with the present housing situation either by this amendment or by any measure which it has introduced during the past two years. I intend very briefly to show where I think the government has fallen down, and to show what additional steps I believe the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation should take in order to make it possible for the construction industry to build the houses which it is capable of building, and to enable those who desperately need housing, to purchase it.

First of all, what is the situation today? We have in Canada today a shortage of half a million unbuilt and much-needed houses. This housing shortage is growing greater every day.

Mr. Winters: Would the hon. member say on what he bases that estimate?

Mr. Hees: Yes; I was hoping the minister would ask that. On page 12, clause 17 of the report of the advisory committee on reconstruction, commonly known as the Curtis report—

Mr. Croll: What year?

Mr. Hees: I was getting to the year.

Mr. Croll: I was afraid you were not.

Mr. Hees: I would not miss such an important thing. On page 12, clause 17 of the report of the advisory committee on reconstruction, known as the Curtis report, concerning housing and planning, dated March 24, 1944, we find that the total urban housing backlog in 1944 was estimated to be 320,000 houses. I might add that this was a government-sponsored survey.

According to the figures supplied by the dominion bureau of statistics, since that year we have built 663,500 new houses. Also, from the figures supplied by the dominion bureau of statistics, we have added 710,400 new families to our population. That means that our backlog of housing has increased by 46,900 during the past eight years.

Mr. Winters: Might I ask if those figures of family formations are arrived at by taking the figures for each year and totalling them?

Mr. Hees: Yes.

Mr. Winters: Do they have regard to wastage over the years?

Mr. Hees: Yes, I have here figures supplied by the dominion bureau of statistics for each of the eight years from 1944 to the end of 1952, and they list these figures as net new family formations.

Mr. Winters: For each year?

Mr. Hees: Yes.

Mr. Winters: Then you total them by years?

Mr. Hees: This is the total for the eight years. If the minister would like, I will give him the total for each year.

Mr. Winters: I am just interested in knowing how you get the figure, whether you took the figures for each year and totalled them, or whether the bulk figure has regard to wastage through emigration and so on.

Mr. Hees: Well, the word "net" in the expression "net family formations" takes that into consideration.

Mr. Winters: For each year?

Mr. Hees: For each single year. We total the figures for the eight years and that gives us a figure of 710,400 new families which have been added to our population in the last eight years.

Mr. Sinnott: What about families which have left?

Mr. Hees: I was going on to say that our backlog of housing has increased by 46,900 during the past eight years. That figure, however, does not take into account the number of new houses needed to replace those which have become useless due to obsolescence. On page 12, clause 19 of the Curtis report, that figure is estimated to be 13,500 per year, and again this is an estimate given by a government-sponsored survey.

Therefore between 1944 and 1952 the total number of houses which should have been replaced amounted to 121,500. Adding that figure to the 320,000 backlog accumulated prior to 1944, and to the 46,900 surplus of new families over house construction between 1944 and 1952, we arrive at a total backlog of 488,400, or roughly half a million houses.

I would like to give as an example the situation in the year just passed, 1952. According to the bureau of statistics, during that year we produced 73,087 houses. Net new families formed during last year were 93,000. Therefore we have a surplus of new families formed over houses produced of 20,000. If we take the estimate of the Curtis report that the number of houses that should have been replaced due to obsolescence during the last year was 13,500, we find that during last year alone we should have produced 33,500 more houses than we did produce, if we were merely to keep pace with new family formations and replacement through obsolescence.

The next thing I would like to examine is the possibility for additional construction, and I would like to quote the opinions of several people who I think are best qualified to express opinions on this matter. First of all I would like to quote from what Mr. P. G. Wilmut, president of the Canadian Construction Association, said in his presidential address to the association in Montreal on January 19, 1953. He said that the Canadian construction industry should consider 125,000 houses a year as a normal minimum target to be aimed at. That opinion is concurred in by the Canadian house builders' association, and also by Dr. Firestone, economic adviser to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. He said in Toronto on February 19, 1951, that the productive capacity of the Canadian construction industry could conceivably rise to 130,000 houses per year.

Now, Mr. Chairman, from all this, two things I believe are apparent. First of all, we have a backlog of unbuilt and much needed houses numbering half a million. We also have a potential production capacity of from 125,000 to 130,000 houses per year. That opinion has been expressed by those best able to calculate the productive capacity of the Canadian construction industry. However, we find that during the past year we built only 73,000 houses, when we could have built 70 per cent more.

We naturally have to ask ourselves: Why did this take place? I believe it was caused by three things. First is the lack of serviced land. The second factor is that the down payment required by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is too high; and, third, the interest rate charged on Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation mortgages is too high and the amortization period over which loans must be paid off is too short.

I would first like to deal with the question of serviced land. A great many municipalities today simply cannot afford to provide the schools and the local improvements which are necessary to go with a housing development. I think it is common sense that you simply cannot build houses unless the municipality permits you to build the houses within the municipality. In connection with this difficulty I believe the Leader of the Opposition made a very excellent suggestion on November 24 last as recorded on page 33 of Hansard. He urged the government, and I quote his words:

> To reach agreement with the provincial governments in regard to a clearly defined re-allocation of taxing powers, so that the provincial governments and municipal councils may have adequate financial resources to carry out their rapidly increasing responsibilities.

I believe if that suggestion were followed out we would overcome the difficulties with which municipalities are faced in finding resources with which they could finance the building of schools and local improvements.

The second difficulty with which I want to deal is the 20 per cent down payment which is required on all N.H.A. houses. The cheapest house one can buy through N.H.A. costs $10,000, so the down payment which one must put up is $2,000. In order to find that $2,000 I believe one must earn a minimum salary of $5,000 a year for a minimum of four years. Even then it requires the setting aside of 10 per cent of that income for four years in a row, which I think we all agree is no mean feat. Therefore I think it is obvious that people with incomes of less than $5,000 a year are virtually excluded from buying a new house.

I think it is interesting to see what they have done in this matter in the United States. Their national housing authority requires down payments on a sliding scale. On houses valued at $7,000 they require 5 per cent, or $350. When the value of the house reaches $10,000 the percentage of the down payment increases to 12½ per cent, or $1,250. I believe that a flat down payment of 10 per cent on all houses of $10,000 and less would work satisfactorily, and would permit people of moderate incomes to buy new houses.

I should now like to deal with the third difficulty in the way of people who need to buy a new house, namely the interest payment and the length of the amortization period. Today Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation charges 5¼ per cent on their housing loans, and it is necessary to pay off the loan over a 20-year period.

Mr. Winters: I think the hon. member knows that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation does not charge 5¼ per cent.

Mr. Hees: No; I mean the mortgages obtained through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

Mr. Winters: Through the lending institution.

Mr. Hees: Through the lending institution. This rate of interest, and the time over which it is necessary to pay off the loan, make it impossible for a person with a low income to carry the charges on a new house.

Again I should like to examine what has been done in the United States. In that country, under their national housing authority, mortgages are made available at rates as low as 4 per cent, and they can be paid off over a period of as long as 30 years. I believe this policy merits serious consideration by the government because, in the United States, it permits people with moderate incomes to carry the charges on a new house. In Canada a policy similar to that would make it possible for a man earning between $55 and $60 a week to carry the charges on a good new house.

If the government persists in following what I honestly believe is an obsolete and reactionary housing policy, I believe the situation is going to continue to grow worse every day. As I pointed out, last year the situation deteriorated by a further 33,500 house shortage. As I have also pointed out, the accumulated shortage today amounts to half a million houses. If this situation is allowed to continue to deteriorate, families with four and five children are going to be forced to continue to live in one room. I shall be pleased to take the minister, any time he comes to Toronto, to see accommodation in which families with four and five children are living in one room and paying up to $60 a month rent just because they have no other place in which to live. I do not believe these conditions are the kind in which we can permit Canadians to live.

As I say, it would be one thing if the situation were just a temporary one, but it is not that at all. The situation is getting worse every single day, and the government is showing no inclination to right the situation and to permit the building industry to build the houses which it is capable of building.

I believe the government must immediately reconsider its housing policy in view of three things: First, the chronic housing shortage which is increasing every day; second, the proved ability of the Canadian construction industry to build almost double the number of houses it is building today, if given the opportunity to do so; and third, the success which has been achieved in the United States through practical housing policies which have made housing available to families which need it most.

Mr. Adamson: I should like to say a few words on this matter, Mr. Chairman, whether I say them now or on second reading of the bill. They are of a general nature, and as the debate has been fairly general I think possibly we would be saving time if I continued at this stage.

Last year when speaking on the question of housing I made four recommendations to the government which were as follows: first, that all municipal taxation be allowed as a deduction from income for taxation purposes; second, that personal expenditures on the education of one's own family be allowed as a deduction irrespective of age; third, that mortgage interest payments on the dwelling lived in by the taxpayer be allowed as a similar deduction; and fourth, the calling of a conference of all provincial ministers of education and housing with the federal government to discuss the whole question of housing.

Since that time I have tried to find out what these suggestions would mean and whether there was any support whatever for them. I took the trouble to go into my own riding and make a survey; it was a small survey, nevertheless it was a survey. It covered some 70 householders who were in the new section of the riding. I wanted to find out what these would mean to the individuals in a new housing development. I came up with these average figures. I might explain to the committee that this is merely a small sampling, but it is a sampling of a new development, one which has been built since the war and which contains a large percentage of veterans and a large percentage of young families.

The figures I have are as follows. The average cost of the house was $13,000. If both mortgage payments and municipal taxation had been allowed as a deduction from income, the average deduction would be of the nature of $190. I am not giving the figures to the closest dollar or the closest cent but to the nearest $10. In this group the average income tax paid was $525. If the mortgage payment were not allowed and if only the municipal taxation were allowed, the saving of the average home owner in this group would be $47.50 a year.

I mention these figures, Mr. Chairman, because I think they are indicative of what can be expected if a proposal such as this is carried out. It would mean a saving of 19 per cent in the average income tax. I asked whether there was any support for my proposal either from the building side of housing or from the lending side, and I must say that I have received quite a bit of support—not all of it directly, though some of it was actually directly—from the lending side of the picture, that is to say, from organizations whose duty it is to lend money particularly for housing purposes. In this connection I should like to quote one paragraph from the annual statement of the Chartered Trust Company, which contains the text of an address by Rolph R. Corson, who is the president of the corporation which is certainly concerned with the lending of money, particularly on mortgages. He said this at the annual meeting of the company, and I think it is interesting enough to quote the two short paragraphs to the committee. It is headed: "Inequity in income tax." It reads as follows:

> All the trust companies are in the mortgage business and before I close there is one inequity in present income tax rulings that, if continued, may have an unfavourable bearing on our national economy. The trust companies have reason to remember the effect of mortgage moratoriums in the 1930's and the necessity for the removal of the contributing causes. To deal with the shortage of houses the National Housing Act was enacted. It allows people of limited means to purchase needed homes with a small down payment and give back a much larger mortgage than is considered safe by the government for a trustee investment. Today's price for houses is two or three times greater than a few years ago, and the mortgage load much heavier. For thousands of young people starting their family life, a roof overhead, no matter what its cost, is a "must". Ownership of property carries a municipal tax obligation, which is also heavier than formerly, and today's higher interest rate on a larger mortgage adds to an already heavy load.
> Under present conditions this act was a move in the right direction, but it did not go far enough to accomplish its end. Municipal taxes and interest payments at least should have been allowed as an income tax deduction. Certainly the heavier load assumed by the home owner under this act should be carefully considered and lightened as much as possible. In the United States, where they also have a housing problem, they have met it more realistically as both municipal taxes and mortgage interest are allowed.

So much for the lending institutions. I come now to two resolutions passed by the Canadian association of real estate boards at their convention last fall in Toronto. The minister has probably seen this, but I will just quote the resolutions and the four-line preamble to the first one which is this:

> Whereas this increase in municipal property taxation is due to the rapidly accelerating cost of education, social welfare and other items, which are not services rendered to property, and should rightfully be borne by the population as a whole, therefore
> Be it resolved that the government of Canada be urged in the strongest possible terms to permit, in the national interest, the deduction of municipal property taxes from the taxable personal income of owners of single family dwellings, as a means of making home ownership economically possible for even the lowest income group.

These are two authorities which I submit have considerable experience and knowledge of the problem of housing and the provision of houses for rapidly growing communities.

With respect to this question of mortgage money, a pernicious system has grown up in districts where conditions are not completely in conformity with the national housing regulations. I may say that these regulations are pretty rigid. There are many cases where young families are building their own houses, doing a great deal of the work on them themselves, but which do not rigidly and completely conform to the regulations. It may be that they are outside the area where the lending organizations will lend money, or for some other technical reason; nevertheless they find themselves outside the regulations, and they are forced to go not to the larger lending institutions but to other sources of capital.

It has been found that a system of what you might call bonus or premium mortgages has cropped up. The system works roughly this way. A home owner wishing $6,000 goes to a source of capital and that source of capital says: "Very well, I will lend you the money at 5½ or 6 per cent interest. But instead of signing a mortgage for $6,000 you will sign a mortgage for $7,500, and there will be $1,500 capital bonus to me for accommodating you with these funds." In other words there is water in the mortgage to the extent of 15 per cent, 20 per cent and sometimes even more. Quite a lot of people have come to me with that problem. I think it is pernicious, and everything should be done to stop it.

The question of serviced land is also an important one. It arises in rapidly-growing municipalities around Toronto and in many other metropolitan areas as well. A municipality finds itself virtually unable to provide serviced land, to instal the physical services such as water mains, storm sewers, sanitary sewers, street lights, pavements, sidewalks, police and fire services and all the other amenities. They cost at the very minimum about $5,000 an acre. Assume that you can build between four and five houses on an acre. It means that you have a capital cost, before you turn a sod to build your house, of around $1,000 and possibly more.

On top of that cost there is the capital cost of schools. Today, depending of course on the new family formation density and many other things, I would certainly hazard as a reasonable guess that the cost of schools and the cost of servicing land therefor would add another $1,000 per acre. That is merely the provision of the physical plant. It does not take into account any question of amortization. The amortization of the school board debentures and the cost of the upkeep of the school merely adds to the interest charges of operation. Therefore, before the first sod is turned for a new house, if there is a density of four and a half or five to the acre—and that is reasonable—there is a capital cost of approximately $2,000 per house.

Some way must be found of meeting that capital cost. At the present time, with the lending powers of municipalities considerably stretched, particularly those municipalities with a high percentage of housing and a low percentage of industry, as is found in many metropolitan areas, the borrowing power or the credit of municipalities is taxed to the point where they have to pay 5, 5¼ and sometimes 5½ or even 6 per cent for their money.

This, of course, is a direct charge on the home owner, and a direct charge on the head of the family. What can be done about it? In the United States the banking system is entirely different from ours. They have commercial banks; and then, in a separate category, they have savings banks. These savings banks are rapidly growing institutions, operating under the safeguards of the bank insurance protection enacted by the federal authorities after the bank holiday in 1933. I would judge them to be wholly solvent and sound institutions.

Through the provisions under which they operate, these savings banks are in the mortgage business and are permitted to lend money. Our chartered banks in Canada are not permitted to do that; and I would not for one moment suggest that they should go into the mortgage business. But how are we going to get that money into the hands of the municipalities so that schools and serviced lands can be provided?

I am going to make a suggestion, and I make it on my own behalf. In doing so I am not speaking for anyone other than myself. My suggestion is that some consideration should be given to allowing municipalities, under strict regulation, to issue tax-free bonds. I know this suggestion flies against a great deal of conservative thought—and I use the word with a small "c". No doubt there are many objections to this procedure, but we must keep in mind that we are not dealing with a situation as it prevailed before the war. Rather we are dealing with an entirely new situation, a condition under which large amounts of surplus funds, either of corporations or of individuals, are siphoned off by corporation and individual income taxes. So the formation of capital today is not, on a percentage basis, anywhere near as great as it was before the war. So much for that subject.

The municipality today is the creature of the province. I should think that it must continue to be the creature of the province, as well as its responsibility. But because of the high incidence of taxation, because of the high-geared income and corporation tax we are finding that the municipality is being driven into a more and more difficult position. This very condition introduced in the budget this year, under which we have a 20 per cent tax credit from the income from common and preferred stocks—which are called equities—is going to mean that the average private investor will find himself less and less likely to invest in corporation bonds. And in order to equal the attractiveness or the yield of the common stock, to an investor who is in the income tax bracket anywhere above 15 per cent—and today that is a comparatively low bracket—any investor is going to have to get at least 1½ per cent or probably 2 per cent more on a bond than he would get on a common stock, in order to make the yield equal irrespective of the growth possibilities of the common and sometimes even the preferred stock.

The effect of that will be felt, and I feel that the effect on the borrowing power of the municipality is going to be very serious. I would think that, in order to sell them, the yield on municipal securities must be increased. Having said that and, as I have intimated, having spoken for myself alone, I feel a conference should be called between ministers of education and ministers of finance of the different provinces, to see if something cannot be worked out. The old shibboleths as to what cannot be done should be forgotten or at least, for the moment, put to one side.

We have here a problem that is not being solved by our present methods. The machinery is inadequate. Insecurity, particularly if there is any slight recession in earnings or even moderate unemployment, will grow at a very rapid rate. As has been said, aside from national defence there is nothing as important today as providing for the security of tenure, the security of a man's hearth and home. Next to his life, and the security of his country, these are the most important things he has.

I believe we should look at these matters in a new light so as to try to find ways and means whereby the load will be taken off municipalities through the liberalization of terms of borrowing. But not by increasing the scope of the municipal taxing power. As the load is taken off municipalities it is immediately taken off the home owner who has to pay for the servicing of the debt.

Mr. Pearkes: Because of attendance at another committee I was not able to follow the deliberations here this afternoon, and there is one question I should like to ask. It arises out of representations which have been made to me from the city of Victoria where there is a considerable housing problem. The brokers inform me that they are in desperate need of better access to funds provided under the National Housing Act. If they were given a more adequate supply of funds, even under the existing conditions the housing problem could be greatly improved. Are steps being taken to provide better access to funds available to the mortgage brokers?

Mr. Winters: The short answer to that is "yes." There has been difficulty this year with mortgage money, but to some extent the problem is solving itself. Housing starts this year are certainly far greater than they were last year at this time. There will be a provision in the bill which I propose to introduce immediately this resolution is disposed of which should help to cure that very situation.

Mr. Fleming: Has the minister any information to impart to the house concerning any other matters in relation to housing policy that the government is contemplating?

Mr. Winters: I propose making a somewhat more detailed speech on second reading, at which time I will inform hon. members of some of the progress that has been made under the various sections of the housing act. I would anticipate that we will have a broader debate at that time.

Mr. Fleming: I take it from what the minister has just said that the statement he contemplates making will be of a factual nature. My question related to any announcement in relation to policy. I understand that up to a point policy is involved in these amendments to the act, but is there any other change of policy or any new policy in relation to housing that the government has in contemplation?

Mr. Winters: I would not want to be in the position of anticipating what is in the bill. I think that the question might more properly be asked after the hon. member has seen the bill.

Mr. Fleming: Has the minister anything to say in connection with the Merivale road housing project in Ottawa which I mentioned earlier today?

Mr. Winters: I have not had an opportunity of seeing the correspondence to which the hon. member for Eglinton referred. Unfortunately he sent it to the Hansard office immediately he had used it and although he attempted to do so, he was not able to reobtain it for me. I understand that the pattern is one in which under agreement with the municipality Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation pays a certain fixed amount in lieu of taxes. There are instances where a municipality will come to Central Mortgage and say that they want more money in lieu of taxes, something more closely approximating what they would get if the houses were not crown-owned. In such case, under agreement with the municipality we pass on to the municipality the increase in rent by way of grants in lieu of taxes. The increase does not accrue to the federal government.

I should like to study the letter to which my hon. friend took objection. So far I have not had an opportunity to see it. I agree that no letter should be offensive if it can be avoided. It is certainly not our intention to put in the form of a letter or in verbal form anything which will unduly disturb the tenants.

Mr. Fleming: I shall see that the minister receives a copy. I had just the one copy and it went to the Hansard reporter after I had finished using it. In this particular case the rents have been raised twice. They were raised in 1951 and are now in process of being raised again. In some cases the increases in a period of two years amount to as much as 50 per cent, and I think the minister will agree that that is very severe.

I shall see that a copy of the notice received by the tenants is given to the minister and I hope he will look into it personally. These tenants have not been given enough time. The notice was received on the last day of March to vacate at the end of April or sign new leases at substantially increased rent. They have had no opportunity to negotiate or treat with the officials of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask just one question, and if the minister has not the answer ready perhaps he can come prepared at a later stage. In view of his surprise the other day when I asked a question about the strike of lending institutions in Winnipeg against lending money for small homes, would he tell the house at some early date how many loans for small homes have been made in Winnipeg under the National Housing Act during the last six months, that is for four-room and five-room bungalows?

Mr. Winters: I shall get that specific information. In the meantime I may say that on March 31, 1952, there were 699 houses under construction in Winnipeg, whereas on March 31, 1953, there were 1,247, or almost twice as many houses under construction in that city as a year ago.

Mr. Knowles: The minister will note that my question the other day and my questions now relate to small homes.

Mr. Winters: I understand that.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Winters thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 339, to amend the National Housing Act, 1944.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock, the house will now consider private and public bills.

CANADA GRAIN ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR FAIR ALLOCATION OF BOX CARS

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia) moved the second reading of Bill No. 186, to amend the Canada Grain Act (distribution of box cars).

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to provide a fair method by which box cars may be allocated among elevator companies at marketing points in western Canada. The purpose of this bill is to meet a situation which has grown up in which there is no effective competition in the buying of grain from prairie producers. The bill itself is very simple. The first clause reads as follows:

> Any producer, as defined in section 12 of the Canadian Wheat Board Act, 1935, may, before the first day of October in any year, enter in the car order book his acreage seeded to grain as shown in his permit book pursuant to sections 15 and 16 of the said act, and may assign that acreage among the elevator companies at his marketing point.

This would allow the farmer to take his permit book to the railway agent and, in a new section of the car order book provided for this purpose, state his seeded acreage and declare the elevator company through which he wishes to market his grain.

The second paragraph of the bill provides that the amendment would be operative only if the car order book was not being used. The car order book is part of the Canada Grain Act. The Canada Grain Act includes a provision for the car order book, which provision was obtained by western producers after many years of struggle with various federal governments. The producers feel that the Canada Grain Act is their charter. I for one would not feel capable of altering the act from its original purposes. However, I do believe that the provision I have suggested would provide a satisfactory method by which farmers by their own choice may provide a means of allocating box cars amongst the elevator companies. I believe this amendment would improve the act considerably.

As I say, under the present situation there is no effective competition in the buying of grain. Before we had this large surplus in western Canada, and when elevator companies had excess space available in each crop year, a farmer could go into one elevator and if he believed his grain were No. 2 but the agent would pay him only for No. 3 he could go out of that elevator and to the next elevator company to see if that agent might give him a better grade. Under the situation now prevailing often all the elevator companies at any given point are plugged. Possibly one elevator might get a couple of box cars, and the agent will announce that he is prepared to buy 4,000 bushels of wheat the following day. The farmers, whether or not they prefer to take their grain to another elevator company, are almost certain to haul their grain to that elevator because they are in need of funds to carry on their farming operations and pay their living costs.

As I say, for a number of years the situation has been entirely different from normal. One might argue that we should not amend the Canada Grain Act because the present surplus of wheat in this country is going to be taken care of in a year or so. Then we would not need this type of amendment. I say that if any member of this house makes a study of the wheat supplies on hand in the various exporting countries of the world today he cannot help but come to the conclusion that we are faced with a world glut of wheat. When I looked over the statistics I was amazed at the huge quantities of wheat on hand in the various exporting countries.

According to the latest publication of the dominion bureau of statistics, "The Wheat Review" for March, on March 1 of this year the four major exporting countries of the world had on hand for export and carryover—that is the quantity of wheat in addition to that needed for domestic consumption, feed for livestock and seed supplies—the huge total of 1,468 million bushels. From that date until the end of the crop year, under the present international wheat agreement there is an unfilled quota of some 135 million bushels. In other words, after taking into account the quantity of wheat that is to be delivered under the present international wheat agreement, and taking into account the probable total that may be sold as class II wheat, the four major exporting countries of the world will have something like 1,200 million bushels of wheat on hand for export on July 31 of this year.

It was for this reason that I, for one, hoped that the international wheat agreement would be signed by all the countries and would become effective. Even if the wheat agreement is signed by all countries there will be on hand on July 31 of this year sufficient wheat for the exporting countries to cover more than two full years of the allocations under that agreement. If these exporting countries produce little or no wheat in the next two years for export purposes, there is still sufficient wheat available in those countries to cover two full years of operation under the international wheat agreement. I suggest, therefore, that the present surplus wheat condition in Canada, the plugged elevators, the wheat available on farms which the farmers are unable to market, is a condition that is likely to continue for a number of years ahead. If Canada and the other exporting countries get even a normal crop this year, with the surplus situation as it is, I think it is essential that something be done to improve the allocation and distribution of box cars.

As a matter of fact if Canada this year sells as much wheat as she sold in the export markets in the record year, Canada will wind up with a carryover of some 330 million bushels, which will be the largest peacetime carryover in the history of the country. Canada and the world are, therefore, faced with a large glut of wheat. This situation of filled elevators, a shortage of transportation facilities and farmers ready to market grain without the facilities being available, is likely to continue for some time to come. In such a situation I feel that something more should be done to provide a better distribution of box cars than anything that has been tried to date.

We have a transport controller. As I understand his position and the work he does, he does not allocate box cars among the elevator companies at individual marketing points. What happens is that the local elevator agents daily send to the wheat board a record of the purchases they have made and the shipments from the elevator, if any, as well as the amount of storage space available. The wheat board then sends this information to the transport controller, together with the quotas that prevail at the various marketing points. On the basis of this information the transport controller then says to the railway companies that there is a certain area in western Canada that needs box cars. Box cars are then sent, shall we say, to 100 marketing points; but after that the distribution of box cars as between the elevator companies is entirely the responsibility of the railway companies themselves.

As so often happens you may have one elevator company, possibly a pool elevator company, to which 50 per cent of the farmers at that point wish to deliver their grain. You may have three other elevator companies that normally would allocate amongst themselves 50 per cent of the business; but when the railway companies send four box cars to that marketing point they do not give the popular elevator half of the box cars because half of the farmers want to deliver grain to the pool elevator. They say: Well, let us do it on a rough rule of thumb basis; we will give each elevator company one box car. That immediately forces half of the pool customers to the other elevator companies. It is perfectly true that at certain points farmers will prefer to take their grain to the line elevator companies, and the same thing operates in reverse.

The bill I am proposing would allow the farmers early in the crop year, before October 1, to post their acreage in the car order book with the railway agent. Following that the railway agent at that marketing point would have to apportion the box cars among the elevator companies in the same way that farmers apportion their acreages among the elevator companies, as indicated by the entries in the car order book. If half the farmers with half of the seeded acreage desire to take their own grain to a certain elevator company then that elevator company, by this provision, must receive half of all box cars spotted at that marketing point.

I think anyone who believes in competition, who believes in freedom of choice, should support this bill; because in the marketing of grain now we have regimentation of the worst kind. The farmer must of financial necessity market his grain at whatever elevator may have been fortunate enough to get some box cars the night before and has a little elevator space available. This bill would allow the farmers themselves to indicate where they wish to market their grain, and as a result of that indication box cars would be allotted on that basis.

Somebody might say well, you can use the car order book system. However, I believe the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) will agree with me when I say that the car order book was not brought into effect to allocate and distribute box cars among elevator companies. The purpose of the car order book provision initially was to allow the farmer to order a car, in order to deliver over the platform a carload of a certain kind of grain that he might have, and get away from the necessity of selling it through local elevator facilities.

The car order book now is being used for a purpose for which it was not intended. I do not in any way blame the farmers for using the car order book as it is now being used. Certainly it is better than leaving the distribution of box cars to the railway agents or the railway companies at a great many points.

Wherever the pool elevator company, for example, feels that it has not been getting its fair share of box cars it will ask its farmers to go to the railway station and order cars through the car order book. Immediately, then, the car order book system comes into effect. It is easy for a large farmer who has a quota of 2,000 bushels of grain to deliver to order a box car, but for the smaller farmer who has a quota of 300, 400 or 500 bushels of grain to deliver the car order book is a very cumbersome procedure indeed. Many small farmers feel that the car order book has not been established for their use and they do not attempt to use it. In other instances they try to band together with a number of other small farmers and order a car amongst four, five or six farmers.

As I say, the car order book system when used as a method of distribution of box cars amongst elevator companies is very cumbersome. In addition it led to a lot of friction at many elevator points when first put into effect. Sometimes you find a rush of large farmers, who want to sell their grain to a certain company, going into the same station on the same day at the same time and ordering perhaps 20 cars on the car order book. Then that elevator company will get the first 20 box cars and the other elevator companies will get none. The ordinary patrons of the other elevator companies will be pretty sore at their neighbours who filled the car order book for cars for that particular company.

The car order book provision is good and it has worked well when used for its original purpose; but it was never intended to be used as a method of allocating box cars among railway companies. Railway companies and farmers who use the car order book system as a method of allocating cars do so only in desperation when they have felt that grave injustice was being done in the distribution of cars by the railway companies at an elevator point.

There is another reason why I feel this bill should be accepted by the house. If I read the judgment aright, some of the protection that prevailed under the Canada Grain Act for a great many years has been removed by the recent decision of the board of transport commissioners in the Kreutzweiser case. As I read section 112 of the act, and as I know it has been used in years gone by, a farmer had the right to drive into an elevator company with his wheat and, if there was any dispute about the grade of his grain, he had the right to ask that the elevator company purchase that load of grain subject to grade in dockage. Samples of the grain were put in a tin receptacle provided for the purpose and sent to the chief inspector of grain at Winnipeg, and the sample came back with an official grade, and the farmer was entitled to the price for that official grade.

The judgment of the board of transport commissioners reads in part as follows:

> The provisions of section 112 requiring a sample to be taken and placed in the receptacle only apply, in the opinion of this board, if an agreement had been arrived at between the operator or manager and the person offering the grain for sale that the grain be purchased.

In other words, this interpretation gives the right to the elevator agent to say to the farmer: "I refuse to purchase your grain". Under that ruling I have mentioned, unless the two parties agree that the grain is to be purchased the farmer has no alternative but to accept the price offered or take his grain home. In other words by one stroke of the pen the protection that has been in the Canada Grain Act for years has been removed by this judgment of the board of transport commissioners. I think it is a judgment that is wrong in every way. I do not think it is based on the facts of the case, and I do not believe such a board should attempt to vary the clear provisions of the Canada Grain Act.

With the right which the farmer has had for many years gone it seems to me that my argument is strengthened in advocating the adoption of such a measure as Bill No. 186, which would set up a fair method for distribution of box cars amongst elevator companies. I believe the arrangement is workable. If the farmers indicate that 60 per cent of the box cars should go to a certain company because 60 per cent of the farmers with 60 per cent of the acreage want to deliver their grain to that company, then I think the railway agent should see to it that 60 per cent of the box cars are spotted at that particular elevator. I do not see anything standing in the way of such a provision in the act working smoothly indeed.

In any discussions I have had with people who are conversant with the Canada Grain Act, and the marketing of grain in western Canada, only one other idea has been advanced as perhaps equal to the idea contained in this bill. That was the idea that the elevator agents should each day report to the railway company their purchases of grain, and that the future spotting of box cars should be based on the daily purchases of grain by the various elevator agents. There is only one thing wrong with that idea, and that is that if you start in the fall with two elevators each of which is empty, you will have one of the elevator companies—the one to which most farmers wish to deliver—fill up quite rapidly; then of course the box cars will come in first of all to that company which has been buying grain. But before the elevator company that had its house filled first gets any box cars at all, the second elevator house will be filled. Hence you would have each of them entitled to the same number of box cars even though farmers preferred one elevator company to the other.

As I have said, I think another advantage provided by this bill is the fact that it will restore competition in the buying of grain. Right now there is little effective competition in the purchasing of grain. It used to be that there was real competition in grain buying, a fact which affected grades and consequently prices. But when a farmer comes to town now and finds all the elevators filled but one, the chances are that he will take his grain to that elevator company and will be obliged to accept whatever grade may be offered for that grain.

Another reason I recommend the bill to the house is that I feel it is a satisfactory alternative to the car order book, and that as long as the car order book is not in effect the provisions of this bill would provide for the allocation of box cars on a basis that would result in a great deal less friction among the farmers and among the elevator companies concerned.

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, this is a simple, straightforward bill and I think the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) has made a good case in support of it. I am therefore going to say what I have to say in a very few words.

First of all I may say that we in the Social Credit group intend to support it because we favour the general principle that I think is embodied in the bill, namely that a farmer should have the right to deliver his grain to an elevator of his own choice. I realize that many people will say that a farmer already has that right. While it is true that in theory he does have that right, in actual practice it unfortunately does not work out that way.

At many points we find that the majority of farmers desire to deliver their grain to one specific elevator, maybe because it represents a certain company or maybe because the elevator agent at that elevator has given exceptionally good service. Hence when the crops are harvested we find that the majority of grain starts to come in to that elevator, with the result that it becomes plugged early in the season. Then the farmers are left with the option of either holding their grain or hauling it to other elevator companies.

Then we find that in years of congestion, when the elevators become plugged, it has often been the practice in the past to allocate box cars on the basis of the storage capacity of the various elevators, regardless of the fact that the only reason some of the elevators are full is that the farmers could not haul their wheat anywhere else if they wanted to get it in. We feel that the box cars should be allocated in proportion to the amount of wheat the farmers desire to deliver to any one elevator. In other words, if the farmers desire to deliver 70 per cent of their grain to any one elevator, that elevator should be receiving 70 per cent of the box cars.

I notice that a proposal similar to this was supported by the convention of the Alberta wheat pool delegates. We believe that it will provide for a fairer distribution of the box cars and will help to provide for the practical application of the principle that a farmer should have the right to deliver his grain to an elevator of his own choice. We therefore propose to support the bill.

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support this bill. From time to time I have had many letters from farmers complaining about having to take their grain to an elevator which they did not wish to patronize. The explanatory note opposite page 1 of the bill reads:

> The purpose of this act is to provide in a new section of the car order book a rule for the fair allocation of box cars among elevator companies at a marketing point where the car order book, as presently constituted, is not in effect. By allocating their seeded acreage among the elevator companies at a marketing point, producers themselves will determine the distribution of box cars at that point.

I think if the farmers indicate where they are going to sell their grain and so notify the elevator companies, then the box cars can be allocated on an acreage basis, and you will not have a farmer going around looking for somewhere else to sell his grain at the same point. That is, when there are six elevators and one of the elevators is doing 50 per cent of the business, it should have more cars than the other ones. As it is today, where there are six elevators and six cars come along, they get one apiece. The upshot is that the farmer who patronizes the elevator that is getting 50 per cent of the grain is obliged to go and sell his grain elsewhere.

The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) explained the matter well. I do not need to go into it again and repeat what he has already said. I think this is the solution to the problem which the farmer has today with a glutted market, and I support the bill.

Mr. A. J. Bater (The Battlefords): Mr. Speaker, I intend to take only a moment or two in connection with this proposed legislation. I think the first thing I would say is that I would consider the last two or three years as rather abnormal years in so far as crops in western Canada are concerned.

I think I am correct in saying that at the annual meeting of the Saskatchewan wheat pool delegates last November or December a proposal similar to this was brought forward, and I think I am correct in saying that it was voted down. The reason for that, if I might suggest it, was that it would rob the grower of his rights under other sections of the act.

The present act gives the grower the right to order a car for the shipment of his grain and to direct where such car should be spotted, elevator or platform. I doubt whether any farmer would wish to give up this right. While this bill proposes to provide a new section in the act, care should be taken that the actual result is not to abrogate the right now given to growers. One of the greatest rights the farmer now has is the right to bargain under section 111 of the act for the grade of his grain and for other conditions under which he might deliver it. It would appear that this right to bargain and to change his mind about where he delivers his grain would be effectively lost if this bill were accepted.

I think this bill should have extremely careful consideration. Possibly at the next session consideration should be given to a bill of this kind at the meetings of the standing committee on agriculture.

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, if the committee on agriculture is not called any more regularly in future than it has been called recently, I am afraid we would be a long time in getting any necessary amendments to the Canada Grain Act. I had not intended to speak because I believed the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) had covered the matter fully, and I agreed with his argument. But the hon. member for The Battlefords (Mr. Bater), in the speech which he made, indicated that if this amendment were passed it would abrogate the right of the growers at the present time with regard to the car order book. That is not correct, and I wish to correct him. Section 72B of part I of the bill deals with that and states quite definitely:

> If, at any time, no unfilled application for a car appears in the car order book at a marketing point, the railway agent shall then apportion railway cars among the elevator companies in the proportion that the acreage has been divided among the elevator companies.

In other words, if the growers at a point which has a car order book wish to continue that method they can do so. If they fail to use the car order book, then this other method, as indicated in Bill No. 186, will go into effect.

The car order book was put into effect originally to give the farmer a chance to get a car, as opposed to the elevator companies. It was put in there a great many years ago. It was put in the act before we had the pools in operation and before we had the farm grain companies in operation. It was put into effect before we had the quota system of deliveries, and it served a real purpose; but that purpose has been more or less superseded by the new conditions that have arisen in the last few years with regard to quota deliveries, and the fact that in western Canada today we have in operation certain grain companies which belong to the farmers, co-operatives and so on.

It is the desire of the farmers, instead of using the loading platforms, to use their own companies. Yet at the present time they are not able to do that. This bill would just give them back the right they had under the car order book, when it was first placed in the Canada Grain Act. It is a good bill, and it should be passed.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I would first like to correct the grain statistics put on the record by the proposer of this bill. If his statistics are correct I do not see how anyone would have the conscience to demand a maximum price of $2.05 per bushel for wheat. He says that there are two and one half years' supply of wheat stored today in the world. That is perfect nonsense, of course.

Mr. Argue: See your own publications.

Mr. Howe: He also says the Canadian carryover next year will be 350 million bushels of wheat. That again is nonsense. The fact of the matter is that North America had very big crops last year. We are moving ours as fast as we can get transportation. We have already sold from this crop more than our usual export from a normal crop of wheat. If we could move our wheat faster we would sell more. The difficulty is in transportation rather than in sales. But it is my opinion, and I think the opinion of responsible men around the world, that the reserve stocks of wheat are not more than reasonable protection against the vagaries of nature.

It must be remembered that this continent has had seven or eight years of abnormally large crops. The law of averages works over a period, and we are due at any time for a short crop. I may say that moisture conditions over the prairies this year are not too promising. To tell the world that this great surplus exists is an invitation to sell the market down. I do not know whether my hon. friend intended it that way, but I think any grain man, if he believed my hon. friend's statistics, would not be buying wheat at $2.05, or anywhere near that price.

Mr. Argue: That is your interpretation.

Mr. Howe: You gave us your own interpretation of the statistics. I think the grain men would analyse the position a little more closely.

However, we are discussing the provisions of this bill. It is quite correct to say that the car order book was designed for a different purpose from the one it serves today. It was introduced at a time when there was an open market, when the elevators were privately-owned, when many farmers felt they would prefer to load over a loading platform rather than patronize one of the privately-owned elevators. It was believed by the farmers that grain that had been bought by the private elevator companies was sent forward in preference to farmer-owned grain, in order to take advantage of premium markets.

The car order book was introduced so that everyone would have an equal chance in the distribution of box cars. I may say that it corrected a situation that badly needed to be corrected at that time, and it served a very useful purpose. Today the car order book is not used in many sections of Canada. It is used in others and still performs a useful service; nevertheless the purpose of using it today is to favour certain elevator companies rather than to avoid discrimination between individuals.

It is felt that if a long list of priorities could be established for any one elevator, that elevator will have preference over neighbouring elevators in the distribution of box cars, and that is so. The suggestion has been made that with five elevators at a point and cars being put into that point, each elevator gets one car, but that only the elevator that has the greatest list of requisitions gets the preference in the cars. As a matter of fact, and generally speaking the usual preference is that a pool elevator will get two cars to one car for any privately-owned elevator. I think that is the usual average. I was told that that is about the usual average when a string of box cars are being spotted at any particular elevator point.

However, it is now proposed that the distribution of box cars will be made absolutely rigid by law. It is assumed that those who wish to register their seeded acreage will do so. If all the seeded acreage were registered from one elevator, that one elevator would do all the business and the others would do no business at all. That assumes, of course, that we have far too many country elevators on the prairies; that there are five elevators at a given point but four of them are useless. One elevator can do all the work if the farmers wish to patronize that one elevator. That of course is an absurd premise. I do not think we have too many country elevators. I do think that all of them are needed.

The fact of registering seeded acreage at a point freezes the farmer to the elevator with which he has registered his seeded acreage. If he puts his grain into an elevator other than the one in which he has registered his seeded acreage, obviously he can get no box cars for his grain because he has specified in advance that the box cars must be spotted at the elevator where his seeded acreage is registered. It takes away his flexibility of delivery and in that way attempts to make a rigid distribution of box cars, which may very well not suit the conditions of the crop movement.

To use the seeded acreage as a basis is by no means reasonable in every season. It is true that the wheat board uses the seeded acreage as a basis for quota purposes. That basis may be changed. If it were changed this whole bill would become null and void. It is tied absolutely to the theory that the seeded acreage will continue to be the basis for quotas used by the wheat board. Seeded acreage is no legal basis for anything. It is simply a device used by the wheat board to establish quotas reasonably fairly over western Canada.

I cannot see that this bill would assist the situation in any way. We have appointed a transport controller to operate our transportation system in times of congestion, his purpose being to make sure that the distribution of box cars is as fair as he can make it. I think that by using his own judgment the transport controller has created a flexible system which has served the farmers well. Many farmers will testify that if they write the transport controller and say that a particular area of which they have knowledge is congested, he will immediately ask the railways to relieve that particular area.

I am firmly of the opinion that any rigidity such as is imposed by this bill, which makes it mandatory on the railways to follow the principles laid down in the bill, regardless of any local situation, would not be satisfactory. There might be grain spoiling at one point, or in one elevator, and the law would say, "You cannot give box cars to that elevator, because under the law as laid down by this bill you must give it to the elevator for which the seeded acreage would make it mandatory."

I am always willing to support legislation which I think will improve the situation in western Canada, either improve the distribution of box cars, or improve any other condition that has to do with the movement of grain to the terminals. As the minister who is responsible for the marketing of grain it is in the interests of the job I am attempting to do to see that we move grain to the terminals in the most efficient manner.

I am not going back on the purpose of the car order book. The purpose of the car order book has always been to assist individuals. This bill makes it a device to assist elevator companies in a way which was never intended, and for which it has never operated. Whether it is wise in the interests of supporting one elevator company as against another elevator company to put that rigidity in the law, my hon. friend may have his own opinions. But I am firmly of the opinion that that is not a wise extension of the car order book privilege. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I move in amendment:

That the word "now" be left out, and the words "this day six months hence" be added to the end of the question.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, both the hon. member for The Battlefords (Mr. Bater) and the minister have raised a lot of straw men, and then have attempted to knock them down. The minister has said that this would provide a great amount of rigidity in the Canada Grain Act, in the method of allocating box cars. Is there anything more rigid than the present car order book, when the next car coming to a given marketing point on a certain day must be spotted at a certain elevator for shipment of wheat from a certain individual farmer? The present car order book is the most rigid system one could possibly imagine.

I am not complaining about its rigidity. I think that even with the rigidity attached to the car order book it has an important place to fill in the marketing of our grain. The formula I am asking to have applied would apply not all the time but only when the car order book is not being used. It would not take any right away from any producer. But when the car order book is not being used, then this particular formula, as a result of indications given by the producers themselves, would be used in the allocation of box cars.

The minister has said that perhaps grain would be spoiling at a certain marketing point. This provision does not prevent cars going to that particular marketing point. It says that when they do go to that marketing point they must be distributed on a certain basis. I can imagine the arguments against this formula being used each and every day, and can judge perhaps better than the minister could judge.

There is a provision in the Canada Grain Act—and I refer specifically to section 68 (2)—which gives the board the right to alter even the car order book formula on a temporary basis if it thinks an inequality has resulted. While I am not a lawyer, I would be quite prepared to have that paragraph applied to the whole of the Canada Grain Act, as I think it would, anyway; because if one elevator were empty it would not need 40 per cent of the box cars. I understand that. But the chances of an elevator house becoming empty under the present situation are, in my opinion, almost impossible.

The situation is that you have plugged elevators; and when an elevator has room for 4,000 bushels of wheat, in a day or two there will be 6,000 bushels in front of the elevator house waiting to be unloaded. The farmers do not find the elevators empty. They sometimes find when they go to town with a load of grain that they have to take it home because there is no space.

Then the minister says that if there are six elevator companies at one point it is not right to say that cars are now distributed one to each company. Well, I think that method is used more often than the method of giving the pool two cars for each one that the other elevators companies are getting. We have the car order book in effect now at dozens of country marketing points. Because the pool elevator is sponsoring the use of the car order book, it feels it has been discriminated against in the allocation of box cars.

Then the minister says: Supposing there are four elevator companies at a marketing point. The farmers can decide to sell their grain to one, and there are three elevator companies which do not buy any grain. He says that surely we do not think there are too many elevator houses in western Canada. My answer is that if there are four elevator houses at one point, and all the farmers want to deliver their grain to the one elevator, then the other three elevators should go out of business or should sell to the one to which the farmer wishes to deliver his grain.

Surely that is the way competition works. Surely that is free enterprise. If the farmers do not wish to deliver to three elevator companies, but wish to deliver to only one of them, then under ordinary competition the one would buy out the other three and use the four elevator houses. They would all be in use, and the farmers would have the opportunity to deliver their grain to the elevator of their own choice.

I am happy to go along with everything the minister said concerning the effective work done by the transport controller in connection with the relieving of congestion. I think his allocation of box cars in the areas requiring box cars is a good one. But the transport controller does not allocate the box cars among the elevator companies at grain marketing points. He merely says, "Here is a marketing point which requires 20 cars. We would like to see those 20 cars go to that marketing point." In other words, the transport controller does not know any more than I do which elevator companies will get those 20 box cars.

The hon. member for The Battlefords said he thought—he was not too sure about it—that the delegates to the wheat pool annual convention turned down a measure such as this. I do not believe that for one moment. What they turned down, if they turned down anything, was not this at all. In talking to people in the grain business, and people associated with the farmers, I am prepared to say that the farmers' own associations would support this bill. They might consider that certain amendments were necessary, and that the bill did not show the best draftsmanship. However, I was not attempting to draft a bill which would cover every possible contingency. All I have wanted to do is to place the idea in a bill for purposes of discussion.

I believe if this provision were added to the Canada Grain Act, and if section 62 (2) applied to this bill as it applies to the car order book section, giving the board of grain commissioners the right to remove this section when there was any inequality, it would greatly improve the present marketing methods. If an elevator company at a given marketing point cannot get sufficient grain in fair competition to keep it in business, it should not be in business and its doors should be locked. You do not have a situation in any other place where the patrons are forced to go to a given company whether they want to or not.

I know from practical experience that in certain instances this would help the line elevators, where they might have a popular agent or where farmers believed in that method of marketing. In other instances it would help the pool elevator agents. But in any event it would allow the farmer to indicate where he wished to market his grain.

I think this is a reasonable formula which should recommend itself to the house. The minister contradicted my figures on wheat supplies, but I point out to him that they were released by the dominion bureau of statistics in "The Wheat Review" for March, 1953, published by authority of the Right Hon. C. D. Howe, Minister of Trade and Commerce. The first paragraph reads:

> Latest available estimates indicate that supplies of wheat remaining on or about March 1, 1953 in the four major exporting countries for export and carryover at the end of their respective crop years amounted to 1,468·2 million bushels, some 66 per cent greater than the 885·6 million available a year ago.

There may be some explanation for those figures, but I will tell the minister why I used them. I used them in western Canada when speaking to meetings of farmers and businessmen in an attempt to convince any who might be doubtful that the present large supplies of wheat made it imperative in the interests of western Canada and western wheat producers that a wheat agreement be signed. As the minister knows, there are certain people who are against an international wheat agreement. He knows that certain other people want certain prices without which they are not willing to support an international agreement. If those figures are not right, perhaps I should take a second look at my argument.

Mr. Howe: The hon. member did not quote those figures; he quoted his own interpretation of them.

Mr. Argue: Not at all. I said that 1,468 million bushels, less 135 million bushels still to be filled under the current international wheat agreement after publication on March 1, together with any additional quantities that might be sold as class II wheat, would leave a surplus of wheat which would be equal to approximately two years' demand under the international wheat agreement if all the countries should enter.

Mr. Howe: You are absolutely wrong.

Mr. Argue: The minister says that, but he can amend his own statistics if he cares to. I hope the house will turn down the amendment moved by the Minister of Trade and Commerce and support the bill.

Mr. J. A. Ross (Souris): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say just a word on this measure. I listened to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) speak in opposition to this, but from my own personal experience the allocation of box cars last year in certain districts was not satisfactory. As he said, it is true enough that the quota applied in some districts whereas it did not apply in others. I do not want to be accused of talking out this measure, because I think it is a step in the right direction. As the minister said, it is based on the seeded acreage and it is on that basis that quotas are arrived at and set for the handling of our grain.

I am not going to get into an argument about the carryover or surplus grain, because I agree that our grain should be properly sold and marketed. Nevertheless the last two years have created a very serious situation in the delivery and marketing of our grain. We must realize that in the past few years there has been a great change in our system of harvesting. We now use combines and trucks, things we did not use some years ago. I think the proposed bill will be of assistance in marketing our grain, and therefore I propose that we should support it.

I should like to see a vote taken before six o'clock.

Mr. J. S. Sinnott (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word before a vote is taken on this bill. I give the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) great credit for trying to improve the marketing of western grain. He has presented his case to the government, and I think he would be doing a great favour to the western wheat growers if he did not force this house to divide on this issue but withdrew his bill and left the matter to the consideration of the government, to see what they can do to meet the situation. He has expressed his views most strongly, for which I give him credit, but at the same time I do not think there will be any value in having a vote because it is not a government measure. If the hon. member would give the government the benefit of the doubt and allow them to consider this legislation I think he would be doing a great service.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Howe) which was agreed to on the following division:

CANADIAN BROADCASTING ACT

PROVISION FOR GRANT OF CERTAIN TAXES TO CORPORATION

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Canadian Broadcasting Act, 1936, to provide that the Minister of Finance shall from time to time grant to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, out of the consolidated revenue fund, amounts equal to the taxes collected under part XI of the Excise Tax Act in respect of the goods mentioned in section six of schedule I to that act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Robinson in the chair.

Mr. McCann: Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this resolution is to discuss the principle having to do with the manner in which the finances of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation will be raised. I think perhaps, in introduction of the few remarks I have to make, I might call to the attention of the committee the statement which was made by my colleague the Minister of Finance on the occasion of the presentation of his budget speech. As reported at page 2133 of Hansard he said, among other things:

The government has been seeking a fair and effective source of revenue for the national system of television broadcasting being developed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in accordance with the general policy that was announced by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). The government's policy is to have the cost of the national television service paid, as far as that is practicable, by those who benefit from such service. It also wishes the C.B.C. to have a direct source of revenue, on which it can budget over a period, and not to be dependent upon annual appropriations to finance its operations. We wish to emphasize that it is a separate corporate body, under the general control of parliament but not a part of the government.

Television operations have just recently commenced and their development has been financed by loans specifically authorized in the estimates. It is now expected that, in addition to commercial television revenues, the C.B.C. will require about $6 million in the next fiscal year to meet operating costs of television, including interest on loans. This requirement will increase over the next few years, perhaps to about $10 million. Some part of these needs during the development period may properly be met from loans, and paid from future revenues, but we should start now with a plan to provide adequate revenues over the long run.

It is therefore proposed that the Canadian Broadcasting Act should be amended to provide that the corporation should in future receive from month to month the amount of revenue yielded by the present 15 per cent special excise tax on television sets and the picture tubes for such sets, and on such parts and accessories for television sets as are taxable under the Excise Act. In this way those who buy sets, or the replacement tubes for them, will be providing the basic revenue necessary for C.B.C. television services. In order to make this plan effective, it will be necessary to revise the regulations to provide that tourists returning to Canada may not include as baggage eligible for free entry television sets or the picture tubes for use in them.

Having decided upon this plan in regard to television, we have now come to the conclusion that a similar transfer of the 15 per cent special excise tax revenue can and should be made to assist in financing radio broadcasting,—

That is, of course, sound broadcasting.

—in place of the present licence fee. Although the continuation of this fee had been recommended by the Massey commission, experience has convinced us that it is uneconomical to collect such a small individual fee from such a high proportion of Canadian families, if any satisfactory alternative is open. We believe that payment to the C.B.C. of the amount of revenue received from the 15 per cent special excise tax on radio sets and the taxable parts and accessories for them does provide a satisfactory alternative, at least for the next few years until the present statutory grant for radio broadcasting is reviewed at the end of its five-year term. Consequently we are proposing that the broadcasting act should provide for this transfer of revenue, as well as that for television, and that the order in council under the Radio Act setting the present licence fees of $2.50 should be revoked with effect from April 1.

Of course all members of the committee are aware of the fact that the Radio Act was amended yesterday, and that amendment which discontinues the $2.50 fee is in effect from April 1. The Minister of Finance continued:

I estimate that the amount of revenue to be received by the C.B.C. under these arrangements will be approximately $12 million in the next fiscal year, the amount in respect of radio probably exceeding somewhat that for television. The public will be relieved of paying something over $6 million in radio licence fees, this next fiscal year, and our expenditure in collecting such fees, anticipated at $700,000 in the estimates, will be saved.

I have just a few words of explanation to give with reference to the procedure that has been followed since that budget speech was made. The Department of National Revenue, which collects the excise tax, early in March sent out instructions to dealers that return of taxes should in the future be separate as between radio and television. Our previous custom was to lump the two together. The March tax on those sets which have been sold is not due until the end of April. These figures when they are received must be tabulated and analysed. It is expected therefore that it will not be until the end of May or early in June that accurate figures can be given as to the excise tax revenue for radio and television separately.

Unit sales, based on the ten months of 1952 and estimated for a full year, of radio units was 501,974; television units 102,844, and record players, 24,546. The excise tax collected upon combined radio and television products for the year 1951-52 was $8,252,000. During that period sales of radio products were higher than those of television. However, based on bureau of statistics figures for the first ten months of 1952, it is estimated that the sales of each of these products are about equal. Sales for this period were approximately $38 million each for radio and television; that is $78 to $80 million for both. Therefore it is reasonable to assume that the revenue from excise tax in each of these divisions will be equal. The estimated excise tax for combined radio and television for the year 1952-53 is about $10,500,000. This figure is based upon a ten-month period.

Yesterday the committee on radio broadcasting paid a visit to and had a meeting in the city of Toronto. They were able to have a close-up view and study of the facilities which we have in that city, and actually see the production of a television program. All hon. members found that very interesting and illuminating. It did give them a concept of the enormous expenditure that is necessary to equip a station, both from the point of view of capital expenditure and yearly maintenance. It gave them a splendid idea of where the taxpayers' money went, and how expensive it is to carry on these operations.

I have nothing further to say except to answer any questions which may be asked on the resolution. If we proceed from the resolution stage to the second reading of the bill containing the amendments which will be made to the broadcasting act, it is my intention to move that the bill be referred to the special committee on broadcasting. The bill just provides that:

The Minister of Finance shall from time to time grant to the corporation out of the consolidated revenue fund amounts that, in the opinion of the Minister of National Revenue, are equal to the taxes collected under part XI of the Excise Tax Act in respect of the goods mentioned in section 6, schedule I to that act.

Mr. MacDougall: With respect—

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, this is a government motion, and certain rights attach to the first opposition member who follows.

Mr. MacDougall: I am going to ask a question only. In reading the finance minister's statement with respect to the presentation of the budget the minister mentioned that the elimination of the radio licence fee naturally will bring about a diminution in the number of personnel that have previously been in that department. Am I correct in assuming that?

Mr. McCann: I think that matter has been brought up in the house before. As a matter of fact, the collection of the radio licence fees for receiver sets comes under the Department of Transport. Their authority is the Radio Act. My recollection is that the Minister of Transport has given some indication to the house, although I cannot quote accurately what he said, that a number of people who were so engaged in the department would be transferred to other posts.

With reference to people throughout the country who sold the licences, that was done on a commission basis and was a part-time occupation only. They themselves will have to obtain other employment to take the place of the part-time service they performed.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, as the minister has indicated, this resolution follows logically upon the decision taken by the house yesterday in amending the Radio Act to abolish the $2.50 fee on radio receiving sets, a decision taken with unanimous approval of the house, a decision welcomed I am sure by all, a decision long years overdue.

This present measure is, as I understand it, designed now to fill the gap created by yesterday's amendment of the Radio Act, and to provide alternative revenue to meet the needs of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. That need relates to the activities of the corporation with respect to both sound broadcasting and the development of television which is now just beginning.

The estimate that was made by the Minister of Finance as to the revenue which would be available under the proposed measure was $12 million. That has been broken down a little more closely since that time to these figures: anticipated revenue from the excise tax on television sets and picture tubes, $6 million; that from radio receiving sets and tubes approximately $5,750,000. It happens that the sum of $5,750,000 is the amount that was previously yielded to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation by the $2.50 fee on radio receiving sets. This measure, therefore, if adopted will give to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, it is estimated, almost exactly the same revenue for its sound broadcasting activities as it is losing by the repeal of the $2.50 licence fee.

As to television, as the committee appreciates, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in all it has done up to the present time with respect to television has operated entirely on loans from parliament. Those loans, sir, have aggregated altogether $8 million. The first loan was $4,500,000. Then there was a second in 1950 of $1,500,000; then last year, 1952, parliament voted another $2 million loan, making in all $8 million.

The present measure, as I understand it, will put an end to the policy of loans. It will then be the duty of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in its television operations, on their financial side, to make provision for the repayment of those loans according to the terms agreed upon between the corporation and the government at the time those loans were made.

It may be an ingenious scheme that the Minister of Finance put forward. It may be that it is a striking coincidence that the amount expected to be yielded from the excise tax on radio receiving sets and tubes happens to be almost exactly the same as the amount hitherto received from the $2.50 licence fee on radio receiving sets. But, Mr. Chairman, I think we will have to look a little more deeply into and beyond these superficial and rather striking coincidences in amounts.

As I understand it, it is the duty of parliament, in reference to the voting of money, to assert and to maintain strict control over parliamentary appropriations and expenditures. When the amendment of 1951 was before the house and the house was asked to vote for a period of five years an annual sum of $6,250,000 for the general financial purposes of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, those of us in this part of the house said that the principle of voting money for a five-year period in advance was fundamentally wrong. Whatever might be said for the parliamentary grant to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation—and no one took objection to the grant for the year then under consideration—that was no argument whatever for a five-year grant, in advance, without any necessity of the matter being referred back to parliament year by year within that period of time.

The position we took at that time was fundamentally sound; and the majority of the house, in deciding by legislation that that matter would be placed beyond the reach of parliament for a period of five years, in my submission failed in its duty with reference to parliamentary control over public expenditures.

The measure now before us apparently is designed to repeat the same error. It may be well to ask parliament to make this sum available this year. Parliament has control of the matter, parliament has the facts before it, and parliament can act this year. It would not then be tying its hands for the future—next year, or the year after, or the third year or the fourth year. But if we are to follow the statement made by the Minister of National Revenue this evening, and read again what was said by the Minister of Finance on February 19 as reported at page 2133 of Hansard, apparently this present measure is to have effect for at least the same period as the five-year statutory grants which, thus far, have run only two years.

If that is the effect of the measure, then I say another error is being made. Because whatever may be said for these grants at the present time, it is of fundamental importance in the discharge of our duty as a parliament that we should not give away the right or attempt to pass off the obligation we owe to maintain supervision over this grant year by year.

There may be additional reasons why the matter should be reviewed each year. If the figures with which we have been furnished are borne out by experience, it happens that this year there is a quite close similarity between the amount the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is losing by reason of the repeal of the $2.50 licence fee and the amount they are to receive through the excise tax on radio receiving sets and tubes. But that equation may not exist in the following year, or the year after that.

If I understood correctly what the minister said this evening, as well as the remarks of the Minister of Finance in his budget speech, we are to be invited to say, by way of legislation, that for the period of five years, or what remains of it, this is the grant to be made; and the matter will not have to be referred back to parliament year by year. If that is the effect of it, then I think the house is being invited by the government to commit another serious mistake.

The finances of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation are of very great importance. Its operations are highly important, particularly at this time when it has entered upon the new field of television broadcasting. It would be a very indiscreet man indeed who would attempt to weigh the full influence and effect of television. It is a new and potent force; it is a force which enters into the homes of the nation, and will exert an influence far beyond the ability of any of us now here to comprehend. It will exert an influence upon the thinking of old and young alike in a way that has not been experienced before.

Nothing, then, could be more important in the discharge of our parliamentary duties to the nation and to its homes than that there should be frequent review of the affairs of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and its administration. It has been the policy of the House of Commons, since the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation was first established, to have a committee of the house review its operations every two years. As a matter of fact, sometimes the period has been longer than two years; but in this post-war period the interval has been about two years, on a strict average.

In connection with the voting of large sums such as are involved in this bill—$12 million per annum; and perhaps more than that in the future—I say there should be an annual review. I am not saying that the committee must be set up every year. It may or may not be decided by the house, in its wisdom, to set it up every year in the future. It may continue to follow the policy of biennial committees. But when we are dealing with an amount like $12 million in relation to the operations of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, both with respect to sound broadcasting and television, then I say it is highly important that the voting of this money should come before the house every year.

If we are to follow the procedure indicated by the minister this evening, and as foreshadowed by the Minister of Finance in his budget speech on February 19, then we are putting it beyond our reach to touch this matter for the period of the five years during which the other annual parliamentary grants have effect, and without any further vote on the part of parliament. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation under this measure will enter the new fiscal year with revenues of about $22 million. Of that, $15 million is to be used in sound broadcasting and $7 million in television. Of that $7 million, we see that $6 million will come under this bill and approximately $1 million, it is anticipated, from commercial revenues. These are large amounts; and if parliament is to do its duty then, in my submission, it should review these amounts annually.

The argument has been used—it was used in 1951 when we said that these grants should not be voted for five years in advance—that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation needed assured revenue in order to carry out long-term planning. I am as appreciative as any member of the necessity for long-term planning in the field of sound broadcasting and that of television. In the committee on broadcasting we have been hearing a description of the plans of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in that regard. No one wishes to tie their hands in making plans, but parliamentary control should first be vindicated. I think the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation can have sufficient confidence in parliament and its desire to see that adequate provision is made to meet the proper expenses of the corporation to be assured that year by year parliament will provide what is shown to be required for the purposes approved by parliament.

While recognizing the necessity of providing revenue to replace that lost by the corporation as a result of the abolition of the $2.50 licence fee; while admitting the specious attraction of the present proposal which has some ingenious aspects; while recognizing that so far as may be possible the burden should be borne by those who enjoy the benefits, nevertheless I see in the present proposal something more than just a convenient way of making the necessary provision. If I understand what has been proposed, I see here something that may be entitled to command the approval of parliament this year, but something which invites parliament improperly to tie its hands in future years. That should not be done.

I am glad the minister has indicated that when the bill is given second reading it will be referred to the committee on radio broadcasting. That is a sensible proposal which will assure the bill being reviewed by that committee which is considering other matters closely related to the purposes of the bill. Why cannot we have a bill of this kind and then have an annual provision in the estimates in such form that parliament will be free to deal with it annually on its merits?

Mr. Hansell: Mr. Chairman, before entering into a discussion of this measure I should like to rise to a question of privilege. Bill No. 337, to amend the Radio Act, was brought in yesterday and given second and third reading while the radio committee was away on another assignment in Toronto. I am disappointed that the bill was not left over until the members of that committee could have been here. Not only were the members of that committee not here to discuss the bill; the Minister of National Revenue, under whose jurisdiction is the operation of radio, was also away with the other members of the committee. We can do nothing about it. The bill received third reading by consent, which was not according to the regulations. I do feel that those responsible for the order of business might have extended to the members of that committee the courtesy of leaving the measure over until we returned. As I say, there is nothing we can do about it, but I do rise on that question of privilege.

May I change the subject by discussing for a moment or two the present resolution. I am not going to detain the house by repeating what the hon. member for Eglinton said, because there is no purpose served by saying the same thing twice. I support the hon. member for Eglinton in his argument that by making the amount statutory it is taken out of the hands of parliament year by year. We will have no control over that appropriation.

In order to partially remedy this, I suggest to the minister that the broadcasting committee should be made a standing committee. The order of reference should not be just the discussion of the operations of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation; the committee should be permitted to examine the expenditures and give approval when there is no opportunity to do so year by year in the house.

I am not particularly opposing the measure, or at least the principle involved that those who gain advantage in a certain way should pay the bill. In a sense I think that is a proper principle. If a man owns one radio only he will pay so much excise tax. But if a man is wealthy enough to have one radio in his kitchen for his wife, another in the living room for his friends when they visit, another in his daughter's room so that she may lie in bed and listen to some crazy program, another in his boy's room so that he may see how many cowboys are being killed every night, he then pays more revenue.

An hon. Member: And in his car as well.

Mr. Hansell: As my hon. friend points out, he may also have one in his car. A man who is wealthy enough to have these radios in different rooms in his house is consequently called upon to pay a little more. I have not very much to say against that principle.

But there is something the Canadian taxpayer should know. While he may have hailed with some jubilation the discontinuance of the radio licence fee, the fact is that the government are going to get it out of him just the same. In some cases they are going to get more. In the aggregate the government will be getting about twice as much this way as they would by charging the licence fee. The taxpayer should know that all that has been done is that instead of the government dipping into the right-hand pocket of his trousers, they are now reaching around and extracting twice as much from his left-hand pocket. The government can say, well now if we reach into the right-hand pocket the taxpayer will know we are only taking out $2.50 per year, but by this measure we can now reach into the left-hand pocket of the taxpayer and he will not know how much we are taking out. The only means the taxpayer would have of knowing would be to take a pencil and try to calculate the sales tax at the manufacturer's level and any excess taxes that might be added as the article goes from the manufacturer to the wholesaler to the retailer or perhaps through some middleman, I do not know. However, the taxpayer will not know how much he is paying.

If I had my way I would have a price tag on every article showing the amount the consumer is paying for the article and the amount of tax that is added. Sometimes that is done. It was done during wartime on jewelry and a few things like that. However, the people have yet to realize what the present government's financial policy means in respect to taxation. We are taxed for just about everything we do or everything we own. You cannot own a dog without being taxed. My hon. friend tells me that if you live in Banff you cannot own a cat without being taxed.

An hon. Member: You could move.

Mr. Hansell: The hon. member suggests that we could move. We could move out of one place and move into another, but we might find some other tax imposed there. We might move from Alberta, which is becoming less burdensome in taxes, but if we moved to Quebec we would have an extra sales tax. To what place could one move?

Mr. Fleming: To the moon.

Mr. Hansell: Well, if one went to the moon, as the hon. member suggests, it might be all right; but when we got up there we might find that they had a Liberal government and we would not be any better off. I suggest that the only way this matter can be rectified is for the taxpayer to say, "Well, let's try some other administration that has some different type of financial policy".

Mr. Fleming: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hansell: Now the hon. member for Eglinton spoils it all, because I agreed with him up to this point. Now he says, "hear, hear". I do not want to embarrass him but I should like his party to tell me what different financial policy they have from the Liberals.

Mr. Fleming: We believe in eliminating waste and extravagance and reducing taxes.

Mr. Hansell: The reduction of taxes is not a different financial policy.

Mr. Fleming: It is very different.

Mr. Hansell: It is not a difference in financial policy. Policy is that which runs the machine. It is not taking a bolt off the front bumper and putting it on the back one. A change such as that is just a fluctuation in the amount of taxes one way or the other. However, we will not go into that tonight. I do not want to get into any argument, Mr. Chairman, and you would only call me to order if I did.

I do urge the minister to make certain that if the authority for expenditures and appropriations is made statutory and taken out of the hands of parliament, he will have some substitute for governing that expenditure, even if it is only the radio committee. This method cannot be followed unless that radio committee becomes an annual or standing committee. That is my proposal, and I shall not say anything more during the resolution stage, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to add a word or two. I am glad to have so much support, Mr. Chairman, and I hope I shall have it when I am finished. I really have risen to support some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Eglinton with which I agree most wholeheartedly. First of all I should like to read to the minister one of his utterances in past years which I have treasured in my memory ever since. It made such an impression on me that I was able to give almost the exact words when I sent to the library for it tonight. It was brought to my mind because the minister began by saying that, of course, the C.B.C. was entirely separate from, and was not in any way a part of, the government.

When I read this quotation to the minister I know he will say there is nothing inconsistent in it. I am going to submit to you, Mr. Chairman, that there is a great difference in emphasis. The heart is different, and when I read this to you I think you will agree. I am quoting from Hansard for August 30, 1946, at page 5675; we used to stay here throughout the summer in those happy years:

> I for one believe in state-owned, state-operated and state-controlled radio in this country—

In fairness I should add that the minister went on to say that that was the policy endorsed in 1932 by the party to which I belong. I am not going to enter into that old argument. I am just reminding the minister that in those days he was very full of that aspect of the situation. Tonight, of course, he accentuated the other one.

The first thing I wish to do is reiterate what the hon. member for Eglinton said, that this business of being asked to provide funds over the years in advance does not make sense. In my opinion it does not make any sense at all. Why do we act differently toward the C.B.C. than we do toward the Canadian National Railways? The Canadian National Railways come here year after year and state their position. They state their requirements, and there is a committee to consider that. Then their requirements are met, as is right and proper, but only after the Canadian National give an account of their stewardship. I defy anyone to say there is a difference in principle. I defy anyone to show why it is not a convenient, easy and natural course to follow in this case.

Next I wish to say that this tax, this means of raising money which we are asked to approve, while it does happen at the present time—when I say "happen" I mean happen because it is the sheerest accident—to be just about the amount previously raised, that is a sheer accident. There is no more relationship between the needs of the commission and the yield of this tax than there is between the needs of the commission and, let us say, the tax on cosmetics or on toasters. The yield from this tax is going to depend from year to year very largely on the amount of money the taxpayer has in his pocket. The expenses of the commission are going to vary extraordinarily little. They will go on unchanged from year to year except that, of course, there will be a constant tendency to rise.

There is another thing I object to and it is this way of voting money years in advance. The money is voted in advance now, but there is nothing to prevent the commission coming back next year and asking for more; and there is nothing to prevent the government getting them more, which of course they will do if the commission's needs actually increase. On the other hand it is very, very hard for me to believe, Mr. Chairman, that we will have the commission coming along to tell us that we have given them too much money. That would only happen in a far, far better world, Mr. Chairman.

Without labouring the matter further I repeat and underline what the hon. member for Eglinton said. This is unsound in principle; it is unsound in practice; it does not make sense; and no reason that any intelligent man can make sense of has been given for it.

Mr. Hansell: I am not rising to make another speech, but I would just ask the minister a question before he replies. Since this is a matter which comes under the Department of Finance, is it expected that an official from the finance department will be giving some evidence or will be before the radio committee when it meets on this bill?

Mr. McCann: Mr. Chairman, in answer to that question the officials will be available if the committee sees fit to call them to give evidence.

In closing the debate I shall not take long, but I will just mention a few points which have been brought up. Probably I should first make reference to the comments and criticism of the hon. member for Greenwood.

He referred to my statement in 1946 and then contrasted it with the statement of the Minister of Finance who said that we wish to emphasize that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is a separate corporate body under the general control of parliament but not part of the government. He answered his question himself when he said that he felt quite sure there would be no conflict between those two opinions, nor is there the slightest conflict. I still take the position I took in 1946 when I made that statement with respect to state ownership, control and management for what is a natural monopoly for all the people of this country. There is no use going back to the debate we had when the committee was set up. I dealt with the history of the matter at that time, I think.

One of the reasons which I might emphasize, and which I stated a year ago when we were having a somewhat similar debate, is that the statutory grant was recommended by the Massey commission, which went more fully into the matter of broadcasting than any other commission that we have ever set up.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): You turned down their other recommendations fast enough.

Mr. McCann: We do not have to take all of them, necessarily, but it is well to take the best of them. At that time the commission recommended, with reference to the financing of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, that they be given an amount—and I think they stated what the amount should be—for a period of years in order that they could plan their work. Anyone who is familiar with the work knows that it takes a lot of long-term planning before they can actually put into execution the matters which they have in hand.

I believe, and I will agree with the hon. member for Eglinton, that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is of such importance, and of such growing importance, that we would be well advised to have a standing committee on radio broadcasting, or at least to have the special committee meet every year. That particular phase was also mentioned by the hon. member for Macleod. With respect to his general remarks regarding taxation—well, of course, there are taxes everywhere, even in the planet where he expects to go. I am sure he will find lots of taxes there, and I do say that when he gets to the moon, if there is a government there it will probably be a Liberal government and television will have developed to such an extent that we will be able to have a look at him and see how he is getting along.

I have no further remarks to make.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. McCann thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 340, to amend the Canadian Broadcasting Act, 1936.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read the second time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Fleming: No; we have to see the bill first.

Mr. McCann: After second reading I would move that it be referred to the committee on radio broadcasting.

Mr. Fleming: It requires unanimous consent of the house to have the bill read a second time now. It is all very well to refer a bill to a committee, but we ought to know what is in the bill before we do anything.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that the bill be read a second time at the next sitting of the house?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Last night I announced that we would proceed with Bill No. 332, an act respecting the Canadian forces. I understand that the minister is in conference with some member of the opposition in an attempt to draft an amendment to the section which was contested last night. If hon. members have no objection we will take up Bill No. 316, relating to trade marks and unfair competition.

TRADE MARKS ACT

REVISION AND CONSOLIDATION OF TRADE MARKS LAW

Hon. F. G. Bradley (Secretary of State) moved the second reading of Bill No. 316, relating to trade marks and unfair competition.

He said: Mr. Speaker this bill revises and consolidates the Unfair Competition Act, 1932 (22-23 George V, c. 39), which has been in force since September 1, 1932, and other statutory provisions relating to trade marks, trade names and acts of unfair competition. As the main subject dealt with is trade marks, the short title provided for in section 1 of the bill is the Trade Marks Act.

As many criticisms had been directed against the provisions of the Unfair Competition Act, 1932, and their interpretation and application had given rise to such dissatisfaction, in the fall of 1947 the then secretary of state entrusted to an advisory committee of experts in this field of law the task of studying the representations and suggestions already submitted, of securing further views from organizations and individuals who might appear to have an interest in the matter, and of making recommendations for the drafting of new legislation or, if deemed advisable, submitting a draft statute for consideration. In addition to legal practitioners specializing in, amongst other fields, the law of trade marks, and officials administering the Unfair Competition Act, the said committee included representatives of the Canadian Manufacturers Association, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce and the patent institute of Canada. More recently an official of the Department of Justice has also taken part in the committee's work.

At an early stage of the committee's work questionnaires were distributed to and representations received from interested persons and bodies in Canada, the United Kingdom and the United States, including the patent institute of Canada, the Canadian Manufacturers Association, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, the board of trade of the city of Toronto, the law society of Upper Canada, the United States trade mark association, the chartered institute of patent agents of the United Kingdom and the trade marks, patents and designs federation of the United Kingdom. Copies of the questionnaires were distributed to their membership by the Canadian Manufacturers Association, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, the patent institute of Canada and the Association of Canadian Advertisers Incorporated. A questionnaire was also published in the Canadian Bar Review and in the Ontario Weekly Notes. Notice of the activities of the committee was published in the journal of the patent office society of the United States, and mention of its work and objects was made in the daily press of Canada.

The committee has been in contact with other departments of the government of Canada having an interest in some of the proposed provisions, namely the Departments of Trade and Commerce, of national revenue (customs and excise) and of finance, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the statute revision commission and the Criminal Code revision commission.

The committee has had an average of half a dozen meetings a year over a period of approximately five years. A considerable amount of work was done and time devoted to the committee's task between those meetings by subcommittees or individual members of the committee. Nearly two years ago it produced a first printed draft of the bill, which it circulated amongst substantially the same organizations and individuals who had received the questionnaires, more particularly those who had indicated an interest in the subject, and which it also made available to any others who signified a desire to receive copies. Further representations were received as a result, either indicating general approval of that first draft or containing helpful criticisms and suggestions for improvement.

The same treatment was accorded to the latter submissions as had been accorded to those received by the committee upon the questionnaires circulated by it at the beginning of its work; that is, they were carefully considered and any suggestions that appeared to the committee to be reasonable and helpful were adopted and incorporated in the committee's draft, which was submitted to parliament in the Senate in June, 1952. Subsequently further representations were received, some of which appeared to have merit, and some amendments were made and incorporated in the bill which was introduced in the Senate earlier in the present session.

I hope the foregoing will not give the impression that we pretend to have produced a bill which meets all views. On a branch of the law which is of such a technical character, and at the same time of such practical importance to commerce, industry and the legal profession, it is obviously impossible to achieve unanimity of opinion on all points and proposals. It is for these very reasons that it was intended to afford all concerned an opportunity to give full consideration to, and make representations on, this bill.

The committee has prepared a detailed explanatory report which has been printed and published. Such report may prove very useful later in the administration and interpretation of the new legislation, if adopted. One precedent for this is the Goschen report on the 1938 legislation relating to trade marks in the United Kingdom.

May I, at this point, take occasion to pay well-merited tribute to the valuable services rendered by the trade marks law revision committee who, over a period of nearly six years, have given of their services unstintingly, attended many meetings and devoted many days of their time to this work entirely without remuneration.

I should now like briefly to summarize the main changes that this bill would bring about in the existing law as follows:

1. The elimination of the arbitrary division of trade marks into word marks and design marks, introduced by the Unfair Competition Act, 1932.

2. A more adequate definition of what constitutes a trade mark in the light of modern commercial practice.

3. The applicability of trade marks to services in addition to wares.

4. Relaxation of the rigid rules applying to the assignment and licence of trade marks.

5. Clarification of the principles governing the ownership of trade marks in Canada and the persons entitled to registration, including the right to file an application for registration prior to commencing actual use.

6. Provision for publication of trade mark applications and for opposition procedure.

7. In addition, an effort has been made to gather, into a compendious whole, the provisions contained in various statutes providing prohibitions against adoption and use of marks and symbols such as, for example, the insignia of the Boy Scouts, insignia of the armed forces and university emblems.

I should add that special care has also been taken to ensure that the provisions of the bill were in accord with Canada's obligation under the convention of the union of Paris for the protection of industrial property, including its London, 1934, amendments to which Canada adhered in 1951.

It is my intention, if the bill is given second reading, to move that it be referred to the committee on banking and commerce.

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I shall not delay the house for long on this matter. It is rather a pleasure to follow the minister because I believe this is his first formal speech in introducing a bill. It is the first one I remember at all events. I should like to say that I followed him closely.

Over the week end I took the time to read this bill. As the minister had said, it is a comprehensive bill in every way. In the form in which it is presented it appears to answer most of the questions that had been bothering me somewhat. It appears to be what a working lawyer would say is more or less a bill that will suit the profession. Judging from the remarks which were made in the Senate, the minister is quite correct when he says that it has been studied for three years by a committee of the trade mark law review committee, I believe, whose services were entirely free.

There were just two points that struck me in reading the remarks that were made in the other place when the matter was being discussed. It was before the committee there at that time. There are certain societies and certain persons who are set forth in the act as being entitled to have their marks recognized as such. As an example I refer to the Red Cross. The only point at issue during the debate in the other place, and over which members nearly came to blows at one time—verbally, I mean—was the request of the Blue Cross organization to have their sign of the Blue Cross placed in the same category as that of the Red Cross. We had the rather unusual spectacle of one hon. member accusing another hon. member of attempting to intimidate him at that time. I am sure that would never happen literally in the other place, but it was a rather strange spectacle. The matter actually came to a vote, and as a result of the vote it was decided that the Blue Cross would be included. The following day that vote was reversed at the request of the government.

I do not know whether hon. members of the house here will want to consider that matter. I do not advocate it myself, because I do not know enough about the Blue Cross. It may be that it should be included in the act. However, that is a matter that should be discussed. Then there is a section that complies with the terms of union of Newfoundland and Canada. The entire paragraph is included in the act, I notice, in section 65. I personally see nothing to object to in the bill as presented by the minister at this time.

Mr. Fleming: May I ask the minister whether it is his intention to move, immediately after the bill is given second reading, that it be referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce for study and report?

Mr. Bradley: Yes.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, like the hon. member who preceded me—and who described himself in what I thought were most interesting terms when he said he was a working lawyer—I followed with interest the work of this committee. I think it is sound procedure that the government has followed in introducing this type of legislation, of having their officials give the matter thorough study, then referring it to a committee that gave it further study, and then referring the legislation to the interested parties in the country. I think that is a democratic way of getting a cross-section of opinion and finding the weak spots in suggestions made for amendment of the bill.

Like the hon. member who has just spoken, I read the minutes and proceedings of the standing committee on banking and commerce of the other place, and with great interest. I noticed there was considerable discussion as a result of representations made by some person on behalf of the Blue Cross. He wanted the Blue Cross to receive the same recognition in the bill as does the Red Cross. I read that evidence with interest, and I heartily agree with the majority opinion of the committee at that time. I think the Red Cross is something distinct and apart. It has a place in our national and international life that cannot be equalled. All the good work of the Blue Cross cannot equal it.

I am pleased to know that when the bill receives second reading it will be referred to the banking and commerce committee of the house. I shall also look forward with great interest to reading the minutes and proceedings of that committee, because I am quite sure that the same interest will be aroused in our committee as was shown in the committee in the other place, and I hope that our committee will come to the same conclusion.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

SUPPLY

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

EMERGENCY POWERS ACT—ORDER IN COUNCIL RE TRADE WITH MAINLAND CHINA AND NORTH KOREA

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, there is one matter I should like to place before the house before we go into supply. It has to do with the order in council passed under the Emergency Powers Act which was tabled in the house yesterday by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier). He brought in this order in council, which is No. 604, shortly before the noon recess. It is described as the "Control of trade by sea with mainland China and North Korea, order 1953".

The terms of this order in council are very far-reaching. In the first place it sets up what is a completely new licensing system for Canadian ships. As hon. members know, there are already various licences and certificates required by Canadian ships; but here we have an order in council passed under the Emergency Powers Act which sets up a completely new and additional licensing system. That provision is found in paragraph 3 of the order which reads as follows:

> 3 (1) No Canadian ship to which this order applies shall, on or after the 20th day of April, 1953—

That of course was yesterday. I continue:

> —proceed to sea from any port (whether within or outside Canada) except under the authority of and in accordance with a licence granted under this order by the minister.

In the definition section of the order in council the minister is defined as the Minister of Transport. Subsection 2 of paragraph 3 reads as follows:

> No master, owner or person having the management or control of a Canadian ship shall order, permit or cause any such ship to proceed to sea in contravention of subsection 1.

And by the way, the order is made applicable to every Canadian ship having a gross tonnage of more than 500 tons. It would apply, of course, to both cargo and passenger ships. Paragraph 4 of the order in council goes on further with regard to the licence and reads as follows:

> The licence required under this order shall be in addition to any other licence, certificate or authority from time to time required by the law of Canada.

Paragraph 5 reads:

A licence under this order may be general or for a specific voyage or voyages.

Further provisions of the order set out in what ways the minister may limit this licence. Paragraph 6 reads:

Any licence granted under this order may be granted subject to such limitations and conditions as the minister thinks fit to impose with respect to

(a) the trades in which the ship may engage and the voyages which may be undertaken by the ship;

(b) the class of cargoes or passengers which may be carried in the ship to mainland China or North Korea or within the territorial waters of those countries;

(c) the hiring of the ship.

It will be noticed that there for the first time is a reference to mainland China or North Korea, and that is the only reference throughout the whole order in council to these territories.

The wording of the order in council is such that there must be a licence obtained in every case, but then the Minister of Transport may put a limitation or a condition in the licence with regard to the class of cargoes or passengers which may be carried in the ship to mainland China or North Korea, or within the territorial waters of those countries.

I will not read the whole order in council. There are punishment provisions which provide for a maximum fine not exceeding $25,000 or imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years or both. In addition there is a provision that a director of a shipping company shall be subject to the same fine or imprisonment if the offence takes place with his knowledge or consent, or even if he fails to exercise due diligence to prevent the commission of the offence. The penalty provisions, as hon. members will see, are exceedingly severe.

It should be pointed out that this order in council makes it obligatory for every Canadian ship leaving every port, everywhere—not only in Canada, but leaving port in any other part of the world—if she is over 500 tons, whether passenger or cargo, to obtain a licence under this order in council. The order in council was made applicable at once, without any warning. Obviously it is very far-reaching.

This order in council was passed on April 17, just last Friday, while the House of Commons was in session. No opportunity has been given hon. members to consider it. There was no chance whatever for debate before it became law; there has been no chance for the press of Canada to carry the story of this new law across the country so the people of this nation would have an opportunity to understand what the government was doing.

This is the kind of action against which we in the official opposition cannot protest too strongly. Action was taken under the Emergency Powers Act. Hon. members will recall the debates in the house only a few weeks ago in connection with the extension for another year of the provisions of that act. We were led to believe at that time by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) that he wanted the Emergency Powers Act continued for another year only as a stand-by power, that the act was required so the government could take whatever steps might be necessary when the house was not sitting.

We were told time and again during the debate that there was no intention to by-pass parliament. Oh, no, there was to be nothing of that kind. This Emergency Powers Act was required merely to do something after we had all gone home. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) said it was needed during the period of the election, because during that time there would be no House of Commons sitting, and that the government required such powers.

Yet the ink on Hansard was scarcely dry when the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) walked into the house with a far-reaching order in council of this kind, passed under the Emergency Powers Act. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that this action is in defiance of the Canadian parliament, and that it should be treated as such by members of the house and by the Canadian people generally.

Where has democracy gone in this country when a power-mad government will take action of that kind? It is not as though this were the only way the situation could be met. The government could have brought in amendments to the Canada Shipping Act setting up these requirements for a new type of licence. It may be argued that it would have been impossible to draw an amendment to confine the provision to the mainland of China and to North Korea. Yet we have that being done in legislation before the House of Commons at this very time.

I hold in my hand the revised Criminal Code. We find that section 46 thereof deals with treason and other offences against the queen's authority and person. A provision is written into this Criminal Code to deal with a situation such as that existing at this time in North Korea. Leaving aside paragraphs (a) and (b) we find that section 46 (1) (c) states that everyone commits treason who, in Canada—

(c) assists an enemy at war with Canada, or any armed forces against whom Canadian forces are engaged in hostilities whether or not a state of war exists between Canada and the country whose forces they are;

Words of that kind could have been used to amend the Canada Shipping Act to meet the situation dealt with by this order in council passed under the Emergency Powers Act.

Then already we have a provision in the Canada Shipping Act to meet a similar situation. I would refer hon. members to the amendments to that act passed in 1938. At that time a section numbered 703A was added. This section is described in the sidenote as follows, "prohibition of shipment of articles of war to countries in a state of war." This of course was before the second world war had broken out. We were meeting the problem of the shipping of munitions to potential enemies, and this section was inserted in the Canada Shipping Act at that time.

I make reference to it because I submit that this problem could have been dealt with in the same way by a new section or sections in the Canada Shipping Act. I am not suggesting, of course, that exactly the same wording would have been used. This section 703A provided:

(1) No article to which this section applies shall be discharged at any port or place in any territory designated by the governor in council for the purposes of this section or within the territorial waters adjacent to such territory from a ship registered in Canada, and no such article shall be transshipped on the high seas from any such ship into any vessel bound for any such port or place, and no such article consigned to or destined for any such port or place shall be taken on board or carried in any such ship.

Then the section went on to give the governor in council—that is, the cabinet—the power from time to time to—

(a) designate any territory or territories in which there is a state of war or armed conflict, civil or otherwise, in respect of which the provisions of this section shall apply;

(b) prescribe the time or times during which such provisions shall so apply;

(c) exempt in the case of any territory so designated any article or class or articles referred to in the next following subsection—

Which makes reference to munitions of war.

—from the application of the provisions of this section;

(d) provide otherwise for the carrying out of the intent of this section.

Then subsection 3 of section 703A describes the articles to which the section shall apply, and states that they shall include——arms, ammunition, implements or munitions of war, military, naval or air stores, or any articles deemed capable of being converted thereinto or made useful in the production thereof, or provisions or any sort of victual which may be used as food by man or beast.

There are other subsections of this section which were written into the Canada Shipping Act in 1938.

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. Howe: In other words, we did the right thing in the wrong way; we used the wrong act.

Mr. Green: The Minister of Trade and Commerce says they did the right thing in the wrong way. What has happened is that this government have become so drunk with power that they do not take the trouble to draw up an amendment; they simply come to the floor of the house and throw on the table an order in council passed under the Emergency Powers Act and expect members of the House of Commons and the Canadian people to swallow it.

The actual offence is made much worse in that yesterday morning amendments to the Canada Shipping Act were actually being considered. Instead of dealing with them, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) walked out of the house and left his parliamentary assistant to conduct the bill through the house. Another bill amending the Radio Act was treated in the same way and conducted through by the parliamentary assistant. After both bills had been passed the Minister of Transport walked into the house and asked for unanimous consent to revert to motions in order to table this order in council which should have been brought in as an amendment to the Canada Shipping Act, debated and passed in the normal way.

I submit that in this case the government has deliberately by-passed parliament. This sort of high-handed treatment must be stopped. It is time we in Canada knew whether we are to have a free parliament any longer. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker):

That all the words after "that" to the end of the question be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"This house, whilst in accord with a policy of imposing strict limitations and conditions on Canadian ships and cargoes and passengers carried thereon to mainland China or North Korea or within the territorial waters of these countries, desires to record its opinion that the action of the government in proceeding by order in council under the Emergency Powers Act while the house is in session was a violation of the rights of parliament and that any powers necessary to implement such a policy should have been provided by an amendment to the Canada Shipping Act."

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) I should like to make a few comments about the remarks of the hon. member who has just spoken. He states that he agrees that the evil that has grown up and been recognized by all NATO countries should be stopped, but his thesis is that we should have amended the Canada Shipping Act instead of using the act which was passed specifically by this house to give the governor in council authority to deal with all matters affecting the cold war.

Mr. Fleming: Stand-by legislation.

Mr. Howe: Keep quiet, my young friend, will you please. You can make your speech later. The hon. member states that a bill should have been introduced here, passed on to the Senate and sent down the path that any amendment to an existing act must travel. This action to prevent the movement of contraband was not taken by Canada primarily; it was taken by agreement among the NATO countries.

The first action was taken by the United States. Did they pass an act of congress? Not at all; it was done by executive action. The next government to proceed was Great Britain. Was their action taken by means of an act passed through the British parliament? Not at all; it was done by order in council, as we have done it. I cannot be sure of this, but my recollection is that council was told that the order in council passed by the Canadian governor in council was exactly the same as that passed by Britain. Executive action was taken by Greece to stop Greek ships taking part in this trade. As far as I know every NATO country has taken or is in process of taking similar action, in every case by executive action.

This house has given this government a mandate to carry out its responsibilities as one of the NATO countries with forces in Korea. We passed specific legislation authorizing the government to send troops to Korea, to send ships to Korea, to send aircraft to Korea; yet we are told that the endorsement given by the house for that purpose is not broad enough to stop contraband being carried into Korea by Canadian ships. Could anything be more nonsensical than this picayune idea that if we want to stop contraband we cannot do it by executive action? We can send troops to Korea, we can send ships to Korea by executive action; but contraband, no. The contraband must be allowed to continue until the usual processes of this parliament are carried out. If any serious result occurs that is just too bad, but it cannot be helped as the opposition has said, "Let it go until we can put a bill through the house."

My hon. friend has read from the Canada Shipping Act. Are those provisions that require action by the House of Commons? Not at all; they are provisions that require action by the governor in council. We could have passed an order in council under the Canada Shipping Act as the law provides, except for one thing—there has been no declaration of war against either Korea or red China.

We used the Emergency Powers Act because if there ever was a purpose for which the Emergency Powers Act was appropriate, it was meeting a situation that is causing damage to our efforts in Korea. We were told some time ago that there was a growing trade in war materials into red China and something had to be done about it. It is customary when something has to be done in a matter of this kind to do it and not talk about it. My hon. friend is using the Conservative line that has been repeated to us over and over again—you did the right thing, but you did it in the wrong way. How often have we heard that in this parliament. I venture to say it is 50 times.

Here it is again. If my hon. friend gets any comfort out of saying that we did the right thing but in the wrong way, and that is exactly what his amendment says, he is welcome to that comforting statement. We did it in the way every British country is doing it; we did it in the way every other country is doing it—by executive action. If we have overstepped our powers, I make no apology for having done so.

I say we did the right thing in the right way. We did it without too much debate about it, and it is done promptly. Canadian ships will no longer take any part in that trade, although I am happy to say that of the list of ships I saw that had been active in the trade, no Canadian ship was involved.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the house listened with interest to the remarks of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) and in particular when he said that in this case the government had done the right thing in the wrong way. There is only one right way—

Some hon. Members: He did not say that.

Mr. Howe: I quoted the opposition when I said that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The way some of these people applaud, Mr. Speaker, one would almost think it was with the spontaneity of trained seals.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, there is only one right way when parliament is sitting, and that is through parliament. The minister speaks about contraband in the China seas. If the movement of contraband were to have been stopped, as it should have been, he and his government would not have been losing $12 million on the Ming Sung Canadian ships trading in the China seas. Certainly when the minister terminated his remarks and said he was pleased to be able to report there were no Canadian ships in the list, it would have been interesting to ascertain whether or not this company, the Ming Sung company, guaranteed by the Dominion of Canada, was not one of those whose ships were engaged in this illicit traffic as the result of the assistance given by the government of Canada.

Now, having said that, Mr. Speaker, I mention the emergency powers just for the purpose of saying one thing. When the emergency powers legislation was before parliament we were told repeatedly that its purpose was as stand-by legislation, in case an emergency might arise after parliament was dissolved and before the election took place. This is no emergency that has arisen within the last few hours. What is taking place in China has been going on for a year and a half. We were able to point out the situation over a year and a half ago when the Ming Sung ships, under an order in council, were flying the Canadian ensign and were permitted to have Chinese crews. They were actually engaged in illicit operations at that time. Why did the government not act then? No, Mr. Speaker, this is not a case of saying that you did the right thing in the wrong way. It is the wrong thing when parliament is sitting to proceed as the result—

Mr. Howe: Huh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: My hon. friend says "huh", and the other day it was "nuts". That is my hon. friend's attitude towards parliament. All he says about parliament is that it should not be able to discuss this. A few moments ago he said that parliament would talk about it, but they acted.

In connection with the emergency powers I mention that a question has been asked several times in this house as to whether or not that act is to be used after dissolution in order to reduce taxation, as was the case in 1945. Indeed, in the last few days it has been stated, with a degree of authority that cannot be disdainfully regarded, that this act is to be used after dissolution for the purpose of bringing in a form of health insurance and hospitalization in order to get votes. The Minister of Justice said that the emergency was the election.

The emergency legislation now being used was not necessary in the present instance. Amendments have gone through parliament within the last few days. The amendments to the shipping act did not take hours or days, but took a matter of minutes. This legislation would have been passed. We in the opposition have never stood against any legislation necessary in order to preserve or protect. If the legislation had been submitted to parliament, with the explanation that it was needed, it would have been passed.

Mr. Howe: Tell the British how to pass these things.

Mr. Diefenbaker: As a matter of fact I am not sure the minister is right. I have heard him make statements in the house before as to what the United Kingdom government did. As a matter of fact, he is telling us this on this occasion because there is no one who can answer him. But I can say this. The United Kingdom government has not closed down parliament the way this government has endeavoured to do on so many occasions in recent years. Parliament operates there, and members supporting the government have an independence that has never been shown by any member supporting this government. They take their stand on behalf of freedom and the maintenance of parliament. They stand up one after the other, under the direction of no minister of the crown.

Mr. McCann: Oh, bosh; that is crazy talk.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): How does the opposition stand up?

Mr. Blue: We will give you a job any time; you are a showman.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have never known my hon. friends to be in a state of annoyance unless some of them were being hurt. I simply conclude by saying that this is another example of the type of pretence that is so often used by this government in order to secure emergency powers. A few days ago minister after minister stood up—at least the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) and the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent)—to state that the emergency was the purpose and the reason, and the power would only be used as a stand-by. This matter could have been brought before parliament, and the only reason it was not is the contemptuous attitude of the right hon. gentleman who says, "After all, this achieves the result, parliament or no parliament."

That is contempt of parliament. It is another example of the attitude taken by a government too long in power, too thirsty for absolute executive power, and too willing to deny parliament its right.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I am going to support the amendment which has been proposed by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green).

The minister says that the right thing was done in the wrong way.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): We did not say that.

Mr. Coldwell: I say the right thing may have been done in the wrong way when I look at the record and see the statement made by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) when he tabled this order in council yesterday. At page 4089 of Hansard for April 20, 1953, the minister is reported as follows:

> This order is being passed pursuant to discussions which took place between the British and the Americans in Washington following the visit here of the Right Hon. Mr. Eden, and after those discussions the hope was expressed that we in Canada would pass a similar order in council.

Those are the words of the Minister of Transport. When was the Right Hon. Anthony Eden in Canada? It must have been six weeks ago, and certainly more than a month ago. All this time the government knew that it was committed to take this action. When parliament was in session, why was it not done by parliament? I am one of those who believe that when parliament is in session, parliament should pass upon legislation. This is legislation.

When the emergency powers bill was before us a short time ago, one of our thoughts was that the government wanted to use it merely as a convenient way—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Coldwell: —to do something without having to come before parliament and explain. I do not like that way of passing legislation, because this is legislation. It is legislation with exactly the same effect as if we had passed it through this house. It is very far-reaching, and I think that the house should have been given an opportunity of discussing the matter very thoroughly and the government should have asked the house to approve this legislation.

Mr. Howe: May I point out to my hon. friend that he can move a motion in this house to have this order in council repealed. That is one of the provisions of the Emergency Powers Act.

Mr. Coldwell: We can move to have the order in council repealed, but I do not want to see it repealed.

Mr. Howe: The right thing in the wrong way.

Mr. Coldwell: I agree with the minister that it is the right thing to do provided it is done in the right way. I have very great respect for my right hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

An hon. Member: So have we all.

Mr. Coldwell: I know the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) does get things done, but I am afraid he has developed the habit of getting them done without consulting parliament.

Mr. Prudham: You do not have to be afraid of him at all.

Mr. Howe: This is not my order in council.

Mr. Coldwell: The Minister of Trade and Commerce defended the order in council I thought pretty warmly, so warmly that perhaps he felt there was some justification in the criticism that has been levelled against the government in this regard. I feel that when a far-reaching order in council of this description is being considered, when parliament is in session, it is parliament that should pass the legislation. It should not be passed as an order in council by the government. It is aggravated by the fact that the Canada Shipping Act was before the house at the very time this order in council which deals with shipping was tabled in the house. As I say, there was lots of time to do this because Mr. Eden was here at least six weeks ago.

Mr. Howe: This does not refer to Mr. Eden's visit to Canada; it refers to his conference in Washington which took place less than six weeks ago.

Mr. Coldwell: The Emergency Powers Act was passed, and then this was passed under the Emergency Powers Act. It is true that parliament granted to the government the right to pass orders in council; but the debate in this house when we were discussing the Emergency Powers Act clearly indicated that this house, generally speaking, did not approve of the passing of important orders in council when this house was in session.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Coldwell: I think that to a large degree the minister's own supporters feel that way, and I am going to support the amendment because I believe it is a well deserved censure of the government for doing something by order in council that should have been done by legislation.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to take up very much time on this, and most of the things that could be said have been well said. During the time the Emergency Powers Act was before the house the big objection by all on this side of the house was that the government was able to use it in a manner similar to the way they are using it now. For the government to make use of the terms of the Emergency Powers Act to put through legislation of this kind constitutes an unfair overruling of the powers of parliament.

For those reasons, Mr. Speaker, I am going to support the amendment.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Are hon. members ready for the question?

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. Howe: No, Mr. Speaker. Put the question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) has moved the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. Howe: Put the question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, I have some observations to offer on this amendment.

Mr. Howe: You have made your motion.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member has moved the adjournment of the debate. He must withdraw that motion if he wishes to carry on.

Mr. McCann: He cannot withdraw it.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Fleming) which was negatived on the following division:

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I move the adjournment of the house. Tomorrow we will take up first the resolution of the Minister of Fisheries to approve the halibut fisheries convention between Canada and the United States of America, to provide for the carrying out of the provisions of this convention; then Bill No. 332, respecting the Canadian forces; Bill No. 340, to amend the Canadian Broadcasting Act, 1936. Then we shall continue this motion to go into supply and call an item in finance and legislation, the items to stand, and then proceed with the estimates of trade and commerce, citizenship and immigration, privy council and national health and welfare.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.15 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, April 22, 1953

The house met at eleven o'clock.

QUESTIONS

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES—ARMED FORCES OFFICERS

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. How many officers of the armed forces have travelled by Trans-Canada Air Lines between April 1, 1952 and to date?
2. What was the amount paid to the Trans-Canada Air Lines for such transportation?

Mr. Blanchette:

1. 4,676.

2. $629,402.

Taking into account the saving in time, it is more economical for officers to travel by air than by rail.

COLWOOD MAGAZINE, ESQUIMALT HARBOUR, B.C.

Mr. Pearkes:

1. When was the Colwood magazine, on the west side of Esquimalt harbour, British Columbia, constructed?
2. How many acres did this magazine comprise?
3. What was the total cost of construction of the various buildings, ammunition stores and jetties?
4. How much was spent on fencing the area?
5. How much has been spent on the construction and maintenance of roads?
6. To what purpose will the area be put after the magazine has been removed to Rocky Point?
7. Does the government propose to dispose of the area?

Mr. Blanchette:

1. During the period 1937 to 1939.

2. 261·39 acres.

3. In so far as existing records show, the total cost of construction was $413,742.17.

4. Included in the above figure is the cost of erecting a chain and link fence—$15,559.68.

5. Included in the answer to No. 3 above is an item for roadwork at $4,500. Only minor expenditures on road maintenance have been made.

6 and 7. Not yet determined.

ARMED FORCES—PURCHASES OF SUSPENDERS

Mr. Lennard:

What were the total purchases, giving cost, quantities, varieties, and from whom purchased, of suspenders for all branches of the armed forces, during the period from April 1, 1951 to December 31, 1952?

Mr. Dickey:

Questions

CHICOUTIMI, LAPOINTE AND LAC-SAINT-JEAN COUNTIES, QUE.—DEFENCE EXPENDITURES

Mr. Gagnon:

Since January 1, 1945, what amounts have been spent in the counties of (a) Chicoutimi; (b) Lapointe; (c) Lac-Saint-Jean, by the Department of National Defence and the Department of Defence Production?

Mr. Dickey: This question has been discussed with the hon. member, both by myself and by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence. The hon. member has agreed to have the question dropped.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

NAVIGATION LOCK, CANSO CAUSEWAY

Mr. Fleming:

1. What persons or corporations submitted tenders for the construction of the navigation lock at the northern end of the Canso causeway, and in what respective amounts?

2. Was the sum named by T. C. Gorman (Nova Scotia) Limited, in its tender $4,817,777 a firm fixed over-all price or a sum based on unit prices to be paid for estimated quantities?

Mr. Benidickson:

1. Canit Construction Limited, Montreal, P.Q., $4,608,600; T. C. Gorman (Nova Scotia) Ltd., Halifax, N. S., $4,817,777; Northern Construction Company and J. W. Stewart Ltd., Vancouver, B.C., $5,279,500; Arthur A. Johnson Canada Limited, Toronto, $5,441,725; Atlas Construction Co. Ltd., Montreal, $5,520,875; C. A. Pitts General Contractors, Toronto, $5,611,450; B. Perini and Sons Canada, Ltd., Toronto, and R. K. MacDonald Construction Co., Antigonish, N.S., $5,665,120; the Foundation Company of Canada Ltd., Montreal, $6,135,205; Pentagon Construction Co. Ltd., Montreal, P.Q., $6,518,165.

2. The amount of the T. C. Gorman (Nova Scotia) Ltd., Halifax, tender is based on unit prices to be paid for quantities as estimated by departmental engineers.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—MOTOR CARS, OTTAWA

Mr. Higgins:

1. Are motor cars owned by the Department of National Defence used in Ottawa by persons other than high-ranking officers?

2. Are there civilians in Ottawa who have been authorized or permitted to call upon the Department of National Defence to supply motor cars for their own personal use?

3. Are motor cars and motor vehicles owned by the Department of National Defence used by the staff of Government House at Ottawa?

4. If so, by what authority are such vehicles supplied?

5. For what purpose are the said vehicles required and used?

[Mr. Dickey.]

Mr. Blanchette:

1 and 2. At the request of a senior official, permission may be granted to a departmental employee to use a motor car for the performance of a specific duty when that duty is sufficiently urgent or important to require such transportation.

3, 4 and 5. No service vehicle is attached to Government House, but in accordance with long standing practice a truck is made available on rare occasions such as an official visit when additional transportation for baggage is required. In such cases this is arranged by the director of supplies and transport at army headquarters.

POST OFFICE BUILDING, WINNIPEG

Mr. Sinnott:

1. Are plans and specifications completed for the new post office building in Winnipeg, Manitoba?

2. If not, when are plans and specifications to be completed?

3. What is to be the type of construction?

4. Is Tyndall stone to be used or specified?

5. Have tenders been called for construction?

6. If not, at what date are tenders expected to be called?

Mr. Fournier (Hull):

1. No.

2. Late this year.

3. Structural steel and reinforced concrete floors, brick walls with some stone trim.

4. Specification will call for Canadian limestone.

5. No.

6. Late this year.

Has the federal Department of Labour a memorandum or document of recent date giving information as to provincial labour standards in Canada, including (a) statutory school-leaving ages; (b) minimum ages for employment; (c) maximum hours of work; (d) minimum rates of pay; (e) fair rates of pay; (f) workmen's compensation provisions, etc.?
2. If so, what are the details of the information contained in any such memorandum or document?

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): Return tabled.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

REDUCTION OF AUTOMOBILE INSURANCE COMMISSION RATES

Mr. Diefenbaker:

For a copy of all letters and telegrams, since the first day of January, 1953, that have passed between members of the association of insurance agents for the province of Ontario, or individual agents or persons, and the Department of Justice and/or the combines investigation branch, and replies thereto, with reference to complaints regarding the action of the board and non-board automobile insurance companies, in reducing by a uniform percentage the rates of commission paid by such companies to local agents.

HIGHWAYS, ALBERTA—FEDERAL CONTRIBUTION

Mr. Macdonald (Edmonton East):

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents, exchanged between the federal government and the premier of the province of Alberta, or any member of the Alberta government, since January 1, 1953, relating to federal contribution to the building of highways.

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Speaker, there is no objection to this motion, provided there is the usual reservation, that the consent of the government of Alberta will be requested.

Mr. Speaker: Agreed, in conformity with the statement of the Prime Minister.

HARVEY LUNAM

Mr. Diefenbaker:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams or other correspondence, since the first day of February, 1952 and to date, which have passed between the Department of Public Works and representatives of any department of the federal government in the city of Regina or elsewhere in the province of Saskatchewan, and the replies thereto, in connection with efforts to locate Mr. Harvey Lunam of the Lunam Construction Company Limited.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, I would ask that this motion stand for today. I saw it only this morning, and I should like to look at it.

Mr. Speaker: Stands.

Mr. Graydon: You may be able to locate him in the meantime.

CONSTRUCTION

REFERENCE TO ANNOUNCEMENT OF PARLIAMENTARY ASSISTANT TO MINISTER OF FINANCE TO REFORM CLUB, QUEBEC

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister. Is he now in a position to answer the question I asked him on Monday, as to whether there is any government white paper outlining plans for housing, public works and other developmental projects? If so, will the document be tabled?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): There is no such white paper.

THE CORONATION

SUGGESTED REPRESENTATION OF CANADIAN INDIANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister. Has the government decided to send a representative of the Canadian Indian race to the coronation?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): No, the government has not so decided.

GRAIN

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF BOARD OF GRAIN COMMISSIONERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Would he give the house information as to when we may expect the tabling of the annual report of the board of grain commissioners?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The annual report of the board of grain commissioners is still in the hands of the queen's printer. We have been pressing the queen's printer for some time to furnish it. Thus far, this has not been done. I shall see that another message is sent to him today, to hurry it up.

FISHERIES

CONVENTION FOR PRESERVATION OF HALIBUT FISHERY OF NORTH PACIFIC OCEAN AND BERING SEA

Hon. James Sinclair (Minister of Fisheries) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to approve and confirm the convention between Canada and the United States of America for the preservation of the halibut fishery of the northern Pacific ocean and Bering sea, signed by Canada and the United States of America in Ottawa, on the 2nd of March, 1953, and to provide for the carrying out of the provisions thereof.

Motion agreed to, and the house went into committee, Mr. Robinson in the chair.

Mr. Sinclair: Mr. Chairman, the house has already been informed of the purpose of the convention. That information was given in a statement made earlier at this session, on the day the convention was signed.

[Mr. Knowles.]

The purpose of this resolution is to secure parliamentary approval for a revised convention for the preservation of halibut in the northern Pacific ocean and the Bering sea. There are four changes in the new convention, the first of which is in respect of the actual name of the treaty.

When the treaty was first signed in 1923 it was known as the international fisheries treaty. It was the only international fisheries treaty at that time. Since then there has been a series of international treaties signed by Canada for the preservation of fisheries on our coasts and the costs of other countries. It has been thought that we must now be more specific in our designation of this commission, and the commission will henceforth be known as the international Pacific halibut commission.

The second change is made at the request of the Americans. In the United States the control of fisheries rests principally with the states rather than with the federal government. In the past, as their representatives, the Americans have had as their two commissioners one representative of the federal government and one of the state of Washington. The Americans would now like to give representation to the territory of Alaska, and have asked that the number of commissioners for each country be extended to three, so that they may make that provision.

The third change will give authority to the commission to establish more than one season for the catching of halibut. At the present time the scientists of the commission set the total catch to be made each year, and when that catch has been made the season is ended. Actually it now takes less than two months of fishing on the halibut banks off the Queen Charlotte islands to catch the quota which last year I think was 62 million pounds.

The scientists feel that instead of having just one open season it might be better to have two or perhaps even three at different times of the year in order to exploit fully the different banks. The industry is interested in this because it will mean that instead of having one catch which would have to be held in cold storage for ten months, the fish will remain in the sea and two or three open seasons will allow the fish to be caught at more regular intervals.

The last change is a very minor one. While fishing on the halibut banks themselves is controlled, halibut can be caught on the west coast in other areas incidental to fishing for cod or sole or other ground fish. We have had regulations to control the disposal of such halibut when caught during the closed season, but there have been no regulations to control halibut caught incidental to other fishing during the open halibut season. The new convention makes provision for that.

When the bill is given second reading it is proposed to refer it to the standing committee on marine and fisheries.

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Chairman, we are indebted to the minister for giving us a brief review of the changes being made in connection with the international fisheries commission which is now to be called the international Pacific halibut commission. The international fisheries commission has been giving general satisfaction during the time it has been in operation, which is some 30 years. There have been one or two minor changes made since the commission was started in 1923, but the major changes now being suggested are the result of considerable discussion which has taken place on the Pacific coast as to the advisability of introducing further revisions to the original treaty.

The reason for the change in the name is quite obvious. I understand that all the powers of the original commission are contained in the present convention.

I should like to examine briefly one of the major changes which are being made, namely, the splitting of the halibut season. As I said previously, discussions have been taking place which resulted in its being considered advisable to split the season. I think it has been the desire of the smaller fishing companies and the individual fishermen that such a change should be authorized. It would enable the owner of a small fishing vessel to catch halibut during the halibut season and then be able to catch other species of fish during the closed season for halibut. As the seasons for different species sometimes overlap, it is desirable to have this split season so that the fishermen may go out and for part of the time catch halibut and then perhaps catch salmon, and then later on in the year, during the second or third portions of the season, catch halibut again. That would seem to be advantageous, particularly to the smaller fishing concerns.

I understand that it has not been possible until now to authorize a split season because the scientists have been doubtful whether it would be in the best interests of conservation to increase the quota of the halibut catch. I understand from the minister's statement that the scientists have agreed to the splitting of the season, and may even be prepared to recommend an increased quota.

I should like to ask whether this split season will enable the quota of halibut to be increased. I understand at present it is in the neighbourhood of 55 or 56 million pounds each year. Possibly a decision has not yet been reached as to whether the quota can be increased, but my understanding is that the scientists believe that by splitting the season it will be possible, perhaps in the near future, to increase the quota without affecting the yield in future years. I hope the minister will be able to say something with regard to this.

The number of representatives on the commission has been increased and I understand that Canada is now to have three members, the same as the United States. I presume they will be appointed by this government and not by the province, in the same way that the members of the United States group are to be appointed, one from Alaska and one from the other states. Perhaps it will be possible for the minister to give the committee the names of the representatives. I notice that the treaty fixed the salaries to be paid and perhaps the minister could say a word on that.

My understanding is that the clause dealing with incidental catches merely extends the regulations, which are now applicable during the season when halibut cannot be caught, to the period when halibut can be caught.

I think these are all the points that I have to make in connection with this new convention. My understanding is that it is acceptable to the industry and to those officials who are responsible for the conservation of fish.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, there is very little that needs to be said on this resolution as it is merely renewing the agreement between Canada and the United States, an agreement which has worked well in the past. The changes in the new agreement seem to have been indicated by the developments during the past few years in the halibut industry.

These agreements are arrived at after careful study by representatives of Canada and the United States who are interested in conserving the halibut fishing industry and getting the best out of it, for both countries. The renewal of the agreement has my approval, if that is worth anything.

Mr. Fulton: I could not hear the minister's statement very well because of people moving around, and so on, in the house. I should like to ask whether this convention, which is between Canada and the United States alone, is going to be affected by any action which the Russians may or may not take, and whether or not we are in a position where we are compelled to and should consider the propriety of trying to negotiate with Russia with respect to the preservation of this fishery. I notice that the resolution refers to the halibut fishery of the northern Pacific ocean and Bering sea. Would the minister say a word about the relationship of the Russians to this problem?

Mr. Sinclair: Mr. Chairman, before I answer the points raised may I first of all express my appreciation of the manner in which the convention has been received. The proof of the pudding is in the eating, of course, and the thirty years of international halibut control have been a wonderful thing for the industry on the west coast. The hon. member for Nanaimo asked whether split seasons would result in a quota increase. The bill does not say that there are to be split seasons. The bill will make provision to give the commission authority, if the scientists so recommend, to have split seasons. What will probably happen will be that the next season will be split and the scientists will watch the results.

The scientists do feel that there are some banks on which halibut are not mature at the time of the open season on the main banks. If the fishing could be conducted later on these banks it would be possible to have a larger catch, but that will be a matter to be determined by scientific control. Certainly the quota will not be less because of the split season. He mentioned the fact that this convention has resulted in a very happy relationship both between ourselves and the Americans, and within the industry between fishermen, operators and the scientists of the international halibut commission.

The representatives for Canada are appointed by the federal government. At the moment we have just two and the Americans have just two under the existing convention. Our two representatives are the assistant deputy minister, Mr. George Clark, who is a product of the west coast and who was in the halibut fishery for many years, and a representative of the fishermen and industry, Mr. George Nickerson of Prince Rupert. When the commission is expanded to three we would hope to be able to have a representative of the fishermen and a representative of the processors instead of just a single representative for these groups. The commissioners get no payment. They get their expenses but no payment even on a per diem basis. That is also true of the other fisheries commissions.

[Mr. Fulton.]

That situation does not raise a problem as far as the government representative is concerned, nor does it raise too great a problem as far as the representative of the industry is concerned, but it does present a problem with respect to the fishermen's representative who has to take time off from his job of fishing in order to sit on these commissions. Both we and the Americans are now reviewing the position with respect to some sort of payment for attendance at the meetings.

A question was asked by the hon. member for Kamloops as to the effect on our relationships with the Russians in the north Pacific. This treaty actually has covered the waters of the north Pacific from San Diego up the American coast, up the British Columbia coast, up the Alaskan Panhandle and around into the United States half of the Bering sea. At the moment there is nothing to prohibit the Russians, or for that matter the people of any other maritime nation, from sending their ships into the deep sea offshore waters of that area to fish for halibut. The first real step forward in that regard is the new convention which was passed by the house a little earlier in this session, the Canadian-United States-Japanese treaty for the control of the fisheries in the north Pacific, under which each of these nations agrees to abstain from fishing offshore in the other nations' areas for those stocks which are under scientific study, which are under proper protection and control, and which are being fully exploited.

On our side of the Pacific that includes today the salmon, the halibut and the herring. So far as the Russians are concerned, at the moment they are not competitors at all in fishing in the north Pacific. It is the Japanese of course who are the great fishers on the east side of the Pacific. This convention is one of the treaties which will be respected under the new Canadian-United States-Japanese convention. We have the halibut under full scientific study, full conservation and control, and we are fully exploiting the fisheries.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Sinclair thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 341, to implement a convention between Canada and the United States for the preservation of the halibut fishery.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall this bill be read the second time?

Mr. Sinclair: I wonder if we could have second reading now and refer the bill to the standing committee on marine and fisheries?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: By leave. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Sinclair moved the second reading of Bill No. 341, to implement a convention between Canada and the United States for the preservation of the halibut fishery.

Mr. E. T. Applewhaite (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of holding up second reading of the bill but I would be remiss in my duty if I were to allow second reading to pass without expressing to the government the great satisfaction which will be felt by the halibut fishermen of the Pacific coast that the treaty has been amended in the form that it has. It would be too much to expect any hon. member other than myself to remember that I spoke at some length on this subject on the 28th of June, 1950, at which time I urged upon the government revision of the treaty to make provision for split seasons, giving reasons therefor, and also giving the consensus of opinion of the fishermen of the Pacific coast. They will welcome this most heartily.

I should also like to say that the provision enabling the United States to appoint a commissioner representing Alaska is one which meets with the wholehearted approval and support of the fishermen of the Pacific coast. Canada, as the minister has said, will now appoint an additional commissioner. Without implying any criticism whatever of those already appointed, I would urge in the strongest manner possible that the third commissioner should be one with a practical knowledge and appreciation of the problems of halibut fishing from the point of view of the men who actually go out and catch the fish. I can assure the minister that the convention in its present form will have the wholehearted support of those who catch halibut on the Pacific coast.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on marine and fisheries.

CANADIAN FORCES ACT

AMENDMENTS TO NATIONAL DEFENCE ACT, DEFENCE SERVICES PENSION ACT AND CANADIAN FORCES VOTING REGULATIONS

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 332, to amend the Canadian Forces Act—Mr. Claxton—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 4—Ordinary residence of members of regular forces.

The Chairman: When this bill was under consideration before we were dealing with clause 4, Canadian forces voting regulations.

Mr. Campney: Mr. Chairman, just before the house rose on Monday evening, while we were considering clause 4 of this bill, the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings was good enough to refer to my colleague the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and myself in very kindly words. The hon. member for Greenwood went a step further and included the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings himself in the kindly references. He further made the beneficent suggestion that if the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings and I would confer we might be able to clear up the little difficulty which seemed to be developing about clause 4. That advice was acted upon. As a result, I would like now to propose three amendments to clause 4 which I hope will commend themselves to all hon. members of the house.

One of the points discussed when we were considering clause 4 was the provision for an extension of the period within which those persons who were members of the forces as of June 21, 1952, might elect as their place of residence for purposes of having their votes recorded. As the house will remember, that period expired on September 21, 1952. We have since found that approximately 20,000 personnel had not at that date made their election. The amendment proposed in clause 4 is to the effect that these "delinquents" should have until dissolution of parliament to make their election. There was some suggestion the other evening that there ought to be a fixed time limit as an alternative to the date of dissolution. The amendment which I will ask one of my colleagues to move will provide that persons in the class I have mentioned will have two months from the date that this amending bill is assented to to make their election or until dissolution, whichever shall occur first.

In considering the voting regulations governing members of the forces, paragraph 27, of the Canadian forces voting regulations, which the house will remember is a schedule to the elections act, provides that as soon as possible after the publication of the notice in daily orders on form 5 setting out that the house has been dissolved, the date of the election and other details which I do not think I need to give the house, the commanding officer shall prepare a list of names. There was some feeling among members that the words "as soon as possible" with which the clause begins were perhaps too indefinite and it was therefore suggested that there be a definite time specified rather than a nebulous period. I will therefore ask that paragraph 27 be amended by deleting "as soon as possible" and substituting for those words the words "within two weeks".

The third amendment is a consequential one which provides for renumbering of the subclauses of clause 4. If the house permits I would like to have my colleague move three amendments to clause 4 to give effect to what I have briefly stated.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I so move.

The Chairman: Mr. Fournier (Hull) moves:

That clause 4 be amended by deleting lines 7, 8 and 9 and substituting therefor the following:

"(2) Before the dissolution of the twenty-first parliament or before the expiration of two months from the day on which the Canadian Forces Act, 1953, was assented to, whichever is the earlier, every member of the regular forces who was such a member on the twenty-first day of June, 1952, shall" and also

That clause 4 be further amended by inserting after sub-clause (2) the following sub-clause:

"(3) Paragraph 27 of the said regulations is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

'27. Within two weeks after the publication of a notice in daily orders, in form No. 5, each commanding officer shall, through the liaison officer, furnish to the special returning officer for the appropriate voting territory, a list of the names, ranks, numbers and places of ordinary residence, as prescribed in paragraph 23, of Canadian forces electors attached to his unit; the commanding officer shall also furnish to the deputy returning officer a copy of such list for the taking of the votes of the Canadian forces electors attached to his unit; at any reasonable time during an election, such list and the statements referred to in paragraph 23 shall be open to inspection by any officially nominated candidate or his accredited representative, and such persons shall be permitted to make extracts therefrom.' "

and also

That sub-clauses (3), (4) and (5) be renumbered as (4), (5) and (6) respectively.

I presume that there is an amendment for the corresponding section in part II?

Mr. Campney: Yes.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, I am sure that the kindly words which I directed the other night towards the Associate Minister of National Defence and the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration were justified by the results which have accrued. I am not sure whether the suggestion of the hon. member for Greenwood added to that situation, but at least the three working together yesterday I think accomplished in this matter something which is a distinct improvement over what we had in the committee the night before last.

I still think that it was unfortunate that the situation had to arise regarding these amendments. I think they are an improvement upon that which was originally brought in but the situation is still not as good as it would have been if the report of the elections committee last year had been acted upon and the necessary steps taken at that time. However, as that was not done, we were faced with an unfortunate situation. I know that yesterday both ministers tried to meet the views which were expressed and in the end the amendments which are brought before the committee this morning, although not the most satisfactory in the world, are a definite improvement, and I am sure since it was necessary to have them they will contribute towards the working of the regulations.

I might say that in our discussions yesterday we all thought of other amendments which perhaps could have been made and which would have improved the regulations. I am sure that in some future time after we have had the experience of trying these amendments they will be subject to review. When that does take place, whatever committee is operating at that time should try to re-establish the principle which was established last year.

The Chairman: Shall the amendments carry?

Mr. Harkness: I am not quite clear on the purport of the second amendment as far as the lists are concerned. As I understand the matter, the commanding officer of each unit will have a list prepared and I think the amendment provides that it will be sent to the deputy returning officer. Does that mean that the list which is prepared by the commanding officer might very readily contain the names of men who are going to vote in a hundred or more different constituencies? Does it mean that the names of men who are going to vote in each particular constituency are to be sent to the deputy returning officer of that constituency—or is there just this one list which contains the names of people voting in a large number of constituencies and which will be in the unit office and available for inspection?

Mr. Campney: Mr. Chairman, I am not familiar with the exact routine that is followed. It must be in accordance with what is set out in the regulations and paragraph 27 thereof provides that each commanding officer after publication of this order shall, through the liaison officer, furnish to the special returning officer for the appropriate voting territory a list of names of Canadian forces electors attached to his unit with ranks, numbers and places of ordinary residence, as described in paragraph 23 which we are amending. Whatever detailed procedure the commanding officer follows in that regard is not being changed in any event. The only change is that instead of an indefinite time, which might be interpreted differently by different people, his duty as indicated here is limited to a period of two weeks. In other words, he must have the list of his unit prepared and forwarded to the special returning officer, not in an indefinite period but within two weeks. Otherwise, the procedure followed is whatever the routine is in regard to this section. I am not familiar with the step by step details of the duties of the commanding officer.

Mr. Harkness: I take it that this list prepared by each C.O. will be available in his own office where it can be inspected by the local candidate. In addition to that, I presume he sends a copy of this list to the special returning officer who will be, I suppose, an officer at national defence headquarters. I presume that officer will then make a consolidated list of these people, and will have a list of the men voting in each particular constituency, which list will be available in Ottawa. I should like to ask the minister if these lists will be available to the candidates.

Mr. Campney: I am not going to presume anything in regard to the procedure, but as I understand it the lists that are prepared pursuant to the sections are available for inspection by any person concerned. It is for that purpose they are made. Just how that is done or what steps are taken to accomplish it I cannot say. I am not familiar with it.

Mr. Harkness: I think we should have something a little more definite than that. The minister says he is not familiar with this matter, but none of us is familiar with it. Just reading the regulations the only conclusion to which one can come is that there will be a list for each unit in the particular unit office and there will also be a copy of the list sent to this special returning officer who will be here at national defence headquarters. I think the minister should be able to tell us whether this consolidated list at national defence headquarters will be available, because it would be the only list from which candidates from any particular constituency could find out what people are going to vote in their constituency.

Mr. Campney: I shall get that information in a moment.

Mr. Pearkes: Dealing with subsection 2 which is mandatory in that it says that every member of the forces shall, after the expiration of a time or within two months after the date when this act has been given royal assent, do certain things, I should like to point out that the average soldier, sailor or airman would never know when this act was given the royal assent. What opportunity has a man serving in Korea or on a ship, or even in a station in Canada, to know when this act has been given the royal assent? It seems to me quite unreasonable to expect a private soldier or able seaman, who is not particularly interested in politics, to know when the act has received the royal assent.

Surely, the obligation of informing the individual man through the normal channels should rest on the minister. He should inform the men when the royal assent has been given, and then they could be required to sign the necessary forms. It seems to me that if that is not done, then a very unfair obligation is placed on the serving man.

Mr. Campney: As I intimated on Monday evening when this section was under consideration, it is proposed that when the terminating date is established by royal assent to this bill the position will be fully set out in orders. We are contemplating also—we have not firmly decided this as yet—writing to each one of the men who have not elected, setting out what is open to him and the time within which it must be done. We are anxious, as I am sure all hon. members of the house are anxious, that every possible step be taken to decrease to the lowest possible number those people who have not elected and who may therefore have to be dealt with at the poll on polling day. At the moment we are studying all possible means which might be effective to that end. I can assure the hon. member that the matter will be given every attention by the department, by the minister and also by the services who are anxious to have the matter cleared up as completely as possible.

Mr. Nowlan: I think it is more than a matter of writing letters. The discussion which took place about these amendments was based on the fact that the department requires more time to get these declarations. The average person felt that the period of two months was too long, and it should be shorter. We realize, however, that there are troops scattered throughout Korea and western Europe. The department felt it needed time in which to ensure that as many of these men as possible had signed. The department can write letters if they want to do so, but I doubt if that is the best way of dealing with this. If, when the minister leaves this building today, he were to cause a signal to go out to every commanding officer of every unit in the world, I have enough confidence in the efficiency of these officers and men to believe that they would see to it that within two weeks 90 per cent of the men would be pledged. I think that is the procedure which should be adopted; at least, that is why we think too much time is being taken.

In so far as the lists are concerned, to which the hon. member for Calgary East refers, this is the first time that provision has appeared permitting access to these lists. It was not there before. I might say for the benefit of the minister, who has not had experience with the administration of the lists and some of his officials who have not had that experience, that in many cases these lists were not prepared at all. I think, if the minister is going to write any letters, they should be letters to the commanding officer giving directions as to how this matter should be carried out, and impressing upon him the fact that the best qualified officers and N.C.O.'s should be detailed to do the work.

Mr. Harkness: The minister has not answered my question.

Mr. Campney: Dealing with that question, it is now my understanding that the commanding officer prepares a list of the personnel of his unit, together with their place of residence, and in addition to sending it to the special returning officer for the respective territory, of which there are three in Canada, also sends a copy—perhaps I should read that provision:

—the commanding officer shall also furnish to the deputy returning officer a copy of such list for the taking of the votes of the Canadian forces electors attached to his unit; at any reasonable time during an election, such list and the statements referred to in paragraph 23 shall be open to inspection by any officially nominated candidate or his accredited representative, and such persons shall be permitted to make extracts therefrom.

Mr. Harkness: The difficulty I see is how a candidate or his accredited representative could see this list. How does he know where it is going to be? A member for a Nova Scotia constituency may quite readily have a couple of hundred people stationed in Calgary, Alberta. How is the candidate or his representative to see the list? Naturally, he is not going to be able to see it in Calgary. As I understand what the minister has said, these lists are sent to three particular places in Canada for the forces as a whole, and in each case the list is sent to the special returning officer for this area. Now, is it at the area that the candidate or his representative will see these lists, or where is it?

[Mr. Nowlan.]

Mr. Campney: He may see lists either at the unit through the deputy returning officer or through the special returning officer of the area. In either place all these names are available.

Mr. Harkness: Let us take a practical example. Let us take a constituency in Nova Scotia. In Calgary there are a couple of hundred people from that constituency who will be registered in that constituency in Nova Scotia. Where are the candidates in that constituency in Nova Scotia going to see these lists? They cannot travel out to Calgary; they have not facilities for appointing agents in Calgary, and so forth.

Mr. Campney: As I understand the regulations, if the candidate or the accredited representative of a candidate wants to check across the country he must do so through representatives in the different places. I do not think there are any provisions otherwise in the regulations as they exist now and as they were put in the statute by the committee which considered this matter.

Mr. Harkness: Perhaps we can find out what an area consists of. Is there any sort of master list made for all the units for the particular area concerned which the candidates or the candidates' representatives could look at and get the people from their own constituency?

Mr. Campney: To answer the first question, according to the regulations special returning officers are appointed (a) for Ontario and Quebec; (b) for the maritimes; (c) for the western provinces and lastly in areas where Canadian forces are serving overseas, such areas being as designated by the chief electoral officer.

I am informed that so far as these lists are concerned they are not, as the hon. member calls it, master lists; they are lists as they come in from the units to the special returning officer in the area.

Mr. Harkness: Do these lists also come into any central office here at national headquarters where they might be available?

Mr. Campney: No, I am informed they do not. Once the election is called, the administration of these regulations, as I understand it—except in these particulars where commanding officers are specifically authorized or instructed to do some duty—is under the jurisdiction of the chief electoral officer the same as all other administrative regulations in regard to voting. He is the man who interprets and carries out these regulations. The taking of the vote is not a matter of administration for the army as such nor for the Department of National Defence.

These regulations set out the duties that the officers and personnel of the Department of National Defence have to perform but the actual carrying out of the electoral regulations is not within our jurisdiction. It is under the jurisdiction rather of the chief electoral officer.

Mr. Harkness: It is not the matter of carrying out the vote that I am talking about.

Mr. Campney: In regard to lists or anything else pertaining to the election, all is under the chief electoral officer who, I take it, is governed by the regulations.

Mr. Harkness: The point is that the act provides that the candidate or his representatives shall have access to these lists and see the lists; but from the practical point of view, if the lists are posted up in the hundreds of different stations across Canada, or are available in hundreds of different stations where troops are to be found across Canada, that provision really means absolutely nothing. Unless there is, or are, some central place or places where these lists are available, the provision might just as well not be there. That is what I am getting at, as to whether these lists can be made available at some central area. It seems to me there should not be any undue difficulty in having that done. Is the minister going to comment on that? What is to prevent these lists being sent here to national defence headquarters and being available here?

Mr. Campney: I do not think I can make any comment beyond this. I will certainly see that the observations of the hon. member are taken into consideration. I do not think I can say anything more.

Mr. Pearkes: Will the candidate or his agent be able to see not only the lists of personnel who would record votes in his constituency, but the places where all the other service personnel in that station will be recording their votes?

Mr. Campney: I understand the list shows the places of residence of all the members of the units, together with the places where they are resident for the purpose of casting their vote.

Amendment agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall the section as amended carry?

Mr. Pearkes: May I ask one question on subsection 2. There is an addition there. The addition reads:

But where the member is serving outside Canada or in a ship and none of the foregoing clauses (a), (b), or (c) is applicable—

It seems to me that there may be certain personnel in these services to whom these clauses will not be applicable, and who will not have had any place of ordinary residence in Canada at the time of enlistment. For instance, suppose a person enlisted into the armed forces from outside Canada. We have certain musicians from Holland who were enlisting in the armed forces of Canada. I do not know that they would have a vote, but there would certainly be men from the United Kingdom who will have joined the armed forces in the United Kingdom, and perhaps are now serving in western Europe. The time will come, if it has not already been reached, when they will be eligible to vote in Canada. They would never have had any ordinary place of residence in Canada, and none of the three clauses (a) (b) or (c) would be applicable.

Mr. Campney: In reply to the hon. member, I understand that this particular portion of the clause which he is reading was designed to cover the cases he has mentioned. If a man has the right to vote, he must have come into Canada once and gone out to make the clause applicable, in which event his place of residence would be where he was while in Canada. If a man has never been in Canada I do not think he is covered.

It would appear to me that if he had a spouse or relative in Canada, under the right of election section he could take the residence of his spouse or other dependent or relative. If he has no relative in Canada and has never been in Canada even for a day, I doubt whether he would have the right to vote under the regulations.

Mr. Pearkes: Would he not have the right to vote if he had served the required time in the Canadian armed forces? Would that not entitle him to citizenship?

Mr. Campney: I understand not unless he had actually been in Canada; but if he has served for that length of time in practically all cases he would have been in Canada at some time at least for a day. There might be one type of person who would not fit into any of these particular regulations. I do not think they would be very numerous.

Mr. Pearkes: Yes; I think you might have men who enlisted in the United Kingdom, perhaps men who had been in Canada with the R.A.F. and had received their training here, but then they would not have been members of the Canadian forces. There must be a certain number of men who are enlisted directly from European countries or from the United Kingdom who will be serving in the armed forces of Canada and who, it may be assumed, will take their leave, and all that sort of thing, in the United Kingdom. They would have no permanent residence here. These persons do not seem to be provided for, when they become entitled to a vote.

Mr. Campney: In the narrow circumstances outlined by the hon. member, I should think that if a man had no relatives in Canada, and had never lived here, he could not vote at large. There would be no constituency with which he could be identified. He would have no status, so far as voting is concerned. I do not know where he would poll his vote.

Mr. Pearkes: That is the question I was raising.

Section as amended agreed to.

The Chairman: Hon. members will notice that sections 5, 6 and 7 are duplicates of sections 2, 3 and 4, which have already been carried. Therefore I would assume that they would be carried as well.

Mr. Campney: I would have an amendment to section 7.

Sections 5 and 6 agreed to.

On section 7—Ordinary residence of members of regular forces.

Mr. Campney: I have had an amendment to section 7 prepared, to give effect to the amendment passed this morning to section 4, and I would ask my colleague to move it.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I move:

That in part II, clause 7 of the bill be amended by deleting lines 24, 25, and 26 and substituting therefor the following:

"(2) Before the dissolution of the twenty-first parliament or before the expiration of two months from the day on which the Canadian Forces Act, 1953, was assented to, whichever is the earlier, every member of the regular forces who was such a member on the twenty-first day of June, 1952, shall complete, in duplicate,"

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I move:

That clause 7 be further amended by inserting after line 6, page 11, the following as sub-clause (2):

"(2) Paragraph 26 of the said regulations is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

'26. Within two weeks after the publication of a notice in daily orders, in form No. 5, each commanding officer shall, through the liaison officer, furnish to the special returning officer for the appropriate voting territory, a list of the names, ranks, numbers and places of ordinary residence, as prescribed in paragraph 22, of Canadian forces electors attached to his unit; the commanding officer shall also furnish to the deputy returning officer a copy of such list for the taking of the votes of the Canadian forces electors attached to his unit; at any reasonable time during an election, such list and the statements referred to in paragraph 22 shall be open to inspection by any officially nominated candidate or his accredited representative, and such persons shall be permitted to make extracts therefrom.' "

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I move:

That sub-clauses (2), (3) and (4) be renumbered (3), (4) and (5) respectively.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING ACT

PROVISION FOR GRANT OF CERTAIN TAXES TO CORPORATION

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue) moved the second reading of Bill No. 340, to amend the Canadian Broadcasting Act, 1936.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I do not think I need add much to what was said last night in the discussion on the resolution preceding the bill. The proposed amendment to the Canadian Broadcasting Act, 1936, provides authority for granting to the corporation out of the consolidated revenue fund amounts that equal the taxes collected under the Excise Tax Act on the sale of sound broadcasting sets and apparatus, and similarly for granting to the corporation, on account of television, an amount equal to the taxes collected under the Excise Tax Act on the sale of television receiving sets and tubes.

The proposed amendment continues the provision of funds to the corporation by statutory provision, and does not alter the basic principle for the provision of adequate funds to the corporation, therefore retaining the autonomy which is inherent in the present legislation.

The proposed amendment is one section in the bill, and the repetition of that section also appears. The second one will be repealed when the Revised Statutes of Canada come into effect.

Hon. members will recall that already at this session we have considered Bill No. 225, to amend the Excise Tax Act, and that it has been passed. Section 11 in that bill made provision for the repeal of section 6 in schedule I, and section 6 (a) was substituted therefor. I need not read it in full, but that section now refers to phonographs, record playing devices, radio broadcasting receiving sets or any combination of the foregoing, and the tubes therefor; and states that they shall be subject to a tax of 15 per cent. Then paragraph (b) deals with television apparatus, and makes specific reference to television receiving sets and tubes therefor, as well as any apparatus or device that enables a person to see, or to see and hear, television programs distributed by any means whatever, or television radio broadcasting programs distributed by any means whatever. And in that case, again, the tax is 15 per cent.

If hon. members will recall the discussion that took place when that bill was before the house they will recall that it had, as its purpose, the clarification of all those things included that would have to do with television sets, and this included what are known as rediffusion sets.

I believe that is all the comment I have to make at this time.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, there was some discussion last night at the resolution stage, and I do not propose to repeat now what I said at that time. I do draw attention to the fact, however, that the bill is open to all the objections to which, in my remarks last night, I said it was open, having regard to the observations of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) at the resolution stage and those of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) when he referred to this matter in his budget speech.

The amendment to the act is very brief. It may be simple in appearance; nevertheless it has the effect of setting up continuing legislation under which revenue will be paid over out of the consolidated revenue fund by the Minister of Finance year by year to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, without any further reference to parliament and without need of any further authority from parliament. That is a fundamentally unsound procedure, having regard to the necessity of maintaining strict parliamentary control over all moneys drawn from the consolidated revenue fund.

The minister has said this amendment continues in effect the scheme that has been in existence for a long time. It is quite true that under the combined effect of the Radio Act and the Broadcasting Act as in effect hitherto, the $2.50 licence fee on radio receiving sets has been paid over, under statutory authority, by the government to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. But hon. members will recall that parliament was called upon each year to make provision in a specific item of the estimates for the collection of that radio receiving licence fee. Parliament was thus afforded an opportunity every year at least to debate this whole question.

Under the amendment before us there is no such right. There will not be anything before parliament—unless, by any chance, in his budget proposals the Minister of Finance recommends some change in the excise tax, either by way of the percentage of the tax or in the matter of its application.

I think the house ought to understand clearly that if the amendment is passed in its present form, this will be an end to any annual opportunity for discussion as to whether parliament should make provision in this form and in these amounts for the needs of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I indicated last night that there may be a specious coincidence in amounts as between the amount collected hitherto from licence fees on radio receiving sets and the amount it is calculated will be paid under this new amendment to the corporation for sound broadcasting, being the amount collected by way of excise tax on radio receiving sets and tubes. That happens to be a coincidence and it is nothing more. It is no excuse for ignoring and defying sound parliamentary principles.

It was indicated last night that if given second reading this bill will be referred to the committee on radio broadcasting where it will be further reviewed. If that course is followed I hope the committee will be prepared to propose amendments to this bill because in its present form it is open to the serious charge that it simply lifts control over a substantial amount of money year by year completely out of the hands of parliament. If this measure is passed in this form the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) can go on from now until eternity paying out of the consolidated revenue fund all the amounts collected from the excise tax on the goods mentioned in section 6 of schedule I of the Excise Tax Act. I consider that that is an utterly unsound way of proceeding.

As I said to the house last night, there are additional reasons why parliament should consider this matter annually, why parliament should address itself in each annual session to the consideration of how much it ought to provide to meet the proper expenses of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, both with respect to sound broadcasting and to television. These are matters of vast importance. Because it happens at this particular moment that the amount that the government thinks will be required for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation happens to coincide approximately with the amount that is being yielded at this time from the excise tax on the goods in section 6 of schedule I of the Excise Tax Act, we are being asked to pass this legislation giving the minister power to pay over all the amounts collected from this Excise Tax Act to the corporation.

That is no way to go about meeting this problem. This coincidence in amounts that exists today may not exist in six months' or a year's time. I do not think one would be rash to say that it will not exist in two years' time, in three years' time or in four years' time. Then why do we pass legislation of this kind which has the effect that from now until eternity parliament will not have an annual opportunity of reviewing this whole matter?

This is not doing justice to the obligations of parliament with reference to the very important task that it has placed upon the shoulders of the board of governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Surely they are entitled to have their affairs and financial needs carefully considered year by year in parliament. If this bill is passed in its present form it will preclude that. I say that if the bill is given second reading I hope the committee on radio broadcasting will be able to send back a much better bill than the one that is now before us.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the special committee on broadcasting.

SUPPLY

The house resumed, from Tuesday, April 21, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fournier (Hull) for committee of supply, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Green.

EMERGENCY POWERS ACT—ORDER IN COUNCIL RE TRADE WITH MAINLAND CHINA AND NORTH KOREA

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Howe: Speaking the second time?

Mr. Casselman: The first time.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I have a few remarks that I should like to make with reference to the amendment introduced last evening by my colleague, the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green), to the motion that the house resolve itself into committee of supply. This matter is of recent origin, going back to what happened in the house just two days ago.

[Mr. Fleming.]

May I recall to hon. members precisely what happened in this house on Monday morning of this week, this being Wednesday morning. Among other items of business the house had before it for consideration a number of amendments to the Canada Shipping Act. This bill had been before the house previously, but the house in committee of the whole reviewed the various amendments on Monday morning. It was noted at the time that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) did not remain in the house to pilot the amendments through the committee of the whole, but left the chamber. The amendments were approved in due course, the bill was given third reading and passed on its way to the other place.

After the house had spent but a few minutes in the transaction of some other business, to the surprise of hon. members the Minister of Transport made his appearance just prior to the one o'clock adjournment and proceeded to ask permission to revert to motions. That permission was granted and he thereupon tabled two copies, in English and in French, of order in council P.C. 1953-604, passed on Friday, April 17, under the provisions of the Emergency Powers Act with respect to the control of trade by sea with mainland China and North Korea.

The full significance of what the government has done I think is now abundantly apparent. This was an order in council made in the usual secrecy last Friday. The government must have known about this matter for weeks in advance. In any event they made this order on Friday, April 17. They had ample opportunity last Friday night in announcing the business that would come before the house on Monday, April 20, to refer to this matter. That would have been the time, if they were determined to proceed by order in council, to have acquainted the house with the fact. Much better still, that was the time to notify the house that amendments would be proposed on Monday morning, when the Canada Shipping Act amendments were before the house, to carry into legislative effect in the proper constitutional and parliamentary manner what the government has now done by this order in council.

But, no, the government did not proceed in that manner. The government did not choose to acquaint the house with the facts on Friday evening. The government did not choose to acquaint the house with the fact on motions on Monday morning. Why was it that the government did not take advantage of the opportunity to have announced this order in council on motions? Oh, no, this order was held back, and held back deliberately, until the house had concluded its consideration of the amendments to the Canada Shipping Act. Nothing could be more obvious.

They did not want this subject discussed in parliament. That is equally obvious. Therefore they held it back until the Canada Shipping Act amendments were out of the way. Is this the kind of method that hon. members of this house are going to approve? I put that question to hon. members of this house who are accustomed to support this government. I ask every one of them if he approves the way in which the government has flouted and ignored this House of Commons and denied to the House of Commons information on a matter of very considerable importance as to which there would have been an opportunity on Monday morning for adequate discussion in the parliamentary manner. That is question No. 1, Mr. Speaker.

Let us follow that a little further. How did the government proceed? Where did they seek to find a method of dealing with the problem, a problem that was described by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) last night in his very angry and ill-tempered speech as contraband trade? This House of Commons, Mr. Speaker, does not take second place to the Minister of Trade and Commerce or the government in its determination to see that proper measures are taken to prevent trade in contraband with communist China. Why does the government not trust the House of Commons? The House of Commons is capable of prompt action. It has shown that on more than one occasion where conditions required prompt action. But oh no, the government did not choose the parliamentary method. They wanted to do this by their secret and favourite method of legislating by order in council.

They might have approached the matter through the Canada Shipping Act, but they did not do so. They went to a statute which has now acquired a very ugly and notorious history, the Emergency Powers Act. This is a measure that has had as much discussion at the present session as any measure that has come before the house. No legislative measure that has come before the house this year has been subjected to as lengthy debate or as critical comment as the bill to extend the Emergency Powers Act.

That measure was criticized because of the breadth of the powers that the government sought to take from parliament to do virtually everything that parliament can do with the exception of taxation, arrest, detention and deportation. Everything else in the way of transfer of absolute powers they grasped from parliament. When we in this quarter of the house criticized that measure, when we said that no self-respecting parliament could pass a measure virtually abdicating its powers to the executive branch of government, we were told by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in the most soothing terms, in the intervention he made in the debate in its late stages on March 26, that the house need have no fear, that the government would be so careful in the exercise of these powers, that the utmost regard would be had for all democratic privileges and considerations, and that the house might well subdue all fears that it entertained about placing in the hands of the governor in council powers that could be used virtually to subvert the entire constitution of the country and stop all pretence of parliamentary government. Such was the assurance that the house received from the Prime Minister.

Some of us were very critical of the way in which the government in the two years that this measure has been in existence had proceeded to legislate by this method while parliament was in session and quite capable of providing anything required in the way of legislation. What was the record that we pointed out then? In 1951 nineteen orders in council were passed under the Emergency Powers Act and every one of them was passed while parliament was in session, because that year parliament sat from January 30 to December 29; and as to parliament being actually sitting while the orders were passed, every one of them was passed at a time when parliament was actually sitting and not in recess. In the year 1952 five orders in council were passed under the Emergency Powers Act, and three of the five were passed while parliament was actually sitting and quite capable of enacting anything that was required to meet any legislative lack at the time.

We raised this question and raised it repeatedly, and one would have thought that the government would have enough regard for the institution of parliament to have refrained from proceeding to legislate by this order in council method while parliament was actually in session. The order in council in question in this debate was passed on April 17, last Friday. The house was in session that day from eleven o'clock in the morning until ten o'clock at night. Again on Monday, April 20, the house was in session from eleven o'clock on, and I have already pointed out that a bill was under debate in the house that morning under which this measure could have been introduced by the government as a proper amendment to the Canada Shipping Act.

So, Mr. Speaker, we have it crystal clear that this government does not care whether or not parliament is sitting. They have the powers under the Emergency Powers Act, and use those powers they will in whatever way they choose, whether parliament is sitting or not. In the view of the government, when a situation like this arises parliament as an institution might just as well not be in session. We might just as well pack our bags and go home so far as the government is concerned.

An hon. Member: Go ahead.

Mr. Fleming: They do not take us into their confidence. They do not discuss problems of this kind with us. They just go ahead and follow their secret and favourite method of proceeding to legislate by order in council.

Let there be no doubt in the mind of any hon. member, Mr. Speaker, or in the mind of any Canadian that this is legislation. This is not some matter of regulation, some small matter that does not require the direct attention of parliament. This is not the sort of thing that parliament sometimes makes provision for by way of regulations to carry out the intent of a statute. This is legislation. No legislation enacted by parliament this year is more directly legislative in form or effect than order in council P.C. 1953-604.

We have here now—and let the public fully realize it—two law-making bodies. We have parliament containing the elected representatives of the people sitting here transacting public business in public for all to see and so that the public may form its judgment upon the way in which its business is done in parliament. At the same time we have another legislative body that meets in secret and by star chamber methods proceeds to pass legislation just as binding upon every Canadian as the legislation enacted here in parliament in due parliamentary form. Which is the democratic method? The parliamentary method is a method that has been tested down through the centuries and has been found to be the one method that will guarantee the preservation of the rights and liberties of the people. Long ago secret methods were found to be the kind that make it easy for executive bodies to trespass upon the rights of the people.

The executive branch of government, historically and in fact, has never been the champion of the rights of the people. It has been parliament and parliament alone that has fought the battles for the preservation of the rights and freedoms of the people. Parliament and the people have an opportunity now of seeing under their very eyes parliament proceeding to legislate in the traditional parliamentary and democratic method, and side by side a cabal consisting of twenty men proceeding to legislate by star chamber methods that were found three centuries ago to be so notorious that men were prepared to shed their blood to exterminate them. There was no occasion whatever, Mr. Speaker, no need whatever, for the governor in council to proceed by this method. Parliament was in session. Parliament was dealing with matters directly cognate with this very subject matter, and it would have been a relatively easy matter to have introduced this subject in the house on Monday morning by way of an amendment to the bill then under consideration in the house. So, Mr. Speaker, you will never have a more flagrant case than this of the government deliberately choosing to ignore parliament, abandoning parliamentary methods and proceeding to legislate in secret by order in council.

Now, sir, what were the excuses, the pretexts offered by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) last night for this attack on parliament in his angry speech? There were two excuses which he gave, Mr. Speaker, and the first was that the end justifies the means.

Mr. Fraser: That is pretty flimsy.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, when parliament's position is at stake, when the parliamentary and democratic process is challenged, we of the official opposition say most directly to this government and to the Minister of Trade and Commerce that the end cannot justify the means, when you deliberately choose autocratic and unparliamentary means. There is no excuse here for the way in which this government went about it. It was an empty and hollow pretext which the minister sought to put forward last night, and it will convince no one. I do not think that the minister even convinced himself.

Then the minister said: That is the way they did it in the United States and in the United Kingdom. Well, the minister ought to know perhaps better than most members of this house that under the system prevailing in the United States, with congress enacting general legislation, it is their policy and practice to leave matters to the executive branch of government which we, under our system of responsible government, would not think of vesting in the executive branch of the government—at least until this house came to be dominated by an autocratic administration here which had lost all knowledge of true parliamentary processes.

The reference on the part of the minister to the United Kingdom was indeed interesting because it sheds a clear light on something which the Minister of Trade and Commerce said last night in attempting to stampede this house into thinking that this was a matter of real, desperate urgency. He said it was a time for action and not for talk. Well, you see that to his autocratic mentality parliament is just a place for talk, and therefore, he has no patience with it. He has shown that many and many a time. His mentality is obviously not adjusted to parliamentary processes because it is quite true that parliament is a place where people talk. That is the democratic method that has been found by a process of long experimentation to be the kind that is safe and the kind that preserves the rights and freedom of people—so that anything that even resembles talk is anathema to him. To the Minister of Trade and Commerce action is the thing that matters; action is what he demands. Well, the House of Commons is quite prepared to move as quickly as is required, Mr. Speaker.

As I have indicated, his references to the United Kingdom approach to this question have some very interesting light to shed upon the atmosphere of urgency that the Minister of Trade and Commerce sought to throw about this matter. What do we find, Mr. Speaker, to be the fact—the fact that was not stated to this house last night by the Minister of Trade and Commerce? When we look up the records of the United Kingdom we find that their order was made on March 13, 1953—over a month before this matter became one of such desperate urgency last Friday that this government could not even tolerate the idea of putting it before parliament. It was laid before the parliament of the United Kingdom on March 16, 1953, one month and one day before the cabinet here proceeded to pass this order in council. It came into operation on March 17, 1953, one month exactly before this government considered it necessary to pass this order in council—this notorious order in council.

Mr. Howe: Is the order in council in the United Kingdom also notorious?

Mr. Fleming: I do not know what reasons prompted them to proceed the way they did over there; but I doubt very much if the Minister of Trade and Commerce knows very much about the legislation under which it was passed over there; so that any reference he made was based upon a very superficial review of the situation there. I will tell him that if he had taken the trouble to study the facts, instead of contributing more heat than light to the debate last night, he would have been frank enough to have told this house that this matter did not have any of the urgency which he attempted to attach to it last night. The matter was settled over a month ago in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Howe: My hon. friend might at least tell the parliament of Westminster how to run their affairs.

Mr. Fleming: I do not tell them that but I do tell the Minister of Trade and Commerce that if there is anybody in this house who has demeaned parliament, who has treated parliament with utter contempt, time and time again, it is he. There is nobody who is a greater menace in this house to all parliamentary processes than the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member cannot make a statement of that kind. He must withdraw it.

Mr. Howe: Show your contempt for parliament.

Mr. Speaker: I cannot allow it to stand.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, may I ask which remark you mean?

Some hon. Members: All of them.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I heard the hon. member say that the Minister of Trade and Commerce was a menace to parliament.

Mr. Howe: That he demeaned parliament.

Mr. Speaker: I cannot allow that statement to stand.

Mr. Fleming: I will correct that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): You will withdraw.

Mr. Speaker: Before correcting it the hon. member must withdraw the statement.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, I am told by those who are around me that I did not say that the minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Howe: There is no use denying it.*

Mr. Speaker: I cannot allow an argument about this. I heard what the hon. member said and he must withdraw the statement he made that the minister was a menace to parliament.

Mr. Fleming: If that is what I said I will certainly withdraw it in view of your ruling; but I will say that the Minister of Trade and Commerce has repeatedly treated this House of Commons and parliamentary institutions with the utmost contempt. What he said last night—

An hon. Member: That is the same thing.

Mr. Speaker: I do not think the hon. member can say that the minister has treated this parliament with contempt.

*See also page 4226.

Mr. Fleming: With great respect, sir, that very remark has been made in this house—

Mr. Howe: By yourself.

Mr. Fleming: And others.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps this is the time I should stop it. I do not think I should allow any hon. member to refer to a minister as treating parliament with contempt.

Mr. Fleming: The way to correct that is for the minister to change his attitude.

Mr. Howe: Withdraw.

Mr. Speaker: I think I should clear the matter up now. The hon. member must withdraw the statement he has made that the minister has repeatedly treated this parliament with contempt.

Mr. Howe: So withdraw it.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, I hope you will have something to say to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who has undertaken to give orders to both yourself and myself now. I want to make a submission with regard to that remark.

Mr. Speaker: I would first like the statement cleared up. I would like a withdrawal from the hon. member who has accused the minister of treating parliament time and again with contempt.

Mr. Fleming: Yes, Mr. Speaker, there is no question about that statement. I have certainly said that. This is not the first time I have said it.

Mr. Martin: Withdraw; the Speaker has made a ruling.

Mr. Speaker: I should not have allowed it in the past, and I am not allowing it now.

Mr. Martin: Show your own respect for parliament.

Mr. Fulton: Will you permit me to suggest to Your Honour that you are going a little farther than you would intend to go—

Mr. Howe: You are telling the Speaker?

Mr. Fulton: I am suggesting, not telling, which is the minister's habit. I am suggesting that perhaps Your Honour is going a little farther than Your Honour would intend to go if, as I understand it, you are about to rule that the statement that the minister has been in contempt of parliament or used parliament with contempt is unparliamentary. On page 97 of Beauchesne's second edition, I find a list of expressions, and while I am not saying it is all-embracing it is the result of a good many experiences of this sort, and in a quick examination I do not find that the use of the word "contempt" in that sense has ever been held to be unparliamentary.

Mr. Speaker: They are merely examples. Certainly to suggest that the minister is in contempt of parliament is unparliamentary.

Mr. Fulton: The expression is "has used parliament with contempt." I am sorry; I used the wrong expression.

Mr. Speaker: I feel, and I am sure the hon. member for Eglinton will agree with me, that it is unparliamentary. But whether or not he does agree I must ask him to withdraw the statement that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) has treated, and is treating, parliament with contempt.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, you know me well enough to know—

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Fleming: —that if I had thought for one moment the expression was unparliamentary I would not have used it, no matter how strong my feelings may be on the subject I was discussing. This is the first time, after that expression has been used on a number of occasions, that any objection has been taken to it in the house as being unparliamentary.

Now, if you compel me to withdraw it, then I have no course but to withdraw it. I do want to say this. I remind the house that it has been used before, not once but many times, and never before has objection been taken to it by the Chair or by the house.

Mr. Speaker: I understand that the hon. member has, in view of my ruling, withdrawn.

Mr. Fleming: I said that your ruling compels me to withdraw, and I have no alternative but to withdraw it.

Mr. Martin: That is not a withdrawal.

Mr. Fleming: Perhaps I have to say it again to the ministers over there who are engaged in these overtones of raucous interruption, that your ruling compels me to withdraw. I have no alternative but to withdraw in view of your ruling, and therefore I withdraw.

Mr. Martin: That is fine.

Mr. Graydon: That is what he said before.

Mr. Fleming: It is what I said before, precisely. I will say this. This government is going to be called to account for the way in which it has treated parliament. Whom the gods would destroy, they first make mad.

We had a very good example of it last night on the part of the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Hansell: Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on this amendment, but since I have noticed that in the last couple of days we have gone over one o'clock and over ten o'clock at night, I am wondering if you would not consent, since it is only three minutes to one, to having one period short of one o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the wish of the house that I call it one o'clock?

Mr. Sinnott: If the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) does not wish to go ahead, I will.

Mr. Hansell: If the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Sinnott) wishes to go ahead I do not mind, but I do not want to lose my place in the debate. I have not risen to speak as yet. I am only rising to ask you, Mr. Speaker, to call it one o'clock.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): When the house rose for the luncheon recess we were discussing the amendment that was proposed by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) in respect to the order in council which was passed the other day while parliament was in session.

Last night I listened with a good deal of interest to the speeches that were made on that amendment. It is not necessary to repeat what the leader of this party said last evening in putting our position plainly before parliament in respect to this action and in respect to this amendment. Our leader said that we supported the amendment because we believed that it was a negation of the right of a democratic parliament. I do not believe there is one argument against that position. I believe the position taken by the government is indefensible.

Much was said last night with regard to the right thing being done the wrong way. Perhaps a good deal of emphasis was placed on that phrase. It is all very well for a government that does something in the wrong way to rise and point the finger at opposition members and say: "Well, did we do right?" Of course that is tantamount to putting the opposition on the spot, so that they will declare whether they agree with it or not. I do not believe it is a matter of doing the right thing in the wrong way at all. I think it goes farther than that. It is a matter of the government assuming that they are right, and that they alone are capable of determining what is right.

It is not so long ago, as a matter of fact, just a few short weeks ago, that we were discussing the Emergency Powers Act under which the government was able to pass this order in council. What arguments took place then? The whole opposition in that debate were opposed to that measure, mainly because the government assumed power under it to take action while parliament was in session. At the time the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) became more or less an apologist for the government along that line.

It amazes me, Mr. Speaker, that after that act was passed, after all the arguments were used, even after the Minister of Justice, by inference anyway, agreed that it was not the proper principle to apply, orders in council should without necessity be passed while parliament was in session. They wanted the powers of the Emergency Powers Act so that they would be able to do things in an emergency when parliament was not in session. It amazes me that just so soon after the passing of that act and the arguments put forth, the government has turned around and done the very thing which they admitted at the time was, under our democratic processes, an objectionable thing to do. How they could do that, I do not know. Even the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) himself, during the debate on the Emergency Powers Act, admitted that to pass orders in council while parliament was sitting was an objectionable thing to do.

I recall particularly the statements he made, although at the time he was talking particularly of a secret order which was passed in compliance with certain actions that were taken by the North Atlantic treaty nations. What did the Prime Minister say at that time? He said, as reported at page 3318 of Hansard:

> All those who are parties to the North Atlantic alliance share with each other top secret information because of our confidence that there are measures being taken for the proper protection against or the anticipation of sabotage and espionage.
> It is unfortunate to have to live in a world where that has to be done. It is unfortunate that we cannot feel that everybody in the world is going to behave in a manner befitting a Christian gentleman, but that is not the world we are living in. There are certain things that we are reluctantly forced to do if we attempt to discharge the responsibilities that happen to be ours.

Well, as I say, I know he was talking about a particular secret order, and I am not one, and never have been one, to object particularly, if a time of emergency arises, where a secret order has to be passed by a responsible government. I have never criticized the government on the action they took at the time the spy scandal broke out in this country. I have never criticized them for setting up the commission to investigate that matter and denying counsel for the time being to those who were suspected of sabotage. I have never criticized them for that action. It was an emergency at the time. I do not think parliament was in session. It may have been, because I happened to live next door to Mr. Gouzenko's apartment, and I wondered what it was all about at the time. Unfortunately, that was the situation. The government took the bull by the horns and acted according to the power granted them. I have never criticized them for doing that. In fact, I believe I have said in my public meetings that it was the proper thing to do, that I would have done the same thing under ordinary circumstances. And I say "I"—but of course I never will have a responsibility of that kind.

I never have criticized the government for that. I do not criticize them for doing the right thing at the right time. But if, as the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) himself admitted in the debate on the Emergency Powers Act, to do such things would be objectionable, even though he were applying the law to a secret order, how much more objectionable is it when it is not necessary that the order be kept secret, and when parliament is sitting. Upon the face of it, and in the light of the government's own admission as stated by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) and the Prime Minister, how much more objectionable is this.

I say we have reasons for supporting the amendment of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) in connection with the order in council which, as he says, was passed while parliament is sitting. I must admit that I do not know what happens in a cabinet meeting. I do not know how they discuss their orders in council.

Mr. Fulton: Howe discusses them.

Mr. Hansell: Well, perhaps the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) does.

Mr. Knowles: And he is not denying it.

Mr. Hansell: I am almost tempted to think there are so many orders in council that have to be passed—and I am not referring only to orders in council passed under the Emergency Powers Act—and there is so much for the cabinet to do, that someone in the civil service shoves a lot of orders in council in front of them and says, "Sign." They sign. And then they awaken to the fact—"by golly"—

An hon. Member: Careful, careful.

Mr. Hansell: —"we have signed something here we should not have signed. Let us place it on the table. It will be all right there." It is either that or, knowing full well what they are doing, they do something that is objectionable to parliament, and know that someone will talk back to them about it. It is one thing or the other; you cannot have it both ways.

In my imagination I go up to the council chamber and take a little keyhole peep at the cabinet in session. I can see an order in council of this kind coming before them. Now, I have always said the Prime Minister is an honest man, and I think he is.

Mr. Fraser: Have you any doubt?

Mr. Hansell: Well, I mean to say that I judge by what he says in the house, and how he reacts to certain arguments. For instance, I remember when not long ago the house was discussing horses. He rose in his place and admitted certain things—and that was the gentlemanly and the nice way to do it.

Mr. Hees: It is the only thing you can do when you are caught.

Mr. Hansell: I can go only by what I see and hear; but I do not view the Prime Minister as a slippery politician, at all. I do not, and I never have.

Mr. Byrne: Can't say the same for you.

Mr. Hansell: Who said that?

Mr. Fulton: The hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne).

Mr. Speaker: Order. There are too many remarks being made, and I am unable to hear them. If hon. members wish to make any statements they should rise in their places and make them loud enough so that I can hear what is being said.

Mr. Hansell: Yes; let him rise in his place and say that anyone here is not honest. If the remark was directed to me, let him say it now.

Mr. Fraser: The hon. member for Kootenay East.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The remark, if it was made, should not have been made.

Mr. Hansell: It is all right; I do not mind if it is on the record.

Mr. Speaker: But I would not allow it to remain on the record.

Mr. Hansell: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am not ashamed of a single, solitary thing I have ever done in the political field or in this House of Commons.

Now, let me get back to the keyhole again, if I may. Here is an order in council, such as we are now discussing. The Prime Minister says, "Well, boys, we have this matter of ships entering Chinese ports"—and so forth and so on; or it may be something else. "What are we going to do about it?" Someone rises and says, "Well, it is the right thing to do." The Prime Minister says, "It may be the right thing, but do you not think that the way we should do it is not the right way?" The Minister of Trade and Commerce says, "Huh! Huh!"

I can imagine looking through that keyhole during a session of cabinet and the Minister of Trade and Commerce saying, "Huh". But when he has the nerve to say it in the House of Commons, that is too much for me. I cannot understand it.

Then the Prime Minister says, "Well perhaps we had better pass it." And the gentleman sitting at the end of the table, the Secretary of State (Mr. Bradley), is asked by the Prime Minister, "What do you think about it?"

Mr. Hees: Wake him up.

Mr. Hansell: He pops up and says, "Well, Mr. Prime Minister, I just was not listening. Anything you say will be all right." And then, speaking to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier), "Mr. Minister of Public Works, you are responsible for the conduct of the business of the house. What do you think about it?" "Oh, it is all right; pass it. We will have enough Liberal backbenchers there who will heckle so much that no one will understand what the opposition are saying, anyway."

The order in council is passed. Eventually it is laid on the table. And we are now in the process of debating whether or not it is a negation of the democratic rights of parliament. I say, and I do believe, that the government should admit it has made a mistake in doing what it has done while parliament is in session. It should tell us whether it was an order in council signed along with a million others, or whether it knew what it was doing at the time. Did they know what they were doing, right on the heels of their being given power by parliament under the Emergency Powers Act, and having been made aware of all the objections to exercising it while parliament was in session? Knowing that, did they deliberately flout the desires of this parliament by preventing a matter which is not secret being brought before us for discussion?

The action involved in the order in council is right; and if they had come down with a measure, I am sure it would not have taken more than an hour or two of debate for us to have said that—

Mr. Howe: And to get it through both houses?

Mr. Hansell: —this is the right thing to do at this particular time. It is the obvious thing.

Let me ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) if his attitude is that it was done because it would take too long. Is that the reason they passed the order in council, because they thought that if this legislation were brought down it would take too long to discuss it? Is that the reason? No answer. I think that they should give us a reason. They have not given us a satisfactory answer yet.

We are not discussing whether it is right, we are discussing whether or not the government should set itself up as the high potentate and great umpire over those who are able to say what is right and what is wrong. We in this house have the right to say what is right and what is wrong before the thing is done. Those are our objections. I think they will hold water, and if the debate has done nothing else it has served to indicate that the government should go a little slower with orders in council while parliament is in session. Whether they will take any notice of it, I do not know. I would suggest just one thing, that if they do this again it will indicate what the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) was trying to say this morning.

Mr. J. S. Sinnott (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, when the motion to go into committee of supply was moved last night and the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) got up and objected to this order in council which had been passed, I was reminded of a drowning man grasping for a straw.

An hon. Member: Out in Springfield.

Mr. Sinnott: You boys can have your fun, but I am going to say what I have to say.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Sinnott: I want to make it crystal clear that there was no secret order passed whatsoever. I want to quote what the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) said, as reported on page 4089 of Hansard of April 20:

> Mr. Speaker, may I have permission to revert to motions and to table two copies in English and in French of P.C. 1953-604, an order in council passed on Friday, April 17, under the provisions of the Emergency Powers Act with respect to the control of trade by sea with mainland China and North Korea. This order provides that no ship registered in Canada shall, after the 20th day of April, 1953, proceed to the mainland of China and North Korea without a licence. This order is being passed pursuant to discussions which took place between the British and the Americans in Washington following the visit here of the Right Hon. Mr. Eden, and after those discussions the hope was expressed that we in Canada would pass a similar order in council.

Mr. Green: May I ask the minister whether the United Kingdom and the United States have adopted similar measures?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, both countries have.

Mr. Green: Is this order identical with the provisions made by the British and the Americans?

Mr. Chevrier: I can say that it is identical with the British order because I have seen it, but I have not seen the American, although I am told that it was the hope of both the American and the British governments that this be done.

That was the end of the discussion. Later on the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, being the shrewd politician that he is, decided that here was a straw that could be grasped by the Conservative party and decided to bring up this thing again. I speak as a backbencher on this side and I want to say that I do not at all times follow the lead of the government. But I do want to express my own personal opinion about this order in council which was passed for the protection of every man, woman and child in this country. Who on the opposition side can say that the government did not know that there was a load of contraband near Korean or Chinese waters?

As soon as the government could do so they indicated that they had passed this order in council on Friday last. Nothing was concealed, nothing was hidden, nothing was done that should not have been done. It has been admitted by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra and by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) that this was the proper thing to do, but it was done in the wrong way.

It may be true that amendments should have been put through on Monday but, as I said before, who knows that there may not have been half a dozen ships filled with contraband near these waters at that time and this order may have been necessary.

Mr. Fraser: It should have been passed a year ago.

Mr. Sinnott: No one knows better than the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has given every assurance that orders in council would not be passed unless they were essential and necessary for the protection of this country. I want to indicate with these few remarks that my opinion is that this order was passed with all good intentions and that political capital should not be made out of something that does not exist.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, as my leader, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), indicated last night, we shall support the amendment which has been moved by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) because we believe that this parliament should pass a vote of censure upon the government for what it has done in passing this order in council under the Emergency Powers Act even though parliament was in session at the time.

The hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Sinnott) has expressed his view as one member on the Liberal side of the house. I was interested in looking up the views of another member on the Liberal side who had something to say about this question when we were debating the emergency powers legislation earlier this year. I refer to the hon. member for London (Mr. Jeffery) whose remarks will be found on page 2107 of Hansard for February 19. He made it clear that the only reason he was prepared to vote for this legislation was that he felt that it might be needed during a time when with an election being held there would be no parliament to call into session.

On that occasion that Liberal member said that he took second place to no one, not even to the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), in his opposition to emergency powers legislation. So far as he was concerned, it was wrong in principle and he was against it. Nevertheless he did say that he was going to support the government on that occasion because he felt that they might have to have this kind of stand-by power during a period when because of an election there was no parliament.

I am satisfied that the view expressed by the hon. member for London was held by a good many members on the Liberal side of the house. I am satisfied that there are many of them who do not like this legislation but who felt that there was sufficient weight to the argument made by the hon. member for London to go along with the government in support of this measure. Therefore, I suggest that there will be members like the hon. member for London and others in the Liberal party who will be just as annoyed as we are that so soon after the passing of the Emergency Powers Act, presumably for the purpose of having it when parliament was not here, particularly for the purpose of having it when there was no parliament at all, it is used simply for the purpose of avoiding debate on the floor of parliament.

When we of this group expressed our opposition to this measure in the debate that took place earlier this session we indicated that we had come to the conclusion that the government regarded the emergency powers legislation simply as a convenience. Indeed, I took the trouble to indicate some of the orders in council that had been passed under the emergency powers legislation and pointed out that in many cases that was all the government had done; it had just used that legislation as a convenience. I remember, for example, that one of the measures passed had to do with the foot-and-mouth disease. The government said that they thought they could have passed it under other legislation but since there was some doubt they used this legislation which was there for them to use. Then there were other items, an item with reference to the content of the Canadian five-cent piece and others of that kind which certainly made it clear to me that the government has had emergency powers legislation for so long that they regard it as a convenience which they are not prepared to do without.

I submit the sequence of events in this case is evidence of the fact that the government is just using the Emergency Powers Act as a convenience, as a means of bypassing discussion in parliament. I have had to be out of the chamber a part of the time today because the committee on industrial relations is meeting and dealing with a couple of very important pieces of legislation. Therefore I may have missed some of the points that have been made, but I should like to make this point whether or not it has been made before. The order in council which we are now discussing—and please bear in mind, Mr. Speaker, that we are not discussing the subject matter of the order; we are discussing the method by which this law has come into being—was passed by the governor in council, in other words, by the cabinet, on Friday, April 17 last. That means that when the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) came into the house at eleven o'clock on Monday morning, April 20, he must have had the order in council in his pocket. If he did not have it physically in a pocket in the clothes he was wearing, he at least had it with him and could have tabled it at eleven o'clock that morning, on motions.

That is the time when documents of this kind are usually tabled in the House of Commons. But no, the Minister of Transport did not choose to table this order in council, passed on the previous Friday, at eleven o'clock on Monday morning I wonder why. There is in this case circumstantial evidence that is going to be pretty hard for the government to answer. The fact of the matter is that the Canada Shipping Act was up for discussion that very morning and it follows inevitably that if an order of that kind had been laid on the table of the house at eleven o'clock there would have been discussion on it during the consideration of the amendments to the Canada Shipping Act. But no, the Minister of Transport held back the tabling of the order in council until his parliamentary assistant had successfully piloted the amendments to the Canada Shipping Act through the house. A little later that same morning, just before one o'clock, the Minister of Transport then rose and asked the house to revert to motions so that he could table this order in council which had been passed the previous Friday under the Emergency Powers Act.

I submit that that makes it clear that all the government was trying to do was to by-pass a discussion in parliament. I submit that it is not of consequence whether that discussion might have taken five minutes or five hours. The point is that the right way to put legislation on the statute books of the country is to have it passed by parliament, and any faith that some people, like the hon. member for London (Mr. Jeffery) and others of his party who expressed the views they did during an earlier debate, have in the government so far as its use of emergency powers is concerned must be badly shattered by this early use of these powers for this purpose.

A great deal has been said about the need for getting this legislation into effect quickly but, as I believe has already been pointed out, the British experience was that their order in council was passed on March 13, tabled in the British House of Commons on March 16 and came into effect on March 17. I am not condoning their action in doing it by order in council, but the point I am making is that it appears that the decision of the three governments, the United Kingdom, the United States and the Canadian, to pass orders of this kind was apparently made back in the middle part of March. Yet the government waits from the middle of March, when Mr. Eden was here, until the 20th of April and then tells us there is such hurry about this matter that it has to be done by order in council rather than by putting it through parliament in the proper way.

We did not like the emergency powers legislation itself. We opposed it when the votes were called earlier this session, and we are still against it. We raised particular objection to the use of these powers when parliament is in session. We have objected on other occasions to the additional power the government took in 1950 to keep any order in council secret. We suggest that the present experience will increase the doubts of many people as to the wisdom of parliament in having given the government these emergency powers, and we hope that after the censure now being made of the government through the terms of this motion, and through the support I hope there will be for it, there will be an end to this sort of practice on the part of the government. It is bad business, and it should cease.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Just prior to the noon adjournment there was a discussion in the house during the course of which you asked me to withdraw certain words, which I did. In the course of that discussion you will remember that there were a good many interruptions and interjections hurled across the floor from the ministerial benches. At the time I could not distinguish them all. I did not distinguish one that I now find was made and which is a breach of the rules of the house. One member thought he heard it and spoke to me afterward and told me that I should check it up in the transcript of the Hansard notes. I have done that and this is what I find in that transcript.

An hon. Member: Did you change it?

Mr. Fleming: No, I did not change it.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fleming: That is another slur from the other side of the house and I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to rebuke the hon. member who interjected it. This is how the passage reads in the transcript:

> Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, I am told by those who are around me that I did not say that the minister—
> Mr. Speaker: Order.
> Mr. Howe: There is no use lying about it.
> Mr. Speaker: I cannot allow an argument about this.

And so on. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that you could not have heard, as I did not hear, the remark made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce when he said, "There is no use lying about it", and in that way imputed a dishonest statement to a member of the house. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to require the minister now to withdraw that remark which is in breach of the rules of the house.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Speaker, in reading the transcript I myself noticed it. I knew it was unparliamentary and I communicated with you, Mr. Speaker, and after that changed the transcript to read "denying it". I am now making a full confession. If my hon. friend would like me to expunge the line I will do that. I am sorry I made the remark. I was a little annoyed at my hon. friend and I think he was a bit annoyed too. That is the story. What would my hon. friend like me to do more than that?

Mr. Fleming: So far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, that is quite sufficient. I am glad the minister has spoken as he has.

Mr. J. L. MacDougall (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in this debate with considerable reluctance, for the simple reason that I have a terrific regard for the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacDougall: I dislike very much to have to rise to my feet and, according to my conscience and the principles which I hold, disagree with them on this matter. If my memory serves me correctly, it seems to me that when the Emergency Powers Act was being discussed—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If I may interrupt for a minute, perhaps I should say with respect to the statement made by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) that it had been my intention to bring the matter to the attention of the house when it resumed at 2.30 this afternoon, but the hon. member was not in his seat at that moment. I am pleased that he raised the matter as soon as he came into the house.

Mr. MacDougall: You are not referring to me, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: No.

Mr. MacDougall: With respect to this whole problem, I think we must recognize that Canada has won its nationhood by the blood of Canadian men and women in two world wars. I am proud of the fact that I am a Canadian and, by virtue of that, I cannot particularly conform to either the executive action of the United Kingdom in dealing with this matter or the executive action of the United States in dealing with this matter. To me, we are not a satellite of either one or both of those countries and as a result, if that argument is correct, then we have a perfect right, our own Canadian right as representatives of Canadian people from the Atlantic to the Pacific, to decide rightly or wrongly how matters such as this should be dealt with.

In addition, we recognize the fact that for the maintenance of peace, order and good government this parliament has delegated certain powers to the government. As a Liberal with a capital "L" I have never been too enthusiastic in my support of emergency powers but this year, of all years that we have granted emergency powers, it seemed to me they were justified. That was because of the fact that, and I think most hon. members will agree with me, during this year there are going to be a number of days when Canada is not going to have a parliament. Consequently there will be a period when Canadians will have what might be termed a dead parliament and a dead parliament cannot in any emergency be whipped back to life. Therefore, it seemed to me that this was the one year where emergency powers were necessary and I fully supported the granting of those emergency powers—largely along the lines mentioned by the hon. member for London (Mr. Jeffery) when he said that in his opinion this was the year that we should have the emergency powers because a certain period of the year was going to be void of parliamentary authority, and that additional powers should be given to the government in the event of an emergency arising.

I might have misunderstood the words used by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) with respect to the invoking of the emergency powers, but I am convinced in my mind that the words which he used were such that led me to believe that these emergency powers would not be invoked when parliament was in session.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacDougall: I think I am justified in assuming that was the case, and if it was the case I wonder whether this action was absolutely necessary at the time. I am not going back over the speeches made this morning or this afternoon with respect to the matter, but it certainly would seem to me that it could have been dealt with as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) said, regardless of whether it took five minutes or five hours. Again I must agree with the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) because I, a very ordinary backbencher, feel that we do waste a lot of time in talking and I do not very much blame him on occasion for getting a little annoyed. Just the same, that is our parliamentary process and it is the fundamental essence of democracy—regardless of what type of political thought dominates the majority in the House of Commons.

Therefore, sir, under those circumstances I cannot believe that it was necessary to take this step in the manner in which it was taken—and because of that I am inclined to believe that in any business or any government mistakes are made. They may be mistakes of omission or of commission, but the fact remains that we cannot be right all the time and no man will substantiate that statement more readily than my good friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I think on occasions in the past he has stated that if he was right 40 per cent of the time he was pretty lucky, and I think that goes for all of us. However, I am forced to make the statement although I personally have opposed the granting of emergency powers other than for this year when I did go along with it, that when we are today meeting in parliament assembled so soon after these emergency powers were granted by this parliament, we have been, to say the least and to put it mildly, slightly remiss in our responsibilities.

Further than that I would like to say that the people of Canada, with respect to each and every individual in this house, have attributed to us certain powers of discernment, or at least they thought that we had certain powers of discernment. They thought that those powers were in line with a fairly average intellectual quotient. In other words, if the electorate of Canada figured for one moment that we were low-grade morons they would not have voted for us. They considered that we were above that category and on many occasions when the electorate individually or collectively cannot express their ideas on certain measures in this house they expected that the elected representatives of their ridings would have a sufficient I.Q. to stand up in parliament and put principle before everything else in respect of decisions on things that vitally affect the Canadian people from coast to coast.

That, Mr. Chairman, is the one and only reason I rise in this debate today. As I have already said, like the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell), I am not a keyhole gazer and I hope I never shall be; but I do maintain that there must be some solidarity to cabinet support of any measure. There is no doubt in my mind that after due consideration the cabinet decided that this was a wise step to take. Someone will possibly say, the cabinet having decided that we should do so, why should Jack MacDougall rise to contradict the opinion of a majority of the cabinet? I do it, sir, because I feel that perhaps the cabinet has made a mistake in invoking this power when the parliament of Canada is in session. I think that my people in Vancouver-Burrard would consider me remiss in my duty if, in an emergency like this, I did not express my opinions in connection with the function of parliament. I care not, sir, whether the majority of the electors of Vancouver-Burrard agree with me or not; but I maintain that the fundamental principle of the political faith to which I have subscribed all my life is that principle is more than party.

Therefore, sir, I am sorry that I cannot support the government on this measure. I think it is right and proper that I should so express myself amongst my colleagues. I certainly feel that an active, virile democracy, which Canadian blood bought and paid for on the battlefields of the world, is something that is greater to me than any picayune bill regardless of whether it concerns contraband or non-contraband.

Sir, in conclusion I wish to say that, having spoken against the principle involved in this measure, I shall find myself duty bound to oppose it.

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) has definitely left the opinion with me, and I think with other members, that the reason this measure was passed by order in council instead of by the normal channels through the house as an amendment to the shipping act, was that the government felt there would not be sufficient time for it to go through in the regular way. By saying that, the minister is simply stating that the government believed there would be opinions expressed against this measure. After all, Mr. Speaker, it is only by expressing opinions against the measure that a measure is held up.

I think it is obvious, from what has been said in this house since this matter first came up, that this measure would not have met with opposition from any member. All members of this house feel that this is a good and necessary measure to be passed. We object to the manner in which it has been put through. If the government had come before this house and let it be known that it was essential to put this measure through in a hurry, this measure would have gone through this house and the other place in a matter of hours. There is no doubt about that. There is, therefore, no excuse for this measure having been put through by order in council instead of through the normal parliamentary channels.

I should like to ask the minister, if there was this great hurry in this case, then why was this measure not put through a month ago when the British government put it through? This government knew that the measure was going to be put through, and if there was the great haste which the minister has led us to believe there was, the measure could have been put through weeks ago. The excuse that it would have taken too long to put it through the two houses of parliament, is one without foundation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think this all goes to illustrate very clearly what we have said many times concerning this government, namely that it prefers to operate by order in council rather than by putting measures through the ordinary parliamentary channels. I suppose that is what you have to expect when a government has been in office for 18 years, and has come to believe that it rules by divine right. Without question this government resents parliament, and wishes we did not sit at all. It would far sooner be allowed to run the business of the country by order in council.

Mr. Howe: It wishes we had a few more mature minds over there.

Mr. Hees: The Minister of Trade and Commerce became very touchy this morning when the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) implied that the minister treated this house with arrogance. To back up what the hon. member for Eglinton was saying, I want to quote from what the minister said last night. It is found at page 4197 of Hansard for April 21, 1953, and reads as follows:

> If we have overstepped our powers, I make no apology for having done so.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce does not care whether the government overstepped its powers; he makes no apology to this parliament. They want to do it, so therefore they go ahead and do it. As he said on that other memorable occasion, "If we wanted to get away with it, who would stop us?" If that is not treating this parliament with arrogance, I do not know what is.

I believe that one of the main purposes for putting this Emergency Powers Act into force was a strictly political one. I have reason to believe that one of the purposes which prompted this government to introduce this measure was so that they could do something similar to what they did before the election of 1945 when, exactly 28 days before the election, they brought in sweeping tax reductions on a wide variety of products, by order in council, obviously with a considerable political appeal. I believe that this government intends, after this parliament is dissolved and before the election date, to introduce some measure of state medicine, without having the matter brought before the representatives of the people, before the representatives of the medical profession or the representatives of the provinces. I believe that that demonstrates beyond doubt that this government, in introducing these emergency powers, is far more interested in the political welfare of the Liberal party than in the welfare of the people of this country.

Mr. Howe: You believe also in Santa Claus.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): I wish to put myself on record, Mr. Speaker, as being opposed to the action that was taken in passing this order in council, not in what the order in council did but in doing it in this manner. I am not sure that we can make the best case in our opposition to this order in council and how it was passed if we are going to follow the line taken by the member for Broadview (Mr. Hees). Let us stick to the matter before us, because I think there is sufficient in that to condemn the government without drawing upon our imaginations for something that may or may not happen.

First of all, may I say that when we were discussing the Emergency Powers Act, I drew attention to the fact that the danger in having such powers was that it was the easy way for a government to do things. If there were anything to be done which seemed a little difficult or a little embarrassing if brought up in this house, then the natural thing for the government to do would be to try and do it the easy way. They would say, "Well, we can do this under the Emergency Powers Act without the bother of going through all the rigmarole of introducing a bill in the house and having it go to the Senate, and all the debate on it in the process." Well now, that is just what has happened. One thing after another comes up, and the government gets into the habit, as any government would, of doing things in the easy way.

Usually I am impressed with the arguments advanced by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). I doubt if there is any minister in the cabinet who can bring forth better reasons for doing things, and bring them forth more concisely, than he can. But after reading what he said in regard to this order in council, I must say that he did not make the usual good case. On page 4197 of Hansard for April 21, 1953, he said:

> We used the Emergency Powers Act because if there ever was a purpose for which the Emergency Powers Act was appropriate, it was meeting a situation that is causing damage to our efforts in Korea. We were told some time ago that there was a growing trade in war materials into red China and something had to be done about it.

How long ago were they told this? If they were told some time ago, why did they not bring in a bill in the house some time ago and deal with the matter in that way? That kind of argument just does not hold water.

Then he goes on to say:

> Canadian ships will no longer take any part in that trade, although I am happy to say that of the list of ships I saw that had been active in the trade, no Canadian ship was involved.

Let me draw to your attention, sir, the fact that this order in council is effective only against Canadian ships, and if no Canadian ships were involved at this particular time, what was accomplished by passing this order in council that could not be accomplished any time by an act of parliament? I repeat that once you give a government the power to do a thing in the easiest way, that government, no matter what government it is, is going to take advantage of that way of doing things. This house on this occasion should say that it is opposed to governments doing things by order in council that could be done just as effectively in other ways.

I am told on many occasions that this is a Liberal government, which means that it is only a government for people who are Liberals. As far as I am concerned it is my government, too. I am interested in what the government does, and in preserving the integrity and honesty of the government in everything that it does, because it is my government. And when it appears that they are doing things not in the regular, prescribed parliamentary way it hurts me as much as it hurts anybody else. For these reasons this house should condemn the action that was taken, because there was no reason in the world why it should be taken at this time. A bill by this parliament would have dealt with the matter, and I am basing my argument solely on the argument used by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe).

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the fact that ministers have other duties to perform and cannot be in the house at all times, but I think one is entitled to draw attention to the fact that the action under attack at this time is based on the order in council passed on the insistence of and tabled in the house by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier). One should recognize the fact that apparently the minister taking the brunt of the attack, because he is the minister having entered the defence of the action that was taken, is the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). But I do think it is a perfectly proper observation for any member in the house to make, to wonder why the Minister of Transport, who presumably assumes responsibility for the situation, has not defended the action that was taken.

Mr. Benidickson: May I make a comment in that respect on a question of privilege? Last evening the Minister of Transport had a duty to perform in Toronto and was there when this debate originated. I had another duty in the city of Toronto the same evening and accompanied him on that trip. The minister was ill. He performed his duty very creditably notwithstanding the fact that he returned late last night, but is home sick today.

Mr. Fulton: I am glad to hear the explanation. I said that we appreciated the fact that ministers are not able to be here all the time, and I accept of course the explanation—

Mr. Benidickson: Your leader just came into the house.

Mr. Fulton: —as a perfectly satisfactory one. But I wonder why the parliamentary assistant has not entered this debate to attempt to justify a perfectly unjustifiable action. The parliamentary assistant is here. It is significant that there has not yet been heard from the government benches a single statement to justify in detail this action that was taken by the Minister of Transport, although his parliamentary assistant is here.

The absence of the Minister of Transport is explained perfectly satisfactorily, but I believe that no other minister has entered this debate to justify the action, nor has any parliamentary assistant entered it because they know it cannot be justified.

When the Emergency Powers Act was passed we were given a number of explanations as to why the government felt that that act was necessary. As I recall it, one of them was the emergency of an apprehended election. We have heard no other justification; we have heard no satisfactory explanation as to why it was necessary to introduce and pass that Emergency Powers Act. The explanation of that act is that the government insisted it should be done.

It has now been drawn to my attention that there is not a cabinet minister in the house at the moment. I do not know whether I should make any other comment on that, other than saying that probably the reason is they are having a cabinet meeting to decide whether or not they should revoke this order in council. I hope that is what they are doing. But in the absence of any satisfactory explanation as to why the Emergency Powers Act was pushed through this house, we are left with the statement of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) that it was because of the emergency of an apprehended election.

In the light of that statement, Mr. Speaker, we are faced with this situation from which I suggest there is only one obvious conclusion to draw. The government know that it had no basis in fact, no justification in fact, for having insisted on pushing the Emergency Powers Act through the house, and when they contemplated the necessity of justifying that action in the election campaign, in the emergency of an apprehended election, said to themselves: "Well, we had better pass an order in council under the Emergency Powers Act to justify its existence and to justify our having passed it." And so they looked around and they decided: Well, we will dig up a subject which it will be difficult for parliament or anybody in the country to criticize us for having dealt with. And perhaps the best subject for us to pass an order in council on from that point of view is one that will prohibit the shipping of contraband to communist China. That was a ready-made and obvious subject for them to deal with, and so they decided to deal with it by order in council, and bring it into the house and then have a debate on it and use exactly the line of argument which the Minister of Trade and Commerce used last night. In other words, to suggest that there was the necessity for the greatest speed, and that they could not possibly have taken the time necessary to put through legislation to deal with the situation.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that no member of the house, and I am confident that no Canadian in the country, will fall into the trap which the Minister of Trade and Commerce tried to set last night. They say that in attacking the action of the government in passing this order in council we are attempting to suggest that there is not the necessity of immediate and vigorous action to deal with the possibility of trade with communist China. Of course there is the necessity of immediate and vigorous action to deal with the situation. That necessity is not new; that necessity has existed for over a year. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) has been pressing for over two years for legislation to be introduced dealing with the communist problem and the problem of trading with communist countries, and the government has steadfastly refused to introduce such legislation.

Under the guise of emergency, a disguise which is said to be used to dispel all opportunities of criticism, we have the argument that we had to deal with this thing speedily, and therefore an order in council passed under the Emergency Powers Act was the only way with which to deal with it. Never was there a more obvious subterfuge used to justify the existence of a totally unjustifiable piece of legislation, namely, the Emergency Powers Act. We were told that the Emergency Powers Act was to be in existence only as a stand-by to be used in case of emergency.

Mr. Dickey: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Fulton: I am a little tired of these questions—but, oh, yes.

Mr. Dickey: Can the hon. member quote to the house where that was said, and by whom?

Mr. Fulton: I hesitate to correct the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Dickey), but I think he knows as well as I do that it is not permitted to quote from previous debates in the same session. And I am not going to allow the hon. member to have an opportunity to suggest to Your Honour that I am out of order.

Mr. Hees: Nice work, Davie.

Mr. Dickey: I challenge the hon. member to find it.

Mr. Fulton: And I suggest to the senior member for Halifax that he look it up in the debates himself, where he will find ample basis for what I have said.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I should be more strict, and remind the house that it is against the rules even to refer to a previous debate of the present session on a question not now under consideration.

Mr. Fulton: Well, Mr. Speaker, this order in council, which is the subject of this amendment of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green), is of course based on the Emergency Powers Act. And it seems to me hardly possible to discuss that matter without referring to that circumstance—although, as Your Honour has pointed out, it is not necessary to discuss the merits or otherwise of what was said in debate on the earlier occasion.

Mr. Dickey: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has made a certain assertion as to what was said in debate, and it is not correct.

Mr. Fulton: We are now told by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) that it was necessary to do it by order in council because there was an element of emergency in the situation, in which—

Mr. Howe: I said nothing of the kind, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Dickey: Misrepresentation again.

Mr. Howe: This man couldn't—well, all right; it is unparliamentary. I intended to say something else.

Mr. Fulton: I can imagine the Minister of Trade and Commerce is rather irritated by the fact that last night I felt it necessary to draw attention to certain inaccuracies in a speech he made over the radio two weeks ago. And now he is irritated—

Mr. Howe: No one listens to those speeches.

Mr. Fulton: I can understand his irritation. If he wants to criticize me, or to say harsh or soft things about me, I can assure him it will not worry me, because it will not be the first time he has said them.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Does not the house think we would make more progress if we discussed the amendment before the house?

Mr. Fulton: I agree with you entirely, and I am endeavouring to do that. And perhaps if hon. members opposite would curb their desire to interrupt I would be able to get along with the task I was trying to do.

I think we have to ask ourselves whether there is in fact any emergency which would justify the passing of this order in council. The Minister of Trade and Commerce in his argument last night relied upon the fact that the British have dealt with it by order in council. I point out to him that the British passed their order in council over a month ago. And if therefore it might conceivably be argued that there was some emergency confronting them, it was not a new subject over there. There could hardly be said to be an emergency confronting us, when apparently it was within the knowledge of the government that they had taken action in Britain to deal with it over a month ago.

I do point out to the Minister of Trade and Commerce and to the house, and ask hon. members to consider this in deciding what attitude they will take when the vote on the amendment is taken, that in the British House of Commons they had the grace to lay on the table of parliament an order in council passed the day before it came into effect. Now, I hesitate to enter into—

Mr. Howe: That was done here.

Mr. Fulton: The Minister of Trade and Commerce says that was done here, does he? I do not think it was. I do not think the Minister of Trade and Commerce is right. This order in council was laid on the table of parliament here on April 20.

Mr. Howe: What day did it come into force?

Mr. Fulton: The order in council was passed on April 17, and it is stated in the order that it will come into effect on April 20.

Mr. Howe: Yes.

Mr. Fulton: The day it was tabled.

Mr. Howe: Yes.

Mr. Fulton: It came into effect on the same day, the day it was tabled.

Mr. Howe: It was passed on the 17th and tabled on the 20th, and came into effect on the 20th.

Mr. Fulton: That is what I said. And in the British House of Commons it was tabled on the day before.

Mr. Howe: That is a great difference! I hope you can win an election on that!

Mr. Fulton: And there we have a perfect illustration of the attitude of the Minister of Trade and Commerce toward parliament. The minister does not think that there is any importance attached to the fact that in the British House of Commons the order in council was tabled the day before it came into effect. Parliament would be entitled to express an opinion or, if it did not express an opinion, could have it examined. But obviously the minister does not think that opinions expressed here matter.

I suggest to you that it does matter to the country whether or not parliament is disregarded because, whether the minister realizes it or not, parliament is elected to represent the people of this country, and the people would like to have the opportunity to express their opinions as to the wisdom or otherwise of government action, before that action is put into effect.

That is the principle which was recognized in the British House of Commons. And, recognizing the importance of parliament, and the importance of getting the opinion of the people's representatives, they tabled their order in council in parliament the day before it became effective. That is the distinction, and that is the importance of the matter which obviously the Minister of Trade and Commerce cannot understand.

Mr. Howe: That is terrific.

Mr. Fulton: That is an importance which the Minister of Trade and Commerce would not be expected to understand or to attach to this matter.

Mr. Howe: One of the best points I have ever heard made in this House of Commons.

Mr. Fulton: I beg your pardon?

Mr. Howe: One of the best points I have ever heard made in this house by my hon. friend.

Mr. Fulton: I do not object to interruptions by the minister; I welcome them, because they illustrate very clearly his supreme indifference to the institution of parliament.

Mr. Speaker: Once again, hon. members are conversing with one another, not addressing themselves to the Chair.

Mr. Fulton: The next point it is important to ask hon. members to consider, when they are deciding how they will vote on this amendment, is the other debating point made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Occasionally he does attempt to make a debating point, although when real points are made by others he disregards them and calls them only debating points.

But he attempted to make an argument, in justification of what the government had done, on the basis that to take this action that would prohibit trade with communist China, and to do it by way of legislation, would have taken too much time. In criticism of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) he said, as reported at page 4197 of Hansard, in an attempt to ridicule the arguments put forward:

> The contraband must be allowed to continue until the usual processes of this parliament are carried out. If any serious result occurs that is just too bad, but it cannot be helped as the opposition has said, "Let it go until we can put a bill through the house."

And then he went on to say:

> We were told some time ago—
> "Some time ago."
> —that there was a growing trade in war materials into red China and something had to be done about it. It is customary when something has to be done in a matter of this kind to do it and not talk about it.

The minister there was dealing with the suggestion made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra that proper action could have been taken by way of an amendment to the Canada Shipping Act, as was taken in 1938, or by way of an amendment to the Criminal Code. Trying to ridicule that argument, the minister was suggesting that the legislative process took too long, and that parliament was not capable of dealing with an emergency. The minister showed extreme forgetfulness—perhaps not for the first time—of his own previous experience in dealing with legislation in parliament having to do with emergency situations. It was the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) who introduced that amendment to the Canada Shipping Act in 1938, which dealt with the shipping of contraband to potential enemy countries.

Just in case the minister has forgotten it, may I remind him that the bill was debated in the house for I should judge only three quarters of an hour on February 11, 1938. The debate started on page 372 where it is indicated that the minister moved the second reading of the bill. The debate continued on second reading and in committee up to page 382, and at that time the bill had been dealt with completely in committee except for one clause. Then the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who is so scornful of the procedures of parliament as they are applied today and of parliament's readiness to deal with emergent situations, is on record on page 382 of Hansard as having said:

I move, Mr. Chairman, that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

On that occasion the debate was adjourned on the motion of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The bill was not debated again until May 30 of the same year, and on that date it was not debated at all. Perhaps I should read what occurred, and I quote from page 3346 of Hansard of that date as follows:

The house resumed from Friday, February 11, consideration in committee of Bill No. 9, to amend the Canada Shipping Act, 1934—Mr. Howe—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 1—Prohibition of shipment of articles of war to countries in a state of war.

Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe (Minister of Justice): Mr. Chairman, I understand this section was discussed fully in committee, but was not passed on the former occasion in order to permit any further observations hon. members might wish to make.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

The bill was debated for a total of 10¾ pages of Hansard in 1948 and that bill dealt with trading in contraband with potential enemies of the country. Is the Minister of Trade and Commerce seriously going to suggest that a parliament which would pass an important measure dealing with a matter involving the interests of Canada in a debate taking up a total of ten pages of Hansard, or at the maximum perhaps three-quarters of an hour, in 1938 would not deal in the same expeditious manner with an equally important measure today?

Mr. Howe: This is a totally different opposition.

Mr. Fulton: What does the minister mean by that?

Mr. Howe: There is no resemblance at all. The opposition in 1938 was a business opposition.

Mr. Fulton: And this opposition is what?

Mr. Howe: You name it.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fulton: I think the difference is—

Mr. Speaker: Is this examination in chief or cross-examination or what? I think all hon. members should address the Chair.

Mr. Fulton: So do I. I think the situation is that the opposition has not changed, but the government has changed. In 1938 we had a newly-elected government which was mindful of its responsibilities to the people; in 1953 we have a government grown too used to power, a government grown careless of its responsibilities to the people of Canada. I point out to you that the indications that we have had from the attitude of the government with respect to this matter show clearly that it is not the opposition that has changed. The opposition is just as willing to deal expeditiously with a matter of importance to Canada as was the opposition in 1938. But the government has changed completely its attitude.

In 1938 the government dealt with this matter by way of legislation although we still had the War Measures Act on the books. The change in the situation is that they did not have the Emergency Powers Act on the books so the government was forced to deal with it by way of legislation. That is the difference. It is a difference in the government, not a difference in the opposition. It is a difference in the fact that the government now has the Emergency Powers Act right in its hand and so it does not have to introduce legislation. It does not want to introduce legislation because it finds it convenient to deal with it by order in council although all the evidence points to the fact that it was not necessary to deal with it by order in council. It was merely more convenient to deal with it by order in council and it was a ready-made way of by-passing parliament.

The same minister who is advocating this action today is the minister who introduced the legislation in 1938 and he sits over there making these pitiful excuses in a solitary attempt to justify this highly and completely improper action which has been taken by his government, deserted by his colleagues except for the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier), who is after all the leader of the house and will support his colleague to the hilt.

Although I have not been privileged to observe a meeting of the cabinet, even through a keyhole, I point out that we could not have had a more clear or definite illustration of the way in which power corrupts. The same minister who dealt with this legislation in 1938 then went through all the wartime years when he dealt with matters by orders in council and spent more of the money of the Canadian people than any other minister has ever spent in the whole history of this parliament. He has become used to perpetuating emergency powers and has grown used to that way of governing. It now comes to the point where instead of introducing legislation to deal with exactly a similar situation he prefers to deal with it by order in council. He is so forgetful of past history, he is so forgetful of his own past experiences, he is so forgetful of the relationships which should govern the attitude of the government in its responsibilities to the people that he is willing and happy to rely on these poor excuses, not realizing, because he has grown so used to this method of governing, that he is doing something which if persisted in will completely destroy the institution of parliament.

Mr. Howe: May I ask my hon. friend one question. I ask this from an eminent lawyer for purposes of information. If instead of passing this order in council by virtue of the Emergency Powers Act the government had passed it by virtue of its powers under the Canada Shipping Act, what would have been the views of my hon. friend?

Mr. Fulton: I think the minister told us last night that it could not have been done under the Canada Shipping Act.

Mr. Howe: It was a very close decision.

Mr. Fulton: I take it that in that instance the government decided to be governed by the law. They felt that it would not be legal to do it under the Canada Shipping Act.

Mr. Howe: I am not sure.

Mr. Fulton: Until the minister is sure, perhaps he will not ask me to answer a hypothetical question.

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Speaker, when the resolution preceding the legislation pertaining to emergency powers was up for discussion on February 20 I asked the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), who was then steering the legislation through the house, a question which is reported on page 2281 of Hansard. I asked him first:

> Will the minister outline to us just what situations have arisen during the past two years wherein the interests of the country would have suffered if the government had not possessed these powers?

My second question was:

> —will the minister outline to us definitely what situations he visualizes may occur that will demand the exercise of these powers by the government when they could not possibly be exercised by parliament or by calling parliament?

In answer to my first question the minister replied as follows—

Mr. Dickey: May I ask the hon. member from what he is quoting?

Mr. Noseworthy: I am quoting from Hansard, page 2281.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): This session?

Mr. Dickey: My point is that I believe the hon. member is quoting from a previous debate in the same session, which I understand is out of order.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Mr. Noseworthy: It is a question whether we are now discussing the Emergency Powers Act which was passed or the amendment raised by the opposition.

Mr. Speaker: The house is debating the amendment which has been proposed by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. It is not in order to quote from a debate during the present session on another subject. I have not stopped a reference to that debate. Someone raised the question during the address of the previous speaker, and I then pointed out that if the rules were enforced strictly even a reference to a previous debate would be out of order, although I had not stopped such a reference. This is the first time any hon. member has attempted to quote directly from that debate, and it would not be in order.

Mr. Noseworthy: Am I in order to quote the minister's statement in answer to my questions on that occasion?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Unless there is unanimous consent I cannot allow it, and there does not appear to be unanimous consent.

Mr. Noseworthy: Instead of quoting directly I shall simply refer to the fact that when that measure was under consideration the minister deliberately pointed out to us that the government wanted those powers because between now and August, 1954, there must of necessity be a general election, there must of necessity be a period during which there would be no parliament, and if during that period a state of war or other emergency arose it would be necessary for the government to have the powers which the Emergency Powers Act confers upon it. The minister who guided that measure through parliament, if not in actual words certainly by implication, assured us that the government wanted these powers to be available in case of such an emergency. The opposition not once but many times—

Mr. Dickey: I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Noseworthy: Why not make your own speech?

Mr. Dickey: I intend to speak. As a matter of fact I rose at the same time as the hon. member, but he caught the Speaker's eye and I did not. My point of order is that I think the rules of parliament are quite clear that there should be no reference to or quotation from previous debates in the same session. I believe Your Honour also indicated the principle earlier today when you indicated to the hon. member for Kamloops that the prohibition was really to any reference to a previous debate. The position in which we are getting ourselves in this particular debate is that these references are being made to alleged statements in a previous debate. When I speak I intend to simply say that these suggestions are not based upon fact and that the imputations as to what was said at that time are not correct.

But if hon. members are going to be permitted to quote indirectly, surely Your Honour will have to permit some answer to be made. I do not think that is the purpose of this debate or that it would be proper to have an extended debate on what was said in a previous debate in this session. I would submit that if you are going to permit the hon. member to continue his present argument it will be necessary for you to permit one or more speakers from this side to transgress the rules of the house as well.

Mr. Speaker: I regret that this matter was not brought to my attention previously. Hon. members will recall that during the day a number of speakers have referred to the debate on the emergency powers bill. I did intimate that it was not in order to do so. If it is the wish of the house I can enforce the rules strictly. I certainly do not intend to allow a revival of that debate at this time. I shall be guided from time to time by the remarks which are made by hon. members. If the hon. member for York South has a brief reference to make, I shall allow him to do so, but I hope he will not pursue this subject unduly.

Mr. Noseworthy: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, speaking to the point of order, without engaging in any extended debate at the moment I need not remind Your Honour that the purpose of the rule to which reference has been made is to avoid the revival of a debate or debates in the same session. That is the thought which must be borne in mind in examining the effect of what is done. In this particular case there is a motion before the house which seeks an expression from the house that it was not proper to proceed in the manner in which this matter was dealt with on this occasion. It would seem to me that in such a case it is appropriate to make reference to such assurances as were given as to the kind of action that would be taken under the act which gave the government the power to pass the order in council under discussion.

Mr. Speaker: As the Leader of the Opposition has said, the purpose of the rule is to prevent the revival in the same session of a debate that has been concluded. It seemed to me that the hon. member for York South was going so far that it might have resulted, and if he continues it might result, in a revival of that debate. I would therefore ask him to restrict his reference to that debate as much as possible.

Mr. Noseworthy: My point was that when that measure was before the house the government gave no impression whatever that the power was needed for use under such circumstances as it was used in the matter of this present order in council.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce has indicated that the government did the right thing in what he believed was the right way. The government has done by the issuing of an order in council exactly what opposition members and some government supporters felt the government would do at the time the Emergency Powers Act was before the house. The government has used the powers conferred upon it by that act, at a time when parliament was in session, to deal with a matter that could have been dealt with at any time during the six weeks preceding the passing of the order in council. It was a matter which could have been brought before parliament, and if the government had respected the powers of parliament it would have been brought before parliament instead of being introduced by way of order in council.

It was the wrong way to bring that matter in, by order in council, at a time when parliament was in session. It was the wrong way to bring that matter in by order in council six weeks after the matter had been brought to the attention of the government by the officials of the United Kingdom parliament, six weeks after the government had the measure under consideration; and the only excuse the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) gives, which he gave last night, is "We did it without too much debate. It was done promptly."

Now, Mr. Speaker, if that is to be the standard by which we are to judge the efficiency of parliament then let us have all government legislation done without too much debate and done promptly—by executive orders, which is exactly the way Stalin throughout his regime did things in Russia, and exactly the way in which Hitler in his regime did things in Germany. Why have a parliament at all if the criterion of success of that parliament is to be getting things done without too much debate and getting them done promptly? Certainly any cabinet, any government, can do things by executive order much more promptly than they can be done through the democratic processes of parliament.

That, Mr. Speaker, is one of the arguments used against democracies and democratic institutions by those who favour dictatorships. It is simply one more example of what has been said by many in the press and on the platform and all across this country, that today Canada is not being governed by this parliament but by a small group of cabinet ministers. Today we have government by that small group, and certainly through the medium of orders in council that small group can get things done without too much debate and can get them done very promptly.

I was rather surprised to find the Minister of Trade and Commerce in a Liberal government holding up as an example the executive action of a Conservative government in the United Kingdom and the executive action of a Republican government in the United States. That, it would seem to me, is a new departure in Liberal political history. I think you will have to go back a long way before you will find any other Liberal leader excusing his action on the ground that similar action was being taken by Conservative executives in other countries. Of course times have changed. Time may even have changed the old Liberal party. It is just possible that the Liberal party under the leadership of the present Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), the Minister of Trade and Commerce and a few other cabinet ministers is in actual fact the Conservative government of this country, probably more Conservative than the Conservative government in the United Kingdom. That may be the reason the Minister of Trade and Commerce holds up as an example the executive action of a Conservative government in the United Kingdom.

Government by cabinet is very easy. They can get things done. Government by order in council can get things done without too much debate, and it can get them done promptly; but it is not democratic government, and no good reason has been given to us why the order in council now under consideration could not have been brought before parliament in a democratic way.

The hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) pointed out that the cabinet may be wanting to justify their action in asking for these powers and, consequently, may have had recourse to an order in council which they knew no member of the opposition would want repealed. We are not questioning the content of that order in council; what we are questioning is the government's, the cabinet's disregard of the fact that parliament was in session and that there was opportunity—there had been ample time, there had been six weeks since the government's attention was called to this by Mr. Eden—for the matter to have been brought before parliament and for parliament to pass upon it. The action of the government is a distinct slur upon this parliament and a direct indication that as far as the present cabinet is concerned they feel they can get things done without too much debate and much more promptly by order in council than by using the democratic processes of parliament.

Mr. J. H. Dickey (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, I shall not detain the house for more than a moment but I do think in view of several statements that have been made in this debate that I should perhaps say a word.

When the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) was speaking I felt that I should have risen on a question of privilege, but I decided that the better course would be to wait and speak briefly when he had finished. There is a rule of procedure in this house, Mr. Speaker, which prevents members from imputing motives to their fellow members. I consider that the argument made by the hon. member for Kamloops, in imputing motives for not speaking to members of the government, parliamentary assistants and other members who are supporters of the government in this house, was clearly an improper implication of motive and a completely inaccurate assessment of the facts. That, of course, is perhaps not surprising but I can assure hon. members that the motive he imputed to us is not correct, and that is one of the main reasons that I rise to speak.

The hon. member then went on to construct a most devious argument which was just a moment ago supported by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy). They imputed a motive to the government as to why this order in council was passed. I think that probably was also out of order. Certainly it is completely incorrect, and all that argument can possibly prove is the kind of devious mind that would think of it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the motive of the government in passing this order in council is, I think, crystal clear and will be crystal clear to the people of Canada. The motive is to co-operate with our partners in the North Atlantic alliance in doing anything that we may be required to do to prevent the possibility of Canadian vessels engaging in contraband trade with our enemies in Asia. That has been done. I think not only parliament but the Canadian people would expect the government to do that job in an efficient and legal way. As has been indicated in this debate, there is a grave question as to whether or not it could have been done effectively and legally under the Canada Shipping Act. The Emergency Powers Act clearly indicates that the kind of executive action that has been taken in this case is specifically the kind of executive action that the act authorizes the governor in council to take. There can be, therefore, no question as to the legality or effectiveness of the order in council.

The act requires the government, in passing orders in council of this kind if parliament is in session, to place the order in council before parliament within five days. That has been done. I submit there has not been the slightest suggestion of any action on the part of the government that is in any sense a slight to parliament or a derogation from parliament's duties.

The hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) and the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy), as well as several other members of the opposition, have, by reference to the debate in this house on the Emergency Powers Act, given rise to a completely false impression. I questioned the hon. member for Kamloops when he was speaking, but he obviously misunderstood my question. I did not ask him to quote from any debates in this house. I simply asked him to inform the house where, when, and by whom any such statement as he was suggesting had been made. He avoided answering that question by indicating that he was prevented from quoting by the rules of the house. I was aware of the rule of the house, and did not ask him to quote. I was aware also of the rule of the house to which Your Honour drew attention, indicating that in his reply he had shown he was out of order in the line of argument he had been following.

I simply want to say, Mr. Speaker, that the impression which it has been attempted to create here, that the action that has been taken by the government is one which was indicated would not be taken in that previous debate, is completely incorrect. It is a misrepresentation of what was said in that debate.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): It seems, Mr. Speaker, that there has been some departure from the purpose of the motion before the house. The motion makes it clear that what is sought is a declaration from the members of this house that they do not approve the procedure that was followed in this case. There is no substantial issue introduced by this motion as to the subject matter of the order in council. In response to a statement to that effect, some suggestion came from the government that it did not make very much sense to object to something simply because the procedure was wrong if the result was right.

The government have made it clear, both in the debate which is now in Hansard which took place last night and in the discussion which has taken place today, that in their opinion if the result is right the method does not matter. That is the fundamental point in issue. Under any dictatorship many good things may be done by dictate. Many people, however, object to government by dictate. They prefer government by elected representatives through their executive body, where the executive body has that power, and through parliament where it should be the responsibility of parliament to decide any question that may arise. By dictate a dictatorship may build good roads, may construct good hospitals, may do a number of things that would, in themselves, be to the advantage of the people of that country. It may give good medical services or might do a number of good things by dictate. But it is generally conceded that a bad method does not become good simply because a bad method happens, on particular occasions, to produce satisfactory results.

We have seen all too much evidence within recent years that shortcuts which challenge the responsibility of parliament under the name of efficiency, speed and the avoidance of delay can prove very dangerous and have, in fact, proven dangerous for the whole world. In this case the method was wrong. No matter what the subject matter of the order was, it was particularly wrong because of the reasons given earlier this session for the renewal of the Emergency Powers Act. In that respect, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make reference to the order which has been mentioned on different occasions earlier this afternoon. It is obvious that there is a substantial misconception as to what the rule really is. The rule to which reference has obviously been made is rule 293, and it reads as follows down to the end of part (a):

> Besides the prohibitions contained in this standing order, it has been sanctioned by usage both in England and in Canada, that a member, while speaking, must not:
> (a) refer to any debate of the same session on any question not then under discussion;

The words that are important in what I have read are "not then under discussion." The rule is intended to avoid the renewal of debates which have already been disposed of at a time when the subject matter is not under discussion. In this case, Mr. Speaker, I submit that what took place in the debate prior to the adoption by a majority of this house of the measure which was designed to re-enact the Emergency Powers Act is very relevant to the discussion of this motion, because we sought at that time to find out why it was that the government asked to have these wide and sweeping powers renewed on this occasion.

It will be recalled by hon. members that there was a long debate on the Emergency Powers Act. That debate was lengthened because the government failed to give any satisfactory explanation as to why it wanted that legislation re-enacted. Over and over again we urged the government to give us illustrations of the kind of circumstances which would call for special powers of this nature. We were told that while the house was not in session some situation regarding box cars might arise that would call for action. We were told that while the house was not in session something might arise—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): On a point of order, I do not want to interrupt, but the hon. gentleman is just repeating and not observing the rules of the house. He tried to make us believe that the same question was under discussion today by quoting citation 293, referring to any debate of the same session on any question not then under discussion. The Emergency Powers Act was discussed, voted on, carried and came into force. The terms of the Emergency Powers Act are on the statute books. It was passed this session. I believe the hon. gentleman knows that he cannot revive that debate. He is a very skilful speaker, and I noticed the trend he was taking to distract our attention so he could repeat what he said and what others said in that debate. I think the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) wants to comply with the rules of the house, especially after the ruling made by Mr. Speaker today. In view of that I do not believe he will insist on continuing that trend.

Mr. Drew: I was referring to the reasons that were given for the adoption of this legislation. The motion now before us refers to the propriety of the proceedings that were taken on this occasion. I am pointing out that amongst the very vague and uncertain explanations which were given as to reasons for adopting the emergency act under which this order in council has been passed, not one suggestion was made that powers were sought to deal with something relating to the shipping of this country.

We did point out that if special powers were sought in relation to shipping or transport, it would be wise to introduce amendments to the Canada Shipping Act or to other acts now in force; that the administrative power of the government would then be defined by the act itself; that it would be necessary for the government to be dealing with administrative powers under the general authority of an act which related to a particular subject; that whatever objections we may have to administrative orders at any time, they are not so objectionable if that administrative authority is conferred by some act which relates to a particular subject and gives administrative authority in relation only to that particular subject.

There is a reason why this is of immense importance in this discussion. It is quite clear that the order in council which has been passed by this government, and which was tabled on April 20, is part of some understanding between the government of Canada, the government of the United Kingdom and the government of the United States. Let us see then what the situation is. The government of the United Kingdom dealt with this subject by order in council on March 13 as a result of the understanding between these governments in regard to the need of something of that kind. This government obviously knew of that situation, because it has been indicated to us that this was part of a general agreement. Therefore this government knew on March 13, at the very latest, of the need for some legislative provision of this kind.

The Emergency Powers Act was under debate in this house until March 26, thirteen days later. Although this government knew that it was called upon to act either by legislation or by order in council to deal with this subject, not a suggestion was made to hon. members that this act was to be used for the purpose of dealing with that particular subject. No; reference was made to box cars, to elections and to other things of that kind, but not to the subject now under discussion, not to something that as the result of an understanding was dealt with by order in council in the United Kingdom thirteen days before this bill became law in this house on March 26. It was on March 26 that we had the last explanation of the reason the government sought these wide powers.

The government sought these wide powers, according to the government itself, to meet unforeseen exigencies. This was not an unforeseen exigency; this was an exigency that had already arisen, had been discussed, and in regard to which the government of the United Kingdom had acted thirteen days before. Mr. Speaker, the question of government responsibility, of government good faith, is raised by these dates and by the explanation given by the government itself as to the relationship between the order in council passed in London on March 13 and the explanations given to this house for the necessity of passing the Emergency Powers Act as late as March 26. No, Mr. Speaker; if the government, with knowledge that it was going to act under the Emergency Powers Act, withheld that information from hon. members, then what other act may be contemplated by now of which we have had no explanation whatever?

The government has introduced the subject of elections into this debate. Therefore it cannot be suggested that this is brought in gratuitously. Since the government is obviously thinking so much of elections in discussing this particular subject, then it is possible that it is withholding from this parliament certain things of great importance which we have asked to have brought before the house, so that they may deal with these things under this very act at some later time when their conduct cannot be examined and the propriety of the details of the measure placed before hon. members.

Mr. Hees: That is the answer.

Mr. Drew: After all, we do not know. We do know that in this particular case the government of the United Kingdom had acted thirteen days before we were told that there was nothing definite in the mind of the government, but simply that they wanted stand-by powers.

Then we are told there are other reasons why this course was followed. We were told this afternoon that the motive of the government is crystal clear. Well, of course, it all depends from which side one looks at this subject. You know, Mr. Speaker, there has been some indication that certain members supporting the government are sensitive when there is any hint of motives on the part of the government. We have listened to hon. members opposite suggest motives over and over again. We have heard members on the other side of the house impute motives of supreme purity to the government, motives such as no government ever possessed even in the best governed countries. Apparently it is only when one does not impute the kind of motives the supporters of the government attribute to it that there is anything wrong in imputing motives.

Most certainly hon. members must ask the government why this course was followed. It is no explanation to say that it was necessary so we could co-operate with our associates in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. It was known on March 13 that something of this kind was going to be done, and this is April 22. Legislation could have been introduced and dealt with long ago, which would have disposed of this subject in a proper, parliamentary way.

Then there is another point which should be disposed of. It is perfectly true that there has been extended debate on many measures that have come before the house. There was extended debate on the bill concerning the Emergency Powers Act, under which this order in council was passed. And there should have been an extended debate. Indeed, it is clear to me that the debate should have been even more extended, because it is obvious that the government contemplated taking action which it did not disclose to hon. members when they asked us to pass the bill.

The members of this House of Commons who should be demanding explanations now are the members who voted for that bill. They are the ones who accepted the explanation given by the government. They are the ones who said that this was only to meet some unforeseen circumstances in the future, when the house was not in session. They are the ones who acted with that assurance. They are the ones who should be asking now that the government give an explanation for this extraordinary procedure taken so short a time after the bill was passed.

And there is something else demanding an explanation from the government. Again this is something about which hon. members who voted for the bill continuing the Emergency Powers Act should be anxious to learn. It was only as recently as April 20 that the Canada Shipping Act was before the house. That is the act that deals with Canadian shipping, the very same subject matter that is dealt with by this order in council. An order in council had already been passed on April 17. The time when orders in council are ordinarily tabled is when the house meets, immediately after the opening. Why did not the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) table that order in council when the house opened on April 20?

Mr. Howe: Do you want an explanation of that?

Mr. Drew: Yes.

Mr. Howe: The reason is that an order has to be sent to the governor in council for signature before it is available for tabling. It was passed on Thursday, and it was not returned in time for tabling on Friday. Therefore it was tabled on Monday.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Why not on Monday morning?

Mr. Drew: It was tabled in the house after the Canada Shipping Act bill had been passed. The order in council had already been passed, and the bill concerning the Canada Shipping Act was coming up on Monday. If the minister had wanted to have the Canada Shipping Act dealt with on Monday, he could very easily have obtained the signature of the governor in council to that order in council before eleven o'clock, and had it tabled in the ordinary way. Then hon. members would have known that this had been done.

Certainly members of the house want something done to prevent the shipping of supplies to any enemy, real or potential. We have been asking for that for two years. Over and over again we have sought some action in regard to the Ming Sung company, which was trading with the enemy, and doing so under the Canadian flag and by special permission from this government. This was a subject of great interest. The government finally did the very thing we had been asking it to do. And this was a matter of very real interest when the Canada Shipping Act was being discussed in the house.

I suggest that those hon. members on the other side of the house who voted for the continuation of the Emergency Powers Act, with the assurance from the government that it was to deal only with unforeseen exigencies in the future, should ask the government why it was that the Emergency Powers Act was invoked, and that information in regard to that action was withheld until after the Canada Shipping Act had been disposed of. It was only after the act was passed that, following a very unusual procedure in circumstances of that kind, the Minister of Transport then tabled his order.

There is another reason why those who voted for the Emergency Powers Act should now be asking for an explanation from the government. While it is true that there are extended debates on many occasions, members of the government know perfectly well that a number of measures have passed through this house in a single day, where reasons for prompt action were discussed in advance and substantial argument put forward in favour of speedy action. Hon. members will recall the way in which legislation in connection with the foot-and-mouth disease was dealt with. It was put through as rapidly as possible.

Mr. Howe: Two days.

Mr. Drew: Yes, two days. A similar order in council was passed by the government of the United Kingdom on March 17. If this subject had been discussed here on the same day, this would have been law on March 18; and we have now reached April 22.

There are other occasions where this course has been followed. When the government in this instance points out that the matter was dealt with by order in council in Great Britain, I would ask it to inform the house that in Great Britain it is the practice for the head of the government to inform the leader of the opposition of any administrative order of this kind, in advance, so if there is any objection it can be indicated before the order is tabled in the house and becomes effective. That is the procedure which the government could tell us is the general practice in England in regard to matters of this kind.

Since we have been asking for something of this nature, and since we have objected to the shipping of goods and supplies to those who are actually engaged in a very real war against our young men, we most certainly would have supported legislation dealing with this subject; and it would have been passed promptly by the house several weeks ago. That explanation simply does not hold water at any point. It simply adds insult to injury when hon. members of this house are asked to swallow an explanation of that kind.

The real and important issue before us is that the government has made it clear that it does not feel bound by any of the assurances given to this house when the Emergency Powers Act was passed. That is something that hon. members on the other side who voted for that act should bear in mind. This order in council serves notice on this house that the government accepts no limitations arising out of the assurances it gave prior to the passing of that act.

In this case it was no future and unforeseen exigency, it was something that had been done ten days before by the government of the United Kingdom when this house finally, after long debate and over the objection of the opposition, passed the Emergency Powers Act.

I submit that the most serious thing of all is that in this particular case we see very little evidence on the part of the government that they are concerned in any way about what they have done. This is the statement by the government, and I emphasize "by the government". We are not dealing here with the action of any single minister or the explanation of any single minister; we are dealing with the action of the government of Canada under an act which received third reading on March 26 after certain assurances had been given to this parliament.

That government, already knowing they were going to be called upon to do something of this nature, offered no indication to the house; they withheld all indication of this when the Canada Shipping Act was before the house as recently as April 20. They denied to hon. members in general the opportunity to discuss this in the form of legislation, and when perhaps legislation could have been improved and extended. That is something I should like to point out.

During the course of this session there have been a number of improvements made in legislation as a result of the acceptance by the government of suggestions from the opposition. While it is true that on occasion members of this government show little inclination to listen to arguments in regard to legislation, the fact remains that from time to time they have accepted suggestions. In this very session a number of suggestions from the opposition have been incorporated in legislation.

This is an important subject, and we should have been given a chance to examine it since we have been asking for it for two years. When the government finally acceded to our request to do something, we should have had a chance to see whether this met all our suggestions or whether there were improvements which could have been put into effect.

We have been told that the Canadian people would expect the government to act in a legal way. Yes, the Canadian people not only expect the government to act in a legal way, the Canadian people expect the government to respect parliament. The Canadian people believe in the business of this country being returned to the control of the people themselves through their elected representatives in this house. It is in the face of those circumstances, circumstances in regard to which members opposite should be asking questions and demanding explanations, that we have the statement of the government which stands as the position of the government in this debate, as reported at page 4197 of Hansard of April 21, as follows:

> If we have overstepped our powers, I make no apology for having done so.

In other words, no matter how far we have exceeded our authority, no matter how far we have denied the responsibility of parliament, no matter how far we have challenged the supreme authority of the people through their elected representatives, we apologize for nothing as long as we can get away with it. That is the position of the government.

It is to direct attention to that situation that this motion is before the house. I would hope there would be some reassurance to the people of Canada in the fact that members on the opposite side would rise now and demand from the government some explanation as to why the government has acted under this Emergency Powers Act as they have instead of introducing legislation in the house and having it dealt with in the proper parliamentary manner.

COLLECTION BY MANITOBA OF ALLEGED OVERPAYMENTS TO OLD AGE PENSIONERS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, before Your Honour leaves the chair there is another matter that I feel I should raise in the house at this time. It arises out of discussions that have taken place in the house—on orders of the day at any rate—with regard to the relations between the federal department of health and welfare and the province of Manitoba, in respect of the collecting of alleged overpayments made to persons while they were in receipt of the pension under the former Old Age Pensions Act. I do not now need to go into all the details to arrive at the grievance which is now before us, but there are one or two points in the history of this matter which I believe I should indicate to the house.

Shortly after the new Old Age Security Act came into effect some of us began asking for the repeal of the former Old Age Pensions Act so that living pensioners would not be hounded for the repayment of alleged overpayments. These alleged overpayments arose because in 1950 or 1951 some persons received other income which gave them a total slightly in excess of the ceiling that was in effect at that time. The feeling on the part of those people was that since the means test was being abolished they should not be penalized the next year by being asked to pay back the alleged surplus out of their old age security pensions of only $40 per month.

In due course all the provinces of Canada except Manitoba discontinued the effort to collect any of these alleged overpayments. Manitoba, however, continued until very recently to hound these older people to make repayment of these alleged overpayments. There was considerable discussion back and forth as to whose responsibility it was, whether it was that of Manitoba or that of the federal government; and quite a volume of correspondence was exchanged between Ottawa and Winnipeg with respect to this matter. I have read it with interest although I must say it is very technical. After trying a number of times to put a question to the minister on the floor of the house in a way that would get action, I think it is fair to say that I finally succeeded in doing that on January 29 of this year as recorded at page 1435 of Hansard, where I put a supplementary question to a question I had already put to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin). This is from Hansard:

> Mr. Knowles: May I ask a supplementary question? Can the minister say whether this practice is being pursued in any other province than Manitoba?
> Mr. Martin: What is the question again? I want to make sure so that I can give a correct answer.
> Mr. Knowles: I asked the minister if he can say whether the practice referred to in my question is being pursued in any other province than Manitoba.
> Mr. Martin: No.

That was a very brief answer, but it did the trick. It annoyed the provincial government of Manitoba to be publicized in that way, as the only province in the country that was still exacting repayments from these living pensioners.

May I interject at this point to say that in this discussion today, and in that question of January 29, the reference is only to one phase of this matter, namely to the collecting of overpayments from living pensioners. The issue I am discussing now does not relate to the matter of collecting from the estates of deceased pensioners. That is another matter.

However, as a result of the statement made to this house by the Minister of National Health and Welfare that Manitoba was the only province that was still doing this, as I have already said the government of Manitoba became annoyed and more letters were exchanged between that provincial government and the Minister of National Health and Welfare or his deputy minister. As a matter of fact, that correspondence is all a matter of public record because in response to a motion of mine which was passed on February 9, 1953, this correspondence was all tabled on March 16, 1953, in the form of sessional paper No. 89A.

At any rate, as the result of another exchange of correspondence between the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the minister in Manitoba, Hon. Mr. Bell, Manitoba joined with the rest of the provinces of Canada by discontinuing the practice of collecting this money from these living pensioners. We were very glad that Manitoba saw fit as a result of the little word the minister said in this house—the one word "no"—to discontinue that practice.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think in the light of what I will come to in a moment as the present grievance, I should point out that there was a dispute, highly technical and highly legal, as to who was to blame for the continuation of this practice in Manitoba. At any rate I think it is fair to say that the letter which the Minister of National Health and Welfare wrote to Mr. Bell on February 9, 1953, certainly was the kind of letter that gave Manitoba the green light to discontinue the practice of collecting these overpayments. It is a long letter of some six pages, so I shall not read it all; but the minister pointed out in this letter that at the end of 1951, when the time was running out for the former means test pension, his deputy, Dr. George F. Davidson, wrote to the various provinces and asked them to supply Ottawa with a list of the persons who owed money on account of alleged overpayments.

There are some little details that I need not give, because I do not think they materially affect the story. In due course the minister said this, on page 4 of the letter:

> It was assumed that after supplying the lists complete to December 31, 1951, the provincial authorities would leave the matter there and await a final decision from Ottawa as to the further action which the federal government itself would decide to take under section 95(3) of the Financial Administration Act, or the further action, if any, which the federal government might wish to suggest that the provinces themselves should take.

Then the minister went on to point out that because of that assumption that the provinces would leave the matter there, the other nine provinces did just that and discontinued the practice of collecting these overpayments. May I point out that most if not all of the other nine provinces discontinued that practice as from January 1, 1952, the day the Old Age Security Act came into effect. Well, I think the Hon. Mr. Bell, the minister, and the Manitoba government were perfectly justified on receipt of the letter of February 9 from the minister in taking the position that they now had the green light to discontinue collecting these alleged overpayments. The Manitoba government also decided that they had been wrong in making the collections which they had made between January 1, 1952 and February of 1953 when the practice was discontinued.

As I say, I was most annoyed that the Manitoba government followed this practice for so long, but having expressed that annoyance I must now congratulate the provincial government, even if they had to be prodded into it by a statement from the minister here, on finally discontinuing the practice. I find now that the Manitoba government desires to go one step further, and it is a very logical step. That government has decided that if it was the only province of the ten that was collecting this money during that period of 14 months, it was wrong for it to have made those collections; and if it was wrong for it to have made those collections, it should now refund them. By reference, for example, to the Winnipeg Free Press of Thursday, April 16, 1953, I find that the Manitoba government has decided to make restitution. The provincial government decided it should never have collected that money from these people. No other province in Canada was doing it. They had the green light to discontinue the practice, as well as a rebuke from the Minister of National Health and Welfare for doing it, so the Manitoba government has introduced, and I presume the legislature has passed, legislation to provide for repaying that money which was wrongfully collected.

Mr. Martin: I do not think the hon. member really wants to use the word "rebuke" because that does not really represent the situation. If I did not point that out, then my hon. friend would argue that I had acquiesced in the term he has used. It may suit his purpose, but it does not really represent the situation.

Mr. Knowles: I accept the minister's interjection. I am absolutely certain that he did not intend what he said to be a rebuke. As a matter of fact, if you read the whole of his answer under date of January 29, 1953, to which I am referring now—the answer to my initial question—you will discover that it is as carefully worded as the minister's answers always are. It is clear that he did not intend it to be a rebuke, but the Manitoba government took it as a rebuke. It was as a result of their annoyance over being publicized as the bad province in the country that this change came about.

At any rate, as a result of the publicity to which I have just referred, and as a result of the minister's letter of February 9, the Manitoba government has discontinued the practice. Now they have gone one step better. Mind you, I do not think they have any particular credit coming to them for going that one step better. I think it follows that they should take that step, once they came to realize that they were wrong in collecting the money. The only proper course for the Manitoba government to follow is to repay that money. I understand from the press that the government of the province introduced a bill to make provision for repaying some $14,000 all told to these 385 persons. I emphasize again that these are living persons. These are people over 70 years of age, and in many cases considerably more than 70 years of age. Their only income now is the present old age security pension. There is no question of estates being involved in this at all.

Now, to get on with the story, I may say that Manitoba has decided to make this restitution; but in the meantime, following the law, Manitoba remitted to Ottawa 75 per cent of the money which had been collected from these living pensioners. This was in accordance with the law because the former old age pension under the means test was paid 75 per cent from the federal treasury and 25 per cent by the province. When there were any collections for overpayments, therefore, the amount collected had to be divided in that same proportion. It appears now that the Manitoba government has not yet been assured by Ottawa that Ottawa will return that 75 per cent.

That, Mr. Speaker, is my grievance. I am sorry it has taken quite so long to get to it, but I felt it was necessary to give the background so the house would understand it. Let it be clear that I think Manitoba was wrong in the first place because it collected this money, but Manitoba stopped collecting it because of the letter written to Mr. Bell by the Minister of National Health and Welfare on February 9. After reading the minister's letter they felt they had been wrong in collecting this money during the previous 14 months, so they decided that the money should be returned to the people from whom it had been collected.

Mr. Martin: Will the hon. member help me a little bit? He says that as a result of the correspondence that has ensued between the federal government on the one hand and Manitoba on the other we have indicated Manitoba was wrong in collecting the money. My hon. friend uses a group of words that, again, I do not think really depicts the situation. I think he ought to point out what the law is and where the obligation rests to carry out that law, and then from that the situation will flow in the clarity which I know he would want to give it.

Mr. Knowles: I know of no better way to demonstrate the clarity which the minister attributes to me than by quoting from his own letter. I find on page 4 of the letter of February 9, which he wrote to Mr. Bell, after the paragraph which I quoted a while ago, the following:

> In the case of the other nine provinces—

That is, the other nine apart from Manitoba.

> —this is exactly what happened,

That is, that in the case of the other nine they discontinued collecting these overpayments. I go on from the letter:

> —and the statement which I made in reply to a question recently in the house is literally correct, namely, that no province with the single exception of Manitoba has been endeavouring to take further action on its own initiative with respect to the recovery of these overpayments. Since these lists have been furnished to us the federal government has recognized and accepted this position. It has not objected or written to any of these provinces to insist that they continue to make further efforts to recover these overpayments.

What does that mean, Mr. Speaker? It means that the federal department wrote to each of the provinces at the end of December, 1951, and said to them: "You furnish us with a list of the people who might owe any of this money, and let the matter rest there until some decision has been made." The other nine provinces took that as an indication that they need not collect any of this money that had been overpaid. Manitoba did not take it that way; but when Manitoba received this letter I think Manitoba was perfectly justified in feeling that they misunderstood the previous correspondence and that it was a mistake, shall I put it, on their part to have made these collections. If they were led to feel that it was a mistake on their part I think they did the right thing in deciding to refund that money. I also think Manitoba is perfectly justified in expecting Ottawa to return to Manitoba the 75 per cent of that $14,000 which in the meantime Manitoba had remitted to Ottawa.

If Ottawa is not prepared to remit that 75 per cent, look at the discrimination that results, emanating from Ottawa, as between living pensioners in one province and living pensioners in the other nine provinces of Canada. It would mean that roughly $10,000 would be in the federal treasury, collected from living pensioners in Manitoba on this basis; whereas there would be no such money in the federal treasury collected on that basis from living pensioners in the other nine provinces of Canada.

Every time the minister has got up to interrupt me during the course of these remarks I dared to hope that he was going to take my speech away from me by stating that this issue had been settled favourably. I hoped the minister would say that negotiations between Ottawa and Manitoba on this point have now been concluded with the result that 75 per cent of that $14,000 will be refunded to Manitoba, so that Manitoba in turn can pass it back to these 385 pensioners in my province from whom this money was collected.

The case is unanswerable, Mr. Speaker. We are really amazed that there has been any delay on the part of the federal government in dealing with it in a fair and proper way. It has been a sorry story across these past 15 or 16 months, the way in which people who drew pensions under the former Old Age Pensions Act have been hounded by the ghost of a means test which supposedly died so far as those 70 and over are concerned on December 31, 1951. It is particularly annoying to me that this should be done with respect to older Canadians in only one province. It has also been annoying the way in which this has been tossed back and forth between provincial and federal governments.

I think both governments have been to blame. I certainly do not give the Manitoba government a clean bill of health in this matter. I feel that long ago they should have interpreted that letter, the one back at the end of 1951, in the same way the other nine provinces did; but they did not do it that way. Since they made the mistake of collecting the money, they had to be brought to time in the way I have indicated.

It seems to me that this government should now put this matter on an even keel across the country by refunding the money that Manitoba sent to Ottawa, so they can give back in full what they collected from these 385 pensioners and end this sorry story on a much more pleasant note than it has had up to this time.

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): My hon. friend, in his zeal, I think has not given the house—I know he has not done it intentionally—the true situation. As my hon. friend knows, under the Old Age Assistance Act administration of the measure –

Mr. Knowles: The minister means the Old Age Pensions Act.

Mr. Martin: Yes. Administration of that act is left to the provinces, and if the provinces choose to collect overpayments that is something that flows from a responsibility that arises out of its assumption of the administration of the Old Age Pensions Act.

After the passage of the Old Age Security Act Manitoba continued to recover overpayments that had been made in connection with the Old Age Pensions Act. What my hon. friend is asking me to do is to accept the responsibility for the action of a province. My hon. friend knows perfectly well that is neither a fair suggestion, nor is it one that I can possibly accede to. The provinces administer this measure in accordance with agreements executed between Canada on the one hand and the provinces on the other.

My hon. friend referred to the letter I wrote to Mr. Bell on February 9. Since he has done so I think it should be placed on Hansard in its entirety to indicate what the situation is. While the letter is a little long, I propose to do that. On February 9 I wrote to the minister of health and public welfare in Manitoba as follows:

Dear Mr. Bell:

I have your letter of February 2 on the subject of overpayments under the former Old Age Pensions Act. I think there is a good deal of misunderstanding and confusion about this matter, arising in part at least out of the fact that a number of separate questions have at various times been under discussion and the subject of correspondence.

I note, for example, that in one of the Winnipeg papers for Tuesday, February 3, you are quoted as being "amazed" at what I said recently in the House of Commons in reply to a question on the subject of overpayments; and you are alleged to have indicated that it was the opposite of what I told you in letters written March 4 and April 8, 1952. If you will examine the text of those letters, you will see, I am sure, that nowhere did they refer to, touch upon or deal with the subject of overpayments at all. Those letters dealt rather with the subject of recoveries from estates and with the repeal of the Old Age Pensions Act. They were written in reply to letters directed to me by your predecessor Mr. Schultz under dates of February 20, March 11 and March 15; and once again, if you will examine those letters and the resolution of the Manitoba legislature which prompted Mr. Schultz to write me on those occasions, you will see that Mr. Schultz' letters and the resolution passed by the Manitoba legislature dealt similarly with the questions of recoveries from estates and the repeal of the Old Age Pensions Act, and that, in fact, the resolution passed by the Manitoba legislature specifically excluded the question of recovery of overpayments from the subject matter of its recommendation.

I have carefully reviewed all the correspondence that has passed between this department and your department on the subject of overpayments, and so far as I have been able to discover, this subject, as distinct from recoveries from estates and the question of the repeal of the Old Age Pensions Act, has never been dealt with at any time in correspondence between Mr. Schultz, your predecessor and myself. Most of the correspondence between our two departments has dealt with the questions of the repeal of the act and recoveries from estates, and very little has been directed to the question of overpayments.

I note, however, that in a letter dated January 3, 1952, my deputy, Dr. Davidson, wrote to your Mr. McNeill—as he did to the corresponding officials of all provincial governments—setting forth the legal position and advising as to the attitude of the federal government on the subject of overpayments. In that letter, it was pointed out that, so far as the legal position goes,— —overpayments are technically and legally debts owing by the pensioner to the provincial government, and that consequently the collection of them was basically a provincial responsibility. It was pointed out further that the Old Age Pensions Act had not been repealed, and that the legal position of the provinces with respect to the recovery of overpayments was therefore the same as it had always been, and that this would continue to be the case until the actual repeal of the Old Age Pensions Act.

And I think it is important to emphasize this.

Having thus outlined the legal position, Dr. Davidson then went on to point out that the means by which the provincial pension authorities had traditionally endeavoured to recover overpayments,—namely, suspension of pension or partial reduction,—would no longer be available to them after December 31, 1951, when pensioners were transferred to the new Old Age Security Act. In recognition of this fact, the federal government had included a provision in its Financial Administration Act, which made it possible under certain circumstances for the federal authorities to take over from the provinces the responsibility of further recoveries by way of deduction from federal payments such as old age security. In consequence of the passage of this new legislation, Dr. Davidson requested the provincial authorities in Manitoba and in the other provinces to undertake the preparation of lists of all outstanding overpayments as at December 31, 1951. He further indicated that if these lists could be prepared on the basis of certain detailed information which he outlined in his letter, it would facilitate the task of the federal authorities and, in the final instance, of the federal treasury board in determining the steps which the federal government should take under section 95(3) of the Financial Administration Act to effect recovery of these overpayments.

I have dealt in some detail with the contents of this letter of January 3, 1952, because, so far as I can determine, it is the only letter which has ever dealt in any detail with the position of the federal government respecting overpayments. An identical letter was sent under the same date to each of the provincial pension authorities. In every case without exception, the provincial authorities complied with the request that lists of overpayments should be prepared and furnished to us. In the case of two provinces, these lists are not yet complete, but despite that, I think it can be fairly said that all the provinces complied substantially with our request.

Mr. Knowles: Underline the next paragraph.

[Mr. Martin.]

Mr. Martin: I think the whole letter is worth underlining, because it correctly sets out the situation. It continues:

It was assumed that after supplying the lists complete to December 31, 1951, the provincial authorities would leave the matter there and await a final decision from Ottawa as to the further action which the federal government itself would decide to take—

And I add, in parentheses, pursuant to its legal obligations under section 95 (3) of the Financial Administration Act.

—or the further action, if any, which the federal government might wish to suggest that the provinces themselves should take.

In the case of the other nine provinces, this is exactly what happened, and the statement which I made in reply to a question recently in the house is literally correct,—namely, that no province with the single exception of Manitoba has been endeavouring to take further action on its own initiative with respect to the recovery of these overpayments since these lists have been furnished to us. The federal government has recognized and accepted this position. It has not objected or written to any of these provinces to insist that they continue to make further efforts to recover these overpayments.

And I add again, by way of parenthesis: For the simple reason that it had no authority to do so. Any policy of seeking overpayments is a matter that is dependent entirely upon the competence and the authority with which the provincial government itself has endowed itself. Then the letter continues:

We have not insisted or pressed the provinces to make further efforts to recover these overpayments because we recognize that with the transfer of these pensioners to the old age security rolls, the provinces are no longer in touch with the individuals concerned and consequently have not the facilities which they formerly possessed for the effective recovery of the amounts which have been overpaid.

But while the federal government accepts this position, it remains true that the Old Age Pensions Act is still in existence,—

Again, by way of parenthesis, I must emphasize that it is still in existence. It is the law of the land; and no minister or any combination of members from this side of the house or from the other side has any power to halt the operation of something that is still the law of the land. Then, to repeat the first part of this paragraph:

But while the federal government accepts this position, it remains true that the Old Age Pensions Act is still in existence, and that the technical legal obligations resting upon the provincial authorities in connection with this legislation remain essentially as they were before the act ceased to be operative. This being the case, you will readily understand, I am sure, why it is not possible for me, as the minister charged with the responsibility for administering the act, to direct an instruction or even a request to any provincial authority asking or authorizing it to disregard what are undoubtedly its legal obligations under the act. As I said in another connection in my letter of March 4, 1952, to your predecessor Mr. Schultz, "we have not told the provinces that they should or that they should not continue to make recoveries from estates". Likewise, we have not told the provinces that they should or that they should not continue to make further efforts to recover overpayments. All that we can do is to point out the legal position as it now exists and as it will continue to exist until a proclamation is issued by the governor in council setting the date for the repeal of the Old Age Pensions Act in accordance with section 13 (2) of the Old Age Security Act.

Having thus set forth what is undoubtedly the technical legal position, I must say that I do not feel called upon in my capacity as the responsible federal minister to do more than that. It is then for each province to decide on its own initiative what it wishes to do or what it will do in this matter of overpayments. Nine provinces have taken no further steps to recover overpayments due to them since they submitted their lists as requested in the early part of 1952. I have not objected to that course of action in the case of any province.

And I might have added that I would have had no authority to do so.

The province of Manitoba has exercised its undoubted right (since these overpayments are technically and legally debts due to the crown in the right of the province of Manitoba) to make further attempts to recover these overpayments. That again is undoubtedly the right of the province of Manitoba, and I have had no quarrel with that either. All that I have said—and this continues to be my position—is that while such collections are undoubtedly made in conformity with the federal law (i.e. the regulations and the agreement made under the law), these overpayments are legally a matter for the provincial government, since they are without question debts owed to the province and not to the federal government.

With this explanation, I trust it will be possible for the Manitoba authorities to come to a satisfactory decision as to their future policy with respect to the recovery of overpayments.

I should add, in fairness, that when I made the statement in the house that Manitoba was the only province, naturally I acted upon information I was given. I find, however, that my statement was not entirely correct, and that there had been some smaller payments made in at least some provinces. I wrote to Mr. Bell and pointed that out to him, as I now point it out to the house. I think the correspondence gives the details.

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I must say something about this because I have had a great deal of correspondence with some of these old age pensioners who have had to return overpayments. The letter read by the minister was too long for me to grasp and perhaps if I had the supper hour in which to digest it I might speak differently about it. If the Manitoba government collected this money, they collected it according to the law that we passed in this parliament. If eight or nine other provinces did not collect it, why should the old age pensioners in Manitoba be penalized? I do not think it is fair. An article in the Winnipeg Free Press of Thursday, April 16, states that the federal government has declared that it is not in a position to refund this 75 per cent of the overpayment collections. The article went on to say, however, that it was understood it might change its mind on this score.

I hope the government will change its mind and straighten out this matter. It is a disgrace to treat old age pensioners like that, as they find it hard enough to live on the $40 they are getting without having anything taken away from them.

Mr. Martin: I know my hon. friend wants to be fair, but he is complaining about a situation in his own province. I am sure in the light of the law as contained in the letter which I have quoted, if the situation is as he indicated he would want to address his remarks to the proper authority. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has done on other occasions what my hon. friend is now doing, that is to completely disregard the law as it is. He is trying to impose upon us an obligation which does not rest upon us. If the hon. member would further peruse the letter which I have just read, perhaps he would think differently.

Mr. Bryce: It is all right for the minister to talk about a letter, but let us use a little common sense. I do not have any respect for people who would chisel old age pensioners in Manitoba. They have allowed money to be collected from them. If the minister tells me that he is going to give it back to them I will sit down immediately.

Mr. Martin: I think my hon. friend is perhaps one of the most fair-minded members in this house. Would he not agree that the last people in the world who would want to chisel old age pensioners would be not only my hon. friend but every hon. member of this house including the minister who is now speaking? Surely the government that has introduced the most comprehensive old age security legislation in the world cannot be charged with a responsibility which rests upon another authority.

Mr. Bryce: I am only going to say that if the government do not pass legislation to refund that money to Manitoba, then they are chiselling on both the provincial government and the old age pensioners.

Mr. J. A. Ross (Souris): Mr. Speaker, the minister read us a very lengthy document.

Mr. Martin: It was a pretty good one.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I imagine it is, as the minister usually does a fairly thorough job with this sort of thing. But it seems strange to me that one province should have collected these old age pensions to the extent that it did. After all, I give the Manitoba government credit for being reasonably efficient in the matter of collections, even though I do not agree with all they do. I do not think that they could have misunderstood the situation to the extent that they would be the only provincial government that continued collecting these overpayments.

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend's words will go to Manitoba, and for that reason I ask him to allow me to intervene. That is what I said when this question was first posed. But I had a look at it and I saw I was in error and that there were some other provinces who had made some overpayments. Those provinces are sovereign bodies just like this parliament. What my friend should do is to address himself to the proper authority, not to the government which has no control of this matter.

Mr. Knowles: If the minister regards the provinces as being sovereign in this respect, will he not respect the right of the province of Manitoba to refund this money by giving back to them the 75 per cent which was sent here?

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend is not doing now what he has done on other occasions, that is to argue on behalf of old age pensioners; he is now arguing for the treasury of the province of Manitoba.

Mr. Knowles: I am asking you to put that treasury in a position to refund this money to the old age pensioners to whom it belongs.

Mr. Martin: What my hon. friend is saying is that the government of the province of Manitoba, having collected certain amounts that had been overpaid to certain pensioners, having done that within their perfect legal right and having now decided that perhaps that course was undesirable, they propose to make a refund. We had nothing to do with that and the hon. member is asking us to reimburse the province of Manitoba for what might be regarded as a mistake or as the result of a reconsidered policy which they pursued. I submit to my hon. friend that the submission he is making is not on behalf of the old pensioners but on behalf of the treasury of the province of Manitoba, and is a wholly defenceless position.

Mr. Knowles: As the Minister of Trade and Commerce would say, nuts.

[Mr. Martin.]

Mr. Ross (Souris): I have taken up this matter in the past with the minister, and I cannot understand why the provincial government would have to collect it.

Mr. Martin: Under the British North America Act the provinces have the right to make laws affecting property and civil rights. If in respect to old age pensions a province decides to impose liens in order to guarantee against fraud, or if it decides to adopt a certain policy of recovery of overpayments under certain conditions, that is a power which it can exercise without any interference whatsoever from the federal government. That is what the province of Manitoba and some other provinces have done. There is no power on earth or under the constitution of this country which would permit us to interfere with that.

If I did interfere, what would happen? I would be told by hon. members that we were establishing a centralized authority, that we were interfering in provincial matters. They would be right in saying so. I say with great respect that this is a matter that comes exclusively within the powers of the provincial government, and that that is the answer to my hon. friend's question.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Mr. Speaker, at six o'clock I had almost finished my remarks on the motion to go into committee of supply. I merely want to suggest to the Minister of National Health and Welfare that I think these people have some claim on the federal authorities with respect to overpayments of old age pensions. The situation has been left in a rather uncertain state right now in the province of Manitoba. It has been stated that the authorities there are going to make these repayments, but it is not at all clear whether or not they are going to undertake to pay the 75 per cent which was turned over to the federal authorities when they collected it.

Having regard to the uncertain position in which this matter was left at the end of 1951 as between the minister and the provincial government of Manitoba, I would think there is some obligation on the federal government to reimburse these people. The minister says we are speaking for the provincial treasury, but my concern is that the recipients themselves be reimbursed. Whether it be through the provincial department or the federal authorities, they should get the money.

Mr. Martin: The recipients are getting the money.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Robinson in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

General administration—

426. Departmental administration, $588,333.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, the estimates of this department afford an opportunity of reviewing the trade position of the country. In his speech last Friday evening the Minister of Trade and Commerce reviewed this subject as he sees it and also made some comments on the condition of internal trade in Canada following the lines of the budget speech made by his colleague, the Minister of Finance, some two months ago. It is to be observed that the estimates of the department this year amount to $17,316,971, an increase of approximately $400,000 over those of the previous year.

The approach of the official opposition to this matter is based upon a recognition of the fundamental importance to Canada of her export trade. Indeed, in a very real sense the maintenance of our markets abroad and the maintenance of a high and profitable standard of export trade is of the lifeblood of this country. We have been competing with France for the last several years for third position among the trading nations of the world. On a per capita basis our exports in 1952 amounted to approximately $575. In this respect we can compare the United States, whose per capita exports amounted to $170. On a per capita basis we are practically three and a half times their figure, and we are nearly double the per capita figure of the United Kingdom. Indeed, on a per capita basis we export less only than Hong Kong and New Zealand. Last year a quarter of our gross national production went to the export market.

I mention these facts to emphasize the extent of Canada's dependence upon healthy export markets for the maintenance of a strong Canadian economy. We were happy indeed to see that the figures reflected that in the year 1952 our exports did expand and Canada's external trade reached the highest figure in her history. But, Mr. Chairman, we must not be led by contemplation of these figures into assuming that all is well with Canada's trading outlook, or that we can afford to sit back and be complacent in the face of certain hard facts. There was not much indication in the statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce last Friday evening that some of these facts have received that recognition on the part of the government which I think they should receive. Some of the figures, while they look very good and are indeed a matter of gratification to us all, nevertheless bring little comfort to some sections of the Canadian economy.

The weakness in Canada's trading position at the present time, if one may sum it up in a sentence, lies in the loss of our markets for many of our agricultural products abroad, and principally the loss of the United Kingdom market, the traditional market for many of our agricultural products. Today we are selling no cheese to the United Kingdom for the first time in our history. We are selling hardly any bacon, pork, poultry, eggs, milk, beef, apples, fish and other food products. The loss of these markets has been a very serious challenge to the well-being of the Canadian economy. We are faced with a great surplus of pork in Canada. Figures have been given of 100 million pounds, with 40 million of it in the form of canned pork on hand. This surplus exerts a heavy pressure on our market, on the prices our farmers are receiving for their products.

These are all the direct result of the loss of the United Kingdom market for these important agricultural products. The problem is, how shall these markets be recovered? The Minister of Trade and Commerce in his speech on April 17 did not seem to be unduly concerned. In fact it would be correct to say that he did not display any particular concern over the loss of these markets; for in characteristic fashion, he summed up the situation at page 4063 of Hansard in these words:

> The simplest way I can describe the present economic situation in Canada is to say that at no time in the past have Canadians been more prosperous.

Well, Mr. Chairman, let the Minister of Trade and Commerce say that to some of the farmers of this country. The minister undertook to tell the house also that the government has done everything possible to recover our traditional markets, by which I assume he meant the markets for our agricultural surplus in the United Kingdom. Mr. Chairman, it will take a great deal more than that mere assertion on the part of the Minister of Trade and Commerce to convince the people of this country, and particularly the farmers of this country, that the government has done everything possible to recover our traditional markets. Perhaps, however, we may recognize this change of attitude shown in the minister's statement. He is at least recognizing the fact that the country under this present administration has lost those traditional markets. Hitherto we have been hearing only airy and confident statements from the treasury benches to the effect that things were never so good in the country before. Well, tell that to the farmers who have lost their traditional markets for bacon, pork, poultry, eggs, milk, cheese, fish and other products.

Let us have a look at some of the figures issued by the minister's own department on this subject. I have the dominion bureau of statistics daily bulletin for February 10, from which I read:

> Accrued net income of farm operators from farm production declined by $255 million in 1952, a drop of 12 per cent from the record level established in 1951. This decline is largely attributable to a severe drop in livestock prices of between 20 and 25 per cent, and a 10 per cent rise in farm operating expenses. The record wheat crop of 688 million bushels was of excellent grade, and initial prices were unchanged; but these factors were not sufficient to offset the developments mentioned above.

Mr. Lesage: Foot-and-mouth disease.

Mr. Fleming: Yes, foot-and-mouth disease did enter into what happened to the prices for livestock in this country, but that is not the whole story. These markets have been lost, and we are not satisfied that this government has made the resolute efforts required to recover them. The government has shown too characteristic an attitude of sitting back and viewing everything with complacency.

The government are making much of the fact that they were represented at the prime ministers' conference last autumn. Well, Mr. Chairman, it is to be remembered that we waited a good many years for this conference to be called before any steps were taken in that direction, and all the while our markets in the United Kingdom and abroad for our agricultural products were contracting. Yet when we brought the matter up in the house it was turned down every time. On October 21, 1949, as found in Hansard at page 1023, we moved for the calling of a conference of the nations of the commonwealth "for the purpose of working out arrangements to preserve and enlarge those traditional markets on which jobs and opportunities for Canadians very largely depend". What was the fate of that proposal put forward in the interests of the Canadian agricultural producers? It was defeated, Mr. Chairman, by the Liberal majority in this house. They voted solidly against it.

Let us come down to 1950, when a similar motion was introduced on behalf of the official opposition in this house. On February 28, 1950, as recorded at page 308 of Hansard, this amendment was moved:

> this house is of the opinion that the government should take immediate steps to convene at the earliest possible date a conference of the nations of the British commonwealth and the countries of the empire to devise policies to restore our lost markets, and thereby to provide jobs for our Canadian people.

What was the fate of that proposal? The same fate, Mr. Chairman; it was defeated by the Liberal majority in this house, with every Liberal in the house voting against the proposal.

Coming down to 1952, on June 3 of that year the Leader of the Opposition moved this amendment:

> this house is of the opinion that the government should consider the advisability of taking steps to convene at the earliest possible date a conference of the nations of the British commonwealth to seek means by which there may be convertibility of commonwealth currencies, and to explore all the possibilities for restoring and enlarging those traditional markets upon which our prosperity so largely depends.

What was the fate of that motion? The same as that of the others; it was defeated in this house by the Liberal majority, with every Liberal voting against it.

Of course, Mr. Chairman, great virtue is claimed for the fact that the government was represented at the prime ministers' conference in London in December. While we are glad to have seen Canada represented there, we have not forgotten that the effectiveness of such a conference would have been much greater if it had been called long before; and it was not called long before because this government decided against it. The conference of last December was belated. The government went into that conference with a lack of enthusiasm, as reflected in its attitude in the house on the occasions to which I have referred.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a word on the subject of wheat. It is a matter of very great satisfaction indeed that while our exports to the United Kingdom of other agricultural products were declining, and indeed were being cut off entirely, our exports of wheat to the United Kingdom did increase substantially in 1952. Indeed, our exports of wheat moved up approximately 40 per cent in value, from $441 million in 1951 to $621 million in 1952.

An hon. Member: Almost 50 per cent.

Mr. Fleming: No; an increase of something like 40 per cent. Our flour exports to the United Kingdom rose just slightly. But, Mr. Chairman, lest we sit back on our oars let us remember that even taking account of the increase in 1952 in exports of wheat to the United Kingdom over 1951, nevertheless the total of such exports was not sufficient to make up, as is pointed out in the quotation I read from the dominion bureau of statistics bulletin, for what the farmers in this country have suffered through loss of income from other products.

In this year, 1953, we have more wheat to sell than ever before. Indeed, the big carryover in this country presents a serious problem. The dominion bureau of statistics daily bulletin of April 13 puts the problem in this way:

> Supplies of wheat remaining on or about March 1 this year in the four major wheat exporting countries—United States, Canada, Argentina, and Australia—for export and carryover at the end of their respective crop years amounted to 1,468,200,000 bushels, some 66 per cent greater than the 885,600,000 available a year ago, according to the March issue of the bureau's wheat review.
> Supplies on March 1 this year (in millions of bushels) were as follows, with last year's figures in brackets: United States, 668·2 (411·6); Canada, 533·3 (391·2); Argentina, 160·3 (2·1); and Australia, 106·4 (80·7).

So, Mr. Chairman, you can see at a glance that in every one of those four exporting countries the carryover of wheat is substantially greater than a year ago. This bulletin proceeds:

> Exports of Canadian wheat as grain in February amounted to 14,000,000 bushels, the lowest monthly total for the current crop year, states the bureau's wheat review. Wheat shipments during February may normally be expected to be lower than those of other winter months, but an additional factor this year was the strike of elevator workers at several of the larger west coast terminals normally handling a substantial share of the export movement. Although this year's February wheat exports were some 4,700,000 bushels lower than in January and 4,600,000 below those of February 1952, they were 3,800,000 greater than in February, 1951.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we are soon to have in this house a debate on the new international wheat agreement, and I do not intend to attempt to anticipate that debate or the course of it. However, before I leave this subject of wheat after commenting on the effect of this big carryover and the problem that it presents for the whole Canadian economy, I must comment that it must be a matter of disappointment to all Canadians that the United Kingdom has not seen fit to subscribe to the wheat agreement.

This agreement is of very great importance to Canada. The assurance of a market for our wheat is of the most vital importance, not only to the agricultural economy of this country but to the whole national economy. We have only to think of what happened several months ago to recognize the danger that would confront the economy of this country if the United Kingdom should transfer to Russia or other countries, for instance, even a substantial portion of her wheat purchases. We had an example in January last in the scare that was created when a report was issued that Great Britain was turning to Russia for the purchase of 600,000 tons of wheat. The scare which resulted is just an example of the feeling of concern we must have in this country for the whole future of the marketing of our wheat. An agreement without Britain subscribing, when she is the leading wheat importer in the world and particularly for Canada, is after all something like the play without Hamlet.

The United Kingdom market for our wheat is fundamental to our national prosperity. Whatever may be the reasons which have led the United Kingdom government to their decision not to adhere to this agreement, whether it be that the maximum price of $2.05 was 5 cents more than they wished to pay or whether it was some antagonism toward bulk buying, nevertheless it is a matter of very great concern indeed to all Canadians.

I have not time at this stage, Mr. Chairman, to say as much as I wished to say on the subject of raw materials and the extent to which Canada could strengthen her economy by the greater processing of raw materials at home. The economy of this country has been immensely strengthened by the extent to which we are now able to draw upon domestic sources for oil, which used to be a major import from the United States. Notwithstanding discoveries of vast ore bodies in Canada, iron and its products still remain a major factor in the import situation in this country. In 1952 our imports of iron and its products from all countries amounted to $1,407 million, of which we purchased only $122 million from the United Kingdom and $1,231 million from the United States.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a word concerning our trading relations with the United States. Geography has dictated that our trading relations with the United States shall always be intimate. Political factors oftentimes have had a contrary influence. In the past three years, 1950, 1951 and 1952, our imports from the United States rose in both amount and percentage. Our exports to the United States in 1952 were approximately the same in value as in 1951, while the percentage they represented of the total of Canadian exports dropped from 59 per cent to 54 per cent, and in the first two months of this year our exports remained stable.

There is a feature of our trading position with the United States which is not new. In 1950 our import balance in trade with the United States, as it is now euphoniously called, was just $80 million; in 1951 it increased to $479 million, and in 1952 to $628 million. This is a continuing problem for the Canadian economy, the extent to which we are confronted with an import balance in our trading relations with the United States. It is quite true that the United States is our best customer, but we are her best customer. The difference in amount, Mr. Chairman, is something that is fundamental in our whole trading position. It is the danger that results from a country placing most of its trading eggs in one basket.

In the case of the United States, in 1952 she took 54 per cent of our exports and supplied us with 74 per cent of our imports. In other words, Mr. Chairman, 64 per cent of this country's trade, export and import, with the world was done with one country, the United States. While our political and economic relationships with the United States may be on the whole very satisfactory, and on the political side are certainly an inspiration to the world, nevertheless there are very great economic dangers in this condition of unbalance between exports and imports. Indeed, the Minister of National Revenue recognized this, for he is reported in the Toronto Globe and Mail of September 12, 1952 in these words:

> Canada's economic position, at present strong, also has a weakness, Revenue Minister McCann told the National Tax Association at its 45th annual conference in the Royal York Hotel yesterday.
> "That weakness is that Canada depends so much upon the United States," said Dr. McCann. "Canadians can never be freed from the fear of a slump in the U.S., for which we would not in any way be responsible and which we could do little to control."

There is a commendable recognition of the problem. It is a continuing problem of serious proportions when we measure the strength of our trading position. Wherever we may expand our exports to the United States, let us bear in mind that that is no adequate substitute for the loss of markets in the United Kingdom, because of the fact that the purchases made by the United States in such cases are not of the same products as those which Great Britain had been accustomed to make in the past before we lost our traditional markets there.

Now, what of our trading relations with the United States? What is to be said of some of the more pressing problems that confront us there? We are waiting to see, of course, what will be the effective trading policy of the new congress, not just the new administration, but the new congress. We recall that Senator Taft has said, as reported in a Reuters dispatch of November 18, that he doubted whether U.S. tariffs could be reduced much further. Again Mr. Taft said that U.S. tariffs had been reduced to their lowest point already, and he added:

> I personally doubt if changes in tariffs would result in any substantial increase of imports into the United States.

President Eisenhower has made statements which, on the whole, contribute to a feeling of confidence in this country, but whether or not that policy will be reflected in the United States congress is yet to be proven. There is pressing need, Mr. Chairman, so far as our trading relations with the United States are concerned, for customs simplification. Legislation for that purpose was urged upon congress by President Eisenhower. It is a fact that the authority of collectors of customs in United States ports is very broad. There is so much uncertainty and so many differences in the way these customs regulations are applied that they have created very serious problems for Canadian producers seeking to export to the United States. We would have liked to hear more from the Minister of Trade and Commerce as to efforts on the part of this government to seek the enactment of such a measure on the part of a friendly United States administration.

Then there is that problem, Mr. Chairman, which is of quite serious concern to the Canadian farmers, particularly the Canadian dairy farmers. The deliberate breach of the provisions of GATT by the United States congress in the face of protests on the part of the administration, both in the days of President Truman and since the time of President Eisenhower within quite recent months, has not only had the effect of excluding Canadian dairy products on a large scale, but has given rise to feelings of disquiet and uncertainty as to the whole future of our relations with the United States under the general agreement on tariffs and trade. It has hurt the Canadian dairy producer, and it has challenged the whole principle of these agreements.

I should like to say a word concerning our trading relations with the United Kingdom. I have mentioned already the loss of that traditional market for virtually all of our agricultural products except wheat and flour. Salmon is another product that we used to ship in large quantities to the United Kingdom. Apart from an altogether too small order that was announced recently by the Minister of Fisheries, the market for our salmon in the United Kingdom has been greatly reduced and virtually lost. Again, the United Kingdom used to take great quantities of our timber exports. That market has been greatly contracted, and the timber producers of this country are suffering accordingly.

It is true that our exports to the United Kingdom in the years 1950, 1951 and 1952 rose in amount though not in percentage, while—and this is regrettable—our imports from the United Kingdom declined in those three years drastically in both amount and percentage of our total. With the financial and trading difficulties which confront the United Kingdom, Mr. Chairman, it is evident that the United Kingdom must have access to more dollars if she is going to be able to increase her purchases from this country. I realize the Canadian government cannot do everything in this respect. To be fair, I would be the first to recognize that fact. But I hope we can make more rapid progress toward the St. Lawrence waterway, because there is an opportunity opening up for Great Britain to increase her sale of heavy equipment with accompanying engineering services in this country.

In his review last Friday night the Minister of Trade and Commerce did not tell us anything about purchases from the United Kingdom on government account. We wish to see the purchases this country is making for national defence used as a means of strengthening our trade with the United Kingdom; for if these purchases that we have to make abroad are routed to the United Kingdom, then the United Kingdom is correspondingly going to have more dollars with which to purchase our agricultural products, and that is highly necessary at the present time.

These facts are recognized in the United Kingdom, because when the overseas trade minister, Mr. Harry Mackeson, left London last September to visit Canada and the United States with a view to increasing the export of United Kingdom products to these dollar countries we read in a Reuters dispatch that he said this:

"But it is mainly in the field of capital equipment, plant and machinery, that we can expect to increase our exports", he said.

That is their exports to Canada and the United States.

Britain is best able to meet competition from other countries in the engineering field, where she can exploit her skill and experience in specialized work such as electrical engineering, machine tools and prefabricated buildings for export, he said.

I hoped that the Minister of Trade and Commerce might hold out some hope to us of enlargement of the token import scheme which has been in effect in the United Kingdom in this post-war period. Forty per cent of the basic period was the maximum permitted in certain imports laid down in that token scheme. In January, 1952, even this percentage suffered a 25 per cent reduction, so that in this scheme only 30 per cent of the United Kingdom imports in the basic pre-war period of 1936 to 1939 is being permitted to enter the United Kingdom.

The minister has said much about our trade with Latin America. It is true that our exports to Latin America in the years 1950, 1951 and 1952 rose in amount and percentage. In the same years our imports showed a slight rise. In 1952 our exports to and imports from Latin America were in almost complete balance. However, our exports to Latin America have fallen off sharply in 1953, partly as a result of reduced shipments of automobiles, and our imports from Latin America in 1953 thus far are also slightly lower. I am not going to say, of course, Mr. Chairman, that that has anything to do with the visit of the Minister of Trade and Commerce this year to Latin America, but it does emphasize that we must make every effort to take advantage of the trading opportunities that lie in the Latin American market.

As to our position with respect to Europe, Mr. Chairman, in these three years, 1950, 1951 and 1952, our exports to Europe showed a substantial and gratifying increase in amount and percentage. But in the first two months of 1953 they dropped by one-third as compared with the first two months of 1952, and that is a very serious decline. We hope that it will be arrested. Our imports from Europe in 1952 declined both in percentage and amount. The increase in strength of the German economy augurs well for this country, if we can continue to find in Germany a market for our wheat.

In his review the minister said very little about trade with countries behind the iron curtain. We are still doing some trade with most of those countries. It was reported last November that the Canadian government was taking steps to restrain dumping in this country on the part of two of the countries behind the iron curtain, Czechoslovakia and Poland, but we have heard very little on that subject since. I hope we may hear what steps the government is taking in dealing with the problem of dumping in the Canadian market by countries behind the iron curtain.

The minister had some words to offer to the house concerning the general agreement on tariffs and trade. We are greatly concerned about the continuance of this agreement on tariffs and trade. Unquestionably, Mr. Chairman, while there are two sides to the ledger with respect to GATT, nevertheless it was an important achievement when, in 1947, 34 countries entered into general agreements on tariffs and trade, and when it was possible to extend these agreements as a result of the subsequent conferences at Torquay and Annecy. The continuance of these agreements is not to be assumed. Therefore, since the trading outlook of this country depends to a very substantial extent on the continuation of these general agreements on tariffs and trade, we hope the government will lose no opportunity to put its whole strength and weight behind efforts which may be made to extend these agreements.

It is a fact, of course, that the future of GATT, particularly in reference to Canada, depends to a considerable degree upon the extent to which the United States will give willing subscription to the extension of these agreements. President Eisenhower himself has declared for their extension; but it remains to be seen what attitude the congress will take, particularly in the light of the action of congress, in breach of GATT, in imposing the ban on imports into that country of dairy products from Canada and other countries that are parties to GATT.

In his review the minister did not have anything to say concerning the problem of the convertibility of currency. This is a problem of very great proportions. I should be the last to underestimate the difficulties involved; but we must do all we can in concerting efforts with the United Kingdom and other countries of the sterling bloc to revive convertibility, at least initially, on some current basis. The problems are very great; but there will not be any lasting solution of our trading problems with them, and there will be a continued loss of markets in the United Kingdom, unless this problem is grappled with and eventually a solution found for it.

Therefore, summing the matter up in conclusion, I should like to say that we in this part of the house do not view Canada's trading outlook with pessimism, far from it. On the other hand we do not view it as something the health of which can be regarded as assured for all time. On the contrary, I think what we need in our approach to this question is a realistic attitude, appreciating the strength of our trading position and also recognizing such weaknesses as have developed in it.

I mention these weaknesses as problems to which we should be alive, and which should attract our best efforts in seeking their solution. I do not purport necessarily to list them all in order of importance, but certainly I would put in first position the restoration of our lost markets, particularly in the United Kingdom, for our agricultural surplus;

Next, the future of our exports of wheat;

Next, the future of GATT, when the present agreements come to an end this year;

Next, the problem of having our trading eggs, to a dangerous degree, in one basket, and thereby emphasizing the desirability of our making a supreme, a herculean effort, to recover those markets in Great Britain and in other countries abroad for our agricultural products;

Next, the problem of doing what we may, and to encourage the United Kingdom and other members of the sterling bloc to do what they can, to restore the convertibility of currency as soon as that may be possible;

Next, the need of a greater degree of balance in our exports and imports in trading with the United States.

Next, there is also the problem which is presented by the re-emergence of Japan as a world trader. Up to this time we have not felt seriously the impact of post-war Japanese competition, but that is a problem we must prepare to meet. Japan is knocking on the door of GATT; and if she is admitted I do urge that something will be required from the Japanese government by way of an undertaking to conform to fair trading practices. Of necessity we must do something like that if Japan is to be admitted to the company of countries which are members of GATT, having regard to the experience we have had with Japanese dumping in pre-war years.

Finally, so far as this Progressive Conservative party is concerned, let me make it abundantly clear that our aim is not to restrict trade but rather to expand it. What I have said has been designed to stress the importance we attach to the maintenance and the expansion of our export trade. We want none of the smugness that has long been evident on the part of this government in the face of the loss of our traditional markets, and particularly the markets for our agricultural surpluses.

This is a matter of leading importance to Canada and, so far as the Progressive Conservative party is concerned, we regard it as something which must be a first national objective.

Trade is a two-way street. We cannot be satisfied simply with the trading position we hold today, strong though it may be in many respects. Our production is growing. It must continue to grow. We cannot take for granted even the continuance of our present markets. We must maintain those markets and must seek to expand them. We must seek further markets abroad. In all cases we must follow active policies. We must look ahead. And any thought that the free world should continue to be divided even partially into two trading blocs, dollar and sterling, is inconceivable to this country. If it were left that way it would spell very serious difficulty for our Canadian trading outlook.

No; Canadians in the years ahead will need to be efficient producers and efficient salesmen. In the export markets of the world we will have to meet competition that will be very keen. No doubt we will be confronted with challenges to keep down costs. We hope the government will contribute to lessening the costs of production by following a policy of reduced taxation, and that the whole Canadian economy will then be geared to a policy of expanding production and expanding sales abroad.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Chairman, this is the kind of debate in which I believe all members of the House of Commons are interested. Whatever may be our differences in approach to the problem of trade and commerce, we are all anxious to see this country prosper, to see our trading relationships bring to this country a high degree of welfare for our Canadian people, and to make our contribution to a better world.

We are a country that is peculiarly vulnerable economically, because of our dependence upon external markets. No one in his senses suggests that Canada can be made self-sufficient. We are not organized in that way. Our whole economy has been geared to supplying our own people with certain of their requirements, and producing vast quantities of certain commodities that by no conceivable stretch of the imagination could be consumed by ourselves. Therefore we must export our surplus in exchange for goods and services our people can use for their own benefit.

Canada is more dependent upon external trade than any other country in the world. For example, on a per capita basis we are the leading world trader. In absolute terms we have become, since the end of world war II, with the exception of one year, the number three trader. That one year was 1951.

This shows our dependency upon world trade, when we realize that, per head of population, we are first; and in absolute terms, with the exception of 1951, third. The United States and the United Kingdom have ranked first and second in absolute terms during these years, and it was in 1951 that France displaced Canada, and moved into the third position. As far as I have been able to see from the complete records for the first quarter of 1952 we have jumped to third position again, and from the present patterns of trade I think it is indicated that we are likely to maintain that place in the near future.

I believe that is all the more significant because we must realize that if we are to continue to expand as we have during the past few years, when our expansion has been very great indeed, exports must not only be as great as they are today but they must increase in proportion to our total production.

Let us look at the two leading items of export, newsprint and wheat. The foreign market for these particular commodities is very critical and always susceptible to factors beyond our control. For example, newsprint, wood pulp and pulpwood sales are dependent upon a high level of business activity in the United States. Some people may say that perhaps if that high level of activity in that great country were lessened we might be able to conserve our forest resources to a greater extent. I think that is true, especially when I see some of these United States papers, particularly the Sunday editions, and realize the number of Canadian trees that have gone into their production. I realize then how necessary it is for us to have some sort of forest conservation policy.

Nonetheless our economy is largely dependent upon our exports of newsprint and pulpwood to the United States. At the least sign of a recession advertising will drop, and with a drop in advertising the demand for our newsprint and pulpwood will drop because newspapers will be reduced in size to that extent. At the same time the Canadian producers would be forced to reduce their production of these commodities accordingly.

In connection with wheat we all realize in this house, particularly those of us who come from the prairie provinces, that a major factor in the production of wheat is the weather. As the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) has said, most of us are greatly disturbed over the recent failure to effect an international wheat agreement. Under such an agreement at least we were assured of a major share of the United Kingdom market. We have not that assurance now. I suppose the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) may say, and quite correctly, that in any event the British will have to buy large quantities of Canadian wheat, but we have not the comfortable assurance today that we had under the international wheat agreement.

I regard with a good deal of misgiving any return to the uncertainties of the open market, especially with the increasing surpluses we have witnessed over the past year or two. Perhaps this should not have been unforeseen. I remember some of the debates that took place in the British house on the British wheat agreement which I think on the whole was of benefit to our western growers. Criticism of that agreement came from the ranks of the supporters of the government now in power in Great Britain. I will not say all of them, but I think many of them rather dislike negotiated agreements of this description and would be quite glad to see the Liverpool exchange opened again and have trading on the pre-war basis.

Last week I noticed in the United States paper a report which is quite serious to those of us who come from western Canada, and should be of serious concern to Canadians generally. The suggestion was made and apparently received sympathetically that an embargo should be placed upon the importation into the United States of coarse grains. In the representations that were made in Washington, Canada was mentioned particularly.

A serious curtailment of our exports to the United States and elsewhere of wheat, wood pulp, newsprint, coarse grains and other products would have a serious effect upon our whole economy. In 1952 wheat and newsprint—I am going to speak in very round numbers—each provided more than 20 per cent of our exports. It was a little more than 20 per cent in one case and a little less in the other, but together the exports of newsprint and wheat made up some 40 per cent of our total exports.

Let us look for a moment at another aspect of our external trade. In 1952 we imported fuel goods, that is coal, petroleum and its products, worth nearly $500 million. Nearly half a billion dollars worth of our imports in 1952 were fuel. Of course we hope that as time passes and new oil and gas fields are found and developed in western Canada we shall become more and more self-supplying in that regard. There is every indication that that will be so.

Then we are forced to import large quantities of rubber and bauxite to supply two of the great essential industries in this country. We have the Polymer plant owned and operated by the government. I once complimented the minister upon the Polymer plant as an example of public enterprise and I remember he said, perhaps with a good deal of pride, that it was not a public enterprise, it was his enterprise. I do not care whose enterprise it is, the Polymer plant has filled an important place in our economy. I hope under public enterprise it will continue to do so. But we still have to import raw rubber.

Of course we have to import bauxite for our huge aluminum industry. Our dependence upon imports becomes clear when it is noted that last year we brought in $1·25 billion worth of capital goods which were required for our further expansion. These were made up of farm and non-farm machinery, automobile parts, rolling mill products, engines and boilers, aircraft parts, electrical apparatus and so on.

When we discuss these trade problems, our huge imports, our necessity for export markets and the necessity to balance our trade as far as we are able to do so, we also have to bear in mind that in spite of our huge production we have a relatively small population. The maintenance and raising of our standard of living, in view of our very limited population and domestic consumption, must be related to the sale of much of our production in external markets. When we export we do so primarily to import something that we can use or that will be beneficial to the people in this country, whether it be capital goods, consumable supplies or services that our people can use.

It is quite clear that our own consumers are not sufficient in number to purchase a large proportion of our domestic production. There is a limit to the amount of wheat that an individual can consume or the amount of newsprint or other products such as salmon, fish or bacon and pork. So we must continue to view with a great deal of interest our export markets. I think that is illustrated by the disposition of our two major products, newsprint and wheat. We are already among the leading consumers of both newsprint and wheat, but we must still largely depend upon foreign markets for the consumption of most of what we produce in both of these commodities.

If we are to do this properly we must consider the financial position of Canada in relation to the rest of the world. Of course this relationship obviously must have an immense bearing on our trade, for in absolute terms—absolute terms, let us not forget—we are still a debtor nation, although our position greatly improved in that respect as the result of world war II. But in so far as most countries are concerned we are a creditor nation. Indeed, it is only toward the United States that we remain a debtor nation, and this of course is of great importance when trade with Europe and particularly our trade with the United Kingdom are under discussion. It means that there is a complete reversal from the old days in our financial relationships with the United Kingdom.

In the old days the United Kingdom was a creditor to us but now she is a debtor. This means that not merely does she need to export goods to us—I shall put it this way, although it is not quite accurate—equivalent in value to her imports from us, but she must export goods considerably in excess of her imports if she is to retire her debts, invest in Canadian industries—and I think most Canadians welcome such investments—and at the same time achieve something of a balance of payments with us. That of course is involved in what my hon. friend called convertibility just now. After all, convertibility is not entirely a question of financial arrangement. It is really a question of trade, the exchange of goods, the flowing of goods in various directions and so on, so that as goods move currencies appear and you have a reasonable relationship between those currencies which enables you to bring about a system of convertibility.

Old-time multilateral trade seems to be gone, and at least for the present it does seem to be far beyond our reach. More and more, whether we like it or whether we do not like it, trade becomes a question of exchange, and already in many instances and between some countries it has become in effect a matter of barter. That is an attractive trade arrangement in some respects so far as Great Britain is concerned, because of the shortage of certain currencies, in making trade agreements with the Soviet union and other iron curtain countries. That is not a financial arrangement but a matter of the exchange of goods under what amounts in many respects to some system of barter.

I spoke of imports, but let us look at the trade picture more closely as it affects our external relationships. Go back a few years. At least 15 per cent of our imports in each of the years between 1920 and 1929 came from the United Kingdom, with a peak of 18·4 per cent attained in 1924 and a low of 15 per cent in 1929. From 1930 right through 1938 our minimum imports from the United Kingdom were 16 per cent in 1931 with a peak of 24·4 per cent in 1933. In other words, as the depression became worse we seemed to have a higher percentage of imports from the United Kingdom.

But since the end of world war II in 1945 our peak in imports from the United Kingdom only reached 12·7 per cent in 1950, while our imports reached a low of 7·4 per cent in 1947. In 1952 our imports were slightly higher at 8·9 per cent, but one might almost say no higher. That is the picture as far as the United Kingdom is concerned. I agree with the hon. member for Eglinton that we have to think of trade with the United Kingdom because so far as our trading relations are concerned, I think we are more secure with that country than we are with the United States.

I asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce yesterday about the refusal of the United States to consider a low tender for ships from a Canadian company in exactly the same way that the United States refused to consider a tender from the English Electric Company for hydroelectric goods which was very greatly below the lowest American tender. The minister said what is perfectly true, and I have no quarrel with it, at page 4141 of Hansard:

> —but whether the government of the United Kingdom is justified in protesting as to how the United States buys its electrical equipment I cannot say.

He said it was the privilege of the United States to decide what they would do in that respect, but it illustrates the point I want to make. It shows how uncertain our trading relations with the United States are. It is not a question of tariff policy. It is an embargo against tenders from the United Kingdom and an embargo against tenders from Canada. If the United States is going to continue that kind of policy, what use is GATT to us? What use to us is any other trading arrangement? I think many of us in the house are pretty disturbed at the manner in which the United States has failed to live up to the understandings and the agreements to which we committed ourselves at Geneva in 1947 and which we have fulfilled. I think that is tragic because the American people are such generous-hearted, fine people, so friendly and all the rest of it to ourselves and to the rest of the world. Yet as a nation and as a government they are unreliable and often shortsighted. It is dangerous for us to place all our eggs in the United States basket. That, I think, is the lesson we have yet to learn.

Let us look at the picture as to imports from the United States in the same period. It shows exactly the opposite trend. From 1920 through 1929 the lowest record of imports was 64·9 per cent in 1924 and the highest was 68·9 per cent in 1920, closely followed by 68·8 per cent in 1929. I am taking these figures from the official records of the department. From 1930 through 1938 the low was 54·2 per cent in 1933 and the high was 64·8 per cent in 1930. Since the end of world war II the low was 67·1 per cent in 1950 and the high was reached last year with 73·9 per cent.

You will notice the reverse trend during the depression. The percentage of British imports went up and the percentage of United States imports went down. Imports from the United Kingdom during the past seven years have been at a level of 6 to 7 per cent lower than they were during the 1920's, and imports from the United States have been at a level of 3 to 5 per cent higher for the comparative periods. I think the outstanding feature of these figures is the concentration of our trade with one country, and that one country the United States.

This is particularly significant when we consider the fact that we are a debtor nation toward the United States and a creditor nation toward the United Kingdom. If the roles were reversed the concentration of our trade would reflect a very much happier picture as far as our Canadian economy and the future of this country are concerned. As it is we are exceedingly susceptible to any economic changes that take place in the United States. If a major depression did take place in the United States—and I hope it will not come there—our economy which is so highly dependent on our trade with that country would undergo serious and—yes, I would go so far as to say—disastrous dislocation.

So I can say to the minister that I think every effort should be made by this country to find other export markets, and I welcomed the fact that the minister took a trip to South America. I hope he and others will take trips to other parts of the world in an endeavour to diversify our markets as quickly as possible even though, may I add, that should result in what seem to be some short-term losses and indeed some short-term trading disadvantages. Of course, since the acceptability of a policy of this description to private manufacturers and traders is unlikely, even though it is in their long-term interests, I think the onus is on the government to adopt some appropriate course of action, and I am going to say something about that.

Such a policy should take into account both imports and exports. In the short-term view the latter appear to be less important. We are exporting more and more goods, and we are obtaining better prices for them. The increase is due to the fact that there is such a demand for raw materials with which we can supply the world, particularly in view of the general re-armament that is going on all over the world. However, it is not merely a matter of disposing of our products today but rather, as far as possible, of ensuring that we shall still be selling them tomorrow and the day after. This can be assured, and I hope the minister agrees, only by developing new markets overseas.

Important as is diversification of our export markets, more pressing is the diversification of our import markets. For example, while 70 per cent of our total exports in 1952 went to the United States and the United Kingdom, an even greater percentage—73·9 per cent of our imports—came from one of those two countries. I mean 73·9 per cent of our total imports, $2,977,000,000 out of a total of $4,030,500,000, came from one of the two, from the United States. To my mind it is already obvious that such a situation is undesirable from considerations which I have already mentioned and perhaps from other points of view which could be given by other hon. members of the house.

I shall state some of the reasons why I think it is undesirable. First of all it leaves Canadian prices too much the prey of external forces over which we have no control. Second, it leaves us with a deficit in our balance of payments with the one country to which we are habitually in debt. For example, in the years 1949, 1950 and 1951 respectively we paid to the United States $205 million, $260 million and $321 million in interest or dividends. Rather than continue a policy which adds to this interest deficit with the United States we should, if possible, be compensating by exporting to the United States more goods than we import. That would be the ideal position.

Mr. Howe: May I ask how my hon. friend accounts for the strength of the Canadian dollar?

Mr. Coldwell: How do I account for the strength of the Canadian dollar? I think the answer, although I am not a financial expert, is that the strength of the Canadian dollar is due to a very large extent to the demand for Canadian dollars for investment in our resources and industry, as well, of course, as the purchase of raw materials for defence.

Mr. Howe: The balance of investments is against us.

Mr. Coldwell: Well, you asked me what I thought and I am giving what I think is the reason. If I am wrong I hope the minister will explain to the house why the Canadian dollar has been so strong over the past number of months. Well, if multilateral trade were operating effectively and the United States discontinued its policy of resisting imports, there would be an alternative means of balancing our payments through the free flow of United States dollars into other countries with which we have an excess of exports from Canada.

That is the old-fashioned way of settling balances of trade between nations. That has been for a number of years—and it will be for some time to come, if it ever returns again—far from the case. It is therefore necessary that we adopt the most effective methods to rectify all this. They in turn will help to alleviate the third undesirable feature, that of the present concentration of our exports. The solution, I think, is to shift as many of our purchases as possible from the United States to other markets, particularly to the United Kingdom, to western Europe or indeed to other parts of the sterling area and, again, to South America. If we can direct our trade in those directions there will be a long-term gain and something of long-term insurance.

As a means of solving some of these problems I am going to summarize what I have said and perhaps expand on one or two points on which I have not already expanded. I think sterling might be accepted in part payment for Canadian produce sold to sterling area countries. You may say to me: what are we going to do with that sterling we accumulate as credits overseas? Well, sterling could be used to buy sterling area goods, or it could be used in sterling areas that are undeveloped and which we sometimes call underprivileged or backward countries. It could form part of our contribution to the Colombo plan and although I know that satisfactory arrangements might not be possible, but if it were possible I would like to see us use some of it for the technical aid projects of the United Nations. I want to say something about those technical aid projects and Canada's part in them when we return to the estimates of the Department of External Affairs.

Then we might have a much higher proportion of governmental orders for supplies placed in the sterling areas. I was looking over some of the orders that have been placed for equipment and supplies in the United Kingdom and the sterling area, and I was astounded at the relatively small amounts of supplies that are bought in the sterling area by Canada for our various projects and our various departments.

Of course we have tariffs and dumping duties on imports from Britain which we put into effect last year. We raised the tariff on textiles under the Geneva agreements in 1948, and certain dumping duties were applied against Britain on goods sold for less than their home market price. Those duties applied to automobiles and some other supplies sold in this country. I think the tariffs against countries with which we want to trade should be lowered to make it easier for those countries to earn Canadian dollars with which to buy Canadian products. That, of course, is of particular interest to those of us who are from the prairie provinces, where we have been so dependent up to the present time on the export of commodities which we produce there in large volume.

Then we should try to make long-term commodity agreements for specific imports and exports. It may be difficult to do that. As I said earlier, I think the present government in Great Britain does not like the idea of specific agreements of this nature. But there are other countries which might be inclined to enter into such agreements. In the position in which we find ourselves, perhaps we could make credit arrangements which would facilitate the conclusion of such agreements.

There is a matter which I have not discussed but which is very closely connected with the world wheat agreement; that is that Canada should give, and has not given, full support to the establishment of a world food pool very much along the lines suggested at the United Nations by Lord Boyd Orr. It was proposed to the FAO as well by the international federation of agriculture several years ago. While the idea was not immediately acceptable to the government, in view of our long-term interests I think Canada should give all the support possible to that proposal when it is made again before the food and agriculture organization of the United Nations.

Then I think there are certain emergency measures that might be adopted. An offer might be made to the British government for postponement for three years—I have made this suggestion several times before—of the interest on the annual payment to be made on the British loan, providing the extra dollar exchange thus made available is used for purchases of certain Canadian products. We might specify apples, salmon, cheese, fish and certain agricultural products. Then, when payments were resumed, the United Kingdom would be allowed to repay the loans, if she wished, in commodities from her own sterling area, commodities of her own choice provided of course that we can use them. Canada can use most of the goods that she could supply to us.

In conclusion, I want to say that what I have said, Mr. Chairman, is the result of some study and some thought. All that I have said may not be entirely in line with the thinking of the government. Indeed, it may be subject to some correction by the minister when he speaks. But I can assure him that we are interested in this very vital project of expanding our trade as we expand the development of our resources, and maintaining our great agricultural and other industries in this country. With the possibility of international tension easing—let us hope it is a real easing of that tension and let us hope, too, that there will be a diminution of demands for raw materials than can be used for warlike purposes and an increasing demand for materials that can be used in raising the standards of living and the food of that half of the human race which goes to bed hungry every night—it becomes imperative that we should make an annual review of Canada's position as a world trader.

As I have already said, we are third in absolute terms, and first in per capita trade. It is a remarkable achievement for a young country such as this. No government can take credit for it. It has been done because ours is a land which has vast resources, a land peopled by men and women who have done their level best to produce from those resources. I think we can say that it is to the credit of Canadians generally, rather than to the credit of any particular group of Canadians or any particular government in power now or in past days, that we have achieved this remarkable place in the world of commerce. I hope, Mr. Chairman, that we shall continue not only to maintain it but as the days go by to improve our position and make a further contribution to the health and welfare of mankind.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, it has been a real pleasure to listen to the two hon. members who thus far have spoken. I may say that it was a real pleasure also to listen to the minister the other night. In the subject of trade, as all hon. members recognize, we are discussing a matter which could easily mean success or disaster to our nation. Perhaps too few people in the country actually comprehend how serious some of the moves we may make in respect of trade can be for all time.

In saying what I shall say here tonight, I have the deepest sympathy for the minister because I realize that he is handling a very difficult task. I believe he is making a good job of it. I realize also that he is not entirely a free agent in drafting policies or in putting them into operation, but is more or less the victim of the will, shall I say, of people who do not understand the problem nearly as well as the minister does.

Now, that being said, I shall go on with what I feel it would be fitting for me to say tonight. With respect to the hon. member for Eglinton, I should say that one of his difficulties was that he said what pretty nearly everyone wishes—yes, of course we want that, but nobody knows how to get it. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar did condescend to begin to tell us something about how it might be done. If in the course of my remarks I give more attention to how it ought to be done, I trust I will not be misunderstood. After all the incessant talk in this house about things that ought to be done, which everyone 14 years of age and up knows ought to be done, so often no one has said a word about how to do it. That is about one of the most contemptible things of which you could conceive in a country of this kind and in a house of this kind.

There ought to be some sort of penalty imposed on the members of the house who get up and clamour for something to be done, but never give any idea as to how to do it. They rail about something that is not being done, without giving any idea as to how it could be done. We would shorten the length of these sessions by two-thirds if there were some penalty imposed by the whole house or individual members upon those who would put on such a performance. I grow weary of hearing people cry out for things that everybody knows ought to be done, but who never give an idea how to do them.

I thought it would be quite proper to read a little statement which I believe comes from the Ottawa Journal concerning the Minister of Trade and Commerce. It is rather well put, and no one will mind if I put it on the record. It reads as follows:

> Mr. C. D. Howe, Minister of Trade and Commerce, spoke to the national foreign trade convention in New York this week, had this to say about the forthcoming commonwealth conference:
> "What Canada wants to see emerge from these commonwealth talks is not a sterling area plan, but something very much bigger, in which North America and the free world generally can play a full part to the advantage of all concerned. This kind of an approach, we firmly believe, has the best chance of success. And that is what I hope will emerge."

I think everybody says "amen". The article goes on:

> What is this "something" that is "very much bigger", and just how, specifically, is it to be gained? Mr. Howe doesn't offer a clue. Doesn't as much as hint what Canada will propose.
> Strange, too, that Mr. Howe himself is not going to the commonwealth conference, but passing it up for a trade mission to South America early in the new year.

That is no reflection on the minister; that is just the beginning of a discussion of his troubles.

There is another quotation which it might be well to have on the record and to keep in mind in our discussion of our very difficult trade situation. This quotation is called "Foreign aid given by U.S.A.," and reads as follows:

> From June 30, 1945, to June 30, 1952 the United States extended grants or credits to a total of $38 billion in foreign aid. That was 11·3 per cent of the $308 billion federal revenue in the seven years and 10·6 per cent of the national expenditures—$329 billion—in that period.
> Close to a third of the total aid extended was in the form of loans of which $3 billion has been repaid, making the net amount up to June 30 of this year of $35 billion. Congress has authorized foreign aid in the current fiscal year ending next June 30 totalling $5,800 million, which would raise the grand total to $40,800 million. Western Europe got the lion's share of the net aid, $25,795 million in grants and credits. Great Britain got a net total of $6,363 million. France was second, Germany third, Japan fourth, Italy fifth.

About $1,091 million went, in the early post-war period, to Russia and other countries no longer friendly. That was 3·1 per cent of the total net foreign aid.

That quotation also was taken from the Alberta Wheat Pool Budget, October 31, 1952. I should like to ask all hon. members to ponder this simple question with me for a few minutes: How long do you think the United States can stand that sort of thing? How long do you think it ought to stand it?

Mr. Howe: Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend will not mind my saying that over the same period Canada gave more aid to the world on a population or national income basis than the United States. We are still standing it.

Mr. Blackmore: Well, I am not so sure that we are "still standing it". I must say that the pressure which is on the ordinary Canadian today as a result of standing that is simply unbearable. Anyone who does not believe that should just get down among the ordinary people and see what a time they are having paying their rent, buying their coal and paying their taxes. I will tell you, if you get down and find out, get the facts, you will not feel that we can afford to stand that very much longer. As an example, stop to think of the almost unbearable pressure that is placed on a young couple when they have a third child, or a second child; what the cost is to have that child delivered to them, what the cost is to raise it in any sort of way, as a result of the taxation which we are placing on everybody in order to stand this thing. And when you reflect on the effect that is going to have on the population of this nation in the course of 25 or 30 years in terms of Canadians who will grow up to carry the responsibilities which must be borne 25 years from now; when you reflect along those lines, you are not so positively sure that we are "standing it" in a way that we can permanently sustain.

All honour to Canada that we are doing it, but I say to the minister it is just high time the pressure began to be relieved. There must be a way of relieving that pressure. I have said this time and time again, and I will say it to the minister once more in all seriousness: You must not keep the idea that the only place you can get money is in the people's pockets. You must not do it. The United States must not do it. If you do you will wreck the world as surely as we are sitting here tonight. It is no longer a laughing matter, a sneering matter or a matter to be treated lightly; it is a matter that must be met and dealt with positively.

I give these facts merely to show how much is being done, and yet what is being done is not nearly enough. Everybody recognizes that. I have another important quotation that I should like to give just to show the difficulties the minister faces. This one again is from the Alberta wheat pool budget of April 3, 1953 this time, and reads as follows:

About 24 per cent of the Canadian population is dependent for a livelihood to a great degree on exports of Canadian products. This country is more dependent upon the continuation of a large export trade to maintain the standard of living here than are any other peoples in the world.

The above statement was made by G. S. Duncan, chairman of the board of directors of the Massey-Harris Company, in an address to the annual meeting of the Ontario hog producers' association. Mr. Duncan said that his company does 75 per cent of its business with foreign countries. He said 54 per cent of Canadian exports go to the United States and that there is a danger of relying too much on one customer.

It is enough worry to the minister to try to find a market for our wheat, oats, barley, hogs, cheese, and other primary products, but when he also has to go out and try to find markets for our manufactured products, well he is facing a task which is impossible under prevailing circumstances. I believe everybody realizes this.

Having said this much, I wish to tell the minister that I want a great deal more information than he has given in his speech. As a member of the house I think I am entitled to it. I am not able to find any document up to the present time in which I can obtain the information I want. I am going to quote some passages from the minister's speech and ask him some questions concerning these which I would like him to answer, before we finish discussing his department. He must know where to get these answers. At page 4065 of Hansard of April 17, in the second column, he used these words:

This strength has been created in large part by sound policies, and it has buoyed us up during a period when many other countries have suffered setbacks.

I want to know in some detail what these "sound policies" are. You know the statement sounds very beautiful on the radio and looks good in the press. So many statements are so beautiful on the surface that they convey much which the people cannot quite comprehend. We all want to know the details. Then I quote another passage on the same page:

During these years the government has done everything possible to encourage and assist the recovery of our exports to those countries overseas which are our traditional customers.

I would like to know what the "everything possible" is. Everything possible is a very large order. I want to know whether the minister and the government offered to take British pounds in return for Canadian goods that they want to sell to Britain. That was a suggestion of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. That suggestion is thoroughly feasible. It has been offered several times by the hon. member for Acadia and various others. Never a word has been said by the government in answer to that, as far as I know; yet it is a thing which is obviously feasible.

I wonder whether the minister would tell us if he has done that; whether he has offered that. I should like to ask him whether or not Canada has yet offered to Great Britain a proposition similar to the one she gave to Great Britain in world war I. Great Britain wanted $50 million worth of wheat. Canada created the money, bought the wheat from Canadians and gave the wheat to Britain on such terms that Britain could repay in any kind of goods that Canada could receive as soon as Britain could repay. Britain had repaid the debt by 1927.

I have suggested such a proposition several times on the floor of the house. Not one person on the government benches has spent a moment trying to show that that proposal is not completely feasible, because they cannot show it. Why do they not use that device? Have they offered to do that for Great Britain? If they have not done that, they have not done everything possible; and to make that statement is simply to deceive men. And there are many other things that could be done, some things that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar mentioned. The minister will have to take a little time to answer all this. He realizes, I think, that members of the House of Commons are entitled to a detailed explanation of that statement; and the people are also entitled to it.

Now I should like to read another passage from his speech where, at page 4066, he said:

> Canada participated fully in the recent commonwealth economic conference, as hon. members are aware.

I think that is a good place to stop. The minister says that Canada "participated fully". What is the minister talking about when he refers to full participation? What is his meaning? We would like to have that explained. Up to the present time the members of the cabinet have been as silent concerning the matter as mice. What went on at that economic conference? We do not know what Canadians proposed; we do not know what they rejected. We do not know what Great Britain proposed. We do not know a thing about this matter, which is so vital in our lives at the present time. I say that every hon. member in this House of Commons and every person in the country is entitled to be told in full the answers I have asked for.

If for example Great Britain asked us to use the imperial preference and we refused to do it, everybody in Canada has a right to know that we refused and why we refused. And if the reason we refused was that there was pressure put upon us by the United States, then everybody has a right to know that, 100 per cent. We should know how that pressure was proposed to be put on, and why.

All this information is necessary in order that we may begin to have wisdom concerning our status in international trade today, and concerning the well-being of the British commonwealth, in whose welfare this nation is so intimately bound up—not with the well-being of the United States. We have evidence to show that the United States is pretty hard-boiled, to use a common expression, in her business arrangements. She is not one bit concerned about our well-being. She is concerned about herself, and that is enough. If the United States takes care of herself, she is doing all the worrying she can afford to do. Let us look around and find someone with whom we can work.

Now, I want to know all about this commonwealth economic conference. Why has there been all the secrecy about it? We find secrecy everywhere. That does not sound very good; it does not look good.

I should like to read again from the minister's speech:

> We may be greatly encouraged also by the increasing amount of international agreement about what needs to be done to solve the trade and financial problems of the sterling area and western Europe.

Well, what is this thing that "needs to be done?" Who are the nations that are in agreement? To what exent are they in agreement? How do we know they are in agreement? Has their agreement been expressed? If so, how and when? Until the minister gives detailed information setting forth the answers to those questions he is just deceiving us, leaving us in the dark; and maybe he is deceiving himself, too.

I should like to know what he believes should "be done" to solve the difficult financial problem, the problem of the sterling area and western Europe. I want to know why he thinks that "what" is a solution, and I should like to have evidence to prove that it will be a solution. I think it would do the minister's department a lot of good if they were to do a bit of hard thinking along that line. I shall be listening; I will not take everything lying down, either. We have to have something that will help us toward the solution of these problems. And now we come to this passage:

> Many of the countries concerned are showing signs of moving in the right direction.

What is "the right direction?" Who knows it is the right direction? How does he know? Where did he find out? Where is his proof? Does the fact that half a dozen graduates of the London school of economics in the minister's department think it is the "right direction", make it so? He has half a dozen pretty noisy boys in his department, who think they know all about how to run the world. But they do not know very much yet; they only think they know. I have been in touch with several of them. Of course he has some men in his department who do know, but their voices cannot be heard because of the babble of loud noise from those youngsters who got all their knowledge at the London school of economics, the very last place they ought to go to get the truth. So we want these facts.

Now on the same page the minister said:

> Nevertheless, in 1952 the value, quantity and proportion of our exports to British countries did increase and for the first time their value amounted to over $1 billion.

What I want to know is this. What kind of exports did they accept in large amounts? Were they exports which are the result of our war condition, or exports which are to be permanent? If they are not permanent, then obviously the very minute things begin to clear up in Korea those markets will disappear like mist on a July morning. So if we are not going to be relying upon quicksand as the basis for the house we are going to build, we must be given many of the details.

Another passage at page 4066 is in these words:

> I am glad to see that the United Kingdom have been able to increase their sales to us of many types of machinery and that their sales to the United States are increasing. It has been said before, but it bears repeating, that there is a large and continuing market in this country for many goods which the United Kingdom can supply in greater quantities.

I should like to have details about that. I cannot be convinced by this smooth statement. I cannot understand, for example, if it is really true that the British are increasing their sales to us, why it is that we find conditions such as those disclosed in the February 1953 issue of the Economic Record from Great Britain. It says in respect of sugar:

> Sugar is still rationed to 10 ounces each week for each ration book. It is estimated that to deration sugar an additional half million tons a year would be required which can only be obtained from the dollar area at a cost of about $40 million a year.

Why are they not able to get all the sugar they need over there, when we are literally swamped by Cuban sugar here?

Mr. Howe: They have derationed sugar now.

Mr. Blackmore: I am speaking about February of 1953. I am wondering now whether the derationing is on a basis that can persist, or whether they have established conditions under which they can continue to deration. Then in connection with cheese it says:

> The weekly ration is now 1½ ounces, with a special allowance of 12 ounces for agricultural and certain other workers in places where there are no catering facilities. The abnormally low level of the ration is due to Britain's inability to spend dollars on cheese from Canada and the United States.

And so on and so on. We go through a list which would make a person feel unhappy for a week. And now Great Britain is "increasing her sales" to us. That needs to be explained in much detail, much more than the minister has given thus far. I read this on page 4066:

> Germany has increased its Canadian purchases substantially so that it is now the second largest European market for our products.

I want to know what Germany has paid us for what she has bought from us. What have we taken from Germany that we could not take from Britain? Can we continue to take these things from Germany without interfering with the welfare of any of our own industries? These are things that we all want to know. I quote again from page 4066:

> From the Canadian point of view the increasing importance of the Japanese market has become more and more apparent in each recent year.

What are we prepared to accept from Japan that will enable us to sell to Japan? Everyone realizes that it will be a fine thing to trade with a nation of 83 million people, or thereabouts, if we can take the things that they have to send us. We are sure they can take our products, but what goods are they able to send us that Britain or some other nation of the commonwealth is unable to send? Before that statement can be worth very much to me I have to have that question answered. Here is another passage from page 4066:

> At every appropriate opportunity the government has made clear to the government of the United States that basic principles are being infringed by the imposition of import controls upon dairy products in the United States.

I would like to know what "basic principles" are being infringed by the United States when she takes measures to shut out dairy products from Canada. I would like to know what moral responsibility the United States has to Canada that she must allow Canadian dairy products to come in to destroy her dairy producers. I should like the minister to explain that in great detail when he comes to speak. We do not want generalities; we want details, as the minister would want them. The minister is one of the greatest engineers in Canada. He would not accept a blueprint that was blurred or vague in its details. He would want every detail quite clear so he could be sure it would work out in a certain way. The minister is giving us a blueprint for a trading establishment which we want to erect for the welfare of our children and our children's children. We want the details of that blueprint, not just a general statement.

Before leaving this matter may I ask this. Has not the United States merely invoked article XIX in the famous GATT which was designed to enable a nation to protect any of its industries against outside goods? The minister must have read something different from what is contained in the agreement. I think I could get a copy without much difficulty and show that it was definitely declared that any nation had the right to protect any of its industries which were in danger of being destroyed from outside. If there is no such provision, then I suggest that when GATT comes up again we put that provision in and be sure that it stays there. Without that the agreement is not much good. If the United States agreed to GATT, she did it in a moment of absentmindedness and is now finding out that it will not work. She is taking realistic measures to protect her own producers.

This is the system which she used to build herself from a group of straggling colonies into the mightest nation on the face of the earth in an amazingly short time. Are we to be told that those principles which she used to build herself to greatness are no longer sound and that she should now begin to go backwards and undo the things she has done so painfully through the generations, and if she does not do it she is "infringing principles?" All these matters need considerable elaboration. Another passage from page 4067 reads:

Canada and the United States have helped themselves and the world as a whole through the negotiation of extensive trade agreements, before the war in 1935 and 1938, and since the war under GATT at Geneva in 1947 and at Torquay in 1951. The unprecedented flow of trade between Canada and the United States today is conducted in accordance with the general agreement on tariffs and trade.

That is getting near the climax. I tell you that we need a lot of explaining there. Just how has Canada helped herself through GATT? Let us have the details, even if it does take a book or another white paper. We do not want just a general statement, let us have it proved that Canada has "helped herself" through GATT. At whose expense has Canada helped herself? That is also an important matter. Has it been at the expense of Britain or some other member of the commonwealth? Just how has the United States helped herself through GATT, and at whose expense? Let us have the details.

Does the minister know who originated the idea that led to the instrument called GATT? I wonder if the minister has gone back into history to find out who it was that started this thing called GATT. That is a very important thing to know. If you could find out just who it was in the United States administration that proposed GATT or the thing that grew into GATT, and find out what connection he has, it might make a lot of difference in our thinking in respect to GATT.

Does the minister know what were the immediate objectives of the first movers in this connection? For example, was it the destruction of imperial preferences and the pound sterling? What were the ultimate objectives? For example, were they to give the United States markets? Was it considered that the rest of us did not amount to anything so long as the United States got markets? I wonder if that is true. Can the minister prove that it is not true, with documents that can stand up against criticism?

I suggest that the minister will have some help from these graduates of the London school of economics, but he should be sure to give us both sides. I have not very much faith in the London school of economics.

Mr. Pouliot: The hon. gentleman is in good form.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we shall go into supply and consider the estimates of trade and commerce, citizenship and immigration, the prime minister's office, and health and welfare.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, April 23, 1953

The house met at eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REFERENCE BY PRIME MINISTER TO NEWSPAPER STORY CONCERNING A MEMBER OF PARLIAMENT

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as leader of the house I should like to make a very short statement concerning a sensational story about a member of parliament published in the Telegram under date of yesterday, Wednesday, April 22, 1953. The story is headed "Government Contractor paid $71,800 to Liberal M.P."

I am sorry this story has come out at a time when the member concerned has had to return to Saskatchewan to the sickbed of his aged mother.

If he were here, I am sure he would be most anxious to deal with it at once as a matter of personal privilege and I hope he would be able to do so in a manner that would satisfy everybody as to the propriety of whatever he may have done. I am also confident that, if there remained anything which might be a cause of embarrassment, he would wish to take the steps required to prevent that embarrassment from being shared by anybody else. Until the hon. member has had an opportunity of dealing with this story, I think his fellow members and the public generally should keep an open mind about it.

DAIRY PRODUCTS

SKIM MILK POWDER—OFFERINGS AND PURCHASES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. E. Anderson (Norfolk): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Could the minister tell me how much has been purchased and how much has been offered under the government's undertaking to purchase ten million pounds of skim milk powder?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has given me a copy of his question and I have this prepared answer. We have purchased 863,200 pounds of roller process at eight cents per pound f.a.s. Montreal and 3,214,800 pounds spray process at eleven and a half cents per pound f.a.s. Montreal. We have purchased all the skim milk powder that has been offered.

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): Has the government considered allowing the skim milk powder people to ship to a point in Ontario in order to save the freight charges to Montreal?

Mr. Gardiner: We have considered it but we have not changed the present provision which is f.a.s. Montreal.

Inquiries of the Ministry

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PARTICIPATION OF CANADA IN ANZUS PACT—STATEMENT IN NEW ZEALAND PARLIAMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. A press dispatch from New Zealand a day or two ago indicated that during a discussion in the New Zealand parliament one of the members had raised the question of Canada wanting to become a member of the ANZUS pact and being refused admission.

The minister of external affairs for New Zealand notified the house that that was not correct and is quoted as having said "Canada didn't want to be in." I should like to ask whether or not that explanation by the minister of external affairs for New Zealand is accurate.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I saw the Canadian Press dispatch in the Citizen of April 21. It was followed by a comment by the newspaper itself which I think states accurately the position. The comment was as follows:

> Canada has always expressed "interest" in the ANZUS pact of Pacific powers but the Canadian government has never taken the view that this country should be a member although this has been urged in parliament here on several occasions by members of the official opposition.
> External Affairs Minister Pearson has stated that if an invitation is forthcoming to join, it would then be considered. None has been forthcoming so far, and none is being sought.

That is exactly the situation.

Mr. Green: In fact the statement by the minister of external affairs for New Zealand is correct.

Mr. St. Laurent: My hon. friend can put any construction he likes upon the statement of the minister of external affairs for New Zealand. The fact is that no invitation has been forthcoming and none is being sought.

Mr. Green: Would it be accepted if it were forthcoming?

Mr. St. Laurent: The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) stated, and I think wisely, that that would be considered if and when it happened.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO FURTHER LEGISLATION TO BE BROUGHT DOWN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Can the Prime Minister say whether the government plans to introduce at this session any further legislation that is not on the order paper and, if so, will such further legislation include amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The matter of the Unemployment Insurance Act is still under very active consideration. As to whether or not there will be other legislation, I have not looked at Votes and Proceedings, but I believe there was a notice yesterday of a resolution and the usual bill for the capital financing of Canadian National Railways. With the exception of the Unemployment Insurance Act, which is still under active consideration which is apt to be finished today, I do not know at this time of anything additional that would require to be introduced.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

426. Departmental administration, $588,333.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, last evening I was quoting a number of small passages from the excellent speech made by the minister on April 17 and I was referring to expressions used which I thought it would be in the interests of the committee and the country to have the minister elaborate upon or explain. In order to give continuity to my remarks, this morning I shall quote again the last passage which I quoted last night, which was from page 4067 of Hansard of April 17. I quote:

> Canada and the United States have helped themselves and the world as a whole through the negotiation of extensive trade agreements, before the war in 1935 and 1938, and since the war under GATT at Geneva in 1947 and at Torquay in 1951. The unprecedented flow of trade between Canada and the United States today is conducted in accordance with the general agreement on tariffs and trade.

I asked the minister several questions, the first of which I shall repeat. I asked: Just how has Canada helped herself through GATT? At whose expense has Canada helped herself, if at anybody's? Just how has the United States helped herself through GATT and at whose expense, if anyone's? For instance, has this help in the case of one of these nations or the other been at the expense of Great Britain or some member of the British commonwealth? It would comfort us to be assured, and with proof, that such had not been the case.

Does the minister know who originated the idea that led to the instrument called GATT? Does he know what were the immediate objectives of the first movers in this connection? For example, were the men who began this movement aiming directly at the destruction of imperial preferences and the pound sterling in the British commonwealth; in other words, not aiming at the welfare of the world at all but merely aiming at the opening of the markets of the British commonwealth to the United States? If that were found to be the case I think it would detract in some measure from the sanctity which is endeavoured to be cast about this whole GATT mechanism.

What were the ultimate objectives of this movement? For example, was it just to give the American people markets and to destroy the British commonwealth? I know it sounds harsh to suggest that a nation like the United States, that ought to be by far the most tenderly friendly nation towards Great Britain on the face of the earth, might be aiming directly at the utter destruction of the British commonwealth. I am afraid that some of the evidence available indicates that we had better not be quite too sure that she has not been seeking the dismemberment of the commonwealth, and is not now. By "she" I mean those who are deep in the American administration and are determining ultimate policy.

Does he know that the basic principle upon which GATT is founded is a fallacy, and that Samuel Crowther, in his excellent book called "America Self-Contained", makes remarks which indicate quite unanswerably that the belief in free trade is a myth, that there never has been free trade, there is not now free trade, and that with the world consisting of nations of such a wide variety of economies and economic strength it never can exist?

If this whole GATT idea is based on the ultimate validity of free trade, then this document is foredoomed to failure. Will the minister tell us what he knows about all this?

The next quotation from the minister's speech which I wish to read is to be found at page 4067 of Hansard of April 17, and is as follows:

> Since the tariff undertakings of the general agreement on tariffs and trade are firmly bound only until the end of 1953, decisions will have to be made amongst the countries concerned as to what further steps to take to safeguard the future of international trade. There may be a further opportunity to take steps forward in the reduction of tariffs and the elimination of trade restrictions, as an alternative to moving in the other direction. The interest of Canada in this matter is perfectly clear, because we require other markets to be open to our goods on an expanding scale.

Before asking questions, I draw attention to the fact that the statement which I have just quoted seems to be designed to give the idea that it would be impossible for Canada to get other markets and have an expanding scale of trade unless we have the mechanism called GATT. I might ask in a general way, how on earth did trade expand before men created GATT? I should like to requote the last sentence:

> The interest of Canada in this matter is perfectly clear, because we require other markets to be open to our goods on an expanding scale.

What has caused our expanding trade up to the present time? It seems to me, as I will develop later, that in this part of the passage I have just read there is an attempt to arrogate, shall I say, to the mechanism called GATT credit for all expansion of trade and the development of resources and production which has taken place during recent years.

There are however several statements in the minister's speech to which in fairness I must refer, which indicate that the objective which I have suggested was not predominant in these two passages, but nevertheless I think what I have said has some justification. As examples of passages which show that the minister is aware that other factors have entered into the situation, we find the following quotation on page 4067:

> That this is so is due primarily to the capacity and enterprise of the Canadian people and to the extent and variety of the resources which they have at their command.

That is quite correct. Again:

> Government policies, too, have played an important role, and I wish to refer briefly to some of the trade promotional activities of the Department of Trade and Commerce, particularly to the work of the trade commissioner service which is well known to many of you in a general way.

Again:

> —it was built up and organized on such a scale as to give Canada a really competent trade service in most of the world's principal commercial centres.

Again, in the next column:

> It was Canada's rapid commercial growth that accounted for this marked departure from the ordinary sequence of events.

If the minister desired to emphasize those considerations which I have indicated in these later quotations, then he pretty nearly hewed out from under GATT all the credit which it would appear he attempted to give in the two major quotations which I gave at the beginning of these remarks.

I would say that the whole of the minister's April 17 speech, as recorded on pages 4063 to 4068 of Hansard, appears to have been designed to convey to the house and the country that the highly gratifying growth of Canadian trade and production is largely, if not mainly, a result of the general agreement on tariffs and trade, commonly called GATT, signed at Geneva in 1947, again at Torquay in 1951, firmly bound only until the end of 1953, and presumably desired by the present Canadian government to be signed again for another term of years.

Far too much credit appears to be sought to be given to the general agreement on tariffs and trade, far too much credit for the growth of our production and our trade. While other factors are by no means disregarded, there appears to be too little weight given to, first, the fact that we are at war or are in a war economy, a state of preparation for war, and the consequent physical and financial demands which naturally result from war. To give GATT credit for what is accomplished by being in a state of war preparation would certainly be obviously unrealistic. That is one of the kinds of thing to which I object. There appears to be too little weight given to, second, the richness and variety of our resources, which the minister mentioned in the passages I have quoted; third, the energy, resourcefulness and skill of our people, which the minister also indicated in the passages I have quoted; and, fourth, the growing industrialization of Canada.

Appropriate stress was laid by the minister upon what he calls "a really competent trade service in most of the world's principal commercial centres."

Nevertheless, all things being considered, his speech, whether intentionally or unintentionally, appeared to be, in effect, a propaganda speech, the over-all effect of which was to mislead the people in Canada and elsewhere, tending to encourage people to attach too much importance to, and place too much reliance in, GATT.

I should like to read a passage from the April 19, 1953, monthly bulletin of the Empire Industries Association and British Empire League. The passage, which I think has a message at this stage, reads:

> A gradual reduction in American exports on an agreed plan plus a commercial agreement which would permit a reasonable use of both tariffs and preferences would do more towards closing the dollar gap and making convertibility possible than has been done by GATT in the past, or could be done by its continuation.

There is one element in that passage which I think ought to be modified to some extent and that is the statement that there should be a gradual reduction in American exports. I do not agree with that particular part. I do not believe that there should be any gradual reduction in American exports but I do believe that American exports should not go into the economies of nations of the world, competing with the industries which those nations are endeavouring to establish. This latter kind of export of United States goods, which other nations of the world do not wish, would be forced into the economies of those nations to their detriment, whereas by rights those surplus American goods should be made available to the needy peoples of the world.

Once more may I say, Mr. Chairman, in all earnestness to the minister, that we in our generation simply must discover the means whereby we can take surpluses from our splendidly blessed countries and get them into the hands of the 1,400 million people who go to bed hungry every night. If we do not do that we will betray our trust in these generations in which we live.

One of the serious difficulties in respect of all proposals which emanate from the United States and Great Britain is that we find no indication whatever of their awareness of the urgent responsibility to get our surplus goods into the hands of needy people. I shall probably have more to say about that at a later time. As I see it, there is no escape from this responsibility, and so I would say that the surplus goods of the United States call for a means to be adopted whereby those goods can be put into the hands of needy people and not be thrust into the economies of other nations to the injury of the economies of those nations.

With these reservations I would say that the quotation which I read from the periodical issued by people who are realistic in all matters pertaining to trade is highly commendable, and I would suggest it as a sort of ideal to aim at as an alternative to GATT.

Mr. Sinnott: Mr. Chairman, during the debate yesterday the hon. member for Eglinton made quite a thorough and comprehensive speech on trade, along with various other matters. He referred to the fact that Canada as a whole had been doing a fair job of selling surplus products with the exception of certain farm products which were not now going to Britain, such as bacon, cheese, et cetera. Mr. Chairman, I think it can be said without contradiction that at the present time the only surplus products we have in Canada are a little canned pork and possibly a few dairy products.

Mr. Ross (Souris): What?

Mr. Sinnott: The reason for those surpluses is mainly the embargo which was placed on certain products because of the foot-and-mouth disease outbreak last year.

What the hon. member for Eglinton forgot to say was that Britain is able now to purchase many of those products at a figure much lower than that at which our products are selling at the present time in Canada and in the United States. Take for instance beef which would cost Britain 35 cents per pound today if she were to buy from Canada. She is able to get Argentine beef laid down in Britain at the present time for 17 cents a pound. Suppose the wife of the hon. member for Eglinton were to ask him to bring home some meat for the daily meals. If there were three stores such as Loblaw's, A. & P., and Dominion Stores, and if two stores were selling meat at 40 cents a pound and the other selling it at 17 cents a pound, there is no doubt that even the member for Eglinton would stretch his dollar by purchasing in the cheaper market. I believe that the reason for Britain's hard dickering today is the dollar shortage. Despite the dollar shortage in Britain our government has done very well up to the present time in disposing of surpluses to other markets and, owing to the trade minister's mission to South America, we have found outlets for much more of our production.

Mr. Chairman, in listening to the somewhat lengthy statement of the leader of the C.C.F. party, and I see he is in his seat now, I was shocked to learn that he did not know why Canada's dollar was at such a premium today.

Mr. Coldwell: You tell us.

Mr. Sinnott: I am sure that it was a terrible blow to members of that party to find that their leader did not know the answer to that question.

Mr. Coldwell: Well, you tell us.

Mr. Sinnott: I am sure that it will be a severe blow to those who support the C.C.F. in Canada to discover that a man aspiring to the leadership of the C.C.F. in Canada does not know why Canada's dollar is at such a high level. Most assuredly such a man cannot be considered too seriously by the people of Canada.

Mr. Coldwell: You tell us.

Mr. Sinnott: I will give you my own opinion when we get into finance.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Sinnott: I did not interrupt the hon. member yesterday and I hope that he will be gentleman enough not to interrupt me today.

I rise to speak today because of the failure of Britain up to now to sign the international wheat agreement. I think that it would be a tragic mistake if we did not give Britain some inducement to enter into this agreement. During the war we lent Britain $1,250 million and then made a straight gift of $1 billion. Those were steps in the right direction in order to enable Britain at that time to buy much of the produce produced in Canada. Owing to her hard-pressed economy and preparation for this cold war Britain has rationed her people more severely than she did at any time during the last war. Owing to the very severe dollar shortage there is no question but what at the present time she is fighting for her very life and attempting to obtain cheaper food for her people.

An hon. Member: And shorter hours.

Mr. Sinnott: Mr. Chairman, it would be a calamity for the British empire if Britain were not to join this wheat agreement. It would also be a severe blow to Canada. If I am not correct in making this statement possibly the minister can answer later, but I think I am right in saying that Britain would sign at a figure of $2 a bushel.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Chairman, there is a resolution on the order paper having to do with the wheat agreement which I hope will be debated next week, perhaps early in the week. I think it would be much wiser not to discuss the wheat agreement at this time.

The Chairman: The point of order raised by the minister is well taken because, as the hon. member knows, we cannot anticipate discussion on a matter which is already on the order paper and which will come up later. Therefore, I will ask the hon. member to reserve his remarks on the wheat agreement until later.

Mr. Sinnott: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I believe that the minister has good reason for saying what he has said, and I believe there may be good reason for some further negotiations before the deadline. In view of what the minister has said, I shall withhold my remarks until some future time.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I followed with considerable interest the over-optimistic remarks of my good friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce in introducing his estimates. I agree that Canada does enjoy an enviable position as a trading nation today. I think that Canada, with her undeveloped natural resources, should enjoy great prosperity in the future. We have huge resources of oil, iron ore, nickel, uranium, copper, pulpwood, lumber and many other very useful materials. We should be very proud to possess these resources. We have also a very industrious people in this nation, and that is all to the good. Coupled with all this, we have had a great period of inflation. I believe it is acknowledged by our financial experts that the Canadian dollar now has a value of about 49 cents, and that should be taken into consideration in assessing these various matters. It does make a great difference to many people in this country of ours today.

While this country as a whole has enjoyed great export trade and prosperity, I am sorry to say that the same cannot be said of the farming population in this nation. They are in a very different situation. I feel in the past a greater effort should have been made, realizing that trade is a two-way street, to purchase from Great Britain more items needed for our defence program, such as tanks, airplanes and things that are in short supply for our armed services. Since the same minister is responsible for making these great expenditures, he should have exerted a greater effort to buy from Great Britain, thus making it possible for Great Britain to purchase more of our agricultural production. It goes without saying that we have lost a great deal of these overseas markets for products which have been mentioned such as apples, vegetables, meat and many other items. We did enjoy a good market for a number of those items, and those markets have been lost. I feel that the government has not put forth the effort that might have made it easier for Britain to purchase these things by supplying the equipment we need so greatly for our armed services at this time.

I think we have missed the boat in that respect. I do not think our farm population has ever been taken care of too well. According to the 1951 census there is 20 per cent and a fraction of the population located on farms in this country, and they only received 12 per cent and a fraction of the national income. In 1952, the agricultural statistics show that that income was reduced by 12 per cent, while the cost of farm production had increased by 5 per cent. This disparity is increasing day by day. Inflation is also increasing in this country, despite the fact that ministers say it has been checked. During the last month an item which certainly enters into western farm production costs, that is freight rates, was increased. The Minister of Transport admitted that this would have an inflationary tendency at this time. This is one item which enters particularly into western farm cost accounting. I say, therefore, that the farm population does not appear in this rosy picture painted by the minister.

[Mr. Ross (Souris).]

It has been pointed out by the Minister of Agriculture and others—in fact by the hon. member for Springfield, who just resumed his seat—that the only surpluses about which we have to worry are canned pork and frozen beef. Last evening the member for Eglinton put on the record the amount of wheat now held by the principal exporting nations of the world. I have in my hand a bulletin on grain stocks held in Canada as of March 31, 1953. The dominion bureau of statistics, in co-operation with the statistics branch of the Board of Grain Commissioners for Canada, has compiled this data. The total holdings in Canada as of March 31, 1953, are as follows: Wheat, 604 million bushels; oats, 309 million bushels; barley, 217 million bushels; rye, 22 million bushels; flaxseed, 7 million bushels. Those are the round figures, and there are some odd thousands to add. This statement shows that the average for 1943-52 is as follows: Wheat, 380 million bushels; oats, 223 million bushels; barley, 104 million bushels; rye, 9 million bushels; flaxseed, 7 million bushels. I would think that, apart from flaxseed, there is a great surplus shown by those figures. I believe that this is a cause for considerable concern amongst the grain producers of this country at this time.

I agree also that it is quite difficult for the minister to announce the initial payment that will be paid for grain produced for the crop year 1953. Such an announcement was made last year before seeding operations commenced, and we had hoped that in each year these initial payments might be announced as a guide to those who are planning their seeding operations. I hope the minister can announce those payments as soon as possible, because some farmers might want to make some shifts, although I agree that it is difficult under the prevailing conditions at this particular time.

With respect to the international wheat agreement, the minister has stated that we will be asked to discuss and ratify it at a later date, so I shall not go into any details on that. Much of the publicity concerning the agreement has been painting a very rosy picture, but I am afraid the results will be disappointing to the wheat producers of this country. It is understood that we shall have to ratify the agreement and there will be a debate then, but I should like to point out to this house and to the country that, in view of the stand taken by Britain, I do not believe we will definitely know what the position will be until after July 15. In answer to a question about the stand of the United States, the minister has pointed out that in all likelihood we shall have to take a second look at this agreement following July 15 to see what can be done about quotas. The final position may be quite disappointing because, although all we read about in the newspapers has to do with the maximum price of $2.05, people are greatly concerned about the minimum price of $1.55. I do not wish to deal in detail with the agreement at all, but I did want to point out that situation. I think we should be giving it serious thought before we are called upon to ratify the agreement.

According to the report of the Canadian wheat board for 1951-52, which is the last official record we have, as a result of the operations of the international wheat agreement there was a difference between the average prevailing price for class II wheat and what the farmer actually received of 48 and a fraction cents a bushel, which amounted to $140 million on all the wheat included in that agreement. There was a considerable loss on that basis in every year of the agreement. Of course it is all water under the bridge as to the many hundreds of millions of dollars that the producers had to forgo in order to carry out the United Kingdom-Canada wheat agreement. They have had to make a great contribution. With respect to the price of domestic wheat in this country, may I say that I think it is unfair that the minister and his department, through the Canadian wheat board, should insist that the wheat producers of the prairies should continue to subsidize all the consumers of this nation to the extent that they do, because they purchase all their wheat on the basis of the international wheat agreement. I wish again to raise objection to that procedure and I hope that that will not be the case in the handling of wheat in the next crop year after August 1. I hope that discrepancy will be done away with.

I also want to repeat that on March 17 I asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce if he would refer this report of the Canadian wheat board to the standing committee on agriculture, and he said he had no objection at that time if they wished to consider it. Mr. Chairman, you know how all the committees of the House of Commons are organized. The majorities in these committees are members of the government. It is true enough that you are perhaps supposed to persuade the chairman to call a committee, but there were many matters of concern which we could have discussed had the minister referred this report to the committee and had they sat. There were many matters that could have been discussed, including not only the handling of our grain but other problems dealing with the Department of Agriculture as well. I am greatly disappointed that the committee has not been called. I noticed a press account one month later—I think it was last Friday or Saturday—to the effect that the chairman was going to poll the members of the committee and find out whether they wished to sit now and consider the report. I have pointed to the composition of these committees, Mr. Chairman; and I do not presume that, in this rush to finish up the business of this session, they will now sit. Certainly if they were going to do so, they should have met long before this, in view of the fact that this session of parliament opened last November.

I hope to have a great deal to say with respect to this international wheat agreement. I just wanted to register my disapproval of the fact that a greater effort had not been made to regain these markets for the agriculturists throughout this nation and also to point out the great disparity that exists between the position of these people and others of this nation at this particular time.

Mr. Thatcher: Mr. Chairman, I shall detain the committee for only a moment or two, but there are a few remarks I should like to make to the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether he wants to listen to them particularly or not.

Mr. Howe: I must.

Mr. Thatcher: Despite the statement which he made last Friday night—which was an optimistic one—I think there are some obvious weaknesses in his trade policies. I think probably the foremost one is the fact that he, in conjunction with the United States, has done little in an economic way to strengthen the NATO treaty alliance. As I understand it, our foreign policy is based largely on NATO. The objective of that organization is the building of a strong defensive alliance against communism. We have gone a long distance, in a political and military way, to strengthen NATO, but I think we have fallen down badly in an economic way; and I think the Minister of Trade and Commerce must accept a good deal of responsibility for that fact.

Article 2 of the NATO agreement calls for economic co-operation. Yet both Canada and the United States have refused to make it easy for our European allies to sell their products and merchandise on the North American continent. I cannot see how the NATO alliance can be a really integrated community unless there are greater economic ties. I think the absence of those ties can undermine the military aspect of the alliance.

What exactly is this country doing today? On the one hand, it is sending military forces overseas, and giving huge financial assistance to defend western Europe against communist aggression. Then on the other hand it is following shortsighted fiscal, economic and tariff policies which are tending to prevent our allies from working out their own economic salvation. I suggest that the time has surely come when Canada should make it easier for our NATO partners to send their merchandise within our borders.

I want to agree with many of the members who have already spoken about the British-Canadian trade impasse. We have reached the point where our farm products are simply not being sold in Britain, with the possible exception of wheat; even that market we may ultimately lose. Harsh economic realities are forcing the British to buy farm products from those countries that are buying from her. It is quite true—as the minister has pointed out—that we have found an alternative market in the United States; and I think most farmers and Canadians are grateful for that fact. But we know that in the past the American market has not been a stable one. We know that it has been subject to recessions, and particularly to changes in tariff policy. Even at this moment the farm bloc in the United States is agitating for higher tariffs against our meat and our coarse grain.

I think we must face the fact that if there are surpluses in the United States, Canadian farm products in the near future may face exclusion from that market. Under these circumstances Canadians must realize that it is not only vital but a matter of absolute self-preservation for us to regain our British markets for farm products. I think failure to do so may mean that, in the next decade, a great many farmers may face financial ruin. I say that the Minister of Trade and Commerce, knowingly or otherwise, has led Canadian agriculture, within the last few years, down a kind of blind alley. We had better get out of that blind alley before it is too late.

What can be done to improve British-Canadian trade relations? I believe there is a great deal that could be done on both sides of the ocean. I think the first step must be taken by the British themselves. British manufacturers simply must become more aggressive in the Canadian market. Certainly any business experience I have had with the British leads me to believe that they today are not doing all they could to get into our market here in Canada. Many Canadian would-be buyers of British goods have recently been bewildered by the off-hand manner of British manufacturers. The British tell us, "If you do not buy from us, we cannot buy from you." Yet when Canadian buyers—and I include myself—genuinely try to buy British goods, they are finding it virtually impossible in many lines. Among British suppliers one often finds interest that is lukewarm or condescending, prices that are vague, delivery dates that are uncertain, and styles and models that are not suitable for the Canadian market.

Several months ago dealers from all over Canada met in the city of Toronto at the annual Canadian hardware show. In that automotive building were display booths for goods from many parts of the world including Britain, Germany and many other countries. Many hardware dealers went down there with a specific desire to buy British goods. I know that my own company had two buyers who wanted to buy British cutlery, British tools, British shelf hardware and the like. However they obtained little satisfaction from the British suppliers on that occasion and ended up by buying German goods. It may be that our company is too small for these suppliers to bother with it; but I would point out that there were hundreds of other small dealers in a similar position who were leaning over backward trying to buy British goods at that fair. Yet in many cases they found it impossible to do so.

Speaking of the hardware business, may I say that before the war we handled little else but British cutlery. We handled a great many British tools, British toys and a great deal of British chinaware. We should like to get such merchandise again; but no matter how hard we try, we are finding it extremely difficult to do so. I would tell my British friends that today there is a crying demand among hardware dealers, from one end of this country to the other, for British cutlery, British scissors and British iron and steel goods. Where can we get such merchandise? I ask British manufacturers what exactly is wrong. Sometimes I wonder if they really want to get into this Canadian market. Those of us who live on the prairies want to sell our farm produce to Great Britain. We know that it is common sense and good business for us to buy British goods in return, so that they can earn Canadian exchange.

The Saskatchewan government not long ago set up a special committee whose duty it was to encourage a "Buy British" campaign. The Hudson Bay association, the Co-ops and other groups, have also sponsored "Buy British" campaign. Thus it seems unfortunate that today, for one reason or another, many lines of British goods are not yet available. I do not make these comments in a critical sense at all, but only in the hope that our British friends will realize that there is much they themselves can do to improve British-Canadian trade relations.

I think the British should realize that since 1945 they have failed to take advantage of the tariff concessions which we have given them. Time and again British products have enjoyed tariff advantages over products from the United States. Yet, invariably the British products have been swamped by American competition.

Today where tariffs apply, the British rate is usually about 10 per cent lower than the American. For example, let us consider the drug and chemical industry. The tariff on those products, for British goods, is about 15 per cent less than the tariff on similar American goods. Yet of the $200 million worth of those goods which Canada imported last year, Great Britain got $20 million and the United States $175 million. Then, Canada imports more than $20 million worth of coloured cotton fabrics each year. The duty on the British fabrics is 3 cents a pound less than that on the American. Yet the United States factories got nine-tenths of the business last year.

In the field of iron and steel products the picture is much the same. The British enjoy a tariff protection or advantage of about 10 per cent. Yet last year imports from the United States were valued at $1·2 billion while the imports from Great Britain were valued at only $130 million. I have spoken to many buyers who have gone to Great Britain in an endeavour to buy British goods. Sometimes they were successful; but many times they found it virtually impossible to obtain the supplies they wanted.

I repeat that I am not saying this to belittle British efforts in any way; I am saying it because I realize how vital it is for my province and, I suggest, for the whole country, to increase British imports. But it has got to work both ways. The British, as well as ourselves, have to co-operate. It seems to me there are a number of steps the British could take if they really desire to sell more goods in Canada.

First of all, I think they should send out a far greater number of salesmen to this country to directly contact Canadian importers and businessmen. Secondly, I think they should increase their advertising of British goods in this country. Thirdly, I suggest they should speed up delivery dates, and make those delivery dates specific, so that one could count on them. Fourth, I think they should give a greater degree of priority to the Canadian market. Fifth, I believe they should set up a more efficient system of spare parts and supplies in Canada. A great deal could be done by the British themselves to increase and improve British-Canadian trading relations.

Then, I believe a great deal more could be done by this government, if it were so inclined. For instance, I think the Minister of Trade and Commerce should set up an import committee, or a special branch within his department to encourage imports, particularly from the sterling area.

Mr. Howe: We have had that special branch for years.

Mr. Thatcher: Well, it must be very inactive.

Mr. Howe: It is very active.

Mr. Thatcher: I doubt it. Perhaps the minister should have that branch of his department get in touch with importers, and tell them how essential it is for this country to buy British goods.

It is essential for the government to do a public relations job in this connection. And secondly, as other hon. members have suggested, we should increase our defence purchase orders in Great Britain, assuming always that prices are competitive.

In the third place, I believe our crown corporations, such as the Canadian National Railways, the post office, Trans-Canada Air Lines, Polymer and others should be requested wherever possible to give a preference to British goods.

In the fourth place we should consider at this time the feasibility of making further tariff concessions to the British.

In the fifth place I believe members of the House of Commons, and particularly ministers of the crown, should travel from one end of the country to the other making speeches, pointing out to our people why it is desirable and necessary for us to trade with Great Britain—not primarily for any reasons of sentiment, but solely for reasons of our own economic self-preservation. The time is past when the government, and particularly the Minister of Trade and Commerce, can maintain an attitude of aloof detachment from the gravity of this trade problem.

The Canadian primary producers are calling upon the government for action. We think the only answer to the British-Canadian trade impasse is a "Buy British" campaign.

Mr. Brown (Essex West): Mr. Chairman, may I first of all express to the hon. member for Peace River my appreciation of his relinquishing his time so that I might proceed. Duties which I have undertaken in connection with the work of the House of Commons have made it impossible for me to be present on most occasions when the house is sitting. It will be impossible for me to be here either this afternoon or this evening because of those duties. Therefore I appreciate the courtesy that has been extended to me.

Recently, and for a period of time, remarks have been made both in and out of the house which have been derogatory, to a large extent, of an industry in my constituency. Therefore I should like to say a word or two concerning the automobile industry in Canada, and particularly deal with the manner in which it affects the people of Canada, and our economy. I shall refer to its effects on the farmer on the prairies, the logger in British Columbia, the fisherman in the maritimes, as well as the workman in the factories of Ontario and Quebec.

I am, Mr. Chairman, not unconscious of the fact that I am speaking for the rank and file of the little people of my own constituency, four-fifths of whom are engaged directly or indirectly in the manufacture and assembly of automobiles, or the parts and accessories that go into the production of the automobiles. Of that four-fifths, three-fifths of my people are engaged in the direct manufacture and assembly of automobiles with the Chrysler, Ford and General Motors corporations, in chief, and the other one-fifth of the four-fifths are working for the some fifty odd feeder plants in my city.

The other main centres for the production of motorcars are presently at Oshawa, Ontario, where two-thirds of the population work for General Motors, and the feeder plants situated there, and at Hamilton, Ontario, where the Studebaker Corporation now produce motorcars.

In Canada there are now four companies which produce passenger cars and trucks. Then, of the aforementioned, there are two companies which produce passenger cars only. There are also four companies which produce trucks and buses exclusively. This is apart from the companies which import complete vehicles from the United States and the United Kingdom. These latter maintain some type of distribution facilities but are not regarded as a part of the automotive industry in Canada.

The first automobile produced in Canada was manufactured in Windsor, Ontario, in the year 1904, almost fifty years ago. There were imported models, or horseless carriages, introduced to our country before that date, but the more advanced motorcar came to Canada from the United States through Windsor in the year aforementioned.

The 1904 model was a crude creation in comparison with the sleek, comfortable and speedy models of 1953. When one looks back at the improvements that have been made in the last 50 years one cannot help but think of what the next 50 years will bring in the way of jet propulsion or atomic energy as applied to the automotive industry. We in Canada can be sure that when these means have been developed to the proper stage the ingenuity and progressiveness of the automobile industry in Canada will adopt such advancements as may be applied for the full benefit of Canada and Canadians.

I am sure that in 1904 that small carriage company at Windsor, the manufacturer of the original motorcar, little realized that in 50 years the industry which they were getting under way would grow to be the second largest in Canada, second only to the pulp and paper industry as an employer of people and in the total wages and salaries paid. In 1952 the total value of the products of the automotive industry, including vehicles and parts, was estimated at $717 million. Little did those pioneers realize in 1904 that within 50 years there would be at a given time over three million motor vehicles on the roads of Canada and that those vehicles would represent an investment by their owners of more than $4·5 billion. That investment is greater than the total value of all lands, buildings, implements and livestock in the agricultural industry in Canada.

In 1952 automobile firms directly employed over 35,000 men and women with wages amounting to $132 million. Indirectly employment was given through 350 feeder plants to 148,000 persons who were paid $112 million. Those people were employed on automotive contracts during the period 1951-52. With the phenomenal growth of industry in Canada it is reasonable to expect that this industry will increase correspondingly in the years to come.

I have said that the industry was concentrated in Windsor, Oshawa and Hamilton, Ontario, but those are only the places where motorcars are manufactured. Oakville, Ontario, will soon become one of the leading centres in Canada for the assembly of motorcars. The whole economy of the country is supported by this industry. We must realize that it provides a market for the products of mine, forest and farm throughout the whole country. I regret that I have not available the amounts spent directly by the automotive industry on subsidiary industries and feeder plants, but I do have the information given by the president of one company to a group of members of this house in this building early this year. He indicated the amount which his company had spent in the various industrial centres in 1952. It must be remembered that there are four companies manufacturing motorcars, as well as other companies producing trucks and buses, so it will be seen what this means to the industrial life of our country and to the many industrial centres represented by members of this house.

This one company in 1952 made the following expenditures in the following centres:

Chatham, Ont.	$ 820,000
Montreal, Que.	4,082,000
London, Ont.	2,184,000
Stratford, Ont.	346,000
Kingston and Gananoque, Ont.	536,000
Hamilton, Ont.	7,450,000

These are only a few of the leading towns in Ontario and Quebec which have benefited directly from this industry. Altogether there are between 350 and 400 communities in Canada which share in the business created by this industry.

Apart from the independent garage men and dealers in imported cars there are 5,200 automobile dealers in Canada selling cars and trucks under licences from the manufacturers. These dealers employ about 55,000 persons who are paid over $132 million a year in wages and salaries. If we were to group all the automotive industry together, that is the manufacturers and the people who work in the factories, the feeder plants with all their employees and workmen, and the dealers with all their salesmen and mechanics, we have an industry employing 238,000 men and women with a combined payroll of over $376 million. That is over $1 million per day which goes into the pockets of Canadian labourers, clerks and technicians.

This is not the only contribution made by this industry to the economic welfare of Canada. The demand for certain types of steel has led to the establishment of facilities for the production and processing of such steel in Canada. This steel need not be imported by other users as it is made available to the manufacturers of other commodities. With the development of Canada's vast iron ore resources, the establishment of these and other steel processing plants and the knowledge derived therefrom will be of immeasurable benefit in the future industrial growth of our country.

This industry is highly competitive and as such engages the most highly trained personnel, engineers, draftsmen, tool makers, accountants and highly-qualified office workers. It is a magnificent industrial training ground and a leader in developing and adopting new methods and techniques which will facilitate higher and higher production with lower and lower costs.

This know-how and technique is available for the defence of Canada in time of war. This was proved during world war II. The knowledge of means and methods of mass production enabled the industry to turn out hundreds of thousands of motorized units for our armed forces. It also produced parts for tanks, gun mountings, aircraft components, parts for ships and complex secret devices which the technicians of the automobile industry were well trained to execute and bring into being.

Objections have been taken in this house relevant to the differential in automobile prices in the United States and Canada. I agree that at the present time there is a variance of about $450 in the price of the popular four-door model of the three most popular lower-priced cars. This does not take into consideration a slight reduction in price made recently by one of the manufacturers.

Let us see how this is made up, and I take my information from a publication of the Canadian automotive chamber of commerce. The factory list price in Canada of this model is $1,836; the factory list price in the United States is $1,609, which gives a differential of $227. There is a sales tax in Canada of $145 and as there is no sales tax in the United States that gives a further differential of $145. The excise tax in Canada is $217 as compared with $134 in the United States, which gives a differential of $83. The total sales and excise taxes are $228 greater in Canada than in the United States. Therefore the price to the Canadian consumer is $2,198, and to the United States consumer $1,743, or a differential of $455. With the permission of the committee, Mr. Chairman, I should like to place on Hansard a table giving the figures I have just quoted.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Brown (Essex West): The table is as follows:

	Canada	United States	Differential
Factory list	$1,836	$1,609	$227
Sales tax	145	nil	145 | $228
Excise tax	217	134	83 ⌋
	$2,198	$1,743	$455

The basic difference in price therefore is $227 per car. The balance of the $455 I have mentioned is in our hidden taxes. We in Canada have made tremendous strides in our industrial growth, especially in the last four years. We as Canadians take great pride in our country. We have no desire of being merely the woodshed of the United States. Neither are we content to remain an agricultural community without a market for our farm products. It is essential that we have a well balanced economy in which the workman in the factory supplies the tools and equipment and the farmer on the land provides the food and raw products, but one in which both obtain a fair share of the profit.

Before there was any motorcar industry in Canada there was a customs duty of 35 per cent on automobiles. But there was no automobile industry to protect. The customs duty was and has been a source of revenue in Canada. Since United States manufacturers have seen fit to establish the industry in Canada, the customs duty has been reduced at various stages until it is now 17½ per cent on motor vehicles imported from the United States. The United States manufacturer is well able to supply the needs of the Canadian market at any or all times, but because of the tariff protection he finds that the motor vehicle can be manufactured in Canada using Canadian labour and a large percentage of Canadian material for less than what the motor vehicle would cost in the United States plus the duty to import it into Canada.

At the present time Canadian manufacturers import the frames for motor vehicles as well as the metal bodies. A few other minor parts are manufactured in the United States. On the other hand, there are many feeder plants in the Windsor area in particular which are manufacturing parts for American automobile manufacturers in job lots. Just a few days ago I had the pleasure of visiting one of these plants and there found that a great deal of their work comprised jobs for United States manufacturers which were rush orders.

The reason for importation of frames and metal bodies is that the equipment necessary for these parts is terrifically expensive and it is found that the parts can be imported and duty paid for an amount less than it would cost to build a piece of equipment to perform the operation. If a huge stamping machine or press is constructed to stamp out the metal body for a car at a cost of $200,000 —and I have no idea whether or not that is anywhere near correct as I have no connection with the automobile companies themselves—the cost of that press must be added to the price of the particular model sold. If 100,000 units are sold, $2 per unit of the sale price must be applied to the cost of the press. If 1,000 units are sold, for the purpose of my argument, then $200 of the sale price must be applied to the cost of the press or machine. This means that the selling price to the consumer of the individual unit must be considerably higher when there is smaller production.

Human nature being what it is, human tastes being fickle, and the needs of the purchasers being varied, there is not just one body model stamped out of the sheet metal. Each year the public and the public alone demands new and improved models which mean new dies and presses and increased expenditures resulting in higher prices to the consumer. This applies not only to metal bodies but to all parts of motor vehicles. The dies used in a punch press or stamping machine will make a thousand units or a million. If a million are made the cost of the die can be spread over the larger production. The same applies to component parts of a motor vehicle. An order for a million units will enable the feeder plant to cut its costs so that the unit can be supplied for less than the per unit cost of a small order.

The population of the United States is about 150 million people. In Canada we have only approximately 14 million. Production in the United States in 1952 was about thirteen times that of Canada. Therefore we can see that by reason of the greater population and higher demand orders will be much larger and costs will be correspondingly reduced. We are therefore paying an additional $227 per car for the privilege of buying a Canadian product, using Canadian labour and materials, and building up a balanced economy in the country.

In addition to the $227 for the privilege of buying Canadian, the consumer is paying an additional $228 approximately in hidden taxes which goes to pay for our national defence, family allowances, old age pensions, unemployment insurance, etc., for the benefit of all Canadians.

Remarks have been made at times that the automobile companies are making huge profits. Personally I do not represent any automobile company and have no stock in automobile companies, but I am vitally interested in the automobile industry because they are employers of labour in my community. I am sure that so long as there is a Liberal government they will be making money, and I like to see them make money because when they are making money the rest of the country is prosperous.

However, a few days ago I saw the annual statement of one of the larger companies which showed that there had been a considerable profit; but when you stop to consider the amount of sales the profit amounted to something like 6 per cent of the sales made by the company last year. I do not think 6 per cent is considered to be an excess profit. I think you will find that the grocer considers that he has to make more than 6 per cent on his sales unless of course it is a huge supermarket. I think that the farmer considers he has to make more than 6 per cent, and I do not think anyone in this house or out of it will consider that a profit of 6 per cent on gross sales of any company or individual is excessive. That is what the profit was in this company. That does not take into consideration at all the amount invested as capital investment in the company but is merely the profit on sales.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, it is my view that the automobile industry is a vital part of the economy of the country, and as long as we provide a healthy atmosphere for business and commerce I am sure that the automobile industry will succeed and prosper and will give employment to individuals and small corporations throughout the whole country to the benefit of all.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Peace River has always been noted for his courtesy and co-operation and he deserves, I think, a special credit this morning as does the hon. member who has preceded me. I want to express my appreciation to them for having made way for me. Actually, the hon. member for Peace River should have spoken, but owing to an appointment which I have after lunch he agreed to let me speak now.

I do not wish to speak at any length in this debate but there are one or two matters which I wish to bring before the committee at this time. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has given us a very glowing picture of the trade of this nation and I do not think anyone can quarrel with the figures which he has presented. I would, however, like to direct to his attention one matter which is of particular importance. When the minister returned from his trip to South America some time ago he gave us a very glowing picture of the trip and of the possibilities which might flow from it. The minister can paint a glowing picture and gild the clouds, as we know, and he can also be most forthright and most direct—as he usually is. Some months have elapsed since he made that trip to South America and I would like the minister to deal specifically with it and to tell the committee this afternoon when he speaks just what concrete results he expects to flow from the trip. It is a matter of interest of course to all of Canada but particularly so to those of us in the east who are using maritime ports.

There was a time when we had extensive trade with Cuba and with the West Indies but our trade with South America has never been as satisfactory as we would like. There are undoubtedly possibilities for development there that the minister, with the research that he has done upon this, with the personal contacts he has established there, and with the emphasis which has been laid upon the possibility of the development of that market, should be in a position to speak upon concretely and directly to us. He might tell us what trade will flow or develop from his trip and from the publicity work which has gone into the development of that market.

The second matter I would like to draw to the minister's attention is one that I am sure he appreciates already. It concerns the proportion, the increasing proportion, of Canadian goods which are being directed for export through American ports. We have just listened to a graphic picture of the development of the automobile industry in this nation and of the importance that industry plays in our economic life. We all recognize that and appreciate it, and I think that Canadians generally are proud of the industry and are prepared to support it in any way possible as part of our integrated economic activity.

However, when one looks at the export figures one cannot help being alarmed at the increasing number of automobiles which are being produced in Canada for export and which are being exported through American ports rather than Canadian ports. I know that the minister can say that it is a matter for private enterprise and what can you do about it. It is true that it is a matter of private enterprise but private enterprise is very often influenced, and assisted, by national policy. The automobile industry is one of many private industries which have undoubtedly benefited by national policies inaugurated by this and preceding governments. I think that a government through its national policies can influence the development of private industry in more than one field and certainly this is one which is of tremendous importance to those of us in the east because although our exports are increasing and developing rapidly, the proportion of those exports going through American ports is increasing rather than decreasing. In the automobile industry it is particularly marked. When the minister speaks this afternoon I would like him to refer to that situation and tell us what if anything can be done to further the development of trade through Canadian ports. When I say "Canadian ports" I include all of them although the figures I refer to have application to the eastern American ports where trade has been diverted through government railways and other means to American ports.

Mr. Chairman, there is only one other matter to which I wish to refer and it is one that is of special importance to my own constituency. It has, of course, been mentioned before. It was mentioned last night by the hon. member for Eglinton, and other speakers have talked about it. Nevertheless it is a point which I want to stress formally, and that is the supreme importance of again getting access to the sterling markets and the markets of Great Britain. As all hon. member have said, it is a matter which is of importance to all of Canada: but there is no constituency in Canada, no area in Canada, which is more greatly affected than that which I have the honour to represent—the Annapolis valley with its fruit-producing industry. Not so many years ago the Annapolis valley produced and exported more apples to Great Britain than all of the rest of the empire and commonwealth together. As a matter of fact Great Britain imported more apples from the Annapolis valley than she did from all of the rest of the world—and that was just prior to the last war. Since then our exports have continued to go out the window for various reasons until last year we did not ship one single barrel or box of apples from Nova Scotia.

Mr. Howe: But a good many apples were shipped.

Mr. Nowlan: As the minister says, a good many apples were shipped; but, fortunately, the American crop was light and the Americans were in the market for our apples. Because of that fact we were able to send substantial quantities of apples to the American market.

Mr. Howe: If my hon. friend does not mind my interrupting him, since he is not going to be here this afternoon—

Mr. Nowlan: Quite all right.

Mr. Howe: Last year we sold to Britain 706,000 bushels of apples valued at $1,581,000. I suppose that if none were sold there from the Annapolis valley there was a better price in the United States—and that must be the answer.

Mr. Nowlan: I am not familiar with the figures and all I know is that last year no apples went to Britain. Whether there was a carryover from the preceding year I do not know, but it is true that last year in the valley, as was generally the case, the crop was small. I think it was small all over the continent and certainly it was fortunate that was true in the United States. Because of the drastic shortage of apples in New York and Virginia, American buyers were in the valley almost clamouring for apples. Of course, there are economic developments in the industry. For instance, baby food—and to use a popular phrase, because I do not know the technical term—I suspect that manufacturers of Pablum and other baby foods are today in the market for thousands and tens of thousands of bushels of apples. A few years ago that market was not open to us. From time to time there will be crop failures in the United States and we will be able to ship apples there on those occasions—and we will be very thankful when those opportunities present themselves.

Mr. Cruickshank: Everyone wants B.C. apples.

Mr. Nowlan: I am not going to enter into a discussion with you on that; but I am sure that if there were enough Nova Scotia apples for general consumption then those who were able to get them would not want British Columbia apples and they would hardly recognize them as such.

Mr. Cruickshank: We ship them to Halifax.

Mr. Green: Be careful.

Mr. Nowlan: I am not going to indulge in that discussion but I am more alarmed at the remark of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra than that of the hon. member for Fraser Valley.

What I am saying is that the American market, though in some ways it may be a substitute from time to time, is not a solution to our problem. That is obvious for two reasons. In the first place, as the minister knows better than anyone else, our trade balance with the United States today is such that we are in a most vulnerable position. Figures have been put on the record before and I am not going to deal with them now, but our imbalance of imports over exports is such that we are not in a satisfactory position. More than that, the Americans produce large quantities of good quality apples and when the crop years are right they themselves have a surplus. As the minister knows, they not only supply the local market but unfortunately they export and they receive a bonus for offshore trading which—even if we did get access to the export market—puts us in a difficult position.

The last time we sold apples in any quantity to Great Britain, the United States producers were getting a bonus of $1.25 per box on the export market, and we had to meet that in order to get into the market. We are prepared to do that. The industry in the valley has been revolutionized, owing in part to help from this government and in part to the energy which has been shown by the growers themselves. The industry has been put in a position where, from a production standpoint, it will compete favourably with any apple industry in North America. But it does need the export market. Situated in Nova Scotia, on the periphery of this continent, the industry is to a large extent precluded from taking advantage of our own market. But by that very geographical position, jutting out as a sort of wharf into the Atlantic, we are enabled to take advantage of the British market. We can truck the apples to Halifax, put them on a boat and land them in the British market within a few days.

But something more must be done than has been done in that connection. I am not going to review what has been said before. We know the record of our demands that greater emphasis should be placed on the development of the British market. We have had resolution after resolution moved to that effect defeated by the government majority here because they have suggested that there was nothing that could be done. Now, we read in the United States papers, and I noticed in the New York Times the other day, that responsible writers are prognosticating movements which are taking place behind the scenes. It is alleged that there are discussions between the Canadian, United States and British governments, as well as the international settlement bank, as a result of which something is going to be done to bring about convertibility of currencies. I think that is possible, Mr. Chairman.

If such developments are taking place, then we should know about them now. The fruit industry is not one in which you can operate on short-term planning. The growers should know now what the possibilities are so that they can decide whether or not they can afford to spray, and whether or not they can afford to look after their crop. They could decide whether or not there is any possibility of a market for the crop. There is nothing which is more important to the people generally across Canada, and particularly in my own constituency, than the necessity of once more getting access to the British market. I hope when the minister speaks again this afternoon he will, if he can, deal frankly with this matter just as he usually deals frankly with these matters. If he can make any statement with respect to developments, I feel he should do so and give us the information now to enable the growers to make proper plans for this year's production.

Mr. Low: I have been keenly interested in this whole matter of trade for quite a number of years, and although I have not spoken too often about it in the house yet I have listened with great respect and interest to those things that have been said and the various policies and proposals put forward by means of which it was hoped to assist the world to get back into some sort of balanced economy. I feel that I should speak at this time to put forward once more the views which I have held for a good number of years, and also put before the minister a matter of great interest and concern to my own constituency.

First I should like, Mr. Chairman, to deal with trade generally and to trace, for just a moment or two, some of the facts about world trade which have contributed to the present impasse. For a number of years now, I shall not attempt to say the exact number, there has been what may be called a maladjustment in the world economy. This maladjustment has been of tremendous concern to most thinking people, and I imagine it has to the government. What I have observed thus far as a consequence of their concern has not impressed me as being action that would in any way tend to alleviate the serious condition. I think that if we had followed different policies from those which we have followed, particularly since the end of the war, or if one were to name a specific date, 1949, we could have prevented some very serious dislocations that have occurred in our own Canadian economy. I might refer, as one specific example, to this whole matter of the fruit marketing which the hon. member who has just finished speaking mentioned.

This maladjustment of the whole world trade and economy I think has shown itself more particularly in the relationship between the dollar and sterling areas. Since 1949 a number of discussions have been held amongst the various nations concerned, and attempts made to find some sort of makeshift, I shall call it, because that is all they seem to have been trying to do. They have been finding some sort of makeshift to enable the sterling area to carry on just a little bit longer without collapse. It seemed to me that there was nothing fundamental in their search or in their thinking; it has been somewhat superficial. Let us put crutches under the old thing they say, to hold it up a little longer so it will not completely fall on us.

So far as I am aware, no real effort has been made to get down to the real root of things with a view to finding a permanent solution to this very serious maladjustment. What happened, for example, at the recent Washington conference has been kept strictly secret. We do not know, therefore, what proposals were put forward. Certain things leaked out, I suppose, and became confused. The suggestion is that, out of the Washington conference, there is going to come some successful solution to the inconvertibility of currencies. Well, Mr. Chairman, I think that we should have been given a whole lot more information than we have been given about the results of the Washington conference. We are in the dark, and as a consequence it is very difficult to discuss in an intelligent manner the problem that we now face with respect to world trade. Until we do get that information, I suppose we shall just have to go on putting forward the ideas that we feel are sound, and I hope that some time the government will make it possible for us to know a little more. I am convinced that nothing short of a fundamental change in outlook on the part of the nations concerned can produce a permanent remedy to the trade sickness which has so long afflicted the world.

Now, getting right down to basic considerations, I think it can be demonstrated that the United States has had a wrong outlook for quite a number of years towards this whole matter of trading. I am not attacking the United States at all when I say that. But when any nation with the industrial might of our good neighbour to the south has a wrong attitude toward this world economy, unbalance is bound to result. Then, when other nations like Canada voluntarily follow the United States in their wrong outlook, the unbalance of course is seriously aggravated; that has been the case in the past few years. Finally, when under political pressure the rest of the world is whipped into line by the United States, then it becomes next to impossible to restore the equilibrium in trade matters until that outlook is changed.

Now there is not the slightest doubt in my mind that the source of the world trade slump is the economic unbalance that has been brought about by such a policy on the part of the policy makers in the United States and Canada, and their inability to face the realities or to base their policies upon realistic thinking as to what would balance the economy from a world point of view. Now, what is a balanced economy? I say it would be one in which the production and exchange of different kinds of commodities and services corresponds very closely to human needs. Nothing less than that could possibly be called a balanced world economy. That is the only kind of world economy, in my judgment, that could flourish and expand steadily in the years ahead. Right now, this world does not have such a balance. I would say it is far from it, largely as a consequence of selfish shortsighted policies laid down and slavishly followed by, I will go so far as to say, adolescent human beings or, in the alternative, forced upon nations by powerful financial and economic combinations of men. It should be perfectly obvious, I would think, to any grown-up, mature person that the only way to correct—in a permanent way, let us say—the present economic unbalance in the world is to restore the balance as quickly as possible. That is just ordinary, common horse sense. I realize that what I suggest is a big order, of course—how to correct the unbalance as quickly as possible—and I admit at once that it is much easier said than done. But it must be clear to anyone in this committee that it will not ever be done unless we deliberately and with determination set out to do it, and not just attempt to put crutches under an old arrangement which just cannot possibly stand by itself.

Over the years the United States has built up an ever-expanding balanced economy, balanced internally as well as externally, except when she refuses to recognize that the rest of the world cannot buy from her unless she is prepared to buy from them. She did so by protecting her own industry from external competition that might have been a destructive type of competition without that protection. She also built it up by attracting both skilled manpower and capital from Britain and other parts of the world in the early stages of her development. By the time world war I ended the United States had built up a tremendous surplus productive capacity and, as a consequence, the United States forced huge quantities of surplus goods into the channels of world trade without any effort to create an external balance either by increasing her imports or by consistent investment in other countries. Consequently by 1931 the unbalance had become so terrible that it erupted into the great depression that became world wide.

Faced with the necessity of trying to do something about it, as you will recall, the countries forming the British commonwealth of nations organized amongst themselves a preference system in order to present some sort of balancing factor in the world so as to offset the unbalance that was created by this huge United States industrial upsurge and the lack of world responsibility that was so evident within that country. This organization of a preference system amongst themselves helped the commonwealth nations tremendously and as a consequence they enjoyed a measure of balanced expansion for some years. But the nations of Europe which were prevented from helping each other to form an expanding, growing economy by the most-favoured-nation clause that was inserted in trade treaties were obliged to resort to every kind of restrictive device in order to save themselves. I speak there, of course, of the unconditional most-favoured-nation clause in trade treaties.

World war II, I think, served only to aggravate the serious unbalance of the period between 1918 and 1939. Then to make matters worse, the United States threw all of its immense political and economic weight into what amounted to enforcement over the whole trade world of the very obstacles to recovery which had earlier been placed there; and she has been determined to prevent the building up of nation groups, with combined resources comparable to those of the United States, which would be capable, of course, of holding their own through a balanced, mutually expanding production and exchange among themselves, if necessary. The terms of the Washington loan, the Bretton Woods agreement, the Geneva agreement and the Havana charter have all been witnesses to the truth of that determination that I have spoken of on the part of the United States.

I am convinced that the only remedy for the present trade stalemate is the restoration of world balance by co-operation between relatively weak and unbalanced countries. They should be allowed to do that without any interference or restriction. As to whatever pledges the countries made under Bretton Woods, Geneva and GATT, anybody knows that they will inevitably and eventually be forced to evade them. The United States is evading them now. Other countries are forced to evade them. They cannot keep those terms and live up to their agreement, so they are being evaded wholesale today. The nations that are precluded from the free and flexible methods of co-operation by such things as mutual tariff preferences are having to resort to something else.

I am becoming much more impressed, Mr. Chairman, by the necessity for having the nations completely free to take whatever action they feel, in their own wisdom, they ought to take on the highest moral plane to bring balance and decency into this whole system of world trade. If they were allowed to build up mutual tariff preferences wherever it was found necessary, and freely adjusted currencies, I am sure they would not be driven by necessity to try to achieve something by such things as fixed import quotas, exchange controls and bilateral bargains that try to get in under the wire. Some of these things I have mentioned are damaging to their own enterprise and initiative as well as to world trade as well. I think the history of the nations in the last ten years would indicate that that statement is perfectly true. As I said, I am becoming a great deal more impressed every day by the necessity for leaving the nations completely free to take whatever action they feel, in their wisdom, they ought to take so that they can bring some sort of balance, decency and fairness into world trade.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Low: Mr. Chairman, to continue what I had begun to say before lunch, in recent years Canada has drifted into the habit of buying from the United States, and at the same time trying to sell to Great Britain and to Europe, and then leaving it to others to complete the triangle of trade. This, of course, is exactly what the others cannot do under the present unbalance of trade.

Since 1949 Canada has found herself in the position that her natural and her best markets are increasingly restricting their purchases from Canada, except where they are paid for by the aid which these countries receive from the United States. Canada was the only commonwealth nation which, at Geneva, did seriously reduce her preferences on British imports.

I have often been led to ask our policy makers if they did not realize that by taking that action Canada was only adding to the difficulties that were faced by Great Britain in buying from Canada. We in Canada have drifted into a state of thinking that we are actually in the dollar area, although in our interests and our sympathies, as well as economically, we are linked a whole lot more closely with the British commonwealth and with Europe.

I wonder what would be the real difficulty in Canada's acknowledging that fact in the currency arrangements that she makes. Some time ago, when the Minister of Agriculture was in England he gave a speech in London in which he stated that some arrangements would have to be made by which Great Britain could buy her foodstuffs and other supplies in Canada, and that no currency restrictions ought to stand in the way of the successful achievement of that objective, and the achievement also of a balance in world trade. There is sense to what he said.

Undoubtedly the Minister of Agriculture realized that what I am saying now is true, that economically and in many other ways we are linked to Great Britain, the commonwealth and Europe more closely than with the United States, although in recent years we have got into the habit of thinking that we can tie ourselves to the United States and be safe. That is not true. I think we are finding it more so every month.

I believe Canada should have started as far back as 1949 to accept payment in sterling for any balances owing us by Great Britain and by other parts of the sterling area. I realize all too well that it would probably have been necessary for us to accept sterling at a rate which we ourselves would find most convenient. I do not think there would have been any difficulty in arranging that, either.

I should point out, too, at this stage that the sterling area is a free association whose members can at any time change their rates to meet their requirements. If we had agreed to accept sterling, as I have suggested, and set a rate to suit our convenience, we could have shared with Great Britain a certain amount of protection against American competition, and at the same time we could have ensured that our people could enjoy satisfactory prices on the imports we bring into this country.

The only difficulty I can see about accepting sterling would have been this, that for the time being at least Canada would have found herself accumulating a surplus of sterling above our current requirements. These surpluses would, I suppose, have to be invested temporarily in the country owing the balance. But to offset that, there is every evidence that Canada has reached a stage of development where we could do that sort of thing safely, especially if we limited our commitments to a certain maximum figure until such time as the trade volume with the sterling area has come more nearly into balance.

Under such an arrangement, of course every sterling country, instead of restricting its purchases of Canadian goods, as those countries have been doing for the last few years, I think would go all-out to buy every pound of foodstuffs and other materials Canada could produce. I am satisfied European countries would have followed suit as far as they would find sterling an easier currency to meet than the American dollar. Instead of thinking about restricting the production of Canadian foodstuffs, as we have been thinking about it—and some of the farmers have been told they ought to do it—we could open up the valve and go all-out in production. There is a wider and perhaps much more important result than this that would have accrued from our willingness to accept sterling in payment for balances with Great Britain and the sterling area. I think that such action would have gone far to strengthen the sterling area, and by now we probably would have begun to see some hope of achieving a balance in world trade.

[Mr. Low.]

I am convinced it would have been greatly to Canada's advantage if we had adopted the policy I have suggested as early as 1948, or certainly by 1949. I am also convinced that world balance in economy and trade can never be achieved under rigid agreements like Bretton Woods, Geneva or GATT. It can be achieved only if all the nations find themselves free to take whatever action they feel it is desirable to take, particularly along the lines of setting up and arranging mutually satisfactory co-operative associations, wherein they could present a united and comparable productive front to the great world industrial giant, the United States.

I should like to conclude this part of what I have to say about trade by pointing out the problem faced by the people in the United States today. To do this I should like to read briefly from the Alberta Wheat Pool Budget of April 17, 1953, where, under the heading "U.S. Farm Problem", it says:

> The United States government has $2,900,000,000 tied up in its farm price support program. As parity prices are guaranteed on principal farm products to the end of 1954, the government of that nation is somewhat in a quandary. The chief products involved are wheat, corn, tobacco and cotton.
> Overseas markets for U.S. farm products are drying up. That is the main cause of the domestic problem. Farm exports in January were 29 per cent below a year ago. Cotton exports were down 63 per cent. Broader export markets are urgently needed, mainly by wheat and cotton growers. Higher import tariffs on the other hand are wanted by the dairy industry. This conflict puts the government under pressure. The administration would like an extension of the present trade agreement program allowing more time for study.

When you contemplate that situation, and also the situation that exists here in Canada, perhaps to a lesser degree at the moment but certainly growing, it becomes abundantly clear that we simply must find some means of distributing these surpluses. The suggestion that has been made of setting up a world pool or an international commodity clearing house organization for the distribution of surpluses seems to me the best that has been made thus far. We must find a way of distributing to the people who need them the surpluses that are bound to occur as we open the valves of our productive capacity and go all-out in peacetime production.

We are told that we had in Canada last fall something in the neighbourhood of 700,000 cases of salmon many of which are unsaleable at the moment. I am only quoting what a correspondent from British Columbia wrote recently to the Christian Science Monitor, as follows:

> While the smaller salmon pack was not a matter of serious concern to packers who were faced with a carry-over of 700,000 unsold cases from 1951, fishermen have been hard hit. The market for canned salmon has been restricted because of Britain's continued dollar shortage: Britain and the commonwealth countries having long been Canada's best customers for these exports.

The most recent figures indicate a present surplus stock of no less than 350,000 cases.

That seems to indicate a serious situation with respect to our ability to dispose of the salmon that we can gather in and put into cans. It just proves the seriousness of what I have mentioned. We must find means of distributing these surpluses to the countries that need them. It seems to me that that is the only guarantee for anything like a hope for world peace.

I should like to take a minute or two to make an appeal to the Minister of Trade and Commerce in connection with a situation in my own constituency. The Peace river country is a fast-growing empire, as I think the minister knows. Its population is expanding rapidly and today there are something like 65,000 people in the area. New communities are springing up fast and older ones are growing and expanding. The production of all the things that these people can produce is increasing.

I should like at this moment to remind the Minister of Trade and Commerce of the productive capacity of that country as shown by figures representing the 1951 and 1952 production for crop districts 15 and 16 which are included in the Peace river. These are as follows:

	1951 bushels	1952 bushels
Wheat	9,552,000	7,586,000
Oats	19,076,000	17,079,000
Barley	5,004,000	7,306,000

The marketing figures are even more significant. The figures for the crop year 1951-52, the last year for which figures are available, for crop districts 15 and 16 in the Peace river district show the following marketings:

	bushels	Cars of 2,000 bushels
Wheat	8,989,000	4,495
Oats	9,714,000	4,857
Barley	2,838,000	1,415
Rye	439,000	219
Flax	188,000	94
	22,160,000	11,080

I am taking the railway cars as averaging 2,000 bushels apiece which I think is fairly accurate. I should like to point out at this time that we in the Peace river country have been suffering under a number of disabilities. The first is that we are isolated because of the failure on the part of those who could have done the job in the past to extend the Northern Alberta Railways to the Pacific coast in order to provide a western outlet. At present there is a backhaul of up to 425 miles just to get into Edmonton. It might be interesting to note the distances of some of these communities from Edmonton, and I give a few examples as follows:

Spirit River	326
Grande Prairie	407
Beaverlodge	435
Dawson Creek	495

Those are on the south side of the river. Then on the north side we have:

	miles
Peace River	317
Fairview	365
Hines Creek	382

The latter point is at the end of the line on the north side of the river. The nearest inland storage elevator at present is situated in Edmonton and I understand that this has a capacity of somewhere around 2,350,000 bushels.

In addition to that isolation, we suffer the added disability of transportation isolation. We are often left until the very last of the crop year before millable or marketable grain is moved from the area. If there happens to be a car shortage, as there has been over the years, the people in the Peace river country are just about the last to receive service. The areas nearer to the market are the ones which seem to be given the first service, and I can understand that that is necessary under the circumstances when we have to fill foreign commitments.

In 1951-52, which was the last year in which we had a car shortage, as late as March, 1952, there were ten million bushels of the crop still left on the farms. As a consequence farmers were penalized although their grain was of millable quality and greatly in demand to fill Canada's commitments abroad.

One solution to this whole problem would be the building of a railroad outlet to the west coast. I appreciate the problems involved at the present time but that will have to be done if this country is to realize its full potential in contributing to Canada's strength and security. Certainly the building of this railroad is long overdue. I shall not labour the point now because this is not a matter for the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

However, I would like to point out another alternative, the building of an inland storage elevator of perhaps two million bushels capacity to be located at some point in the Peace river district where the necessity for a back haul would be kept at a minimum. There are two or three places where this could be located to advantage, such as at McLennan and High Prairie where the facilities are available for putting up such an elevator.

I understand from the minister's own lips that it would cost in the neighbourhood of $5 million, but I think even that large cost could be justified particularly when one realizes that this country just cannot go ahead until the transportation and storage situations are corrected. There are a number of tremendous advantages that would accrue both to the Peace river area and to Canada as a whole, and I shall mention them only briefly. The first would be that by establishing a two million bushel storage elevator in the Peace river district it would increase storage space available by 20 to 25 per cent. I am told by authorities that today there is only something in the neighbourhood of nine million bushels storage capacity, at elevators and annexes, in the whole area. That is too small a storage space to take care of the needs of the area and its productive capacity. The second advantage would be that a smaller number of box cars could handle the crop in any year on a shuttle service basis in just a few hours because it would only take a matter of six or seven hours to get to the terminal from any part of the huge area. That would be particularly advantageous during a period of shortage of box cars.

Another advantage would be that it would supply cleaning facilities in the area making it possible to take out dockage which I think runs normally around 3 per cent or a little better in the Peace river country. The screenings from the processing could be left in the area to stimulate a livestock feeding industry which, by the way, is greatly needed in that country to help to balance their agriculture. Another advantage of a storage elevator of that kind would be that it would provide drying and conditioning facilities which are badly needed. Often in that country we find ourselves with much tough and damp grain that should be dried and processed quickly in order to save it. I am satisfied that over a period of years an investment of even $5 million in an elevator there would pay in added production and the saving of production that would normally spoil if it were not processed quickly.

Therefore I appeal to the minister again to give this matter his earnest and sympathetic consideration. I have spoken to him about it before. I know he said at the time that was not the solution to our problem but he did not give me reasons. If it is impossible to grant this request, I hope that he will at least be able to give us reasons why it would not be a solution or a partial solution to our problem at any rate. We think that the struggling people of the Peace river are certainly entitled to that much consideration. When one remembers the efforts which they have made in the past to add to Canada's prosperity, and particularly during the war when they went all-out in their productive efforts and did what I think was a magnificent job, it seems to me it is only right that we should now provide them with a railway outlet to the west coast or in the alternative with an inland storage elevator of the type which I have suggested. I know I have exceeded my time and I appreciate your indulgence, Mr. Chairman. I do ask the minister to give this proposition his most earnest and thorough consideration.

Mr. Hetland: I should like to ask the hon. member a question. In trading with England is price not a big factor, and would the hon. member suggest that England should pay for meat and such products as little as she pays other countries such as Australia and New Zealand?

Mr. Low: Yes, of course, Mr. Chairman, price is a big factor. There is no question about that.

Mr. Hetland: How would you overcome it?

Mr. Low: I feel perfectly satisfied that any disability of price could be overcome if we worked on a two-price system such as my colleague, the hon. member for Acadia, suggested in the house not very long ago when he was dealing with a similar subject.

Mr. McIvor: Mr. Chairman, I rise to say a brief word because we at the lakehead are interested in trade but are even more interested in the Minister of Trade and Commerce. He is the one who to a great extent has to deliver the goods and I am convinced that he has been delivering the goods because there is very little in Canada today that is not being delivered. Wheat, for example, is being sold as fast as it can be carried. We have some salmon in British Columbia but I understand that the Minister of Fisheries is taking care of that. I am almost a free trader. I believe in trading with the empire, and having been born in the old country I have a soft spot in my heart for trade with that country.

As a matter of fact I am using a car that was made in England. The reason I like that car is because it has no American frills on it, and I can skid a corner with it as fast as anybody in the house. Listening to some hon. members, one would feel that the country was going to the bow-wows and that the Minister of Trade and Commerce had not been doing a good job. They may have convinced somebody else of that fact but to me it is not a true fact. They cannot convince me because my correspondence tells me that today Canada is on the top. My correspondence tells me, and I see it in certain publications, that more people want to come to Canada than want to go to any other country in the world. Why? Because they know they can earn their bread and butter freely and be protected thereby.

I know that not all people come from the British empire. When the embargo on cattle was lifted, the farmers in the west were willing to sell their cattle to United States buyers if they would pay a little more than anybody else because they had found that the United States dollar would buy just as much as a dollar from any other country. The reason why I got up to speak is that I want to state that since I have been in the house I have never heard a finer tribute paid to anybody than that paid to the Minister of Trade and Commerce by an opposition member. I think it was the bright young member for Kamloops who did so on the occasion when he was discussing the wheat agreement that had been formulated by forty-six nations. He rose and spoke to the Minister of Trade and Commerce and said, "You go to England." Just think of that tribute. It beats an LL.D., a D.D. or any other kind of degree because it is telling the Minister of Trade and Commerce to go and do what forty-five other nations could not do. To me that is one of the finest tributes I have ever heard paid to anybody in the house. I say to the opposition: Just keep on, because it will not make a bit difference to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and when he puts on his new hat on the Sabbath day it will not be a bit tighter.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Sinnott: Now we are really going to get it.

Mr. Hees: I hope the hon. member will understand it.

Mr. Sinnott: I am trying very hard.

Mr. Hees: On Friday last we heard a very glowing account of Canada's trade position and of our prospects for the future given to us by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. One thing for which we cannot criticize the minister is his optimism, but I think we owe it to ourselves to examine the foundation of that optimism to find out if it is sound.

If we look at a government publication entitled "Trade of Canada, Exports", we see that our exports of all products to all countries in January, 1953, were 2 per cent less than our similar exports during the same month of last year. In February, however, this falling off had mounted to 11 per cent below our exports of similar products during the same month of last year. If we leave out exports of non-ferrous metals and their products, a great part of which are made up by shipments of strategic war materials to our NATO allies, and which may be very greatly affected by the present Russian peace offensive, we find that during January our exports of all other products were 13 per cent lower than our exports of the same products during January, 1952. Our exports of those same products during February of this year were 15 per cent below what they were during February of 1952. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that shows us what is happening to our normal export trade, upon which we rely for our prosperity year in and year out—whether the cold war blows hot or cold.

One of our chief exports has always been the wheat which we have shipped to Great Britain. Very recently that country signified its intention to stay outside of the international wheat agreement. If Britain follows the same course of action which she followed in regard to oats and barley, and switches all or a large part of her buying of wheat from Canada to Russia, then our export trade is going to suffer a very severe blow.

I think we all realize that our prosperity depends to a very large extent on our export trade. Anyone who has studied the figures from year to year will have noted that a variation up or down in our export trade in any one year has always been followed by an almost identical variation in our national income in the following year. For that reason I think it is obvious that we must maintain a high volume of export trade.

I believe one important step that we should take to achieve this end is to suggest to our fellow members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization that they set up a special subcommittee to study the possibilities of unclogging channels of normal trade between NATO countries. That could be done under article 2 of the charter, and I think that it is altogether fitting that it should be done.

None of the members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization—and especially Canada—can continue to finance the high expenditures on defence which they are at present putting forward unless they maintain a high volume of trade. I believe that the greatest possibilities for maintaining a high volume of trade and increasing that volume of trade lie in increasing the trade between the nations that have proved that they can co-operate so effectively in matters of defence —and have done so during the past two years.

Today, three senior members of this government are arriving in Paris to take part, with other members of the North Atlantic council, in very important deliberations. I earnestly urge the Prime Minister that he dispatch a cable to them right away suggesting that they put this suggestion forward to the other members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, and see what they can do to persuade those members to set up such a committee as I have described, designed to do everything possible to increase trade between the NATO nations—and to have that committee set up just as soon as possible.

Mr. Sinnott: Are you going to pay for the cable?

Mr. Hees: Now, I would like very briefly to deal with what I believe we can do in this country to make it easier for other people to buy our products. Two of the important factors in any cost of production are taxes and freight rates, over which this government has a very great influence and control. I believe that if this government could follow the suggestions of the opposition, namely to eliminate waste and extravagance and thereby reduce taxation, that would go a long way towards helping exporters reduce their prices. Also, if we could keep freight rates down, that would help materially in this regard.

A little earlier today the member for Moose Jaw brought up the question of our trade with Great Britain, and I would like to speak very briefly about that matter. The firm with which I am associated deals in textiles, and for the past thirty-five years, we have maintained a buying office in Manchester for the sole purpose of buying British textiles.

Since the war, we have not been able to buy a dollar's worth of textiles in the United Kingdom, and that has been due to three things. First of all, their patterns, which before the war were always attractive and very comparable with American and Canadian patterns, are now of an inferior nature, and, I am afraid, cannot compare with the textile patterns produced in this country and in the United States. Secondly, their prices are higher than the prices on this side of the water. Thirdly, it is very difficult, if not impossible, to get British manufacturers of textiles to promise or keep a delivery date. As anybody in business knows, it is vitally important to know when your goods are going to be shipped, and equally important to have them shipped at that time so that they may arrive in the country where they are required for sale in time to be sampled for the trade before the selling season starts. If the goods do not arrive in time, they miss that year's market, and they are virtually worthless.

Our buyers have several times gone to Britain to try to revive the trade we did with Britain in those materials, but they have found the British very lackadaisical and in no way anxious to make promises of delivery; and we have found that a very discouraging factor when trying to do business with them.

I believe that every Canadian realizes the importance of buying all the goods we can possibly buy from Great Britain. I think, however, that the British people could do a great deal to help Canadians "buy British", and they could do it by bringing their designs to a level comparable with those available in the United States and Canada; by bringing their prices to a comparable level; and by realizing that it is vitally important, to those who sell their goods for them on this side of the water, to know when the goods will be shipped—and to have those shipment promises kept.

I think the British manufacturers could also do a great deal by improving their packaging methods, which I think are out of date as compared to those of Canada and the United States. I think they could also sell a great many more capital goods in this country by ensuring that those capital goods would be serviced once they were in use on this side of the water.

I know that for a few years after the war, British businessmen were hindered by a great many government restrictions, but to a large extent those restrictions have been removed in the last year or so, and I believe they can find no excuse on that score at the present time.

I believe that they should send out, as the member for Moose Jaw suggested, a great many more salesmen and representatives to sell their goods—and I mean really sell them in Canada—and also to find out from Canadian buyers what it is that they want so that those wants can be catered to in Britain in the production of goods for sale over here. I think also that they must realize that the United States merchandisers are very aggressive indeed. If British manufacturers are going to successfully compete against the goods we are buying from the United States at the present time, they must sell far more aggressively than they have done in the past. In short, and in conclusion, I would simply say to our friends in Great Britain that we in this country desperately want to buy far more British goods than we buy at the present time, and I earnestly urge them to do a great deal more than they are doing now to help Canadians buy British.

Mr. Herridge: The trade policy of this group, Mr. Chairman, was ably presented to the house by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. I am not going to take the time of the house to deal further with it. I do want to bring a certain matter to the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce at the request of the fruit growers in my constituency, as well as others who are interested in this question.

Last year the soft-fruit growers in the interior of British Columbia were very hard hit by a number of circumstances: the particularly large crop in the United States, the heavy crop in Canada, and then the change in the existing value of the dollar. They were able to sell only a percentage of their pack to the canners because the canners were well stocked and the demand for these products had lessened. I am speaking of canned peaches, canned apricots and soft fruits of that sort. The domestic market had already been considerably flooded by fresh soft fruit from the United States which matures somewhat earlier than ours.

This matter is one of increasing concern to the soft-fruit growers in the interior of British Columbia, to such an extent that it was the basis of a lengthy discussion at the annual convention of the British Columbia Fruit Growers Association held in January this year. I am going to read briefly two resolutions adopted by the convention and then bring this situation directly to the attention of the minister. In dealing with this question, the convention passed the following resolution:

Canned Fruit Import Controls

Whereas the orderly marketing of soft fruits is much dependent on cannery sales, and

Whereas the volume of imported canned peaches, pears and apricots in 1951 has reached four times the level of imports of these commodities for 1948, and

Whereas the volume of mixed fruit in can in 1951 has increased to 12 times the volume of 1948, and

Whereas there is no control of imports to Canada on these commodities;

Resolved that the council impress upon the proper government officials the seriousness of the tariff reductions accorded canned and processed imports in the current trade agreements, and press for every possible protection to the Canadian producer.

In addition I have received correspondence from various people. I will read briefly from one letter. I have in my hand a can of Australian peaches which are a sample of the peaches that are being sold in communities in my constituency, where the peach growers had to dump peaches last year, and where the peach growers did not receive a sufficient return on their fruit to get back the cost of production. This is what my correspondent has to say:

These peaches are processed and exported by the Shepparton Fruit Preserving Company Limited of Shepparton, Victoria, Australia. They are imported by O. B. & Company of Vancouver, B.C. They come in heavy wooden cases. A case of 24 wholesale here at $9 and retail at 45 cents per tin. They do not compare in quality with our Okanagan peaches, being small and hard.

At Christmas time Australian Christmas cakes were also being sold throughout British Columbia that could just as well have been baked here.

If it were canned orange juice, oranges, or any of the many things that Australia produces that we do not, things that we need and can use and not interfere with our own home production, I think it would be a good move. But canned peaches and fruit cakes and such do not fall in this category.

Trusting you will bring this matter before the house and to the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

I do not know what the department can do in this connection. I am sure there are many products that we could import from Australia that do not compete with production in the district where the peaches are grown.

There is another aspect of this question, and that is that we are distinctly under the impression that these peaches are not nearly as high in quality as the peaches canned in British Columbia. They are canned under lower standards than ours and when I am finished speaking I shall send this tin over to the minister so that his officials can open it and compare the quality of the contents with the British Columbia canned fruit. The question of quality has also been given consideration by the British Columbia Fruit Growers Association. The convention passed another resolution which reads as follows:

Peaches—Minimum Size

Resolved that this council recommend that the minimum size which peaches may be packed in Canada shall be two inches.

Marketing Survey

Whereas the distribution of fruits and vegetables is anything but satisfactory;

Resolved that this council request the division of economics, dominion Department of Agriculture, to make a survey of the entire marketing situation covering fruits and vegetables.

I bring this matter to the attention of the minister, because I am quite sure his officials are interested in the growers problems. I should like them to consider the survey by the economics division of the Department of Agriculture, which has been suggested by the British Columbia Fruit Growers Association, and do all they can to see that we only get the things from Australia which we require and do not produce. It seems an absurdity—there are many absurdities under capitalism —for peaches to come all the way from Australia and be sold in communities where the growers of peaches did not receive the cost of production last year. With those few words, I send the tin to the minister, for his inspection.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I rise primarily for the purpose of bringing to the attention of the members of the committee some words I wish to quote from the last issue of the London Economist commenting on Mr. Butler's budget of last week. The words I think are interesting, and if the minister has not seen them I think he will be interested in them.

Sometimes the minister worries us a little by seeming almost too happy with the situation as it stands. Of course, after the moving tribute we have just heard from the member for Fort William, it is not perhaps surprising, but the rest of us will perhaps have to try and look at things in a somewhat more realistic fashion. We sometimes get worried because the minister so often is content, as he said the other day, to describe the present economic situation in Canada by saying that at no time in the past have Canadians been more prosperous. I am not going to dwell on that except to reiterate what the member for Eglinton said, that if you tell that to the farmers who have lost their traditional markets in Britain for many of their products, they will not be very happy about it.

It is for that reason I want to say a word about the British market. I was troubled by what my colleague the member for Broadview said this afternoon, although I do realize that those difficulties exist and that the British, perhaps in times past, have been wanting in progressiveness. I am hoping, partly because of what I find in these pages of the Economist, that they may be pulling up their socks in that as in other ways. This year, of course, so far as trade is concerned, is a crucial year because of the fact that GATT is to be renewed—at least, we hope it is to be renewed, and the importance of our trade with Britain is of course accentuated greatly. The people in British Columbia can tell us a great deal about that.

That leads me to the point I wish to make. There has been a disposition over the decades, I suppose you might say over the generations, to write the old country off. I remember in the early years of this century we were told that she was decadent economically, and the Germans were going to sweep everything before them; she really was a washout. Then, of course, we came to the first war when many people were ready to write her off. The same thing occurred in the second war, and perhaps most of all in the years since this last war, when we have been greatly troubled by the situation. It seemed perhaps that the traditional virtues of energy and initiative were being swallowed up or perhaps I should say tied down by the mass of red tape and restrictions of all kinds. It is heartening to find that, as judged by the latest budget, they are emerging from that situation and that they are stepping out and are ready to take chances in the hope of returning to a world in which there will be freer and more profitable trade. With that comment, I wish to read a couple of extracts from the Economist of April 18, 1953—the one of a week ago—as follows, and I may say that this is to be found at page 130. Speaking of the budget it says—and these are Mr. Butler's words:

—"the reliefs which I shall propose are designed to improve our competitive efficiency, to provide incentives for greater effort, and to encourage private saving" or again "all reliefs are carefully designed for the prime purpose of giving the incentive for greater production."

Commenting on that the Economist says:

For the budget's greatest merit is one that cannot be put into figures. It marks a change of direction, a turning of the fiscal tide.

And again it says:

Whatever criticisms may be made of their details, they have the great recommendation that they mark a determination to "step out from the confines of restriction to the almost forgotten but beckoning prospects of freer endeavour and greater reward for effort."

I think that will warm the hearts of many of us and that we will wish them well in their effort which means so much to us as well as to them. I hope it will also stimulate us to make sure that we on this side of the water are doing every mortal thing we can. That leads me to mention one thing that has been mentioned before by others—and only yesterday by the hon. member for Eglinton—and that is whether in fact we are trying in every possible way to make as many of our defence expenditures as possible across the water. The difficulties are great and the minister will no doubt do justice to that aspect of the matter. But on the other hand, as the old music hall catch said—and I have quoted it perhaps too often in this chamber before—where there is a will, there are three ways. I hope that much more can be done than has been done up to the present.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, as others have emphasized in this debate, I too want to say that the direction of our trade policies at the present time is such as to provide a real danger, particularly to the agricultural industry of this country. I believe that the United States market for agricultural products is in the main not a complementary one but a competitive one. The United States market is no doubt the best market for Canadian pulp and minerals, but I believe that the loss we have sustained in the British market for many farm products has dealt and is dealing agriculture a serious blow. Unless steps are taken to recover the British market for many of these products, our agricultural industry is going to suffer. I say the United States market is not a reliable one for farm products. I think the Americans themselves have demonstrated that fact to us clearly in the restrictions they have placed on the importation of Canadian cheese, on Canadian dairy products and the suggested ban that might be placed on the importation of Canadian oats and feeds. Even as a market for Canadian cattle—and I see no alternative to that market—we can see the effects of competition from United States-produced cattle on the price of cattle in our own country.

Farmers were told last year by the Minister of Agriculture: "Keep your cattle home on the farm; you have nothing to worry about. Add another 300 or 400 pounds of weight to each head you have, and as soon as the United States embargo comes off you can ship your cattle into the United States and take advantage of the higher price." The minister had a floor price on cattle of $25 a hundredweight last year, and some of us thought that price was scarcely adequate. But when the floor went off and we were to get back into the United States market at the higher price, as the Minister of Agriculture had said, we find instead that cattle are selling much below the floor price that prevailed last fall. The United States cattle population is high and the Canadian cattle population is high. Economists tell us that for the next three or four years cattle producers can expect a further drop in the prices of cattle.

I think the British market is the only market in the world that can provide any hope for agricultural producers. Ever since I became a member of this house I have pointed out to the government the danger of losing the British market for Canadian products. Time and time again we in the C.C.F. have made the statement that we were losing the British market; and every time we said that, the government pooh-poohed the statement and said there was no foundation for it.

Mr. Howe: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Argue: Certainly.

Mr. Howe: Is he aware of the fact that last year we shipped more food products, both in volume and in value, than ever before in the peacetime history of this country?

Mr. Argue: As far as value goes, yes; but as far as volume goes, no. If I understand the way you arrive at your volume, you add it all up in pounds, in hundredweight; and of course the quantity of wheat adds up to a tremendous volume. But when compared to such products as cheese and bacon, the figure is of course not comparable at all.

Mr. Howe: Does the dollar value not matter?

Mr. Argue: I said as to dollars, yes, but as to volume, no; because I do not think you can compare 1,000 pounds of wheat to 1,000 pounds of cheese when you are adding up the quantities that we have shipped.

Mr. Howe: Why ship so much?

Mr. Charlton: Why not let the hon. member make his speech?

Mr. Argue: The minister can make that point, but I say that the British balance of payments with Canada now is bad and the British are not likely to continue to buy that same high value of Canadian products.

Mr. Howe: Oh, well—

Mr. Argue: I think that is the very reason Britain has not entered the international wheat agreement. I do not think it is a matter of another five cents a bushel one way or the other. Britain knows that her balance of payments position with Canada and with the United States is extremely adverse. I think that Britain is preparing to take drastic measures and that she has in mind a great deal more than just a nickel on a bushel of wheat. Let me tell the Minister of Trade and Commerce what his colleague the Minister of Agriculture has said in the past about Canada's trade position and the British market for agricultural products. The Minister of Agriculture is reported in the Regina Leader-Post to have said this at Qu'Appelle during the last general election. I quote from that article:

> There is no evidence to support the contention of M. J. Coldwell, C.C.F. leader, that Canada is losing the British market for food—

Mr. Howe: Hear, hear.

Mr. Argue: It is true that the C.C.F. contended that Canada was losing the British market for food. I repeat that statement and I shall be able to prove it. Let us look at Canada's bacon shipments to Great Britain in 1946, after the war. They were 272·9 million pounds, valued at $61,400,000. Last year, shipments of Canadian bacon to Britain were zero. So there is no argument about whether the British market for Canadian bacon is going down or whether we are losing it. We have lost it; it is gone. Farmers of Canada believe that the British market for bacon we have had in the past was an important market.

Mr. Howe: Why do they not sell it at the British price, then?

Mr. Argue: And the government should take every possible step to see that that British market is opened.

Mr. Howe: It is wide open in price.

Mr. Argue: The Minister of Trade and Commerce interrupts by asking what about price. Of course all that a government of the political complexion of the government in which the minister serves can think about is the matter of price. We in this group believe that if Canada can produce, and if our farmers do produce bacon that the people in Great Britain need, those people should have that bacon, and we should adopt whatever financial and trade measures are necessary to see that that bacon is moved to Great Britain, and to other European countries.

That is the trouble with the trade policy of this government: it is all price. And so by sending into the United States market our pulp and mineral products, Canada is prosperous. But when the government is going to supply any agricultural products to Great Britain it raises the old bogey of price.

Great Britain is short of Canadian dollars. We have lost the British market for farm products and agriculture does not face a recession—agriculture is in a recession right now, in commodities other than grain.

We have not done so well in the British market with our cheese. In 1946—and the figure I shall give is much less than the amount we shipped during the war—Canada shipped to Great Britain 92 million pounds of cheese valued at $18,420,000. Last year we shipped just 150,000 pounds of cheese valued at not eighteen and a half millions of dollars, not even one million dollars, but of a value of only $47,641. No wonder the cheese producers are not happy when their British market for cheese has now disappeared.

In 1946 we shipped 68 million dozen eggs to Great Britain valued at $25,500,000. Last year we shipped 2,374 pounds of dried eggs. Were they valued at $25,500,000?—not quite. Were they valued at $1 million?—not quite. They were valued at $2,700. And so, the British market for eggs is not being lost; it has disappeared.

We in the C.C.F. contend that unless Canada, in co-operation with other nations of the world, can reorganize international trade, in order to maintain and to increase our markets in Great Britain for agricultural products, then the agricultural producers in this country face dire days ahead. This government has no vision when it comes to new and daring international trade policies. A few years ago the food and agriculture organization made great plans for an international commodity clearing house, a method by which countries producing exportable surpluses might get those surpluses to the nations in need of them. Under the plan the wealthier nations of the world would make financial arrangements to supply necessary currency to the commodity clearing house, and the countries that were to import agricultural products would obtain the currency from that organization in order to buy agricultural products throughout the world.

Well, our Minister of Agriculture went to that conference. He was against it. He was against the international commodity clearing house.

Mr. Gardiner: I never was against it.

Mr. Argue: Oh, yes, you were. The minister said, "We do not see any surplus of food in Canada. Even if there was, we feel we can deal with this through national policy." Well, we have had the minister and his national policy for some years, and we have seen the prices of agricultural commodities, one after another, go down, down, down.

Mr. Gardiner: Get my speech and read it.

Mr. Argue: The people of Great Britain, the people of Europe, the people of Asia—all those people need our food; and we have so much food in Canada that prices to agricultural producers are falling.

Mr. Gardiner: What I said in Rome was exactly the opposite of what you are saying.

Mr. Argue: Probably it is exactly the opposite, but—

Mr. Gardiner: Better read it.

Mr. Argue: —the Minister of Agriculture has always got an answer. And he always has an answer because every speech he makes is different from every other speech he has made; and he makes sure that he makes speeches on both sides of the question. Then if you try to nail him down he will say, "Look at the speech I made the month before"—or the month later, as the case may be.

Well, just a few days before the election in 1949 he said, "This C.C.F. contention that we are losing the British market for Canadian food is all wrong." I ask him today—

Mr. Gardiner: I did not say that, either.

Mr. Argue: —where is the British market for bacon? Where is the British market for cheese? Where is the British market for eggs?

Well, the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Trade and Commerce have a right to their own opinions. If they do not think that market is important, all right. But the agricultural producers and those who represent the people engaged in agriculture know that the British market is important to the welfare of the Canadian economy and of Canadian agriculture.

The government says: "Well, it is a matter of price." Oh, certainly, it is always a matter of price—always a matter of dollars, with this government. The Minister of Agriculture, as I said, makes speeches of all kinds; and there was a famous quotation in a speech he made in the house not many weeks ago, when he was telling us about the big barns in Alberta.

Mr. Gardiner: I will make another next week.

Mr. Argue: Very likely, and you had better change that one, too. He told us about the big barns in Alberta and the big houses the farmers had out there. He said he talked to farmers who had told him that they had built those barns and houses on 5-cent pork. Well, there is about as much sense in that statement as in many other statements the Minister of Agriculture has made.

Mr. Gardiner: Ask your friends in the front seats about what they built those barns on.

Mr. Argue: Well, they did not build them on 5-cent pork.

Mr. Gardiner: They built them on less than that.

Mr. Argue: No; they were probably attempting to pay off the mortgage with 5-cent pork, and never managed to do it. But they certainly never built barns on 5-cent pork.

The British balance of payments position with Canada, in my opinion, is cause for concern. I do not say that Canada alone can deal with this problem; it is one that has to be dealt with by both Canada and Great Britain, and is something that requires a good deal of thought by international organizations such as the food and agriculture organization.

The government says it is a matter of price in everything—a matter of price in everything but defence; and then it is a matter of what the government says Canada needs. In connection with our desire for markets for agricultural products, I say the thinking of the government should be based upon our needs and world needs and not on price alone. And if the government brought that kind of thinking to bear on this problem we, as a nation, would be spending more than one dollar on economic and technical assistance for every hundred dollars we now spend on armaments. I can think of nothing that would help Canada more or help the world more than for us to spend $200 or $300 million to help move our surplus of food to those people in the world who need it. If we did that, I think we would get a greater return for the money we spend by way of obtaining peace, than we shall get for the $2 billion we are now spending on national defence.

In 1950 Great Britain purchased from Canada $68 million more than we purchased from her; in 1951 Great Britain purchased $214 million more from us than we purchased from her; in 1952 Great Britain purchased from Canada $386 million more than we purchased from her. I think it is that $386 million adverse position in Britain's balance of payments with Canada that is now determining British policy toward buying our wheat.

Some steps have to be taken by Canada and some steps have to be taken by Great Britain to see that this large gap is narrowed. I hope that we will not leave it only to Great Britain, because if we do she will cut her purchases of wheat. She will do so until her payments position is balanced. I am fearful that she will be able to do so only by a further curtailment of purchases of Canadian commodities, particularly agricultural products, including wheat.

I have advocated the commodity clearing house which was proposed by the food and agriculture organization. I have pressed the need of moving our food to those countries of the world where people are hungry. I think the measures I have suggested and those suggested by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) are sound, and that the government should follow our suggestions. In the meantime we are losing the British market. Instead of running the risk of further restrictions in British purchases of agricultural commodities and a further loss of that market, this government should adopt the policies I have suggested in order to regain the essential British market.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Mr. Chairman, I shall take but little time to say the few things I want to say in connection with the discussion that has gone on today and previously. I have listened to members of the opposition since last November complaining of the fact that we are doing such an enormous business with the United States of America. Why any sane-thinking person would criticize this government for seeking all the markets that are possible in the United States I fail to understand.

An hon. Member: Whoever did that?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Some hon. member says, "Whoever did that?" I have heard this remark made around this house one hundred times in this year: You should not put all your eggs in one basket.

Mr. Hees: Indicate the "some hon. member" who said that.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): It was only five minutes ago that the hon. member sat down. He was suggesting more trade within NATO countries. Would he suggest free trade within NATO nations?

Mr. Hees: I am suggesting that we increase our trade with NATO nations.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Answer my question. If the hon. member is going to make a speech, let him sit down. I asked a question.

Mr. Hees: You asked me a question. I said we should increase our trade with all NATO nations.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): The hon. member has not answered my question and I will ask him again: Do you support free trade within NATO nations?

Mr. Hees: I did not say that I supported free trade; I support increased trade.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): The last time I spoke on this subject I suggested that there should be free trade within the NATO nations. If hon. members are honest and sincere in their desire to help the NATO nations they would be willing to adopt my suggestion and do away with tariff walls. I have never heard anyone in this group to my left suggest free trade among NATO nations.

Mr. Graydon: Have you heard the cabinet suggest it?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I certainly have. If you will follow the procedure adopted by the Minister of Trade and Commerce during the four years since the last election you will find that he has used every method to try to bring about more liberal, and freer, trade with all countries.

Mr. Hees: Is this government a free trade government?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Absolutely.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hees: Is it? Is it?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I tell you what I base that on.

[Mr. Stuart (Charlotte).]

Mr. Hees: Let us hear the Minister of Trade and Commerce say that.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I would like to ask the hon. member if he is prepared to go half-way in meeting any country. You cannot give it all away. I have just listened to the hon. member for Assiniboia talking about the markets that we have lost in Great Britain for Canadian products. Would the hon. member be willing to accept the prices that are being offered today by the British for the very things he mentioned? Is he prepared to accept those prices?

Mr. Argue: No.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): That brings us back to the same old story. Only a month ago they were saying that taxation in this country was too high, that it was unbearable, but yet they are prepared to subsidize the producers of this country so that they may sell something that others do not want to buy. If that makes sense, I must be going the other way.

Mr. Hees: I think you are.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): At least the hon. member knows where I stand; when I get up and speak on trade I mean what I say. Some of those I have listened to, I am sure in my opinion, do not mean just exactly what they say. I believe that everything we can sell in the United States today should be sold there.

Mr. Fleming: On a point of order, no hon. member of the house should be allowed to say that another member did not mean what he said.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I said that that was my opinion.

Mr. Hees: You cannot express your opinion that way.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Charlotte did not identify any hon. member. He said that he did not think some hon. members meant exactly what they said. I do not think he meant the hon. member for Eglinton.

Mr. Fleming: On a point of order, I am sure that he did not mean me, because I have not been participating in this debate. The statement was directed at hon. members of this house and it was not a proper statement, being in breach of the rules of the house.

The Chairman: If the hon. member will look at citation 299 of Beauchesne's second edition he will see that it is not in order for an hon. member to say of another that he does not say what he means or does not mean what he says, but if the hon. member says that he does not think some hon. members say what they mean or mean what they say, that is a general statement without reference to anyone in particular.

I would like to remind hon. members, who perhaps on this occasion are particularly ticklish about expressions used by the hon. member for Charlotte, that I have heard expressions used which were much more offensive than this one and no one stood up and said that they should be withdrawn. I think the hon. member should be given some latitude and it should not be insisted that certain words be withdrawn on one occasion when on another occasion words which were perhaps much more offensive were not asked to be withdrawn. I do not think it is imperative that I ask the hon. member to withdraw the expression he has used as it was not made in reference to any hon. member in particular. At page 99 of Beauchesne's second edition we find this, for instance:

That a member has taken a course unworthy of a minister.

And other expressions like that. I have heard such expressions in this house, and not very long ago either. Yesterday it was said that hon. members were taking directions from the minister the minute he stood up as to how they were to vote. Perhaps that was in contradiction of the ruling that was given not long ago having to do with accusing hon. members of not being independent. I think we ought to be reasonable about these expressions. The hon. member will remember that one time an hon. member asked that the word "irresponsible" be withdrawn. The hon. member himself claimed that the Speaker should not go that far, that after all some of these expressions had to be used sometimes. Let us not exaggerate.

Mr. Graydon: I guess you had better be careful.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I will be careful. As I have said, there has been a great deal said here about our trading eggs, as you might call them, being all in one basket. There is another thing that makes me wonder in connection with that statement and that is whether it is better to sell to that market for cash or to give our commodities to somebody else. We all know that the British are keen traders. I admire them for that, but I believe that the prices they are quoting today would not be of a great deal of interest to the farmers of Canada. Surely it would not be right and proper to subsidize food and sell it in Britain when it can be sold for cash at a better price somewhere else. I do not believe that the people of Canada can be convinced that that is the right procedure to follow.

My friends to the left who seem to be disturbed can all remember that a few years ago the leader of their party was going to blast his way into the markets of the world. I watched that situation pretty carefully because at that time I found it pretty difficult to make a living myself. Many who sit here today may have found conditions during that particular period such that they could make a living without too much effort, but I worked longer hours than I ever worked before, harder than I ever worked before and made less than I have ever made in my lifetime.

An hon. Member: See what a man it made of you, though.

Mr. Hees: So did everybody else.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I could not see that the explosives that had been suggested to get into these markets had been very helpful.

Mr. Hees: Everybody else in the world was doing the same thing.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): No, they were not.

Mr. Hees: Sure they were.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I can tell the hon. member that I have heard members of his group stand up and speak in glowing terms about the great R. B. Bennett regime. They certainly do not remember what I remember.

Mr. Hees: You are talking about the great world-wide depression.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I remember it well. I remember conditions during the particular period when, as I have mentioned, they were going to blast their way into the markets of the world.

Mr. Martin: They blasted themselves out of office.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I heard the hon. member for Queens, Prince Edward Island, say some time afterwards that all the trade that was carried between Prince Edward Island and the mainland at that time could have been carried in a canoe. I agree with him there.

Mr. Charlton: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Yes.

Mr. Charlton: If the hon. member will refer to page 3566 of Hansard of April 7 he will see how much more was shipped to Great Britain from 1930 to 1935 under the Conservative government than was shipped between 1936 and 1939.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I am glad the hon. member has brought up that question because if those goods were shipped over there they must have all come from Ontario. None of them came from the maritimes. I lived down there and there was no great amount of goods going to Britain at that time. Therefore the central provinces must have taken full advantage of that.

Mr. Hees: We are talking about Canada. Get a broad view.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I suggest to the hon. member who interfered a few minutes ago that if he wants to take a broad view then we shall throw this thing wide open.

Mr. Howe: He was talking about shipping percentages.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I will tell you exactly why they are not doing it. There are people here on my left who could never accomplish it themselves, but they expect people from this country to go over to Britain and say: This is it, take it, no questions asked and no contradictions. That is what these people to my left are doing in the house. I do not believe they are sincere, but that is the kind of unreasonable statement they make with respect to trade. I believe the minister who conducts the affairs of this department has done everything that is humanly possible. We all realize the value of the British markets to this country. There is not a member in the house who does not realize that, but if we can sell to a market for cash then I do not want to see our products given away, and I do not believe the people of Canada want us to do that. I do not believe the people of Canada want us to subsidize if we can sell for cash. Am I right? You can go on and on saying that it should be done and that we should be helping these people. There are different plans today under which we are contributing enormous sums of money to countries which are not as well off as we are. There is the Colombo plan and there are other plans under which we are helping these countries. I support them in every way, but there is a limit to how much we can give away. I am one who believes that as long as a cash market can be found we should not give away for nothing what has been produced by the sweat and toil of the people of Canada.

Mr. Hees: Who suggested giving it away?

An hon. Member: The socialists.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): The hon. member for Assiniboia who just spoke said that it should be done regardless of price. He said that he knew the Minister of Agriculture would ask whether he wanted to sell at the prices Britain was quoting, and he said that did not make a bit of difference. He said that price was no object, that it was just a matter of getting rid of it.

I believe that the way the trade of this country has been carried on since the war is a credit to the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the officials of his department. I believe they are doing a swell job. I believe they are doing everything that it is humanly possible to do, and I do not believe that they have any right to tell Britain or any other country what it should do. I for one do not want to see that procedure followed. I believe that the British are in a position to run and control their own affairs in the way they want to deal with them.

I remember being over there in 1948 and being disturbed and worried because I found that Russian salmon was coming into Britain. There was not a single pound or dollar involved in the deal. The salmon was being bartered for tinplate. At that particular time we had plenty of salmon on the Pacific coast which could have been bartered for tinplate without any trouble at all, but Britain decided that it would take an inferior grade of salmon from Russia in exchange for tinplate in preference to the salmon in the warehouses in British Columbia. I do not say this in a critical sense, but may I add that during the war I could not buy a pound of salmon in this country. It was all given to Britain. I am not criticizing that because they needed it and I am glad they got it. We gave them all the salmon that we could produce, but when it came to paying for some on the line they bartered tinplate for Russian salmon of an inferior grade. I have one more word to say with respect to the criticism about trade with the United States.

An hon. Member: Tell us about cigarettes.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I can tell you about cigarettes. We have a Minister of Finance who has been responsible this year for a reduction in the price of cigarettes to the extent of about six cents which I think was helpful to those who smoke cigarettes. But there is one thing that means a lot to the maritime provinces so far as the United States market is concerned. I refer to our pulp and paper business. Some people may say that there is nowhere else for them to get what they require, but let me suggest that if the United States market for pulp and paper was taken away from this country there would be a lot of unemployment in our pulp mills, logging camps and woodworking camps.

These markets mean so much to the maritime provinces and to every other province in the country that I cannot understand why anyone would suggest or think that we should not take advantage of every market that we can get in the United States. It is our natural market.

Mr. Hees: Nobody is suggesting that we do not take advantage of every market in the United States.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): If you are not, then a lot of idle talk has taken place here.

Mr. Hees: By whom?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): A lot of idle talk has taken place since last November.

Mr. Hees: Quote names.

Mr. Pouliot: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): What you are saying now is as idle as anything can be.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Pouliot: I rise on a point of order. I am addressing the Chair on a point of order. I have been trying to listen to the hon. member for Charlotte and have not had the opportunity to do so because of the heckling coming from the opposition. If the Conservative member for Broadview continues to heckle Liberal members like that he may expect the same thing in return when he speaks. It will be the golden rule. I have never seen anything like that. The hon. member who has the floor has been very patient, and I wonder that no member has risen before to protest against the continuous heckling of the hon. member for Broadview.

Mr. Hees: On a question of privilege, I get heckled just as much as the hon. member for Charlotte.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Did I heckle you?

Mr. Hees: I should like the hon. member to tell me where in my speech I intimated in any way that we should cut down trade with the United States. My remarks were quite to the contrary. I have suggested that we should do everything possible to increase our trade with the United States and all other countries.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I am pleased that I got up to make these few remarks because now there have been so many differences of opinion and contradictions that I will have to read Hansard to find out just where the hon. member stands. Before I resume my seat I want to emphasize the fact that I believe every effort has been made to increase trade with all countries. I believe that the trade mission from which the Minister of Trade and Commerce returned only a few weeks ago—

An hon. Member: Liberal policy.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Yes, I believe it was Liberal policy—was one of the greatest ideas ever developed in any mind. I think the results which we may expect from that mission will be very helpful to the producers of this country. I want to support the action the minister has taken in every way in gaining every bit of the United States market that he can get. The more we trade with the United States the better I like it. I for one would like to say that we should trade for cash rather than trade for credit or give our produce away. The maritime provinces have depended on that market since 1867 and I do not want anything done to disturb it in any way. I would like to see it increased.

I know the people whom I represent do not want to produce unless there is a market for their produce and, in addition, they do not want the people of this country to subsidize produce or give it away to someone else. Let us take advantage of the markets open to us, and at the same time endeavour to increase markets in every other part of the world. To be sure, with these eggs that are all in one basket, let us protect the markets that we have. Let us not take chances on losing them, because when the time comes again to use a little dynamite or some other explosive to get them back we might meet the same result that we met between 1930 and 1935.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Chairman, I would like to take two or three minutes of the time of the house on a matter which affects so many counties of western and southwestern Ontario; I refer to the growing of tobacco. Heretofore when I have spoken on tobacco in the house it was with the idea of having the duty or excise tax on cigarettes reduced in order to encourage increased production of tobacco, for the stabilization of the tobacco market generally, and to decrease smuggling. The hon. member who has just taken his seat in his speech a moment ago referred to the Minister of Finance as having only recently reduced the price of cigarettes by some 7 or 8 cents. That statement is probably as accurate as what he said about this government being a free trade government.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): On a point of privilege, Mr. Chairman, what I said was that the Minister of Finance had been responsible for a reduction of 6 or 7 cents—a 5-cent reduction of his own and 2 cents which the manufacturers gave as a consequence of the minister's reduction. I did not say that he reduced them 7 per cent. Read Hansard tomorrow.

Mr. Murphy: I do not have to read it; I have ears and I listen. The member said just now that the minister was responsible for a decrease of 7 or 8 cents and that the minister's reduction was some 5 cents a package, but that was not the reduction at all. I wish he would look up the records and make himself a little more aware of the facts before he makes statements in the house which are wrong.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Murphy: The same thing goes with respect to the tariffs applied by this government on goods leaving or entering the country.

For some fifty odd years we have been developing an industry in southwestern Ontario which has meant a great deal to our economy, although it has had its setbacks because of high taxes and high duties placed on certain of its products. It has been my privilege since I came to the house to advocate a different argument to that which I make today, because on previous occasions I suggested that the government consider reduction of the excise taxes and duties on cigarettes in order to encourage and support the industry. I think I can say without fear of contradiction that I have never heard any Liberal member representing a riding that grows tobacco advocate in this house a reduction of duties or excise taxes on any tobacco product.

Mr. Anderson: I rise on a point of privilege, Mr. Chairman. As I understood the hon. member he said that he had never heard a member on this side of the house rise in his place to protest against excise taxes on cigarettes. If he will refer to Hansard he may see what other Liberal members and I had to say last year; and credit for the decreases in excise taxes on tobacco is due as much or more to the Liberal party than to any other party in this house.

Mr. Murphy: Well, Mr. Chairman, I must apologize to the hon. member if I am wrong, and I accept his statement because I cannot do otherwise and be fair to him. However, I wish to remind him that since 1945, when I came into the house, it has been a lonesome road over here in the matter of endeavouring to impress upon the government that it was its duty or responsibility to reduce the excise taxes and duties on tobacco products. If there was one lone voice from the government benches it was very faint. In all probability that voice was simply asking for a reduction in the taxes which have been put on by this government since it came into power. Never in the history of the country have taxes on tobacco products been as high as they have been under the Liberal government, and let there be no mistake about that.

[Mr. Murphy.]

My purpose in rising now is to express the hope that this industry can be encouraged. I think, with the number of trade commissioners we have in various leading trading nations in the world today, an opportunity is now presented to those representatives in those countries to develop markets for our various products, and I refer particularly to our tobacco. I am very happy to tell this house that we take second place to no one in the world in the types of tobacco we produce. In western Ontario and in the regions which go still farther north we grow the flue tobacco which goes into cigarettes. I am very glad to say that in that part of Ontario we also grow what is known as dark tobacco and burley tobacco. In the province of Quebec they continue to extend the growing of tobacco that is used in the fillers and the binders when making cigars.

I think the house will agree with me that the reduction of the duties on cigarettes is going to give an impetus to the tobacco industry generally. That will apply not only to growers but to manufacturers and, I hope, to wholesalers and retailers. I think the acreage which can be used for growing these different types of tobacco can be greatly increased, but what concerns most of the tobacco growers in Canada today is the price which they get for their product and the markets which they have.

Markets seem to be none too certain in any given year. Owing to exchange difficulties we find that our market for tobacco in Britain has been seriously curtailed, and in all probability that will reflect itself in the price which growers will receive for their product.

I mention this, Mr. Chairman, because the other day one of the members of my party was kind enough to draw to my attention an article in the publication Foreign Trade, dated April 18. On page 191 there is a reference to Portugal's imports of tobacco leaf for 1952 in the amount of $3,816,000, as compared with a slightly smaller amount for 1951. I think we are all seriously concerned with promoting the sales of the various commodities which we in this country can produce in abundance. What interested me, Mr. Chairman, was the fact that Portugal's imports came from the United States, Greece and the Portuguese overseas possessions. According to this report the United States shipped about three-quarters of the amount imported by Portugal.

I mention these tobacco imports because we in this country can produce very much the same type of tobacco that the United States produces. There is only one type of tobacco that the United States produces which we do not produce, and that is what is called a tobacco binder. We do not grow that in this country. When it comes to cigarette or pipe tobacco we do not take second place to the United States as far as quality is concerned. I am very happy to be able to say that to the hon. members of this house. I hope that the minister and his officials will take cognizance of this situation and will endeavour, through the trade commissioners in these very important trading nations, to see that some effort is made to market quantities of our Canadian-grown tobacco. I do know there are certain countries which require different types of tobacco, but I feel satisfied that in this country we can grow tobacco that can be imported and used by all these trading nations for either cigarette or pipe tobacco.

I noticed with a good deal of pleasure, and I am sure this applies to other members of the house, a statement recently made by the minister in which he said that the number of countries in which trade commissioners were located had increased over a year ago. He stated that the younger people on the staff are being encouraged to take training to become more proficient for that purpose. I hope these trade commissioners will endeavour to get a toehold, so to speak, in these various countries. Even small exports would be appreciated, because I know if they do import some of our good tobacco it will mean increased sales as the years go by. Such sales would help to stabilize the market for the grower, because there would be so many more outlets for what he is able to produce.

The other important matter with which I shall deal very briefly is the sugar situation as we find it today in Canada. I have dealt with this subject at some length on two occasions, and upon the minister's return from South America he gave a review of what had taken place during his visit to Cuba. I appreciate that. Just recently an agreement has been reached between the processors in western Ontario and the sugar beet growers. The price no doubt will be determined to a great extent by the price of raw sugar which is, of course, set in New York, that being the world price. I believe the minister indicated that the representatives of the refining industry would go to Cuba and report to him on their return. Through a question placed on the order paper I have asked if any such report was made, and have been advised that a verbal report was expected within a short time. Thus far no report has been given to the house. In view of the fact that this situation is so critical, and the fact that so many people in western Ontario—in fact all the growers in Canada—are dependent upon this price, I think we are entitled to some statement from the minister as to what the prospects are for the marketing of sugar beets this year.

Have steps been taken to curb the importation of Cuban sugar into Canada? When the minister spoke in the house after his trip he said there would be no refined sugar coming into the three western provinces or into the sugar beet area of western Ontario. I am not going to repeat what I have said before, nor do I apologize to anybody for what I did say. I was speaking on behalf of the sugar beet growers of this country, who today face peril and calamity with respect to the marketing of their products. There has been no assurance given by the minister or by anybody on behalf of the government as to what the prospects are for these growers. I am going to be brief in my remarks. I think people are entitled to a statement, because I am quite sure a report has been made to the department by these refinery representatives who were asked to go to Cuba.

If this were a matter involving only a few dollars it would not be so important. It is, however, a matter involving millions of dollars and thousands and thousands of growers. As I said before, if we crucify one segment of our primary producers today and another segment tomorrow, we will not have any left and we shall be dependent upon foreign sources for those requirements. I am going to say, too, that the minister was speaking in a little town in Perth county not long ago. I am sure he was aware that refined sugar had been coming into Canada, and certainly it was coming directly from Cuba. It was easy enough to find out how it was coming here. It was being shipped through New York in bond direct from Cuba.

In his speech in Mitchell—I have here only a monitored statement from CKNX, Wingham—the minister is reported as having said:

> The sugar institute undertook to see that the members of the institute would not ship here, and so far as I can find out they have been successful so far.

This speech was made on March 29 of this year. I want to say to this house not a pound of sugar is shipped out of Cuba except under a certificate issued by the sugar institute. No independent processor can ship one pound of sugar out of Cuba without getting such a certificate. The co-operation we are getting from Cuba seems to me to be very doubtful, from the attitude I have seen expressed in the Cuban press as well as from the statement made by the minister upon his return from South America.

The people of Cuba are going to ship refined sugar into this country until this country takes the necessary steps to stop it. Thus far they have not taken those steps, that I can see. At the time the minister spoke in the town of Mitchell he was asked by the largest sugar beet grower in Canada, a young man by the name of Wilfred Brockman, who was very much interested in what the minister had to say, on this question —I am quoting now from a newspaper report, and it reads as follows:

> Mr. Brockman asked him if he was aware that at least 25 carloads of Cuban refined sugar had entered this area since he had made his statement in the house that no more Cuban refined sugar would enter beet-growing areas. Mr. Howe replied that he had said there would be no "direct" shipments and that these carloads had not come directly.
> Mr. Brockman asked Mr. Howe: "Then the statement you made in the house was of no value; it was only a shield?" Mr. Howe said: "That's right".

Mr. Howe: Mr. Chairman, that is a complete misquotation of what happened. My hon. friend was not there. It is hearsay. If he continues to stooge for Mr. McGregor, he might at least be decent about it.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. The minister cannot get to his feet and make an assertion like that, namely that any hon. member is acting as a stooge for somebody else; and I would ask him to withdraw that assertion at once.

The Deputy Chairman: I think possibly the word "stooge" is unparliamentary.

Mr. Howe: I withdraw it, Mr. Chairman, and I will say "emissary".

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, that word is just as objectionable. The minister has no right to come in here and charge that another hon. member is speaking for somebody else and is not giving his own honest opinion. I ask you, Mr. Chairman, to instruct the minister to withdraw this other statement.

The Deputy Chairman: As I said when I rose before, I do not consider the word "stooge" to be parliamentary, but I am afraid that I cannot agree with the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra that the word "emissary" is unparliamentary, nor do I think it implies that the hon. member for Lambton West who has the floor is not expressing his own opinion.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, the minister said in effect that the hon. member was acting as an emissary for Mr. McGregor. A charge of that kind is not right, and I am sure the minister will withdraw it. We could not carry on a debate here in an orderly manner if members could get to their feet and charge that other members are acting here as emissaries or agents for someone outside of the House of Commons.

Mr. Howe: I do not think the hon. member for Lambton West would question it. He made a personally conducted tour of the sugar beet area arranged by Mr. McGregor; he attended meetings arranged by Mr. McGregor and he spoke throughout the area. I do not think he would object to the words I use. I do not know why the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra objects if the hon. member for Lambton West does not.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Chairman, I think I can take care of myself. What I have already said indicates plainly that anything the minister said in the house, and which was repeated here, is much more important than what he had to say about my connection with the sugar beet growers' association or with anybody connected with the sugar beet industry. I want to tell the minister flatly right now in this chamber that I am no emissary of Mr. McGregor or of anybody else in the processing industry. I want him to know that I was born in the sugar beet area and that my people grow sugar beets, always have and I hope always will if they get decent legislation which will assure a market for their products. I want him to know that I have been interested in the sugar beet growers just the same as I have been interested in the tobacco growers in this country, because both those groups have surrounded me ever since I was born. I do not mind telling him that I was born on a farm, that I spent a great many years on the farm, and that I am still farming.

Mr. Charlton: That is nothing to apologize for.

Mr. Murphy: I take an interest, of course, in the sugar beet growers of this country and the tobacco growers; and for that interest I make no apology to the minister, to this government or to anybody else in Canada. I have taken that interest during the time that I have been a member of this house; and as long as I am—and I expect to be here after the next election—I shall continue to do what I have been doing in the past. I think the minister may as well know that, as far as the sugar beet growers are concerned, a statement like that which he made in Mitchell does not reflect what I would call or what they would assume to be a fair practice, when he said in the House of Commons that there would be no refined sugar from Cuba going into the sugar beet growing areas of western Ontario and the three western provinces, and then qualifies it by saying that it will not come direct from Cuba. As he said at Mitchell when he was asked:

"Then the statement you made in the house was of no value, it was only a shield?" Mr. Howe said "That's right."

For once he was honest when he said it was right that the statement he made in the house was of no value—

Mr. Howe: Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend did not hear that statement. The conversation was conducted in the corner of a church where I was assaulted by this young man. The hon. member is repeating hearsay. I tell him today that I was there and he was not. I have said he is not telling the truth about that conversation. Perhaps he will go on from there.

Mr. Murphy: Yes. It is a strange thing to me, Mr. Chairman, that until now the minister has not denied the statement.

Mr. Howe: I may say that I have had apologies about the incident from my hosts at that gathering; and I was speaking to a branch of the federation of agriculture. I should be pleased to present my hon. friend with a letter of apology from the federation.

Mr. Murphy: I have no doubt that the minister had apologies from those at the meeting, because it was a Liberal meeting. He would no doubt have apologies because he was placed in an extremely embarrassing position. It is embarrassing not only for him but for the government to have a senior member of this government get up and say that what he said in the house was only a shield; and today, because I raise the matter in the House of Commons, he says he did not say it.

Mr. Howe: What the hon. gentleman is saying is untrue. That is not a slander of him because he does not know what was said; but I know what was said. If he continues to repeat that untruth, I shall continue to set the matter right. Suppose he stops presenting slanderous hearsay in the House of Commons.

Mr. Fleming: Order.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I hope this discussion has concluded. I think the hon. member for Lambton West must accept the assurance of the minister as to what he said on any particular occasion.

Mr. Murphy: All I can say about the matter in conclusion, Mr. Chairman, is that it is an extremely strange thing that this statement was not contradicted before today.

Mr. Howe: It was not made before today.

Mr. Murphy: It was made in the press.

Mr. Howe: My hon. friend is the only person low enough to make that kind of statement, not knowing anything about it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Murphy: I am going to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce to withdraw the remark which he has just made.

Mr. Howe: I will not.

Mr. Murphy: I refer to the statement in which he said I was the only person low enough to make such a statement.

Mr. Howe: Who was the lower man?

Mr. Murphy: I am asking that that statement be withdrawn.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Howe: I will not withdraw.

The Deputy Chairman: I am sure the Minister of Trade and Commerce would not wish to offend the hon. member for Lambton West.

Mr. Howe: I would be delighted to.

The Deputy Chairman: At the same time, I am not sure that I can rule that the word "low" is unparliamentary. However, I am sure the minister would not wish to offend the hon. member. And I hope that this particular phase of the discussion has been completed. As I said, I feel that the hon. member for Lambton West must accept the assurance of the minister as to what he said outside of the house on the occasion in question.

Mr. Murphy: If the Minister of Trade and Commerce is not man enough to withdraw that remark, I can only say that we are both in the same pit.

Mr. Howe: That is a slander on me. I hope I never find myself in the same pit with my hon. friend.

Mr. Murphy: I do not know how I can present the matter more effectively than by using the minister's own words. It so happens, Mr. Chairman, that the minister—who, through not having foreseen the results of some of these trade agreements which he makes, now finds himself in a jam, and all the sugar beet growers in a jam—is greatly disturbed when he is being criticized for having a wrong policy, or for the lack of any policy. I think it is high time that this industry, which has meant so much to the economy of this country, had some clear-cut statement from the minister as to what the future has in store for it. I know there were a few people here the other day from the various provinces of Canada—Manitoba, Alberta, Quebec and Ontario, I think—representing the sugar beet growers, who had a consultation with the minister. I want him to tell the committee if any assurance was given them as to what they could expect, and if he by any chance indicated that there was some embargo on Cuban refined sugar. I was given to understand that statement was made.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Chairman, if the sugar beet growers had wanted my hon. friend's presence at that time I am sure they would have invited him. It happened to be a private conference, and I do not know that he is entitled to know what happened.

Mr. Murphy: The sugar beet growers who came down here were certainly given some information that would be of value to the sugar beet growers of this country, which the minister would have been able to give them. It may have been private so far as the minister and those representatives were concerned. But I think it is of vital public interest that matters of such concern should be made available to the public generally. Those people were after information they wanted to take back to the growers of their respective provinces. If some embargo is to be placed upon Cuban refined sugar for 30 days, then let the minister tell the house if that is so, and how it is being done. Let him also tell the house how he is going to stop the importation of refined sugar into any part of Canada, as he said when he spoke after his return from Cuba.

The sugar beet growers of these four provinces in Canada are entitled to a statement from the minister as to the government's intentions with respect to the preservation of their industry, which has meant so much to the economy of this country.

Mr. Jones: Mr. Chairman, I rise to support the remarks already made by the hon. member for Kootenay West regarding the apple and soft fruit growers of Canada, and particularly those in British Columbia. I am not going to deal with all soft fruits although I could, because I have received numerous letters setting out the personal loss and inconvenience caused these growers by lack of markets and unfair competition. I have letters showing where the finest prunes that can be grown in Canada, or anywhere else on the North American continent, were sold for as low as 9 cents a crate. I have other letters showing where half a crop had to be dumped in the ravine to get it out of the way.

However, I should like to take this opportunity to deal particularly with the plight of the peach growers. A few days ago I received a letter from a man who has been growing peaches in the Okanagan valley for the last twelve years. In 1949 he picked 40 tons of peaches from his then young and promising orchard. The severe frost of a few years ago killed a third of his trees and damaged almost all the balance of them, with the result that in 1950 he had no crop.

Incidentally those growers received compensation, but his total compensation for the loss of all those trees was only $38, to help him in replanting. This year his orchard recovered to the point where he had 20 tons of first-class peaches. The bulk were sold to the cannery. Some of them netted him $63 a ton and some $40 a ton, or an average of somewhere around $50 a ton. The choicest peaches of all were sold for an average of less than 50 cents a large crate. These were sold as fresh peaches on the domestic market.

The sad part of his story is that while the cost of production was almost $70 a ton, he sold them at an average price of $50. The growers of British Columbia I must say have not been idle in trying to remedy their marketing conditions. They have organized into one of the finest growers' organizations on the whole of the North American continent. But even so they can only see to it that they have a first-class product ready for market. The growers, naturally, look to the government for assistance in protecting the domestic market which, at the present time, could absorb all the peaches grown in Ontario and British Columbia combined, if it were not for what I consider unfair American competition, which last year amounted to approximately 12 million pounds of canned peaches alone. This dealt a severe blow to the Canadian canners, who now have a combined carryover of more than 25 million pounds of canned peaches.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me the time has arrived when the government should take an interest in this problem. They have taken some responsibility for butter, eggs, pork products and wheat. I do not think that the fruit growers are asking, nor would they accept, charity; but they are asking the government to investigate the situation in connection with the importation of soft fruits from the United States.

I realize that much could be done on a provincial level. We in British Columbia have a soft fruits and vegetables market consuming roughly $5 million worth of those commodities annually. Yet $3 million worth of the products going to that market was supplied by the importation of fruits and vegetable from the United States. As I have pointed out before, this condition is general in every province; it is not confined to British Columbia.

I notice in The Grower, a publication issued by the Ontario fruit and vegetable association, some very pertinent facts in respect of the marketing of peaches. They set out on an approximate basis the value of the total quantity of peaches sold. I shall not quote the figures, because I would not be in order if I were to do so, but I can say that the processors of peaches paid $2,125,000 in 1951 for 22,627 tons. The domestic fresh fruit market was probably greater than that. They estimate that for 1952 there would be a drop of 9,453 tons in the quantity to be processed. This was caused by the heavy carryover. On June 30, 1951, there was a carryover of 13,670,000 pounds of canned peaches. On June 30, 1952, a year later, there was a carryover of 25,355,000 pounds. Naturally this forced a reduction in the pack for 1952-53.

It is pointed out in The Grower that during 1951 Canadians imported 11,805,000 pounds of canned peaches from other countries, chiefly the United States, and exported only 57,000 pounds of our own canned product. The publication also points out the fact that from 1948 to 1951 inclusive the sale of imported fruit cocktails jumped from 2,079,971 pounds to 25,397,276 pounds. Estimating a third of the contents of fruit cocktails to consist of peaches, this would indicate another 10 million pounds of peaches imported in that form, or from 5,000 to 6,000 tons.

Without this tremendous and unbalanced importation, Canadian peach growers grew enough to supply the whole market. The Grower goes on to blame partly the antiquated processing methods used in Ontario. However, that does not apply to British Columbia, where we have a similar marketing problem. Our methods are quite up to date in our canneries.

The answer to this complaint could well be for the government to advance loans on a long-term basis at a low interest rate to cooperative processing plants, thus enabling them to bring down processing costs by the use of more modern machinery. I presume that price is a major factor in the sale of canned peaches. Through modern methods of production, methods which we should have with government help, the United States has been able to quote prices that have captured the Canadian market to the extent of 12,000,000 pounds after paying heavy transport costs and a duty of approximately $50 per ton on peaches. I hate to use the term "dumping", but I feel we have a serious situation there which to my mind amounts to dumping, and that is why I think it should be investigated. I realize also that high freight rates, along with the recent increases, will further handicap our growers.

As The Grower points out, surely there is something wrong when a nation of 15 million people are importing 12 million pounds of peaches, whereas a nation of 150 million will take in return only 57,000 pounds of our canned peaches. This problem involves government policy. We ask that a fair break be given the soft fruit growers, both in British Columbia and Ontario, by setting up an investigating body to see if something cannot be done to protect our own domestic markets for our own goods.

Mr. Pouliot: Mr. Chairman, I have just a few questions I should like to ask the minister. I have in my hand the Canada Year Book for 1951, and on page 890 I see that in 1948, the year the present minister became head of the Department of Trade and Commerce, our total imports amounted to $2,636,945,000. In the same year our total exports amounted to $3,075,438,000. I would appreciate very much if I could have the total of Canadian exports and imports for 1935, when there was a change of government in Ottawa.

Mr. Howe: In 1935 the exports to all countries were $756,600,000 and imports from all countries were $522,400,000.

Mr. Pouliot: I thank the minister for that information. Could the minister tell us the total amount of Canadian imports and exports last year?

Mr. Fair: There were two wars in between.

Mr. Howe: In 1952 the total exports of Canada to all countries were $4,400,000,000 and the total imports were $4,050,000,000.

Mr. Pouliot: I thank the minister for the information. There has been a tremendous increase in imports from 1948, when they totalled $2,636,945,000 and when the minister took charge, to the total of $4,050,000,000 last year. In the case of exports the increase was from $3,075,438,000 to $4,400,000,000. These figures show that today our trade is much greater than it was in 1935 when the Liberal administration took office, and they indicate also the progress that has been made by the Department of Trade and Commerce under the present minister.

I am always satisfied with good results. I cannot argue with those who put the needs of their constituencies on the record, as that is their right; but as far as my electors are concerned I am perfectly satisfied with the good results that have been achieved by the Department of Trade and Commerce under the present minister.

The minister carries on many occupations with equal success, something which I cannot understand his being able to do. I think the success of the Department of Trade and Commerce is due to his initiative and the constant assistance that is given to Canadian businessmen by the officials. I have had occasion to get in touch with the export and import branches of the department, and I was surprised to learn the amount of information that was at the disposal of Canadians who intended to trade with other countries.

I believe I have said this already in the house, but I want to take this opportunity to state again, that the international trade fair held at Toronto has put Canada on the map. It brings businessmen from many countries to Canada where they have an opportunity to meet Canadian businessmen. This fair, which was brought about through the initiative of the minister, has done a lot to promote Canadian trade.

Another action by the minister that has brought good results is the trip he made to South America. Some years ago a similar trip was made by his predecessor, and the results were quite good. But the last trip of the present minister to the various countries of Central and South America was the thing Canada needed to increase our trade with these friendly countries. I have some friends there who tell me that the minister was received not only as an ambassador of good will but as a prince by the chiefs of state of those countries.

What the Department of Trade and Commerce has done under the present minister is to make all facts accessible to all. There is a weekly periodical published by the Department of Trade and Commerce which is very useful. It has a fine appearance and it is the best kind of publicity for promoting our trade. I know the minister is modest, and I find him very patient with some speeches that are made. I could say much more to praise the department which he leads, but for me it is not speeches that count. It is, as I said in the first place, results; and the results under the splendid leadership of the Minister of Trade and Commerce have been so good that everybody should be satisfied with the progress that Canada has made in trade.

Mr. Higgins: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Temiscouata is indeed a very special pleader in this matter, but it is rather unusual to me at least to feel that the Minister of Trade and Commerce has to retain counsel to reply on his behalf. I believe he is quite capable of doing that himself, and why the hon. member felt that an explanation was in order, and why he had to put all the questions he did to the Minister of Trade and Commerce is a little hard for me to understand. But he does it in a very admirable way. I should think the information he gave was very useful, but he did not go quite far enough.

Mr. Pouliot: I am more interested in facts that in theories.

Mr. Higgins: So am I, but I suggest to the hon. member that inasmuch as he was getting this information he might well have asked the minister the value of war production during the years from 1935 to 1952. That is very material.

Mr. Pouliot: It is on top of that. Everything has been good.

Mr. Higgins: This is separate.

Mr. Pouliot: Although my hon. friend pictures it in black, it is pink.

Mr. Higgins: No; a little grey, I would say. After all in the nighttime all cats are grey. But even after hearing these glowing figures I still have a little doubt in my mind when I hear hon. members from all parts of the country get up and talk about the market for peaches being bad, the market for apples being bad, the bacon situation being tough—I do not mean the bacon itself—tobacco sort of in trouble, cheese not very easy to sell, wheat also in a little difficult situation, lumber bad, base metals going down and mines closing. One begins to wonder what is going on. Of course we have to admit, even as the hon. member for Temiscouata will admit, that money is definitely going up in amount, but it is certainly very much less in value.

While there is no question that the Minister of Trade and Commerce is doing a good job, I wonder just how good that job really is, because we have several hon. members complaining about these markets and the difficulties of selling products. What is the answer? Is the answer that the Department of Trade and Commerce is not doing its job properly, or is it that the markets are not able to absorb the products? I am not competent to talk about the items I have enumerated, and possibly it may be considered that I am not even fully competent to discuss the question that I propose to discuss now. However, I notice that no members from the maritime provinces or from Newfoundland have mentioned the question of fish. The markets of those provinces at the present time, both for salt fish and fresh fish, are very definitely in the doldrums. The minister is fully aware of that.

With respect to the salt fish market, part of the minister's recent hegira to the West Indies and South America was the special visit he made to Brazil. I am told, although I may be wrong, that the special visit to Brazil was for one purpose only, to inquire as to the market for salt fish. I understand that no good whatsoever came out of that visit in so far as opening the market is concerned. That is an extremely serious matter because in the old days, and not so old at that, Brazil was one of the greatest markets Newfoundland had, at one time buying something like 400,000 quintals of fish. That market is now closed, and of course with any market closed to Newfoundland salt codfish it puts an added burden on the markets to which the maritime provinces sell.

I am sure the minister will tell us that he has done everything possible with respect to the Brazilian market, but it is a very serious matter. If it were possible for that market to absorb 100,000 quintals of salt codfish, then the salt codfish situation would be eased as far as Newfoundland is concerned, and consequently that would ease other maritime markets. I presume the minister has tried every possible means to make that market available. I do not know whether it is a question of the Brazilian people not having the money or what the situation is, but even if it is necessary to lend them money that is so much better than to try to put a floor price under fish.

At the present time the fresh fish business is in a very bad condition indeed. There is a tremendous glut on the market, and Canada has not been getting her share of the increased purchases in the United States in the past few years. United States consumption has gone up but Canada, while still the largest supplier of fresh frozen fish to the United States, has practically remained in a stable position while the sales of the competitors of Canadian fish have gone up amazingly. I should like to give certain figures so that hon. members may understand the situation clearly. They appear in an editorial in the Daily News of Newfoundland of April 15. I am not going to read the editorial, but will merely quote the figures.

In the period from 1950 to 1952, while Canada's shipments of frozen cod fillets to the United States remained practically stable, Iceland's rose by 300 per cent and Norway's shipments by 500 per cent. That is an extraordinary situation.

Mr. Howe: What was the size of the shipments in 1950? Percentages are sometimes misleading.

Mr. Higgins: I shall give the sizes, and they are by no means small. Canadian sales in 1950 amounted to 51,067,000 pounds and in 1952 they amounted to 54,807,000 pounds. In 1950 Iceland shipped only 12,529,000 pounds to the United States, but in 1952 its sales rose to 35,487,000 pounds. That is not peanuts; that is fresh frozen fish. In 1950 Norway shipped 2,080,000 pounds and in 1952 10,540,000 pounds. In other words they had increases while Canada's market in the United States was stable. We did not sell any more, but those two countries increased their sales of fresh frozen fish by 31 million pounds over what they had been selling before. I do not blame the minister for it, but certainly somebody has very definitely missed out in this market.

It is easy to say that Iceland has been forced to sell more to the United States because of the loss of the British market. As the minister knows, the reason for that loss of the British market was the embargo placed on Icelandic fish by Britain as the result of Iceland extending her territorial water against Britain's wishes. I think that is the reason, though whatever the reason is it has set up this reaction now and we—and I mean the maritimes as well as Newfoundland—are finding the market for fresh frozen fish terribly sticky indeed. It may be a temporary matter and the minister may be able to evaluate these things much better than we can, but it is serious indeed.

When the hon. member for Lambton West was talking about his sugar beets and Cuba, I was thinking that it is not altogether an easy situation to handle. I hope he will not disagree with me too much, but while it is very nice to say that we will not buy any sugar from Cuba and that we will use our own, I am sure that the minister will agree with me—and I do not like to agree with him too much—that if we do not purchase sugar from Cuba they will not be able to purchase fish from us. Therefore I think there must be some kind of a happy medium in the matter. We have to approach the problem of trade carefully, and not completely shut off a market which we are dealing with. We have to approach it in the light of what they buy from us and what they want to sell to us.

An hon. Member: We have sugar beets too.

Mr. Higgins: I know you have, but this has to be worked out. We cannot suddenly put up the barriers and say that we are not going to do any business at all.

I have before me a clipping from the Daily News of April 15, 1953. It contains an Associated Press dispatch from Washington dated April 14 referring to a meeting to be called by North Atlantic fisheries interests and the United States. They proposed to put up tariffs on fresh frozen fillets; and I read:

Under present tariff schedules imports of frozen fish fillets are taxed 1⅞ cents a pound on the first 15 per cent of domestic consumption or 15 million pounds, whichever is larger. Thereafter the duty is 2⅛ cents a pound.

The new plan calls for a flat duty on all imports of 2½ cents a pound.

That is only a report of the meeting so far and the matter has not gone to the United States congress. However, if the plan is presented and if the United States government adopts the recommendation, it is going to be practically ruinous for the frozen fish industry of Canada. I am sure the minister has had that in his mind when dealing with the question of fish, but if he has not had it there before I trust that he will remember it in future.

We also have the rather extraordinary spectacle that when our own frozen fish and salt fish trade is, as I said, in the doldrums Canada is importing a very large variety of fish, fish which we produce in Canada ourselves. According to an order of the house which was tabled on March 30, Canada bought $6,265,094 worth of fish in 1952. More than half, $3,280,000 worth of fish, was purchased from the United States. As an amateur in this trade and commerce business it does seem to me that it is a rather extraordinary situation that at a time when we cannot sell our own fish to the country we need to sell it to, we should be buying fish from that country. It may be that it is the sugar beet and Cuba question all over again; but it is something that I just do not undersand and cannot explain in any way. I trust that the minister will be able to give me a little light on it later.

The last matter I wish to refer to is the question of new industries in Newfoundland today. We have the unusual spectacle of Newfoundland being changed to a more or less machine age, and that is being done in a tremendous hurry. I am sure the minister must have full knowledge of what is being attempted by the provincial government of Newfoundland, and that he is in a position to assure us that all is well in those new industries. He is doubtless very close to one of them indeed, as he himself opened the machine plant last August. I was not present at that opening because we do not receive invitations to be present on such occasions, but I believe he promised that there would be extensive orders—

Mr. Howe: Mr. Chairman, are we going to continue these secondhand rumours which my hon. friend peddles in the house? To whom did I promise orders? I did not promise anything in the hearing of my hon. friend, I am sure.

Mr. Higgins: I said I was not present at the opening of the plant.

[Mr. Higgins.]

Mr. Howe: Let us not discuss the promises I made.

Mr. Higgins: The promises did appear in the newspapers. I do not have the references with me, but I recall them at the time and they have been constantly repeated since by columnists writing in Newfoundland papers. I have been attempting to get an answer to a question which I put on the order paper on March 6, but I have received only a very equivocal reply. The minister could say "yes" or "no" or "go to heaven" about that industry, and then there would be no question about the position. There would be no question about secondhand evidence or misquotations, merely a straightforward answer about what is going to be done about that machine plant.

This is a time when Newfoundland has not too much money to invest, and a great deal of money has been invested in that industry by the Newfoundland government. I believe that in all the industries that are now in operation or attempting to be put in operation there is some $25 million on loan. Where the industries are being entirely operated by the government, some $10 million has been given not as a gift but as an advance. The minister must know what is going on. A lot of us are very doubtful of the very rosy promises made by the premier of Newfoundland as to the future, but the minister does know what is going on and I think it is time he made a statement on this matter to Canada as a whole.

This is not too much to ask in connection with a new province. The minister has been very gracious in his approach to the problems we have, and I may say that he has given us material assistance through his department in a great number of ways. He very clearly keeps his finger on the problems, and I think it is time that he should tell us whether all is well in the industrial program of that new province.

Mr. Green: The minister has listened to quite a bit of advice in speeches today and I was proposing to ask him four or five questions, but perhaps he wishes to make his statement first.

Mr. Howe: I can make my statement first if you wish. There have been a good many questions asked and I can answer you now or later, just as you like.

The first question was raised by the hon. member for Eglinton about the loss of our markets in the United Kingdom, with particular reference to markets for products such as salmon, cheese, apples, bacon, etc. Our exports to the United Kingdom in 1952 showed a substantial increase in both value and volume over the previous year, and at $745 million they reached the highest figure in the past five years. The United Kingdom is making steady improvement financially, and will continue to provide a major market for Canadian exports.

The hon. member asked about the loss of markets for food products, and the future for the export of Canadian wheat in view of the failure of the United Kingdom to accede to the international wheat agreement. First of all with reference to food products, I might say that the value of the food products shipped to England in 1952 was an all-time high for any peacetime year. He said that we had lost the market for canned salmon. Britain recently announced the purchase of $4,250,000 worth of canned salmon from the country. This purchase goes a long way toward reducing our carryover of canned salmon as a result of the unusually large catch last year. In so far as cheese is concerned, the British purchased about 5·5 million pounds of cheese this year from us. This purchase cleaned up all the surplus available at the time.

An hon. Member: Now, now.

Mr. Howe: We had difficulty buying it for delivery. We could have sold more.

Mr. Charlton: What are the holdings of cheese today?

Mr. Howe: I do not know.

Mr. Charlton: If you do not know what the holdings are today, how can you say there is no surplus?

Mr. Howe: Do you know what the holdings are?

Mr. Charlton: I certainly do.

Mr. Howe: What are they, then?

Mr. Charlton: It is not up to me to answer the question.

Mr. Howe: If you knew, why did you ask me?

Mr. Charlton: I just wondered if you knew.

Mr. Howe: However, these fictitious surpluses of my hon. friends are not so apparent when you come to buy them.

Mr. Charlton: Mr. Chairman, they are not fictitious.

Mr. Howe: I might say that we were charged with the obligation of buying the surplus of dried milk. Hon. members heard the Minister of Agriculture say that we made provision for buying 10 million pounds, and we have been able to buy less than 5 million pounds to date.

Mr. Charlton: You expect it to be given to you.

Mr. Howe: We are buying it.

Mr. Charlton: But at pretty low prices.

Mr. Howe: If the surplus position were as bad as my hon. friend represents in this house, I think a little more would have been delivered. In 1952 the British purchased 706,000 bushels of apples out of the 1951 crop valued at $1,581,000. We were told today that there was no surplus from the 1952 crop. I think anyone who comes from the apple country will confirm that statement. Apples sold, and sold at a good price.

I turn now to bacon. Canadian prices of bacon have ruled above the support price of 23 cents to January 1 of this year, and at the moment are about $3.50 above the support price. In order to sell bacon or other meat products in the United Kingdom market, Canadian farmers would have to meet the prices charged by suppliers in Australia, New Zealand, Argentina, Denmark and Holland. In the case of bacon this would be $30.32 per 100 pounds f.o.b. Denmark or Holland against the present Canadian price of $36 f.o.b. the Canadian seaboard.

In so far as beef is concerned, the spread would be even wider. Top quality New Zealand beef is costing the United Kingdom an average of 14·5 cents per pound f.o.b. New Zealand, and Argentine top quality beef is about 19 cents per pound against the present Canadian price of approximately 37 cents per pound for good quality at the seaboard. In 1952 we exported 238 million pounds of animals and animal products, in spite of the fact that we had foot-and-mouth disease plaguing us throughout most of that year.

Now, what is the future for the export of Canadian wheat? A good deal has been said about our great surplus of wheat. We have had three extraordinarily large crops of wheat, one on top of the other. Last year we had the largest crop in the history of Canada, and the equivalent of two average crops before that. Selling has not been the problem; it has been transportation. Transportation is still the problem. If we had more wheat available at seaboard, we would be able to sell more wheat. One of the most crippling things that has happened to the marketing of wheat has been the elevator strike at the west coast.

Hon. members gloat over the trade figures for February and March, which show a drop in exports. That drop in exports is exactly equivalent to the amount of money we would have received for the wheat we could not ship from Vancouver because of the elevator strike. I am sure we will be hearing about the decline in exports during the campaign throughout the country, but that is the explanation. We cannot ship the lost quantity of wheat through the eastern ports because the capacity to handle it is not there. We hope to catch up by the end of the year, because we hope the strike is not going to last much longer.

I do not think hon. members wish me to discuss the wheat agreement situation, because a debate on that subject will occur some time next week when we discuss the resolution now on the order paper. I might say that whether or not the United Kingdom accedes to the agreement, she will still be buying wheat in Canada, as she has in the past.

I do not know whether the hon. member for Lethbridge really wants me to discuss GATT, or whether we can sit down quietly and discuss it between ourselves. He asked who started this idea. I think it was a spontaneous demand from all countries emerging from the war to lower the trade barriers. Canada was active in it. Mr. Wilgress was the first chairman at Geneva, and also chairman at Torquay. Every country took an interest in it. As a result of the general agreement on tariffs, we allowed in a great number of items duty free or at a reduced rate and we were protected against discriminatory tariffs on the part of other countries. I am sure the splendid increase in Canadian exports is due in no small measure to negotiations carried out under the aegis of GATT.

What are the prospects for convertibility of the pound? All I can say is that, as a result of a series of conferences in which Canada has taken part, all the countries who are interested in convertibility of the pound are working towards convertibility. The strengthening of the financial position of Britain is a step in the right direction. Conversations have been had by that country with Canada and with the United States concerning the measures that would be needed to place convertibility of the pound on a sound basis. Conversations are now taking place between the United Kingdom and the countries of Europe who would also require to work along the same lines, and all I can say is that steady progress is being made toward convertibility. I can say that anything Canada needs to do as her share towards bringing that about will be done.

Someone said that Canadian imports from the United Kingdom were being hampered by duties. I should like to point out that of the total imports from the United Kingdom in 1951 worth $421 million, 59 per cent came in free of duty. Of the 41 per cent remaining, a good deal was represented by Scotch whisky, which carries a high rate of duty. Excluding the Scotch whisky, the average duty on the balance of the imports was charged at 5 per cent ad valorem. Therefore I think we can discard the theory that Canadian tariffs against United Kingdom goods are a factor in preventing the balance of trade.

The difficulty is that Canada has had a very rapidly expanding economy since the war. The requirements for imported goods have gone up faster than has the productivity of the United Kingdom. We do all we can to favour United Kingdom goods in this market. I think the United Kingdom is making progress in opening up markets here, particularly for manufactured goods which Britain is best able to sell and for which we provide one of the largest import markets in the world. I could give a number of examples of extremely successful efforts by British firms to export to this market in increasing quantities and to establish a market here for their goods, but I do not know that I need to take the time to do so at the moment.

It has been suggested that we are not doing all we can—

Mr. Green: Their delivery rates are better?

Mr. Howe: They are getting a bit better, yes. The situation has been difficult. It has been a matter of lack of availability in the first place and a lack of reliable delivery dates. That situation is being corrected. British prices are in line, and I think the market in Canada for manufactured goods from Britain will grow as Britain becomes more firmly established with a representation in this country. This country imports currently about $600 million worth of equipment alone which Britain might well manufacture. Of that market Britain should take an increasing share.

The suggestion has been made that we should purchase war materials in Britain. The Department of Defence Production must purchase the type of equipment that the army orders, but we have placed substantial orders in the United Kingdom. I think to date the orders placed there amount to something in the order of $100 million. All of our heavy tanks are being purchased there, a certain amount of ammunition, the aircraft carrier, quite a number of airplanes including 15 for Trans-Canada Air Lines and two Comets for the R.C.A.F. It is the policy of the Department of Defence Production to examine all requisitions from the army in order to determine whether they could be filled in England. If the material must be imported, the preference is given to the British market in filling the order.

We were asked what was going to happen with regard to Japan. The question was as to how we propose to meet Japanese competition in the Canadian market. In 1952 our sales to Japan were valued at $102 million and the imports from Japan at $13 million. Negotiations are proceeding for a trade agreement between Japan and Canada in an amicable and friendly manner, and we have good reason to believe that an agreement will be arrived at which will safeguard the interests of Canadian manufacturers and at the same time be mutually beneficial to both countries.

The leader of the C.C.F. party pointed out that participation of the United Kingdom in this market has gone down. During the depression the United Kingdom supplied us with up to 24 per cent of Canadian requirements; that is, exports from the United Kingdom to Canada were 24 per cent of Canadian requirements. But since 1945 the United Kingdom share has steadily decreased. The reason for that is, of course, that our requirements have grown much more rapidly than has the ability of the United Kingdom to produce for this market. There are many easier markets in the world for the United Kingdom to sell in. They can sell in India, Australia, and Egypt, which are traditional United Kingdom markets and which are also expanding rapidly and making a heavy demand on United Kingdom products. However, our exports to the United Kingdom have been growing from year to year; and while our imports have been holding about steady, we expect that situation will improve in their favour.

Then the leader of the C.C.F. party suggested that we sell apples, salmon, cheese, bacon and other surplus products to the United Kingdom for sterling. We do sell for sterling, but we sell for convertible sterling. What I presume he means is that we sell for inconvertible sterling. Inconvertible sterling is merely an agreement to pay dollars at some indefinite date in the future; it is a loan without interest and without a due date. Britain has never asked us to make that kind of loan. I suppose if Britain asked us to make almost any kind of loan we would consider it carefully; but I cannot for the life of me see why members of the House of Commons would urge that we make a loan to Britain in the form of an interest-free advance with no due date, rather than an ordinary loan normally made between two countries. Inconvertible sterling is simply a promise to pay—in small denominations, probably—that we take and put in a safe; but that sort of transaction is not one that either the government of the United Kingdom or the government of Canada would favour. It is wholly impracticable. I do not see why that suggestion has persisted so long.

I think I have fairly well covered the points I wish to make. The hon. member for Annapolis-Kings asked for specific results from our Latin American trip. It is very difficult to give a list of direct sales made, except for the sale of 115,000 tons of wheat to Brazil, which sale was arranged at the time we were in Brazil. Every member of the mission did business, and has had further inquiries since his return to Canada. The Canadian exporters' association reports that more of its members have visited Latin America since our mission than at any other time. One of our leading paper mills reports the best business they have ever had in areas visited by their salesmen, and attributes this fact to the visit of our good will mission. Our farm implement manufacturers have had inquiries, and old customers have again asked for newsprint from Canada.

I think any other information required can be brought out on the various estimates.

Mr. Higgins: Is there any possibility of giving me an answer?

Mr. Howe: My hon. friend worries about the exports of fish. So far as I know, since Newfoundland joined the confederation her fish have been sold every year. I do not know of any fish that have remained unsold over the years. There is a surplus there now, but nothing that either Newfoundland or ourselves consider to be burdensome. We will continue to sell Newfoundland fish just as we have sold it ever since Newfoundland became part of Canada.

Mr. Higgins: Does the minister consider the fish market is just about normal at the present time? Do you think the fish situation is about normal there?

Mr. Howe: No, I am not expressing any opinion. I cannot speak about every commodity in every part of Canada and say whether the market is normal or abnormal. But I say that since it has been our responsibility to sell Newfoundland fish, we have sold it all. We have found markets for it, and I express confidence that we will continue to do so.

Mr. Higgins: I am not talking about Newfoundland only; I am talking about maritime fish as well.

Mr. Howe: Well, let us talk about the area you know, and not extend the discussion to areas you do not know much about.

Mr. Higgins: What about the Brazilian market?

Mr. Howe: My hon. friend has not had the Brazilian market since he can remember. There was a little fish put into Brazil on a barter deal a few years ago, fish for paper. Aside from that Newfoundland has been excluded from the Brazilian market for many years.

Mr. Higgins: Is there any market in Brazil now?

Mr. Howe: Yes.

Mr. Higgins: When?

Mr. Howe: As soon as the currency opens up more.

Mr. Green: The minister dealt with several matters about which I proposed to ask questions. However, there are two or three more I would bring to his attention. Would he tell the committee what results have followed by way of increased trade between Canada and the commonwealth countries as a result of the commonwealth economic conference which took place last November? I ask about that because it appears to me that the conference merely worked out a broad approach to the question of how trade generally could be increased. However, it may be that additional steps have been taken which have increased trade. Is that so?

Mr. Howe: The economic conference in London was not a trade conference. No ministers of trade were there. It was a financial conference, attended by prime ministers and their ministers of finance. We sold more to the commonwealth countries last year than ever before in our history. It was the first time in history that our sales to the commonwealth exceeded a billion dollars. But I would not say that the economic conference was the particular cause of that situation.

Mr. Green: Will there be any sort of trade conference at the gathering to take place after the coronation? I understand the senior ministers of the different commonwealth nations are to confer at that time. Will their discussions include commonwealth trade?

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. Howe: I have not seen the agenda. Trade, of course, is always a subject matter for discussion; but it would not be what I would call a conference on trade.

Mr. Green: Then will the minister give consideration to taking some definite steps to promote trade between Canada, and Australia and New Zealand? These countries would benefit from any commonwealth arrangement. However, as I understand the figures, our trade with those two nations is very low at this time, a matter that is of great concern to those of us on the west coast. I have here a copy of Foreign Trade for February 21, 1953 in which are listed the eleven leading countries in Canada's trade, for the years 1951 and 1952. In both those years Australia was ninth. As a matter of fact in 1952 the exports from Australia were $1 million more than in 1951, or a total of $50 million as against $49 million in the preceding year.

At one time Australia was our third best customer. Now she has dropped to the ninth position in exports, and she is eleventh in respect of imports to Canada. The trade figures show that in 1951 goods to a value of $45 million were imported by Canada from Australia, and that in 1952 goods to a value of only $20 million, or less than half, were imported.

Then at one time New Zealand was our eighth best customer. Now she is not even on the list. I do not know how far the figures for New Zealand are below those for Australia. However, Australia is ninth in her purchases from us and eleventh in our purchases from her. At one time Australia was our third best customer for lumber, following the United Kingdom and the United States in that respect. At times I believe South Africa bought more than was bought by Australia. Also, we formerly sold a great deal of canned salmon to both Australia and New Zealand. We now have 350,000 cases left in our warehouses, even after allowing for recent sales to the United Kingdom, and it is my understanding that no canned salmon is being sold either to Australia or New Zealand at the present time.

It seems to me that if the Department of Trade and Commerce put on a drive of the kind made to develop trade with South America, and if that were put on by the minister himself, there might be great benefit for Canada, Australia and New Zealand. This may not be the best way to approach the matter, but in my opinion there is a very serious problem involved. Something should be done to increase that trade.

We have on the west coast a new shipping line planning a service to Australia and New Zealand, but doing so I believe on a tentative basis. If trade cannot be increased I am afraid there is not much prospect of retaining a proper shipping service to Australia and New Zealand. Of course we can get there by plane within a few hours; they are no longer weeks away from the west coast of Canada.

We do feel greatly concerned however about the fact that trade between Canada and those two nations of the commonwealth has decreased so materially. Would the minister tell us whether anything can be done about it?

Mr. Howe: Trade with Australia and New Zealand is still a sterling area problem, just the same as our trade with the West Indies or with other sterling countries. At the conference held in January, 1952 all the dominions and colonies were asked to tighten up on their expenditures of American and Canadian dollars. They did so. They all imposed drastic prohibitions. Australia and New Zealand stopped importations of automobiles from Canada. That is only one item. I could add that they cut down on their importations of lumber and newsprint. Quotas were put on a large number of products. That accounts for the failure to sell canned salmon. All I can say is that the only hope of restoring the trade is to restore the financial position of the sterling countries to a point where they can afford to spend more dollars in Canada.

Mr. Green: Were there not somewhat similar obstacles in connection with promoting trade in South America?

Mr. Howe: Oh, no.

Mr. Green: Were there not?

Mr. Howe: Nothing to do with the sterling problem.

Mr. Green: But there were exchange problems and restrictions?

Mr. Howe: In certain countries, the Argentine and Brazil, there are restrictions. You mentioned Newfoundland codfish. The currency situation in Brazil has closed off that market for the time being. Argentina has prohibitions on many articles. As we come northward countries like Mexico, Colombia, Venezuela, Cuba, Haiti and the Dominican Republic, have practically no currency regulations. Their markets are just as free as the Canadian market.

Mr. Green: Would the minister give some consideration to sending a mission to Australia and New Zealand. I believe that if we sent representatives on a high level there might be a possibility of doing something about this trade situation. Another result would be to promote understanding among these three countries of the commonwealth.

Mr. Howe: I would be delighted to head a mission to Australia and New Zealand. I would like to go there.

Mr. Green: It would be a good idea.

Mr. Howe: Anything that can be done in Australia and New Zealand can better be done through negotiation with their representatives in London. London is the banker of those countries. I am quite sure that no radical change in money quotas or money restrictions could be arranged anywhere except in London.

Mr. Green: In his speech on April 17 the minister said that the general agreement on tariffs and trade would run out at the end of the present year. Presumably it is to be renegotiated. I took it from his remarks that Canada is in favour of the renegotiation of the agreement. Could the minister give us further details of government policy with regard to GATT and also with regard to the British preference?

Mr. Howe: Canada has no intention of changing its policy on either. We will certainly use our best efforts to see that GATT is extended for another three years. We have always maintained the British preference and always will, at least in the foreseeable future.

Mr. Green: The Canadian government then has no intention of asking for a change in the British preference?

Mr. Howe: No.

Mr. Green: That is correct?

Mr. Howe: We never have asked for it.

Mr. Green: I am not so sure. My interpretation of what has happened in the past is not the same as the minister's. However I am talking about the policy at the present time with regard to the British preference and I understand from the minister that Canada is not going to ask for any change.

Mr. Howe: That is right.

Mr. Green: I should like to have the minister's views with regard to the exportation of iron ore from the west coast to Japan. This has been discussed on previous occasions and, as he knows, I have suggested that the government should take some action to stop or at least reduce this export for fear that if it is continued it will delay or make impossible the establishment of a steel industry on the west coast.

One answer the minister gave last year was that the exports of iron ore to Japan were made in small quantities and would not affect the situation. Our trouble is that our iron ore deposits are comparatively small; we have nothing like the huge deposits in Quebec and Labrador. I got figures today from the bureau of statistics which show that in the last calendar year 802,311 tons were exported to Japan from the west coast. The exports during the last half of the calendar year were far heavier than during the first half, being at a rate which would mean total exports for a full year of 1,103,232 tons.

This iron ore is dug from crown-granted claims, so the provincial government cannot impose restrictions on its export. It is dug out by a company owned in the United States, and shipped in Japanese bottoms. Canada gets about $7 per ton for this ore, yet we buy back from Japan steel which has a value of $150 and $200 per ton.

The great worry is that if this operation is carried on indefinitely there will not be enough iron ore on the coast to justify the establishment of a steel mill, or that the establishment of such a steel mill will be delayed. I would be grateful if the minister would give his views on this question.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Chairman, the iron ore situation in British Columbia is purely a matter for the provincial government. The government of British Columbia owns its natural resources; it owns this iron ore. If it has given mining rights to anyone the permit must have been given with the expectation that the ore would be exported because there is no present demand for it locally. I am certain that the province has the power to stop the mining of this ore any time it pleases.

I cannot think what the federal government could do about it. The federal government must make laws that apply all across Canada. The federal government would be most reluctant to stop the export of iron ore, because this phase of the industry is just beginning. We have been net importers of iron ore for a great many years, and we hope in a year or two to be net exporters. I would hate to do anything that would prevent the export of iron ore. If we did, Newfoundland would be affected because they have been supplying Britain with iron ore for many years and no doubt would like to continue to do so.

Mr. Green: I think the situation is that these mineral claims are crown-granted, which means that the companies which have the crown grants are absolute owners. Therefore the province has nothing to say about what is done with that ore, and I do not think the province can stop its export. On the other hand, the dominion government has power under the Export and Import Permits Act to stop or regulate it. I am afraid that there is no way in which the situation can be met by any government body other than the dominion government.

I realize that action of this kind would not be required in eastern Canada, but our position on the west coast is quite different because of our limited deposits. If these exports should increase we might be seriously prejudiced in so far as the establishment of a steel industry is concerned. Does the minister take the position that he can do nothing under the Export and Import Permits Act?

Mr. Howe: The provisions of that act require that certain conditions must obtain as a reason for interfering with exports. I am afraid the only way we could do it would be to use the Emergency Powers Act, and after the lashing we took on that for the past two days I would think—

Mr. Green: I am not suggesting that for one moment.

Mr. Howe: That is the only power on the statute books that would permit us to interfere with the situation.

Mr. Green: I do not agree with that. I submit that it could be done under the Export and Import Permits Act.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, before proceeding to ask the minister certain questions I should like to comment upon the report of the department. I think it is most regrettable that when we are studying the estimates of this department the report of the department is not available. I am indebted to the deputy minister of trade and commerce for sending me galley proofs of the report this morning. The minister tabled galley proofs in the house this morning, but of course they have not been made available to hon. members. This department is unlike some others in that its year is the calendar year and not the government fiscal year. That explains to some extent the delay in the tabling of the report for the year 1952, but I should like to say that I think it is highly important that in future the report of the department for the previous calendar year should be presented to the house in ample time before the estimates of the department are brought on for consideration in committee of supply, so that all members will have an opportunity of familiarizing themselves with the contents of the report. It is an important report of an important department. I think a knowledge of the contents will not only help to expedite the work of the committee of supply, but it will also mean that members will be informed as they ought to be.

The first matter I should like to take up relates to the prime ministers' conference held in London last December. The minister has emphasized the fact that the conference was concerned with financial questions and not with trade. I think we are all aware of that fact. The report of the prime ministers' conference was, it seems to me, unfortunately vague and general in its terms. It may be that the deliberations of the conference were of such a nature as not to admit of a report being written in more specific terms. Nevertheless it is exceedingly vague and general.

I should like to take up a point with respect to the report of the prime ministers' conference in relation to the subject of convertibility, on which the minister made some comments. He indicated the importance which the government attaches, and I think rightly so, to convertibility as related to the trading outlook of the country. He did say that the government are prepared to take whatever measures they are asked to take to assist in bringing about convertibility.

I should like to ask the minister to develop that theme further and indicate what measures, if any, the Canadian government has been asked to take in that direction; what other measures, if any, are under consideration, and what answer has been given in relation to any particular request for measures that the Canadian government has been asked to take in that direction.

Mr. Howe: As my hon. friend knows, I was not present at the conference. I have only read such report as was issued, and so far as I know no request has come up to this time for the Canadian government to take action. Convertibility is some distance away. I could not say whether it is a matter of months or years, but progress is being made in that direction. It is the intention to work toward convertibility at the earliest practical time, and I am certain that before final steps are taken requests will be made of Canada. All I can say is that Canada is very much interested in bringing about convertibility and will endeavour to do what is necessary at the time.

Mr. Fleming: On the subject of our trade with the United Kingdom, the minister used the expression this afternoon that "we do all we can to favour United Kingdom goods in our import markets." What did he refer to specifically there?

Mr. Howe: Our trade commissioner service is at the service of anyone attempting to sell British goods here. If we are buying for the government abroad, we try to buy in the British market in preference to any other, in our own self-interest. I made the remark this afternoon, I think, that we bought from the United Kingdom something over $100 million worth of goods in the last year in munitions or in aircraft for T.C.A. and things of that kind. In other words, our desire is to buy in the United Kingdom in preference to any other market. It is not always possible; in fact it is only occasionally possible, but when it is possible that is our policy.

Mr. Fleming: That was the point, Mr. Chairman. The minister made a statement with respect to government policy in relation to trade generally. It was at a later stage in his remarks that he took up the point of placing defence orders in the United Kingdom. But are we to understand that it is a definite policy and a matter of instruction on the part of the department to its officers who are placing orders, whether defence orders or otherwise, that where the goods cannot be furnished in the home market they should give a definite preference to the United Kingdom?

Mr. Howe: I would say so, price and quality being equal.

Mr. Fleming: Oh yes, quite.

Mr. Howe: And availability reasonably good. Sometimes we do not have the time to get the goods from the United Kingdom. Delivery is important, but if delivery, price and quality are equal we will favour the United Kingdom.

Mr. Fleming: I think this is an appropriate point to ask the minister for clarification of an incident that created some degree of mystification at the time. About August 15 last the minister made a statement as reported in the press to the effect that Britain might receive $150 million worth of free armament from Canada this year. The press dispatch that came from London, following the appearance of a report to that effect in the Canadian press, indicated that at least some of the treasury spokesmen at London found it hard to understand the statement. They pointed out that if it was something new they did not understand it, and if it was a reference to something that had been undertaken before then it had been announced under circumstances that made it difficult to understand.

Would the minister make a full statement so we may have ample clarification of this matter? The dispatch I have before me is a Canadian Press dispatch from London dated August 15 which refers to another dispatch and reads in part as follows:

> The dispatch said the program announced by Howe had been drawn up "at least six months ago. Canada herself is making no direct arms gift to the United Kingdom", the correspondent wrote. He added that Canada's attitude has been described in Ottawa as "willingness to give Britain all help short of aid." Meantime in the British press there has been little other interpretative comment on the arms-gift arrangement.

Will the minister make a full clarifying statement now with regard to this matter?

Mr. Howe: I think that would be more appropriate when we are discussing the estimates of defence production. It had to do with Sabre planes, which have been delivered steadily, and certain other goods. I do not remember the particulars at the moment. I was not prepared to discuss the matter on these estimates.

Mr. Fleming: If the minister would prefer that I bring it up on the estimates of the other department I would be quite agreeable. I thought it followed along naturally after our discussion on policy with reference to purchases from the United Kingdom, but I shall be glad to bring it up on the estimates of the other department.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, the last subject relating to our trade with the United Kingdom on which I should like to ask the minister for some further statement relates to the token import scheme that has been in effect and applied by the government of the United Kingdom since 1946. That you will recall, Mr. Chairman, is designed on the one hand to limit importations into the United Kingdom and at the same time permit certain commodities from abroad to be kept before the consuming public there. I mentioned last night that while the original quota set was 40 per cent of pre-war sales in the basic period 1936 to 1939, nevertheless effective January, 1952 that 40 per cent quota was cut to 30 per cent.

Imports into the United Kingdom under the terms of this scheme may not bulk large in total. The total in 1952 was $5,600,000 as compared with $7,500,000 in 1951. We are told in publications of the department in the last two years that the British purchase tax and competition from other countries have made sales under the scheme more difficult. In the past year about 266 firms participated as against only 118 in 1946 when the scheme was first introduced.

I should ask the minister for some comment on the scheme and particularly whether the Canadian government has made any representations to the government of the United Kingdom with a view to liberalizing—if I may use that word with a small "l"—the provisions of the token import scheme, increasing the percentage or enlarging the scope within which Canadian exporters may operate under the scheme.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Chairman, the token import scheme is still in effect applying to 30 per cent of pre-war exports, as my hon. friend has outlined. The quotas have not all been taken up, but I think about $5 million of them have been. The scheme has been broadened and, of course, we are always bringing pressure on the British government to relax import controls to the greatest extent possible.

A few days ago I had a personal letter from the chancellor of the exchequer which outlined the present position. It is that there are world open licences which allow anyone to import certain commodities from any country in the world without any restriction as to quantity. They cover: nickel ores and concentrates, residues and matte; asbestos, raw and fibre; platinum ores and concentrates; cobalt metal (unwrought) and cobalt oxide; pig iron, iron ore; steel scrap.

Then there are open individual licences. These are in general issued to individual importers who apply for them. The holders may import unlimited quantities of the commodities covered so long as the open individual licence remains unrevoked. They normally involve an obligation to make regular returns of actual imports and future commitments, and they can be revoked if imports prove to be excessive. In the case of the commodities listed, the open individual licences apply to imports from any country in the world. The commodities are: wheat and flour on reversion to private trade; coarse grains on reversion to the private trade; softwood; lead; zinc.

Then there are specific licences. These are issued on application to individual importers, and allow the holder to import up to a value stated on the licence. Licences are normally issued on proof of essentiality, but in some cases they are issued by reference to a predetermined ceiling of total imports. In the case of some commodities, licences are issued on a non-discriminatory basis—that is the licence enables the holder to import from any non-sterling source. In the case of the other commodities the licence will generally apply only to imports from the dollar area. In most cases non-dollar imports are licensed on a more liberal basis, generally under open general licences or individual licences which do not cover imports from dollar sources. The specific licences cover: bladders and casings; animal fats; linseed and linseed oil; beans for canning; tobacco; veneers; plywood; hardwood; pulp; newsprint; fertilizers; chemicals; kraft paper; abrasives; ferro alloys; steel; synthetic rubber; seeds and pitwood.

The government also makes direct purchases of: cheese, rationed types; meat; canned salmon; aluminum; oils and fats; copper, tungsten ores and concentrates.

That is the position today. The token import market scheme has been broadened to the extent I have indicated.

Mr. Fleming: Do I understand that the commodities listed by the minister have been lifted entirely out of the scope of the token import restrictions?

Mr. Howe: Yes. The licences are broader than those in the token import scheme. Generally speaking, the limitation is much less than in the token import scheme.

Mr. Fleming: That is not too easy to follow. Are we to understand that the commodities which the minister has read in all cases lie outside the token import scheme and, as to such restrictions as do apply, those restrictions have been now lifted?

Mr. Howe: Yes, to the extent I have indicated.

Mr. Fleming: Is there any indication that the percentage for the past 15 months, the 30 per cent applicable under the token import scheme, is going to be raised in the near future?

Mr. Howe: No, there is no indication of that. The import licence scheme is a holding operation to allow exporters of pre-war days to hold their brand name on the market. As financial conditions permit, the government of the United Kingdom is gradually moving out of that plan into a much broader plan to the extent that I have indicated, that is on the commodities I have named. There is no import licence required for a number of items; that is, they can be imported from anywhere in the world regardless of currency. Then there are other items that are subject to fixed quantities with no discrimination as to country. All this list is on a much broader basis than you are claiming.

Mr. Fleming: I have a number of other matters to raise. I am sure, Mr. Chairman, that it will be the wish of the house that the government should do all in its power to encourage the removal of these restrictions by the British government. It is evident in the world today that quota restrictions and exchange restrictions, of this and other kinds, are more restrictive of trade than conventional tariffs. To the extent that the government will do all in its power to encourage the removal of these restrictions which have hampered the export of Canadian goods to the United Kingdom market, I am sure its efforts will be supported.

I should like to turn to several inquiries with relation to the United States. The minister made a brief reference this afternoon to GATT, and expressed the hope that it would be possible before the end of this year to carry forward an extension of the general agreement on tariffs and trade. I believe that view is shared by most of the members of this house. Will the minister tell the house what, if anything, the government has done in the way of feeling out the opinion of the United States government in this matter by opening negotiations. It is quite evident that the success of GATT in relation to its extension will depend very largely upon the attitude of the United States government.

President Eisenhower, in his inaugural speech, declared himself in favour of the extension of GATT, but he did not specify whether he meant simply an extension in point of time or an extension with respect to the commodities and rates covered by the present agreement. There have been various opinions expressed by members of the United States congress on their attitude towards GATT and that type of trade agreement. Will the minister tell us what, if anything, the Canadian government has done by way of opening negotiations with the United States administration on this subject?

Mr. Howe: The negotiations to which the hon. member refers will take place this autumn. Our officials are in close touch with the officials of the United States. Depending upon whether or not the powers of the reciprocal trade agreements act extend the president's power to make further concessions, we would look for an extension of time. If the reciprocal trade agreements act is extended, there may also be a widening of scope. After three rounds of tariff negotiations, the scope of GATT is about as wide as it can go at the present time. We would be glad to see it wider, but we are not too unhappy about it now.

Mr. Fleming: I take it, then, from the minister's statement that the government really has not much hope that the extension will apply to more commodities or carry the present agreements to a higher degree.

Mr. Howe: I did not say that at all. I hope the hon. member is not going to suggest that I expressed an opinion on what the United States will do, because I cannot do that. I have not the faintest idea.

Mr. Fleming: I asked the minister how we were to interpret his remark about the extension. We were talking about two kinds of extension, one an extension in point of time and the other an extension of the application of the general scheme of GATT.

Mr. Howe: Well, if the president's powers are allowed to expire we can then look for an extension of time. If his powers are renewed, then we can look for an extension in both time and scope; that is all I can say.

Mr. Thatcher: I wonder if the minister would say what the present position of Japan is in so far as GATT is concerned. Have they asked to come in? If they have, who is holding them out? Perhaps the minister would say what the attitude of the Canadian government is toward that?

Mr. Howe: Japan has applied for admission to GATT. The application is under consideration. I do not know who is causing the delay; I suppose a number of people. As to what Canada's position is, I am not sure at the moment. In any case, it would not be important. The position of Japan will be considered, I am sure, at the next meeting of GATT, when a further decision will be made.

Mr. Thatcher: I should like to point out to the minister what I know he already knows. Japan is a country of over 85 million people. It has been stripped of the possessions it had before the war. It seems to me that if the Japanese are to live, they must export. I think it would be desirable, therefore, if they were brought into GATT. If they cannot trade with us I think they will have to turn to the communist countries. Therefore I hope the Canadian government will support their entrance to GATT when the time comes.

Mr. Fleming: Will the minister tell us what efforts the Canadian government is making in the direction of customs simplification on the part of the United States?

Mr. Howe: There again, customs simplification on the part of the United States is a matter for the United States government. We are pressing for the United States to ratify that measure. The joint chamber of commerce of the United States and Canada has considered that particular problem, and have been advocating it for some time. What is required now is congressional action.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): We have been talking about the difficulties of this matter for many years. Has there been a real liberalization, say in the last four or five years, in the administrative policy of the United States?

Mr. Howe: There has been no change in the act in the last three or four years. There has been a more favourable approach to customs simplification. A bill has been drawn, and it is before the United States congress. I resent very much being asked any opinion of what the United States congress will do or what United States officials will do.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I was not asking the minister for any opinion on what the United States will do. I was asking about a matter of fact, and he has partially told me.

Mr. Thatcher: This afternoon the minister told me his department had a special import branch. I wonder if he would mind clarifying that statement a little. Will he say who is the head of the branch, what exactly are its duties, and what results it has had in encouraging imports in recent years?

Mr. Howe: The branch has been in existence for six or seven years. It is headed by a man named Charles McGinnis. The duties of the branch are to assist foreign exporters to find markets in this country for their goods. It has been very effective. The branch is the particular guardian of the trade commissioners from other countries, and it helps them carry out their duties in finding markets for the products of their countries in Canada. Similarly we have an export division which performs the same function for our exporters.

Mr. Thatcher: Would the minister care to say whether this particular branch has done any work in trying to encourage imports from Britain in the last year or two?

Mr. Howe: I wish my hon. friend would not ask silly questions.

Mr. Thatcher: As long as the minister will answer them, it is all right.

Mr. Howe: Will the hon. member admit that Britain is a country desiring to export to Canada?

Mr. Thatcher: I would think so.

Mr. Howe: Then this branch is functioning.

Mr. Thatcher: It may be a silly question, but I have never heard of this import branch which the minister says is active.

Mr. Howe: The hon. member has not been in Ottawa very long.

Mr. Thatcher: Has the branch just died a natural death or is it doing something to try to get our import figures up?

Mr. Howe: It is not a committee. It never was a committee. I hate to teach my hon. friend the A, B, C's of government organization, but I may tell him that this is division A of the Department of Trade and Commerce. If he will look in the Department of Trade and Commerce annual report he will get the complete personnel, their salaries and their pedigrees. It has been in existence for a long time. If he will just read the departmental report he will not have to ask that question.

Mr. Thatcher: I am not particularly interested in the pedigrees. All I should like to know—and I do not think the minister needs to get in a dither about it—is what they are doing to increase our British imports, if anything. If they are not doing anything, all he has to do is to say so. If they are doing anything, then let him tell us what it is.

Mr. Howe: They are just doing that. They are working to try to increase British imports and to find a larger market for British goods, just as they are working for French goods, Italian goods, Australian goods and New Zealand goods; I could go through the whole list of 48 countries. They are working for all of them, trying to find markets for their products in Canada, and doing what they can to help to balance trade between Canada and all the countries with which she trades.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want to ask a silly question.

Mr. Riley: That is not surprising.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to know a little bit about the relationship between the export branch and our trade commissioners. For instance, if a Canadian manufacturer wants assistance, does he move through officials there and then does he go on to the trade commissioner, or does he establish direct contact with our trade commissioner?

Mr. Howe: It is optional. He usually establishes direct contact. But if he wishes to go to our export division to find out what commodities a certain country can absorb, he will get advice there and then he will be directed to the trade commissioner service and be in touch with the trade commissioner directly.

Mr. Fleming: This country and city were favoured a fortnight ago with a visit by the premier of France and several of the leading ministers of the French cabinet. Are negotiations being carried on between the Canadian and French governments with a view to a new trade agreement within the scheme or the framework of GATT or otherwise?

Mr. Howe: There are no trade agreements with countries that are members of GATT. GATT is a multilateral trade agreement in which all countries are placed on the same basis. There are no trade agreements with any country in the world that is a member of GATT.

Mr. Fleming: Let us not quibble about terms. We know what the scheme of GATT is. All I asked was whether any negotiations are being carried on between Canada and France with reference to trade, or looking toward closer trade relations, or agreements of any kind with respect to trade.

Mr. Howe: No; nothing of that kind. There could be no agreement. Trade arrangements are fixed for all countries that are members of GATT. They are all the same. We have a committee on trade with France—a committee of civil servants—which meets from time to time to study trade problems, to advise France of any trade opportunities here and to obtain their advice as to any opportunities for Canadian goods in France; but it is not a committee that makes trade agreements.

Mr. Fleming: There are two other matters about which I should like to question the minister. The first is one I mentioned in my remarks last night. It concerns a press report which appeared on November 18, from which I read just the opening paragraphs. It is a Canadian Press dispatch and reads in part as follows:

> The Canadian government has adopted a get-tough policy against alleged dumping of manufactured goods in Canada by two communist-dominated countries—Czechoslovakia and Poland.
> Customs officials have been empowered to increase the value for duty on an imported item by as much as 50 per cent before applying the regular tariff charge. Thus the government will collect the duty plus the difference between the quoted and increased price.

Can the minister make a statement on the subject of the trading operations of those communist-dominated countries in this respect?

Mr. Howe: The article is correct. It is impossible to get fair market values in either Czechoslovakia or Poland. We have asked for the information and we have not been able to get it. Therefore we apply fixed values for duty purposes.

Mr. Fleming: Have those values been the 50 per cent that is mentioned in the article?

Mr. Howe: Fifty per cent is the limit fixed in the act.

Mr. Fleming: Have you applied the maximum in all cases, or just in some?

Mr. Howe: I do not know that. It has nothing to do with me. The Minister of National Revenue operates that machinery.

Mr. Fleming: Can the Minister of National Revenue say?

Mr. McCann: Mr. Chairman, in trade relations it is customary for foreign countries to allow officials of the government, particularly of the Department of National Revenue which has to do with the handling of customs and excise, in their countries where they may obtain values with reference to goods that are exported to Canada. I am sure hon. members are acquainted with the general principle, namely that the goods are invoiced into this country at a fair market value; that is at the prices at which they sell in the country of origin.

With reference to Czechoslovakia, the government carried on negotiations with its representatives in this country at that time, and asked for the privilege of having our representatives go into Czechoslovakia to obtain those values; and that privilege was denied. When it was denied, in order to give a fair share of protection to our own manufacturers with whom these exporters would be in competition, it was decided to apply the dumping duty. That dumping duty is a maximum of 50 per cent in advance of the prices at which those goods are invoiced into this country. That was applied on this occasion, and it was applied because of the fact that manufacturers in our own country, principally of textiles, complained to the government that textiles were being put on the Canadian market at prices less than the equivalent prices at which they were sold in the country of origin.

Mr. Fleming: What is the policy of the government with respect to the export of scrap iron to Japan?

Mr. Howe: Export of scrap iron outside of this continent is not allowed, except for an occasional shipment to the United Kingdom under special permit.

Mr. Fleming: Have no exports of scrap iron to Japan been permitted from Canada?

Mr. Howe: Not at all.

Mr. Fleming: None whatever?

Mr. Howe: No.

Mr. Fleming: Is the minister quite certain that no export was permitted within the past few months from Vancouver—

Mr. Howe: Quite sure.

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. Fleming: —of scrap iron to Japan?

Mr. Howe: Quite sure.

Mr. Fleming: None whatever?

Mr. Howe: None whatever.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): No, Mr. Chairman. I want to ask the minister whether the export situation with regard to Venezuela has been improved.

Mr. Howe: Since when?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Since the minister told us it was in a poor way last February. The minister said that members of our trade mission obtained important on-the-spot orders and all expressed the opinion that Canada is doing a very poor selling job in that country; that is Venezuela.

Mr. Howe: Unfortunately the trade statistics are not up month to month, but I shall be glad to watch that situation carefully and to give my hon. friend a report during the next session. I am sure the situation will improve.

General administration—

427. Commodities services (including the former wheat and grain division) including contributions as detailed in the estimates, $617,872.

Mr. Wright: I note that this particular item now includes the former wheat and grain division. I believe that in the estimates last year this division was under a separate item. Is there any particular significance in the fact that it is now placed under the commodities services branch? Is it just a matter of administration or is there any particular change in policy?

Mr. Howe: It is purely a matter of administration. Dr. Wilson, the former head of the department, is now stationed in Rome; and instead of maintaining it as a separate division —as my hon. friend knows, it is only a small division—it is put under the commodities division for administration.

428. Trade commissioner service, $2,522,696.

Mr. McLure: What is the difference between ambassadors, consuls, trade commissioners, honorary commercial agents and foreign service officers? We find all these under the Department of Trade and Commerce, and apparently all are doing the same work. That is, as I understand it, they are endeavouring to sell our goods in foreign countries. However, they all seem to be designated by different titles. For instance, in Buenos Aires we have an ambassador, a consul and all the other officers. If a man wishes to make a deal with that country, should he go to a foreign service officer or to an honorary commercial agent, or to whom should he go? Perhaps he should go directly to the ambassador, if we have one there.

Mr. Howe: An ambassador is the representative of the government in a country. He reports to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. He is the diplomatic head of the Canadian mission in the country to which he is accredited. The consul is also an officer of the Department of External Affairs, and deals with various commercial documents on behalf of that department. A trade commissioner is a representative of the Department of Trade and Commerce, accredited to a country that does not have a diplomatic mission. He may be the senior representative of Canada in that country. For instance, in Haiti and the Dominican Republic we have trade commissioners as senior officers.

Then a commercial counsellor is a representative of the Department of Trade and Commerce who is attached to an embassy. That is, where an ambassador is the representative of Canada in a country, he will have on his staff a commercial counsellor who is the equivalent of a trade commissioner in countries where there are no ambassadors.

Then in countries where we have no other representation, as in Bermuda, we have a local man who is known as an honorary commercial agent. In Bermuda he happens to be the head of Butterfields bank and, without cost to Canada, he is good enough to reply to our correspondence. If we have problems there we write to him, and he will straighten out the matters for us.

Mr. Catherwood: When the minister spoke on Friday evening he very properly informed us about the activities of this part of our service, which I feel is a very important one. Perhaps we have underestimated the value of the service this branch has given to our country. A trade commissioner in my opinion is really an ambassador of good will to another country. I feel that in selecting these men great care should be taken, because the position calls for special gifts and special qualifications. I do not think an ordinary college education alone qualifies a person to fill these positions properly. They require men of experience, men who are enthusiastic in the interests of Canada and who are willing if necessary to spend 24 hours a day to promote good will between Canada and the countries in which they are located. I hope careful consideration is being given to the selection of the people who will represent us.

Were any new trade offices opened in other countries during the last year, and is there any possibility of opening more in the near future?

Mr. Howe: I am glad the hon. member has mentioned favourably the trade commissioner service, because I believe it is a service that returns its cost to Canada many times over. I am really amazed by the accomplishments of some of our trade commissioners, in fact by nearly all of them. Every few days something turns up that shows extraordinary activity on the part of our trade commissioners, business coming to Canada that we would have lost had it not been for their activities.

Speaking on Friday night I said there were 48 offices with a staff of 379 including local staff. Within the last year we have opened three new offices, at Beirut, the Dominican Republic and New Orleans.

Mr. Wright: To what extent do these trade commissioners use films and radio in their work in these various countries, to advertise Canadian goods?

Mr. Howe: Each trade office has a projector, and they are supplied with a library of films. If there is any particular commercial film required by the office, they will write to the department in Ottawa. We try to rotate commercial film, and sometimes cultural film, so that eventually they travel to all the offices.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Is it the government's policy to encourage young Canadians to serve as typists, filing clerks and the like in these various offices in foreign countries? In my view that should be encouraged so these young people may be trained to take part in our extraterritorial service.

Mr. Howe: When the factor of security is important we send people from Canada to fill the positions of stenographers and clerks. Where that is not necessary we try to employ Canadians who are resident in the area or, if that is not possible, we employ local residents who are not Canadians. However, I have visited most of the offices in Europe and Latin America, and I have found a good representation of people direct from Canada in those offices.

Mr. Higgins: I notice there are only two trade commissioner offices in all of Canada, one of which is at St. John's, Newfoundland, and the other at Vancouver. I notice that the amount for the Vancouver office is being increased this year by a little over $1,000, while the amount for the St. John's office is being reduced by about $6,200. I presume the difference is in connection with the director. Is it the intention to replace him? I understand he died.

Mr. Howe: My hon. friend will appreciate that we used to refer to Newfoundland as a foreign country, or rather as a sister member of the commonwealth. Now it is part of Canada. We are bringing the office down to the point where it is merely a representation of the service in Newfoundland. Vancouver is in a somewhat different position, although I think the duties are about the same. Vancouver is the gateway for everything that comes across the Pacific.

Mr. Higgins: St. John's is in the same position for everything coming across the Atlantic.

Mr. Howe: But they do not all stop there; many ships pass by.

Mr. Higgins: It is not intended to replace the director?

Mr. Howe: No.

Mr. Herridge: In recent years I have noticed that when a trade commissioner is on leave he visits various centres and addresses local organizations. I think this is an excellent thing. I have heard very favourable comment on this practice by people who are interested in the trade commissioner service. What is the policy of the department in that respect?

Mr. Howe: Trade commissioners are brought back to Canada every three or four years and are required to make a tour of the country to get in touch with industry, public bodies and so on. This serves a double purpose. First, it makes sure that the trade commissioner is in close touch with Canada and, second, it makes sure that Canadians have an opportunity to meet our representatives and gain from them any information that they may require about the different foreign markets.

Mr. Fleming: One is glad to have an opportunity to pay a tribute, not only to the importance of the trade commissioner service but to the high quality of men who are serving Canada in that very important capacity. It has been my good fortune to meet a number of these men and it is my opinion that they are eminently worthy representatives of Canada in the important posts which they hold.

There is an item in the details on page 487, acquisition of building for residence abroad, $40,000, which is a new item. Could the minister explain that.

Mr. Howe: We have just sent a man to Djakarta in Indonesia and the report is that there is absolutely no available accommodation. We regard it as an important key point in the east and this appropriation is to enable the trade commissioner to build or buy a suitable building.

Mr. Fleming: Will the building be used as an office or residence or both? Will it provide living accommodation for anyone but the trade commissioner?

Mr. Howe: It will be a residence and office for the trade commissioner, and if he has an assistant I assume that he will also find room in the building.

Mr. Fleming: How many people are there on the staff?

Mr. Howe: Just the one.

Mr. Fleming: Just the commissioner?

Mr. Howe: Yes.

Mr. Fleming: Will it be a case of sending materials there or will materials be acquired in Indonesia for the purpose of constructing this building?

Mr. Howe: We will not send materials there; the building will be of the type that is built in that city. He will attempt to buy, but if he cannot buy at a favourable price he will arrange to build. If he builds, it will be done with local materials and labour.

Mr. Fleming: What is the policy of the department with reference to the provision of buildings to house the trade commissioner service abroad? Is it the policy to obtain office accommodation in an office building and then leave the commissioner to find his own housing accommodation?

Mr. Howe: That is the procedure. We rent suitable office space and the staff look after their own housing. Of course where we have an ambassador the trade commissioner is able to obtain office space in the chancellery. Where the trade commissioner is working by himself, he rents an office and finds himself a house.

Mr. Fleming: I take it that this item represents a quite unusual situation.

Mr. Howe: Yes. The situation was carefully explored and we were told that there is no possibility of renting accommodation there, either for use as an office or a home.

Mrs. Fairclough: In what respect is the service at Detroit being augmented? I notice that both the staff and the appropriation are much larger than last year.

Mr. Howe: Formerly this was an external affairs office, with a consular officer. We have taken over the staff as a combined trade and consular office.

429. Information branch, $177,218.

Mr. Bryce: I think this is the item which deals with advertising. Anything I shall say is not intended to be criticism of the trade commissioners, because I have as high regard for them as any hon. member in the house. I have had the opportunity of meeting Canadian trade commissioners in different countries, and I know they are doing a wonderful job.

However, I do not think we advertise our goods enough. I do not want to take up time because I realize it is getting late in the session. Take the item of hogs alone. I was in Great Britain not long ago, and I have been there many times before. When they sell you a breakfast there they tell you that you are getting a piece of American bacon. That just sticks in my throat when they tell me that it is American bacon, because I know perfectly well it is Canadian bacon.

I have made a study of our bacon in Britain. We have the finest bacon going to Britain, but we do not advertise it. When it is sent away from here it is stamped "product of Canada", but with the fine slicing they did in the United Kingdom during the war that bacon lost its identity completely. I suggest that we follow the pattern set by New Zealand. Right up to the time a man gets New Zealand butter on his table there is a wrapper around it which states that it is a product of New Zealand. Why do we not do that with our bacon? We could supply them with the paper wrapping, telling them that it was the best bacon they could buy, that it was from Canada.

I have seen Canadian eggs in London marked as new-laid eggs when it took ten days to send them there. Stamped on the end of each egg was "product of Canada". It was identified. We send apples there and they are identified as being the product of British Columbia, of the maritimes or of Ontario.

One of the finest products we have ever exported from this country is Canadian bacon. Let us identify our Canadian bacon and not take the dirt that we are eating American bacon when we are served bacon in Great Britain. I made a study of this during the war, and I know we have the finest bacon going to the United Kingdom. Even Danish bacon could not compare with it. I hope the minister will take that into consideration and do something about advertising our products. If you do not toot your own horn nobody will do it for you.

Mr. Howe: In the case of the United Kingdom we advertised our products there up to the time bulk buying became the pattern in the early days of the war. All products were then bought by the United Kingdom and distributed by means of a rationing system, and advertising and labels were discouraged. We were not allowed to put the name "Canada" on our bags of flour. We were not even allowed to put the word "Canada" on a tin of salmon. That situation is changing, and as the market becomes more freely available for our products I am sure we will start other advertising campaigns in the United Kingdom.

430. Economics branch, $156,884.

Mr. Wright: Looking at the details of this item on page 489, I notice that we have a large group of economists who are graded all the way from grade 1 to grade 10. I am rather surprised at that. I do not know just how the grading is done. We have two grade 1 economists, two grade 2 economists, five grade 3 economists, one grade 4, five grade 5, one grade 6, one grade 7, three grade 8, no grade 9 and one grade 10. Will the minister give us an explanation as to the grading of the economists? I should think we would have senior economists, junior economists and perhaps intermediate economists, but ten grades seem too many.

Mr. Howe: The grading system is set up by the civil service commission. It is based upon the qualifications of the man. There is no grade 9. I suppose that man died. I agree it is a good many grades for not too many economists, but this is the system that runs throughout the civil service. Wherever an economist is found, he is in one of these grades. People of the same grade would have the same educational qualifications and the same length of service.

Exhibitions—

433. Canadian international trade fair, including authority to refund, from revenue, deposits received for contracts for space, $830,000.

Mr. McLure: From this item it would appear that we were spending $830,000, but quite a large revenue is derived from this fair and the actual expenditure of the government would not be $830,000 unless they are using their revenue for rebates on space that is not occupied. I should like an explanation. I have attended some of these fairs and I think they are one of the greatest advertising mediums that it is possible for Canada to have. People come here not only to advertise their own goods but, in the case of the bulk of them, they come to Canada to buy Canadian goods. I was wondering what would be the net cost to the Dominion of Canada of this exhibition which is held annually.

Mr. Howe: The net costs have been coming down. In 1952 total expenditure was $709,000, total revenue was $498,000, and the net out of pocket cost was $211,000. For the 1953 fair we expect to bring the net cost down under $200,000.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): I should like to ask the minister if it would not be wise to invite Canadian bankers to attend the fair in order to offer some system of assistance to new industries, especially from Great Britain, to come to Canada and particularly to British Columbia, and establish plants there. These are very valuable exhibitions, but I think there is a missing link. There is need for Canadian financiers to attend these exhibitions and show these people where great advantage can be obtained from establishing their industries right in Canada.

Mr. Howe: I am happy to say that the banks thought of that before my hon. friend. The bankers are very regular attendants at the fair. If my hon. friend will attend the opening luncheon he will find a row of bankers as imposing as any that can be gathered together in the country. I am sure the bankers appreciate fully the value of what my hon. friend has just pointed out.

Mr. Dinsdale: With respect to items 432 and 433, in the details on page 492 I see something that interests me. There is an amount of $67,000 for participation in other exhibitions in Canada, the United States and abroad. I think the minister will be aware that we had a Manitoba trade fair in Manitoba last year; and this year, in conjunction with our provincial exhibition in the city of Brandon, we are holding a western Canada trade fair in the first week of July. It includes all four western provinces. Is any assistance given to that fair under the item I have just indicated?

Mr. Howe: I understand that the Department of Agriculture makes a grant for the Brandon fair, but the Department of Trade and Commerce does not. We hardly think it is designed to promote international trade.

Mr. Fleming: I should like to say a word about the Canadian international trade fair. I think it is only a matter of about three or four years ago that the minister was expressing some doubt as to the future of the fair and whether it should be carried on. I take it that all doubts and fears in that connection have been completely removed by the experience of the intervening years, because unquestionably this has been a highly successful fair and has been well operated. Some able officials from the department have been in charge of it, and I trust that it is now fully established as an annual fair.

Mr. Howe: The first fair was very successful. In fact I think we can say they have all been successful, but after the first fair there was a dropping off of Canadian exhibitors to an extent that in the third year we were in the position of running the fair almost exclusively for foreign exhibitors, which I did not like. A drive was put on last year for more Canadian exhibits, with the result that the exhibits were about 50 per cent foreign and 50 per cent domestic. The 1953 fair will be by far the largest we have ever held, much larger than the first fair, and again the proportion will be about fifty-fifty between foreign exhibitors and domestic exhibitors. This year our effort has been to attract foreign buyers. We have advertised extensively in the United States and abroad inviting buyers to attend. We have more exhibits this year than we can comfortably handle in the space available to us.

Mr. Catherwood: Is any record kept as to the actual dollar value of sales negotiated at the trade fair?

Mr. Howe: No. Businessmen will not give that information. We get a report compiled by our commodity officers who travel from booth to booth and make their own estimate, but generally speaking the businessman does not like his competitors to know just how much business he has on his books as a result of the fair.

Mr. Higgins: Is there not an estimated return in proportion to the outlay? Is there any kind of estimate at all?

Mr. Howe: It is wholly intangible.

Standards branch—

436. Weights and measures inspection services, $726,231.

Mr. Herridge: I understand that there is a fee charged for testing scales and things of that sort. Can the minister tell the committee what revenue is received from such charges?

Mr. Howe: I might say that all these branches are money makers. Against an estimated expenditure in 1952-53 of $16,843,298 voted to the Department of Trade and Commerce in the estimates we had a revenue of $7,882,590, so the net cost of the department to the country was $8,960,708.

Mr. Herridge: That is most interesting.

Mr. Howe: We are careful people.

Item agreed to.

Board of grain commissioners—

440. Administration, $208,577.

Mr. Wright: With regard to item 440, board of grain commissioners, it is customary for the board each year to issue an annual report in the month of January and for it to be tabled in the house here by the minister. This year they have not issued that report or, if they have given it to the minister, it has not been printed and distributed. I would like to get some information from the minister with regard to it.

While I am speaking on this matter I would like to point out to the minister that the present board of grain commissioners is short one member. Mr. Milner, who was the third member on the board, has been acting as transport controller for almost two years. This is an important body as far as western producers of grain are concerned and I know they are anxious for the board to have its full membership. I do not know whether it is because the board is short a member that its annual report has not been issued, or whether there are some other reasons.

There is another matter which I should like to raise and the minister can deal with it when he is speaking. I refer to a finding of the board of grain commissioners which was made this year with regard to what is known as the Kreutzweiser case. Under the Canada Grain Act, in the province of Saskatchewan it was always understood by the producers that when grain was offered for sale at an elevator, if the grain was in good condition and the elevator had room for that grain, it was compulsory for the elevator company to purchase the grain. If there was disagreement between the seller and the buyer with regard to the grain, an interim cash ticket would be issued to the seller of the grain and a sample would be taken and sent to the inspection department at Winnipeg. When a final grade was established by the grading department there, an adjustment would be made to the grower on the basis of the interim cash ticket which had been issued to him.

The finding of the board of grain commissioners with regard to this case was that it was not compulsory on the part of the elevator company to issue the interim cash ticket and, unless there is an agreement between the seller and the buyer, it is not compulsory for the elevator company to purchase the grain. That is something which has alarmed a fairly large number of farmers in western Canada. They feel that the interpretation of the Canada Grain Act by the board of grain commissioners in this case takes away certain rights which they as growers in western Canada thought they had under the act. I would like the minister to say something with regard to this matter.

At a meeting of the agriculture committee last year the minister said that if the growers in western Canada believed there were certain changes which should be made in the act, an opportunity would be given at this session of parliament for them to present their case before the agriculture committee. The committee has not been called and it looks now, at this stage of the session, as though it would be pretty well impossible to call the committee to deal with those matters. I think some explanation is due the producers as to just why these matters have not been referred to the agriculture committee and as to what the government's intention is with regard to the board of grain commissioners and the appointment of another commissioner to bring the board to full strength.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Chairman, I should say at once that the fact that copies of the report of the board of grain commissioners are not available to the house is no fault of that board. That report was forwarded to Ottawa and delivered to the queen's printer prior to March 1. We have been pressing for it ever since, and we are now told that we may get it next Monday. It is only one of several reports that have been held up; one which has been before the queen's printer for a long time was tabled here today in manuscript form. As my hon. friend knows, we are building a new print shop which we hope will be more adequate; but there is nothing a department can do about a report that is delayed by the queen's printer. Apparently the queen's printer is an independent soul.

As far as the board of grain commissioners is concerned, we have three able grain commissioners who comprise the full quota of the board. One of them has been doing extra duty as transport controller, but we hope he can be relieved of these duties this autumn if the pressure which requires a transport controller is relieved. The work of the board is not suffering because that member spends part of his time with the board and part as transport controller.

In connection with the Kreutzweiser case, that is a judicial ruling of the board and I do not know that I want to open it up. I think my hon. friend can see the practical difficulties for an elevator operating close to capacity, with every bin in use, taking in a car of wheat which the elevator operator says is No. 3 northern but which the owner claims is No. 2 northern. The operator must put it in a bin with either one grade or the other. Which bin is he going to choose? He cannot take it in unless he has a special bin to hold it until the grade is officially determined and he can put it in the proper bin.

I do not know what my hon. friend wants to gain by calling the agriculture committee and discussing that particular case. If the man is not satisfied let him go to the courts. The ruling has been given by the proper authority, but there is always an appeal to the courts.

Mr. Wright: The ruling at least changes the interpretation which the producers had of certain sections of the Canada Grain Act. If the interpretation of the section is to be that which the board of grain commissioners has given in this case I for one feel that the Canada Grain Act should be amended to give the producers the protection which until this ruling was made they believed they had under the act.

Mr. Argue: On that point, Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the minister or any officials in the department or the law officers of the crown have given any study to the board's ruling in regard to that section of the Canada Grain Act, section 112. I think the ruling in effect removes the section from the act. I do not know how this man would refer it to the courts, and he might have to go to a lot of expense.

If the minister will think of the experience farmers have had in the past under this section of the Canada Grain Act I believe he will agree that it has been a valuable section. In the past if a farmer went into an elevator with a load of grain and there was a dispute over the grade, the elevator man said he could take it only subject to grade in dock as provided by the Canada Grain Act. A special receptacle was provided, a sample of the grain was placed in it and sent to the chief inspector. When the grade came back the elevator man issued a cash ticket and the grain was sold.

It is certainly not going to help the marketing of grain if an elevator agent can turn away a farmer because there is a dispute over the grade. Most farmers dispute over the grade with the elevator agent every fall. Every farmer wants one grade over that which is offered, and the act has been a protection not only to the growers but to the elevator companies. They really get a referee to decide the grade through provisions in the act for sending it to the chief inspector; but if I read the ruling correctly it removes all the protection which the producers had in that regard.

I think the minister should give some consideration to the ruling, and to the way the act has operated in the past. Let us not decide whether Mr. Kreutzweiser was right or the board of grain commissioners' ruling was right. Let us try to decide in what position the producer is placed right now. Let us try to decide whether it is the same position that prevailed in the past, and whether he can sell his grain subject to provisions of grade and dockage.

Mr. Howe: I am told that the particular elevator to which he took his grain did not have an empty bin. There were other elevators in the area that did have empty bins, and he was told to take his grain where he could get a specific bin until the grade and dockage were taken. You can pass any law, but if an elevator is completely full of grain and a bin cannot be allotted then the elevator company cannot comply with the law. This is a case where they could not take any of this grain without knowing which particular bin it should go into, because all they had was partially filled bins.

Mr. Argue: In a case like that I do not think the elevator agent, if I read the act correctly, is required to take the grain.

Mr. Howe: The courts decided against you, so let us let it go.

Mr. Argue: Who decided?

Mr. Howe: The court of jurisdiction, which is the board of grain commissioners.

Mr. Argue: Two of them were the court. At any rate, here is one line of the ruling:

> The provisions of section 112 requiring a sample to be taken and placed in the receptacle only apply, in the opinion of this board, if an agreement had been arrived at between the operator or manager and the person offering the grain for sale that the grain be purchased.

If in every case you have first of all to get the elevator agent to agree to buy your grain before he will use that receptacle, then there is no protection for the farmer because it takes two parties to make any agreement. From reading the act I would say that it should be sufficient the way it stands now; but in view of this ruling I think the department should give some further study to the situation to see if the act itself cannot be clarified in the light of the ruling that has been made by the board of grain commissioners.

Item agreed to.

441. Operation and maintenance expenses, $3,292,600.

Mr. Fleming: I wonder if the minister would throw some light on several items appearing in the details at page 503. This item, Mr. Chairman, concerns operation and maintenance expenses of the board of grain commissioners which this year have increased from $2,868,720 to $3,292,000, an increase of about $424,000, which is practically the entire increase in the estimates of this department this year. By reference to page 503 one sees that practically all the increase is in salaries and wages.

Half-way down that page one sees a reference to casuals and others, an increase from $95,000 to $336,000. Two items further down there is an item for overtime which has increased from $96,000 to $355,000. Then three items farther down, in travelling and removal expenses, there is an increase from $67,000 to $110,000. I wonder if the minister would give an explanation as to how these casuals are taken into the employ of the department, and why so much of this money is going for overtime rather than in the usual way.

Mr. Howe: This is for the weighing and inspection service which has charge of the grain from the time it is delivered to the country elevator until it is delivered to the ship. The increased cost is due entirely to the tremendously increased volume. The elevators have been working night and day. The revenue goes up correspondingly. This is an item where we make a lot of money.

Mr. Fleming: I quite understand the reason for the increase in the total, but I was wondering why so much of it goes to casuals and others and for overtime, rather than to staff in the ordinary way.

Mr. Howe: We try to maintain a normal staff for normal conditions. It is when you get conditions of great congestion that this comes about. For instance, a year ago we had a tremendous amount of off-grade grain which required extra work and extra supervision. The permanent staff is under the civil service, as my hon. friend will appreciate, and instead of inflating the numbers under the civil service, where it is easy to build up but not so easy to tear down, we try to keep a basic staff of permanents and hire casual labour to meet abnormal situations.

Mr. Fleming: The minister did not mention the third item, the substantial increase in travelling and removal expenses.

Mr. Howe: We opened an elevator at Prince Rupert which had been closed for some years. This meant travelling and living away from home. There were several other situations of that kind which called for extra travelling. It was just because of the unusual and tremendous volume of work piled on a staff that had not been built up for that kind of effort.

Mr. Fair: I wonder if the minister has any further word on the strike at Vancouver?

Mr. Howe: I have been in touch with it almost every hour or so. It seems to me to be ripe for settlement, but we are having a little difficulty at both ends of the settlement. However, I am very hopeful that reason will prevail on both sides. I may say that we owe a great deal to the transport controller, who is the man who really got to grips with the thing and was able to get in touch with the men as well as the employers. I think he has made quite an effort in getting concessions from both sides, and I hope he will be able to finish the job.

Mr. Green: May I ask the minister if this might not be the appropriate time to bring the representatives to Ottawa and close it out?

Mr. Howe: No, that would be the worst thing to do. They are all in Vancouver.

Mr. Green: It worked in the other case.

Canadian government elevators—

442. Operation and maintenance expenses, $1,345,467.

Mr. Fleming: I should like to ask a question on one item in the details on page 505, about the tenth line, repairs and upkeep of buildings and works. There is a substantial increase there from $257,950 to $335,000, which I take to be abnormal. What accounts for that this year?

Mr. Howe: It is the tremendous extra load on the elevators. It is the wear and tear on buckets and belts. The wear and tear on an elevator is just about in proportion to the amount of grain that is put through. If you put through twice the amount of grain, there is twice the wear and tear on the equipment.

Special—

443. International economic and technical co-operation branch, including the administration of the Colombo plan and of certain United Nations co-operation plans, $97,758.

Mr. Green: Could the minister explain this item?

Mr. Howe: Yes, that is for the Colombo plan. The money is voted by external affairs, but the administration is in the Department of Trade and Commerce. We arrange all the contracts and take care of the expenses.

Item agreed to.

Mr. Green: May I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce if he is not taking the research council and atomic energy items tonight?

Mr. Howe: No, not tonight. We thought we would wait until the report is finished.

DEPARTMENT OF CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

57. Departmental administration, $280,729.

Mr. Fulton: Item 57 is the departmental administration item, Mr. Chairman, and there are quite a number of things which I think one should say, particularly about immigration. I know that the other day in connection with the citizenship act, there were one or two things which the minister suggested we might leave for his estimates.

I think it should be pointed out that, in connection with immigration itself, there has not really been a full-scale discussion of the subject for a number of years. Last year, when we had the revised Immigration Act before the house, the minister took the position that it was merely a revision and consolidation and that it introduced no new policy. Therefore when we got into the details of the act, while I will not say that we were not allowed to discuss policy, I will say that certainly we were discouraged from doing so since, as the minister himself pointed out, the act merely lays down the broad limits within which the government determines policy largely by way of regulation. Then again, the minister's estimates last year were not introduced into the house until even closer to the end of the session than they are on this occasion. Hence there was only a limited discussion of the subject of immigration.

There are, I think, a number of things in connection with immigration which are causing some concern at the present time. This concern is felt in two directions. There are those who are concerned lest there should be an over-generous policy with respect to the admission of immigrants, and there are others who feel that the country is not meeting its full responsibility in the admission of persons from countries which are less fortunate than we are. Then I think there is some considerable concern over the apparently limited usefulness of the assisted passage scheme, particularly with respect to its application to immigrants from the United Kingdom.

There are also certain questions with regard to the position of those who have been admitted to Canada from India, who have been for some time Canadian citizens and who wish to bring their relatives into this country in order to help them on their farms or in their lumber mills which they own in considerable numbers on the Pacific coast. These people want to get their relatives in to help them in those enterprises; yet they find that, although Canadian citizens, they are subject to a quota which prevents them from getting their relatives in. They feel that they are subjected to a great degree of discrimination.

As they pointed out to the minister last year and as, of course, they point out to those of us who come from that province when we are back home, they came here in some cases up to 30 or 40 years ago. Many of them were born here, have been Canadian citizens for all that length of time, yet they cannot bring in their brothers, cousins, or nephews except in extremely limited circumstances and within the over-all limitation of a quota; whereas others who have come to Canada in the last five years, just long enough to acquire Canadian citizenship, have acquired citizenship and are allowed to bring in their relatives as of right.

Those citizens out there feel that prohibition to be a harsh degree of discrimination. I think they have a good case. I must confess that I am unable to find any flaw in it. It seems to me to be a matter where the restrictions should be relaxed on the admission of relatives of those who are Canadian citizens of substance.

These and a number of other problems on which I have not yet touched seem to me to call for a statement by the minister on the policy of this government with respect to immigration. Particularly in the light of the fact, as I said at the beginning, that we have not had a full-scale discussion on immigration for at least two years, I hope the minister will take this occasion this evening to take the committee and the country into his confidence and say what is the policy of the government with respect to immigration and what are their views as to what should be done about immigration in the future.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Chairman, I think I should follow the policy that I have followed ever since I became minister, namely that of making a general statement at the outset on my estimates. I followed that practice last year so that, in so far as I was concerned, there was a general discussion on immigration; but I agree that we reached the estimates of this department in, I think, the closing six or eight hours of the session. I therefore appreciated at that time the consideration that other members had for the time limit and the fact that they did not go into the matter as fully as they hoped they could on another occasion. At the end of my statement I shall deal with the points raised by my hon. friend, if he would remind me of them at that time.

I should like to discuss first some of the highlights of the immigration program over the past twelve months and to outline also the program which, as far as we are able to foresee, would appear to be in our best interests for this calendar year. May I have the permission of the committee, which has always been granted on previous occasions, to place on Hansard a full statement on immigration for 1952?

The Deputy Chairman: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Harris: The statement is as follows:

The figures for immigration into Canada in 1952 showed several very definite trends and of particular interest, perhaps, will be the substantial increase in the numbers coming here from the United Kingdom. Out of a total of 164,498 new arrivals, 42,675 were British. This represents an increase of 36 per cent in the proportion of British immigrants over the previous year, and in actual numbers an increase of more than 11,000 over 1951.

This increase reflects primarily, perhaps, the increasing interest in Canada overseas but it also reflects the work of our officers in the United Kingdom; and in this connection I must pay tribute to the conscientious way in which they are carrying out their duties. There is scarcely a night during the year that Canadian immigration officials are not holding meetings in the smaller towns and cities of Great Britain, outlining the developments that have taken place in this country and showing films and film strips on life and work in Canada.

I should, however, make reference here to the situation which may face us this year. Transportation of immigrants from the United Kingdom has almost constantly presented a problem. This year, because of the coronation, that problem will be intensified. Hon. members may have noticed an item in the press recently which indicated that, up until the present time, approximately 8,000 Canadians have booked passage to Britain; and that total, of course, is expected to grow. A very considerable number of United States citizens are planning holidays to coincide with the coronation as well.

All these travellers to the United Kingdom have, of course, booked their return passage, which means that westward transportation following the coronation will be very difficult to secure. We are seeking ways in which this problem may be lessened, but I am not hopeful that any substantial increase in accommodation will be available although we shall continue to seek ways and means to provide for those people who wish to migrate here.

Hon. members, of course, will have noted that the 1952 figures show a decrease from the 194,000 who came to Canada in 1951. I should explain in this connection that there were some unusual circumstances in 1951. It was, first of all, a year in which Canada's absorptive capacity was extremely high. The second factor was that a great deal of shipping became available in the final months of the year, partly due to the fact that the international refugee organization was winding up its activities and still had ships under charter. These things helped to bring us a very heavy intake in the final months. As a matter of fact in October, November and December of 1951 new arrivals came to Canada at an average rate of approximately 21,500 each month. That did not occur in 1952.

Another trend to which I would like to call the attention of hon. members is the way in which the flow of immigrants came to Canada during 1952. And in referring to this I would like to draw attention to two things that are elementary in carrying out an immigration program for a country such as Canada. The first of these is that the best time for workers to arrive is in the spring, summer and early fall. The second is that the integration of any immigrant is speeded if he has his family around him.

It was apparent that 1952 would not offer as many opportunities for immigrants all through the year as did 1951. For instance, the demand for additional workers in heavy construction, in the mines and in the forests was not expected to be as great as in 1951. Our program, therefore, envisaged the movement of as high a proportion of workers as possible during the early months of the year, with priority given to dependents in the final months.

As a result, in the first six months of last year the new arrivals were almost 20,000 in excess of the same six months in the big year of 1951. In the final months of the year, while the number of arrivals was substantial, we find the objective of reunion of families being achieved, with the number of dependents in each of the final three months of the year exceeding the number of those coming here as workers. The figures were 15,616 dependents and 11,944 workers.

We find, too, that the workers were going into immediate employment. For instance, on January 3 of this year we had only a negligible number, all single men, awaiting placement in our reception centres across Canada. The actual figure was 5 in immigration centres and 48 in labour hostels. My recollection is that the corresponding figure for the year before would be something of the order of 3,000. I am quite sure hon. members will agree that this is a desirable situation and will make for speedier integration and more satisfactory settlement.

I have mentioned the substantial increase in the intake of British immigrants. It is a matter of regret that I am unable to report to hon. members the same increase in immigrants from France. As the house will appreciate, France itself is a country of immigration and is not anxious to encourage emigration. However, that proportion of our population representing the Latin races was well represented among our immigrants during 1952 and people of French, Italian and Belgian background totalled almost 27,000 for the year.

Those people from France who are coming here are making a splendid contribution and integrating well into the communities where they settle. For instance, during the past few weeks our officers in the province of Quebec have been holding short courses in Canadian agricultural methods for newcomers. Approximately 50 French-speaking new Canadians have been attending this course at St. Johns, Quebec, and I am happy to state that every one of these 50 is on a farm of his own, that he is making progress, finding Canadian farming a good way of life and seeing here an opportunity for his children to maintain the Canadian tradition of the family farm.

All in all we have been getting an exceedingly fine type of immigrant, with the vast majority coming from those countries whose people have demonstrated in the past that they integrate well into Canadian communities and fit themselves quickly to accept the full responsibility of citizenship.

When we consider immigration I believe most of us think primarily in terms of workers. It is true that workers make up something more than 50 per cent of the intake, but we should not lose sight of the fact that dependents are also represented in substantial numbers. Of last year's arrivals approximately 85,000 were workers; the remainder, more than 79,000 dependent wives, children and parents. As a matter of record, almost one out of every four who came to Canada in 1952 was a child 14 years of age or younger. Again I suggest that this is a healthy characteristic of the Canadian immigration program.

We had in 1952 a 20 per cent increase in the number coming here from the United States. And along with the increased flow of United States citizens coming to Canada we have had an increase of about 30 per cent in the number of Canadians returning to their homeland. Part of this is undoubtedly due to the flattering publicity Canada is receiving south of the border, publicity of the great development in this country, and of a healthy climate for investment and enterprise.

And now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to take just a very brief look at the future. The government is fully aware that Canada needs more people, that we cannot fulfil our destiny and develop our resources with a population of only a little more than fourteen and a half million. The government is fully aware that natural increase will not alone provide the population we must have. The government is aware also of the fact that the difficult times we had in the 1930's had an effect on the natural increase and the number of Canadians reaching working age is lower than normal at the present time. Accordingly the government will continue its program of immigration to stimulate Canadian growth and Canadian development.

To give effect to this, we are now selecting immigrants on a very wide basis. First priority, of course, is being given in all countries to the movement of close relatives of people already established in Canada. I believe hon. members will agree with this. However, the close relatives are only a percentage of those we are selecting now. For instance, in all countries where we have immigration offices, outside of Asia, we are selecting, in addition to the close relatives, anyone who meets our qualifications and for whom there are opportunities in Canada. There is one exception to the above; that is in the Netherlands, with which country we have an agreement for the selection of immigrants. In those countries where we have no immigration offices we are able to deal only with cases of close relatives and cases of exceptional merit.

The approach will continue to be a realistic one, with the development of our economy the guiding factor. We shall anticipate future developments as closely as we can and gear our immigration program to them, realizing as we do that the next few years will present greater opportunities for the growth of the Canadian nation than ever before, and that under these circumstances there is an obligation on the government to seize the opportunity and make the maximum use of it, not only in the interests of our people but in the interests of peace.

Canada has much to contribute to the peace of the world; and that contribution will be the greater as we grow in numbers, not only by natural increase but by the addition to our population of others who will acquire Canadian ways and add something to our national life, and who are quite prepared to play their part in building and defending their country of the future.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman, we have listened with interest to the minister's brief report, and I am very sorry we cannot let him go on with the estimates and finish the discussion this evening. However, I am reasonably sure he did not expect that, and we do not want to disappoint him.

This is a subject about which I do not think we have had sufficient discussion. In my opinion the whole future of Canada depends to a great extent upon what our immigration policy may be, and how well we plan it. In my view immigration cannot be discussed intelligently unless other related factors are considered. Immigration, employment and housing are in my opinion interrelated; and a considerable amount of study and planning must take place if our immigration policy is to be realistic and successful.

The Canadian Congress of Labour and the Trades and Labour Congress made representations to the government within the last few months. They had a section in their brief dealing with this particular matter. They are not opposed to immigration, but they believe in planning it and considering all the factors related to it.

One of the fields that must be carefully surveyed by the Department of Citizenship and Immigration and the Department of Labour is the field of employment. Mr. Mosher, president of the C.C.L., speaking only last week in Saint John, New Brunswick, suggested that unemployment could be looked for from some of the signs they are seeing today, such as a growing resistance of employers to increased wages, the general unrest that is beginning to creep in which indicates a levelling off, and so on. With the curtailment of defence spending in the foreseeable future, pockets of unemployment might develop across the country. These are all things which the Department of Immigration should check closely with the Department of Labour.

I know that if you go across the country from the maritimes to British Columbia you will find that in large industrial centres like Montreal, Toronto, Windsor and Vancouver there is growing uneasiness on the part of the industrial worker because of the influx of people from other parts of the world into those particular centres. I think that adds up to a lack of planning. If you have a recession in those areas you will have a bad unemployment problem. I think the whole matter of immigration should be predicated on developing the country, not just bringing them in and laying them down in the centres where there is employment. If we are going to develop Canada it must be opened up. You cannot continue to concentrate in the centres as we are doing at the present time.

There are many angles to this question of immigration, and I do not intend to tell the minister that I know them all. However, I have done some thinking about these matters because I am interested in the future of Canada and in Canada doing the best possible job in all fields. It is just not possible to discuss the whole question of immigration in fifteen or twenty minutes, or even in a 40-minute speech. I have condensed some of the thoughts I have had on the subject, and I am going to leave them with the minister.

In order to have a reasonable discussion of immigration it is necessary at the outset to clear our minds of two widely held false notions. One is the lump of work theory, that there is only a fixed amount of work to go around. You find the opinion widely held that if we bring in more people there will be just that much less work for everybody.

The other is that population in itself means prosperity, that the more people we bring in the richer everybody will be. Extra people are not just extra stomachs. They can mean extra production, but that does not necessarily mean extra production. An empty stomach is not a customer unless its owner can pay for what he needs to fill it. During the depression years we had hundreds of thousands of people who were just extra stomachs that could produce nothing. We should guard carefully against a repetition of that kind of situation.

We must not forget that from 1940 up to and including the present year we have been living in a false prosperity, in a war economy. If we are successful in arriving at a peace that is sure and certain, if fear of war is removed, we will have to do some serious thinking in the matter of keeping our equilibrium on this continent in an economic peace. By and large the working population of this country and many of the heads of industry who are managing our economy on the outside have grown up in that false economy. If they have to reverse their gears and get back into a peace economy they will require a lot of training, and there may be a lot of dislocation before that is brought about.

These are things that should be kept in mind by the department of immigration. They should see that immigrants coming into this country are not brought into areas where housing is poor or where there is no housing, or into the big industrial sections where employment is fairly tight. These immigrants should have a fairly good idea of what they are coming into when they come to Canada. I think in many cases a rosy picture is painted and when the immigrant is here a short time he becomes rather disappointed that this is not the utopia he thought he was going to.

In my judgment the physical size of this country has almost nothing to do with its capacity to absorb immigrants. Much of our territory is economically worthless or hard to do anything with. Peopling a country is not like packing sardines into a tin; it is a matter of economic, not physical capacity. It is not simply what we can produce but how much it costs us, whether we can sell it, and for how much. It is also a matter of the standard of living. If we are willing to drop our standard of living we can support an enormous population; if we are not, we cannot. I think that was clearly indicated this afternoon and evening in the discussion on the trade and commerce estimates. The Minister of Trade and Commerce is a good salesman who has been all over the globe finding markets. We export a large percentage of what we produce, and I do not think we are prepared to drop our sights or our standards.

The government's immigration policy is based officially on our absorptive capacity. I think in the short statement he made the minister indicated that the thinking of the government is: How many people can we absorb? What we can absorb is anybody's guess. No one can answer that precisely. If he could answer, his answer might be out of date within minutes after it was uttered. It depends on the whole economic situation. A new scientific discovery, a higher or lower United States tariff, fresh import cuts by the sterling areas, and easing of the European dollar shortage; these and a thousand other factors may change our absorptive capacity from day to day.

What the government professes to do is bring in only the kind of labour we are short of, when we are short and where we are short. But that is not always as easy as it looks. The national employment service may report a shortage of such and such a kind of labour today and may even predict that the shortage is likely to last for some time. But by the time the immigrants have been found, selected and shipped in, the shortage may have vanished or may even have turned into a surplus. Sometimes at the right time shipping is short, and at the wrong time it is long. To cap it all, immigration really comes under two government departments—that is what I was pointing out a few minutes ago—labour and citizenship and immigration; and to the extent that there is consultation, co-operation and understanding between the two departments with respect to employment, number of immigrants, class of immigrants and where they should be placed, to the extent that these two departments are working together and co-operating, then to that extent will the government's policy be in line with what the requirements of the country are and in the right spots.

Has post-war immigration caused unemployment? From 1946 to 1951 inclusive we brought in about 625,000 immigrants. Total emigration in the same years was about 207,000. That many left the country. But many of these people entering the country do not come into the labour force at all. Total adult immigrants, less married women, numbered about 331,000, and total adult emigrants, less married women, about 112,000. Therefore net immigration into the labour forces in the whole six years was only about 219,000, and many of these people do not come into the labour market.

In the five years from 1946 to 1950 about 46 per cent of the male immigrants were classified as agricultural or trading. Most of these were probably farmers or small merchants. In 1951, the peak year for post-war immigration, net adult immigrants, less married women, came to about 85,700, and about 28 per cent of the immigrant workers were farming class, trading or professional. In the first six months of 1952 almost 31 per cent were so classified. As our total civilian labour force now runs to about 5,200,000, and our total of wage and salary earners plus unemployed to about 3,900,000, it is evident that immigrant workers form only a very small proportion of the labour supply.

This of course does not dispose of the question. If the cup is already full, a few drops will make it overflow. But until last fall, when unemployment started rising markedly over the year before, there was seldom any suggestion that immigration was responsible for unemployment. In Ontario, which got about half the immigrants for the years 1946 to 1950, unemployment was usually low enough that nobody bothered. Quebec had much heavier unemployment, but got only about 17 per cent of the immigrants. The Atlantic provinces, which had the heaviest unemployment of all, got only 5 per cent of the immigrants. In the fall of 1951 unemployment in Ontario, though still probably much lighter in proportion to total number of workers than in any other region, began to show spectacular increases over the year before. By April, 1952, it was running close to double. In Quebec the increases were less spectacular and came later, but they started from a much higher level. Both provinces also showed big increases in a short time.

All you can deal with are the 1951 and 1952 figures because the figures are not available up to date. I think the figures that I am using show pretty well the trend in employment, and I think they dispose of the arguments that immigration from 1946 to 1951 was responsible for great unemployment. It certainly was not. The figures do not show that, although there is a marked trend in the road to unemployment at the present time.

In the nine months from October, 1951 to June, 1952 the number of immigrants to Ontario was more than 50 per cent higher than in 1950-1951. Immigration to Quebec more than doubled. Immigration to British Columbia rose nearly 80 per cent. At the beginning of July, 1952, unemployment was higher than in July, 1951 in every single region, almost 58 per cent higher in Quebec, almost 43 per cent in British Columbia, almost 38 per cent in Ontario, 21 per cent in the Atlantic region and 15 per cent on the prairies. It does not follow that this was the result of immigration. Only a detailed study of where the immigrants went and into what industries and what job would tell us that.

But it certainly looks on the face of it as if the last quarter of 1951 and the first half of 1952 would have been a good time to ease up on immigration. Instead, the government seems to have done just the opposite. The government might reply that unemployment will soon give way to shortages and then we will need the extra workers in a hurry. But even the Financial Post of July 5 said there would probably be more unemployment next winter than in the winter before. It had this to say:

> Demand is not nearly as buoyant as had been expected . . . It seems evident now that the defence program is getting to the point of levelling off, so far as labour demand is concerned. There may be an increasing demand for skilled workers but the over-all picture will remain about the same.

Yet in the first six months of 1952 immigration of unskilled and semi-skilled workers was about 35 per cent higher than in the first six months of the year before, a slightly higher percentage increase than for skilled workers. This needs explaining, to say the least. In a discussion last evening on the matter of education I pointed out that you can go to the employment offices across the country and find large queues of unskilled workers, and at the same time the bulletin boards in the employment offices will show that there is quite a demand for skilled workers, mechanics, toolmakers and so forth.

We have not been placing enough emphasis on the matter of vocational training in this country, and we have been importing unskilled labour when there is an oversupply in the country at the present time.

The immigration figures for skilled and unskilled workers that I have just quoted show very clearly that we are aggravating a situation that is already bad. Our selection of immigrants should be along the lines of the requirements of the country, but in the last year we have imported unskilled labour when we should have been bringing in skilled people to fill vacancies that already exist at the employment offices. We have been carrying on practically no vocational training in the country to train our own people who are in the queues of the unemployed at the present time.

That is why I said it was so important that the Department of Labour and the Department of Citizenship and Immigration should work closely together. I know that the Department of Labour has the information and the trained personnel who can put their fingers on any given situation across the country in the field of employment, with respect to where immigration is needed, what kind of immigrants, etc. I know the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration understands this just as well as I do, but he is a busy man with a big department to handle. He is pestered a lot by members of parliament and others, and it does no harm to check his memory on these things.

The Minister of Labour is here at the present time. I do not want him or the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration to think I am lecturing them, but it does not do any harm once in a while for someone in the house to urge greater co-operation between the departments on matters that are so closely related as employment and immigration.

I am reminded by the hon. member for Eglinton that it is ten o'clock.

Mr. Fleming: Two minutes to ten.

Mr. Gillis: I have a few more things I should like to say. If the committee wants to sit for another ten minutes I can finish.

An hon. Member: Carry on.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Gillis: The will of the majority is that I sit down.

The Deputy Chairman: Has the hon. member leave to proceed?

Some hon. Members: No.

Supply

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we shall go into supply and continue consideration of the estimates of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, the Prime Minister's office, health and welfare, and mines and technical surveys.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

The following items were passed in committee of supply:

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

General administration—

426. Departmental administration, $588,333.

427. Commodities services (including the former wheat and grain division) including contributions as detailed in the estimates, $617,872.

428. Trade commissioner service, $2,522,696.

429. Information branch, $177,218.

430. Economics branch, $156,884.

431. International trade relations branch, including contribution of $6,300 to the international customs tariffs bureau, $140,370.

Exhibitions—

432. Exhibitions generally, $286,503.

433. Canadian international trade fair, including authority to refund, from revenue, deposits received for contracts for space, $330,000.

Standards branch—

434. Administration, including the standards laboratory and administration of the Precious Metals Marking Act, $180,910.

435. Electricity and gas inspection services, $598,391.

436. Weights and measures inspection services, $726,231.

Dominion bureau of statistics—

437. Administration, $180,974.

438. Statistics, including a contribution of $3,000 to the inter-American statistical institute, $4,473,525.

439. Census, including 1951 decennial census, $879,414.

Canada Grain Act—

Board of grain commissioners—

440. Administration, $208,577.

441. Operation and maintenance expenses, $3,292,600.

Canadian government elevators—

442. Operation and maintenance expenses, $1,345,467.

Special—

443. International economic and technical co-operation branch, including the administration of the Colombo plan and of certain United Nations co-operation plans, $97,758.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, April 24, 1953

The house met at eleven o'clock.

BANKING AND COMMERCE

Sixth report of standing committee on banking and commerce.—Mr. Cleaver.

SCRAP IRON

CORRECTION OF STATEMENT WITH REFERENCE TO EXPORTS TO JAPAN

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, in the course of last night's debate on trade and commerce estimates, as recorded on page 4316 of Hansard, the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) asked me if any exports of scrap iron had been made to Japan in recent months. In replying to the hon. member I had in mind our policy covering scrap generated in eastern Canada, where well over 90 per cent of our scrap is collected and used, and I answered "No, none whatever."

I have since consulted our steel division and find that I overlooked the fact that we have a special problem in British Columbia, where the collection of certain types of scrap is in excess of the melting capacity of the local furnaces. The scrap dealers in buying heavy smelting scrap are obliged to take cast iron scrap, railroad car axles and other types, which are not in demand on the Pacific coast.

Cast iron scrap has also been in surplus in eastern Canada and in the United States and, accordingly, we have licensed the export of these types for shipment to Japan.

Since January 1, 1953, these permits have covered 3,650 tons of scrap iron, 325 tons of scrap railroad car axles, and 1,000 tons of small cuttings and shearings.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO WHEREABOUTS OF BISHOP CUTHBERT O'GARA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, about ten days ago I asked the acting minister of external affairs if the government had been in touch with the Chinese authorities as to the whereabouts of Bishop Cuthbert O'Gara who was supposed to be coming to Hong Kong, and he replied that inquiries had been made of the British department of foreign affairs and that they were continuing inquiries. The minister indicated that he might have some information in a few days.

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member spoke to me the other day and I told him that I hoped to be able to give him some information the day before yesterday. Yesterday I told him that I hoped to be able to give him information today. I am afraid that I will not be able to give him anything useful until perhaps next Tuesday.

DOUKHOBORS

INQUIRY AS TO REQUEST FOR PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE RE SONS OF FREEDOM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. In view of the rapidly-growing concern of the people of Kootenay West over the developing Sons of Freedom problem and the particular concern of the railroads, and in view of representations from various quarters that a dominion-provincial conference might be of assistance, I should like to ask the minister if he has received a request from the attorney general of British Columbia for a conference to discuss this serious problem.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the answer to my hon. friend's question is "No", but perhaps I should not leave it there. The attorney general of British Columbia wired me for an appointment on April 23, and then wired again to say that he could not be here on that date but would be here on April 30. It may be that he plans to raise this matter when he comes.

DEPARTMENT OF CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

A—Department—

57. Departmental administration, $280,729.

Mr. Gillis: Last evening before the house adjourned I had been making some general observations on the question of immigration.

I pointed out what in my opinion was necessary in order to get the kind of immigration into Canada that the country needed and was capable of absorbing. I tried to show the minister that in my judgment immigration, housing and employment are closely related, and that if our immigration policy is to be successful and in the best interests of the country it is necessary for resources and development, labour and immigration to work very closely together in planning immigration so that we will bring in the people we need and can use and so that at the same time there will be housing for them if and when they arrive in the communities to which they are allocated.

I was developing the point that I thought we were wrong in 1952 in that we imported a larger number of unskilled immigrants than could be absorbed. Figures for April, 1953, the latest that I have seen, show that there were 184,000 unemployed in Canada, and I am reasonably sure that if you take a look at the unemployment insurance offices across the country you will see that the great majority of unemployed in Canada today are unskilled workers. At the same time in all unemployment insurance offices throughout the country you will find that there are vacancies for skilled labour. Therefore it is my view that our planning was bad in 1952 in that we brought in people who aggravated the problem already existing in the country of the large number of Canadians who are thrown into the employment stream without vocational or any other kind of training which would enable them to make a contribution.

I know that a figure of 184,000 unemployed is considered normal. In fact there are people who use the argument that it is necessary and normal in a capitalist economy to have about that percentage of unemployed. The late Lord Bennett used to refer to that army of unemployed as a shifting mobile labour reserve that could be moved around where they were needed. I have always looked upon them as a threat outside the factory gates to the employed person so that he would be easier to handle and so that his demands with respect to wages and working conditions would not be so great knowing that people from this shifting mobile labour reserve could be moved in to replace him. So much for the question of employment and immigration.

The second point I should like to make has to do with housing. The government's own experts on the Curtis committee put the shortage of dwellings at the end of 1946 at 648,000. In the six years from 1946 to 1951 inclusive net new family formations were about 513,000 and total housing construction amounted to about 496,000. There were probably 50,000 houses lost by fire, demolition and collapse from old age. Certainly the housing shortage must now be somewhere around 700,000 dwellings. Last year construction lagged behind and we have not caught up with the shortage.

In view of the housing shortage and our inability to catch up on the backlog, I suggest that the department of immigration is justified in these circumstances in slowing up on immigration and taking a look to see whether there is somewhere to house the people we are bringing into the country. In my opinion those who advocate a wide open door and unplanned immigration on the assumption that Canada is a great big country and can absorb all the people whom we can bring in and put them to work on our unlimited resources are unrealistic. I think that one of the first things the minister's department must do when considering immigrants is to make sure there is a place for them to live, and in that connection the department has to work closely with the Department of Resources and Development.

You will get the rugged individualist—and there are many of them in the house—who will say that our forefathers came to this country when it was a primeval forest and they did not hesitate. They built their own homes. Certainly, and at that time that was possible. People coming to this country could get grants of land. They could hew their own homes from the forest and build them. They may have been log cabins but nevertheless they were places in which to live. But the immigrant coming to the industrial sections of Canada today does not know whether he is going to get a job and he does not know where he is going to live. He cannot just step off the train, pick up an axe, knock down a tree and build a log cabin. Circumstances have changed. We are not living in the kind of world that existed when our forefathers came to this country and hewed their homes out of the primeval forest, as a lot of rugged individualists like to remind us today. Those days are gone.

Housing as related to immigration is a very important problem. I know that the minister must receive reports from time to time from the industrial sections of the country with respect to housing. It is a pretty discouraging proposition for an immigrant to come here with his family and find himself in a city like Montreal, Toronto or Windsor where, if he can find a suitable place to live, it will take practically half of his income to pay the rent. Rents are completely out of line in all industrial areas today. In my opinion the whole immigration and housing policy needs re-examination.

There may be humanitarian reasons for bringing people here for whom we cannot provide jobs or decent housing. There may be reasons of international politics such as relieving the appalling pressure of population in Italy. Immigration may be part of our contribution with respect to economic aid to our NATO partners. It may be part of our contribution to world peace. But taking the picture in 1951 and 1952 it looks to me that wholesale immigration without careful planning cannot be absorbed by Canada under the present circumstances.

I also showed by statistics last night that a large percentage of our immigrants in 1951 and 1952 were listed as traders and professionals. We need doctors in every section of the country. I think every effort should be made where possible to supplement our medical set-up in all centres across Canada. We need doctors and there should be no restriction there except as to qualifications. We certainly need dentists. Let anyone try to get a dental appointment in this city or most other cities across Canada. We need dentists badly, and the only restriction should be as to qualifications. But on the other hand our immigration policy should be carefully designed to bring into the country people who are going to contribute to the gross national product. I do not think we need very many more hot dog stand operators and so on.

If you will examine the situation in most cities across the country I think you will find that you have sufficient service organizations in each of them to take care of perhaps twice their populations. I took a look at our own city of Sydney at one time in that light and I figured that we had a service organization that could have taken care of a city of 100,000 while Sydney had around 30,000 at that time. If the minister's department is gathering statistics of that kind he will find what I have said is true. In that field people who merely come into a city and set up a service organization contribute nothing to the gross national product and do not make very much of a contribution to the country. We need producers.

It is all right to say that we need an internal consuming market—and we do; but everyone who comes into the country and produces nothing takes something out of the pool of wealth which there is in the country and reduces the share of everyone else to that extent.

In view of those factors which I have placed on the record at this time, after carefully thinking about them, I believe that the minister will have to agree that what we need in this country is a planned immigration policy. We need an interdepartmental committee at least working between the departments of resources and development, labour, and immigration. It should be an internal committee that would sit down and plan the needs of the country with respect to skills required to make contributions and to bring in immigrants with that thought in mind. Then there is the matter of planning for housing. If we are going to allocate these people to certain areas in order that they may do certain things to contribute to the national economy they must have places to live. Housing is one of the first essentials, in my opinion, for people who are going to make their best contributions. In the final analysis all that most of us will ever get out of life is a decent place to live. It is a nice thing, and not too much to expect after you have struggled with the world for eight, ten or twelve hours outside, to be able to go home to the sanctuary of a place that you can call home—where you can rest and repair your shattered nerves in readiness for the struggle next day. As I say, I think that one of the most essential things in life is a place you can live in and call home.

I think that the only disagreement I have with the general policy is that it is not planned. If our figures for 1951 on employment, housing and the classification of immigrants are examined they definitely point out the need for interdepartmental planning on the part of the government in order to ensure that in the field of immigration the best contribution is going to be made not only with respect to populating our country but with respect to pushing our frontiers forward and building up our pool of wealth so that there will be more for all to share in the future.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, there are a few remarks which I should like to make this morning and I have some suggestions in connection with immigration as well as other subjects. Before commencing my remarks I wonder, just so that we may clarify the procedure to be followed in the discussion, if I could ask the minister whether he cares at this time to make a statement on the other two branches of his department, that is citizenship and Indian affairs, in order that all of his general statement may be before us as we come to conclude the general discussion on this particular item. On the other hand, perhaps he would prefer to follow the course of making his statements on the other two branches when we reach those items—in which case, of course, we would probably expect to have further discussion firstly on citizenship and then on Indian affairs.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Chairman, one of my officials must attend a conference this afternoon and I would prefer to deal with immigration first, complete it, and then go on with the others.

Mr. Fulton: I see. In that case, Mr. Chairman, probably a general discussion at this stage will be fairly well confined to immigration, although I hope the minister will not tie us down too closely because I have a suggestion to make at the outset with respect to the name of the department. Now it is called the Department of Citizenship and Immigration yet it deals with Indian affairs. If the Indians of Canada were citizens in all respects—full citizens—then there would be no point to the suggestion which I am about to make. But, since there are certain respects in which they are not in exactly the same position as those who are Canadian citizens, and since it is an effort of government policy subscribed to and supported by this house and the country as a whole to bring Indians to the point where they may be citizens without differentiation, I think that the name of the department should be extended to include the word "Indian". That would indicate to the country as a whole, and particularly to the Indian population, the importance which is attached to the work of looking after Indians in Canada. It might be a bulky or rather lengthy name but I do not think it would be too long, in view of its importance, to call it the Department of Citizenship, Immigration and Indian Affairs. I hope the minister will cause the necessary amendment to be made to the statute setting up his department to give reflection to the concern which I know the department and he, as well as others of us, do feel about the importance of this subject.

Last night the minister made a general statement on immigration which was a review of previous performance and then it purported to be a statement of policy for the future. The minister in introducing the second part of his remarks said at page 4328 of Hansard:

> And now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to take just a very brief look at the future.
> [Mr. Fulton.]

We hoped that we would get a very definite and positive statement of government policy, but I feel that most of us who hoped that will be disappointed in that the minister's statement, while a statement of broad general principles, was not what we had hoped to have in the way of a statement of policy. There is in it no indication of specific objectives or of specific limits of the broad general principles which are going to be applied by the government in giving effect to those principles. In view of the importance of the subject I do think that we are entitled to know just what the concrete, positive program of the government is with respect to immigration into Canada in the next few years. To what countries are we to look for the major sources of inflow of population? What limits of numbers or what objectives with respect to total immigration has the government in mind or what is it seeking to achieve in bringing people into Canada? About the only indication that we have, and it is pretty general and vague, is contained in these words on page 4328 of Hansard:

> —the government will continue its program of immigration to stimulate Canadian growth and Canadian development.

We are still left with the question, quite unanswered, of exactly what that means in terms of numbers of people coming into Canada, and arrangements for their reception, their employment and their housing—all matters which, as the member for Cape Breton South has pointed out, go hand in hand with immigration policy. We are left without any information on those specific subjects and I must say, Mr. Chairman, that although the minister refers to a program of immigration to stimulate Canadian growth and development, and says that such is the government's policy, my impression is rather to the contrary. My impression is that the government is certainly not doing very much to stimulate immigration in the sense that it will contribute to the growth of Canada, but rather the government is following an extremely cautious policy. I have the feeling, anyway, that there is some slight pressure on the brake pedal, and that rather than stimulating the growth and development of Canada we are hardly keeping pace—if we are in fact keeping pace it is only just keeping pace—with the demand which, as the minister said, the nature and future of Canada makes for an increase in population. In particular, we are hardly keeping pace with the demand for farm workers. I think anyone coming from an agricultural constituency will agree that there is a considerable shortage of farm workers, and that the government's immigration policy does not seem to be in tune with the necessities in that regard.

It seems to me that if we look at the succeeding paragraphs of the minister's statements, they bear out the contention that the government is not stimulating anything in this connection, but is applying a slight pressure on the brake pedal rather than on the accelerator. In order that we may intelligently and fully discuss this subject of immigration, I say again that we should know the government's objectives, and not just in the broad general terms which the minister used in his statement. At that time he said something to the effect that Canada could benefit by an increase in population, both with respect to the development of our own resources and to ensure world peace. I do not think those objectives are quite sufficient to enable us to discuss immigration policy intelligently. There are, of course, certain general statements of principles with respect to immigration with which I think everyone would agree, and that is about as far as the minister has gone.

Everyone realizes that an immigration policy must be realistic, and it must be in tune with the country's capacity to absorb extra people. In this respect I think that the words "capacity to absorb" must be understood in the sense of providing them with employment and accommodation. I believe this phrase is intended to convey the impression of absorbing them in the physical sense as well as absorbing them in the cultural or moral sense. We must not bring in people more quickly than the national structure of Canada, in terms of national culture and national development, will absorb, because this is Canada. We want to develop it, not to change it. These limitations, that we must not bring in people faster than we can absorb them in either the physical or the cultural sense, are I think agreed upon by everyone in the house. I think it is agreed by everyone also that Canada's capacity to absorb in both senses is enormous. What we want to discuss then is the practical application of a policy of immigration which would apply these general principles which the minister has laid down and with which we all agree. But we have not very much yet in the way of statements from the government as to their policy which would enable us to have a factual discussion of these estimates.

I hope that in the course of the discussion, perhaps when he replies to the general remarks which will be made, the minister will give us something more definite in terms of the government's objectives as to the numbers being brought in here and the ways in which arrangements will be made for those who come here to be received, housed and provided with employment. I am speaking of arrangements along the lines suggested by the member for Cape Breton South for integrating the policy of the minister's department with that of the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Resources and Development, so that full employment and housing can be carefully integrated with immigration programs. I think we would be interested also to know what sort of machinery there is for integrating the immigration program with the policies of such other departments as mines and technical surveys, and to some extent trade and commerce, in so far as those departments have the over-all responsibility for Canada's physical development and Canada's prosperity in terms of production and trade. It seems to me that all these things must be carefully co-ordinated with the immigration program.

As I have said, Mr. Chairman, there are these difficulties in the way of discussing immigration policy, difficulties arising out of the lack of any definite statement of objectives. There are, however, certain suggestions which could be made to the minister, and certain indications of positive shortcomings which I believe are presently observable in the government's policy. I believe that in Canada we must strive consciously to develop a home market for our production so that we will not be dependent as we have been in the past on foreign markets, and we will not be as vulnerable as we have been in the past to world-wide depressions. No one will suggest we can completely insulate ourselves from conditions in the world around us, but I do suggest Canada could put herself in a position where she would be a great deal less vulnerable to depressions outside our borders, over which we have no control, than she is at the present time as a result of her great dependence on foreign markets. It is a conscious effort which I say we should be making to give ourselves a more balanced economy. This calls, I believe, for an integrated program of industrial development and of our transportation resources, both railway and highway, as the population developed, all of which would use more people in production.

At the same time as these things increased the number of people gainfully employed and increased production, they would also provide a greater consuming market here at home because of these extra people gainfully employed. There would be an increased consumption, particularly of agricultural and industrial products, which would be turned out as a result of the expansion which we all foresee. I should like to see more signs of a positive plan of that sort being followed by the government. At the moment I agree with those who say that there are not yet evidences that such a conscious plan is being followed. Consequently, I think that there is a weakness in our immigration policy in that we are missing the boat with respect to large numbers of desirable immigrants who would like to come to Canada and who, in fact, are going elsewhere. We are thus allowing large numbers of potentially first-class citizens to pass us by.

The minister outlined the difficulties with respect to a country such as France, which he said was a country receiving immigrants rather than a source of emigrants, yet I believe there could be more positive action taken to encourage immigration from France, as well as other countries. I want to make it clear that I am not suggesting any undue emphasis should be placed upon immigration from any one country. We should, I think, accept and encourage immigration from any country whose citizens are capable of being absorbed into the culture which we now have in Canada. I believe that, subject to that over-all principle to which we adhere as firmly as any other party, we do allow unnecessary obstacles to continue in the way of immigration from the United Kingdom. The figures which I have before me, and which I want to place on the record at this time and to follow up later in particular discussion with the minister, show that proportionately a larger number of emigrants from the United Kingdom go to Australia and New Zealand rather than to Canada.

The minister last night placed on the record figures showing an increase in the proportionate numbers of the immigrants coming to Canada and originating in the United Kingdom. That is true, Mr. Chairman, but it is also true to say, according to my information, that that does not represent an actual increase in immigrants from the point of view of heads of families. My information is that the increase in the proportion coming from the United Kingdom was largely owing to the fact that wives and children of those who had already come to Canada came out in quite large numbers last year to join their husbands and that it did not represent an initial or new inflow of immigrants in the sense of new potential heads of families in Canada but was rather the result of the reunion of families, those wives and children having been left in Britain coming out to join their husbands and fathers who had already come out in previous years.

I believe that there are methods ready to hand which could be evolved and which would go a long way in removing the obstacles which, as I have said, are unnecessarily allowed to stand in the way of immigration to Canada from the United Kingdom. One of these—and I think the most important one—would be for this government to conclude an agreement with the British government, as Australia has done, under the British settlement act which provides for assistance by the British government for their people to emigrate to other commonwealth countries. I cannot understand why more efforts have not been made to conclude an agreement along those lines. The fact is, Mr. Chairman, that according to my information the assisted passage loan scheme is not all the help it might be to immigrants coming here from the United Kingdom. It might be much more helpful if an agreement under their commonwealth settlement act could be made in this country. There is, so far as I know, no obstacle in the way of concluding such an agreement. It has been concluded with other commonwealth countries and I am at a loss to understand why it has not been concluded between Canada and the United Kingdom.

Then in the third place there are, I believe, certain aspects of our policy which bring us dangerously near to the possibility of criticism on the ground of discrimination. Here I want to make it clear that I am not advocating any open-door policy, particularly with respect to immigration from eastern countries. I have said previously this morning and I repeat now that we must preserve the ethnic balance of our nation. We want to take our country as we have it now and we want to develop it; we do not want to change it. Hence in our immigration policy we must be careful to preserve that ethnic balance. That fact in itself, it seems to me, dispels any idea of the open-door policy. I want to make it quite clear that I subscribe to that view. But what I am thinking of here is particularly the position of Canadian citizens of East Indian origin. Incidentally, I mentioned this problem last night and the minister said he would reply in his remarks. I take it that he overlooked doing so, and I hope he will deal with the matter a little bit later on.

It must be pointed out that these people are British subjects and have always been British subjects as well as being at the present time, in the great majority of cases, Canadian citizens. These men who have been Canadian citizens for many years—some of them, as I pointed out last night, were born Canadians—are yet under a definite disability in comparison with others when it comes to the question of bringing in their relations. There is an extremely strict limitation, a strict quota, of only 250 a year now applied to the admission of relatives of Canadian citizens of East Indian origin.

The result of that policy is that these men who have been here for many years, who are first-class citizens making a real contribution to the development of our country, running large and prosperous farms, large and prosperous lumber mills—I am speaking particularly of conditions in British Columbia—and providing employment to their own families and such relatives as they have in the country as well as to other Canadians, are yet unable to bring in their relatives, a right which is extended within limits of degrees of relationship to all other Canadian citizens. It is extended even to those Canadian citizens who have been here only just long enough to become Canadian citizens namely for the five-year period necessary. They can bring in their relatives provided they can guarantee them employment and provided that their relatives come within the classes of relatives admissible under the regulations. There is no quota applied to them. They can bring them in up to any number, provided they meet those requirements. But in the case of these Canadian citizens of East Indian origin who have been here for many years—in some cases the families have been here for from 30 to 40 years—and have otherwise complied with the regulations, they cannot bring in their relatives because of this extremely limited quota of 250 a year. I believe there is necessity for a review of that situation.

I believe that there could be quite easily worked out a more generous and a broader policy with ample safeguards with respect to the preservation of the ethnic balance in Canada—which would enable us to bring in further valuable citizens and still ensure that there would be no danger of any disproportionate amount of immigration from eastern countries.

Mr. Chairman, these are a few comments on some of the weaknesses which I believe exist in present government policy. They are of a rather general nature but then, as I have pointed out, it is not easy to be specific when the minister himself, with respect to the government's program of immigration, was not at all specific last night.

There are one or two other considerations arising out of his statement which I wish he would clear up for us. Last night the minister told us that 194,000 entered Canada in 1951 and that the figure for 1952 of 164,000 represented a substantial decrease from that peak figure. In reviewing the annual statement of his department I find it stated in two places that there were 211,200 immigrants in the period under review. I was wondering whether the minister—

Mr. Harris: That is the fiscal year. The figures I gave last night were for the calendar year.

Mr. Fulton: The minister points out that this report deals with the fiscal year whereas the statement deals with the calendar year. That would perhaps account for the difference.

There is another matter which I would hope he would clear up. That is with respect to the figures he gave. I am reading now from the text of his statement. I have not it in Hansard before me but it is on the third page of his text, at the end of the second complete paragraph on that page, where the minister states:

> In the final months of the year, while the number of arrivals was substantial . . . with the number of dependents in each of the final three months of the year exceeding the number of those coming here as workers. The figures were 15,616 dependents and 11,944 workers.

That makes a total of 26,000. Does that mean 26,000 per month? The minister referred to that number in each of the final three months, and that would be an unusually high figure. In fact it would exceed any monthly total for the year 1951, which we were told was the peak year. Is that 26,000 per month or 26,000 for the final three months?

Mr. Harris: For the final three months.

Mr. Fulton: I do not want to get into a question-and-answer type of discussion at this stage, although I do want to have these particular difficulties cleared up. I would also appreciate a statement when the minister replies as to the effect which they anticipate in the department will be felt with respect to immigration from European countries by the difficulty he mentioned which is going to stand in the way of immigration from the United Kingdom. I refer to the shortage of shipping. The minister pointed out that on account of the numbers going over to the coronation and booking return passages the availability of accommodation for immigrants was expected to be considerably curtailed. Is that expected to stand in the way of or to create difficulties with respect to immigration from continental Europe, or is it to be an obstacle only in the way of immigration from the United Kingdom?

With these remarks and questions, Mr. Chairman, I think I can leave the subject for the time being, just emphasizing, however, before I sit down, what I believe to be generally agreed as a principle to be taken by our immigration policy, and that is that we want to develop Canada, not to change it. We believe that there are enormous opportunities for development, enormous opportunities awaiting the people who will come here. We do believe that the immigration policy should be carefully worked out so as to preserve the ethnic balance which we now have, and which itself will ensure that those coming here have the chance of being absorbed rapidly and easily into our Canadian way of life.

Subject only to that principle, and to the limitations that they must not be brought here in numbers beyond our capacity to absorb, in the physical as well as the cultural sense, this would be I believe a sound policy on immigration today. What the minister said the government intended to do, but which we do not see any signs of their doing, was to work out a program of immigration to stimulate Canadian growth and development rather than merely allowing to exist such immigration as will barely keep pace with the actual physical demands being made by the shortage of population in the country today.

Mr. Shaw: Mr. Chairman, we too listened with considerable interest to the statement made by the minister last night. We must confess that we have to agree with the hon. member for Kamloops when he indicated that probably the statement was too vague and too indefinite. It was a broad statement, which was intended as a general statement, but we do feel that possibly the minister could have been more specific with respect to certain aspects of immigration also, and more specific with respect to plans for the future.

Mr. Low: Especially during the seventh and possibly the final session of this parliament.

Mr. Shaw: As my hon. friend says, especially during the seventh and possibly the final session of this parliament. We realize, however, that various statements have been made by the minister or by his departmental officials from time to time. We also realize that a number of publications have been printed to which we have had access, which have given us certain facts. We realize also that during the consideration of these estimates we shall have the opportunity of asking whatever searching questions we may desire to ask, and we trust that all the information which we require will be forthcoming.

My colleagues and I have at all times supported a vigorous immigration policy; while hand in hand indicating that we would support a vigorous immigration policy we have also emphasized the fact that it should be a carefully thought out and well planned immigration policy. We realize fully the vastness of this great nation; the fact that it is underpopulated. We realize that its future strength and development will depend in no small measure upon the number of its people and possibly even more particularly upon the character of its people. We realize fully that through our immigration policy we can contribute immeasurably toward the welfare of thousands, tens of thousands and scores of thousands of persons who today find themselves domiciled in countries other than our own, people whose lives have been dislocated as a consequence of developments over which they have had no control.

We realize also that problems have definitely been created in various nations by circumstances over which they have no control, and while our assistance to these nations may take the form of material aid, we realize also that we can be of assistance to them in absorbing certain of their population which might be described as being under the circumstances surplus to their requirements.

We have never advocated nor supported the open-door policy as far as immigration is concerned, Mr. Chairman. But one of the things I feared most immediately after the cessation of hostilities was that in our great sympathy for unfortunate people we would throw our doors wide open and allow people to come in from everywhere, regardless of their backgrounds, regardless of the conditions of health and so forth. But I believe that we have kept our heads during that period, and while we have brought in a lot of people, at the same time I realize that we have maintained certain principles which I think are essential to the welfare of our nation.

I have said on more than one occasion that I desire to see the people who are coming to Canada under our immigration regulations of such a type as to offer some reasonable assurance that they can be fitted into our way of life. We feel that we must be absolutely certain that they have an appreciation of the democratic concept of human organizations. I have reason to believe that a good deal of care has been exercised by our teams of officers on the continent to try to convince themselves that these persons do appreciate the democratic way of life and are prepared to fit into it, accept it and support it when they come to this country. I commend the departmental officials for their attempts to see to it that those who come to our country enjoy a reasonably good standard of health.

However, I am going to be just a bit critical in this respect. In our desire to secure those who are of A-1 health, as we say, probably we have been a bit unfair to some. In the field of communicable diseases we often have to be severe, as we say, although I have reason to believe that in instances, for example, where scar tissue resulting from an attack of pleurisy shows up in an X-ray, maybe as a precautionary measure we have not permitted those persons to come in. What can be done I am not certain, but it does occur to me on the basis of the cases which have come to my attention that we have been a bit unfair to certain persons; we have been unfair to persons who may have been suffering from war wounds and from the scars of war.

I suggest that possibly there should be a re-examination of this aspect. I do now want to be misunderstood. I think we must clamp down tightly, as we have done, on communicable diseases, but I think some of these cases should be re-examined.

I realize fully that immigration is a federal responsibility, at least inasmuch as it applies to non-British persons. I have always felt that there should be a continuing measure of consultation between the federal immigration department and the provinces. Let us not forget that once these immigrants enter Canada the question of where they settle is not a matter over which the province has jurisdiction. We find in many instances that they will gather in large numbers within a province or even within a small section of a province. As far as schools, hospitals and so on are concerned, at least a temporary burden is created. Possibly we could re-examine that aspect and perhaps something could be done by way of financial assistance to help solve that problem.

In any event the immigration department should not hesitate to consult with and ask for general co-operation from the provinces. I think the provinces are quite reasonable in this respect and I believe this procedure would be for the welfare of our prospective immigrants.

I now want to say a word and in doing so I am speaking personally. When a person contemplates coming to this country I think it should be made clear to him and he should definitely understand that along with the great privileges we are prepared to extend to him there are responsibilities which he must assume. I cannot understand why there should be so many persons who have been here twenty, thirty or forty years without having acquired citizenship. As I say, I am speaking personally when I say this because I have not consulted with members of my group. I do think that it should be known to these people that they will be expected to take steps to acquire citizenship in the country. Perhaps I might be a little too severe in that respect if I were the one who was helping to determine policy, but it is just a suggestion I pass on to the minister. I think if that fact were emphasized we would have more of these people acquiring citizenship after they had been here for the prescribed period of time.

There are one or two other matters I should like to refer to. One is the question of immigrants who are sponsored by farmers. I believe they agree to spend a year on the farm of the sponsor. I have had quite a few complaints from farmers that these immigrants have not lived up to their agreement, whether it is in the form of a written contract or simply verbal. I think further consideration should be given to this matter. I have had quite a bit of correspondence which indicates that some rather unhappy situations have developed. I realize that there must be some method of ascertaining whether the conditions on the farm are such that the immigrant should be expected to remain there and carry out the undertaking they had given.

I think the time has come when consideration should be given to broadening our immigration policy with respect to those who are entitled to sponsor immigrants. Today it is held down to those who are close relatives. I heard of many cases where in my estimation the sponsor possessed all the characteristics which I would like to see in a sponsor and there was no reason to believe that the prospective immigrant would not have made a good Canadian citizen. But because of the restrictions in the act the officials had to refuse the application. I think the time has come when a further examination should be made of this aspect of the whole question because I believe we are doing an injustice to a great many people by carrying out that policy.

I do not want to be too critical because I must confess I do not know all the problems, but it seems to me that in the case of immigrants from the British Isles, and I say this after having come in contact with many cases, too much time is allowed to elapse in processing the application. I appreciate that there is a problem of transportation involved, but I am not dealing with that at the moment.

I recall the case of two sisters who were sponsored by their uncle. Their applications were submitted in the early fall but were not finalized until away on in the spring. They had to make two cancellations of their passages and as a matter of fact reached the point where they would have to go back to be re-examined medically because of the time that had elapsed from the first medical examination.

Everyone realizes that the men in charge of these matters have been making conscientious efforts to do a good job. I think by and large they have done a mighty good job. But I do feel that too much time is taken up in processing these applications.

There are in the British Isles many persons of limited means who are desirous of coming to Canada and I think we should go beyond this question of assisted passages. Many of these prospective immigrants are told of the great nation called Canada and the wonderful opportunities that will accrue to them if they come over. They are told, "You come over here and, if you are a farmer, contract to work on a farm; you will acquire knowledge as to Canadian farming methods and then you will be able to farm for yourself."

The hon. member for Cape Breton South reminded us that the idea of grabbing an axe and going out and carving a farm out of the bush and then constructing a home is just something that does not happen today. To set yourself up on a farm, even in the most moderate fashion, is a pretty expensive proposition. Some of these immigrants have come to me and said that they were generally happy with this great country, that they recognized it as a wonderful country, but they seemed to think that possibly they had been misled a little. They complained that they found that they could not set themselves up.

I think the hon. member for Cape Breton South had a point when he said that the question of the availability of housing and all these things should become part of our immigration policy. We are doing these people no kindness if we take them out of one situation not to their liking and drop them into another situation which is still not to their liking. All these things should be considered as part of one great problem.

I do not think I agree with what the hon. member for Cape Breton South said with regard to capitalism. In fact I am afraid that I disagree. When the hon. member was discussing unemployment and so on I was reminded of something I had read only a few days ago which came out of Czechoslovakia. In giving the people reasons for not giving them a 40-hour week the government indicated that the 40-hour week applied only to capitalist countries because by working only 40 hours the worker would have plenty of time left to undermine capitalism. They were told that once they had undermined capitalism then the 40-hour week would make no sense; they could then work 24 hours a day for the good of the country. I do not know just why that came into my mind at that time, but perhaps it was as a consequence of the hon. member's reference to capitalism.

I have no desire to detain the committee. We have not too much to complain about as far as our immigration policy is concerned. We think it could be improved in some respects. I suppose these things should be done with caution, but they may have been too cautious in certain respects. Possibly during the consideration of the individual items we will be able to secure further information and give expression to our views in that regard.

Mr. Riley: Mr. Chairman, first of all I should like to congratulate the minister and the officials of his department on the sane and realistic manner in which they have been carrying out government policy on immigration.

Mr. Fulton: What is it? Do you know?

Mr. Riley: I see that the hon. member for Kamloops wants to make another speech. He may continue after I have finished.

Mr. Fulton: I want to listen to yours.

Mr. Riley: I am sure you will enjoy it and you may learn something.

Mr. Fulton: I am always willing.

Mr. Riley: I should like to point out to the minister, however, one or two small problems which have caused some concern in my mind. I came across an incident recently with respect to one of these new probationary Canadians who had come into the country as a domestic and was in the home of a friend of mine where there were a number of children. These new Canadians, particularly the younger ones, have in many instances been indoctrinated in a way of life which is different from and at variance with our own, and although they are anxious to come to this country and fit themselves into our way of life nevertheless there remain in them certain vestiges of thinking which are not strictly in accordance with the Canadian way of thinking.

In this particular case the young lady employed as a domestic in the home from time to time made comparisons between the head of the state from which she came and our own sovereign. That may be understandable because of the respect that had been built up in her mind for the head of the state from which she came. But what made this appear serious to me was that, having been here only a few months, she was anticipating becoming a teacher in one of our schools as soon as she had a better grasp of our language. This may not be a problem for the minister or his department, but I do think, where there is a possibility of some of these new or probationary Canadians going into the school teaching profession in our country before they have attained a firm grasp of our concept of democracy, that the need for great caution should be emphasized to the school boards, municipalities and provinces which might be acting as hiring agencies.

Another problem is indicated by the table put on the record last evening by the minister showing the destination of new Canadians coming into the country. I note that out of 164,498 immigrants to the country last year only 790 were destined to the province of New Brunswick. I suggest to the minister that through the officials of his department he should try to encourage a more even distribution of new Canadians. We in the province of New Brunswick are not so concerned with the bringing in of labourers as we are with the bringing in of people who will work our land and fit into the different sections of the population where their services can be used without disrupting the general economy of the province. I think this is something on which some effort should be concentrated because we need population of the proper type in the province of New Brunswick. I think that the officials of the minister's department could, without too much effort, encourage some of these immigrants to settle in our part of the country.

When they come to Canada they have the preconceived idea that the only place in which they can make a living for themselves is west of the southeastern boundary of the province of Quebec. That is not correct. I think it could be pointed out to immigrants that those who have settled in the maritime provinces have fitted very well into our general social and economic structure and that with very few exceptions they are making for themselves a very good life in this new land.

I should also like to point out to the minister that we have in the port city of Saint John a new immigration station which has been described and accepted generally not only in this country but all over the continent—and perhaps we can extend that comparison to many of the commonwealth countries which are encouraging immigration at the present time—as second to none on the continent. It is not the largest of course but it is geared to accommodate a large number of immigrants. These immigration facilities are not being put to the best use. All summer they are left virtually unstaffed with probably no more than a dozen or so new Canadians filtering through from other countries. I think that is a shame.

I do not hold the Department of Citizenship and Immigration entirely responsible, but I would point out to the minister that perhaps he or the officials of his department could encourage the shipping companies to bring immigrants into the port of Saint John. I realize that it is generally considered as a winter port. That belief exists but Saint John, like Halifax, is an all year round port and one which should be used as much as possible in bringing new Canadians into the country because it would not only provide extra commerce for the community but would also give immigrants the best of impressions of the new land in which they were arriving.

In connection with the immigration station we have a very competent and courteous customs service. I have often heard most sincere words of praise directed to the customs service in the city of Saint John. The customs facilities that have been established in the new immigration station are such as to provide the most courteous and competent system of handling the baggage not only of immigrants but of all travellers. The same applies to the immigration authorities there. The Red Cross people in the community have become so interested in the new facilities that they have provided a very fine nursery for the little children who are brought in by their parents to become future citizens of the country.

A great deal of voluntary effort on the part of the citizens of Saint John and Lancaster is directed toward making this first impression of new Canadians a warm and a lasting one. In addition there are a number of other organizations such as the Catholic Women's League and different church organizations which are directing a great deal of voluntary effort along these lines and they want to do more. They are very intent upon providing all the comforts which can be made available as well as the warmest welcome which can possibly be conceived for these new citizens.

We have such fine facilities at Saint John that I would even recommend them to stowaways—because the detention quarters are very comfortable and well though firmly supervised. I point out to the house, as I have in the past to the officials of the department, that in Saint John we have the best immigration facilities in the country but they are not being used to good advantage. The Canadian Pacific Railway directs a great number of immigrants through our port during the wintertime but I think that other shipping lines should also take an interest in bringing immigrants to that port. I do not say that we should get all of the immigrants there but as large a number as possible should be directed to that port which has the most modern and best equipped facilities.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that when a government brings people to its country, it should do everything it can to see that they have some place to live when they arrive. I believe it is pretty obvious that this government is doing just the reverse.

I would like to cite the actual dominion bureau of statistics figures for last year, showing how the situation deteriorated during that twelve months alone. Last year we built 73,000 new houses, but during the year the net new families added to our population were 93,000, so net new families exceeded houses built by 20,000.

The Curtis report, the report of a government-sponsored survey, made a number of years ago, estimated that during every year we have 13,500 houses which need to be replaced because of obsolescence. It is therefore obvious that during 1952 alone we built 33,500 fewer houses than were needed to keep pace with the net new families added, and the houses which should have been replaced owing to obsolescence. Now, Mr. Chairman, that situation has been going on for at least the past 18 years while this government has been in office. Today, by actual statistics, we are short half a million houses in this country.

The Chairman: Order. I hope that the hon. member intends to relate his remarks on housing to the subject of immigration. Otherwise, I cannot allow him to proceed.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, I intend to do so. As the hon. member for Cape Breton South has said, housing and immigration are today very much allied subjects. I am dealing with the matter briefly, and I am not making a housing speech. I am showing what this government has to do in the way of producing houses in order to consider that it is properly looking after the people who come to this country.

I believe that if the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration had been really on the job, he would have been continually pressing his colleague, the Minister of Resources and Development, to get more houses built for the people who are being brought to the country. The fact is just the reverse. In the three years during which the minister has held his portfolio, the number of houses that were built each year has decreased steadily, and last year we built 20 per cent fewer houses than we built in the first year that he held office.

Immigrants are finding it increasingly difficult to secure places to live. It is harder to find a place to live this year than it was three years ago. We are bringing more and more people to the country but we are building fewer and fewer houses, and I ask, Mr. Chairman, whether that make sense. I think the obvious answer is that it does not.

The increasing competition for the limited number of houses we have in this country is making it exceedingly difficult for the citizens who have lived here for many years, let alone those who are new arrivals. The increasing demand for the decreasing supply of housing is causing people who have lived here for many years, as well as those who are arriving in this country every day, to pay exorbitant rents, and many people simply cannot find a place in which to live.

I see the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration shaking his head.

Mr. Harris: I was just shaking my head over your words "people who have lived here for many years". If you would relate your remarks to immigrants you would be in order.

Mr. Hees: I am talking of people whom this government has brought in as immigrants in the past few years. I think that the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration should be interested in people whom this country brought in as immigrants five years or ten years ago, and those are the people I am talking about. Those people are finding it increasingly difficult to secure accommodation.

As I said to the Minister of Resources and Development the other day, I can take the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration to places in Toronto where people with four or five children are living in one room and paying as much as $60 a month rent—and they are scared to death that they will be asked to move because of the children. If the minister and this government consider those to be the kind of conditions under which good citizens can be produced, then I am afraid I must very strongly disagree with them.

I outlined in the house three days ago, as reported at page 4172 of Hansard, what other countries are doing to build houses not only for people who come to their shores but for people who have lived there all their lives. If the government would follow the pattern set by other countries—and it is a very simple pattern—then we could double the house construction which is being carried on at the present time. That would make it possible for the people of this country, and for people whom this government brought to this country a few years ago, to find places to live at a reasonable rent.

I would like now to deal with another matter, Mr. Chairman, which is very closely related to immigration. It deals with a statement made two days ago by Mr. Jean Desy, director of the international service of the C.B.C., whose job it is to tell people all over the world what an attractive place Canada is to live in. He is supposed to be our prime salesman; yet, when speaking to the Richelieu Club in Quebec on Wednesday, and according to a prepared statement given out in advance to the Canadian press and obviously intended to be given very great publicity, Mr. Desy made the following statement, and I quote his words as they appear both in the prepared text and in their exact reproduction by the newspaper Le Canada on April 23.

An hon. Member: What paper?

Mr. Hees: Le Canada. Mr. Desy said:

> The two principal ethnic groups in Canada have natural, historical and constitutional rights to which new Canadians of other origin have no claim.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that his statement is calculated to antagonize not only people who have recently come to this country from Europe and other parts of the world, but also those who have lived here for many years. Many of the people to whom Mr. Desy refers as having no natural, historical or constitutional rights have become very distinguished citizens of this country, and are among the best citizens we have.

I think it is a very strange statement indeed to come from a government employee whose job it is to speak to people all over the world telling them what an attractive place Canada is. I believe that by this statement he has said that Canada is a country in which we have two classes of citizens. I do not believe that is the kind of statement that is calculated to make people want to come to Canada.

Mr. Harris: Does the hon. member not know that the English and French languages are guaranteed by the constitution, and that no other languages are?

Mr. Hees: Yes, I do, and so does every other citizen of Canada. I think that that is not the sort of thing that has to be repeated to get people to come to this country. Those of us who live here know that we have our language rights, and that is something we take for granted. I do not think a statement like this—which was intended to be given great publicity, or it would not have been given out as a prepared statement to the Canadian press with the obvious objective of getting nation-wide publicity—is the kind of statement calculated to make people who do not speak either English or French feel very much at home when they come to Canada. I would be very much surprised if the minister thinks so either.

I think it is interesting to remember that a very short time ago the government was quite willing to allow the director of the international service of the C.B.C., Mr. Desy, to spend $25,000 on a half-hour broadcast directed to Brazil.

The Deputy Chairman: I think the hon. member will agree that I have allowed him a good deal of leeway in this debate. I know that he will forgive me if I say that, in my opinion, he did not relate his remarks on housing to the subject of immigration as he assured me he would do. Now the hon. member is attempting to discuss a question which certainly has no connection with immigration, and I must ask him to confine his remarks to this subject.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, I feel that Mr. Desy and his international service are very much connected with immigration.

Mr. Harris: We do not use it in any form for immigration.

Mr. Hees: Then I should like to know the purpose of these international broadcasts.

Mr. Harris: You ask that of the Department of External Affairs or the C.B.C. when the time comes.

Mr. Hees: All I say is that these broadcasts affect immigration acutely because the people to whom they are beamed listen to them and gain an impression of Canada. In many cases, these people have no other way of knowing anything about Canada. The broadcast to Brazil, about which I am speaking, Mr. Chairman, was, I believe, designed to tell the people in Brazil something about Canada, with the idea of inducing people from Brazil to come to Canada. It seems to me, and this is all I have to say about it, very strange that the government is willing to spend $25,000 on a broadcast to a country 3,000 miles away, when it permits its employee to make a much publicized statement—which was obviously intended to be given great publicity or it would not have been given out as a prepared statement to the Canadian press—which will obviously antagonize over a million people who live within our borders. I think our immigration would be greatly assisted if this government instructed the director of the international service of the C.B.C. to confine himself to telling people throughout the world what a fine place Canada is, and not to make statements calculated to antagonize not only the people we are bringing to this country this year but those who have come in in the years that have gone by.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): There are some questions in my mind concerning immigration which the minister may answer later in the debate, and some comments which I have to make on the government's policy. There will be more brickbats than bouquets in my comments, but I would not like to minimize in any way my regard for what is a very hard-working staff. I appreciate the courtesy and attention which I have invariably received from them. It is also fair to say that, so far as the minister is concerned personally, whenever I have brought to his attention any case of obvious injustice or one in which some humanity was expected, the minister always treated me very fairly indeed.

Now, one of the questions in my mind arises out of a statement made by the minister last year in this debate. At page 4263 of Hansard for July 4, 1952, the minister said, in discussing policy:

> That policy is to admit to Canada in numbers not exceeding the absorptive capacity of our country and without altering the fundamental character of our people, such persons as are likely to contribute to our national life.

What is the government's view of the absorptive capacity? After all, it is quite conceivable that one could state a figure today for absorptive capacity which would be completely false within a week or a month or longer. If the government is doing any planning at all in immigration, it must have some concept of the absorptive capacity of the country, and I should like to know if any figure has been arrived at. This figure, of course, would have much to do with the policy of the government.

I, like others in this debate, have read with some care the statement the minister made yesterday. While I think the latter part of it would be an excellent speech to give to the Canadian Club, I am not so sure that we in this club appreciate that sort of rhetoric. We would rather have some more facts. The minister says that he would like to take a very brief look at the future. Later he says that we cannot fulfil our destiny and develop our resources with a population of only a little more than 14½ million; that is a truism. He says that the government is fully aware that natural increase will not alone provide the population we must have; that is a truism. He says that the government will continue its program of immigration to stimulate Canadian growth and Canadian development; undoubtedly, it will. But we want to know very precisely what this program is.

The minister goes on by saying that, to give effect to this, we are now selecting immigrants on a very wide basis. The basis is not yet wide enough, because I do not think the government has dropped its colour bars. I am not prepared to accept a policy which still raises the colour bar so far as immigration is concerned. I do not know whether or not this is hinted in that quotation from the minister's statement of last year which I read, concerning the fundamental character of our people. What, after all, is the fundamental character of our people? Do we differ so much from other people? Are we not a nation of saints and sinners, with the great majority of us somewhere in between? Have we not at one time found in our society those who murder as well as those who live in accordance with the concept of justice and mercy? I am not sure that I know what is the fundamental character of any nation. I only hope this is not a euphemism for skin pigmentation.

Another point which I have to mention, and I might as well do it now, concerns what I call very literally these terminological inexactitudes. I do not use that phrase in its usual connotation. I bring to the minister's attention again the erroneous use of the word "racial". I wish we could get away from it because there is neither scientific validity nor sense to it in the way in which it is used. The minister gives us a long table on page 4325 of Hansard for April 23, 1953, headed "Immigration to Canada by racial origin from overseas and totals from the United States." Now, I submit that there is no such thing as a Scottish race or an Irish race, or to take two different examples, the Belgian race or the Swiss. Are the Flemings and Walloons of Belgian races? What about the people who live within the cantons of Switzerland? Are you going to say they are of the Swiss race? Ethnically the term is outmoded, and I should like to see it removed.

Further down on the list we see "Hebrews". I do not know whether the connotation here is race or religion. If it is race, there are Hebrews of oriental descent who profess the Hebrew faith; there are those of Negro descent and those of Caucasian descent whose faith is the Hebrew religion. I doubt if Hebrews are a race and therefore surely the word means nothing at all. If it is used on a religious basis, then it is the only way in which it is used in this whole table. Again, we are given a table of those coming from northern European countries. But again I suggest that this table has merely been copied from previous years and I want to suggest further that it is time that it was changed. I must point out that geographically Esthonia, Latvia and Lithuania are in northern Europe; yet they are included, for some reason which I do not know, amongst the other countries. I wish these details, which are so annoying and which no government publication ought to have, could be changed and changed rapidly.

We have been told—and of course we are usually told by orators in some state of sobriety or another at some after-dinner speech—that this is a country of vast open spaces, and some go as far as to say that we are going to have 150 million people in this country within a few years. Others are much more cautious and conservative. But what I think we have to remember is that much of Canada or much of these vast spaces at the moment seems to be economically worthless and to consist of land on which we can settle no immigrants.

It is a mistake to believe that the physical formation of the country has anything to do with its absorptive capacity. It is conceivable —and this has happened in the past—that under certain economic conditions the absorptive capacity of this country could be nil. If we are going to have planned immigration—and I think the government will agree that they at least indulge in some form of planning although we consider it to be inadequate—then, as the hon. member for Cape Breton South said this morning, it must have some relation to the employment situation in the country.

Where you have a situation such as we have here in Canada now where there is a great capital expansion going on, obviously there is need and there is room for more immigration. But on the other hand, when you realize that we are short for our own people possibly anything between 700,000 and 750,000 homes, one could argue that this is not a time at all in which to encourage immigration. I say to the minister, as others have said, that if the government is going to have a planned policy of immigration, they must pay far more attention to the housing situation as it exists in this country. After all, planning has got to mean something more than merely financial or ethnic considerations.

My criticism here may be unjust, but the minister can answer me. I think there has been a tendency to have immigration to Canada at the wrong time of the year. Too frequently immigrants have been given left-over space on ships coming to this side of the Atlantic. They have had to take the space whenever they could get it, so they have landed here perhaps in the winter or in the early spring. They have landed at a time when seasonal unemployment was rising to its peak, and they have created some animosity, of course, amongst other workers in this country.

The minister has said that the coronation may perhaps affect the number of immigrants coming to Canada. But I would point out that the best time for immigrants to come here is in the late spring and the early summer, a time which will give them a chance to find a job, to find some sort of shelter and to become, at least to some extent, integrated into Canadian life before winter hits us. If there is going to be a great outgoing of North Americans to the other side for the coronation this summer, I assume that many of the ships are coming here empty from Britain to get passengers, and there should be space in them for immigrants to come to Canada.

Some comment has been made about the position of the organized workers towards immigration. Organized labour is not opposed to immigration. But what creates doubts amongst organized labour is the feeling that immigrants are coming into the country and going into the labour market when the unemployment figures are at their very highest. As a matter of fact, I believe those going into industry each year amount to less than one per cent of the total labour force, and normally such a small percentage would not be felt. But when they arrive at the wrong time of the year, when seasonal unemployment is high, opposition arises.

We have spoken of this matter before, and there may have been some change in policy of which I know nothing; but I want to refer again to the necessity for doing something more than merely giving loans to the heads of families who come over here. When an immigrant head of a family comes to Canada with the help of a loan, he has first of all got to face the fact that he has to support two homes, the home he lives in here and the one where his family is. That constitutes an extra and heavy burden on him. Furthermore, he has to repay the loan. He must save to do that. He has to send money so that he can bring his family over. He therefore finds himself in an intolerable economic situation. It would be a much better policy for the government to decide that the family will be brought over as a unit; the wage earner can then have that much of his overhead decreased and of course have a greater opportunity of repayment.

Criticisms have been made in the past—and now and again I have had reason to complain—about what seems to us to be rather unnecessary delay in the department. I remember a case which I brought to the attention of the department a year or two ago, and in which the officials said that this potential immigrant suffered from trachoma. I had doctors' certificates given to me by the wife of this man—and they were certificates signed by quite eminent eye specialists in Rome and Paris—saying that he did not have trachoma but rather that he suffered from what the doctors called a granulated cornea. I took the matter up with some medical friends of mine in Winnipeg and they said the doctor could easily make a mistake in such a case but undoubtedly it is the duty of the doctor responsible to the immigration authorities to be extremely careful. I am not holding the doctor responsible for this matter, but I felt there was an undue lapse of time in this case between the various medical examinations. Ultimately the department decided that granulated cornea was the right diagnosis. This man has come here and has fitted in very well. As a matter of fact he has had other examinations by eye specialists in Winnipeg who say that in their opinion they do not think he ever had trachoma. But the long delays between medical examinations could be obviated, more than has been the case in the past.

Another group who have complained—perhaps "group" is the wrong word—let me say a number of members of a group who have complained are those of Chinese ancestry. They have said that it has been a mistake to try to verify beyond doubt the age of a young man or a young woman by X-ray alone. It has been pointed out to me that there are no scientific data on the physical measurements of Chinese, that we are still working on a hit or miss method, and that anthropological surface measurements show great diversity even amongst Chinese, depending upon their descent, the climate in which they have lived, the sort of food they have received and their general environment. Hence we cannot work out any set of figures or any set of measurements which will cover all Chinese.

There is no objection whatsoever to the use of radiological films but I think they should be used to substantiate a case rather than as a substitute for proof. There must be ways of establishing facts other than by merely saying that a radiological film shows that this man is over the age at which we permit anyone to come to this country. It is possible that there may be an error of between three to five years on either side amongst those people over 18. I should like the minister to comment as to the extent to which radiological evidence is used to decide the age of potential immigrants.

There is another matter on which I am not going to speak because my colleague the hon. member for York South has said he is going to deal with it. I refer to the case of British subjects from the British West Indies who many of us feel have been unfairly treated, and I support his contentions. There is a subject which was brought up last year by several hon. members, namely the question of the quota which is applied to people from India, Pakistan and Ceylon. There is a quota of 150 on those coming from India, 100 from Pakistan and 50 from Ceylon. I myself think that a quota is rather an unnecessary thing in view of the fact that quota allowances have never been fairly arrived at. The quota suggests to me a discrimination of some sort, and I do not think it is right that in the commonwealth of nations one group should be upon a quota basis while the others are not. These are matters which the minister will probably be able to answer when he is summing up this part of his estimates.

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): I had no intention to take part in this debate, but I think it is my duty to challenge a quotation made by the hon. member for Broadview with regard to a speech made in Quebec by the Hon. Jean Desy, or at least to challenge the way he put it and the inference that may be drawn from it. I think the sentence should be read not only in conformity with the text, which may be reproduced exactly in the newspaper mentioned, but also in relation to the rest of his speech.

The implication that the hon. member tried to put forward is not a correct one, I am sure. I do not think anyone in this country or anywhere else can reflect on the Hon. Jean Desy, whose reputation as our ambassador to several countries is high, and suggest that he has tried to create dissension amongst loyalist Canadian citizens, either former loyalists or new ones.

The Hon. Jean Desy was being questioned on external affairs and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, to which he is responsible, and not on immigration. In these two places no reflection has been cast upon him because of the way he was handling his job, which is to be responsible for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation's international service.

My third point is that while I do not want to impute motives to my hon. friend, I do suggest that he has not read the full text of Mr. Desy's speech. I am sure that if he had done so he would not have made the remarks he did, and I am sure that he will not succeed in the implication that he has tried to make. If that implication is there, then it is the responsibility of the hon. member for Broadview and not that of Mr. Desy.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: If the hon. member intends to make lengthy remarks perhaps we should call it one o'clock.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Chairman, immigration is not a problem of major importance to my native province of New Brunswick; hence my remarks before this committee this afternoon will be brief. In answer to a question which I placed on the order paper the minister of immigration informed me that during a period extending from 1949 to 1952 inclusive only 3,888 immigrants to Canada gave New Brunswick as their destination. How many actually stayed in our province we do not know and apparently cannot find out as I am informed statistics are not available.

I was interested this forenoon listening to the remarks of the hon. member for Saint John-Albert when he deplored the little use that was made by the department of immigration of the excellent facilities of the port of Saint John for immigration purposes. I am happy to be able to say to the hon. member for Saint John-Albert that, on this occasion at least, I am in complete agreement with what he said.

I realize that the hon. member for Saint John-Albert was in a rather delicate position this morning as he did not consider it advisable or wise to appear to be critical of the department of immigration. I will venture to go one step further this afternoon than the hon. member for Saint John-Albert and assert that in my submission there has been apparent discrimination against the port of Saint John, New Brunswick, by the immigration authorities.

In answer to a question which I put on the order paper in February the minister of immigration stated on March 11, as reported in Hansard of that day, that from 1949 to 1952, out of a total of 255,344 immigrants who entered Canada through the ports of Halifax, Nova Scotia and Saint John, New Brunswick, 241,792 entered through the port of Halifax, Nova Scotia, as against the pitiful number of 13,552 who entered through our port of Saint John, New Brunswick. If my mathematics are correct, that means that 93 and a fraction per cent of those immigrants entered Canada through the port of Halifax, Nova Scotia, while only 6 and a fraction per cent entered Canada through our good port of Saint John.

I submit that this is something which should be looked into. I submit respectfully to the minister and his officials something which was pointed out this morning by the hon. member for Saint John-Albert, that we have very excellent facilities in the port of Saint John.

With the exception that I have referred to, as I said, immigration is not a major problem for the province of New Brunswick and I would not participate in this debate were it not that I wish to consider the problem of immigration objectively for a brief time and on a purely national level. My remarks will be directed first to the moral aspect of the problem and before I conclude my remarks I propose to bring to the attention of the minister and the committee recommendations that have been made by a recognized body of businessmen in connection with certain social and economic angles of the immigration picture.

The 1952 annual meeting of the leaders of the Roman Catholic church in Canada held in Ottawa last October decided in favour of a program to speed immigration. The archbishops and bishops of the church were of the opinion that countries, such as Canada, with unoccupied land should open their doors to people from overpopulated countries. In a prepared statement which was reported in the Canadian press of October 9 last, they said:

> Immigration is a social question with many aspects. The church does not wish to pass judgment on the details of policy regarding immigration, but does point out to all that immigration is a moral question, subject to moral laws which should direct and inspire those whose duty it is to determine a policy of immigration.
> The policy that governs the flow of immigration should be truly democratic and any regulations that would restrict, in an arbitrary manner, the emigration of people from an overpopulated country, or of refugees from persecuted lands would be contrary to the fundamental principles of justice and true peace.

The prelates went further and urged that action should be taken to see that families were not broken up by immigration, and their statement on this point contained the following:

> Broken homes constitute a deplorable and disastrous problem, particularly when the head of the family is separated from wife and children; public and voluntary agencies should make an immediate and determined effort to reunite these families whose members already have permission to enter the country.

The leaders of the Church of England and of the United Church of Canada have also expressed similar views on the problem of immigration. An editorial entitled "Population Problem" which appeared in the Moncton Daily Times during the week of October 12, 1952, referred to the meeting of the Roman Catholic archbishops and bishops in the following terms:

It is worth noting that archbishops and bishops of the Roman Catholic church at a meeting in Ottawa Thursday, went on record in a prepared statement urging countries with unoccupied land opening their doors to people from overpopulated countries. Recently leaders in the Church of England and the United Church voiced similar convictions. If one of the principal causes of international strife is to be eliminated a just and practical immigration policy by the "have" countries seems necessary.

Speaking recently on the occasion of the consecration of the new bishop of St. Boniface, Manitoba, His Excellency Bishop Blais, the apostolic delegate to Canada, His Excellency Monseigneur Antoniutti said, as reported in the French newspaper, L'Action Catholique of Quebec:

(Translation):

It therefore follows that all men enjoy a fundamental right which cannot be denied them: the right to immigrate from one country into another, in an orderly way no doubt, but also with freedom, so as to have access to material wealth. It behooves society to find the means of ensuring that right. Men without land have the right to cultivate unused lands and the people of those countries that do not have sufficient natural resources have a right to the abundant natural resources of countries without sufficient manpower.

(Text):

The leaders of our church, as well as the leaders of other churches or denominations, have not only the right but the duty, in my submission, to interest themselves in such a grave problem as that of immigration inasmuch as the problem carries a serious moral aspect and raises the primary right of man to enjoy the natural wealth and resources expressly created for man's enjoyment. Our church leaders have made it very clear indeed that it was not their intention nor was it their purpose to intervene in the technique or administrative side of immigration. They have advanced a formula for a policy of really and truly democratic and fair immigration as opposed to an exclusive and preferential system.

Before concluding, Mr. Chairman, I wish to direct the attention of the minister to a statement which was made recently by the board of trade of Montreal and which is to be found in their official newspaper, Commerce-Montreal, in its issue of February last. It reads as follows:

(Translation):

Upon the request for intervention in favour of mass immigration to Canada from the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, your chamber deemed it advisable to reassert its position on the matter. To put it briefly your chamber is of the opinion that immigration should be planned in accordance with Canada's economic and social needs. It believes that we should bring to Canada only those immigrants who can readily adapt themselves.

Moreover, your chamber is of the opinion that the federal government should find a solution to the housing problem before bringing large numbers of immigrants to Canada.

(Text):

Further on in the same article there is the following statement:

(Translation):

Your chamber has forwarded to the federal and provincial governments the brief announced in its annual report on French immigration to Canada. A relatively small number of French people are now emigrating to Canada.

Although most of the newcomers have found at least temporary employment, nevertheless their position remains very uneasy. The integration of these French people into the French Canadian group undoubtedly raises very real problems. It is most urgent that an organization with the necessary means at its disposal be entrusted with the task of solving this problem.

(Text):

In conclusion, I submit to the minister that there is indeed need for a more realistic and a better socialized policy of immigration. As reported in the Moncton Daily Times on the 12th December, 1952, Mr. Robert Rae, president of the Dominion Bank, added his voice as a leading businessman to those in the church and industrial spheres in emphasizing the urgency of a positive, expansive and well controlled immigration program. Mr. Rae, deploring the absence of such a policy in the present department of immigration, is quoted as saying:

This lack in a country as wealthy and underpopulated as Canada is to be deplored on both social and economic grounds.

I therefore urge the minister and his officials to seriously consider the recommendations of the leaders not only of my church but of the Church of England and the United Church of Canada emphasizing the importance of the moral aspect of the problem of immigration, and I also urge the minister to give serious thought and study to these recommendations as well as to those emanating from well organized and well recognized groups of businessmen deploring the absence in Canada of a positive, expansive and well controlled policy on the all-important immigration issue.

Mr. McIvor: Mr. Chairman, in past years when I have approached the minister and some of his officials about bringing people to Canada from different places they have been honest enough to tell me that this is the law and we are not prepared to break it even for you. That is my own language but that is the way I took it. I know it is true that they will follow the law and we have no right, no matter what the local need is, to expect them to break the law because they will not do so. I tried to get a tailor brought out from Italy for a local tailoring establishment because the owner of the establishment could not get a tailor any place in Canada. Because the tailor in Italy was not a relative the request was refused, and of course my friend thought that the government was terribly hard. He may get the tailor here in some other way. However, I should like to say that if a thing is right and you will stick to it the officials will see that you are right.

There is the outstanding example of a Hebrew family we brought out from Poland just two weeks before the war. I tried for two years to get that family brought out here. They landed in Fort William. The rest of their relatives have not been heard from since. They do not know where their uncles and aunts are unless they are across the river Jordan. A boy and girl of that family have been a credit to Canada. They have graduated in arts and are determined now to give Canada their best because Canada saved the lives of their father and mother and their own lives. The boy, who could not speak a word of English when he came here, won first prize for public speaking in our collegiate.

I give this example to show that the officials have still got a heart. While there may be a housing shortage, so far as immigrants seeking to come to Fort William are concerned housing is no problem. Those who want them brought here have houses and jobs for them. As I see it, we need far more immigrants in Canada. You can travel almost any place in Quebec and there is vacant land. Around Fort William we have splendid pieces of land that will grow beautiful potatoes. Therefore we need immigrants to cultivate the land and who will carry their own load.

As I said the other day, I am very pleased that the department of immigration has been getting a number of immigrants from the north of Ireland. I asked then if there was any possibility of getting more of them because men and women coming from the north of Ireland are able to take their places with Canadians anywhere in any type of work for which they are qualified. I congratulate the department on allowing more Irish immigrants to come to Canada, because we believe they are good immigrants.

I must admit that I have tried in vain to bring a young Chinaman out from China but it seemed that the quota was complete. I thought the boy was coming out to go to school in Fort William but an X-ray was taken of him and he was declared to be older than the father and mother said he was. I congratulate the department on having the age limit raised to 25 years and I am therefore hopeful that this potential Canadian citizen will get to Fort William. His father has a restaurant, a fine paying business, and he needs the boy there. The father is an old man both in his years and in his ways. I hope to see the boy come to Fort William.

I have another case of the same kind but because the age limit is raised the second boy may qualify. When the two boys come to Fort William, as I expect they will, we are going to have a real reception for those prospective Canadian citizens.

I just wish to thank the officials for the courtesy they have given me during the years. I could not have been better treated and, in fact, if I asked for something which they found was contrary to the law they were very kind in saying "no"; and "no" should be said to any member of parliament who wants an official to break the law of Canada.

Mr. Noseworthy: As the hon. member for Winnipeg North indicated this morning, I wish to discuss for a few minutes the question of immigration from the British West Indies. In my opinion, the policy which is followed by the government in regard to immigrants from the British West Indies is immigration by discrimination on the basis of colour. I know that the minister will object and say that such is not the case, but from all I can gather it is about the only conclusion one can reach regarding the government's present policy.

About a year ago I took up with the minister a special case. It was the case of a coloured Canadian citizen, a former employee of one of the railway companies, a man against whose character as a Canadian citizen there was no blot, a man who had lived a fairly exemplary life in his community, who wanted to bring his granddaughter from Barbados. I wrote to the minister and the minister in his reply said:

> I have had the case reviewed by the immigration branch to ascertain whether some grounds could not be found for extending favourable consideration. It is quite evident, however, that Miss Braithwaite . . .

That was the young lady's name—

> —does not qualify for admission under present regulations and in the circumstances no encouragement can be offered.

The minister goes on to say:

> In reply to your last paragraph one of the conditions for admission to Canada is that immigrants should be able readily to become adapted and integrated into the life of the community within a reasonable time after their entry. In the light of experience it would be unrealistic to say that immigrants who have spent the greater part of their life in tropical or sub-tropical countries become readily adapted to the Canadian mode of life which, to no small extent, is determined by climatic conditions. It is a matter of record—

—the minister said—

—that natives of such countries are more apt to break down in health than immigrants from countries where the climate is more akin to that of Canada. It is equally true that, generally speaking, persons from tropical or sub-tropical countries find it more difficult to succeed in the highly competitive Canadian economy. It would be quite contrary to fact, however, to infer from this that coloured immigrants are debarred from Canada. As in the past, favourable consideration is given in cases where the exceptional qualifications of the applicant offer reasonable assurance that he will find a satisfactory level in the Canadian community or where refusal would constitute extreme hardship on humanitarian grounds.

So, judging by the minister's statement, people from the British West Indies—British subjects from the British West Indies—are not considered to be suitable immigrants to Canada on the grounds that they cannot readily adapt themselves to the climatic conditions of our country or stand up against the competition of modern life in Canada, and that they are not likely to remain healthy in Canada. In order to find out just what the records were, because the minister in his letter said it is a matter of record, I put some questions on the order paper. I asked:

1. How many persons of British West Indies origin are at present living in Canada?

The answer was:

Information not available.

2. How many persons have entered Canada from the British West Indies during each of the five years 1947-1951, inclusive?

The answer was:

Statistics are not available as to the number of persons who have entered Canada—

An hon. Member: Some record.

Mr. Noseworthy: That is the record. I then asked:

3. How many applicants for entry to Canada from the British West Indies have been refused entry during each of the five years 1947-1951, inclusive?

The answer was:

Statistics on rejections are not maintained by country of origin.

4. For what reasons were these applicants rejected and how many were rejected for each of these reasons?

The answer to that question was:

See answer to No. 3.

Which was:

Statistics on rejections are not maintained . . .

My next question was:

5. How many students were admitted to Canada from the British West Indies for the purpose of studying in Canada during each of the years 1947-1951, inclusive?

[Mr. Noseworthy.]

The answer was:

Students admitted to Canada from the commonwealth countries are shown as British subjects and are not listed by country of origin. It is not possible, therefore, to give the number of students coming from the British West Indies.

6. How many of these students applied for permanent residence in Canada?

The answer to that was:

Information not available.

The next question was:

7. How many of these student applicants were granted permanent residence in Canada?

Again the answer was:

Information not available.

My final question was:

8. Are any statistics available to show how immigrants to Canada from the British West Indies compare with immigrants from other warm climate countries in the following respects: (a) health records; (b) wages or salaries earned; (c) unemployment records; (d) profession and occupation followed; (e) public liabilities?

The answer was:

Statistics not available.

I gather from the answers to these eight questions—every single one of which was answered by the statement that statistics are not available or that records are not available—that, when the minister states in his letter to me that it is a matter of record, someone was judging the case on the basis of some theory that has probably been laid down by the department of immigration for some time rather than by any actual statistics or records.

Now, I sent a copy of that letter to Mr. Braithwaite, and Mr. Braithwaite sent his letter on to his union. He belongs to the brotherhood of sleeping car operators, a brotherhood that is affiliated with the American Federation of Labor and with the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada. It is often interesting for us to see ourselves as others see us, and I want to call to the minister's attention what the editor of the official organ of that union has to say regarding the minister's answers. These comments are contained in an editorial published in a paper called "The Black Worker", for March, 1952. The editor takes up the minister's answers point by point.

First, the minister says:

I have had the case reviewed by the immigration branch . . . It is quite evident, however, that Miss Braithwaite does not qualify for admission under the present regulations . . .

The editor says:

Think of it! Here is a citizen of Canada who cannot even bring his granddaughter to Canada to see him. Why?

Not because she is a communist or a subversive of any stripe, who might plot and conspire against the government; not because she is an indigent and may become a charge upon the government; not because she possesses some contaminating and contagious disease; but solely because she is a negro living in the West Indies!

That is the interpretation which the people affected place upon the minister's statement. His next statement is as follows:

In reply to your last paragraph, one of the conditions for admission to Canada is that immigrants should be able readily to become adapted and integrated into the life of the community . . .

Then the editorial raises this question:

What about the negroes already in Canada who came from the West Indies. We have heard no sound claim made to the effect that they have failed in adaptation or integration into the life of the community.

If a census were taken of the negroes in Canada from the West Indies, it would be found that percentagewise, they will compare favourably, (1) as law-abiding citizens; (2) as reliable and dependable workers; (3) as persons of good health; (4) as citizens non-dependent upon charity; (5) as citizens answering the call of their country to arms; (6) as church-goers, with the white citizens of the dominion of Canada.

The editorial goes on to point out that there are a great number of people from the West Indies living in Canada and occupying prominent positions; some are in the professions and some are active in the trade unions. The article makes a fairly good case of the charge that, apparently, there are few facts to support the statement with which the minister justifies his policy. The writer concludes that the policy followed by the department is pretty well a case of discrimination against British subjects on the basis of colour.

There are no statistics available in Canada, for instance, to show that the people from the West Indies do not do as well in this country, so far as health is concerned, or that they do not become integrated into the life of the community as well as do people from southern Italy, where the climate is very much the same, or people from Florida, where the climate is not too different.

There is abundant evidence to show that in Chicago, and other northern cities of the United States where the climate is not so very different from that of Toronto, these immigrants have not been affected, nor has their health broken down by reason of climatic conditions. At a time when the Department of Labour has before us a bill outlawing discrimination by employers on the ground of race or colour, it ill behooves the department of immigration to pursue a discriminatory policy on that basis, particularly in regard to other British subjects. In the world today there are about two billion coloured people who are not yet communists. History may well turn upon whether or not these two billion coloured people throw in their lot with the western world or with the communist world.

In the light of the attitude of these coloured races of Africa, Asia and India towards the western world, and in the light of their present attitude towards white people generally, I suggest that the minister revise his policy, particularly at this time when a number of people in Canada are contemplating the possibility of the British West Indies becoming a part of our dominion. I suggest that the minister give some attention to that revision and the present policy regarding immigrants from the British West Indies.

Mr. MacInnis: There is one matter or perhaps two that I should like to comment on briefly while we are considering this item of the minister's estimates. I should like to say a word, in general, about our immigration policy, but I shall not take the time of the committee to do that because the hon. member for Cape Breton South came close enough to my point of view on the matter that I can accept what he said as being said on my behalf. The hon. member for York South has made reference to a matter in which he felt there was discrimination because of colour. I am going to raise another matter which is not on quite the same basis. I have reference to the Indians who are in Canada, and who are debarred from bringing relatives into the country on the same basis as, let us say, Europeans. They are debarred from doing so because of a proviso to P.C. 2743.

Mr. Green: No; that is wiped out.

Mr. MacInnis: That may have been wiped out, but the provision was put into effect by some other order so it really does not matter a great deal which way it was done, because the provision stands. The provision reads in part as follows:

—the provisions hereinbefore set out shall not apply to immigrants of any Asiatic race. The classes of persons admissible under the order include: The husband or wife; the son, daughter, brother or sister, together with husband or wife and unmarried children; the father or mother; the orphan nephew or niece under 21 years of age; of any person legally resident in Canada who is in a position to receive and care for such relatives. The term "orphan" referred to in this section means a child bereaved of both parents.

A person entering Canada to marry a legal resident thereof; provided the prospective husband is able to maintain his intended wife.

These provisions do not apply to persons of the Asiatic race. I am just going to refer on this occasion to the East Indians in Canada. Because of the relation of India to the commonwealth and, consequently, to Canada I consider that these people are on a different basis. Besides that, there are so few of them in Canada that no question as to balance of population or no difficulties would arise if the provisions of this order were to apply to East Indians as well as to Europeans. I believe the minister has a brief on this subject from the East Indians in British Columbia. As a matter of fact, the paper I have in my hand is purportedly a copy of that brief.

The hon. member for York South referred to the dangerous situation which exists in the world today, where the coloured races, regardless of their nationality, are beginning to feel the discrimination by the white races in a way in which they never felt it before. If there were no other reason but that of self-interest, I believe that we should do everything possible to take away every vestige of reason for discontent or for turning these Asiatic peoples to totalitarian countries or philosophies. As a matter of fact, we have a great deal to make up for; that is, there is a great deal that we should ask the Asiatics to forgive us for, and we should try to make what amends we can. It would be good for them and it would be good for us and, for that reason, it would be good for the whole world at large because it would be associating these Asiatic people—of whom there are such vast numbers—with us in trying to build a world on democratic principles.

I would therefore suggest to the minister that he give this matter real consideration. I quite agree that it is a problem not of his making. He inherited it and it is now a matter of government policy. But I would suggest to him that he try to use his undoubted influence in getting a change in government policy. From past experience I know that he can do that. I would suggest to him that he try it again.

There is one other matter to which I want to refer; and this is an old one with me, in a different way. In the diplomatic gallery the other day we had a young man who is the coming ruler of, shall I say, an eastern people. He was accorded a wonderful reception in this country. I myself felt a little bit embarrassed over the reception given him as compared with the reception that we gave the people he is to rule over when they were here. A number of people of Japanese origin —some of whom were Canadian citizens and some were not—were caught in Japan at the outbreak of the war. I believe that some of those people were forced into the Japanese army. After the evacuation from the west coast, considerable numbers of Japanese—some Canadian citizens and some who were not—were returned to Japan; it was, theoretically, voluntary repatriation. But among those who understand the psychology of the time in which that event took place, I think few would say there was anything voluntary about it.

I understand that some of those people now want to return to Canada, and I am not so sure that some of them have not done so. However, I believe they are finding some difficulty in returning. I would ask the minister to take that matter under consideration. If we want to be friendly with the Japanese nation, I would say that by doing justice to these people we would be doing more towards cementing that friendship than we accomplish by making a great ado about Prince Akihito. As for myself, I felt that demonstration to be a little bit cheap, considering what we have done to these people.

In all earnestness I suggest to the minister that he take into consideration those two questions I have mentioned, and give them his serious attention. I hope he will see what he can do to remove the reasons for discontent and what is actually discrimination in the case of the East Indians, and that he will also take up the other matter I mentioned.

I hope the minister will notice that I have not indulged in any criticism. There is no one whom I would be sorrier to criticize, and I should hate to be obliged to do so on some future occasion.

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Chairman, there is a matter I wish to bring to the attention of the minister, namely the plight of the Canadian citizens of oriental origin who have relatives still in the Far East. Canadian Chinese still experience considerable difficulty in obtaining permission for their close relatives to come to this country. While I am not in any way advocating any general increase in the amount of oriental immigration, yet for anyone who lives, as I do, in close proximity to a number of our Canadian Chinese, it is not hard to realize the anguish which parents suffer because they are not able to bring their children from communist China to this country; and that statement applies also to other people who have close relatives in communist China and cannot get them out. When I am at home I do not think a week passes that some Chinese Canadian does not come and visit me and ask me if I can do something to help him bring his child, or an aged parent or some other close relative to this country. As the minister knows, I have had a fairly extensive correspondence with his department on some cases.

When these relatives have been able to get as far as Hong Kong, owing to various difficulties there, it seems particularly difficult for them to get out of that country and come to Canada. I know that since the Chinese Immigration Act was repealed there has been an increase in the number of Chinese who have come here, and that the classes of relatives that can be brought out have been extended so that now husbands, unmarried children up to 19, and up to 21 in certain circumstances, and, as the hon. member for Fort William intimated, even children up to the age of 25, under very special circumstances, may be brought in; but the number of cases of children between the ages of 21 and 25 admitted to this country is extremely limited.

When I was speaking on this subject a couple of years ago the minister said that one of the main difficulties was in the shortage of staff at the Hong Kong office. Surely that situation should have been remedied by this time, and there should now be adequate staff to cope with those refugees who have reached Hong Kong. But according to the table that was placed on Hansard yesterday, at page 4325, there has been a reduction of over 300 Chinese immigrants to this country in the last year. The figures for 1951 are given as 2,697, as opposed to 2,313 for the calendar year 1952. I admit that these figures compare favourably with those that have been given for such years as 1949, when only some 794 were brought into this country.

The Canadian Chinese, particularly those living on Vancouver island, for many years have been maintaining their relatives who have reached Hong Kong. They have been sending large sums of money to them. They have also been sending money by devious methods to their relatives who still remain on the mainland of China, but they feel that their relatives there do not get all the money that is sent to them. They believe that there is a system of extortion or blackmail to which considerable donations have to be made by the people in China before they receive the money which their Canadian relatives have sent to them.

As for the lot of those unfortunate people who are in Hong Kong, they are simply stranded there. In a great many instances they are not able to return to their native villages in communist China because of the danger to their very lives if they went back home. I am not going to raise any individual cases because I have taken them up with the minister and his departmental officials; but I do feel that if anything could be done during this period of stress to enable some more of the close relatives to come to Canada, and not place such very strict regulations upon tests which are applied, it would be of great assistance to these people.

I have had cases where affidavits have been produced, not only by Chinese relatives but also by the white employers on Vancouver island, declaring that certain children were born at certain times. Unfortunately, when the individual has presented himself at the Hong Kong office he has not been granted a permit because it has been extraordinarily difficult for him to prove that he is the child of the parent who has made application for his entry to Canada, and he has found it difficult to answer some of the questions which are put to him in connection with other relatives living in China, uncles and so forth.

The question of age also crops up again and again. They are still having these X-ray pictures taken, and quite frequently they do not establish or confirm the age that has been given. There is a feeling that, owing to the malnutrition of the children during the past 20 years, the bone development has not been normal. Therefore I do make a plea for our Canadian Chinese citizens, who are loyal citizens, and urge that a little more latitude be granted to them in connection with bringing their close relatives to this country; and, where reasonable evidence is produced, that at least the benefit of the doubt should be given to the child who presents himself at the Hong Kong office.

Very much the same factors apply to our East Indian citizens. They have been granted citizenship rights, but of course they do not enjoy all the citizenship rights in so far as bringing their close relatives into this country is concerned. The East Indians live in fairly substantial numbers around Victoria. They have made their contribution to the economic and cultural life of British Columbia. They are law-abiding, hard-working citizens, and they feel very keenly that they are not permitted to bring in their close relatives.

I believe that certain quotas have been set. I am not quite certain, but I think it is between 200 and 250 for India and Pakistan. I did notice that, according to the table which was published in Hansard, and to which I have referred already, only 168 East Indians were permitted to come into Canada last year, and in the year before that only 97. So it seems to me that we are nowhere near reaching the quota, if it is, as has already been said here, between 200 and 250. And yet I have been told that in making application, or supporting applications being made—I am thinking particularly of one man who served in the British army as a driver in the first war and was very anxious to come to Canada to join relatives here, but the quota had already been filled.

I must ask the minister what the quota is. If it is what I have been led to believe, that is somewhere in the neighbourhood of 200, it is quite obvious that it has not been filled in the last two years. While applications of those applying for this year's quota have not been granted, I do hope it will be possible to give consideration to those who are eligible to come to this country and that the full quota be admitted.

Mr. Sinnott: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words on immigration and I join with previous speakers in thanking the minister for the co-operation he has given me in the past in regard to certain cases. The hon. member for York South referred to British Honduras or British West Indies. In my particular case a young gentleman would have been deprived of his Canadian citizenship if it had not been for the co-operation which I received from the minister. This young man is now teaching in one of the schools in Springfield constituency, and I think he is one of the kindliest, most intelligent and well-mannered persons we would hope to see.

They were having some difficulty in obtaining a teacher for this particular district, and as this man seemed to meet their needs they came to me and expressed the wish that he come back again. The result was that through the co-operation of the minister he is now back on the job and the whole district is satisfied. I imagine there are many more men with similar ability in British Honduras.

While I have no objection to immigration, I think those on the other side should be very watchful to see that immigrants who come to this country are carefully selected. This should not be on the basis of racial discrimination or anything like that, but they should meet the medical and political qualifications.

I have referred before to a couple who slipped through the immigration department a year or two ago when suffering from a serious malady. They first stayed with relatives on a farm in Windsor and then they came to western Canada where they soon found themselves in the position where they could not take care of themselves. For medical aid and other assistance, they came to the municipality where I reside. That couple is now costing the municipality $40 a month or $480 a year. After ten years it will have cost that municipality $4,800 in addition to the medical attention they will have received.

That is not a good type of immigration. That is the type of immigrant we should keep away from this country. The people of this municipality have had placed upon their shoulders a financial burden when actually they have enough of a financial burden to take care of their own families.

I urge upon the minister to make sure that in future the screening is carefully done, because this is a serious matter. It would be almost impossible to deport these people after they have been here for so long, but they are proving a serious burden upon the municipality in which I reside. During the past year, we know, certain officials on the other side have been quite lax. I believe this matter has been taken care of. I urge the minister to make sure that some of the things which have happened in the past do not recur in the future.

I should like to say a word about our farm immigration. Applications are being made by people to come to this country as farm workers which have never been lived up to. Many of these immigrants have been taken from the railway station and have never reached the farm at all. They have gone into industry in the city. This sort of thing should be stopped. The type of immigrant who will adopt these fraudulent means is not a good type of citizen to begin with. Strong measures should be taken to see that those who come here to work on a farm should live up to their obligations.

Representing this municipality as I have for some years, I can readily understand the financial burden that may be placed upon a municipality by the wrong kind of immigration. This matter has been raised by hon. members on the other side. While we are on this subject we should thoroughly discuss and attempt to mould this policy in order that we can get the most out of it.

This parliament is the parent governing body in Canada. While immigration is good for the country, at times it does cause a shortage of housing, a shortage of schools and a shortage of teachers. I think as a federal parliament we could go much farther toward helping these hard-pressed municipalities. All one needs to do is to look around and see the shortage there is in school rooms and how much it is costing these municipalities to take care of these citizens who are coming to this country. It is a good thing to have them come here, but I think that we as a federal parliament should go further to help these municipalities with their present difficulties.

Mr. Thatcher: Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the main issue which should be decided by this debate is, how many immigrants does Canada want in 1953? I notice that last evening the minister did not state the figure which the government believed should come in, and I noticed also that most speakers so far have not been specific. I say quite frankly, I believe that we have not been bringing enough people to Canada this past year or so. I certainly believe that our immigration policy should be based on our absorptive capacity. But I am going to suggest that certainly in the last year that absorptive capacity has not been reached.

Certain remarks have been made in the house today that we have to watch unemployment. Of course that is sensible, but I repeat what I have said earlier, that every time a person picks up a daily newspaper he finds not columns of "help wanted" advertisements but page after page. I have in my hand at the moment today's Toronto Telegram and there are six or seven pages of help wanted advertisements seeking bricklayers, electricians, painters, domestics, unskilled workers, shippers, service station attendants, teachers, chauffeurs, bookkeepers and so on.

An hon. Member: Hardware men.

Mr. Thatcher: Yes, certainly; hardware men are wanted.

An hon. Member: Hardware merchants.

Mr. Thatcher: In my opinion, no matter what city you mention, there is an acute and all-pervading labour shortage today. Many schools in my province are closed, and I believe also in other provinces, because teachers cannot be obtained. We have hospitals that are having great difficulty in carrying on operations, because they cannot get nurses and attendants. As has been mentioned by the hon. member for Springfield, many farmers cannot get farm help. Factories have had to curtail operations because in some cases they cannot obtain skilled workers.

I think there is room in Canada for thousands of domestics. I believe there is also room for a great many more unskilled workers. The way our industry is expanding today, there are not even enough workmen for those industries that are past the blueprint stage, let alone enough men for future expansion. Suppose the Minister of Defence Production decides this year that the nation is going to go ahead with the St. Lawrence seaway. Where would we get the men to build it? What would happen if the Minister of Agriculture decided to go ahead with the South Saskatchewan river project? Where would he get 10,000 workmen to build it? What if our gold mines should open again? Where are we going to get men to operate them?

An hon. Member: From the unemployed.

Mr. Thatcher: I say it is folly for Canada to be short of workmen as we are today, when there are so many people in western Europe who want to emigrate to Canada. During the current session of parliament I have heard two main problems discussed again and again; the loss of our overseas markets for farm products, and high taxation. I think immigration can help solve both these problems or at least alleviate them. If we brought more people to our country we would have a larger and more stable domestic market for our farm products, at a time when we have lost many of our English markets. I also think that if immigration were more extensive the fantastic tax burden which Canadians are called upon to bear today could be spread out among more people. If the tax bill against production in Canada cannot be lowered, and apparently the government feels it cannot, then it seems to me it is sensible for us to step up production by immigration. It seems logical to me that the more rapidly our population increases, the sooner we can expect tax relief.

We have heard a great deal about the problems of the railroads during this session. I suggest that a larger population would ease some of the problems they are facing. I think greater immigration is needed for reasons of defence. In view of these facts, I suggest that the minister should set his immigration target for 1953 at a higher level than last year. I do not want to be too radical, so what I suggest is that we accept the suggestion made in Toronto last night by Mr. C. H. Millard, the head of one of our largest trade unions. Mr. Millard was speaking at a panel discussion held for the benefit of the Toronto business and professional club. In this morning's Globe and Mail there is the following report:

> Mr. Millard, who insisted on seeking some concrete conclusion from the discussion, finally suggested Canada in the next ten years should admit about 2 per cent of its present population annually in immigration.

I believe that would work out to between 280,000 and 300,000 persons per year. I should like to suggest that our immediate objective for this year should be at least 300,000 people. In making that suggestion, I am very pleased to have the company of Mr. Millard, that eminent trade union leader.

There are only one or two other things I would suggest to the minister. I believe that the number of emigrants from Great Britain to this country fell down very badly last year. We only brought out 44,000 people. There are two reasons for that. The first is that the minister has withdrawn a good deal of the assistance on transportation which was formerly provided. The second is that the British government will not allow emigrants from that country to take out sufficient money. I think the minister should be more generous with assisted passages. At the same time the government should approach the British authorities to see if some system cannot be worked out whereby their government will permit emigrants from that country to bring more money to Canada.

I think Canada is also going to miss the boat if we do not bring in more people from Germany. I had hoped that when Chancellor Adenauer was here last week discussions would have been held as the result of which a good many more German immigrants would have been permitted to come to Canada. I say again that I do not favour unregulated immigration; it is only sensible that it should be planned. But I suggest that we should plan for an objective of 300,000 this year and not 160,000 as in 1952.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, I think it is significant that during the present session we have had an excellent discussion on external affairs and that today we find many members on all sides of the house taking an interest in matters pertaining to immigration. I feel that these two subjects are closely related. The problem of population is quite intimately connected with some of the difficulties that are facing us in the field of external affairs at the present time. I do not want to hold up the committee unduly, but I think it is rather important that a more or less extended discussion should take place at this time so that we may have a chance to direct the thinking of the public throughout Canada to this very important subject, and also because there have been very limited opportunities on other occasions to deal with matters pertaining to immigration.

This is the first time since I became a member of the house that we have had an extended discussion on immigration. As one who comes from a western constituency, I am most interested in the problems of immigration because we belong to that part of Canada which is sometimes described as "the half-empty half-continent". As I listened to the previous speaker, the hon. member for Moose Jaw, it seemed to me that he also was expressing a viewpoint that might be regarded as peculiar to the west. There is an old poem that describes the spirit of the west and contains a line something like this: "Out where the world is in the making, that's where the west begins". As we look at our lack of human resources on the prairies it is evident that that statement is definitely true because in our huge geographic areas we have tremendous spaces with very limited population. The province of Manitoba, for example, has only 800,000 citizens, a very small group indeed.

As the discussion has proceeded, many of the points that I had in mind have been mentioned so that accordingly my remarks will be abbreviated. I agree that from the western viewpoint many of our problems would be overcome if we could solve the difficulty of depopulation. As the hon. member for Moose Jaw mentioned, we have agricultural problems that are with us continually, mainly those relating to the marketing of our products including our grain. A population increase would provide a domestic market which would alleviate that difficulty to a considerable extent. The same applies to the perennial railway problem and to all the other matters that have been mentioned by the previous speakers.

I have tried in my reading and my investigation of the subject since I came to Ottawa to discover the policy of the government in specific terms regarding immigration. The closest one can come to it is the rather vague statement made last July by the minister, which has already been quoted in the house several times today, that immigration is to take place not exceeding the absorptive capacity of the country and without altering the fundamental character of our people. Also there is to be immigration of such persons as are likely to contribute to our national life.

That statement was followed by a radio statement by the chief of the information service of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, Mr. E. B. Reid. He said that one important factor in Canadian immigration is its flexibility; so that in addition to the absorptive capacity and the policy which attempts to maintain what is described as the fundamental character of our nation we also have now this further principle of flexibility.

However, along with other hon. members of this chamber I have the feeling that each one of these categories is much too vague to provide the specific information that we need to understand the problem of immigration. Several members have queried "absorptive capacity." It is vague; it is not a fixed quantity, and not a fixed entity. The truth of my statement is indicated by the further principle laid down by the chief of the information service to the effect that immigration must be flexible. I think it would be helpful, as we proceed in our discussion of the departmental estimates, if we could come to more realistic grips with the program and the policy of immigration.

In the few minutes at my disposal I wish to deal with some of the principles of immigration as I understand them. During the past year we have seen a decline in the inflow of new citizens from 194,000 to 164,000 which is something like 30,000; but at the same time we have seen a percentage increase in the number of new citizens coming from the United Kingdom.

Mr. Harris: Not only a percentage increase but an actual increase.

Mr. Dinsdale: Yes, an actual increase in the number of citizens coming from the United Kingdom; that is true.

It has been said on many occasions, and the Minister of Agriculture is an enthusiastic exponent of this idea, that there are 15 million citizens in the United Kingdom who could quite easily be persuaded to come to these shores. I was interested to note quite recently in a press statement dated February 24 from London, England, that the British government has set up a migration board similar to that in existence before the second world war. The statement says in part:

> John Foster, parliamentary secretary for commonwealth relations, said in the House of Commons Monday he agrees on the need for a "blood transfusion" of emigration to underpopulated parts of the commonwealth.

Possessing this surplus population of 15 million, there is an increasing interest in the old country in the movement, as it has been expressed here, "to underpopulated parts of the commonwealth".

As I recall listening to previous discussions on the subject, it has been explained that one of the reasons for the relatively limited number of immigrants from the United Kingdom is the currency problem or the exchange difficulty. I have taken the trouble to investigate the precise situation in that regard. The explanation seemed plausible when I heard it because we are all aware that there is a sterling-dollar difficulty, but here is the situation as I have been able to discover it.

The present regulations permit an emigrant to convert into Canadian dollars and export to Canada up to £1,000 for the head of a family plus £250 for each dependent including his wife. That means that a family of five may export £2,000, which is a fairly substantial amount. The permit stipulates that one-fourth of the total amount may be taken at once and the balance in three equal annual instalments. In addition the emigrant may pay all his transportation expenses, steamer and rail, including sleeper accommodation and train meal tickets, in sterling. After arrival, if he needs more cash than he has brought to buy or furnish a home, start a business, or for any such use essential to his settlement, he may apply for transfer of all or a part of the remainder of his original allotment. If the object seems reasonable and can be supported, this is then remitted to him.

Additional arrangements with the customs department further allow immigrants who have in this way secured their full allowance of cash, but still have a sterling balance in the United Kingdom, to use it to purchase tools of trade which may be exported to Canada and are admitted here duty free. "Tools of trade" has been liberally interpreted to include household goods, machinery, prefabricated houses, in fact just about everything a settler may need for his own use, except automobiles and livestock. There is no upward limit on the quantity or value of goods which may be so purchased and brought in duty free, and these privileges do not adversely affect the additional shipment and duty-free admission of previously owned household goods, furniture, etc., as settlers' effects.

The cumulative effect of these privileges is that the average family deciding to move to Canada may very well transfer quite quickly cash and goods to the value of not less than $10,000. That somewhat changes the complexion of this sterling problem. I would venture to say that there are very few persons contemplating emigration who have an estate that would amount to $10,000, and I can see no particular difficulty in increasing emigration from the United Kingdom because of the so-called currency problem.

Coming along to the matter of what has been called d.p. immigration, the hon. member for Cape Breton South dealt with it at some length earlier today and pointed out the employment difficulties that have emerged from the very rapid and relatively large inflow of persons from Europe. Actually, they make up 16 per cent of the post-war immigration according to my statistics. The total figure in round numbers is 130,000 and those people, coming into Canada as a largely unskilled group, have strained our employment resources to some extent and have created the tensions that have been expressed in some of the observations of organized labour and other groups in the country.

Today, however, there is a dropping off of the influx of what might be called displaced persons. Whether that is due to a lack of interest, the fact that there is no longer a large group available in Europe, or to other reasons, we do not know.

It seems significant, however, that the problem of the German refugee remains one of rather extreme proportions. In fact it is a problem of increasing proportions, as we discovered when Chancellor Adenauer was in the country recently. In discussions with the government he mentioned the difficulty that is arising from the constant movement of refugees from the eastern section of Germany to the western section. Apparently about 10 million people have come across the border seeking political refuge and asylum in the western part of the country. It would seem, then, notwithstanding the downward trend in the influx of what might be called displaced persons, there is still a large reservoir available for movement to this country.

So far as I can gather through an examination of the records there seems to be a new trend in immigration to this country, which might be regarded as beginning last year and is no doubt due to the increasing selectivity that is being emphasized in connection with the movement of new citizens to Canada. Formerly there was a greater tendency to accept these new immigrants regardless of their skills. It would seem now that a screening process is being carried out much more closely. We find that last year there was a tendency for the largest number of immigrants to be people with clerical skills, trade training and even a good many in the professional categories. I have here a breakdown of the figures for the first ten months of 1952. Of the 146,000 who entered during that period, nearly 69,000 were classed as dependents of new citizens who had arrived earlier. Among the 77,000 with occupations, there were more than 20,000 skilled workers, more than 6,000 clerical workers, and over 6,000 professional people. There was also a group of about 18,000 who were classed as unskilled and semi-skilled. They were in the minority, as we can see. At the same time, around 16,000 immigrants entered who classified themselves as farmers.

This indicates that greater care is being taken in regard to selectivity. This may help to deal with the problem mentioned by the hon. member for Cape Breton South, where you have vast numbers of immigrants competing with our large reservoir of untrained and unskilled labour. It is significant too, I feel, in investigating the facts concerning the new trends in immigration, to discover that those people who are specially trained are not necessarily coming to this country to better themselves in a material way. In fact the professional group, until they become assimilated and integrated with our population, are going to find their lot much more difficult than it was in their native land. I would say that those who are coming to seek political refuge in this country should make an ideal type of citizen, because they are largely leaving Europe because of the pressure from communism.

However, this does produce a special difficulty, and I want to deal with it for a moment. Most of these immigrants with skills and trade training tend to gravitate to the urban areas. Speaking in broad terms, we find that at least half of them have come to Ontario. It has been estimated that a quarter have settled in the Toronto district, that is a quarter of all the immigrants since the end of world war II. About 124,000 have settled in Quebec. This presents a special problem from the standpoint of assimilation or integration. In the minister's general remarks we were given no specific information in this regard, and I am wondering what program the government is carrying out by way of helping to integrate these people into our urban areas. It would be much easier to assimilate the newcomers into a rural district, because I believe the community life is much closer and more personal there. It is difficult enough even for a native-born Canadian who comes from another part of Canada to adapt himself to the big, blooming, buzzing confusion which makes up our modern urban life.

We do have some general information regarding the assimilation program being carried on by the government, but I should like to get some information on the following points. It was announced some time ago in the house that the provincial governments were going to be assisted financially in providing educational facilities. I am wondering how many provincial governments have taken advantage of that offer by the federal government, and how successfully the program is operating. From personal contact with the liaison officers of the department, I know that an excellent job is being done in the various regions of Canada. The liaison officer in Winnipeg, in particular, has been active not only in that city but in the western part of Manitoba, trying to encourage voluntary groups in the communities to participate in the responsibility of assimilation and to assist these newcomers in making a successful adjustment to the land of their adoption.

I feel that the government, so far as we can see, has not been nearly as enthusiastic as it should have been concerning immigration. Indeed, most of the immigrants who have come to this country have done so under their own steam and without too much encouragement from official sources. The government, in a general way also, has provided textbooks and facilities to help in the process of adjustment. In addition to the government effort in this regard, I feel it is essentially a community problem. These people are moving into community areas which have all sorts of social welfare services. They have all sorts of institutions and groups such as the Y.M.C.A., the Y.W.C.A., the Legions, the I.O.D.E., Catholic women's leagues, churches, labour unions and so forth. It seems to me that the solution to the problem of absorbing new citizens into our way of life is largely going to be found through the co-operation and co-ordinated efforts of local community groups.

I am sure that if that were done the absorptive capacity might be expanded even as far as the hon. member for Moose Jaw has mentioned, to nearly 300,000 instead of making calculations based on 150,000 or 200,000 as has been the annual average since world war II. If we are going to deal with the urgent Canadian need for an increase in population the whole matter has to be viewed not from the standpoint of flexibility or the vague principles of policy that have been enunciated thus far, but from the viewpoint of necessity. We hear people express the opinion repeatedly that the next 25 years in Canadian development is going to be the important period. That the twentieth century belongs to Canada is a sentiment that has been expressed many times. But with 14 or 14½ million as our population we are hardly going to be able to exploit the rich resources of the north and the rich resources that are only now coming to light in the western part of Canada. If we are to realize the golden age of Canadian development and progress, it will depend largely upon the launching of a comprehensive immigration program operating to bring in many more people than have thus far arrived in this country.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to speak at length because I think the policy for this group was well presented to the house by the hon. member for Cape Breton South who, in my opinion, gave a comprehensive, all-inclusive review of the immigration situation and of the general point of view of this group.

I fully appreciate the difficulties the minister encounters. I am sure the question of immigration produces for the minister many problems that are not apparent on the surface and do not meet the public eye. Personally, from the general comments I have heard throughout the country, I think it is generally conceded that the minister has done a fairly good job in connection with an extremely difficult matter.

I must express my appreciation of the courtesy of the officials of the minister's department. When I have had occasion to bring various cases to their attention, I have always found them to be most courteous and willing to go to a great deal of trouble to get files, to supply me with information and so on.

I am rising to speak, Mr. Chairman, because this is a subject which is causing serious concern among quite a large number of my constituents, especially those people who are organized in trade unions. I have had considerable correspondence from a number of trade unions in my constituency and from the interior of British Columbia on the question of immigration. I know the Canadian Congress of Labour and the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada are quite concerned about immigration policy. They are both in support of a planned immigration policy, but are greatly concerned that immigrants should not be brought into this country during periods of unemployment, particularly the winter months.

In addition to that, Mr. Chairman, I might say that a good number of unions in British Columbia are opposed to immigration entirely under present circumstances. That opposition seems to be somewhat unusual, but it is occasioned by a fear on the part of the loggers and the miners that they are going to be unemployed in the year ahead. It is occasioned by quite a large amount of unemployment among miners owing to the closing down of some base metal mines, and the closing down of a considerable number of operations in the logging industry. It is expected that quite a few thousand loggers will not return to work this summer as usual because of the restriction of overseas lumber markets and the lessening of activity in the lumber industry. Hence it is natural that these people should want to protect their livelihood and not want people brought to Canada to fill jobs while they are seeking employment.

In that connection I want to read from a news release issued jointly by the Department of Labour and the dominion bureau of statistics. It is marked "For release 11 a.m., Wednesday, April 22, 1953." From that we can see that it is fairly well up to date. This is April 24, if I can see the calendar correctly. This is what is stated on page 2:

> The balance of the labour force consisted of 172,000 persons who did not work during the survey week and were looking for work. These, along with 12,000 who worked part of the week but also looked for work, make a total of 184,000 who were actively seeking jobs or more work during the week.

And again:

> Applications for employment on hand at national employment service offices on March 19 totalled 407,742, an increase of 6,000 over the figure for February 19 and an increase of 25,500 over the total for March 20, 1952. Although the Canada total increased by 6,000 during the past month, three regions had fewer applications on file at March 19 than on February 19 (Atlantic 400, Ontario 4,300 and Pacific 6,200) while two regions experienced an increase in applications on file (Quebec 16,000, prairie 1,000). Compared with the situation a year ago all regions except Ontario have a larger number of applications on file although the increase is more marked in Quebec (21,700) and Atlantic (8,800) than in Pacific (7,200) and prairie (6,000), while the decrease in Ontario amounts to 18,300.

It is quite reasonable for unemployed loggers and miners to look with a certain amount of disfavour on the bringing to this country of large numbers of immigrants unless their employment is planned and they have jobs to go to without displacing others. Just a few minutes ago the hon. member for Springfield made some reference to people who have come from Europe to go on farms. I will tell you this, Mr. Chairman. From my experience a very small percentage of those people stayed on the farms. Some of them simply said they were farmers in order to come to Canada, and in some cases they never went near the farm. I have had farmers tell me that the men never turned up, and that in other cases they stayed on the farm for a month or two and then disappeared somewhere in this country. I expect some of them are now running secondhand stores.

Mr. Gillis: Or a hot dog stand.

Mr. Herridge: Or a hot dog stand, as the hon. member for Cape Breton South says. One can well understand the concern of good Canadians over the competition they may experience from immigrants from Europe if these people are brought in here without consideration to the unemployment situation and are dumped on the labour market and taken advantage of by some employer, as they have been by some companies in British Columbia. While good Canadians who served in the last world war walk the streets of Vancouver displaced persons from Europe are taking their jobs at Kitimat and other places. I speak with some heat on this matter because some of these boys have talked to me about this situation, and have written to me about it.

Mention was made previously this afternoon of the fact that Mr. Millard suggested that we can absorb from 280,000 to 300,000 people yearly in Canada. I want to say without any equivocation that in my opinion Mr. Millard is talking through his hat. He does not understand the whole situation. He is speaking, I presume, from his own limited experience. I do not take any more notice of Mr. Millard's statement than I do of one by John Brown, the lumberman in my riding, or one by Tom Jones, the miner in another district. He is simply expressing his opinion. For anyone to suggest that fixed figure for immigration into this country at this time without giving consideration to our changing tempo of economic development, to the changing unemployment situation and to the housing situation as it exists generally in this country, is certainly not speaking with a knowledge of the concern of labour in Canada at this time.

[Mr. Herridge.]

Mr. Gillis: Hear, hear.

Mr. Herridge: I note that I have a "hear, hear" from the hon. member for Cape Breton South.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Millard probably had not seen the figures that you just put on the record.

Mr. Herridge: Possibly Mr. Millard spoke without a knowledge of those figures and particularly of the situation in British Columbia today. But I am speaking for the miners, the loggers and the workers of West Kootenay, and I have no hesitation in saying what I have said this afternoon. I am sure I speak also for the majority of the workers in British Columbia. I respect the minister for what he has done to direct immigration. It is a most difficult question. We want to receive into this country all the people that we can properly absorb and place in employment, but we do not want to receive into this country people who are going to push Canadians out of jobs and out of housing when housing is in such short supply at the present time.

Mr. Gagnon: Hear, hear.

Mr. Herridge: I am very pleased to hear that I have the support of the hon. member for Chicoutimi. Chicoutimi is very close to Kootenay in pronunciation and I note that we are on common ground in this respect. Immigration policy is a serious matter for a great number of Canadians. I have had Canadian Legion branches write to me about this matter, also trade unions in my district, and other organizations. It is causing particular concern now. I trust that the minister will not listen to some of the suggestions he has heard this afternoon with respect to bringing persons into this country without giving careful consideration to the employment situation and our capacity to absorb them and house them.

Very recently I received a most interesting pamphlet from the international labour office entitled "Organization of Migration into Canada" by V. C. Phelan of the international labour office. I read this with a great deal of interest. It is a very interesting and informative document with respect to migration into Canada. On page 10 I find a paragraph having to do with administration, and I should like to quote these words:

> It is the responsibility of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and his department to endeavour to determine in advance the absorptive capacity of Canada for immigration over a selected period, to discover where suitable and admissible immigrants are available, to control the flow and reduce any risk of failure of the absorptive capacity, and to arrange and execute the selection and processing of the prospective immigrants.

That is a very good definition of the responsibility of the minister and the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, and I recognize that it is a very heavy responsibility. They are dealing with so many intangibles and probabilities. I fully appreciate all the difficulties the department has had, but I do urge that the utmost care be exercised in the selection of immigrants. We have brought into this country a great number of good people but in addition to those, Mr. Chairman, I have met some phonies. If I were the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration they would be back where they came from overnight.

I look upon Canadian citizenship as something to be proud of. I have met some people who have come to this country who were most ungrateful for what Canada has done by permitting them to come to this country and giving them an opportunity to live the life of the average Canadian. Therefore I do urge that the strictest selection be made; that we let people come to this country who will fit into our democratic way of life and appreciate the fact that we are giving them a great opportunity by admitting them to this country, and that here they will have an opportunity to live in one of the best countries in the world.

Second, Mr. Chairman, I do urge that our immigration be planned to meet the actual needs of expanding industry and agriculture, and that every consideration be given to the concern of the trade unions with respect to the absorptive capacity of the country. Do not bring people into this country to displace Canadian workers from jobs; do not bring people into this country to displace or compete with Canadian workers for scarce housing and accommodation.

Before I conclude I do want to support what the hon. member for Nanaimo had to say with respect to Chinese immigration. I have had quite a bit to do with them. I see the minister perking up and smiling at me. I have known a good number of Chinese in the interior of British Columbia for a great many years. The Chinese population of my constituency are regarded with affection by the old-timers who have known these people for years. There is something about a Chinese citizen who has been in this country for 20, 30 or 40 years which engenders the respect of Canadian citizens. They have some qualities that are appreciated by Canadians generally, and I support fully the plea by the hon. member for Nanaimo for bringing in the relatives of these Chinese citizens who have resided in this country for a long time. These people are producers. You will never find a Chinese citizen looking for relief or assistance of that kind. You will always find them busy producing goods or performing essential services.

This microscopic examination of Chinese bones with X-rays is in my opinion a bit overdone. What perplexes me, Mr. Chairman, is this. As far as the old age pension branch is concerned they claim you cannot tell the age of a man by X-raying his bones; that you cannot tell whether he is 70 or 75. I suggested that two or three years ago, and they said it could not be done. However, as far as the Department of Citizenship and Immigration is concerned they can tell the age of a man to within three months by X-raying his bones.

I am not blaming the officials for the departmental policies; but I do ask them not to squint too closely into that X-ray when they are looking at the bone structure of Chinese applicants. I am quite sure that in my constituency I have half a dozen who have made application to bring their sons from China, but whose applications have been rejected. From knowing these people for a long number of years I am quite certain that they are telling the truth, but there is this scientific investigation into their relatives' bone structure, and in my opinion it is not always dependable. I do urge that the minister give consideration to this question, and that where there is reasonable proof that these young people coming from China are children of the Chinese people in this country they be admitted.

I may say for the information of the committee that the Chinese in my constituency are very highly regarded. A young man who quite recently came from China to our community came to see me on a Sunday morning in a hotel in Trail. The father was so pleased about the arrival of the boy that he said he wanted to change his Chinese name and name him after me. I said: "That is quite all right, you can call him after me."

Mr. Harris: Why not me?

Mr. Herridge: So if you meet a Chinese boy in Canada who has my name you will understand the circumstances.

Mr. Fulton: Do you say there might be any mistake?

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): That is the story you want to tell.

Mr. Herridge: I do urge that the applications of these good people be granted; and when I say this I know I have the support of the people of the community. These Chinese people are regarded in the community with something bordering almost on affection, particularly those who have had long residence there. I urge that the applications of these people be looked upon with favour and sympathy.

What I have had to say this afternoon, Mr. Chairman, has been quite brief, but I can assure you and the minister that I have spoken with the endorsation of the majority of the workers in my constituency and the majority of the people whom I represent. We want to see brought to Canada all the people we can support. We cannot live in this great and vast land without sharing it with other people. But we do ask that the greatest care be taken to bring these people in so they are fitted into our economic life and into the communities generally without displacing Canadians, without taking homes from Canadians, and without developing the frictions and the difficulties that arise as a result. When they have come as the result of careful selection and policies of that type, in a very short time they will become good Canadians like the rest of us.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Chairman, the remarks of the previous speaker were so interesting and convincing that I hesitate to draw attention to the contradictions that were so evident in his speech. When he concluded I was not sure whether he was in favour of bringing in people or keeping them out. One thing is sure; he is not in favour of the policy that was enunciated by the minister last night, when he said that the government was fully aware of the need of this country to get more people. He said they were going to do their best to bring immigrants into this country on a very wide basis.

There is no doubt that a country like Canada, 3,500 miles wide and with population only along a railway strip across the country, with a huge hinterland which is still unpopulated, cannot justifiably refuse more immigrants. I do not think any man in his sane and sober senses could argue that way. More immigrants would mean more people to bear their share of taxation and more consumers to consume the enormous production of this rich land.

Take the matter of wheat alone. The people in this country will never be numerous enough to consume all the wheat that the country can produce. Last year this country produced 660 million bushels, which is equivalent to 220 million barrels of flour. In Newfoundland we figure an average of one barrel of flour per year per person; therefore 220 million people could be fed by the wheat produced in this country. If other articles of food were produced in the same proportion this country could support an immeasurably larger population.

[Mr. Herridge.]

The minister said that in pursuance of their immigration program they were going to give priority to wives, children and other close relatives. That is a very humane and understandable position which I think everyone will support. It is the declared permanent policy of the government to make a careful selection, as was requested by the previous speaker. They make a careful selection to try to get people who can be settled advantageously and permanently absorbed into the population. In doing that there has always been a sort of favouritism toward people of Nordic stock, people from the British Isles and from northern Europe. According to the figures in the report of the government a considerable number of people have come in from southern Europe, which I am glad to note. I think it would be a mistake to people this country with selections only from the Nordic races who in some cases have been lauded much too highly.

Then there is the question of continents other than Europe. If the white men have exploited the dark races in the past they have an opportunity now, which I am sure they are not going to use, of permitting the dark races to share in the tremendous riches which the white man has in his possession in the United States, and especially in this country.

Among the races who have been coming to Canada have been Japanese and Chinese. Before the war the Japanese came in annually by the hundreds, but since 1928 at least the Chinese have come in only one by one from a vast population of about 400 million. That continued until 1947, when the government relaxed the strict regulations against the Chinese. Since that time they have been permitted to come in at the rate of 3,000 annually.

The figures indicate that last year, up to March 31, 2,745 persons of Chinese origin came into Canada, and of that number 14 went to Newfoundland. As the minister knows, I have been interested in assisting the wives and children of Canadian citizens of Chinese origin living in Newfoundland to come to that province. If we had received our proportion of the 2,745 total we would have been entitled to 69. I ask the minister to keep that in mind when applications are made by Canadian citizens of Chinese origin residing in Newfoundland who want to bring in wives or children. I ask him to remember that Newfoundland's proportion has been unusually small, and not the number to which we were entitled. I urge him to act as generously as he can under those circumstances.

I know many of these Canadian citizens of Chinese origin who live in Newfoundland.

Many of them are in business, and if wives or sons were brought in there would be no displacement of workers. The children brought in would be able to carry on the business of their parents. I might say in passing that before 1949, when we entered into confederation, no Chinese women were allowed into Newfoundland. They always had to go back to China to get married and their children had to live there, as no children were permitted into Newfoundland. But that situation was changed under the new regulations which came into effect after confederation.

A committee of members of the other place has been discussing this subject. I note from the remarks of the hon. member for Nanaimo and the hon. member who preceded me that this same problem has arisen in different parts of the country. There seems to be a generally sympathetic attitude towards the Chinese. The deputy minister has admitted in the committee of the other place that they make good citizens.

It seems to me that although these people of Chinese origin have lived in pagan communities their outlook is much like our own. They look upon the family as the most important social unit, and they consider the land as the only place where people can be brought up to be good citizens. While ethnically they may be difficult of absorption, because they have a similar attitude to our own, from political and other points of view they can be absorbed advantageously into the community. They seem to be able to fit into the community with no dislocation whatever.

This is all I wish to say, and I apologize if I have delayed the committee.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Chairman, I intended to raise a matter on item 60 of the immigration estimates, but since it is unlikely that I shall be here when we reach that item I hope the minister will not mind my raising it at this stage.

Before I do so I should like to say something generally regarding immigration. I have noted the differences of opinion across the chamber with regard to the number of immigrants who can be received and absorbed in this country, where they can be placed and all the rest of it. But I think it all depends on how you look at it and where you come from. If you come from an industrial centre where there is unemployment, you do not want to see immigration. If you come from an area where employment is high and where there are opportunities for settlement, then of course you can see the possibility of absorbing immigrants in quite large numbers.

It is natural that in a discussion of this sort we should have a good many different opinions expressed, even by members of the same political party. What I intended to say in that regard is that what we need in any immigration policy is a plan to settle people. I remember when Miss Margaret Bondfield came over here in 1924 and went across the country to see how British immigrants were being received. She told us in Regina that when these people come into the country there should be someone who had the kettle on to invite them in and give them a good hot cup of tea. That reception, she said, would do more to settle them than almost anything else that could be done for them.

There is a great deal in that. I was an immigrant. I came to this country in February, 1910, and in the years that followed I saw people being brought in by the transportation companies and dumped by the wayside. Fortunately there were free lands in those days that could be homesteaded. We do not have those free lands today, notwithstanding what the hon. member for St. John's West said. We do not have unlimited land on which to settle people. In those days we had large quantities of land, but even then people who came to this country were dumped by the wayside and suffered severe hardships for many years, although ultimately many of them became good citizens and good settlers.

I listened this afternoon to the plea of the hon. member for Vancouver East with which I have the greatest sympathy, as I have for the plea for coloured people made by the hon. member for York South and the plea made by the hon. member who has just discussed the problem of reuniting Chinese families in this country. I noted that the other day we received His Imperial Highness the Crown Prince of Japan with a good deal of honour, and that was the proper thing to do. I recollect that in 1937 we received Prince Chichibu, I think it was, with the same kind of honour when on his way to the coronation of George VI. I believe he was the most expensive guest ever entertained in Canada. We took him all over the country. Four years later we were at war with Japan, but when we came to the war many humble citizens of Canada of Japanese origin were treated in a manner which is a reflection upon the Christian spirit of the country in which we live today.

I think we should rectify that situation, and wherever there are young Canadians who, owing to the prejudice against them, were forced out of this country during the war years and went back to Japan because of the feeling of antagonism engendered against them, we should be prepared to take them back. I doubt very much whether under our citizenship act we have the right to keep them out.

I think I or somebody else asked a question in the house about that problem of the present Minister of National Health and Welfare, who was at that time steering the citizenship act through the house. The answer he gave led me at least to believe that these people born in Canada, and who had gone back to Japan under pressure, could in all probability come back to this country when things had settled down without any legal difficulties in that regard. I hope I am right in that respect. I have always felt that while we may honour princes and kings, we should at least treat humble citizens who come from the countries represented by these princes and kings as human beings and fellow members of the human race under the fatherhood of one God, if I may say so with all reverence.

What I really rose to say this afternoon was that the department of immigration at times seems to be very tardy in reaching decisions. Whether or not this is due to the fact that the department is inadequately staffed I do not know. I would join with others in the house in saying that any approaches I have made have been met with invariable courtesy. I do not want to be misunderstood in that regard, but on several occasions over the past number of years decisions have been tardy in many instances, and I think unnecessarily so.

Let me illustrate that by reference to a case I have before me at the moment. It is the case of a lady now resident in Montreal who made application to the department of immigration in order that her father and mother might come to Canada. Actually they are living at the present time in Venezuela. Her application was made to the department in the month of January, 1952. Several times since then the department has been approached. The lawyer concerned, whom I know very well—I do not want to mention his name, although I am quite prepared to give the name and also the letter to the minister if he so desires—approached the deputy minister and the inspector in chief in Montreal regarding this case on several occasions and he always got the same answer, namely that the department was still studying the application of the lawyer's clients.

The matter was brought to my attention and I wrote to the minister with respect to this case on March 6 of this year. I got the same answer. In his letter of March 12 the minister said in part:

> In all cases of this nature, it is necessary to satisfactorily complete certain inquiries into the background of the proposed immigrants before a final decision may be reached. In this instance these inquiries were instituted at the time the application was submitted.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

That was some 14 months before I approached the minister.

> While they are progressing, they are not yet complete. All possible steps have been taken to finalize this case with a minimum of delay, and action was again taken recently in order to hasten a decision.

Mr. Harris: What is the nationality of the mother and father?

Mr. Coldwell: At present they are in Venezuela, and I should think by the name that they are Polish. Yes, that is right; this daughter was a Polish immigrant. I know that careful inquiries should be made. In fact I am in favour of it, but I think an effort should be made to speed up decisions so that they may be reached in a period less than 14 or 15 months. That is the point I am making. If the minister does not have sufficient staff, then I think it is up to the house to provide him with the necessary appropriations to get such staff.

I am not complaining about investigations. In fact I would go so far as to say that in some respects I do not think our investigations are comprehensive enough. I do not think people who are opposed to our democratic institutions and our democratic way of life are likely to become good citizens of Canada after they have reached the adult stage. I say that whether they are communists or whether they are not. I have met immigrants who have been admitted to this country who are anti-communist but at the same time they are anti-democratic. I have had some of them tell me quite frankly that Hitler tried to do a good job in Germany, that after all Hitler was not a bad fellow, and that parliament was all right but we did not get things done. Such people should be carefully investigated.

Mr. Herridge: That is the very type of people about whom I was talking.

Mr. Coldwell: When we let people into this country we want to be sure that they are not nazis, neo-nazis or fascists, whether they come from Italy, Germany, Poland or any other country.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): And no communists.

Mr. Coldwell: No communists, I agree. I think the communist is a danger to our democratic institutions, but the fascist and the nazi are equally dangerous. I am afraid that distinction is not always made by the department of immigration, and that we are in danger of bringing people into Canada who while anti-communist are entirely out of sympathy with our democratic way of life.

I do not say this because I am of British origin, but I should like to see more immigrants from northern and western Europe, from Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Netherlands, France and the United Kingdom, people who for centuries have had the background of our democratic institutions and understand our democratic way of life. If we do not get a little leaven to leaven the lump we are bringing in, some possessed of anti-democratic points of view, then we are going to find it difficult to maintain our democratic institutions in the years to come.

I want to say that to the minister because I believe it implicit that as far as possible we should encourage immigration from countries where there are democratic institutions, where they understand our democracy; and we should be careful that we do not bring into the country too large a proportion of people—I was going to say "any people"—who are not conversant with the ways of life that we call the democratic ways of life in the country in which we live.

The two main points I wanted to make were, first, that we might speed up these decisions because it is rather painful for people who are in this country to make pleas time and again to get their relatives in, provided they are acceptable in the sense which I have indicated. Second, I think much more care should be given than has been given to seeing that not only are communists kept out of the country—I know there is careful screening of communists, and I approve of that screening—but let the people who are imbued with the ideas of the fascists and the nazis be equally carefully screened before they are admitted to this country.

I think that immigrants properly settled in this country under a proper plan can contribute to the welfare of the country, of themselves and of the world. I have no sympathy with those who say that we are going to bring these people in to share our tax burden and consume our production; because these people are going to increase our taxation if we build schools and other facilities necessary for them, and they are going to increase our production. Probably they will balance gains and demands and we shall get no advantage, but when we are planning to build a nation in this country let us try to build it on a thoroughly democratic basis.

Mr. Hansell: I shall only detain the committee for a minute or two, and perhaps the line of thought I shall follow will be somewhat different from the speeches that have already been made.

I wish to make two particular observations. First I would like to express my appreciation to the minister himself for the efforts he has put forth in the individual cases which I have brought to him in the past. I believe that perhaps all members might be able to say the same thing. He has cared for any cases which I have brought to him, not as rapidly as I might have expected sometimes, but if cases have to be put before other governments we can excuse some delay. I have one case pending at the present time which I will not bring up here but I will take it to the minister personally and I am sure I will receive his attention on that case as I have received it in the past.

The second observation I wanted to make is in respect to a recognition by our Canadian people of the importance of their citizenship, and of obtaining some documentary evidence of it. I say this particularly in regard to any of our Canadian citizens who may be thinking of going abroad as tourists or for a few months of study. I have in mind those of my own profession who may be expecting to go to some other country on some missionary project or work. I know that such people are not numerous, but I have had some little experience with cases of that kind and I am quite certain that our Canadian citizens do not recognize the importance of having some documentary evidence of their Canadian citizenship.

Perhaps such importance is secondary in the minds of our people because it is something that does not touch their everyday life. Only when they get into difficulties do they begin to realize that they have not paid the attention which they should have paid to that matter. It is easy for young people having some idea of study, or world travel, or going to some other country as a missionary or teacher or something of that kind, to think they can do all sorts of things in their travels and then, in the end, they find they are in difficulty.

I know a case where a young gentleman left Canada to go to the United States to take up some studies. After taking his studies he did some professional work, and while in the United States he married. In the process of time he went over to China and spent a considerable period there. When certain circumstances in China meant that he had to leave he went to Africa because there was some Chinese work in Africa which he had an opportunity to take on and be of some service. The upshot of all this was that he found some difficulty in the first place in respect to the fact that he had married a young American citizen. There was some complication in respect of what her citizenship was and what her status was in some of these other countries. By the way, the young man himself was born in England. Now he finds himself without a domicile and the only thing which he has to prove any citizenship at all is his birth certificate, and that sometimes does not prove anything. A birth certificate proves that you were born, but I do not know whether you need to have proof of that.

What I am trying to put over to the minister is that Canadian citizens should not regard these things lightly. You cannot travel all over the world from one country to another and to another and then another and stay for periods of time without having some difficulties. That is not the fault of the minister and it is not the fault of our legislation. It is the fault of people themselves because they do not realize the seriousness of their responsibilities in this respect.

I was talking to a gentleman some time ago and he told me that when he was a young man he was a colonel in Her Majesty's imperial forces. I suppose he served in Queen Victoria's day. He said he was sent out to India and that he travelled around the world and went to every country of the British commonwealth, and all he had for identification was a birth certificate. He said that a little while ago he took a similar trip around the world and that they fingerprinted him, photographed him, took blood tests, vaccinated him and detained him. He said sometimes he did not know whether he was going to be put in jail or whether he would ever get back. That indicates the situation now.

The Deputy Chairman: It being five o'clock, the house will proceed with the consideration of public and private bills.

PRIVATE BILLS

SECOND READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Mr. H. W. Winkler (Lisgar) moved that the following bills be read the second time:

Bill No. 342, for the relief of Hanus Braun, otherwise known as John Browne.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 343, for the relief of Hazel Loisette Robinson Darby.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 344, for the relief of Pearle Elizabeth McLeod Martin.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 345, for the relief of Suzan Klamka Migicovsky.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 346, for the relief of Olive Margaret Searle Pfeffer.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 347, for the relief of Alfred Roger Holder.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 348, for the relief of Joseph Willie Brais.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 349, for the relief of Gladys Ola Taylor McLellan.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 350, for the relief of Freda Smolar Brown.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 351, for the relief of Marguerita Downie Couture.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 352, for the relief of Howard Douglas Wardle.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 353, for the relief of Rose Brownstien Lazarus.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 354, for the relief of Rebecca Bowman LeFloch.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 355, for the relief of John Stewart Hannah.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 356, for the relief of Harold Speevak.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 357, for the relief of Rita Rabinovitch Abrams.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 358, for the relief of Marcel Roland Veilleux.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 359, for the relief of Mary Gordon Wilson LaForest.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 360, for the relief of Lionel Jobin. —Mr. Winkler.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): I do not know that I want to enter into any particular discussion of these private bills, but I should like to say that at five o'clock I was talking about citizens being detained, when I found myself not only detained but cut off. I just rise now to say that once again this year I want to protest this method of dealing with divorce bills.

Motion agreed to, bills read the second time and referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

57. Departmental administration, $280,729.

The Chairman: The committee is considering the first item under citizenship and immigration. Perhaps at this time I should tell the hon. member for Macleod that at the time he was interrupted it was shortly after five o'clock. Under the rules we have to proceed to the consideration of private and public bills at five o'clock, and if he was interrupted at one minute past five he could not reasonably claim that he was cut off. I thought perhaps we should have that understanding.

Mr. Hansell: Mr. Chairman, I was just making a little pun to indicate the difference between being detained and being cut off. I am not complaining. In fact I had forgotten that it was Friday. We work such long hours around here that one loses track of time. I was asked how I put in my week ends and I said that on Sunday morning

I went to church, and I worked the rest of the day. I work all day Saturday, and I do not always keep a record of whether it is Friday, Saturday or any other day. I was completely surprised when Your Honour left the chair and informed me that the hour for private bills had arrived.

I do not know that I need to go any further with what I was saying. I should like to ask, however, whether or not any effort has been made to bring to the attention of our Canadian people, particularly those in our universities, theological colleges and other schools, the seriousness of the responsibility that is theirs. I do not think it is a government responsibility necessarily, but it is a responsibility that every individual, as a Canadian citizen, should take upon himself. The citizenship and immigration laws throughout the world are extremely complicated. They are not uniform, and people are not always cognizant of those things.

I recall that during the war I was a member of the committee on defence regulations. It may not have been that committee, as I am trusting to my memory. I believe that Dr. Coleman or some official from the state department or immigration department was a witness at the time, and he told the committee that the immigration or citizenship laws of the various nations were not uniform. He gave an illustration to show that it was possible for a person to be a citizen of about seven countries at the same time. That seems almost incredible, but it was an illustration of how complicated the citizenship laws of the different countries were. They were not uniform. I am not blaming anyone for that. It just cannot be helped, but I believe the citizens of our country should know that. They should be told that when they go abroad to study they should have their citizenship papers, their birth certificates and everything else in order before they make a move.

I am wondering if the department could not do something toward informing the people of this situation. I know the department has published small booklets on citizenship and they are very fine booklets. I have given some of them to students at times, but I think they are published primarily for the information of immigrants who come to this country. I am wondering if it would not be a good idea to have some display advertising occasionally in some of our daily newspapers and the more widely circulated magazines. These advertisements could be in a sort of interrogative fashion. They could ask, how do you know you are a Canadian citizen? Have you got your certificate? Are you going abroad? If so, make sure that you have proof of citizenship. Something of that sort might be helpful. I am passing these suggestions along to the minister for what they are worth.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): There are a few remarks, Mr. Chairman, I should like to make on this item. I have noticed that most of the speakers thus far have put the emphasis on immigration, and I think rightly so. However, there is one suggestion I should like to put on the record concerning citizenship. As has already been said, the department has published an excellent series of little booklets. I was especially struck with the value of one entitled "Our Government", which describes how we as a people are governed at the federal, provincial and municipal levels. I suppose it is a booklet gotten out primarily for immigrants coming into the country, but it is something that would be of great value to many native-born people.

As to the processes of our government and what democracy means, and as to the need for preserving and hanging on to what we have in that regard, the ignorance of the Canadian people is abysmal, in some cases at least. I would suggest to the minister, if it has not already been done, that consideration might be given to sponsoring a film to be made by the national film board and following closely that little booklet called "Our Government". I think such a film would be of great value to the Canadian people in general. That is something that has perhaps already been done or is being considered; but if not, I think it might be worthy of consideration.

That is all I have to say on the question of citizenship, Mr. Chairman, but there are some remarks I should like to make with regard to this vast and thorny problem of immigration. I sympathize with the minister when he finds himself confronted with this problem because it is of vast importance and significance. I say that not because I think it is, in a selfish way, something that concerns us as a nation, and that in some way we would be better off if we let people come in or if we kept them out or if we let certain groups come in and kept others out. It is a greater question than that. After all, here we are, about 14½ million people, sitting on a vast area of this earth's surface which is blessed with a great abundance of minerals and forest wealth and great areas of fertile soil. If we ourselves do not voluntarily do something about sharing this abundance with the populations of the world, the time may not be far away when we shall be forced, by drastic means, to share our vast natural resources. We, as a nation, cannot indefinitely retain this dog in the manger attitude about our resources.

Someone may say, "Why suddenly this problem? After all, civilizations have been going on for thousands of years. Why, all of a sudden, in the last 50 years or the last 10 years, should a shortage of this world's goods suddenly be created?" The answer is very simple. At the present time the population of the world is increasing at the rate of about 60,000 per day, net increase. In other words, every day we get up it means that the world has to supply the means of livelihood for about 60,000 new people; that is for a net increase of about 60,000.

That situation is created partly by the advances of science in the last number of years. In earlier times populations did not increase rapidly. Owing to plagues, famines and wars, the population of most areas of the globe remained fairly constant or even declined. At the time of the fall of the Roman empire the population of Europe was estimated to be about 100 million. In the 15th century it is estimated that that population had dropped to about two-thirds of that number. That drop, of course, was caused by pestilence, famine and, as I said before, disease.

For instance, during the black death at least a quarter of the population of England died off in one year. During the last century in Ireland alone it is estimated that a million people died of starvation. That happened in the small country of Ireland. In the last 100 years at least 100 million Chinese have died of starvation. A few simple scientific advances have cut down the death rates and the natural forces which kept the human population down. That fact is strikingly illustrated with regard to the British race. I am now quoting from a book called "Human Fertility" by Cook. At page 54 of that book it is stated:

> In 1650 there were only six million people living in the British Isles. Today they are represented by a multitude of descendants on every continent . . . In 1950 the descendants of the six million on the British Isles of 1650 showed a twenty-six fold increase, distributed in the following countries;

United Kingdom	50,300,000
Ireland	2,900,000
United States	84,000,000
Canada	7,425,000
Australia	8,000,000
New Zealand	1,000,000
Scattered in Asia, Africa and the islands of the sea	5,000,000
Total	158,625,000

So in that period from 1650 to 1950, which is 300 years, you have a population increasing from 6 million to 158 million as the result of natural causes alone.

[Mr. MacLean (Queens).]

The simple sanitary advances have caused the natural increase in the population to accelerate at a terrific rate. Even if that acceleration did not increase further beyond its present rate, and the current increase of one per cent per year were to continue for only the better part of a century, the numbers would have more than doubled in 75 years. This is the way the world population would multiply in two centuries. In 1950 the world's population was about 2·3 billion. In 70 more years—that is by 2020—the population will have doubled to 4·6 billion, and so on. So in 200 years from now the population of the world, at its present rate of increase, will have reached over 18 billion.

We should therefore recognize that there are, in the other parts of the world, large and increasing pressures of populations demanding living room or living space. I think it is childish for us to expect that we with our meagre population, can hold out against that pressure for any length of time.

As I say, Mr. Chairman, I do not look on this problem of immigration as merely a national or an international one. It is a world problem that must be tackled with courage of a high level. The amount of productive land in the world is small. The hardships and privations which are caused by the lack of food and living room are greatly accentuated if the populations, as they exist, are not reasonably evenly distributed over the productive areas of the world. For instance, in the case of China it has been estimated that 100 million Chinese have died of starvation during the past century. There is little likelihood that we have seen the end of famines. China possesses less than one-half acre of arable land per person. That briefly is the situation in the more densely populated parts of the world.

As I said, of course, this becomes a multilateral problem, a problem which must be tackled by this nation on the one hand and the other possible sources of immigration on the other. It is all very well for a person to point out the difficulties and not suggest any cure. I am not going to suggest that I know the answer, or anything of that sort. But I am justified in pointing out the problem and perhaps making some suggestions which might be used as a point from which we should do some thinking.

This is not a problem which concerns Canada and any other single country. I should like to take as an illustration the problem as it exists between Canada on the one hand and the United Kingdom on the other, merely as an example. I am not suggesting that the United Kingdom is the only suitable source of immigrants, but I should like to take the United Kingdom as an example of the situation. In the United Kingdom, as everyone knows, there is a shortage of natural resources of every kind. On the other hand, in Canada we have an overproduction of certain goods, especially agricultural production. We are faced with the problem of selling this surplus in other countries overseas, or not selling it at all. That leaves us with the cost of transportation, adding that much more to the cost of our production of food.

In the United Kingdom you have a very large population without sufficient raw materials, or sufficient land to supply its own food. In both instances you have an unbalanced economy; but you have an economy that is out of balance in opposite directions. I would suggest that the economies of both countries could be brought more nearly into balance if we could look at this problem as a real and vital one which concerns the whole world, and the western world especially, and as one of prime importance. It is not a case of bringing in a few people to increase our population or to make some good-looking statistics. It is a vaster problem than that; it is a problem of the redeployment of population to the best advantage of all concerned.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I suggest it would be to the common advantage if a large percentage of the population of the United Kingdom and of course other countries—I use the United Kingdom only as an illustration—could be transplanted to the vast empty spaces of the world. The obvious places of course in the case of the United Kingdom are Canada, South Africa, New Zealand and Australia. You will say immediately that is not practicable; it cannot be done readily. The problem is such that we must face it with courage, with energy, and look in every possible direction to find the solution.

In the case of the United Kingdom and its food production I quote from a book called "The Next British Empire" at page 77:

> The area of the United Kingdom is 60,153,371 acres, of which about 9 million are agriculturally unproductive. We are therefore using some 51 million acres to produce food in one way or another; and that food amounts to about 38 or 40 per cent of what we consume. My estimate, therefore, on a pro-rata basis without examination of details, could have been as high as 77 million acres, and it is indeed arguable that the United Kingdom is agronomically over-populated to the extent of needing that much additional territory. But we will be satisfied with claiming 69 million only. That means, since we can't get them from the surrounding ocean, that to adjust the balance, the population of the United Kingdom ought to be reduced. By rule of three, seeing that the present population of 47 million would be soundly established as an agronomic unit on 129 million acres, the proper number of inhabitants for our inexpansible 60 million acres is no more than 22 million.

In other words if the United Kingdom were to become self-sufficient as far as food is concerned, of course there would still be exports of certain types of food and importations of other types, but on balance if the United Kingdom were to become self-sufficient as far as food production is concerned, it would have to reduce its population to 22 million people.

If we were to embark on a really large scale redeployment of population we would of course be faced with a lot of problems. The first and obvious one is the fact that if a person is an immigrant arriving in a country he is also a migrant when he leaves his former home, and the problem of migration is a very real one. It is obvious that in the economy of a country where the population is expanding, which means that a large percentage of that population is young and virile, things tend to be buoyant and there is expansion. On the other hand, where the population is stationary, as in France, or declining as it is in Ireland, certain problems occur.

That applies not only to nations but to provinces. For instance, the population of my own province of Prince Edward Island has remained practically stationary for the last 80 years, and that has created problems that make the development of our province, so far as roads and that sort of thing are concerned, very expensive, and place on the population a high per capita debt. That siuation arose partly because as a province we were not allowed to expand. The three maritime provinces were the only ones that did not acquire large areas of unorganized territory at one time or another, and we had that problem of limited resources and a population which did not increase.

We are going to have the same problems in these countries from which immigrants are going to come. The countries which are acquiring these new citizens should recognize that they are the beneficiaries of the migrations, and they should have certain responsibilities as far as the country which is supplying the immigrants is concerned. For example, in the United Kingdom the per capita debt is something like £514, which is a very heavy debt. Related to that problem, of course, is the problem of convertibility of exchange, which places another impediment in the way of migration. That has already been mentioned. I do not think it is coincidental that the sterling area is, generally speaking, the overpopulated area of the world, and the dollar area is the underpopulated area. I think that situation exists, and the pound is not convertible into dollars merely because in the dollar areas of the world our population density is not high and our per capita production for labour expended is higher. I simply point out these impediments and difficulties. I am not intending to say that it is an easy problem to solve. It is a problem that will require real energy and foresight and imagination.

I thought perhaps a suggestion of this kind might have some merit. If the United Kingdom were to undertake to supply one million immigrants to this country over a period of years, we as the country receiving them should recognize some responsibility. We must remember that for the most part they would be young, productive people. We should realize that the country which produced those people would have used up certain potential resources in order to give them to us. We should also recognize that for every million people who migrate from the United Kingdom an extra debt of £514 million is placed on the shoulders of those who remain behind.

I think some system could be worked out whereby we as the country receiving these people might assume a fraction of their per capita debt in the country they were leaving. A fund of credits could be set up for that country. That may seem ridiculous to some people, but we have made loans to sterling area countries to permit them to purchase food, machinery and so on in the dollar areas. That was done without any logical or businesslike basis. I think perhaps a relationship between immigration and these loans or grants could be arrived at so that the United Kingdom, for example, would have a dollar buying power to permit them to purchase food, wheat, cheese and many other commodities of which we have an oversupply and for which they could provide great markets.

I throw that out merely as a suggestion or a point from which some thinking could be done. I do not propose it as a policy of my own or of any party or group or anything of that sort. I use it as an illustration to substantiate my belief that this is a problem which requires really advanced thinking. We must face up to it. If we do not the consequences are going to be most unfortunate.

I think the accent should be placed on bringing industries to this country, or even transplanting whole towns along with the skilled labour concerned. Those could be taken from overpopulated areas and relocated in the vast empty spaces of this country where the required raw materials might be readily available. That would get us away from the present system under which we try to bring in agricultural labour or those who will settle on the land. We must remember that that is a difficult thing to do. To begin with, the days when a family could push off into the wilderness and carve themselves a new home with no other capital than a couple of oxen and a few primitive agricultural tools are gone for ever. It takes a great deal of capital to establish yourself in agriculture at the present time.

You are trying to do the impossible when you try to force people into agriculture against their will. The reason it is difficult to keep immigrants on the land is that farmers cannot pay them wages comparable to those paid in the cities. There is no equal opportunity in agriculture. The opportunities in agriculture for those already on the land and their families would be greatly enhanced if home markets were built up by the creation of new towns in sparsely settled areas.

It may seem rather unusual to refer to new towns, but even in the United Kingdom they recognize that it is not a good thing to have your population crowded into a few large cities. That is even truer of this country. We should try to organize our economy so that our increasing population will find homes for themselves in new locations spread more evenly across the whole breadth of our great country.

At the present time the population of a few large cities is increasing at a very rapid rate. This creates many problems in the way of traffic congestion, the creation of slums and the vital problem of creating the most attractive atomic bomb targets that could exist on the face of the earth. These are things we should try to avoid. Therefore I think something should be done to have our immigration funnelled into new locations where it could be leavened by native-born Canadians to bring about a uniformity in culture and way of life.

I have already quoted from a book called "The Next British Empire". This was written before the last war by a forward-thinking Englishman who had foreseen most of the difficulties with which we are now faced. He suggests a cure for those difficulties, and in one place he says:

> Up to the present our dominions have shown an understandable but somewhat exaggerated fear of having their standard of living lowered by any large influx of cheap labour. But why cheap? Simple because, if the labour arrives before the jobs, wages will naturally fall. But if the courage of manufacturers first creates a demand for workers, as it has to the west of London, all the subsequent march of labour to that point does not upset the market and create depression. London, in spite of having absorbed over 1,000,000 provincial newcomers since 1921, has a lower percentage of unemployment than any other manufacturing region of the United Kingdom, yet its immigration capacity is infinitesimal compared with that of Canada. And London has really far fewer geographical foundations for industry than many undeveloped ore fields of Canada. London has to fetch all raw material from a distance. The only irresistible attraction she offers to industry is the paradoxical one of a gigantic market consisting of a population who live chiefly by taking in each other's washing. That shows you can attract industry merely by dumping population—and capital, be it tirelessly repeated—in a readily accessible spot.

Canada abounds in accessible spots. The Romans, with their eye for nodality, could have picked out hundreds of first-class sites for towns in Canada, had they ever got the chance. We could surely do something of what they did when Britain was virgin soil, and of what Russia, but recently a primitive illiteracy, is now doing to open up vast tracts far less hospitable than are latitudes 50° to 60° in North America.

Then he goes on to say:

I stress the need for new towns in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and elsewhere, because merely to group fresh population round the existing markets of Montreal, Quebec and Toronto would be to repeat the elephantiasis of London. Ultimately Canada would not thank us for that. We have no right to batten on what the Canadians have already created for themselves. There are enough fresh sites and fresh opportunities for us to settle down beside the Canadians and not on top of them.

It has already been said that the large-scale migration of British Islanders to Canada would not tremendously increase the agricultural production of the dominion, because the majority of the immigrants would not and could not work on the farms. The chief effect on the Canadian farmer would therefore be to bring his market nearer to him—against which process he ought not to object.

That sums up the views I have been trying to place before the committee. I make these suggestions merely that they may serve as the basis for further thought with respect to the great and thorny problem of migration from the overpopulated areas of the world to the underpopulated.

Mr. Bater: I know the minister is quite anxious to be getting along with his estimates and I do not intend to take very much time with my remarks, but only once in going through life do we celebrate a fiftieth anniversary of almost anything, whether it be our birthday or our marriage. I have been listening this afternoon and I have heard the words "emigration" and "immigration" several times. It recalls to my mind that on the 31st day of March, 1903, I became an emigrant when I sailed from Liverpool and on the 12th of April following I became an immigrant when we landed at Saint John, New Brunswick.

I want to take this opportunity of thanking the minister and the officials of his department for procuring for me a photostatic copy of the passenger list of the S.S. Lake Manitoba which sailed from Liverpool on March 31, 1903 and arrived at Saint John, New Brunswick, on April 12, 1903. On page 20 of the list there are three names among many others. The first of the three I am going to mention is William Bater, age 39, tobacconist. That was my father. The next is Master Bater, age 14, my brother, who is still farming in the district where I farm. The next one is Master Bater, age 11, who happens to be myself.

I promised that I would only be a short time, but before sitting down I should like to read an extract from the Montreal Gazette of April 12, 1903. The dispatch is from Saint John, New Brunswick, and reads as follows:

Four special trains, carrying the Barr colonists, numbering 1,960, left here today for the Saskatoon district, where the new Canadians will establish homes and cities. The party, which is declared to be the greatest emigration from England since the departure of William Penn, arrived Saturday morning on the steamship Lake Manitoba, whose cargo of humanity was packed like fish in a box. The colonists bring with them half a million pounds sterling. They are probably the finest body of men, women and children that ever landed here. Lawyers, doctors, clergymen, merchants, aristocrats, farmers, clerks, artisans, domestics, tradeswomen and labourers are included, besides babies by the score. On the passage, which occupied eleven days, there was not a death or a case of serious illness on the congested ship. Reverend I. M. Barr, the organizer of the party, is a brisk businesslike man who is full of enthusiasm over the prospects of his scheme. He says 1,500 more colonists are to follow, and that 10,000 will come next year.

With respect to the last two words "next year", that never did come about so far as the Reverend Mr. Barr was concerned because he left very shortly after reaching Saskatoon. As you know, many of the colonists rebelled against him and the colony was taken over by the Reverend Mr. Lloyd after whom the town of Lloydminster was named. This summer at Lloydminster, which is a great oil town on the border between Alberta and Saskatchewan, a celebration is going to be held in connection with the fiftieth anniversary of the Barr colony. It was in the district surrounding Lloydminster that the government along with the Reverend Mr. Barr and Mr. Lloyd had picked out a certain number of homesteads to be taken up by the Barr colonists. I have no doubt that the hon. member for Battle River and myself will be playing a small part in that celebration this summer.

Much has been said about immigrants coming to Canada. Last summer on our farm we employed a young couple who had come to Canada some two years ago through the minister's department. The young man was accustomed to farming in Great Britain. He had served his time in the British navy in the last war, and he brought his young wife and child with him. He spent his first year on a farm just north of Toronto and then wanted to go west. He has been with us on our farm for approximately twelve months and I can say that he has been very satisfactory. He was accustomed to farming in England, and I think he is going to make a real good citizen of Canada.

Mr. Fair: Mr. Chairman, my name is not included in the list just referred to by the hon. member for The Battlefords, but I may say that I arrived in the real home of the Barr colonists, the town of Lloydminster, on January 10, 1914. At that time it was a rather small town, but today it is one of the most progressive in Alberta or in Canada. There is a group of businessmen there who have been building up their businesses, and at the present time the town has a population of considerably more than 4,000. I think what they have done is a credit to these people.

I only wish time would permit the hon. member who has just taken his seat to relate some of the experiences of the men and women who came here in 1903. It would be well worth while, because none of them were experienced farmers. They were businessmen who had been engaged in different lines of business in the old country, and they have certainly made a contribution to the welfare of Canada. Around Lloydminster they have cleared thousands of acres of land and are growing millions of bushels of grain. Now we also have oil developments there. The Canadian National is being supplied with oil for its diesels, and oil is also being supplied for many other purposes including the production of roofing and road-building materials.

I did not want to let this moment go by without adding my words to those of the hon. member for The Battlefords. It is really amazing to see the progress that has been made there in a short time.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Fulton: Before it carries, I wonder if the minister would now care to make a reply to the general statements, and then we could get on with the questioning on the detailed items.

Mr. Harris: If we might carry the general item, I could then speak first on the first item of immigration.

Item agreed to.

Citizenship—

58. Citizenship registration branch, $195,964.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, this is the first item dealing with citizenship and there are a number of questions.

[Mr. Bater]

Mr. Harris: I will make a statement on citizenship; or do you want to go ahead?

Mr. Fulton: I should be glad if the minister would make a statement.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Chairman, I would like to take a few moments to speak about citizenship, and I shall do my best to make it very short.

In presenting the estimates of the citizenship registration branch of the department for consideration of hon. members, I am glad to report that all signs point to a growing awareness of the value and responsibilities of Canadian citizenship. As hon. members know, this branch of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration is responsible for administration of the Canadian Citizenship Act with the exception of those two sections which provide for citizenship training and naturalization court proceedings. The branch is also the custodian of all records under the act and is the agency which issues all certificates of citizenship.

Considering the very great increase in immigration to Canada since the end of world war II we would naturally expect a substantial increase in the number of applications for Canadian citizenship. This, of course, has not yet occurred because of the fact that an immigrant must be a resident in Canada for five years before he can apply for citizenship.

Declarations of intention which precede the actual application for citizenship are, however, showing an encouraging increase. In 1952 these totalled 13,323, exceeding by some 4,000 the total filed in each of the previous five years. I anticipate that this trend will become more noticeable, for in recent months the number of declarations of intention filed with the department has shown a substantial increase each month over an average of any of the months since the citizenship act came into force. I would suggest that this increasing interest is an indication that the program of training in citizenship which has been in operation since 1947 is beginning to show results.

I would draw particularly to the attention of hon. members the interest in citizenship shown in recent months by various veterans organizations across Canada. Not only are these organizations taking the lead in helping to create a greater awareness of Canadian citizenship but the members are also, as individuals, applying in increasing numbers for their certificates of proof of Canadian citizenship which are available to ex-service men and women without charge. I have had the very great pleasure during the past year of participating in several ceremonies where practically the complete membership of a veterans' organization has received certificates.

In addition to the veterans' organizations, members of Canadian service clubs are also showing a very great interest in this worthwhile work.

It is worthy of note that, among the largest ethnic groups to receive certificates of Canadian citizenship in 1952, were 1,281 persons of Polish nationality. A large portion of these were the Polish veterans who were among the first of the immigrants to be admitted to Canada after the end of world war II. They were men who fought bravely in Italy and in our own Canadian corps in northern Europe, and who cast their lot with the free world when their own country passed into the sphere of communistic domination. I am glad to pay tribute to the manner in which these men are assuming the duties of citizenship in Canada.

In submitting the estimates of the Canadian citizenship branch, I should like to emphasize the role played by the branch in the integration of newcomers. The branch works closely with national and local voluntary organizations and has assisted in the creation and development of some 50 citizenship committees in various cities and towns across Canada. These committees, which include representatives of various ethnic groups, co-ordinate the activities of local organizations that are engaged in the promotion of "civism" and particularly in assisting new Canadians to adjust themselves more rapidly to life in Canada. They have done valuable work and I welcome the opportunity of expressing the government's appreciation of the assistance they have given—and I am sure that I can add the appreciation of the house as well.

At the request of national and local voluntary organizations, the branch has also assisted in developing general citizenship programs embracing such themes as the responsibilities of citizenship in a democracy, the problems of newcomers and language and citizenship classes.

With reference to the latter subject, as announced previously to the house the department has offered to pay to the respective provinces a sum equal to one-half of the amount expended by the provinces themselves in respect of language and citizenship classes for immigrants. The citizenship branch will be responsible for completing the necessary agreements with the respective provincial authorities under which the grants will be paid, and for the administration of such grants. It is recognized that instruction in language and civics contributes much toward the rapid integration of newcomers and the proposed grants for this purpose should be of material assistance in the further development and extension of such instruction.

At present the department, through the citizenship branch, offers free of charge to the various departments of education and other agencies conducting language and citizenship classes all of the necessary teaching materials. These include language texts in both French and English as well as the citizenship series booklets on the geography, history, government and resources of Canada. A fifth booklet in the series on our transportation services has been completed and will be available for use in the near future.

The branch has also produced a series of film strips relating to the geography, history, government and resources of Canada that have been well received and widely used in citizenship classes. In fact, up to the end of last year, over 12,000 prints of these film strips have been sold by the national film board. A further series of film strips on the development of our transportation services is nearing completion, and will soon be available.

The integration of newcomers requires the assistance and support of all citizens and particularly of national and local voluntary organizations. It is intended, therefore, to hold this spring or summer a national seminar on the subject of integration. It is hoped that all aspects of the problem will be explored at this seminar and recommendations made that will lead to further action required to accelerate the integration of newcomers and ethnic groups.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, perhaps before we start questioning the minister on citizenship you might call it six o'clock.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Fulton: Just before six o'clock, Mr. Chairman, the minister had concluded his introductory statement on the citizenship branch of his department. There are some questions I should like to ask him concerning the work of that branch. I do not very often throw bouquets around, and I am only going to throw a small one tonight, but I should like to say that I think the department is working along very sound lines in the efforts it is making to convince new Canadians that they are welcome in Canada, and also in the efforts the department is making toward giving them a sense of what Canada means and the opportunities and advantages which will be theirs when they acquire Canadian citizenship.

On reading the last annual report of the department I have been quite impressed to find an outline of the steps that have been taken in that connection. One thing which does concern me, and it was touched upon by the minister in his statement, is the extent to which the applications for citizenship appear to lag behind the number of immigrants admitted into Canada during the post-war years. The last annual report covers the fiscal year ended March 31, 1952. At pages 16 and 17 it shows that during the fiscal year 19,833 certificates were issued and 8,845 declarations of intention were filed. Since 1945, that is for the last five years, there have never been less than 66,990 immigrants admitted. It takes an immigrant five years to acquire Canadian citizenship; therefore I think it can be seen that these approximately 20,000 certificates represent a small percentage when compared with the 66,000 immigrants admitted annually. This indicates that there is a substantial number who have never acquired Canadian citizenship and who have not yet filed their declaration of intention to do so.

When you find that there are only 8,845 declarations of intention to acquire Canadian citizenship, and compare that with the figure of 66,990 immigrants in 1947 and 79,194 immigrants for 1948, it seems to me that the problem becomes one of major importance. The minister did touch upon the matter. He said the department was encouraged by the increase in the number of declarations of intention filed during the current calendar year. My information, of course, comes from the last annual report which covers only the fiscal year ended March 31, 1952. I would appreciate it if the minister would say a word or two more on this subject.

I believe my question is well founded. Is there not a disturbing shortage of applications for citizenship and declarations of intention to apply for citizenship being filed, in comparison with the number of immigrants admitted? What positive steps is the department taking to carry forward the work of impressing upon the potential new Canadians to an even greater extent the importance and desirability of becoming fully qualified Canadians citizens by obtaining certificates of citizenship?

[Mr. Fulton.]

Mr. Harris: The hon. member has pointed out that there were about 66,000 immigrants in 1947, but I think I would say there were 64,000 in that year. Of those about 38,000 were from the United Kingdom. Our experience has been that those people do not very often apply for citizenship certificates, that is the percentage is not as great as in other cases. This leaves something like 26,000, and of those it may be said that some 8,000 have applied. Of the 27,000 a good many would be infants, who would have to be taken into account in that figure of 8,000 declarations of intention. I am not suggesting that those who declared their intention during the last year were, in all cases, 1947 entrants.

We are concerned that we do not get into the position which was mentioned by one hon. member, of having people wait a good many years to take out their citizenship papers. We have no means of imposing any restrictions on them if they do not, and we have not any form of sanction that we could impose. On the other hand, it is our thinking that during the calendar year 1953 the 1947 group will have run over the five-year period. Of course many people put things off, and they do not apply at the first possible moment. We think that as a result of the experience we have this year we will be able to judge much better what people will be doing with respect to citizenship. If there are any steps that can be taken after this year to draw to the attention of a newcomer of 1947 or earlier that he has now had the opportunity and we should like him to take advantage of it, we shall certainly do so.

We feel that with municipal corporations, provincial governments and our own government contributing in some form, together with the voluntary organizations doing so much good work in welcoming these people to Canada and into these little societies, looking after them at night schools, and so on, these people should, in all conscience, take the earliest possible opportunity of applying for Canadian citizenship.

Mr. Fulton: In connection with that subject, what steps are being taken to impress upon the new arrivals the desirability of becoming citizens? I noticed in the annual report at page 10 a paragraph dealing with the distribution of film strips which are made available for citizenship instruction in either English or French. After giving a list of the titles, the paragraph concludes:

> During the fiscal year 1951-1952, these strips were in wide demand, and 6,440 were sold to educational organizations and interested groups.

The titles which are given these film strips certainly suggest that they would contain matter of great interest and importance in instructing new Canadians. I was wondering whether or not the minister could say where full information could be obtained by an organization which might be interested in showing these films to new Canadians in their vicinity. These organizations might want information as to the content of the films, how they can be obtained and what procedure has to be followed. It occurs to me that here is a field where members of parliament, and others who are interested in this work of welcoming new Canadians, might avail themselves of this new instrument. Perhaps they could interest service clubs and other similar organizations to which they belong in having once a month or once a year, or with whatever frequency would be suggested, evenings when they would be hosts to the new Canadians in their area and ask them in for a showing of these films.

I must confess that it seems to me an area in which with a little bit of work and a little bit of interest, any one of us could make quite a considerable contribution to interesting our communities and community organizations in that work. Will the minister tell us, for the record, what the procedure is as to getting these films and on what terms they are available?

Mr. Harris: These films are produced by the national film board and are sold at a nominal fee to the provincial governments, which use them through their film distributing organizations. In other words, a voluntary organization can write in and get a film for showing such as my hon. friend indicates. In addition to that, however, our liaison officers, who were only appointed after 1950, do encourage the use of these films at the voluntary organizational meetings and will show them on request at service clubs and other similar institutions. I for one should be glad if any person or group of persons or any hon. members would in fact put on an evening of some kind for the benefit of newcomers or even for the benefit of Canadians, to show them these things because I think the film strips are of good use for this purpose.

Mr. Fulton: Do I understand that anyone or any organization interested should contact in the first instance the provincial educational department, and that they would have full information and would have a stock of these films on hand?

Mr. Harris: Yes; and the film board has a stock to sell and will sell them for a dollar.

Mr. Fulton: Then the report also contains another interesting item. I see that I have really been discussing both the citizenship branch and the citizenship registration branch under the same heading. One small question arises out of page 19 of the report which is headed "Number of certificates issued to aliens by countries of origin" and under the heading "Great Britain" there is the figure of 53. I should probably know this, but I confess to being a little bit disturbed about it. Is a British subject coming from the United Kingdom officially classified as an alien, even if he has been lawfully admitted to Canada?

Mr. Harris: I should not think so, but I will have to find an explanation. In the item that is referred to, the countries of origin are the countries from which these people come. That is residence, not nationality or racial origin.

Mr. Fulton: We would presume that these would be persons who originated in Great Britain but were not necessarily British subjects?

Mr. Harris: That is right.

Mr. Green: I think we have come a long way in our approach to this problem of citizenship. It is encouraging to hear from the minister that steps have been taken to make the people who have come to this country and have become naturalized, feel welcome. Only a few years ago all that happened was that they appeared in a crowded naturalization court, two friends spoke on their behalf and then they got out of the crowd as best they could. Then some time later they took the oath of allegiance before a notary public. I think Canada was extremely shortsighted in her approach to this problem of welcoming new citizens. I am afraid we are still a long way behind our cousins, the Americans. I should like the minister to explain to the committee why it is that we cannot have a procedure somewhat similar to that followed by them.

I have here the program for the 32nd annual public reception welcoming naturalized citizens of 1952-53 in the city of Portland, Oregon, under the auspices of the Portland Americanization council. This was held this year on February 22, the 221st anniversary of George Washington's birthday. In addition to setting out the officers of this Americanization council, it sets out a list of 90 on a reception committee and 30 on a hospitality committee. They had a receiving line which included the governor of the state and his wife, and the secretary of state for the state of Oregon and his wife; the treasurer of the state of Oregon; the United States district attorney; the mayor and commissioners of the city of Portland and ladies; the board of county commissioners for, I presume, the county of Multnomah. On the inside of the program there is a list of the names of those who have been naturalized during the year 1952-53. I notice that there are 103 from Canada, by far the largest number from any country; 43 from England and a similar number from Germany, and several hundred altogether in the list.

They had a program which included the grand entry of colours; pledge to the flag—we might be under some difficulty in Canada deciding which flag we were to use; however, perhaps that will be straightened out one of these days—the national anthem—where we again might have some difficulty—invocation by a leading clergyman; official welcome and response by one of these new citizens who is described as of the class of 1952. Then there are selections by a choir, presentation of banner to the city of Portland, the acceptance, tribute to the flag; then an address by a former dean of the college of law; a song "God Bless America", then the benediction and the retiring of colours. That program was recorded and broadcast over several radio stations.

On the back of the program we have a list of organizations which belong to this Portland Americanization council. It is a long list and I shall refer to only a few in which I think hon. members would be more likely to be interested. There are the American Legion with about 30 branches; the American Red Cross; the archdiocesan organization of Catholic women; Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks; B'nai B'rith; Boy Scouts of America; Canadian Legion and auxiliary—and I would ask you to note that; this is a welcome in Portland, Oregon—Catholic Daughters of America; central labour council; council of churches; council of parents and teachers; Fraternal Order of Eagles; federated Jewish society; Independent Order of Odd Fellows; junior chamber of commerce; Kiwanis Club; Multnomah bar association—I presume that is the legal bar; Portland chamber of commerce; Portland police department; Portland Lions Club and auxiliary; Rotary Club and so on. There are dozens of these organizations belonging to this Americanization council.

Is there not some way in which in Canada we can work out some friendly welcome of this type which includes representatives of all the leading organizations of the city? Perhaps we are too phlegmatic. I do not know why it is that we have hesitated for so long to do things of this type. Millions of Canadian citizens have become such by naturalization, I think a larger number than in any other country of the world except the United States. It is of such tremendous importance to make these new Canadians feel at home, feel that they are accepted as such; and I cannot think of any finer way to do it than by some such scheme as this.

[Mr. Green.]

At the present time in Vancouver, thanks to the efforts of one outstanding citizen, Will Walton, who unfortunately has passed away, the Canadian Club is doing great work in this connection. He was assisted by immigration officials, some of the judges, and various other clubs. There we do have a fine welcome given in the courts when people are naturalized. I think we should go farther and have something like this plan of the Americanization council of Portland. I presume that is happening in every large city in the United States every year, and it is no wonder that you get such a remarkable national spirit in that great country. I do hope that Canada can adopt some such method. I am sure it would help to strengthen the spirit of this nation. Can the minister tell us whether an effort of that kind would be possible?

Mr. Harris: The Canadian Citizenship Act has been in force now for only six years plus a few months. We have been experimenting with the business of the form that will be followed before the courts and the reception that shall be given to immigrants by welfare groups before that, and I must confess that to my knowledge not much is done in the way of a reception afterward, except in the city of Vancouver, as my hon. friend has mentioned. On the other hand, I have attended similar small receptions in several towns and small cities in Ontario, but as a rule they are the tentative beginning of something that should grow and be accepted more from time to time.

Nothing but good can come from a reception of that kind. It is a public acknowledgment, in addition to the legal one which is made on the occasion of their taking the oath of allegiance after they have been granted their citizenship. That is something that must be done, but this is something that will bring to the immigrant, the new Canadian, the sense of an interest in him by the other members of the community, and we are hopeful that, as I mentioned in my earlier remarks, we can find a good solution to it which would be a dignified public reception with sufficient solemnity to be impressive and at the same time friendly enough so the people would not be backward about attending.

Mr. Mott: I should like to say a few words on this matter at this time. First of all may I say I do appreciate the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra and of the minister who mentioned that he knew that Vancouver was doing a wonderful job—

Mr. Harris: I should have included New Westminster.

Mr. Mott: —in accepting new citizens in our city. It would be only right at this time if I mentioned what happens in my own city of New Westminster. The judge who swears in the new citizens plays a very important part in just what kind of ceremony takes place. For the last four or five years Judge Sullivan of the county court in New Westminster has had an outstanding ceremony in our city. On several occasions I have been asked to speak. Senator Tom Reid was asked to speak on many other occasions.

To give you an idea of just what does happen, invitations go out to all the local bodies, including the local council of women, the mayor and the council, the president and members of the executive of the board of trade, and the bar association has always been represented by seven or eight of the outstanding members of the bar in their robes. We also have a member of the R.C.M.P. in a red coat, and our own local police.

They do have an outstanding ceremony. We are always asking the judges who come from Vancouver why they do not put on a similar ceremony in Vancouver. I should like to bring this to the attention of my good friend the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra because it has now moved along to a point where the service clubs have a citizenship night once a year in the stadium in New Westminster. They send invitations to all the new citizens, and have representatives of the New Westminster regiment, the Boy Scouts and the Girl Guides, and several bands. An outstanding program is held at the stadium. On several occasions I have sent the program to the minister. We are very proud of the ceremony that takes place in New Westminster, which has always been known as a royal city. We try to keep that name before the public. We welcome our new citizens to the city, and we extend our congratulations to Judge Sullivan of the county court who has been a leader in the movement for the ceremony that takes place.

Mr. Higgins: I have not heard too much of this debate, but I was quite interested in the remarks of the last two speakers, particularly the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, who always makes an interesting address.

As I understand the situation, both hon. members spoke about what happens after the immigrants have been in Canada for some time. The situation that we should tackle in Canada is what happens when the immigrants come to Canada first. The first view they have of Canada and of Canadians is important. It may not happen at all the ports of entry; it may not even happen in that one small port that I heard described as the port of Saint John—the hon. member is not here to enjoy what I have to say about it. But I have seen quite a number of immigrants come to Gander, having been brought over by Trans-Canada and other air lines. These lines were employed by the government in those days. I have seen them come in with tags on them, as you would tag a cow, a horse or any other kind of animal you were shipping. It was very obvious why they were tagged in that way. It was not done to discredit them or as a mark of dishonour. They were tagged because they could not speak English or any other language of the country. Their destination was put on the tag and they were told how they had to buy their food and where they had to buy their food, and what have you.

The thing I want to say to the minister is this. I do not know whether that system still exists as it did in the days I am speaking of, but at all ports of entry the minister should have people who could interpret the language of these immigrants, whether it was Italian, Norwegian—I was going to say Irish, but I will not because of my hon. friend who is sitting in front of me. It is quite obvious that quite a number of nationalities do not speak English, and when they come to the ports of this country the first thing they have to do is to deal with a foreign language. They do not know what is going on around them; they do not know what they are being invited to do, and it upsets them very much.

If that condition still exists, then I say to the minister that he should have people stationed at these ports who can speak the language of these particular immigrants. It would not cost very much, and the first impression sometimes means so much.

Then I come to the points that have been made already, and I only want to reiterate what has been said before. I do not believe this planning of immigration by the government has been definite by any means. I do not think immigration is as well planned as it might have been. I feel that the parts of the country in which these immigrants may want to settle should have an opportunity of discussing things with the minister or with the officials of the department. I am thinking especially of a conversation I had earlier in the day with an hon. member from Prince Edward Island. He told me that they would like to have a lot of high-class farmers in that part of the country. The same applies to other parts of the country, and I think it would be a good idea if the minister consulted the various provinces to see what types of people they wanted and in what numbers. He could then cut his garment according to the cloth.

I noticed the following in the last bulletin I received from the department of external affairs at Dublin, and by the way this is southern Ireland:

> An Irish-Canadian club to promote closer cultural and trade relations between the two countries was formed at a meeting held in Dublin last week. The club is to have branches throughout Ireland and in Canada. It is estimated that there are nearly 1,000 Canadians living in Ireland and 1,500,000 of Irish descent in Canada.

I believe I read in the paper where the minister had stated that quite a number of Irishmen were coming over.

An hon. Member: From the north.

Mr. Higgins: That is what I was going to say; let me say it, will you? I think there should be a fair proportion come from southern Ireland. I do not know what the situation is there, and it may be that southern Irishmen do not want to leave their home. But every opportunity should be given to them if they want to come. After all, if there are 1,000 Canadians in Ireland surely we should have another five or six thousand Irishmen over here.

The last point I wish to raise has been mentioned already this afternoon, and I merely want to reiterate what has been said. I refer to Chinese immigrants who may want to come to Canada. In so far as I know the Chinese are a most excellent race and make fine citizens. The officials of the department have been most helpful to me in connection with any applications I have made. I found them very courteous and kindly. In view of the terrible position of the Chinese in China and Hong Kong I should like to see everything possible done in order that the wives and children of Chinese who are here may come to this country without too many difficulties being placed in their way.

The Chairman: The discussion has been principally on immigration, so may we consider that items 58 and 59 are carried, and then we could go on to immigration.

Mr. Knight: Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: If any hon. members wish to speak on immigration I would ask them to wait until item 60 is called.

Mr. Knight: I feel compelled to rise if only to prove to my hon. friend from St. John's East that we from the north of Ireland also speak English. If I might be reminiscent, I hope my hon. friend is not like a certain old lady whom I met in Pennsylvania when a small boy. I went to stay with an aunt there at a hotel in the Pocono hills. I was a little white-haired boy—I was going to say that I am still white-haired, but without the hair—and we met this American lady who was staying at the hotel. She asked who the little boy was, and my aunt told her that I had just come out from Ireland three weeks previously. She said, "My, how quickly he has learned the language".

I am glad to see that the population of Canada has been increased by three or four hundred good men from Northern Ireland, and I congratulate the minister, in so far as he deserves it, on that account. As far as I can tell about the hon. member behind me, his forebears did not come from Northern Ireland. Though his southern brogue remains, I suggest that he is not Irish at all. I notice that in the Ottawa valley practically everybody claims to be Irish. When anyone tells you he is Irish and you ask where he came from he says, "My great-grandfather left Ireland in 1801". That is not being Irish at all. Such people, perhaps like my hon. friend, say "Oh, we are Irish improved". Well, perhaps in their case some improvement was necessary.

I just wanted to say a word about citizenship.

An hon. Member: Canadian or Irish?

Mr. Knight: The question of Irish citizenship is too difficult to discuss, so I shall confine myself to the Canadian variety. I should like to inquire about these ceremonies. We have heard of a ceremony on a pretentious scale described by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, and then one on a more modest scale described by the hon. member for New Westminster. In the city of Saskatoon we have made an effort to give these people a welcome when they receive their certificates. Judge Smith is at the court house and a group of people, including the mayor and representatives of various organizations, welcome these people and say a friendly word to them.

I thought that when the act was passed a few years ago this procedure was definitely laid down. I remember that the government issued a booklet outlining the ceremony that could be held on these occasions. I imagine that it is being used in many places. I should like to ask the minister to what extent these ceremonies are being held and to what extent are people being merely handed their citizenship papers without any formality. When the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra was describing the ceremony used I could not help but think that moderation might perhaps be useful. As far as I can see there was everything in that program except movie stars, and God forbid that we should introduce that type of ballyhoo in a ceremony granting citizenship.

I want to say one word on the matter of language, and I must confess that I am leaning in the direction of the hon. member from Newfoundland. Most of our immigrants come from Holland and Germany at the present time, and it occurs to me that there must be Canadian citizens of German or Dutch origin who could be employed over there in the teaching of English. They would have the racial origin of the country to which they were assigned. I am thinking of older teachers or perhaps retired teachers and people of that sort who could be used to give these people instruction in the use of the English language, and they would not then suffer the embarrassment upon their arrival here described by the hon. member for St. John's East.

Mr. Harris: I do not think my hon. friend perhaps understood what the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra and I were speaking about, or did not note the difference. I think my hon. friend was referring to a reception given by a leading group of citizens in the city of Portland for those who had acquired their citizenship during a given year. It was a formal reception with a ceremony which was attended by representative groups as well as by representatives, apparently, of the state government. What he was referring to before in connection with our booklet were the simple ceremonies that we have suggested immediately after the swearing in by county judge. That would occur three, four, five or six times a year, as the county judge felt it necessary to complete the work of his court.

I think there is a place for both. One is a completion of the legal requirements of the case. The other is a more open public reception and acknowledgment of their citizenship during that year.

Mr. Coldwell: I know that it has been done at a number of smaller points in Saskatchewan. Senator Aseltine and I had the pleasure last year of attending a very interesting ceremony over which the county court judge presided. The mayor and the reeves from the neighbouring countryside were present at the ceremony at which a number of people were welcomed. A banquet was held, and they were made to feel that they were being taken into the citizenship of the area. It can be done on a much smaller scale in small places, and I think a good deal of encouragement should be given. I know that the welcome at Rosetown was one of the nicest functions I have attended since I have been a member of parliament.

Mr. Harris: I hope the practice is growing. We are going to encourage it.

Mr. Brooks: I have listened with interest to what hon. members have said about looking after immigrants on their arrival and taking them into citizenship. There is usually quite a period of time in between. I was very much interested in reading an article today in a pamphlet entitled "Industry" published by the Canadian Manufacturers Association. The view is expressed in the article that we do not pay enough attention to immigrants after they reach Canada from the point of view of teaching them something about our country. It is suggested that these people have a tendency to come here with a love for their own country, which is natural, and to get together in groups with the result that they do not learn enough about Canada.

It is pointed out that a few years ago, in order to overcome this difficulty, the United States fitted up a "freedom train" which went from one end of the country to the other visiting every city, town and village. On board were such things as a copy of the constitution of the United States, the Declaration of Independence, Lincoln's Gettysburg address, the muskets of George Washington's army and many articles of that kind. People were taught the history of their country in a practical way. The article goes on to say:

> Well, the history of Canada could certainly fill a train.

That is very true.

> The British North America Act with all the original signatures, the extant documents of Frontenac and Montcalm, Alexander Graham Bell's original telephone, the case books of Dr. Banting, the discoverer of insulin, the test tubes from the laboratory of Charles Saunders who discovered the now world famous Marquis wheat, the pistols of General Wolfe and even the cap worn by the heroic Laura Secord are just some of the things which come immediately to mind. Maybe there were some things about the freedom train which we wouldn't like. They could easily be changed. But the effort to build up a national patriotic consciousness is surely something which we should applaud.

There is no problem as to the children. They go to our schools and learn these things, but the older immigrants do not have that opportunity. I would suggest to the minister that he might consider something of this kind so that the history of our country may be better known to older immigrants entering Canada.

59. Citizenship branch, $390,464.

Mr. Fulton: Has any consideration been given to any sort of compulsory qualification before a citizenship certificate is granted? I do not refer to the language qualification, which was discussed briefly in connection with a bill we had before us a little while ago. Is there any requirement that they must have attended so many classes or anything of that sort? I appreciate that it is most difficult. Here we are on the one hand suggesting that they should be urged to take out their certificates of citizenship as soon as they qualify from the point of view of residence, and I appreciate that it would perhaps appear inconsistent if in the face of that we put other obstacles in their way and compelled them to comply with this or that regulation before they could obtain them.

I wonder if some happy medium could not be arrived at whereby if free classes on citizenship were available in a locality, perhaps some classes using films or visual education and some the lecture method, which might take only four or five nights during a year, consideration might then be given to making attendance compulsory at such classes before these people would be regarded as qualified for citizenship. Has any consideration been given to that, or as to whether anything along these lines could be worked out? I know that efforts are being made by voluntary organizations in certain provinces to give classes, and that is what made me wonder whether there was a possibility of making attendance compulsory to a certain extent?

Mr. Harris: We are in the process of drafting a number of regulations having to do with these classes. In the meantime, however, where they have been held and where a certificate has been granted the county judge will accept that as evidence of certain accomplishments. But it will happen, of course, that some applicant for citizenship who has attended no classes at all but who is fully qualified according to the standards we set down will come before a judge. Therefore it is difficult to say that such a rule should apply, although we undoubtedly encourage them to do so. On the other hand, there are also many places where we have no classes, yet by private tuition and self-help the immigrant is able to appear before the judge. Where there are no classes we are seeking to have them if we can, and where there are classes we are doing our best to see that as many people as possible attend them and that some recognition is given for having done so which will permit them to have easier access to the courts and their citizenship.

Mr. Fulton: I think that is a very excellent idea. I hope the minister can report to us that other provinces besides Ontario and British Columbia are awarding certificates of proficiency. Have any other provinces adopted that scheme?

Mr. Harris: I think that is all at the moment.

Mr. Fulton: Can the minister tell us for the record who is the new director of the citizenship branch in succession to the late Mr. Frank Foulds, to whose work I think we are all glad to pay tribute.

Mr. Harris: We have not appointed a new director. There is an acting director, Mr. Eugene Bussière, but the permanent appointment has not been made.

Immigration branch—

60. Administration of the Immigration Act, $824,403.

Mr. Fulton: The minister said he would take advantage of this item to reply to the general discussion and suggestions that have been made with respect to immigration.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Chairman, I wish immediately to thank hon. members for their kind remarks about myself and the officials of the branch for the work we have been doing. I believe hon. members realize that in dealing with immigration we are dealing with human beings; and while there are certain definite prohibitions in the Immigration Act which must be observed, nevertheless the regulations are flexible and should be used with discretion. They should not always be applied rigidly. The department tries to follow that practice within the policy laid down from time to time by the government. Where we are able to assist hon. members, not only are we glad to do so but we should in fact do so.

In the general discussion it seemed to me that every shade of opinion was expressed as to immigration; and it occurred to me that everything that was said this afternoon has been said at one time or another by myself and by my officials, when we have been discussing the policy of immigration. There are times when one takes the view taken by the hon. member for Cape Breton South, which I think is probably the most restrictive approach that has been stated so far in this debate. On other occasions perhaps we would take a view more in line with that of the hon. member for Queens who, if I understood him correctly, while he did not recommend it in exact terms, nevertheless thought in terms of a general migration of people at some time in the future of the world.

In between those two extremes the Canadian immigration policy tries to function. As everyone has said, we have to observe our absorptive capacity, and we must try to determine that capacity not only from year to year but in fact from month to month. We bear in mind what the hon. member for Cape Breton South said, namely that there may be a scarcity of labour at a given time and that by the time we have found the people to fill that scarcity, it no longer exists.

So in supplying the labour market we must pursue a cautious policy. But at the same time I do not think we should allow our caution to overcome the natural optimism which all Canadians have as to the future of this country. I noticed that every member who spoke about the mechanics of immigration did say that consideration should be given to the winter season and the seasonal unemployment we have at that time, and that we should not have many immigrants entering the labour market during those months.

With a certain amount of modesty I can say "Thank you", because we introduced that policy last summer, and I believe it was quite successful this winter. As I said last night, we have had no confusion, no conflict, and no surplus number of workers in any given community. That to some extent restricts the number of people who can be admitted to Canada in any twelve month period, because if to a considerable extent you shut off migration in late October, or at some such time, and presume to open it in late February or early March, you then shut off four months of the year which otherwise could be used to bring in people at a time when perhaps they could be absorbed.

There has been considerable discussion as to whether or not we had more immigrants in 1951 than we should have taken into the country. I suggest that that was not so, although I do not want to engage in any argument with hon. members on the point, because I realize that everything they have said today has been helpful. Every suggestion they have made will be followed up. But 1951 was the beginning of the expansion in this country of industries connected with preparations for carrying out our commitments with NATO. There was a greater demand than we could meet for both skilled and unskilled workers in almost every line. Therefore we did our utmost to meet that necessity.

As I said last July, and repeated last night, it would appear that that met the requirements of the day, and that perhaps there was not going to be a continuing demand for skilled and unskilled labour for that particular purpose. I think I did point out last night that, in particular, there was little demand this year for persons to go into the mines, the logging industry and the like; and my recollection is that the hon. member for Kootenay West spoke about that this afternoon. Looking at the figures I find that we took in only about 900 loggers during the whole of last year, which is away down from what it had been at any time prior to that. This indicates that we can operate immigration to fit conditions as we see them, according to the information we receive.

It was suggested by the hon. member for Kamloops and the hon. member for Cape Breton South that we should have recourse to other departments of government, and should have interdepartmental committees studying migration. It was said that we should co-ordinate our efforts along those lines. I say with all respect that we have had similar committees since I became minister, and I believe they were in existence for some time prior to that. The whole policy is made up as the result of information available to the government in all its departments, and as a result of the opinions expressed by those on our staff and on the staffs of other departments who can best form opinions as to the likely requirements in the foreseeable future.

We never go beyond twelve months; and for that reason one may say that we do not plan for the distant future. We do not. We do not claim to do so at the moment. We merely say that from month to month and, at the most, up to a year in advance, we have certain plans and certain expectations of what can be done by way of migration.

Something was said about consulting provincial governments. We do that as well. Their opinions, along with the opinions of other groups in Canada, are taken into account when we arrive at conclusions as to what should be done.

I believe that is all I need say about the general debate. I would repeat, however, that all the doubts and all the hopes expressed this afternoon by every speaker are constantly in our minds. Migration should not at any time displace Canadian workmen. Migration should only be a means to add to our population in such a manner that we will grow in numbers, and grow as well in our standard of living, not reduce it. On the other hand we should not, because of too much caution, miss the opportunity which most of us believe this country has in the next few years.

Specifically, there was a general discussion about matters having to do with those Canadian citizens of East Indian origin, and of certain Chinese-Canadian difficulties. Some reference was made, also, to the assisted passage scheme in respect of the United Kingdom, with which I shall now deal.

The assisted passage scheme was instituted for the purpose of providing the means of admitting to Canada persons with certain skills who were needed, and on the basis that these persons would not have the money with which to purchase transportation. The classes of persons who from time to time would qualify applied to all countries in which we used the assisted passage plan. That is, if we said that a person in the United Kingdom who was a nurse's aide could have the benefit of assisted passage, we said also that a person in a similar position in another country could have the benefit of assisted passage, because there was need in this country for such persons. It is true that the people in the United Kingdom who have come forward have not used the assisted passage scheme to anything like the extent that it has been used by others from continental Europe. But that is only to be expected, because people in the United Kingdom have more money and more means than those on the continent. In particular I think it is fair to say that the people of Germany have literally no means whatever. If we desire to have them here, and if they have the qualifications we want, then it is to be expected that they will apply in greater numbers than any others for assisted passage.

With respect to the persons in British Columbia of East Indian origin, it is true that there is a restriction on the number of people of that particular origin who can be admitted from the east. In 1950 they were restricted to those persons who were admissible under P.C. 2115, namely the unmarried children under 18 of Canadian citizens resident here, or the wife of a Canadian citizen. Since that time we have successively extended the group to take care of the husband, unmarried children up to 19, then up to 21 and later up to 25 under certain circumstances. I have forgotten who it was, but this afternoon someone said that the admissible groups here are those 19, and under certain circumstances 21. That is not so; the admissible group is up to 21, and under certain circumstances up to 25.

Mr. Fulton: They are all subject to an over-all quota?

Mr. Harris: That is not subject to quota; that is absolute. All those people can come in under P.C. 2115. But in addition to that 150 other persons may come from India, 100 more from Pakistan and 50 from Ceylon. As was pointed out this afternoon, we have not met that total number of 300 because of difficulties which occurred in finding a suitable staff to go to India. We finally found a staff late last year. I expect that this year will see that number coming close to the quota. I am told that there are hardly any coming from Ceylon, so that to the extent of that 50 we may not meet the quota. Indeed, it may not be so even in the case of Pakistan, but I am quite satisfied that the number from India will, this year, be to the limit permissible.

When the hon. member suggested that these people are not permitted to bring their relatives out, I suggest he is not being entirely accurate, although I know he has no intention of not being so. This quota, if I may call it that because in fact it is, has only been in existence now for the past two years. There have been certain operating difficulties, but we are gaining experience in dealing with it. I should like to point out the persons who did come during 1951, the last figures I have. In 1951 there was one spouse of a person here; one child; seven fiancées; 14 parents, brothers and sisters; and 127 other groups.

The other groups were made up as follows: married children, 24; sisters, brothers and brothers-in-law, 24; nephews and nieces, 35; cousins, 16; grandchildren, 5; grandnephew, 1. Then there was employer application for specific purposes, 8. There was an adjustment of temporary status of persons already here who had not been properly landed, 10; and there were four more who in fact were in the country illegally, and we then regularized their papers. This brought the total to 127. I suggest that that catalogue of relatives is indicative of the type of immigration we will have when this really begins to function a little more successfully than it has up to the present time. The lack of success has been wholly due to our inability to find a staff, but the staff is now there and working in New Delhi.

The other question raised was that of a Chinese Canadian who wants to bring forward his children. I only speak of it because of the reference made by the hon. member for Kootenay West to the X-ray procedures. The committee should remember that the use of X-rays for determining age is only resorted to after an inspection has been made of the applicant by our staff in Hong Kong, and that person has been rejected as a result of the investigation. I discussed this with the head of the Hong Kong immigration office, Mr. Peters, when he was here on leave. I have checked Mr. Peters' work from time to time. I am thoroughly satisfied that Mr. Peters is a highly competent immigration officer who knows the situation in the east as well as anyone we can get for that purpose.

When he examines a person who presents himself as the child of an applicant in Canada, he examines him having in mind certain procedures and certain knowledge which the person must have if he is a member of that family. If the immigration officer comes to the conclusion the person is not as represented then, and then only, the applicant is given the opportunity, if he wishes to take advantage of it, of having X-ray photographs taken to indicate whether or not an error has been made in Mr. Peters' judgment. It was stated this afternoon that we claim these photographs to be accurate to within three or four months. We do not. We realize that medical opinion is not completely satisfied on some points of this procedure, and that in fact there should be a variation which would allow for the ordinary uncertainties which any doctor admits exist in these things. We do—when I say "we" I must say not this department but the Department of National Health and Welfare —consider these X-rays in the light of what the ordinary doctor would expect to find by way of variation in the age group.

I do not know anything about this subject other than that I am told that an X-ray examination of the bone structure is reasonably accurate up to 19, 20, 21, 22 or 23 years of age, but probably not beyond that. It is that group with whom we are dealing. We do not examine people beyond 25 years of age, because 25 is the outside age limit. As I said before, it is never a complete bar to admission of any person. It is only an additional opportunity that he has to prove the facts which he alleges.

Nevertheless I recognize that there have been many cases where Chinese Canadian citizens feel that these examinations have not yielded the results they should. I think many hon. members in this house will bear me out when I say that we constantly review individual cases to see if there is any possibility that an error has been made, or that additional information might be obtained on which we could base a different conclusion. That is always the policy, and we shall continue at all times to accept any evidence that applicants can bring to us. We will review all cases on request. In fact I hope we can find an even better method of dealing with them than we have at the present time, although I am told it might entail considerable expense in the Hong Kong office.

I think I have covered all the specific subjects mentioned. If not, I apologize and I shall be glad to speak of them if anybody reminds me of what they are.

Mr. Fulton: I appreciate the minister dealing with the points which have been raised. There are just two matters that I should like to follow up, arising out of what he said, and I should like to start with one of the later ones, namely the position of East Indians. I do not want to quibble over the question of whether or not I was accurate, but I believe it is important to be certain as to whether or not there is differentiation or discrimination between them and other Canadians. While it is true that they can bring in their relatives within these limited categories, children under 21 and in certain circumstances 25—

Mr. Harris: May I interrupt to say that I was in error. The permission up to 25 was in the case of Chinese.

Mr. Fulton: Yes. While it is true that they can bring in their immediate relatives within these limited degrees, without reference to the quota, any other degree of relative such as cousin, nephew or grandson does come within the quota of 150, in so far as India is concerned, and Pakistan 100, or for the Indian subcontinent exclusive of Ceylon, 250 a year. On the other hand, in the case of any other Canadian citizen, even one who may recently have come here and just qualified as a Canadian citizen, my understanding is that, provided he can give the usual guarantees as to ability to support the immigrant applied for and can comply in other ways with the requirements, he can apply not only for his relatives but for his friends in his country of origin in Europe, provided again that the friend comes within the general but much broader classification of admissible persons from those countries. There is therefore a much narrower restriction on the type of persons whom Canadian citizens of East Indian origin may apply for as compared with citizens of European origin; and even those are restricted within this quota of 250. It was in that sense that I meant there was a difference bordering on discrimination.

The minister has explained some of the difficulties giving rise to the fact that the quotas—even those limited quotas—have not yet been filled. I should like to ask him whether there will be a carryover; in other words, if only 127 out of 150 were actually processed, passed and admitted to Canada in the first year—that is in 1951—will that balance of 23 carry over into the quota for 1952? And will the unfilled balance of the cumulative quota for 1952 carry over and be added to the quota of 250 for 1953? It seems to me it is only fair that this should be done particularly if, as the minister says, it was administrative difficulties which were responsible for the fact that the quota was not filled in the first year.

Mr. Harris: The answer is yes.

Mr. Fulton: Good. I shall take up the rest of the matters in correspondence with the minister and his officials, because I have a number of cases.

Then with reference to the subject of immigration from the United Kingdom, what I said this morning was that not only did it seem to me that the assisted passage scheme was not being used to its fullest advantage in bringing out desirable immigrants from the United Kingdom, but that we had not completed any agreement with the British government under their empire settlement act. My information is that the assisted passage scheme is not of as much assistance to immigrants from the United Kingdom as it is to immigrants from the continent of Europe. Indeed that fact is borne out by what the minister said, namely that there had been more from European or continental countries taking advantage of it than from the United Kingdom.

The reason that is so is that the scheme does not extend assistance to dependents such as the wives and children of the husbands, and a far greater proportion of those coming from the United Kingdom than of those coming from the continent are married men with their families. The fact is that, owing to the impact of war on the continent, families are to a great extent broken up, and what we are dealing with there are displaced persons. For that reason it would be obvious that the number of people wishing to come as family units from the continent of Europe would not be as great as from the United Kingdom. Therefore the assisted passage scheme is of only limited assistance to the great majority of those who desire to come from the United Kingdom, according to my information.

That is why it seems to me regrettable that Canada has not made an agreement with the United Kingdom under this empire settlement act, under which the British government will pay a portion of the cost of the passage of a United Kingdom subject migrating to a commonwealth country. For instance, in the case of Australia I am told that the most recent agreement there provides that the United Kingdom will extend assistance to pay for the passage of emigrants to Australia up to a limit of £150,000 per annum. The situation you have there is that the emigrant pays £10 himself—that is all he is required to put up—the United Kingdom pays £25 per immigrant up to that over-all limit of £150,000, and the Australian government puts up the balance of the cost of the passage. As I said this morning, the result of that scheme is that substantial numbers of British emigrants have gone to Australia.

I do not see why it is not possible for us to work out with the British government an extension of our assisted passage scheme applicable to people from the United Kingdom, under their empire settlement act, in order to ease the burden on the British family which wishes to immigrate to Canada as a unit. I should like to hear from the minister whether he has any really insuperable objection to concluding such an arrangement.

Mr. Harris: The government of the day between 1921 and 1927 had, at various times, agreements with the United Kingdom under the empire settlement act. We have not had any agreement since that time. That has been the policy since the war, and I think it was a carryover of the policy which had been determined some years before. I think the feeling is that this country should at all times retain absolute control over migration to Canada, and that we can best do that by financing migration ourselves if we feel we should spend money on it, or by admitting people if they choose to come.

We have had experience with the act. Without reflecting in any way whatever on others who use it, may I say that suggestions have been made that you do not necessarily get the best type of immigrant if he is almost wholly subsidized to come. In fact experience 20 years ago led to that conclusion at that time, in some cases. We have therefore, so far, not accepted the standing offer which is in the empire settlement act; and that fact does not seem to have adversely affected the migration to Canada.

If you compare the figures of those who went to Australia and those who came to Canada you will find that while they did run ahead—and you would expect that—they are not so much greater than Canadian figures as to indicate that the lack of this plan is a definite deterrent to migration to this country. My recollection is that to the end of 1951 something like 290,000 people left the United Kingdom for Australia, and while I cannot give the figures to the end of 1951 to Canada, I think to the end of 1952 it would be around 250,000.

Mr. Brooks: From what date; since the war?

Mr. Harris: Yes, since the war. But a very considerable factor in migration to Australia and New Zealand was of course the fact that the people could take their money with them. The hon. member for Brandon made reference to that this afternoon. Perhaps he did not give the credit to this government that he might have given. He recited the considerable sum of money that anybody in the United Kingdom could bring to this country.

Included was a large quantity of goods which could be entered duty free, and he came to the conclusion that one would require $10,000 before he would be seriously hampered.

The fact of the matter is that when this department was first created the restriction on the export of capital to migrants was the restriction he stated, namely, £1,000, spread over four years. The additional advantages which he later mentioned were advantages which have come about because of discussions between the two governments, and because of the act of this government in greatly extending the goods which could be entered as settlers' effects. On the other hand, if you can go to Australia and take all your money with you that is a real attraction. It was a real attraction in the years 1949 and 1950 when the pound was devalued and there was considerable doubt in the minds of a good many people in the United Kingdom as to just what was the best thing to do. But if you look at the figure for that year, when we had 13,000 people come from the United Kingdom to Canada, and compare it with the 42,000 who came last year you will see that the numbers are building up and that we think we are now getting a good number of people from the United Kingdom, and we expect to continue to get that number.

Mr. Fulton: I might conclude on that point. I think it is important to point out that according to my information the reason there is a substantial increase, up to 42,000, which is not after all a very large part of the total immigration, is that a large portion of this 42,000 consists of wives and children coming out to join their husbands and fathers, and naturally do not represent new family units migrating from the United Kingdom in the year in question. I have been told that since 1947, 170,000 immigrants have gone from the United Kingdom to Australia alone under this empire settlement act.

Mr. Harris: In one year?

Mr. Fulton: No, since 1947. In view of the comparisons between the two countries of Australia and Canada, I venture to say, if I may without offence to Australia, that the relative attractions of the two countries indicate that Australia has been doing disproportionately well, that is disproportionately well as compared to Canada and what we have to offer to a potential British immigrant. Therefore it seems to me we should be giving more consideration to the plan. Dealing with the minister's argument—I do not want to protract this unduly—I want to ask him whether he will deal with this. He made what would appear to me, on the face of it at any rate, to be two potentially valid objections to the use of the empire settlement act. I wonder whether we can analyse it a little further and see if they are so valid as they might seem.

First the minister said it was the opinion of those concerned with policy that you get a better type of immigrant if his passage is not completely subsidized. Well, now, it seems to me that with respect to that principle, by far the greater proportion of the displaced persons who have come here have had their passages virtually completely subsidized either by one of the refugee organizations or by the passage money being put up or guaranteed by somebody in Canada. Therefore both in the latter case particularly and in the former case the immigrant might eventually be under some obligation to repay the money.

It seems to me that by far the majority of the displaced persons being admitted to Canada have had their passage money virtually completely subsidized. I do not want to suggest that that makes them less desirable immigrants; in fact I do not make that suggestion. It was the only way they could get here. Therefore, since I do not make that suggestion, I suggest to the minister it would not be an objection applicable to the use of the empire settlement act in the case of the United Kingdom immigrant.

The minister also used words to this effect, that it was the feeling of those responsible for the policy that it was most desirable that we should retain exclusive jurisdiction over the—I do not know the exact word he used—selection of our immigrants. Do I understand from this that the use of the empire settlement act would deprive us in some way of the complete and final decision as to what immigrants came from the United Kingdom; Because if it would, then I think it is a valid objection. I should be very surprised if an agreement with the British government under that act would in fact deprive us of any element of decision as to whether or not an immigrant was suitable and should come forward.

I wish the minister would deal with these two points, because if they are to be accepted as valid then perhaps I would be more inclined to accept the objections to that scheme than I am at the moment, because I cannot see how the argument applies.

Mr. Harris: Before I answer that I might point out that of the 42,000 who came here last year, 18,000 were relatives, so 24,000 of those persons to whom my hon. friend refers were either heads of families or single workers.

Mr. Fulton: The number 24,000 in one year is not very many, really.

Mr. Harris: Perhaps not, but my hon. friend heard his colleague from Gloucester this afternoon urge upon the government that families should not be broken up, and that we should have these people come forward to the head of the family at the earliest possible moment; and you must make that allowance.

Mr. Fulton: I was not objecting here at all; I was trying to put this in proper perspective.

Mr. Harris: The proper perspective is that you must have both. The other arguments I made I think are still valid. The persons who came forward as displaced persons, totalling 165,000 since the war, were persons who were subsidized, as my hon. friend says. They were subsidized for the reason he gave (a) they had no money whatever, but (b) they were a problem which was on the doorstep of the United Nations, something which was wholly removed from migration as a national policy. It was an international situation in which humanity came into play, in which self-interest required that a problem had to be solved, and I do not think these people can be used as an argument as to the normal course of migration in any form.

On the other question, when you enter into an agreement with respect to persons who will come to Canada and you subsidize them, it is inevitable at once that the other party to the agreement should be given some consideration. In other words, if you make an agreement with another party, in common courtesy you have to hear his opinions and perhaps agree to them on occasion. I am not suggesting that it would not be proper that they be agreed to. At the present time our offices abroad choose the persons who can come provided they meet the standards we impose, and under those circumstances we accept full responsibility for any mistakes that may be made. I think we are getting the type of immigrant most suitable to this country. If it is found that the policy is not working out satisfactorily we can change it immediately parliament indicates its dissatisfaction.

Mr. Herridge: The hon. member for Vancouver East has been called out of the chamber, and he asked me to ask the minister a question on his behalf. I understand that the hon. member asked some questions this afternoon with regard to the policy of the department in connection with certain Japanese who were repatriated to Japan and now wish to return to Canada. Can the minister answer the hon. member's question?

Mr. Harris: I think that question could be better asked either in the external affairs committee or on the external affairs estimates, because if those persons are citizens of Canada we do not handle the mechanics of admitting them; it is done through external affairs. If they are not citizens of Canada they would be admissible upon application under P.C. 2115 by anyone here who could claim the proper relationship as set out in that order. I think my hon. friend is referring to a group of persons who may be claiming to be Canadian citizens, and they would come forward upon application to external affairs, not to immigration.

Mr. McLure: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a suggestion to the minister under this item. I have not said anything on immigration or citizenship because the time has been all taken up. Some $26 million is to be spent on immigration and citizenship, but what I would like to see for Prince Edward Island is a policy to end migration. Through the fault of the government we lose a lot of our population every year, and these people could easily be kept there. If the same support were given to the people of the province, in different ways, that is given to bringing immigrants into the province we could retain at least a thousand people a year who are now leaving the province to go to other places.

I have nothing to say against immigration, but I urge upon the government through this department that they adopt some plan, especially for a province like ours, to keep people at home instead of bringing in other people to replace them. This could be in the form of loans to farmers' sons. In most cases a farmer's son cannot get as good a place or as large a loan as the person coming from outside.

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Chairman, this country is a member of the United Nations and it is really amusing at times to listen to the variety of ideas we hear on immigration. In my opinion immigration is one of the greatest factors that must be considered by Canada. I lived in the United States for a number of years, and a very able man who had started as a coal miner in Virginia and amassed a vast fortune through the desire to work advised me to return to my native land. He said to me, "You have a country there with tremendous undeveloped resources; it is the last great country in the world that offers what it does." Yet we have men in this country and in this parliament who want to put the brakes on prosperity, who want to put the brakes on progress. Because we are being fooled to some extent by the Russians the stock market drops and values are reduced by millions of dollars, simply because we are not carrying on an all-out war or almost an all-out war.

We have a country with resources second to none; but through lack of planning by the old Conservative party and the present Liberal party, which brags that it has been in power so long, we are faced with a quandary as to what to do. This government consists of various departments which are like cog wheels that should be meshing properly. Years ago they should have been thinking of what they were going to do with the iron ore they knew was located north of the great lakes. Forty-five years ago I sailed over lakes in the north country that covered great bodies of iron ore. The knowledge that there were vast ore bodies in northern Ontario, northern Quebec or Labrador was not gained just recently.

If we could not develop those with our own money, why did we not plan in conjunction with industry in the United States and with our own industry to develop these resources? We knew for years that there were vast oil fields in Alberta. No one will deny that, particularly the oil people. A man who was associated with my father in the law practice and who worked in conjunction with Imperial Oil years ago told me that they capped oil wells in Alberta at least 25 years ago.

These resources are being developed with the aid of millions of dollars of foreign capital. We are talking about the need of more immigrants. Mr. Millard, a great labour leader, has been accused of being almost crazy because he has stated that 250,000 immigrants could be brought into this country. He means if there was work planned for them to do when they arrived; he means if there were houses to be built.

The minister of immigration is a man of great resources, and probably he is doing his very best in the department. There has been great laxness on the part of this government in connection with the general development of Canada, and this includes the department of immigration. The same laxness was shown by the Conservative government in the past, and now the sins of the fathers are being visited on the people of today.

This is still going on. Why should we worry if there is an armistice in Korea? Why should industrial stocks in Canada drop? Why should unemployment be created? Every man in the House of Commons with any semblance of ability knows full well that we have not enough labour to meet the demands that would be created with an economy planned with the industrialists of this country, planned with the financial men of this country, planned with the industrialists of Europe and of the United States; planned with their money. We must go there for money. We must go there for help in our engineering problems. But what do we do?

An hon. Member: Move to the left.

An hon. Member: Come on over here.

Mr. Ferguson: I am speaking as a Conservative who has lived in this country all his life with the exception of a few years, a man whose grandparents came to this country over 150 years ago. I am speaking on behalf of the people I love and the country I love, and I am sick and tired of seeing it go down. I am sick and tired of seeing it act like a thermometer. Every time the wind blows, the sun rises or the cold comes, up and down goes the prosperity of our country. It is absolutely unnecessary. Take the country of Japan. Fifty years after an American admiral went there and told them how to do a little bit of business they were able to make almost any nation shudder if they threatened it with war. They were able to defeat the great Russian nation years ago. How do they exist? Where do they get their natural resources? From an almost barren island.

Look at what we have. Look at the money we are making. The government should be leaders, and not follow the practice every time they want anything done of picking on the one man in their party who is an industrialist, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Minister of Defence Production, the minister all-powerful.

An hon. Member: Amen.

Mr. Ferguson: Look at the arguments against the C.C.F. party. In the Conservative party we have lawyers, doctors, farmers, industrialists and financial men. That is why the Liberal party and the Conservative party are preferable to a party that preaches class hatred and looks at the picture from one side only.

An hon. Member: Boloney.

Mr. Ferguson: What are we doing? The present government, with all its ability and experience, is carrying on in almost the same manner as the Labour government of Great Britain did. The Minister of Public Works says he has a job. He says when someone has asked for a post office he will see that it is built. He will see that tenders are called. I just cannot believe that the Minister of Public Works and the other ministers are consulted with respect to immigration. How much immigration will we need this year, next year and next year and next year for the next ten years? How much financing will we have to do?

I am not suggesting for a moment that the government should take over the country and try to run it, but I am suggesting that they should endeavour to co-operate with the people who are doing a good job financially. The people of Europe who have come to this country as immigrants are solid rocks in the foundation of Canada. Today we heard of a Chinese, an honest, loyal and decent citizen, who has been kept out of the country. I cannot understand the hearts of people who at one moment preach United Nations and down with communism and then act in this way. I do not know any better way of bringing about communism than to say we love you and then punch a man in the face at the same time. The abolition of slums and the putting of these people into proper housing will obliterate any thought of communism.

In my home at the present time I have a little Chinese boy who was brought to Canada to join his father six months ago at a cost of $1,000. Fancy paying a thousand dollars to bring a child you love and cherish from China to Canada. Surely the government could make some kind of arrangement with a shipping company whereby it would only cost $200 or $250. This boy's mother and sister are still in China. Imagine bringing a little boy of 12 out here at a cost to the father of $1,000. The expense is so great that the father, who has been here for 20 years, has had to leave his wife and another child in China.

We talk about being human beings. It is time we changed our thoughts and actions. That boy came out in August. Last month his father was stricken with an illness from which he cannot recover. He is now in hospital in Collingwood. I have taken the boy into my home. These things should not be necessary. This man is married to this woman in China and he has a little girl there. The wherewithal should be given to this man. If we are going to allow such a man to come to our country he should be able to bring his family here so he can enjoy the family life to which he is entitled as much as you or I or any other citizen of the country.

The father of that little boy is a Canadian citizen. What does that mean? Does it not really mean freedom for everybody? Does it not mean the same possibilities irrespective of creed, religion or nationality? The government says: Take out your Canadian citizenship paper; pay $5. In my opinion no man who is willing to work and abide by the laws of the country needs to take out any paper. That is sufficient to show what kind of a citizen he is. The mere taking out of a citizenship paper and having your photograph taken while being given your certificate does not make you a Canadian. It does not change your ideas if they are communistic. It does not make you a man who believes in democratic government.

The government should hide their heads in shame in the light of conditions in the year 1953. Some members of the House of Commons doubt whether there should be any immigration for the next five or ten years. Some of them go so far as to say we should not bring any more immigrants into the country. I say bring in three or four million good people of the right kind of stock to help us develop what God has given us. Let there be no more puttering around by the government. Let them get down to earth and do a real job.

Mr. Higgins: The minister referred to Mr. Peters, the chief immigration officer at Hong Kong. I thoroughly agree that he is a very fine type of civil servant, as are most of the officers of the department. But I do bring to the minister's attention, because it has come to me from very many sources on very many occasions, that there is something a little bit rotten in the state of China, if you will, with respect to the Chinese part of the establishment at Hong Kong. The minister is aware already that there have been all kinds of stories of money being passed and so on before Chinese could come here. I bring the matter to his attention as it has been brought to mine.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want to make one brief reference to the minister's statement tonight. I think one must say quite frankly that what the minister said sounded practical. In effect he said what is contained in a paragraph of what he said yesterday, that the approach should be realistic, that we must anticipate future developments as closely as we can and gear our immigration program to them. Then he spoke about the opportunities for growth, and said the government must seize the opportunity and make the maximum use of it in the interests of our people. Then he spoke about one thing he did not mention tonight. He hinted briefly at the question of defence, how much Canada has to contribute to the peace of the world, and said that that contribution will be greater as we grow in number.

As I said a moment ago, I think there is a lot of common sense in that approach by the minister. But on the other hand I think it is not unfair to say also that it is almost wholly negative. You are more or less like the fly on the wheel. You are circling around; you are keeping track of what is going on and fitting yourself into that, but it seems to me there is no evidence there of a taking hold of the situation, of any lead of any kind. In a sense there is really no policy except the policy of trying to mesh in with what is going on.

I admit that in a sense that is a policy, but it is perhaps not unfair to call it a policy of negation, in a way. It is very different, from example, from the policy of Australia which has been outlined, although I am not sure their policy is perfect by any means. But one aspect of the negation seems to be that we have had two entirely different views presented to us. One of them was contained in the very interesting speech of the hon. member for Cape Breton South, in which he pretty well wound up by criticizing the government. I shall read these words:

> Our selection of immigrants should be along the lines of the requirements of the country, but in the last year we have imported unskilled labour when we should have been bringing in skilled people to fill vacancies that already exist at the employment offices.

Then the hon. member for Moose Jaw indicated that Canada is very short of people with different kinds of knowledge, including hardware men.

This leads me to ask the minister one or two questions, the answers to which I hope will throw some light on the practical outcome of the approach which he has suggested. For example, he has made reference to our arrangements abroad, and has spoken about our having an agreement with the Netherlands. He says, after referring to other countries:

> There is one exception to the above; that is in the Netherlands, with which country we have an agreement for the selection of immigrants.

I would ask the minister to tell us two things. First of all would he give us the nature of that agreement. It seems to me, on the face of it, sensible to have an agreement; and the minister, as I gather from the tenor of his speech, thinks well of it too. He thinks it is a very sensible and workmanlike position to be in. Will he say something about the working agreement, and will he tell us also why, apparently, we have an agreement only with the Netherlands?

Mr. Harris: At the end of the war the government of the Netherlands decided that they would serve their interests best by encouraging migration out of their country. An agreement was entered into in the spring of 1947 with the government of Canada whereby an institution called the Netherlands foundation was established for the purpose of processing would-be emigrants from the Netherlands.

We agreed at that time to take numbers which would be agreed upon from time to time of farm workers and farm settlers. In essence the terms have remained much the same. We indicate in advance approximately the number of persons from that country we think we could absorb during the coming shipping year. We have our offices in The Hague and, in conjunction with the Netherlands foundation, who find the people and send them to us, we process them. There has been some variation, I may say, in that while it started out to be wholly agricultural in content, it is not entirely that way now. The total figures for last year were, I believe, 22,000, of whom about 15,000 would have been agricultural, although I am not sure of the exact number.

It is the only country with which we have such an agreement; and it is peculiar to that country because they desire out of their own funds to do the finding of the immigrants and deliver them to us for examination within their country.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Have we tried to make any other such arrangement?

Mr. Harris: No; but I think I might add that most other European countries, with the exception of Germany, are not particularly anxious to encourage migration.

Mr. Fulton: What about the United Kingdom? Could not an agreement along those lines be made under their settlement act?

Mr. Harris: I suppose an agreement of that kind could be made. But it has been traditional for the government of Canada, and in fact for some provincial governments, to maintain offices in London for the purpose of soliciting people to come to this country.

Mr. Brooks: Is the Netherlands foundation sponsored by the government, or is it a privately sponsored organization?

Mr. Harris: It consists of various private organizations; but it is established by the government, and carries out the duty of selecting migrants not only to Canada but to Australia and other countries, under the assistance and with the approval of the Netherlands government.

Mr. Cardiff: I should like to ask a question, but if it is not convenient to answer I might be able to get the information in some other way. How many immigrants had Canada absorbed until the end of 1948, and how many in each year since?

Mr. Harris: I would have to have a statement prepared to answer that.

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Fulton: There is one other point. The minister outlined an agreement with the Netherlands. It appears to be unobjectionable. I think he told us that the Netherlands actually finds the immigrants and brings them forward to us for examination. If that is unobjectionable in the case of the Netherlands, why is an agreement along similar lines objectionable in the case of the United Kingdom? We would still maintain the right to examine them in our offices in the United Kingdom. It seems to me what the minister has said disposes of his earlier argument against such agreements.

Mr. Harris: I said at the beginning that the government of the Netherlands embarked upon a policy of encouraging their people to go abroad. So far as I know that has not been the policy of any government in the United Kingdom since the war. They have maintained their settlement act, whereby they subsidized passages under certain conditions.

Mr. Fulton: Is that not the same thing?

Mr. Harris: No, not quite the same. In fact I believe I can quote the present leader of the government in the United Kingdom as saying something about its being a rather difficult thing, and that they ought to see it through. But I think the hon. member would find that he would be getting into a field that is wholly different from the Netherlands, where for the sake of their own economy they decided specifically that they would have to reduce their population.

Item agreed to.

61. Field and inspectional service, Canada—operation and maintenance, including $10,000 for grants to immigrant welfare organizations, $5,204,217.

Mr. Gillis: Under this item I should like to bring something to the minister's attention. I note that the item refers to field and inspectional service, and my question deals with both of them. I see here $10,000 for grants to welfare organizations dealing with immigrants. I have a press clipping in my hand from tonight's Ottawa Journal that pretty well bears out the fears I was expressing today about bringing in immigrants who may not find jobs when they get here, and have no accommodation. This Canadian Press dispatch emanates from Edmonton, Alberta, and states:

> John A. Gough, an English immigrant, who claimed false information given him by Canadian immigration authorities in Britain was partly responsible for him turning to crime, pleaded guilty yesterday to five break-in charges, and was sentenced to one year.
> Gough said that before he left England a year ago, he was assured there would be a job and accommodation for him in Canada. He claimed this was not the case.

I am not saying this press statement is absolutely accurate, but apparently there must be something in it. I would ask the minister, under this item, to give the committee a general description of how that inspectional service is carried on in Great Britain, and how immigrants are handled when they land in Canada. What does this welfare organization do, that is receiving the grant of $10,000? Is there some redress for a man of this kind—in this instance he is in jail—to appeal to the welfare organization to assist him in finding employment, so as to keep him out of the toils of the law?

This case comes to our attention because the details have appeared in the press. However, there may be many more similar cases across the country. Are any efforts made to prevent these men getting into the toils of the law and ending up in jail?

Mr. Harris: If I might make one brief answer, it would be this. I could explain to my hon. friend just what the situation is, and at considerable length. I would be prepared to do so at any time he chooses. I think you realize that with nearly 800,000 people coming here since the end of the war, there are bound to be people who do not fit in and who may have formed the impression that they were given certain assurances. I have personally investigated many, many cases where people have said they were told thus and so. I find a wholly different story. I do not suggest that this young man is misleading anybody, but I do not think anyone could seriously hope that, in a migration of that size, you would not find some unfortunate people who would get into trouble when they got here, or that there would not be some who would have come with ideas which no reasonable person should have in the first place, and who come with no more than the ordinary encouragement which I think anybody here would expect our immigration officers to give.

Now, if we are going to have a policy of immigration we are bound to have immigration officers who like to tell people about the advantages of Canada. If you are not going to have that, if you do not want that, then say so and if that is government policy you will not have immigration officers doing that. As I understand the policy of this government, and as I understand the policy of parliament in the past six years since the end of the war, there never has been, except on one occasion, a member who spoke positively against all immigration. If you have immigration you are bound to have immigration officers who will put forward not the most glowing picture of this country—though they could do so reasonably— but a reasonably optimistic picture encouraging people to come to what they believe is a good country.

Mr. Gillis: I agree with everything the minister has said, but that does not answer my question. What I should like the minister to do at another time is to give us a blow by blow description of how this selection is made, and what happens when these immigrants—

Mr. Harris: I shall give you a blow by blow description of what happened to that particular immigrant if you will give me his name.

Mr. Gillis: I do not know his name, but I shall give you the clipping. You can check on it. There is only one thing I want that inspector in Britain to tell the truth about, and that is whether or not he said there would be a job available when this man landed in Canada, and that he would have a place to live. I do not care what else he said by way of window dressing, but did this officer say there would be a good job and good accommodation when that man came here? If he was so assured, then I think he was misled.

However, I should like a description of just how the selection is made, and what guidance the immigrant gets when he lands in Canada. What does this welfare organization do which gets the $10,000 grant?

The Chairman: Shall items 61, 62 and 63 carry?

Mr. Brooks: It is ten o'clock, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: The only reason I have asked whether these items would carry is that we had a long discussion on the item for the administration of the whole department. On the first item for the immigration branch we had another general discussion. There was a discussion of assistance to immigrants, which is item 63, and field and inspection service, which is items 61 and 62. It was for that reason I asked if these items would carry. If hon. members wish to discuss them further, that is their privilege. It is now five minutes past ten, so I can only report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. Brooks: There has been a discussion, but there have been committees sitting all day. A committee of which I was a member sat this morning, this afternoon and this evening. There has been no opportunity for some hon. members to discuss this subject.

The Chairman: The hon. member knows that the chairman cannot be guided by that fact. When we have a general discussion of the administration item there is no way for the chairman to know who is absent because he is attending a standing committee or because he is detained elsewhere. Even if the chairman knew, the rules say that, by practice, a general discussion takes place on the first item, and then the committee continues with discussion being directly relevant to the various items.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REPORT OF COUNCIL FOR TECHNICAL CO-OPERATION IN SOUTHEAST ASIA

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): May I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to revert to routine proceedings?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the minister leave to revert to routine proceedings?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Martin: On behalf of the Secretary of State for External Affairs I beg leave to table three copies of the report for 1952 of the council for technical co-operation in southeast Asia. At its recent policy session in Colombo the council agreed that this report be published simultaneously by member governments not later than April 24, 1953.

BANKING AND COMMERCE

SEVENTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Hughes Cleaver (Halton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to revert to the order of business for the tabling of reports.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that the hon. member may have leave?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Cleaver: I now present the seventh report of the standing committee on banking and commerce.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, on Monday we shall consider the resolution standing in the name of the Minister of Trade and Commerce to approve the international wheat agreement. Then we shall move to go into supply, and hope to pass the motion with little or no discussion. Then we shall take up the estimates of the following departments: the Prime Minister's office, legislation, agriculture, mines and technical surveys.

It being ten minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

The following items were passed in committee of supply:

DEPARTMENT OF CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

A—Department—

57. Departmental administration, $280,729.

Citizenship—

58. Citizenship registration branch, $195,964.

59. Citizenship branch, $390,464.

Immigration branch—

60. Administration of the Immigration Act, $824,403.
