Mr. Fleming: May I ask a question by way of clarification. Subsection 2 states that the section is applicable to the 1954 and subsequent taxation years. Does that mean that payment is to be made in 1954 in respect of dividends received during the preceding year, or does it mean that you start the whole new system in 1954 so that on the dividend payments received in that year, the 25 per cent deduction would take place in 1955?

Mr. Abbott: No. My understanding is that the dividends carried by brokers for unknown or undisclosed clients in the 1954 taxation year would have 25 per cent deducted at the source in that year. That will remain in that position until the dividends are paid over to the clients when it is developed later who they are. Then, as the hon. member for Greenwood put it, the client will either have had his tax fully paid by the 25 per cent deduction, or if it is overpaid he will get a refund. If there is any further tax payable, he would have to pay that on a personal basis.

Mr. Fleming: Then the section will apply only with respect to dividends received during 1953?

Mr. Abbott: No, it will be all dividends accrued and carried up to that time.

Mr. Fleming: All dividends standing in the account?

Mr. Abbott: That is right; on the basis, of course, that the broker who holds them takes the position, I think quite correctly, that it is not his income, that it belongs to someone whom he is not able to identify. As I said this afternoon, it is income which should be subject to tax.

Mr. Fleming: Is that the effect of the opening words of the subsection which are:

> Where an amount has been received by a broker or dealer in securities in the period of twelve months immediately preceding a taxation year,—

Does not that mean the amount received within a period of twelve months?

Mr. Abbott: I think subsection 3 picks that up. It may be another year in which he would find the client with respect to whom the dividends are payable or for whom the dividends were receivable.

Mr. Fleming: The undisclosed client turns up later and claims credit for the 25 per cent deducted against that year. As far as he is concerned, will that be applied to the year in which he receives the dividends or in which the broker paid the dividends?

Mr. Abbott: It would.

Mr. Fleming: Which would be the year before the payment of the 25 per cent by the broker?

Mr. Abbott: I think that is correct.

Mr. Fleming: This may produce some strange results in years when there is a change in the taxation rates.

Mr. Abbott: That may be, but the 25 per cent rate is fairly moderate, and since there is an adjustment either up or down I do not believe that any injustice will result. From the discussion we have had this would seem to be the most practical way of solving this problem. As I say, if between now and 1954, as a result of examination of the way these accounts are actually handled, it appeared that some other system would be better, an amendment could be made and there would not be any prejudice suffered in the meantime.

Mr. Fleming: There is no doubt that if a missing client happened to be a deceased person and there was no tax payable on his behalf, there would be no difficulty in obtaining a refund?

Mr. Abbott: There would be a refund of the full amount under those circumstances.

Amendment agreed to.

On section 17—Averaging for farmers and fishermen.

Mr. Quelch: I think this is an improvement in the act and we certainly support it. There is one matter I should like to have clarified. On page 10 of the "Farmer's Guide" we find the following:

An election to average income form must be filed on or before 30 April following the fifth year.

Apparently many farmers do not get a copy of the Guide and therefore do not understand the full meaning of that clause. Instead of filling in that form they merely write a letter asking the department to average their income over the past five years. That is sent in before April 30. Then perhaps a couple of months later, in June, they get a letter telling them that they should have signed this election form, and having failed to do so they will not be able to average their income.

It seems to me the department is being a bit sticky about that. As long as the department gets a letter which states clearly that the farmer has decided to average over the past five years it should be allowed to stand. A form should be sent to him with instructions to fill it out. Apparently they just tell the farmer that he did not send in a form and therefore cannot average his income.

Mr. Fair: I have had similar complaints, and without taking the time to repeat the argument made by the hon. member for Acadia I want to support what he has said. I think it should be understood by this time that farmers are not a bookkeeping class of people. They are too busy working at good, honest work on the land. We find that many of them hire people, in some cases lawyers, to make out their returns for them, and apparently the lawyers do not know the rules either or they are more interested in building up an account so they can charge $10, $15 or $25 for making out the farmer's return. I think the department could relax some of the red tape a little. I think they might accept a letter where a letter has been sent in instead of insisting on the prescribed form. Failing that, they should send the prescribed form to the farmer so he may fill it in.

Mr. Abbott: It is essentially an administrative problem, and I can assure both the hon. members who have spoken that the deputy minister of national revenue, taxation branch, has been following their remarks closely.

Sections 18 to 22 inclusive agreed to.

On section 23—Dividend from personal corporation.

Mr. Abbott: I apologize for having to make all these amendments, but as the committee will realize this is a very technical bill. We have been trying to remove some inequities and anomalies, and since first reading of the bill our attention has been called to certain cases in which we had not covered what we intended to cover. This is a pretty technical amendment, but it has been drawn to our attention that we have provided in the act already for a credit in the case of the ordinary personal corporation. This amendment will make provision for a similar credit in the case of a foreign tax credit through several personal corporations. The amendment is rather long. Perhaps you might read it, Mr. Chairman, instead of my doing so, but that is the point that it is intended to cover.

The Chairman: The amendment reads as follows:

2. That the said bill be further amended

(a) by deleting lines 35 and 36 on page 14 thereof and substituting the following therefor:

"23(1) Subsection (6D) and (6E) of section 61 of the said act are repealed and the following substituted therefor"; and

(b) By inserting immediately after line 6 on page 15 thereof the following:

"(6E) Where a dividend is deemed by this section to have been received from a personal corporation on the last day of a taxation year of the corporation by an individual or another personal corporation, the person by whom the dividend is so deemed to have been received shall, for the purpose of section 38, be deemed to have income on that day from sources in a foreign country equal to that proportion of the dividend that he is so deemed to have received that

(a) the income of the personal corporation (from which the dividend is so deemed to have been received) for that taxation year from sources in that country, is of

(b) the income of that personal corporation for the year;

and he shall be deemed, for the purpose of section 38, to have paid income tax thereon to the government of that country equal to that proportion of the tax paid or deemed to have been paid to that government by the personal corporation (from which the dividend is deemed to have been received) on its income from sources in that country that

(i) the dividend he is so deemed to have received is of

(ii) the income of that personal corporation deemed to have been distributed to its shareholders on that day."

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I so move.

Mr. Abbott: I apologize for the seeming complexity of these amendments. It is true that the case to be covered affects only a very few taxpayers, but it is a very real inequity. In essence, where there are two personal corporations, this provides that the foreign tax credit may pass through one personal corporation to the other. There may not be more than half a dozen of these in the country, but there is an inequity and this covers that difficulty. As usual, I should like to move a corresponding amendment to part II, which is the revised statutes section of the bill.

The Chairman: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fleming: I wonder if we could have a moment to look this over and go on with something else.

Mr. Gibson: Take a couple of months.

Mr. Fleming: There is a real problem here, and if the minister would not mind letting it stand and going on with another item—

Mr. Abbott: That is quite agreeable. I have no objection.

Section stands.

Sections 24 to 27 inclusive agreed to.

On section 28—Benefits to employees.

Mr. Abbott: Here again I must ask the indulgence of the committee. This is a new section which relates to benefits to employees as the result of stock option agreements. It has been given a great deal of attention since the provision was first put in, and I should like to make the following statement before asking one of my colleagues to move an amendment.

During the last week or so since the bill received first reading I have had numerous representations regarding this clause in the bill which is designed to take care of a loophole which now exists in our law with respect to stock option plans. While the provisions of the clause now before us were designed to cover the relatively narrow field of stock option plans, the proposed legislation does bring into perspective the more general problem of how to treat the more usual type of employee stock purchase plan as distinct from stock option.

The amendment which I am going to ask one of my colleagues to move deals with the two subjects under one general provision. Where, under the existing law, benefits to employees under the ordinary stock purchase plans were potentially taxable under section 5 (1) (a) of the act, the amendment here proposed introduces a specific taxing provision for these benefits. The benefit to be taxed under both the stock purchase plans and the stock option plans is the difference between the purchase price of the share to the employee and its value at the time he acquired it. This benefit need not be included along with other income for tax purposes and thus put the employee in a higher tax bracket than would otherwise be the case. It will be open to him to have the benefit treated as a lump sum and taxed at a rate determined by the relationship between tax and income of his three previous years. The amount so determined will be reduced by 20 per cent of the benefit.

I might explain why this 20 per cent abatement against tax appeared to be a reasonable degree of relief. Section 5 of the law, while defining generally the scope of the tax on wages and salaries, provides that certain of what I might call fringe benefits need not be included in income. For example, the benefits obtained under group insurance plans need not be included in income. Neither is the employee required to include in his income the dollar value of his benefits under medical service plans. These facts suggest that it would not be unreasonable to exclude by some device moderate benefits received under stock purchase plans, for example.

A further point in this connection is that although the benefits received by the employee under stock purchase or stock option plans are regarded as income from office or employment, that is, it is regarded as remuneration, the corporation providing remuneration in this form to its employees does not charge it against its profit and loss account for purposes of corporation income tax. Thus it might be said that we are getting corporate income tax in a larger amount because the corporation decides to benefit its employees in this way.

These facts suggested that a degree of abatement equal to the low bracket of corporate tax might be a reasonable measure of relief to adopt. Accordingly, as I stated above, the tax as calculated on the effective average rate for a three year period will be reduced by 20 per cent, which is the minimum rate of tax on corporations.

I should add that it was not the intention in introducing this legislation to interfere with normal employee stock purchase plans which have been introduced by a number of corporations, but it was felt that it was necessary to prevent an abuse of these stock option devices through allowing employees, perhaps executives of a corporation, to get very large benefits which would not be taxable.

I would ask that my colleague, the Minister of Public Works, move another long and very carefully drafted amendment which gives effect to the policy I have just enunciated and, as well, the corresponding amendment for part II.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I move:

That subclause (1) of clause 28 of Bill 228, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, be amended by striking out section 75A and substituting the following therefor:

75A. (1) Where a corporation has agreed to sell or issue shares of the corporation or of a corporation with which it does not deal at arms length to an employee of the corporation or of a corporation with which it does not deal at arms length,

(a) if the employee has acquired shares under the agreement, a benefit equal to the amount by which the value of the shares at the time he acquired them exceeds the amount paid or to be paid to the corporation therefor shall be deemed to have been received by the employee by virtue of his employment in the taxation year in which he acquired the shares;

(b) if the employee has transferred or otherwise disposed of rights under the agreement in respect of some or all of the shares to a person with whom he was dealing at arms length, a benefit equal to the value of the consideration for the disposition shall be deemed to have been received by the employee by virtue of his employment in the taxation year in which he made the disposition;

(c) if rights of the employee under the agreement have, by one or more transactions between persons not dealing at arms length, become vested in a person who has acquired shares under the agreement, a benefit equal to the amount by which the value of the shares at the time that person acquired them exceeds the amount paid or to be paid to the corporation therefor shall be deemed to have been received by the employee by virtue of his employment in the taxation year in which that person acquired the shares; and

(d) if rights of the employee under the agreement have, by one or more transactions between persons not dealing at arms length, become vested in a person who has transferred or otherwise disposed of rights under the agreement to a person with whom he was dealing at arms length, a benefit equal to the value of the consideration for the disposition shall be deemed to have been received by the employee by virtue of his employment in the taxation year in which that person made the disposition.

(2) Where a benefit is deemed by paragraph (a), (b), (c) or (d) of subsection (1) to have been received by an employee by virtue of his employment in a taxation year, the employee shall, if he so elects, pay as tax for the year under this part, in lieu of the amount that would otherwise be payable, an amount equal to the aggregate of

(a) the tax that would be payable by the employee for the year under this part if no benefit were so deemed to have been received by him in the year, and

(b) the amount, if any, by which

(i) the proportion of the benefit so deemed to have been received that the aggregate of the taxes payable by the employee under this part for the three years immediately preceding the taxation year (before making any deduction under section 32, 33, 35 or 38) is of the aggregate of the employee's incomes for those three years,

exceeds

(ii) 20 per cent of the amount of the benefit so deemed to have been received.

(3) Where an employee who has elected under subsection (2) to pay as tax for a year under this part an amount determined under that subsection was not resident in Canada throughout the whole of the three years referred to therein, the tax payable under subsection (2) is an amount equal to the aggregate of

(a) the tax that would be payable by the employee for the year under this part if no benefit were deemed by paragraph (a), (b), (c) or (d) of subsection (1) to have been received by him in the year, and

(b) the amount, if any, by which

(i) the proportion of the benefit so deemed to have been received that the aggregate of the taxes that would have been payable by the employee under this part for the three years referred to in subsection (2) (before making any deduction under section 32, 33, 35 or 38), if he had been resident in Canada throughout those years and his incomes for those years had been from sources in Canada, is of the aggregate of his incomes for those three years,

exceeds

(ii) 20 per cent of the amount of the benefit so deemed to have been received; and, in such a case, the election is not valid unless the employee has filed with his election a return of his income for each of the three years in the same form and containing the same information as the return that he would have been required to file under this part if he had been resident in Canada in those years.

(4) Where a share is held by a trustee in trust or otherwise, either absolutely, conditionally or contingently, for an employee, the employee shall be deemed, for the purposes of this section, to have acquired the share at the time the trustee commenced so to hold it.

(5) Where a corporation has agreed to sell or issue shares of the corporation or of a corporation with which it does not deal at arms length to an employee of the corporation or of a corporation with which it does not deal at arms length,

(a) no benefit shall be deemed to have been received or enjoyed by the employee under or by virtue of the agreement for the purpose of this part except as provided by this section, and

(b) the income of the corporation for a taxation year shall be deemed to be not less than its income for the year would have been if it had not conferred a benefit on the employee by the sale or issue of the shares to the employee.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): And I move:

That subclause (1) of clause 73 of the said bill be amended by striking out section 85A and substituting the following therefor:

"85A. (1) Where a corporation has agreed to sell or issue shares of the corporation or of a corporation with which it does not deal at arms length to an employee of the corporation or of a corporation with which it does not deal at arms length.

(a) if the employee has acquired shares under the agreement, a benefit equal to the amount by which the value of the shares at the time he acquired them exceeds the amount paid or to be paid to the corporation therefor shall be deemed to have been received by the employee by virtue of his employment in the taxation year in which he acquired the shares;

(b) if the employee has transferred or otherwise disposed of rights under the agreement in respect of some or all of the shares to a person with whom he was dealing at arms length, a benefit equal to the value of the consideration for the disposition shall be deemed to have been received by the employee by virtue of his employment in the taxation year in which he made the disposition;

(c) if rights of the employee under the agreement have, by one or more transactions between persons not dealing at arms length, become vested in a person who has acquired shares under the agreement, a benefit equal to the amount by which the value of the shares at the time that person acquired them exceeds the amount paid or to be paid to the corporation therefor shall be deemed to have been received by the employee by virtue of his employment in the taxation year in which that person acquired the shares; and

(d) if rights of the employee under the agreement have, by one or more transactions between persons not dealing at arms length, become vested in a person who has transferred or otherwise disposed of rights under the agreement to a person with whom he was dealing at arms length, a benefit equal to the value of the consideration for the disposition shall be deemed to have been received by the employee by virtue of his employment in the taxation year in which that person made the disposition.

(2) Where a benefit is deemed by paragraph (a), (b), (c) or (d) of subsection (1) to have been received by an employee by virtue of his employment in a taxation year, the employee shall, if he so elects, pay as tax for the year under this part, in lieu of the amount that would otherwise be payable an amount equal to the aggregate of

(a) the tax that would be payable by the employee for the year under this part if no benefit were so deemed to have been received by him in the year, and

(b) the amount, if any, by which

(i) the proportion of the benefit so deemed to have been received that the aggregate of the taxes payable by the employee under this part for the three years immediately preceding the taxation year (before making any deduction under sections 33, 34, 38 or 41) is of the aggregate of the employee's incomes for those three years,

exceeds

(ii) 20 per cent of the amount of the benefit so deemed to have been received.

(3) Where an employee who has elected under subsection (2) to pay as tax for a year under this part an amount determined under that subsection was not resident in Canada throughout the whole of the three years referred to therein, the tax payable under subsection (2) is an amount equal to the aggregate of

(a) the tax that would be payable by the employee for the year under this part if no benefit were deemed by paragraph (a), (b), (c) or (d) of subsection (1) to have been received by him in the year, and

(b) the amount, if any, by which

(i) the proportion of the benefit so deemed to have been received that the aggregate of the taxes that would have been payable by the employee under this part for the three years referred to in subsection (2) (before making any deduction under sections 33, 34, 38 or 41), if he had been resident in Canada throughout those years and his incomes for those years had been from sources in Canada, is of the aggregate of his incomes for those three years,

exceeds

(ii) 20 per cent of the amount of the benefit so deemed to have been received; and in such a case, the election is not valid unless the employee has filed with his election a return of his income for each of the three years in the same form and containing the same information as the return that he would have been required to file under this part if he had been resident in Canada in those years.

(4) Where a share is held by a trustee in trust or otherwise, either absolutely, conditionally or contingently, for an employee, the employee shall be deemed, for the purposes of this section, to have acquired the share at the time the trustee commenced so to hold it.

(5) Where a corporation has agreed to sell or issue shares of the corporation or of a corporation with which it does not deal at arms length to an employee of the corporation or of a corporation with which it does not deal at arms length,

(a) no benefit shall be deemed to have been received or enjoyed by the employee under or by virtue of the agreement for the purpose of this part except as provided by this section, and

(b) the income of the corporation for a taxation year shall be deemed to be not less than its income for the year would have been if it had not conferred a benefit on the employee by the sale or issue of the shares to the employee."

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: No, just a moment.

Mr. Abbott: I would be very happy if you would care to have it stand for a few moments. I can only say that it has been carefully drafted by the Department of Justice to implement the policy which I have endeavoured to explain. I do not want to hurry the committee, and perhaps we could distribute copies of the amendment and allow this section to stand while those who are particularly interested may have a chance to read it through.

There is a further amendment to this section which concerns the question of special reserves held by insurance companies. Following discussions with the superintendent of insurance he has suggested that the section as now contained in the act on page 21, reserve for unearned premiums, would be awkward for the companies to comply with. I now would ask my colleague, the Minister of Public Works, to move the amendment. Again I apologize for the necessity of moving these amendments, but after all these are very technical statutes and it is important, when special points are brought to our attention, that we should be sure the amendment is satisfactory.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I suggest that in future where we have complicated things of this kind it should be possible to let us look at them before the last moment.

Mr. Abbott: In this case I do not wish to hurry the committee, but there is no change in the principle. If my hon. friend will look at the amendment I think he will see in a couple of minutes that it is a very minor one.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): It was really the others I was referring to.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I move:

That the said subclause (1) of clause 73 be further amended by striking out subsection (5) of section 85B and substituting the following therefor:

"(5) Paragraph (c) of subsection (1) does not apply to allow a deduction as a reserve in respect of insurance, but an insurance corporation, other than a life insurance corporation, may, in computing its income from its insurance business for a taxation year, deduct as policy reserves such amounts as have been approved for the purposes of this subsection by the superintendent of insurance."

Mr. Fleming: I wonder if we could have some elucidation of the concluding words. As I understand the proposal, insurance corporations, other than life insurance corporations, are not permitted to deduct reserves in the same way that other corporations are; but they are allowed to deduct such amounts for their policy reserves as are approved by the superintendent of insurance. What is to guide the superintendent of insurance?

Mr. Abbott: We attempted to spell out formally under this section what was desired, but the insurance companies told us that they did not keep their records on a day to day basis in this way. After consultation with the superintendent of insurance it was agreed that the section should be amended in this way, leaving necessary flexibility for the superintendent of insurance to approve the basis upon which reserves could be set up. I am told that he has to do that for the purposes of the Insurance Act now, so he would be combining the job he has to do under the Insurance Act with the determination required in this section. I am also informed that there is no intention to change the practice which has prevailed in the past.

Mr. Fleming: I wished to be clear on that point. As far as the non-life insurance companies are concerned, first of all there is to be no change in the practice imposed on them by the superintendent of insurance in the method of calculating reserves; and in the second place, this does not involve any additional taxation because there is no change in their tax position?

Mr. Abbott: I am told that my hon. friend has correctly stated the position in both cases. There is no change.

Sections 29 to 34 inclusive agreed to.

On section 35—Tax on premium.

Mr. Fleming: Has the minister an amendment on this question to meet the problem of the non-resident-owned investment corporation?

Mr. Abbott: Yes. This was a point which was called to our attention by the hon. member for Eglinton. It was a point that was well taken and I will ask my colleague, the Minister of Public Works, to move the following amendment:

That the said bill be further amended by inserting

(a) immediately after the word "corporation" in line 23 on page 25 thereof, and

(b) immediately after the word "corporation" in line 16 on page 57 thereof, the words "other than a non-resident-owned investment corporation".

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I so move.

Section 36 agreed to.

On section 37—Interest on bonds.

Mr. Abbott: There is a minor amendment here which results from a point we overlooked in apportioning interest in the case of sales by a non-resident of Canada to a resident; and the amendment which I am going to ask my colleague to propose to section 4A will provide that in the case of a non-resident who sells a security to a Canadian resident, the 15 per cent tax will apply only in cases where it would have applied had the non-resident not sold the bond.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I move:

3. That the said bill be further amended by deleting lines 7 to 12 on page 27 thereof and substituting the following therefor:

"(4A) Where paragraph (a) of section 19A would, if part I were applicable, require an amount to be included in computing a non-resident person's income for a taxation year, if the transferee of the securities is a person resident in Canada, that amount shall, for the purposes of this part, be deemed to have been a payment at the time of the transfer, to the non-resident person by the transferee of the securities, of interest on which tax is payable under subsection (1) of section 96 to the same extent as tax would be payable thereunder if that amount had been paid as interest under the security to the non-resident person by the person by whom interest is payable under the security".

Mr. Fleming: I think we shall have to ask to have a look at that one.

Amendment stands.

Section stands.

Sections 38 to 44 inclusive agreed to.

The Chairman: Hon. members will have noticed that in part II sections 46 to 87 inclusive are merely repetitions of sections 1 to 42 inclusive of part I. I take it that hon. members will agree with those clauses and their corresponding amendments.

Sections 46 to 87 inclusive agreed to.

Mr. Knowles: Will the minister explain to us what there is in part II that corresponds with section 43 in part I? As you, sir, have just pointed out, sections 46 to 87 do correspond clearly with sections 1 to 42. When you get to section 43 of part I we need some explanation.

Mr. Abbott: Section 43 only applies to agreements made before the coming into force of this act. But part II, of course, is the revised statutes which will apply in the future, so it is not necessary to carry forward that provision into the continuing law. This is really a special provision to deal with cases which are governed by agreements entered into before the adoption of the bill which we are now considering, and it is not necessary to make that permanent provision in the revised statutes.

Mr. Knowles: I have two more questions. What does section 88 in part II correspond to in part I? Then another question would be this. What is there in part II to correspond to section 44 in part I?

Mr. Abbott: I will enlighten my hon. friend in a moment, I hope. Section 44, I am told, is to correct a printing error and we need to correct that only once.

Mr. Knowles: My question previous to that one was this. What in part I corresponds to section 88 in part II?

Mr. Abbott: I am told that section 45 in part I is the corresponding section, the section which provides for deductions for oil and gas exploration.

Mr. Knowles: The minister says that section 45 in part I is the equivalent of section 88 in part II. I suppose the minister has noted the fact that section 45 takes four pages but that section 88 takes only about a third of a page.

Mr. Fraser: There does not seem to be any connection there at all.

[Mr. Fournier (Hull).]

Mr. Abbott: I am told that all the provisions which are in section 45 in part I are covered in section 53 which is referred to in section 88 which we are now discussing. Instead of spelling it all out, it is incorporated by reference.

Mr. Knowles: Why could it not have been done that briefly in section 45?

Mr. Abbott: I will have to consult the draftsman, I think, and find out why he did not do it that way. We have to spell it out once, but we do not need to spell it out again.

Mr. Knowles: If you can say it all in a third of a page, why do you take four pages?

The Chairman: Shall we revert to clause 23 and its amendment which was allowed to stand earlier?

On section 23—Dividend from personal corporation.

Section as amended agreed to.

The Chairman: Section 28 was also allowed to stand. Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. Fleming: I really think we should have more time on section 28, Mr. Chairman. It consists of two and one-half printed pages of foolscap.

Mr. Abbott: It is mostly repetition from the previous section. The change in principle is the one to which I alluded.

Mr. Fleming: Perhaps if the committee could go on with the other sections in the meantime, it would meet our convenience.

Mr. Abbott: That is all right.

The Chairman: Section 28 stands. We are now considering section 37.

On section 37—Interest on bonds.

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

The Chairman: There is only one section left, namely section 28.

On section 28—Benefits to employees.

Mr. Abbott: I might add a word here. This amended clause was drafted after getting fairly complete information concerning the stock purchase plans of a number of companies. It perhaps would not be invidious to say they included such companies as the Bell Telephone Company and the Maritime Telegraph and Telephone Company, which have had the stock ownership plan for a good many years. I am personally satisfied that the amendment deals fairly with the cases of the stock purchase plans, and that it provides a reasonably generous basis for stock option arrangements but does impose some tax with respect to employees who may be in the higher income brackets and who get quite substantial stock options.

The 20 per cent tax credit device, which was worked out by the officials in my department, I think—in fact I am satisfied—will be found to be satisfactory in employee stock purchase cases and I think should be quite satisfactory in the case of stock option arrangements. My personal belief is that it is fairly generous. While I think it is desirable within limits to encourage these plans, I do not think one can allow them to be abused. Since we have not in this country any capital gains tax, if employees of a company are given substantial benefits through a stock option arrangement on which no tax is paid there could be, I think, real grounds for criticism.

Admittedly the section as drafted is extremely complicated, but it has been drawn by the assistant deputy minister of justice who has been responsible for the drafting of the original Income Tax Act and the subsequent amendments. I am free to say that I have the greatest confidence in his capacity as a draftsman, and from experience I have found that his drafting always stands up.

The statement which I gave to the committee indicated as simply and as clearly as I could the basis upon which the benefit would be taxed, namely as a lump sum payment; and that when that tax was determined there would be a credit of 20 per cent of the benefit.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I have one question with respect to the wording, on page 1 of 75A(1), paragraph (a), line 3, "a benefit equal to the amount by which the value of the shares". The question is as to the word "value". Is that definite enough? Is that the price?

Mr. Abbott: That would be a question of fact. If the option was given, let us say, at $10 a share and the market value of the shares at the time the option was taken up was $20 a share, the benefit would be $10 a share. If it were not a stock which was quoted on the market, the value at the time the option was exercised would be a question of fact; and if there were any difference of opinion between the taxpayer and the taxing authorities, that would be a matter for determination by the income tax appeal board or by the courts.

Mr. Fleming: The minister indicated the extent to which regard had been had to some well-known and major employee stock option plans. Has this long and involved amendment been submitted to those concerned in such plans for their comments?

Mr. Abbott: No, it has not, but I think the general basis followed has been discussed with them. I think my officials felt that it was not appropriate, before the amendment was submitted to the House of Commons, to indicate exactly the basis upon which it would be done. But I think the principles were outlined to them. Of course, as the committee will appreciate, this provision is considerably more generous than the section as found in the bill now. But when we examined the facts in connection with some of these employee ownership plans it seemed that we had been unduly strict in the original proposal here, and that it might interfere with the operation of long-standing employee stock ownership plans which had been carried on for years.

I think it is quite appropriate that a corporation should offer its stock to employees at a price which is appreciably below the going market value because those values fluctuate. There is a certain amount of risk involved, and it is a way in which employees can obtain a benefit. So long as that is not excessive I do not think we should attempt to tax that modest benefit, because it is not charged by the corporation as an expense.

Mr. Fleming: Can the minister indicate more fully how the election under subsection 3 of 85A (1) is to work out?

Mr. Abbott: It is the same as any other lump sum payment. An employee would have the option of taking the benefit into his ordinary income and paying tax on it; and if he had no taxable income that year it might be to his advantage to take it in and pay the lower rate of tax. He has the option however of either including the benefit as a part of his income for the taxation year in which the benefit is realized or treating it as a lump sum payment in that year and paying tax accordingly at the effective rate of tax over the past three years less the 20 per cent credit. He would obviously select the option which was to his advantage.

Mr. Fleming: Under subsection 4 we have this provision:

> Where a share is held by a trustee in trust or otherwise, either absolutely, conditionally or contingently, for an employee, the employee shall be deemed, for the purposes of this section, to have acquired the share at the time the trustee commenced so to hold it.

How will that work out in the case of an employee who is a minor?

Mr. Abbott: That had not been thought of. That clause was inserted to meet the case, and there may be others, of one telephone company—I have no objection naming it, the Maritime Telegraph and Telephone Company —and its employees, who acquire shares which are held in trust for them by the trustee. I understand, subject to correction, that the shares are turned over to the employee when he leaves the employ of the company. It was to meet that case that that section was inserted.

Mr. Fleming: I can understand the effect of the provision in the case where the beneficiary, the employee, is sui juris, but what about the case of the employee who is not sui juris?

Mr. Abbott: This relates only to employees. I do not suppose an incompetent could acquire the shares, could he?

Mr. Fleming: Take the case of a 20-year old employee.

Mr. Abbott: I do not know. That would depend on the law in the particular jurisdiction in which he was, but I do not know whether an employee could acquire shares under those conditions. Perhaps he could, I do not know.

The Chairman: Shall the amendments carry?

Amendments agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Mr. Fleming: Before we leave this very complicated subject I should like to ask whether perhaps, looking at it from the point of view of future years, the time may not have come when a bill as technical and involved as the annual income tax amendments bill is becoming might not better be referred in the first instance to one of the select committees of the house, for example the banking and commerce committee, for review before coming to the house. It might enable us to cope better with a situation like the one encountered several times today where quite lengthy, involved and sometimes quite abstruse amendments are submitted to the committee with perhaps less time to study them than members feel they ought and would like to give to the subject.

We appreciate that the minister did not try to force the pace on this. When we asked that they stand he has been quite ready to accede to the proposal, but there is a limit to what one can attempt to digest in the way of very involved amendments such as some of those extending, each of them, over several pages. I offer that suggestion while at the same time acknowledging with appreciation the fact that the minister this year did assist us by arranging to let the officials talk to the members about these questions that gave them difficulty. I am thinking particularly of these amendments that have been put before us.

Mr. Abbott: I think the suggestion is well worth exploring. I again apologize for bringing in these amendments tonight as I had to do. But in the amendments to the Income Tax Act this year we have attempted to do quite a number of things. We have attempted to tidy up quite a lot of situations which I think needed tidying, perhaps rather more so this year. But, as my hon. friend has said, this is a highly technical bill. It is one that does require very careful study. It might be well and it would be useful, certainly, in cases where there are a great many of these amendments, to have them considered in detail in a committee such as the banking and commerce committee. But granted that, with this type of bill it is clear that amendments to it, since it is a money bill, could only be moved by the minister in committee. However, it might be useful to examine this suggestion. It certainly can be considered.

Mr. Fleming: I quite appreciate the point the minister has made that amendments could not be introduced in the banking and commerce committee any more than here by anyone other than a minister of the crown. A similar situation arose before the banking and commerce committee when the Income Tax Act was first introduced for adoption in the house. I am thinking about the opportunity that would be afforded members to understand the bill they are dealing with, particularly in the case of the amendments introduced in the course of the discussion.

Mr. Abbott: I shall certainly see that the idea is considered.

Mr. Higgins: I am not going to delay the consideration of this measure, but unfortunately at five o'clock I thought private members' legislation was going to take longer than it did. I should like the privilege of taking one minute on section 11. I would have asked the minister certain questions at five o'clock, but he himself was a bit late.

I would ask the minister to consider the position of those who are on fixed pensions, or who are living on receipts from insurance policies or pension plans. I would ask him to think over the idea of increasing the exemption for such people, because the cost of living has gone up out of all proportion to the conditions when they were put on pension. I am not going to labour the point, but I think he knows what I am talking about. I would ask him to bear these people in mind and to see if it is not possible to increase the exemption of these people from $1,000 to $1,500 for single persons and from $2,000 to $2,500 for married persons.

Mr. Balcom: May I say a word. If the section we have been dealing with had gone through without the amendments made by the minister, our company, the Maritime Telegraph and Telephone Company, would have been very seriously affected in so far as their plan is concerned. This company has over 1,000 employees, and the plan has been in operation for several years. Had the section gone through as it was originally drafted, in all probability the plan would have been abandoned. We should like to thank the minister and his advisers for the kind consideration they have given us.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time?

Mr. Knowles: At the next sitting of the house.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the wish of hon. members to have third reading now?

Mr. Abbott: No; next sitting, Mr. Speaker.

PUBLIC SERVICE SUPERANNUATION ACT

PROVISION FOR PRESENT AND FUTURE PAYMENT OF ANNUITIES AND OTHER BENEFITS

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to revise the Civil Service Superannuation Act and to provide, amongst other things, for payment out of the consolidated revenue fund, as a matter of right, of annuities and other benefits to persons and to widows and children of persons who, having paid contributions into the consolidated revenue fund while employed in the public service of Canada, cease to be so employed, and to continue payment out of the consolidated revenue fund, as a matter of right, of allowances granted under the Civil Service Superannuation Act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Chairman, the bill to be founded on this resolution is to consolidate, revise and modernize the legislation governing pensions and retirement allowances for members of the public service of Canada.

The first provision of this sort was enacted by parliament in 1870. In succeeding years there were numerous changes and revisions. Broadly speaking, the present pattern of contributory superannuation benefits was established under the Civil Service Superannuation Act of 1924.

In the nearly 30 years that have elapsed since then the 1924 act has been amended by parliament on ten separate occasions. The present legislation thus consists of the 1924 act plus ten amending acts. Moreover, there has been a great deal of experience gained in the administration of our act, and there has also been a steady and continuous development of pension policies and practices in private industry and in government employment, both in this and in other countries. There is, therefore, a very strong case for consolidation, revision and modernization at this time.

This will be a rather lengthy and technical bill. In making a statement at this resolution stage I propose to limit myself to an explanation of the important new principles which have been incorporated in the bill.

The first important new principle is that in future the benefits under the plan will be a matter of right rather than a matter of grace. Hitherto all payments of superannuation and related benefits have, as a matter of law, been grants by the governor in council —rewards for good and faithful service. Even pensions to widows under the present law are dependent upon their "worthiness" to receive them. The new bill will depart from this somewhat archaic concept, and will establish the benefits clearly as a matter of right.

A second principle, which is closely related to the first, is that the bill will go just as far as is practicable in incorporating in the act itself all the rules governing contribution, calculation of length of service and benefits. The old act, based on a concept of grants and awards, naturally and perhaps inevitably gave very broad regulation-making powers to the governor in council and required that every award should be approved by the governor in council. Some regulation-making power, some element of discretion must be given to the governor in council, because the human factors and circumstances are so varied that it is quite impossible to cover every possible combination in an act of parliament. But when the bill receives first reading hon. members will find that it covers a much wider field in much greater detail, and that the regulation-making power, while requiring a somewhat lengthy description, is restricted to dealing with exceptional and unusual cases or combinations of circumstances, and with that degree of discretion which must be given if genuine hardships and practical injustices are to be avoided.

A third new principle, and the one which will have the greatest practical and beneficial results, is the proposal to extend the coverage of the plan to the great majority of all regular full-time public servants. Broadly speaking, the old act covers only those government employees of so-called permanent status. I estimate that the new bill will bring at least an additional 60,000 employees under the act; that is, it will probably almost double the number of employees covered by the plan. Our proposal is that in so far as it is practicable every regular full-time government employee will begin to build up superannuation rights from the commencement of his employment. The bill will not cover, of course, casual or part-time employees, nor is it possible at this time to apply it to the majority of prevailing rates or seasonal employees. But with these and a few other exceptions the intention is to provide a scheme of the broadest possible coverage.

The new bill will provide improved benefits in certain and rather limited sets of circumstances. The rates of contribution will be evened out to a straight 5 per cent for women and 6 per cent for men. The improvements in benefits are not major in character but are designed to smooth out the pattern of benefits and to remove some anomalies. Care has been taken to keep the fund actuarially sound, on the basic principle that the employees' contributions, plus an equal amount contributed by the employer, that is, the government, plus the accumulating interest on the total fund, shall be fully adequate to meet the calculated liabilities of the fund.

As I said earlier, this will be a rather lengthy and technical bill. I am sure hon. members will not want to have two overlapping debates. It seems to me that the appropriate time for a useful general debate will be on the second reading of the bill when its text will be before us. When I come to move second reading I shall be able to give some further information and explanations, but even then I shall not attempt to cover details or go into purely technical points. I suggest that the most effective way to deal with this bill in all its detail will be to refer it to the banking and commerce committee for study and report, and as soon as the bill has received second reading I shall so move.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Chairman, I shall be brief. I think everyone welcomes a measure designed to do what the minister has described. We are pleased to note, first of all, that it will classify these pension rights as rights, not as ex gratia payments. As a matter of fact, to tell the truth I had not quite realized that that was the law.

For reasons that I think are historical rather than justifiable, employees of the Department of Veterans Affairs—the old department of soldiers' civil re-establishment —have been in some measure subject to disability. From what the minister has said I would understand that the large numbers of regular employees being taken in would also include these people, and that any discrimination which may have existed will be removed.

As the minister has said, this matter will go to the committee on banking and commerce, and I think I need say nothing more at this time.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, I am particularly pleased that this resolution has come forward. I have been one who has been rather appreciative of the civil service superannuation legislation. Canadians generally can be very pleased with the superannuation provisions for the public service and that they compare favourably with those in other jurisdictions. Indeed I hold the view that they are the best of any of which I am aware in any jurisdiction.

I have always felt there was not sufficient appreciation of the splendid work done on this subject by the committee in 1923 under the chairmanship of the late Hon. James Malcolm. The report of that committee was the basis for the present superannuation legislation, and the 1924 act was based upon it.

Then in 1944 there was an amendment which could be considered quite important in that for the first time it removed the discrimination against permanent civil servants who were paid other than by a stated annual salary. It opened up the right of great numbers of long-term civil servants to come under the act. Prior to 1944 not only was it necessary that a civil servant, before coming under the act, must be permanent, but also that he be paid a stated annual salary. That had the effect, of course, of excluding employees in the printing bureau where the pay was on a weekly salary basis similar to that in the printing trades. It also excluded prevailing rate employees who were paid on an hourly or daily basis. Again in 1947 there were further substantial changes liberalizing the act.

As I interpret the words of the minister, this bill will have the effect of permitting all long-term employees in the service to come under the provisions of the superannuation act. An unfortunate terminology is used in connection with civil service matters in that some employees are classed as permanent while others are classed as temporary, although the latter may have been employed for a great number of years. The use of those terms has had a most unfortunate effect in discriminating against some long-term employees. As I interpret the remarks of the minister, I take it that this discrimination is now being removed. If I heard him aright, some 60,000 new employees will now have the right to come under the act.

Mr. Abbott: Additional.

Mr. McIlraith: I certainly welcome that, because I think the superannuation act is an excellent one. I also note that after second reading the bill is to be referred to the banking and commerce committee where it can be given detailed study. I hope that suggestion commends itself to the house.

There is one point bothering me. I noticed that in his remarks the minister made no reference to opening up the right of election to come under the act. I can see nothing in the wording of the resolution on that point. I would hope that the right to elect to come under the act will be again extended for a period of time, and that an injustice which was done to some permanent employees who have lost the right to so elect will be removed.

A rather curious situation exists, mainly in the Department of Veterans Affairs but also affecting some of those who were in the old department of the interior. There may be employees in other departments in the same position. When the first act was passed in 1924 there was a group of civil servants with permanent status under the Civil Service Act who elected to come under the superannuation act in the ordinary way. They were permanent employees, before the 1924 act was introduced and they would have had the right to have their superannuation based on the average salary for the last five years of their employment.

The permanent employees of whom I am speaking elected to come under the act. It is rather hard to get accurate information, but as best I can understand the situation a legal opinion was given that since the department of soldiers' civil re-establishment was not a permanent department, civil servants who had come from other departments, even though they had the old permanency certificates issued under the Civil Service Act, were not eligible to come under the superannuation act. Although they had permanent status and had elected to come under the act, their election was cancelled out and they lost that right.

Later on permanent status was given to the department that succeeded the department of soldiers' civil re-establishment, and of course they then had the right to come under the superannuation legislation. But the consequence of being permitted to come under the legislation only at that time was that their superannuation was based on the average salary for the last ten years of their employment instead of the last five years of service. The result is that this small group of men and women although many of them have been contributing for 30 or 40 years will receive a much smaller superannuation than other civil servants who had permanent status at the same time and who have contributed the same amount of money.

It seems to me that a substantial injustice has been done, particularly when you bear in mind that by the very effluxion of time as affecting this legislation and the ruling to which I referred, these men and women are now about due for superannuation. These people came through the period of the thirties —I do not want to get into a party controversy —but I think it will be admitted that employment conditions were not good for civil servants then because there were no promotions and that sort of thing. They have only got their increased classifications and pay rates in the last five years of their service.

I would hope that the minister will elaborate upon what he proposes to do with respect to this group. I have always felt that there was an injustice done. I am not going to argue the legal point as to whether or not the ruling, that they were not entitled to come under the 1924 act, was sound because the old act, being based on the principle of ex gratia payments, makes the point irrelevant. I have always held the view that they were legally entitled to come under the 1924 act and that their election made at that time was valid. However, as I say, there is not much point in arguing that legal point. I have felt that an injustice was done to this small group, and I hope that it will be corrected in the bill.

I look forward to seeing the bill and I hope it will contain not only the beneficial provisions to which the minister has referred but other provisions to remove a number of small but nonetheless important administrative injustices in the act. The existing legislation and the principle behind it I think is thoroughly beneficial. I can speak only in congratulatory terms of it and express appreciation to the minister for bringing forward this much-needed amending bill at this time.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, we too welcome the introduction of this legislation. The minister will recall that he said it was his intention to introduce legislation of this nature at an earlier session. I believe he indicated, either at the last session or the session before, that when the legislation was brought in any of its benefits which would have become effective at that time would be made retroactive to the earlier date. I hope that undertaking will not be overlooked.

We too welcome the fact that after second reading this bill is to go to the committee on banking and commerce so it can be thoroughly studied by the members of that committee. I hope that committee will exercise the right which all standing committees of this house have to hear witnesses or delegations that may wish to make representations or suggestions. I am glad to see the minister nodding his head affirmatively. I am confident that if he gives the nod the committee will go along with him. I am sure the various civil service associations will be most anxious to appear before that committee to express their appreciation of the improvements that are forthcoming and make their representations where there are other changes that should still be made.

Since both the previous speakers, the hon. member for Greenwood and the hon. member for Ottawa West, have referred to one particular group, I should like to say a word about that group as well. The reference is to that small number of employees who were in the old department of soldiers' civil re-establishment after world war I and who for some reason or other have been denied the right to transfer to part II of the Civil Service Superannuation Act. The denial of that right has had the effect which the hon. member for Ottawa West has pointed out, and it does seem to me that it is most unfair.

As the last speaker has indicated, the number affected is very small, but I suggest that the fact that the Department of Veterans Affairs employees' national association has made substantial representations on their behalf indicates that those who are working together with them feel very strongly the justice of the case being put forward by these employees. Like other members of the house, I have corresponded with the Minister of Finance about this matter. I have before me his letters to me and I have also seen copies of letters that he has written to other people on this question. If I may sum it up, it seems to me that he has based his decision thus far not to meet this request simply on the ground that a negative decision was made back in 1925 and again in 1926 or 1927.

I agree with the hon. member for Ottawa West that the decision was unfair and unjust, and surely that is no reason for that unfairness and injustice being continued. Now we are confronted with what amounts to a new bill. If the previous decision was simply a matter of interpretation, surely that can be corrected now by legislation so as to give to these employees the right to transfer to part II which is enjoyed by other employees of the government who have worked for a comparable period of time. I earnestly hope that consideration will be given to these representations even before the bill is brought in. If a change is not provided for in the bill, I am sure that if the committee will hear delegations on behalf of these employees there will be very strong representations made on this point.

Another group whose case I hope has been taken care of in the drafting of the bill is that known as the ex-Wrens, ex-members of the Women's Royal Canadian Naval Service. I understand that perhaps through some oversight the same right to count service during the war for pension purposes that is enjoyed by members of the women's division of the Royal Canadian Air Force and the women who served in the army is not enjoyed by those who served with the Women's Royal Canadian Naval Service. I hope that anomaly, the discrimination against that group, will be corrected in the bill when it is brought before us.

We welcome the fact that so large a group, an additional 60,000, will be permitted to come under the provisions of the Civil Service Superannuation Act, but I hope it will not be long until some of these other groups are also brought under the act. I find it difficult to understand the minister saying on the one hand that the aim is to bring in practically all the regular full-time government employees, and then telling us on the other hand that prevailing rates employees are not to be included. After all, prevailing rates employees are just as full-time and regular government employees as classified civil servants. The only real difference is in their basis of pay, and it would seem to me that the job is not fully done until these other groups are brought in as well. I hope that question will be gone into by the banking and commerce committee when it considers this important piece of legislation.

There is one other group which some of us had hoped might receive consideration when legislation of this kind was being introduced. I refer to federal civil servants who are already retired. The hon. member for Ottawa West has just made reference to the difficulty that still exists in some cases because of the lower salaries that obtained during the thirties. Many retired employees of the government are today having a difficult time in getting along on their low pensions. Whether these low pensions arise from conditions in the thirties or from other reasons, it seems to me we should not go on any longer without providing some increase for our retired civil servants, particularly those in the lower brackets. I am sorry that there seems to be no indication in the resolution that any such provision for superannuated civil servants is being proposed in the bill.

Again, if that is the case I hope this matter can be dealt with in the banking and commerce committee. I hope the committee will permit any organizations of retired civil servants that would like to make representations to appear and state their case. I am sure if a committee of this house could hear a statement of their case from these people and the difficulties they are having, in the light of today's cost of living, in getting by on the small amount of pension some of them have, the committee would certainly want to recommend that something be done for these people.

I agree with the minister that most of the details as to this matter can be left for further study when we have the bill before us, and still further study when it goes before the committee. In general we welcome the introduction of the legislation. We are glad to note the improvements that are forthcoming, and we hope the door is not closed to still further improvements that may be suggested while the legislation is going through the House of Commons.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): Mr. Chairman, I too welcome this legislation. For a number of years I have tried to bring to the attention of the house that it would be in the interests of the civil servants to have a committee to discuss such matters as superannuation, salaries, conditions of work and so on in the civil service. I am glad that at last we have a concrete result of all the representations that have been made to the government over the past few years with respect to one feature at least, namely the superannuation act. What I welcome most is the fact that the minister said that in future the benefits derived by civil servants will be benefits of right and not of grace. We want our civil servants to be the best in the world. We want them to be loyal, honest, and faithful. We want them to be satisfied with their lot and to give the best of their time and their lives, although in most cases it is not with the hope of much promotion or advancement.

A civil servant is in the true sense a servant of the crown, and in most cases he cannot hope that his lot throughout his life will be one of advancement and promotion. That is why the benefits to be derived when the time comes for his retirement should be the best that can be devised under present methods. I have been hoping that the legislation will give more and better benefits to the civil servants of Canada.

The second feature of the minister's announcement is that there will be proper regulations for the awarding of pensions, and that it will not be a matter of discretion. That discretion will be reserved for certain cases such as those of hardship. The third feature of the announcement is that the superannuation act will extend to all full-time employees.

The last speaker made a good point when he stated that full-time employees are included as well as prevailing rate employees who are on a full-time basis. They are servants of the crown just as well as those who are temporary clerks, and so on. I did understand the minister to say that some prevailing rate employees might not be included but he stated that some or at least most of the prevailing rate employees will be covered by this act from the commencement of their employment.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not want to repeat what has been said by the hon. member for Ottawa West, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and the hon. member for Greenwood about employees of the soldiers' civil re-establishment department and the situation which occurred in 1924. I do not need to repeat that I am in agreement with them that the minister, either under this act or through some amendment, should see that it is possible for those people to get the benefits of which they were deprived by the passing of the act in 1924.

There is another class of employees, too, who suffered greatly; that was the group from the department of the interior. I shall not go into that situation at this time, but everyone will remember that a large number of employees were released from that department in the 1930's. Some were fortunate enough to preserve continuity of employment and others were re-employed later by the government. They were kept from receiving the benefits of the superannuation act. There were those who for certain reasons—on account of the depression and so on—could not get employment with the government and received an immediate pension, were later re-employed and started on another pension scheme. There are those who receive a pension for service up to 1932 and then another pension for service starting after their re-employment. They would, of course, have received much more benefit if their employment had been continuous through the years.

I do not wish to go into greater detail but I would like to repeat what I have said through the years, although I do not know that I will be successful, that a number of superannuated civil servants should have been considered for increases in their pensions. Their pensions are very low and they were unfortunate in being retired at an early date and before the recent increases in salaries. I have said before that other countries such as England and the United States have seen fit to give a cost of living bonus to some of their superannuated civil servants in cases where the pensions were too low. I am still hoping that this government and this parliament will see its way clear to consider that matter. This is not solely a business proposition; and this is not the case of an insurance company balancing its books according to the contributions. The government has a certain responsibility which is different from the responsibility of the ordinary corporation to its employees. The government should give the best lead and the best example in the treatment of its employees, and I hope the minister will consider the case of superannuated civil servants just as he has given consideration to others in these amendments.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I know this bill is going to a committee, and we will have an opportunity of examining officials of the department and perhaps suggesting amendments which I hope the minister will see fit not only to consider but to accept.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, the operative words of the resolution before us are:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to revise the Civil Service Superannuation Act . . .

The words which follow define in some measure the additional features that are suggested. In explaining this the minister has referred to the full-time employees, and certain other references have been made. We shall presently have the act before us in detail and that will be the opportunity to discuss that act.

There is, however, one aspect of this problem which should be borne in mind in considering the nature of the bill that is to be introduced and the purpose of a revision of this kind. In addition to any statutory provision for adjustments which will improve the general provisions of the superannuation act, every reference to "full-time employees" draws our attention to one unsatisfactory aspect of the present situation which should be borne in mind in presenting this act; and having been borne in mind in presenting this act, it should be carried forward into other legislation relating to those engaged in serving the people of this country.

There are too many people who are actually full-time employees and who are not so regarded in the records which establish their entitlement either to superannuation or to other rights. It is perhaps a natural tendency under all governments to carry forward various types of temporary employees to a stage where they have in fact been permanent employees, in many cases for a considerable number of years. That produces inequalities and injustice, and above everything else it denies to those who find themselves in that position a sense of security. It denies that peace of mind and comfortable assurance as to the future which in itself contributes so much to the efficiency of the service that is given in this way. In a very large measure the continuing business of this country under one government and another depends upon a high standard of civil service and upon that feeling of assurance that is given by legislation which avoids any feeling of unfairness or unjustness.

Canadians have every reason to be proud of the standard of our civil service. The members of this government, and of every government, should at all times be careful to preserve the great traditions of that civil service. Above all, they should be sure that under any system that is devised the measure of security that is offered is in fact extended to everyone who offers a service to the people, no matter what the description of that type of service may be.

Mention has been made of the difficult circumstances of some people who received pensions at a time when those pensions were thought to be adequate. With the changing value of the dollar pensions that were adequate a few years ago are not adequate today. It does seem that those who have served their country well in that capacity deserve recognition of that service and due consideration for the years they have spent in serving Canada generally.

I feel that all members of this house agree that it is expedient to introduce a measure of this kind. I feel also that there is general agreement that the adjustments should be made to extend in every way possible uniformity of treatment of those who serve this country, no matter in what category that service may be rendered.

Mr. Dickey: I do not want to delay the committee in passing this resolution, Mr. Chairman, but I wish to support most warmly what was said earlier by the hon. member for Ottawa West with respect to a group of civil servants who, under present arrangements, will not fully enjoy the benefits of the excellent superannuation legislation that we have in this country for our public servants. It is true that these individuals will enjoy part of the benefit of this superannuation act —even on that basis it is a good act—and they will be reasonably well treated.

However they feel, and I think with a great deal of justification, that for reasons over which they had no control they are not in a position fully to enjoy the benefits to which many of their fellow civil servants are entitled. As to these particular civil servants, I think almost every one of them is a veteran of the first war. They have been employed for many years in the service of the veterans of this country, both of the first war and the second war.

I know the minister has given this matter careful consideration. He has on many occasions proved to us the effective way in which he considers the difficult problems that are placed before him. We had an example of that earlier this evening in the amendments he proposed to certain provisions of the Income Tax Act. I see his desire to maintain the principle of not shifting cut-off dates and not giving rise to any unfair advantage to civil servants who might at one time have had an opportunity to make an election but failed to do so, and who now want to come in and make that election. I do not think that what is being requested would amount to creating that kind of precedent. These particular employees on whose behalf I am speaking were prevented, through no fault of their own, from making the election at the time required, and those who did make the election in good faith found later that they were legally not entitled to make that election and the certificates which they actually held were withdrawn.

I know the minister will consider these matters carefully, and that the committee also will consider them. However, I wanted to add my voice in support of the plea that was made so eloquently this evening by the hon. member for Ottawa West and supported by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and other members.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, I wish to add my voice to those of hon. members who have already welcomed this resolution preceding the bill to extend the benefits of the superannuation act. I think this extension of the benefits of the act to so-called temporaries is long overdue; but it is better late than never.

I also wish to add my voice to those of the hon. member for Ottawa West, the senior member for Halifax and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in the matter of those former employees of the soldiers' civil re-establishment department and the soldier settlement board. It was only this afternoon that I had a long letter from the minister with regard to this matter, and I wish to thank him for going to the trouble, with all his other duties, of writing quite a long letter to explain the various points of the situation.

It seems to me that the strongest point in the case for these civil servants is, first of all, their long service and second, the fact that they had paid their superannuation contributions back to 1919, I believe. There are so few of them left now that I think a departure could be made and that as they are about to retire there could be extended to them the benefit of basing their pension on the last five years of their service.

I do not know, and I will not know until we have the bill before us, to what extent the staff of the House of Commons may be covered in this measure. Perhaps it may not be the intention at all that they should be, but if it is not the intention I hope the matter will be considered. I am thinking at the moment of the stenographic pool. I know that in that pool there are many women who have given probably 25 or 30 years' service in the House of Commons. They are now getting to the age where they can no longer give efficient service, but members of the house do not like to dispense with their services when they have no other means of livelihood.

In private employment during the past few years there has been a terrific increase in the amount of pensions, sick benefits and that kind of thing that have been provided by employers. It seems to me that the lower the wage or salary and the more intermittent the service, the more important it is that these people should be helped to make provision for the time when they have to retire. Whether a person is legally in the service of this country—I was going to say "of this government"—and whether they are legally permanent or whether we call them temporaries or part-time employees, I believe they all should participate in the same benefits.

It may be a little bit difficult to arrange for it, but I am sure that a person who could draft and understand the amendments that were made to the Income Tax Act this evening would find it quite simple to deal with this matter of superannuation. I am just going to leave my case at that, knowing full well that the Minister of Finance will be equal to the occasion.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word on behalf of a group of civil servants whom everyone has described as having suffered a certain amount of discrimination and injustice over the years. I refer to the civil servants who were employees of the old soldiers' civil re-establishment department and of the soldier settlement board.

As I understand this matter, these people never had the opportunity of electing to have the last five years of their service counted rather than the last ten years for superannuation purposes, entirely owing to the fact that the soldiers' civil re-establishment department was looked upon as being only a temporary department following the first great war. Therefore these people were not able to get the status of permanent civil servants, and they could not make that election. In other words it was through no fault of their own.

All those who have spoken here, from all sides of the house, have expressed the desire that the superannuation should be changed so that the comparatively small number of people affected should have that right of having their superannuation benefits based on the last five years of service. The minister's statement was not clear as to whether the proposed legislation covers this point; but I would take it from the tone of the speeches made, particularly from the government side of the house, that the legislation does not deal with this point.

What the minister said, I think, was that the rates will be smoothed out to 5 per cent for men and 6 per cent for women.

Mr. Knowles: The other way around.

Mr. Harkness: Was it? I was not quite sure what that meant, but in any event it did not seem to me that it was going to meet this particular point. That was the only thing I heard the minister say which might be interpreted as applying to it, namely that the rates would be smoothed out, and therefore presumably all people would be on the same basis.

As I said, the desire has been expressed by hon. members speaking from all sides of the house that this injustice should be corrected. Perhaps the minister can tell us whether the present legislation which he is introducing in actual fact will correct that injustice, and whether there is any definite provision in the legislation as now drafted to look after this matter.

Then I think the house would be very pleased if the minister would give an assurance that amendments which might be introduced either by himself or in the banking and commerce committee will look after this particular matter so this long-standing discrimination might be done away with.

[Mr. Harkness.]

Mr. Thatcher: The minister stated this evening that this legislation is going to reform the Civil Service Superannuation Act. Quite a few reforms are needed. One of them which has not been mentioned tonight is the compulsory retirement age of civil servants. If my understanding of the legislation is correct, civil servants have the option today of retiring at 60 and are forced to retire at age 65. In view of the increased life expectancy in recent years that compulsory age of 65 is outmoded. It is wrong, and it is financially dangerous to the country.

When we pick up our newspapers today we find that it is very difficult to get help in Canada. I came back from the west the day before yesterday, and I picked up the Toronto Star. I found in that paper page after page of help wanted ads. Farmers, chemists, bookkeepers, machinists and others were wanted. There were eight pages of help wanted ads in that particular paper, and the same is true of every paper from Newfoundland to British Columbia today. You just cannot hire people in Canada. That being so, is it sensible to force our civil servants to retire at the age of 65 if they do not wish to? I personally do not think it is. I was reading an article in a United States magazine not long ago which said that the chief of the United States public health service, when speaking on this question of forced retirement at the age of 65, said that it is costing the United States every year 1,250,000 workers who would earn $4 billion. If these figures are correct, and if Canadian figures are somewhat similar, I suppose it must be costing us across the country, industry and government, at least 150,000 workers, and perhaps a national production of about $400 million a year.

Time and again the government has suggested to private industry that it would be well advised to keep its employees beyond the age of 65. It seems sensible to me to suggest that the government should give industry an example. When this legislation is being reviewed the government should consider extending the compulsory age of retirement of civil servants from 65 to at least 68. There are a good many civil servants who would welcome a reform of that nature, because they find it very difficult to retire with the cost of living as high as it is. Another aspect is that when a man retires he usually deteriorates physically and mentally. That kind of reform would also save the taxpayer a good deal of money.

Today the taxpayer is being forced to pay a large share of the retirement pensions of civil servants rendered non-productive usually against their own desires. When this matter goes to the committee I hope the government will give consideration to the reform I have suggested.

Mr. Brooks: I do not wish to delay the committee. This matter we are discussing, particularly with relation to the soldiers' civil re-establishment department and soldier settlement board, has been discussed on quite a number of occasions before. I remember that in the veterans' committee away back in 1947 and 1948 the matter was brought up, but at that time unfortunately our terms of reference were not broad enough to enable us to discuss the matter at any length. However, I wish to say that I am in hearty accord with what has been said by hon. members here tonight. I think the veterans in the soldiers' civil re-establishment department and in the soldier settlement board received very shabby treatment over a long period of years. I do hope that when this legislation goes before the committee, of which I am a member, the injustice will be corrected.

I have nothing further to say in this connection, but I do feel the time has arrived when this matter should be adjusted and I hope an amendment will be made to the legislation which will do justice to this particular group of worthy men.

Mr. Green: Can the minister tell the committee how many civil servants are under the superannuation act at the present time, and also whether it is the intention to cover these two groups that have been referred to tonight, first those who served in the old soldiers' civil re-establishment department and the superannuated civil servants?

Mr. Abbott: I shall be happy to do that. I am afraid I have not the number of civil servants under the act at the moment. That is readily available and I can get it in a few minutes. In any event I can do it on second reading.

I had not intended to make a statement at the committee stage about this particular problem of those civil servants who were in the old department of soldiers' civil re-establishment, but we have a few minutes before ten o'clock and it may be helpful to consider it. It is a matter which can be discussed in committee, but in its consideration it might be helpful if I were to outline the facts in connection with these particular civil servants.

When the Civil Service Superannuation Act was passed in 1924 it was provided that those who were permanent civil servants within the meaning of the act on July 19, 1924, should be given the advantage of the average salary over the last five years of their service in the calculation of any allowances which might be granted to them. On the other hand any temporary employee on that date, or anyone else who subsequently became a permanent civil servant, was to be subject to a ten-year average salary provision instead of five years.

While ten years was determined in 1924 as a necessary factor for actuarial reasons in the benefit formula for future contributors, the five-year provision was put in primarily for the benefit of those who would be retiring shortly after 1924, after having gone through a recent period of low salaries which were supplemented by a cost of living bonus. The use of the five-year period instead of ten would be some compensation to that group, those who it was expected would be retiring very shortly after 1924.

The question which has now been raised concerns the department of soldiers' civil re-establishment employees appointed prior to July 19, 1924, when the superannuation act came into force. Prior to that date, the department of soldiers' civil re-establishment act provided that the minister, under regulations, might employ "such technical and special temporary staff as may be required . . ." It was also provided that the regulations should contain provision for the issue of certificates by the civil service commission in respect of the positions.

An amendment to the department of soldiers' civil re-establishment act which came into force on July 19, 1924, altered the power of appointment by removing the reference to temporary staff and at the same time expressly exempted the positions and staff from the operation of the Civil Service Act. The amending statute was expressed to have force and effect from November 10, 1919. The effect of this would be to exclude the positions and staff from the operation of the Civil Service Act as of that date and, as the deputy minister of justice expressed in an opinion of October 13, 1924, made it possible to give permanent status to employees of the department by regulation with retroactive effect to that date.

Prior to giving this opinion, however, the deputy minister of justice on September 24, 1924, expressed the opinion that all appointments made under the department of soldiers' civil re-establishment act prior to the amendment in 1924 were temporary only, there being no power in the minister to make a permanent appointment under the terms of the original act. The opinion of Mr. Edwards, who was deputy minister of justice at the time, continues:

> I am of the opinion, in view of the terms of the statute, that such employees have only a temporary and not a permanent status. It follows that they are not eligible to become contributors under the new superannuation act.

In the light of the amendment and the opinion of the deputy minister of justice on October 13, 1924, a proposed regulation was considered by the treasury board in February, 1925; but the board on looking into the circumstances did not approve it.

When the Civil Service Superannuation Act was amended in 1927 the case of these and others who had been excluded in one way or another was again raised. In speaking of these groups in general the then minister of finance stated that the act was not intended to include any employees whose sudden withdrawal from the service would impose unexpected demands on the fund. These demands would arise from the abolition of office provision which at that time carried with it the benefit of the grant of an allowance for life on the same basis as if the person concerned had retired because of age. The government therefore was not satisfied that the positions in this department were permanent and the employees therefore could not become contributors to the superannuation account.

Of course all the employees of the department would not necessarily have become permanent had the treasury board approved the regulation proposed in 1925. The department, however, hoped until 1927 to have the position altered, and on its own deducted amounts equivalent to the contributions which those of its employees who might have become permanent would have made to the superannuation account. The department forwarded these deductions to the superannuation branch of the Department of Finance. This branch, acting on the opinion of the deputy minister of justice of September 24, 1924, did not accept these payments but consistently returned them to the department. The department held them in a trust fund until 1927, and then returned them to the employees.

The employees of the department were, with some exceptions, blanketed in in 1929 under the department of pensions and national health act. Thereupon under the provisions of the act they were deemed to be permanent and were dealt with properly under part I of the superannuation act.

While it is true that these civil servants will not obtain the same advantages in the way of pension benefits as those who were permanent employees within the meaning of the act at that time, yet they are in the same position as that of any one of the 14,000 temporary employees in 1924 who may now be still employed.

Since that time thousands of decisions have been taken, allowances granted, and payments made on the basis of the decision of the treasury board in 1925 and, in effect, the confirmation of parliament in 1927. To try to undo all this would lead to a hopeless tangle, and to grant special privileges now to those who are still employed would be absolutely unfair to those in a similar position who may have retired or to the widows of those who have died.

Any decision as to whether an employee should be regarded as permanent or not has to be made on the basis of the situation at the time the decision is made. Many functions and services of a department of government are not obviously of a permanent nature until a number of years have elapsed; and until that is accepted as evident the persons filling those positions have not been able to enjoy the privileges attached to permanency. That was the position of the department of soldiers' civil re-establishment up to 1929 when, as I say, it was blanketed in with the department of pensions and national health.

Happily, of course, we are taking steps to get away from any repetition of such an admittedly unsatisfactory situation, under the bill which is to be based upon this resolution. The old distinction between permanent and temporary is being removed, as well as the special abolition of office allowance, the existence of which made that former distinction necessary.

As I say, these questions can be discussed properly in the committee on banking and commerce, when officials of the superannuation branch and of my own department will be available to give any explanation which may be required. I propose to make a considerably more detailed statement on the motion for second reading, when I shall deal with the various provisions of the measure. However, it may be useful to have this factual statement on record tonight with respect to these employees of the old department of soldiers' civil re-establishment.

Mr. Green: I take it that neither of those two groups is covered in the bill as it stands.

Mr. Abbott: That is right. And there are a number of other groups which in my opinion have a better claim than this particular one, which I still do not think should be included. But they would have a better claim than the employees of the department of soldiers' civil re-establishment.

Mr. Knowles: Was I correct in assuming the minister agrees with me that it would be all right for the committee to hear representations from organizations representing these people?

Mr. Abbott: That should be a matter for the committee to decide, but speaking personally I have no objection to it.

Mr. Knowles: That means a lot.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Abbott thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 334, to provide for the superannuation of persons employed in the public service of Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): On Monday we shall consider the following measures: The third reading of Bill No. 228, to amend the Income Tax Act; Bill No. 331, to amend the Fisheries Research Board Act; Bill No. 330, to amend the Trans-Canada Air Lines Act, 1937; then two resolutions in the name of the Minister of Veterans Affairs, which stand as Nos. 6 and 7 on today's order paper; Bill No. 100, to prevent discrimination in regard to employment and membership in trade unions by reason of race, national origin, colour or religion; Bill No. 329, to amend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act; Bill No. 333, to amend the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, 1939.

The house sits at eleven o'clock on Monday. Most of these are amending bills.

Mr. Drew: I should like to ask the government leader when it is intended to bring in the estimates of the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I expect the return of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) over the week end; but my thought was that on Tuesday we would move to go into committee of supply at eleven o'clock and I would call three departments, which would be allowed to stand. Then we would take up the estimates of the Department of National Defence all day Tuesday and all day Wednesday. I do not know if we can go any further because I understand that three ministers are to leave during that week end to attend NATO meetings in Paris. That is what I was thinking at the moment.

Mr. Drew: That was my reason for asking the question. I understand that the Minister of National Defence is to leave at the end of next week. There is no single department of government that calls for such attention as does the Department of National Defence. We all recognize that under that one department half of all the money to be taken from the taxpayers during the current fiscal year will be voted. That department should be dealt with in a manner that recognizes the amount of taxation involved and the importance of the questions and answers that will be asked and given. I think I must express my own opinion that there is nothing more important for the Minister of National Defence than to be here for a continuous examination of the estimates of his department.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I have given the only answer I can at this time. On Tuesday we shall move to go into supply but if there are speeches on agriculture all day I will be in a bad fix to get into national defence. I ask hon. members for their co-operation to let me get into supply on that day. I might wait until Thursday, but that would be late in the week. That is why I propose to move on Tuesday.

As to the importance of the department, everybody agrees with the Leader of the Opposition, but I have noticed that discussion does not always go according to importance. I took three days for just a small fraction of the amount to be spent on national defence.

Mr. Drew: That is exactly the point. Can the minister inform us as to when the Minister of National Defence will be returning?

Mr. Abbott: He will be away for a week, I think.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I gave that information without being sure. I shall have to consult my colleagues before giving a definite answer. The Leader of the Opposition may rely on my willingness to be co-operative and to help.

Mr. Drew: I can only say that the skill and dexterity with which the minister handled his own estimates is still apparent in his discussion of this subject. I understand from him that after the motion to go into supply on Tuesday is dealt with it is the intention to call the Department of National Defence?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): And go as far as possible.

It being five minutes after 10 o'clock, the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

APPENDIX

LETTERS OF C. M. DRURY AND JOHN STEVENSON

MARCH 12, 1953.

John A. Stevenson, Esquire,
Editor,
Saturday Night,
Toronto, Ontario.

Dear Mr. Stevenson:

In your column entitled "Ottawa Letter" in Saturday Night of March 14, you make the following statement:

"In the sessions of the select committee on defence expenditures, the persistent efforts of its chairman, Mr. Croll, and his henchmen to smother damaging evidence of governmental waste and mismanagement have not availed to prevent the opposition members from unearthing some very damning material to sustain their case. They are now licking their chops over some candid reports by important officials, and their severity can be gauged by the following two quotations:

'However, I could not fail to be impressed by the fact that for such a tremendous administrative machine there appears to be very little fighting strength', and 'a high percentage of the construction and other contracts were awarded on a cost plus basis, which the department itself has declared to be wasteful, inefficient, and an incentive to extravagance.'

It is very distressing when reputable journalists mislead the public, either through distortion or failure to take the trouble to ascertain the facts.

In your first quotation you may have some special knowledge not in my possession, but to describe the author of these remarks as "an important official" is stretching the truth beyond the breaking point.

With regard to the second quotation, its author is Arthur Blakely of the Montreal Gazette, writing in that paper under date of February 27. So far as I am aware, the government has not, as yet, appointed Mr. Blakely to any important office.

Yours sincerely,

C. M. DRURY,
Deputy Minister

THE PRESS GALLERY

OTTAWA, March 18, 1953.

Dear Mr. Drury,

You are the latest of a line of individuals ranging downwards from the late Lord Bennett and the late Mr. Mackenzie King, who have been "distressed" by my writings and I can only regard your distress over my reputation as a piece of childish condescension.

In respect to such strictures upon my work as yours I have always followed the maxim adopted by Disraeli in his dealings with women—"Never complain, never explain". But I will depart from it to the extent of referring you to the story written by Mr. Richard Jackson in the Ottawa Journal of March 16th and the admissions of the Prime Minister on the same day, which seem a complete answer to your charges about distortion and misleading the public.

I propose to ask the editor of Toronto Saturday Night to publish this correspondence between us.

I am,

Yours faithfully,

JOHN STEVENSON

Mr. C. M. Drury,
Deputy Minister of National Defence,
Ottawa.

P.S. Your letter was held up in Toronto and only reached me today.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, April 13, 1953

The house met at eleven o'clock.

WHEAT

STATEMENT ON INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENT

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, on Friday last my parliamentary assistant read to the house the text of a press statement regarding the outcome of the prolonged negotiations for a renewal of the international wheat agreement. I now intend to supplement that statement by a brief account of the negotiations and to state the Canadian position with respect to the renewal of the wheat agreement.

The negotiations for a renewal of the agreement began in London in the spring of 1952. The United States at the outset proposed a price range of $1.90 minimum and $2.50 maximum for a period of four years. Canada saw no hope of an agreement at that level of prices and made an opening proposal of $1.75 minimum and $2.25 maximum, excluding carrying charges, which under the present agreement have amounted to the additional six cents per bushel. Australia indicated general agreement with Canada.

The importers did not make price proposals in London, but indicated that they considered the maximum price of $1.80 in the present agreement to be a fair basis for renewal if that maximum included carrying charges.

In Washington the negotiations began on January 30, 1953, where they had left off in London. The United States, supported by France, repeated its proposal on prices but for a period shorter than four years. Canada and Australia repeated their offer of $1.75 minimum, $2.25 maximum, for a period of four years. At this stage the importers made no proposals whatever.

In order to advance the negotiations the exporters unanimously declared that they would not enter into a new agreement at present maximum or minimum prices. The importers replied that they could contemplate an agreement at prices higher than in the present agreement but that they were not prepared to make a definite proposal unless the exporters were prepared to contemplate an agreement with a maximum below $2.25. The exporters unanimously met this condition by agreeing that a maximum below $2.25 would be acceptable.

The importing countries, then, on February 16, 1953, put forward their first offer of a minimum of $1.40 and a maximum of $1.95, inclusive of carrying charges. At that point there was a good deal of informal probing of the price positions on both sides extending over a period of some days. On March 6, the United States said that it was prepared to accept a maximum price of $2.15, inclusive of carrying charges. Canada and Australia supported the $2.15 maximum price as offering a reasonable basis on which to conclude an agreement for a three-year period with a minimum 50 cents below the maximum. A few days later the importing countries unanimously rejected the $2.15 maximum as unacceptable but indicated that there was some basis for compromise between the views of the exporters and importers.

On March 17, Canada, supported by Australia, declared that although they considered the maximum of $2.15 to be reasonable they were prepared to accept a maximum of $2.10 and a minimum of $1.60 in an effort to bring the views of the exporters and the importers into harmony.

A week later the importers replied to the Canadian and Australian proposals. They unanimously rejected the $2.10 maximum. A substantial number of them, representing well over a majority by number and a high proportion by quantity of wheat purchased under the agreement, declared that they could accept a maximum of $2.05, inclusive of carrying charges and a minimum of $1.55. A smaller number, but representing a substantial quantity of wheat, said that they could not agree to this level. Included was the United Kingdom which adhered to the importers' original offer of minimum $1.40, maximum $1.95.

This marked the turning point of the negotiations on price. The United States and the United Kingdom, being the largest exporter and the largest importer, respectively, held discussions in an effort to bridge the considerable gap that still separated them. Finally, on Thursday last, the United States announced that it was willing to accept the proposal of $1.55 minimum, $2.05 maximum, made by a substantial number of the importers. The United States delegate added that while the administration would, of course, recommend approval by the Senate the maximum price to which he was agreeing carried the possibility of failure of Senate ratification. Australia and Canada fell into line. The United Kingdom, however, said that it was unable to accept a maximum price above $2.00.

When the motion to fix the minimum at $1.55 and the maximum at $2.05 for a period of three years was put before the council, only the United Kingdom voted against it, although a few other importing countries abstained.

I have summarized the course of these prolonged negotiations on prices so that hon. members will realize that there was a good deal of give and take on both sides at this wheat conference. Some people may think that the importing countries scored a victory by bringing the exporters down so far from their original ideas. Other people may think that the exporters did well to bring about an improvement from the levels of the present agreement. I suggest that if there was a victory, it was a victory for common sense. That such a wide measure of agreement was reached is evidence that with patience and perseverance and a generous portion of good will, views which may at one time seem so irreconcilable may be reconciled.

It is unfortunate that the council could not reach a unanimous conclusion. Yet I am impressed not by failure to reach complete unanimity, but rather by the fact that the proposal for a $1.55 to $2.05 range of prices received such a wide measure of support and so little opposition. After all, even the United Kingdom did not disagree with the minimum price of $1.55 and was within 5 cents of agreement at the maximum price.

A good deal more attention seems to be directed to the maximum than to the minimum price. Indeed, I have seen suggestions that the maximum of $2.05 will determine the price at which wheat will be bought and sold under the agreement during the next three years. This, of course, is not necessarily so. The forces of demand and supply are bound to affect the price, regardless of whether or not there is an agreement. The wheat agreement merely fixes the range within which prices can fluctuate.

The maximum price is intended to be a protection to the importing countries against prices for the quantities of wheat in the agreement going above that level, just as the minimum price is intended to protect the exporting countries against prices for the agreement quantities going below that level.

At the maximum the importing countries have rights, not obligations. They can demand that wheat be delivered to them at that level. But they do not have to take it. If they can buy wheat at cheaper prices they are free to do so, down to the minimum.

In effect, agreement to a maximum is what the exporting countries have to accept to get the importing countries to undertake to buy wheat at the minimum. As far as Canada is concerned, we look upon the minimum as being fully as important as the maximum. It is only because of the minimum that we are prepared to join in the agreement.

The Canadian delegation had, of course, worked for a unanimous recommendation and the government regrets that this was not possible. But it will be agreed, I think, that prices which were opposed by only one country out of 46, and which were approved by all except a very few countries which abstained when the vote was taken, do on the face of it provide a fair and reasonable basis for a renewal of the agreement. And, of course, the difference of 5 cents at the maximum between the United Kingdom and rest of the world is very small indeed and well within the margin of error of any forecast of price trends.

Having been in many negotiations with our good friends from the United Kingdom, I know that they are shrewd and hard bargainers and I respect them for it. Their final effort to bring the maximum price down by 5 cents was quite understandable. In a similar position the Canadian government might have done likewise. We tried very hard indeed to get an agreement at maximum and minimum prices 5 cents better than were finally recommended. It should be clear now, however, after fifteen weeks of negotiation, that an international agreement is possible on the basis of the prices recommended by the council and on no other basis. There is a bare minimum of time left for signature and ratification before the beginning of the new crop year.

The agreement will be open for signature for a period of two weeks. The Canadian delegate has already been authorized to sign on behalf of Canada, and will do so today.

We hope the United Kingdom will also sign. While it is possible, and may be necessary, to have an international wheat agreement without the United Kingdom, that is obviously most undesirable. Canada would not be happy. We would not like to be dealing with our best wheat customer on one basis and with our other customers on another. And the government would regret to see relations between our two countries adversely affected either by failure of the agreement to go ahead because the United Kingdom did not adhere, or because there was an agreement without the United Kingdom.

During the conference, as my summary has indicated, Canada's chief purpose was to harmonize the views of the importers and the other exporters, in particular the United States. To be perfectly frank, we encouraged the United States to modify their original ideas to the point which we thought would provide a reasonable basis for settlement. From time to time, we led the way. Finally, however, it was clear that any further reductions would jeopardize the chance of acceptance by the United States Senate and would probably be unacceptable to the farmers of Canada and Australia. At that point, fortunately, the main body of the importing countries could agree, and thus the council was in a position to make a recommendation supported by an overwhelming majority.

I am confident that the United Kingdom shares our belief in the underlying purposes of the wheat agreement. Their declarations on this point and their agreement with the recommended minimum price of $1.55 are evidence of that belief. I hope that they will join the rest of us by agreeing to just a little less protection at the ceiling than they had tried to get.

May I add a word or two on the question of quantities. As further evidence that the proposed range of prices is reasonable under all the circumstances, requests were made for increases in their guaranteed quantities by many importing countries, adding up in total to very large amounts. Unfortunately, because of a series of short crops, Australia, on the exporting side, could not agree to maintain her quota and submitted a lower figure. It was, therefore, impossible to meet all the requests for increases by the importing countries. Canada, however, agreed to increase her guaranteed quantities from 235 million bushels, which applies during the final year of the present agreement, up to 250 million bushels for the three years of the new agreement. The agreement will relate to approximately 600 million bushels if all countries join. A guaranteed quantity for the United Kingdom is included at the present level of 177 million bushels.

The new agreement will come into force if signed by April 27 and accepted by July 15, 1953, by importers representing 50 per cent of the guaranteed quantities, and by exporters representing 50 per cent of the guaranteed quantities. There is provision for withdrawal by any exporting country if an important importing country fails to accept, and vice versa.

May I add that throughout the negotiations the position taken by the Canadian delegation had the unanimous support of the five farm advisers—Messrs. Parker, Wesson, Plumer, Brownlee and Coates. The government is grateful to them for their assistance and their patience.

I cannot speak too highly of the work of Canada's three official delegates, M. W. Sharp, W. C. McNamara, and Dr. C. F. Wilson. Their skill as negotiators, their patience and industry, were in my opinion responsible for avoiding a breakdown in the lengthy negotiations. Their efforts to reconcile the conflicting views of the largest exporter with those of the largest importer were tireless and, I believe, effective to a high degree.

The present international wheat agreement is one of the few successful international commodity arrangements. The measure of its success is that the 46 member countries were willing to spend five weeks in London and ten weeks in Washington trying to agree on terms of renewal, and that they were almost able to reach unanimity in their final recommendations.

In the light of this success and these efforts, I think there is reason to be hopeful that the agreement will continue in full vigour for another three years. The Canadian government will leave no stone unturned to achieve that objective.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I rise merely for the purpose of asking one or two questions. I realize that the matter is not debatable at this time but I am sure Your Honour would raise no objection if I say that, in my opinion, the prices set will be disappointing to the expectations of the western farmers.

The questions I rise to ask are these. Does the minister believe that it will be possible to make an international wheat agreement either effective or even operative without the participation of Great Britain? Second, in the anticipated agreement is there any provision for escalator clauses to cover possible rises in the cost of production? Finally, will the minister say which were the importing countries that abstained from voting when the final determination as to prices was made?

Mr. Howe: Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first question is yes. The answer to the second question is no. The countries that abstained from voting were New Zealand, Greece, Ceylon and India.

Mr. Thatcher: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question of the minister? Would he say whether he or some other minister would contemplate flying to Britain within the next two weeks in order to see whether or not the British cabinet could be persuaded to sign this agreement?

Mr. Howe: Mr. Speaker, it is not customary to announce government policy in advance. If I do fly to England I will certainly let the house know after I return what transpired.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

SERVICE PERSONNEL DEPENDENTS—RELIEF PAYMENTS

Mr. Bryce:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents from the 20th day of November, 1952 to date, exchanged between the Minister of Justice and the town of Gimli, Manitoba, regarding relief payments to dependents of service personnel.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, we have no objection to having this motion passed subject to our getting the town of Gimli's approval of the production of the papers. I do not think there will be any difficulty.

Inquiries of the Ministry

TELEVISION, SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. Diefenbaker:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents, since the first day of January, 1951, which have passed between any person or persons containing applications for the right to establish television station anywhere in the province of Saskatchewan, or requesting information as to the terms and conditions upon which consideration to private companies to construct such stations would be considered.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, there are two difficulties in the way of this notice of motion. One is a question of interpretation. If my hon. friend reads the notice of motion, I am sure he will realize that it is not clear. I do not know what he means by it. For instance, it is set out that there is required—

—a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents, since the first day of January, 1951, which have passed between any person or persons . . .

Then it goes on to deal with certain applications. This might mean that it were to cover correspondence between Mr. X in Regina and Mr. Y in Regina or Mr. X in Saskatoon and Mr. Y in Saskatoon. With all due respect to my hon. friend may I say that, if he will be good enough to couch the motion in one of the two official languages of this house, I shall be glad to see that he gets a reply. When he does indicate that the motion is one which I presume is directed at the Department of Transport, then may I say to him now, so there will be no loss of time, that there is no objection to the motion as presumably reworded with this one exception, that all letters, correspondence, telegrams and so forth should, I take it, be produced with the exception of the application itself. It has been the policy not to produce the application, and for technical and financial reasons I take it that it should not be produced. I do not think my hon. friend will want that. Subject to that, I presume the order could go through.

Mr. Speaker: Do I understand that the motion is to be dropped and reworded or does it carry in its present form? I take it that the motion is to be dropped and reworded.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Motion dropped.

ATOMIC ENERGY

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON CONFERENCE AT CHALK RIVER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister of Trade and Commerce give the house a report on the atomic energy conference which took place at Chalk River last week?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The conference held at Chalk River last week was a conference of technicians who met to discuss with their colleagues from other countries the problem of a further declassification of atomic energy information. It was not a meeting at which decisions were made. It was a meeting to formulate recommendations that could be made to the appropriate authority of the countries represented by these men. I have not heard the results of the conference, but that was its purpose.

Mr. Green: Will it be possible to make an announcement at a later date?

Mr. Howe: If the final decision is to further declassify atomic energy information, most certainly an announcement will be made in every country.

CANADIAN PRISONERS OF WAR

MEETING OF REPRESENTATIVES OF NATIONAL COUNCIL WITH GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State. Has the government arranged to meet representatives of the national council of Canadian prisoners of war? If so, when is such meeting to take place?

Hon. F. G. Bradley (Secretary of State): The hon. member's question was handed to me just a few minutes before I entered the house. I shall be glad to take it as notice and let him have an answer in due course.

Mr. Brooks: I do not see why the Secretary of State needs notice at all.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STRIKE OF GRAIN HANDLERS—REQUEST FOR FURTHER REPORT

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, there have been reports over the radio and in the newspapers indicating that considerable activity has been taking place in connection with the negotiations with respect to the grain handlers, dispute on the west coast. Will the minister bring the house up to date?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): There is nothing of a definite nature that I can report to the house but perhaps I may be permitted to bring the house up to date following the statement I made on the 24th of March, to be found at page 3230 of Hansard. I placed on record at that time the proposal which our chief conciliation officer, Mr. Wilson, had made to both parties with the object of effecting a settlement. No formal reply was received from either party until toward the end of last week. In the late afternoon of April 9 the following wire was received from Mr. R. H. Tupper on behalf of the employers. The wire is addressed to Mr. Bernard Wilson, chief conciliation officer, Department of Labour, and reads as follows:

Referring your letter March 20th regret delays arising from settlement of Port Arthur differences prevented earlier reply. Am directed by all five elevator companies concerned in dispute in Vancouver and New Westminster to inform you that they leave open their offer to grant two additional statutory holidays, an increase of 5 cents per hour in present graveyard shift differential, payment of double time for all work done on Sundays and to provide where practicable for proper job rotations provided the union will join with the companies in submitting as the only outstanding difference to be determined the question of wages for arbitration before a judge of the Appeal Court or Supreme Court of British Columbia.

On the next day, the 10th of April, the following wire was sent at 1.46 p.m. Pacific time by Mr. E. C. Sims on behalf of the unions. This wire reads as follows:

Re your wire April 9—

I should interject that the terms of the wire I have just read were conveyed to the unions. This wire is also addressed to Mr. Wilson. I continue:

—we note the companies have rejected your proposal of March 20th and submitted counter proposal re arbitration. I am instructed to inform you this counter proposal has been rejected and your March 20th proposal will be taken to membership tomorrow for acceptance or rejection. Will inform you of results.

On the next day, the 11th of April, the following wire, addressed to Mr. Wilson, was sent by Mr. Sims at 11.40 p.m. Pacific time:

Full general membership meeting held today. I am instructed to inform you that question put re acceptance or rejection of your proposal of arbitration dated March 20. Motion carried rejecting the proposal with twenty-nine dissenting votes. Results of vote indicate same strength as when strike vote taken. Manner of voting decided by motion of membership. Results indicate tie-up to go on indefinitely unless employers change attitude toward wage question and fringe benefits.

Since the receipt of these wires we have continued our efforts to bring the parties together for further negotiations. I can report nothing further this morning.

Mr. Green: Does the minister still think it would be of no value to invite representatives to come to Ottawa?

Mr. Gregg: I do not think that there would be value in taking that step at this time.

GRAIN

INQUIRY AS TO 1953 INITIAL PRICE FOR WHEAT, OATS AND BARLEY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. Ross (Souris): I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce if he is in a position to announce what initial prices will be paid by the Canadian wheat board for wheat, oats and barley produced in 1953. If he is not in a position to do so now, when may such an announcement be expected?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): My hon. friend will appreciate that the situation is too uncertain at the moment to permit an announcement of that kind. When matters regarding the wheat agreement have been clarified, an announcement will be made.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Not before seeding, in other words.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INQUIRY AS TO TABLING OF WHITE PAPER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Does the minister propose to table a white paper on defence this year, as has been done in the past several years? If so, will he be in a position to table it today so it may be in the hands of members before the defence debate commences, which is scheduled for tomorrow?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): I had confidently expected that the queen's printer would have the white paper here in time to table it at the opening of the session this morning. I expect it within an hour or so, and if I may intervene then I shall revert to motions and table it the moment it is received.

[Later:]

Mr. Claxton: If I may have permission to revert to motions, I should like to table a copy of "Canada's Defence Program, 1953-54."

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the minister if there will be the usual copies available for all members?

Mr. Claxton: Yes, they have just arrived at the distribution office.

Inquiries of the Ministry

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO WHEREABOUTS OF BISHOP CUTHBERT O'GARA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): I should like to direct a question to the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs. I tried to get in touch with him and left notice at his office. Has the Canadian government made any inquiries regarding the whereabouts of Bishop Cuthbert O'Gara of Ottawa, a member of the Passionist order, who was last reported on March 21 to be on his way to Hong Kong via Canton from somewhere in China but who has not yet arrived at his destination?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): We have not been informed so far that Bishop Cuthbert O'Gara, the Canadian church official referred to by the hon. member, has been released from prison by the Chinese communists. On March 26 we were informed that he was seriously ill. We immediately asked our high commissioner in London to approach the foreign office, requesting them to instruct their chargé d'affaires in Peking to make representations to the Chinese government on behalf of the bishop. As yet, no reply has been received.

CRIMINAL CODE

INQUIRY AS TO AMENDMENT ALLOWING PROVINCIAL LOTTERIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Paul E. Gagnon (Chicoutimi): I would like to ask the Minister of Justice whether the government is considering an amendment to the Criminal Code to allow the establishment of provincial lotteries.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the answer is no.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

WOODFALLE SCHOOL, ROCKCLIFFE—CURRICULUM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. M. Robichaud (Gloucester): I should like to ask the Secretary of State (Mr. Bradley), for the third time, when a reply may be received to an order for return appearing in my name and passed by this house on January 28, over two and a half months ago.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has asked his question.

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): I might answer the query because it concerns the affairs of the Department of National Defence. We have been ready for some time to table such correspondence as there is, but we are still awaiting a reply from a provincial government whose consent is necessary before the tabling of it.

Mr. Robichaud: May I ask the minister a supplementary question? Which government is it?

Mr. Claxton: The government of Ontario.

PACIFIC SECURITY CONFERENCE

INQUIRY AS TO CANADIAN REPRESENTATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Claxton), whether Canada has any representative or observer at the Pacific security conference which opened in Honolulu a week ago today.

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): We made inquiries concerning the character of these talks and the information received was that their purpose was to have an exchange of views, of a technical military character, between the countries which have forces committed in that area. Consequently, we did not seek to have any Canadian representative in attendance as an observer or otherwise.

Mr. Green: Can the minister tell us what countries are taking part?

Mr. Claxton: There are the members of the ANZUS alliance, I understand—and I do not know whether there are others.

Mr. Green: I think also the United Kingdom and France.

INCOME TAX ACT

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved the third reading of Bill No. 228, to amend the Income Tax Act.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, before third reading is given to this bill to amend the Income Tax Act there are one or two things I would like to say. In the first place I wish to say that this bill does nothing to narrow the tremendous gulf that exists in our income tax legislation between business and professional people on the one hand and the ordinary worker on the other.

I speak with particular reference to the matter of deductions or exemptions that are allowed to these two groups of taxpayers. This matter was particularly drawn to my attention, although I have spoken of it in the house on previous occasions, when I received through the mail a few days ago a little vest pocket booklet entitled "Canadian Pocketax, 1953" which has been issued by the National Trust Company Limited, 250 Portage avenue, Winnipeg. It seems to me to be quite up to date and to take into consideration the changes being made this year in our income tax legislation. It is one of those little booklets that various firms sometimes put out to advise people as to their rights and privileges, as well as their obligations, under the Income Tax Act.

What interested me particularly, as I went through the pages of this little booklet, was to find that it takes more than four pages to list what are known as deductible items. The deductible items on these four pages are listed under a total of 46 main headings. If one were to break down these main categories into the subdivisions that are included he would find that the number is much larger. However, when one goes through these deductible items, and when one reads the preliminary paragraphs commenting on them, it becomes clear that this long list of deductions is not available to the ordinary worker when he files his income tax return.

The ordinary worker, as a matter of fact, finds himself for the most part limited to just four possible deductions, apart from his personal or family or statutory exemptions. Those four which are available to the ordinary worker, if he meets the required conditions, are: Deduction for contributions to an approved pension plan; deduction for allowable trade union dues; deduction for charitable donations; and a deduction for medical expenses, but only on that portion of expenses which exceed, from now on, 3 per cent of his gross income.

Beyond these four there are no deductions available to the average worker. In other words, when he gets his pay and when he is confronted with his income tax bill, he has had it. His tax, for the most part, is a tax on what he actually gets—and there is no fooling around with it. For the other group who are on what is called "gross income", whether it is because they operate a business or are in the various professions, there is, as I have pointed out, this long list of deductions which the National Trust Company has listed in this little book. I am not going to take the time of the house to read all of these forty-six main headings but I would like to name some of them. Here they are: Accounting expenses; advertising expenses; appraisal costs for insurance; bad debts; carrying charges; carting charges; efficiency experts' fees; industrial engineers' fees; insurance premiums; fire, theft and group insurance premiums deductible by the employer; interest on borrowed money; interest on succession duties; legal expenses to collect past due debts, to defend actions under the Combines Investigation Act, and to protect the right to do business; production control costs; raw material costs; promotional expenses; secretarial expenses; taxes on real estate; cost of technical assistance; and telephone, and so on.

As I say, Mr. Speaker, I have not read all of them but those are some of the main headings in this list of forty-six deductible items set out in this little booklet. It is very interesting to get this little book and to find that so many deductions are permitted, but it only draws attention to the tremendous gulf that this government's income tax legislation has established between the people who get their income in what is called a "gross form" on the one hand—business and professional people—and the ordinary working people who are on salary or receive a pay envelope on the other.

Of that list the latter taxpayer is limited to the four deductions I read out earlier. Incidentally, my colleague from Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) points out that a telephone is an essential to the earning of a livelihood in the case of many workers, such as railway men, who must have a telephone so that they can be called. But they do not get such a deduction. There are travelling expenses which are an essential part of the earning of a livelihood of many industrial workers, but for the industrial worker who is on wages they are not allowed. He gets none of these many deductions available to business and professional people. He is limited to the four which I have read, as anyone can see by referring to the short income tax form. He gets his deduction for a pension plan, provided it has been approved by the department; some are and some are not. He gets his trade union dues allowed, provided those dues are for the purposes spelled out in the act. He gets charitable donations allowed, up to a certain amount, provided he has the receipts. There are many instances where charitable donations are made by individuals who are unable to get receipts for them. As for medical expenses, of course, he gets only those expenses that are set out in the act, and he gets only that portion in excess of 3 per cent of his gross income.

Now, I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that this is a serious matter and that something should be done to narrow that gulf. If the minister is not prepared to widen and extend the exemptions that are allowed to the ordinary worker, I submit that he should apply the axe to many of those deductions and exemptions that are allowed to that other group. Surely, the one principle that should characterize our income tax legislation is fairness. Here is a place where unfairness persists, and I strongly urge the minister to reconsider this whole question. This is not the first time I have made this appeal to the minister, but I point out that there has been no narrowing of this gulf in the legislation presented this year. In fact, some of the so-called technical changes in the bill now before us have actually widened that gulf, for they extend still greater concessions to those on the business or professional side of the picture.

I remind the minister again of a particular example of this unfairness which has to do with the fact that the government has, as yet, done nothing about the ruling of the income tax appeal board to the effect that the expenses of lawyers attending conventions of the bar association are deductible. The minister has said this is a matter for the courts to decide. I remind the minister that when the courts have made decisions on other matters that were at variance with what the government had intended the legislation to provide, they have changed the legislation so as to make it conform to what they originally intended. I could cite other cases, but I shall stick to income tax matters.

The minister remembers the Bond and Rutherford case back in 1946, when Mr. Justice Thorson of the exchequer court ruled that the fees of those two lawyers to the law society were to be allowed as deductible, even though they were on a net salary rather than on gross income. It was very interesting to note that, in that particular case, no action was taken by the government to change the law to meet what had been their original intention. In that instance lawyers were involved, but a few years later another judge of the same exchequer court, Mr. Justice Angers, ruled that the same right to deduct fees paid to an association should be extended to trade unions, and the government immediately amended both the old income war tax act and the Income Tax Act so as to make the law read the way they had intended in the first place. The government simply said that they recognized the decision by the exchequer court as indicating what the law meant as it was then written, but they did not mean that so they changed the law to make it read the way they intended. Fortunately, that chapter has a much brighter sequel in that the government was later persuaded to change the law to grant the right of deductibility in respect of trade union dues.

But then we come to the case of Mr. Parkinson, the lawyer who claimed deductibility for his expenses in attending a convention of the bar association. He made out his income tax form including those expenses as a deductible item, but the department rejected his claim. I think it is fair to assume that the department knew what the government intended. As soon as Mr. Parkinson had his claim denied by the Department of National Revenue, he took his case to the income tax appeal board, which board acts now in these cases instead of the exchequer court. Mr. W. S. Fisher, Q.C., of the income tax appeal board, ruled that as the law read Mr. Parkinson, even though he was on a salary, had the right to deduct his expenses to the convention of the bar association. Surely that is a case where it is quite clear that the income tax appeal board has ruled that the law says something different from what the government intended it to mean. What happened back in Mr. Cooper's case with regard to trade union dues? Actually the same thing, and when that happened, the government changed the law to make it say what they intended it to mean. But now in the case of Mr. Parkinson and the expenses of lawyers attending the bar association when a corresponding judicial body says that the law means something the government never intended it to mean, the government refuses to take any action.

I submit that in all fairness the government should do one or the other of two things. Either they should amend the law so as to permit deductibility for expenses to conventions to be extended to all trade unionists, farmers, those attending church conventions, school teachers and all the rest, or they should amend the law to make it clear that lawyers do not have that particular right. I have no particular quarrel with my lawyer friends in the house, some of whom are staring at me while I am making these remarks. As a matter of fact, I believe most of them will agree with me, whether or not they are personally affected, that there should be fairness in respect of this matter.

Mr. Speaker: I do not know whether the hon. member was referring to me as one of the lawyers who were staring, but if so the reason I was staring at him was that I was rather concerned about whether he was in order. As the hon. member knows, on third reading of a bill a member can discuss only what is in the bill. He cannot go beyond the bill as it is presented for third reading. It seems to me he is getting away from the bill as presented to the house for third reading.

Mr. Knowles: I want to say at the outset that I was not referring to you, sir, as one of the lawyers who were staring at me. I shall not go so far as to name the ones to whom I referred, but may I just say that it did seem to me that on third reading it was proper to deal with the general principle of this bill. However, I assure Your Honour that I have said all I need to say on that particular subject. I feel I should point out that this bill amends the Income Tax Act, and some of its changes involve widening the exemptions and the deductible items that are provided in the Income Tax Act. I was expressing my regret—if Your Honour feels I have gone far enough, I shall leave it at that—that at a time when changes were being made in the provisions for deductibility, the government had not seen fit to make the necessary change to clear up this injustice, this inequity. During the course of the debate, when we were in committee of the whole on the bill, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) said in a number of instances that the reason for the point he was introducing was to clear up an inequity or an injustice. Well, I have cited what I regard as a gross inequity, a gross injustice, and I hope that one of these days soon it will be cleared up.

I leave that item as I have put it, Mr. Speaker, and I suggest that it is another example of the case I was making earlier, namely, that there is too wide a gulf between the treatment accorded by the Income Tax Act, as we are now amending it, to the business and professional groups on the one hand and to the ordinary workers on salary on the other.

There is just one other comment I wish to make and then I shall take my seat. I do this very briefly; I do it by no means in any argumentative tone but rather just to place my position on the record with respect to it. Earlier in this session, in connection with one of the taxation bills, the Minister of Finance, not on a point of order and yet with reference to a matter of procedure, expressed the view that it was proper to precede a taxation bill with a resolution much shorter in form than that to which we are accustomed. In fact, he said it was now his view that it was not necessary, in the resolution preceding a taxation bill, to spell out the proposed changes. He said that all that was necessary was to bring in a resolution saying that it is expedient to amend such and such a bill. The Minister of Finance did not contend that he was going to change the practice now being followed, and I am sure that he does not intend to do so. I am sure that for his purposes the present practice of presenting resolutions which give a certain amount of detail is much more satisfactory. Because I am sure he has no such intention I do not wish to argue the point; I simply wish to say this. I have secured the memorandum on this matter to which the Minister of Finance referred the other day, and which he invited us to secure, and I must say—and this is the point that I wish to put on the record—that in my view the memorandum is well put with respect to another matter, but it does not deal with this point at all. It is a memorandum on the question as to whether or not a resolution preceding a money bill should stipulate the maximum amount of money to be included in that bill. That is a different question altogether in my humble but very considered opinion.

The memorandum to which the minister refers really does not deal with the point he was speaking about the other day, and since it does not deal with it, it does not back up his case in the way that he seemed to feel it did. Now, I am not going to go into it in any detail; I am not going to argue the point, but I simply felt that the minister having said what he did the other day I should report that I have read the memorandum, and that, in my view, it would be very difficult for him to make a case on it for the proposition that he gave the house. I leave it at that because I am satisfied, as I have already said, there is no intention to change the practice; that it is more satisfactory for the minister as well as for the house as a whole to follow the present practice of bringing in, prior to taxation bills, resolutions that give us a fair amount of detail as to what is to be expected in the bills themselves.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to make one or two brief comments. In the first place I should like to associate myself with what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has just said. I was surprised at the breadth of the statement made by the minister the other day, but I do not propose to deal with it because I think in fact that in practice we shall find that the minister does not go the length which that statement might be presumed to take us.

This bill is like the curate's egg, Mr. Speaker. It is good in parts and therefore we are not going to propose an amendment; nor shall we oppose the bill. There are certain things in it which we have approved again and again, namely, the reduction of the income tax on persons and corporations. But on the other hand I wish very briefly to reiterate the fact that there are certain things in the bill which we have disapproved and which we still disapprove. I wish to maintain that position to the end.

We are not able to bring about any alterations in these, but we have of course continued to disapprove of the fact that the sales tax has been unaltered. We have pointed out that it means the great bulk of the people benefit very little from the present budget. We sought to have relief given to municipalities and school boards on their purchases, but that is denied us. Mr. Speaker, that is all I wish to say.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I am going to be very brief. I intended to say a few words on second reading, but the hon. gentleman who has just spoken failed to take part in the debate on second reading and it passed before I realized it.

We in this group regret this Income Tax Act still provides for the income taxation of co-operatives. We believe that co-operatives are the economic hope of the world, and we think that the government would be doing a great service to this country if they would eliminate those sections in the act that provide for the taxation of co-operatives. In that respect I am going to be quite brief because I realize a good deal of time has been spent on this bill. I do want to quote what Canon Coady had to say in this respect:

> It has been said that nature is red in tooth and claw. This is the philosophy of the survival of the fittest, but it is fundamentally erroneous. Co-operation, more than competition, is the chief factor in survival. Nature at its best is co-operative. We see it in the human family, the primary unit of society.
> Co-operative nations can make the world a family. There is here the germ of universal peace. Until this foundation is laid for peace, there is not much hope for the future.

This excerpt is taken from "Social Significance of the Co-operative Movement".

We believe exactly as the canon does in that respect. A large number of my constituents are very concerned about the income taxation of co-operatives. We were very sorry indeed that the government decided, shall I say, to surrender to the views of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, who presented a brief to the royal commission on co-operatives in 1945, and to illustrate its point of view I want to quote from that brief. It was an excellent brief from the chamber's point of view. It dealt with the position of co-operatives so far as taxation is concerned, and in one paragraph it said this in part:

> After a slow rate of growth over many decades the rapid expansion of co-operatives and mutuals in Canada has been substantially enhanced by their exemption from liability for income taxation. The record supports that conclusion. While this position of special privilege is maintained the expansion of co-operative and mutual associations will continue, leading finally to the removal of a considerable part of the commerce of the country from the taxable to the tax-exempt form of business organization.

From the point of view of the business interests, that is a sound analysis of the situation. However, we in this group believe that the co-operative movement is a movement that should be supported in every way possible and that this government could not assist such a movement to better advantage than by removing the income taxation of co-operatives at this time.

While we agree with various deductions made for travel expenses in the act, before taking my seat I do want to bring to the attention of the house and the minister again the fact that we believe that workers who have to live some distance away from their employment, up to thirty to thirty-five miles, are put to abnormal expenses of from $10 to $25 a month, which they often cannot afford, and should be permitted to deduct these expenses for income tax purposes. In addition to that, we in this group believe that not only should oil companies, gas companies and mining companies receive exemption on developing properties, but that farmers who are clearing land, who are bringing land into production, should be allowed to deduct these expenses for income tax purposes. In that connection we support the proposal of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, which in its presentation to the cabinet this year said, on the subject of tax exemption on clearing and breaking:

> In our opinion it is desirable to encourage the improvement and development of our farm lands, just as much as it is to encourage the exploration and development of minerals and oil by special inducements. We therefore recommend that clearing, breaking and improving of farm lands be deductible as a farm expense where such acreages are reasonable in relation to the general farm operation.

We support that point of view, and regret a provision is not made for those deductions in the bill.

Finally, while I agree with the minister that there are administrative difficulties, and that possibly there have been some abuses on the part of some provincial governments, I think due consideration should be given to the removal of the sales tax from supplies, equipment and machines purchased by municipalities.

Mr. Speaker: I think that question was discussed previously under another bill.

Mr. Herridge: Perhaps so; I am just concluding what I have to say. I do think the violations of the law could be overcome by strict regulations.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

FISHERIES RESEARCH BOARD ACT

INCREASE IN MEMBERSHIP OF BOARD—APPOINTMENT OF PERMANENT CHAIRMAN, ETC.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (for the Minister of Fisheries) moved the second reading of Bill No. 331, to amend the Fisheries Research Board Act.

Mr. J. Watson MacNaught (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, when this bill was in the resolution stage on April 2 I made a short statement indicating the reasons for the amendments.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I wonder if the bill has been distributed, so that we could have a copy of it.

Mr. MacNaught: Yes, it has been circulated. It is Bill No. 331.

At this time there is very little that I can add to what I said on that occasion; I think, however, I should remind hon. members that for some time it has been becoming more and more apparent that, owing to the increasing ramifications of the work of the board, its structure required some modifications. The modifications which the amendments will bring about will permit wider regional representation on the board itself. This will permit representation from Newfoundland and additional representation from central Canada.

Under the present set-up the chairman and the vice-chairman are professors doing university work in Queen's and Toronto universities respectively. It is thought desirable that the chairman should be a full-time scientist residing at Ottawa. This will permit of continuous attention to the management and co-ordination of work done at the various stations. The chairman will be responsible for seeing that the program laid down by the board at the annual meeting is carried out.

The work of the board has grown tremendously over the years. A decade ago the budget of the board amounted to approximately one-quarter of a million dollars. Today it is close to the two million mark. It is apparent, therefore, that the chairman should be located at headquarters in Ottawa so that greater co-ordination can exist between the various stations and the Department of Fisheries.

When this bill was in the resolution stage the hon. member for St. John's West asked me if there would be representation from the province of Newfoundland on the board. One of the purposes of the amendments is to permit of such representation.

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry I had not seen the copy of the bill, although I find that there was one on my file. I am sure hon. members will agree that, in view of the volume of work done by the fisheries research board, these amendments are important. I am familiar with some branches of that work. It is unfortunate that the report of the board for 1952 has not yet been published—at least I have not received my copy. We were told two weeks ago by the parliamentary assistant that the report was in the hands of the printers; but it has not yet been received.

I think it is a wise procedure to give the chairman permanent tenure so that he may give more attention to the valuable work the board has to do. For many years I have been familiar with the work done by the scientists in connection with the fisheries, and I realize that this work is of the utmost importance to fishermen.

I hope the changes contemplated in the measure will result in improvements for the benefit of the fishermen and all others concerned with the fisheries.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Constitution of board.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Why has not the report been published? It is difficult to discuss these amendments properly without having the annual report before us.

Mr. MacNaught: Mr. Chairman, I checked the date upon which the report was tabled last year, and I find that it was during the month of June. This year the report was sent to the queen's printer some time ago, but it has not yet come back. The moment it is received it will be tabled.

Mr. Gibson: Why do we make the assertion that the board must have a majority of scientists? Has there been any difficulty in that connection? Usually when an assertion of that kind is made, it is because there has been some dispute about it in the past. Would the parliamentary assistant make any comment as to why the board is to have this majority of scientists?

Mr. MacNaught: Most of the work done by the board is of a scientific nature. Therefore I think it is desirable that a majority of the persons doing the work should be scientists. That has been the practice in the past, and I think it is a good one.

Section agreed to.

Fisheries Research Board Act

On section 2—Appointment.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Where is the statement in the bill indicating that the board shall include representatives from the provinces?

Mr. MacNaught: I do not think there is a specific section covering the point. However, it is the intention of the department to see that a representative is appointed from Newfoundland.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Would he be from the fishing industry, or a scientist; or is there to be dual representation?

Mr. MacNaught: That will be decided on a balance of convenience. If it is found to be more desirable that the representative be from the industry, then he will be from the industry. I think the fishing industry of Newfoundland in relation to the fishing industry of the rest of Canada is such that it would be desirable that the representative from Newfoundland be from the practical side of the industry, rather than the scientific side.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Has the parliamentary assistant considered informing us as to who the chairman will be, in view of the fact that it is to be a permanent appointment? What is the salary?

Mr. MacNaught: Those are matters of government policy. No decision has yet been made as to who the chairman will be, or the salary he is to receive.

Section agreed to.

Sections 3 and 4 agreed to.

On section 5—Constitution of board.

The Chairman: I take it that sections 5 to 8, which are a duplicate of the original sections, will be accepted?

Sections 5 to 8 inclusive agreed to.

Section 9 agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Shall this bill, by leave, be read a third time?

Mr. Knowles: By leave.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: By leave.

Mr. Fournier, Hull (for Mr. Sinclair) moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

[Mr. MacNaught.]

VETERANS BENEFIT ACT

CHANGE IN DATE OF EXPIRATION

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Veterans Benefit Act, 1951, to provide that the act shall expire on the last day of the first session of parliament in 1954 in lieu of the last day of the first session of parliament in 1953.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, may I interrupt the hon. member. I have had to pass over the next item, the bill to amend the Trans-Canada Air Lines Act, 1937. This is a small bill. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) is out on government business and will be here at 2.30. I therefore thought we would bring in these two small resolutions in order to advance them to the bill stage. I have no objection to having the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) notified.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege, may I point out that—

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Chairman, may I suggest that we await the return to the chamber of the hon. member for Royal, since he had asked to be present when these matters were being considered. I told him that I would wait.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Thank you.

Mr. Knowles: Here he is now. He is on the job.

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Chairman, this is the resolution preceding the annual bill to extend for a further year the provisions of the Veterans Benefit Act, 1951. As I explained during the course of the last session—in April, I believe it was—the bill provides at the present time that the act shall expire on the last day of the session of 1953.

There are two manners in which these benefits made available to Korean veterans could be extended for a further period of time. The first would be to follow this procedure, which we have followed since 1951, of extending from year to year the provisions of the act. The second would be to give a more permanent character to these benefits by putting them into a statute. It has been felt that until present events in Korea changed and the situation was such as to anticipate an early settlement, it was preferable to follow this present procedure which hon. members will recall was the one followed during the last war.

As a matter of interest to the committee, I might say that under this act 9,474 gratuities have been paid to Korean veterans to date and re-establishment credits have been set up for 9,046 Korean veterans. Some of them have taken advantage of the vocational or university training facilities. At the present time about 150 Korean veterans are undergoing either university or vocational training. This procedure will be continued under the present act.

Mr. Brooks: Mr. Chairman, this resolution is familiar to us all because it has been up for consideration a number of times; I think this is the third time. Of the two systems which the minister mentioned as to the procedure followed, I think this is the one which meets with general approval.

The minister has pointed out that this legislation will be needed as long as our soldiers are in Korea. It gives to the Korean soldiers all the benefits that were given to the soldiers in world war II. I think that is correct. I do not think that anyone will criticize this measure, because, while we do not call this Korean situation a war exactly, there is no question that these men are undergoing just as severe hardship as the soldiers experienced in the second world war, and that the fighting is just as severe in Korea as it was in world war II. They are fighting under conditions which are perhaps even worse than those under which the soldiers fought during the second world war. They are also fighting against an enemy who is just as unscrupulous and cruel, if not more so.

I have little comment to make, Mr. Chairman, with regard to this matter. The minister has said that the situation may change. I am sure that we all hope that the present negotiations for a new truce or a continuation of the truce talks, which were ended on October 7, will be resumed. We also hope that not only will the truce be resumed but that in a short time we may have peace. This may be too much to expect. In reading the press not only of the past week or so but of this morning, I note that the United Nations command is studying the Red offer to resume full-scale truce talks. This is all to the good. I think that the members of the United Nations are certainly taking the right stand when they are cautious in dealing with this matter. However, as I said, I hope that the situation will change and that, as to these men who are now in Korea, we may hope they will be home at a not-too-distant date.

I had a number of questions I intended to ask the minister; he has already answered some of them. One was: How many war service gratuities have already been paid? That question has already been answered. I should like to ask him what is the average amount of each of these gratuities. He has also answered another question, the number of applicants for university and vocational training; but I should also like to ask him how many have applied for settlement under the Veterans Land Act and the number of contributions made under the unemployment insurance benefits. Perhaps the minister is not prepared to answer those questions at once. If not, he can answer them on second reading.

I should like further to ask the minister whether the department has reached a decision with regard to paying re-establishment credits, the same as gratuities, to members of the forces who are still serving in the regular forces after their return from the theatre of war. These are just a few questions I should like to have answered. I should also like to know whether men serving in Korea will receive all the benefits granted to veterans of world war II. I think it is correct that they are but I want to make certain.

Mr. Lapointe: I will be very pleased to answer these various questions when we are on second reading of the bill. There is one which I can answer right away. I apologize for not giving the figure when I spoke previously. Up to the present time there have been eighty-nine applications made by Korean veterans under the Veterans Land Act. Thirty-eight have already qualified, nine have been withdrawn, nine have been refused and the remainder are being processed at the present time.

Mr. Quelch: I am very glad to support the resolution extending the act for another year. We will welcome the introduction of legislation to bring into operation the full set of benefits under schedule A. I realize that under the act the governor in council can declare any of the benefits under schedule A to be applicable. Section 3 of the act reads in part as follows:

> The governor in council may by regulation provide that all or any of the enactments set out in part I of the schedule to this act shall, in such manner as the governor in council may prescribe, apply to . . .

Can the minister say whether all the benefits outlined in schedule A are available today to veterans of the Korean war?

Mr. Lapointe: My understanding is that all can be made available if applied for. I would prefer to give a more definite answer to my hon. friend, and perhaps I might do so on second reading of the bill.

Mr. Quelch: When the minister answers that question I should like him to explain whether or not a veteran can make application for any of the benefits under schedule A or whether first of all the governor in council has to pass a regulation to provide for that being done.

Mr. Lapointe: I shall be pleased to do so.

Mr. Knowles: We in this group would also like to indicate our support of the resolution and of the bill to be based on it. We would not imagine that the government would do anything less than is called for here in extending the legislation for another year. But even so, we welcome it and hope that more precise provision respecting these matters will be made in due course. While I am on my feet, may I join with the others who have spoken at this stage and say that we too share the hope that it will soon be possible for those who have been representing us in Korea to come home.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Lapointe thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 335, to amend the Veterans Benefit Act, 1951.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

ARMED FORCES

ASSISTANCE FOR HIGHER EDUCATION OF CHILDREN OF CERTAIN DECEASED MEMBERS

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide assistance for the higher education of children of certain deceased members of the armed forces and of other persons, all allowances and costs payable under the act to be paid out of moneys appropriated by parliament.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Mr. Brooks: Will the minister give us an explanation?

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Chairman, in introducing the resolution I believe I can make the statement that this country is justly proud of the legislation it has put on the statute books for the benefit of its veterans, which legislation has come to be known as the veterans charter. I can also state that all members of the House of Commons, irrespective of party affiliation, have looked upon veterans legislation in years past in a generous and unselfish way, in a manner truly reminiscent of the high spirit of service of those who enlisted in the Canadian forces.

As was stated once by one of my predecessors, the Hon. Ian Mackenzie, the veterans charter grew in spirit, substance and final form out of the hearts and minds of a united people dedicating themselves and the lives of their sons and daughters to victory. Its basic provisions were the result of a desire to deal in a just manner with all who served.

In view of what I have just said, I am confident that all members of the House of Commons will welcome the introduction at this time of a measure to provide assistance for the higher education of children of certain deceased members of the armed forces and other persons. As the committee will recall, the legislation governing rehabilitation for world war II veterans provided assistance in a training program designed to fit the veteran into suitable employment. It provided training assistance for the veteran with little formal schooling at one end of the scale and right up to university graduation at the other. The purpose of this resolution is to assist financially pensioned sons and daughters of former members of the forces, who have died as a result of service, in obtaining post-secondary education.

Such a program has been under consideration by the department for some time, and the time has now come when many of these children are reaching university age. I might add that it is also proposed to extend the benefits to be derived from the terms of the legislation to children of Canadian veterans who have lost their lives as the result of service in Korea.

For the information of the house I might say that at the present time there are approximately 12,000 children who are receiving pensions under schedule B of the Pension Act. An analysis made by the department shows that the peak load of candidates for the type of training that this legislation will provide for those whose fathers served in world war II will come between 1958 and 1962. Candidates who qualify under the act will receive a training allowance during the time they are in full time intramural attendance plus payment of their tuition fees. In addition to occupations for which graduation from university is required there are occupations, as hon. members know, for which high school graduation —that is matriculation or the equivalent of university admission—is required. Teacher training, through the provincial normal schools, and nursing, through the teaching hospitals, are cases in point. Under the Veterans Rehabilitation Act which provided training to world war II veterans these latter were classified as "vocational". The bill is designed to provide assistance in these training institutions for which high school graduation, matriculation that is, is now a prerequisite.

The provincially controlled secondary schools, that is the high school, technical and commercial schools, provide training required for entry into the most common occupations. Statistics indicate that some 60 per cent of young people entering high school leave without completing the usual four-year program, and not more than 10 per cent or about one-quarter of those who do graduate proceed, or are likely to proceed, with further schooling—post-secondary education.

The bill which will follow this resolution is designed to deal with this latter group eligible for admission and seeking admission to training institutions for which high school graduation is required. In other words, the criterion is secondary school graduation—regardless of whether the proposed occupation requirement is regarded as university or vocational.

That, Mr. Chairman, constitutes the general outline of the proposed measure and I shall be glad, when we are in committee on the bill, to go into any further details—for instance, questions of eligibility, type of education contemplated, benefits available, academic standing required and time limits.

Mr. Brooks: Mr. Chairman, I do not think there will be any disagreement about this resolution. The minister spoke about the veterans charter, and I recall that when the veterans charter was before the committee in 1945 and 1946 it was recommended by myself and others that this matter be given consideration. The Canadian Legion and other veterans organizations have been pressing for this ever since. As we all know, they presented a brief in November, 1952, and this point was covered, as were a number of other recommendations presented to the government at that time. I might say, incidentally, that this is one of the very few to which the government has given consideration.

Also, the Canadian Legion presented a resolution before the veterans affairs committee of 1948 which read as follows:

> That the government accept greater responsibility for the welfare and education of the children of men who lost their lives in the service, by extending benefits equivalent to the rehabilitation benefits their father would have received had he returned.

The comment made on that is:

> Veterans feel that this is an important omission in Canada's rehabilitation program as it affects the children of those who lost their lives in the service. Subsistence maintenance until the age of 16, 17 or 21, as the case may be, is not enough. The responsibility for educational or training benefits or assistance to enter a trade or calling must rest with the government.

For a good many years this matter has been before veterans committees and I, for one, am very much pleased that the government is introducing this resolution now and intends to introduce a bill to implement it.

One great criticism that might be made is the delay. As the minister pointed out, to the great majority this legislation is coming in very good time; but there were children who were in their early teens in 1945—eight years ago. Those children have now reached the age when they are past university entrance. There are not many but still there are some, and I can think of a few myself. If this legislation had been introduced immediately after the war those children would have been looked after. I would ask the minister whether any young men or young women of the age of 21 and over who are anxious to take up university training will be able to do so. In other words, will the act be made retroactive? Will those who have paid their own way through the university be reimbursed?

One of the main arguments used for introducing legislation of this kind—and I think it is perfectly obvious to all of us—is the fact that with the high cost of living the widow with only a pension would have hardly sufficient means to buy clothing, food and shelter let alone provide a college education.

The minister stated that there are about 12,000 children who would be of school age and who would be covered.

Mr. Lapointe: At the present time there are about 12,000 children who are receiving pensions under schedule B, which would mean up to the age of 21.

Mr. Brooks: The minister estimated that about 10 per cent of those would be eligible for university and vocational school grants.

Mr. Lapointe: That is a rough estimate.

Mr. Brooks: I would hope that there would be more because, as we know, there are many boys and girls who would like to take advantage of university and vocational training but they cannot afford to do so. No doubt this group would be a very intelligent group because we think of our soldiers themselves as the best and, as children of our soldiers, I would hope that the figure for this group would be larger than the 10 per cent average.

There is nothing further that I would like to say except to add that I believe there is no way in which we can invest money to greater advantage than by educating the boys and girls of our soldiers. I might also say that I do not think there was any finer investment made of our country's money than the investment which was made to educate our soldiers when they came back. My understanding is that there were in the vicinity of 40,000 returned soldiers of world war II who took advantage of the educational facilities offered by this country. Those men are now in every walk of life and in every profession. The contribution which they are making to this country today cannot be overestimated.

When the bill comes up for second reading there are certain questions which I would like to ask the minister, but until that time, Mr. Chairman, I will let it stand.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, this is good legislation and we heartily welcome it; and we shall certainly give it our full support. There is no question but that these children of our servicemen who gave their lives deserve this consideration, and as has been said by the member for Royal, we could hardly find a better investment than assisting these young men and young women with their education. As I say, we support this bill wholeheartedly.

While I am on my feet I must say that we in this group are very glad that the government's opposition to federal aid to education in some forms has not stood in the way of this kind of federal aid to education. I am sure the Minister of Veterans Affairs and other members of the government agree with me that this bill and other legislation which we have had similar to it, in no way interferes with provincial responsibility for education, which all of us in this country agree to and support. It is another example of the fact that where there is a will there is a way. I am glad that a way has been found in this respect, and the minister knows that he will hear more from us later on this point.

Before this matter is concluded I hope the minister will make a statement to the house as to whether or not there will be any other veterans legislation presented at this session of parliament. In particular, I hope he will tell us whether or not there will be any changes made in War Veterans Allowance Act.

Mr. Quelch: We in this group are wholeheartedly behind this measure, which carries out, at least in part if not in whole, the recommendations of the veterans organizations. We feel that the money spent under this measure will be money well spent, not merely in the interests of veterans and their dependents, but in the interests of the people of Canada as a whole.

[Mr. Brooks.]

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Lapointe thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 336, to provide assistance for the higher education of children of certain deceased members of the armed forces and of other persons.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES ACT

INCREASE IN NUMBER OF DIRECTORS—ADJUSTMENT OF CAPITAL STRUCTURE, ETC.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of Bill No. 330, to amend the Trans-Canada Air Lines Act, 1937.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I believe the hon. member for Greenwood has something to say on this measure. Since he is not here, could we call it one o'clock?

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Speaker, this bill proposes certain amendments to the Trans-Canada Air Lines Act, 1937, as amended. The principal objects of this bill are four in number: the first object is found under section 2 of the bill where provision is made to increase the number of directors of Trans-Canada Air Lines from seven to nine persons. This will enable a wider geographical representation on the board of directors.

The second object is seen in section 9, subsections 1, 2 and 3 which provide for a rearrangement of the capital structure of the corporation to bring it in line with the normal commercial practice of financing part of the corporation's undertakings by means of equity capital and part by borrowed money.

Under these provisions Canadian National Railway Company will be required to surrender 200,000 shares of the capital stock of the corporation for a bond or debenture having a face value of $20 million, bearing a fixed interest rate and payable at a definite time in the future.

In this connection since the inception of Trans-Canada Air Lines the practice has been followed of requiring the air line to pay to the railway company interest on the railway company's investment in the air line. This principle was written into the Trans-Canada Air Lines Act, 1937, during what was called in the act the "initial period". During the initial period the air line was permitted to add to its operating expenses five per cent on the capital invested in the air line and deficits, if any, were made up by upward revisions of mail payments to the corporation by the department of the Postmaster General. The initial period was to end on December 31, 1939, but was extended by parliament on two occasions and finally came to an end on March 31, 1942. Since April 1, 1948, interest on the capital invested has been paid by the air line to the railway company at the rate of 3 per cent per annum.

The third object of the bill relates to income tax liability. The rearrangement of the financial structure of the corporation will have the effect of keeping the income tax liability of Trans-Canada Air Lines within normal commercial limits. If the capital structure were allowed to remain in the form of equity capital only, no deduction from that income would be permitted for income tax purposes on the interest payment hitherto paid or to be paid to the railway company, with the result that the railway company might be forced to look for payment by way of return on its investment to the net earnings of the corporation, if any, after payment of income tax. Furthermore, the provisions of subsection 4 of section 9 propose to give legal effect for income tax purposes to the interest paid to the railway company on the capital invested during the calendar year 1952 and, as well, up to the time of enactment of the bill, limited to three per cent on the capital invested by the railway company in the air line.

The fourth object of the bill is to be found in section 20. This provides for the extinction of the company incorporated under the name "Trans-Canada Air Lines (Atlantic) Limited." This company was formed to take over the responsibilities and activities of a wartime organization known as the Canadian government transatlantic air service. That organization was set up for the primary purpose of providing a rapid mail service to Canadian troops serving overseas, and its operation was made the responsibility of Trans-Canada Air Lines. When the Canadian government transatlantic air service was discontinued, it was thought desirable to form a separate company to continue overseas operations. There no longer seems to be any reason for making a corporate distinction between what are in effect two divisions of Trans-Canada Air Lines, and the absorption of Trans-Canada Air Lines (Atlantic) Limited into the parent company, Trans-Canada Air Lines, has many administrative advantages.

The above are the principal objects of the bill. However, there are some minor objects. There are certain proposed amendments in section 1 of the bill to section 2 of the act, which might be termed "clean-up" amendments, as they remove from this section definitions of words or expressions which are no longer referred to in the act.

By section 3 of the bill, subsection 3 of section 7 is amended by providing that Canadian National Railway Company may sell the shares of the capital stock of the corporation only with the approval of parliament.

By section 5 of the bill, section 13 of the act is amended to provide that the auditor appointed by parliament to audit the accounts of Canadian National Railway Company will be the auditor of Trans-Canada Air Lines instead of an auditor appointed by the minister.

By section 6 of the bill, certain amendments are made to section 14 of the act which authorize Trans-Canada Air Lines to carry out functions directly connected with the operation of the air line. This section also authorizes Trans-Canada Air Lines to use the descriptive name "Air Canada" which already has wide recognition in the French-speaking sections of the country.

By section 8 of the bill, section 20 of the act is repealed by providing that if another corporation is formed under the provisions of section 20, the number of directors shall not exceed nine, instead of seven as presently provided in section 20.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I have just a few remarks to make at this time, and I shall ask some questions when we get into committee, and are discussing the sections of the bill. My observations at this time will be general.

I can understand the reasons the minister has given. The desire to escape taxation is one of the most human desires, and apparently it exists even in crown corporations. The reason the minister has given is quite understandable.

I should like to reiterate briefly something that took place in the debate on the resolution, because I think it is a matter of some importance. I had asked the minister a question with regard to the monopoly position of Trans-Canada Air Lines, and I should like to read my question and the minister's answer, because I regard his answer as of sufficient importance to have it on the record.

As reported at page 3548 of Hansard I asked this question:

> I would like to ask the minister a question having regard to the answer he gave to the member for Winnipeg North Centre.

That was in answer to a quotation the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) had read from a statement by Mr.

King on April 2, 1943, which seemed to indicate almost that the monopoly position was going to be without end, or at least there was no indication of an end. I asked this question:

> We do have competition between the railways, and I believe they feel it is good. The chairman of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation spoke about the usefulness of competition. I wanted to ask the minister whether the policy enunciated by Mr. King might not be changed, and whether we might not reasonably look forward to a time when there would be enough airplane traffic for more than one company.

To that the minister replied:

> The hon. member is quite right. This is a thinly settled country. We have air services that are essential to the economy. However, today air transport in Canada is not competitive, or is competitive in only a few cases, whether public or private. If an air line company is assigned to a territory, that is its territory and no one else has a right to operate an air service in it. I believe that is a sound policy at the moment. If sufficient travel develops to the point where competition is warranted, then certainly air routes may be entitled to competition.

Having put that on the record, I shall reserve anything I have to say until we reach the sections of the bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Repeal.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I have noticed what the minister said about section 1, and I am assuming it has been carefully drawn. However, it is surprising to me that all the definitions listed on the right side of the page, including such phrases as "gross revenue" and "operating expenses", are no longer necessary. But if the minister is satisfied that this long list of definitions can be taken out, certainly I am not going to set up my opinion against his. I understand from the minister's explanation that none of these is needed.

Mr. Howe: That is correct. These refer to conditions which applied during the initial period, which ended in 1942. At that time there were certain guarantees when basic revenues resulted in a deficit. All those provisions have been abandoned, with the result that it is possible to delete certain definitions from section 1, which is the definition part. These definitions are no longer essential.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Board of directors.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): What did the minister mean by his reference to regional representation? Another question is this: How are these five directors to be elected by the shareholders? Will there be anybody else in addition to the Canadian National Railways?

Mr. Howe: The provision now in the act is that there shall be seven directors, of whom four are elected by the shareholders, the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): How are they elected?

Mr. Howe: The board of the Canadian National Railways, I would assume, passes a resolution. Perhaps they have only a voice vote; I do not know. But somehow or other four people are designated to be the directors of Trans-Canada Air Lines. I am not sure as to the method followed. Then, three members of the board are appointed by the government by order in council.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Does that not mean that Canadian National Railways are going to control Trans-Canada Air Lines?

Mr. Howe: Canadian National Railways owns the air line.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): As the minister knows, in the past there have been requests from Winnipeg that consideration be given to the appointment of someone from that locality to serve on the board of directors of Trans-Canada Air Lines. In view of the increase in the number of directors, has consideration been given to that request?

Mr. Howe: I undertook two or three years ago that when the Trans-Canada Air Lines Act was in process of being amended I would enlarge the board to make provision for a director from Winnipeg. That is the purpose of this amendment.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I wish to add a word on the question of directors. It seems to me that what we are doing in respect of this crown company—and it may be true of any crown company—is to afford a means whereby control to all intents and purposes is vested in the government, but where the government makes the best of both worlds by escaping the limitations of a government department through having a corporation which technically is independent and has the rights and privileges of a corporation including, as we have found out —and I am not criticizing this—the right to keep salaries confidential. In my mind this raises an important question: Are these boards, as set up, anything more than creatures of the department? Is there any independent opinion which is brought to bear?

As has been indicated, this board will consist of five members elected by the Canadian National Railways and four by the governor in council. As reported at page 3546 of Hansard the minister said:

> It is a board of seven at the present time. Four are directors of Canadian National Railways. One is a retired civil servant and the two others have no association with the government.

In other words, five out of seven were to all intents and purposes government officials or, let us say, directly or indirectly under the control of the government.

Mr. Howe: Some five of the directors would not like you to say that, though.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I realize that; I am trying to speak as accurately as I can, and used the expression, "directly or indirectly". I raise the question as to whether that is a sound position. When I raised it the other day I suggested that there might be a larger board and the minister answered in effect that if you had a large board the members might be careless about attending and would perhaps come only a few times a year and then not be familiar with the business when they did come. My answer to that is that that is true of national private corporations, but nevertheless they do not consider it wise to have a group of their own officials running their company. I do not see why the same considerations should not apply here.

I am quite sure that the minister has no qualms in his mind about the efficiency of the running of this corporation while he occupies the position he does, but nevertheless the fact remains that the operations of many of these crown corporations are quite large and I do not think it is sound principle to have them to all intents and purposes just branches of the departments concerned.

I raised this question in connection with Canadian National Railways and when I did I was careful to say that I was making no criticism of the members of the board. The only member of the board that I know quite well is Mr. Symington, who is an outstanding businessman. I have no doubt that these members are competent, but to have the board as small as it is seems to me to be unwise. In the same way I think that this board is more open to objection because the minister has said quite frankly that five of the directors are going to be elected by the directors of Canadian National Railways while four will be appointed by the governor in council. There you will have a pretty tight family party. I submit that the people of Canada are entitled to have a much more representative board.

I am not foolish enough to think that the directors are going to dictate the policy of the company. I was a director myself once in a small way and I know that usually directors do not do that kind of thing. Nevertheless, I think you should have the combined judgment of a wide variety of men because it may happen that we will run into times when it will be much harder to operate than it is now. I think in this section we are approving of an unwise principle.

Section 3 agreed to.

On section 4—Repeal.

Mr. Knowles: What is the effect of this section which repeals section 9 of the act?

Mr. Howe: I do not remember what section 9 was.

Mr. Knowles: It is set out in the explanatory note as follows:

> Shares of capital stock shall not be transferable except to such persons engaged or interested in aviation as are approved by the minister.

Mr. Howe: In the early stages of the company's history it was contemplated that ownership of the air line might be distributed between those engaged in aviation. In other words, at that time the possibility was being explored of making the company a private enterprise operation. The situation today is that the air line is so firmly established that it is undesirable to change the ownership and therefore that section is being deleted which contemplated the sale to aviation interests.

Mr. Knowles: In other words, this is to make sure that it will stay under public ownership?

Mr. Howe: It provides definitely that the shares can be transferred only with the consent of parliament.

Mr. Knowles: Good.

Section 5 agreed to.

On section 6—Maintenance of air lines.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Here the power to erect, construct, etc., is continued. Will the minister say whether this power has been availed of to any extent in the past or whether construction has not in the main been done by the Department of Transport or other departments of government.

Mr. Howe: The air lines has constructed a great deal of real property. At the moment it is building a $3 million hangar in the city of Toronto. It builds its own facilities except those required for passengers. It has built passenger terminals, but in the major airports the government usually builds the terminals and leases space to those air lines operating at that airport on a self-liquidating basis. Considerable sums are spent each year by Trans-Canada Air Lines on the construction of physical property.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Does the minister approve of the idea of separate construction facilities? It would seem like a multiplication of the Department of Public Works. Does the minister think there is advantage in having the T.C.A. do it itself?

Mr. Howe: The air lines builds its own hangar facilities and either leases from the government or builds its own passenger accommodation. That is done out of its own funds earned from operations.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That is interesting, but I do not think it settles the question. In the case of passenger accommodation, why should the construction be done by the government? Is it because the accommodation may be used by several companies?

Mr. Howe: Yes. The Department of Transport and other departments of government such as the post office, the express service, immigration and so on may require space in the building. The usual practice has been for the government to construct the terminal, although in some of the smaller centres Trans-Canada Air Lines builds its own accommodation out of its own funds, just as it builds its own hangar accommodation. However, the practice more often is for the government to build the airport building and lease space to those that require it, including the post office, the express company, immigration, the Department of Transport and so on. Space is leased to the Trans-Canada Air Lines according to its requirements. I might say that the rents are quite expensive.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): When the minister says "government" he means which department?

Mr. Howe: Department of Transport.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am not sure whether this would come under this particular section, but is it the intention that all necessary financing will be done through Canadian National Railways?

Mr. Howe: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Why is it considered desirable that T.C.A. should not do that directly when it needs money? Why should it have to make application to Canadian National?

Mr. Howe: Canadian National Railways own all the shares of Trans-Canada Air Lines. The air lines is a creature of Canadian National Railways. I think that any other arrangement or any other source of money would be poor business.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): It would depend upon the respective capacity for borrowing from the public. I am not suggesting that today or tomorrow T.C.A. may want to borrow, but why should it be prohibited from doing so if it is faced with a situation where it needs money?

Mr. Howe: Canadian National Railways have 100 or more subsidiaries and I think it would be poor policy to have every subsidiary do its own borrowing. It is much better to centralize the borrowing in the parent company and let it look after its subsidiaries. It is not anticipated that Trans-Canada Air Lines will require more than the $25 million that is now at its disposal plus earnings and accrued depreciation which may be added to that amount.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): If the minister is saying that they are not going to need to borrow, then the question is academic.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Paragraph (j) of subsection 2 reads:

> (j) to purchase, lease, or otherwise acquire or provide, hold, use, enjoy and operate such hotels in Canada as are deemed expedient for the purposes of the corporation.

Does that meet the existing need?

Mr. Howe: It refers to existing or future needs. For example, T.C.A. operate a hotel at Goose Bay and I think—I am not quite sure of this—they also operate a hotel at Gander. I am not sure of that but I know they built and are operating a hotel at Goose in order to take care of passengers stranded overnight.

Mr. Gillis: With respect to paragraph (k) of subsection 2 of section 6, it is not the intention to change the name "Trans-Canada Air Lines" and use the name "Air Canada" on this continent, is it?

Mr. Howe: I believe that the name "Air Canada" is used in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Chevrier: It is the translation.

Mr. Howe: It is really the translation of "Trans-Canada Air Lines", and the purpose of this provision is simply to reserve the term "Air Canada" so that the right to use it in the province of Quebec cannot be infringed. It is really the French translation of Trans-Canada Air Lines.

Mr. Gillis: I understand that, but it is not the intention to change the trade name of Trans-Canada Air Lines across the country?

Mr. Howe: No.

Mr. Gillis: It is merely legalizing it.

Mr. Howe: It is to protect the French translation.

Mr. Knowles: The marginal note to this clause refers to maintenance of air lines. Perhaps under that I might be permitted to say a word which I think would express the view of all hon. members. I want to say that we are proud today, as we have been throughout the years, of the splendid record of Trans-Canada Air Lines, particularly in the matter of safety. In Winnipeg and here too, because of the attention that was drawn to it in the news a few days ago, this safety record was highlighted a short time ago by the skill and cool-headedness of Captain E. W. Norquist and his crew when after they took off from the airport at Stevenson field with a load of some forty-three persons, it was learned that the landing gear and hydraulic equipment had been damaged. The way the pilot and his crew, consisting in addition to Captain Norquist of Murray Lunt, first officer, Ken Flack, purser-steward, and Miss Eva Mossop, stewardess, kept the plane in the air for some six hours until the runway could be sanded and a safe landing effected made quite a dramatic story.

There is no doubt there are many such instances that occur in the service, and they serve to point to the skill and care of the crews who operate T.C.A. planes. We think it is a very good record. There are others whose names might be put on the record, but I think it is only fair to name this particular crew for the way in which they have drawn attention to the care and skill exercised by those who operate this air line.

Section 7 agreed to.

On section 8—Governor in council may create corporations.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): What is the purpose of changing the number of persons to form a corporation? It does not refer specifically to Trans-Canada Air Lines. It refers to any corporation which Trans-Canada Air Lines or Canadian National Railways may like to form in connection with the business of T.C.A. Why is there a change in the number?

Mr. Howe: The pattern up to now has been seven directors and the number is being changed to nine. It is felt if any other corporation is formed the same nine directors might wish to act, but in any event the number on the board shall not exceed nine.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Is there anything in contemplation at present?

Mr. Howe: No.

FAIR EMPLOYMENT PRACTICES

MEASURE TO PREVENT DISCRIMINATION ON GROUNDS OF RACE, NATIONAL ORIGIN, COLOUR OR RELIGION

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour) moved the second reading of Bill No. 100, to prevent discrimination in regard to employment and membership in trade unions by reason of race, national origin, colour or religion.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in moving this bill for second reading I should like to make a few remarks. The speech from the throne last December declared the government's intention to introduce a bill which would prohibit discrimination in employment against any person because of his race, national origin, colour or religion in connection with any work, undertaking or business within the legislative authority of parliament. National labour organizations and many other bodies in recent years have advocated such federal legislation.

I think it is only fair to say that several members of the house have stressed the importance of the government taking some action in this field. I do feel that it would be wrong in introducing the bill if I did not acknowledge one voice from this side of the house that has been forceful, consistent and eloquent in its demands for action against discrimination for many more years than I have been a member of the house. I refer of course to the voice of the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll). I wish to express to him my warmest thanks for all he has done in the past to help prepare the ground to make possible the introduction of this bill at this time. I am sure there are many Canadians outside the house who would want me to make this public expression of gratitude to the hon. member for Spadina on their behalf.

Also, it is with respect that I acknowledge the sponsorship of similar private members' bills by the official opposition labour critic, the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough). It was very kind of her to withdraw her bill from the order paper this year to make way for mine, and I welcome her support of the principle of the bill.

I believe that equality of opportunity for employment without discrimination on account of race, national origin, colour or religion is a fundamental right which every resident of our democratic state should enjoy. It is a right which this parliament can well assert and try to protect. The government is now asking parliament to make this assertion by the bill I am introducing in respect of all persons in Canada who are employed or seeking employment in activities which come under federal authority. Although this federal sphere of jurisdiction is relatively limited, I believe that the passing of this legislation may have a far-reaching and healthy influence across the whole country.

I think one can say that the underlying principle of the bill is assurance of equality of vocational opportunity. In recent years Canada, as a member of various international organizations, has subscribed to general declarations concerning the basic rights and liberties of the individual. However, because of the divided jurisdiction established by our federal constitution, Canadian representatives have not always been able to make specific commitments with regard to legislation to ensure the protection of human rights.

For example, in 1948 the Canadian delegation to the general assembly of the United Nations voted for the universal declaration of human rights which was adopted by the assembly on December 10 of that year. The head of our delegation stated that certain important aspects of the declaration lay within the field of provincial jurisdiction in Canada and that the federal government did not intend to invade that field. Canadian participation in the international labour organization has been affected in the same way by the federal nature of our constitution. Canadian delegates to the general conference of the ILO in 1944 approved the adoption of the new declaration of the aims of the ILO which became known afterwards as the Philadelphia charter. This declaration asserts, among other things, the solemn obligation of the ILO to promote among the nations of the world programs which will achieve full employment, higher standards of living, the extension of social security, adequate protection for the life and health of workers, effective recognition of the right of collective bargaining—and this is the one that embraces the principle of this bill—equality of vocational opportunity, and other conditions conducive to human well-being.

Some action has already been taken by this government to prevent discrimination in employment in those areas of jurisdiction within which the federal authority has power to legislate.

At the last session the Unemployment Insurance Act was amended to provide that it is the duty of the commission to ensure that there will be no discrimination in referring any worker seeking employment, either in favour of or against any such worker, by reason of his racial origin, colour, religious belief or political affiliation. Then, as a further step in its program, in September last an order in council was passed which requires the insertion of a non-discrimination clause in federal government construction and supplies contracts entered into on or after January 1, 1953, to which the government fair wage provisions apply.

This clause expressly forbids the contractor to discriminate against any person because of his race, national origin, colour or religion in the employment of labour for the execution of the contract.

It might be said that discrimination in employment is based on ignorance, prejudice, selfishness, or an attitude of mind which cannot be discovered or changed by legislation. I agree, Mr. Speaker, that there is much to be said for that view. However, I would like to stress the point that the legislation which I am introducing is designed to deal with positive acts of discrimination. There will still be need for continued effort on the part of all those educational, religious, cultural, yes, and government influences, which are now working together and doing so much to create in Canada a climate of opinion in which racial and religious prejudice shall find no place.

The provisions of the legislation will apply to all employers of five or more employees, excluding non-profit educational, fraternal, charitable, religious and social organizations. The legislation applies to employment upon any work, undertaking or business which is within the legislative authority of parliament to regulate, to crown companies, and to trade unions composed of persons employed upon such works, undertakings or businesses. In effect, the legislation applies in respect of the same industries to which the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act applies.

The provisions of the bill will prohibit employers from discrimination as defined against any person in respect of employment or prospective employment, and prohibits employers from using the services of any employment agency which in its operations so discriminates against persons seeking employment. The use of advertising in connection with employment which expresses any such discrimination or preference is prohibited. Trade unions shall not so discriminate against any person in the matter of membership.

The legislation will be administered by the Department of Labour and by a division of the work amongst existing staff. It is not anticipated that additional costs for administration will be great.

Provision is made in the legislation for the receipt and investigation of complaints by conciliation officers of the department, and for the use of industrial inquiry commissions for the purpose of ascertaining the facts, with a view to the adjustment of complaints made under the act. Provision is made for prosecution in the courts for alleged infractions of the act and for the imposition of penalties by way of fine and recovery of lost wages where the offence is proved. This procedure for the handling and disposition of complaints is very similar to the procedures provided under the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act for the handling and disposition of complaints of unfair labour practices. It is proposed to use the same administrative machinery.

I believe that legislation of this nature to deal with overt acts of discrimination is practical and can be administered. The record of New York state, which pioneered in the United States in prohibiting discrimination against workers, has established the effectiveness of an act of this kind.

Passed in 1945, the New York law set a pattern for similar laws in ten other states and, I think, for the fair employment practices act enacted by the province of Ontario in 1951. Experience under the Ontario act perhaps has been of too limited duration to permit an adequate appraisal of its effectiveness. But there is ample evidence that in 7½ years of its operation the New York law has had an appreciable effect in eliminating discrimination and in broadening job opportunities for minority groups.

Briefly stated, the New York law provides that no person shall be denied the right to earn a living because of his religious belief or his racial or national background. It lays down penalties for acts of discrimination, whether by employers, labour organizations, employment agencies or other individuals.

The term "employer" under the New York act does not include a non-profit organization or an employer with fewer than six persons in his employ. The act does not apply to a person employed by his parent, spouse or child, nor to domestic servants.

While punitive powers are provided for the New York act, to be used when and if needed, the policy of the commission administering the legislation has been to rely on conciliation and persuasion and to avoid legal proceedings wherever possible. The record shows that out of approximately 2,500 cases handled to date the New York commission has had to resort to court action only three times. When one considers this experience in that highly industrialized state it seems a great victory for conciliation and persuasion, with the teeth of the law almost entirely unused.

One might sum up by quoting the following paragraph from the commission's 1951 report on its administration of the law:

> The commission realizes full well that the problems of employment discrimination which made a law necessary have not been completely solved. It is satisfied, however, that the law is no longer viewed by the general public as an expedient, an experiment, or a controversial document, but as an important instrument in the building of a stronger, democratic state.

The Ontario act has been in force since the middle part of 1951, and I am advised that in the intervening period, while there have been a limited number of complaints dealt with under the act, these complaints have been adjusted under the provisions of the act without the necessity of resort to the courts in any instance.

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that the principle of this bill will have wholehearted support in this house and amongst the citizens of this country. It is only with this large measure of public support that it will be effective for the purposes for which it is designed.

Following a discussion of the bill on second reading, if it is the wish of the house, I shall move to refer it for study to the standing committee on industrial relations. I am confident that it can be made into an effective ally to the main effort in Canada for ensuring equality of vocational opportunity.

It is as an ally that I view this measure. The main effort against discrimination must continue to be carried on by individual Canadians with the potent weapons of human understanding, of charitable example, and with the application of the golden rule. If this bill becomes law we will see to it that it is used only to augment those weapons.

I commend it to the house.

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West): I should like to join with the minister, Mr. Speaker, in paying tribute to the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) for the work which all of us know he has done in this field over a period of many years. I should like to thank the minister for his kind remarks concerning my own participation, small though it has been, in this field. I think that possibly at this time I might review some of the reasons for my support of this type of legislation and the motives which prompted me, in the first instance, to introduce a bill which, as the minister has said, I withdrew earlier in this session.

As I said on previous occasions, I think it is important that legislation should be provided to implement the universal declaration of human rights as proclaimed before the general assembly of the United Nations on December 10, 1948. Like the bill which it was my privilege to sponsor earlier, this bill applies only to employment in those fields which fall within the jurisdiction of the federal government. I am sure that every member of parliament will be in sympathy with the enactment of legislation which seeks to establish a common basis for all peoples in this nation, regardless of their origin, their religion or the various circumstances and conditions under which they labour. Canada is a nation of producers, and their production falls into many and varied categories. The very life and future of this nation depends upon those who, by their labours in every field, are building an economic stability to support a growing importance of international scope.

Quite apart from humanitarian standards, it is important that all citizens of Canada should recognize equality of effort which every day enhances our nationhood. It will be said, and truly so, that discrimination is of the heart and that legislation cannot alter the thoughts of man. But it is true also in other fields that all legislation sets a standard to which citizens tend to conform more and more as time goes on. In the past two years we have gone a long way towards recognition of the universality of human rights, and it is my opinion it is now expedient to put upon the statutes of this nation testimony to our belief in that fundamental principle. Of course, the members of my party propose to support this motion.

The preliminary steps in this direction which have already been taken were described by the minister, that is the amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act and just latterly P.C. 4138 which became effective January 1 of this year with regard to government contracts. These steps, taken with the support of all members in this house as well as with the support of various labour organizations, have come about as a result of changing opinions, or perhaps I should say a realization on the part of the people that there must come a time when we would put upon the statute books of this nation some tangible evidence of our belief in the equality of all citizens. I was very much interested some time ago in reading a statement which was submitted to the minister by the Canadian Congress of Labour, and I should like to quote two or three excerpts from it. The first one reads as follows:

> The congress asserts that the denial of a job to any Canadian for no other reason than that his race, his creed, his colour or his ancestry is not that of the majority, is a violation of one of the most fundamental tenets of democracy: equality of opportunity. Such discrimination has no scientific basis; it is based wholly on prejudice. It is contrary to the religious and moral values on which this country was founded.

Then a little later on the statement says:

> It deprives Canada of the best efforts of countless thousands of her people and leaves her the poorer for it.

Then, touching upon the manner in which such legislation should operate, the statement says this:

> The removal of prejudice is a long, hard task, and fair employment practices legislation is but one of the many means which must be used in the process.

It is true, Mr. Speaker, that the goal will not be reached overnight. Deeply held opinions and long practised habits are not easily changed. It is my opinion that lasting results can only be achieved by constant educational efforts, coupled with prompt and intelligent handling of reported situations. As the minister has said, this is a fairly new type of legislation. So far as I know the New York and New Jersey legislation of 1945 was about the first, and possibly the New York legislation has become a pattern for most of the legislation which exists today. Because of that it is very easy to examine the New York record and to judge the effectiveness of such legislation by the experiences within that state. It was, therefore, very interesting to read the current report of the New York commission covering the year 1952. In the introduction, I find this paragraph, which I should like to read to the house:

> The New York state law against discrimination, which started out on July 1, 1945 as an experiment in enlightened social legislation, may now be assessed, almost eight years later, as an essential statutory device in eradicating those practices of discrimination which not only deny individual interests and inventives, rights and privileges, but retard the growth of our economy by the squandering of our manpower resources. Such practices can never be justified in a democratic society, and to the extent that they continue to exist . . . they not only violate the law, but they tend to keep us from the immediate goal of our national defence production program: the most effective use of our available manpower supply. They also, quite obviously, supply grist for the propaganda mills of those forces which seek to undermine the faith of . . . the people . . . in our democratic form of government.

Then they, too, proceed to speak of the necessity for an educational program in connection with this type of legislation. A little further on they say this:

In 1945, when the law became effective, it was generally recognized that the ultimate goal could not be reached overnight. Although that observation is as valid today, it is the fact that persons formerly barred by reasons of discrimination from jobs in certain fields or prevented from advancing above menial or segregated levels of employment, have made definite progress towards the achievement of equal employment opportunity. The patterns of the past, however, are not easily changed, and a sizeable job remains to be done.

I was interested, Mr. Speaker, in the minister's remark that the implementation of this bill will be undertaken by the existing staff within his department. I was particularly interested in that because I had previously examined the estimates of the labour department, and I found no item especially earmarked for administration of this legislation. Therefore, possibly I can be forgiven if I wondered whether or not it was the government's intention to proceed very vigorously along the lines of administration of a Fair Employment Practices Act.

Now that the minister has made that explanation I should like to say this: I do hope that the government is not going to pass this bill and push it to one side, waiting for someone who happens to find out about it to make a complaint under the legislation. I believe that the full effectiveness of this legislation can only materialize if the government will institute a proper program of education to go hand in hand with the administration of the legislation itself. I believe that very strongly. We are all human, and we know that workers hesitate to make complaints, particularly those who are in menial employment. In many cases they are afraid of their jobs. They need to be assured that under this legislation it is their right to complain, but not to file complaints indiscriminately. Where there is definite basis for belief that they have been discriminated against they should be encouraged to make known instances and circumstances of such discrimination. I believe that, by removing from them the fear of retribution from employers or others, legislation of this sort can be made properly effective.

In this bill, as in the Ontario bill, provision is made for an industrial inquiry commission to look into such complaints as are made. This of course is an entirely different matter from a standing administrative commission or body to plan not only the administration but the education of workers in this field. I would urge the minister to give serious consideration to the establishment of a commission which will be charged with this responsibility. I feel that it would not only be a good thing at the federal level to have someone actively engaged in dissemination of information, but it would provide a stimulus to those provinces which have legislation of this order at the present time or who may, I hope, enact such legislation at a later date, to proceed along those lines. I believe that at the present time in the Dominion of Canada only two provinces, Saskatchewan and Ontario, have legislation of this kind. I understand that Manitoba is seriously considering such legislation, and one other was mentioned to me as being keenly interested in this type of legislation.

There should be a permanent administrative body charged with this responsibility, and the establishment of a commission should not depend upon the receipt of complaints which cannot be handled by the ordinary conciliation officers of the department.

The minister has spoken of the limited experience which the province of Ontario has had in this matter, and that is quite true. It is my understanding that in the approximately two years that the act has been operative only ten complaints have been received, and these have all been easily handled. While the province of Ontario did not set up any educational program, it did cover the ground fairly thoroughly in the first instance with letters and information to employers, trade unions, and so on. A great deal can be done to make effective the provisions of this legislation if one specific body is definitely charged with this responsibility. This is the least we can do to make such legislation operative. If we are not going to go that far, then the enactment of such legislation is merely giving lip service to a principle; and while that is all very well in itself, unless we are prepared to take more active steps, the legislation itself cannot achieve the result that is desired. I feel very strongly upon this point, because I have travelled pretty extensively across this country and throughout the northern part of the United States. I have seen conditions under which a great many people work and I have witnessed all too frequently instances of discrimination which should not exist. It is up to those who have very definite opinions on this subject to voice them, and to voice them in places where they will be heard right across the length and breadth of this land.

We are creatures of habit. A great deal of the discrimination which exists today is merely habit. We are inclined to gather together in groups of our own kind, and that is true of those who come from other countries as well. We are proud of the traditions of our own particular race. We all suffer to some extent, and in varying degrees, from religious bigotry. Some of this we do not take seriously; some we do. Because we are human and given to human frailty it is necessary that we should dig beneath the surface of habits which produce discrimination and to set up this example of the intention of the people of this country so that discrimination cannot threaten the rights and privileges of the citizens of Canada, nor can it menace the institutions and foundations of a free democratic state.

Since this bill is to go to the committee on industrial relations I do not propose to speak on any particular clause thereof. There will be plenty of opportunity to discuss them in the committee, and later when we get to the committee stage in this house. In closing these few remarks on the principle of this bill, I should like to quote a small paragraph which has come to me and which is anonymous:

> When people are no longer willing to help right the wrongs of others, their own rights are no longer safe.

And so, Mr. Speaker, in supporting this bill I say that if we are motivated by no more than selfishness, it behooves all members of this house to give their wholehearted support to the enactment of this legislation which will do away with one blight which unfortunately infests the whole North American continent today, and in so doing we shall support Canadian principles and give impetus to production, which this country needs more than anything else to take it farther along the road of progress on which it has so well started.

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say at once on behalf of the C.C.F. that we support the principle of this legislation. Indeed, I think in days to come it will be recognized that this bill has been something of a landmark in Canadian labour history. We believe, of course, that it should be sent to a committee because, while we support the principle, there are many details connected with the bill with which we are quite dissatisfied. We are convinced many improvements can be made in it, but it is in the committee on labour relations that these improvements will be suggested.

For many years the major labour congresses in this country have worked long and hard to try to secure legislation such as this. Along with those labour congresses have been individuals. As the minister has said, credit should be given to persons such as the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) and the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) for what they have done to bring this condition about.

But we ought to remember—and the hon. member for Hamilton West has pointed it out—that with the passing of this legislation a new day is not going to dawn overnight. This is but a start. Prejudices are not lost with such speed. Indeed I would say it is much easier to smash an atom than to break a prejudice.

The bill is an attempt by means of conciliation to prevent discrimination in employment. That, I believe, is a proper procedure—although behind that conciliation there must be the force of law and of compulsion. American experience has shown us that in the last resort these measures must be compulsory if they are going to be successful. In those areas where there was no compulsion there was a quite noticeable lack in the efficiency of the legislation as compared with states, such as the state of New York and other states, where the element of compulsion existed.

One of the reasons we dislike some of the sections in the bill is that they are altogether too permissive. In other words, they are not sufficiently mandatory. We would not like to see the bill pass only to see it by-passed at a later time. There was a suggestion by the minister which led us to feel that perhaps not as much was going to be done about this legislation as those of us in the C.C.F. would like to have done. Where discrimination is found, discretionary powers are given where we believe the powers should be mandatory and insisted upon. In our opinion the bill would be strengthened if these discretionary powers were removed. In other words, the legislation must have teeth if it is going to be successful.

Then one further obvious and glaring omission has been brought to the attention of most hon. members, in that there is nothing in the legislation concerning discrimination against a person because of sex. There are still a number of men—fortunately, a decreasing minority—who seem to think that women are not people. They look upon women as chattels, an idea which I trust will rapidly disappear. However, this matter of discrimination because of sex is something which can be discussed more fully in committee.

Another weakness now apparent in the bill is that it has not outlawed those wretched application forms which insist that an applicant for work must state his or her religion, his or her ethnic origin, or the place where his or her mother and father were born. The bill would have been much stronger had some thought been given to this subject, and I believe the committee should give careful consideration to the outlawing of such stupid questions in applications for employment.

I have never been able to understand why it is better to employ a man because of his religious belief or the colour of his skin rather than because of his innate capacity to do the work. Yet that is what these application forms seem to suggest.

The minister has told us that there will be a director in this new division, and he added that the cost of the division would not be great. I felt somewhat pessimistic when he made that statement, because I think the government could make no greater mistake than to burden with the directorate of this division a man who already is doing something else. Whoever is to be the director will find that he has a full-time job. This is one place where I am sure the members of the various parties in the house would not object to an increase in costs of a department, if we knew that the division was going to function properly.

The minister has said the government worked with other groups throughout the country to try to create a society in which prejudice would have no place. But if we are going to do that properly people will have to be educated; and if we are going to educate them we must be prepared to spend money. I would hope that the director of this division would not be merely an administrative head, but rather one who would conceive it as his duty to act as an educational spearhead in the fight against discrimination all across the country.

While at times we in Canada may think we are free from the more baleful influences we see in other nations, nevertheless we do see examples in this country which would indicate that this kind of education is required. In my journeying around Ontario I have found repeatedly that many who have been settled here for some generations insist upon describing as foreigners those who have been immigrants to this country, but who have now become Canadians. Nothing could be more distasteful or insulting to a Canadian who has taken out Canadian citizenship than still to be referred to as a foreigner.

It is that sort of attitude which we hope education will change, and change for the better. If we insist upon describing these Canadians as foreigners, perhaps it is because they have lived on the other side of the tracks. In Winnipeg I live on the other side of the tracks. I am very happy about it and proud of it, because I could not hope to live among better people.

However, discrimination does exist in part of almost every community in this country and, indeed, most other countries. There are various bases for discrimination, but, after examining into the subject, I would conclude that, apart from ignorance and prejudice, the greatest is an economic one.

I recall vividly that before the depression people would live as neighbours. They might be of different ethnic groups but, in normal, good times, they would get along very well and continue to be good neighbours. But when times got hard, when there was a struggle for work, a struggle for jobs, a struggle for existence, one would become afraid of the other. He would have the fear that the other might take his job, his very means of existence. When such conditions occur, instead of being good neighbours these people become hostile to each other, if not indeed enemies.

One of the best ways to avoid discrimination is to create and to maintain a society in which there is full employment. In my experience the chief forms of discrimination have been by and large against working people. Anyone who has studied the history of our labour organizations knows full well that race hatred has been used on many occasions as a weapon with which to destroy organized labour. I suppose that that is why labour is such a strong advocate of legislation such as this.

The union to which I belong, the united packinghouse workers, has as its symbol two clasped hands, one black and the other white. The two colours together indicate not only neighbourliness but brotherhood. It is quite understandable why a trade union should have such a symbol. I think labour realizes better than most that racial intolerance, racial prejudice and racial hatred is one of the most dangerous fifth columns we can have in this country and of course it shows itself in practice by discrimination against individuals.

Some years ago I introduced legislation before the house which was not dissimilar to what the minister hopes to achieve in this bill. That legislation did not get very far. Obviously this will get much further. I have been so much impressed with what I have seen of the effects of discrimination that I do not think it can be handled adequately except by an amendment to the Criminal Code. In its effect upon people racial discrimination is vicious and should be made a criminal offence. Discrimination against an individual is an insult to that man or woman, an insult to the inherent dignity of the individual, and it should be punished accordingly.

Our experience has been that discrimination has been practised against many of the minorities in this country. We seem to forget that this is a nation of minorities, that there is no one in the majority. When anyone is hurt we should be ready to go to his rescue immediately lest we ourselves suffer in the long run.

I know of many cases where Canadians of Ukrainian descent have complained of discrimination and on examination it has been proved to be well founded. Yet Canadians of Ukrainian descent have been among the hardest workers in this country. They were settled on sparse land and they made gardens out of what was almost desert. They worked day and night to earn a living for themselves and to educate their children. The sons of those people have risen to high positions in many walks of Canadian life. They are to be found at the bar, in commerce and, as this house knows, in politics. As one who lived among them I can say that the record of their sons, and indeed their daughters, during the last war was second to none as the honour rolls of Winnipeg schools can well testify.

They take their citizenship most seriously. I remember when there was a provincial election in Manitoba two or three years ago a Canadian of Ukrainian descent who was 72 years of age decided it was his duty as a Canadian citizen to get out and vote although he was sick in bed. He attempted to get to the voting booth but before he could enter it he dropped dead. That man took his citizenship most seriously indeed. It is intolerable that Canadians such as these should be discriminated against as they have been in the past.

One of the reasons why we support this legislation is our hope and belief that it may help groups such as this. There are others with whom I am well acquainted who have suffered just as badly, and I speak now of citizens of the Jewish faith. Anti-semitism I am afraid is something which is always latent, not the least among employers. In my professional experience I have come across employers who refuse under any circumstances and for no good reason to employ one of the Jewish faith. No reason can be given except that of ignorance. Such ignorance can be dispelled only by educational processes carried out, I would hope, by the minister's department and other institutions and organizations in this country.

I have found discrimination against the Jewish people in every walk of life in Canada, from the universities down through every occupation. Yet who is there to deny that the Jews have made a most distinguished contribution to Canadian life and culture? We can only hope that this legislation will do something to help those who have been so often and so unjustly discriminated against and against whom the hands of their fellowmen have been so often raised.

There are other groups which will hope for relief and help from legislation such as this. A young Polish-Canadian of Winnipeg gave his life during the last war. He was a pilot of a bomber and he ordered his crew to bail out while he continued to fly the bomber until it disintegrated in the air. He was given the Victoria Cross posthumously for his heroism. Yet his people have suffered. Canadians of Polish descent have been among our hardest workers and have contributed much to Canadian life. It is wrong that people such as these who are Canadian citizens should be discriminated against because of their religious views or because they bear names which do not seem to suit Anglo-Saxon employers.

I have brought to the attention of the House of Commons previously the case of certain Canadians of German origin whose sons and daughters were in the armed forces but who were compelled to report month after month to the mounted police who thought perhaps they might be disloyal. This sort of discrimination unhappily runs through almost every segment of our society.

Not the least of those affected are our coloured people. There are not many of them, yet they have suffered as have many other groups, although they are good, law-abiding citizens. Two days ago I happened to be passing through Dresden, and I could not help but think of the wretched action which had brought such notoriety to that community. I have heard of many examples of discrimination against people because they were coloured.

Marisse Scott of Owen Sound hoped to work in a hospital in that town but she was refused employment because the colour of her skin was not acceptable to the hospital authorities. They said to her, "we are sorry, but we do not accept coloured girls." She could not get employment in the vocation which she had decided she wanted to follow, that of nursing. But her parents were not content to let it go at that and they took the matter up further. The trades union congresses of Canada took up the matter and finally Father O'Reilly of Guelph, Ontario, persuaded St. Joseph's hospital to let this young girl work there. She was given employment in that hospital, and all credit to the authorities. She turned out to be a most excellent nurse.

This sort of enormity against human beings has to stop and I can only hope that this legislation will help to stop such stupidity.

I hope that this legislation will really have teeth in it. Yet history of the past has shown that on occasion after occasion employers have opposed such legislation on the ground that they did not really need it and it would interfere with their freedom to hire whom they liked, and all the rest of the usual conventional excuses. But Business Week, a reputable businessmen's magazine, had this to say about the United States experience:

> Employers agree that FEPC laws have not caused near the fuss that opponents predicted. Disgruntled job seekers have not swarmed commissions with complaints. Personnel friction has not been at all serious.

We will find exactly the same thing in Canada. Then Mr. Arnold Forster in Personnel Journal said:

> Some businessmen have worried that FEPC would involve them in endless red tape and in complicated legal proceedings, but again the statistics show that these fears are unfounded and that voluntary adherence to the law has been the rule rather than the exception.

The time is coming, and I hope it comes soon, when we shall all realize that discrimination against human beings is wasteful socially and economically. What is more important, discrimination against human beings is morally indefensible. It has been put no better than by the most Rev. Bernard J. Shiel, auxiliary bishop of Chicago, when he said:

> A fair employment practices law would give legal recognition to the God-given dignity which every human being possesses. If we are truly Christian, we cannot preach one thing and practice another . . . Economic discrimination is immoral; it is clearly sinful. How long can we expect to sit by while children of God find their paths blocked at every point by the forces of bigotry and discrimination?

We have sat by for a long time. Now we are taking the first step forward, and it is a step which we in the C.C.F. most warmly welcome.

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take very long to discuss this bill on this occasion. I think it is generally conceded in all parts of the house that the general principle of the bill is going to be accepted as a step in the right direction. Therefore we in this party have no hesitancy in accepting the general principle of the bill. When it comes before the committee no doubt there will be some argument with respect to certain sections and some changes will have to be made, but I think we can all agree on the general principle.

It has been pointed out that Canada is a great nation, and we all recognize that fact. One of the obligations which we as Canadians must assume is that of seeing to it that everybody has the opportunity to be employed. Certainly in our country there should be no lack of opportunity, and when those opportunities present themselves it should be the privilege of any Canadian to make his livelihood by being employed in the development of the resources of the country. In my judgment the bill provides a basis, at least, whereby all can enjoy the opportunities presented by our country.

Generally speaking I think nearly all industries and individuals would like to be as fair as they can to their employees in giving employment regardless of race, religion or colour, but it seems to me that many of the difficulties that present themselves to such employers are not nearly so great as they imagine. I believe that one of the difficulties in enforcing a law such as this is not going to be so much the question of legal enforcement as it is going to be a matter of education. When we get our people educated to the point where race, religion, creed or colour make no difference, I think we will have gone a long way in getting over the racial, religious and colour difficulty.

I do not believe there are very many members of the house who have not had a great number of letters and other communications from women's organizations throughout the country presenting the problem with which they are faced. They contend, and probably rightly so, that one of the faults of the bill lies in the fact that no provision is made against discrimination as to sex. When the bill goes before the committee I think every opportunity should be given to the women's organizations to present their briefs and support their claims. Then the members of the committee will be in a much better position to judge what action should be taken.

There is also another form of discrimination so far as labour is concerned that is not mentioned in the bill and which is becoming very widely practised in this country. I refer to discrimination on the ground of age. It seems to be the current practice of industry now to retire a fellow when he reaches approximately 50 years of age whether or not he has sufficient pension or income to take care of him. When he reaches 60 they are mighty sure that he is old enough to retire, and when he gets to be 65 they kick him out. One of my friends behind me says that he might be ready to go to that other house over here by that time, but that depends.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Johnston: Again it is purely a matter of opinion. That too is dependent upon education.

Mr. Hansell: The poorhouse, you mean.

Mr. Johnston: Some of these questions will probably confront us as the bill advances through its various stages, but I think the proper place to discuss them is in the committee. I am pleased that the minister has said the bill will be sent to the committee, and it seems to me that is the time when further discussion should take place. We are glad the bill has been introduced, and we accept the general principle of it on this occasion.

Mr. David A. Croll (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, may I first say that I appreciate the kindly reference made by the minister to the part I played in the formative stages which led to the introduction of the bill today. The fact of the matter is that the minister's name appears on the bill and the credit is his, but I appreciate that there is enough reflected glory for the rest of us.

It is my view that this bill does credit to this great House of Commons. I am pleased to join with other members in hailing it as the latest step in reducing racial and religious discrimination in this country. I am both pleased and proud to be associated with a government which is making an earnest effort to maintain this and other basic principles of human rights. By passing the bill we indicate that we are realists and we give a lead to the provinces and to industry. It is now written, it is spelled out, endorsed by parliament and supported by the Canadian people.

As other members of the house have already said, intolerance and discrimination are the two sides of the coin of infamy which has been current far too long. It is the duty of all of us, nations no less than individuals, to wipe out this base currency which is a constant threat to our freedom. I am reminded of the words of Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt, a great woman, spoken several years ago when she told of her embarrassment while she was chairman of the United Nations human rights commission owing to the prevalence of racial intolerance in her country. These are her words:

> Racial discrimination is now an international problem. Each account of discrimination, segregation or lynching discredits us abroad. Racial discrimination is the weak spot in our democracy. We must re-examine ourselves and work out a solution as quickly as possible.

It can be added that discrimination is also a source of grave infection within a nation. No country can be healthy or secure so long as that infection goes unchecked. So far as this country is concerned I am very happy to say that the incidence of acts of discrimination has always been low. I believe this is due partly to the good sense of our people and partly to the fact that almost every one of us in Canada belongs to a minority group in some sense, be it racial, religious or linguistic.

With so many minorities living together we are more concerned with respecting each other's freedom because we know in the long run it safeguards our own freedom. Yet we must be honest enough to admit that prejudice and discrimination are not unknown in Canada. Unfortunately these ugly things do exist, these cancers in the flesh of our freedom; and they call for the application of preventive medicine without delay. Many of the symptoms do not appear dangerous to some people at first glance. A barber refuses to shave someone because of his colour; a deed of land contains a clause that the land may not be sold to people of a certain race; a winter resort cancels a reservation because of the guest's colour or religion.

Some people do not consider these things dangerous, but they are. They are what Mrs. Roosevelt called "the weak spot in our democracy". If we do nothing about them, if we permit them to increase and multiply, then in the long run we shall be without democracy; for if there is no freedom then there can be no democracy. So we have examined ourselves and we have been working out a solution. Ontario and Saskatchewan have already taken steps along similar lines, and I would like this house to particularly consider the situation in Ontario. I indeed am very proud of it.

In 1944 the province of Ontario enacted a law against discriminatory advertising. In 1950 the conveyancing and law of property act was amended to prevent racial restrictive covenants in conveyances of land. In 1951 the province passed a fair employment practices law. I wish to quote Premier Frost, who is a man of stature and who has a place in the hearts of the people of Ontario. He had this to say on the passage of the act:

> I think our people in this province do not want to discriminate. They do not like it and do not want it. The position of the government and my personal position is one of strong opposition to racial discrimination of any kind.

The province of Ontario, in passing the fair employment practices act in 1951, took a great step forward. That was the first act of its kind in Canada. Unusual, too, was the inclusion in the act of the following significant preamble:

> Whereas it is contrary to public policy in Ontario to discriminate against men and women in respect of their employment because of race, creed, colour, nationality, ancestry or place of origin;
> Whereas it is desirable to enact a measure designed to promote observance of this principle;
> And whereas to do so is in accord with the universal declaration of human rights as proclaimed by the United Nations;

There we have very positive, welcome and decisive steps in the long fight against discrimination.

This government is not without credit, and I think I should point out the steps which have been taken by the present minister on behalf of the government. In recent months it has removed, in a number of important areas, the legal bases for some of the more blatant forms of discriminatory practices. I want to review a few of them briefly, as I do not think the minister did himself justice in his opening statement. Perhaps he was a little too modest.

In June of 1952 the Unemployment Insurance Act was amended to include the following subsection:

It shall be the duty of the commission to ensure that there shall be no discrimination in referring any worker seeking employment, subject to the needs of the employment, either in favour of, or against any such worker, by reason of his racial origin, colour, religious belief or political affiliation.

Of lesser importance but still involving the important principle of religious liberty was the amendment in July, 1951 of benefit regulations under the Unemployment Insurance Act ensuring that a claimant shall not be prejudiced under the act when, because of his religious beliefs, he cannot accept work on Saturday.

Possibly the most significant federal measure was the recent order in council, P.C. 4138, dated September 24, 1952, which establishes a fair employment practice policy regarding government contracts effective from January 1, 1953. The preamble states:

—it is considered advisable that a clause prohibiting discrimination by the contractor in the employment of labour in respect of race, national origin, colour or religion should be incorporated in all contracts made by the government of Canada for construction, remodelling, repair or demolition of public buildings or other works, or for the manufacture and supply of equipment, materials and supplies.

Today we are considering a further step in the same direction but, before going on with that, I should like to put on the record something this house has overlooked. On February 3 there was a bill before this house entitled the Royal Style and Titles Act. There were admirable speeches made in the house that day by all members who spoke. I want to refer particularly to part of the speech made by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) as it appears at page 1567 of Hansard. His words are most expressive; they are beautiful words, and they ring so genuinely:

We all know from our own Canadian experience that unity between us, unity between all the elements of our population, is and must be based upon that recognition by us all that we are all equal to each other and that all have the same rights to Canadian citizenship, and that Canadian citizenship gives us equality in every respect with all our fellow-citizens, whatever their origin, their traditions and their cultures may be. It is because our forefathers had the wisdom to recognize that it was not going to be necessary in this Canadian nation to pour all the elements into the same mould that we now have a Canadian nation.

We are all proud of being Canadian citizens because we can be so and can exercise all our rights as such without forgetting our racial origins, our ancestral traditions, and without there being any effort by any of our fellow citizens to make us over into any other kind of Canadian than we happen to be because of our racial origins and with our ancestral traditions.

The bill before us at the present time calls for no racial discrimination, particularly with regard to membership in trade unions. The stakes which trade unions have in discrimination being wiped out are certainly as great as those of management. Fortunately Canadian labour unions have directed a strong campaign for the enactment of fair employment practices, and are deserving of much credit for their persistence in this regard. Their resolutions passed at annual conventions, their briefs presented to the government, their constant vigilance in reporting on discriminatory practices, should not go unnoticed at this time when we are considering this legislation. Nor should the efforts of other groups, religious, fraternal, welfare and minority bodies, who have acted on their own or in co-operation with labour organizations to end discrimination in this country.

I need only remind you that Canada has received since the end of world war II new Canadians to the extent of 165,000 who have survived nazi concentration camps. If it were to permit these people alone to become established and employed as citizens equal in status to native-born Canadians, this fair employment practices legislation would be more than warranted. By this legislation we show these people that their suffering, their persecution and discrimination has been fully replaced in Canada by a sense of tolerance and understanding, in employment and in other ways.

I want to take issue with those who say you cannot legislate for tolerance. This type of remark is made too lightly by people who want to dismiss this problem without thinking it through. Has the Criminal Code not acted as a deterrent to lawlessness and crime? I do not believe it is far afield to say that you can legislate for tolerance. I am convinced that most people are not intolerant by nature. They may, and indeed they often do, fall into intolerance through carelessness or lack of consideration, or they are led astray by a bad example. Legislation in this field can have a very direct effect upon human conduct. First of all it brings to light the fact that society officially disproves of intolerance and discrimination. I do not think we should underestimate the effect of social disapproval on people's minds. Secondly, by positively discouraging acts of discrimination it will reduce the incidence of such acts and so reduce the number of bad examples which others might be tempted to follow.

I am not suggesting that an act of parliament is sufficient to transform an intolerant man into a tolerant man, but it definitely can introduce a climate that will foster the spirit of tolerance and the reduction of discrimination. Law not only expresses custom; it creates it. I am satisfied that the vast majority of our people are not intolerant, but some of them may be potentially so. There is in every society a fringe, the young, the impressionable, those with real or imagined grievances, who can fall prey to intolerance if it is allowed to work on their minds. If we keep them on the right track, if we show them society frowns on discrimination, if we prohibit acts of discrimination by law, then I believe we will have gone a long way toward eliminating the vice itself. The government, by setting an example of tolerance within its own sphere —that is all that can be expected of it— can accomplish that. It can set a standard of public morality which is bound to have an effect on industry and the private citizen.

I am particularly hopeful as to the future of this legislation in establishing a national standard. In this connection I recall the experience of the wartime labour regulations. As hon. members are aware, that was a revolutionary advance in labour legislation in Canada. Imperfect though it was, it set a national standard for labour regulations which left its mark on every factory and home in Canada. Then when the dominion partially vacated the field of labour regulations at the end of the war, the provinces drew heavily on the national code in framing their own labour laws. Thus the dominion established a standard and a practice which moulded the pattern of labour relations in this country. In the same way, I anticipate with confidence that our good example here will be followed across the nation by the provinces.

Let no one think that legislation such as this is mere whistling in the dark. The experience in Canada, and in various states in the United States, has proven that regulation of employment practices really works. There has generally been an acceptance of these government standards which speaks well for the future of human relations. Discrimination in employment can be brought under control. But it is not enough merely to enact the law. It must be enforced, and it must be accompanied by continuous public education. I do not propose to devote too much time today to a consideration of the enforcement aspect, other than to say that there are no great obstacles in the way.

This bill does not have as its purpose the abolishment of prejudice; that is to change human nature. It is a law to prevent anti-social manifestation of prejudice. It is possible of enforcement, and it can be determined that men are denied employment because of racial or religious prejudice or for other such reasons. It is a difficult task, but we do it every day before our labour relations boards when men, who have been discharged for union activity, obtain a hearing and are often reinstated. It does need a patient, perceptive approach. I am satisfied that the Department of Labour has sufficient good men in its ranks to do the job conscientiously and well. The important thing is that the law be enforced. It must not be allowed to sit idle on the statute books, and I am sure it will not.

But enforcement alone is not enough. Authorities agree that the elimination of intolerance depends, in the long run, on a process of continuous education. I appreciate that this matter of education is not one that can be provided for in this bill. I am concerned to raise it at this point as an indication of what remains to be done after this bill has been enacted as law. Education is an indispensable part of the act. It can only be administered with great restraint, and with understanding of some prejudices that, unfortunately, have roots in our Canadian life. There must be recognition that persuasion is generally more potent than coercion in leading men to change their long formed habits.

Just as education may be essential to the act, so this act will be considered an indispensable element in directing men to follow fair practices. Law is the most potent educational force that we have. The lack of law in this field of human relations suggests that discriminatory employment practices are acceptable; whereas the passing of this bill would be the sign that discrimination on grounds of race and religion is deplored by the community as a whole.

Intolerance is the product of darkness and ignorance. I believe firmly that it can be brought under control by legislation like this, and experience bears me out. Our schools, our churches, our community organizations are already doing much in this direction, but their work must be increased. Public opinion must be brought to bear on the problem in order that we may have not only obedience to this new law but also understanding and acceptance of what it means and what we are trying to accomplish.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I think the days of discrimination in this country, for the reasons for which this act is passed, are numbered. Mind you, the end of discrimination and prejudice will not come about automatically. It will require hard work and determined effort. But ours is a democratic and resilient society. It has shown fundamental respect for human rights, and it has absorbed change in response to the will of the majority. The sooner we learn to practise what we are brought up to believe, the sooner we will be at peace with ourselves and our neighbours. The late President Roosevelt wrote just before he died:

> Today we are faced with the pre-eminent fact that if civilization is to survive we must cultivate the science of human relationships—the ability of all peoples of all kinds to live together and to work together in the same world at peace.

We add a new weapon to our arsenal for strengthening democracy at home. I close by quoting a man of great eminence, James Cardinal McGuigan:

> We must endeavour to accord to all men of whatever colour or creed equality in the fundamental rights of the human person, equality in the respect due to man's dignity, equality of rights of employment.

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): I was pleased indeed to hear the Minister of Labour so generously pay the credit which was justified to the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) for the part she has played in bringing this matter before the house. We all know, as the minister mentioned, that last year she introduced a private member's bill almost identical to this bill and withdrew it at the government's request so that a government measure could be brought forward at this time. I feel that a great deal of credit is due her for the fact that we are discussing this very important bill today.

I was also very pleased to hear the minister pay credit to the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll). I think all hon. members know the work he has done over the past few years in bringing this matter to the attention of the government. I am particularly interested in the work of these hon. members, because the hon. member for Spadina defeated me the first time I ran for this house, in 1945, and I was elected the same day as the hon. member for Hamilton West. The hon. member for Spadina also happens to be my member of parliament, so of course I take a great deal of interest in everything he does in and out of the house.

I believe the principle embodied in this bill is a very important one indeed, not only for the application which it will have to the industries to which it will apply, but also for the educational value it will have on all industries throughout this country.

The fact that we in this parliament are in favour of this measure is a clear demonstration that the people of the country are in favour of it because, after all, we are simply their representatives. This legislation should provide a great deal of encouragement to provincial governments right across the country to introduce similar legislation in the near future.

In Ontario we have had a fair employment practices act in operation for the past two years, and it has proved to be both workable and beneficial. During the first year of its operation only five complaints were lodged with the Ontario department of labour, which is an indication of how well the act has operated in that province.

Many people ask this question: Can you eliminate discrimination by legislation? They point out the fact that an employer can give any number of excuses, other than the right one, for his refusal to employ a certain applicant for a job. If the employer persists in refusing to employ people who fall into one or more of the categories specified in this bill, these rejections will form a pattern. This pattern will make it possible to prosecute the employer and get a conviction. From then on it will become increasingly difficult, if not impossible, for that employer to break the law.

As I said earlier, another important reason for passing this bill, and I believe it is the most important reason, is the educational value it will have. If we in this parliament demonstrate our belief in this measure by making it law, I believe the effect this legislation will have on industry throughout the country will be very great indeed. Heads of companies will then have been given a clear lead by the government, and it will be up to them to impress upon their personnel directors, their superintendents and their foremen the importance of judging an applicant for a job solely on his merit and on no other basis.

I have found from practical experience that those who are responsible for employment within a firm can be educated to observe the principle embodied in this bill; and they have found, often to their very great surprise, that the people against whom they have held a prejudice in the past have turned out to be no different from all other people with whom they live and work. The resulting effect upon their outlook is very refreshing indeed.

I believe this bill will help to make this kind of education more general throughout the country and the result within industry generally will be beneficial indeed.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): I wish to join with those who have welcomed the introduction of this bill. Credit has been given to certain people for their part in leading up to the introduction of the measure. However, I would rather believe that this bill is the result of the maturing of the Canadian people.

If credit is to be handed out I do not believe I should go without a certain amount of credit myself, because I have given many years of my life to the fighting of racial discrimination, in part in this house, when it was a pretty hard thing to fight. The hon. member for Spadina said that great credit was coming to the government for what they had done. I would say there is great discredit also coming to the government for what they did, because do not let us forget that it is only four or five years since people in this country were deprived of their vote simply because of their race and religion.

Many times I have been amazed and dismayed by the depths to which otherwise decent people would stoop to use racial prejudice against a political opponent. I believe that is a thing of the past in Canada; I do really believe it, and I am glad indeed that that is so. In my opinion racial prejudice and intolerance are not things that are a part of the human attitudes and human behaviour. In Vancouver I live near a high school, and I know that even when racial discrimination and racial issues were at their height in that part of the country, I could walk out any day and see youths of various colours, various nationalities and various racial origins walking together. I would see girls who were Chinese, Japanese, Scotch, English, Irish and every other nationality walking arm in arm along the streets, with no thought that one was different from the other.

I discussed this matter at one time with a high school principal. He said, "We have no difficulty at all with the race question in this school. There is no feeling in the matter on the part of the pupils. It is only after they have been in the universities and are approaching graduation, and are beginning to look for jobs, that they notice someone is Jewish, that someone else is Japanese or someone else is of some other nationality." The feeling of prejudice, the intolerance between one racial group and another, is the result of ignorance and a lack of understanding of our common origin, intensified by economic circumstances.

I believe I should know as much as anyone about racial prejudice, because I suppose no people in the world were more intolerant not only of other races but of different sections of their own race, than that from which I have come. The Macleods hated the Macdonalds, and the Macdonalds hated the Macleods; the Gordons hated the Stewarts and the Stewarts hated the Gordons; the MacFarlanes hated the MacDougalls, and the MacDougalls hated the MacFarlanes—and I imagine the MacInnises hated all of them. But that is of the past. The clans are all agreed now that all of them are really the salt of the earth; and if what I am saying were not being reported I would like to say that I agree with them.

Then the question of enforcement arises. I am not greatly concerned about that, because I do not think it will be a big problem. This is as much a step in education as a step in statutory law. I believe we can eliminate racial intolerance and racial discrimination when, no matter what the circumstances may be, each one of us will denounce that sort of thing every time it raises its head, no matter when or where. So I am not greatly worried as to any difficulties that may arise in connection with enforcing this legislation. I think it will operate in much the same way as the traffic lights on our streets. People observe them automatically and almost universally. Sometimes a drunken or a reckless driver will drive through a red light; but most people observe them because they know there is something back of them. They know the police and the courts stand back of those red lights. They know, too, that it just is not the thing to do to disregard regulations which are helpful to everyone.

I am convinced that the great majority of the people will react in that way toward this legislation. I shall not detain the house further, but would only repeat that I am pleased indeed the minister is bringing this legislation before us, and I express the hope that it will become law before parliament prorogues.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I wish to add only a brief word, because there are some points I want to have clear.

First may I congratulate the minister upon the intelligent way in which he explained the principle of the bill; even I could understand it. The people today who are receiving the workers are the employers. That includes not only the dominion government, but those other employers engaged in carrying on work throughout Canada.

Then the unions must receive the workers. There are groups who will not receive all workers. For instance, a union may raise its hand against some workers; a contractor may advertise by stating, "No coloured people need apply; no man or woman from the Orient need apply".

Both these restrictions should be ruled out. I know that at the lakehead we have contractors who are practising the principle contained in this bill. Some will recall that when the orientals were forced out of British Columbia some of them were wise enough to stop at the lakehead. They received employment there, and today they are just as good workers as we have, even as good as the Irishmen. Not only are the Japanese good workers, they are also good citizens. Today they are taking their place at the lakehead, and many of them have become some of our best athletes. One of the best umpires in our hardball games last year was a man of Japanese origin.

But the question is this: Will all the people of Canada, no matter what their ideologies may be, receive these citizens? I doubt it very much. We know that today many workers have been expelled from union executive positions. What does the minister intend to do with people who have not the inclination to be loyal to Canada and to Canada's queen? I think we should have an explanation along those lines.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, those who have spoken on this measure this afternoon have presented the case for it so well that those of us who come along at this stage of the debate hardly need to take very many minutes. However, I feel that this is one of those occasions when parliament is really dealing with something fundamental. In my view there is nothing more basic than the fact that all human beings are created equal and that our rights should be equal, not on the basis of race, colour, creed or religion but simply on the basis of the fact that we are human beings.

It has taken the human race a long time to approach the realization of that principle, that ideal, but I believe we have made considerable progress toward its realization. I believe that one of the allies in the battle against discrimination, in the battle for equality of opportunity among all peoples, is legislation. I agree with those who have suggested this afternoon that we need education, as well as other forces, but it is also true that something can be done by legislation. Therefore I am glad to see this legislation being brought forward at this time.

I happen to be a member of the committee to which this bill will go and I shall have an opportunity there to express my views on some of its sections. However, I did want to indicate my wholehearted support of this measure and to associate myself with the remarks of my colleagues the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) and the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), and also with the support that has been indicated by members of other groups.

I noted in particular the suggestion made by a number of members that legislation of this kind being enacted at the federal level may well play a part in encouraging provinces that have not passed legislation of this nature to put such legislation on their statute books. As a matter of fact I feel that that has happened already in the case of my own province of Manitoba. Unions and other interested groups in Manitoba have been trying for a long time to persuade the government of that province to enact fair employment practices legislation. That government has shown itself interested, but has been reluctant to act.

When we met on November 20, 1952, to hear the speech from the throne that opened this session of parliament it was indicated that there would be fair employment practices legislation at the federal level. Lo and behold! when the Manitoba legislature met a few months later it was announced by the government there that they would follow suit. So I suggest that there is validity in the hope that although this legislation applies only to workers who come under federal labour jurisdiction, it will encourage those responsible for labour matters at the provincial level to follow suit. I hope it will not be long until legislation of this kind, or even better, will be the rule throughout the country.

I am glad the decision has been made to refer this bill to the committee on industrial relations so we can study it carefully, and so interested bodies, particularly the trade unions which have been so keen on this legislation, will have an opportunity to appear before the committee. Indeed that committee will have some interesting sessions when it meets, which I take it will be shortly, because we will have before us not only this bill but also the subject matter of another bill, namely the one in my name which provides for the check-off of trade union dues, in support of which various labour groups will wish to make representations.

With these few words I am happy to indicate my wholehearted endorsation of the principle of the bill now before us.

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Speaker, before the minister closes the debate

I want to say that I support this legislation. Like the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) I fail to see any great reason for expressly congratulating the government upon the introduction of this particular piece of legislation. As in so many other instances to which we have called attention in this house, the government is following public opinion rather than giving progressive leadership. It is because legislation such as this has become reasonably popular, it is because the need for it has been shown by trade unions across this country, it is because a great deal of basic educational work in this field has been done by the trade unions that the government comes along with this legislation. Nevertheless we welcome it and shall support it.

I would suggest that the government could assist in this field by giving financial aid to those agencies whose primary purpose is the breaking down of racial and religious bigotry and prejudice in this country. There are some organizations which have done a great deal toward this cause. But unfortunately there are other organizations of good repute which contribute to disaffection between peoples of different religions and beliefs. I think the government should give consideration to rendering assistance to such organizations as exist for the primary purpose of breaking down this prejudice and bigotry.

It is important to a country of minorities such as Canada that there should be a greater degree of national unity established. I am one of those who believe that eventually this must become part of our Criminal Code, and that injury or mischief to public interest shall include the promotion of disaffection or ill will or hostility between peoples of different religions and beliefs.

In the meantime education can be assisted by legislation. Those who are engaged in the educational field and the breaking down of these prejudices find it most difficult when children, for instance, are taught tolerance in the school and then find intolerance in their homes, in business circles, and in other fields as the rule of life in the world in which they have to live. Anything the government can do by way of legislation such as this to give assistance to organizations promoting unity will help to build Canadian unity.

There is one omission with which I am concerned and which has been called already to the minister's attention. That is the omission of the word "sex", and of any reference to the elimination of discrimination in regard to employment because of sex. The minister has told us that the legislation is in line with the United Nations charter and the universal declaration of human rights. I am sure I do not need to remind the minister that the preamble to the United Nations charter includes among other things a reference to the equal rights of men and women. The universal declaration of human rights says in article II:

> Everyone is entitled to all the rights and freedoms set forth in this declaration, without distinction of any kind, such as race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, property, birth or other status.

The fact that the bill is going to the industrial relations committee encourages us to believe that possibly the government may be willing to accept a suggestion from the committee that the word "sex" be added to the bill so that it will include discrimination on the basis of sex as well as on the basis of national origin, race or religion. Certainly our C.C.F. representatives on the committee will put forth that plea to the government, and I am confident that others will also do so. I can only hope the minister will lend an ear to that request, and that such a provision may also be included.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, before the minister closes the debate I have a few thoughts on the principle of the bill that have not been expressed by anyone so far, and I should like to give voice to them at this time.

I agree with everything that has been said about the bill being a step in the right direction. The fact that there will be a national basic law on the matter of discrimination will be a deterrent to those who might practice it. A good example of that is the federal statute on civil reinstatement of members of the armed forces, which is enforced by the Department of Labour. We have not had many cases arise but there have been some, and I am reasonably sure that if there was not an act compelling employers to employ returning service personnel we would have had a great deal of difficulty in having many returned servicemen re-employed.

As an example of how that legislation is enforced, I had a case recently—as a matter of fact I have had several since the legislation has been in effect—of a boy from Korea. When he returned and made application for his old job he was told that there was no employment for him because someone had filled his place. He asked the personnel manager of the company if he knew about the Reinstatement in Civil Employment Act, and pointed out that he had a right to re-employment under that act. The answer he got was that the government was not going to tell them whom they were going to employ. That young fellow came to see me. I got in touch with the Department of Labour in Ottawa, and inside of 48 hours there was a man in that area who definitely told the manager of the company that it was the law of the country, and that it was enforceable and would be enforced. The boy was back at his job within 48 hours.

The fact that this legislation will be on the statute books in my opinion will have the same result that the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) described. It will be generally observed as our traffic laws are.

I have looked over the organizations to which the bill applies, and I am disappointed to see that so far as the application of the legislation is concerned the words "political discrimination" have been omitted. In the United Nations bill of rights discrimination on political grounds is also included, and as a member of the industrial relations committee which will consider the bill now before us I am going to attempt to have that provision included. I think it is badly needed because, while government members look upon the bill as a desirable thing and many of them have expressed their approval of it, I want to remind them that there is considerable political discrimination in this country on the grounds of patronage.

I do not have to leave my own riding to give instances, and it applies right across the country. Many times government contractors have come there on some large project, and one of the conditions laid down by the contractor has been that the applicant for work get a slip from the chairman of the patronage committee in the area before he will be employed. Therefore I am looking forward with interest to the enforcement of this legislation along that line. The very government that is passing the act condones, unofficially at least, a system of employment by contractors whom they employ that I think could very well be discontinued under the terms of this legislation if the words "political discrimination" were included.

Then there is another omission that was mentioned by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston), that of the man who is 40 years of age. Employers right across the country have a policy at the present time under which they will not hire anyone in their plants, factories or mines who is over 40 years of age. That is discrimination because of age.

An hon. Member: Governments, too.

Mr. Gillis: Governments take the same stand. While we are doing a desirable thing in trying to eliminate racial and religious discrimination, let us not forget for a minute that thousands and thousands of Canadians are walking the streets today because of discrimination against them on the ground of age. The reason for that of course is that companies that have established pension plans are not employing anyone who is not young enough to make a substantial contribution to the pension fund before he reaches retirement age. A citizen of Canada who has reached the age of 40, and who still has about 20 good productive years ahead of him, should not be discriminated against because he happened to become unemployed when he was approximately 40 years of age.

Another instance of discrimination so far as employment is concerned very badly affects ex-servicemen. The minister, who was minister of veterans affairs for some years, realizes that in every part of the country where there is heavy industry young men may come back from service with war wounds and disabilities incurred during service entitling them to a pension at the rate of 5 or 10 per cent, but in the areas in which they live they are 100 per cent disabled as far as employment is concerned. That is because one of the requirements for employment is that the man pass a medical examination, and when the company's doctor finds that he has a 5 or 10 per cent pension then he is not considered fit for employment in heavy industry and he is not employed. I am sure that members of the house representing ridings where there is nothing but heavy industry have many such young fellows come to them trying to find some way of securing employment.

Provision should be made in the bill to cover the three points I have mentioned, political discrimination, discrimination against young men who may have a 5 or 10 per cent disability, and discrimination against men who having reached the age of 40 still have 20 years ahead of them in which they can produce, but are debarred from employment as a result of the general policy adopted by employers.

I wanted to make these points, Mr. Speaker, because I intend to press for their inclusion in this bill when the committee is set up. I see no difficulty in enforcement of these things. I think the bill will work just as the Reinstatement in Civil Employment Act works.

Members can help in this matter of education. Members can talk about it, and they can assist in cases where there is discrimination. If employers across the country are not living up to the terms of this bill the best medium of education is the member of parliament in his riding publicizing its provisions and assisting those who may be affected.

It is not easy for people across the country to understand the mechanics of the bill and to know how to go about obtaining redress under it. The member of parliament is the best agency in the matter because he knows the necessary mechanics for getting redress under the terms of the bill. Example is the best method of education. If the employers of this country desire to implement the terms of this bill all they have to do is put it into practice in their industries, plants and mines across the country.

On the other hand, trade unions have been pressing for this for 50 years. I remember it being a subject matter of debate and resolution in local unions at least 30 years ago. The trade unions too can practise the virtues of this legislation by opening their doors and admitting suitable people where they can be found; and I have particular reference to the coloured people in this country who have been discriminated against for a good many years.

If the unions and employers set the example across the country there will be no difficulty in working out the problem. I am not really concerned about the broad problem of racial and religious discrimination, but I am concerned over the discrimination cropping up in connection with our own citizens, people who were born in this country, because of age, war disability, or the other matters that I mentioned.

I shall not take up more time, but I wanted to let the hon. member for Spadina know that as a member of the committee I will seek his assistance in having these points covered in the bill. If we are going to give the provinces and others a guide in this field, then we should make this bill as tight and all-inclusive as possible. I do not think the time is far distant when most of the provinces in Canada will be following the lead of the federal government in this matter.

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): I would like to make a few remarks on this subject before the minister replies. First I would like to congratulate those responsible for the introduction of this legislation: The hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) who has worked for and advocated this for such a long time; the minister, for his fine sentiments expressed when introducing the bill; and the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) for the work she has done on this subject.

I think everyone here is in perfect agreement about the desirability of this legislation. As some hon. members have pointed out, there has been a gradual recognition over the years of the fundamental human right that all men are born equal in the sight of God; and this bill gives legislative effect to the aims of the second commandment to love your neighbour as yourself for the love of God. We are all children of the same Father and therefore ought to treat each other as brothers.

It is a long distance from the old days about which I have heard in my own family. When immigrants went to the United States they saw signs on the factories saying "No Irish need apply" or "No Catholics need apply". I think every one of us in our own experiences has come across examples of prejudice either toward ourselves or toward others on account of race, religion or colour. I remember very well an example which occurred over 35 years ago, and I am glad to say that I took the part of a negro who was refused admission to a certain organization with which I was connected and in which all the others were white. I remember that I advocated that he should be allowed to enter.

I would also say that this legislation owes much to the influence of the trade unions and those who have been connected with the co-operative movement. We had today an appeal by the member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) on behalf of the co-operative movement addressed to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). I must say, having been connected with the co-operative movement for many years, that I believe one of the chief attractions to the movement for those who have joined has been the principle of universality, that everyone is entitled to join no matter what may be his creed, colour or race. That gives a feeling of brotherhood, and people work together. I believe it is one of the reasons for the success of the co-operative movement during the last hundred years. They have recognized universality as the first of their principles.

I agree with the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) that consideration should also be given to the inclusion in this legislation of a clause dealing with political discrimination. Although the minister may have used his influence to have inserted in government contracts a clause that no one shall be discriminated against on account of his political affiliations, I feel quite satisfied, from my own experience, that men have been debarred from employment on government jobs or jobs undertaken for the government by contractors, whose reputation is that they are supporters of the government; and such men have not been given employment. I think that in the committee stage consideration should be given to that question.

I should also like to state that I have received, as no doubt other hon. members have received, communications from women's organizations across the country, and especially from my own part of the country, asking for the inclusion in this bill of a clause dealing with discrimination on account of sex. I believe, and I have been informed by those in authority, that it is not suitable to have such a clause included in a bill of this kind; however, the hon. member for Hamilton West has on the order paper a bill which deals with this problem and which would provide equal pay for equal work regardless of sex.

I have nothing more to say except that I hope the function of this committee will be performed in perfect harmony, and that we shall have brought back to us a bill which is improved in every respect.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Speaker, in closing the debate I need only refer to one or two particular points that were made this afternoon.

First I would like to touch very briefly upon the point made by my hon. friend from Fort William (Mr. McIvor). I want to assure him that this bill will not, and I repeat "not", require our trade unions to accept persons who have proved their intention to propagate subversive activities in Canada, whatever the background of those people may be.

Mr. McIvor: Thank you.

Mr. Gregg: We can deal with that further if necessary when the bill comes back to the committee of the whole, but I want to make that point quite clear at the present time.

Equally briefly may I refer to the remarks made by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) in which he referred to political discrimination. Whatever one may say about political discrimination in general, in so far as my bill is concerned I want him to read section 3. That section sets out those undertakings and activities to which this bill will apply; and I am quite sure he would not want this government, or the Minister of Labour, to look into the activities of various firms who are free and independent and to dictate to them whether their employees should be supporters or non-supporters of the Liberals, Progressive Conservatives, or members of the C.C.F. or Social Credit parties.

On the other points he made, namely that sex, disability, age—and I would add disabled civilian workers—should be included here, I should like to ask him, between now and the time this bill goes before the standing committee, to consider whether or not that cannot be more effectively accomplished by sharpening up the placement services of our national employment service. For administrative purposes I should like to keep this bill as simple as possible, so we can get a background of experience in carrying its principle into effect. However, I leave that thought with my hon. friend.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I gained the impression that it was the general desire that this bill should go to the committee on industrial relations. I am in accord with that. In closing might I express my gratitude not only for the very kind words that were said in favour of the principle of the bill, but also for the very high standard of the debate in which the members took part this afternoon.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on industrial relations.

EMERGENCY GOLD MINING ASSISTANCE ACT

CHANGE IN DEFINITION OF RATE OF ASSISTANCE

Hon. Douglas Abbott (for the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys) moved the second reading of Bill No. 329, to amend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, with your permission and with the concurrence of my colleague, the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Prudham), who is unable to be present today, I should like to make a statement concerning the bill to amend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act which is before the house.

Hon. members will recall that on November 24 last I announced that the government would introduce legislation to increase the amount of assistance payable to the gold mining industry for 1953 gold production. I explained at that time that rising costs and other factors during the past year had further increased the special difficulties affecting the industry. These developments had placed a number of mines in a position where they might be compelled to close down. The government decided that some upward adjustment in the assistance payable under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act was desirable in order to help prevent the further closing of mines and the consequent hardship which this would cause to communities largely or wholly dependent upon them.

The Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act has been discussed many times in this house and hon. members are generally familiar with the formula by which assistance is calculated. In brief, the amount of assistance a mine receives depends both upon its costs of production and upon the number of ounces of gold it produces. The bill now before the house will broaden the formula for calculating the amount of assistance for the calendar year 1953 by changing the rate of assistance element in the formula. The act in its present form defines the rate of assistance as one-half of the amount by which the cost of production per ounce exceeds $22, with a maximum of $11.50. The proposed amendment will change this definition of the rate of assistance to one-half of the amount by which cost of production per ounce exceeds $18, with a maximum of $13 50. In effect, most mines eligible for assistance will receive an additional $2 for each ounce produced to which the rate of assistance applies.

No change will be made in the other component of the formula. The new rate will apply to the number of ounces of gold produced by the mine in 1953 in excess of base year production, or one-half of 1953 production, whichever is the larger. I would remind hon. members that the mines have a choice of 1948, 1949 or 1950 as base year for purposes of this calculation.

In submitting this amendment for the consideration of the house, I express the belief that it will be of material assistance to the industry generally in meeting its special difficulties, and that it will enable the continued operation of many mines in communities which are dependent upon them.

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): The brief statement made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) deals with the factual situation concerning the formula for assistance. In my opinion, however, the question on this act goes a great deal further than merely the production of gold and the salvation or the continuance of the gold mining industry in Canada. Vitally important as that is, this bill asks for an expenditure of money to assist in the production of gold. It must, therefore, be considered from two points. First and most important, is gold worth producing? Is this expenditure of money as a subsidy to one industry justified? The second question is, will this palliative preserve the Canadian gold industry?

The first question is the governing one, because if gold has no value to the Canadian economy we certainly should not be wasting manpower and material producing gold, nor should we be asking the Canadian taxpayer to spend this money on it. The question of the usefulness of gold depends almost entirely on its monetary purposes. Here the questions are, can gold help make currencies convertible, particularly the so-called soft currencies? Will freely convertible currencies aid world trade; and can Canada, a small country, do anything in a positive way to assist by her fiscal policy? In my opinion, the answer to those questions is yes. It is because of the importance of this problem which can be called world trade that I venture to take the time of this house to discuss the matter in some detail.

As was evident, and as I forecast last year when the present Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act was introduced, the cost of this legislation to the Canadian taxpayer is increasing. This bill is immediate and concrete evidence of that fact. The new proposals are a reversion to the old $18 per ounce cost from the present $22 basis, and the maintenance of the present cost bracket at which the assistance is paid by changing the maximum payment per ounce from $11.50 to $13.50. This means an increase in assistance of about $1 an ounce, as the minister said, on the ounces coming under the provisions of the bill. What this will cost is a matter of estimate, and depends upon production and a further rise in the cost of gold mining. I feel, however, that I would not be far wrong in hazarding the guess that it would be in the nature of $14 or $15 million for the current year.

Mr. Abbott: Not the increase?

Mr. Adamson: No, that is the total; that is what it would cost this year. I would be surprised if it did not cost a little more than that, with the increased cost of steel and other materials. I must repeat that the gold mining industry has never asked for a bonus, but only that their product be sold freely on the open market. Unfortunately, owing to deterioration in the industry and the continuing rise in the cost of mining, there are few gold mines in Canada today that could continue operation without this subsidy. In other words the great gold industry, which was last year the greatest producer in terms of dollars of all mineral industries, including oil, is now a creature of the federal government and beholden to it for its very existence. I repeat that the gold industry today is the creature of the federal government. This is the inevitable penalty—it is true of any industry in the world—when an industry abandons the open market economy and accepts subsidies from the government. If this bill has done nothing else, if that simple point can be got across to Canadian industry and Canadian mining, it may have justified itself. This was pointed out by myself and a few others, notably the Northern Miner, at the time the principle of bonusing the industry was introduced.

Gold, as far as Canada is concerned, has three main uses. The first use is as a metal of development. Today, when our frontiers are just opening up with regard to iron and uranium, we should look back and see how these deposits were found and where the development money in the first place came from. Steep Rock may be a vastly larger iron ore deposit than as yet we have any idea.

It may be so large, in fact, that it will actually exceed the great Mesabi iron range on which was built the United States industrial machine of the last half of the nineteenth century and the first half of the twentieth century. This range—and I shall call Steep Rock a range, for that is what it is—was discovered by the efforts of two men, Joe Errington and Don Hogarth; they with imagination and capital disclosed this vast asset. Their venture capital came largely from a gold mine which is now closed down at Little Long Lac.

The Labrador finds would have been impossible without the capital of men like Jules Timmins, which was in turn based on the Hollinger gold mine. The nickel finds at Lynn Lake were also discovered by men looking for gold. The Eldorado pitchblende uranium deposit was discovered because the gold deposits provided the funds for La Bine to continue his search. The new Frobisher exploration in the Yukon, as well as what appear to be amazing base metal discoveries by Hudson Bay Mining and Smelting Company, Ventures, Consolidated Smelters, Prospectors Airways and others, are in large part the result of men looking for gold which started, incidentally, in the tough, romantic days of the gold rush of 1898.

Shades of Robert W. Service and Dangerous Dan McGrew! Today there are, as far as I know, no active, straight gold explorations going on in Canada. Gold prospecting is a thing of the past. There is no surer way to close down the frontier than to destroy men's incentive to look for gold. This is the first penalty Canada suffers because of the belief that governments can manage currencies.

So much for the first value of gold to Canada; and I wish to give fair warning that if the Canadian frontier is to be pushed farther north, if we want new Steep Rocks, new Lynn Lakes, new Eldorados, new Labradors, we must have a prosperous gold industry to help us find them.

I come now to the second value of gold to Canada, and that is as a curb against internal inflation. No matter what the short-term situation may be, there is no real evidence that we have checked inflation. In fact there is concrete evidence to the contrary. The recent settlement of the railway dispute will unquestionably mean greater costs of transportation, and costs of transportation are written into every single thing that is bought or sold. If transportation becomes more expensive, the goods which are carried must also become more expensive. The recent 7 per cent increase in freight rates is, in my opinion, merely the start. The security of the people can never be guaranteed by government promises. It can never be guaranteed through pension plans, and it can never be guaranteed through any form of insurance, so long as the national currency has a constantly decreasing purchasing power.

I have pointed out from statistics of the Bank of Canada that the wholesale price index has shown an annual increase of about 5 to 7 per cent for approximately the past quarter of a century, or ever since the Bank of Canada was brought into being. The wholesale price index has risen, with only three exceptions, in every year since the bank was established. These three exceptions were the panic years prior to the outbreak of the last great war, and the readjustment brought about after the outbreak of the Korean war which, in the year 1951, brought about excessive buying and caused what is known as a high erratic in the graph. From the most recent information, the figures for 1953 will equal or even pass that of 1950, putting it somewhere well above the 220 mark. I gather that the February 15 figure for the wholesale price index was 220·9. With this continuous and continuing rise in the cost of wholesale goods, which is a reliable base index, there can be only one result; that is that the purchasing power of the Canadian dollar is continuously falling.

The fact that our budgets are balanced, the fact that our currency sells at a premium over the United States dollar, the fact that we have a favourable balance of payments in world trade, the fact that we have a good pattern of personal savings in the country, do not alter the fact that we also have inflation. With inflation no man is safe, and nothing the average man can do, irrespective of new and greater pension plans and higher and higher wages, of more and more social security, can prevent his eventual pauperization.

With the shorter working week, with the rise in direct and indirect taxation, and with a constantly lengthening life span, it is now impossible for any man who is not wealthy enough to amass common stocks or other equities, commercial properties or a productive agricultural plant, to retire with any degree of security whatsoever; and it certainly makes it almost impossible to provide for his family. This hits directly at the workingman, the man on an hourly wage. Unless we can prevent further destruction of the purchasing power of our currency, we are destroying his security, no matter what glib political promises we make about it and no matter what wages he may now be receiving. I contend, Mr. Speaker, that unless our currency can have a fixed value in gold we shall never be able to assure our retired and pensioned people adequate security.

I have discussed the question of inflation. There is, however, the other side of the coin, namely deflation, caused by the fantastic panic in men's minds over the possibility of peace. The communist propagandists must be having an absolute festival over the behaviour of the New York stock exchange, which has virtually panicked over the proposals put out by Moscow for peace. If ever the capitalist system handed the communists a heaven-sent piece of propaganda, Wall Street certainly has done it this time. I would like just to make one comment about this, and that is no country in the world will prosper by peace so much as Canada. The idea that it is profitable to tax ourselves at the rate of $2 billion a year to produce equipment and material the sole purpose of which is destruction and which in turn is destroyed itself after a very short life, is one of the strange mental processes of the present generation which historians may argue about for centuries to come.

If, however, we do have deflation leading to a depression and the panic fear drives frightened capital into rabbit holes, then as gold in the final analysis is the only real money, the paper value of currencies, stock prices, bond prices, commodity prices and, in fact, the price of everything else will be driven down by this action to a point where the ratio of gold to paper approximates the empirical equilibrium formula of about one to four. This will mean that security prices will decline about 80 per cent. I leave it to the imagination of members of the house as to what sort of depression that will bring about. Anyone who says today that the $35 price for gold is adequate is merely asking for this calamity to happen.

The third factor is, of course, international trade. Quite recently the president of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce stated that in point of view of gross value Canada was the third trading nation of the world. Whether this is correct or not, there can be little doubt that on a per capita basis we are far out in front. Therefore international trade means more to Canada than it does to any other country in the world, and a solution to the currency problem is more vital to us than anyone else. Canada must trade to exist, and any individual or organization who questions this is a voice from the past and a throwback to nineteenth century Whig colonialism.

In this regard I wish to mention specifically the Winnipeg Free Press which, for political reasons, has been trying to accuse the Conservative party of advocating trade restrictions. Let me say to this croaking voice from the past that were it not for high taxation and the cost of transportation many manufactured goods could be sold in Canada cheaper than in the United States. I have several instances in my own industrial constituency where subsidiaries of United States companies are making goods cheaper than their parent companies in the United States; but because of taxation and distribution costs the final cost is higher.

The question of trade, however, has little to do at the present time with tariffs. The chief stumbling block to world trade is the lack of convertibility of currencies, and that supreme evil, exchange control. I do not wish to be in any way critical of the United Kingdom government, and no doubt they honestly believe they are doing the right thing, but never in history has exchange control brought anything but ruin. Exchange control is a form of price fixing applied to money. The government attempts to fix the rate at which its nationals are allowed to buy its paper currency in terms of other currencies. The result of this is that, if the price fixed is too high, there is a shortage of other currency. It further creates a chronic excess of imports over exports, which has to be prevented by such measures as embargoes, quotas and absolute prohibition of imports. It diverts production into wrong channels by reducing relative incentives to export. It makes it more desirable to export to soft currency countries than to hard currency countries where there is greater competition. It encourages the continuance of internal inflation; it destroys the safety valve readings by which people can measure the extent of inflation and the degree of world confidence in the currency.

To say that there is a dollar shortage in the United Kingdom is to say that the pound has been pegged at too high a price, and to tacitly admit the error of the $2.80 pound. This I hope to show is wrong. The United Kingdom made two previous fantastic errors with regard to currency convertibility, and for the same reason; they tried to convert at too high a price.

In 1926 the gold standard was restored in England at the 1913 level of around 80 shillings an ounce, equivalent to our old $20.67 price. With a greatly inflated currency base, as well as an enormously increased national debt, there simply was not enough gold to go around at the old rate and, consequently, there was a run on the United Kingdom gold holdings, particularly by France. The United Kingdom lost gold so fast that she was driven off the gold standard in 1931 after the publication and the implications of the May report became understood.

In 1947 the United Kingdom again attempted convertibility at the overvalued rate of $4.03 United States to the pound. This was such an obvious mistake that it caused such a rapid loss of gold and dollars that the most drastic reduction in the price of the pound had to be taken in September, 1949, from $4.03 to $2.80. Whether these two moves, the return to the gold standard in 1926, or the $4.03 convertibility of 1947, were brought about by pride or for whatever reason, they were both fantastic mistakes. Consequently there is today in the United Kingdom an enormous public feeling against convertibility because of these two tragic experiences. It seems strange that a country whose whole life and prosperity were built on free trade should twice in less than a quarter of a century stray so far from the basic principle of free trade in connection with the most important article of all in connection with free trade, namely the national currency, the pound sterling.

Trying to make the pound convertible at an artificially arrived at price is just as ridiculous as trying to sell goods at a price away above the world market. The employment of exchange control, quotas, embargoes and all the other devilish devices of scarcity is the inevitable result. If a currency is to be convertible it must be convertible freely, and the price in terms of other currencies must be decided by the action of the market. Surely our own experience in Canada should be an example for all countries still using exchange control. And here may I say that I advocated, and this party advocated, a return to free convertibility of the Canadian dollar long before the government haltingly adopted it.

To peg a currency and employ control to keep it at that point is like using a fever thermometer which is stuck at 99 degrees. I realize, of course, there are extremely difficult situations in the United Kingdom, and that the problem of the sterling balance held in India and Egypt is a severe deterrent. It is, however, because I have faith in the United Kingdom that I am convinced that allowing the pound to find its own level on the world market would bring about not a decrease in its value compared with the United States dollar but an actual increase, and I am further convinced that if exchange control were done away with there would be a flow of capital into England rather than out of it.

Just the other day I talked to a leading British steel industrialist in the company of a United States banker. I asked them both if exchange control were abolished, did they think United States capital would flow into the denationalized, now privately-owned, steel industry and provide the capital which is apparently lacking within the United Kingdom itself. They both were of the opinion that this would be so and that once capital was allowed to move freely it would find work to do. Idle capital and idle gold benefit no one. Exchange control destroys the usefulness of both.

The sterilized hoards of gold, whether held by governments or by private individuals, do nobody any good; and it is the evil genius of the money managers, particularly in the central banks, which has brought this about. They were ardently encouraged by politicians of all parties who, by managing the currency, could show at least on paper a fictitious condition of prosperity. I ask anyone in this house what sort of prosperity we would be having in Canada if we had to go back to 1938 prices. It would not be national prosperity, it would be national bankruptcy.

It is in this regard that the sterilization of gold is doing so much harm. The world's currencies must have a common denominator, and that common denominator must be freely available to the holders of the world's currencies. In no other way can true international convertibility be brought about. To bury gold in a national fortress, in a private hoard in Tangier, in a bank in Paris or in an old sock under the bed is to destroy its power to help world trade.

I have great sympathy, however, for the man or woman who wishes to keep a personal holding of gold. The little man with his defenceless family who has been ruined through inflation from time to time has full realization that the only way in which he can protect his capital, amassed over the years by the exercise of thrift, which we are all taught is a sound virtue and the essence of good citizenship, is to change his paper currency into gold. With proper functioning, monetized holdings are not sterilized hoards in the ordinary sense but are rather the base on which sound paper currency is issued.

Many of the present critics of gold and some economists have overdone the danger of individual gold holdings. They go back to the fable of King Midas and forget that savings in the form of currency, insurance policies or bonds are subject to raids by governments through planned inflation.

The prime agency destroying the usefulness of gold and delaying free convertibility of currencies is the international monetary fund. It seems ironic that this body, set up primarily to bring about convertibility, has acted as the greatest deterrent to this and to world trade. The pattern of the operations of this organization is so sinister that some consideration of the bona fides of the personnel should be given. First of all, at the beginning of the international monetary fund at Bretton Woods there was a man called Harry Dexter White, who was reported to have changed his name from Weiss, and who at that time was assistant secretary to the United States treasury and a major framer of the international fund set-up. He was a friend of Alger Hiss and was charged with being a communist and slated to appear before the United States Senate committee. Unfortunately, however, he died before he could give any testimony.

The next communist to be associated with the international monetary fund was Frank Coe, who has been secretary for many years and has only recently been discharged. This man refused to answer charges before the United States senatorial committee as to his communist affiliations. Another man in the organization, Edward Posniak, apparently is still working for the fund. He was called by the committee, but as yet has neither refused to testify nor has he been before them.

Here are three men, two of them definitely known communists and the other under suspicion, who were key personnel in the international monetary fund. I do not say that the international monetary fund is a communist-dominated organization, but put yourself in the place of a communist with executive authority in that organization. What would the communists most wish to do? Surely they would have two objectives. The first would be as far as possible to impede world trade, particularly between the sterling and the dollar countries. The second would be to make ineffective a great United States asset, namely the $23 billion of gold held idle in the United States. Surely the fund, since its inception, has been a prime factor in preventing convertibility and has, through its restrictions, made it extremely difficult for non-dollar countries to buy in the United States. While world trade has shown great growth, it must be remembered that this growth is expressed in depreciated dollars and other currencies whose real purchasing power is now about a third or less of what it was prior to the war.

The other action of the international monetary fund, which is obvious, has been to prevent any use being made of $23 billion worth of gold held idle in Fort Knox. The slogan "Trade, not aid" will be nothing but a pious hope unless some method is found by which the present non-free or controlled currencies can be made freely convertible.

[Mr. Adamson.]

I am convinced, therefore, that long ere this Canada should have stood out against these trade-strangling regulations and demanded that the international monetary fund repeal them or else we should have withdrawn from the fund completely. I believe that just as our dollar, when allowed to go free, has maintained itself as the primary currency in the world, so too, had we the courage, could we have established ourselves as international bankers and made either Montreal or Toronto a world clearing house. It is likely that the United Kingdom will restore the free bullion market sometime in the future, and when this happens Canada will have lost a great opportunity, in fact a golden opportunity.

With the passing of every year the amount of monetary gold available decreases and thus makes international trade that much more difficult. It is estimated, even by figures published by the international monetary fund, that gold made available for monetary purposes runs a bad third behind gold for industry and gold for hoarding. Whether or not the figure for gold being absorbed into industry is a true figure, and does not represent at least in part gold going into hoards in the shape of jewelry, particularly in Asia, is an interesting question. However, the main point is that gold is not being used for monetary and trade purposes, which is what concerns us here.

The figures for gold going into national treasuries or to central banks show a rapid decline, both in total as well as in percentage of production. Prior to the war gold production ran at about a billion to a billion and a quarter dollars per annum based on the $35 United States price. It has shown a decline of about 20 to 25 per cent in the last ten years. From 1946 the international monetary fund has published the free world production, together with the amount of gold going to the central banks. The figures are interesting because they show this point quite clearly. The figures are as follows:

World Gold Production	million	Increase to Monetary Reserve million
1947	767	740
1948	785	390
1950	844	384
1952 (estimated)	825	330

Thus it is seen that in the years of the operation of the international monetary fund, gold going to useful purposes had declined from between 75 to 80 per cent of total production to an estimated 40 per cent for this year, or an actual 26 per cent in 1951. If there is anything which should damn the operation of the international monetary fund it is this decline in the availability of gold for monetary purposes.

Compare these figures with the situation in the ten year period prior to 1939, when the total world gold production was $11·3 billion and the increase in monetary holdings was $10·3 billion. This means that in that period 91 per cent of the total world current production went directly into monetary holdings and only 9 per cent, or approximately one billion ounces, went into industrial use and private holdings. I should like at this point to put a short table on the record which comes from the report of the bank for international settlements, showing the disposal of gold since the year 1946.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member permission?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Adamson: The table is as follows:

(All figures are millions of dollars (U.S.))

Year	Production	Inc. in official reserves	To individual uses	To private holdings	Total to other sources	Percentage of production
1946	763	350	280	133	413	54
1947	774	430	120	224	344	45
1948	798	380	170	248	418	52
1949	833	480	200	153	353	43
1950	858	410	210	288	448	52
1951	844	130	220	484	714	85
Total	4870	2180	1200	1490	2690	55

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Adamson: Mr. Speaker, just before the dinner adjournment I had put on Hansard the figures of the bank for international settlements giving the disposal of newly mined gold since the year 1946. As will be seen from the figures which the house gave me permission to table, they differ slightly from those of the international monetary fund, but I am quoting both authorities to show that while there is a difference in some of the figures the difference is slight, and they are both in agreement as to the main point at issue, which is that gold is not being monetized and therefore is not fulfilling its basic function. It is particularly significant that these figures show that 85 per cent of the 1951 production was lost to the central banks whereas prior to the war 91 per cent of gold production went into monetary reserves.

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): I should like to ask a question. I know that the minimum number necessary for a quorum are present, but I should like to know if it is according to the rules to have only two members of the opposition sitting in the house.

Mr. Speaker: If there are twenty members in the house there is a quorum.

Mr. Adamson: I think the opposition is much larger than two.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member must be referring only to the official opposition—

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): I thought you were with us.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It makes no difference which side of the house members are on. If there are twenty members in the house there is a quorum.

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): Thank you, sir.

Mr. Adamson: The answer to the question of the disposal of monetary gold is obviously that the controls on gold envisaged by the international monetary fund, which developed out of the Bretton Woods agreement, simply broke down. The demand for gold in the face of the world-wide planned or unplanned inflation was so great as to push aside the barriers. Virtually the sole remaining impact of the action of the international monetary fund in holding the price of gold at $35 U.S. per ounce is on the gold producers and the gold producing countries, by which Canada as the second greatest suffered. We are subsidizing the middleman and the brokers, and a great deal of our production does not go to our friends.

I come now to the question of price. Here I wish to take most violent disagreement with those people who say that a government, generally referring to the United States government, should raise the price of gold. In my opinion the United States government should do nothing of the sort and in fact cannot do anything more calculated to continue the present difficulties than to unilaterally raise the price of gold. The price of gold can only be determined by the action of the open market. What this will be, no man can say. The important thing, however, is not the price. The important thing is the stability of the price, and that can only be found by the free market. Unless gold can be bought, sold, exported or imported freely and without government restrictions of any kind whatever, it will not fulfil its function as a lubricant of trade or as a standard of value.

To say gold is worth so many dollars or so many pounds an ounce, without allowing the free play of the world market, is being dishonest unless at the same time the country which says that removes all restrictions from gold and allows anyone to obtain gold anywhere at any time and do anything he likes with it. That is a complete restoration of the full fixed gold standard. This, in my opinion, is an impossibility for a considerable period. There is some belief that the United States dollar is a gold currency. This is not so. The United States dollar, because the United States government prohibits its own nationals from owning gold, is not a gold currency and should not be so considered.

Coming now to the question of the United Kingdom, I fully realize that the United Kingdom and all the sterling area are extremely anxious for the United States to raise the price of gold, and it has been suggested that $52.50 an ounce should be the price. If, at the same time, the United States would return to the full true gold standard at this price the move might be logical. I believe that possibly it might be sound. Certainly it would be honest. However, it would be a very brave man or administration who would stake the future stability of the United States dollar on this price for gold. My own view is that it would be foolhardy to do so with a past record of many years of deficit financing on a national basis and a fantastically expanded national debt. This move may be made and I can only say that if it is I hope, although I doubt very much, that it will succeed.

There is a school of thought headed by a group of economists in New York advocating that the United States return to the gold standard at the present price of $35 an ounce. I have only one thing to say with regard to this, and that is that for the past five or six years the United States has been having an annual deficit of many billions of dollars and it is estimated that the legacy of the Truman administration will mean a deficit of no less than $10 billion this year in United States federal accounts. Unless the Eisenhower administration makes drastic cuts in expenditure, with a deficit of $10 billion, or a sum equal to nearly half the total gold hoard in the United States in one year, and with a series of deficits of very considerable size in the last ten years, how long does anyone think the hoard at Fort Knox would last if it were available at the $35 price? To talk about raising gold to $50 or $52 alone will not assist in the convertibility of currency. It may bring about a temporary stimulus, but we have been too prone to look for temporary stimulants in international trade and to believe that favourable figures for a month or so mean a reversal of the imbalance of world trade or an end to world inflation.

The price at which gold should be sold is the price men will pay for it in the truly free market. Prior to the war gold and platinum had approximately equal values. Platinum, which has remained free, is selling at about $100 an ounce. Platinum of course is a war metal with strategic value, and is therefore in demand not only as a precious metal but as a war metal, and possibly is an unreliable index with regard to gold. The purchasing power of the dollar, however, is considerably less than 50 per cent of the 1935-39 value. The price at which gold will be stabilized will probably have some bearing on this, and it may be that something in the nature of $70 to $100 an ounce will be the price at which it will finally be stabilized.

As I have said, the price is actually unimportant except to our Canadian gold mines. The important thing is that gold's usefulness as a trading medium shall be restored. Any attempt to peg it at any price without a full restoration of the gold standard at the same time is useless. Much as I believe that the return to the gold standard is necessary and desirable, it cannot take place unless it is brought about by the play of the free market.

While I have dealt in some detail with the use of gold—and let me say that if gold has no use we certainly should not be considering this measure—I have consequently discussed the international aspect of the subject. There are now two specific recommendations I would like to make to the government. They are: (1) The government should permit the sale of fine gold in bar or other form under these provisions. Without any other change this would automatically mean an increase in the price to the gold producers on the sale of this gold of from 30 to 50 cents per ounce, an important addition under present circumstances. (2) The government should announce its willingness to permit foreign purchasers of gold to store their gold for safekeeping in our banks, and should give assurance that if, as and when export of such gold is desired by the purchasers, exports permits will not be withheld. This would have the effect of opening up a restricted gold market in Canada immediately and would, I feel sure, have the effect of increasing the price at once to our struggling gold industry.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him expired at ten minutes past eight.

Mr. Knowles: Speaking in reply to a government measure he has unlimited time.

Mr. Adamson: Am I not speaking in reply to a government measure, and do I not have unlimited time?

Mr. Fleming: He is the first opposition speaker.

Mr. Adamson: I am the first opposition speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I did not hear the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre but in any event, as the hon. member knows, normally a member is entitled to a forty-minute speech. It had not occurred to me that the hon. member was the first member to speak in reply.

Mr. Adamson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Abbott: Is he enunciating official opposition policy or is he giving his own private view?

Mr. Adamson: I am enunciating policy. I wish to bring certain evidence to support my plea for a free gold market and its usefulness with regard to solving the problem of currency convertibility. My first witness is the monthly letter of the National City Bank of New York for January this year. I quote:

> On the continent, there is a growing feeling that the ultimate objective of convertibility must be achieved in terms of gold. To restore faith in paper money a number of governments on the continent have tightened up their spendings and money markets, raising interest rates and also the respect for money. Free gold markets have been permitted to develop in Paris and other centres. Government participation to stabilize free market prices of gold could be one path toward a de facto gold standard.
> In the past people have enjoyed the fullest degree of freedom and convenience in international intercourse when principal nations were on a full-fledged gold standard. Often when people talk about reintroducing gold into circulation they think of hoarding by individuals. Actually, in a nation that follows sound financial policies, hoarding is practised only by the most cautious individuals, willing to forsake interest rate return for an absolute degree of security. In such a nation the availability of gold for circulation is primarily of importance to foreign trade, travel and investment.
> This traditional use of gold was presumably in mind when the Republican party platform set out the aim of "a dollar on a fully convertible gold basis."

My second witness in favour of a free gold market is Professor Willard L. Thorpe, assistant secretary of state for economic affairs in the Eisenhower administration. In his article in Foreign Affairs of April, 1953, at page 414, he said:

> At least in theory the gold provided an automatic mechanism to correct disequilibrium through movement of gold from one country to another and consequent changes in relative price levels. Today price levels are the result of national fiscal policies rather than automatic adjustments. Somehow a force must be put to work which will bring about the results achieved by the gold standard. In other words convertibility in today's world will require international monetary management of some sort or other with national co-operation. It is a goal well worth striving for.

Later in discussing the international monetary fund, he said:

> Primary responsibility for matters in the monetary field lies in the international monetary fund, which is seriously handicapped by charter provisions limiting its operations. Since the international trade organization was stillborn, responsibility in the trade field has fallen to GATT. The United States membership rests on GATT's activity in the field of trade agreements and it has never received congressional approval.

I think the strange attitude of the United States with regard to the dairy industry, under the general agreement on tariffs and trade, is an indication of what we may expect on this matter. In 1950 the United States had a favourable trade balance of $5·2 billion and in 1951 a favourable trade balance of $5 billion. In the same years they gave away $4·7 billion and $5 billion respectively. Apparently it is the policy of the United States to have an enormous surplus of trade and to act as a creditor nation by giving away money, goods and material to balance it. That, apparently, is their policy; and what the American taxpayer may think of it, I do not know.

In conclusion I would like to quote as my third witness the report of the Bank of Canada concerning currency controls, and may I say in this regard that I commend this report to hon. members for its clarity and its forthright statements, two of which I shall give. The first is:

> More than seven years have now passed since the end of the war and it must be acknowledged that the world is still far from the goals of currency convertibility and non-discrimination; indeed, restrictions on trade and payments are in many cases more rather than less severe than they were some years ago.

The second quotation is:

> Major reliance in dealing with these difficulties has been placed on trade and currency controls which have, however, merely been able to suppress for a period the symptoms without eliminating the underlying causes of the exchange difficulties. Indeed, there seems little doubt that over a period of time the effect of these restrictions is to aggravate the exchange problem, since they encourage the uneconomic use of resources by providing shelter for inefficient production in protected markets and by rendering production for "hard currency" markets less profitable.

Nothing I have said in condemnation of currency controls goes farther than this. The question of gold is not an academic one. Its solution is fundamental to international trade, particularly trade between Canada and the sterling countries. It should be emphasized constantly that over half the trade of the world is still being done in sterling. The sterling markets are most important to us for agricultural produce because the sterling area is largely complementary to our agricultural economy, whereas the United States is competitive. Practically nothing is grown in Canada that is not grown in the United States. Depressed Canadian prices generally coincide with depressed United States prices.

If our agricultural produce is to find steady, continuous and adequate markets, a large part of them must be sold outside the North American continent. To do this we must find some way to enable non-North American countries to provide the machinery whereby convertibility of all currencies is free and open and not at the behest of any government. The solution, therefore, of this problem of gold and convertibility is more important than any other to the Canadian farmer. If our economy is going to be truly balanced, then we must strive for convertibility so we can sell freely in the sterling area and throughout the world.

My plea is that gold, because of its universal acceptance, has an essential part to play in making currencies convertible. My plea for a free market is because it would start setting up the machinery—I do not say that it is the whole answer—whereby we in Canada could provide the necessary means for true convertibility of currencies, and upon that depends our whole intercontinental trade.

Mr. Armand Dumas (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, those who are interested in gold mining, and more particularly those who are dependent upon the industry for their livelihood, welcome the amendment outlined in this bill. Since its promulgation in 1948 the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act has been amended from time to time, and it has proven to be of great help not only to the industry but also to the miners, the farmers and all those who have invested their savings in the gold mining communities and surrounding districts.

[Mr. Adamson.]

At no session of this parliament have I missed an opportunity of telling the house of the difficulties the gold mines have encountered. I have done everything I could to co-operate with the government and other members who have the betterment of the industry and the welfare of the gold mining communities and their inhabitants at heart. Every time I rose to say something on this subject, I did so for the sake of an industry which has played a great part in the opening up of northern Canada and the building of our national economy. I did it for the sake of those who have taken the risk of investing the necessary capital, whether in large or small amounts, for the development and bringing into production of new gold mines. I did my share of pleading for higher prices for gold, more particularly for the sake of the 22,000 Canadian miners, the breadwinners of 130,000 people living in some 30 mining communities across Canada.

I worked hard in this respect for the sake also of the small property owners who have invested more than $125 million in these communities. In my constituency of Villeneuve more than 50,000 people are directly dependent upon the mining industry, and another 25,000 are living on farms which would not be worth cultivating if it were not for the ready market which is being provided by this same industry. I am satisfied that in pleading the case of the gold mines I am working in the best interests of each and every person in the constituency of Villeneuve, whether he is a miner, a farmer, a storekeeper or a small property owner. In doing so, Mr. Speaker, I am satisfied that I am doing my duty, and you can rest assured that I intend to continue to do it.

While there have been many cross currents in the mining business lately, such as lower prices for gold, sharply lower prices for base metals, and so on, Canadian mining is already a great industry and its future is even more impressive. The progress realized in Canada during the past 10 years was dependent upon the development of the natural resources of the country, and mining has been spearheading much of the expansion that took place during that period. The discovery in Canada in recent years of some of the richest and largest mineral deposits so far found on this continent has given rise to a marked realignment of ideas as to Canada's mineral future. The present pace of mining operations throughout the country strongly supports the new conceptions that have been gained.

During the past six years, however, to our great disappointment, we have had to face the fact that the swing of the pendulum has been away from gold mining. The industry, though still the chief single contributor to Canada's mineral output, has been adversely affected since the war by rising costs and the fixed price for gold. In recognition of this, and in order to help the gold mining communities, in 1948 the government introduced the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act. Before the expiration of its original three-year term, the act was extended to 1951, and at the end of that year the present government announced its further extension for the years 1952 and 1953.

Without going into an elaborate analysis of the effects of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act, there can be no question but that it has enabled the majority of the gold operations to continue in production. This act really rescued the declining gold mining industry, and many producers owe their continued operation to this assistance. The Canadian mining communities have greatly benefited also from this measure.

However, a new development in the Canadian economy has impaired the usefulness of this measure. The appreciation of our dollar caused a sharp decline in the mint price for gold, so much so that during 1952 the gold mining industry has been reduced to a condition of acute crisis.

If any proof is needed of the current precarious position of the industry, the reading of last year's annual reports of the Canadian gold mining companies provides it. These reports reflect the seriousness of the situation: difficulties of meeting wage demands, higher prices for almost everything the individual gold mine has to buy, and the discouragingly low price for the final product. This last item is the direct result of the appreciation of the Canadian dollar in terms of United States funds.

In order to realize the damaging effect of this on the gold mines, one has only to compare the mint price of $38.05 in 1950 and $36.86 in 1951 to the very low price of $34.28 in 1952. At the last annual meeting of Hollinger Consolidated the president of the company had this to say:

> The serious drop in the face of rising costs of labour and supplies, will inevitably result in forcing closure of many of the gold mines, curtailment of development in others, as well as lessening of ore reserves. Another effect—and probably of equal consequence—will be the end of prospecting for the yellow metal.

The content of other reports discloses the same situation and gives the same warning. The year 1952 was definitely a rugged year for gold mining. Some mines have been forced to close down and others were being placed in a position where they might have to take the same step were it not for the amendments contained in this bill, and which were outlined in a statement made in the house last November by the Minister of Finance.

The government's interest in gold mining is evidenced by the assistance it provides, and the facts show that it has done and is doing a real job in keeping alive a considerable number of mines which otherwise would have had to close their doors. The sympathetic consideration received from this government is gratefully acknowledged by the producers, by the miners, by the mining communities and by all those who have some kind of interest in gold mining.

I wish to say again that the producers have always been aware of the willingness of the government to co-operate, and to this end they themselves have done everything possible to increase the efficiency of their operations in order to keep down costs. Extraordinary efforts have been made to stem the rising tide. Expansion of mill capacity, aggressive exploration programs and a high degree of mechanization have only partly offset the tightening squeeze. Every practicable method has been adopted to improve efficiency.

The miners are also doing their share in trying to help the situation. They understand that the gold mines are not in a position to increase wages and they are willing to co-operate by being patient and hoping that better days are not too far ahead. A large number of them remember the time of the depression in 1931 when the gold mines did not take advantage of the situation, but instead kept on paying the highest wage rates in the country. Our miners are working hard in order to produce more. In co-operation with management they are doing everything they can in order to keep costs down as much as possible.

Our gold miners do their jobs with care and ability, they are safety conscious; and on this subject I wish to mention that only two weeks ago the personnel of Canadian Malartic Gold Mines Limited won the John T. Ryan national awards for safety for the second year in succession. Last year's presentation of the trophies to the employees of Canadian Malartic was made by the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Prudham) on the occasion of his visit to the district. In 1950 the trophies were won by Sigma Mines of Val d'Or and in 1948 and 1949 they were awarded to two gold mines in Ontario. Everyone interested in the industry feels a glow of satisfaction that a gold mine has again won nation-wide recognition as the safest metalliferous mine in Canada. This is an outstanding record, and without the co-operation, interest and ability of the miners and surface employees of Canadian Malartic such a record could never have been won.

Obviously there is a limit to such process of increasing efficiency and improving methods of working. The time will come when there will have to be another readjustment of wage rates, and in view of this I want to point out again the urgent need to stabilize and if at all possible improve the prospects of the gold mining industry.

It is recognized that it is impossible for Canada, as a producer and seller of gold, to dictate a price to the buyers. It is also recognized that an increase in the official price of gold cannot be accomplished without the co-operation of the United States and that may not be easily obtained. However, we feel that if Canada is not to lose its gold mining industry and the communities dependent on it, a revaluation of gold is a vital necessity.

As a result of the present unrealistic price of gold the total world production is not very much more than 60 per cent of what it was before the war; and, moreover, a large percentage of the newly mined gold is passing into the hands of hoarders. Very few people realize that the total production of gold amounts to about only fifty cents per head per year in the west, and it takes very little public buying to eat that up. In a sense, the western people are being returned slowly but surely to the early days when gold was practically unknown, and when the monetary system was primitive.

We are not the only ones concerned with this problem. A rise in the price of gold would be beneficial not only to a few but to all the western world. The world productive invested capital has more than doubled during the past two decades. The economic production in many war-torn nations has, in monetary volume, increased as much as 40 per cent over pre-war. The costs of goods and services have also about doubled. In contrast, the dollar value of government gold has only increased a fraction as compared to the increase in dollar volume of international trade settlements.

With higher prices for commodities and an ever-growing volume in world trade, the balance of payments between countries has become an acute problem. As a consequence of this, trade has been restricted with some countries and unrealistic barter agreements have been made with others. Obviously an increase in the price of gold is the only solution to obtain proper balance of trade.

Increasingly lower production of the yellow metal and the loss of newly mined gold are serious matters, and they should be remedied. At this point I wish to quote from an article which appeared in the October 1952 issue of the Pre-Cambrian. It says:

> It is felt that the remarkable growth of populations, the tremendous increase of governmental financial responsibilities cannot be reconciled with the loss of new gold.
> Military defence of our way of life requires strong moneys, hence an ample supply of gold.
> There is little hope of bringing about a dishoarding of gold at the present price levels. The unproductive French attempt, by way of a gold-plated loan was dramatic evidence of this—it brought in one per cent of French private hoards.
> To activate gold production, to encourage dishoarding, to lessen private buying, and thus bring gold into the hands and uses of the governments there is one procedure open. It is the simple one of raising the official price, uniformly.
> Leading economists feel that a higher statutory price will not induce inflation. It will recognize the inflation which we already have. It will bring uniformity to the economies of the western world.

There is another school of thought concerning the revaluation of gold, and that is raising the price of only the newly mined gold. However impractical this may seem to be, I wish to quote from an article by Patrick Maitland writing from London in the Toronto Telegram. In part Mr. Maitland said this:

> One difficulty facing the British negotiators is the strongly deflationist attitude of Mr. Humphrey, the new secretary of the treasury. He is anxious not to be caught giving anything away, and his entire outlook is hostile to one particular remedy for the dollar crisis agreed upon at the commonwealth economic conference last November. The remedy is to raise the price of gold.
> A report published in New York last summer by a group of former Marshall aid officials in London insisted that the price of gold was a cardinal feature of the whole problem.
> They pointed out that before the war the sterling area only balanced its trade with the dollar area thanks to sales of newly mined gold at the rate of $500 million a year.
> These sales, concealing the true trading position, meant that even then there was a dollar problem. For newly mined gold apart, the sterling area would have been in deficit with the dollar area, despite the flow of income from foreign investments.
> However, it was a significant enough feature of the relations between the two areas to be singled out by the former Marshall aid mission in London.
> The implied conclusion was: Since the price of every other commodity on the world market had risen meantime, a comparable rise in the price of newly mined gold would go far to correcting the present state of unbalance.

It is fully appreciated that this question of raising the price of gold is a highly complex problem concerning which the Canadian government is not in a position to take entirely independent action. However, during the last five or six years, on different occasions, Canada has pressed upon the monetary fund the difficulties encountered by the Canadian gold mines. We are also aware that Canada supported a request for a higher price for gold during the commonwealth conference of last fall. The government is to be congratulated.

Canada and other countries of the commonwealth are the principal gold producers of the world, and they would certainly derive advantages from an increase in the price of gold. For that reason it is to be hoped that this very important question was included in the recent talks in Washington. We are hopeful that an increased price will result from these negotiations. When interest in gold revives, as I am confident it will, Canada will have a much better chance of turning up new base metal mines as well as new gold mines. It was the search for gold that turned up 90 per cent of the base metal mines we now have. This is the kind of history that could repeat itself.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say only a few words. I must say I listened with considerable interest to the remarks of the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson). I was particularly interested when he said that he was speaking for the Progressive Conservative party, because I have had a number of inquiries as to the program of that party concerning—

Mr. Adamson: I did not say that.

Mr. Fleming: No, he did not say that.

Mr. Herridge: Then if I am wrong I apologize. But I understood the hon. member to say that he was speaking for his party.

Mr. Fraser: No, he did not say that.

Mr. Adamson: Mr. Speaker, the rules of the house should be properly understood. An hon. member in the opposition speaking immediately after the introduction of a government measure is allowed unlimited time. That is the rule of the house I was invoking. I think you will realize, Mr. Speaker, that I was quite correct.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps I could clarify the position by saying that it was by inadvertence I rose and indicated to the hon. member that his time had expired. It had not occurred to me that he was the first member speaking in reply to the motion sponsored by the minister.

While I would not wish to elaborate upon the matter at this time, perhaps in order to clarify what has been said about standing order 37 hon. members would refer to page 797 of Beauchesne's third edition, and the ruling of Mr. Speaker Lemieux, where he said that to speak in reply one is bound to argue against the measure.

Therefore the meaning of standing order 37 is not exactly what the hon. member for York West had just indicated. The Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition may always speak more than forty minutes. A minister moving a government order always has more than forty minutes. An hon. member moving a vote of want of confidence has more than forty minutes. An hon. member speaking in reply to a government order moved by a minister has more than forty minutes, if he does speak in reply; and if he is speaking in reply he must be arguing against the measure.

Hon. members will recall that I had to give a ruling along these lines when the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) spoke immediately after the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier), on a motion having to do with the Canadian National Railways. As he was not arguing against the measure, and therefore was not speaking in reply, I denied him the right to speak for more than forty minutes.

The hon. member may continue.

Mr. Herridge: I apologize if I misunderstood the situation. I understand now that the hon. member was not speaking for the Progressive Conservative party.

Mr. Adamson: You can understand anything you like.

Mr. Herridge: This group supports this measure because it does seriously affect the lives of a large number of Canadians under present conditions and circumstances. As the hon. member who preceded me said, it affects the lives of, I believe, some 130,000, including miners and their dependents. It also affects those who service the various mining communities and those who make a living by supplying agricultural and other products to those communities. We support it because of the large investment in homes in the gold mining communities. We support it because of the large investment in business premises and service facilities. We support it because of the municipal, provincial and federal government expenditures that have been made. On those grounds, and as a temporary palliative to meet a peculiar present situation, this group supports this measure.

I understand that the amount of the subsidy paid out last year in the way of gold mining assistance was something in the neighbourhood of $10 million. On that basis the gold mining industry, in relation to the size of other industries, is the most highly subsidized industry in Canada. I think that is a correct statement.

Before concluding my remarks I should like to point out that here is a well-established industry which finds it necessary to come to the government for assistance under these circumstances and conditions. We hear much about free enterprise from hon. members, but in reality it does not exist today when you have an industry like this which cannot survive unless the government provides some assistance. That is why we consider that this is simply another illustration of the fact that those who insist that we live in a free enterprise country are speaking in the terms of mid-Victorian days.

We of this group want to add briefly to what we have to say in support of this measure at this time that if the government would subsidize agricultural production to the same extent, to the same percentage and degree as it finds it necessary to subsidize the gold mining industry at this time, we would have stability in agriculture. We suggest that if it can be done for the gold mining industry, it can be done for the agricultural industry.

There is a great need for houses in Canada at this time. For years we in this group have urged the government to subsidize low rental housing. We say that if we can subsidize the gold mining industry—and we support the measure—we can subsidize low rental housing and do something about having the homes built that are necessary at this time.

With these brief remarks I once again emphasize the fact that as a particularly necessary palliative of capitalism under present circumstances we endorse and support this measure.

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): There are just a few words I want to say on this measure. I notice in the report on the administration of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act for March, 1952, that the purpose of the act is stated in these words:

> It was designed primarily to assist the high-cost or marginal mines to continue in operation over a difficult period and to maintain their dependent communities.

The question one is bound to ask is how many communities are we going to maintain in Canada and at how great a cost are we prepared to maintain them? For how many years are we going to continue to maintain them? I recall that last year when we were discussing the question of selling wheat in the domestic market in Canada at the world market price rather than the international wheat agreement price, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) stated that he was not prepared to tax the people of Canada for the purpose of subsidizing the wheat grower. Apparently we are quite prepared to subsidize the gold mining industry in order to make it possible for them to meet their costs of production. When it is suggested that we subsidize certain other industries it is said that we would not be justified in taxing the people of Canada in order to do it.

I was quite interested in an editorial which appeared in a good Conservative paper, the Calgary Herald, dealing with this question of gold. I draw it especially to the attention of the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson). This was published in the issue of November 8, 1952, and reads:

> How Much is Gold Really Worth?
> According to Mr. Drew, the Leader of the Opposition in Ottawa, it is an "extraordinary course" for Canadian gold to be sold to the United States at "less than the cost of production". Mr. Drew argues that this is, in effect, a subsidy paid by Canada to the United States government.
> It is natural, we suppose, for a politician with an Ontario background to be concerned over the price of gold. Gold mining and the Toronto financial market have always been closely interlinked. It is true, also, that the gold mining industry provides a considerable amount of employment in northern Ontario. But we have never really been able to see why the business of mining gold should get such special treatment from governments which do not seem to care particularly whether the Alberta coal mining industry, say, goes under from lack of markets.
> Except in the monetary sense, gold is not a particularly useful commodity. It makes pretty jewellery, tarnish-proof wedding rings (which do not, however, wear very well unless the gold is subjected to considerable adulteration), satisfactory fountain-pen nibs and gilt for the sign on lawyers' office doors. Beyond this, it is hard to think of any purely functional uses for gold. The world, in fact, could probably survive very nicely if all the gold in it disappeared tomorrow morning.
> The only factor which makes it worth while mining gold at all is the fact that governments are prepared to accept it as a medium of exchange. In the most literal sense it is true, today, to say that gold is as good as dollars—at any rate so long as the United States government, with its vaults at Fort Knox already bulging with the stuff, is prepared to go on importing it, in unlimited quantities, at 35 American dollars per fine ounce. But if both the U.S. and British governments announced tomorrow that they were no longer prepared to accept gold at any price, every gold mine in the world would shut down, since the supply of industrial gold is already fully assured for thousands of years.
> Gold, in fact, is a colossal (though quite useful) fiction. As a utilitarian metal, its values are restricted. The only reason it is worth even as much as $35 U.S. an ounce is that this is what the U.S. government is prepared to pay. We should probably be grateful to Uncle Sam for offering to pay as much as he does.

I agree wholeheartedly with that argument. That was a good Tory paper, the Calgary Herald.

Mr. Hees: That is not a Tory paper.

An hon. Member: Where do you come from?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): It is an independent.

Mr. Hees: Very independent.

Mr. Quelch: I would point out that gold mining is the most highly subsidized industry in Canada today. Last year the hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Studer) criticized a member of the C.C.F. for suggesting that the subsidy paid to gold mines was greater than that paid to the wheat growers. He referred to the fact that during the past ten years agriculture had received something in the neighbourhood of $900 million, taking into consideration all payments such as those for drought relief, freight assistance, P.F.R.A., foot-and-mouth disease and various consumer subsidies.

I would point out that the amount paid to the gold mining industry is very much greater than the amount paid to agriculture, because if the subsidies to agriculture were in proportion to those paid to the gold mining industry, on the basis of population, in those ten years agriculture would have received $4,000 million instead of $900 million. I say that because on April 6, 1951, the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Prudham) is reported on page 1705 of Hansard, as having said:

> The gold mines now in operation give employment to about 23,000 people.

Mind you, only about 23,000 people. Farm workers, on the other hand, according to the statistical review for March, 1951, totalled around one million. In other words, gold mine workers are less than one-fortieth of the total number of workers in agriculture. Therefore on the basis of $40 million for an industry employing 23,000 workers over a period of four years, the farming industry with a million workers should have received over $4 billion over a period of ten years to be on a parity, instead of receiving just $900 million. Again I say, how many communities are you going to subsidize, how far are you prepared to subsidize them and for how long are you prepared to go on doing it?

When I recall the kind of discussions that took place in the house at the time the $65 million for the wheat growers was being voted, especially the comments of one or two of the Conservative members, I am surprised that they should be so enthusiastic about subsidizing the gold mines. On the other hand, we realize that apparently it is government policy to encourage the production of gold in this country. In view of the fact that it is government policy to encourage the production of gold, and at the same time the price of gold having been tied down as a result of the Bretton Woods agreement to which this government subscribed; and in view of the fact that the price of gold has been tied down to a level far below the present cost of production, then I say to that extent the gold miners of Canada are entitled to demand a subsidy.

If it is the wish of the government that gold be produced in Canada, and if at the same time the government will not allow the gold mine operators to get a fair price for their product, then I think they are justified in asking for a subsidy. But we suggest that a far better solution to the whole question would be to divorce gold entirely from our monetary system. I know that is the case internally, but it is not true so far as the Bretton Woods agreement is concerned. If you divorce gold entirely from your monetary system, both nationally and internationally, then you can establish a free market for gold and let it sell for whatever it is worth.

Of course if that were the case, if it was divorced entirely from national and international trade, in all probability the price of gold would fall to a very low level and no doubt many gold mines would very shortly close down. But on the other hand let us not forget that today there is a shortage of labour. There is a shortage of mining engineers and skilled workers, and if the gold mines had to close down there would be employment for these workers in other industries. After all, of what use is it to employ thousands of men throughout the world producing something that has little or no value, merely in order to maintain a myth? The idea of gold as a true monetary yardstick is just a myth, and even that Conservative paper, the Calgary Herald, realizes that the true worth of gold is pretty low.

However, in view of the fact that we have tied down the price of gold under the Bretton Woods agreement, and in view of the fact that the government is encouraging the mines to continue in operation, we feel that the gold mine workers are justified in asking for a price that will return the cost of production. Therefore on that basis we will support the measure.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I have spoken on this measure annually in recent years when it has come up for consideration in the house. The views I expressed on those occasions are unchanged. I think whatever may have happened in the meantime has gone to vindicate the views I sought to express before. Accordingly, I shall be very brief tonight in what I have to say on this bill to extend the effect of the act and to modify the basis upon which aid is to be provided under its terms.

I wish to say first that the way in which the government has brought the bill to the house is very disappointing. We have been given no essential information whatever with respect to the operation of the act since the last report on its operation was issued on March 31, 1952. It is noteworthy that when the resolution preceding the introduction of the bill came before the house on April 2 there was no discussion, of course, in the house, and there was virtually none in the committee. The reason there was no discussion in the committee and no questions were asked with a view to eliciting the information that ought to be before the house with respect to a measure of this kind is that certain members at any rate were given the assurance by the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Prudham) that he would supply them with the information.

Mr. Abbott: That can be given as soon as we are in committee. I have it all here.

Mr. Fleming: I wish to comment upon that. The arrangement I referred to, which was designed to facilitate the business of the house, was entered into at that time and the promise then made was not fulfilled. That information should have been available to members before the bill was called for second reading. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) has said that the information will be available in committee.

Mr. Abbott: What is the purpose of committee?

Mr. Fleming: Very well, Mr. Speaker, but members ought to have that information before second reading.

Mr. Abbott: Why?

Mr. Fleming: That, as I understand it, is the purpose of having a resolution stage, with consideration of the resolution in committee, on any money bill before the bill is introduced and before second reading is moved.

Mr. Abbott: Wrong again.

Mr. Fleming: The Minister of Finance could have given that information to the house this afternoon, but he contented himself merely with practically reading the explanatory notes in the bill. Therefore we come to the second reading without any recent information with respect to the operation of the act.

The situation, Mr. Speaker, is simply that a grave crisis does exist in the gold mining industry. The statement made by the Minister of Finance on November 24, 1952, as found at page 16 of Hansard, recognized the critical condition that exists today because he felt it necessary at that time to announce government policy in advance of the year 1953, even though the measure of assistance to the industry was not to begin until the calendar year 1953.

As to the bill and the proposal to continue the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act, may I say that of course we in this part of the house accept the bill. It is better than nothing. It is absolutely necessary for even the minimum, bare survival of the gold mining industry; but having said that for the measure, that is virtually all that can be said for it. It is simply a survival measure in the light of a serious crisis. Having regard to what has just been said by members who have immediately preceded me, I can share with them the regret that the taxpayers should be called upon to provide a subsidy for this industry; but the fact of the matter is, Mr. Speaker, that unless this subsidy is provided the industry cannot survive. Its plight is just as serious as that today.

The subsidy was not asked for by the gold mining industry. They asked for a solution of their problem, a problem largely created by government action. That is a factor which I think the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) failed to recognize in his statement tonight.

Mr. Quelch: But the Conservative party supported that action.

Mr. Fleming: It is a situation created by government action.

Mr. Quelch: And supported by the Conservative party.

Mr. Fleming: This crisis having been created by the government, it is necessary in the existing situation either to let the gold mining industry die or at least do this much for it.

Mr. Quelch: Do not forget that the Conservative party supported the Bretton Woods agreement which tied the price of gold.

Mr. Fleming: The hon. member can take what satisfaction he likes out of crowing now—

Mr. Quelch: It is a fact.

Mr. Fleming: —over the position he took on Bretton Woods in 1945. In recent years I think I have been as critical of the way the international monetary fund has worked out as any other member of the house, but I do not credit myself with the ability to have foreseen in 1945 all the trends that have occurred in the world since with respect to trade, with respect to monetary movements and also with respect to Russia's challenge to world peace. I do not think any of us foresaw in 1945 what we have seen in the unhappy years since.

Mr. Low: We saw that Russia would not join then.

Mr. Fleming: We did not see that at all at the time the measure was under discussion.

Mr. Low: We told you so.

Mr. Fleming: My hon. friend can take what comfort he likes out of saying he told us so. The fact of the matter is that I think the majority of the members of the house acted reasonably with respect to the measure in 1945. I am not prepared to go back now and be critical of the decision that was taken then.

Mr. Low: You don't have to be critical.

Mr. Fleming: I did not criticize the government over the decision any more than I criticized those in the house who have not supported the government in general but nevertheless supported its legislation on the Bretton Woods agreement and international monetary fund. One can say that and yet, at the same time, express regret that the international monetary fund has not been made effective to serve the purpose for which it was designed. It has come in these years increasingly under the domination of United States fiscal policy, and that seems to me the reason the international monetary fund has failed to live up to the legitimate hopes held for it in 1945.

Mr. Low: That was the reason we opposed it in the first place.

Mr. Fleming: Now, sir, I mentioned that the industry is languishing. Indeed, there are so many mines that are just being kept barely in production today that I am glad the minister has recognized the situation in the change he is proposing in the formula.

We hear members in this house talk so glibly about gold having no value and of the ability of the world to get on as well without gold as with it. I am afraid they have forgotten a lot of history. They have forgotten what gold has meant to this country as an important element in our international trade. They have forgotten what gold production in this country has meant in former years in meeting deficits that this country has had in its commodity trading account. They have forgotten what this gold mining industry has meant in the development of the great northern regions of this country, not only northern Ontario but northern Quebec, northern Manitoba, Yukon and the territories and other areas of the country as well. They have forgotten also what the prosperity of the gold mining industry in the days of the depression meant to the survival of the economy of this country, when days were very dark indeed. They have forgotten a good many other things which one could mention at a time like this.

The fact of the matter is that unless a measure of relief is brought to the gold mining industry right now those communities in the northern parts of several provinces in this country simply cannot survive. Those communities are dependent on the mines and cannot exist without them. Those communities have been experiencing great difficulties for some years past, as the gold mining industry has struggled with the problem of a price fixed by government action on the one hand and rising costs on the other. Yes, Mr. Speaker, it would be well to recall the debt that the economy of this country and its development owe to the gold mining industry. We have heard talk tonight about free enterprise. The reason free enterprise cannot operate freely today with respect to the gold mining industry, Mr. Speaker, is that government interference has prevented it. There is no play there for the force of free enterprise principally because it is an industry that is working under the ceiling of a price fixed for its product by government. It is not a freely negotiated price in the ordinary sense at all; it is a price fixed by the government.

Mr. Abbott: And always has been.

Mr. Fleming: Not in the same way as it is now; and the minister is not going to argue that point. What we are working under today with respect to newly mined monetary gold is, in fact, a price fixed by the United States government and concurred in, broadly speaking, by the international monetary fund. That is the situation, and it is the situation that has existed since the war.

Now, sir, we in this part of the house have criticized the Canadian government before for not taking more effective action to meet the essential, deep-seated problem of the gold mining industry. While I have said that this measure is necessary today for the survival of the industry, it cannot be regarded as anything more than an artificial, temporary, stopgap, hand-to-mouth palliative. It is certainly no solution and, as the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Dumas) very properly said tonight—and he speaks with knowledge of the problem—there must be a substantial increase in the price of gold if we are going to deliver the gold mining industry of this country from the threat of extinction, and relieve the taxpayer from being called upon to provide aid in stopgap measures of this kind.

Now, Mr. Speaker, since this measure was last under debate in May 1952, three things have happened which have a bearing upon the problem of finding a proper solution for the plight of the gold mining industry. The first was the prime ministers' conference which met in London last fall. There it became clearly recognized, if one may follow the press—although the statements which emanated from the conference were very meagre—that on balance the British commonwealth of nations has a very deep-seated interest in a higher price for gold. South Africa in relation to its total economy probably has the biggest interest, and Canada has a very great interest indeed. There became apparent a unity of interest among the nations of the commonwealth with respect to this question, a unity that had not been fully apparent or fully recognized previously.

The second factor, Mr. Speaker, was the change of administration in the United States. Now it is not, I am sure, for any one of us to offer criticism of the policy of the United States. That is a matter for the proper authorities of the United States; nevertheless we are concerned about the effect of that policy on Canadian interests. The Republican party in the election platform which it wrote in July, 1952, included this among its monetary policies:

> To restore a domestic economy, and to use our influence for a world economy, of such stability as will permit the realization of our aim of a dollar on a fully convertible gold basis.

Of course that did not say explicitly that the Republican party was committing itself to a higher price for gold.

Mr. Abbott: I'll say it doesn't.

Mr. Fleming: No, but at any rate it does recognize the importance of gold in establishing stable monetary policies in the world. There can be no answer, it seems to me, to that interpretation of these words:

> . . . and to use our influence for a world economy, of such stability as will permit the realization of our aim of a dollar on a fully convertible gold basis.

Whatever hopes may have been conjured up by the statement that the United States government would change the policy that had been previously in effect when Mr. Snyder was secretary of the treasury, certainly there has as yet been no indication that the United States government is prepared to enunciate any policy looking to an increase in the price of gold. But, Mr. Speaker, it is the duty of the Canadian government to put such representations as it can before the government of the United States, and before the international monetary fund, as will represent the total exertion of all the influence the government of Canada does command, with a view to bringing about an increase in the price of gold.

The United States government is holding something like $22 billion of gold of which, we are told, $16 billion are needed for currency backing. There have been rumours that even in the face of representations from the British government and from the governments of the commonwealth countries, the United States government hesitates to increase the price of gold because they have a haunting fear that such action might somehow help Russia. Well, Mr. Speaker, there is so little that has come on this subject from really authoritative sources that I do not intend to speculate on the subject. I do say that our interest as a country, as a leading gold producer, lies with or in the direction of an increase in the price of gold; and that is also where the interest of the British commonwealth lies.

The third factor of the three I mentioned as having occurred since May last is, of course, the conference Mr. Butler held recently in Washington with Mr. Humphrey, the United States secretary of the treasury. Again there has been little by way of announcement from that conference to indicate what action, if any, may be expected to emanate from Washington with respect to the price of gold as an aid to the furtherance of the "trade, not aid" policy. The Canadian government must have some knowledge of this subject, Mr. Speaker. I think they must have been in consultation in relation to these negotiations at Washington. They must have discussed this matter with Mr. Butler when he was recently in Ottawa. To the extent to which he is free to communicate the information to the house, may I say to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) that I hope he will make as much information as possible available to the house on this important subject.

On the subject of convertibility, Mr. Speaker, let us recognize that gold has an indispensable part to play in convertibility, and in shaping plans for restoring convertibility of currencies throughout the trading world. There is not very much to warrant our being satisfied or complacent until we shall have brought about at least a substantial measure of convertibility of currencies which does not exist today among the great trading nations of the world.

This is an urgent matter. On September 17, the association of Canadian provincial mines ministers asked the federal government to raise the price of gold. From a Canadian Press dispatch which was issued from their conference in Quebec, we read this:

> The association of Canadian provincial mines ministers decided today to ask the federal government to raise the price of gold. The step was in one of three resolutions adopted at closing sessions of the ninth annual convention of the association which asked aid from the federal government to the gold mining industry.
> The resolutions were: (1) that the government take every step possible to increase the official price of gold; (2) fine gold be given freer circulation and wider ownership; (3) government assistance be more regulated than provided under the law of federal emergency assistance to gold mines.

Mr. Speaker, that resolution comes from the provincial ministers of mines. They are speaking from knowledge of the problem with which they have firsthand contact, not only the problem of keeping the gold mining industry alive but also the well-being of the communities that are directly dependent upon the gold mining industry for their survival. Gold has lost none of its importance as a medium of international exchange. If it had, as was suggested by one hon. member tonight, why is it that every country in the world, including Russia, is trying to obtain gold? If any country's internal policy might be thought to be designed to eliminate any necessity for gold as a medium of exchange, one would have thought surely it was Russia, and yet Russia is seeking gold. The fact of the matter is that gold is, as it has been for centuries, an indispensable element in international exchange.

This measure is necessary, but it is no solution. It is at best an artificial, temporary, stopgap, hand-to-mouth palliative. What is needed in the national interest is a solution.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Rate of assistance.

Mr. Fleming: Is the minister going to make a statement?

Mr. Abbott: Is there any special information my hon. friend wants? The last report that has been tabled is the report for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1952. This gave the number of mines receiving assistance during that period and the preceding period, and pointed out that there were 74 auriferous gold mines and 22 placer mines receiving assistance. There were 13 on the free market in 1952. There are only 5 mines selling on the free market now, and 8 have gone back under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act after selling on the free market.

The estimated cost of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act in 1952—the accounts are not yet completed—is $10·8 million. For 1953 it is estimated that the new formula for mines which received aid in 1952 will involve an additional $3 million, and for the 8 mines returned to the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act after selling on the free market in 1952, an additional $2 million. This will mean a total of an additional $5 million, so my friend the hon. member for York West was about right when he suggested this new formula would cost about $14 or $15 million. These figures would indicate that it will be about $15·8 million, or somewhere between $15 and $16 million. The payments will not all be made in 1953 or perhaps even in the fiscal year 1953-54, because of the time lag in assessing claims.

I pointed out that the additional $5 million is not all due to the amendment which the house is now considering. Approximately $2 million is due to the fact that 8 mines have found the free market less profitable than assistance under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act. Only 5 mines, as I say, are now selling on the free market compared with 13 in 1952. The total sales are estimated at 500,000 ounces in 1953, compared with 1 million ounces in 1952. The current free market price is $36.75 U.S., or about $36 Canadian, and that has remained substantially the same during the past year.

The following summary of production may be of interest. These are estimates, and they are in thousands of ounces. For 1952 mines under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act, 2,970; mines opting for the free market, 1,000; base metal mines production of gold, which is all sold on the free market of course, 530. The estimated total production, 4,500 thousand ounces. We estimate the same production for 1953, but the distribution will be different. It is estimated that 3,470 will be eligible for emergency gold mining assistance; 500 only for mines opting for the free market, and the same 530 for the base metal mines.

Mr. Fleming: I thank the minister for the information he has given. Is it any part of the policy of the Canadian government to seek an increase in the price of gold?

Mr. Abbott: I have repeatedly stated in this house, Mr. Chairman, that the Canadian government, as the second largest gold producer in the world, would be delighted if the price of gold were increased. If my hon. friend is asking, as I think he is, that the United States increase the price of gold, in other words increase the gold content in the United States dollar, then of course what he and others are suggesting is really the devaluation of the United States dollar. The gold content of the United States dollar is established by an act of congress, just as the gold content of our dollar used to be established by act of parliament. What he is suggesting when he suggests that the price of gold be increased is that the United States congress should increase the gold content of the United States dollar; and that, in effect, is devaluation of the United States dollar.

Obviously, this would be advantageous to Canada, as a large gold producer, just as it would be advantageous to South Africa and other gold producing countries. But that is essentially a matter of domestic policy in the United States.

Mr. Low: What would it do to your foreign exchange fund?

Mr. Abbott: I do not know. I suppose the book value of our holdings of gold would be increased, and so would the value of the gold reserves of the United Kingdom and of the other countries. The point I want to make is that of course Canada is in favour of an increased price for gold. Why should we not be? But when we are talking about it we are talking about an increase in the gold content of the United States dollar, and we are saying that it would be a good thing for us if the United States would devalue its dollar. That is all we are doing, and if anybody suggests that I should stand up in the house and advocate that I will tell them I am not going to do it.

Mr. Fleming: Will the minister then confine himself to what I think he acknowledged to be his proper function in relation to Canadian policy, and tell us what the Canadian representatives at the international monetary fund have been instructed to do or say on this subject within the last year or two at the meetings.

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend I hope appreciates that the international monetary fund does not fix the price of gold. The international monetary fund agreement provides that the countries that are members should fix a parity for their currencies, and that it should be in terms either of gold or of the United States dollar. We did have a fixed parity for a time, and we fixed it in terms of the United States dollar, which in fact was fixing it in terms of gold, because the United States dollar is fixed in terms of gold. But for reasons which I explained to the house some time ago we found it necessary to withdraw from a fixed parity for our dollar, and at the present time there is no parity.

The international monetary fund, as I have explained, does not fix the price of gold. As I have said in this house time and time again, in fact the value of gold for monetary purposes is determined by the country which holds the largest quantity of monetary gold, and which fixes its currency in terms of gold. That country is willing to take unlimited quantities of gold at $35 an ounce in exchange for United States goods and services. That is what fixes the monetary price of gold; and this free market has developed just exactly as I expected it would, and just exactly as I have told the house it would. Any substantial quantity of gold which is thrown on this so-called free market simply has the effect of lowering the price. South Africa deliberately rations the amount of gold that it will sell on this free market at, I think, 40 per cent of its production; and even that quantity of gold being put on the market has had the effect of lowering the price.

Mr. Fleming: The minister is aware that South Africa rationed the sale of newly mined gold on the free market even before the action taken by the international monetary fund in September, 1951.

Mr. Abbott: The international monetary fund did not take any action at all. South Africa did it entirely independently of the international monetary fund. I think we should not confuse this question of the price of gold with the international monetary fund agreement, because they are not really related.

Mr. Fleming: Fortunately, it is not very often that the Minister of Finance undertakes to address the house in the tone of a schoolmaster.

Mr. Abbott: The hon. member has been lecturing, only he has been doing it on a false premise.

Mr. Fleming: No, I have not been lecturing the house, and not on a false premise. I wish to put the minister right on that, and I wish to put him right on something he has just said, namely that it was after the action taken in September, 1951, by the international monetary fund that the South African government for the first time proceeded to ration the sale of its gold on the free market. It was selling a rationed proportion of its gold on the free market long before that.

Mr. Abbott: The same proportion.

Mr. Fleming: Regardless of what the monetary fund—

Mr. Abbott: Exactly the same proportion; it is selling 40 per cent.

Mr. Fleming: Yes. Why does the minister say this as though it happened only since October, 1951?

Mr. Abbott: I did not mention October, 1951.

Mr. Fleming: Why does the minister mention that as the date on which the government of South Africa started rationing gold? They were rationing their sale of gold on the free market before that.

Mr. Abbott: If what I said misled my hon. friend, I had not the slightest intention to do that. South Africa's action had nothing to do with the international monetary fund, because they started to sell on the so-called free market long before the question was discussed in the fund.

Mr. Fleming: Quite; and we were urging in the house that Canadian mines should be similarly free to sell their gold in the free market and obtain what they could for it. If they could do better that way than selling newly mined gold to the United States government, then they should have the privilege of doing so; and it was only after we lifted up our voices on that subject for a long time that this action was taken finally in October, 1951.

Mr. Abbott: Will my hon. friend permit me?

Mr. Fleming: What is it?

Mr. Abbott: I do not know exactly whether my hon. friend is aware of the chronological sequence there. May I explain?

Mr. Dickey: He is not aware of anything.

Mr. Fleming: Yes, without interruptions from the smart aleck member for Halifax.

Mr. Abbott: Well, prior to October, 1951 the international monetary fund issued a statement of policy in which it said it felt that it was in the interests of the members of the international monetary fund that gold should not be sold by members into these free markets which were essentially for hoarding purposes. That was not part of the fund agreement; it was a statement of policy issued by the fund, to which Canada subscribed because we believed and we still believe that the real future of gold is as a monetary metal, not as a commodity. We subscribed to that and we respected it.

South Africa, for reasons with which I do not quarrel, decided that it should not adhere to that statement of policy, and it proceeded to sell in the so-called free market, as my hon. friend and I both agree, a substantial portion of its production. Then at the meeting of the international monetary fund in September 1951, I think it was, the Canadian representatives and others pointed out to the fund that if one member of the fund was going to do this selling on the free market, then others should be free to do so, and we took that position quite firmly and clearly. I made it quite clear that we must be free to do the same thing, and we have. My recollection is that the fund issued a statement that this declaration of policy was no longer in effect. That is the history of that.

Mr. Fleming: There is nothing new in what the minister has just said.

Mr. Abbott: That has nothing to do with the price of gold as such.

Mr. Fleming: We fully approved what was done at that time, the decision that was taken at the international monetary fund on September 28, 1951. It was followed on October 7, 1951 and put into regulations issued by the Canadian government.

Mr. Abbott: That is right.

Mr. Fleming: With respect to the sale of gold; let us have this quite clear. There was a position taken by the Canadian representatives at the meeting of the international monetary fund in September, 1951.

Mr. Abbott: That they all must be treated alike.

Mr. Fleming: Quite right. That is what we had been asking for on this side of the house. We had been pointing out that notwithstanding the policy of the international monetary fund, here was the biggest gold producer selling a large proportion of its production in the free market. Canada, a large gold producer, should not have its hands tied in the way in which they were being tied at that time. We pressed for the kind of action that was taken by the international monetary fund, which the minister has just described, and taken I believe on the initiative of the Canadian representatives.

That was the kind of action we in the opposition had been asking for and pressing for, for a long time. We approved the consequent step taken by the Canadian government in issuing its order in council in October, 1951, although some of us had reason to criticize, as I said here in the house on May 14, 1952, some of the conditions attached to the permission given by the Canadian government at that time to Canadian gold producers to sell their gold in the free market. I said then that the terms were too rigid. I still think they are too rigid.

Let it not be said, therefore, Mr. Chairman, that what was done at the meeting of the international monetary fund has no bearing on this question. What happened on that occasion has had a very substantial bearing on this whole question, and I have no doubt that what happens at succeeding meetings of the international monetary fund, whether by way of decision or by way of discussion there and putting forward of points of view, will still exert an important influence on the whole course of events, on the position of gold as a means of furthering international exchange and as a backing for currency, and in relation to the vexed question of the price of gold.

I repeat what I said earlier, that I hope the Canadian government, with due regard for the public interest and with due regard for what the gold mining industry has meant to this country, will lose no opportunity to do all it can to secure a better price for the gold produced by Canadian mines.

Mr. Knowles: I should like to ask the minister a question that, I think, relates to the clause—and that will be a change. I notice that the proposal is to increase the rate of assistance in two ways. At the moment I am not arguing the merits or demerits of the proposed change, but I would like to know why the minister decides to start the assistance at a lower figure in relation to the cost of production.

He has argued, and the explanatory note says, that the reason for this increased assistance is the increase in the cost of production. Formerly the arrangement was that assistance was given in relation to that portion of the cost of production which was in excess of $20 an ounce. I can understand the minister arguing that there should be further assistance for the upper brackets of increased production costs. But why does he lower the point, from $20 an ounce to $18 an ounce, where he begins to provide this assistance?

Mr. Abbott: My recollection is—and I am speaking from memory—that when the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act was originally introduced the low point was $18 and the high was the actual cost of production. Then when it was renewed for the first time, in the hope that we could taper it off we cut down the rate of assistance by raising the lower limit from $18 to $22.

It is a very complex formula, as my hon. friend appreciates. The rate of assistance is half the difference between $18 and the top production cost. If it costs $60 to produce an ounce of gold, the difference between $60 and $18 would be $42. Half of that would be $21, and it would apply to either half the production or the production in the base year, whichever is greater. Now, there are at least three variable elements in there. I have taken the extreme case.

It is clear that the $21 per ounce would only bring the cost down from $60 to $39, even if it applied to all the gold. But it applies to only part of it. So, as I said in my statement this afternoon, this in fact increases the potential rate of assistance by $2 an ounce. But it does of course benefit more the high-cost producers, because they are the ones at the very top who will get the full benefit. Then it tapers down. At a given point the low-cost producers, those still on the free market, would get no benefit at all from the formula. The maximum benefit is given to the high-cost producers at the very top of the range.

Mr. Fleming: I have one other question to ask on policy. It relates to the proportion of gold and U.S. dollars acquired for the exchange fund of this country. I notice on page 25 in the table the minister submitted to the house on February 19 that the proportion of United States dollars has been decreasing, while the proportion of gold holdings has been increased.

Mr. Abbott: That is right.

Mr. Fleming: At December 31, 1950 the amount of gold was $580 million and the amount of U.S. dollars $1,144 million. On December 31, 1951 the amount of gold was $841 million and of U.S. dollars $899 million. On December 31, 1952, the amount of gold was $885 million, and of U.S. dollars it was $961 million. May I ask the minister if this is the result of deliberate government policy to increase the proportion of holdings of gold vis-à-vis United States dollars, and if that policy will be continued.

Mr. Abbott: Oh, yes, I think it has been. It was felt it might be desirable to increase moderately the proportion of gold as compared with U.S. dollars. It is an exercise of judgment. On the U.S. dollar portion of the reserve we earn something, because those moneys can be lent. They are lent on a short-term basis on the New York market, and we receive interest on them. But on our gold holdings we earn nothing. So it is obviously desirable to have some earning assets in the fund, and it is a matter of judgment what the proportion should be as between gold and U.S. dollars.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE ACT

PROVISION MAKING ELIGIBLE CERTAIN CROWN LANDS IN MANITOBA AND SASKATCHEWAN

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of Bill No. 333, to amend the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, 1939.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Lease option deemed agreement for sale.

Mr. Fair: Mr. Chairman, in connection with this legislation, may I say we have no objection to it and will support it. Something similar was done for Alberta some months ago, and at that time we said that when the minister brought in legislation dealing with Saskatchewan and Manitoba he would have our support. We are now giving it.

Mr. Hansell: Is this the only amendment the minister expects to make in the act this year?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, Mr. Chairman, this is the only amendment to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act we will bring in this year.

Mr. Hansell: I think there should be some other amendments. However, I might be out of order if I were to discuss them at this time. What I have to say can be said in the discussion of the estimates.

INDIAN ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING LOANS, SEIZURE OF GOODS, ETC.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) moved the second reading of Bill No. 37, to amend the Indian Act.

Prairie Farm Assistance Act

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Loans to Indians.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The leader of the house has got up such a head of steam that I think he is taking a good many people by surprise. I believe the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness) would like to have something to say on this. Do we have to rush things through so much?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I did mention to the hon. member for Calgary East that after we finished the Prairie Farm Assistance Act we would take up the Indian Act. I do not want to insist, but it is a short bill containing minor amendments to the act.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am not sure how much the hon. member has to say, but this lightning speed may have taken him by surprise. It is five minutes to ten, and perhaps the minister would call it ten o'clock and give him a chance.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I will not insist.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull) moved the adjournment of the house. He said: Tomorrow we will move to go into supply and call three departments, the items to stand. We will then continue in committee of supply on national defence estimates.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, April 14, 1953

The house met at eleven o'clock.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT

SHIPS RELIEVED FROM COMPLIANCE WITH CERTAIN PROVISIONS

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in connection with reports tabled on February 4, 1953, indicating cases in which ships were exempted, under the provisions of section 133A of the Canada Shipping Act, 1934, from the obligation of carrying certificated masters, mates and engineers during the past year, I beg leave to table a supplementary report for the month of December, 1952. These exemptions were granted by the steamship inspector in Europe, and his report was not made until his recent return to Canada.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

TABLING OF RETURN

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I beg to table parliamentary return No. 178, mover Mr. Robichaud: How many persons received unemployment insurance cheques in each month and in each county of the province of New Brunswick during the years 1949, 1950, 1951 and 1952?

I might add a word of explanation by saying that we do not keep the record exactly for counties. This return gives the information as near to that as possible.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

HEADQUARTERS' SITE FOR GAGETOWN BRIGADE TRAINING AREA

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, in view of the interest that has been taken in the matter, I think the house might be interested in a brief statement on the selection of the townsite of Gagetown. This has reference to a question by the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) and is in consequence of other representations.

It was announced on November 15, 1952, that following a thorough investigation by a group of six independent engineers and architects, it had been decided to construct the permanent installations of the army divisional training camp at Gagetown, New Brunswick, in the vicinity of the town of Oromocto, this site being the most practical under the circumstances. A further announcement on December 3, 1952, gave the eleven conclusions reached by the six independent engineers and architects following their investigation, which formed the basis of their recommendation of the Oromocto site. Their decision was based on such factors as general topography and soil condition, capacity for expansion and development, water supply, supply of electric power, railway facilities, the proximity of airport facilities and the accessibility of both the main training area and local ranges. Following the announcement of that decision, a delegation of citizens from Saint John, New Brunswick, met with the Minister of National Defence and made representation that the matter should be reconsidered. As a consequence, representatives of the citizens of Saint John, the Department of National Defence and the consulting engineers, met last week at Saint John and visited the alternative Westfield site. When the detailed military requirements were related to the ground in the Westfield area it was decided that it would be more satisfactory and more economical to develop the Oromocto site and the decision announced on November 15, 1952, has consequently been affirmed.

Mr. Brooks: When does the minister expect this construction will be started?

Mr. Claxton: A considerable amount of preliminary engineering has been done already and will be pressed forward. Construction will be started just as soon as the plans can be related to the engineers' investigations. It will certainly be within a matter of weeks or months.

Mr. Brooks: I take it that the preliminary engineering work was done before it was decided where the site would be?

Mr. Claxton: It was begun and partly completed. It was stopped and now it will be pressed on.

Mr. Fleming: Will the minister make available to the house the reports of the engineers?

Mr. Claxton: It is not the kind of report which is usually made available because it is intended for the confidential information of the minister in order to arrive at a decision. In view of the fact that two reports have been made I shall certainly give consideration to the hon. member's request.

WATER POWER

SAINT JOHN RIVER—REQUEST FOR REPORT OF INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): May I ask the Minister of National Defence if he is the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs in the absence of the minister?

Mr. Claxton: Yes.

Mr. Pouliot: Will he be kind enough to table this week a copy of the report made by the international joint commission at Washington with regard to the development of hydroelectric power on the Saint John river?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): I shall be very glad to look into that and if the report is available and should be tabled I will be glad to table it.

FERRY SERVICE

YARMOUTH-BAR HARBOR—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. A. M. Kirk (Digby-Yarmouth): May I ask the Minister of Transport if he is now in a position to give the house a copy of the report concerning the progress of the proposed Yarmouth-Bar Harbor ferry project.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I am sorry but I am not in a position to do that. If the hon. member will allow me to take his question as notice perhaps I can answer it tomorrow.

THE CORONATION

SUGGESTED ATTENDANCE OF REPRESENTATIVE OF CANADIAN INDIANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Is the Prime Minister aware that no member of the Canadian Indian race, the original inhabitants of this country, is to attend the coronation? Will the government give consideration to sending a suitable representative in full Indian regalia? I think this would be more interesting to those attending the coronation than any of our officials in their regalia.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): In answer to the first part of the hon. member's question, may I say that I am not aware of all those who are to attend the coronation. In answer to his second question, may I say that as it has now been asked publicly, no doubt it will come to the notice of the coronation committee.

TRADE

REPORTED EMBARGO BY UNITED STATES AGAINST OATS AND FEEDS—DAIRY PRODUCTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister based on a report in today's press that the secretary of agriculture of the United States has announced that the administration is studying an embargo against Canadian oats and feeds. Can he state whether representations are being made to the United States protesting against such action? Also whether protests have been made regarding the embargo placed some time ago on certain Canadian dairy products, and whether a reply has been received officially from the United States government?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The hon. member did not consider it necessary to give me notice of this question. In fact I shall have to make inquiries before I can give him a proper answer.

FISHERIES

NEWFOUNDLAND—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF REPORT OF JOINT COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): Can the Minister of Fisheries state when the report of the joint committee on the fisheries of Newfoundland will be released? I understand it is at the printer's.

Hon. James Sinclair (Minister of Fisheries): The department received a wire this morning from Newfoundland saying that copies will be air-mailed to the government today.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR LOAN BY PAKISTAN TO FINANCE PURCHASE OF WHEAT—SHIPMENTS UNDER COLOMBO PLAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. Earl Catherwood (Haldimand): I should like to direct two questions to the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has the government received any representations from the government of Pakistan asking for a loan to finance the purchase of wheat from Canada, and also would the minister state whether any immediate or recent shipments have been or are being made under the 1952-53 Colombo plan agreement with that country?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): The hon. member was good enough to give me notice of his questions and I can answer both of them now.

In autumn of last year there were some discussions concerning the possibility of credit arrangements to assist the Pakistan government in financing wheat purchases from Canada. At that time it was concluded that, within the limits of existing legislation, the only practicable form of assistance would be the use of some part of the funds made available by Canada under the Colombo plan on a grant or loan basis. In February of this year the Pakistan government requested that Canada's contribution to Pakistan under the Colombo plan for 1952-53 should take the form of wheat. As announced on February 24, the Canadian government agreed to the allocation of $5 million of Colombo plan funds for this purpose. Shipments of wheat financed from this grant are scheduled to take place between mid-April and mid-May. The first vessels are now loading.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Defence services—

241. To provide for the Canadian forces, the defence research board and other expenditures relating to defence, including contributions toward the military costs of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization; to authorize expenditures in the current year out of the amount hereby provided, not exceeding $324,000,000, under the provisions of section 3 of the Defence Appropriation Act, 1950, and to provide that, notwithstanding subsection 3 of that section, where equipment or supplies acquired by the Canadian forces after March 31, 1950, are transferred, the estimated present value thereof shall, if the governor in council so directs, be credited to this vote instead of being paid into the special account mentioned in the said subsection 3, and when so credited may be expended for the purposes of the Canadian forces; and notwithstanding section 30 of the Financial Administration Act to authorize total commitments for the foregoing purposes of $3,994,895,578 regardless of the year in which such commitments will come in course of payment (of which it is estimated that $1,971,926,275 will come due for payment in future years), $1,960,159,633.

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Chairman, as there has been distributed to hon. members a white paper on Canada's defence program for 1953-54 which gives very full information about the program for the current fiscal year, it is not my intention to go into the same facts and figures or to endeavour to cover the same ground.

When we consider the defence program of any country we must realize that its purpose is to produce armed forces. It will be judged by the quantity, quality, selection, training, equipment and leadership of the forces, whether they be in the navy, army or air force and whether they be active or reserve. In the last resort the quality of the forces of any country is tried and tested and proved in battle, and during peacetime in exercises and training operations. So that it seems to us that it is important to keep always in the forefront of our minds the fact that while here in parliament we are dealing with dollars and cents and in the department often we are dealing with plans and programs, contract demands and requisitions, orders and regulations; but the object of it all is the young man with a rifle and his ability to use it as part of a trained, equipped formation. We should, I submit, in appraising and appreciating what has been done in the way of defence, examine the results, and those results can be seen today in far-off Korea or in Germany or in the various training exercises that have taken place in Canada and elsewhere.

For the first time in peacetime our defence forces, navy, army and air force, have achieved a total of over 104,000, and of those there are officers and men of the Royal Canadian Navy in three destroyers constantly on duty, on patrol and in action in the Far East. That has been the case ever since July, 1950. In the course of their operations these ships have sailed a total of 720,000 miles. They have engaged in action and in activities on a scale far above anything experienced by similar vessels in the second world war, and they have shown that if you can judge the quality of the Royal Canadian Navy by their performance there is not much wrong with the Royal Canadian Navy.

At the same time officers and men of the 25th infantry brigade have been in action in Korea. While the strength of the brigade, as is well known, is about 6,000, altogether over 20,000 officers and men have fought with the brigade in Korea. We have followed the practice of rotating men who have been in service there for a year and it has been possible to maintain the practice of rotation. In the course of it, and to replace those wounded now totalling some 1,300, or others who have had to leave the field of battle by reason of illness, it has taken a total of about 20,000 officers and men.

The third battalions of the Royal Canadian Regiment, the Princess Patricia's and the "Van Doos" have left for Korea to begin the third term of rotation. When the United Nations began this international police operation no one anticipated that it would go on for three years. As the Hon. Frank Pace, Jr., former United States secretary of the army, declared before a committee of congress just ten days ago, no one anticipated it; and yet day in and day out there have been Canadians on that front showing that they are as good as any force fighting there.

Simultaneously squadron No. 426 of the Royal Canadian Air Force has been carrying on an airlift to the Far East supplemented by Canadian Pacific Air Lines, both flying North Star aircraft produced by Canadair Limited, and the two services working in close harmony have produced a record of over 900 round trips for a total of close to 12 million miles of successful travel without loss or injury, a record unequalled.

At the same time at the other side of the world we have been building up our forces in Europe, and in the army have contributed the 27th Canadian infantry brigade to the forces under the command of the supreme allied commander in Europe. That completes our army commitment to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. Our forces have been there since the target date of November, 1951. In accordance with the procedure decided upon, some 1,913 married men have returned on rotation at the end of a year's service. The force has been maintained and is among those forces on the western front trained and equipped so that it could enter battle at an hour's notice. It also has earned a good record for itself and for Canadian arms.

We have sent abroad a wing of three squadrons of Sabre fighters which are now stationed at North Luffenham, England, and form an important, yes, an important part of the defences of the north Atlantic area in England. They were followed by a second wing in a remarkable operation called "Operation Leapfrog" when all the aircraft of the second wing were flown across by their own pilots to take up their station at Grostenquin, France. A third wing is on the way over and is arriving at Zweibrucken in the French zone of Germany. When I visit it for the first time next week I expect to hand it over to the control of SHAPE and complete three-quarters of our air force commitment on the target date.

A fourth wing is now being formed in Canada with officers and men joining their squadrons and being equipped with Sabre fighters as they come off the lines and are tested. That wing will leave for overseas later this year to complete the formation of our air division of twelve squadrons of Sabre fighters plus a divisional headquarters, plus a repair depot and the other supporting units, which will complete our air commitment to NATO right on the target date.

Simultaneously our navy has been building up its strength and we have supplied to the forces under SACLANT, the supreme allied commander in the Atlantic, North Atlantic Treaty Organization, all the ships we have promised up to date. We expect to comply with our commitment for the current fiscal year of 1953-54; and, subject to a possible exception which I will mention later, we expect to complete our naval commitment to the North Atlantic treaty on the target date.

At one and the same time we have been discharging our obligations as one of the United Nations in an effort to stop aggression in Korea and, as one of the North Atlantic treaty nations, to build up our forces in Europe so that they, with those of our allies, may form a rampart of peace and preserve our security by being sufficiently strong to indicate to the only potential enemy that he cannot win.

That operation has gone on over a period of less than three years. It is important that hon. members should appreciate that fact. The act of aggression which changed the thinking of the western world took place on June 25, 1950, and the plan under which we began to build up our forces in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization was first approved at Washington in October, 1950. In other words, in less than three years Canada, like the other western nations, has built up its strength very substantially indeed.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the plan on which we have been proceeding was announced by me in the house on February 5, 1951. On that occasion I announced that we were embarking on a three-year plan which it was then estimated would cost $5 billion. It was a three-year plan because that was the period which had been agreed to by the North Atlantic treaty nations as being suitable for planning purposes; and the object at that time was to build up our forces collectively so that we would arrive at the strengths that were fixed from time to time by June 30, 1954. Since then, of course, there have been delays in all countries—delays in construction and the production of equipment, delays sometimes due to financial or economic reasons, and delays contributed to considerably by the continuation of hostilities in Korea and in other parts of the world. The North Atlantic Treaty Organization recognizes this situation and uses a new word "slippage" to describe it.

There has been some slippage and, generally speaking, the date now fixed as the target for the achievement of the program as revised from time to time is June 30, 1955. As I say, having completed our army commitment already, having every expectation of completing our air force commitment this year, and having completed our navy commitment up to date and expecting to do so for the next year, we expect to complete our planned program, subject to one or two exceptions which I will mention later, by the date originally indicated—by June 30, 1954.

As we go on, some countries will give consideration to a deliberate stretch-out of their programs in order to keep production lines in operation. Rather than accumulate large stockpiles of equipment such as ships, aircraft, guns and ammunition over and above what appears to be immediately required, and over and above reasonable reserves, participating countries will wish to keep items of that kind in production to maintain production lines and keep up productive capacity, rather than to stockpile and close them down. However, in Canada we have not started to do that. The only deliberate stretch-out that we have had has been in connection with the production of the CF-100 and the F-86E aircraft, both of which we deliberately delayed in order to begin production of later types at the earliest possible dates. Neither of those stretch-outs will affect our ultimate position.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that it would be of some convenience to hon. members if we looked at this three-year program and saw how much of it had been achieved and how much it has cost. We can do that now because two of the three years have passed. We have the actual expenditures for the year 1951-52, we have an estimate of the expenditures for the year 1952-53 which has just been completed, but it is likely to be an accurate estimate as it is on the basis of eleven months' experience and a projection for the rest of the fiscal year. Also, we have before us the estimates which we are now discussing for the year 1953-54. The figures which I will give you are divided under the heads which are customary in NATO and which are used in the table appearing in the white paper at page 37. The heads are: Military personnel costs; procurement of equipment; construction; operations and maintenance.

We have expended or will expend during the period 1951-54 a total of $1,164 million on military personnel. That has been the cost of maintaining—paying, feeding and clothing our forces in the navy, army and air force during that period. The total strengths as at April 1, 1953, on the basis of the last figures available but which are subject to correction, are: 15,546 for the navy; 48,458 for the army; 40,482 for the air force; or a total of 104,486 in the active force, and 5,325 for the navy; 47,318 for the army; and 5,760 for the air force; or a total of 58,403 in the reserve force.

There has been some talk about the cost of a man in the armed forces for a year, so I will give the actual figure for the cost of another rank for his initial year on joining the armed forces. The cost is $2,251 per year based on figures most lately determined, without travel or transportation but covering items of pay and allowances, subsistence, clothing, medical and dental services, and pension. That figure is broken down as follows: Pay and allowances $1,135; subsistence, $732; maintenance of clothing and personal equipment, $136; medical and dental service, $43; government contribution to the pension fund, $205; for the total I mentioned of $2,251. Now, for all other ranks for the same period, giving proper weight to the number of men in each grade and pay group, the average cost is $3,023 per year. If we take the average for all three services, for all officers and men, again weighted so as to give the proper weight to the number of officers, their ranks and so on, with the N.C.O.'s and men, the figure is $3,411. The comparable figure for 1949 was $2,975. The comparable figure for all other ranks in 1949 was $2,573, whereas it is $3,023 today, the difference being largely represented by increases in pay and some increases in the cost of living reflected in the items I have mentioned. A comparable figure for all civil servants in the civil service is $2,526. If we take all the civil servants, exclusive of prevailing rate employees and casual labour, their average salary is $2,526, and that compares with the figure for the armed forces of $3,023. They are not very far apart, having regard to the different functions that they perform.

Now, of the members of the armed forces, 43 per cent are married today. This has led us, of course, to the necessity for establishing campsites with married quarters, chapels, schools, stores and all the other amenities of the average civilian community. For example, today the Department of National Defence operates 40 schools for the children of serving personnel, and in those schools there are close to 10,000 children and about 400 teachers, all working in accordance with and under the provincial educational systems. In the armed forces today we have, largely in the R.C.A.F., 3,200 women who are included in the figures I mentioned above.

Turning to the category of officers, which is of great importance, we have in training today for the active and reserve forces a total of 7,957 men, of whom 4,612 are at the universities. During this last fiscal year we made two major changes in the provisions for the training of officers. The first was the establishment in September, 1952, of the College Militaire Royal de Saint-Jean, at Saint-Jean, Quebec. I should like to say a word about that institution, which was started in September, 1952, some three months after it had been decided to establish it there. The response, both from the French-speaking and from English-speaking candidates, was very good indeed. The number originally intended to be taken in in the first year of 100 had to be increased to the maximum capacity we could handle, 125. Of the 125, some 78 were of French-speaking origin and the balance were of English-speaking origin. In view of the experience of the last six months it can be said that this college, which was certainly new in military training arrangements in this country and in most others, has already proven itself to be a substantial success. The candidates of the two languages mix and work together, and virtually all of them now speak both languages. These men will constitute an important pool of officers of great value, particularly today when the nations of the world are intermingling more freely.

Another important thing is that of the 123 candidates now in attendance, all except 7, if my memory serves me correctly, have signed on with the regular forces and consequently after they graduate from Saint-Jean, and possibly R.M.C., will enter the regular forces, if they qualify, and serve for three years. More and more, we are looking to the graduates who enter the three services colleges of Saint-Jean, R.M.C. and Royal Roads, to be of a category who will sign on for a minimum of three years' service with the regular forces. The balance will serve with the reserve forces.

This brings me to an announcement I should like to make for the first time today. So great has been the success of Saint-Jean, and so desirable is it that this operation in military training as well as in national unity should be extended, we are going to make provision for a total strength of 400 cadets.

The second development of major proportions made during the year in the training of officers was the establishment of the regular officers training plan, under which cadets at R.M.C., Royal Roads, Saint-Jean or any one of the university plans, may sign on at any stage of his course and receive tuition, subsistence, clothing and so on, and serve as a subordinate officer taking the summer courses, conditional upon his agreement to serve with the regular forces for three years after graduation. It is too early to say what the results of these various devices will be, but our expectation is that, by one means or another, through the services colleges, through the universities or through direct entry on short-service commission basis, we will be able to meet all the requirements to replace the wastage of officers which it is estimated will be of the magnitude of 1,500 from 1954 on. This applies now for the first time, I am glad to say, to doctors and some other officers requiring professional qualifications. Hon. members may recall that I reported earlier that we were short, and we expected to remain short, of doctors. However, owing to improvements in the arrangements we have made, and also to our having recruited a certain number of doctors in the British Isles, the situation is such now that we believe we will have enough doctors, dentists and most other professional personnel to fill all requirements as they arise.

Turning from the question of personnel to that of equipment, I may say that in 1951-54 we have spent or will have spent a total of $2,102 million on equipment. Main items of equipment include ships, of which we now have some 52 on order, of types varying from the aircraft carrier H.M.C.S. Bonaventure which is being built for us on the other side to replace the Magnificent, or the arctic patrol vessel the Labrador, or the escort vessels and minesweepers down to gate vessels. We expect to be behind in the program with regard to the construction of anti-submarine escort vessels. This is accounted for partly by the fact that these are ships of an entirely new type never before built here or anywhere else. We had delays in procuring steel, component parts and machine tools from other countries. The ships are so complicated that the engineering—particularly the electrical engineering—took more time than we had engineers to do the work. I anticipate that there will be some delay with others of these ships as they come off. I also anticipate that they will still be well ahead of any corresponding vessels being made by any other country because we got started on this operation well in advance of the others.

Another major item of equipment is aircraft. It may be remembered that in 1951, in my statement then, I announced that we would require a total of over 3,000 new aircraft. We expect to have by the end of the current fiscal year over 2,000 of those; and we will complete the balance of the planned figure, which is considerably above 3,000 of new aircraft, early in 1955. We have deliberately postponed the equipping of our own forces with additional Sabre fighters in order to make Sabres available to the United States and to Britain. The delay in finishing our own aircraft program will not delay our fulfulling our commitments to NATO and will not delay beyond the target dates the build-up of our own air force for the defence of Canada, but it will delay the re-equipment of auxiliary squadrons with CF-100's and the provision of reserve aircraft.

With regard to weapons such as guns, we have had a large program under way; and here again we expect, for the reasons I have stated, that we shall not be able to complete the whole by March 31 or June 30, 1954, but we should be able to comply with our commitments. The same thing applies to ammunition. Apart from these items we expect that our production of equipment will meet all our requirements. The figures before hon. members already reflect some reduction, as we have completed the program for the stockpiling of a large part of what are called "soft goods" such as clothing and barrack stores.

The next major head of expenditure is construction. Between 1951 and 1954 we have spent or shall have spent a total of $665 million. Between April 1, 1952, and February 28, 1953—that is in the first eleven months of the fiscal year just completed—orders were placed bringing the total value of contracts under administration to $358,398,000, on 1,048 major construction projects plus a larger number of minor ones. Hon. members may appreciate how large an operation this has been when I tell them that during the year 1940-41 we spent on construction a total of $92 million and, during the wartime peak, a total of $152 million—that was in the year 1943-44—whereas at the present time we are administering contracts for a total of $358 million, more than twice the wartime peak. Included in the construction have been buildings for operations, research laboratories, barrack blocks, cookhouses and all the others but, in addition, some 16,550 permanent married quarters which, with the temporary married quarters that we have, make a total of about 20,000 married quarters. We shall still have to continue the married quarters program. The construction program has passed its peak, and this has resulted this year in a lower appropriation for construction, and we believe this figure will be still further reduced next year.

The fourth major head is operations and maintenance. That means the oil and fuel and the repair work necessary to maintain the forces and to enable them to carry on their operations. For the years 1951 to 1954 the total spent or expected to be spent under these heads is $1,301 million.

To summarize these items of cost for the years 1951-54 as actually spent or estimated: personnel, $1,164 million; equipment, $2,102 million; construction, $665 million; operation and maintenance, $1,302 million: or a total of $5,233 million. In addition the excess of credits to the replacement account over expenditures therefrom within this period of $35 million brings the total to $5,268 million. That is on account of the program, announced on February 5, 1951, of $5 billion. It represents an expenditure of 5 per cent over the estimate; but, as I have indicated, there will be some additional expenditures carried into 1954-55 owing to delays in production to which I have referred.

This total includes the amount of $680 million spent or expected to be spent during the period on mutual aid. In the white paper, at page 33, hon. members will see outlined all the expenditures made up to date on mutual aid. They run back to a year before the 1951 period to which I have just referred, and up to March 31, 1953, they total $551,800,000. In addition, in the estimates put before hon. members, there is provided a total of $324 million.

These figures represent, of course, large sums; and the magnitude of the operation that this has involved for the various government departments concerned can be appreciated by one or two comparisons. A large part of the moneys appropriated for national defence is not spent by the Department of National Defence itself. The spending is administered by the Department of Defence Production, in the procurement of equipment; by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, in the provision of married quarters; by Defence Construction Limited, in the provision of other buildings; by the Department of Transport in the acquisition of land and in the construction and lengthening of runways. Altogether, during the fiscal year 1952-53 this operation has involved the placing of a total of 151,000 contracts. We have spent on what might be called capital account—that is, for construction and equipment: $2,102 million on equipment and $665 million on construction—making a total of $2,767 million which we have spent or will have spent between 1951 and 1954.

And a great deal of the construction and equipment represented by that expenditure already exists. It is placed on the ground—equipment is on issue or in store, except for such portions as might have been used up either in action or in training.

This total of $2,767 million may be compared with expenditures on comparable account by the Canadian National Railways. The Canadian National Railways came into existence in 1923, and in those thirty years spent on corresponding accounts a total of $1,341 million. Or, in other words, the Department of National Defence, through the agencies I have mentioned, in the performance of its program will have spent twice as much in one-tenth of the time.

Then, if we take another great Canadian corporation well known to all hon. members, the Shawinigan Water and Power Company, which has built an industrial empire along the St. Maurice river, we find that in the fifty-five years of its existence it has spent on comparable accounts something under $300 million. I mention this only to indicate the scale and the magnitude of what has been involved in bringing our forces and their equipment up to their present state.

During that time the number of men has increased from 47,000 to 104,000, an increase of 120 per cent. But the increase in fighting capacity, in the elements of the three services that can properly be called operational, is far greater in proportion than the increase in the total strength of officers and men.

For example, in the navy during this period the number of ships in active operation has increased from 23 to 56, the present number. And we expect the target set in 1951, of 100 operational ships by 1954, will be met.

In the army, where we had six major operational units before Korea, including the Royal Canadian Regiment, the Princess Patricia's, the "Van Doos", the Lord Strathcona's, the Royal Canadian Dragoons and a regiment of artillery, today we have 26 major operational units, including those in Korea in the 25th brigade, and those in Germany in the 27th brigade. They constitute the major units for an equivalent of two divisions.

In the air force the increase has been even more substantial, because during this period we have added nine squadrons of Sabre fighters, and have begun the organization of the first squadron of CF-100's. Of the total objective of some 41 squadrons we have now achieved the formation of 31. The proportion of administrative and training troops to that of operational troops in organized formations of the R.C.A.F. will stand comparison, and I may say favourable comparison, with those of any other country.

[Mr. Claxton.]

At the end of the program announced in 1951 I outlined fifteen points as our target for 1954. In the course of my remarks I have tried in a general way to deal with what has been achieved under each of those fifteen points. I shall now set out those points, and indicate what has happened in respect of each of those goals:

In the navy—

1. Nearly 100 ships and many small craft, either new or refitted and newly armed.

Today we have 56, and we expect to achieve the target.

2. Permanent seaward defence of vital harbours.

These are under construction, and we expect they will be completed by the target date.

3. The shipbuilding industry geared to produce additional ships rapidly.

We have some 26 ships under construction, and 26 more are to be begun in 16 different yards.

4. Administrative and training staffs, depots and stores, for all-out mobilization.

That is largely completed.

In the army—

5. An airborne striking force, anti-aircraft artillery and other units for the defence of Canada against direct attack.

We have an airborne striking force which we have maintained at the planned strength. We have anti-aircraft artillery units, but they are becoming obsolescent and are being modified, in part, by the addition of new equipment now in the course of production. But for part we propose deliberately to postpone the construction or purchase of new anti-aircraft guns, because we believe that by the time we got them they would be obsolete, and would be under replacement by ground-to-air guided missiles, which are already in production in some countries.

6. Part of the active army with integrated force under General Eisenhower.

That has been dealt with. Our commitment is completed.

7. Part of the Canadian forces continuing in the Far East as long as that is necessary.

I am sure all hon. members share my regret that it has proved to be necessary to continue the strength it has. I shall have a word to say about that in conclusion.

8. Administrative staff, training establishments, depots, stores, clothing and equipment to provide for rapid mobilization in a total effort.

Generally that has been accomplished, particularly with regard to the provision of soft goods. We expect by the time set to have completed the operations for other types of equipment except in so far as we decide to stretch out the program so as to maintain productive capacity. I believe that that may prove to be desirable in a number of cases.

In addition we have decided, since 1951, to acquire the large training area at Gagetown, which we believe will be in operation by 1954.

The philosophy of stockpiling has been dealt with in the house a good many times. It was announced in my statement of February 5, 1951, and nobody took any objection to it. It has been carried out in so far as we considered it desirable with regard to soft goods, as we call them. We have done the job there and we will proceed with the stockpiling of other types of goods and ammunition. But I have already said a word on what may affect the timing of that.

In so far as experience shows that we have more equipment of any type than we need for the reserves or for mobilization, we can take it into current issue. Before any order for new equipment is placed we look at both our stocks and our stockpiling for mobilization, and either place the order or not place the order accordingly.

9. Replacement of equipment on issue to the active or reserve forces, or in stores, by latest type United States equipment purchased from the United States or made in Canada and our industry in Canada tooled up to make a considerable part of this equipment.

That has been partly accomplished and the rest is under way.

10. In the air force—41 regular and reserve squadrons with more than 3,000 aircraft additional to those we now have of the types suitable for the purposes intended.

I have mentioned the figures in a general way and probably that is as far as I should go. We expect to complete the program on time in so far as it relates to our commitments to NATO and the equipping of our regular forces in Canada, but it may not be possible to convert all the reserve or auxiliary squadrons to new types of aircraft by the target dates.

I should add here that very considerable interest is being shown by other countries and by the North Atlantic Treaty Organization in the CF-100. There is no other all-weather fighter in quantity production anywhere. This aircraft is considered to have qualities and capacities which could make it desirable for use in Europe as it certainly is in Canada.

11. Radar equipment manned and located to provide radar defence integrated with a corresponding United States chain of stations, connected by the necessary communication system and backed by fighters.

This radar system will be largely completed in 1953.

12. In Europe an air division of eleven fighter squadrons.

This was subsequently increased to twelve. Nine of them are there and we expect the other three to be there this year.

13. Airfields, men and equipment to train large numbers of aircrew for ourselves and other countries.

During 1952-53 there were 19 regular units including airfields, stations and schools opened, bringing the total number used by the air force up to 108. Another 13 regular and 7 auxiliary schools and stations will be opened during 1953-54. To date for NATO we have trained 748 pilots and 947 navigators, and another 1,200 are in training.

Just on Sunday I visited the great station at Clinton, Ontario, for the training of radar and wireless operators. The strength there varies from 1,800 to 2,100, depending on the number of pupils. That station is now working on two shifts with something over 1,000 pupils. We could easily increase the number using that plant by more than 100 per cent, or probably 200 per cent in the event of emergency, by working three shifts and doubling up.

14. Industry in a position to produce large numbers of the latest type of aircraft needed by the forces of ourselves and others.

Hon. members are very familiar with that.

15. Production of quantities of equipment for NATO and training of large numbers of officers to strengthen our common defence by assisting our allies.

I have already referred to the program of equipment and air training for NATO and that is being carried on.

I have reviewed the three-year program in the light of our experience and given to the committee as effectively as I could in the time available information on the progress made. There are a number of things which I might mention if time permitted, such as standardization. We have made great progress in the standardization of procedure, communications, weather reporting and the like. The progress has been much slower in connection with equipment. The latest word on the all-important question of the rifles and ammunition is that quite considerable progress has been made in the last few weeks toward reaching agreement. I am beginning to be hopeful that that will be arrived at within the next month or two.

With regard to the reserves, I could give a number of facts and figures. We started this period with some 47,000 officers and men in the reserves and today there are 58,000 despite the fact that some 11,000 of the most active officers and men have joined the active forces from the reserve forces. The number undergoing summer training and taking courses has steadily increased. However, like other hon. members I feel that this very important part of our defence activities deserves every support we can give it. We are constantly discussing with representatives of the conference of reserve associations ways and means of making the work of the reserve more effective.

During recent weeks developments have occurred in the Far East and elsewhere which must have struck hon. members. The communists have shown a disposition to at least open discussions that may lead to a settlement of hostilities in Korea. We welcome that possibility. The peaceful objectives of the western nations have been shown both at the United Nations in New York and in the resumption of negotiations in Korea.

But we must remember that no change has occurred to alter the policy which the United Nations in Korea and the North Atlantic nations have agreed to, that is to build up sufficient strengths so that they can be secured. President Eisenhower and Mr. Churchill have made plain in their statements what I believe is the attitude of all the western nations on this subject. As the Financial Post said on April 4, 1953:

> If, today, all the guns on all the fronts where East is fighting West were to be silenced, our side would still be far from achieving the unity, the economic and armed strength essential to our safety.

The western nations have had as their objective the stopping of aggression in Korea and the preventing of aggression in Europe. They have worked together in both areas in a great demonstration of common purpose and common practice to bring about both objectives. This is the first time in the history of the world that nations have agreed on a plan, on an objective and on the ways to achieve it, and nothing has happened to change that objective or to change that plan. We have spent great sums on our defence in Canada, as have other western nations, sums expended as insurance of peace, and the prudent man does not stop paying the premium if the risk continues. While, therefore, everyone is hopeful that what is taking place in Korea may lead to a termination of hostilities there and may lead to a better atmosphere everywhere else, there is no reason yet for the North Atlantic treaty nations, or those of the United Nations who think with us, to change fundamentally the policy and the course to which they have agreed and to which they put their hands three years ago.

Our hope is that it may be possible to moderate what we are doing, but to change it fundamentally would be a serious indication of weakness. The fact is that the Russians have shown a change of attitude, and in our view, and I think in the views of those in the other western nations, something which has contributed to that change has been the attitude shown in Korea and the building up of our strength in Europe and at home. That has been our objective, and the fact that we have had three years without a major war has indicated that the policy has so far been right. That policy has, I believe, had the strong support of all sections of the Canadian people as it has had the strong support of members in every part of the house. It is because of that support, because of that great objective and the appeal of that objective to our own people, that the government has seen fit to ask parliament for the large sums of money which we consider necessary to maintain and build up our strength. It is in that spirit that I put before this committee these estimates.

Mr. Chairman, it has been the practice during the war and since to table, and to print as an appendix to Hansard, a list of the orders, decorations and medals awarded officers and men of the Canadian forces for gallantry. Such a list was last printed as an appendix to Hansard on June 25, 1952. I have here a list bringing that information up to date and, if I have the unanimous consent of hon. members, I should like to have it printed as an appendix to Hansard, following my remarks of this morning.

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): Mr. Chairman, I should like to join with the minister in offering congratulations on behalf of this party to the men of the various services who are now taking part in the operations which are being conducted in Korea and in Europe. It was my great privilege to see the departure of the first three destroyers which left Esquimalt in the summer of 1951 in order to play their part as a first contribution from Canada in the operations to prevent aggression in Korea. It has been a source of pride to all of us that the Royal Canadian Navy has kept destroyers such as the Athabaskan, the Haida, the Sault Ste. Marie, the Crusader and others in the dangerous waters surrounding Korea. The men on these vessels have had to experience the dangers and hardships of active operations. They have been exposed not only to shellfire from the land fortifications of the enemy but also to the great mining activity which the enemy utilizes.

We have also seen the activities of the 25th brigade. I saw the original units when they were in training in the state of Washington in the United States just before they left. I have followed their activities with interest, activities which simulate very closely the type of fighting of which I personally saw something during the first world war. They have all the discomforts of life in the trenches, having to take shelter in deep dugouts and to take part in constant patrolling of no man's land in order to be ever on the alert for enemy actions. They have also experienced very brisk and sharp encounters, and we regret the casualties, now amounting to over a thousand, which our units have suffered during these operations.

I also had the opportunity of seeing something of the 27th brigade when it landed in Europe. I have watched with interest their progress during the manoeuvres that have been held by the NATO command in Europe. The air force has been maintaining an airlift of thousands of tons of equipment and a great many personnel, both Canadian and American. No. 426 squadron has had a truly remarkable record, as the minister said, of flights across the Pacific following the dangerous northern route over the mist-shrouded islands of the Aleutian chain.

I should also like to call attention to the fact that civilian pilots and crews of Canadian Pacific Air Lines have been doing their share in maintaining operations in Korea. When the day comes I hope that full recognition will be given to the services of the civilian airmen who have shared the dangers of these long flights with our own R.C.A.F. personnel.

The minister made a reference to the developments that have taken place in Canada and emphasized the importance which he attached to the production of officer personnel. He called attention to the new college that has been established at Saint-Jean in the province of Quebec. We were naturally very pleased to hear about that because the hon. member for Three Rivers has been the protagonist for the establishment of such a college in the province of Quebec where young French-speaking Canadians would have equal opportunities of qualifying for commissions in the regular forces. I am also pleased to hear that there is to be still further development and increase in that direction, and I was delighted to hear of the progress which is being made both at Royal Military College at Kingston and at Royal Roads. I cannot help but recall that as far back as 1946 the then hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, Colonel Cecil Merritt, advocated very strongly that the Royal Military College should be reopened so that the young men of this country should have an opportunity of preparing themselves for eventualities which, even in those days, seemed inevitable.

I think it was very largely the activities of Colonel Merritt and other members of the R.M.C. club of Canada which persuaded the government a few years later to reopen that college. I have been connected with the college myself and had the opportunity of visiting it only a few days ago.

Now, I will turn to the white paper which was issued to us yesterday and I will also refer to the white paper which initiated this program in February of 1951. In the original white paper, the program of 1951, the objectives of our national defence policy are laid down. The minister at that time referred to them as being clear and simple. They are repeated in the program issued yesterday and I will just take a moment to read them because I think they still remain, and I am certain they still remain, as the objectives for which we are working.

(1) The immediate defence of Canada and North America from direct attack;

(2) implementation of any undertakings made by Canada under the charter of the United Nations, or under the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, or other agreement for collective security;

(3) the organization to build up strength in a total war.

In other words, we are to make preparations against the risk of communist policy forcing us to defend ourselves against direct attack while, at the same time, meeting our overseas obligations. To a very considerable extent these objectives overlap, because by building up our forces both at home and abroad they will soon become in a position to be a powerful deterrent against aggression; and they will also be in a better position to fight wherever required should global war be forced upon us.

As I have said, these objectives have not been changed. They have been endorsed from the beginning by the members of this party. In fact, this party has repeatedly urged and encouraged the government to achieve these objectives. The means of achieving them and the rate of progress towards their achievement has given and still continues to give this party considerable concern. When the Korean war broke out, and when it became necessary for this country to take action to check aggression there—and also to make our contribution to the deterring of aggression which was being organized to prevent that aggression in Europe—members of this party cast aside their natural misgivings as far as this government was concerned and formed common cause with the government in order to carry out those objectives.

The right course had to be found and, having been found, it had to be followed. It was not only a right course as far as Canada was concerned, but that right course had to be found which would be in the best interests of all people who took common cause with us and had that common cause at heart. However, I must say on this occasion that I find it much easier to support the government's objective than to admire the actual progress that the government has made toward those objectives with the large sums of money which have been made available for that purpose.

Huge sums of money reaching into astronomical figures have been made available year after year but the results in actual fighting men are extraordinarily meagre, and in no way proportionate to the millions of dollars which have been voted annually by parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearkes: In times of high taxation it is especially important that the country get the fullest possible value for the taxpayers' money which is spent on defence—or on the activities of any other department. We feel that this has not been done; for, in too many instances, instead of well armed men supported by modern equipment, tanks and aircraft, we have been asked to accept spacious lawns, full-page advertisements and stocks of clothing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearkes: Had less money been spent on some of the frills and fineries we could have expected more to have been provided for actual defence, thus giving the taxpayer the security that he has a right to expect.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearkes: Two billion dollars was supplied or voted last year and the same amount is included in this year's estimates to be voted for the services or defence—and for no other purpose. If we continue to squander the money as we have been doing to a certain extent during the past two years, we shall only play into the hands of the enemy either by gradually breaking down our own national economy or by our failure to bear the full share with our allies in the common battle for freedom.

[Mr. Pearkes.]

It is noteworthy that attention has already been called to the fact that the government has failed to spend all the money that parliament voted during the last two years for military aid to our NATO allies. Perhaps the minister will be able to tell this committee the extent to which we have fallen short in the mutual aid program during the last year, and the reasons why our mutual aid program has not been entirely lived up to. I ask this question particularly in view of the warnings which were issued by Lord Ismay when he was in Ottawa recently and the appeal that he made to all partners in the NATO organization to contribute to their utmost.

I notice that the same amount which was voted last year is included in this year's estimates, namely, some $324 million. According to the calculations I have made, I believe that in the last two years Canada has voted—it may be the last three years—some $685,383,108 for mutual aid, of which somewhere in the neighbourhood of $556,517,216 has been actually spent. This works out to somewhere around 19 per cent of the money voted for mutual aid which has not been spent. Last year, I believe, the sum voted was $322 million, of which only $235 million was spent. I doubt whether those figures tell the whole story, because operating expenses will have been deducted from those amounts so that those amounts do not represent the quantity of goods actually placed in the hands of our NATO allies.

According to the minister's white paper, until now the equipment transferred to NATO countries was mainly from existing stock. It would be very interesting to know what prices were placed on that old war material which we sent to our NATO allies. The plan laid down in February, 1951, is described as a three-year $5 billion defence program. It now appears to be turning out in the neighbourhood of $6 billion, and I am not certain that it is not more of a misfire than an actual program. The additional money is made up of $5,268 million from the Department of National Defence, $327,700,000 from the Department of Defence Production, and $121 million from NATO.

Now, up to the end of 1952, the Department of Defence Production had placed orders to the value of approximately $2,708,525,000 for the armed forces. I mention these figures because I referred to them as being astronomical. They are certainly very large figures indeed. In the report of the Department of Defence Production tabled on March 31 this year reference is made to expenditures by the department on national defence during the year January 1, 1952, to December 31, 1952. This figure gives some idea of the amount of money which has already been spent, orders having been placed for these amounts. I shall only deal in millions because the thousands are only fractional points. Orders were placed for aircraft to the value of over $519 million last year; for ships, over $65 million, practically $66 million; tanks and automotive, $87 million; weapons and ammunition $143·5 million; electronics and communication equipment, $131 million; clothing, etc., $76 million; construction, $168 million; other expenses, $192 million. These items make a grand total of $1,385,204,000 for orders placed last year. The orders which were placed last year, added to the previous orders placed by this department, make a grand total of $2,708,525,000.

We have now to ask ourselves what we have got in return for these huge sums of money. Let us turn first of all to the Royal Canadian Navy. In so far as that service is concerned, we were told that there would be 100 ships, manned by some 21,000 personnel. What is the situation today? We are told that we have 56 ships in commission. Hon. members should recall that two-thirds of the time allotted to this program has already elapsed. During 1953-54 there will be in commission 56 ships. Our one and only aircraft carrier, H.M.C.S. Magnificent, is urgently in need of a major overhaul. In fact, she must be regarded as an obsolescent vessel. She is the only vessel of her class which, to date, has not been modernized. She has been on loan from the Royal Navy for a number of years. Today we were told that a new carrier, the Bonaventure, is to replace the Magnificent. She is now under construction in Belfast. I do not know whether or not the Bonaventure will be on loan from the Royal Navy in the same way as the Magnificent was or whether she will become the property of the Royal Canadian Navy. However, it will be many months yet before she can be commissioned.

Our two cruisers, the Quebec and the Ontario, are old but still serviceable. When we come to the modern vessels, only the prototype of the new anti-submarine escort ship has so far been commissioned. She is the former destroyer H.M.C.S. Algonquin, which was converted at Yarrows yard in Esquimalt. She underwent her acceptance trials just last month. Every effort was made by Yarrows to do a good job on this vessel. As the minister said today, there is a good deal of complicated machinery to instal, and it was a severe test for the engineering skill of the draftsmen of that company and of the admiralty men concerned. Another destroyer, H.M.C.S. Crescent, is at present being converted in the dockyard at Esquimalt, conforming to the plans which were made for the Algonquin. Just why H.M.C. dockyard should have been called upon to make this conversion, I do not know. I would have thought the experience gained by Yarrows in developing the prototype of this ship and in turning out the Algonquin would have been of great help in the conversion of the Crescent. It does not seem to me that much encouragement is being offered to a shipyard if they are to produce prototype plans and do all the development work on one vessel, only to find that the next vessel of the same type is to be handed to a government competitor to do the work.

There are fourteen destroyer escorts of Canadian design and fourteen coastal minesweepers being built in Canadian yards. Of the former, I understand that nine keels only have been laid to date. In reserve we have a wartime fleet of frigates and minesweepers. If they are to be used, they must be completely modernized before they could possibly fulfil any of their roles in the event of an emergency. It would be almost criminal to send men to sea in those wartime ships at the present time if there was an emergency. Hence, with the exception of the three destroyers now in service in Korean waters and, you might say, the coronation review fleet—which I believe will consist of the aircraft carrier Magnificent, the cruisers Ontario and Quebec, the destroyer Sioux and two frigates—one may well ask: Where are the 100 ships and the men who are to man them? On February 28 we were told that the total naval personnel consists of some 15,400 men and that of this number nearly 5,000 are employed in administrative duties in commands and in the dockyards. One may truly ask: Why have there been these delays? The minister referred to the delays as "slipping". It seems to me that we have slipped badly with regard to our naval program.

Then we can only call attention to the fact that although we are essentially an anti-submarine navy, we have no submarines and no means whatever—and apparently no plans being made for that purpose—by which we are to develop the types of crafts now considered to be most efficient in the hunting of that underwater marauder.

We were told that the defence program would also include the seaward defences of our vital harbours. I venture to say that never have our harbours been more exposed to attack than they are today. The seaward defences of any nature are practically non-existent. Certainly the great ports on the Pacific coast such as Vancouver, Victoria, Esquimalt and Prince Rupert have no seaward defences. Therefore, with regard to the senior service, I cannot feel that we can be encouraged by the progress which has been made in this program.

Mr. Chairman, it is now three minutes to one; and instead of my now starting on some comments with regard to the army, I would ask you to call it one o'clock.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Chairman, I should like now to refer to the part the army has been assigned, and the progress it has made toward achieving the objectives outlined in the program of February, 1951. The 25th brigade in Korea and the 27th brigade in Europe have been maintained at the strengths up to which it was decided in February, 1951, to have those formations recruited, and it would be churlish on my part if I did not refer to the efforts made by the minister to live up to the obligations he then accepted. We in this party, on this side of the house, are pleased that the government has been able to maintain our overseas detachments of the army at the strength promised to the United Nations and to the NATO organization.

But that strength has been maintained at some expense to the forces being provided for the direct defence of Canada. The program of 1951 included an airborne striking force, anti-aircraft artillery and other units for the defence of Canada against direct attack. When the Korean operation started it was decided that it would not be expedient to send the regular units of the army which at that time were embodied in the striking or mobile airborne force for the direct defence of Canada, and for that reason second battalions of the three regular regiments and the artillery regiment were recruited as ad hoc formations.

Unfortunately it has not been possible to maintain that policy. The airborne striking force has already been broken up and its personnel distributed not only among the forces raised for Korea but also the forces sent with the 27th brigade, with the result that today we have no striking force of units which have been accustomed to work together and which have carried out any extensive training under arctic conditions.

If we are to have units organized and trained to meet an airborne invasion from the north, then those units should have extensive practice in northern areas and, if possible, should be stationed there. In the pamphlet issued by the minister yesterday, in which this year's program is set out, attention is called to the fact that a substantial increase is to be made in the emphasis placed on the defence of North America against air attack. Well, I should think so! We from this side of the house have been emphasizing ever since 1947 the importance of providing home defence. I have been called various names. It has been suggested that I was an isolationist and that I was an alarmist; and last year I was accused of being a yes-but man. Well, perhaps it will be recognized now that I was a realist, and that I had pointed out the danger of attack on this country, and the necessity for the government to maintain an effective force which would be prepared to meet any airborne attack which might be delivered against our shores.

The mobility of such a striking force would be governed very largely by its ability to be transported by air. We have no transport squadrons available for that purpose. We are told in the white paper that Bristol freighters and C-119 aircraft are being obtained. Well, they are not here now; and even if they were obtained, their range of manoeuvrability would be very considerably handicapped by the lack of airfields in our northern areas.

The fact also remains that in this mobile striking force no provision is made for engineer units trained in the rapid construction of airfields. At the present time such a force would be entirely tied down to the existing airfields, and I think if it is to be a really mobile tactical force it must have included in its organization engineer units capable of and fully trained in the laying down of new airfields and familiar with airfield construction.

Reference was made to anti-aircraft artillery. In his remarks today the minister said that such batteries as we have for the anti-aircraft defence of this country, particularly in the reserve army, are armed with obsolescent weapons. I would go much further than that and say that they were armed with obsolete weapons quite out of date and incapable of engaging a modern bomber which might be sent here. The old Bofors guns which is the equipment of many of the light ack-ack batteries across this country would be quite useless against a modern aircraft. I doubt very much whether they provide the right type of training for our anti-aircraft gunners. In fact there is considerable discouragement among the personnel of the anti-aircraft units by reason of the fact that they have such out-of-date equipment.

In so far as the mobile force is concerned, at the moment they have no aircraft which would be capable of acting as fighters to escort them. Without airfields and without fighter escorts to convoy the transports I feel that our mobile force is in a hopeless condition. It has not trained; it has not carried out many exercises, if any, at the unit level or any operations which it would be called upon to do in the future. They are confined largely to parachute operations because of a lack of landing fields.

I have made observations in the past about the 27th brigade in Germany which were based upon personal experience gained when I was in Germany. I felt then and I still feel that too much emphasis is being placed upon the infantry units when they are employed in a theatre of operations where armour would be particularly valuable. I notice from the white paper that since I spoke in the house a year ago a certain number of Centurion tanks have been issued to a squadron—it is only a squadron—with the 27th brigade. It is a start in the right direction, the direction which I recommended. I hope we will go much further in that direction. Personally I feel that it is of the utmost importance that we do.

I notice another change which appears to be taking place in connection with the brigade. Regular units or regular personnel are being sent to replace personnel which had been recruited into the first infantry battalion, the first rifle battalion or the first highland battalion, three units of that brigade. I notice that it is now contemplated that regular units will be sent over to Germany, either the first or third battalion or one of the battalions of the regular units. This seems to be a change in policy.

The minister referred to the large number of men who have passed through that formation. The formation has a strength of some 6,000 personnel, I think he said, and something over 20,000 have passed through in rotation or have been brought back as casualties. This rotation policy may be pleasant for the personnel serving in the brigade; it is nice to think that a married man will be in Europe for only a year and that the single personnel will not have to stay away from Canada for more than two years. But the policy is extremely expensive and has the detrimental effect of breaking up the units.

A continual change of personnel is not healthy for the maintenance of morale. This applies particularly to infantry units where it is most desirable that the men serve with their regiments and regard their regiments as being their service homes for as long a period as possible. Where you have certain personnel coming back after twelve months and others rotating at different periods it has a serious effect on the development of esprit de corps.

I know that I am an old soldier and that 25 years or more ago we placed a great deal of emphasis upon regimental spirit. I sometimes wonder whether the army of today emphasizes that aspect to the same extent. It was with considerable interest that I read an article last January in the Canadian Army Journal by Major Garber, who was emphasizing the need for maintaining personnel in their regiments as long as possible while serving in Korea. He points out the dangers of frequent changes of personnel and emphasizes the necessity of ensuring that a larger proportion of what he terms capable men be sent to the infantry. I should like to make two brief quotations from this article, which is entitled "Every Rifleman Must be An Aggressive Fighter". I commend the article to the attention of all those who are interested in the problem of maintaining morale and efficiency in our units.

The first extract which I should like to quote is to be found on page 23 and is as follows:

> The allocation to infantry of men who fail to meet the standards set by another corps is a common and dangerous practice for it contributes to inefficiency in a corps that is vital to Canada's defence.

I feel that attention should be drawn to that. Then later on, referring to something which the hon. member for Broadview had advocated a couple of years ago, he states that the soldiers who actually fight should receive danger pay, and he goes on to say:

> Many men in specialized corps are given educations at army expense which enhance their opportunities on return to civilian life, but the skills taught infantrymen in most cases, cannot be applied to civilian occupations. They have nothing to show for their years of service except the knowledge of a job well done. Additional pay for fighting men would help to equalize the rewards of service. It is ridiculous to deny fighting men these small rewards on the basis that the administrative effort required is too great. If the task requires longer hours of work from the staff, it would be a small sacrifice to make in comparison to that of the front-line infantrymen.

I am inclined to think that the feeling of the Canadian infantryman today is very much the same as it was during the first world war, because I would have voiced much the same sentiments a good many years ago.

I should like to refer now to the endeavours which have been made to live up to our commitments in respect to the reserve forces. That is the sorry plight—I repeat, the sorry plight—in which we find our reserve army at the present time. It is reported in the white paper that the reserve army had a strength of 47,300 at the end of February of this year. I cannot help feeling that that strength is padded by a good many thousands because when we look at a return submitted earlier in the session in answer to a question we find that only 13,715 out of the 47,300 attended training in camp last year. That 13,000 odd is made up of some 3,850 officers and 9,865 non-commissioned officers and men. If the strength of the reserve army is indeed 47,300, I feel that we are training but a very small fraction of the strength.

After all is said and done, the effective strength of the reserve army lies in the trained personnel in that force. In the past we have voted large sums of money, both last year and in previous years, and the fact that we only trained some 13,000 men for short periods in the summertime bears out my statement that we are only getting meagre returns for the money which has been expended. In other words, the reserve army needs a thorough reorganization at the present time. It must be modernized and it must be provided with the equipment and the facilities to attract the right type of recruits. You cannot expect men to give up their evenings after finishing work at their ordinary civilian occupations to go and train on obsolete anti-aircraft guns. It may be that some of the inefficient units will have to be eliminated. But this is a source of manpower which we must find a way of building up.

As the minister pointed out, this force has also been handicapped by the fact that it has sacrificed itself in making a contribution of some 11,000 men, I think he said, to the active army during the last year. That is highly creditable so far as the units are concerned and is indicative of the desire of the commanding officers who have released these men to take the broadest possible view of conditions. It points out the value of our reserve forces. All through the years our reserve army has provided the means for the expansions that have been necessary when war has broken out. We should be very careful in seeing that our reserves from this source are not weakened, and additional encouragement is required in order to make them effective at the present time. So much for the army.

I have a few remarks I should like to make with respect to the Royal Canadian Air Force and the part that it is playing and should play in the fulfilment of the objectives which were outlined. In the first place I think we must call attention to the dangerous weaknesses which existed in our air force when the Korean conflict commenced. Again it is only fair to give credit to the last-minute efforts that have been made by the government to build up our air forces. But if credit is due to the government for building up our air forces at the eleventh hour, then blame must also be attached to the government for having allowed those forces to sink to such a dangerous level prior to the outbreak of the Korean disturbance.

In the last few years the air force has received a great proportion of the defence vote. It is receiving now as much in the way of money as is being spent on the other two services. Yet the progress which is being made in the R.C.A.F. still causes us considerable concern. The program of 1951 called for 40 regular and reserve squadrons with more than 3,000 aircraft in addition to aircraft which were in existence in 1951 and of types, so the program indicated, suitable for the purposes for which they were intended. We have been told today, now that more than two-thirds of the three-year period has elapsed, that we have some 2,000 aircraft out of the 3,000, but it is highly questionable whether they are of types suitable for the work for which they were intended. So far as the twelve squadrons of jet fighters for the air division in France are concerned, I believe nine of them are now in Europe and the other three are just in the process of organization. Thus we have very little fighter strength in this country. I understand there are some nine auxiliary fighter squadrons—distributed throughout the length and breadth of Canada from Montreal to Vancouver—which are equipped with world war II Mustangs and more or less worn-out British-built Vampires.

Our fighters have all been sent out of the country with the exception of one squadron of CF-100's at North Bay which is today only in the process of being organized. Therefore we have nothing at the moment with the exception of the one squadron of CF-100's now being organized, three squadrons of Sabre jets now earmarked for NATO and preparing to move to Europe, and the nine squadrons of the auxiliary air force armed with very indifferent equipment quite incapable of meeting any hostile bombers which might possibly be sent to attack us here. Even the CF-100 squadron at North Bay is far from operational yet. There are difficulties with respect to organization and the supply of ground personnel, and so far as equipment is concerned there are difficulties with respect to the machines and the engines which still have to be ironed out.

In fact the minister in his white paper said that the aircraft we are now producing will eventually become obsolete. I suppose all aircraft will eventually become obsolete, but time is moving very fast. In fact, I do not think I am exaggerating in the least if

I say that in effect Canada has no air defence to direct attack at present, nor is she likely to have for many months to come. Our fighters are non-existent. If we are to rely upon these auxiliary fighter squadrons to produce the direct defence of Canada, it must be realized that they will very soon have to be equipped with aircraft not less efficient than the CF-100; and it takes a very long time to train pilots and to organize ground crews when the personnel of the fighter squadrons are working solely on a part-time basis. No matter how interested the individuals concerned may be, no matter how much time they are prepared to devote to the study of their work, I am very doubtful whether the auxiliary squadrons can be brought up to that state of efficiency which will enable them to be considered as first-line defence against air attack here in Canada. They will require a larger infusion of regular personnel than they have at present. I am not at all sure that we should not place the squadrons to be equipped with CF-100's on a regular basis.

Air commitments to NATO have been met but our air arm at the moment is insufficient to meet our NATO commitments without stripping, as has been done, units in Canada which are for the defence of Canada. We are told that we should defend Canada as far away from Canada as possible. That is a delightful dream, but in order to be effective, arrangements would have to be made with the enemy that they would attack Canada as far away from Canada as possible.

Mr. Pearkes: We might possibly send all our troops down to the Falkland islands, and they could not get very much farther away, but I question whether we would be doing very much for the defence of Canada if we did that. The long and the short of this matter seems to me to be that we have left our front door wide open while we have sallied out through the back door.

The government has spent millions in developing a specific plane, the CF-100, for our own defence; but until that plane is produced in sufficient numbers, and until ground crews are trained, Canada remains without adequate defence at home—and as far as I can see that condition is going to last for many months yet to come. We are told now that:

> In the event of an all-out war the most probable method of attack on the North American continent would be by air.

It goes on:

> The possibility of such an attack will increase as further progress is made in the design and production of new aircraft and the increasing stockpile of atomic weapons estimated to be held by the U.S.S.R.

Obviously now the admission is made that the communists could, if they wished, use their stockpile of atomic bombs and use their modern bombers, bombers which are capable of flying 6,000 miles or more if they adopt methods of refuelling in the air, against Canada; and we have nothing here in Canada at the present time to meet such an attack.

No wonder the minister says that the emphasis must now be changed in order to meet such a direct attack on Canada. I fear that until we have built up our defences for this country many Canadians are going to sleep very uneasily in their beds in the months to come. If the international situation, which for the moment seems to have cleared a little bit, should deteriorate again, then I fear that we shall sleep uneasily in our beds until we are provided with the necessary fighter squadrons to beat off any enemy bomber attack which might be directed against our cities. This is nothing new. I have spoken about this matter in the house time and time again. I think it was only last year that I used these words:

> The need of maintaining adequate fighter squadrons in Canada for the protection of our industrial plants, the loss of which would create such a crippling blow to our NATO effort and might prove fatal to Canada . . . must not be lost sight of.

I am afraid that it was lost sight of but I am delighted to see that recognition is now being given to the fact that Russian bombers, their TU-4's which have been tried out, are capable of coming here; and steps must be taken to defend Canada against the possibility of such an attack. It is no good to merely refer to our radar screen—if a radar screen exists—because, if it is sufficiently far away from the immediate targets to which it is going to give warning, it must be remembered that it can only be a warning system. There is no defence in radar. Radar can merely give a warning of the approaching enemy; and, unless the radar stations are in the extreme northland, it can only be a warning of a matter of four or five hours at most before a modern bomber could reach our industrial cities.

If you have no defence—and we have no anti-aircraft defence and we have no fighters—then all you can do is to tell people to run and hide. That is all the defence that radar can give you. It is no wonder that a man like Wing Commander Rohmer should have felt that it was his duty to speak in the city of Toronto just a few weeks ago and to say that Canada is absolutely defenceless to air attack at the present time in spite of the millions which have already been spent on air defence.

I could go on a great deal longer on the question of air but I do not feel that I am entitled to detain the committee much longer. However, I just want to refer to the question of construction which has been going on.

The minister referred to the fantastic sums which have been spent on construction in this country, but there is other construction going on in Europe and foreign countries. The amount spent between April 1, 1950, and December 31, 1952, is, I think, somewhere in the neighbourhood of $358 million for projects in Canada, exclusive of married quarters. That construction can be divided into accommodation such as barracks and so forth, into amenities such as canteens, recreation rooms, swimming pools, schools, hospitals and so forth; and technical buildings such as workshops, administrative buildings and hangars. I would like the minister to explain the policy which is being followed in connection with this big construction program.

Some of these buildings which are being constructed are of a permanent nature, others semi-permanent and still others are purely temporary. We understand the purposes to which the temporary buildings will be put; they are to meet the immediate situation. But what plan is being followed, if any, in respect to the erection of permanent and semi-permanent buildings? Where are those being placed, and for what number of troops to be permanently employed in Canada are those buildings designed? Elsewhere, the methods of construction and the methods of awarding the contracts have been examined. We are not satisfied with all of this construction work, some of which I have seen. In a great many cases, the contracts are being let without calling for tenders. The contracts are being let on a cost-plus basis, and they are an invitation to extravagance. There is the feeling that such extravagance has taken place. Everyone wishes to have our troops comfortably housed and our servicemen provided with all the amenities, but nothing is to be gained by such expenditures as those which have been disclosed in the press and elsewhere.

Now, to sum up my rather lengthy remarks, I feel that the program which was drawn up in 1951, which is still being adhered to, and the progress which has been made shows that, although two-thirds of the time for this three-year program has elapsed, the objectives are not really in sight. Secondly, already the estimated $5 billion has been found inadequate and is being exceeded. Thirdly, much of the huge sum of money that has been spent has been spent on non-essentials, with the result that the taxpayer has not received full value in terms of defence for the outlay of his dollars. Fourthly, Canada today is virtually defenceless against air attack, although such attack is now admitted as a possibility. Fifthly, no mobile tactical force, combining the army and R.C.A.F. units, for defence against airborne attack on Canada exists. Sixthly, the reserve army, because of lack of training facilities, is ineffective and requires complete reorganization before it can play its role in the defence of Canada in total war. Lastly, our naval construction program lags far behind schedule.

It is for these reasons that we have criticized the progress that has been made in the development of this program which was laid down in 1951.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Chairman, I am sure you will agree with me that any backbencher entering this debate does so with a lot of diffidence. Most of the members of this house are not able to obtain the kind of information necessary to enable them to discuss the defence program. In my opinion national defence is a misnomer. What we are engaged in is a global defence. Canada is merely one part of a team that has been organized through the United Nations to provide an international police force to police the peace of the world. If we are going to do that job successfully it is going to cost money. We are going to have to pull our share of the load, and merely carping criticism based on a lot of misinformation is not going to serve any useful purpose. The opinions which I shall express are based on the information it is possible for an ordinary member of the house to obtain.

We are going to have to ask ourselves some questions, and answer them honestly, in order that the people who pay the taxes to provide this program may have some understanding of the necessity for the continuation of the program upon which we have embarked. The first question we have to ask ourselves is whether or not peace is any closer today than it was when we first made the appropriation of $5 billion and allocated it for the purpose of defence. In my opinion, it is not. I have seen a lot of comment in the press, and I have heard a lot of opinions expressed to the effect that the new tactics employed by Russia are an indication that that nation is ready to put out the hand of peace and do away with the armaments race. It is said that, therefore, our defence effort is no longer necessary.

In my opinion, Mr. Chairman, the new Russian approach to the international problem is not a change of policy at all, but merely a change of tactics. I know that many members of this house have read a lot of the philosophy and the program of communism as laid down by Marx, brought up to date by Lenin and Stalin, and now Malenkov has the job of carrying that program forward and bringing it up to date. I say it is merely a change of tactics because in the past I have had to contend with a lot of these people. You have to read about their philosophy and policies if you are going to successfully talk to them in the many places that you meet them. Since 1945, and up until recently, we have been going through part of a program, as far as communism is concerned, that was laid down a good many years ago. Since 1945 we were in the period which they termed the national revolutions, in which they would stay at home to build up their own country, promote revolution in every other country, just as they have right across Europe and Asia, and then let the revolution take place on the inside of that country. That period is over.

The communists tell you quite frankly in their literature that in the struggle for world revolution there will be periods of attack, retrenchment and retreat. They are merely in a period of retrenchment to consolidate the gains which they have made, then they will go forward when the opportune time arrives. In my opinion, the program upon which we have embarked for global defence to build an international police force to police the peace of the world is just as necessary now as it was when we made that appropriation. I think that has to be made clear to our people. We have to make it clear that we are living in a world in which there are no frontiers, no barriers; it is one world. Our defences are going to have to be kept up, I believe, during the lifetime of most members of this house.

I have listened to a lot of criticism in the house, and I have read a lot in the press, concerning waste and extravagance. I could stand up here perhaps and make that kind of criticism myself. But I should just like to say this. When we made the appropriation of $5 billion and said that we were going to build an army, a navy and an air force and everything that is necessary to supplement those organizations, we were in the position where we went out into the country and took in civilians from all over Canada, people who were untrained, gave them a few months of military training, made officers of them, put stars on their shoulders and then sent them in to head up a department that was going to spend perhaps a billion dollars. The spending of money and the keeping of books requires a great deal of training and in the process of throwing that money around there was bound to be a good deal of waste, not because of dishonesty but, in my opinion, because of inefficiency. In many of the documents that I have seen, and with the eight or nine accounting systems that existed, for example, in the works branch of the army, I think there was a clear indication that there were on jobs a great many people who should not have been on them, and as a result there was created the mess that necessitated the Currie report.

I say that the minister himself and his department are responsible for permitting that kind of thing to develop. As the minister will recall, for two years, as one member of this group—and there were others in the house—I suggested that the minister should take under consideration the appointment of an additional minister. I pointed out that it was not humanly possible for one minister to preside over the three defence departments, with the reorganization that was bound to take place and with the huge amount of money that was to be spent. I said that he would need an assistant. My suggestion was not followed.

Another suggestion that I made and urged on the government from time to time was that we should set up a defence expenditure committee, a committee that would continue to sit week by week and month by month for the purpose of scrutinizing expenditures, with the power of calling in the heads of the departments and of the different services, in order to check from time to time as to the methods that were being employed in the spending of the money and in the reorganization of the forces. That committee was not set up for two years. It has now been set up, but it was set up too late.

The minister now has an associate minister to take some of the load. You have that defence expenditure committee set up and probing what is termed waste and extravagance. In my opinion there should be a continuing committee of this house consisting of some of the members of the house who have had some experience in the services, and there are about 100 of them in the House of Commons. That kind of committee would have prevented from happening the kind of thing that brought about the Currie report. As to responsibility, the minister and his department are responsible for not taking the necessary precautionary steps which, in my opinion, could have prevented the bad tangle that was brought about and that necessitated the bringing in of this famous Currie report.

The question arose as to whether it was right for Mr. Currie to make available to the deputy minister of national defence a copy of his report before it was tabled in the House of Commons. I do not think it was. I think that was a bad mistake. The way I see it is this. It is just as if, in civilian life, if someone commits a crime and the crown prosecutor prepares the case against him, he then submits the case to the accused to check it for accuracy as to whether or not it was properly prepared. That is about the correct analogy. It was the Department of National Defence that was under suspicion. They were being investigated and they were being charged. I think Mr. Currie will have to take the responsibility for releasing that report to those who were accused at that time. As to that particular angle, however, it is in the past as far as I am concerned; and I think what we must do from now on is to plan for the future.

I listened to the hon. member for Nanaimo speak on this question of Canada's present position in the matter of air defence. In "Canada's Defence Program" issued by the Minister of National Defence, on pages 1 and 5 I notice that he indicates that the department and the government are becoming conscious of the fact that our air defences in this country are not adequate. I never set myself up as an expert and I did not get to my feet here and try to tell the minister what he should do in that particular field; but I have always had the opinion that the building of a network of radar stations across this country was not enough. Of what value are those radar stations in the event of an air attack? We have nine squadrons of Sabre jets overseas at the present time and there is one squadron of Sabre jets in Canada. If something happened—and, as is indicated by this program the minister has shown us now, the only possible chance of attack on Canada would be from the air—we blow all the horns in Canada, and there is one squadron of Sabre jets in the country that may get somewhere fast enough to intercept somebody who might be coming in. I think that greater attention must be paid to that matter.

I also think—and I have thought it from the start—that sending foot troops or infantry over to Europe is a mistake. As far as Canada's defence is concerned, I believe that the main emphasis should have been put on the air force of this country and that there should be in Canada sufficient air force to protect this country in the event of something happening. In the second place, I think that the force that we should have in Europe is an armoured force. As to the soldier on foot today, may I say this. In the kind of situation that prevails over in Germany, there is in eastern Germany all kinds of heavy armour that could race through foot soldiers like nothing if it were desired. As far as we are concerned in Europe, I think the emphasis should be on heavy armour. I believe that our whole program in that regard has been wrong. I am glad to see that the minister and his department have done some thinking anyway in the matter of air defence; but I still think that it is necessary for them to give some thought to the problem of foot soldiers versus armour over in Europe.

Another thing that I never could see is the period of enlistment. You will take a soldier on for Korea, and he is enlisting in for eighteen months. He goes to Korea for eighteen months and you take him back and discharge him. You enlist him to go over with the 27th brigade. You equip him and train him and go to all that expense. He serves a year over in Europe with the 27th brigade, comes back and is discharged. In my opinion that system is all wrong. I believe that if a young man in this country is going to be persuaded to make a career of the service, periods of eighteen months and two years are too short. On the other hand, if we are going to get the young people of the right calibre in this country to make a career of the service, we must begin to understand that our defence program is not a short-term program and that it is not going to be handled by soldiers who go in for eighteen months and get out, go back in again for another year and go to Germany. They are merely Cook's tours.

I think something must be done to build up the morale of the army, and to establish the old esprit de corps that existed in the different units at the time of the first world war. One does not hear any praise today for the unit in which a soldier has been serving. They will say that they were in a year or eighteen months, and that they got out. The only comment we will hear about their service is that they had a pretty rough time of it, that they were not treated well, or that sort of thing.

Something must be done, as I say, to build up the morale of the army. I know that, under present circumstances, if I were 21 years of age and wished to join the armed services, I would want to join for a period of three years. I would want to be in long enough to find out something about it, and to determine whether or not I wanted to make a career of it. Because today in this country service in the armed forces is a good career for the average young man, and proper methods should be taken so that he will be interested in the services and will want to make a career of it.

I have made a few notes on this question of morale in the services, and have set down what I think is wrong and what should be done. There are very few things as important to the armed services of a nation as morale. Whether morale is high or low can depend upon many factors—food, fair treatment, pay, discipline, the prompt and just redress of grievances, and so on. The methods by which discipline is administered, and the manner in which grievances are heard, are as important as any of these factors. Discipline, and the disposal of grievances of members of the armed services, are important not only because of their relationship to morale, but also because of necessary limitations of civil rights imposed upon those who join the forces.

Civil rights and privileges of a member of the armed services are very much restricted. He is subject to absolute discipline. He may not sue his sergeant if he thinks that he has been unjustly treated. He may not write letters to the editor complaining about his commanding officer. He may not stand up on a soap box and speak about the inefficient way in which his service is organized. His political rights are limited to little more than the privilege of voting. He may not form any organization remotely resembling a union. Indeed any attempt at mass redress of grievances is an offence, according to the military code. He has no say whatsoever in the formation or administration of the rules of military discipline by which he must abide.

For these reasons it is particularly important that parliament exercise the greatest vigilance to ensure that members of the armed forces are afforded the greatest possible protection, consistent with the requirements of military discipline and efficiency, to ensure that the possibility of injustice and wrong to members of the armed services is reduced to a minimum.

The National Defence Act passed by the House of Commons on June 7, 1950—and I was a member of the committee which looked it over—took away some of the limited protection which soldiers, sailors and airmen had under previous legislation. Formerly a soldier who felt himself wronged by his officer could appeal over the head of that officer to seek redress of his grievance. His right to carry his complaint right up as far as the general was established by law. Similarly, an officer who felt himself wronged or who had a grievance had the right of appealing over the heads of his superiors, ultimately to the King himself. Now, however, section 30 of the new act, instead of prescribing the right of the soldier with respect to redressing wrongs, simply states that such rights and such procedure shall be as "prescribed in regulations made by the governor in council".

Again, the right of an accused person to be represented by counsel before court martial is not set out in the statute. Here again, the right to be represented at such proceedings is to be governed by "regulations made by the governor in council". This is provided by section 150 of the act.

Generally the new National Defence Act greatly increased the jurisdiction as well as the powers of punishment to be exercised by the various officers in the armed services. Previously any person convicted of insubordination was liable to penal servitude, or to a lesser punishment. Now, however, he is liable to life imprisonment or less. This provision is made in sections 74 and 75. The powers of a commanding officer were formerly limited to the awarding of 28 days' detention. Now his powers have been increased so that he may award 90 days' detention. This is set out in section 136.

These and numerous other examples may be cited to show how the armed services were, by the new act, made more authoritarian than previously and the rights of the members of the forces, as prescribed by law, were reduced. This tendency is to be deplored, and every effort should be made in parliament to afford the members of the services greater legal protection than they now have.

Mr. Claxton: They have more protection than ever before, under the regulations.

Mr. Gillis: I am simply setting out the sections of the act. Their rights were definitely laid down before the act was changed. Now they are subject to regulations; and who knows what those regulations are?

Another important element in maintaining morale in the armed services is pay. There is little doubt that in spite of increased pay in recent years there is a great deal of dissatisfaction with the rates now prevailing. The deputy minister of national defence in appearing before the House of Commons public accounts committee on May 3, 1951, admitted that one of the difficulties with respect to recruiting was that the men would receive less pay in the forces than they could get in industry.

During the war one of the social advances made by the armed services was the institution of dependents' allowances. These were paid for wives, children and other dependents, so that the income of a man with a large family was increased to help meet his greater needs. This provision went a long way toward recognizing a principle toward which socialists have strived for many years: "from each according to his ability, to each according to his need". Since the war the dependents' allowance has been greatly restricted so that now, while there is a flat marriage allowance, there is no provision for increases in the allowance according to the number of children, and no provision whatsoever for other dependents.

Officers in the three services have long complained about the requirement that they purchase their own dress uniforms and certain items of equipment. This requirement is a hangover from the old days when a career in the services was a privilege reserved for the well-to-do. A man had to have a private income of his own before he could afford to take out a commission in His Majesty's forces. Gradually this has been changed so that officers are properly paid for their jobs, but the requirement that they buy their own uniforms still remains. If service regulations require the wearing of particular uniforms or equipment, that equipment should be paid for by the service and not by the man concerned. Otherwise it is simply a roundabout way of reducing the officer's pay.

One of the biggest omissions in the attempt to build healthy morale among the armed services is the failure to provide the men with proper educational and informational services. The deputy minister of national defence admitted that if a man "goes into the infantry and remains with it, about the only skill that he would acquire would be some mechanical knowledge about the weapons with which he has to deal." The navy has educational officers to instruct recruits in academic subjects, but army and air force recruits must, if they wish to improve their educational background, take correspondence courses.

The complete failure of the services to provide proper informational and educational services for their men has led to a failure of the Canadian troops in Korea to appreciate the significance of the United Nations action there. Pierre Berton, the feature editor of Maclean's magazine, who visited Korea earlier this year, reported on his return that, while most of the officers know what they were fighting for, the men could seldom answer the question as to why they were there and what they were fighting for.

I have thought a lot about the morale of the troops in the services. We have heard many stories from Germany about the 27th brigade. Men have told me that the punishment meted out in that brigade was worse than anything they had seen during the last war, in which some of these boys had served for five years. They said it was no trouble at all to get 90 days for the slightest misdemeanour. But there was one thing that stood out in their minds. When you were sentenced, even if it were only to 14 days' detention, the first thing that happened was that you were marched off to a German civilian barber who shaved off all your hair just like a convict. When you came back to your unit after the 14 days you still bore the stigma of a convict by having had your hair shaved off.

That kind of thing is ridiculous; it is absolute nonsense.

Another mistake made by the Department of National Defence is in connection with young men of 19 or 20 years of age who are taken into the service when married and perhaps with a child or two. These men are sent out of the country but their wives are not entitled to any allowance until they reach 21 years of age. Those women are left for a year or two without any allowance except what their husbands can spare by way of pay assignments.

I suggest to the Minister of National Defence that in building up an army, navy or air force he is dealing with human beings who react to injustices and the kind of thing I have just been talking about exactly as the minister or I would. It is not hard to be fair and reasonable with these young men, who are prepared to leave good jobs in many cases in order to make a contribution which they feel is vital under present world conditions.

I should like to say just a word on the matter of production. This is all-important. The hon. member for Nanaimo mentioned that our whole program was lagging, that we were not getting the kind of production we should. That may not be the fault of the Department of National Defence. I have in my hand a copy of a speech delivered by Mr. R. M. Brophy, deputy minister of defence production at the annual meeting of the Canadian industrial preparedness association in Quebec city on Thursday, October 16, 1952. I have had this for some time but I was struck with two passages which seem to indicate that there are others in this country who are not pulling their weight. I quote from page 8 as follows:

> It is always a good thing to plan well in advance for a possible contingency but in doing so we don't want to neglect the job in hand. From the government's point of view, the task immediately ahead of us is to maintain production schedules and to get deliveries as quickly as possible in order to attain the degree of strength needed to stop aggression.
> I well remember the enthusiasm which Canadian industry first showed in tackling this defence job. Much of that enthusiasm is still in evidence and there are many companies today that are putting their best effort into defence work. On the other hand, we are facing situations where it is hard to get firms to take on certain types of defence contracts and also where there is a slowing down on work already in production. In other words, it seems to those of us who are looking at the picture from the government side, that there is a growing tendency to put priority on commercial work instead of defence contracts.

Then on page 11 he supplements that statement with these words:

Getting back to this matter of a certain indifference towards defence work that we are finding in industry, I want to point out again that this by no means applies to industry as a whole. However, it is true of certain firms. I am sure that we all embarked on this defence effort with the earnest desire to make a worth-while contribution to the defence of this country, and to the defence of the free world. I know that the delays and complexities have been discouraging. Nevertheless, the necessity to complete the program as soon as possible is still there. We have undertaken certain commitments and it is up to us to carry them through. As I see it, a defence contract carries with it a good deal of responsibility—responsibility to keep costs down, to maintain production schedules, and to meet delivery dates.

The financial inducement to accept this responsibility is, I know, not very great, but surely the returns are immeasurable. Individually, Canadians are making their contribution to Canada's defence. Industry, particularly in a free enterprise country, has an equal stake in this endeavour and the acceptance of defence contracts, even if they are not as lucrative as commercial business, is not too high a price to pay for the maintenance of political and economic freedom.

I think that answers the question of retarded production. It is the sort of story that we have been hearing since 1944, that certain industrial plants are reluctant to change over and retool for defence contracts. In those days there was a lot of stalling and delay. As the hon. member for Nanaimo suggests, there has been delay and there have been bottlenecks, but I would not hold the Department of National Defence responsible for that. The same thing happened when Great Britain had her back to the wall at Dunkirk. At that time the 5 per cent limitation on profits which had been laid down by statute by the House of Commons had to be removed. The minister of munitions and supply indicated to the house at that time that he could not get firms in this country to accept war contracts until the profits limitation had been removed. Those who were in business for the sake of business apparently did not have much patriotism or did not recognize the necessity of making a contribution toward defence. They were not ready to lose money by retooling for defence contracts.

Unless the government puts some teeth into some legislation these people will not carry their share of the load. The young man joining the air force to become a pilot may be giving up a job which pays him $500 a month. He leaves that job and risks his life because he realizes that this country is worth fighting for. It is not too much to ask the man who wants to carry on commercially, who wants to make money out of his operations, to do something as well. I think the government ought to talk a little to people of that kind.

I want to say a few words about defence research. Suggestions have been made in this house that Canada should discontinue defence research, that we should sit back and let the United States do the necessary research work and take whatever they may get. In the meantime we would not be spending money on research.

That is a pretty immature attitude for any hon. member of this house to take in the kind of world that we are living in today and with the kind of defence that must be visualized for the future. Our defence set-up will come mainly from the test tubes of the scientists. Where would our whole defence program be without the atomic research and plant that we have today? There must be continuing research into defence against atomic attack. If you do not spend money on that type of defence you will not have much in the way of defence.

On the other hand, we are experimenting up in the north country, where there is extremely cold weather, on the use of equipment, machines, planes and so on. We are doing research on clothing to enable our troops to move in that kind of climate in the event of having to meet a threat that might come over the Bering sea. That kind of research has got to continue. I have in my hand a little booklet put out by the defence research board. Its title is "Research Opportunities". I am not going to take the time of the house to read from it, but if anyone who is thinking in terms of depending only on research that may be done in the United States will take the trouble to take a look at the kind of work that the defence research board is carrying on and relate it to any war that may occur in the future he will realize that the most important part of our defence expenditure is the work that the scientists are doing in developing new machines, new equipment, new engines, further uses for atomic energy and all that kind of thing.

Actually in my opinion we are in the hands of the scientists for all of our defences in the future. I wanted to say that because I think anyone who makes the statement that Canada should discontinue defence research has not thought the matter through very far. That is about all I want to say. What I have said I thought should be said. As I said when I began, I do not set myself up as an expert. I think most members of the house are just feeling their way. In my judgment there are no experts on the world of the future in so far as war and social problems are concerned. I think we have entered a new era. We have closed the old book of history and are writing a new one. There is no charted course. It is going to be a matter of trial and error from now on, but the least any of us can do is to try to think the thing through sanely and honestly and make the best contribution we can to our country regardless of what political tag we may wear.

Mr. Ray Thomas (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Chairman, at the outset I should like to join the hon. member for Nanaimo and the minister in paying tribute to the members of our armed forces. They have built up an enviable reputation throughout the years and have certainly served with distinction in the wars in which they have taken part. They are well known for their abilities, courage and resourcefulness in the field. We have been critical many times in the past and probably will be in the future but those criticisms have never been aimed at the armed forces as such. They have been criticisms of the department and the manner in which the administration of the armed services has been carried out.

In the present situation we know that things are serious. We are engaged now in a battle—and whether it be a hot war or a cold war it is still a battle—to maintain our way of life. This is not a war as we have known wars in the past. It is not a war between countries for trade benefits or anything of that sort. It is a battle between communism and the democratic way of life. We must never allow the peace overtures emanating from the communist bloc at the present time to lull us into a false sense of security. World domination has always been a part of communist doctrine. We sincerely hope that the peace moves that we have seen in the last few weeks are sincere. I am sure that Canada and the other western nations will meet the communists half way if they are sincere and will do all they can to bring about a lasting peace.

There is the possibility of course that the new soviet administration has seen the light and realizes that a world union based on power or anything of that sort will not work but that the community of nations upon this earth can get along peacefully if good will is exercised on the part of all. Although, as I indicated a few moments ago, we have always supported the expenditures of the Department of National Defence because we feel that at the present time defence is the most important branch of our government, we have been critical of the way in which the moneys have been spent at times and still are. The aims of the department are certainly worthy but in many cases the results leave very much to be desired.

The minister said today that our commitments to NATO will be met. I am glad to learn that but I am not too sure that the NATO aims are high enough. I believe that the NATO objective for armed forces is something like 90 divisions or 1,350,000 men by 1954. If we achieve that we will have done something, but we are far from having enough available men to even fight against the might of soviet Russia for a short time until we can build up further defences. As General Gruenther said last year—these figures were placed on Hansard during this same debate of last year—the soviet active force consists of 175 divisions or something over 4 million men, and they also have 20,000 first-line aircraft and 300 submarines. These figures are out of date. He also pointed out that the East German police force has at the present time 360,000 men who could be converted into an army on very short notice. Coupled with at least 360,000 Russian soldiers in East Germany, it makes quite a formidable force to meet if they should decide to march across the border anywhere within Germany.

The magazine Aviation Age says that the 1951 Russian production was 10,700 fighter planes, 530 reconnaissance planes, 3,060 light and medium bombers, 1,430 transport aircraft and 5,000 trainers and liaison aircraft. During the same period the United States produced only 5,000 planes of all types and in the neighbourhood of 20,000 aircraft engines. It is quite apparent that at the present time soviet Russia exceeds us in air power, manpower and sea power. If they can keep on producing at this rate we can never catch up with them.

I should like to say a few words with regard to aircraft. General Hoyt Vandenberg was reported to have said that the MIG-15 is a better climber than the F-86 and that the F-86 has a longer range. At altitudes up to 25,000 feet the F-86 equals the speed and appears to handle better than the MIG-15. Above 25,000 feet the MIG is faster and has a higher service ceiling. He goes on to say that the MIG and the F-86 are roughly in the same general area of technical development.

However, we must remember that the MIG-15 is not the best fighter plane the Russians have. The MIG-19 and the LA-17 are both superior to the MIG-15 in all respects; and it is claimed that both are either in production or could be put into production in a very short period of time. It has been pointed out to us that our F-86's have proven themselves superior in many respects in Korea, although we have had reports to the contrary. We have no way of knowing, however, whether the MIG-15's that are in use there are the Russians' first-line aircraft or whether they are a second-grade aircraft being shoved into the Korean war.

Last year, Mr. Speaker, I urged that the Department of National Defence consider building more small aircraft carriers. At that time I indicated that I was not referring to the Magnificent or anything like it, but to something of the order of the old converted merchant vessel aircraft carriers we had for escort purposes during the war. Certainly those aircraft carriers played a leading role in the defeat of the U-boats in the Atlantic during the last war. That was particularly due to the fact that while our escort vessels were unable to match the speed of many of the new submarines which the Germans then had, the aircraft, which incidentally were of an obsolete type, were able to make up the deficiency in speed. I would suggest to the minister that this type of aircraft carrier is cheap, and they would certainly pay for themselves in a very short time in the event of submarine attacks in the Atlantic.

The minister mentioned today that we have at the present time 56 ships in the R.C.N. I wonder just how many of those are first-line ships or how many would be any good under actual combat conditions and against modern submarines. I certainly hope they would be good; but if they are anything like the old ones, and if they have not been remodelled, they certainly would not stand up under modern warfare.

It is all right, Mr. Chairman, for the minister to say that our commitments to NATO will be met, but we must remember that while we are meeting these commitments we must have something left over for our own defence here at home. We must have fighter strength spread across this country so we can offset any air attack which might come to any part of the country. I believe the minister said, or it was said in the white paper that was tabled, that air attack would be the type of attack we would have to worry about here at home. Also I think we need an adequate mobile army defence force which can be transported in a hurry to any part of the country where it may be needed. We should have sufficient numbers to do some good when they get there—at least sufficient to hold back any invader until some of the NATO countries, the United States or someone else, can come to our assistance.

We certainly appreciate the troubles which the Minister of National Defence and the Department of National Defence have had in the past, but I do not think these difficulties which have been pointed out should be sufficient to stop our defence effort. Our freedom, our way of life, and as a matter of fact our very lives are at stake. With good administration, conscientious defence spending, and with armed forces personnel of the type we have here in Canada we should be able to hold back all comers. We have the personnel, we have the ability, and now it is up to the department to see that we have those things which the men require to fulfil their duties to NATO and to us.

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary East): Mr. Chairman, this morning the minister spoke at some length of the quality and achievements of the fighting men of the army, navy and air force who have been taking an active part in the war in Korea. I should like to join with him in paying tribute to those men—tribute to their spirit, to the efficiency of their training, to their leadership and to their accomplishments. I was glad to hear the minister pay that tribute to the men who are out on the sharp edge as far as the defence of Canada is concerned at the present time. In that way I would hope to draw the attention of the general public to the work which they have been doing in defending all of us.

I was rather sorry, however, that the minister conveyed the general impression, I thought, that the efficiency, the spirit and the accomplishment of these men were due to a high level of efficiency as far as the Department of National Defence is concerned. I do not think that follows at all. The ability of the Canadian fighting man has been well demonstrated in every engagement in which he has taken part; and the job these men have done is, I think, essentially due to that ability.

I was also glad to hear the minister say something about the College Militaire Royal de Saint-Jean this morning. Perhaps I might say that I have a certain amount of personal knowledge in regard to the college because I have a boy attending there. I think at that college they are doing an excellent job from the point of view of training young Canadians both in the way of a general education and of giving them military training at the same time. They are also helping to foster a spirit of unity between the two chief races in Canada.

I have been at the college on two or three occasions and I was extremely favourably impressed with the commandant, Colonel Lahaie, and the way he is carrying on his job there. I did not have an opportunity of meeting many of his staff, but those whom I did meet also made a very favourable impression. I think the creation of this college will serve a very important need, one which has not been met before in Canada, and will considerably strengthen the country from both points of view I have just mentioned.

As has already been indicated by the hon. member for Nanaimo, the objectives of our national defence effort were stated in the white paper of, I think, three years ago. They are again stated in the white paper which was issued yesterday. I shall not read them but they are, briefly, to defend Canada itself, to meet our commitments overseas—our commitments to the United Nations or NATO—and organization to build up strength in the event that total war should break out.

With those objectives I am in full agreement as, I believe, is every loyal citizen of Canada. My criticism of the government is of the way in which they have attempted to attain these objectives or, perhaps I should say, how they have failed to reach them effectively. In that failure they have wasted large sums of the taxpayers' money.

For the past five years I have condemned the government on the grounds that our effective fighting forces are very small in comparison with the amount we have been paying for them. Unfortunately, year by year this situation has grown worse instead of better. If we look at the figures which are given on page 86 of the report of the Department of National Defence for 1952, and also in the white paper at page 36, we get a picture of how the cost has mounted. If these are arranged in the form of a table, as I have them here, the thing strikes one quite forcibly. For 1949-50 we had in the active forces 47,185 personnel; the cost was $384,879,000—I shall not give the odd dollars. This works out at a cost per man in uniform of $8,157. In 1950-51 there were 68,427 personnel; the cost was $782,457,000, and the cost per man was $11,435. In 1951-52 the total personnel was 95,394; the cost was $1,415,473,000, and the cost per man, $14,438. In 1952-53 the total personnel was 104,486; the cost was $1,889,507,000, and the cost per man, $18,083. For this year the estimated cost as given in the white paper is $2,243,767,000. We do not know the number of personnel, so we cannot make that calculation.

Based on the figures we have for these four years, we find the cost per man mounting from $8,100 to $11,400, to $14,400 and to $18,000. In other words there has been a steady progression upward in the cost per man in uniform. I might point out also that the strengths I have taken here are the strengths given for the end of the year in each case, that is at March 31. If one took the average strength throughout the year the figure would be somewhere halfway between each of the figures I have given, and therefore the cost per man would be considerably greater than the amounts I have given.

Now, these figures show how the cost has mounted for each man and woman in uniform. Of the 104,000 men and women we now have in the services, a large number are in administrative or training positions. The number actually in fighting units and capable of being put into battle is, of course, very much smaller. According to the figures on page 15 of this white paper the total number of men in fighting formations or units is 43,200. That would include a considerable number of non-fighting personnel, such as medical personnel and so forth. I would estimate that not more than 35,000 or 40,000 actual fighting personnel are to be found there.

This morning the minister said that we now have a larger proportion of troops operational than we had three years ago, and that is correct. He went on to say that the number we now have operational compares very favourably with other countries. I would have accepted that more readily if it had not been exactly the same answer he gave two or three years ago when I brought up this question. At that time he stated that the number of operational troops we had, as compared with non-operational troops, compared favourably to the number in any other country. Today he says we have greatly increased the number of operational troops, so surely there is a discrepancy there. It leads one to wonder about the minister's statement.

In any event we have a comparatively small number of fighting troops ready to go into action. As I say, probably 35,000 or 40,000 are in this category. In order to secure this comparatively small fighting potential we will have spent in the five years from 1949 to 1954, a total of $6,720,084,000. This is the total of the figures I gave before. I should like to ask, Mr. Chairman, can this showing be defended by the government as efficient handling of defence funds when we have spent such enormous amounts for, comparatively speaking, such small effective fighting formations? Of course the minister will say that a large part of this sum has been spent for armaments, ships, airplanes, guns, for buildings, the stockpiling of equipment and things of that sort. It is true that large amounts have been spent for these purposes, but the unfortunate fact is that even the small forces we have in being are not fully equipped with up-to-date arms. At the same time, I must say that we have more carpets, neckties, teapots and things of that kind than these forces will be able to use in a good many years.

Last year I pointed out that we now have considerably fewer field and anti-tank guns, rifles and small arms of all sorts than we had four years ago, in spite of having made some purchases of United States type arms of these kinds. We have shipped equipment of that sort for some three divisions or more to Europe. We are, therefore, in the position of having spent this very large amount, yet we have a smaller amount of equipment in many lines on hand for fighting purposes than we had four years before the program started. We have also only a small number of up-to-date tanks, of the Centurion type. We have fewer serviceable vehicles of all sorts than we had four years ago. When we come to the air force, on which a large measure of the expenditure has been made, we find that, according to the white paper and the minister's statement, we now have nine squadrons of F-86E Sabre jets in operation. These are the only operational squadrons of up-to-date aircraft which we have. There are three more squadrons of these Sabres in the process of formation and training in Canada.

We have, however, no fully operational squadron of CF-100's, the aircraft that has been announced as the one to provide for the defence of Canada itself. The white paper says there is one squadron of CF-100's but that squadron is only in the process of formation. I know it is not fully operational. In addition to that, of course, the Minister of Defence Production announced a short time ago that the total number of CF-100's of all sorts produced to date was 16. The Minister of National Defence made some statement to the effect that they had deliberately let the program lag to some extent, but that certainly was not the tenor of the statement he made last year in connection with the CF-100, or the year before that. These aircraft were supposed to be available in large numbers long before this, and in the sky ready to defend this country. We have not got them.

We have been told that we have a partially constructed radar screen, but we do not know how complete it is. One thing we do know is that we have practically nothing with which to back up that screen, either in the way of fighter aircraft or ack-ack defence. As the hon. member for Nanaimo pointed out, a radar screen is useless for defence purposes unless you have something with which to back it up. He referred to the statement made by Wing Commander Rohmer; and I too think he did a great service in drawing that fact to the general attention of the people of Canada. It is a matter which we have raised year after year, but I am afraid it did not sink into the consciousness of a great many of the Canadian general public that we were comparatively defenseless as far as any air attack from the north was concerned.

The minister also mentioned the airborne brigade. That airborne brigade, of course, has been changed around considerably because of the rotation system of troops to Korea and so forth. However, whatever its efficiency may be—and I believe and trust that it is quite high again, because the people now in the airborne brigade have had upwards of a year of training in that role—and whatever the quality of the airborne brigade may be, it would not be of a great deal of use in discharging its function of being dropped to meet any attempted invasion of this country from the north, or the seizure of an airfield in the north so that bombing could be carried on down here or anything of that sort, because we simply have not the transport planes to carry it and drop it there. To that extent the airborne brigade serves only to lull the people of Canada into a false sense of security. For that brigade to be effective we must have planes ready to take them where they are needed and drop them there; but we just have not those planes.

What all this adds up to, Mr. Chairman, is that we have not the requirements to meet our primary objective, namely the defence of Canadian territory. In other words that objective has not been met, and it has not been nearly met. When we come to the second commitment, namely our obligations to UN and NATO, the minister says that has been met or will be met by the target date. We have done considerably better in meeting that objective than we have in meeting the primary one. When we come to the third objective, we find it is to a large extent a matter of the reserve forces and the general organization that is to be built up; and I shall deal with that matter later.

The small amount of defensive strength that we have in relation to the amount we have spent is also shown up clearly by a comparison of the numbers of personnel in the forces now and their cost, with the numbers and costs during the war. This comparison shows to what a great extent the cost per man in the services has increased. The increase is really out of all proportion to what one could reasonably expect. These figures are to be found at page 86 of the report of the Department of National Defence. I have already put on the record the figures for the past four or five years and I should now like to refer to the figures for the years 1941 down to 1945.

In the year 1941-42 there were in our active forces approximately 426,000 personnel and the expenditure was $1,011,451,000, or a cost of $2,373 per man. In 1942-43 the number in the forces was 640,592 and the cost was $1,865,622,000, or a cost per man of $2,912. In 1943-44 there were in the services 709,666 personnel and the expenditure was $2,629,-094,000, or a cost per man of $3,704. This was the year in which our forces were at their height, and this was the year in which we started to fight in earnest. In spite of that fact, when we were blowing away large amounts of ammunition, and when we had the largest number of people in uniform that we had at any time during the war, the cost was only $3,704 per man whereas today it is approximately $18,000. In 1944-45 the number in the forces was 672,632 and the expenditure was $2,938,377,000 or a cost per person of $4,369.

Compare those costs, namely $2,300, $2,900, $3,700 and $4,300 at the height of the war, when the greatest expenditures of all were taking place, with the cost during the last three or four years of $8,100, $11,400, $14,800 and $18,000, with the figure still to go up in the next year, apparently. It certainly indicates that something in the nature of extravagance has been going on.

The minister, of course, may say that the costs now are greatly increased over what they were during the war, and that the general cost of living has increased. That is true, of course. But what he should add, but will not, is that that fact again is, to a considerable extent, owing to the policy of this government as a result of which we now have a 50-cent dollar. But even if you take that fact into consideration and allow that general costs of everything now are twice what they were, we still find that defence costs per man are over four times what they were at the height of the war, or just twice as much as we might reasonably expect them to be.

Amongst the chief reasons, for this excessive cost are poor administration, overblown staffs, inefficiency, extravagance and waste. The Auditor General's report, the Currie report, and the two reports which we were not permitted to see all show these conditions to exist in certain branches of the defence department. I think no reasonable person in Canada is in any doubt that similar conditions prevail to a greater or lesser degree in all branches. The reports, of course, dealt especially with inefficiency, extravagance and waste. I have spoken on those matters in a previous debate and I shall not go into them again at this moment. However, I should like to look at the matter of how staffs have been expanded, or in other words the empire-building which has gone on in the Department of National Defence.

A return which was recently brought down for the hon. member for Kamloops showed that in the deputy minister's office there are now more personnel than there were at any time during the war. What is or can be the justification for a state of affairs of that sort? If we look at the estimates for this year we find, under departmental administration alone, that the number of employees has increased from 2,512 in 1952-53 to 3,599 for 1953-54, or an increase of 1,087 in one year. If we go back and look at the estimates for the previous year we find that in 1951-52 the number of these civilian employees was 1,230. So there was an increase of 1,282 the previous year. The staff was more than doubled for the next year, in order to bring the figure up to 2,512 in these estimates for 1952-53. Well, this leads one to ask where this thing is going to stop. Are they going to keep on multiplying and multiplying and multiplying these staffs, until they employ half the people in Canada?

Then the number of civilian employees throughout the department showed a very sharp rise, though perhaps not quite as bad as in the departmental administration branch. Throughout the whole department in 1952 there were 21,782 civilian employees. For 1953-54 that figure is up to 26,638, or an increase of 4,856. And I would add that these figures do not include the casual and prevailing rate employees, who must number several thousand, although the exact number is not given.

One of the particular spots where the increase in the number of civilian employees is shown is in connection with stenographers and typists. Evidently the paper war has been and is being stepped up, although we were told last year, I believe it was, that the paper work in the department was to be simplified. Well, I can readily believe that paper is flowing more freely than ever both into and out of national defence headquarters, because I have seen some graphic examples of it. My route home from this building often takes me between the national defence headquarters buildings, and on several occasions I have seen large burlap bundles filled with paper. Evidently this is waste paper that has been piled ready to be taken away. It is an arresting example of the vast number of pamphlets, forms and letters which have to be thrown out frequently, and gives one some idea of the enormous amount of paper that this very large number of civilian employees are kept busy passing about from one to another. The cost of the staff employed in shuffling this paper about is enormous. Even the cost of the paper must be very high.

Then last year I spoke at some length concerning the multiplication of staffs that has taken place at national defence headquarters, as well as at command and area headquarters, and at similar headquarters of other services. I shall not repeat what I said at that time, except to mention that in one branch of national defence headquarters alone, that of the army training and staff duties branch, there are now seven full colonels, each with a staff of officers and other ranks, as well as civilians. All those people are doing the work accomplished before the war by one colonel, three majors, and something like twelve other ranks.

No doubt the amount of work has increased; but I doubt very much whether, so far as that particular branch is concerned, the amount of work has more than doubled, or anything along that line. As I said last year, they have to put out the same number of training pamphlets whether they have a thousand men or ten thousand men. The work of preparing those pamphlets is the same in either case. But in any event we see this enormous multiplication of effort taking place, a great deal of which I am sure does not contribute very greatly to the defence of this country, and which is certainly very expensive.

Then, extremely large sums of money have been spent for equipment, but we have received comparatively little information as to what equipment we have received for these large sums of money. Last year in the defence expenditure committee there was discussion of an item of $683 million for aircraft, about which we could get practically no information. We find in these estimates another $400 million for aircraft. I would hope that this year, when we begin to discuss the estimates in detail, the minister will be able to give us a considerable amount of information as to how this billion-dollar item has been spent. What have we to show for it? What did we receive for it? So far as we know, all we have is nine squadrons of Sabre fighters, plus a certain number of training aircraft.

The same applies in respect of equipment for the army. Large sums of money have been spent for it, and from the last information we were able to get in last year's defence expenditure committee, it did not appear that much equipment had been secured. In fact a very limited amount had been secured at that time. That is another matter upon which we should have more detailed information from the minister during the discussion of his estimates.

The minister said that, so far as administrative procedures and things of that nature were concerned, standardization had gone ahead satisfactorily, but that it had not worked out so well in respect of arms. He expressed the hope that a standard rifle would be adopted in the not too distant future. I firmly believe that the decision made three years ago by the minister to standardize our arms with those of the Americans was a very grave mistake. After the decision was made, the department started in on the program of getting rid of the arms we then had by sending them to European nations. Then the department found that in many cases they could not get arms from the Americans, and that when they did they were not as satisfactory as the ones they could get from the British.

That program had to be halted, and it definitely was halted. Only a limited number of American small arms, guns and the like were purchased. Practically no purchases were made of United States tanks. I believe the mistake then made has done a great deal to increase the expense of our defence effort, and has greatly complicated it and made it less efficient than otherwise it would have been.

I suggest the minister should tell us what amount of United States armament we now have, including small arms, guns and the like. He should tell us what Canadian forces, if any, are equipped with these small arms, in other words to what units they have been issued. The minister said—and I am not sure whether it was in his speech or in the white paper—that good progress has been made in producing 105-millimeter and 155-millimeter guns. I would like to know how many of these guns have been produced, and what units in our forces are equipped with them; because we were definitely short of guns, due to the number that were shipped to Europe.

I should like now to say a word about the reserve army. Once again I would compliment the members of our reserve army, those men who give so much of their time and energy in an attempt to keep the reserve in force. I would include not only those men, but also members of the naval reserve and of the air force reserve. These are men who are devoted to their task but who, to a very large extent, are not supported to the extent they should be—and indeed never have received the support from this government that should have been given. At page 14 of the white paper the minister says this about the reserve force:

> The Canadian army reserve force has increased by nearly 13,700 since March 1948 to a total strength of more than 47,300 at February 28, 1953.

If we look at page 7 of the white paper issued last year we find this:

> The reserve army strength has increased by over 13,000 since March 1948, to a present total of approximately 47,000.

Actually the minister should have said in this year's white paper that the reserve force has increased by 300 over last year's figure; and that is not a very impressive increase. We may well ask this question: Why does the minister take 1948 as the year from which to compute the increase in strength? If you look at this report on national defence I think you will find the reason quite readily. The year 1948 was the year in which the reserve forces of the army were at the lowest ebb they had ever reached since the first great war. I complained about this last year, because it is typical of the things the minister does. I do not know whether he does it deliberately, but I do not see how he can be doing it any other way. It creates a wrong impression; it gives the people an idea that things are better than they are in actual fact. If we look at the figures for the last few years we see that the reserve forces have shown practically no change in strength. The figures for the reserve forces of the army are as follows:

Last year	47,000
This year	47,200

There has been practically no change in those four years. In both these white papers, one year after the other, the minister tries to give the impression that our reserve forces have actually increased by 13,000. He does that by taking 1948 when they were at the lowest ebb since the first great war. It is an unfair way of doing things, and it definitely creates a false impression.

Mr. Claxton: Is it not a good thing to begin at the base, to show the increase from the base?

Mr. Harkness: I think it is a good thing if the impression the minister is trying to make is that everything is improving with the Canadian defence forces, but I do not think it is a good thing to try to deceive the Canadian people and make them believe that things have been improving constantly when as a matter of fact they have been standing still for the last few years. The reserve forces have been hard put to it to maintain the strength they have.

[Mr. Harkness.]

The situation in the reserve forces has not been good. There is no question about that. Along with other hon. members I have been receiving an increasing number of complaints from men in the reserve forces. The general situation in a lot of the reserve units is pretty well summarized in an article which appeared in the Calgary Herald of March 30. This was written by Jim Senter, who was a member of the unit I was in overseas and also of the reserve force unit which I commanded after the war. This was an artillery unit, and therefore I think he knows what he is talking about. I believe he is still in the reserve army. The article goes on in this way:

> Officers Claim Faults Injuring Reserve Army Lack of Understanding and Scarcity of Equipment Cited as Main Troubles
> A lack of understanding, a shortage of permanent and non-permanent personnel and a scarcity of good, modern technical equipment is tearing the heart out of Canada's reserve army.

And then again:

> In part, at least, the reasons for the above situation are not too hard to find. These are: Overcommitment of Canada's small, but efficient regular army, now charged with the defence of Canada and the maintaining of two brigades for service under United Nations charter in Germany and Korea; and, promises and shipments of Canadian army equipment to countries of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization have stripped stores and supplies for the reserve army.
> "I think they are making a big mistake", said one officer. "Most of our equipment was hauled away gradually and what we have left is becoming obsolete fast. At this rate things are going to be just like they were in 1939-40 when the artillery was training on 18-pounders and 4·5-inch howitzers.
> "If a third great war should come, troops would require so much training after the outbreak that it would be years before they would be ready to fight."
> This officer suggested that at least one piece of each item of modern equipment should be issued reserve army units "so we can keep up to date. They keep promising us that equipment will be replaced but, at the present rate, that's going to take years and it will be obsolete by the time we get it."
> Particular shortages are to be found in transport, technical survey equipment such as the director, so important in artillery work, and range tables, without which artillery batteries can scarcely function.
> The infantry in Calgary is not too badly off, but artillery units are in the ridiculous position of training with guns without breech rings. The director shortage is reminiscent of pre-second great war days when units made do with wax tins and broom sticks.

The article says the infantry is not too badly off, but I was talking to some infantry officers when I was home over Easter and they were complaining bitterly about shortages of equipment. They told me their carriers were about to be taken away from them. They told me their carrier platoon was the best they had. Their jeeps have gone already, and other parts of their transport are gone. Their contention was that if their carriers were taken the only thing they would have left with which to train would be small arms, and generally the spirit of the battalion would suffer seriously as a result.

It is extremely difficult to understand why the equipment of the reserve forces should have been constantly drained away during the past four years. The minister gets up here year after year and says they are anxious to do everything possible for the reserve forces, yet we find this situation existing. This equipment is gradually being taken away from them, and as a result their efficiency has been destroyed.

Mr. Claxton: The hon. member must know that the equipment to which he refers is being taken away to be rehabilitated and then shipped to Europe, and will be replaced by equipment of the latest type. That procedure is well under way.

Mr. Harkness: What is the use of taking away equipment and saying that it will be replaced, and then months and months go by and it is not replaced. These people are left without equipment with which to train. How can you expect the spirit of a unit to be kept up; how can you keep up the interest of the men; how can you carry on training if you take equipment away and say that some time in the future they will be given more modern equipment? As a matter of fact the equipment they had should have been left with them until the modern equipment was available. Then they would have had something with which to train; but to take away this equipment and have months go by without it being replaced is the surest way I know to kill interest. The article continues:

> We're not getting the understanding or co-operation we should from western command. They treat us as active force units. Returns, returns, returns, all the time.

It is the same paper war I was talking about a while ago.

> It's impossible to do them all in the few hours' training time allotted each week.

I do not blame the western command for this situation. I blame national defence headquarters and the minister. They are the people who lay down what returns have to be sent in. They are the people responsible for the paper war that the reserve army has to fight. The western command or any other command merely carry out the orders they get from here.

This article goes on to deal with other matters and then makes a few recommendations as to how the situation might be improved. One of the suggestions made is one that I have mentioned before. This is the suggestion that a certain number of officers and N.C.O.'s from reserve units should be sent on a tour of duty of six weeks or two months in Korea or Europe.

I have heard the minister say on several occasions that the availability of officers has always been a matter of worry, that there has been difficulty in getting officers. I would think that any deficiency which may exist in connection with officers and N.C.O.'s could readily be met by giving reserve force officers a tour of duty in Korea. Of course it would have to be limited in time because they have civilian jobs which they could not stay away from for very long. We have an airlift in operation. It would be quite a practical business to carry them back and forth, and the cost of doing so would be no greater than the cost of putting them in camps, sending them to schools and things of that sort which have proved comparatively ineffective. From the training point of view, if you adopted some scheme of this sort you would give these people the best training they could possibly have and make them very much more effective in their own units when they returned from such tours. You would also build up the reserve of people who had had actual experience in the Korean war about which the minister was talking. That is one way in which interest in the reserve forces and their standard of training could be improved, and I would recommend it very strongly to the minister.

Other ways, of course, are to reduce the number of returns and the great quantity of paper work involved which reserve force people on the whole just do not have the time to attend to. Another would be greater interest being displayed on the part of the government, national defence headquarters and so on in the reserve forces and their problems, particularly expressed in making sure that they have sufficient equipment. I have spoken about the matter of equipment before. Apparently equipment of all sorts is short. One of the things which the reserve force units resented particularly was the loss of their jeeps, which left them without vehicles to do all sorts of little jobs. I do not think you can expect anything else but that the reserve force officers will have to put up a terrific fight to keep their men and to get more men in the units and get them interested if they are constantly short of equipment, if what they have is taken away from them, and if they constantly have to improvise.

There is one other matter which I should like to mention briefly. I refer to promotions within the Royal Canadian Air Force. Last year I took up the matter of promotions of administrative officers with the minister and pointed out that the number of promotions in that category had been very small. I understood there was a considerable amount of feeling among administrative officers because of that fact, which naturally did harm in the service. The minister made a reply which I thought was none too satisfactory.

However, there is another matter along the same line that I should like to take up. I asked some questions as to the length of time officers in the R.C.A.F. had been in their present ranks. I received a return on the 4th of March. The highest rank is air commodore, of whom there is only one, who has held that rank for over nine years. Taking all officers, there were 120 who had had no promotion for over nine years. There were 173 who had had no promotion for nine years. There were 298 who had had no promotion for over six years and 913 who had had no promotion for over three years. Many of these men are junior officers.

Taking flying officers, the lowest rank, there were 21 who had had no promotion for over nine years. There were 33 who had had no promotion for nine years, 98 who had had no promotion for over six years and 285 who had had no promotion for over three years. I should like to ask the minister to be prepared to make a statement on the promotion policy of the R.C.A.F. particularly, and also of the army and navy. It seems to me that it is very difficult to get efficient service if you have considerable numbers of men, particularly in the two most junior ranks, who have had no promotion for nine years or more. It is bound to kill initiative and make things sticky as far as carrying out military activities of all sorts is concerned. It may be that there is a good explanation, I do not know; but certainly it is a matter about which the committee should have some explanation.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Calgary East has divided his speech into two sections, one which had to do with a discussion of policy and the latter part which had to do with the asking of questions. Since there are only two minutes left before five o'clock and we have to consider private and public bills at that hour, I thought this might be a good opportunity to discuss the procedure which we will follow after the general discussion is completed. It will be recalled that last year the details at page 295 were called heading by heading and studied under the various headings. Is that procedure agreeable to all members this year? I should like to hear comments if there are any. Is it agreed that we will follow that procedure?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Harkness.]

The Chairman: Does the hon. member for Kamloops wish to begin his speech?

Mr. Fulton: It is now one minute to five.

The Chairman: Shall I call it five o'clock?

Mr. Fulton: If that is agreeable to the minister.

Mr. Claxton: Agreed.

The Chairman: As it is five o'clock, the house will consider private and public bills.

PRIVATE BILLS

MERIT INSURANCE COMPANY

On the order:

House in committee on Bill No. 280 (Letter R-9 of the Senate), intituled: "An act to incorporate Merit Insurance Company". (Without amendment)—Mr. Macnaughton.

Mr. Speaker: I notice that on the order paper there are two bills, the one the deputy clerk has called and also a bill intituled "an act to incorporate Canadian Disaster Relief Fund, Incorporated", being Bill No. 229. There are also a number of divorce bills. All these bills are to be considered in committee of the whole. Is it the unanimous wish of the house that I should now leave the chair for the house to consider all these bills in committee of the whole?

Defence services—

241. To provide for the Canadian forces, the defence research board and other expenditures relating to defence, including contributions toward the military costs of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization; to authorize expenditures in the current year out of the amount hereby provided, not exceeding $324,000,000, under the provisions of section 3 of the Defence Appropriation Act, 1950, and to provide that, notwithstanding subsection 3 of that section, where equipment or supplies acquired by the Canadian forces after March 31, 1950, are transferred, the estimated present value thereof shall, if the governor in council so directs, be credited to this vote instead of being paid into the special account mentioned in the said subsection 3, and when so credited may be expended for the purposes of the Canadian forces; and notwithstanding section 30 of the Financial Administration Act to authorize total commitments for the foregoing purposes of $3,994,895,578 regardless of the year in which such commitments will come in course of payment (of which it is estimated that $1,971,926,275 will come due for payment in future years), $1,960,159,633.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I do not suppose any member who heard the minister's statement this morning on Canada's defence program could have failed to be impressed with the thought that if the defences of Canada were in as good shape as the minister would have us take from his statement, there would not be very much for anybody to say about it. However, the facts of the situation are, Mr. Chairman, that unfortunately there are a number of us who feel that we cannot take that reassurance from the minister's statement; because he has been making these reassuring statements every year now, particularly since Korea and the inauguration of the three-year, $5 billion program.

The developments and the discoveries of what is going on in the department do not warrant us in relaxing our efforts or, I think it is fair to say, they do not warrant us in relaxing our criticism in an attempt to obtain a more realistic and efficient defence program in this country and, also, as part of the United Nations Organization and as a country having responsibilities to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

It is, of course, true that one of the main features with which our criticism deals is the actual amounts of money which are spent; but, Mr. Chairman, it should be made clear, if it has not already been made clear, that the objection on that score is not that we have to spend money on defence. Owing to the circumstances in which Canada and other free nations find themselves it is unfortunately necessary to provide for defence on a scale with which we have never before been confronted in a time of nominal peace. It is not the fact that the government is asking parliament to authorize huge sums of money for defence which is criticized but, rather, the fact that we are told that we are getting defence which is quite unrealistic when you compare the situation as it actually exists, and the adequacy of our defences, with what should be available in terms of real defence after the amount of money we have spent.

This attempt to have the house and the country believe that we have in fact got real defence for all of the money we have spent takes two forms. The first is with respect to the details of the program announced in the various white papers we have had, as to the size of our defence forces themselves, the efficiency of the various components and so on, to the effect that they are at a certain level of efficiency and that they have equipment. That does not seem to be the case when we analyse the situation. Second, there is an apparent belief—and certainly it is so consistently put forward by the department that it may be the minister believes it himself—that money spent on frills and fineries, on things which do not actually increase the shooting power of Canada's defence forces, nevertheless is providing a defence machine which will be adequate to discharge the job of defending Canada, when in fact the things for which large amounts of defence funds are being spent will not give us any defence at all in the real sense of the word.

In respect to the first of the unrealistic branches of the minister's defence of his own department—that is, that our defence forces are actually equipped and ready, that we have forces in being to an extent which does not seem to be borne out by a detailed analysis of the situation—I think there cannot be a better example of the truth of what I have said than that which was furnished recently in the statement by Wing Commander Rohmer, which was previously referred to in this debate. Wing Commander Rohmer, in the speech he made on March 26, 1953, in Toronto, took exception to the very thing I have been mentioning, these general statements about the adequacy of the defence forces of Canada—statements which are not borne out by the facts. He opened his address with a statement or an article appearing in the press in Toronto which was obviously inspired by the department. He took objection to the statement contained in that article. We have all had similar experiences concerning inspired articles in the press with regard to what the government is doing. The words to which the minister took exception are the following:

> Backed by R.C.A.F. jet fighter squadrons and the army's mobile striking force, they constitute a military force that experts say is capable of dealing with any Arctic invader.
> Military authorities, guided by long years of experience, believe that control of the air is vital to any successful land attack on this continent.
> With a fast striking air force to guard the northern skies, the mobile army striking force to deal with a surprise airborne invasion, and a fast-growing navy to patrol the coastal waters, Canada's home defences against attack are stronger today than ever before in peacetime.

Those words, Mr. Chairman, were found in a Toronto newspaper article on January 12, and they are words obviously inspired by the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Claxton: What evidence has the hon. member of that?

Mr. Fulton: I have the evidence of other similar articles.

Mr. Claxton: That is no evidence at all.

Mr. Fulton: Perhaps the minister is indicating that the department does not agree with this statement in the article I just read.

Mr. Claxton: With what has just been said? That article goes much farther than the facts or than anything I have ever said.

Mr. Fulton: Then the minister is saying that those words which appear in the press article—

> With a fast striking air force to guard the northern skies, a mobile army striking force to deal with a surprise airborne invasion, and a fast-growing navy to patrol the coastal waters, Canada's home defences against attack are stronger today than ever before in peacetime.

—are not based upon anything the minister has said, and do I understand him to say that it goes much farther than the facts?

Mr. Claxton: I would have to sort it out. The final statement that the defence forces available are much greater than ever before in peacetime is completely true, but that vast striking—

Mr. Fulton: Fast, not vast.

Mr. Claxton: There is a fast one, but I thought you said vast. I am sorry, but I did not make the statement. I have made lots of statements and I stand by them, but I did not make that statement.

Mr. Fulton: I had not indicated that the minister made the statement, but I was saying we had experience with similar reports in the press which are said to be inspired by military experts or departmental officials. Then when we try to tie it down we cannot find the name of the expert who actually said it. I am glad to have the minister's statement. I will not go any farther than what he has actually said here. I understand now he says that this does not represent or is not based upon a statement made by the department, and that certain parts of the article go beyond anything which is justified by the facts or by any official statement made by the department.

Mr. Claxton: I said that having understood the hon. member as saying "vast". Now that I have the correct impression as "fast", I would have to look at the article and sort out what was in accordance with what I said before and what was not.

Mr. Fulton: Then we are left in the position that perhaps we had better wait until the minister deals with the matter at a later stage. On that basis, then, I should like to deal with a statement made by Wing Commander Rohmer to the effect that except for three Sabre squadrons under training to go to Europe under NATO, Canada could not put up a single modern aircraft. He said that Canada is absolutely defenseless against air attack, and after analysing the situation went on as follows:

> Gentlemen, the air officer commanding, air defence command of the R.C.A.F., through no fault of his own or that of the R.C.A.F., could not stop one Russian bomber attacking over 30,000 feet in broad daylight, unless it stumbled into the Quebec area.

From other parts of that speech it is obvious that the reason he said "unless it stumbled into the Quebec area" is that it is in the Quebec area that the three Sabre squadrons destined to form part of Canada's air division of the NATO forces in Europe are at the present time. If they were to leave tomorrow the situation would be, on the basis of this article, that even if it did stumble into the Quebec area the R.C.A.F. could not stop one Russian bomber attacking at over 30,000 feet in broad daylight. This is the situation, Mr. Chairman, in spite of the statements which have been made in this house year after year as to Canada's defence program, the first branch of which is to provide for the adequate defence of Canada as part of the North American continent.

We find the same impression being created this year, that adequate attention is being given to home defence, by the statement on the first page of the white paper tabled yesterday. It reads:

> There has also been a substantial increase in the emphasis on the defence of North America against air attack.

On page 5 of the white paper we find this statement:

> In the event of an all-out war the most probable method of attack upon the North American continent would be by air.

This statement is under the heading, "First objective: Defence against direct attack." As I say, Mr. Chairman, similar statements have been made year after year in this house and in the course of the white papers, yet we find the situation such that if tomorrow the three Sabre squadrons forming part of the NATO component were dispatched overseas, we could not stop one Russian bomber attacking at over 30,000 feet in broad daylight. We have other statements which have been made to the house in an effort to reassure the country that everything is as well as it could possibly be in the best of all possible departments. There have been statements to the effect that the aircraft production program is going ahead as scheduled; yet as a result of pressing for details we have a statement made by the Minister of Defence Production—with obvious signs of annoyance that he should have been pressed into giving that accounting—with respect to the production of CF-100's, that after four years and the expenditure of $130 million only 16 airframes and 96 engines had been produced up to December 31, 1952. After four years and the expenditure of $130 million of government funds, that is the situation.

Then we find another statement being made which, if taken at face value, would give the impression that Canada has a squadron now equipped with CF-100's, capable of taking to the air. Of course the fact is that, although the squadron has now been activated, it is not yet in a position to take to the air and operate as a fighting unit. Here is what the white paper says, again at page 5:

> The first regular squadron equipped with CF-100 all-weather, twin-engine, jet fighters, was recently formed—

It is not much use forming a squadron unless it is in a position to fly and fight. I do not know why, in these white papers, the minister does not complete that side of the picture. We find that that sort of completed statement is never made. We are left with the indefinite and vague information that by the end of the fiscal year a number of these squadrons will be operating. But we have the information, which was made available finally by the Minister of Defence Production, that in the field of air defence with respect to the CF-100—which we have been told is the one aircraft on which we can rely to meet the requirements of defence of Canada's northland—after four years, the expenditure of $130 million, and vast numbers of promises, all we had received up to December 31, 1952 were 16 airframes and 96 engines.

Then we were told—and the minister spent some time this morning in entering this branch of his defence—that we have spent vast sums of money on defence. But I should think that fully half of the minister's lengthy statement this morning was devoted to an outline of the purchase of objects and of installations which would not in fact stop one Russian from attacking Canada. Neither the Russians nor any other enemy would be deterred by any amount of defence building or construction of the sort which the minister was taking obvious pride in outlining to us this morning. We are not going to stop the Russians by building barracks or indeed by building airfields unless we have the aircraft to operate from those airfields. We are not going to stop them by building barracks to accommodate the soldiers who form part of the airborne brigade unless we also have the aircraft to lift that brigade and the places to set them down in the areas in which it is anticipated that the Russians may be making their first landing.

The building of barracks and training grounds is not going to be the thing which will stop a Russian attack. What will stop a Russian attack will be a trained and equipped group which is not only ready with its own weapons but is capable of being moved to the places where the attack is anticipated. So far as one can find from the white paper or from the minister's statement this morning, we do not have that airborne brigade in being in that sense, even at the end of two-thirds of the $5 billion, three-year defence program. But we have vain statements—that is to say vain in the sense that they are not going to help us to repel a potential attacker—as to the amounts that we have been spending on construction.

We were told by the minister this morning that the construction program calls for $358 million this year. Then we were told—and it was said in a manner which indicated pride and satisfaction on the part of the minister—that this amount was more than twice that expended during the peak of wartime construction. That is a most extraordinary thing for the minister to take pride in, Mr. Chairman. In wartime, in the last war, we had approximately 1 million men under arms. Yet this year, although we have only 104,000 in the three forces, or only about one-ninth or one-eighth of what we had at the peak of the wartime, we are spending more than twice what we spent on construction in the peak wartime year.

This fact that we are spending on construction more than twice what was spent in the peak war year is put forward as an important aspect of the defence program, as though somehow or another it was going to deter a potential aggressor. I should think that, on the contrary, a potential aggressor, if he had any aggressive intent, would be encouraged to think that the government of Canada in this year, with about one-ninth of the number of men in uniform that it had in the war, was spending with respect to the forces over twice as much on construction as it spent in the peak war year, instead of getting on with the job or providing them with the necessary arms, equipment and aircraft to enable them to do the job for which they were designed.

Then the minister appeared to take pride in putting forward as a defence of the defence effort the fact that the department, on this type of construction or on the acquisition of this type of installation, has spent more than twice as much—and done so in one-tenth the time—as the Canadian National Railways has spent in the whole course of its existence. What an extraordinary and perfectly meaningless argument to put forward as a defence of the way in which the government is discharging its responsibility to provide for the defence of Canada against aggression. All one can say there, Mr. Chairman, is that perhaps the country has rather more to show from what the Canadian National Railways has spent, even though it may have taken ten times as long to spend it, than we shall have as a real contribution to defence from the type of things in this field for which the government is spending these vast sums of money.

Then the minister seemed to take much pleasure out of the fact that somewhere in the neighbourhood of $2 billion out of a total of $5 billion was to be spent on construction—I think he used the general word "construction"—or under the heading of construction. Was that not approximately the figure he used this morning?

Mr. Claxton: No. Speaking from memory I think the figure on construction was $665 million. I think the $2 billion was for equipment.

Mr. Fulton: The minister says $665 million will be spent on construction. That will be approximately one-eighth of the total of $5 billion to be spent on defence in this three-year period. That fact seemed to give the minister a good deal of satisfaction and to be regarded by him as an argument that the government must be discharging adequately its responsibility in this field of providing defence because it was going to spend on construction one-eighth of the total cost of the defence effort. Mr. Chairman, you would almost think that Canada, during the war of 1939-45, made no more contribution to the war effort than a country the size of, let us say, Luxembourg. You would almost think we did not have any accommodation at all in which to train, equip, marshal and house our army, navy and air force during the 1939-45 war. Certainly when you come to look at the amounts that we are spending now you would think the government of that period of 1939-45 had not provided any sort of armed forces and that Canada's defence effort had been almost completely negligible.

Now when we have armed forces of just about one-tenth of what we had in the peak of the war years, we are spending as though we had had practically no accommodation for the really enormous armed forces which we put into the field during those years. I think one is entitled to ask what has happened to all those buildings which were constructed during the last war. Some of the information we now get as to how they have been disposed of and as to the prices which have been received is really disturbing when you compare those figures with the cost of the present construction program.

From returns which were brought down this session I have taken four illustrations. I know that buildings are subject to deterioration but I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that these figures raise in our minds serious questions as to whether this money is being spent wisely or well. As to the four buildings here in Ottawa at the corner of Elgin and Argyle streets which were built at a total cost of $95,600, with fixtures worth $12,417 or a total of $108,017, those four buildings and all fixtures and equipment were sold for $10,000. There were two buildings at St. Hubert in Quebec which were built at a cost of $50,724.18 and sold a year or two ago for $5,600. There were three buildings at the same place built at a cost to the taxpayers of $99,386.35 and sold for $6,000.

The Chairman: Order. Are not these figures the object of examination by the special committee on defence expenditures?

Mr. Fulton: No, not these figures. None of these has been made the subject of inquiry by that committee; and so far as I know the agenda of the committee does not indicate that they are to be examined.

Mr. Claxton: What have they to do with defence?

Mr. Fulton: It is surprising to me that the minister will suggest they have nothing to do with defence, when he devoted such a relatively large part of his address this morning to a boastful revelation of the amount we were spending on defence construction, as a part of Canada's defence effort.

Then there were two other buildings in Montreal purchased as recently as 1948 for $29,000 and sold a year ago for $5,750. Those are examples of the way in which we have been disposing of buildings, which were built at heavy expense and sold for relatively small sums, and which would provide accommodation for our forces. In the case of the two buildings in Montreal we see that they were sold only three and a half years later for a fifth of the amount paid for them. Yet at the same time we are devoting hundreds of millions of dollars to constructing accommodation for the forces which have been raised as a result of the present program.

So I do not think the country can take much comfort from the fact that these huge sums are being spent on construction. Particularly is it true that the country cannot take comfort in the sense the minister would have the matter understood, namely that the construction of this accommodation is in some way or another a material contribution to the deterrent we are trying to build up against possible attack by the only potential aggressor that could attack Canada—that is, the Russians.

Then there are other features of the defence program, and the administration and handling of that program by the department, which give great concern to the people of Canada, and which it is our duty to bring up in the house with a view to obtaining an explanation. The hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness) referred only a few moments ago to the tendency toward empire building that seems to be going on in the defence department. He has given us some examples, and made particular reference to an increase in staff which appears to be entirely unjustified by the volume of work being done. I was particularly impressed by the increase in staff in the deputy minister's office. There may be some good explanation for these figures, but certainly I have not been able to think of it. I shall put the figures before the minister, and perhaps he will give us an explanation as to why these numbers should be on the staff now, as compared with the smaller numbers there during the war.

I have here a two-page return tabled in the house. It involves only one department, namely the Department of National Defence, and contains a question relating exclusively to the administration of the deputy minister's office here in Ottawa. This question stood on the order paper for quite some time, for at least a week or two, and finally, one day, it was answered. However, on the day it was answered it was made an order for return, as a result of which, of course, the answer did not appear in Hansard. I imagine that fact would probably give some comfort to the department, because the figures set out in the return are not particularly creditable to it.

This return was brought down on Monday, March 30, and it states that the total number at that time on the staff of the deputy minister of national defence was 114, whereas, during the war, as at March 31, 1944, the total number on the staff of the three deputy ministers for navy, army and air force was 98; as at March 31, 1945 it was 93 and as at March 31, 1946 it was 77.

To understand the significance of these figures we have only to mention the fact that in 1953 the department is administering a fighting force totalling 104,000, and for that task the staff of the deputy minister numbers 114; whereas in 1944 and 1945 they were administering fighting services totalling approximately 900,000, and for that purpose required staffs of only 98 and 93 respectively. In 1946, although demobilization had already commenced, there was still a substantial number of men in the forces over and above the number there now. In addition at that time they were faced with the extra problem of demobilization. Yet in that year they were able to handle the work with a staff of 77 in the deputy minister's office.

In addition to that, there seems to be an unwarranted mushrooming of personnel, in comparison with the size of the armed forces, and particularly as compared with the numbers on strength during the war years. There now seems to be a tendency to resist giving full and complete information as to what is going on in the department, and what has been said about it by experts and others who have been appointed to examine into the affairs of the Department of National Defence.

We have seen examples in the house recently. We remember the refusal to give us copies of reports, and statements made with respect to those reports which have created a wrong impression. I would refer particularly to a report made by a member of the civil service commission on the activities in the establishment of the army works services, about which I attempted to get information on several occasions. Although it is known that a report does exist—and of course its existence is now established by authority of the statement by the Prime Minister—the house has not yet been taken into the confidence of the government; and thus far the government has refused to give us any other information as to what is in the report, or the circumstances under which it was compiled.

The other day I asked the Minister of National Defence if he would now table the full text of the report. His reluctance to give any information on the report, one which obviously is embarrassing to the government, is in strong contrast to some of his earlier statements as to the duties of governments and governmental bodies to give information, and as to the conclusions to be drawn when those bodies refuse to give information and let the people know the facts.

I had hoped the minister might show a great deal of frankness, and a readiness to co-operate with the house in this respect, in the light of a statement he is reported to have made at a meeting of the graduates of McGill University, and others held at South Porcupine, Ontario, on Saturday, March 6, 1948. I have here a mimeographed copy of the text, and the minister is on record as having said this at that time:

> Communists cannot face facts. That is the reason why the communists will not allow us to go into their countries to see and report what is happening there, or tell their people the truth about what is happening here. They just cannot stand the comparison.

I regret very much that the minister who holds those views, views which are obviously correct, should not apply them in the case of his own department and welcome us into the department to see and report upon what is happening there. I hope it is not because he feels that the department could not stand comparison. It is unfortunate that statements were made in the house in connection with this particular report in reply to efforts we were making to get it, which certainly created a wrong impression. A statement was made by the Associate Minister of National Defence on March 4, as reported on page 2608 of Hansard:

> I might add, Mr. Speaker, that if the hon. member is looking for an alleged report to which he referred in the defence expenditures committee on February 26 and which was the subject of an article by Mr. Blakely in the Montreal Gazette of February 27—in which article Mr. Blakely purported to quote from such report—I would inform the house that no such report was ever made to or received by the Department of National Defence at any time.

Mr. Dickey: Do you question that?

Mr. Fulton: I do not know why the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Defence Production should be so anxious to intrude into the affairs of another department. If the hon. gentleman will just give me time to complete my statement I will let him know what I have in mind.

Mr. Dickey: Do you question it?

An hon. Member: If anything.

Mr. Fulton: The parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Defence Production has made certain statements in connection with this report and the activities of those of us who are trying to get it which themselves do not stand up too well to analysis. I suggest that he refrain from interrupting other people, and I shall tell him about the statement made by the Associate Minister of National Defence. It was stated by the Prime Minister in the house on a later occasion that this report was not a report made to the Department of National Defence. In that respect, but only in that limited respect, the actual words used by the Associate Minister of National Defence are accurate.

Mr. Claxton: That is completely accurate.

Mr. Fulton: The report was not made to or received by the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Dickey: Completely accurate.

Mr. Graydon: Do not be so agitated over there.

Mr. Fulton: It is obvious that the hon. member for Halifax and the Minister of National Defence know that words can be used in a way which, although they are completely accurate, as they are now so loudly proclaiming in a rather parrot-like fashion, can convey a wrong impression. I am informed, and I hope the minister will correct me if I am wrong, that the existence of this report very shortly after it became a subject of controversy, particularly after it was quoted in the Montreal Gazette, was known to senior officials in his department, one of whom, after thinking carefully about the matter, found that he was familiar with those words and that he was able to trace back where they came from.

Mr. Claxton: The hon. member is making a statement that has no foundation in fact and which I think is offensive in that it reflects on the Associate Minister of National Defence. If it does not do that, then I do not see the point of his making it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fulton: The ministers of the government unfortunately are all too prone to consider criticism as reflecting on somebody and being offensive. If that is the way they react to criticism, that is not something over which we have any control.

Mr. Claxton: That is the way we react to misrepresentation.

Mr. Fulton: It is not misrepresentation. The minister has been pressed to give us the facts with respect to this matter, and there has been extreme reluctance on the part of the government to do so. Apparently the whole matter is very embarrassing to the government.

Mr. Claxton: The facts have been given.

Mr. Dickey: The facts have been given.

Mr. Fulton: A report of this kind, containing the statements that it does, is obviously not a report which would go unnoticed by the government or by those to whom it was made, particularly when extracts from it are published in the press. It seems hardly possible to assume that the government and the departments concerned would not be making most strenuous efforts to find out just what the report said, whether there was such a report and where it was. Yet we have the situation that on March 16, some 18 days later, when the report was again referred to in the house at approximately three o'clock, the Prime Minister makes a statement to the effect that there was no such report from which the extracts quoted in the Montreal Gazette could be taken.

The Deputy Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but I am obliged to advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Fulton: I am under the impression that in committee the 40-minute rule is not one which it is possible to enforce inasmuch as members are entitled to speak on a number of occasions. I have had a number of interruptions. If it is your ruling that I should not complete this at the moment I shall resume my seat, but I will have to exercise the opportunity to complete my remarks at a later stage.

The Deputy Chairman: I am entirely in the hands of the committee. Has the hon. member leave to proceed?

An hon. Member: Carry on.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Claxton.]

Mr. Fulton: With respect, I put it to you that it is not a matter of proceeding by leave, it is a matter of the right to proceed according to the rules of the committee.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fulton: Since it is obvious that this matter is objectionable, and understandingly so, to certain hon. members opposite I do not wish to be in the position of proceeding by leave. I shall proceed at a later stage when I shall be perfectly within the rules in doing so.

Mr. Dickey: Mr. Chairman, I do not propose at the moment to deal with the subject with which the hon. member for Kamloops was dealing just as he sat down, as apparently he intends to continue his remarks in connection with that matter and it can be dealt with fully when he has completed what he has to say.

I should like to deal briefly with another part of his speech this afternoon, the disposal of surplus buildings. As I understood the hon. gentleman, he was attempting to make some point that surplus temporary wartime construction was being disposed of at the present time under conditions that would indicate no justification for some or all of the present construction program being carried on to meet the present needs of the Department of National Defence.

The hon. member has placed a number of questions on the order paper in connection with the disposal of surplus buildings. It has been quite obvious from those questions that he has been interested in the disposal of wartime surplus buildings of a temporary nature, and that he has been interested particularly in the items in the annual report of Crown Assets Disposal Corporation which indicate that some buildings have been disposed of at fairly small amounts in comparison with the original cost.

The first point I should like to make is that the requirements of the Department of National Defence for construction at the present time obviously do not necessarily bear any relation to the requirements that the department faced under wartime conditions between 1939 and 1945. The requirements of our defence services have changed in the interim, and the whole program at the present time is a very different one. The construction program during the war was almost 100 per cent of a temporary nature, and I think nobody will deny that to make wartime construction of a temporary nature was obviously the proper and economical thing to do.

The second point is that at the present time there are certain requirements that can be observed and recognized to be permanent. The fact is that prior to 1939 there was practically no permanent construction for the defence forces in Canada that had not been done by the British before they gave up their military responsibilities in this country. We therefore, in starting our defence program in 1950, were faced with very large requirements for permanent construction, and wartime temporary construction could not meet that need. Wartime temporary construction is continuing to be used wherever it can be used. It is being used in its present state in certain cases. In other cases, where circumstances require it, it is being made into a more permanent type of construction by means of the installation of foundations and things of that kind. In every instance where wartime accommodation can be used it is being employed, but in certain cases we are having to go into permanent construction for purposes of economy.

I think it is recognized throughout the construction industry and in every phase of Canadian life that when you have a long-term permanent requirement the cheapest and most satisfactory way to meet it is with a permanent, solid type of construction that does not carry with it the maintenance and ever-recurring costs that must be met with in less permanent types of constructions. So much for the suggestion in the hon. member's speech that for some strange reason we were not taking advantage of wartime temporary construction to the extent that we should.

Let us look for a moment at the question of the disposal of surplus buildings and what we get for them. It must be obvious to all hon. members that the value we get from construction is not to be judged by what the building will bring when its utility for the purpose for which it was intended has come to an end. The fact is that wartime construction served us extremely well and we got full value for the money spent on such construction from 1939 right up to 1946, 1947 and 1948 when our requirements for such buildings came to an end.

One example of the four given by the hon. member for Kamloops was the C.W.A.C. barracks at the corner of Elgin and Argyle streets, known as Argyle barracks. These barracks were built early in the war when the C.W.A.C. was first organized. They were used continuously while they were required for that branch of the army service and gave excellent value and good accommodation for the estimable young ladies who served in the C.W.A.C. in Ottawa during those years. When the C.W.A.C. was disbanded I understand the buildings were used for certain temporary requirements, and then those requirements in turn came to an end. The problem was very simple. We either keep those buildings under crown ownership and let them stand empty and become a total loss or we try to sell them.

In a number of instances where there was a civilian use for wartime construction, the prices secured for the buildings were very reasonable and gave quite a nice return to the crown for the original investment. But in many cases, and the Argyle barracks was one of them, there was no civilian use. In fact they were put up for sale and there were no takers except those who were prepared to buy the buildings for the material they could salvage from them, in other words, those who were prepared to pay scrap value for the buildings. The means whereby we ensured that we got the best possible value out of these buildings was to put them up for sale by public tender. If the hon. member for Kamloops thinks that in the circumstances these buildings were worth more than the amount that was paid for them, and which he quoted from the annual report of the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation, he was perfectly entitled to go out and buy them and pay the price that he thought they were worth.

An hon. Member: Himself.

Mr. Dickey: Himself, or anybody else who might have wanted them. The fact is that those assets were put up for sale by public tender. We got the greatest amount of money for them that they would bring, and the result is that the crown has not only got out of the buildings the value of their service during the time they were occupied for army purposes, but they have also got the highest amount possible to get from them for scrap value. If the hon. member thinks there is any validity in any criticism that he has based on the questions he has placed on the order paper and the kind of argument he has made today, I submit he is very much mistaken.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Chairman, I should like to join with others who have already spoken in this debate in expressing the appreciation we all feel for the men and women of our armed forces who are performing a great service to Canada at home and abroad in these uncertain times. They constitute the shield behind which all of us can shelter. A review of the world situation at the present time indicates that we cannot afford to relax our efforts in any way to build up our defences, and I am quite sure that all sides of the house, and for that matter the people of Canada generally, are in agreement on pushing forward the program for defence.

We are entitled, of course, to criticize the details of that program, but generally I think the feeling is one of desire that Canada play her full part in world affairs and protect not only her own territories and shores, but contribute to the defence of the free nations throughout the world.

The situation in Korea at the present time, although offering some slight prospect of relaxation of tension, is far from a solution. The exchange of sick and wounded prisoners is about to take place, but I noticed in the press of yesterday that rather extensive attacks by land, sea and air have been prosecuted by the United Nations forces, that the enemy's attacks on various portions of the front have been repulsed, and that strife is going on quite close to the place which those who are arranging the exchange of prisoners have selected. I notice, too, that even at this time with the prospect of some settlement held out before us, Canadians are back in action, and that Canadian casualties are again growing. It is not a prospect that leads one to hold out any hope for relaxation of effort.

This morning when the minister was making his statement I listened attentively, hoping that he would cover fully the situation in Korea. After all, we are making there our major effort in terms of danger to lives. I thought that his mention—it was not a review—of the Canadian situation was inadequate. I had hoped that he would give us a review of the last year's operations in Korea and draw our attention to the performance of our Canadian troops there, and generally point out, for the benefit of all of us and for Canada, the contribution that is being made by our forces under these difficult conditions. I had hoped that he would indicate the composition of our forces there in detail; that he would tell us the measures that are being taken to provide protection for our personnel in the field and comment on the standard of training and efficiency, and generally give us a picture of the war that is being waged in Korea.

I had hoped that he might say something about the use, if use is being made, of the Republic of Korea troops with our Canadian forces, as has been reported in the press. I had hoped that he would say something about the equipment of our men in the field and the advantages, if any, of the type of protective clothing that has been developed for men serving in the line. I had expected that he would say something about the casualties suffered by our forces in Korea; but the mention of our casualties was confined to one brief sentence. As I recall the minister's remarks, he pointed out that 20,000 Canadians have participated in the engagements in Korea, and the rotation of units has taken place during the last two years. Then he said that of that number, 1,300 had been wounded. I think he intended to say that there had been 1,300 casualties.

I feel that more attention should have been paid to that particular aspect of the situation. As I say, it is our major effort from the standpoint of danger. Other efforts that we are making within Canada and abroad are vitally important; but nevertheless this does constitute the danger point of Canada's experience in warfare.

The casualty lists should be drawn to the attention of the House of Commons from time to time; we should not be dependent on the statements that appear in the newspapers. I notice that in today's paper the 171st casualty list was published, showing a total of 1,301 casualties under the headings of killed, 248; wounded, 939; missing, 26; injured, 87; prisoner, 1. That figure does not correspond with the return that was given to me and which appears in Hansard of February 9 of this year at page 1730, in response to my question. The answer that appears there says the total casualties to January 31 amounted to 1,335. I wonder why the difference, and whether there is not some explanation the department might give with regard to that. We should have accurate figures on the casualties occurring in Korea.

This is a heavy casualty list in 24 months of fighting. As I have pointed out before, the casualties have been suffered very largely by the 1,800 front-line troops of the infantry battalions, and a casualty list of 1,300 out of 1,800 men who appeared actively in the forward positions is heavy indeed.

From time to time I have been endeavouring to get information on another problem, namely that of ammunition. I notice that the minister's statement today with regard to ammunition was contained in one sentence. He was speaking about equipment and said something about the fact that we would meet our commitments with regard to guns, and then added that the same thing applies to ammunition. It would be advantageous, I think, if a complete report on the ammunition situation were available to the House of Commons.

On November 25 I asked a question of the minister concerning this matter, and on that occasion I was given a reply which is reported on page 63 of Hansard for that date. I should like to read two sentences from it, which are as follows:

But in this case our ammunition is supplied from United States sources. We are on the United States supply line and get precisely the same treatment as the Americans get.

On December 5 the matter came up again, as the minister thought it necessary to rise at the opening of the house and make a statement in view of some remarks I had made earlier. On page 365 of Hansard for December 5, 1952, he had this to say with regard to ammunition:

So far as ammunition is concerned, the position in Korea is precisely as I outlined it the other day. Canadian troops have never been subjected to unnecessary casualties by any shortage of ammunition, nor are they in the least likely to be exposed in such a manner.

On March 9 I again returned to this problem because of the reports in the press throughout November, December, January and February concerning the shortage of ammunition in Korea. On that date I questioned the Associate Minister of National Defence, and his reply is reported on page 2736 of Hansard for that date. He said:

—there is no shortage of ammunition in respect of actual operations.

Then when I asked if the minister was aware of the declaration of General Van Fleet concerning the ammunition shortage in Korea, he replied again as follows:

I have no intention of commenting on any dispatches or any statements with reference to the ammunition supply of other nations.

I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that if the Minister of National Defence informs the House of Commons that we are on the supply line of the United States, then it is quite competent for members of the house to ask questions if that supply line seems to have failed in any respect, and we are entitled to answers with regard to that problem. It is not an answer to say that the problem of some other nation with regard to ammunition is not a matter for discussion in this house. If we are dependent upon the United States supply line for ammunition, then we are entitled to know what ammunition is being supplied to our forces, and that was the basis of my query.

Quite a bit of information concerning the ammunition shortage in Korea has come to light since the return of General Van Fleet from that theatre of operation. He was in command of the United Nations army there for two years, and under his command were the Canadians. In U.S. News and World Report for April 3 there is a lengthy verbatim report of the questions asked of General Van Fleet and the answers he gave concerning the situation in Korea and the alleged shortage of ammunition. General Van Fleet declared time and again during the course of that inquiry that there was a shortage of ammunition during the time he was in command in Korea, and that from time to time he had to issue orders restricting the use of ammunition. I am asking the minister to give to the House of Commons a complete report, some time during the discussion of his estimates, with regard to ammunition. Are our forces in Korea on the United States supply line for ammunition, or are they on a British supply line?

Information has reached me to the effect that a great portion of the ammunition supplied to our artillery in Korea has come from Canadian sources. Why can we not have that information, if that is correct? I have heard that during 1952 a very large quantity of ammunition was shipped from Canada to Korea. Why can we not have that information here? Let us have the facts. I am speaking of shells for the artillery. I notice that in General Van Fleet's discussion of the problem, mortar shells were often in short supply, as were grenades. The infantry soldier is dependent upon the supporting fire of mortars, and his use of grenades when he is in a difficult position under enemy attack. If the artillery is unable to supply the defensive fire which is required to repel an enemy attack, the infantry unit is dependent wholly upon its own supporting weapons, its mortars, its machine guns and the grenades in the hands of the individual soldier.

A little earlier I referred to the fact that the minister, in replying to me some time ago, had said that no Canadian troops had ever been subjected to unnecessary casualties due to a shortage of ammunition. It depends, of course, on how you view the situation. A somewhat similar question was asked of General Van Fleet by Senator Saltonstall, and the report is contained in U.S. News and World Report for April 3, at page 83. The questions and answers are as follows:

—were lives lost because we failed to send enough ammunition or was it that you just could not advance?

General Van Fleet replied:

The lack of ammunition means that you do not shoot as much as you wish, that you do not shoot at all the targets of opportunity; that when the enemy is firing at you, you do not fire a sufficient amount to silence his fire, counter-battery; that you do not maintain fire superiority on the battlefield because you cannot shoot enough that you would like to shoot, and all our regimental, all our battalion commanders, division, corps, and myself would like to shoot more, and the more you shoot, the more enemy you kill, and the more American lives you save; that is just axiomatic.

I think any person who has served actively is well aware of that fact. If the artillery has an insufficient quantity of shells they cannot undertake counter-battery work, and counter-battery work is most effective in protecting your own troops from enemy fire. You may argue, and statements appear in the press, that there has been a sufficient quantity of ammunition in Korea for, as it is put in military terms, the mission given to the troops. But I say this. If the mission assigned to the troops is simply to sit in their trenches and take it because there is not sufficient ammunition to deter the enemy from firing their artillery at these troops, then that is not a very satisfactory mission on which to be engaged. It is far better to put in the hands of those troops the arms and ammunition that is required so they can dominate the field.

General Van Fleet reports that the enemy have doubled the number of guns on their front now as compared with the guns of the United Nations army. He reports that they may not have as much ammunition as has our side, nevertheless it is a fairly serious situation. He reports that it has resolved itself into an artillery war, and that greater emphasis is placed upon artillery than on any other branch of the service. It follows therefore that ammunition must be supplied for that type of conflict. He similarly treats of shortages that developed with regard to hand grenades and mortars. Just to indicate his awareness of the situation, at page 84 he says:

> Because of that small supply or critical—below the critical level—by the end of December, I had practically prohibited anyone using 81-mm. ammunition except in extreme emergency.

That is evidence from the army commander that there was a shortage of some types of ammunition. In another place, at page 89, in answer to a question as to whether the method of operation at the front was dictated by the control of ammunition, General Van Fleet said:

> It naturally influences everything we do along the front; the less ammunition you have, the less pressure you put on an enemy.

I am wondering what is the situation today with regard to our forces in Korea. They have just re-entered the line. A press dispatch from there says they have to regain control of no man's land and again gain domination of the battlefield area. Have they the arms and the ammunition with which to do that, or must they sacrifice lives? Must we have a lengthening casualty list because men have to go out and patrol under those conditions without adequate fire support? That is the type of information we want and should have, I think, with regard to our forces which are serving actively in the field.

The problem of ammunition does not stop at that point. A press dispatch appearing in the Ottawa Citizen of March 18, 1953, coming from the Associated Press at Paris and referring to the meeting of the foreign ministers of the NATO nations who are to gather together on April 23, says this:

> The critical shortage in all categories of ammunition will be the biggest headache facing the foreign ministers of the fourteen NATO nations when they gather in Paris April 23 for their second meeting in four months.

So perhaps we are facing an ammunition shortage in Europe as well as elsewhere. What is the ammunition situation right here in Canada?

The third matter with which I intend to deal, Mr. Chairman, is the balance of forces within the Canadian army. We have had put before us a great defence program for the defence of this country and for our commitments elsewhere. We have had painted for us a picture of developments in a great many fields of activities in the three services. I propose to deal now only with the Canadian army.

I think that in the last three years we have achieved within the Canadian army an unbalance of forces which is serious. In the Canadian army there are four main fighting groups, namely the infantry corps, the artillery, the engineers and the armoured corps assisted by the various services whose work is essential and is always conducted in an able manner. But the four fighting groups are those that I have mentioned.

What has happened owing to the policy that has been laid down by the minister? I am dealing now with high policy which rests right with the minister himself. As a result of the program, we have an infantry brigade in Korea and an infantry brigade in Europe. The second rotation now taking place in Korea provides that by this year three brigades of infantry will have gone through a baptism of fire under war conditions in Korea. The other brigade will have completed intensive training in Europe. All told, it means that four brigades of infantry will have received some form of intensive training or of actual active service.

In the artillery we have a regiment in Korea and a regiment in Europe. Rotation of the regiments, I presume, will result by this summer in four regiments of artillery receiving intensive or active service training and experience. I suppose a similar situation prevails with regard to the engineers, although their services may not have been called upon to a great extent; I am not aware of that.

Nevertheless they are, I presume, through rotation, getting a somewhat similar experience.

Let us consider the armoured corps, with one squadron in Korea and one squadron in Europe. By rotation not more than four squadrons have been exercised either in intensive training in Europe or under active service conditions in Korea.

What are the training results that come from a program of this nature? Let us consider the situation. Approximately four infantry brigades have been trained. Four brigadiers have received training. Twelve infantry commanders, lieutenant colonels, have received intensive training. Twelve majors, second in command of battalions, have been trained in an active theatre. Forty-eight majors, company commanders, have been trained actively. The infantry corps of the Canadian army must be at an extremely high state of trained efficiency, and I think that is all to the good.

But what about the armoured corps? It has become the Cinderella of the Canadian army. Not one lieutenant colonel has received training in an active theatre of war or intensively in Europe. He has no command. What training is there for a major in command of a squadron in Korea or in Europe? The white paper informs us that in Europe the infantry units are formed into three regimental combat battalions supported by tanks. It means that the tanks of the squadron there are farmed out to the infantry regiments. How does the major in command of that squadron ever exercise his squadron as a whole? I presume the same thing applies in Korea.

The importance of this matter becomes evident when you consider what is being brought about. Not only is it important that the junior officers, N.C.O.'s and men be thoroughly trained under active service conditions but it is even more important that the senior officers receive adequate training. That is being done in the infantry corps and, as time passes, from those trained senior officers in the infantry corps will be drawn the brigadiers and major generals of the Canadian army of the future. The artillery and the engineers may supply their quota of senior officers. But what opportunity is there in the armoured corps for advancement of any officer? There is no expansion of the armoured corps, and there is no opportunity for lieutenant colonels or brigadiers to be trained.

As time goes on we will find that the higher positions within the Canadian army are going to be filled by men who are unfamiliar with the armoured corps. I maintain that there is a clear lack of balance in the training program of the Canadian army. What a difference there is between the situation now and the situation as it was at the time of the second great war. We had overseas three infantry divisions, two armoured divisions, two army tank brigades, three armoured reconnaissance regiments, two armoured car regiments and other armoured units. In summary, the Canadian army overseas was about half drawn from the infantry corps and half from the armoured corps. And that, I think, is a reasonable division of responsibility within a modern army.

At the present time the Canadian army is overweighted in infantry. The armoured corps is neglected. Compare the British army of today. They have eleven divisions undergoing training and performing services in various parts of the world. At least three of those divisions are armoured, and they are serving in Europe at the present time. They have maintained an armoured regiment with the commonwealth division in Korea, and have rotated. From the Royal Tank Regiment they have armoured units attached to the various infantry divisions, and they are maintaining a balance between their infantry forces and their armoured forces.

I suggest that the opportunity is now and for some considerable time has been in the hands of the minister. This is the plan I suggest to him, to maintain a proper balance: an infantry brigade in Canada; an infantry brigade in Korea; an armoured brigade in Canada and an armoured brigade in Europe. This would provide for the necessary rotation and replacements.

What could be done immediately? It would be reasonable to dispatch to Korea an armoured regiment. Send the Lord Strathcona's Horse or the Royal Canadian Dragoons to the commonwealth division, and replace the British armoured regiment that is there. Or make plans for the dispatch to Europe of an armoured brigade to replace the infantry brigade now in that area. By that means a balance in our army would be maintained, and the training of our officers would be performed as it should be performed.

There is nothing more disturbing in warfare than to have a senior officer in charge of formations of which he has had little experience. Hon. members will recall that we went into the war of 1939-45 totally unprepared for armoured warfare. We had ignored the exploratory work that had been done by the British. We had ignored completely the efficient build-up of armour that had been conducted by the Germans; and we were caught totally unprepared. It was an extremely difficult matter for Canada to raise, equip and train armoured formations. Fortunately we had several years in which to do it. We may not have that time available on another occasion, and I suggest that we should profit by the lessons of the past, and put our emphasis on these two major formations within the Canadian army, namely our trained infantry and our trained armour.

What is our final objective? Surely the lesson of the second great war is this, that if you are going to fight effectively you must have armoured formations. The white paper indicates that plans are afoot for the provision of a large training area in New Brunswick, where it will be possible to train formations of divisional strength. Are we to do that just on the basis of an infantry division? Surely not in this age. Armoured divisions, mobile forces, are what are required. And that is why I suggest we are missing a great opportunity at this time. It is unfortunate that we are involved in a war in Korea, and that heavy casualties have to be suffered there; but the opportunity is there to train men under active service conditions. It is unfortunate that we have to station men in Europe; but that provides an opportunity to give intensive and useful training to large formations.

Surely we must attempt to re-establish the balance in the Canadian army that we had during the second great war, and put proper emphasis upon the use of armour. In fact I have advocated in the house before this, and will continue to advocate in the future, that still greater emphasis should be placed upon a mobile armoured force. This has also been brought to the attention of the house by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) and by others on more than one occasion. The mobility of an infantry division in conjunction with an armoured division can be greatly increased if that infantry component is provided with the proper type of armoured tracked vehicles to keep up with the armoured force. There is a great future for a mobile armoured force of that nature; and I think Canada most certainly should be in the forefront of progress along that line.

I shall not deal with other problems connected with the balance of forces within the Canadian army, but will be content to leave the matter there. I repeat that the Royal Canadian Armoured Corps has become the Cinderella of the Canadian army, and something should be done immediately to bring it back to the position it should occupy. We must produce officers in the Canadian army not only for infantry formations, but also officers trained in the use of armour as well as artillery. We cannot do that unless we produce the means whereby they may gain that experience.

Some hon. Members: Time.

Some hon. Members: Go on.

Mr. Churchill: We are spending billions of dollars in providing camp installations of all kinds. We are stockpiling soft goods, as they are called. We are doing something with regard to arms and ammunition, but we have not the full story even yet. I hope we will get it. And all of this will be ineffective unless the highest efficiency is obtained in our military formations and in their training.

Canada's shield of defence is to be found in her young men of military age. They deserve the best type of weapons and the best type of training. Of vital importance is the complete training of the senior officers; and that training is not being provided with the present lack of balance of forces within the Canadian army.

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): Mr. Chairman, I shall not take long with what I have to say. I wish to make it perfectly clear at the outset that I am not a military expert. Apparently we have an abundance of them across the way. However, they had gallant records during the war, so I will give them credit for being experts. And if I did not give them that credit, it is obvious from their speeches that they are claiming credit for it themselves.

I happen to have in my riding the best army camp in the Dominion of Canada. I am very proud of it; and in spite of all the disparaging remarks that have been made, it still has the best record in more ways than one, when compared not only with camps in Canada but camps throughout the British empire.

Mr. Hees: What about the world?

Mr. Cruickshank: I will include the world, if you like; and possibly for the simple reason that the hon. member for Nanaimo was one of those who gave material assistance to selecting the campsite. I have had a certain amount of experience in the army, augmented by the fact that I served in the battalion that best represented Canada in the army.

Mr. Hees: Or any other country. What about the world?

Mr. Cruickshank: I would include the world in that as well. It is doubtful if anyone would include the city of Toronto in the world.

Mr. Hees: It is away above it.

Mr. Cruickshank: What I really wanted to say was that we have the finest airport in Canada in the riding of Fraser Valley. We spent $5,491,887.86—we keep very close track of it—on that airport. There are three all-steel hangars, and they are not those little jerkwater hangars like they have around Malton. They are capable of handling the largest plane manufactured in Canada or any other part of the world. We have accommodation for 88 officers and 1,152 men.

What I am saying is borne out by the press of British Columbia and by other people who may not be so well versed in military lore or other military matters as my hon. friends in the opposition. I repeat that we have the best airport in Canada. That is the opinion of qualified airmen who actually have flown planes, not men who were behind the lines reading books on military law and strategy. Those men knew what they were talking about. They have said that this is the best airport in Canada, and the press of Vancouver agree with that.

At the present time I am sorry to say that this airport is made use of only when planes carrying the Minister of National Defence, the Minister of Transport or the Minister of Defence Production cannot land at the fog-bound airport at Vancouver. The Abbotsford airport is fog-free at all times of the year. Even with all the accommodation I have mentioned we have only 65 men stationed there at the present time.

I am not trying to be critical. The people of my riding do not care how much money is spent on national defence, for they believe that the best way to prevent actual war is by working through the United Nations. I am sorry my friends in the far corner do not believe in the United Nations. We in the Fraser valley definitely do. I presume those in the far corner do not, because of their past utterances to the effect that they believe the United Nations is just a bunch of communists and socialists. I want that on the record.

We cannot understand why this airport only 20 miles from the heart of Vancouver as an aeroplane flies is not made use of. We are willing to submit to any taxation necessary to improve our defences. I urge the Minister of National Defence to make use of this airport. I am not doing this in a spirit of warmongering, but simply because this third largest city in Canada is situated on the most vulnerable spot of the Pacific coast if we are ever attacked. Under these circumstances surely an airport such as that should be made use of.

I want the minister to appreciate the facilities that are available there. I know he is aware that they are there, because I had the privilege of showing him through the stainless steel kitchen. I do not want it to rust for lack of use. I urge the Minister of National Defence, if not in the immediate future then certainly at some time soon, to give consideration to utilizing these airport facilities in the defence of the Pacific coast and the rest of Canada.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, you will recall that just before six o'clock I was invited to continue certain remarks I was making at that time having to do with the suppression of a certain report dealing with the Department of National Defence. At that time the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Defence Production entered the discussion and criticized what I had said with regard to the disposal by Crown Assets Disposal Corporation of certain buildings which were previously owned by the Department of National Defence and which had been declared surplus.

I am sure the hon. member will take this in good part, but in what he said he appeared to miss completely the point I was trying to make, which was not concerned exclusively or even very much with the small prices actually received by Crown Assets Disposal Corporation for these buildings but with the fact that at the very time the department was declaring surplus and disposing of buildings which apparently had been useful at one time for the purposes of defence, they were taxing the people of Canada to provide other buildings for accommodation purposes at enormous cost. It was not only the fact that these buildings were disposed of at sums not more than—

Mr. Claxton: Were those department of defence buildings?

Mr. Fulton: All but the one example I gave this afternoon were department of defence buildings.

Mr. Claxton: None of them were in Montreal.

Mr. Fulton: They were used for defence purposes, to house defence personnel, except in one case in Montreal. In that particular case the building was disposed of for about one-fifth of what it had cost, while the defence buildings were disposed of for only one-tenth of what they had cost.

One interesting thing about the remarks this afternoon by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Defence Production was the suggestion that since these buildings were disposed of by public tender, anyone who felt that the government was not getting the best possible prices—and particularly if I felt that the government was not getting the best possible prices for them—I was free to go and bid on them and buy them in, I suppose for the purpose of selling them at a profit.

I realize that the government, this government particularly, is not too much concerned with the relationship between members of parliament, or indeed between members of the cabinet, and the government in connection with transactions involving profit when members of the cabinet or members of parliament are dealing with the government, as has been shown recently by the instance of the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys who, in common with his colleagues in the cabinet, appears to feel that it is perfectly all right for ministers to have these direct financial dealings with the government. I suggest to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Defence Production that he consult the Senate and House of Commons Act which raises some serious doubts as to the propriety of members having dealings with the government or with government agencies of the sort which he suggests I might have if I questioned the amount which the government received.

While it might well be that hon. members opposite would welcome the fact that I was compelled to resign my seat, I assure them that I do not intend to give them any such ready-made method of getting me out of the House of Commons.

Mr. Dickey: Labour this a little more! It is laboured.

Mr. Fulton: It is a point which perhaps requires some labouring because the government seems to be extremely indifferent to the propriety of the sort of course suggested by the parliamentary assistant.

The thing I wanted to deal with specifically this evening was the report on certain establishments in the Department of National Defence which has come to light, although the government has refused to table the full text. As I pointed out before six o'clock, the Associate Minister of National Defence used words in connection with the matter which while accurate in themselves had the effect of creating an impression which did not accord with the facts. The associate minister was very careful to add the qualification that the report was never made to or received by the Department of National Defence at any time. I think he will agree with me when I say that he did use words which left the impression that his department and the government as a whole had no knowledge of that report.

Mr. Campney: Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege, I made the statement attributed to me by the hon. member for Kamloops and I meant exactly what I said. I was speaking for the department which I then represented, and I do not think it is in order for the hon. member to read a further meaning into my words beyond the ordinary meaning of the words which I used and which I meant.

Mr. Fulton: The words the minister used are now on record in the course of this discussion. That, I point out, was on March 4, which would be five days after certain extracts from the report had been quoted in the press. These extracts, from which I shall quote shortly, raised very serious considerations as to the efficiency of the Department of National Defence. I doubt if either of the ministers would suggest, and certainly I would not suggest, that the government would be so completely indifferent to the implications or import of these passages that they would not be making fairly strenuous efforts to determine whether such a report was made, exactly where it was and the circumstances under which it was made. If it was discovered that there never had been such a report or memorandum or writing they would not have lost very much time in denying the existence of the report and in telling the house that there was no such writing in the possession of the government.

But not very long after that I had occasion to refer to this matter again in the house; that was on March 12. At that time I was challenged to produce the report, to which I replied that the government had the report and that I had asked them to produce it, and if they denied the accuracy of anything I was saying then I suggested they produce the records and prove that what I said was inaccurate. That challenge, I might say, was not taken up by the government.

Four days later, on March 16, these extracts which had appeared in the press, and the existence of the report, were again referred to. On that occasion the Prime Minister intervened and said, with reference to the earlier statement by the Associate Minister of National Defence, that the hon. gentleman had stated that there was no report of which these excerpts, referring to the excerpts that had appeared in the press, would be extracts. On the same date he also said there had been no indication of where these excerpts had come from.

This was on March 16, some 18 days after the appearance of these quotations in the press. I suggest to you sir that if the Prime Minister was able to state that there was no report of which these excerpts would be excerpts, and was able to reinforce what the Associate Minister of National Defence had earlier said, that there were no such reports in the possession of the Department of National Defence, it is then very obvious that the government had been making pretty intensive inquiries to ascertain what were the true facts. As every hon. member will agree, and as I will be the first to maintain, when the Prime Minister makes a statement on a matter which is within his knowledge as prime minister and head of the nation, then that statement must be accepted and we accept the fact that it is a statement made on his responsibility as Prime Minister.

I doubt very much if it would be proper—certainly it would not be accepted by hon. gentlemen opposite—for us to suggest that the Prime Minister would make that statement without having been informed that pretty intensive inquiries had been made within the department and by the government as a whole. I think I should interject here that the report in question was a report made by an official of the civil service commission concerning establishments as the result of a request made by the Department of National Defence, and a report made as the result of a survey of the army works service and the establishment of that service, which was the object of the request by the Department of National Defence. The report was made and it was in the possession and under the control of the government, as the Prime Minister's subsequent statement revealed.

But it is important to realize that at three o'clock in the afternoon of March 16 the Prime Minister made a statement which threw very grave doubts upon the accuracy of an earlier statement that had been made from this side of the house concerning the report; and he made that statement some 18 days after the matter had first become a subject of controversy in the house and a subject of discussion in the press. I raise very seriously the question of whether the government knew anything more about that report at 3.30 on the afternoon of March 16 than they knew about it at 3 o'clock on the afternoon of March 16. Are we to suppose that after 18 days of intensive search and inquiry as to the existence of the report, as to its whereabouts and the circumstances under which it was made, the government was in complete ignorance at 3 o'clock and yet at 3.30 that same afternoon knew all about it? I suggest to you, sir, that that supposition does not stand up; but if that is the case, then I would expect and would welcome verification from the government that those were the circumstances.

But the facts again are that, although at 3 o'clock on March 16 the Prime Minister made the statement in which he indicated that he was informed that there was no report of which these excerpts would be excerpts, nevertheless at 3.30 he made an entirely different statement in which he placed on the record the fact that there was such a report, that it was made by an official of the civil service commission, that it was in the possession and under the control of the government and that its whereabouts were known to the government.

These circumstances would not call for the comment they do if there had not been another event which took place between 3 and 3.30 o'clock on the afternoon of March 16. After all, the Prime Minister is entitled to change his mind. It has happened before in connection with orders in council whose existence he assured the house he had not known about or had forgotten. Therefore we might be inclined to accept in good faith the statement that the government knew more about this report at 3.30 on March 16 than it knew at 3 o'clock were it not for this other very significant fact, that at about 3.10 p.m. on March 16 the afternoon edition of the Ottawa Journal appeared on the streets, and these afternoon editions are in the lobbies of the House of Commons at about 3.15. On this particular afternoon the afternoon edition of the Ottawa Journal was received in the House of Commons, and it carried a complete statement as to the circumstances of the making of the report which verified its existence.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I should like to know what we are talking about.

Mr. Harkness: If you will just listen you will find out.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): I have been listening for more than half an hour and I do not know yet what we are talking about.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Fulton: It also pointed out that the report had been delivered to the immediate senior of its author at the time and that the man who had been his senior at the time he made his investigation—

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Chairman, I am sorry to—

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): I rise on a point of order.

The Deputy Chairman: I must remind the hon. member that the member who has the floor may not be interrupted without his consent.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): May I point out to you, Mr. Chairman, that it is not my intention to interrupt the hon. gentleman. I merely want to know what we are talking about.

Mr. Fraser: Do you know what you are talking about?

Mr. Hees: He doesn't know.

Mr. Fulton: It was then fifteen—

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Hees: Go out and have a sleep.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I do not like to be unpleasant to any other hon. member—

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): You are not unpleasant; you are the most pleasant fellow in the world, but I want to know what you are pleasant about.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I must remind hon. members once more that the hon. gentleman who has the floor must not be interrupted without his consent.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): What is he talking about?

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Chairman, if you refuse to tell us what he is talking about perhaps the hon. gentleman is in a position to tell us what he is talking about.

Mr. Fulton: I do ask the hon. member, with all the good will in the world, to appreciate the fact that I have done my best to explain to hon. members what I am talking about and the seriousness of what I have to say. If the hon. member is unable to understand me at the moment I do urge him to read it in Hansard tomorrow, when I think he will grasp the full implications of it.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Hees: Oh, sit down.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): The hon. gentleman has put a question to me, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Fulton: In the circumstances I ask the hon. gentleman if he will do me a favour and let me continue without interruption.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): It is not a matter of favour.

Mr. Fulton: I am sure all hon. members will appreciate that.

[Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont).]

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): The hon. gentleman has already told us that we are supposed to understand what he is talking about, but the fact that we are supposed to understand, Mr. Chairman, does not mean that we do understand. Therefore the hon. gentleman is supposed to give us his ideas in such a way that everybody will understand and will not have to go to Hansard tomorrow.

Mr. Hees: You will feel better tomorrow.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Once again may I please remind hon. members that the hon. member for Kamloops has the floor and may not be interrupted without his consent.

Mr. Fulton: I think the facts I have recounted to the committee so far are facts which raise implications, the answer to which is perfectly obvious and which it should not be necessary for me to emphasize on this occasion, except that I do want to make it perfectly clear that I question very seriously whether the government knew anything more about these circumstances at 3.30 o'clock on March 16 than it knew about them at 3 o'clock; and it is, I say, a very unfortunate and serious circumstance that it should be necessary for outside evidence to come in and make it clear beyond any peradventure of doubt that the facts are as we have alleged them, before the government admits in fact they are as we have alleged them.

I say to you, sir, that it should not be necessary, in connection with matters of this importance, dealing with the Department of National Defence, a subject so vital to the welfare of the country, for this sort of circumstance to develop before the government admits and places the house and the country in possession of all the facts; because, as I say to you, sir, when ministers make statements we on this side of the house and the country as a whole are bound to accept them as full and frank statements of all the facts in connection with the situation.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Sure.

Mr. Fulton: And we like to do that; we want to do that.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Do it.

Mr. Fulton: And we regret very much—

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): No, no.

Mr. Fulton: —that at any time a question should arise as to whether the government does in fact take the house and the country into its confidence in connection with these matters.

Now, sir, the existence of this report has been established, and it raises very serious questions not only with relation to the circumstances I have been describing and the matter of whether or not confidence should be placed in statements made by the government, but it also raises very serious questions as to the administration of the department itself.

The minister has told us on earlier occasions something to the effect that this is not a report; it is only a memorandum. It might be interesting for us to indulge in some speculation as to when a report is not a report. It is only a report, apparently, when its contents happen to suit the thinking of the government; but if it does not happen to suit their thinking, then apparently it gets put into a pigeonhole and is never taken out again unless it should come accidentally to the attention of other people against the desires of the government, when it is called not a report but a memorandum.

The fact is that this written document contains very serious criticisms of the Department of National Defence with respect to the army works service particularly. The other fact is that this report was made in September, 1949, and it reveals that the circumstances with regard to the activities of the army works service in September, 1949, were exactly the same as they were two and one-half years later, at the time Mr. Currie made his investigation. That being the case, the inescapable conclusion is that the government knew about these circumstances, or if they did not, they most certainly should have known; but they did nothing about them. They kept the matter under cover until the development of the irregularities at Petawawa became of such a serious nature that it was no longer possible to conceal from the people the true facts with respect to the administration of the department.

The reason I make that statement, Mr. Chairman, is that the report that I am referring to, the MacNab report, refers to a situation at Halifax which is in the same terms—

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): I have a question to ask the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Fulton: —as those which were subsequently used by Mr. Currie in his report. Here is what the MacNab report had to say:

> The slowness of the tradesmen (at Halifax) is a standing joke—

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): I rise on a point of order.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Fulton: I continue:

> The slowness of the tradesmen (at Halifax) is a standing joke in the garrison. As an example, I was shown a plywood partition about six feet wide and told that it actually took four carpenters two weeks to build it.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): I rise on a point of order.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Fulton: A bit later with respect to Halifax:

> The command engineer officer (at Halifax) said they weren't ready for a survey and that he knew many things were wrong.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Both of us are on our feet.

The Chairman: Order. Do I understand the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont is now rising on a point of order?

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): You are right. The hon. member for Kamloops has been talking about evidence. I should like to know what is his definition of evidence.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. Fulton: As I was saying, Mr. Chairman, the report made by the official of the civil service commission who made a survey—

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): No, no, not that. I hope you will not accept that.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Fulton: —shows circumstances found and reported upon to be exactly as those that were found by Mr. Currie. We have this particular extract:

> I came to the conclusion that number six works company must be known in Halifax by workmen as a good place to get a soft job and a good place for third-class tradesmen to roost to their heart's content.

I am not doing this with any desire to make an invidious distinction as between one locality or another. I took these two excerpts because they do prove conclusively that the situation at Halifax was known to officials in the employ of this government two and a half years before Mr. Currie made his investigation. When Mr. Currie made his investigation, he found exactly the same circumstances at Halifax as well as at other places. It is particularly because the incidents at Halifax proved the truth of that general assertion that I have referred to them.

Mr. Dickey: I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question?

Mr. Fulton: Up to the moment I have been making these remarks under considerable difficulty. I wonder if the hon. member would reserve his question until a later stage, or until I have concluded this part of my remarks?

Mr. Dickey: I shall be delighted.

Mr. Fulton: What Mr. Currie said is reported at page 728 of Hansard for December 15, 1952. It reads as follows:

> As an example of what can be and actually has been done to remedy conditions quickly, it is interesting to follow the action which was taken at Halifax immediately following my inspection early in September. I reported verbally to national defence headquarters that conditions at Halifax were not satisfactory. As had been found at other establishments, stores, accounting and administrative procedures had broken down seriously. Senior officers were immediately dispatched from Ottawa to look into the situation. They took remedial action at once. Certain key personnel were replaced; others were put on notice; temporary stores and clerical staff together with a labour force were engaged to clean up the situation and bring the accounting records up to date.
> In November, I was invited to return to Halifax to examine the results of the vigorous action which had been taken. I found that remarkable changes had been made. The company had been completely reorganized.

A little later on he said:

> As a result of what had been done the unit had been placed in a position to function properly and to carry on with normal efficiency.

So, Mr. Chairman, what happened was this. In April, 1952, Mr. Currie was appointed to investigate the whole situation in the army works services. He found a chaotic condition at Halifax, exactly the same as that reported in September, 1949, by Mr. MacNab. Mr. Currie outlines the situation here. He tells the officials in the department what the circumstances are, and by now the matter has reached such proportions the department knows it cannot keep this under the cover any longer, so active steps are taken to deal with the situation at Halifax. Only three months later Mr. Currie says that he goes back to Halifax and finds that effective action has been taken.

Now, when we apply that situation to the whole of the Currie report, in which he reports on the administrative breakdown in the Department of National Defence and in which he says that at various army works service establishments he finds this chaotic condition, you can see, Mr. Chairman, how important this is, and how unfortunate it is that the government did not take effective action in September, 1949 to deal with the situation which was then drawn to its attention but which it preferred to ignore. Effective action was taken as a result of Mr. Currie's inquiry because the matter had come into the realm of public knowledge and public discussion, and could not be kept under the carpet any longer. A report was in their possession as long ago as September, 1949, yet they did nothing about it.

Of course, various attempts are made to minimize this matter and say that this is not a report at all but merely a memorandum. When the matter becomes one of public knowledge and public discussion, officials of the department write to reporters objecting to what those reporters may say about it.

In this connection I think the public should be, and is, very much concerned. Certainly my impression is that the public is very much concerned about the way in which the Minister of National Defence has sheltered behind his deputy, and has allowed and encouraged his deputy minister to make representations which should have been made by the minister. Let there be no doubt about the situation in this regard. To criticize what has happened in this case is not to criticize the civil service. It is to criticize the government for not cleaning up affairs in its own department initially, and then leaving things in a position where civil servants feel that they have to enter the lists of controversy in order to defend things that are going on in their department.

Just two days ago we were told by the Minister of National Defence that he approved the writing of the letter by the deputy minister, and that places upon the minister the onus of a very serious charge. It is the charge of using the civil service in a manner in which it is most improper for the government to use it. If the deputy minister felt keenly about this and wanted to write such a letter, that is a matter which can be understood. But if the minister approved that course of action, and in fact encouraged it, I submit to you that would be a most improper course of action for a responsible minister of the crown to take. If there were things which required to be said regarding this matter of public political controversy, it was for the minister to say them and not his deputy.

I am glad to note that the deputy did go to the minister before he wrote the letter. As I have said, his motives and his feelings with respect to what was going on are matters we can appreciate, because he is a normal person. But the fact that the minister would allow him to fall into what I suggest was an error and would, in fact, encourage him to do so, thus leaving the responsibility on his deputy instead of assuming it himself, is most reprehensible.

In this connection I do not leave it, sir, on the basis that I am a constitutional expert. I base my position on a book which is accepted as the authority on the British constitution, written by Mr. Ivor Jennings, in which at pages 143 and 144 you find the following passages:

> The responsibility of ministers to the House of Commons is no fiction, though it is not so simple as it sounds. All decisions of any consequence are taken by ministers, either as such or as members of the cabinet. All decisions taken by civil servants are taken on behalf of ministers and under their control. If the minister chooses, as in the large departments inevitably he must, to leave decisions to civil servants, then he must take the political consequences of any defect of administration, any injustice to an individual, or any policy disapproved by the House of Commons. He cannot defend himself by blaming the civil servant. If the civil servant could be criticized, he would require the means of defending himself. If the minister could blame the civil servant, then the civil servant would require the power to blame the minister. In other words, the civil servant would become a politician. The fundamental principle of our system of administration is, however, that the civil service should be impartial and, as far as may be possible, anonymous.

I am quite sure, Mr. Chairman, there is not a member of the house on either side who, if he but reflects upon the matter, would not agree with that statement of principle. Yet the minister has made two if not more most important departures from that principle, and has taken actions which place him in direct violation of the principle of independence of the civil service. He has encouraged his deputy minister to take action with respect to a matter which is in the realm of political controversy, which is going to involve the department and the civil service in criticism. Jennings says that if the civil servant can be criticized, he would require the means to defend himself.

It is one of the principles of our government that civil servants do not speak on matters of policy. They do not have the means of defending themselves. It is therefore important—and I make this statement with due regard for its implications—that in the House of Commons we should avoid criticizing civil servants with respect to matters of government policy. Our criticism should be directed toward the government. When the minister encourages his deputy minister, his senior civil servant, to take a position with respect to a matter of political controversy, then he inevitably and most improperly exposes that civil servant to criticism in the house. I am not going to say anything beyond that point. My quarrel is with the minister and with the government, not with the civil servant who was led into placing himself in that position.

Then Jennings goes on to say:

If the minister could blame the civil servant, then the civil servant would require the power to blame the minister.

There is controversy here. There are criticisms in connection with the letter which the deputy minister wrote to Mr. Stevenson because of the facts which I have put on the records of the house regarding the circumstances surrounding this MacNab report. Yet the minister encouraged the writing of that letter. The minister has told us that he approved the letter and said, "Yes; go on and write it". I think it is most extraordinary that the minister did not say, "I will sign that letter; the responsibility is mine, not yours". The minister is now in a position to say, and has to say, that any fault or inaccuracy or otherwise is, of course, in the deputy minister's letter. He says it is perfectly accurate. There is a controversy as to that.

Mr. Claxton: What controversy?

Mr. Fulton: What position is the minister left in? He has to say, "That is a letter of my deputy". It is a letter of his deputy. So if there is any blame to be attached or any criticism to be made, the situation would be that the minister would have to blame the civil servant. But it is not open to a civil servant to answer, or to blame the minister. So we have a complete breach and a complete disregard of two of the most important principles with regard to the position of the civil service. The fact is that as a result of this course of action what is likely to happen is just what Jennings has said:

In other words, the civil servant would become a politician. The fundamental principle of our system of administration is, however, that the civil service should be impartial and, as far as may be possible, anonymous.

Mr. Cruickshank: Is that the Jennings of the restaurant?

Mr. Fulton: I did not hear what the hon. member said. What did he say?

Mr. Brooks: Something silly.

Mr. Fulton: I am not sure whether or not the remark will appear in Hansard; but as I did not hear it, I cannot answer it.

Mr. Cruickshank: I asked whether that was the Jennings of the restaurant.

Mr. Fulton: If the hon. member for Fraser Valley thinks that Mr. Jennings of the restaurant—estimable character though he may be—is an authority on constitutional matters, I shall leave him to continue in that belief. However, I do not think he holds it seriously and I greatly doubt that any other member of the House of Commons would not know the Jennings to whom I was referring.

The situation is this. Since this matter first came up, that is to say, the question of the Currie report itself and the question later on of the MacNab report and all these various matters involving criticism of his department—the Minister of National Defence has been, I submit, too prone to leave responsibility with those who should not be required to bear the political responsibility, and he still owes to the house a great many things by way of explanation with regard to the circumstances surrounding this whole matter. He owes us an explanation as to why they chose to disregard the MacNab report. He owes us an explanation as to why they chose to leave the impression with the house and the country that there was no such report; and why it was that they did not do anything to remove that impression until after the evening edition of the Ottawa Journal of March 16 proved beyond a doubt that there was such a report and that the government could no longer get away with the fiction it was trying to maintain in this matter, and indeed in connection with the whole matter of national defence.

The minister and his associate owe a duty not only to the house but to the country to take it into their confidence and to stop trying to indicate to the people that they are getting value for their money when we find that, far from that being the fact, an unnecessarily large proportion of what is being spent for defence is being spent on frills and fancy things which are not going to deter any potential aggressor from his desire to attack, if that should be his desire. And they owe an explanation as to why it is that the government—which now, in spite of its own efforts, has had a few corners of the rug lifted so that a few glimpses of what is underneath the rug have been vouchsafed to the people of Canada—should still persist in trying to sweep more things under the rug and then to hammer more tacks into the edge of the rug so as to keep the people in ignorance of the true state of affairs with respect to national defence.

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to delay the committee for many minutes because everything the hon. member for Kamloops has said has already been answered in Hansard. I refer to the statement of the Prime Minister on March 16 which appears at page 2968 of Hansard, and also to the other statements that have been made. To that I have little to add at this time, beyond this. The hon. member has raised the matter of this so-called MacNab report two or three times, I think, in another place, and two or three times in this chamber. It is rather important that it should be understood just what this report was. I suggest that the best source of that information is what Mr. MacNab himself said about it as reported in the London Free Press of March 17, 1953.

Mr. Fulton: Who was interviewing him?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Oh, you were not interrupted.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Mr. Fulton: Not more than a dozen times.

Mr. Claxton: The article is headed "Private Letter Lawyer States" and reads as follows:

> Ronald S. MacNab, former staff investigator for the civil service commission and now a London lawyer, denied last night that a memorandum he wrote in 1949 was a government report. He said it was a private letter to his superior, and statements in it were not necessarily facts, but—

And the reporter quotes this:

> —"things I had heard from various sources during the course of routine investigation."
> Mr. MacNab was reported in Ottawa yesterday as the author of one of the controversial "reports" which opposition members have sought as alleging waste and extravagance in the defence department.
> Contacted in London, Mr. MacNab said he wrote a private letter to George T. Jackson, director of organization and classification for the civil service commission, in September, 1949, on the request of Mr. Jackson. In it, Mr. MacNab said, there were statements—not charges nor facts as such—which he had heard from army and other sources.
> "But it was not a government report," he emphasized. "Before it could be a government report these statements would have had to be checked and double-checked."

This is the document which somehow, by means unknown, was extracted from the files of George T. Jackson of the civil service commission or was given by someone unknown into the hands of the hon. member for Kamloops or Mr. Arthur Blakely, the correspondent of the Montreal Gazette, and which then was produced not at the committee on defence expenditure when it might have been produced—

Mr. Fleming: It was refused there. It was asked for and was refused by the government majority.

Mr. Claxton: It was asked for, but by a person who probably had a copy of that memorandum in his own possession, whereas the Department of National Defence had never had a copy in its possession.

Mr. Fleming: Or the rest of the government?

Mr. Claxton: The rest of the government, either. This was a personal document prepared for Mr. George T. Jackson who, as the Prime Minister said in his statement on March 16, happened to be in Burma, and consequently it was some time before any trace was found of the source of this story as it appeared in the Montreal Gazette, from some source unknown to the government, quoting sections of this statement. On the basis of that the hon. member for Kamloops has on two occasions taken up the time of this house and held up the defence expenditure committee to talk about reports and concealment and so on.

I suggest to him that the business of this country demands that we give most serious attention to the affairs of national defence; that we look into every charge for which there is any basis, and that we investigate it to the full, as we have. People talk about receiving hundreds of letters. How many letters have been brought to my attention during the last six years relating to irregularities? How many? You could count them on the fingers of one or two hands. Every one of them has been investigated; and in every case where an investigation has shown that there has been wrongdoing, the prosecutor has been the government and the Department of National Defence. We have taken that course in every case where it appeared to be justified.

Now we have these continued sweeping assertions without support and without corroboration. In this instance a report dating from 1949, four years ago, is now paraded before us as something that the government is endeavouring to conceal, when the government did not even know of its existence.

Mr. Fulton: The Prime Minister knew about it on March 16.

Mr. Claxton: Because at about that time Mr. Jackson's secretary looked in his private file.

Mr. Fulton: Then the government should know of its existence.

Mr. Claxton: I am prepared to answer other questions that were put by hon. members in the course of the serious discussion this afternoon. I would be happy to do so, unless there are other hon. members who wish to speak. I must say that the course of the debate this evening has indicated that there is an intention rather not to allow me to make this reply tonight.

Sir, the business of the defence of our country is serious business. As hon. members have said, we have defence forces fighting in the field today, and I suggest that that business is serious; and that hon. members before attacking the effectiveness of our operations either abroad or at home by making assertions for which they are unwilling to take personal responsibility, should think twice about its effect upon our national effort.

Mr. Fulton: If the minister wishes to have an answer, I take the responsibility, as I have said before, for the assertions I have made. And I will give the minister an answer now, if he wants to have one, or later, if he wishes.

An hon. Member: Produce the letter.

Mr. Fulton: The minister seeks to brush this whole incident aside as something based not upon any memorandum or report, but merely a private letter. As I have said before, when is a report not a report? Perhaps it is when it is embarrassing to the government.

The minister has read from a Canadian Press dispatch of a reported interview with Mr. Jackson in London. I asked him the source of that dispatch, and he did not indicate what it was. I happen to have read it, and I know it is a Canadian Press dispatch giving, in abbreviated form, the gist of a reported interview. But there is in existence and on the record a very much fuller report of an interview with Mr. MacNab. This was an interview by Mr. Richard Jackson of the Ottawa Journal, containing the observations made by Mr. MacNab in reply to his questions. This particular portion is not in quotation marks, but it is what Mr. MacNab said. The newspaper article states—

> He left the government service in 1949, but not before verbally reporting to Mr. Jackson—

That is Mr. George Jackson.

> —conditions he had found in army camps.
> At Mr. Jackson's request, he committed his findings to writing in an official memorandum after he had left the civil service staff but was still in Ottawa.
> Since that time—

The actual time of that incident is not reported in this article.

> —the memorandum has been shown to deputy defence minister C. M. Drury.

Mr. Claxton: That is not correct.

Mr. Fulton: It continues:

> Tracing Mr. MacNab's moves since he left Ottawa in 1950, the Journal this morning found him by long distance telephone at his London law office.
> Were you the author of the disputed MacNab report? he was asked.
> "Why, is it now causing a stir?" he countered.
> "Yes, something of a stir in parliament.
> "Some people say it was an official report, others claim it was a personal letter; which was it?" asked the Journal.
> "It was neither. It was a memorandum."
> "Written before or after you left Ottawa?"
> "Written after I had left the civil service commission, but while I still was in Ottawa."
> "Why did you write it after you had left the government staff?"
>
> "I was instructed to."
> "By whom?"
> "By Mr. George Jackson. I had reported verbally to him on the findings of my investigations and he ordered me to put them in a memorandum."
> "Did it just cover conditions you found in army establishments at Halifax?"
> "No, it covered a number of other centres."
>
> "Do you regard it as an official report made in line of duty as a civil service investigator?"
> "Yes. I suppose I must. But why don't you ask Mr. Jackson about it?"

Then there is an interjection by Mr. Richard Jackson who wrote the article, where he states:

> Mr. Jackson is on a special government assignment in Burma, advising the Burmese government in civil service problems.

The interview continues:

"Is there any doubt that your memorandum reported a condition of waste and extravagance in army encampments?"

"You'd better read the report yourself".

Then the article continues:

The memorandum was written (at Mr. Jackson's request) as a matter of "routine", further explained Mr. MacNab.

Every two years, civil service staff investigators probed the use each department made of staff.

Then the article continues with observations by Mr. Richard Jackson on other subjects of controversy. So it is pretty certain that this was not a private letter. It was a memorandum reducing to writing personal observations made by Mr. MacNab when he was touring army works services establishments in the course of his official duties. If the minister wants to perpetuate this fiction that it was not a report based on personal observations, but was merely hearsay, I suggest to him that to do so is merely to insult the intelligence of the house. All you have to do is to read what was said in that memorandum as quoted in the press. The accuracy of what was quoted has not been questioned in any way. Of course they cannot question its accuracy.

Mr. Dickey: Does the hon. member take responsibility for the accuracy of that quotation?

Mr. Fulton: I have told the hon. member on two occasions previously, and I now say to him for the third time, that I take responsibility for the accuracy of everything I have said. If the hon. gentleman disputes its accuracy let him go to the government and require the government to table the text of the report. Until he does that I wish he would cease these futile and childish interruptions and show some sense of responsibility in connection with this matter. Here is what the memorandum says:

The slowness of the tradesmen (at Halifax) is a standing joke in the garrison. As an example I was shown a plywood partition about six feet wide and told that it actually took four carpenters two weeks to build it.

Here is another one:

While I was interviewing in the area engineer's office in Regina (one whole day) the entire staff was idle, many were sitting at their desks, soldiers and civilians, no work of any sort on the desks.

I ask the hon. member and the minister if that is hearsay. I ask them further how they reconcile—

The Chairman: Order. Perhaps I should point out that when the hon. member for Kamloops says, "I am asking the hon. member", when he puts a question he should at the same time indicate when he wants the hon. member for Halifax to answer. Otherwise it becomes provocative and perhaps the hon. member for Halifax is justified in trying to take the floor in order to answer.

Mr. Fulton: There will be another question.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Kamloops has the floor but if in the course of his remarks he says, "I ask the hon. member for Halifax," perhaps the hon. member for Halifax should wait until the hon. member for Kamloops, who has the floor, indicates when he wants him to answer.

Mr. Fulton: I welcome the hon. member's question, but I was in the course of putting another one to him and I thought he might like to answer them both at the same time. I should like to hear also from the minister. After all, it is the Minister of National Defence to whom we are putting these questions. If the hon. member for Halifax wishes to assume responsibility for that department as well, he is welcome to do it. My other question is this: Will the minister, the associate minister and the hon. member for Halifax explain how they reconcile the fact that what Mr. MacNab said in his memorandum was on all fours with what Mr. Currie subsequently reported. Are they going to say that Mr. Currie's report is based on hearsay?

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Currie did not say anything about that. You can search his report and you will not find anything to that effect.

Mr. Dickey: So far as the question submitted to me is concerned, I might say that the very point covered by the minister was what I intended to raise a few minutes ago when the hon. member would not agree to my asking a question. It is quite obvious from the quotations he gave from this personal letter of Mr. MacNab's and from the Currie report that there cannot be the slightest connection between the two incidents.

In answer to his question about hearsay I would simply point out that anybody who has the slightest knowledge of what hearsay is and what direct evidence is, on reading the quotations which the hon. member put on the record from the MacNab letter, will say that what he says there is based upon what he was told had happened some time previously. If that is not hearsay, then I do not know what it is.

Mr. Fleming: You do not.

Mr. Fulton: Apparently the hon. gentleman does not know what is hearsay; and if he wants to indulge in self-accusation, that is all right by me. It will be remembered that Mr. Currie said that the appalling conditions at Halifax were the same sort of conditions that had been reported upon in the MacNab report. Mr. Currie said:

I reported verbally to national defence headquarters that conditions at Halifax were not satisfactory. As had been found at other establishments, stores, accounting and administrative procedures had broken down seriously.

Those things are in amplification of and are exactly similar in nature to the very incidents mentioned by Mr. MacNab.

Mr. Dickey: Oh, no.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. MacNab is even more specific than Mr. Currie. He reported on particular incidents which he noticed at Halifax.

Mr. Campney: What somebody told him.

Mr. Fulton: He said, "I saw". He said that at Regina when he was interviewing, the whole staff was idle, that many soldiers and civilians were sitting with no work on their desks. That was a personal observation. He further said this:

The engineers (R.C.E.) are engaged in some very large (construction) projects and I think it is fair to say that their attitude toward costs of construction indicates their attitude to finance generally, including money spent on staff. It seems to me that they are under the impression that . . . cost is no object when they want to do something.

That is in language exactly similar to the report of Mr. Currie, who states, as reported on page 717 of Hansard:

This involves the abandonment, by all administrators of the program, of the war psychology with its emphasis on speed with resultant wastefulness and extravagance—

The findings of the two men throughout their reports proceed on parallel lines. If the government wishes to draw the absurd distinction that in one case it was not a report because it was a memorandum, whereas in the other case it was a report because it was entitled a report, they can rely upon that sort of distinction; but it shows that they are driven to that sort of absurdity to justify their position.

The facts placed on the record and the facts found by Mr. MacNab and reported by him, as well as his own conclusions based upon his personal observations, establish clearly that these matters were found and were reported, not to a minor or obscure official but in the first instance to the director of organization of the civil service commission. Is anyone going to say that he is a minor or obscure official? I should not think the government would say that.

Then as to the minister's statement that the answer to all this is found in the statement made by the Prime Minister on March 16, to be found at page 2968 of Hansard; that is no answer at all. Indeed it proves, if anything more were needed, that the government did know about this report; that it sought to leave the impression that there was no such report; that it knew about it at 3 o'clock on March 16 yet still refused to set out the full facts; that it left the impression with the house that there was not such a report or if there was one, which they doubted, they did not know anything about it.

The statement made by the Prime Minister at 3.30 showed that they had known just as much at 3 o'clock as they knew at 3.30. But they revealed their knowledge at 3.30 only because their hands were forced by the article which appeared in the afternoon edition of the Journal of that day.

What the minister has said is no answer to the serious criticism we are making. There may be room for controversy as to whether or not the mere incidence of the MacNab report reporting on conditions in the army works services would be sufficient justification for a sweeping condemnation of the whole defence department; but when you find that what is said in the MacNab report is substantiated and confirmed by what is said in the Currie report; when you find that the government is so anxious to suppress the facts regarding the MacNab report, indeed its very existence; when you find that they will say at 3 o'clock on March 16 words which leave the impression that there is no such report and then have to eat those words at 3.30, I submit to you, Mr. Chairman, that the basis of our condemnation and criticism of the department has been amply established.

An hon. Member: No answers?

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon): Mr. Chairman, in the few minutes remaining I should like to get back to matters other than that which has been discussed for the last hour. I want to refer to some of the items that were dealt with in a general way by the minister earlier today. I listened to his statement with a great deal of interest, and it was encouraging to note that when given even half a chance Canadian youth are able to put forth a fairly substantial effort in the defence of freedom and the values that make up our way of life. The record established in world war I was maintained in world war II, and it is evident that the pioneer spirit is by no means dead in this country.

As I listened to the rather general statement of the minister I felt the same sense of frustration that I have experienced on other occasions when defence matters have been discussed in the house. I do not think I am as frustrated as the hon. member for Kamloops because he has a real problem and he has been here longer and has had a greater opportunity to become frustrated. However, I have discovered in my short experience in the house that it is rather difficult to dig out information from the Department of National Defence dealing with what might be described as problem areas. I have found that in most cases it is necessary to go to magazine or newspaper reports in order to get any information that might be regarded as helpful. I felt that such was again the case this afternoon as I listened to the general statement of the minister.

The phrase "not in the public interest" seems to be resorted to very frequently by the government, and perhaps the Department of National Defence abuses the privilege more than any other department. I am sometimes led to believe that instead of saying "not in the public interest" it should say "not in the government's interest" or "not in the party's interest". I had that experience of frustration at the beginning of March when I was trying to seek out information with respect to welfare services in the armed forces. At that time a resolution that I had placed on the order paper for the production of papers was denied. Access to that information was denied me as a private member. Previous to that, on November 27 last, I asked a question on the orders of the day with regard to the same problem. My question was as follows:

> In view of the continuing expansion of the armed forces, does the government intend to make use of the welfare facilities offered by the voluntary organizations which served so effectively during world war II?

In reply the minister said:

> The heads of the three services consider that it would be unwise, uneconomical and unnecessary to establish at all these places—

The reference is to the various Canadian military establishments.

> —the five welfare agencies that we used during the second world war and I agree with them.

I suppose that is where the matter would have rested if we on the opposition side had been inclined to accept the statement as definitive. But I find that the matter is not at all settled. It would seem that even the Department of National Defence itself is not completely happy over the present situation, because in the answer to a question I placed on the order paper on February 25 there was some indication that resort is being had to welfare facilities other than those found within the military organization itself. Part 3 of my question was as follows:

> What facilities are provided for entertainment, recreation and welfare for these personnel and who provides these services?

The reference is to our air force personnel stationed in France. The answer to question No. 3 reads in part as follows:

> To assist in recreational planning, the R.C.A.F. has on loan from the government of Ontario an expert in adult education and recreation. He is now in France to organize recreational and entertainment programs.

That would indicate that the trend toward militarization of welfare, if I may use that phrase, has not been entirely satisfactory in its results. Again, I notice that the Canadian Legion makes use of a phrase that was used in reference to my question of November 27 and quotes it in an article found on page 17 of the Legionary. The heading is, "Unwise, Uneconomical, Unnecessary". The Legionary quotes excerpts from a letter written by the Minister of National Defence in reply to an inquiry with respect to whether the department intended to use the auxiliary services of the Legion.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we shall move to go into supply and call the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys and the Department of the Secretary of State, these items to stand. We shall then continue this interesting debate on national defence.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Second report of standing committee on external affairs.—Mr. Bradette.

REFERENCE OF CERTAIN ESTIMATES TO COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved:

Motion agreed to.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. A. F. Macdonald (Edmonton East) presented the first report of the standing committee on industrial relations, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

WATER POWER

SAINT JOHN RIVER—REQUEST FOR REPORT OF INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) asked a question to which I should like to reply.

The report of the international joint commission in response to the joint reference of the governments of the United States and Canada for an investigation of the Saint John river system with a view to the conservation and regulation of the waters of that system has not yet been submitted to the two governments. The commission stated in Washington on April 8, 1953, that it expects completion of the report of its engineering board by about June 1, 1953.

Following completion of the engineering board's report and its appropriate consideration by the commission, the commission will submit to the two governments its recommendations concerning development of the basin.

RADIO ACT

AMENDMENTS TO DEFINITIONS, REMOVING LICENCE FEE, ETC.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 337, to amend the Radio Act, 1938.

Mr. Green: Will the minister explain?

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, the object of the bill is to put into effect the recommendations announced by the Minister of Finance in his budget speech, one of which was the abolition of the radio fees, and to make certain other minor amendments to the Radio Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CO-OPERATIVE CREDIT

MEASURE PROVIDING FOR ORGANIZATION AND SUPERVISION OF ASSOCIATIONS

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 338, respecting co-operative credit associations.

Mr. Knowles: Explain.

Mr. Abbott: The purpose of the bill is to authorize the incorporation of co-operative credit associations by special act of parliament and to provide for the inspection and supervision of these organizations. The bill in a good many of its particulars resembles the Trust Companies Act and the Loan Companies Act with respect to the supervisory and inspection powers of the superintendent of insurance.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

GAGETOWN BRIGADE TRAINING AREA—HEADQUARTERS

Mr. Brooks:

1. Has the Department of National Defence decided on the location of the headquarters site for the Gagetown army brigade training area in New Brunswick?

2. If so, where is the headquarters to be located, and is it the intention of the department to start work and construction on headquarters this spring?

3. If no decision has been made yet as to the location of such headquarters, when may one be expected?

Mr. Blanchette: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the minister answered this question in his statement to the house yesterday, may I respectfully submit that the question be dropped.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

"CURRENT AFFAIRS"

Mr. Diefenbaker:

What was the March, 1953, press run of "Current Affairs", published by the army bureau of current affairs?

"LA SEMAINE À RADIO-CANADA"

Mr. Diefenbaker:

What was the January, 1953, press run of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation "Times" (English) and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation "La Semaine à Radio-Canada"?

Mr. McCann: Canadian Broadcasting Corporation "Times" and "La Semaine à Radio-Canada" are issued weekly. For the week of January 25, 1953, the following number of copies was printed for each edition: Pacific edition, 1,800; Prairie edition, 7,600; Eastern edition, 7,725; French edition, 2,450.

KNOWN COMMUNISTS IN CANADA

Mr. Higgins:

1. How many known communists are there in Canada?
2. What is the approximate number in each province?

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for St. John's East and I have discussed this question and have reached agreement that it might be dropped.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

COLOMBO PLAN—CANADA'S CONTRIBUTION

Mr. Catherwood:

1. What was Canada's total contribution to the Colombo plan, during the years ending March 31, 1952 and March 31, 1953?
2. For what purpose was this money used and in what amount?

Mr. Claxton:

1. In addition to the appropriation of $400,000 for technical assistance in each of the two years, parliament approved a contribution of $25 million for 1951-52 and the same amount for 1952-53 to assist in the economic development of countries in south and southeast Asia under the Colombo plan.

2. Expenditures or commitments against these capital assistance votes have been made for the following purposes and in the amounts indicated:

1951-52

India—

(a) $10 million for wheat.

(b) $4·5 million for trucks and buses for the improvement and extension of the Bombay state transport system.

(c) $500,000 for capital equipment for an irrigation and hydroelectric project.

Pakistan—

(a) $5 million for a cement plant in the Thal area where the Pakistan government is carrying out a large-scale refugee colonization scheme.

(b) $2·8 million for railway ties.

(c) $2 million for an air and geological survey of Pakistan's resources.

(d) $200,000 for agricultural machinery and related equipment for a model livestock farm in the Thal area. This is a joint Canadian-Australian-New Zealand project.

1952-53

India—

$5 million for wheat.

$3 million for equipment for a hydroelectric project.

$2·2 million for locomotive boilers.

Pakistan—

$5 million for wheat.

$3·4 million for equipment for a hydroelectric project.

$170,000 for three aircraft fitted with special equipment for use in the locust control program.

$500,000 to cover remaining costs of the cement plant project undertaken during the previous year.

Ceylon—

$1 million for fishing vessels, cold storage plant and technical personnel for a fisheries research and development project.

Several of these projects will yield revenue in local currency (counterpart funds) which will, in turn, be used by the government concerned, in consultation with the Canadian government, to finance further economic development.

MOTION FOR PAPERS

INTERNATIONAL HARVESTER BUILDING, LONDON, ONT.

Mr. White (Middlesex East):

For a copy of all correspondence, papers, telegrams and other documents from January 1, 1949 to date, in possession of the Department of Public Works, including the expropriation proceedings and rulings regarding the purchase of the building in London, Ontario, known as the International Harvester building on York street, for the purposes of using it as a postal terminal.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, would the hon. gentleman be kind enough to let this motion stand? It is the first time that it has appeared on the order paper, and I have not had an opportunity to look over the files.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING ACT

PROVISION FOR GRANT OF CERTAIN TAXES TO CORPORATION

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Canadian Broadcasting Act, 1936, to provide that the Minister of Finance shall from time to time grant to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, out of the consolidated revenue fund, amounts equal to the taxes collected under part XI of the Excise Tax Act in respect of the goods mentioned in section 6 of schedule I to that act.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

ELECTRICITY AND FLUID EXPORTATION ACT

SUGGESTED INCREASE IN TERM OF PERMIT FOR EXPORT OF GAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, in view of the concern expressed during current hearings of the United States federal power commission over the fact that the permit issued under our Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act for the export of natural gas from the Peace river area to the northwest United States is for one year only, has the government given consideration to enacting a regulation making it possible to grant a permit for this particular export which will be in effect over a period of years rather than on the present year to year basis? The Minister of Trade and Commerce will realize the great importance of this project to British Columbia.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend was good enough to give me notice of his question. The house will recall that on March 13 I dealt at some length with the government's policy with respect to the export of oil and gas. In the course of my remarks I pointed out that the government had issued an export licence to Westcoast Transmission Company Limited for the export of natural gas. The licence as issued was to be renewable from year to year, and the Canadian government was prepared to accept responsibility for providing gas in quantities as specified in the licence for the full period of the existing permit issued by the province of Alberta. This was of course contingent upon Westcoast meeting its obligations to supply customers in British Columbia.

Hon. members will be aware that the principal considerations in the construction and operation of any gas pipe line are that sufficient gas must be transported for such periods as will permit the amortization of the capital costs of construction; that adequate and continuing deliveries of gas must be assured to distributors to enable them to underwrite the capital costs of distribution; that adequate and continuing supplies of gas must be assured to consumers. Having regard to these and other considerations, it now appears desirable to crystallize the undertaking given with the licence already issued to Westcoast. The government has therefore issued an amended licence to Westcoast Transmission Company Limited for a period of twenty-two years for the export of surplus gas, the volumes to be determined from time to time by the Canadian government but to be not less than the quantities specified in the permit. In so doing, the requirements of British Columbia will of course be protected.

Bearing in mind that without export the construction of this line would be postponed perhaps for all time, the government in reaching this decision also recognizes the unanimous resolution passed by the province of British Columbia endorsing this project, and the permit issued by the province of Alberta for twenty-two years, as well as the dedication by that province of the Peace river gas to this project. To enable the government to issue such a licence, it has been necessary to amend the regulations under the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act, and this has been done. This amendment provides that in the case of export of surplus natural gas the period of the export licence shall be determined by the governor in council. Export licences for electricity and petroleum remain, as before, on a yearly basis.

Mr. Green: Will the amended regulations be tabled?

Mr. Howe: They will, yes. I should have added that the orders in council amending the regulations and providing for the issuance of the permit to Westcoast Transmission Company Limited will be tabled.

WHEAT

INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT—REQUEST FOR TABLING BEFORE CONSIDERATION OF MOTION FOR APPROVAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of the explanation given to the house on Monday with respect to the wheat agreement and the motion now standing on the order paper in the name of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, I would ask the Prime Minister if the international wheat agreement can be tabled for consideration before the motion is called.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is intended to table the text of the agreement just as soon as we receive it from Washington; and the motion for concurrence will not be called until it has been tabled and members have had an opportunity of seeing the text.

FISHERIES

NEW PROCESS TO PRESERVE MEAT—POSSIBLE APPLICATION TO FISH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. R. Balcom (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) if his attention has been drawn to an article appearing in the April 2 issue of the "Fisheries Council of Canada Bulletin" concerning a new meat preserving process developed by scientists of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology for the United States navy. If so, is he prepared to make any comments on this process at this time so far as it might apply to preserving fish?

Hon. James Sinclair (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, the scientists of the national research council and the fisheries research board are aware of these researches at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and the different methods of sterilizing food products using electro-magnetic effects. Some of this work is being carried on in national research council laboratories, but so far knowledge has not advanced to a point that makes industrial application of the new ideas practicable.

NEWFOUNDLAND—INQUIRY AS TO SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE STORM DAMAGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): May I ask the Minister of Fisheries when the special committee appointed to investigate storm damage to fishermen's gear will visit Newfoundland?

Hon. James Sinclair (Minister of Fisheries): I thank the hon. member for having given me notice of this question but, unfortunately, I could not read it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Sinclair: I shall take his verbal question as notice and answer tomorrow.

NEWFOUNDLAND—TABLING OF REPORT OF JOINT COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. James Sinclair (Minister of Fisheries): Yesterday the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Browne) asked when the report of the Newfoundland fisheries development committee would be tabled in the house. This report is now being printed in Newfoundland and copies will be available for general distribution in about two weeks' time.

Meanwhile the committee has forwarded some mimeographed copies to the federal government. These are not complete since they lack the maps and appendices, but they do contain the committee analyses and its recommendations.

Sufficient of these mimeographed copies are not available for all members of the house, but for the convenience of those members particularly interested and of members of the press gallery I am tabling ten copies of the report as received by us yesterday. In addition a copy will be made available to each of the Newfoundland members.

These advance copies will permit the federal government to give the report immediate consideration and to reach early policy decisions on its implementation. These advance copies will permit also earlier discussions between the governments of Canada and Newfoundland on their respective responsibilities and joint undertakings in any development program.

IMMIGRATION

INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE TO IRISH IMMIGRANTS TO CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Harris) which arises out of a press report stating that the largest single group of emigrants to leave Northern Ireland in the last five years is on its way to Canada and something more than a thousand are to follow. I would like to ask if the government is assisting in their passage.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I would have to look at the individual cases to see if any of them had qualified for assisted passage. I would assume that some have and I would be glad to give my hon. friend the details.

I wish to assure the house that we are delighted to have an additional group of Irish people coming to settle in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fraser: That is what I wanted to hear the minister say.

GRAIN

SUGGESTED REFERENCE OF REPORT OF BOARD OF GRAIN COMMISSIONERS TO AGRICULTURE COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to refer to orders of the day for March 27, 1953, and ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) if he has anything to say about whether or not the report of the board of grain commissioners will be sent to the agriculture committee so that members of the committee will have an opportunity to go over the report this session?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): My hon. friend is a member of the agriculture committee and I am not. If he will speak to the chairman of that committee, I am sure the chairman will be glad to tell him whether he intends to call the committee. If the committee is called and wishes any document in my possession I shall be glad to have it referred to the committee.

Mr. Argue: I wonder if the minister would tell me if he is prepared to have the agriculture committee called.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Argue: Well, we have done it both ways.

Some hon. Members: Order.

FERRY SERVICE

YARMOUTH-BAR HARBOR—STATEMENT REGARDING CONSTRUCTION OF VESSEL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Digby-Yarmouth (Mr. Kirk) asked me if I would make a statement on the position of the Bar Harbor-Yarmouth ferry. I am pleased to do so now.

On November 7, 1952, authority was given for entry into a contract with the Davie Shipbuilding and Repairing Company Limited of Montreal, for the construction of an automobile ferry between Yarmouth, N.S., and Bar Harbor, Maine. The specification called for delivery of the vessel within eighteen months from date of contract, as well as engines which would guarantee a service speed of 18½ knots.

Deliberations began immediately between the technical officers of that company, the naval architect and officers of this department.

It became evident that the specification, which had been prepared by the naval architect, did not provide for sufficient power to allow the proposed vessel to operate on a service speed of 18½ knots. This fact, plus some doubts expressed by the contractor as to the stability of the vessel as designed, made it necessary that tank tests be performed in order to ascertain unequivocally the speed and stability of the vessel.

The tank tests were performed in England and the United States, and the results substantiated the contention of the shipyard as to the two points mentioned above. This has, therefore, brought about some redesigning and alterations in the ship as originally designed, which the shipyard has been authorized to perform.

Davie Shipbuilding and Repairing Company guarantee that the vessel will be delivered eighteen months after contract is signed. This means that the ship will still be delivered in 1954, but unfortunately it appears doubtful that it will be economically feasible to begin operation in late 1954. It would be preferable to delay the opening of the service to the summer months of 1955, when traffic would be available in sufficient volume to allow the economic operation of the service.

SUPPLY

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

SALES TAX ON DRUGS USED IN HOSPITALS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, before Your Honour leaves the chair I wish to raise a matter and I assure you and the house at the outset that it will only take a few minutes, and I have no amendment up my sleeve. My reason for raising this now, rather than on the orders of the day where I might have done it, is that it would have taken me a little longer than is permitted at that stage of our proceedings.

I have had brought to my attention by a person in Montreal something which rather amazes me. Indeed when this correspondent first wrote to me about the matter I could hardly believe what he told me and I asked him to submit the evidence to which he had referred. I have now received this evidence in the form of a bill from the Montreal General Hospital and I should like to draw it to the attention of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) and have his comment on it. I hope there is an error.

This is a bill, as I have already said, from the Montreal General Hospital, account No. C93951, under date of March 23, 1953, and the total amount of the bill happens to be $70.61. One item on it is for medicine, $5.10, and further along in the same line where "medicine" is printed, are the words

"federal tax 10 per cent". In this case 51 cents has been added to the cost of these medicines.

It has been my understanding from the law, from debates in this house, and from my own unfortunate experiences in having to pay hospital bills, that medicines supplied to hospitals are not subject to federal taxes. I assume in this case that the reference is to the sales tax. I have in my hand, as a matter of fact, another hospital bill and this one comes from Manitoba. It happens to be one for which I was responsible myself and it has on it an item which corresponds to the same item on the Montreal bill—"ordinary drugs". The amount is $5.60—being one item in the total bill. There is no reference of any kind to any tax, federal or otherwise.

When I look into the legislation in connection with this matter, namely the Excise Tax Act, I find that articles and materials for the sole use of any bona fide public hospital, certified to be such by the Department of National Health and Welfare, when purchased in good faith and for use by the hospital and not for resale, are exempt from the sales tax.

Mr. Abbott: But they are selling them.

Mr. Fraser: They are administering them.

Mr. Knowles: I anticipated that the minister might make that comment and, as a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, I took this point up with my correspondent in Montreal; and he told me these were drugs administered to the patient while she was in the hospital. It was exactly the same in the case of the bill from Manitoba which I have in my other hand. In both cases these were drugs purchased by the hospital and used for the benefit of the patients while they were in the hospital. They are paid for as part of the hospital bill. In one case, that of the Manitoba bill, apparently no sales tax has been added; but in the case of the Montreal General Hospital a tax has been added and it is indicated on the bill that it is a federal tax of 10 per cent. I draw attention to the fact that it is a printed form, so it must be standard practice in the case of the Montreal General Hospital. The form for Manitoba is likewise printed—

Mr. Abbott: Manitoba should charge the tax.

Mr. Knowles: —but there is no place on it for the addition of such a tax. I submit that if what the minister is now saying is the case, then the public have been deluded as to the meaning of the provisions in the Excise Tax Act that drugs and medicines for use in bona fide hospitals are not supposed to be subject to the excise tax. I quite understand that, if the hospitals were reselling medicines for patients to take home, they would have to be regarded in the same light as drugs purchased at an ordinary drugstore. I, for one, do not think even those drugs should be subject to tax, but as yet we have not been able to persuade the government to change the law in that regard, although as the minister knows we shall continue our efforts in that connection.

My point now, Mr. Speaker, is that it does seem to me that the spirit if not the letter of the law is not being followed in this case, and that in my view hospitals should not be required to add that federal 10 per cent tax to drugs purchased by them and used for the benefit of patients in hospitals on the direction of physicians attending those patients. As is being suggested by my friends around me, it is certainly part of the hospital treatment, just as much as other items. For example, this patient in Montreal had a bill for routine laboratory tests, and a bill for X-rays. In the case of Winnipeg, there are laboratory tests, electrocardiograms, intravenous and other items. In both cases the drugs were part of the treatment being administered by the hospital.

As I say, I am not at this moment trying to deal with something that might be out of order at this stage since we have passed the excise tax bill, namely that drugs purchased outside of a hospital should be free of tax. But certainly it is incredible and astounding that the public should be deluded, which is what is happening if drugs purchased by a hospital, and used on the direction of a physician while a patient is in the hospital, are being made subject to the sales tax. I make my plea to the minister that this practice be discontinued.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this matter is very simple. Where drugs or any other taxable products are purchased by a hospital for use by the hospital, they are free of sales tax. But where hospitals sell to patients at a hospital, as is the case where their dispensaries sell drugs and other products, which if purchased from a retail druggist would be subject to sales tax, then they are obliged to charge the patient the sales tax. I am sure that is exactly what happened in the case the hon. member has cited of the Montreal General Hospital. The dispensary sold to the patient at retail prices the particular drug or medicine in question. If the hospital buys alcohol or liniments or any other drugs, and does not sell them to the patient but includes them in the general hospital bill, then of course they would not be subject to tax. Most hospitals operate a dispensary which, in essence, is the same as a prescription druggist. They sell to the patient drugs which are subject to sales tax, and that is all there is in this case.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I think that is something that is indefensible.

Mr. Abbott: Well, why should one pay more and another pay less?

Mr. Coldwell: A hospital obtains its drugs from a wholesale druggist, and those drugs are prescribed by a physician and given under the direction of a physician.

Mr. Abbott: And sold at retail prices.

Mr. Coldwell: I do not know whether or not they are sold at retail prices.

Mr. Abbott: Why should a man pay one price for drugs in a hospital and another price when he is at home?

Mr. Coldwell: My understanding is that the hospital sells these drugs at a price to cover the cost of handling the drugs.

Mr. Abbott: And they make a profit on them.

Mr. Coldwell: I do not know. I have never examined the statements of a hospital in that manner, although I was a member of the board of governors of the Regina City Hospital for many years. I cannot tell you whether or not a profit is made on the drugs, but I do not believe that the payment of a handling charge is a profit. It seems to me that when a patient is in a hospital and the doctor prescribes certain drugs which are administered by nurses in the hospital, that is a part of the general treatment given in the hospital. Such a case is not in the same category as when I go to the druggist, buy certain drugs on a prescription and administer them myself. The two things are quite different.

As I understand it, in some of our provinces—I believe this is true in my own province—drugs are given under our hospitalization plan, and practically all the drugs prescribed by a physician are regarded as part of the hospital treatment. Certainly, this is a new principle, and I think if it were put into effect across Canada it would cause a great deal of difficulty.

Mr. Abbott: A good many doctors provide their own drugs, and they have to charge the sales tax. Why should a person who happens to go into a hospital get a special benefit?

Mr. Coldwell: I am not going to argue the matter, except to say this. I cannot understand the justice of it. There is no justice in it. It is one of those abominations that the government has—

Mr. Abbott: If I may be allowed, Mr. Speaker, I want to make this point and ask whether any reasonable man has an answer to it. It may be that these things should not be subject to sales tax. I am not going to discuss that now. But if they are subject to sales tax, why should one man pay the sales tax when he is using the drug in a hospital, and another man not pay it? My point is that everybody should be treated the same. If the drugs are subject to sales tax, because a man is able to be treated in his own home by a doctor without going to a hospital, why should he pay a higher price there than if he were in the hospital? Why should he pay a higher price if the doctor dispenses the drug himself and charges the sales tax, as he must do, whereas if he were in hospital he would not have to pay the sales tax.

The reason, of course, for the exemption of hospital purchases from sales tax is that it is rightly assumed that hospitals are non-profit organizations. They are supported by public subscriptions, state assistance and so on. It is felt that the general purchases of the hospital for its supplies should not be subject to sales tax, but people who are being treated in the hospital and who use taxable articles, whether drugs or anything else, should pay their tax just the same as the man who does not go to hospital. I think it is going a long way to call this an abomination and all the other strong words that have been used. My suggestion is that this practice treats everybody fairly. Perhaps one could argue that the tax on drugs should be eliminated, but I am not going to argue that now. So long as the tax is imposed, the man who uses the drugs in the hospital should not be exempt.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): The minister has said that this is a simple matter. Perhaps the trouble with it is that, in the view of the government, it is a little too simple in so far as their approach is concerned. The matter is not new. This same question has been raised in the house before. I recall several years ago having just such a hospital bill as the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has presented today, and raising the question at that time.

The point is made that this is not a fair application of the statute. The minister says, well, if the drugs are used by a hospital and are not resold to the patient, then they are exempt. But, Mr. Speaker, let us look a little more closely at that. When does a hospital use drugs? Does the hospital not use them on patients? Of course, the hospital always uses drugs on patients and that is the only reason the hospital has them; that is the use the hospital makes of them, unless it is in the course of research.

Mr. Lesage: What about the operating room?

Mr. Fleming: Are they not then used on patients?

Mr. Lesage: Yes, but the patient does not pay extra.

Mr. Fleming: This is an attempt to draw a fine distinction which does not exist. The way in which a hospital uses drugs is on patients and for the benefit of patients. The minister is trying to draw some distinction between drugs used by a hospital and those drugs which are paid for by the accounts the hospital renders a patient. If a hospital uses drugs at all, they are used on patients in every case, so far as I know. Why then should a distinction be drawn in a case of that kind, simply because the drugs are put on the bill? In many of these cases the patient who is paying his bill is the patient who is helping to meet the expenses of the hospital, quite apart from the cost of drugs. I think this is a case of discrimination.

If the minister has not a better answer to the question than he has given this morning, and if he can only say that he defends it because to do otherwise would be discriminatory—a point of view that I do not share because I think the way he is applying the act now is discriminatory—let him do away with all of these taxes on drugs. These taxes are causing great hardship for many people. Why should the government—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think that a debate on that subject would be in order at this time.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, may I remind you that this is a motion to go into supply and this is a point that has been raised. The minister himself has touched on this point in his reply. I am dealing with the point that he has made.

Mr. Speaker: The excise tax bill was before the house this session.

Mr. Fleming: With respect, Mr. Speaker, may I say that there has not been any bill dealing with this particular subject. We had some discussion about the sales tax in general on the bill to amend the Excise Tax Act. However, I content myself by simply making this point, and I do not intend to labour it. If the answer the minister has given this morning is the best answer he can give when the point is made that the government is, in a discriminatory manner, charging sales tax on drugs furnished to patients in hospitals, then the proper course for him to follow is to bring in legislation that these taxes on drugs be done away with entirely.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should just like to say a word also in protest against what appears to be an unfair practice by some hospitals, as has been drawn to our attention by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), while others do not resort to it. I was a little bit surprised that the minister should himself get excited over this matter.

Mr. Abbott: I am not excited.

Mr. Low: I think he should look at the whole thing in his usual calm manner. When he does so, I am sure that he will realize—

Mr. Abbott: I just do not like the use of words like "abomination" when they are not justified.

Mr. Low: The procedure which is used by hospitals generally, I believe, is this. Their drugs taken out of their dispensary for the use of patients in a general way while the patients are in the hospital are provided as a part of the services given by the hospital just as the services given in the case of anaesthesia. The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) points to the fact that anaesthesia involves the use of drugs. I know, Mr. Speaker, that on this bill provided by the Montreal General Hospital anaesthesia is charged for separately from all other items and there is no federal sales tax on it although anaesthesia in this case involves the use of drugs. That is a point in support of what my friend the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has said.

Then there is the further practice, Mr. Speaker, that hospitals often follow and it is this. When a patient is about ready to go home, the doctor attending the patient sometimes prescribes drugs that are supplied by the hospital's dispensary. If those drugs were taken home by the patient to be used there, I could quite well understand how the sales tax would apply. The important thing to remember, however, is that the great bulk of the drugs that are charged for on these bills—if not all of them—are drugs that are supplied in the normal course of treating patients within the hospital. In those cases, Mr. Speaker, I am sure that it was intended that those drugs should be tax free under the Excise Tax Act. If the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) will look at the matter fairly and unemotionally, I am sure he will see that it is right that we should ask for a correction of what appears to be an abuse of the law. I am certainly going to add my voice in protest against the practice that seems to be carried on by the Montreal General Hospital—and there is no telling how many others—of charging tax when they ought not to do so according to the law.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that this matter could not have been settled outside of the realm of public discussion. As I understand the problem now, perhaps Montreal may be the only section of Canada where the tax is being applied in this way. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) says that it is not charged in Manitoba. I do not think it is charged in Nova Scotia. At least I have paid a number of hospital bills and have never had a sales tax item on them. As a result of this discussion we may get all the hospitals in Canada adding sales tax to their drugs.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Gillis: It would be unfortunate if that happened.

Mr. Knowles: That would mean the end of this government.

Mr. Gillis: I do not agree with the minister when he interprets the administration of drugs in a hospital as being a resale of drugs. If you purchase drugs from a drugstore, you expeet to pay the sales tax. If a doctor prescribes a specific drug for you and if you are conscious and you take the prescription to the drugstore, you buy the drug and you expect to pay the sales tax. But if you are taken into a hospital when you are in a serious condition such as, for instance, when you may require an operation, you are not buying anything; they are not selling you anything. The doctors and the hospital staff are deciding what is best for you.

Mr. Low: And you have to take it.

Mr. Gillis: While you are in a semi-conscious condition they are administering drugs to you; you are not doing any buying at all. It is an involuntary act, as far as you are concerned. Then, on the other hand, there is quite a big difference between the price of drugs in a hospital and that outside of a hospital. I refer to drugs like penicillin, aureomycin and streptomycin. All of those important drugs today you can get at least 50 per cent cheaper in hospital than you can outside. That fact leads me to believe that the hospital purchases in bulk. They buy direct from the manufacturer and they can afford to sell the drugs that much cheaper than the ordinary druggist.

Mr. McCann: Yes; but they do not.

Mr. Gillis: They do in my section of the country. For example, I can go and get a penicillin needle in hospital for 90 cents, and I will pay $2.50 outside for it. In this city I think you will pay $5 if you get a shot of penicillin outside the hospital. The resale of drugs and the prices charged are matters which require a great deal of examination across Canada, in my opinion. But I think there may be something in this feature also. Perhaps as to the Manitoba hospitals and the Nova Scotia hospitals who do not carry that item of federal tax on their bills, there may be a difference in their accounting systems. Perhaps that tax is wrapped up in the cost of the drug that is administered in the hospital.

Mr. McCann: That is the whole point.

Mr. Gillis: That may be true. But as a result of this discussion I think the minister should assure this house that, in so far as he is concerned, he is going to take a look at this matter, is going to determine whether it is the method of accounting that raises this issue with respect to the Montreal hospital, have a general understanding with the hospitals on the point, and try to give us some information before the house rises. As I say, I think it is unfortunate that a discussion like this took place. If the matter is properly examined with the minister, through the medium of his department, I think there is a reasonable answer to it somewhere that would dispel the kind of thing that we are getting today, namely that one hospital in Montreal is violating the regulations in charging this tax. Anyway, I wish the minister would assure the house that he will take a sensible look at the matter and give us some information on the point at a later time in the session.

Mr. Abbott: I am sure the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann), will do so; and he is highly competent to do so because he knows something about it.

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): There appears to be a misconception with reference to the application of the sales tax as far as hospitals are concerned. With respect to whether or not there should be a sales tax on drugs, I am not going to say anything this morning. That is one separate question; but in the administration of the affairs of the Department of National Revenue, in the eight years that I have been there, there has always been a sales tax on drugs which have been dispensed by a dispensary within the hospital that provides the drugs. And there is no difference between—and there should be no difference between—a patient, we will say, in Montreal who lives on Sherbrooke street and who is ill and is attended at home, and who sends his people to the drugstore and buys a bill of goods on which he has to pay a sales tax, and a patient in a hospital. What is the difference between that fellow, from the point of view of treating everybody the same, and the chap who is in the hospital and from the dispensary within the hospital has drugs supplied to him and the sales tax is added?

As the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) said, it is the way in which it is shown. I feel quite confident that in the case illustrated by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) the sales tax was paid and he did not know it, and the sales tax has been included in his bill; whereas in the Montreal case it is shown up as a separate item. I think that is a more honest and fair way of doing it. It should be shown up as a separate item. In every hospital throughout the country that is subject to sales tax on drugs, the tax is collected.

There is a difference between drugs that are given to the individual and those that are bought for general hospital use, such as alcohol, liniments or disinfectants. You could not set up an accounting system that would deal with the amount of these articles that are applicable to the account of each individual patient, but where a patient specifically gets a bill of goods for drugs that are used in his treatment in the hospital, or to take home, the sales tax is either added or included in the general bill.

EXPENSES OF VICTORIA CROSS WINNERS TO CORONATION

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): I want to deal with an entirely different subject, to bring it to the attention of the house and of the government before we go into supply. The question I wish to raise has already been brought up in the house. Therefore I am going to be very brief.

I feel that we as Canadians think it is just a bit of a disgrace that the winners of the Victoria Cross in the two world wars, while being invited to the coronation, are not going to have their expenses paid. Many of them are not in a position to go otherwise. I think I speak for Canadians generally, all of them, when I say that they would appreciate it if the government would change its mind and see fit to pay the expenses of those men to the coronation.

STRIKE OF GRAIN HANDLERS AT VANCOUVER

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): There is one matter I should like to raise before you leave the chair, Mr. Speaker. It has been raised on other occasions in the house. It has to do with the grain handlers' strike in Vancouver, which has continued on and on during the weeks, with deteriorating effects upon the marketing of wheat. As I understand it, within the last couple of days, the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has received a telegram from the president of the Saskatchewan farmers' union in reference to this matter. Reports have been made almost from day to day by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg), but apparently the situation in Vancouver is no nearer solution than it was weeks ago.

While the delay in settlement continues, the serious situation with respect to marketing is being continued and intensified. I hold in my hand a copy of a telegram that was sent to the Prime Minister by Mr. Phelps, the president of the Saskatchewan farmers' union, and I bring it to the attention of the house as the views expressed by the provincial board of the Saskatchewan farmers' union now in session in Saskatoon. The telegram was sent to the Prime Minister on April 14 and reads in part as follows:

> Provincial board Saskatchewan farmers' union meeting special session appreciate government's efforts resolve dispute Vancouver terminal elevators. Farmers increasing concern its continuation if further efforts along lines previously pursued fail in accomplishment . . .

The government is requested to take certain drastic courses by the union, or in any event—> —to request the prairie farm unions to negotiate settlement immediately between companies and union which we are prepared . . .

That is, to consider settlement. The strike has continued for a very long time. Much has been said of the success attained in the settlement of the impending railway strike a few months ago. This is one that affects the farmers of the western provinces to a degree that few of us really appreciate, and it has exercised the minds of farmers throughout the west to a degree that I have not seen in a considerable period of time. I would appreciate it very much if the Prime Minister would say what his reaction is to the representations that have been made, the last one by the farmers' union, and also whether he is in a position, as leader of the government, to hold out any hope of an early settlement of this matter which is having a most detrimental effect—and the longer it continues the more serious the effect will be.

Certainly no one can say that an endeavour has not been made by the representatives of the Department of Labour to achieve something in the nature of a settlement of this matter. However one suggestion that has been made—and I repeat it—is that the representatives of the companies and the workers be brought to Ottawa in order to discuss the matter with the Prime Minister and the Minister of Labour. I believe that bringing them face to face with the cabinet, in the same way as was done in the other matter of recent days, could not but have beneficial results. For some reason the attitude of the Minister of Labour has been that such a course would not hold out any hope of beneficial results. Something must be done. The situation becomes more serious day by day. To follow such a course would result in neither side having to make any retreat from its position, but it would give the Prime Minister and the Minister of Labour an opportunity, in a face to face discussion with the representatives of the companies and of the workingmen, to achieve a measure of conciliation and compromise without which this matter will not be settled. The longer it takes, the more dangerous it is going to be and the more difficult of settlement. I suggest that the Prime Minister use his offices in that regard.

I suggest that the Prime Minister use his offices to bring these two jarring elements together and thereby do something definite to settle a matter which is becoming more insoluble as the days go on. All of us know that without the opportunity of conciliation being available, in the manner it would be should these people be brought into consultation with the Prime Minister and the Minister of Labour, the more difficult it is going to be. I suggest that the farmers in western Canada do expect something in the nature of action such as that in order to achieve a settlement at the earliest possible date.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to associate myself with the remarks of the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). I believe that the grain handlers' strike is most serious as far as the grain producers of western Canada are concerned. The fact that this strike is going on prevents the sale of tens of millions of bushels of grain.

Mr. St. Laurent: Oh, no.

Mr. Argue: Oh, yes, it cannot help but do that. With our present surplus position in grain it is essential that it be moved as rapidly as possible. A great many of the farmers on the prairies still have their granaries full and there is great need of their being able to deliver larger quantities of grain. It is essential that this strike be ended as quickly as possible.

I believe that in offering their services to mediate this strike the farmers' union organization did something that was most statesmanlike. It was astounding to me that the parties which turned them down were the grain companies rather than the grain handlers' union. When a settlement is reached, if it results in an increase in wages it will be the grain producers who will pay that increase in the final analysis. Here you have a situation where the people who are going to pay any increases which will result have offered their services to negotiate this strike and they have been turned down by the grain companies. I say that in any effort which I hope the Prime Minister will make to settle this strike pressure will need to be brought to bear on the grain companies.

I know that any strike puts the government, the producers and everyone else in a difficult position. This strike has gone on a long time and seems to be no closer to settlement. It has had a most adverse effect upon the movement and sale of Canadian grain at a time when it is most essential that our large surplus of grain be moved to market. The government should step in; the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) should step in. He was successful in the past and I think if he brought the same efforts to bear on this situation as he did in the case of a previous situation we might have the same happy results.

Mr. Robert Fair (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I believe it is fully realized by now that it is about time this strike in Vancouver was settled. It has been going on now for approximately sixty days and apparently the efforts made by representatives of the Department of Labour have not been successful in bringing it to a conclusion. I am not going to suggest any measure that should be adopted by the government, as I think that is their business, but I do believe that the marketing of wheat is of sufficient importance that the government should take action without any further delay.

Many people think that the farmers are rolling in wealth, but that is not correct. I have had many letters from individuals stating that they are not able to deliver their quota, which in most cases is up to 15 bushels at the present time. I have had resolutions from local farm unions, one in particular from the Dewberry local. This resolution, along with others, asks that action be taken immediately to settle this strike. As has been pointed out, we have large quantities of wheat to dispose of and no time should be lost so that it can be got to the markets of the world.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it would be helpful toward a settlement of this strike for me to go into details at this time, but I can assure hon. members that we are fully aware of the seriousness of the situation. We are also aware of the old proverb that you can lead a horse to water but you cannot make him drink. We are doing our best to provide opportunities for settlement and it may be that there will come a time when more than entreatments will be required to bring about an end to this situation. The methods that have sometimes been adopted in the great country to the south have never yet had to be resorted to in this country. I do not think it would be helpful to say anything further about the efforts that are constantly being made to bring about a settlement.

The matter of inviting the parties to come and meet us here in Ottawa has been considered. We have been told that the elevator operators would be represented by their lawyer. He would come here with limited authority and would not have the same freedom of negotiation that I found possessed by the presidents and vice-presidents of the two railway companies when we were considering the means whereby a railway strike could be avoided. If it were possible to have those who would have authority to make a settlement sit down with us we would be glad to discuss the matter with them, but after investigation we were told that we would not have here the parties who had full authority to make a settlement. It would serve no useful purpose to have representatives with limited authority to discuss the matter with us here.

This strike is not something which can be allowed to continue indefinitely. It is causing harm every day it lasts and the means that might have to be taken to put an end to it might have consequences which are still in the balance and about which we have not come to a conclusion. We do not want to be autocratic. This is a country where such autocratic methods have never had to be resorted to and I hope they never will have to be resorted to. But you do not always see your hopes realized.

All I can say is that these elevators are required to serve the economy of the nation and they cannot be allowed to remain idle indefinitely. I think that that is all I should say at this time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the Prime Minister permit a question, which I ask just for the purpose of getting information? Has he asked these various elevator companies to send representatives and have they refused to do anything but send one lawyer to represent them, he being without authority?

Mr. St. Laurent: I must confess that this matter has been handled by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg), and the information I have had is that if we were to invite representatives the representative would be the lawyer who has been handling the correspondence and that he would not come here with sufficient authority to be able to make a settlement.

Mr. Argue: Is the Prime Minister prepared to invite the heads of the elevator companies to come to Ottawa so that the strike may be settled at an early date?

Mr. St. Laurent: I received the telegram to which the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) referred and immediately turned it over to the Department of Labour. The Prime Minister has confidence in his colleagues and prefers to have them deal with matters which are within their respective fields, but he is always ready to give them whatever assistance they feel can be of use in bringing about results.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I think the Minister of Labour needs assistance now.

Mr. St. Laurent: Well, when the matter of the dispute between the railways and their operatives was under discussion I was asked by my colleagues, the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier), to take part in the discussions and negotiations. There I felt that, knowing personally the presidents of these big undertakings and knowing personally the leaders of the labour unions, I could be helpful in the course of the discussions. Unfortunately I do not know personally either the owners of these elevators or the leaders of the union, and I must confess that I know very little about the operation of elevators. I do know that it is a relatively small group of elevators that are involved in the strike and that whatever settlement is made is apt to affect not only these three or four or five elevators but also the whole industry all over the country. That is something which requires to be handled with tact.

All I can say is that no government would be discharging its responsibility if it allowed these essential implements of the grain trade to remain indefinitely out of service. Therefore I think that one must exhaust all possibilities of getting the parties to reach an agreement before looking upon it as a case where expropriation proceedings, or the equivalent thereof, are justified.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is why I suggested the undrastic way of having them come down here.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I venture to make a comment on this matter only because I find myself greatly surprised at the reason which the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) gave, namely that if the parties were asked to come here they would come without authority. It is very difficult for me to believe that if responsible people were asked to come to Ottawa by the government of Canada to discuss a matter they would venture to come and then say that they had no authority to represent the parties.

In the second place, the Prime Minister gave another reason which surprised me even more. He said that in the case of the railways he knew the parties concerned personally and in this case he did not. I venture to say with deference that surely that could have nothing to do with it. The parties will know well enough who the Prime Minister is. Having regard to the fact that sixty days have elapsed and also the urgency of the problem as indicated by members from Saskatchewan, frankly I feel that the reasons the Prime Minister has given are unconvincing.

Mr. J. A. Ross (Souris): Mr. Speaker, I should like to add a word in support of the request that some further action be taken at this time. I was a bit disappointed with the remarks the Prime Minister made, but taking his own argument I should think that there is a real reason why he should intervene now. I would also think that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) would have a very direct interest in the matter because he is the minister of the government responsible for these elevators and the marketing of grain. With the many weeks that have gone by, the situation has become very embarrassing and is causing considerable loss to western farm producers. While recognizing that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) and his officials have done a great deal toward trying to bring about a settlement, I think that the Prime Minister should now invite the heads of the grain companies and the heads of the labour unions to come here. He and the Minister of Trade and Commerce should take a hand with the Minister of Labour to bring about a proper settlement in the interests of the producers who are being so embarrassed at this time. I would think these ministers should be vitally concerned about the matter and I hope that some action will be taken in the immediate future.

Mr. St. Laurent: I hope I have not given the impression that the Minister of Labour was not conferring both with the Minister of Trade and Commerce and with myself about each move that he has made to try to bring about a settlement of the problem.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, without extending the discussion, may I point out to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) that he has made one statement which has a bearing on the desirability now of inviting the representatives of both parties. He has said that it is not possible to contemplate the results that would follow a long delay in the settlement of the strike. Without going into details, that implies a type of solution that the Prime Minister said he does not wish at the present time. If that possibility is in the background, then it would seem that it should be communicated to the representatives of both parties so that they will have an opportunity of considering what they should do in the light of that possibility.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Robinson in the chair.

Defence services—

241. To provide for the Canadian forces, the defence research board and other expenditures relating to defence, including contributions toward the military costs of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization; to authorize expenditures in the current year out of the amount hereby provided, not exceeding $324,000,000, under the provisions of section 3 of the Defence Appropriation Act, 1950, and to provide that, notwithstanding subsection 3 of that section, where equipment or supplies acquired by the Canadian forces after March 31, 1950, are transferred, the estimated present value thereof shall, if the governor in council so directs, be credited to this vote instead of being paid into the special account mentioned in the said subsection 3, and when so credited may be expended for the purposes of the Canadian forces; and notwithstanding section 30 of the Financial Administration Act to authorize total commitments for the foregoing purposes of $3,994,895,578 regardless of the year in which such commitments will come in course of payment (of which it is estimated that $1,971,926,275 will come due for payment in future years), $1,960,159,633.

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon): Mr. Chairman, last evening when the house rose I was discussing certain matters of interest arising from the general presentation of the Minister of National Defence yesterday and pointing out the difficulty that a private member faces in obtaining information on this important subject. As a result my discussion will largely take the form of questions and queries.

I was reviewing some of the attempts that I have made thus far to obtain information with respect to welfare services for the troops, a matter that interests me as well as other members of the house. On November 27 last I placed on the order paper a question to which I received a rather blunt and peremptory reply. I pursued the matter in another question asking for further details. The question I submitted on February 5 read as follows:

1. What welfare service is now being provided at unit level for troops serving (a) in Korea, (b) in Germany?

2. What staff at unit level is detailed exclusively to welfare service duty (a) in Korea, (b) in Germany?

3. What voluntary welfare organizations are serving (a) in Korea (b) in Germany? How many personnel are involved?

4. What Canadian amenities e.g. movies, news, comforts, etc., are available to Canadian forces abroad and how are these distributed?

That question was passed as an order for return and the return has not yet been brought down in the house, so I am still very much in the dark.

In a final effort I attempted to have the documents relating to this subject tabled, and that request was turned down. Therefore, I want to pursue this matter because, in spite of the fact that the minister has expressed the viewpoint that to resort to voluntary welfare services would be uneconomical, unnecessary and unwise, I still feel that there is considerable interest in this subject. That interest is displayed in recent reports from the organizations most concerned.

I was going to quote last evening from an article in the January issue of the Legionary, the official organ of the Canadian Legion in Canada. The Legion had directed a letter to the minister asking for information concerning the present attitude of the government towards welfare problems. One or two excerpts from the minister's reply are interesting:

> At present we have a brigade group in Korea, a reinforcement group and other units in Japan, an air force wing and a depot in England, a brigade in Germany and an air force wing in France.
> The heads of the three services consider that it would be unwise, uneconomical and unnecessary to establish at all these places the five welfare agencies (Canadian Legion, Y.M.C.A., Salvation Army, Knights of Columbus, Red Cross) that we used during the second world war and I agree with them.

Now, that is substantially the same reply, only much briefer, that I received to my question on November 27. Another excerpt from the minister's reply is interesting:

> From what I have seen and from the advice given to me by those whose responsibility it is, the conditions of service, general amenities and welfare services of the Canadians today are, having regard to the situation they are in, in every way as good and in most ways better than during the second world war.

That is rather an aspersion on the type of service that was offered by the voluntary organizations during world war I and world war II. From my knowledge of their activities, I think it would be pretty hard to supply the type of welfare services that those organizations provided during world war II; and I would doubt very much if what pertains to units serving abroad is equal in every respect today to the type of service which we who served in world war II were privileged to enjoy.

I come to another section of the reply:

> As far as the 27th brigade is concerned, the same is true, but they are located in the neighbourhood of Hanover, a large city, with of course all the opportunities for religious worship, entertainment and sightseeing that a large city offers.

The implication there is to the effect that because the 27th brigade is located in a large urban area it would be possible for them to enjoy the social amenities extended to the German civilian population. However, recent reports from the well-known journalist, Bill Boss, would indicate that the situation is just the reverse—and that one of the major problems in Hanover is the inability of the troops to fraternize with the civilian population. The troops are regarded rather coldly and the explanation, as I have read it in these interesting dispatches, is that the residents of Hanover are rather standoffish people who do not easily extend hospitality to strangers in their midst. That, of course, may be a carryover from the situation that prevailed during world war II, but definitely according to reliable press dispatches—and unfortunately we have to depend on press dispatches in these matters as we are not able to determine from official sources—the situation with respect to the 27th brigade has not been realized as it was anticipated in the reply to the Canadian Legion by the minister.

Now, I will move along to the Y.M.C.A.'s interest in this matter. There was a press dispatch in the Globe and Mail of February 27, 1953, reading as follows:

> The Y.M.C.A. will press the government to do something about lack of recreational facilities in the army, both in Canada and overseas, when the annual national council meets today at the Royal York hotel.
> A report to be tabled announces that the "Y" is already working with leaders of the Salvation Army, Y.W.C.A., the Canadian Legion, and the Knights of Columbus on a combined submission to be sent to Ottawa.

I presume that submission is already in the hands of the Department of National Defence.

That joint action gets around a difficulty that was outlined in the reply to my question of November 27, to the effect that it would not be possible to establish representatives of all these organizations with any one particular unit. Of course the experience of world war II should have provided the solution for that particular problem because, as I recall, only one representative of one particular organization serviced any one unit, whether it was army, air force or navy. In other words, the organizations pooled their resources and, in so doing, were able to provide a much more comprehensive and efficient welfare program.

I note that in so far as the Salvation Army auxiliary services are concerned they have taken the initiative and have voluntarily sent a team—I think it is a husband and wife team—to the Hanover area to work among the troops of the 27th brigade. I believe that was done at no cost or at very little cost to the Department of National Defence—which would remove the charge that the service would be uneconomical.

I do not want to labour this, but the main point I want to bring out is that it seems to me that there has been a trend toward militarization of welfare services—that is the incorporation of the welfare services within the body of the service units. I think that is contrary to the real spirit of welfare. Military organization, by its very nature, must have discipline and must have a certain rigidity in its functions. I cannot see that we can provide the subtleties necessary in meeting the welfare problems of servicemen by employing men in the forces who have been trained for military duties and not welfare duties.

There is another matter that must be kept in mind in regard to this welfare problem.

Our forces have always been, and I suppose they always will be—so long as we retain a democratic system—civilian forces made up of personnel whose interests lie predominantly in the direction of civilian activities. It seems to me that the voluntary organizations have built up a vast reservoir of experience, during world war II in particular. I have been reading the story of the Y.M.C.A. in the war, and they built up tremendous resources in regard to the handling of service welfare problems, which, combined with their civilian capacity to serve, makes it almost inevitable that our own military organizations will have to depend upon that organization along with others for meeting the welfare needs. The welfare problem is not only one that pertains to troops in the field or air personnel who are on active service. There is also a large area of welfare problems created, particularly when great numbers of civilians are called up and find it necessary to serve in foreign theatres. This precipitates a crisis in the families back home. We are well aware that divorce statistics went up during world war II and immediately following world war II. It is perhaps significant that divorces are again on the increase, following a decline during the years 1949, 1950 and 1951.

A good many of the men serving in the forces are married men with family responsibilities. They are removed from those responsibilities, and automatically social welfare problems are created which no military welfare set-up can handle. The representatives of the voluntary organizations serving in the field have immediate call upon the welfare resources of the organizations at home. The Y.M.C.A., in particular, has a unit in almost every major community in Canada, as has the Salvation Army. They are able to direct their personnel serving on the home front to give assistance in cases where domestic difficulties arise as a result of the absence of the husband and father from the home. I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, that no democratic military force can afford to dispense with the offer of service that has been so generously and so promptly put forward by each of these voluntary organizations.

There is one more aspect of the civilian question that I should like to mention. During world war II, auxiliary officers representing the voluntary organizations retained their civilian status. I saw them in action with my own squadron in the field, and with other units, and I thought such a condition was a decided advantage. In spite of the fact that the process of democratization has gone on in our military forces, there is still a wide gap between the enlisted private or airman and the officer. I know in my own squadron experience we lived apart in rather comfortable mess conditions, while the airmen took whatever was available. Even the problem of geographical separation, particularly while we were on the continent, was one of some proportions. The only time we were in touch with the men who serviced the aircraft, and the other airmen who were responsible for carrying on all the functions that are necessary to keep the aircraft flying, was when we met these men at the point of duty. It was the efforts of our welfare officer in organizing various entertainment activities and recreational activities that brought the officers and men together and created a much better situation so far as morale was concerned.

I believe that the very fact that a man is wearing pips or rings is a deterrent to coming to close grips with the intimate personal needs of the men who are serving in our armed forces. There is a line of social distinction that exists. Obviously the welfare officer, even if he had specialized social service training, is under a handicap in dealing with the men because of the fact he is wearing pips or rings. The soldier or airman in difficulty thinks twice before he bares his soul to such an individual. One of the advantages of using the voluntary organizations was the fact that the representative retained his civilian status, and the organizations provided excellent co-ordination between the commanding officer, the padre and the men. In addition to this they were always in direct contact with the domestic situation on the home front.

When the minister says the use of these services at the present stage of development of our armed forces is uneconomical, unnecessary and unwise, I would disagree most heartily with that statement. If we are moving towards the militarization of welfare, I believe that the words which have been used to describe the use of voluntary systems might be more aptly applied to a strictly military program of welfare. Such a program is uneconomical because we can use our military personnel to much better advantage. It is unnecessary because we have social welfare agencies willing to undertake the job, and axiomatically such a program would be unwise.

I notice the minister says that the advice from the heads of the three services, the navy, army and air force, was against the use of these voluntary bodies. I can understand that problem. As civilians, auxiliary officers would not come under strict military discipline. They might constitute a thorn in the flesh, particularly when they are dealing with subtle, intimate personal problems, and they might have a solution other than the prescribed military solution according to Q.R. (Air) or army regulations. Other disadvantages arise from the policy of maintaining strict military discipline over these auxiliary personnel, but they are more than compensated for by the fact that qualified and experienced welfare officers are able to get to the heart of the matter, are able to get under the surface and look at the problem from the standpoint of the real needs. The fact that the welfare bodies are continuing their representations and are compromising in every way to make it possible for them to serve the present defence needs, which has been stressed by the minister as an urgent and imminent one, is an indication of their willingness and interest in this matter.

I am going to leave the problem of welfare. It might be that, since the Y.M.C.A. and other organizations have made their representations, there has been a change in the interpretation of this problem. Unfortunately, we have not heard about it in the house. I have not been able to get any information from the various attempts I have made.

I now want to discuss briefly a statement that appears in the white paper on Canada's defence program. It is contained on page 5, section 13, subparagraph 1, which reads as follows:

> The immediate defence of Canada and North America from direct attack;

That is given as the No. 1 priority under the objective of our defence policy, and according to the white paper that defence policy has remained unchanged since the reorganization of the services to meet the Korean crisis.

Then, going down to section 18 on page 5, we find that the defence department is moving to fill the gap, that has become increasingly evident so far as home defence is concerned, as follows:

> Regular and reserve fighter squadrons, the backbone of the air defence network, are being built up. The first regular squadron, equipped with CF-100 all-weather, twin-engine jet fighters, was recently formed and by the end of the fiscal year a number of these squadrons will be operating. Meanwhile, a number of squadrons of F-86E Sabres, destined as part of Canada's NATO air contribution have been in Canada available for the defence of this continent. As the last of these are sent to Europe during the year, their places will be taken by squadrons of CF-100's. Reserve squadrons now equipped with Vampires and Mustangs will be re-equipped with CF-100's as these become available.

Ever since I came into the house hon. members on this side have been stressing the fact that priority No. 1 has been ignored in the build-up of Canada's defence. I agree heartily with the hon. member for Nanaimo. I remember when he was rather severely castigated because he dared to infer that priority was not being given to the defence of this continent; but it becomes increasingly obvious that such is the case.

It is now generally recognized that Canada occupies a unique position with regard to air defence. The very fact that we are contributing to it at least half of the national defence budget indicates an emphasis in that direction. From the standpoint of military strategy, we guard the northern approach to the most vulnerable country of the western world, namely the United States of America; and therefore we have a special obligation, along with that country, to see to it that our home defences are adequate to meet any threat of attack. Then during our short military history, beginning with world war I and our participation in the Royal Flying Corps and again in world war II, Canadians have demonstrated that they have a special aptitude with regard to air warfare and air defence.

We of the official opposition gave emphasis to that viewpoint, during the discussion that arose from the appointment of an associate minister of national defence, when we suggested that it would be a more feasible plan to appoint a deputy minister for air who could concentrate exclusively on the important and highly necessary task of building up our defences for air. I do not know just how the defence department is organized, but recently in the Winnipeg Free Press a series of interesting articles attracted my attention. These articles proposed a much more logical, coherent and rational defence organization where the responsibility for policy determination would be removed from the shoulders of the heads of the departments and would be placed in the hands of some sort of military council which would be in a position to deal more adequately with the difficult problems that are connected with our defence build-up.

The suggestion that we appoint a special deputy minister for air was turned down and we are carrying on much in the same hit-or-miss fashion that has been going on in the past few years.

To come directly to this matter of defence for Canada, we have had it brought to our attention forcibly by certain air force personnel that, so far as air defence is concerned, we are wholly inadequate in this regard. Wing Commander Rohmer in Toronto, towards the end of March, made a statement in this regard.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Dinsdale: I hear hon. members on the other side laughing, but it was not the first statement of this kind that has been made.

A similar statement was made just a year ago by a group captain who occupied, and still does—he did not have to retire before he could make a statement—a strategic position in the auxiliary air defence of Canada in Vancouver. He spoke almost a year ago. These statements seem to have something to do with spring fever. A Canadian Press dispatch of March 11, 1952, gave this information:

> Group Capt. Geoff Northcott, commander of R.C.A.F. reserve units in British Columbia, said yesterday British Columbia now is practically defenceless against possible Russian air attack.
> The second world war ace told a meeting of business men a few bombs are just what we need to wake up a few people here.
> He said Russia has the best planes in the world and at least 1 million airborne troops. Canada's west-coast defences were obsolete and insufficient.
> He said the R.C.A.F. wants to establish fighter bases in the British Columbia interior to meet enemy bombers before they could reach Vancouver.
> "We would like to move into Kelowna and Prince George but you know the speed the air force moves under the government", he added.

That was a year ago and this charge was repeated again by Wing Commander Rohmer who retired before he made the statement. These men, I suppose, have had in our auxiliary air defence the most responsible positions occupied by any people in Canada. Wing Commander Rohmer commanded the two squadrons in Toronto and Group Captain Northcott has the two squadrons on the west coast. I was therefore pleased to see that there was in the statement that the minister made a stress or emphasis on this problem. We are moving forward slowly. Perhaps the difficulty has been that we have refused to face up to reality. I have here a statement from Canadian Aviation of April, 1952, in which, at page 29, speaking of the difficulties relating to air defence, two reasons are given, and the second reason given is:

> The fanciful predictions at the political level have supported the naïve assumption that such a process should be quick and simple.

Mr. Dickey: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Dinsdale: Yes.

Mr. Dickey: Does he think that the quotation he has just read from the editorial to which he referred is a fair quotation to make from that editorial when read as a whole?

Mr. Dinsdale: Yes, I do; because the editorial goes on to describe the efforts of Avro in regard to the production of the CF-100 and points out that in terms of the experience in the United Kingdom and in the United States, Canada's record has been unexcelled.

Mr. Claxton: First class.

Mr. Dinsdale: That is notwithstanding the fact that we had to start from scratch. We had no previous experience in this regard. But I do agree with this criticism that we were naïve in assuming that we could have CF-100's and other types in production back as early as 1950, when it takes such a long time to produce an original type from the drawing board. Because of that, or as the article expresses it because of the fanciful predictions at the political level, we have been lulled into lethargy, thinking that everything was well. I think the government should have taken the public, through the elected representatives of the people, into its confidence and explained the details, the problems and the circumstances. Had that been done, I think we would have had greater co-operation from the public at large. It is a good thing that for the first time air force personnel intimately in touch with the problem are speaking out, in order to bring these difficulties to the attention of the public.

We do not criticize the F-86. It has proved its worth in operations in Korea. It is being sent as interim supplies to the R.A.F. until they can develop their own advanced types. The CF-100 likewise is going to serve a very useful purpose in the defence of Canada. My criticism is that the government has not been realistic in keeping the public and this house informed, rather choosing to lull us into a sense of well-being when there was no cause for such a feeling.

Some hon. Members: Time.

Mr. Dinsdale: I think I still have a few minutes.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Go ahead.

Mr. Dinsdale: And nobody is overly enthusiastic on the other side. Continuing to deal with the problem of the defence of Canada, the No. 1 priority, according to the minister's white paper, is getting over the equipment difficulties so far as aircraft are concerned. I only hope—I have no information, because no information is forthcoming for hon. members—that in the production of aircraft we shall continue to keep abreast of the changing needs as we move toward the delta wing type of aircraft, or as it is presented in the Roundel for the current month, as we move toward "the turbo-jet, the ram-jet and the rocket air force of the future". Here is a very interesting article on that subject. That contains information that we could not possibly get in this house.

There is also the personnel problem. We discovered that in the lowering of the educational standards. The hon. member for Calgary East, in a reply he received, got the information that the educational standards for servicemen were constantly going down. I often wondered how the quality of our personnel compares with that of other NATO troops, especially NATO airmen being trained in this country. I do not have the information on it but I would rather doubt, with the continuing lowering of standards, that we are finding it easy to maintain the necessary high levels to man the type of air force required by today's defence needs. I notice that we are still emphasizing the sort of easy approach to defence in advertisements in the press. Here is an advertisement that appeared in the Carberry Express on January 28, 1953:

Security—Pension

Responsible Position

for

If you are over 17 years of age . . . in good health. . . . eager for adventure, travel and fellowship in a large organization that offers real careers for young Canadians today . . . fill in the coupon below and get the full information about careers open to you in the Canadian army. You will be amazed at the wonderful opportunities for trade training . . . the good wages . . . benefits of all kinds including long annual holidays. Find out without obligation.

Well, that is offering a good time in the army when I think we should be emphasizing more the obligation and the responsibility to serve in the defence of freedom. It reminds me of the situation that existed during the 1930's when I was a young student. In 1936 we subscribed to that famous Oxford resolution that under no circumstances would we take up arms for king and for country, and three years later most of us who had subscribed to that view were involved in the bloodiest war that this world has ever seen. We seem to be still bogged down by the fallacy of nineteenth century Liberalism that believed we were moving gradually towards perfection and that if we only waited long enough everything would work out happily in the end, or, as the Fabians called it, the inevitability of gradualness. I believe that we should be emphasizing more the responsibility of service and the obligation to serve rather than feather-bedding the situation, as seems to be indicated by that advertisement.

Now, there is the reserve and the auxiliary problem. The reserve seems to be frustrated and the auxiliary seems to be frustrated, judging from the statements I have already indicated. From personal experience I know that we have not been able to make very good use of the auxiliary other than those who are actively engaged in the nine auxiliary squadrons, and even those do not seem to be too happy, judging from Rohmer and Northcott's remarks; but in the air force association frustration prevails because up to the present time—and I am a member of of the association—the only part we have been able to take is in the form of a social club, to try to preserve the old camaraderie of world war II, to do a little line shooting in an atmosphere that is very similar to the wartime mess atmosphere.

We tried to assist recruiting, but there were not enough recruits offering themselves to require any assistance. We tried for the air observer corps, but we discovered no observer corps was being formed in our area so we participated in the mobilization air training plan; at least two of us did. I am glad to see this plan being expanded, because I think it is a very useful way to absorb those keen types who in the face of the present emergency and crisis want to do something more than reminisce about world war II.

Speaking personally, I have been trying to retain my interest in radar, because I think it is the most important avenue of service as we move toward the new type of air defence required in Canada; but under the M.A.T.P. I am earmarked as a personnel officer, a trade in which I have had absolutely no experience in the air force. All my experience was with night fighter airborne radar. We spent months and months in tedious training in aerial interception (A.I.) tactics, and now there seems to be no use for that particular activity. I find this very hard to understand in a day when the defence of Canada depends upon a supply of personnel skilled in the practices of G.C.I. (ground controlled interception).

One final word on this problem of the defence of Canada. Judging by the statement in the white paper we are going to replace the present Vampires and Mustangs of reserve squadrons with the CF-100. That seems to be another one of these facile statements and so far as I am concerned it requires more elaboration. With the present type of training going on in the reserve squadrons, I am very sceptical whether it will be possible to bring the reserve crews up to the standards of efficiency required for radar-equipped CF-100 all-weather fighters and necessary to cope with any possible airborne attack. I remember my own long-extended training: a year in Canada, two months at an advanced flying unit to convert from singles to twins, four months on operational training and then on to blind approach training and further squadron training before becoming operational. From the time we graduated with wings until we became operational another year was absorbed in training. After we were trained we converted twice to new types of radar equipment, and we were taken out of the line of operations during the period of conversion. But this statement says—and apparently the reserve is still going to be the backbone, the main responsibility for Canadian defence—that the CF-100 will be supplied to the reserve and everything will work out for the best. All-weather flying of jet aircraft with airborne radar requires the most highly skilled type of crew. It is one of the most highly skilled types of activity in the air force. It means that we shall have to take into consideration real problems of reserve training in order to handle this responsibility.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It being one o'clock I now leave the chair.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Dickey: Mr. Chairman, before the house rose at one o'clock the hon. member for Brandon had been speaking for some fifty minutes or so, and at one point in his speech he referred to an editorial in Canadian Aviation of April, 1952. At the time he gave the quotation I asked the hon. member if he thought that what he had selected from the editorial was fair, without reading the whole editorial as it appeared, simply using that quotation to try to support the kind of case he was making.

The fact is that this editorial was written at a time when a number of public statements had been made which were I think intended to make exactly the kind of case the hon. member was trying to make in his speech this morning. This editorial was written, not in support of that case but as an answer to the criticisms that were being made. It was for that reason that I questioned the hon. member on the careful selection he had made of one small part of the editorial. I think in fairness to everybody I should read the editorial as it appeared. This reads:

> Facts Versus Rumours—An Appraisal of the Avro Projects
> The rumour factory seems to be in quantity production on the subject of Avro Canada and more particularly the two high-priced projects, the CF-100 patrol interceptor and the Orenda jet engine. If we are to credit the anonymous but "well-informed" sources responsible for current reports, the CF-100 is a flying flop and the Orenda is crawling with technical "bugs". To sum it up, millions of tax dollars have been poured into Avro but only delays and alibis have come out of the factory.
> What are the facts? It is true that since 1946 the government has consigned some $50 million to the Avro programs. It is also a fact that in terms of aircraft and engines produced to date, the return on this substantial investment has been insignificant. On the other hand, what reason did we have to expect these projects to move from drafting board to quantity production in less than five years? Here are two reasons: 1. As a nation we have had no previous experience in appraising top-flight aeronautical assignments of this kind.

This is the portion selected by the hon. member for his quotation:

> 2. The fanciful predictions at the political level have supported the naïve assumption that such a process should be quick and simple.
> Is the CF-100 fighter program shamefully sluggish? Here is the chronicle: Design project launched in October, 1946. Detailed design started in May, 1947. Prototype tooling commenced in January, 1948. Government contract for 10 pre-production fighters issued in May, 1949. First prototype CF-100 flown in January, 1950. Total elapsed time, design start to test flight: 40 months. Comparable British fighter prototypes have required 38 and 39 months to initial flight. A U.S. fighter got airborne in 34 months.
> The original assignment was to build 10 CF-100 fighters. It was not until September, 1950, that a production order was issued and this was stepped up substantially in February of last year.
> The record also reveals that time consumption on the Orenda development has not been out of line. The period from design to first test run: 29 months. U.S. average: 25 months. Two comparable British jets: 29 months average.
> In February this year, the Orenda Mk. 2 (production version) completed, with success, its 150-hour type acceptance test run. This was 36 months after the initial run. U.S. average for this stage: 46 months. Comparable British average: 37 months.
> In attempting to assess Avro's progress, it is only fair to note that conversion from experimental development to quantity production is quite an ordeal for any organization. In this instance it involved a drastic shake-up that split Avro down the middle to create engine and fighter divisions. The Orenda assignment has called for erection, in less than a year, of a new 400,000 square-foot plant. While the pilot production line in the original building continues to dribble out engines, the impressive ranks of machine tools are forming in the new plant and it is predicted that production will be flowing steadily before the end of this year. Meantime, fighter production has been retarded for spar modification and for important armament changes. Such delays are a familiar feature of military aircraft progress. On the strength of factual evidence we believe it is fair to concede that these two projects are proceeding without significant delay.

The editorial then goes on to discuss briefly the quality of the aircraft and of the engine which I do not think is relevant to the argument the hon. member was making. The editorial concludes as follows:

> The CF-100 is neither substandard nor obsolete. It was recognized after flight testing of the prototype that the main spar would have to be strengthened to prevent undue wing flexing under the high G stress of military aerobatics. The two prototype versions delivered to the R.C.A.F. and shortly returned to the manufacturer for modification had been placarded (with a 5 G limitation) pending this modification.
> This aircraft was designed to meet a particular military specification combining exceptional range, all-weather night and day operation, high rate of climb, and effective speed for combat. There are very few aircraft in the world today in this particular bracket. And until one of this type with superior performance comes along, the CF-100 can't be described with accuracy as obsolete. Critical examination of government investments such as the Avro projects is a right of the public and a responsibility of the press. But criticism is only helpful when it is sound. And rumours are poor substitutes for facts.

I am content, Mr. Chairman, to leave my question to the hon. member, who has made a quotation from that editorial in support of the argument he has been making, and the reading of the editorial to speak for themselves. Perhaps I might also say in addition that the final sentence of the editorial can, I think, with great justice and with advantage be applied to a very great majority of the criticisms that we have been hearing not only in this debate but also over the past two or three years from the official opposition regarding defence matters, namely, that rumours are poor substitutes for facts.

Mr. Dinsdale: I am glad that the hon. member has placed the entire editorial on the record. I did not have time to do so myself.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Dinsdale: I think it brings out the point I was trying to make even more clearly than hitherto. As the hon. member will recall, the point I made at the beginning of my remarks last evening was that information has not been forthcoming concerning some of the major defence developments, particularly with reference to air. As a result of the rumour-mongering that has arisen from lack of information, there has been much unnecessary criticism of these very excellent projects. I agree entirely that A. V. Roe and Canadair have done an excellent job, but it is unfortunate that members of the house could not have been taken into the confidence of the Department of National Defence so that unnecessary rumours might have been allayed.

I also made the point at the opening of my remarks that we in the opposition have to go to magazine and newspaper reports in order to get the facts, and that is an unfortunate state of affairs. The editorial that has just been read indicates that situation precisely. I was not fully aware of developments on the CF-100 project and the Orenda engine until I received all the necessary information from various Canadian aviation magazines. We in the house are treated to broad optimistic generalities rather than the specific information that is necessary in order to discuss the very important problems of defence development intelligently and in a meaningful way.

The phrase "not in the public interest" is used repeatedly when we are looking for information on these problems. The hon. member for Nanaimo asked for information on radar development which he was denied. We had to get the information from a publication of the air force association. I would venture to say that espionage agents know more about the defence program than we in the opposition. I think we would have a happier state of affairs so far as defence matters are concerned if the government were willing to take members on all sides of the house into their confidence and treat them as reasonable beings having a sense of responsibility in these matters and as official representatives of the citizens of Canada, because in the final analysis, no matter how we try to conceal the true facts of the real situation, the burden is going to fall upon the shoulders of the public. They are the ones who inevitably have to bear the brunt. Therefore I thank the hon. member for Halifax for putting the editorial on the record because it very precisely and effectively climaxes the important point that I was trying to make in my remarks.

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): Mr. Chairman, I was rather surprised by the attitude of the hon. member who has just spoken and who is one of our most likeable colleagues. He forgets one thing, that no minister of national defence has afforded as many opportunities to members of parliament to visit plants where jet planes are made and other plants that supply arms and ammunition as the present Minister of National Defence. I wonder if the hon. gentleman was a member of parliament when we went to Toronto a couple of years ago and visited the A. V. Roe plant at Malton. Nothing was hidden from us. There were gentlemen there who were willing to show and explain everything to all members of parliament who were there, and they were not only Liberal members. There were many Conservatives and members belonging to other groups. We were together and that visit was very interesting and most informative.

Now, sir, you may find me a little old-fashioned but I do not understand the propriety of discussing technical matters concerning arms and ammunition in the house. There are some things that are supposed to be secret but nothing should be secret to a member of parliament. He has the right to be informed, but I wonder if it would not be a good thing to discuss all these matters in camera. Some gentlemen of the press might complain about it because they would not have the opportunity to hear the discussion that took place in the house, but members of parliament would have the opportunity to become much better acquainted with all these matters without any publicity. I presume that the hon. gentleman who has just spoken was not at all seeking publicity and that he was fulfilling his parliamentary duties in speaking as he did. I am sure that was his purpose.

But on the other hand if we look at the newspapers we see that they give very detailed and precise information about matters that should remain secret, and I maintain the view that discussions like this one should be held in camera notwithstanding the complaints that may come from the press. When members of parliament are properly informed about any matter, they cannot ask for anything more unless they want to play politics.

I stand by the minister and I also stand by my own attitude in the house with regard to military matters and with regard to two incidents that occurred in Quebec city. Something very serious happened during the Quebec conference. We all remember, as it appeared in the press, that the plans for the invasion of Normandy were lost in the reading room of the Chateau Frontenac. They were top secret documents; and they were left there by an officer who was absent-minded —whether American, English or Canadian I do not know. But that top secret document, the most secret document of the time, was left there by someone who was perhaps absent-minded, perhaps drunk, perhaps crazy—probably all three. But, now, what did we see in the press afterwards? We saw that a sergeant had been rewarded, had been given a decoration because he had found those papers—and quite properly so. But we did not see in any paper, and I have not been told by anyone, that the officer guilty of that gross negligence has been punished. One was rewarded; the other was not punished.

The result was this. It occurred again, and it was reported in all the papers and particularly in the Ottawa Journal of November 7 of last year:

Reporters Hear 'Top Secret'—on Upper Shelf

Quebec City, Nov. 7—(BUP)—Two reporters rode down in a Chateau Frontenac elevator with 15 civilians and senior officers attending the Canadian-British-U.S. military conference.

One officer turned to the other and asked: "Can I borrow those documents you have?"

Answer: "I'm sorry, I can't do it—top secret you know. But you'll find them in my room . . . on the upper shelf in the clothes closet".

Mr. Adamson: Did they fire the manager of the hotel too?

Mr. Pouliot: No, they did not fire the manager of the hotel at all. But, because there was no sanction of the first offence a second one occurred which was reported by the press.

Do you not find it serious, Mr. Chairman? I cannot conceive that men who are supposed to keep the old army tradition and make the necessary distinction between what is important and what is not could come to be guilty of such an offence. I am not telling you, sir, anything that is unknown. I only remind you of what you know and, I hope, the consequences too.

May I tell you, sir, that I am much more interested in Korea than in Currie; and we have heard so much about Currie that I hope that I may be excused if I talk about Korea. I have great respect for the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) and I believe that he has done a quite superhuman job, especially before the appointment of his associate minister. That does not mean that I have always agreed with him and that I take for granted everything that is said by the Department of National Defence; but I believe sincerely that he has done a good job under the circumstances and that none of his critics could have done better under similar circumstances. Now, sir, what astounds me is that external affairs and the army are intermingled to such a point that it is impossible to discuss army matters without discussing external policy, and vice versa. Very often the Minister of National Defence had to speak about external matters, matters of external policy, and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) had to speak about military matters. I will speak about both.

Mr. Chairman, I remember that about three years ago, when it was decided that Canada should take part in the police force that was to settle the Korean problem, everyone was under the impression that the destroyer that was sent by Canada to Korea would arrive in Korea when everything was over. One remembers also, Mr. Chairman, that President Roosevelt some years ago, immediately after the war with Japan, decided to "liberate" Korea. That was the expression used by the then president. He wanted to free the Koreans from all Japanese influence. It was a noble aim, but afterwards it was decided that Korea would be divided in two by the 38th parallel; and that there would be a police force in the south—an American police force. What happened was that the American officers who were there were under no control, and one of the top ranking officers was in love with a mistress of the chief of the communists of North Korea. That woman succeeded in helping the smuggling of arms from South Korea to North Korea and that is the reason why North Korea became at one time well equipped in arms and ammunition. That has been published in Coronet, a United States magazine.

Well, there were battles in Korea but there was no declaration of war—so much so that sometime ago a young American soldier who carried double risk insurance was killed in Korea and, according to the press, his family after consulting eminent lawyers decided to take legal action against the insurance company, under the claim that there was no war in Korea, that it was only a police action, and that the insurance which did not cover war risks was in force for that man who was fighting as a policeman in Korea. The United States tribunal which studied the case in the first instance gave judgment in favour of the family, and that judgment was appealed by the insurance company. The appeal court confirmed the judgment of the first instance, showing that it was a police action that was being undertaken in Korea. Approximately three years ago when it was decided to send a Canadian destroyer to Korea, I warned the Secretary of State for External Affairs that that was a very dangerous step, to be too much under the influence of the foreign policy of the United States. It was abused by some of the newspapers, in these times of human rights and fundamental freedoms, because I had taken advantage of my human rights and fundamental freedoms.

Since then, many important statements have been made. I recall reading in Le Soleil of Quebec, February 14 last year, a very well written and timely article under the pen of one of the most brilliant journalists in Canada, the former president of the press gallery, Mr. Lorenzo Paré. He said that it was then time to get out of Korea. One may say that it is the prerogative of military men to express views on military matters, and that it is their exclusive right to make pronunciamentos in that regard. Well, some important gentlemen have spoken to that effect. General Mark Clark, for instance, is quoted by the Ottawa Journal of September 26, 1952, in an editorial entitled "This Bleak Prospect in Korea". He said:

> The sober reality today in Korea is that there is no fresh and concrete evidence to indicate any increase in the reds' desire for a truce.

Then the Journal continues:

> General Clark's grave words come with the Panmunjom 'truce' talks virtually suspended, and while hot water in Korea grows hotter.

The same editorial, dating back eight months ago, quotes Major General Selden, who had just returned from Korea. He said:

> Twice as many United Nations troops and half again as much air power would insure a decisive allied victory in Korea.

After having made these two quotations, the Journal concludes:

> It may be, as so many argue, that we can't risk all-out war with China: that we can't do much more than we are doing in Korea lest it bring such war with China. But against that, can we risk or afford a continuation of what is happening in Korea now, with its bleak prospect of years of costly indecision, and with exposure to the Russians of both weakness and fear?

On September 25 last year, Mr. Clement Davies, Liberal party leader in the British House of Commons, suggested a quick plan for disarmament, to be supervised by a United Nations police force. On Thursday, October 2, 1952, Major General A. J. H. Cassels had a hunch that there would be a Korean armistice within six or nine months from that date. Therefore the pourparler that is taking place now was foreseen by officers of high standing.

There was something else that occurred last year, and that was the Truman-Eisenhower controversy about the campaign in Asia, and what former President Truman said was reported in the newspapers of October 1. Two days later the newspapers carried General Eisenhower's answer, and I need only read the headline:

> Ike tells isolationist area U.S. should not have fought.
> General suggests America should not have gone to war against Kaiser, Hitler; leave Asia to Asians.

Well, this statement is most important, because it came from the lips of the general who commanded the allied forces during the last war. What I find very refreshing is the change of administration in the Pentagon at Washington. Just because the United States is a friendly neighbour, one should not be precluded from expressing an honest opinion about matters of such tremendous importance which mean life or death for countless people. When I think of that beautiful country, full of tradition, that rich country that was Korea, and when we see the mountains of ruins in all the cities of that formerly prosperous country, I wonder how that country has been liberated, to use the words of President Roosevelt.

Well, sir, I have many quotations that I could use, but I shall abstain from doing so because I do not want to make a long speech at this stage of the session. But my conclusion, sir, is this. The Minister of National Defence and also the Secretary of State for External Affairs, to whom I give certain credit for his efforts for peace, should see to it that even within the United Nations Canada should express an independent opinion—one that is not biased by that of the United States or of Great Britain—until a common decision is made. We are partners. It happens that under NATO the forces should be under one command and should have one policy. But it is important that those who attend such conferences should not be impressed by the other delegates who represent larger countries. They must express the sentiments and the feelings of the Canadian people before giving a power of attorney to the other delegates who speak in their behalf. Therein lies the superiority of NATO over the United Nations.

In the United Nations everything was run by the security council; everything was run by the great nations, and the other countries like Canada were not on a footing of equality with the big ones. In the next conference I hope that the Minister of National Defence and also the Secretary of State for External Affairs for Canada will continue to impress upon their fellow delegates the importance of Canada as a great nation. If the population of Canada is not as large as that of the United States, Great Britain, Russia, France, or the other countries of Europe or of China, nevertheless it is a great country in the noblest meaning of that word. By that I mean that Canada has reached the point where she should be considered by all to be on a footing of equality in the international discussions in which our ministers and delegates take part.

In conclusion may I say that I hope the efforts made by the government—I do not say by the ministers alone but rather by the government—to promote peace in the world at the earliest possible opportunity will have the full support of all those who belong to NATO and also of those who belong to the United Nations.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Chairman, in rising to speak in this debate I fully admit my limited capacity to speak with authority on this subject. What I have to say will be based on listening to debates in the House of Commons and on my experience on the defence expenditure committee. I will also convey to the minister some of the things that have been expressed to me by a good number of my constituents.

With the knowledge that some 45 per cent of the taxes collected today are being spent on defence, I am quite sure that all members of the committee realize the necessity for making as certain as possible that there are no unnecessary expenditures in this extremely large-spending department. I never rise to speak on this question without thinking of the workers in the smelters, the mines, the forests, the factories, the offices and on the farms of Canada whose hard labour, and the taxes which result from that hard labour, make it possible to carry on and to continue this defence program. I am sure they are willing to pay what is necessary to provide adequate defence for this country; but I am sure they would be most unwilling to pay what was unnecessary.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

We must realize at this time that all those people who are contributing considerable taxes from their modest incomes are doing without many things they would otherwise enjoy were it not necessary to provide for these defence estimates. May I also say, Mr. Chairman, that I think we are making an exceptional defence effort. I think it is quite correct to say that for purposes of defence we are paying a greater percentage of the taxes collected than is any western European country. I understand that the average there is somewhere about 32 per cent.

Whenever I am listening to debates on defence or am starting to speak on defence, I am always reminded of a statement made by the hon. member for Nanaimo and to be found in Hansard of May 10, 1951, at page 2810. I never forgot that statement because when the hon. member made it he spoke with a lifetime of experience and with knowledge. I accept that statement as founded in fact. The hon. gentleman said:

> I have never known an admiral, a general or an air marshal who did not begin by asking for more than his share of anything.

I have always kept that statement in my mind when I have been dealing with defence matters because I think it puts into good language what happens in military circles not only in Canada but in other countries. It indicates a more or less inevitable development of the military mind.

The scandal at Camp Petawawa was revealed as the result of the action of a responsible and patriotic citizen in sending an anonymous letter to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. It was not discovered by the defence department. It was discovered by the alertness of one citizen. I hope that all citizens of Canada continue to be just as alert as was that gentleman.

That scandal was discovered and as a result of the discovery of it the minister ordered Mr. George Currie to conduct an investigation into the whole situation in the army works services. This investigation proved without question that at Petawawa—and it was an exceptional case, we admit—as a result of a conspiracy, a gang of crooks had organized to loot and to steal public property. In addition to that, there is no doubt that the Currie report revealed an unfortunate state of affairs throughout a considerable section of the army works services.

As a result of that investigation and as a result of debates in the House of Commons—and they should never be underestimated, although we all at times get tired of listening to repetitious remarks—there is no doubt about it that there is a great improvement across Canada at this time. I have heard that from my constituents; I have heard it also from friends in the services. There is an improvement in the administration of the Department of National Defence. In fact, I am told that the pendulum has swung a bit too far the other way and that now if you want to paint a screen door you must get authority from Ottawa. That is typical of the defence department, and the military mind. It naturally goes from one extreme to another. But I am told that is a fact. In any event, I think we are all extremely pleased to know that there is a considerable improvement.

I might say at this point that to me there is an interesting aspect of these debates as far as my correspondence is concerned. I have had to explain repeatedly to some of my constituents that the so-called Murray report dealt with the United States forces and not the Canadian forces.

Mr. Fulton: No, no.

Mr. Herridge: Constituents have written and told me about the dreadful waste on the Alaska highway, and that sort of thing. I have had to write back and tell them it had nothing to do with Canada, that it was waste by United States forces there during the second world war.

As a member of the defence expenditure committee, I have had an opportunity to hear witnesses from the Department of Defence Production. I must say in fairness that I have formed the opinion that they are an honest, competent group of officials who have been working under particularly difficult conditions. Without doubt, though, Mr. Chairman, the evidence clearly indicates that in the defence construction program there has been waste and extravagance. But I do not blame the officials of Defence Construction Limited. I am trying to be fair in this whole question. Their handicaps have been the results of a set of unusual circumstances. The first was the inevitable sense of haste and urgency. In fairness I think we must admit that we do not do things as well under abnormal conditions as under normal conditions when we can take the normal time to plan a project, develop it and so forth.

Second, there were shortages of material, particularly of steel, which caused delays, and which in turn caused increased expenses and excessive costs, and so on. That was not their fault.

The third important thing was that, after listening to the evidence, I came to the conclusion that there were delays and increased expenses occasioned first of all by the program as designed by the armed forces. They say what they want, and it is obvious to me in many cases they started out on a project without knowing exactly what they did want, and then after they got started in some instances major changes were made in design. These things caused increased expenses, and no doubt in some cases there was no justification for it. On top of all that we had this program going on under difficult weather conditions, with the construction industry naturally looking for its profits as usual. I think that that combination of circumstances did produce conditions which meant extra cost, some extravagance and some waste, but I certainly would not lay the blame on the honest and competent officials of Defence Construction Limited. After listening to their evidence in the committee I think it is fair to say that one cannot fail to be impressed by the magnitude of the task, the unusual problems they had to meet, the urgency of the program and these other factors that I have mentioned.

Defence Construction is commissioned to build what the armed forces consider they require. I am of the opinion there is every evidence, as Mr. Currie said in his report on the army works services, of a tendency toward war psychology among certain of the high officials of the defence department. Many of these men obtained their experience in the second world war, and public money is nothing to them when trying to get things done. They were impressed, and rightly so, by the urgency of the situation and the element of speed, and they allowed themselves to be carried away. Money apparently was no object whatever when things had to be done. That has had a big effect on the cost of the program today. Buildings were frequently delayed, as I said before, because of change in designs and plans. I am distinctly under the impression, because of that war psychology that Mr. Currie mentioned, that the senior officials in the armed forces gave little thought to costs when planning the building programs and bringing them to fruition. These people look on things from an entirely different point of view when compared with the average Canadian citizen. They have lived a different life; in fact I have said to some of them, and I know some of them who are bitterly opposed to socialism, that they live the life of the most complete social security of any people of Canada. They are cared for from the cradle to the grave, and naturally they have not the same approach as the man in the street who is struggling along making a living, and being taxed to pay for these things. That was indicated when the program was first started by the purchase of new desks and furniture.

I am told, and I should like the minister to correct me if I am wrong, that quite serviceable desks were taken out and, I understand, taken down to public works and brand new desks of a finer type were brought in. Expensive rugs were bought. I am quite sure that these new desks and these expensive carpets did very little to increase the defence effort or contribute to the greater defence of Canada. In that connection, Mr. Chairman, I want to read briefly from an article in the Globe and Mail of November 20, 1952, by George Bain:

Two years' purchases

Defence rugs, carpets cost $839,903

In less than two years, $839,903 worth of rugs and carpets have been ordered by the Department of National Defence.

At $17 a square yard—more than most Canadian householders pay for floor-covering—this would buy enough broadloom to cover Yonge street, curb-to-curb from King street almost to Roxborough street.

On this rug, all the 100,000 men and women of Canada's active navy, army and air force could be assembled—two to a yard—without crowding.

The total of the defence department's rug orders is derived from the lists of major defence contracts which have been published twice monthly since November 20, 1950.

This is how the rug-buying breaks down by years:

Between November 20 and the end of 1950, contracts were placed for $54,865 worth of rugs.

In 1951, five orders added $141,403 to the total.

And up to the end of October this year—the last date covered by the contracts lists—$643,635 worth had been ordered.

In the same 23 months since November, 1950, contracts in a total of $452,929 were made for linoleum. All but one of these was awarded in 1951, when linoleum purchases amounted to $428,929.

Retail prices quoted here for top quality linoleum are $4 a square yard for blue, $3.45 a square yard for brown—the colours in which it is presumed the defence purchasers would be most interested.

At an average price of $3.75 a yard, $452,929 would buy more than 114,000 square yards of linoleum. Even with allowance made for the cost of installation, which would reduce the yardage, the amount purchased still could be reckoned in acres—about 24 of them.

To go with the new rugs and linoleum, the defence department in same period—a period in which the strength of the services increased by fewer than 55,000 men—ordered about $8,650,000 worth of furniture.

Some of this has been office furniture—filing cabinets, tables, office safes (79,671 this year) and the like—but the largest number of contracts listed have been simply for "furniture".

Defence headquarters and the country's navy, army and air force bases were not without furniture when the new, post-Korea defence program was embarked upon.

[Mr. Herridge.]

And so on. I think that very extensive ordering of rugs—and there are some very expensive rugs in some of the offices of defence headquarters; you fairly sink into them when you walk on them—and this expensive linoleum and these expenses for furniture show that these people were going to have their offices in good shape as soon as they had the money to carry on and do it with.

I am going to pass from there to bring to the attention of the minister something that several of my constituents have mentioned to me, men of experience in the Royal Navy and in the Royal Canadian Navy. I have no capacity to speak on the subject, but I am just passing on to the minister the criticisms that have come to me from men with senior naval experience. They are of the opinion that there is a danger for us in this country to get delusions of grandeur as far as the navy is concerned and consider going in for large ships. I should like the minister to tell the committee what is the daily cost of running the Magnificent and if the government is considering building another aircraft carrier of that type. What does it cost per day to run a cruiser?

I have a clipping here from the Montreal Gazette of December 18, 1951, which deals with the Canadian naval policy as laid out by Admiral Mainguy. This reads:

Mainguy Stresses Anti-Sub Defence

Sees Major R.C.N. Role Under NATO in Combating Undersea Menace

Ottawa, Dec. 17—Major role of the R.C.N. under the North Atlantic Treaty Organization is anti-submarine warfare, Vice-Admiral E. R. Mainguy said today.

The admiral who this month took over command of the R.C.N. and who two years ago wrote the "Mainguy Report" on the navy's internal problems, said at a conference in the parliamentary press gallery that he, as chief of the naval staff, is "against" any R.C.N. activity or development which does not have to do with anti-submarine work or the defence of harbours.

The admiral said in a speech recently that there was no reason why Canada should not become the anti-sub authority of the allied powers.

At today's conference he said Canada's naval role had been discussed at NATO conferences, and it was generally considered that Canada's main responsibility is anti-submarine work.

When the minister replies I should like him to tell the committee what are the intentions of the government with respect to building large ships for the navy.

I have very little to say at this time with regard to the army except that a number of my constituents have said to me that it appears to be rather expensive advertising when it costs $161 to secure each recruit.

Mr. Claxton: The corrected figure is $70 per active force man or $43 if you include the reserves.

Mr. Herridge: I got the figure of $161 from another person and I am glad to be corrected. That is the figure that people have written me about and I will see that it is corrected.

I listened with a great deal of interest yesterday to the speech of the hon. member for Cape Breton South. I think he made a most excellent speech and dealt with some aspects of defence in a unique and somewhat unusual way.

He spoke at some length about the morale of the troops in Germany and Korea. I mention this also because a number of my constituents have written to me and I have met a number of men who have returned from Korea and Germany and there are complaints about the welfare services in those countries. The hon. member for Brandon spoke at some length on this matter earlier today. I have another clipping from the Montreal Gazette of December 8, 1952, dealing with this question. This is entitled "Troop Morale in Germany Said 'Rotten' ". It sets out interviews with various men who have returned from overseas and who were complaining about the lack of recreational facilities and so on.

I am definitely in favour of the suggestion made by the hon. member for Brandon that civilian recreational services for the troops should be provided if possible. I know that they rendered great service during the first and second world wars. I want to make my plea that everything be done to make living conditions as good as possible for those men who are away from Canada. The minister may have some explanation of the present form of welfare services that are being provided, but I would like him to tell the committee just what is being done at the present time. I think there is a general complaint across the country, and I know I have received complaints from my constituents that the welfare services overseas are not all that they should be.

Dealing with the air force I must say that here I will have to depend upon what other people say. I was disturbed by an article which appeared in the Globe and Mail of March 27 entitled, "Time People Given Truth, Rohmer Says". The article continues:

> Addressing a meeting of the Canadian Progress Club at the Royal York hotel, he continued: "Canada could not put up a single modern aircraft in its own defence. (She) is absolutely helpless to an air attack".
> His main charges:
> The air defence of Canada is entrusted to nine auxiliary fighter squadrons equipped with hopeless, obsolescent aircraft and manned by part-time pilots.
> Despite frequent assurances to the contrary, there is not one Canadian squadron to enforce the radar chain being established along the Arctic frontier.
> Every first-line jet in squadron service with the R.C.A.F. has been committed for use in Europe under provisions of the North Atlantic treaty alliance.

Apparently that article was reprinted in many Canadian papers and has caused great concern to many Canadians. I should like the minister to deal particularly with the charges made by this retired air force officer and tell the committee exactly what is the situation.

There is another aspect of defence in which I am particularly interested and in which a great number of people across the country are interested. Many people are of the opinion that in recent years there has been a tendency for parliament to lose control of these vast expenditures and for civilian control to be lessened and lessened. This has been a gradual development. In this respect I should like to quote briefly from Comment of June, 1951. This is an excellent magazine which deals with economic and social questions. I think it will save time to quote this article because it sets out succinctly what I have in mind. It reads:

> Military Must Accept Civilian Control
> The experience of recent months has graphically illustrated the importance of civilian control over military forces.
> Military commanders must have a good deal of power and authority so that they can direct the forces at their disposal effectively. But military commanders derive their authority from appointment and not from democratic elections. They are not responsible to the people but must be held absolutely responsible to the civilian representatives of the people who appoint them.

And again:

> The principle of civic control over the armed forces of the nation has long been accepted in the United Kingdom and in other nations which derive their constitutional practices from the traditions of the British parliamentary system. But the evolution of modern methods of defence, warfare and international security action may call for closer scrutiny of the way in which this principle is being applied.

We of this group agree with those sentiments. We believe that we should watch to make certain that there is proper civilian control of the military in connection with the expansion of our defence program. We feel that decisions are made by the military with regard to large expenditures that should be made by civilian authorities. They have had their way as to what was required here and there. We do urge that there be stricter control of the military and greater reference to parliament with regard to these large expenditures. In many cases all that parliament does is to confirm the total amounts when knowing little about the details until after the money has been expended. Apparently Mr. Currie was of the same opinion because he makes this suggestion in his report:

> The second alternative is to create a civilian organization running parallel to a military organization up through commands to army headquarters. This alternative would—
> 1. Relieve military personnel of most of the administrative function and enable them to concentrate on planning and on executive direction of works.
> 2. Open up career possibilities to civilians and thus attract high calibre permanent personnel and provide stability to administration now difficult to achieve.
> The advantage of this course of action would appear to be the combining of greater administrative stability and efficiency with a valuable training element for R.C.E. personnel.

He had in mind there a more or less parallel civilian organization. As I understand it, at the present time huge quantities of valuable buildings and supplies are handed over to the armed forces and they are not made directly responsible for accounting for them. So far as the quartermaster general's branch is concerned, there should be a civilian check and audit on the whole quartermaster general's department so that they will be responsible for equipment and supplies to a civilian authority, with that civilian authority responsible to the minister's officials. As I said before, in our opinion parliament under present conditions has very little to say about the major decisions involving large expenditures. The military people decide what they want regardless of cost and go ahead and spend the money. In our opinion a system must be devised whereby there will be more civilian control of the defence program through the parliament of this country.

I want to deal now with a different aspect of the question. I understand that the present defence program was designed with a view to a peak in our expenditures being reached in 1954-55, but present events should cause some consideration to be given to a levelling off of that program. There is not the sense of urgency; we can continue to carry out the program over a longer period of years, and on that account there should be some opportunity in the near future for reducing our expenditures on the military aspects of national defence. With the defence construction program nearly completed, it should be possible to save considerable sums of money in that quarter.

A few months ago a United States commission conducted an investigation into the armed forces of that country, and it was their honest opinion that a 10 per cent reduction in defence expenditures could be achieved through the elimination of waste occasioned by haste and speed without affecting the adequate defence of the country. That period is passing in the United States as it is here, and there is more control by congress over defence expenditures and so on. Even this year in my opinion the minister could save $200 million by insisting on economy and doing away with frills and so on, which saving could be used by way of economic aid as a part of our defence program and thus give some positive evidence to the world of our desire to go at least half way in the effort toward world peace.

There has been certain optimism in recent weeks because of the apparently changed position of the Soviet leaders. Past experience would cause us to proceed with caution, but I do think it is quite safe to say, just as the hon. member for Temiscouata said, that the Canadian people want the government to speak up for Canada and say in a very positive way that we are willing to do all that is fair and possible to promote world peace and to go at least half-way in that direction.

In going over some figures recently, I noticed that the subsidy to A. V. Roe Limited for the development of the jet airliner was $6,648,363.50, and that total subsidies to A. V. Roe Limited were over $63 million, mostly for the Orenda engine and CF-100's. I am not going into the question of whether or not that was a warranted expenditure. I am not competent to say but I do want to say that $63 million is ten times as much as we are spending on technical aid today. If we could reduce our defence expenditures by $200 million in the year or two ahead, what possibilities that would offer for the Canadian people to make a big contribution in the form of economic aid; first, economic aid under the North Atlantic treaty; second, rehabilitation of Korea; and, third, through technical assistance to substandard countries.

More than that, not only would we be making a gesture that would be a challenge to other countries of the world but we would also be doing something very sound and concrete to stabilize our agriculture. I am sure that the Minister of Agriculture would like to have a few of the millions that are being spent on defence to spend on floor price support for certain agricultural commodities. I am certain that the Canadian people would welcome the opportunity to make a magnificent gesture by contributing from $200 million to $400 million for economic aid, the rehabilitation of Korea and technical assistance to substandard countries. In doing so, we would not only be helping others but would be stabilizing the agricultural economy of Canada and taking positive action in the development of world peace.

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Mr. Chairman, for a few moments I want to go back to the very interesting subject about which we were talking last night. I should like to start by asking the minister when it was—oh, I see no minister. Perhaps I can wait until the minister returns, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Croll: The parliamentary assistant is here.

Mr. Hees: I wanted to ask the minister, and in his absence somebody else who can answer for him, when the minister first saw the MacNab memorandum, as the minister likes to call it.

Mr. Croll: Go on with your speech.

Mr. Hees: I think that is quite an important point. We are talking about the national defence estimates. These are the estimates for which the minister is responsible. We are spending $2 billion on them this year, and I am rather disappointed that both the ministers responsible for this department seem to be out of the house at the present time.

Mr. Croll: They did not know you were going to speak.

Mr. Blanchette: If I may explain, the short answer is that the Minister of National Defence has just left to welcome Field Marshal Montgomery.

Mr. Dickey: If the hon. member wants an answer I shall be glad to give it. My view would be that the Minister of National Defence has never seen the MacNab report.

Mr. Fulton: How about that for hearsay?

Mr. Hees: I am not asking for the view of the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Defence Production. When we are discussing the estimates of the Department of National Defence and the money that the government is asking us to vote, we ought to have somebody here who is able to answer these questions. We are here to get information. Both ministers are out of the house, so I will have to proceed without them. I take it from the remarks that the Minister of National Defence made last night that he either has never seen the MacNab memorandum, or he has seen it just recently. From that it is obvious that the memorandum has simply lain in the files of Mr. Jackson for the past three years.

Mr. Fulton: It has been through treasury board.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Jackson sent Mr. MacNab across the country to investigate conditions in the various military establishments.

Mr. Dickey: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. Hees: Certainly.

Mr. Dickey: On what authority does he make the statement that Mr. Jackson sent somebody somewhere?

Mr. Fulton: On the basis of the interview given by Mr. MacNab to Mr. Jackson of the Journal.

Mr. Hees: I say that Mr. MacNab presented his memorandum to Mr. Jackson after his investigation of the various defence installations which he visited. Therefore I take it that he made his trip—

An hon. Member: Hearsay.

Mr. Hees: —and inspected these defence installations at the request of his superior, Mr. Jackson.

Mr. Applewhaite: Guesswork.

Mr. Hees: If Mr. MacNab had returned to Ottawa after his tour of inspection and had reported to Mr. Jackson that conditions were satisfactory, the logical thing would have been to file the report and forget about it. However, the conditions which Mr. MacNab found and reported upon were anything but satisfactory. The minister told us yesterday that in his naval production program he has encountered slippage. I think the only word that can describe what Mr. MacNab found in inspecting the defence installations is slippage, because the report that he made to Mr. Jackson was a very critical one indeed.

Now, Mr. Jackson is an intelligent, logical and conscientious man, and I feel sure that the obvious thing for him to have done, when he received a report telling him that conditions were anything but satisfactory in the defence installations which were inspected, would have been to bring that memorandum immediately to the attention of the minister whose department had been under investigation—so that the minister could immediately take steps to investigate those conditions to see if they were as reported, and, if they were as reported, to have those conditions rectified as soon as possible.

However, for some unexplained reason, Mr. Jackson decided not to do that and the only explanation I can give for a reasonable, conscientious and intelligent civil servant taking the action that he did, or not taking the action that he should have taken, is that he had learned, as we in this house have learned, that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) resents very strongly indeed any criticism having to do with any aspect of his department. I think that Mr.

Jackson must have figured that if he brought the attention of the minister—

Mr. Dickey: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Fulton: Oh, now, this becomes frightful—

Mr. Croll: If he doesn't raise it, I will.

Mr. Dickey: On a point of order, in the absence of the Secretary of State (Mr. Bradley) I think a protest should be made immediately—

Mr. Pearkes: Are you speaking on his behalf now?

Mr. Dickey: —against this kind of attack on a civil servant. It is quite improper—

Mr. Ferguson: Oh, what are you speaking about?

Mr. Dickey: —in the activities of this house. Mr. Jackson is an excellent civil servant—

An hon. Member: Sir Galahad.

Mr. Dickey: —and I protest against this kind of attack.

Mr. Hees: I have never heard such utter nonsense uttered in this house, and there now comes up the interesting point of just which portfolio the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Defence Production is aiming to take over; because now he is speaking for all departments. Perhaps he is aiming for the prime ministership, and perhaps he is going to be entered in that race after the next election.

Mr. Dickey: I am speaking for parliament.

Mr. Fulton: He may be aiming for the leadership of the opposition.

Mr. Hees: Yes, that is what he will be trying out for.

Mr. Dickey: There are enough contestants for that leadership now without my entering.

Mr. Hees: When I was so rudely interrupted I was saying that the only explanation I could find for Mr. Jackson not making this obvious report to the Minister of National Defence was that he must have felt that the minister would simply blow his top; would do nothing about the report; and that no good would come of his presenting this memorandum to the minister. Therefore, he decided to file it away.

If the attitude of the Minister of National Defence had been such as to invite a memorandum of this kind to be presented to him so that he could constructively go to work on it, the country would have been saved hundreds and hundreds of thousands of dollars. In the first place, there would have been no need for Mr. Currie's investigation, because the conditions which made that investigation necessary would have been stamped out three years ago.

We are told that Mr. Currie's investigation cost $55,000. That would have been saved, and also there would not have been the train loads of cement, removed sidings, horses on the payroll and all the other things that Mr. Currie has described as being impossible of adding up to calculate the loss incurred. In addition, we would have saved the unknown losses that undoubtedly occurred between the time Mr. MacNab made his investigation and when Mr. Currie made his. It was a very important period when heaven knows what went on in this much investigated department.

All of this makes us wonder how many other similar reports made by senior civil servants on operations going on in the various departments of government are today lying in Mr. Jackson's files, or in the files of other senior civil servants, simply because the ministers of this government have made it so obvious that they will tolerate no criticism of their departments; and civil servants feel that it is a waste of time to present them with facts showing conditions as being anything but what they should be in the various departments.

It makes it again very obvious, Mr. Chairman, that if we are ever going to have any kind of efficiency check-up and clean-up of the waste and extravagance that becomes more obvious every day in the operations of this government, it can only be done by bringing in somebody from outside, like Mr. Currie, who has proper qualifications and can look at the picture with an unbiased eye.

To do that would be simply following the principles that have long been established in the business world. After all, we have got to remember that this defence department is the biggest business in the country, doing about $2 billion worth of business every year; and a great many operations in the defence department are exactly similar to operations within any big, successful, commercial corporation.

In the business world it is well known that you cannot expect a departmental manager to report upon himself because, if he does, he is simply showing up the things that he should have done and the things that he should not have done. Periodically in large and successful business operations efficiency experts from outside are called in. They are not magicians but only people who have studied the most satisfactory operations in the most successfully run commercial businesses. They take a look at the business they are investigating and, having no pet theories, no pet personnel, no ghosts in the closet to cover up, they say what that business operation is doing wrong. They make an unbiased report and, if that report is acted upon, as it is in business, the savings are usually far beyond the wildest dreams of the people running the company.

From practical experience I can say that it is impossible to know where you are being inefficient when you are close to the business, as you are when you are operating within a corporation. It is the kind of thing that we have urged this government to do with the various departments, particularly the Department of National Defence, but it seems that this government just does not want to listen to that kind of thing. I suppose that it is because they know that they have too much to hide.

The usual excuse is that it is not in the public interest to have outside investigators look departments over. I say it is far more evident now that it is not in the best political interests of the Liberal party to have these operations looked over on the eve of an election. I suppose, Mr. Chairman, that we are going to have to wait until we take over in a short time—

An hon. Member: What? How long?

Mr. Hees: —to bring in the kind of investigation that will clean up this government.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Might I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Hees: Certainly.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Do you take the same view with regard to the examination of the South Saskatchewan project and the report?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hees: I would like to know how that has any bearing on what I have said. If you want me to give you a short talk on the South Saskatchewan river project I shall be very glad to do so.

I think that the building of the South Saskatchewan dam is the best way I can see to provide hydroelectric power which will make it possible to give the province of Saskatchewan industries which it badly needs to diversify its activities—and if you are against that, get up and say so.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. We are discussing the estimates of the Department of National Defence, not the South Saskatchewan river project.

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw): Mr. Chairman, I only want about five minutes in this debate and, like other members who have already spoken, I certainly do not presume to set myself up as an expert on national defence. However, there are several questions which I would like to direct to the minister or, in his absence, to one of the parliamentary assistants.

I think it is a fair statement to say that the Currie report, the MacNab report, the Auditor General's report and similar documents have shocked Canadians recently. During this present session of parliament we have seen increasing evidence from time to time that the taxpayer is not receiving value for his defence dollar.

Ministers of the crown, in a very general way, have denied that there is extravagance or waste. But no minister so far has satisfactorily explained to parliament or to the Canadian people the great disparity between Great Britain, the United States and Canada in the cost of equipping one man in each of their armed forces. I hope that before this debate is through either the minister or the parliamentary assistant, who has studied this problem, will give an answer to that question, because I think it is very pertinent to know what are the comparative costs of equipping a man in each of these allied armies. I realize that there are a great many complicating factors in trying to arrive at a figure, but I went to the offices of the British high commissioner and to the United States embassy to try to get their figures in this connection. Some of the figures which I obtained I believe are pertinent, and I should like to lay them before parliament.

The British high commissioner's office gave me a copy of the British defence minister's report to parliament of February, 1953. On page 9 of this report we find that at April 1 of this year Great Britain had 879,800 men under arms. On page 22 of the report it is stated that the defence budget this year will total £1,636,760,000, which at the existing exchange rate of $2.80, brings it to about $4·583 billion. In other words the cost to the British taxpayer for each man in his armed forces is $5,210. These are the official British figures.

I also have here the United States publication put out by the office of the president of the United States and headed "The Federal Budget in Brief." Quoting from page 10, I read:

> The 1954 budget provides for an average strength of more than 3·6 million.

On page 11 it is stated that during 1953, $44·4 billion will be spent on the armed forces. Therefore, according to official United States figures, it is costing the United States taxpayer $12,333 this year for each man in the armed forces.

Yesterday the Minister of National Defence tabled the white paper on Canada's defence program. On page 15 of that paper we find that Canada, as at March 31, had 104,486 men in the armed services. According to the estimates of the Department of National Defence and the Department of Defence Production, we will spend this year $2,068 million for defence. It is then costing Canada $19,792 to equip one man in our services, or almost four times what it is costing for each man in the British service.

Mr. Applewhaite: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Thatcher: If the hon. member will just allow me to continue for a moment, I shall be very pleased. I know that someone is going to say, what about mutual aid? Suppose we take mutual aid of $32 million off the figure, and we will arrive at an average cost of $17,750 for equipping one man in our service.

When you remember that Great Britain is fighting a war in Malaya, when you remember that she is guarding the Suez canal, when you remember that she has one of the largest navies in the world, I think there is something wrong. When you remember that the United States is bearing the brunt of the Korean war, when you remember that she has divisions in Europe and divisions in Japan, their figures seem to be out of line with ours. It has been suggested that the Canadian defence department is also equipping the reserve army, and that would affect the Canadian figures. I admit that, but surely the same is true of Great Britain and the United States. It has been suggested also by the defence department that the lack of conscription in Canada is a contributing factor. I think that, to a degree, that explanation is reasonable, but I do not think it can explain such a huge disparity.

The government says there is no waste or extravagance in defence spending. Well, I suggest that these per capita costs indicate that there is either waste or extravagance or gross mismanagement. I challenge the Minister of National Defence or one of his parliamentary assistants to tell the Canadian people why our figures are so out of line if there is no waste or extravagance.

If the hon. member wants to ask me that question before I proceed to one other matter, I shall be glad to have it.

[Mr. Thatcher.]

Mr. Applewhaite: I wanted to ask the hon. member if he had compared the position of the United States $44 billion figure which he quoted with the position of our $2 billion figure, not only with respect to mutual aid but with respect to capital expenditure on defence construction and so forth, or whether he was endeavouring to create the impression that the $2 billion Canada spends is spent entirely equipping men in the forces?

Mr. Thatcher: I went over that with one of the United States officials and got the figures which he felt were comparable to our own. Now, if there is something wrong with them I should be very glad to have it pointed out. As I see it, the comparison as I have put it is a fair one.

There is only one other aspect of our defence program which concerns me as a layman and which I should like to mention at this time. I seriously question the wisdom of this nation pioneering, as it has been doing, in the field of advanced military weapons. It seems to me that this phase of defence could be better undertaken by our allies, Great Britain and the United States, who have greater facilities. For example, in recent years Canada has spent hundreds of millions of dollars, as has been pointed out today, experimenting in the field of advanced military aviation. Much of that work has been duplicated by other NATO countries.

Let us take the CF-100 project which has been bandied about a good deal today. I think it is obvious that for about four years this project has been dawdling along very slowly. The latest figures I have seen show that it has cost the taxpayer roughly $130 million, and about 16 planes have come off the assembly line. I think it is obvious to an unbiased observer that this CF-100 project, if it is not a fiasco, is at least a very costly experiment. I recall that the F-86 project was started at roughly the same time under United States licence. My understanding is that about 700 F-86 planes have come off the assembly line. I think there is a lesson to be learned from that comparison. It may give us a sense of real pride to read of Canada's achievements in this field, but I think at the same time parliament should keep in mind the staggering costs to the taxpayer. In addition, there is always the danger of one of these advanced weapons bogging down some place between the blueprint stage and the production stage.

We have read newspaper reports to the effect that the department is planning on going into further advanced fields in so far as military planes are concerned. I have seen the figure of $100 million bandied about for a new fighter. I think such costs are unnecessary, and I contend that the taxpayers could save millions of dollars and still we could have weapons which were just as effective or better if, instead of taking on the present headaches of pioneering and design, we were to leave those to Britain and the United States. Then we could manufacture under licence in this country the best weapons which those countries could produce. It would be much less costly, and I think we would have just as good or better weapons.

I hope that before this debate is concluded the minister will tell me if there is something wrong with that suggestion. I have other suggestions to make during this discussion, but I shall leave them until the details of the estimates are being considered.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a word or two on the first item in the estimates of the Department of National Defence. Like the speaker who has preceded me, I do not claim to be an expert on defence. As a matter of fact I have never fired an army gun in my life. I have never been in the army, the navy or the air force, and know very little about that. The last gun I ever fired was a 12-gauge shotgun, and it kicked so badly it knocked me over and I lost my hat. However, I got the bird.

While I do not claim to be an expert, nevertheless I am interested in the defence of our country. I have personal reasons also for being interested. I had three sons, one of whom I lost in the war. Of the other two who went through the last war, one is at present a flight lieutenant in the Canadian air force.

I wish to speak on what I might term broad policies with respect to defence. I have always adopted the view that it is best to be strong for the purposes of self-preservation. I have not been a keen critic of the defence department. I have more or less left such responsibility with the government as a responsibility of trust. I have never criticized individual expenditures unless such expenditures may have affected my own constituents in some direct fashion.

If I have been critical at all, it has always been of broad policies such as those which existed during the war; I refer, for instance, to the policy of the conscription of men, whether necessary or unnecessary, and to broad questions affecting war measures which involve defence policy at large. After all, I feel that policy with respect to war, defence and international relations governing defence are the more important issues. Therefore as I rise to speak on this item I feel impelled to say a word or two with respect to policy.

Toward the conclusion of his speech yesterday, when the estimates of his department were introduced, the minister welcomed the apparent shift in Soviet policy. I am sure we all welcome any change in policy that will lead to a better understanding between the nations of the world and particularly between the Soviet and what we generally term the western or free democratic nations of the world. The policy now apparently adopted by the Soviets looks to be one designed to thaw out the cold-war policy that has existed in the world for a number of years.

Even though the minister may have welcomed this shift in Soviet policy, it seems to me that one or two questions must be asked and that those questions should be answered. The one question that gives me a good deal of concern—and it must give the minister similar concern—is whether or not communism itself ever changes, or whether communism always remains the ruthless ambition for world dominance and world dictatorship. If the answer to that question is that communism never changes, even though communist tactics may, then we must conclude that the present shift in policy is a tactical one. If we come to that conclusion, then we must ask ourselves the question: What is the reason for this tactical shift in Soviet policy?

If I am not mistaken, the general consensus is that the Soviet have always played their cards with some expectancy that what they call the capitalist system would eventually collapse; and by carrying on a cold-war policy which to some extent has avoided a universal war, they have hoped that the economies of the western democratic world would collapse. If such an event took place, then of course they expected that the result would be a depression of such great proportions that the western democratic world would be a fertile breeding ground for communism, and that it would become strong within the democratic countries.

I think it is conceded by some that one thing that is keeping the economies of the western nations—and I should say particularly the North American economies—in a reasonably prosperous position is the vast amounts of money being appropriated for defence, a fact which is reflected in a fairly high level of industrial activity and employment. I think it is generally believed that should reasonable assurance of peace be accepted, thus bringing about a condition where defence preparations would not be so necessary, we would consequently be headed for a business recession and perhaps a very serious economic depression.

The question that should be asked is what policies would be pursued. The government of the day should be farsighted enough to be able to answer the question as to what policies, financial or otherwise, they are now contemplating to prevent the occurrence of a business recession or a depression. This is a question that has been asked on previous occasions, if not directly at least by very direct inference over and over again. Yet to my knowledge the government has never sufficiently answered the question. It is a very important one because the people who have to pay the bills ought to know. If Soviet calculations are correct that what they call a capitalist collapse is within the realm of possibility, then what policies would the government pursue? We have yet to have that question answered, and it is an important one.

There is another question that should be answered; and I am aware of the fact that in concluding his speech yesterday the minister was very careful to state the reason he was asking for such vast sums of money. I have gone over the last page of his speech very carefully. The minister is an able gentleman. He was not speaking from a prepared manuscript, but I daresay he watched every tiny word and every tiny comma in the conclusion of his remarks yesterday. Should peace come in Korea can the people of Canada expect a reduction in defence expenditures? That is important.

In conclusion may I mention one or two things in respect to a broader international policy involving defence. The hon. member for Temiscouata this afternoon indicated that he was interested in any defence policy having to do with the defence of Canada proper. I fancy that what he intended to convey was that he was not particularly in favour of vast expenditures for defence in other parts of the world. Perhaps I did not interpret him correctly, but that was the impression I received. I am not going to comment on that except to say that I believe Canada's voice should be stronger when it comes to the determination of foreign policy affecting our defence efforts abroad. We are all aware, and it is coming to light now, that in the recent past we have had nothing whatsoever to do with certain secret agreements that have been struck by the leaders of some nations, and particularly of one other great world power.

That just is not good enough. If we are to be called upon to support armies, navies and air forces against what might appear to be an aggressor, then we should demand to be heard in respect of agreements that might be struck behind the scenes. That has not been our experience in the past. We were not consulted with respect to the policy of turning Manchuria over to the Soviet, and not only turning Manchuria over to them but with Manchuria millions and millions of dollars worth of excellent war equipment, which the Russians eventually turned over to the Mao communist administration of China to handle, and which became the base of their operations in the present struggle in Korea. We were never consulted about that, yet we are called upon to share in paying the bill.

We were never consulted in respect of the reversal of United States policy in China, which was largely responsible for communism taking over there. Some of these things, in my belief, were blunders on the part of a very large world power; but when trouble comes of course we are asked to help overcome that trouble by taking part in a shooting war. I repeat, that is not just good enough. I do not know to what extent we were called upon to enter into a discussion on whether or not General MacArthur should have been withdrawn from that scene, a man who to my mind knew the score in respect of oriental policy, if I might put it that way, at least policy in China and Japan. I do not know whether we were called in for consultation about these things or not, but we should have been. At least if we were not, then we would have a perfect right to say: well, we are not going to send men over to give their lives for what might be the protection of the blunders of others, whose blunders have been made in secret.

I do not know what is going to happen as a result of the present Korean struggle. I do not know if anybody else does. Whether it is going to wind up eventually with the 38th parallel being the line separating communist North Korea from Syngman Rhee's regime in South Korea, I do not know. I do not know whether it is going to result in communism boring from within in South Korea and getting all they want anyway. I do not know and perhaps nobody else knows, either.

Those are broad policies that we have to look at. We do not know what is going to result, even in Japan. We do not know whether communism may or may not bore in there and thus cause us to lose the position we once occupied, at least in the East. We do not know what is going to happen in India and other countries. I realize that these are broad matters and that someone has to make decisions. What I am saying is that when decisions in respect to these things are made we should be brought into consultation and not expected just to help fight a war, to give the lives of our young men and to give our money in order to protect the ultimate result of someone else's blunders.

Most likely the minister will be replying to the speeches that have been made and answering the questions that have been asked, and I wonder if he would answer one or two that I want to put to him. What policy does the government expect to pursue in case peace should be achieved in Korea? Are we to expect such vast expenditures to continue? Does the government regard the present Soviet move as one intended to bring about normal peace among the nations of the world, thus eliminating the necessity for such vast expenditures and bringing about a depression? What policies are the government going to pursue to prevent such depression and the making of the western nations breeding grounds for communism?

There is another question I believe the minister should answer. How much in dollars has Canada contributed toward the Korean war? That may be a little hard to determine, although it should not be too difficult. It may involve some actuarial figuring, because we know that as we carry on the training of men, as we erect various buildings necessary for the defence of Canada, as we bring into being schools and barracks and air runs, and as we provide equipment of one kind and another, these are general defence expenditures and it cannot be said just what part is for the Korean effort. But I think we should be able to arrive at some sort of comparable estimate. I repeat that I would like the minister to say just how much the Korean war has cost the taxpayers of Canada.

That is all I want to say at the present time, but I repeat that we must be careful in respect to broad international policies which involve Canada, and in connection with decisions made by other powers.

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): Mr. Chairman, I am sorry the minister is not in his seat, but probably the associate minister will be able to answer the questions which I shall bring up and which I think are fairly fundamental to our whole defence policy.

It appears from the white paper and everything that has been said by the minister and the other spokesmen for the defence department that Canada's role is to build a purely defensive force. For instance, in the air we are building fighters and interceptors, but the R.C.A.F. is to have no bombers. At sea we have anti-submarine vessels, there is a new aircraft carrier to come, we have two old cruisers, but no submarines. In the army we have a military force which has a very low percentage of armour. The question is: Why not bombers? Why not submarines? Why not more armour? I shall discuss that in more detail in a minute.

I realize that defence production and the production of arms is dependent entirely upon the national economy. If we use too much of the national effort to produce arms we put our economy in unbalance. A well-rounded defence force, however, must have strike-back weapons; it must have some weapons of offence. There are two ways to destroy a bomber. One is to shoot it down when it is attacking your target, and the other is to destroy the plant that makes the bomber before that bomber can attack your target.

I realize that this is a problem of some magnitude and that probably a compromise decision must be made, but it seems to me that with the history of the R.C.A.F. and the ability we showed in bombing during world war II, and considering the time that it takes to train a bomber crew, let alone a bomber wing we should now be at least training bomber personnel. All this is something to which consideration must be given at the present time. Study must also be given to the resultant effect upon technical manpower. But it seems to me that to have your air force composed entirely of fighters and interceptors, with trainers of course, is to have an air force which is in unbalance. Naturally the main problem is the defence of Canada and undoubtedly we should concentrate on interceptors and fighters, but to ignore entirely the bombing arm is, I think, open to question.

I come now to the matter of the provision of a striking naval arm which we are building so many ships to combat. I refer to the submarine. The same firm, Canadair, that is building Sabre jets and the other fighters which I shall deal with in a minute is also producing submarines. It is probably the world's premier submarine-producing firm. I refer to the Electric Boat division of the General Dynamics Corporation. The first atomic submarine cost the firm $19 million. I happen to be a shareholder of the firm because I was interested in national defence and what they were doing. In their report they have stated that the first atomic submarine cost approximately $19 million.

With a company that is already building submarines and with quite a considerable naval construction industry within our boundaries, surely there is some argument that we, whose life depends on an anti-submarine navy, should give some consideration to the advisability of the construction of submarines, particularly as we have a liaison with this corporation which is building Sabre jets. Modern naval thought is that a submarine is the best defence against itself.

The minister may say that the construction of this type of vessel is entirely beyond our means. I should like to point out that this firm is not only building two atomic submarines but built three new high speed submarines for the United States last year as well as two target submarines, and has also built two large guppy submarines, the Tiburon and the Lobo, for the republic of Peru. Surely if a small country like Peru considers that the submarine is not beyond the capabilities of the country, some consideration should be given to the matter by Canada where the question of building an anti-submarine navy is of such paramount importance not only to us but to the whole free world.

Coming now to the question of the provision of armour for the military side of our defence forces, that has been dealt with before; but I feel that the more we can develop the army into an armoured force the more effective it is going to be. We can never have a large army. Our manpower precludes that, but because of our national characteristics and the mechanical ability of the Canadian people we have a flair for the production of armour and the utilization of armour in combat. I feel that the ratio of armoured to non-armoured troops should be increased in favour of armoured.

Considering the most important question of all, the function of the R.C.A.F. in the design and production of aircraft, the R.C.A.F. is a fighting service. Its primary duty is to fight. To ask a fighting service to superintend the construction and design of aircraft is to ask it to step out of its role. Not only do you not have trained engineering officers in a fighting service, but because of the rotation of officers you do not get the permanency which is required when you go into something like the production of fighter aircraft. I commend that some consideration should be given, and some discussion should take place in the house, as to the possibility of setting up a similar establishment to the ministry of supply of the United Kingdom to which technical officers are seconded from the R.A.F. Together with engineer officers you have business people with the business know-how who deal with the problems of supply and the production of aircraft. I think that the lead the United Kingdom has today in new types of aircraft is better evidence than any that I can give of the effectiveness of this procedure.

Dealing quite briefly with Canadian production, the Canadair annual statement, which has come to hand today, shows that they completed 453 F-86E Sabre jet fighter planes for the Canadian government in 1952. They received an order for 300 to 400 Sabre jet fighters from the British Royal Air Force. They completed the first of more than 500 T-33 Silver Star two-seater jet trainer planes for the R.C.A.F., and they prepared for the production of T-36 defence trainer transports with piston engines for the United States air force. I mention that because there you have a private company, a company with shareholders, with, I submit, a very satisfactory record in the last year so far as the production of aircraft is concerned. If nothing else shows the importance of the government divesting itself of interference with the aircraft industry, the statement of the Canadair corporation certainly does.

I will deal quite briefly with the situation at Avro. The problem of designing and producing a prototype of an entirely new aircraft, which the CF-100 is in its various marks up to the Mark 4, and producing in quantity and delivering to the service does not seem to be understood. As has been stated, the designing of the CF-100 commenced in 1947. The time to flight of the first prototype was 33 months. The time for the second prototype was 39 months. The time to delivery of first production after that was 22 months, and the time to series production in quantity and delivery to the R.C.A.F. was approximately six years. For a new aircraft, from the drawing board and with new engines, I contend, Mr. Chairman, that that is a very creditable performance and one of which we should be extremely proud. The hold-up in production of the CF-100 has been the interference of the government with the A. V. Roe Company and the system by which the R.C.A.F. controls design and interferes with the production of the aircraft right the way through. I suggest that even these figures would have been greatly improved if some mechanism similar to the United Kingdom ministry of supply had been in force in Canada. I earnestly ask the minister to comment upon that.

I want now to say something about subclause 141 on page 26 of the white paper. It is the last sentence discussing the CF-100, and it reads:

> On the other hand, funds expended for aircraft development in Canada support and encourage Canadian design and development organizations, essential to the growth of the Canadian aircraft industry.

I wish the cabinet would read that sentence every day. There is nothing more important to the development of this country than that we should have our own design and our own aircraft industry. To allow the aircraft design team, or call it what you will, at the A. V. Roe Company to be disbanded or to fall into disuse would be nothing short of criminal. I say that because of bitter experience at the outbreak of the last war. We had in Canada no aircraft industry and no people competent to design aircraft, so we were fobbed off by the United Kingdom—the United States was not in it then but the United Kingdom was—with the production of obsolete or obsolescent types of aircraft, because the United Kingdom manufacturers did not believe that it was within the competence of Canada to produce aircraft. I remember very well the hon. member for Quebec South calling me a fifth columnist, when I made my maiden speech in this house some 14 years ago, because I said that we were being fobbed off and asked to produce obsolete and obsolescent aircraft.

Mr. Chairman, we can never be put in that position again. We must have an aircraft design organization and an aircraft development organization in Canada that will keep us up in the very forefront of aircraft production. Not only is that good national defence, but it is good economics. It is a matter of dollars and cents. The cost of design for the CF-100, that is design and development costs to date, runs somewhere under $12 million, dating from 1947 to the present time, 1953. On the total order for the CF-100, up to the Mark 4 which they are now about to produce, that amounts to about $13,000 per aircraft.

Well, Mr. Chairman, I have looked through the report of the General Dynamics; and for licence fees to produce the Sabre jet, and patent fees and royalties which we have to pay to produce an American-designed aircraft, as far as I can find out the figure will run to very nearly $20,000 an aircraft. That figure covers all of the patent fees and all of the licences and other things concerned. It is money that is first of all lost to Canada, and which pays no taxes. Second, it is money that goes elsewhere to build up the design and development facilities of someone else's aircraft industry. I contend, Mr. Chairman, that it is not only bad business but it is bad national defence in every way. Today we have the Avro firm with the results they have produced, with a keen and alive team, and we must allow this teamwork and development to go on. We must act at once, and in this connection I would hope that there would be an immediate announcement that the production of the new aircraft, the CF-104, which I shall call the Orca, should be proceeded with immediately.

We have seen that the life of an aircraft is limited in years. What the continuous life of the Sabre will be we do not know. We do not know when the Sabre will be replaced by the turbo-jet, but it will be replaced; and we know that the Sabre has only a certain number of years of useful life ahead of it. We also know that the CF-100 has only a certain number of useful years of combat life ahead of it. We have a limited amount of time, not much, and I contend that the CF-104 should be given the green light and proceeded with at once.

I want to quote some figures to give an example of what the United Kingdom aircraft industry is spending on development. The United Kingdom is spending some $160 million in the year 1952-53 for aeronautical design and development; and the research establishments are spending $70 million. The United Kingdom, with a frightfully heavy tax burden and shortage of materials, considers it desirable to spend money in these large amounts for research and development alone. Surely the comparatively modest amount which it will cost to develop our own aircraft in Canada should be willingly and gladly spent. The amount that it will cost to carry this on is quite modest. I have heard that the figure will be something between $5 million and $10 million a year. Mr. Chairman, we can never again fall back on someone else's design of aircraft.

In this regard I wish to disagree completely and absolutely with the statement made by the hon. member for Moose Jaw. It is bad national defence to do so, and not only that; it is bad economics. We cannot allow our engineering brains to leave this country and develop the aircraft industry in another country.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Chairman, we are not only dealing with the department of government which asks for by far the largest sum of money from the taxpayers of Canada through their representatives now meeting here; we are also dealing with a subject which is of most vital concern to every Canadian at this time.

Yesterday a very distinguished soldier, with the widest experience of any officer in Canada today, placed on the record a clear and unchallengeable analysis of the failure of the Department of National Defence to provide national defence for Canada. The hon. member for Nanaimo has, in his own service, embraced not only the different ranks of military service but the different problems of military service in a way which I believe is unequalled by any other single officer in this country. Out of that great experience he has given us an analysis of the present situation. No white paper, no generalities, no interjections about equipment being designed for NATO, constitute an answer to that analysis of our defence which calls for action, not by the Minister of National Defence but by the government of Canada.

My remarks this afternoon are not directed to any one minister. They are directed to the government of Canada which is responsible for this shocking failure which has been exposed in terms that cannot be denied. Let us see exactly what the government itself declares to be the purpose of our defence objectives. These are stated on page 5 of the white paper issued the day before yesterday under the title "Canada's Defence Program." Under the heading "Canada's Defence Objectives", we read the following:

The objectives of our defence policy remain the same as heretofore:

(1) The immediate defence of Canada and North America from direct attack;

(2) implementation of any undertakings made by Canada under the charter of the United Nations, or under the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, or other agreement for collective security;

(3) the organization to build up strength in a total war.

Mr. Chairman, those are the objectives as declared by the government. Surely, therefore, it is appropriate that we should examine what the result has been from the expenditure of over $5 billion since the end of the war, and more than $4 billion since the beginning of the period which commenced with the act of aggression in Korea.

Let us deal with the second item first. In so far as the implementation of any undertakings made by Canada under the charter of the United Nations or under the North Atlantic Treaty Organization or other agreement for collective security is concerned, we must, in a very large measure, accept the statement of the government without too complete information as to the details. Those who have already spoken have indicated their own admiration for the high standard of efficiency displayed by these young men in uniform who are taking part in the various duties which constitute the implementation of these various agreements. Every Canadian shares the pride that is the proper appreciation of the gallant and courageous action of our young men in the different units serving in Korea. Those who have seen their services, and those who have seen the other units now outside of Canada, have expressed their admiration for the way in which those young men are taking their part in the various operations that are part of our attempt to defend freedom by a plan of collective security.

[Mr. Drew.]

I have seen the Canadian troops in Europe. They are giving Canadians the same reason for pride that Canadians have given in other places where the Canadian uniform is worn. I have seen the Canadian squadrons in Europe. I have seen the operations of those squadrons, and I have also had reason to know something of the admiration that is expressed for those young men who fly the aircraft which have gone from Canada to Europe. I have seen something of our naval forces, and I know the splendid job they are doing. It is because our young men and young women in uniform are always capable of giving a good account of themselves, and adding new reasons for pride in the name of Canada which they carry on their shoulders, that we should recognize the extent to which many young Canadians today, both men and women, are being denied the opportunity to give the kind of service they want to give by the failure of this government to fulfil its own undertakings in regard to the defence of this country.

Nothing that is said here can be interpreted as any reflection on the young men and women of Canada, either in uniform or out of it. It is because we know how good they are that we have a right and a duty to examine what the situation really is, and what the facts are in regard to the defence of this country at this time.

I have referred to the second item of our defence objectives, and I say that to the extent that we know what is being done, we certainly have reason for pride in the achievements and conduct of the young Canadians who have gone from Canada or are training in Canada to fulfil our obligations under the charter of the United Nations, the North Atlantic Treaty Organization or other agreements for collective security.

But then let us examine the other two. Let us remember that we are told that the first objective is the immediate defence of Canada and North America from direct attack. The hon. member for Nanaimo yesterday pointed out—and gave supporting figures—that in spite of this tremendous expenditure the government has not provided for the defence of Canada and North America from direct attack. In fact the hon. member for Nanaimo has made it clear that not one service—the army, the navy or the air force—in so far as the direct defence of Canada is concerned, is in a position to meet an attack of that kind.

Then also there is the other item under Canada's defence objectives: the organization to build up strength in total war. The statements made by the hon. member for Nanaimo and by other hon. members who spoke yesterday and today have made it perfectly clear that we have not today the organization to build up strength in total war or otherwise.

Mr. Chairman, the defence of Canada against the possibility of direct attack simply does not exist. With all the fine spirit of those who seek to serve, our naval defence is inadequate for that purpose; our air defence is non-existent; and the army defence is wholly ineffective for that task because of the limitation upon mobility and the lack of equipment to which reference has already been made.

I think some further reference should be made to our reserve forces. At all times it has been recognized that in this country the reserve forces are the backbone of our defence. We never at any time have pretended that our permanent forces are adequate in peacetime for the defence of Canada. It is to the reserves that we look for the larger numbers and the possibility of expansion. That has been the case through long years of the military history of Canada. Today the reserve force is simply not being allowed to fulfil its allotted task; and that statement applies to every branch of the reserve forces.

Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to go through one unit after another in order to indicate the situation with which the reserve units of this country are confronted at this time. I wish, however, to refer to an interjection made by the Minister of National Defence yesterday when, in reply to a statement by the hon. member for Calgary East, as reported at page 3833 of Hansard, he said:

> The hon. member must know that the equipment to which he refers is being taken away to be rehabilitated and then shipped to Europe, and will be replaced by equipment of the latest type. That procedure is well under way.

I wish to speak about that interjection, because it referred to a statement that arms and equipment had been taken away from certain reserve units and that they were incapable of performing their responsibilities. The answer given by the Minister of National Defence is not in keeping with the understanding of the reserve units which find themselves in that position.

It is by giving specific illustrations that the general situation can best be understood. Let me give the example of one artillery regiment. I am under the impression that the figures I give in this case will be found to be repeated generally in the case of other artillery regiments across Canada. I will give the figures in regard to an artillery regiment of three batteries. It happens to be one of the oldest artillery regiments in Canada, with a record of efficiency which indicates why it is certainly a perfectly fair test of the present situation.

That regiment, in addition to its headquarters, has three batteries authorized. Two of those batteries are at present activated. The number of guns required for three batteries of that type is 32 for that regiment. That regiment at present has four guns instead of 32. A year ago it had eight. Four were taken away. The four that remain cannot be fired. In fact they cannot even give effective training with the four guns they have, because not one of those four guns has a breech-block. Everyone with any knowledge of gunnery training knows that, without a breech-block, you cannot give effective training in loading and firing guns.

Last year it was decided that the breech rings on the guns needed to be changed. The regiment was informed that these guns could not be fired. Four of the guns were taken away, not with any explanation that they were to be sent to NATO but with the explanation that they were to have the breech rings replaced, and with the understanding that the guns would then be available for firing practice. The other four guns remained, but they could not be used for firing. As far as that is concerned, they could not give the members of the battery effective training anyway, because the tractors that haul these guns are not adequate for the job. Therefore even if they could give effective gun drill, they cannot train the men for the camp to which they are expected to go during the coming summer in this very critical period.

Up to a month ago they had eight gun tractors. Five were taken away. Now they have only three tractors. The jeeps were taken away a year ago, with the understanding that they were to be replaced; but they have not been replaced. The fact is that this artillery regiment, which certainly can be shown to be one of the better artillery regiments in Canada, is worse off from the point of view of equipment than it has been at any time since the war. To my knowledge it is worse off than it has been at any time either since the last war or in between the two world wars. That is the situation with which we find ourselves confronted after $5 billion has been spent for defence.

Mr. Claxton: Will the Leader of the Opposition let me know the name of the regiment? Would he mind doing that?

Mr. Drew: I shall be very happy to let the Minister of National Defence know the name of the regiment, and I shall do it outside of the house. I have no doubt he is aware that

I have certain contacts with certain artillery regiments in this country, and I shall be very happy to let him know.

Mr. Claxton: Is it your old regiment?

Mr. Drew: I shall be very happy to let him know the name of the regiment. The minister is aware that I have not completely severed my association with the artillery.

The situation is this. These units are trying to train gunners without serviceable guns. They are trying to train gunners for camp this summer in what we are told is a very critical period without the opportunity to give them adequate tactical manoeuvres. These units cannot even do what are described as dry exercises, under which the gunners could be given some impression of what their duties will be in camp. Nor are those who will be charged with the responsibility for handling the movement of the vehicles being given the type of training that will qualify them to perform that task when they go to camp. As everyone knows, whether they have been with one service or another, it is not simply a case of getting onto a tractor and then moving that tractor. There are involved movements by signal which call for a great deal of training. The officers of these units, when they are carrying out their exercises in preparation for camp, are called upon to use their own automobiles for that purpose. They are using their own private cars for command post training.

I have not given these figures, Mr. Chairman, with the idea that this is an isolated case. It is not. Right across Canada units find themselves in a similar position today in varying degrees. If a reason is sought for the inability to maintain the enlistment level of our reserve units, it will be found in the atmosphere of utter unreality which is created by the shortage of weapons and equipment in the reserve units of this country at this time. That remark applies to other branches of the army as well as the artillery.

It is extremely difficult to get young men, keen young men, anxious to perform some useful task, to go through the movements of drill when they know that what they are doing has little relation to the kind of training they will be called upon to do in camp. If this were a period in which we had been spending little money then of course one might understand and even seek to justify a situation of this kind. How is it possible to justify a situation of this kind after an expenditure of $5 billion? There can be no justification. If our present results are to be the measure of what we get for $5 billion, then think of what would happen to Canada if by any unhappy chance we were called upon really to take part in war. God forbid that that should happen, but there is no sensible person who does not realize that this training is done with the knowledge that the dreadful possibility of war is always there.

If what we have now received for the expenditure of $5 billion is to be the measure of the result of such expenditure, then this country would literally almost bankrupt itself if it were called upon to raise the forces that we might be called upon to raise with the serious threat of a more imminent emergency than that which now confronts us. These figures, this expenditure of $5 billion and the inadequate results flowing from that expenditure, indicate why this parliament and the people of Canada should have assurances which have not yet been given to them.

I hope no one is going to imagine that after the consideration of these estimates we are going to know very much more about the details than we know now. We have learned by experience that this government will use its majority at any time to close the door upon information that we are seeking. We do know that there has been waste, extravagance and inefficiency of the most astounding kind. We know that from the very small measure of information which has come to us as a result of inquiries which have been conducted. We know that within the very limited area of the inquiries which have actually taken place waste, extravagance, and inefficiency give a very clear indication of why we have these inadequate results after the enormous expenditure of money which has taken place.

Effort after effort has been made to have a complete and exhaustive inquiry into the whole organization and administration of the Department of National Defence, which was found to be inefficient by the one impartial inquiry which has gone into the administration of that department and which we have been permitted to examine. Statements made within the last few days, Mr. Chairman, have not been reassuring. In the white paper tabled the day before yesterday we find this statement:

> During 1952-53, in addition to meeting its own requirements, Canada was able to sell a number of F-86E Sabre aircraft to the United States for successful operation in Korea.

Then in Hansard of yesterday, the following day, we find the minister giving us information in the following words, as reported at page 3809:

> We have deliberately postponed the equipping of our own forces with additional Sabre fighters in order to make Sabres available to the United States and to Britain.

There are several clear inconsistencies between the white paper which was tabled the day before yesterday and the statements made yesterday by the minister, and there are inconsistencies as between the various white papers. But these are not things which call for our attention to the same extent as the simple fact that after the expenditure of more than $5,000 million the reserve forces of this country are incapable of performing the tasks allotted to them and of meeting the test laid down by the government itself in regard to those defence forces.

We also have the fact, and it is an alarming fact, that in spite of these enormous expenditures our defence forces are not capable of undertaking the immediate defence of Canada from direct attack. That is the first objective of our defence preparations as declared by the government itself. The government has already spent $5,000 million and asks for more than $2,000 million more without having gone very far toward meeting that first requirement, according to its own statement.

Nor have we met the requirement stated by the government of an organization to build up strength in total war. We know that one of the ways in which we can most likely hope to prevent war is to have it known by Russia that there is in Canada as in the other free nations an organization capable of building up the strength of the defence forces beyond those now in existence. Those requirements have not been met. It is a story of failure for which this government has given no effective answer.

I repeat that my remarks are not directed to the Minister of National Defence; my remarks are directed to the Prime Minister and government of Canada. This is their responsibility. They are asking the people of Canada to provide this year more than $2,000 million on top of more than $5,000 million already spent. We should have and the people of Canada should have at this stage assurance by the Prime Minister on behalf of the government that in the face of these admitted inadequacies there will be an immediate, effective and complete inquiry into the administration, organization and general activities of the Department of National Defence.

We are not going to be able to change this situation during the course of the discussion of these money items now before us. We know perfectly well, having regard to the policy of the government, that we are not to know very much more after these estimates have been dealt with than we know now as to what the results are going to be. Let anyone outside of this house who suggests that the opposition could have obtained more information than they did remember that the government has denied an opportunity to obtain information in the one effective way in which it could be obtained. It was effective in that limited case where less than one per cent of the expenditures was under examination. We have sought a similarly effective examination in regard to the total expenditures of the department.

Recognizing that we cannot obtain the facts from a government which uses its majority to deny the facts, I urge that the Prime Minister on behalf of the whole government reassure this house at this time and reassure the people of Canada, who now learn that they have not the defence they had the right to expect, that there will be a review of the organization, administration and accounting of the Department of National Defence as a result of which we may expect to get results from the money that we are called upon to spend.

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Chairman, the Leader of the Opposition in his opening remarks properly gave praise to the personnel of the Canadian forces in the Far East and in Europe. He did that under the head of speaking about the second objective of our national defence, namely the implementation of any undertakings made by Canada under the charter of the United Nations or under the North Atlantic treaty or other agreements for collective security.

If I understood him aright, the Leader of the Opposition said that with the information available he felt that in this respect we were doing what we said we were doing. That is all right. There are three objectives in our national defence which we have set out. The first is the defence of Canada against immediate attack. The third is to enable us to mobilize our resources to meet an all-out objective. The second, at this time of cold war and of activities in Korea and of the building up of the strength of the North Atlantic treaty nations in Europe, is really part of the other two.

Who is to say which should come first. In the view of the government they are all part of the single problem of national defence. They are aspects of one thing that has to be done. We must take our part in the cold war and at the same time be prepared for a hot war should it come.

In his speech the Leader of the Opposition praised our soldiers and by necessary implication acknowledged the part played by the government, by the department and by the armed forces in respect to that very important second category, carrying out our commitments to the United Nations in Korea and to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization in Europe. This is the first time in six years that the Leader of the Opposition has made such an acknowledgment. If he stays on that side and we stay on this side of the house, as we all expect will be the case for some time further, it may be that he will be in a position next year or perhaps the following year to acknowledge that we have done equally well on the first and third points, because we are just on the way to getting there.

The building up of our armed forces at the rate at which it has been done has been, as we all know, a large job, and it has been a complicated one. In his remarks the Leader of the Opposition made several sweeping assertions, but he based his whole case largely upon the analysis that had been made by the hon. member for Nanaimo. I propose, in replying to hon. members who have taken part in the debate so far, dealing with as many points as I can and answering such questions as I can without delaying the house too long, to begin by taking up the remarks of the hon. member for Nanaimo.

He said in his speech yesterday, if you remember, that our one and only aircraft carrier, H.M.C.S. Magnificent, is the only vessel of her class which to date has not been modernized. My information is that that is not the case and that so far only one vessel of the class to which the Magnificent belongs is in process of modernization. He also said, as found at page 3815 of Hansard:

> . . . only the prototype of the new anti-submarine escort ship has so far been commissioned. She is the former destroyer H.M.C.S. Algonquin . . .

The Algonquin is not the prototype of the new anti-submarine escort vessel. She is the first of our Tribal class destroyers to be modernized and equipped with mess decks, bunks, new electronic and fire control apparatus and the like. She is not one of the new anti-submarine escort vessels. The hon. member also said:

> There are fourteen destroyer escorts of Canadian design and fourteen coastal minesweepers being built in Canadian yards. Of the former, I understand that nine keels only have been laid to date.

Nine keels have been laid, but with modern shipbuilding practice that is not necessarily a good indication of the degree of progress, because so much is done in different parts of the whole operation. Three of these ships have been launched. All fourteen of the coastal minesweepers have been launched, and we expect that they will be completed during this fiscal year. The hon. member for Nanaimo went on to say:

> In reserve we have a wartime fleet of frigates and minesweepers. If they are to be used, they must be completely modernized before they could possibly fulfil any of their roles in the event of an emergency.

All of these ships in reserve will, we expect, be modernized in the present fiscal year. Some of them already have been, and the work is well in hand. Then the hon. member remarked on the fact that we had no submarines, which of course is self-evident. But it would be spreading our resources very thinly indeed if, in addition to going in for an aircraft carrier, we went in for a submarine as well and had an orphan submarine. It is much better for us to go along with the arrangement we have with the Royal Navy and the United States navy to borrow a submarine for training purposes whenever we need it.

Then the hon. member came to his remarks on the army. He referred at some length to the position of the striking or mobile airborne force for the direct defence of Canada. It seems to me that he has been badly misinformed about the situation of the mobile striking force. This force exists now and includes the second battalions of the three regiments. The required number of men to make it effective for the purpose for which it is designed have been trained. In addition to the infantry units there are units of artillery, engineers, army service corps, signals, medicals, and so on, who are also trained airborne troops.

Then he suggested that we should have special engineers trained to make airfields, apparently after they had landed. This is not according to the concept of defence that my advisers have. Indeed, in the operations in which we have engaged in training and in working out the doctrine of defence of our north, the fewer airfields we have the fewer airfields we have to defend against the possibility of the enemy using them as steppingstones from which to leapfrog toward our settled areas. Indeed, were it possible the greatest single defence throughout our northland would be the rough nature of the ground and the extent of the territory itself.

We recall, for example, how important were the 21 miles of the channel even during the period of the bomber and fighter attack. There is a depth of a good deal more than 2,000 miles in our northland, and this would be very useful indeed. The concept of this defence is that with the equipment that the only potential enemy has he cannot make a large-scale airborne attack and landing in force on this continent at the present time, and we have arranged with our United States allies that each of us shall have the force which we together have agreed upon to be desirable to clean up any operation that we would anticipate might take place in the future so far as we can foresee it. We have that force; we have it now.

What is more, we have the transport to enable that force to be used. Hon. members have referred to the fact that hitherto we have only had Dakotas to use for this operation, and very good they were too. A good many countries in the world still only have Dakotas, but to them we have added a number of C-119's. They are coming along at the rate of several per month. Therefore we believe that today we have an airlift sufficient to meet the kind of situation envisaged by the concept on which we are working. Exercises are held regularly. Parts of these formations are trained in succession in winter warfare at Churchill and in airborne operations at other places. Last year a large exercise was held at Churchill. Another exercise, exercise Bulldog, was held at Norman Wells. The airstrip was defended by a force acting the part of an enemy, and was then retaken by an airborne force. Similar exercises have been held at Wainwright, Fort Chimo and other places. There are usually two such planned each year.

In addition, our officers are being trained steadily both in the doctrine and management of these operations. At Rivers there is the joint airborne training school operated for the benefit of the navy, army and air force. There, three weeks ago I was present at the closing lecture to the army staff college and the air staff college. It was attended by representatives of ten different countries, including a very large team from the United States. They all had spent over ten days at Rivers and elsewhere working over specific plans for just this kind of operation. In fact at the staff colleges, as well as in training exercises for both army and air force, this has formed a major part of their training over the last several years.

Then the hon. member referred to anti-aircraft artillery. On that I was very frank. There is not in the world today any anti-aircraft artillery of the conventional type or of new type which is really adequate to deal with fast high-flying jets. Fortunately, we do not know that the only potential enemy has any such jets that can reach this continent carrying a load of bombs; but on the other hand we do have in Canada anti-aircraft guns of the latest conventional type and we are modifying them so as to make them just as effective as conventional anti-aircraft guns can be made. We are not going to go into a complete outfitting of all our own forces, active and reserve, at an expenditure of something like $500,000 per gun, with weapons which will unquestionably be rendered obsolete within a period of 3, 4 or 5 years. In the meantime we have a considerable number of the latest types of guns. They are being modified with the latest types of devices, and there is nothing better than those of which we know. All we could do would be to get more of those, if they existed, and have them delivered to us at just about the time when we are rather confident that there will be a far more effective weapon in production in the form of ground-to-air guided missiles.

The hon. member referred again to the 27th brigade and expressed the thought which he has so often expressed, that we should have more armour. I have gone into that before, and I do not think there is any point in repeating the observations I have made on previous occasions. We have the type of unit we were asked to provide and which fits into the scheme of things on the other side. It enables us to train and operate independently as a unit, but an independent armoured brigade group working in isolation from a division or a group, as I have said before, is a military monstrosity. We have never heard of such an organization, and it could not operate.

What would have to be done to carry out the suggestions as I understand them would be to add elements to our infantry brigade group to constitute a balanced force of very considerable proportions. Well, we have no intention whatever of increasing our manpower commitments on the other side at the present time. From the studies I have made and that I have had made for me, we feel that to carry out this suggestion would not mean a saving in manpower; for in order to create the unit that has been suggested, as we understand it, we would require larger forces than the present ones.

With regard to the tanks used by the 27th brigade, the hon. member referred to the fact that a number of Centurion tanks had been issued to the squadron. He said:

> It is a start in the right direction, the direction which I recommended.

I am sorry but I cannot give him that satisfaction, because the squadron had tanks before the suggestion was made by the hon. member. It had Sherman tanks with which it was outfitted on this side and, as soon as they became available, we replaced the Shermans with Centurions for several reasons, the main one being maintenance on the other side. Also the Centurion is more modern and in some ways, but not all, a more effective tank for Europe than the Sherman.

Then the hon. member said:

> —it is highly questionable whether they are of types suitable for the work for which they were intended.

—the aircraft—

As far as my advisers tell me, and that means the chief of the air staff and his technical officers, the aircraft we have and that we are getting are the aircraft best suited for the purpose for which we are getting them. If the hon. member has in mind one type, namely the Lancasters which we have modified for use as maritime reconnaissance aircraft, then I can tell him that we do not know of any other aircraft in the world today more suitable for this type of work over the waters over which our aircraft have to travel. There is not one. We have had to make these modifications and we have done so, because it was the cheapest way of going about it. Otherwise it would have been necessary to design and build a new long-range aircraft.

The Lancasters will, of course, wear out and they will have to be replaced; and we are looking into the question of what is to be the ultimate replacement of the Lancaster for maritime reconnaissance. So far we have not found the answer. We do not know that such an aircraft is yet on the design board of any country. We do not want to have to go ourselves into the design of a fundamentally new type of aircraft if we can get one from another country which can possibly be modified, adapted and built in this country or purchased from abroad. The Lancaster is the only aircraft to which the hon. member's remarks could be directed, I should think, and the answer is as I have stated.

We are producing the F-86E, the CF-100, the T-33 trainer, the latest Harvard type trainer, plus light transport aircraft—the Otter, the Beaver and the Chipmunk, leading aircraft of their type. As far as we know there is not anything to match them; and it is high time, I think, that the Canadian people began to recognize that their air force has become one of the leading air forces in effective fighting power on our side today.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Claxton: When the committee rose I was dealing with some of the points made by the hon. member for Nanaimo. There is one more that I should mention. He referred to the nine auxiliary fighter squadrons distributed throughout the length and breadth of Canada from Montreal to Vancouver, "which are equipped," as he said "with world war II Mustangs and more or less worn-out British-built Vampires". The situation regarding those I have already described. It does happen that for the type of air attack which might be made on Canada and North America, with the type of aircraft which the only possible enemy are believed to have with the capacity to carry a bomb load to this continent, world war II Mustangs and Vampires would be, not the best defence, but a very good defence. They are the kind of planes that dealt with this kind of aircraft during the war, and which a number of other countries have to deal with today.

The fact is that had we obtained other types of aircraft to replace the Mustangs and Vampires we would have been using our resources on aircraft that would soon have become obsolete, instead of which we decided, as a matter of deliberate policy, to go for the F-86E for its particular role of fighter interceptor and the CF-100 for its role of long range, all-weather fighter. The CF-100 was designed for the defence of Canada, and the F-86E was not. While the F-86E is unquestionably the leading aircraft of its type in the world today, it by no means follows that that is the ideal type of aircraft for the kind of operation we envisage as being necessary to defend Canada in the next few years. The range of this aircraft is not great, it has not full instrumentation and does not carry a navigator. Consequently anyone familiar with flying conditions in our north country would recognize that, while the F-86E would give a good account of itself, the losses would be high due to the fact that it might not be able to get back to its base again. We therefore went for the CF-100, designed particularly for the purpose, and so far as we know it is the best aircraft to meet that purpose.

What is important from the point of view of this committee is to recognize that there was no alternative to following this course. So far as we know there is not a long-range all-weather fighter in production anywhere comparable to the CF-100, and designed to meet conditions as we envisage likely to obtain in the next few years on this continent. In the meantime these Vampires and Mustangs have proven very worthy against the only type of bomber that we know the enemy has in quantities able to deliver a bomb load on North America.

There is quite a different problem from the one in northwestern Europe, where the main objective would be to secure command of the air by destruction of many fighters. In the defence of North America it is not envisaged at the present time that fighters from any enemy country could travel the distance required. Consequently there is an interim period during which Vampires and Mustangs will be useful. To have acquired any other aircraft would have been wasteful, we think. The CF-100 is designed for the job.

The hon. member for Nanaimo referred to our construction program and asked what plan is being followed in respect to the erection of permanent or semi-permanent buildings. He indicated that this matter had been dealt with by the special committee on defence expenditures. It was dealt with during a series of sessions. I can refer him particularly to June 12, 1952 and March 17, 1953. This question of the type of construction, the need for it, the scale and quality of the construction was gone into by that committee at that time. Certainly in June of last year the scales and standards of construction, the way in which contracts were placed, the number of square feet per man, and all the other elements that might give hon. members an opportunity to exercise some judgment of their own, were laid before the committee. Reading the records of the committee at that time, I can see no objection being there made to them. Those scales and standards were worked out over a period of years having regard to wartime experience and having regard also to the conditions that existed in Canada, the conditions which existed in other countries and the way they have been met there.

I have not heard any hon. member specify any particular instance in respect of which the allowance has been too great for the Canadian sailor, soldier or airman. If any hon. member thought that, he might have said so. I have not heard, either, that the costs were too high, having regard to building costs throughout the country.

In all these cases, except in the few referred to in the statement by the hon. member for Halifax where there were cost-plus contracts because of special considerations, the contracts were let on tender and the buildings are there. Hon. members have been given numerous opportunities of seeing them. If they feel that they are too luxurious for the Canadian sailor, soldier, or airman, they ought to say so. In fact they ought to have said so a long time ago, because the facts on which they could have based their judgment have been before them for a long time now.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South made a speech which I think appealed to most hon. members of this committee, as do most of his speeches. He began by disclaiming any special knowledge as an expert. He said he approached this consideration with the viewpoint of an ordinary man. He expresses the view of the ordinary citizen in no ordinary fashion because he speaks from the heart, and he speaks his mind effectively and forcefully. With a great deal of his speech I was in complete agreement.

He referred to the terms of enlistment for service in Korea and in Germany, and it seems to me that there he had been misinformed, because after the special force had been enlisted for 18 months or duration in Korea, everyone else was enlisted in the Canadian armed forces for a minimum of three years, and that procedure has been going on. Every effort is made, of course, to keep in the armed forces the men we want to keep.

He referred to the National Defence Act as having cut down some of the rights of the service personnel. As I suggested to him, that has not been the case. What was done was to arrive at a service disciplinary code for all three services on a sound basis; and we were the first country in the world to do that. We did it after this disciplinary code had been considered by committees of the other place and of the House of Commons over a period of many months. The result has been not that the rights of the common soldier have been reduced but that they are actually greater than before.

He said that officers in the three services had long complained about the requirement that they purchase their own dress uniforms and certain items of equipment. I do not know to what that refers, but he must have had in mind the fact that all officers in all three services receive an allowance of $375 towards the purchase of their equipment; and in addition they are issued, at cost, items such as battledress, working clothes and so on.

He referred to the educational and information services. Here a considerable change has been made over the last 18 months in that we have instituted the bureau of current affairs which serves all three services with publications, booklets, wall charts and the like as well as lectures and education courses with officers and others as discussion leaders. We have communicated with our opposite numbers in the allied countries, and I think most of them would agree that we are a good deal in advance of the other countries in this respect, namely in the respect of putting before our service personnel information on which they can base their own views and which will serve as the basis of discussion. If hon. members are interested in any of this material, they can always have it. A great number have expressed interest. I must say that throughout the whole course of publications—and the publications are given out every two weeks in French and in English—I have never had a single complaint about any text or any work from any hon. member of this chamber; and they are fairly ready to voice their views if they find anything wrong along that line.

As to education, all members of the armed forces have available to them the educational services which were conducted by the Canadian Legion and the Department of Veterans Affairs during the war and which are now continued. In addition, we have voluntary educational classes which will become compulsory with effect from September, 1953, for educational courses up to grade VIII. That system is already in effect for the 27th infantry brigade, but it is not possible to make it effective in Korea.

The next statement to which I refer is that of the hon. member for Calgary East, who made some assertions about waste and commented on how the cost of having a man in the armed forces has mounted year by year. This brings me to a point that has been made by numerous hon. members opposite, including the hon. member for Moose Jaw just before the adjournment. I think it was started in an editorial in the Globe and Mail of November 17, 1952. I refer to the procedure whereby you arrive at the cost of the soldier by dividing the number of service personnel into the total amount spent on defence for that year. I would point out that the two things bear no relation whatever.

Let us take, for example, the case of the United States or Britain and ourselves. Before the second world war Britain and the United States had large regular forces in peacetime and they had the physical equipment, the accommodation, the training facilities and the great camp areas necessary to train men. We did not. Before the beginning of the second world war we had for the armed forces in Canada virtually no special accommodation of any kind. Almost all were living in established centres. Most of them were engaged on administrative and training work. We had virtually no forces in being, to use that commonly-used expression. Consequently when, at the end of the second world war and particularly since Korea, we had to build up our forces, we had to spend much more per man simply on constructing accommodation in which he could live, as well as mess halls and the other facilities.

It may also be pointed out that in the case of both the United Kingdom and the United States they have a much larger proportion of their personnel serving abroad. In respect of those men serving in Germany, for example, all construction and all maintenance costs have so far been met out of occupation costs whereas, in the case of Canada, we pay our own maintenance costs. These comparisons are therefore invalid and misleading. If you want to get a proper basis of comparison you must find out how much is paid to each soldier in Britain, Canada and the United States for pay and allowances, clothing, food, pension, medical and dental services, the equivalent of a civilian wage.

I have set out in my statement at page 3807 the costs for Canada. We have looked into the problem of finding similar costs in the United States and Britain. It is pretty difficult to arrive at costs because of the different way in which their figures are computed; but by and large I would say that the cost of maintaining an average service person throughout the year in Canada is not far off that in the United States. The pay and allowances in the United States are a bit higher than in Canada, corresponding in part to the difference in the wage levels in the two countries. But the cost of clothing in Canada is a bit higher than the cost of clothing a soldier, sailor or airman in the United States, owing to the difference in climate. The figures work out very closely indeed. If you take a weighted figure, having regard to the proportion of officers, N.C.O.'s and so on, you get a higher figure on a per capita basis for the United States than for Canada.

If you compare the figures by the process of division that the hon. member for Moose Jaw used, and that has been used by other hon. members, then you ought to be pretty sure that you have the same basis for comparison. That is, the total costs for Canada should be less expenditures on mutual aid, less expenditures on stockpiling, and should be on a totally comparable basis. After you arrive at that you have to consider how much more one country puts into the air force, which is much the most expensive service and how much more another country will put in the army, which is the least expensive service, on a per capita basis. So these comparisons, on a per capita cost basis, arrived at by the process of dividing the total costs of defence by the number of personnel in the armed forces, are, I suggest totally invalid and cannot stand up to any serious examination.

Then the hon. member for Calgary East referred, as several others have done, to the statement of Wing Commander Rohmer. Here I must admit I am in a little difficult position. I do not think it is necessarily desirable that I should answer in the house or in public the statements of an officer in the air force reserve. This one happens to be a man with a good record during the war. He was a flight lieutenant at the end of the war. Had he stayed on in the active forces he would by now be at about the rank of squadron leader with about one year's seniority. However, he went into the reserve.

He became a wing commander in charge of one of the squadrons in Toronto, and I found on inquiry that he was about 275th on the list of seniority of wing commanders in the air force.

Mr. Fulton: The rank doesn't matter; answer his assertions.

Mr. Croll: You used his rank.

Mr. Claxton: I have seen hon. members opposite point with a good deal of importance to his rank. I am just giving the facts, and if anyone wants to hear the facts I will give them. The situation is that he made a request to relinquish his command before he made this speech. He made the speech, and ever since hon. members have been very largely engaged in basing their cases against the air force, the Department of National Defence and the government on the basis of that speech.

Mr. Harkness: We have been saying these things for two years.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): For twenty years we have been receiving promises from your party.

Mr. Claxton: It is rather important to keep a sense of proportion. In my position I do not make decisions about air force plans, about the program of aircraft, about how many aircraft are to be sent abroad, the types of aircraft we are going to make, without long, patient and thorough investigation by the people whom I regard as the most competent in the world to make that investigation, namely my advisers and the Royal Canadian Air Force. This starts with the chief of air staff, with his long experience, and all his officers. I do not say I always take their advice, but generally I do on technical matters.

In any event, whenever a matter comes up of any important consequence involving future policies it goes to other government departments and is considered by them and by the cabinet defence committee, and is ultimately approved by the cabinet. Everyone knows that is the procedure. I do not profess to be an expert, but I should like to read to the committee a letter written by Wing Commander Rohmer to Crawford Gordon, Jr., president of A. V. Roe Canada Limited, Malton, Ontario, on February 27, 1953, before this matter came up. He wrote:

Dear Mr. Gordon:

The officers of 411 (F) squadron (auxiliary) toured your plant last evening.

On behalf of the squadron members, I wish to thank you for the privilege of seeing the progress which your firm has made toward the ultimate high production of the CF-100.

This progress is of special significance to us, inasmuch as the plans of the air force to date provide for our use of your aircraft at the earliest possible moment.

What we saw last night has given all of us a much better perspective as regards what we might expect by way of production and quality of production. As you are well aware, there have been several rumours and stories as to the capability and potential of A. V. Roe. It was my intention in asking for this visit to discredit in the minds of my officers that any contrary rumours that they might have heard should be dispelled.

Such is the case today, and we are looking forward with confidence to watching the CF-100 roll off the line in quantity and to flying it.

My compliments to your conducting staff, and in particular, to Mr. Jackson who handled our group with a great deal of care and attention.

Yours sincerely,
Richard H. Rohmer, W/C.
Commanding Officer,
411 (F) squadron (auxiliary)

Mr. Fulton: Does he say on what date they are going to roll?

Mr. Claxton: They have been rolling for some time. The letterhead, I may say, is:

Lang, Michener & Cranston
Barristers & Solicitors
Bank of Montreal Building,
50 King Street W.,
Toronto.

Mr. Harkness: What does that prove?

Mr. Claxton: The hon. member for Calgary East then went on to talk about overblown staffs. This is the easiest kind of charge to make, of course, and it would be very easy for me to say, as I do, that this is a matter of gravest concern to all of us, to keep down our staffs to the lowest possible level so as to ensure adequate control with the least possible number of controllers.

Hon. members have referred a great deal to the Currie report, and some hon. members have heard that report discussed before the special committee on defence expenditures. They will find from the evidence that the statement I made in the house on January 13 was completely confirmed, that is that a major factor in the lack of control which gave rise to my appointing Mr. Currie and the making of his report was the lack of sufficient staff to do the job. Actually we are understaffed today in the Department of National Defence.

The hon. member went on to give as his only example of this the situation in the office of the deputy minister, and stated that there are now more personnel there than at any time during the war. The hon. member for Kamloops made the same statement and gave the same figures at page 3840 of Hansard.

Mr. Fulton: Figures provided by the department.

An hon. Member: Hush, Davie.

Mr. Claxton: Of course we always give information when it is possible to give it.

Mr. Fulton: And when it is not too embarrassing.

An hon. Member: Oh, hush.

Mr. Claxton: The answer to this is the following figures. The present staff in the deputy minister's office is 114 as compared with totals of 98, 93 and 77 for the staffs of the three defence deputies on March 31, 1944, March 31, 1945 and March 31, 1946 respectively. The increase is due exclusively to the assumption by the present deputy minister of national defence of responsibility for several functions that were previously allotted to the services. They have been assumed either to permit a greater degree of co-ordination or control or to replace service personnel with civilians.

The chief secretary with a staff of 29 provides secretarial services for the interservices committees, an activity previously carried out by service personnel. The present arrangement has the advantage of providing greater continuity since service officers can be appointed as committee secretaries only for short periods.

Until recently each of the three services was responsible for preparing its own estimates and for a number of other financial control functions. The assistant deputy minister of defence, who came to the Department of National Defence from the Department of Finance, now co-ordinates the financial control and the preparation of estimates for all three services. The present staff of this branch is 23.

The real estate adviser's office with a staff of eight also carries out a function that until recently was performed by the three services. The controller of office services and supplies with a staff of three co-ordinates the demands of the three services for stationery supplies and office equipment. Experience has shown that substantial economies have been achieved by co-ordinating the demands for this type of supplies. Thus of the total staff of 114 in the office of the deputy minister, 64 are engaged in activities that were not undertaken by the three deputies in 1944, 1945 and 1946. So the increase in staff over the comparative figures for those years is attributable entirely to the additional functions now carried on.

Mr. Fulton: Not entirely on a proportionate basis.

[Mr. Claxton.]

Mr. Claxton: The next statement by the hon. member for Calgary East was in connection with evidence of waste, and he said he had seen burlap bundles filled with paper outside the Department of National Defence. I hope he has seen similar bundles outside every department of government and I hope, as in this case, they are sold as waste paper on tender. What else the hon. member would expect to do with it, I do not know.

Mr. Harkness: Just an example of the paper war.

Mr. Claxton: Then the hon. member dealt with the question of equipment for the reserve forces, and he quoted largely from an article which had appeared in the Calgary Herald. The hon. member said:

> They told me their carriers were about to be taken away from them.

I do not know where he got this information, but if it is so it must be because the carriers they had were worn out. So far there is nowhere that we know of an acceptable modern infantry carrier. Everyone on our side is working on one, but we have not found anything better. Then the hon. member said, "Their jeeps have gone already." The jeeps were removed from the reserve army units and active force units in order to renovate them and send them to Europe where they were urgently required to be used for operational training, and were immediately replaced with a new type made during the last 18 months which are now pooled under the control of the general officers commanding. Jeeps that were used previously for administrative purposes are being replaced by commercial type vehicles. More than 80 per cent of that operation is complete, and I would think that it will all be complete this month.

The hon. member suggested that the reserve force officers should be given a tour of duty in Korea. That is provided for if they will agree to serve a year. It would not be economical on any other basis.

Then the hon. member dealt with promotions within the Royal Canadian Air Force, I understand particularly those on the administrative list. Everyone in the Royal Canadian Air Force up to the rank of squadron leader is required to take examinations in order to qualify for promotion. If any of the gentlemen he had in mind have not qualified it is due to their failure to pass the examinations. Above that rank it is considered that officers generally should be on the general list, but there are arrangements under way under which they can move from one to the other.

The next comment to which I would make reference was that of the hon. member for Kamloops who said, as reported on page 3840 of Hansard:

In the case of the two buildings in Montreal we see that they were sold only three and a half years later for a fifth of the amount paid for them.

Mr. Fulton: I told you last night that they were not defence buildings.

Mr. Claxton: A number were dealt with last night. I am dealing with those that were not dealt with last night.

Mr. Fulton: I told you that they were not defence buildings last night.

Mr. Claxton: In answer to a question you told me that one of them was not.

Mr. Fulton: I said that the Montreal example was not defence buildings.

Mr. Claxton: Why did you give it?

The Chairman: May I suggest that this type of discussion between two hon. members should not be carried on. If the hon. member for Kamloops wishes to interrupt the minister he should do so through the chair. This sort of thing has been going on for some time.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I was simply bearing in mind the treatment to which I was subjected last night. I apologize to you and I shall not repeat the example which we saw here last night. I am sorry.

Mr. Claxton: The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre referred again, as he has on numerous occasions, to the shortage of ammunition. I suggest that this is a matter on which hon. members should exercise the usual caution which should be applied to matters affecting the morale and welfare of the troops. I can read to him a statement made in the British House of Commons on March 26, 1953. The quotation is as follows:

Mr. Shinwell asked the Prime Minister, as the head of our defence forces, whether he was informed of the shortage of ammunition for United Nations troops in Korea; and what action was taken in the matter.

The Prime Minister: I am informed that the ammunition supply in Korea has always been sufficient to meet the operational requirements of the United Nations forces, and shortages of ammunition have not restricted the planning of operations.

Mr. Shinwell: But has the right hon. gentleman not been informed of the statement made quite recently by General Van Fleet on his retirement from the command in Korea to the effect that there has been a considerable shortage of ammunition?

The Prime Minister: I have to rely upon the official information which is transmitted to us in due course. I cannot deal with every statement that is made by an ex-commander—or even by an ex-cabinet minister.

Mr. Shinwell: But would the Prime Minister be good enough to address his mind seriously to this question. Does he regard it as satisfactory that statements should be made to congressional committees in the United States by retiring commanders on the subject of the alleged shortage of ammunition without information being conveyed to this house in order to remove a possible misleading statement of this kind?

The Prime Minister: I do not think it would be a good thing if we were to let our procedure in this house be governed by investigations of congressional committees in the United States. I should have thought that the right hon. gentleman ought to be very careful when he pursues this line as he might be falling out with some of his colleagues below the gangway.

Mr. Shinwell: Does not the right hon. gentleman understand that I am anxious not to fall out with anybody but if I had to choose between my hon. friends below the gangway and the Prime Minister I should prefer the right hon. gentleman because he is much easier to handle. Will he be good enough to make inquiries and to ascertain whether the statements by General Van Fleet are accurate? After all, we ought to be assured on a very important subject of this kind.

The Prime Minister: We have regular reports, and very close and intimate relations prevail between the British military representative and the commander in chief in Korea. I have no doubt that the reports we have received fully justify us in giving our full confidence to the character of the statements made. May I thank the right hon. gentleman for the compliment which he paid me and only express my regret that he should have thought it necessary to add any reservation.

On the same day the views of President Eisenhower were expressed, and they were quoted in the Washington Post of March 27. I read:

President Eisenhower said yesterday there is sufficient ammunition in Korea for present scale operations and then described the supply situation as perfectly sound under current circumstances. Across the Atlantic, Prime Minister Winston Churchill gave similar assurances to the House of Commons and an army spokesman said that shipments of some types of ammunition have been diverted to other areas because Far East pipe lines of such shells are now full.

The president was asked about the ammunition situation at his news conference. He said he had questioned the Pentagon about it and if there was any relation between the shortage and the loss of Baldy Ridge hill in Korea, given up by American troops yesterday after a heavy fight. The army chiefs assured him emphatically that ammunition was not a factor in the loss of the position, Mr. Eisenhower said. In fact, he added, the Far East command turned back a shipload of ammunition because the reserves of that particular type were so high they didn't want it.

Mr. Fulton: Which editorial do you believe?

Mr. Claxton: I do not understand the hon. member's comment. I am reading from the report of a debate in the British Hansard and the report of what President Eisenhower said in Washington.

Mr. Fulton: Which editorial do you believe? How about giving your own views?

Mr. Claxton: My own views?

Mr. Fulton: Yes.

Mr. Claxton: I have already given them in the house.

Mr. Fulton: I have not heard them.

Mr. Claxton: Well, the hon. member was not here, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Fulton: Yes, I was.

An hon. Member: He was not all here.

Mr. Claxton: The situation was described before and there is no need to go into it further. But the hon. gentleman did ask about the supply line. What happened was that the British were in need of some 25-pounder shells at the beginning of the war in Korea and we sent them 200,000. That was our contribution to the commonwealth supply line. Shells for 25-pounders, some mortar bombs and small arms ammunition now come from British production. Ammunition for other weapons comes off the American supply line. We generally get the same treatment as anyone else. The situation was as I indicated in my statement in the house last December, and since then it has steadily improved.

The next reference with which I wish to deal is that made by the hon. member for Brandon with respect to welfare. I must say that I think an apology is owing to him for some delay in completing the answer to a return he asked for some time ago, but it required investigation and checking in both Korea and Germany. However, I have ascertained that the information is now available and it will be tabled tomorrow. It will give a full statement on the question of welfare in both theatres. I have a number of quotations, extracts and so on and so forth which run directly contrary to some of those which have been used in the house, but I will not give them now. I should add, however, that it has been decided to institute a Canadian army welfare fund similar to the benevolent funds for the air force and navy for the purpose of extending benefits to serving personnel. That has been set up and a statement to that effect will go out tonight.

With regard to one or two other matters, the hon. member for Kootenay West and other hon. members have referred again to these global figures for items such as rugs, furniture and the like. We have set up a special committee on defence expenditure to look into these items. That committee has done so.

Mr. Fulton: Rugs? They have not been discussed.

Mr. Claxton: If it has not been done, it is exclusively due to the lack of endeavour on the part of the hon. member to have that subject brought forward.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Mr. Fulton: No. On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, it may interest the minister to know that we have had six items on the agenda, which was the maximum we were allowed to place on it, and we have not been allowed to deal with more than three of them.

Mr. Dickey: Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: May I ask if a report has been made to the house with respect to the proceedings of the committee? If not, they cannot be discussed in the house.

Mr. Dickey: But Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Fulton: The minister should not make an inaccurate statement about it.

Mr. Dickey: Mr. Chairman, the proceedings—

The Chairman: Order. I did not object to the hon. member for Kamloops rising on a question of privilege. He was quite right in doing so, and he has stated his question of privilege. But I say again that to carry on a discussion of what has happened before that committee before its proceedings have been reported to the house is, in my view, not in order.

Mr. Dickey: But Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order—

Mr. Dickey: The proceedings of the committee—

Mr. Fulton: On a question of privilege—

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Kamloops must give the hon. member for Halifax a chance to state his question of privilege if he has one.

Mr. Fulton: I am endeavouring to state a question of privilege myself.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Kamloops rose and stated his question of privilege.

Mr. Fulton: No, Mr. Chairman. You yourself—

The Chairman: If he did not, I will hear him now. The hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, you yourself have said that either there is no question of privilege before the committee or that alternatively this committee is not entitled to discuss the proceedings of the special committee on defence expenditure. My point was that the minister made an inaccurate statement with regard to the proceedings in that committee, which I endeavoured to correct.

An hon. Member: You didn't.

Mr. Fulton: Now, sir, if you are going to allow debate or discussion on that question I submit that you must allow complete discussion of what has or has not been allowed to be debated in that committee.

Mr. Howe: You have spoken in this debate already. Sit down.

Mr. Fulton: You have spoken six or seven times.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Fulton: We all know how the Minister of Trade and Commerce resents giving anybody else an opportunity to speak in this house.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Harkness: You wait for wheat tomorrow.

The Chairman: I think it might be preferable to observe the rules to the letter and, therefore, any references to the proceedings of the committee on defence expenditure are not in order.

Mr. Dickey: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of National Defence was referring to the proceedings in the committee last year, proceedings which were reported to this house.

Mr. Fulton: On a point of privilege—

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Chairman: Perhaps we might let the Minister of National Defence say what proceedings he was referring to.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Carroll: Mr. Chairman, you have made a decision in this matter and I think it is the due of members of this house that you should enforce it. You have made the decision, and I do not think you should call on the Minister of National Defence at the present time to answer any questions.

The Chairman: Order. Perhaps we should reflect a little on what is happening. Let us not develop heat where there is no reason for it. The Minister of National Defence, in the course of his speech, said there was a committee set up to examine the expenditures of the Department of National Defence. He was at that time referring to a question which had been put to him by hon. members on the opposite side and which had to do with the purchase of rugs. He said that the committee had been set up and if the matter were to be investigated it could have been investigated there and was investigated there.

At that moment the hon. member for Kamloops took exception to the statement.

Mr. Fulton: Hear, hear.

The Chairman: He rose on a question of privilege and said that they were not allowed to discuss the matter, that there were only six items put on the agenda. At that moment the hon. member for Halifax rose in order to contradict what the hon. member for Kamloops was saying. As two members were attempting to speak at once, I considered it my duty to rise and say that if the proceedings of the committee had not been reported they could not be referred to in debate in this house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Kamloops again rose, carrying on the statement of his question of privilege. He was merely continuing the statement of his question of privilege which had been interrupted by the rising of the hon. member for Halifax. At that moment I heard him further and said that I thought it preferable not to carry on the discussion of proceedings in committee which had not been reported. The hon. member for Halifax then rose and explained that what the Minister of National Defence was referring to were not proceedings before the committee now sitting but proceedings of the committee last year. Therefore I proposed and I now suggest that the Minister of National Defence, who was the one who referred to these proceedings, is the one to say to what proceedings he was referring.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

The Chairman: Was it proceedings of the committee this year or last year? I think it is proper for the minister who created the incident to explain to what proceedings he was referring.

Mr. Claxton: Yes, Mr. Chairman. Last year the committee on defence expenditure referred to a great many items and if they did not include rugs that was surely by way of oversight, because rugs were dealt with in the house, as I see by the statement made on November 27, 1952.

Mr. Fulton: That was after the committee had risen.

Mr. Sinclair: Address the chair.

Mr. Claxton: Now, sir, hon. members of the opposition have on a good many occasions made sweeping statements about extravagance, waste and the like; and those usually take the form of stating a large figure: "They have spent $251,000 on landscape gardening; so much on ties", and so on. Those assertions are played up and made use of repeatedly, as if there was something wrong because the figures happen to be large. The figures happen to be large because of the scale of the operations, and the place where these things can be looked into best has been and is, I suggest, before the committee on defence expenditure.

An illustration of this situation perhaps can be given in the simplest possible terms. Many hon. members of the opposition have made a good deal of the fact that we bought a lot of ties. We need 420,000 ties a year to supply each member of the armed forces who has to wear a tie with the minimum number required to equip him. You have to think in terms of that sum.

The Leader of the Opposition followed the hon. member for Calgary East by referring to some shortages in the equipment of the reserve forces. He described them as deplorable and likely to produce an attitude of frustration and so on. Well, we have some hundreds of units in the reserve force of the army and their effort is to do the best job they can—and a very good job they do, too. They are handicapped in that effort if they have more equipment than they need for the purposes of their training; so effort is constantly made by the reserve forces themselves to reduce the amount of their equipment to that which they need for training purposes.

In the question put by the Leader of the Opposition it would appear that he had in mind an artillery regiment. Indeed, it would look as if he were quoting from the same text that was referred to by the hon. member for Calgary East. As far back as last August information went out that the number of guns that would be available for the training of each artillery regiment would be reduced to the number they could usefully use. The distribution was put under the command of the general officer commanding. It was before the conference of defence associations at their meeting in Ottawa in January, 1953, and no complaint whatever was made about the result. Indeed, it appears to have been in accordance with their wishes. The general officers commanding and area commanders recently had their conference in Ottawa and the question was not raised. As far as one can see this was a thoroughly sensible course, in accordance with the wishes of the units.

Mr. Harkness: Probably they asked for guns without breeches and breech rings, did they?

Mr. Claxton: With regard to the question of breech rings, in consequence of experience gained in Korea it was decided just before Christmas of this year to make modifications in the breech rings in order to ensure greater security, this despite the fact that 25-pounders have been in production and use for a number of years. So the breech rings are being modified, and that modification will be completed before the coming training season. Had an accident occurred by reason of failure to carry out that modification, the necessity of which was borne in by experience in Korea, I am sure that hon. members opposite would have been the first to call this to our attention.

Now, sir, I think I have dealt with most of the points covered by hon. members opposite. If there are any that I have not covered I am sure they will be drawn to my attention and we can deal with them as we get into the detailed discussion of the estimates.

Mr. Pearkes: Before we go into the discussion of the details, there is one question I should like to ask the minister, arising out of his observations. Just before the recess he referred to a statement I made yesterday with reference to the former destroyer H.M.C.S. Algonquin, which I had said was being converted at the Yarrows yard in Esquimalt and was the only prototype of the new anti-submarine escort ships that have so far been commissioned. The minister said the Algonquin is not the prototype of the new anti-submarine escort vessel, but she is the first of our Tribal class destroyers to be modernized, equipped with new mess decks, bunks, new electronic fire control apparatus and the like. She is not one of the new anti-submarine escort vessels. I think I took down the minister's words correctly.

I based my statement on information which appeared in a magazine entitled Canadian Shipping and Marine Engineering News, March 1953, the Royal Canadian Navy issue, and particularly an article entitled "The Navy's Progress", by the Hon. Brooke Claxton, D.C.M., Q.C., Minister of National Defence. In this article the minister said:

> A prototype of Canada's new anti-submarine escort ships, the former destroyer H.M.C.S. Algonquin, was commissioned in February, and the job of converting another destroyer, H.M.C.S. Crescent, into a similar deadly foe of the submarine, was taken in hand.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do submit that these are two diametrically opposed statements. On the one hand the minister says Algonquin is not the prototype of the new anti-submarine escort ships, and the month before he wrote an article in a trade magazine in which he said that she is the prototype of the new anti-submarine escort vessels. These conflicting statements only lead to confusion, not only confusion for members of the opposition who try to base their arguments on statements made by the minister, but also confusion in the minds of the public. I do not know which of these two exactly opposite statements is correct, and I would ask the minister.

Mr. Harkness: Convicted out of his own mouth.

Mr. Fulton: Neither is correct.

Mr. Claxton: The titles of these ships, as the hon. member may know, change from time to time according to the type of description applied to them.

Mr. Fulton: They change every time the minister speaks.

An hon. Member: Wait.

Mr. Claxton: The type of ship which we generally call the anti-submarine escort vessel is the new type which is being produced, the first of which is the St. Laurent, which was launched last year. The Tribal class destroyers are being reconverted for anti-submarine work, but they are not the anti-submarine escort ships.

Mr. Pearkes: Then the statement in this edition of Canadian Shipping of March, 1953, by the minister is incorrect.

Mr. Claxton: I do not know; I have not checked it.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Chairman, I should like to discuss not the details of the equipment but the broad question of organization. Before doing that, I should like to make one or two comments on the speech which the minister has just finished.

I was rather puzzled by the comments he made about Wing Commander Rohmer. It did not seem to me that it was important to know whether he was No. 286 on the list or whether he had a pleasant talk with Crawford Gordon, Jr., or whether he wrote a letter to Crawford Gordon, Jr., or whether he was the partner of a Conservative candidate and an active Liberal party worker in Toronto. I think the only thing that was important was whether or not what he said was true. I understand that what he said was exactly what the hon. member for Nanaimo said, and that it has not been either controverted or attempted to be controverted in any way.

The minister began by saying that this gentleman was an officer with a good record. But from that point on it seemed to me the disposition was rather to play him down. It will be a sorry day when we try to play down men who have the courage to say what they think. One of the troubles is that there are so few people who do have that courage.

I should like to draw attention to another thing. At the beginning of the minister's speech he referred to the fact that the Leader of the Opposition had expressed approval of what is called our No. 2 obligation, that is the obligation to NATO and our obligations under the United Nations charter. I am quite satisfied that the Leader of the Opposition is ready to give credit where credit is due.

With regard to the other two points—No. 1, the defence of Canada against enemy attack, and No. 3, the organizations to build up strength in a total war—I confess I found myself very disappointed with the words which the minister used. Speaking of the Leader of the Opposition he said: "If he stays on that side of the house and we stay on this side, as we all expect will be the case for some time further,"—that was just thrown in—"it may be that he will be in a position next year or perhaps the following year to acknowledge that we have done equally well on the first and third points because we are just on the way to getting there."

I think the taxpayers will be disappointed at the fact that all the minister can say is "maybe next year or perhaps the following year." In that connection I wish to read from today's Ottawa Journal concerning the increasing futurity, we might say, of the progress that they are making in the Department of National Defence. Speaking of the white paper the Journal says:

> We read them, anxious and eager to agree with Mr. Claxton that all is going well and that our billions of dollars of expenditure have brought us the utmost in defence security; but we cannot, no matter how we try.
> One reason for our cautious approach to these white papers is Mr. Claxton's persistent use of the words "will be", his emphasis about the arms we are to have rather than the sabre in our national fist at the moment. For example, we have looked up the 1952-53 white paper and it said: "At present the fighter squadrons for this purpose (fighter defence of Canada) are equipped with Vampire and Mustang aircraft. These will be replaced by CF-100's as they become available. In addition, there are a number of squadrons equipped with F-86E's and designated for the NATO air force in Europe. In the meantime they are available for the defence of this continent.

The following year, in the 1953-54 white paper, I read the following from the white paper:

> The first regular squadron, equipped with CF-100 all-weather, twin-engine, jet fighters, was recently formed and by the end of the fiscal year a number of these squadrons will be operating. Meanwhile, a number of squadrons of F-86E Sabres, destined as part of Canada's NATO air contribution, have been in Canada available for the defence of this continent. As the last of these are sent to Europe during the year, their places will be taken by squadrons of CF-100's. Reserve squadrons now equipped with Vampires and Mustangs will be re-equipped with CF-100's as these become available.

And the Journal goes on briefly:

> So, apart from that one squadron with an unstated number of aircraft, the CF-100's are still in the "will be" stage, and antiquated Vampires and Mustangs remain to be counted among the defenders of the nation in the case of a sudden attack.

I wish to direct the rest of my remarks to what I think may be called No. 3 of these objectives, although it affects them all. I refer to the objective of enabling us to mobilize our forces to meet an all-out attack. I wish to discuss that matter from the point of view of the whole organization of the Department of National Defence and its conjoint companies, defence production, defence construction and Central Mortgage and Housing.

I put it this way to you, Mr. Chairman. Two years ago or thereabouts we started on a huge new enterprise on which we have spent billions of dollars. In his speech the minister referred to the capital expenditure and put it at $2,767 million. Then the minister proceeded to talk with what seemed to me to be great satisfaction about the fact that we had managed to spend all this money. He told us that it involved hundreds of contracts. Actually it came to sound like a song of billions. But for the most part or indeed almost altogether it seemed that we were just listening to an outline of huge expenditures.

For example, the minister compared it with the expenditures of the Canadian National Railways. He said that in 25 years the Canadian National Railways had managed to spend only $1,341 million; and I presume this is on capital account. He pointed out, apparently with pride, that in two and a half years our defence program has managed to spend more than twice as much as this. Then he gave us an illustration of a private corporation. He gave as an illustration the Shawinigan company which I think he said in 50 years had spent something like $335 million, although I am not quite sure about that figure.

What I felt was that all these figures were splendidly irrelevant. They seemed to me to have nothing to do with the case. To me the whole point is to know not whether we spent all this money—I have no doubt that we did—but whether we did so effectively. From listening to the minister, as far as I could see one was almost supposed to assume that we had spent this money effectively. From the fact that we had been able to enter into all these contracts and have everything done according to legal form by all the various companies, including defence construction, defence production, Central Mortgage and Housing and national defence—I find it difficult to remember all the names—we were supposed to assume that that in itself was a great achievement.

Then we have had criticisms in this debate. We have had criticisms that have been referred to tonight. I do not propose to take the time of the committee to refer to them. Those gentlemen who have made their criticisms and who have been answered—and in my opinion very ineffectively—will be prepared to say whatever further needs to be said on those subjects. I come back to the question of organization.

Many months ago, indeed I think I may say years ago, when this thing first came up, we on this side felt that this was a tremendous job; and I think sincerely enough we tried to press that view on those across the gangway. It seemed to us—and I have never been able to get away from that feeling—that the matter was taken too lightly. I myself asked a question in the house on May 24, 1951. I tried to stress as best I could what seemed to me to be the magnitude and the complexity of this job, and I asked whether any expert assistance was being sought. I asked whether the government was seeking in any way to get assistance, and the answer I got was this:

It—

That is the department.

—is set up in accordance with the practice which has obtained in the Department of National Defence over the years. There has not been much change. We have to do a job, and we do it.

I might point out, too, that there was a slight inaccuracy in that statement of the minister because my understanding is that during the war years Colonel Ralston did in fact bring in several top-ranking businessmen to assist him, one of them being Mr. Currie with whose name we are all so familiar. Hence in fact it was not just the department itself that he relied on. He went outside for assistance.

We know that there are people who specialize in organization and who have useful help which they can give if they are asked for it. Of course it is always arguable that there are men who do not need to be trained in administration, that there are men of genius who seem to be able to do things without the training and experience that ordinary men need; and it was always arguable that we might have found that these men were in the Department of National Defence. So far as I can see, that assumption was made, namely that without any outside assistance and without any outside advice they had succeeded in mastering this tremendous job. As a matter of fact, I was assured by the department that these efficiency companies really were not competent to assist large organizations, that they could assist only the small fry. That was just a complete misunderstanding of the assistance that was available if it had been sought.

Yesterday the minister made a great point of telling us that he had had few letters of complaint. He said you could count them on two hands. I did not take much stock in that answer. The complaints would have to come mainly from two sources. The first source would be somebody in the services. I do not need to tell you, Mr. Chairman, that people in the services are not going to be very ready to write letters of complaint to the minister. That would be a rather unusual thing to do. Then the second source would be people who are doing business with the government; and I do not think they would be very free in writing letters of criticism either. They want to do business with the government, not to criticize them. I am therefore not at all impressed by that test which the minister applied.

We in the opposition have tried to make effective criticisms. We have not done it to our own liking; but I leave the matter to anyone who looks at the thing in a detached way. It is extremely difficult to drive your criticisms home if you have no means of making an independent examination and if you are left entirely to departmental officials who, however competent they are and however desirous they are of doing the right thing, have got to take the departmental line. How could they do anything else? They are in a department and they must take that line. Let us be realistic about the thing.

So things went along, Mr. Chairman, and we were uneasy. I think many people were uneasy. Then something more than a year ago an event took place which perhaps is an illustration of the old hymn that "God moves in a mysterious way"; because an anonymous letter really touched off something. There was an anonymous letter which indicated that all was not well at Petawawa; and as a result of this letter the minister took the entirely proper and wise action of appointing Mr. Currie to make an investigation, which he did.

We know about the investigation. It was discussed in the house. But once the report was brought in, it did not seem to attract much favour among the ministers. Mr. Currie suddenly descended from the heights which he had occupied, and we suddenly found that this idol, in the eyes of the ministers, had feet of clay.

I must say that the Minister of Trade and Commerce made a very gallant attempt to deal with the situation in a broadcast which he gave about a week ago. Anyone who knows anything about the background would be considerably enlightened if I read a paragraph from what the minister said in regard to the report. He was paying his tribute to the opposition, and in the midst of it he said this:

> Opposition parties will say: "What about the Currie report? They are all we need to prove our charges." What are the facts?

And then the minister went on:

> Mr. Currie in his report did not find any waste or inefficiency, nor does he claim to have found any. It was the Minister of National Defence who discovered irregularities in the army works service at Petawawa.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce was not quite fair to the anonymous letter, but we will pass that. I continue:

> It was he who brought to justice those who conspired together to steal a few thousand of dollars worth of public property, and those who personally profited through some of the operations of the army works company at Petawawa camp. These men were being tried and sentenced before Mr. Currie was appointed to suggest improvements in administrative procedures, such as would make that kind of thieving impossible. The Currie report indicates that many improvements had already been made in the system, and more have been made since.

You will I hope realize, Mr. Chairman, that what I have read would seem to indicate that the Currie report, far from being critical of the Department of National Defence, was almost a eulogy. The minister I am sure will not misunderstand it if I say I really think that is one of the most splendid instances of sublime arrogance that I have ever seen. I do not know how the minister got into that frame of mind. The rest of us all thought this report was a criticism. The minister says it is not a criticism. It carried me back to a thing I never could understand when I went to school. It was a thing called a syllogism, a form of reasoning that was always over my head.

Mr. Harkness: No, it is a phobia.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): It occurs to me that the only way I can explain it to my own satisfaction—I hope the minister will accept this as a genuine attempt to explain what he said—the only thing I can imagine is that the minister with sublime arrogance, as I said, argued this way: No sane man can criticize this government; Currie is a sane man; therefore Currie did not criticize the government.

I looked carefully through the broadcast to see whether the minister had concealed any further references to the report, but I could not find anything unless it was in between the lines.

Mr. Howe: Everybody has forgotten the Currie report except you and me.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I can only say to the minister that this is the most magnificent effrontery that I ever heard in my life. I was going to say, Mr. Chairman, that for those who do not live in this rarefied atmosphere of imperturbable and unassailable self-satisfaction—

Mr. Howe: My sentence was better than yours, anyway.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): —the Currie report does seem to us to be criticism. I am not going to go over the phrases that we know so well, but I want to remind you in passing, Mr. Chairman,—and here I am getting near dangerous ground, but not quite on it—that apart from a couple of negligible quibbles, there has not been a dent made in the Currie report.

Mr. Casselman: They know it, too.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I think the ordinary person, not one of those people who are living in this rarefied atmosphere, but just the ordinary Joe, as we call him, would think that it would be reasonable when you found a state of gross—what shall we say—gross irregularity, gross inefficiency in the department, an attempt would be made to extend the examination. I would say that anyone outside of a kindergarten, or even inside a kindergarten, would think that was reasonable. And of course we all know that in a private business, if a department was found to be ineffective or inefficient and the manager did not move to have the whole business investigated, he would get the sack. It is just as simple as that. But to this government nothing is impossible, nothing unreasonable is impossible, and so there has been no inquiry. It was voted down.

I can only imagine the government hopes that memories are very short. It is their hope that before the 10th day of August, that magic date which is being bandied about by the Citizen and in other places, this will be forgotten.

I do want to make one reference to the Currie report, because in addition to the blistering criticism of the department's administration, Mr. Currie makes one statement which I think is so far-reaching and goes so much to the root of the matter that I want to read it, and I want to support it a little later on; and I do hope that it will be in order. I am watching awfully carefully, Mr. Chairman. At page 717 of Hansard of December last Mr. Currie, after his various detailed criticisms of what he found, goes on to what seems to me to be the basic criticism that he makes, which goes to the very root of the matter and which personally I find very convincing, because I think it would be nothing short of a miracle if this organization could have been licked into satisfactory shape just by a sort of hit-or-miss method, and I have never been able to discover any other which has been used. This is what Mr. Currie says:

> What is needed now is the creation of a system—

I want to repeat that:

> What is needed now is the creation of a system—

It is not a modification or a little change here and there, but the creation of a system.

> —designed to fit the economic and efficient administration of a large and long-sustained preparedness program inside a national economy operating at full blast.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there you see a man who knows his onions. There is a man who knows something about the economy and what fitting this into the economy means, because he is at once a distinguished businessman and a distinguished public servant. They could not have found a man better qualified. The minister did a great public service when he got Mr. Currie to go into this a year ago. The only trouble is, having got him, and having got the medicine, they would not take it. I continue:—

The Chairman: Order. I do not want to stop the hon. member from making references to the Currie report, but I bear in mind the fact that a debate took place upon it earlier in the session, and that later on when other measures came before the house His Honour the Speaker intervened. I should like to remind the hon. member of the ruling the Speaker made, which is to be found at page 2340 of Hansard, where he said:

> The hon. member cannot refer to a previous debate on another subject during the present session, either directly or in quoting newspaper reports or speaking generally. It is improper for a member to refer to a previous debate, whether or not he uses the exact words which have been said.
> It is my opinion that the debate on the Currie report should not be revived at this time.

That was during the budget debate during which, as the hon. member knows, considerable latitude is allowed. The Speaker continued:

> That report, for consideration, was referred to a special committee of the house. Now, I do not intend to prevent a reference to the Currie report; but another debate on it at this time I am sure would not be in order.

It has been said that only part of the report has been referred to the committee, but that is not the point at issue at the moment. It is that before the hon. member carries on quoting further from the Currie report, and comments on it, I think I should bring to his attention this ruling and also one which had to do with the extension of the inquiry, which was asked by the opposition and which was voted down by the house. Therefore, a decision of the house having been taken on that very subject, it should not be brought forward again.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Chairman, may I say with deference that we are now discussing the organization of the Department of National Defence. I am not reading from Hansard; I am reading from the Currie report which made an observation upon the organization of the department. There was only one short extract that I wanted to read. I submit that there is nothing more relevant in a discussion of the organization of the Department of National Defence than the suggestion made by a distinguished man engaged by the government to make recommendations. I just wish to be allowed to read briefly from those recommendations.

The Chairman: As I say, it is relevant; I did not stop the hon. member previously when he had made several references to it. He can carry on and make other references to it and I will not stop him. I have in mind the fact that if I allow the hon. member to discuss the Currie report at this time I shall have to allow other hon. members to do the same thing, and then we will not be discussing national defence estimates at all, but will be reviving a debate which took place a few weeks ago.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Chairman, I think you will find that I am not going to discuss the Currie report, but I should like to quote from it as follows:

> This involves the abandonment, by all administrators of the program, of the war psychology with its emphasis on speed with resultant wastefulness and extravagance, and the substitution of an alert, economic and efficient operation flexibly designed, to be sure, to meet emergencies, but designed also to become a more or less permanent part of Canadian life and government.

It so happens that the Winnipeg Free Press has carried a series of articles by a man called S. M. I do not know who he is.

Mr. Knowles: Shane MacKay.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I hope he is a good man. I should like to read briefly from this article because it is perfectly clear that I am not the only one who is troubled about this question of organization. This is from the Winnipeg Free Press of March 17, 1953:

> Apart from the individual cases of deficiency brought to light by the Currie report, a study of the present organization of the Canadian army indicates the presence of a more fundamental problem in military administration.
> Mr. Currie's report implies that the breakdown in the army works services branch may have been the consequence of a more serious administrative shortcoming at defence headquarters.

I am going to be quite brief. The writer of these articles and finally the Winnipeg Free Press itself puts forward quite a definite thesis as to organization. I have no intention of supporting that thesis because I have not given the matter enough thought. I am raising this only to show that this question of organization is exercising other people, and to show that there is a great disturbance of minds as to whether or not our organization is sound. I should like to read from another of these articles where reference is made to the hon. member for Nanaimo and a reference by him to the National Defence Act which was approved in 1950. This article reads:

> When the act was referred to a special committee of the House of Commons, General G. R. Pearkes, V.C., the Progressive Conservative for Nanaimo, commented on the wide powers it gave to the chief of the general staff.

I might interject here to say that the thesis of this writer, as far as I can make it out, is that the army chiefs have been given too much power. I continue to quote from the article which is quoting the hon. member for Nanaimo:

> "Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether the committee is aware of the fact, but I think there is a bigger change here in so far as the army and the general administration of the staff are concerned than in any other section of the act. Here you are changing the whole system of the staff control of the army.
> In the past you have had the general staff represented by the chief of the general staff, who has had the responsibility of co-ordinating the work of the other branches of the staff, the adjutant-general, the quartermaster-general and the master-general of ordnance.
> Here you are placing the chief of the general staff in a position senior to the heads of the other branches, and that is really a major change which is going back almost to the system which was in vogue in 1904, when you had a commander-in-chief of the army.

I shall go on now to make a few further brief remarks. I come back to the words used by Mr. Currie, "the creation of a system". This report was made by a competent man. Of course we thought that the inquiry should be extended, but it was not. I am not going to say anything about that, Mr. Chairman, because I see you shaking your head at me. But I think we might have expected that there would have been some indication in the minister's speech that somewhere there had been a stirring of the waters, that something was going to be done, that there was not complete satisfaction with the present situation. However, I could not detect anything of that kind in the minister's speech.

Maybe it was there, and if he can correct me on that I shall be only too glad to be corrected. I could not see that there was any recognition of the existence of the problem.

Since I may not mention the fact that we could not get the report extended you will realize that so far as we are concerned we feel that an iron curtain has been pulled down. If you cannot have an independent inquiry into what is going on you are faced with practically an iron curtain, as I said a little while ago. We have to go on in the dark to deal with such information as the minister sees fit to give us.

I want to be fair in this and say that we have been given quite a lot of information; but the question is, what kind of information? The information that we got is and is bound to be, shall I say, screened information. When I say "screened" I am not suggesting anything sinister—I want to be fair to the situation; but it is not the kind of information you get when you send in your own representative, when you send in an independent person to inspect. It is suggested to me that it is edited information. In one sense it is.

I have talked long enough and you have been most patient with me, for which I am grateful. I just want to say that the situation is unsatisfactory. It is perfectly clear that at the moment the defence of Canada is in a most unsatisfactory state. The minister used a phrase which at one time was used a great deal, that the sound thing is to defend your country as far away from your country as possible. But that remark would be valid only before the days of global aircraft. I am not sure, but I think that phrase was used first of all by the Australians in Africa, who said that they went to Africa because they preferred to defend Australia there.

As the hon. member for Nanaimo said, what is the use of saying that, unless you can get the enemy to agree to fight it out, say, in the Falkland islands? We know that at the present time the situation is unsatisfactory and there is no use of having any make-up about it. I can only hope that as a result of this debate and other means of enlightenment the people of Canada will wake up to the situation. If they do I am quite sure they will find it to be most unsatisfactory.

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): Mr. Chairman, it is rather late in the evening—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Higgins: —and looking around the house I see that most people are fairly quiet.

[Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood).]

I do not think there is going to be much interrupting. I am not going to say anything that is going to provoke people very much.

I want to talk about the silent service. It has not been talked about very much and it talks very little for itself. There is very little about it in the minister's white paper, very little in the minister's article that the hon. member for Nanaimo quoted, very little in Hansard of yesterday, and very little in the minister's speech of today. But because Canada is the type of country that will always require a navy, and because I come from that part of Canada which has been associated with the navy for so many years, I am going to take a little bit on my back and speak for a short time about the navy this evening. I am basing what I have to say, before I quote what I have to quote, on an article written by the chief of the naval staff, the present Vice-Admiral Mainguy.

When I first knew Vice-Admiral Mainguy in St. John's, Newfoundland, in the last war he was then known as Captain D, and he was the person responsible for the establishment of what has become in naval circles, and almost internationally, a very well known place, the Crows' Nest in St. John's, Newfoundland. Possibly some hon. members remember when they were on escort duty in the bad days of the last war and came back from England or Ireland to Newfoundland. After that particular patrol you went to the Crows' Nest to get a little bit of sustenance, not only the sustenance that you took there but the sustenance that you got in the form of good fellowship. As I say, the Crows' Nest has become more or less an international place for naval people, particularly of the Royal Navy, the Royal Canadian Navy and, as we knew it in wartime, the wavy navy of Canada. St. John's, Newfoundland, was indeed a very honoured place in those days because of the great number of ships that called there and because of the very real pleasure the navy extended to the residents of St. John's which they were happy to reciprocate in kind.

With that preamble I want to quote rather extensively, because it has not been quoted and I think it should be—the navy does not usually talk very much—from an article by the chief of the naval staff, Vice-Admiral Mainguy, in the last edition of Canadian Shipping and Marine Engineering News. It is the Royal Canadian Navy issue, and the article deals chiefly with submarines. I trust that I will be excused for putting it on the record. I think it is worth while having. It is not too long and it is quite important, at least to me.

At page 83 of the magazine there is the following in Vice-Admiral Mainguy's article:

A good deal has been said and written during the past few years on the subject of the R.C.N.'s chief potential antagonist, the modern submarine, but the fact remains that only a few have any clear understanding of its real, and considerable, destructive power. This should be as well known to every Canadian as it is to those who might seek to use it against us, for it is among the gravest threats that we may have to face as a nation should we become involved in yet another great destructive war.

In appearance the post-war model submarine is not vastly different from its sufficiently troublesome predecessors. In performance it is in many respects an entirely different vessel, with some rather alarming characteristics and possibilities. In the first place, its underwater speed is approximately double that which could be attained by the U-boats of the second world war. Secondly, the depth to which the submarine can dive is steadily increasing. This makes it harder to detect and increases its chances of escape even if detected.

Then he talks about the German apparatus which we knew as the snorkel but which he calls the "snort". He says that with the snort installed this submarine of the modern age can now stay down for a matter of weeks. He says that the modern submarine has a range of 5,000 miles, and carries torpedoes whose range may now be calculated in miles and which are equipped with target-finding devices which have increased their effectiveness most seriously. He goes on and enlarges upon the fact that the submarine with its new potential killing apparatus is an infinitely more dangerous weapon than ever before. Then he says:

The submarine is thus faster, harder to catch, harder to kill and possessed of greater destructive power than at any time in the past. What is more, it can be built in quantity. The U.S.S.R. has today some five or six times as many submarines as the Germans had in 1939, and is certainly building many more of advanced types. The present fleet is actually about the size of that possessed by Germany at the zenith of success in the last war. There is every indication that it will continue to grow.

I am by no means competent to evaluate properly the findings of the chief of the naval staff except as an ordinary common-sense individual reading common-sense language. The Minister of Fisheries may say that I cannot write too well, but I can read better than I can write.

Mr. Graydon: He needs glasses.

Mr. Higgins: It does appear to me that the new submarine is a threat that we cannot afford to ignore in any way. I believe the only way—and again I speak subject to correction by persons who are very much more advanced in knowledge of this particular subject than I am—that you can possibly handle submarines is by the co-ordination of aircraft and surface vessels. There are two particular factors to which I want to direct my remarks in the time left to me tonight, the aircraft and the surface craft that Canada now has.

Before I proceed to deal with the aircraft situation, may I say that I am somewhat confused by the statement made by the chief of the naval staff as to the ships now under construction, by the white paper issued by the minister and by the minister's statement in Hansard. I shall tell the minister the particular parts about which I have a little doubt so I will not confuse him any more than I am. For instance, in the table that the chief of the naval staff has in his article he shows the Royal Canadian Navy's construction and conversion program. Under the heading "New Construction" there are fourteen anti-submarine escort vessels, with nine under construction, three of them launched and five more to be laid down in the near future. You will note he says that three of them are launched. After all, a ship is a ship. It does not disappear. It does not suddenly get itself born again. He says that three of them have been launched.

At page 25 of the minister's white paper, paragraph 130, the statement is made that two escort vessels have now been launched and nine keels have been laid. Either there is a misprint in one statement or the other or the minister is wrong or the chief of the naval staff is wrong. Obviously somebody is out a ship.

Mr. Claxton: Or the dates are different.

Mr. Higgins: Well, yes; I suppose the dates could be different. The minister's statement is dated—what date is it, actually? I presume it is dated the day he tabled it.

Mr. Harkness: He tabled it the day before yesterday.

Mr. Higgins: This particular issue of the magazine is dated March, 1953. Perhaps there was a ship launched—or not launched—within the past seven or eight days. There could be, I suppose. The chief of the naval staff says, as I say, that there are three; and the minister in his statement says there are two. Maybe there was a ship launched in the past week that the minister did not know about. I suppose that could be, but I would think it unlikely.

Mr. Claxton: I said there were three, tonight.

Mr. Higgins: Then the white paper is wrong?

Mr. Claxton: It is a little out of date.

Mr. Higgins: When was this printed?

Mr. Harkness: It was tabled the day before yesterday.

Mr. Higgins: How much more is wrong in this?

Mr. Fulton: Most of it is wrong.

Mr. Higgins: This is a rather extraordinary situation.

Mr. Cleaver: Why?

Mr. Higgins: I will tell you why, and I am just giving it to you as I see it. Your hon. members may be used to it, but I accepted this thing as a statement of fact.

An hon. Member: You are naive.

Mr. Higgins: I agree that may be so. I thought everything that was in this was absolutely correct; but do you mean to say this is not correct?

Mr. Claxton: Correct as of the date when it was prepared.

Mr. Higgins: I do not want to provoke things at this hour of the evening, Mr. Chairman, but would the minister say when this was prepared?

Mr. Claxton: I would have to look at the passage and trace it back.

Mr. Higgins: Would you look at it?

Mr. Claxton: Sure.

Mr. Higgins: Would you do it now? Have you got it there?

An hon. Member: He is going to answer you.

Mr. Claxton: Sure.

Mr. Higgins: It is paragraph 130 and it says:

> Two escort vessels have now been launched and nine keels have been laid.

The minister says that is not correct. Well, what is the correct situation, and when was the correction made? Before I go on could I have that answer?

Mr. Claxton: Yes.

Mr. Higgins: Do you mean to answer it now?

Mr. Claxton: No, I will answer it tomorrow.

Mr. Higgins: All right.

An hon. Member: They are going to lay another keel tomorrow.

Mr. Lapointe: Are you lost, Gordon?

Mr. Higgins: There are a couple more what appear to be errors that the minister could explain.

An hon. Member: Only five minutes to kill.

[Mr. Higgins.]

Mr. Higgins: I have not any five minutes to kill.

Mr. Cleaver: Four and a half.

Mr. Higgins: If hon. members would only give me their attention I might be able to gather my wits together. All right; in paragraph 131 we have this particular sentence:

Mr. Lapointe: Who found that for you?

Mr. Higgins: It reads:

> Three additional destroyers, nine "Bangor" class minesweepers . . .

—and I had better finish the sentence—

> —two diesel minesweepers and fifteen frigates are expected to complete conversion refits during 1953.

Vice-Admiral Mainguy says: Minesweepers, "Bangor," ten complete, ten others under modernization. There is a very definite difference; and I think I am reading it correctly now.

Mr. Cleaver: Just two minutes now.

Mr. Higgins: Does the hon. member want to time me?

Mr. Lesage: We are helping you.

Mr. Harkness: On a question of privilege, hon. members on the Liberal side seem to be implying by their constant interjections about time, and so forth, that the hon. member is trying to kill five minutes—

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, my question of privilege covers the fact that I have four pages of notes on which I will speak at considerable length as a result of the speech the minister made. I should say that will take me 15 or 20 minutes, so there is no question of killing time or anything else.

The Chairman: I submit that is not a question of privilege.

Mr. Fulton: Well, I have a question of privilege.

Mr. Lesage: You are getting a lot of help.

Mr. Fulton: My question of privilege is that we are discussing here the estimates of the Department of National Defence. It is my understanding that, according to the rules of the house, the minister is bound to answer questions which are put to him.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Fulton: That is a perfectly good question of privilege.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Pouliot: Mr. Chairman, I want to listen to the hon. member for St. John's East, but the hon. member for Calgary East and the hon. member for Kamloops prevent me from listening to him.

The Chairman: Someone suggests that time will be killed. Perhaps I should kill it myself and therefore settle the argument.

The point I want to bring forward is that last year and two years ago when we studied the estimates of the Department of National Defence there was an agreed procedure, which we are following this year. It is that first of all we have a general policy discussion and, as soon as that is over, we carry on with the question and answer period. I think we are still at the general policy discussion period.

Mr. Claxton: May I help the hon. member for St. John's East out of his difficulty by taking up the remaining time—

Mr. Harkness: No, no, no, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Cleaver: Held over.

Mr. Claxton: The date in the white paper for ships and such matters is up to February 28, or some date in February. The paper was set up in proof form but dates and figures were changed as they came in, particularly regarding manpower. Subsequent to the insertion of the figure of two ships launched, shown there as at the month of February, there was one ship launched. Hence my statement today. Admiral Mainguy's statement in the publication from which you are reading, and the statement in the white paper are all correct.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: May I ask the Minister of National Defence not to imply—

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Chairman: —that perhaps the hon. member for St. John's East had in his mind to kill time. Also, I would not want anything I said myself, when I made a remark in a light vein, to be construed to the effect that the hon. member was trying to kill time.

Mr. Graydon: The clock has let you all out.

Mr. Harkness: Before you call it ten o'clock, I think the minister should withdraw that remark.

Mr. Pouliot: You will agree, sir, that it is easier to kill time than it is to kill the minister.

Mr. Harkness: I would like the minister to withdraw the remark that the hon. member was killing time.

The Chairman: I am glad to see that at this closing hour hon. members are still in a very good mood. I might tell the hon. member for Calgary East that under the rules the implication which was perhaps in the minister's remark is not offensive and I do not think I should ask him to withdraw. Might I make the suggestion that no implication should be left of accusing an hon. member of trying to kill time. The minister has nodded his head in agreement with me. That nod will not appear on Hansard but my explanations will clear up the situation, and I think that will satisfy the hon. member.

Mr. Higgins: May I make a suggestion? I realize that the minister has been under a bit of cross-heckling today, if you will, and I am quite certain that he did not mean the remark he made. Even if he did it would be understandable. I was really not trying to kill time, but I was pressing the point I was trying to make, and I will make it tomorrow, maybe.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we shall take up the second reading of Bill No. 334, an act to provide for the superannuation of persons employed in the public service of Canada. After second reading this bill will be referred immediately to the committee on banking and commerce. I should like to see the bill reach that stage, because the Minister of Finance will be absent for a week and we shall have time to make a serious study of this bill in the committee. Then we shall take up the estimates of national defence and trade and commerce.

Mr. Fleming: In that order?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): In that order.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

WHEAT PURCHASES BY ELEVATOR COMPANIES

Mr. Argue:

1. How much wheat was purchased by each elevator company at country elevator points, during the crop years 1950-51 and 1951-52?

2. How many bushels of each grade of wheat from No. 1 to feed wheat and including tough, damp and rejected grades were purchased by each company in each of the above years?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, when this question was called on April 8 I indicated that to give the information requested would disclose the competitive position of each elevator company. I pointed out that it had never been the practice to give such information and I asked that the question be dropped. The hon. member asking the question was not in his seat on that day and at the request of his leader we let the question stand. I see he is here today, and I wonder if the question could be dropped.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

ST. JOHN'S, NFLD.—HOUSE ON CIRCULAR ROAD

Mr. Higgins:

1. From what person or body was the house situated at Circular road, St. John's, Newfoundland, presently occupied by the premier of Newfoundland and taken over when Newfoundland entered confederation, purchased?
2. What was the amount of the purchase price?

4. If so, when did the person or body acquire the said property?

WHEAT

ADDITIONAL SHIPMENTS OF WHEAT TO HALIFAX AND SAINT JOHN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. R. Balcom (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Is it the intention of the wheat board, because of the strike in Vancouver, to ship additional wheat to the elevators in Halifax and Saint John, and is it the intention to ship wheat through these Atlantic ports during the summer months?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the strike on the west coast has, of course, placed an additional burden on the eastern routes. Whether grain will be shipped through Halifax and Saint John I do not know, but I may say that wheat is being railed to Halifax and Saint John with the idea, in any event, that the elevators will be filled at both points.

The situation of the maritime ports is that the cost of putting wheat in those elevators is obviously more than the cost of putting it into the elevators at Montreal. If the wheat board is able to sell wheat from the maritimes for delivery before shipments from those points would normally begin, with that differential, I presume that grain will be sold; but I cannot say any more than that.

INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT—NON-PARTICIPATION BY BRITAIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw): I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

In view of the announcement by the British food minister yesterday that his government will not participate in the wheat agreement, will not the government now consider sending a minister overseas in one last effort to induce Britain to reconsider the matter before April 30?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I will speak for myself. I have no intention of going to Europe before I sail for the coronation, which I hope will be in the middle of next month.

Mr. Thatcher: It will be too late next month.

BRIDGES

CHARLOTTETOWN, P.E.I.—OWNERSHIP OF RAILWAY BRIDGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): I desire to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has a decision or an agreement between the federal government and the government of Prince Edward Island been arrived at with reference to the ownership of the condemned railway bridge on the Hillsborough river, Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island?

[Mr. Balcom.]

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, my recollection is that some time ago I had correspondence with the premier of Prince Edward Island on that subject but, as far as my memory can stand at the moment, I have no recollection that agreement has been reached. I believe that the matter is still at the point of negotiation.

PUBLIC SERVICE SUPERANNUATION ACT

PROVISION FOR PRESENT AND FUTURE PAYMENT OF ANNUITIES AND OTHER BENEFITS

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 334, to provide for the superannuation of persons employed in the public service of Canada.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in moving the second reading of this bill I intend to limit my remarks to the major changes which are proposed in our system of providing contributory superannuation benefits for employees in the public service of Canada. I shall not try to cover the details of this admittedly complex piece of legislation because, as soon as second reading has been given, I propose to move that the bill be referred to the banking and commerce committee for detailed study.

In preparing this bill I have had the benefit of the valued advice of an advisory committee composed of representatives of our employee organizations and senior administrative officials, and I should like to place on record my sincere appreciation of the responsible and constructive assistance which this committee has given me. I am glad to be able to inform the house that all the proposed changes of substance have the support of this committee and that all the important points it recommended have been incorporated in the bill with one exception.

The one exception is a request that the pension benefits should be calculated on the retiring employee's average salary for his best consecutive eight years instead of his best consecutive ten years, which we are now proposing. The government has not been able to accept the cost of adding this further improvement in the pension provisions, because we believe that the other proposed major and minor modifications in the plan will place the superannuation account in a very close balance from the actuarial standpoint.

In this connection hon. members will recall that, just over a year ago, I tabled a report on the actuarial examination of the superannuation account prepared by the chief actuary of the Department of Insurance. This report revealed that the account was inadequate to meet its full estimated liability and, even after making special credits of $75 million in each of the fiscal years 1950-51 and 1951-52 and a further one of $25 million in 1952-53, there is still an estimated actuarial shortfall of $189 million as of March 31, 1953. Steps have been taken, as hon. members know, to see that no further deficits develop and the new bill contains a requirement that an actuarial report be laid before parliament at least once in every five years. This will provide a means of determining whether the procedure adopted since that report was prepared is, in fact, adequate.

I think that I should make it quite clear at this stage that our basic objective has been to devise a plan that can be supported on the basis of equal contributions by the employer and employee to which the government would add interest. In addition, of course, special contributions, such as those which I have just mentioned, will have to be made from time to time to reduce the deficiency which already exists or to make good any new deficiency created by a general salary increase which cannot be foreseen in establishing the contribution and benefit pattern.

Taken as a whole this bill provides for a contributory system of pensions for public servants and their dependents that is in line with the best prevailing practices of government and of private industry as developed in this or in other comparable countries. I believe the proposed plan is fair to our employees and is also fair to the people and the taxpayers of Canada who, in an ultimate sense, are the employers of all those in the public service of our country.

Under these circumstances, the government cannot recommend acceptance of all the many requests that have been made for improvements in the benefits which would add materially to the cost of this pension plan at the expense of the Canadian taxpayer. If, however, several years of experience under the new plan show that there is room for some further improvements, the matter can be reviewed at that time. And, of course, if there were a general willingness to pay higher rates of contribution the benefits under the plan could be still further improved.

I turn now to a summary of the principal changes proposed in this bill. Perhaps the most important change of principle is the proposal that, in future, as I indicated the other evening, the benefits under the act will be a matter of right rather than a matter of grace, as has been the rule heretofore. Up until now, all payments under the act have been grants by the governor in council in recognition of good and faithful service. In future, payments will be matters of right with ultimate determination, if necessary, by normal judicial process. Concurrently with this change of principle we have endeavoured, as far as is practicable, to spell out all the rules and their application in the law. In as complicated and as human a matter as pension rights it is impossible to cover every conceivable situation by a clause in the act and there must therefore be some provision for the making of regulations by the governor in council; but hon. members will find, if they compare the present act with the bill now before us, that much more has been spelled out in the bill and much less has been left to regulation-making powers of the governor in council in very general terms.

These two factors—the establishment of a legal right to benefits and the effort to put more into the bill and less into the regulations—are responsible for the somewhat greater length and apparent complexity of this bill as compared with the existing acts.

The principle I have just stated is perhaps the most important change in the legal aspects of this bill, but the change which will have the greatest impact on the whole body of the public service is the proposal to withdraw the present distinctions under the act between so-called permanent and so-called temporary employees.

If this bill becomes law, that distinction will disappear and, once any contributor has five years of pensionable service to his credit, he will become eligible to receive annuity benefits in accordance with the circumstances of his retirement. While a new employee would normally be appointed on a temporary basis in the first instance, this bill provides a waiting period of not more than one year of substantially continuous employment before such a person would become a contributor to the superannuation account. If he were appointed on an indefinite basis before the year was over, he would become a contributor from the time of that appointment.

The word "temporary" will still be used in future but it will be applied, and more appropriately, to the types of employees who were formerly described as "casual". The new class of temporary, like a casual employee in the past, will neither contribute to nor, of course, receive benefits under the new scheme.

Consequently, unless provision is made for his retirement benefits under some other act, every full-time employee in the public service, married or single, male or female, with an annual rate of salary of $900 or more, who is not a sessional employee and has not been locally engaged outside Canada, will commence to build up his superannuation credits after no more than a year of substantially continuous employment. Prevailing rate and seasonal employees will, as in the past, become contributors to the superannuation account when they are designated for that purpose by the governor in council or when, in the case of the former, their status is changed from prevailing rate to classified. Perhaps I should point out here that, as the name implies, the Public Service Superannuation Act has a considerably broader coverage than just the employees who are subject to the Civil Service Act. This was the case under the Civil Service Superannuation Act as well so there is no change in policy in this respect.

Before going any farther I should make it clear that, while it may be some months before the administrative machinery can be adjusted to handle the great influx of the present temporary employees as contributors, any contributor to the superannuation account who retires after December 31, 1952, or the dependents of any contributor who dies after that date, will be able to enjoy any improvement in the benefits which the new act would bring. There is no need therefore for any of these persons to worry about a slight delay in bringing this act into effect. Any additional payments to which they may be entitled will then become payable retroactively. On the other hand, no change is proposed in the allowances where the retirement or death occurred prior to January 1, 1953.

The general pattern of benefits under the new act will give all contributors rights to annuity benefits after five years of pensionable service. If a contributor ceases to be employed during those first five years, the only benefit available will be a return of contributions.

If retirement takes place after five or more years of pensionable service and the contributor is over the age of sixty, an immediate annuity only will be available. If a person leaves the service before sixty because of disability or otherwise, he will have the option of some form of lump sum payment or an annuity commencing immediately, if disabled, or at the age of sixty under other circumstances. If the treasury board agrees, the deferred annuity may be paid as early as the age of fifty but reduced on an actuarially equivalent basis.

In the event of dismissal due to misconduct the treasury board will be empowered to look into the circumstances and may give entitlement to the whole or any part of any benefit to which the person would otherwise have been entitled, subject to a minimum benefit of the return of contributions. Under the existing act the most that a dismissed person can get is the return of his own contributions which in some cases can prove to be a very severe financial penalty in relation to the offence which brought about his dismissal.

In the case of the death of a contributor before his own retirement, the widow or children will receive an immediate annuity, if he has had more than five years of service, or a return of his contributions if he had less than five years of service. Where death takes places after retirement and no lump sum benefit has been paid to the contributor, then the widow and children will receive an immediate annuity. If there is no widow or child the contributions, less any benefit already received, are payable to the estate of the deceased.

Under the Civil Service Superannuation Act, the normal annuity of a retired contributor was based upon his average salary in his last ten years of service. As I indicated earlier, under the new bill it will be based upon his average salary over his best ten consecutive years. This will be of assistance to those who, for one reason or another, may be in less well paid positions during the last years of employment.

The allowance payable to a widow and children of a deceased contributor will continue to give the widow one-half of the husband's annuity in the normal case and one-tenth for each child; but, under the present act, no matter how many children there are, the combined widow's and children's benefits are limited to 75 per cent of the husband's allowance. This bill provides for an increase in this limit from 75 per cent to 90 per cent of the husband's annuity in the normal case. This increase will be of most assistance through the insurance protection provided for the man who may die in his younger years leaving a widow and three or four young children. Similarly, the upper limit of orphans' allowances has been raised from 50 per cent to 80 per cent of the deceased father's annuity. Moreover, the $600 annual limit on each orphan's allowance has been removed as well as the $300 limit in the case of each child where the mother is still living.

At this stage I should mention the one type of benefit which is being dropped in the proposed act. Up to now an immediate allowance payable for life has been available on the abolition of office of a contributor. The existence of this form of benefit has been one of the main reasons for excluding temporary employees from the annuity benefits of the present act, because of the financial loss which would result from the granting of abolition of office allowances should large numbers of these employees be released. From the financial point of view, therefore, the only sound thing to do on making annuity benefits available to the present temporary employees is to eliminate that form of benefit. This move is also in line with other steps which have been taken to increase mobility not only within the public service, but also into and out of it, and to dispel the impression that employment with the government carries with it a right to permanency.

While there are a number of other minor changes in the benefit pattern, I shall leave the explanation of them to the discussion in the committee.

Turning now to the question of contributions, the only change in the bill in this respect is the requirement that all male contributors pay 6 per cent of their salaries until they have the usual thirty-five years of pensionable service to their credit. Female contributors will continue to pay on a 5 per cent basis. Hitherto male employees have contributed on the basis of 5, 5½ and 6 per cent of their salaries depending on either their salary levels or the year in which they commenced to contribute to the superannuation account. This will mean that some of the older employees will now have to pay 6 per cent for a few years instead of the former 5 per cent, regardless of salary, but these persons are eligible to receive all the additional benefits which have been introduced since they became contributors to the superannuation account prior to August 11, 1939. They have, in effect, been enjoying a 1 per cent salary advantage over others who may have started to contribute at a later date but have been doing the same work at the same nominal salary. It is only fair therefore that everyone should contribute on the same basis.

A person who is already contributing for a certain period of prior service under the Civil Service Superannuation Act will be able to continue to pay for that period on the same basis as he has been.

A number of changes in the nature of this prior pensionable service for which a person may elect to contribute have also been included in this bill. The most important of these relates to war service. Under the present act a contributor could elect to pay for war service only if he had overseas service to his credit. Thus great numbers of civil servants have been debarred from counting this form of prior service through no fault of their own. The government has received numerous representations to remove this restriction and considers that they are reasonable. It is proposed therefore, under the new act, to make no distinction between active service in the forces whether in Canada or overseas. A further minor change in respect of the period of war service that may be counted arises out of the extension of the termination of world war I from November 11, 1918, to December 31, 1920, the date of national demobilization.

For one reason or another large numbers of civil servants fail to elect to pay for prior service within the one year limit of the present act but come along wanting to elect in later years. In many cases the reason for the earlier failure to elect is that the civil servant may not have intended to remain with the government or did not fully realize the advantages of having this service to his credit. Then, gradually, with a number of increases in salary or the acquisition of a family he realizes what he has missed. Most persons would want to elect at a later date because it would be greatly to their advantage, but that would lay the superannuation account open to actuarial selection against it. On the other hand, many may have missed their chances to elect through some minor fault or neglect.

To overcome this, but also to guard against selection and at the same time to establish an increasing penalty the longer a person defers his election, this bill provides that an election for prior pensionable service can be made at any time, but, if it is not made in the first year, it can be made only if the person satisfies the medical examiners and contributes on the basis of his salary at the time of making the election rather than on the almost certainly lower salary at the time when he was first employed.

A medical examination will also be required during his first year as a contributor if a person wishes to contribute for service under an approved pension plan with another employer. Failure to satisfy the medical examiner in that case means only that he acquires no annuity rights until he has served another five years.

As I mentioned earlier, this bill contains several features designed to encourage the mobility of labour, particularly through the transferability of pension rights when an employee enters or leaves the public service. Provision is made in this new bill for the entry into agreements with crown corporations, provincial and municipal governments, the Bank of Canada, the government of a foreign country and international organizations designated by the governor in council. Under these agreements it is envisaged that an employee who transfers from one of these bodies to the public service or vice versa will carry with him all service to his credit under his former pension plan and that both his own and the employer's contributions will also be transferred.

The retirement fund will be continued under the proposed act on a very much reduced scale. Prevailing rate and seasonal employees will contribute to this fund until such time as they are designated as contributors to the superannuation account. With reference to the prevailing rate employees, I might say that we are exploring an equitable way of providing more of them with annuity benefits rather than a mere return of contributions with interest from the retirement fund.

The only other new feature on which I might perhaps comment now is one that will make it possible for a widow, for example, who is entitled to an allowance under the new act to pay out of the superannuation account all or a part of any succession duties attributable to her allowance. This would be done only at her request and would result in her own annuity being reduced on an actuarial basis.

I think that I should say a few words about one aspect of the retirement picture which has not been carried forward in this bill. Under the present act retirement is compulsory if an allowance is offered to a contributor, and no contributor may be retained in the civil service beyond 65 years of age, except where the governor in council, for reasons of exceptional efficiency and fitness, grants annual extensions up to the age of 70.

The proposed act does not specify an obligatory retirement age but continues the provision in the present act whereby, after August 1, 1957, superannuation benefits are frozen for those already over 65 and will be frozen for others on becoming 65. Because of ever-changing conditions the government feels that there would be some advantage in not being too rigid about this matter in an act which is primarily designed to cover the situation when employment ceases. The policy to be followed in lieu of that provided under the present Civil Service Superannuation Act is being worked out and will be made known in due course.

In conclusion, may I emphasize to hon. members the ultimate purpose behind this legislation. Our pension plan with its various benefits is an integral and essential part of the pay that is provided for civil servants. It is taken into account in establishing salary rates and other conditions of employment. It is, I think, wholly fitting that part of the remuneration of persons in the public service should take this form, because the security that a pension plan provides helps to ensure that independence and stability which is so important in the public service. To many of those in it, the public service cannot offer financial rewards on the scale that they could secure in commercial, industrial or professional life; rather it offers that interest and satisfaction which arise from the nature of the work and the purposes to which it is directed. If we are to expect such employees to remain in and to enjoy their work in the public service we must, I think, provide them with reasonable security for their old age or disability so that they can, to a reasonable degree, discount the urge to seek more immediate financial gains.

As I said the other evening, Mr. Speaker, after the motion for second reading has been adopted I propose to move that this bill be referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce for detailed consideration.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I think there will be general agreement by all the members of the house with the statements made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) in closing his remarks when he said that it is essential that we give to the civil servants that feeling of security and certainty of employment which in itself contributes greatly to the efficiency of their work by the state of mind that this feeling in itself produces.

I feel sure also that there will be general agreement with the step that is being taken to extend to those who have been working for the people of Canada, under the employment of the government which represents them, those provisions for superannuation which have been denied to so many employees because of their designation as temporary employees. It is true that the term "temporary employee" will disappear under the provisions of this act so far as superannuation is concerned; but it is my understanding that this term still remains as a designation of those employees who are under that category so far as other aspects of their employment and occupation are concerned. I have heard no suggestion to the contrary.

Mr. Abbott: What we have referred to as casual employees; yes.

Mr. Drew: Yes. This indicates a need for going still further than this bill goes. I think this is an appropriate time to mention this fact because the approach that is made to the bill itself, when it is in committee, will of necessity be governed in some measure by the over-all situation to which this act applies.

There are certain detailed problems which have been referred to already in earlier discussion when the motion preceding the introduction of this bill was before us and these undoubtedly can be dealt with in still further detail when the bill is before the committee, as it has been stated it will be. There are, however, one or two points that I should like to mention.

The unfortunate situation in which those in some special categories of employment still find themselves has not been dealt with by the minister in his statement today. I think that one of the gratifying features of the earlier discussion on the motion was the fact that the comments which were made were divorced from any special point of view because of a member sitting in one part of this house or in another. That is as it should be. The civil servants, whatever their designation may be, are servants of the people of Canada. They are servants who continue to serve the people of Canada whatever government may be in power or whatever the party may be from which that government is drawn.

I am convinced that there is general agreement in regard to the principles which should apply to the employment of civil servants and to the desire to create in the minds of civil servants that sense of security which they should feel in work which is of the utmost importance but at the same time does not receive the remuneration which would be given for the same type of work in private occupation.

I must say that some of the views put forward in regard to those who were employed in the Department of Veterans Affairs were of concern to every one of us. Through special circumstances relating to the history of the department, those who had been employed for some time in that department now find themselves at a disadvantage which was pointed out when this subject was under discussion. There is no indication that this situation is to be covered by anything now before us. Nevertheless, I would hope that when this measure is before the committee there will be an opportunity to make recommendations in regard to amendments to apply to that relatively small, but still substantial, number of employees of the Department of Veterans Affairs whose position has been prejudiced by events entirely beyond their control. I trust that this will be dealt with, and dealt with along the lines suggested in the discussion which has already taken place.

Consideration should also be given to the fact that the calculating of superannuation for appointees is on the basis of the last ten years of service. I do think there are reasons why this in itself does produce inequalities which have been pointed out, and which I am sure will be pointed out to the committee. Very strong arguments have been put forward that the basis of calculation should be the last five years. That view has been expressed by representatives of the civil servants themselves and by representatives of the veterans' organizations, and I hope it will be given due consideration when this committee is considering possible amendments to the proposed measure now before us. That and other related subjects, however, can be dealt with at that time.

The very fact that we are now expressing our general approval of a plan to bring under the provisions of the superannuation act those who have been described as temporary employees for so long emphasizes in itself the necessity for a general review of the situation, and the inclusion of all those employees affected by this act and similarly beneficial provisions under any legislation which would end any distinction of that kind.

An effort should be made to equalize, not only from the point of view of supervision, but from the point of view of status, security of employment and other provisions of that kind, all those who have worked for long years, and have long ago demonstrated by the length of their employment the fact that they were not temporary employees. To the extent that this measure brings to an end or, shall we say, reverses the tendency to increase the proportion of temporary employees in relation to permanent employees, it should be welcomed by everyone in this house as well as by those employed in that way.

In explaining the general provisions of the measure now placed before us for consideration, the Minister of Finance has spoken of the so-called permanent employees and the so-called temporary employees. That was a very apt term. The employees are only so-called temporary when they work as temporary employees for ten, twenty, thirty and forty years, as some of them have. There is however this fact which we must recognize. There has been a steady increase in the relationship of the number of temporary employees to permanent employees. In 1939 the temporary employees were a much smaller percentage of the total than they are today. In 1939 the number of temporary employees was 43 per cent of the number of permanent employees. Today the number of temporary employees is 126 per cent of the number of permanent employees. In fact the figures, as of December, 1952, which would presumably represent the general situation fairly accurately today, show that there were 56,936 permanent employees and 72,200 temporary employees.

The measure now before us provides for putting temporary employees who have at least one year's service on the same basis for pension purposes as permanent employees; but so far as I am able to interpret the statement made to us, or the bill now before us, it does nothing about those special problems relating to employment which are substantially affected by the difference in designation. It has a provision with respect to veterans, but it will still remain for the committee to make sure that those provisions are effective and deal adequately with the special problems of veterans in relation to civil service employment.

Without doing more than seeking to emphasize the considerations which should be before the committee which will have wide-open discretion to review the sections and consider proposed amendments, I would point out that when we start to discuss the question whether the basis of computation should be eight years, ten years or even five years, as recommended by the representatives of the civil servants and veterans' organizations, we realize how unreal the word "temporary" is in relation to a great deal of this employment.

This measure automatically brings some 60,000 of the temporary employees within the provisions of this act because of its coverage of those who have at least one year's employment. But there still is a very large number of temporary employees who are outside the provisions of this act. The figures which are before us show that to be the case, since the figures of the department show that there were 72,200 temporary employees as of December last.

This indicates that there are still over 12,000 temporary employees not affected by this measure. It is true that, as their employment might continue and they might meet the condition of a year's employment, they would find themselves under the provisions of this measure.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member permit a question at this point? I am wondering if he has taken into consideration in his argument at the moment the distinction between casual and temporary employees as it is now in common usage in the service?

Mr. Drew: Oh, yes.

[Mr. Drew.]

Mr. McIlraith: Because I am inclined to think that the difference to which he is referring is made up largely of the casual employees. There are really three designations for classes of employees now being used.

Mr. Drew: No, this does not include casual employees. At the time there were 72,200 temporary employees, there were, according to the figures issued by the department, 11,758 casuals.

Mr. Abbott: We should not have any confusion in the matter of terminology. As soon as it is recognized that anyone is suitable for the public service, he or she will come under the act. That is the principle of the bill.

Mr. Drew: I was not attempting to confuse the issue. I was simply explaining that the figure of 72,200 does not include the casuals. It embraces the number rated as temporary; and therefore there are still some 12,000 designated as temporary employees who are not embraced by this act. The minister has not left any doubt about the situation. He has indicated that as they reach that qualification of a year's employment—

Mr. Abbott: Or even before.

Mr. Drew: Yes, or even before—they then find themselves eligible for benefits. I am not raising this by way of criticism; I am simply pointing out that it still leaves a number of temporary employees, who may or may not be temporary employees in any way, depending upon the types of occupations for which they have been engaged.

Mr. Abbott: If they stay in the public service they will come under it.

Mr. Drew: What I am emphasizing is that in dealing with this problem, which is a very real one, in a way which I am sure meets with general approval in the house, I urge that we recognize what this demonstrates. It demonstrates how unsatisfactory it is that there should be civil servants who have had many years of occupation but who are described as temporary. This still does not remove that difficulty, so far as other terms of employment are concerned.

Mr. Abbott: It removes that, completely.

Mr. Drew: It removes that difficulty and injustice so far as superannuation is concerned. This is in fact a step to render justice to those who have been designated improperly as temporary employees of the government of Canada. And when I use the word "improperly" I am not attributing any improper motive. But it is a practice that has grown up; and by the figures I have shown it has had the habit of extending itself.

I suggest that in dealing with this matter we should recognize that fact, and that we should adopt the attitude that this is the recognition of a principle which should be extended still further to the civil service of this country, and that we should end the unreality of the term "temporary" in relation to those who have had steady employment for some period of time.

I do not intend to deal with the sections one by one, because they will be discussed by the committee. Many of them carry out rather involved provisions in regard to the method of computation. There is one section however to which I should like to refer, one which I believe is very satisfactory, and that is section 28. This section provides for reciprocal agreements in respect of the transfer of employees. I believe that is a very satisfactory arrangement, and one which should be encouraged. It should be applied wherever possible in connection with the transfer of civil servants from one government to another. More and more there is an increasing field of joint activity between the dominion and the provincial governments. I am sure for that very reason it will be extremely advantageous to the public service of Canada generally if civil servants of the dominion and of the provincial governments may be transferred from one service to the other, without disrupting their continuity of employment, or their continuity of contribution to superannuation. In fact, the more that there may be an even standard of civil service employment across Canada, the better it will be for the public service generally.

I am not suggesting for one moment that anything done by this government should encroach in any way upon the authority of provincial governments or legislatures. But the very fact that such agreements can be worked out will widen the opportunity for the exchange of civil servants in those branches of employment where it may be that a civil servant of the dominion government may perform a more useful service at some point in the administration of a provincial government or vice versa.

I support the general principle of the bill. And in discussing the points I have made I would ask not only that they be given consideration in committee, but that also we acknowledge this step as a recognition of a general principle which should apply to the whole service; and that the name "temporary" should cease to be used in respect of people who long since ceased to be temporary employees, as shown by their years of service.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we too welcome the introduction of this bill and, despite some shortcomings to which I shall refer in a few moments, let me say at the outset that speaking generally we regard this bill and its provisions as satisfactory.

As I said at the resolution stage, we are glad that the bill has been drafted in such a way as to widen greatly the extent of coverage provided by the act. We are glad that the name of the statute has been changed, to indicate that it does go beyond what are sometimes referred to as civil servants, and includes provisions for more than those—indeed, for those employed in the public service generally.

We are pleased with the way the minister puts it, when he says that pensions under this legislation will now be a matter of right rather than of grace. In point of fact, there may not be a great deal of difference in the actual awarding of individual pensions. But certainly the terminology and the idea behind that approach is all to the good.

We feel that the introduction of the legislation at this time is an indication of the growth of the idea that all those who render service to their day and age are entitled to the reward of a dignified and decent retirement allowance, when their years of service are over.

I have no intention of going beyond the bounds of the legislation before us; but I do think it is permissible for me to say that we welcome the legislation, not only because of the rights that it extends to public servants, but we welcome it as a part of a growing body of legislation that provides security for all our older people. We hope that that body of legislation will continue to grow, until we have adequate security for all. We will continue our efforts in that connection.

I said the other day, and I repeat now, that while we are glad to see the so-called temporary employees being brought under the act to the tune of including some 60,000, we feel that there are groups of prevailing-rate employees who have not yet been given the benefit of this legislation, and who should be included. I realize of course that further legislation to extend the benefits of this act to other prevailing-rate employees is not necessary. All that is necessary to take in further prevailing-rate employees is for the governor in council to designate such other groups as coming under the provisions of this legislation. I hope that it will not be long before some of these groups of prevailing-rate employees, and other groups such as employees of this House of Commons, who are now left out will be brought in and designated as coming under the provisions of the act by means of a regulation passed by the governor in council. As a matter of fact we all felt when we spoke on this matter the other day that the distinction between prevailing-rate employees and temporary employees is really just one of the basis on which their pay is arrived at, and it is hardly fair to deny pension rights on that basis.

There has been some discussion already by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) and by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) with respect to the question of the period of service on which a retiring public servant's annuity is to be based. If I understood the minister correctly, and if I read the bill correctly, a change has been made, in that from now on the basis will be not the last ten years but the best ten years so far as the employee is concerned.

Mr. Abbott: That is it.

Mr. Knowles: I think perhaps the Leader of the Opposition missed the slight change that is being made on that point.

Mr. Abbott: As my hon. friend knows, sometimes an older man may want to take a somewhat lower paid position. He may have had five or ten years of more highly paid service, and this provision will enable him to base his superannuation on his best ten years.

Mr. Drew: For the purpose of keeping the record clear, I was not unaware of the distinction drawn. I was recognizing that in the ordinary course of events the best years are the last years.

Mr. Abbott: As a rule that is quite right because of the rising pay level.

Mr. Knowles: That is certainly correct. I am glad that the Leader of the Opposition has made that clear.

Mr. Abbott: It was to take care of the exceptional case where a man's best years would not be his last years.

Mr. Knowles: Now we all know what we are talking about and we are all talking about the same thing. We now know that the government has improved the legislation slightly in that it has changed the provision from the last ten years to the best ten years. But we also know that the government has rejected the proposal of the advisory committee that it should be the best eight years. I am sorry that the government did not find it possible to accept that recommendation. I note, for example, that in the new pension plan of the Canadian National Railways the provision there is that the pension is based on the last ten or the last five years of the employee's service, whichever is to the benefit and advantage of the employee. After all, the Canadian National Railways is owned by the government of Canada and there is a case where, true by option but certainly at the option of the employee, a five-year period may be taken as the standard for determining the pension. Because a five-year period is considered in that case, I am sorry that the government has stuck to the ten-year period in this case. It seems to me that the recommendation made by the advisory committee for a period in between ten and five, namely, a period of eight years, was a very responsible one, and I hope that even yet that figure will be given consideration when the bill goes before the committee.

There are still other provisions that the minister has announced today which we think are all to the good. We feel that the provisions he has announced with respect to lump sum payments and the provisions for widows and children, where changes have been made, are all to the good, and I am sure that all who are interested in this measure will welcome them. I think it was also very fitting and timely that the minister should announce today that the pertinent provisions of this measure will be retroactive to December 31, 1952. He made the particular point that any employees who have retired since the first of this year will not lose the benefits which they otherwise would have gained if they had continued in the service up until the time the act is passed, given royal assent and put into force.

As I say, that is a welcome announcement for any who have retired since the first of January but it is tough news for any who retired in November or December of last year. I see that the minister is smiling. I know he will say that it is always the role of the opposition, even when something is good, to suggest that it might have been just a little better. Therefore we are not out of character in that respect, but in suggesting and asking as I do that the retroactive date be put back to an earlier point of time I have good reason for making that request. The minister knows that when the speech from the throne was read in February of 1952 opening the session before this one, it was announced that there would be amendments to the Civil Service Superannuation Act, and we expected that the bill that we now have before us would be introduced during the 1952 session of parliament.

As that session went on and it became apparent that the bill might not be brought in, there were some civil servants who were fearful lest the government's delay in bringing the bill before parliament might cost them the rights they would have under the legislation. Accordingly, Mr. Speaker, on June 23, 1952, I put this question to the Minister of Finance on the orders of the day, as recorded at page 3547 of Hansard for that date:

> May I direct a question to the Minister of Finance? Would it be possible for the minister, before this session ends, to make a statement as to whether or not the amendments to the Civil Service Superannuation Act, which have been put off until the next session, will include a provision making the terms of those amendments retroactive to whatever date would have been the effective date had the bill been brought in at this session, as was indicated in the speech from the throne?

The minister replied as follows:

> It would not be possible to do that, Mr. Speaker.

Then the next line of Hansard contains that little word that sometimes appears in Hansard in italics, the word "later" in brackets, which means that not right at the moment but a little later in the day, in fact I believe before questions on the orders of the day were concluded, the Minister of Finance thought better of the answer he had given me and stood up and said:

> Perhaps I should supplement the answer I gave the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. It is possible that some of the changed provisions of the Civil Service Superannuation Act could be made retroactive, but I think it is unlikely that all of them could be.

As a matter of fact, though neither of us said it in that exchange, I am sure that both of us were thinking of this very problem, the problem of those who would retire before the benefits of the new legislation would become effective. In view of the fact that the government announced in the speech from the throne in February, 1952, that the amendments would be made at the 1952 session, and in view of the undertaking which the minister gave the house in reply to my question on June 23, 1952, I think that the question of the retroactive date should be reconsidered. If the bill had been brought in and passed in the 1952 session I do not know what its effective date would have been, but I am sure it would not have been December 31, 1952. It probably would have been December 31, 1951. At any rate, all the employees of the government who retired between the date that the announcement was made in the speech from the throne in February, 1952, and December 31, 1952, lost out. They get none of the benefits or improvements that are made available to those still in the service or to those whose retirement did not take place until after January 1, 1953.

I press that point on the minister as strongly as I can. I know that it will come up in the committee on banking and commerce to which this bill is to be referred, and it seems to me this is a case where those who will want that retroactive date put back from the point of view of time have everything on their side—that is everything except the minister and I hope they will get him on their side very soon.

I was very glad, Mr. Speaker, to note that the bill makes provision for war service to be counted in terms of pension rights whether that service was in Canada or overseas. As the minister will recall I raised, when we were at the resolution stage, the question of an apparent discrimination against ex-Wrens. It seemed to involve this very matter and I looked into the bill hoping to find something that would cover their point. I take it that the bill covers that problem. The Wrens felt that they did not have equal rights with ex-women members of the army and air force, and the point had relation to a distinction as to overseas service. If the minister has abolished the distinction between overseas service and service in Canada, that will be taken care of.

Mr. Abbott: Yes. The complaint came from a wider field than the Wrens, and quite rightly. There were others who, through no fault of their own, did not serve overseas.

Mr. Knowles: Am I right in saying that the problem has been taken care of?

Mr. Abbott: That is right.

Mr. McIlraith: All members of the armed forces.

Mr. Abbott: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: We are all pleased that it has been fixed. I wish that we could always get this help from the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. McIlraith), the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lesage) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) himself. Now they are agreeing to help me—

Mr. McIlraith: It is not a matter of their helping you, it is a matter of your helping them.

Mr. Knowles: Fine, and that is why I am prepared to help the hon. members to whom I have referred to get that retroactive date put back to an earlier date on the basis of what I feel were undertakings given in the session of 1952—and I am waiting for their agreement. I hope that their silence will not last.

Mr. Speaker, we also welcome the way in which the act is being changed so as to provide for greater mobility of employment as between various agencies of the government and the civil service proper; also as between the federal civil service and provincial civil service; and also as between service with the federal government and service with the international agencies and other such bodies. As the Leader of the Opposition said a few minutes ago, this is certainly all to the good and we welcome it. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, I hope that it will not take too long until we establish this principle on an even wider basis than just as between different types of government service. One of the characteristics of our society today, as we build up these pension plans, is that in many cases workers are frozen in a type of employment for fear of losing their pension rights or for fear of taking lesser pension rights than would otherwise be the case. It seems to me that there is definitely room for increasing mobility of employment by arranging for greater transferability between all pension rights—not only between different types of government service but between service with different private employers, and between private and public service. That is an ambitious program to take care of, but one way in which it can be facilitated is for the government, through the same minister we have before us now, to provide the proper kind of income tax deductibility for those pension plans in private industry which are funded in such a way as to provide mobility, or in other words to make it possible for employees to leave one employment for another employment, and yet take with them their pension rights.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, what I am saying is that if this principle is desirable in terms of public service we feel that it is desirable generally. I feel, to the extent that society recognizes the right to dignified retirement in old age, the right to security in old age on the basis of service rendered, and makes sure that it is a reasonable amount, to that extent society is making progress.

I am also glad that the minister has announced the provision which seems to have the effect of re-opening to those who have lost it the right to elect to cover past service. He has put certain strings upon that right which I think are a bit severe and I hope that they will be considered in committee—but at any rate it is a move in the right direction. I take it from what the minister says that not only will it be possible from here on for persons to elect to cover past service, even after a year has elapsed, under the conditions that are spelled out in the act, but it will also be possible for persons who have already exceeded the year in respect of the past now to have a chance to elect to cover that service. I see the minister nodding—

Mr. Abbott: I think that's right—on the basis I have outlined.

Mr. Knowles: On the basis which the minister has indicated.

Mr. Fraser: It is only fair.

Mr. Knowles: I hear the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) say that it is only fair. Yes, it is only fair that they should have the right to reconsider. As the minister said when he was discussing this matter, conditions have changed in many cases. Civil servants who did not elect in the year given to them have now realized that they should have so elected. Conditions have changed to make it more necessary or conditions have changed to make it more possible for them to elect to cover past service. I think that there is no question but that the re-opening of that right to elect is all to the good.

Mr. Abbott: There are certain conditions.

Mr. Knowles: The minister interrupts to remind me of what I was aware, namely that there are certain conditions attached to that election after a year has elapsed. We have no objection to the idea of the medical examination and no objection to there being a penalty; but when the minister says that contributions in such cases for prior service must be on the basis of one's present rate of pay, it seems that he is imposing a pretty heavy penalty. A person who is now seeking to elect to cover service we will say in years prior to the war, who was in the service then and is in the service now, will find himself confronted with a pretty heavy bill. In fact, it amounts to paying 12 per cent on his current income if that basis is to obtain. I also raise the question of whether it is fair to say that not only must he pay for back service on the basis of today's pay, but that he must also pay on the basis of today's rate, which is 6 per cent, even though the rate might have been lower during the former period. Again, that is a detail that can be threshed out in committee. As I say, I think the idea of re-opening the right to elect is all to the good and I am sure that was what the hon. member for Peterborough West meant when he agreed with me. He was not agreeing to restrict the formula.

Mr. Fraser: I was agreeing with you.

Mr. Knowles: I hope this can be gone into more fully by the committee.

There are one or two things which the minister seems to have forgotten. Well, he has not forgotten them, but he has overlooked them and I regret to say that I feel that it has been deliberate on his part with respect to this bill. He heard the discussion the other day, when we were at the resolution stage, with respect to the employees in the old soldiers' civil re-establishment department who have not yet been given the right to transfer to part II of the Civil Service Superannuation Act. The minister will recall the discussion because just about every member who took part in the debate urged that a change be made. In response to that urging he made a rather lengthy statement which, of course, left the door open for further consideration; but it indicated that the minister did not feel that this change should be made at this time. Frankly, as I listened to his argument and tried to analyse it, it seemed to me that it was this in the main. To make this change in favour of these employees who are still in the service would be, so he said, to give them a right which many who have long since passed out of the service or passed on did not get. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, it is not a very good argument to say that because some others did not get something that was their right, those who are left behind should not have that right either. He might argue that it was not a right, but common sense does seem to suggest that those employees should have been given this right long ago. The mere fact that those who are not now in the service or those who have since died did not get it is, I suggest, no reason why it should not be extended to the few hundred who are still here and who have been discriminated against in this way. I have no doubt that if the committee will hear delegations on various points, there will be a delegation with respect to this matter. I trust that the committee will give it very earnest and sympathetic consideration.

I think we all approve of the suggestion made by the minister this morning with regard to the elimination of the obligation that public servants generally should retire at 65. Generally speaking, I think there is merit in his suggestion that pension rights, from that point on, would be frozen. I wonder, however, about the case—there will be some like it, I imagine—of a person who, at the age of 65, has not yet obtained many years of pensionable service? Will such persons be denied the right, if they are kept on in employment, to build up their years of service for pension purposes? The act places a limit of 35 years on pensionable service, and that seems to be a reasonable proposition. In other words, the top possible pension is 35/50ths of one's average salary for his best ten years or 70 per cent of that average salary. Since you already have that ceiling, why impose another ceiling on people who may have come into the public service late in life? There may be angles to that which can be gone into, but I hope it will be considered.

I have just one other observation to make, Mr. Speaker, with respect to this bill. I think after all the fine things I have said about it the minister will not be surprised if my next comment is one of very severe condemnation. My guess is that he knows what is coming. I condemn the government very strongly for failing to include in this bill a provision for an increase in the pension of those already retired, particularly those in the lower brackets. The minister knows from repeated comments on this matter on the floor of the house, and repeated representations from those affected, how serious is the plight of those people. The figures are on Hansard. I have seen to it that they have been put on every year for a long time, but in this session they are shown at page 510 of Hansard for December 10, 1952. I shall not read them in detail, but I shall indicate that these figures show that out of 10,572 retired civil servants, 1,468 are on a pension of less than $60 a month. In fact, 312 are on a pension of less than $20 per month. The figures for widows of civil servants, who number 5,123, show that more than half, 2,766, are on a pension of less than $40 a month, and 942 are on a pension of less than $20 per month.

Mr. Abbott: But some of those are people with very short service. Perhaps they acquired a pension somewhere else before they went into the public service.

Mr. Knowles: There is always an explanation from the minister, either short service or they were employed in the days when Bennett was reducing salaries, but the point is that these pensions are too small to enable people to live on them. The minister tries to tell us every time this matter comes up that you cannot indulge in retroactive legislation of this kind. However, at least two provinces, Newfoundland and Saskatchewan, have made some legislative provision for people who have retired on small pensions. The minister knows that on two or three occasions when the United Kingdom had legislation like this, they provided for an increase in the pensions of those already retired. Similarly, in the United States in 1948, an act of congress was passed which increased the pension of retired employees by 25 per cent or by $300 per year, whichever was the lesser figure.

Then, in 1952 a further increase was granted by another act of congress. The result of these two pieces of legislation works out, for example, that a superannuitant who was receiving $1,000 per year was increased in 1948 to $1,250, and in 1952 to $1,565.50. This example, of course, is in a little higher bracket than is the case of the figures for Canada I gave a few minutes ago, but the principle involving a percentage increase is there, and that would be of at least some assistance to those in the lower brackets. For their sakes, however, I believe a better formula is possible. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the continued reluctance on the part of the government to deal with this matter is most reprehensible, and it is a source of bitter disappointment that when an otherwise good job—I say that without qualification despite the few points upon which I have criticized the bill—is being done, these people are left out in the cold.

On January 12 of this year, I asked one of my frequently recurring questions on this point, and it appears at page 891 of Hansard for that date, in the following form:

> Has the government given consideration to the provision of a cost-of-living bonus or other increase in the pensions of federal civil servants already retired? If so, what is the result of such consideration?

The reply is as follows:

> Mr. Lesage: The government's policy in connection with the granting of a cost-of-living bonus to superannuated civil servants has been stated many times in the House of Commons and in answers to questions. A complete statement was given by the Minister of Finance on January 28, 1949 (see Hansard for that date, page 42).

I have looked back at that answer a good many times, of course, and all it says is no. What I think is most annoying to the people who are affected is that, for a few years, there seemed to be a growing willingness to consider the matter. Since that statement appeared on Hansard for January 28, 1949—it had been issued publicly a few days before—there has been no apparent reconsideration of this whole problem. This is the case despite the fact that I have before me letters from officials of organizations of retired civil servants in various parts of the country who get a certain amount of encouragement out of letters they receive from the minister, from other ministers and from members on the government side of the house, telling them that the matter will be considered.

As a matter of fact, on January 28 of this year the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) apparently wrote to Mr. J. O. Belanger, the provincial secretary of this organization in Quebec city, assuring him that his representations would be considered when the superannuation act was under review. Well, it has certainly been under review because we have Bill No. 334 before us, a bill of some 43 pages. It seems to cover, satisfactorily or otherwise, all the points one might think of except the plight of these retired civil servants. Mr. Belanger tells me also that 12 other ministers have given his association the assurance that they will honour them with their best consideration on this matter. He tells me that 22 other members of parliament from Quebec have given an assurance in writing that they will give consideration to the matter. These people who write these letters are very cautious. They do not promise that something will be done, but they promise that consideration will be given.

Mr. Abbott: The hon. member has probably written letters of that kind.

Mr. Knowles: The difference between the kind of consideration I give and the kind of consideration the minister might give is—

Mr. Abbott: The hon. member has no responsibility.

Mr. Knowles: —that having promised to fight through on a matter like this, I recognize my responsibility to keep up that fight; and the minister knows I am doing it.

Mr. Abbott: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: I suggest that the minister, his colleagues in the cabinet and all the members of parliament from the province of Quebec who promised this particular organization that they would give this matter consideration, have a greater obligation than just to sign their names to these letters and let it go at that. I feel strongly that this matter should be gone into by this committee. I hope the government will not give the committee the notion that the door is closed.

I picked up the correspondence that I have from the gentleman to whom I have referred in the city of Quebec because it comes from the same province as does the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott); but I have correspondence as well from my own province of Manitoba and I have a good deal from the province of British Columbia. In both of those provinces the people affected have been discouraged by the long delay but nevertheless they get some encouragement from these letters they get from all sides of the house promising that their plight will be given consideration. In the meantime some of these people have been on these low pensions for years. Time has gone on. The cost of living has gone up. Their plight has become worse. I suggest that the absence of any reference to this problem is a black mark on an otherwise good piece of legislation which the minister has brought before us at this time.

To come back to what I said at the beginning, we welcome this legislation. We welcome it because of what it does for civil servants in the light of what are their rights and we welcome it as part of the general attack on the problem of providing security in retiring years for those who have served their day and age. We are glad to see the improvements. There are changes in the act which perhaps should be made by the committee, but its main shortcoming is that it overlooks completely the problem of the retired civil servants, particularly those in the lower pension brackets whose plight I have drawn to the attention of the house once again.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take just a few moments to say what I think about the bill that is now before the house. My first words should be ones of commendation of the minister for bringing in this new bill to replace the old superannuation act and for the comprehensive changes for the good that have been incorporated into the bill.

When one is considering an act of this kind, it seems to me that it has to be considered against a certain well-defined background. In this case I think we ought to keep in mind that the background is this. As the minister has stated, the people of Canada are the ultimate employers of the civil servants, and the taxpayers of Canada therefore must be considered in every move that is made to improve the lot of the retired civil servants. They have a claim to consideration just as well, of course, as have the civil servants. If we are not careful, it is easy for us to weight our consideration on the side of one or the other, and I think that procedure would be unfair.

Another consideration the minister always has to keep in his mind is this. He has a fund to administer and he must keep that fund actuarially sound without having to come back to the House of Commons every now and again and ask for large contributions to make it actuarially sound when it has got out of balance. Against that background, Mr. Speaker, it looks to me as though some of the arguments that have already been advanced might be weighted slightly in favour of the civil servants and against both the minister and the taxpayers of Canada.

I hasten to say that with practically everything that my friend the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has said I can quite agree. For instance, there is the question of retroactivity which is an important consideration. I can well imagine that the minister is up against the necessity of drawing a line somewhere, and if he did not draw it at December 31, 1952, he would have to draw it somewhere else. No matter where he put the line, Mr. Speaker, I am sure that some of us would have a criticism that he did not put it farther back. Somebody is going to find himself aggrieved under any circumstances. There will be at least some who consider that they have been discriminated against. While I am quite prepared to go along with my friend the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in his claim that there might have been a certain undertaking that would justify setting the date at December—

An hon. Member: Last session.

Mr. Low: —or back into the last session, anyway, on the other hand I can understand fairly well what the minister has been up against.

I want to commend the minister. He does not often get too much commendation. I think he has done a good job on this act. He has certainly incorporated into it a good many principles with which I find myself in agreement. I am not going over all of them; I am not going to name them all. However, I want to say just a word or two about some of them.

In the first place I want to mention something that has not been said thus far in the debate. I was glad to see that the new act is not so rigid with respect to compulsory retirement age. I hope that this is a forerunner or an indication of a general loosening up all the way along the line with respect to these rigid retirement dates. As a matter of fact, I think we have carried compulsory retirement too far not only in government but in industry throughout the whole country. I think we have been just a little bit foolish about it, but I am not going into the reasons why I think so. It is, however, a fact that there are in Canada a great many people, who have been retired just because they have reached the age of 65, of whose skill and abilities we ought to have availed ourselves for a good many years yet. There is no reason in the world why we should condemn them to retire before they are ready to retire physically, mentally and perhaps otherwise. There ought to be some election in the matter on the part of the person who is to be retired, if his health makes it possible for him to continue in that kind of active employment.

I therefore just express the hope that what the minister has included in this act is an indication that there will be a loosening up all the way along the line and that a little bit more attention will be paid to the right of the civil servant to elect whether he shall retire when he comes to the age of 65 or whether he shall continue in employment.

I should like to say just a word with respect to the retired civil servants, those for whom my friend the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre made such an eloquent appeal. He has made that appeal on numerous occasions, and I honour him for it. This is a group to whom further consideration must be given. I certainly am not convinced that the minister could give it under this act. In fact, the more I study the case, the more I am convinced that this is not the act under which it should be done. However, that consideration does not excuse the government for not bringing in something that would help those retired civil servants. I am not going to go into the matter at too great length, but, Mr. Speaker, by policies which we have laid down and slavishly followed we have actually condemned to spending the remaining portion of their lifetime in perpetual poverty a great many Canadian people who gave of their best while they are employed as civil servants. I do not believe that is the right thing. I am sure the minister would not want to do that. We simply cannot go on slavishly following policies that will condemn people to poverty.

Many of these people were not able to work after they were retired. Many of them have not been able to find any gainful employment since that time. Remember that the government is responsible in large measure, because of the policies it followed, for the decline in the purchasing value of the dollars that these poor people have been given. Since that responsibility must rest on the government, then I say that the government is obligated to do something for these people. I am not saying in this act, but certainly in some other act they can bring in.

Let me impress upon the government this important point. They must know that this country is capable of producing sufficient goods and services to enable these old, retired civil servants, who are on a miserable pittance, to have a decent living. There is no doubt about that. What we have to do is to set our minds to the task of finding a way of getting these goods into the hands of the people who can use them to bring up their standard of living, so that we can at least hold our heads up and not have to go about hanging them in shame.

I say to the minister, we are prepared to help him find that way. I know as long as he follows the present financial policy it will be virtually impossible for him to find a way to help these retired civil servants whose purchasing power today is only half what it was in 1939. I say it is time we were looking for another act, and we should bring in a piece of legislation that would make it possible for us to get the goods we can produce into the hands of our own citizens who can use them. There is no sense in condemning them to a lifetime of poverty just because we have not yet had sense enough to discover and put into effect at least a decent policy.

But let me say this: I must congratulate the minister on all these fine changes that have already been mentioned—I do not intend to take up the time to go over them again in this house—which are contained in the bill. The introduction of this bill does mark a real step forward in our consideration for Canada's employees. It is certainly far beyond anything we have had in the past, and the minister certainly deserves commendation for it.

When the bill goes before the banking and commerce committee I hope it will be possible for the members of that committee to hear representation from the employees of the old soldiers' civil re-establishment department. Their case is a good one, and I appeal to the minister on this ground. It has already been said that there are only a comparatively few of these old employees. I do not think that anybody at any time in this country would criticize the minister for listening to these people and granting them some relief under this legislation. When that committee meets I for one would certainly be prepared to hear the representation from these people and see if it would not be possible to incorporate into the bill something that would help them out.

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): I should like to make a few remarks on this bill. I regret that time has not permitted a proper study of it, but it is going to a committee quite competent to study its provisions. I have no complaint to make on that except that there is a special section which deals with civil servants of Newfoundland. They have been given no opportunity up to the present time of making any representations. However, I hope they will have time before the bill is dealt with in committee.

Everybody has noticed some outstanding improvements in this bill over the present law. One of course is that it gives to civil servants a pension as a matter of right instead of as a matter of grace. The other is that it makes for 60,000 temporary employees a new status which entitles them to a pension.

I should like to say that the clause which bases the pension on the ten best successive years does not impress me very much. I do not believe this is important to very many civil servants, but I should like to draw attention to the provision, in the English law and the law in Newfoundland before the union in 1949, which gave to civil servants in England the last three years, which in 99 per cent of the cases are the best three years. We had that same provision in the law in Newfoundland.

I should also like to pay tribute to the commission of government in Newfoundland before 1949 on drafting the civil service act and the regulations that were to be made under it. They furnished us with a copy of their draft and the regulations. They gave the civil service association an opportunity to study all the various provisions, and then they sat down with us and we debated the changes which we required.

It seems to me that that ten years is a very long period, and a man's salary may change considerably from the beginning of that period to the end. Therefore it may reduce his pension very considerably. Even though an advisory committee has recommended eight years, I think that is too high. I look at the estimates every year and I see the salaries going up. I can see that there is going to be a very marked difference between the beginning of the ten-year period and the eight, and therefore I condemn it. I do not think it is a just method for calculating the pension.

Before I sit down I should like to say another thing with reference to a remark made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) about when this pension scheme should begin. He pointed out that it was mentioned in the speech from the throne last year and again this year and that January 1 seems to be a very near period to begin the pension system. Since this was mentioned in the speech from the throne in 1952 it seems to me that it would only be fair that it should go back to some time in 1952. I am sure that in the standing committee on banking and commerce that and other matters will receive the consideration they deserve.

I agree with the last speaker that the minister deserves a meed of praise for having brought in these improvements. I suppose we cannot expect all the improvements to take place at one time. I hope they will continue to occur just the same.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, when the minister closes the debate I hope he will make it clear that the standing committee on banking and commerce will be free to make whatever recommendations it sees fit without undue weight being brought to bear on the decisions by the government. We all know that the committees of the house are made up in approximately the same proportion as to members of each party as the house itself, and that the government, by reason of such plan, has a very firm hold on the actions of each committee. I do suggest that this is a case in which the committee should be given freedom to bring in its own decisions without taking into consideration government policy.

One reason I say that is that it would be very valuable if this committee were to remember what happened a year ago. At that time it was considering a bill to provide pensions for members of parliament. And while there are greatly improved pension plans in effect across Canada, I do not believe there is any plan more beneficial than the plan brought in for the members of the house. Here is an opportunity during this session to see that the pension plan of the civil servants of Canada, who after all carry the bulk of the responsibility for the administration of this country, is made equally modern and equally beneficial as the plan brought in for the members themselves.

I would hope that the minister, in addition to giving the committee freedom to express its opinions, would urge upon the chairman of the committee that arrangements be made to hear evidence from those branches of the service which are not satisfied with this measure. First of all, I believe it should be possible to have representations concerning the number of years upon which a pension is to be based. I believe that ten years is too long, in the light of changing conditions in the world today. In the last few years we have seen how the cost of living has gone up, and it is likely that there may be changes in the years ahead.

I believe the period should certainly be cut from ten years to eight years, as recommended by the advisory committee. In any event, representations should be heard on the point, because it is one of the key points in the measure.

Then there has been unanimous support from those in all parts of the house who have spoken on behalf of the claim put forward by those veterans of Canada who happened to be serving under what was formerly called the department of soldiers' civil re-establishment, after the first war. I was disappointed by the answer the minister made to my question during the debate on April 10. He seemed to think that these men did not have any better claim than several other groups. I doubt very much whether that is so.

In any event it is significant, as the minister is reported to have said at page 3736 of Hansard, that their own department went to the length of collecting these deductions from the veterans and forwarding them to the superannuation branch of the Department of Finance for a period of three years, believing that these men were entitled to this additional protection. The minister said:

> The department, however, hoped until 1927 to have the position altered, and on its own deducted amounts equivalent to the contributions which those of its employees who might have become permanent would have made to the superannuation account.

That was a very unusual course for one branch of government to follow in its dealings with another. And that particular action, in itself, is an indication of the strength of the claim these men have to be put on a five-year rather than a ten-year basis.

Another point in that connection is that the minister argued that because there was a provision for the cases in which there was what he called an abolition of office allowance, because there was that provision these men therefore should not now be entitled to have a change in the number of years, when calculating pension. But I would point out now that the only ones who would benefit by a change at this time would be those who are still in the services. His argument about the abolition of office allowance does not apply.

Finally I should like to endorse the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) with regard to retired civil servants. For a good many years he has been raising this point, and I believe I have supported him on each occasion. I do hope the committee will be asked to make a recommendation on this point. It is true that there is no provision in the bill for these retired civil servants. However, this question is of sufficient importance to warrant consideration and recommendation by the committee.

One of them wrote to me a few weeks ago, and put it clearly when he said that those who in the past served Canada had a very clear understanding that they would receive a stated percentage of their pay when they retired, which would be sufficient for them to maintain approximately the same standard of living they had reached when they retired.

That statement is true and yet, because of the increase in the cost of living, they are not receiving the treatment to which he referred. Something should be done about it at the present time. The United Kingdom, with all her troubles, has been able to provide for an increase in the pensions of her retired civil servants. I believe Canada has been remiss in failing to make a similar provision.

In conclusion I do urge again that the minister give the committee free rein to go into the merits and demerits of these proposals, so that it will not act merely as a group to run through the bill section by section, and then bring it back to the house in a day or two with all sections approved, and no close or detailed work having been done in the matter. That often happens in committees, and I hope it will not happen this time.

Mr. Knight: I can say all I have to say in a few moments; and—

Mr. Abbott: Before the hon. member begins, I wonder if I might crave the indulgence of the house to sit a minute or two after one o'clock. I have an important appointment at three o'clock with some visitors from abroad, and I would hope that we might complete the debate.

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, in view of what the minister has said, perhaps we could take a minute each. I do not wish to repeat what my colleague has said, but would voice my support of what has been said concerning retired civil servants. I have received letters from these people regularly.

Let me say once again that, in terms of purchasing power, pensions have been cut by a half. Sometimes hon. members are accused of raising these points for political reasons. I can assure the house that no such accusation can be made at this time, because in my own province of Saskatchewan only 243 of these people are still living, and there are 102 widows of those who have died. A fraction of that number will, of course, be located in Saskatoon.

This, after all, is the government for which those people have worked. This is the government whose policies are at least partly responsible for the fact that their scanty dollars are now reduced to only 50 cents. In the case of the ordinary workers, the government would advance the argument that wages and salaries have advanced in proportion to the cost of living; but no such argument can be made in this instance.

I should like to add my plea to others that have been made on behalf of these people in order to bring about what I think is only common justice.

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker I shall take only a moment to say—

Mr. Speaker: If the minister speaks he will close the debate.

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I shall take only a moment to draw the minister's attention to section 39 of the terms of union, and to say that members from Newfoundland on both sides of the house have been receiving a considerable number of letters with respect to that section of the terms of union, as it applies to section 21 in the bill. I would ask the minister to keep that point in mind, and to refer to a return to the house tabled in November of 1949, as well as correspondence with the Secretary of State (Mr. Bradley) and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier).

Mr. Speaker: I would repeat that when the minister speaks he will close the debate.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I shall take only a moment, because I propose to deal with only one point that has been raised.

First, however, may I thank all hon. members who have taken part in what I think has been a helpful discussion this morning. As the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) said, and quite properly, this is not a question on which we have party differences. It is the responsibility of parliament to see that the superannuation provisions for public employees are as fair and as just as possible, in the light of our responsibility to the other parties to the contract—that is, to the public and the taxpayers of Canada.

I do most sincerely thank hon. members who have referred in generous terms to the real improvements which are contained in the bill. I only want to touch on one point, the suggestion that the average number of years should be either eight or five instead of ten. I want to make it perfectly clear that the reason why the government felt it could not accede to this request is that we concluded that we could not defend to the people of Canada substantial improvements in the superannuation benefits which would further increase the already substantial actuarial deficit in the fund. It would be quite in order to make the period of time five years or eight years if we were prepared to increase the rate of contribution.

I pointed out in my statement this morning that improved benefits could be granted if the rate of contribution were increased. My information is that the great majority of civil servants are not in favour of increasing the rate of contribution from 6 per cent in the case of men and 5 per cent in the case of women to a higher figure. As I indicated in my statement this morning, after we have seen the operation of the act for another two or three years, have seen how these additional benefits work out and have seen whether or not the actuarial deficit of $189 million as it now stands is further increased, it may then be possible to make some further improvements in the benefits. But I think it is fair to say that the civil service superannuation plan is as good as any other plan, whether by government or by private industry, and very much better than most. I conclude by thanking some other hon. members who I know had some intention of speaking on this matter but who have refrained from doing so.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think we might call the next order of business.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): We shall go into supply and continue consideration of the estimates of national defence.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Carter in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Defence services—

241. To provide for the Canadian forces, the defence research board and other expenditures relating to defence, including contributions toward the military costs of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization; to authorize expenditures in the current year out of the amount hereby provided, not exceeding $324,000,000, under the provisions of section 3 of the Defence Appropriation Act, 1950, and to provide that, notwithstanding subsection 3 of that section, where equipment or supplies acquired by the Canadian forces after March 31, 1950, are transferred, the estimated present value thereof shall, if the governor in council so directs, be credited to this vote instead of being paid into the special account mentioned in the said subsection 3, and when so credited may be expended for the purposes of the Canadian forces; and notwithstanding section 30 of the Financial Administration Act to authorize total commitments for the foregoing purposes of $3,994,895,578 regardless of the year in which such commitments will come in course of payment (of which it is estimated that $1,971,926,275 will come due for payment in future years), $1,960,159,633.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Higgins: Mr. Chairman, last evening when I attempted to deal as briefly as I could with this matter the minister was suggesting that I was more or less killing time. Actually, I was not killing time; I was trying to get out of the fog which the minister's statement plus the white paper plus the statement of the chief of the naval staff had put me in. I assume that the chief of the naval staff would not have written such an authoritative article unless he had the approval of the minister or unless the minister had told him to write it. After all, we had the acknowledgment by the minister during this week of the approval of another communication which was quite important, and I refer to the letter written by his deputy minister to Saturday Night. So, I assumed that the chief of the naval staff, in writing this article for the March issue of Canadian Shipping and Marine Engineering News, had the authorization of the minister. In the same issue was an article containing a picture, a very fine picture of the minister, and an article written by him as well.

With that as a preamble I want to draw the attention of the committee to some discrepancies. I began to do so last night at the time the minister was saying that I was actually killing time, and I will try to do it as briefly as possible. In the white paper at paragraph 130 this statement appears:

> Of the fourteen minesweepers now under construction, six have been launched, with the remainder to be launched during 1953.

In the statement or in the article by the chief of the naval staff there is this citation:

> Coastal minesweepers, wooden, . . . 14, all under construction, eight have been launched.

At page 3920 of Hansard the minister says:

> All fourteen of the coastal minesweepers have been launched . . .

Now there does appear to be a very great difference to say the least in those figures. The minister's white paper claims that six have been launched; the chief of the naval staff says that eight have been launched; and the minister corrects himself and says that all fourteen have been launched. Obviously somebody is launching ships the minister did not know about until yesterday. I would like him to comment on that.

In paragraph 129 of the white paper we have this sentence:

> A total of 52 new vessels are on order, including escort vessels, minesweepers, harbour craft, inner patrol vessels, clearing diving vessels, tugs, crane lighters, a northern patrol craft and auxiliary vessels.

In other words all the types of ships that are being built for the navy are enumerated in that section, and they total 52. In the article by the chief of the naval staff the figures are given under the same descriptions as appear in the minister's white paper, and they total 110. Now, again, somebody is fooling somebody but I do not know who it is. In paragraph 130 again, and I think I mentioned this last night, we have the statement:

> Two escort vessels have now been launched and nine keels have been laid.

In the article by the vice-admiral, there appears this statement:

> Anti-submarine escort vessels, 14—(nine under construction, three of them launched; . . .

That is just one more ship than is shown in the minister's white paper. This article was published or at least put on sale on March 1 in Canadian Shipping and Marine Engineering News. Obviously it had to be compiled before that date and I understand that the usual time for compiling these articles for printing on the first of March would be not less than two or three weeks before publication. The minister tabled his white paper only the other day and he says the material was brought up to date. His last answer last evening, as it appears at page 3939 of Hansard, is:

> The date in the white paper for ships and such matters is up to February 28 . . .

Obviously, whoever compiled this white paper for the minister must not have been aware of a ship being launched. After all, one of these anti-submarine escort ships is not by any means a small ship. I believe that the ship in question was H.M.C.S. Fraser launched at the Burrard docks. It would appear to be a little peculiar to say the least to say that such a ship could be launched within a matter of three or four days and the minister not know about it. As I say, the white paper was prepared on February 28 and this ship was launched some considerable time before that, because it appears in the article written by the chief of the naval staff.

The wording of paragraph 130 is a little gobbledygook to me. We are talking about 14 escort vessels and this is the way the 14 are made up, and I am reading from paragraph 130 of the white paper:

> Two escort vessels have now been launched and nine keels have been laid.

I presume that adds up to eleven.

> Five more will be launched and the remaining five keels will be laid down this year.

I presume that five and five are ten, and that ten and eleven are twenty-one—yet there are only fourteen altogether. Somebody has got to do a little correction in addition or else there are more ships being produced than the minister knows about—or maybe he is producing more ships than the chief of the naval staff knows about.

I think my next point was drawn to the attention of the minister last night by the hon. member for Nanaimo but I want to draw it to his attention as another discrepancy in his statement. In the article written or, I presume, ghost-written for the minister, entitled "The Navy's Progress" in Canadian Shipping and Marine Engineering News, this statement appears at page 93:

> A prototype of Canada's new anti-submarine escort ships, the former destroyer H.M.C.S. Algonquin, was commissioned in February, and the job of converting another destroyer, H.M.C.S. Crescent, into a similar deadly foe of the submarine, was taken in hand.

I just draw your attention to this wording:

A prototype of Canada's new anti-submarine escort ships, the former destroyer H.M.C.S. Algonquin—

At page 3920 of Hansard for April 15, 1953, there appears a statement by the minister to this effect:

The Algonquin is not the prototype of the new anti-submarine escort vessel.

Well, what is it? In one breath the minister says one thing, and in the next he denies it. What are we to believe, then, about this white paper? I have only referred to the one section dealing with the navy, but when we find such grave discrepancies in that, how are we to regard the rest of the contents of the particular white paper? Now that is all I had hoped to bring out last night when the minister said I was killing time.

I want to draw to the minister's attention again an article in the Montreal Gazette which was quoted last night by the hon. member for Kootenay West, which referred to statements made by the chief of the naval staff in a press conference in Ottawa. The article is dated Ottawa, December 17, and reads in part as follows:

The admiral, who this month took over command of the R.C.N. and who two years ago wrote the "Mainguy report" on the navy's internal problems, said at a conference in the parliamentary press gallery that he, as chief of the naval staff, is "against" any R.C.N. activity or development which does not have to do with anti-submarine work or the defence of harbours.

I believe that statement, or practically all of it, was quoted last night by the hon. member for Kootenay West. I am repeating it, Mr. Chairman, because I think it is very important. It strikes us in Newfoundland very forcibly. It must be recalled that during the last war we had enemy submarine activity brought right to our doors. In my own riding of St. John's East, at Bell island, the wharf of which has been discussed with the Minister of Public Works on several occasions—I sent him a picture of the wharf at Portugal Cove the other day, and I believe he perused it with great benefit to himself—there were three ships loading ore which were sunk by submarine torpedoes. We had submarine torpedoes discharged against the harbour of St. John's, which struck the rocks on each side of the harbour. We had the Caribou, which ran between North Sydney and Port aux Basques, sunk with a great loss of life. We had a lot of enemy submarine activity. So, Mr. Chairman, I think it is only right that this particular part of the defence of Canada be given the consideration which the chief of the naval staff says it deserves. I am sure my friends from the west coast of Canada will feel the same as we from Newfoundland feel about it, that too much stress cannot be laid upon the part the submarine will play in any war that may come in the future.

As the chief of the naval staff said in this article which was quoted last night, Russia now has as many submarines as Germany had at the zenith of the last war, and she is building them even faster than Germany did. With this very real menace, then, I think Canada has to face up to the fact that the only way you can fight a submarine—I am merely quoting what I have heard those very much more competent than I say—is with planes and surface craft. The most forward eastern base in Canada is in Newfoundland. We do have United States forces in strength there, and I presume they will continue to increase if war appears imminent. It is not quite fair, however, to leave the defence of Canada to the United States, no matter how willing or able she might be to undertake it.

In that connection, we have a very fine airport at Gander, Newfoundland, which has been operating, as you all know, for many years. It was of great help during the last war in the patrolling of the seas in and about Newfoundland, and assisting in convoy work. The airport at Torbay was also of very great assistance, as was the airport operated by the United States navy at Argentia. At the present time there is no land communication between those three important airports, that is between the United States base at Pepperrell, which uses Torbay airport, the United States base at Argentia, and Gander airport, except the narrow gauge railroad operated by the Canadian National. There is no road connection of any kind. I understand the western provinces are now planning to make representations to the cabinet concerning the necessity for the construction of an all-weather defence road for the west coast. In my opinion the construction of a proper broad highway for defence purposes in Newfoundland is really of even greater importance. I suggest to the minister that he take into account the urgent necessity for communication between Gander airport, Torbay airport and the United States base at Argentia. I believe the matter has been discussed—I do not know whether or not it has been discussed at high levels—and the ranking officers of both forces, off the record, have said that they are in favour of the construction of such a road. The road is of equal importance to the United States and to Canada.

I believe that, given the proper approach, such a road could be constructed on a fifty-fifty basis between the United States and Canada. At the present time the United States forces have constructed or rather have materially widened a road to their base at Argentia known as Salmonier road. They have put a lot of money into the rebuilding of that road, and the maintenance of it. I feel that, in so far as the defence of Canada is concerned, the convoy routes of the future are the great weakness of our defence on this side of the Atlantic. We have to depend upon surface vessels to supply our allies on the other side of the world in time of war, and they would have to cross that dangerous body of water, the north Atlantic. I urge upon the minister that consideration be given to the construction of such a road.

As the minister knows, the United States navy maintains quite a large and extensive base at Argentia. There is a very narrow neck of land between the bays known as Placentia bay and Trinity bay. If it were possible that a canal could be cut across the neck of land at present known as La Manche it would enable United States vessels to go from Placentia bay into Trinity bay. If war came it would be of great assistance with respect to the time saved. At the present time you have to steam from Placentia bay all the way around past St. John's and past Conception bay to get into that area. I think it would be well worth while to investigate the digging of a canal. Then of course the peninsula of Avalon would become an island. It might be quite expensive to carry out such a project but I think it is well worth while investigating.

The last matter to which I desire to refer is this. I do not wish to delay the committee unduly but I wish to draw to the minister's attention, and to get his views on, the question of an armoury at St. John's for the reserve units. As the minister knows, term 44 of the terms of union between Newfoundland and Canada says this:

> Canada will provide for the maintenance in the province of Newfoundland of appropriate reserve units of the Canadian defence forces, which will include the Newfoundland regiment.

I am quite certain that the minister will appreciate the fact that the word "maintenance" obviously means the providing of an armoury for a unit such as the Newfoundland regiment. There is no other way that we can get around that word. "Maintenance" definitely means what it says. After all, if you guarantee to provide for the maintenance of any person, it means that you must provide a house or some other building in which such person would be housed or kept. In this particular case, where Canada guarantees to provide for the maintenance of a regiment such as the Newfoundland regiment, I say it is part of the terms of union that an armoury should be provided for this reserve unit. I hope I have not left the minister completely in a fog with regard to the matters I have discussed.

(Translation):

Mr. A. M. Robichaud (Gloucester): Mr. Chairman, in the statement he made in the house last Tuesday afternoon, referring to the Royal Military College of Saint-Jean, Quebec, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) made the following remarks reported at page 3808 of Hansard:

> The candidates of the two languages mix and work together, and virtually all of them now speak both languages. These men will constitute an important pool of officers of great value, particularly today when the nations of the world are intermingling more freely.

Further down the minister added:

> So great has been the success of Saint-Jean, and so desirable is it that this operation in military training as well as in national unity should be extended, we are going to make provision for a total strength of 400 cadets.

I wish to say immediately to the minister that I readily agree with him. The question of national unity is very near to our hearts. Government members like to raise this question as often as possible and they will surely appeal to those sentiments on every possible occasion during the critical period which might very well be the political menopause before the snow flies, this year.

I hope that in making that statement of principle the Minister of National Defence was sincere and I am ready to grant him the benefit of a reasonable doubt. However, during the few remarks I intend to make this afternoon, I will afford him the opportunity of giving us concrete and practical proof of his sincerity. I simply intend to bring to his knowledge a condition which, unfortunately, prevails very close to this house, and to request him to remedy it, as it should be, if he really wishes to contribute by deeds and not only by words, to the strengthening of the bonds of true national unity across the country.

In taking part in this debate, this afternoon, I will stray to some extent from the line which I have conscientiously tried to follow ever since I came to this house, that is not to take part in any debate on questions which I was unfamiliar with and which had little or no relation to the interests or economy of my constituency or my province. I might add right away that I know very little about military matters and I am quite ready to confess, Mr. Chairman, that I am no authority on militarization, and much less an adept of militarism. Nevertheless, if I make so bold as to rise to take part in this debate it is because, to my mind, there is a principle involved, and that is the recognition of the rights of French-Canadian airmen at the Rockcliffe air station as regards the teaching of religion and of the French language to their children, and more particularly to the children at the Woodfalle school.

Let us for a moment consider the situation from the school and educational point of view at the Rockcliffe air station. Then I shall point out briefly what certain responsible and independent newspapers think about this matter.

Well, the situation at the Rockcliffe air base, from the school and educational viewpoint, is simply awful. The real concept of education in the true sense of the word seems to have been forgotten and it seems as though it is being wilfully ignored. It seems that this concept which should include, first of all, the imprescriptible rights of the parents, then of the church and thirdly the suppletory rights—and they are only suppletory—of the state, is being wilfully ignored. The recognition of these rights is being ignored at Rockcliffe, especially the first two, that is the imprescriptible rights of the church and of the parents in matters of education, which are the most important. And it is the authorities of the Department of National Defence who are responsible for this situation.

The Rockcliffe school was built with the money of all Canadian taxpayers and I find, on page N-52 of the public accounts for 1952, that the sum of $514,704.99 was spent for the construction of an 18-room school at Rockcliffe. Now, from a pedagogical standpoint, the school at Woodfalle apparently follows the program of the province of Ontario while refusing to apply that section of the Ontario law which allows the establishment of separate schools where the teaching of the French language and of the Catholic faith could and should be given.

Mr. Chairman, if we compare Rockcliffe to any other area, we find that the treatment meted out to French-Canadian Catholics is worse than the treatment they endured under the famous regulation XVII. At Rockcliffe, national defence authorities are not satisfied with restricting French; they exclude it altogether, along with the teaching of religion. Whereas the school system of the province of Ontario recognizes both the public and separate schools, the national defence authorities have adopted at Rockcliffe the public school system while refusing to recognize the separate school system.

Such is, in brief, the situation at Rockcliffe air base, as I see it from the school and educational viewpoint.

Now, to come to the second point I want to make, let us see what the independent and right-thinking newspapers of this area think of this situation and what they have to say about it.

Here is, first of all, an article published in Le Droit of January 26, 1953, under the title "A situation worse than under Regulation XVII". I quote:

> But what has the Department of National Defence done at Rockcliffe airport? It has refused to provide accommodation so that the children of Catholic and French Canadian airmen may receive an education which would be French and Catholic in character, in accordance with their rights and the dictates of their conscience. If those airmen wish to send their children to school at Rockcliffe airport, they have to send them to the local public school, where teaching is done exclusively in English.
> The Department of National Defence is worse than the Whitney government.

The writer mentions again the famous regulation XVII and he adds:

> True, French Canadian and Catholic airmen can send their children to bilingual separate schools outside, but that changes nothing in the situation which prevails at Rockcliffe airport. Due to a decision taken by the Department of National Defence, there is only one school at that station, the public school, which is neutral and English.

On March 20, 1953, Le Devoir had an article entitled "The Rockcliffe Affair", of which I would like to quote a paragraph:

> Rockcliffe is a suburb of Ottawa. An air base has been established at that place and it so happens there are children of school age.
> A certain number of those children are Catholic. The authorities have forgotten to provide the necessary facilities to enable those children to receive, at the base proper, an education in accordance with their religious beliefs.

Lastly, I would like to quote a paragraph from another article, published in Le Droit of March 17, 1953, entitled: "The Conspiracy of silence, at Rockcliffe, must come to an end". I quote:

> During the past several years, the army has made it a point to give greater importance to the French language and to count more and more on the cooperation of the French-speaking element. We do not know what the situation is with regard to the navy, but we seldom hear complaints. However, in the air force, it is rumoured that in several places, young French Canadian members of that military body do not always receive fair treatment. There are more than false rumours in that connection and specific cases have been stated. They don't appear to be general in scope. The responsibility for these unfortunate happenings has, so far, fallen upon officers of inferior rank and only in a few training centres. We cannot infer from these incidents that an anti-French Canadian policy prevails in the Canadian air force.

However, at Rockcliffe, there is no school where Catholics of both languages may send their children. This is a condition absolutely contrary to a true national spirit, contrary also to the provincial statute, which regulates matters of education in military camps. It is very urgent that this question be straightened out: no question of economy nor any other minor consideration should intervene here. This is a matter of right and Catholics of both languages should take every means to defend that right.

Before bringing my remarks to a close, I wish to call the attention of this house to the steps I have been taking since last January 28 in order to obtain the following documents:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the federal government, or any department thereof, and any person or persons, in connection with the teaching of religion and French to the French-speaking pupils of Woodfalle school, Royal Canadian Air Force station, Rockcliffe, Ontario.

An order for return was passed by this house on January 28 but I am still awaiting the production of these documents. Three times I rose to ask the Secretary of State (Mr. Bradley) about this matter. In the first two instances he answered that he would do everything he could to expedite this return. Last Monday the Minister of National Defence rose to tell me that his department was quite willing to provide me with these papers, but that permission was being requested from a provincial government, which, at my request, he admitted was the government of Ontario.

Will the Minister of National Defence allow me to tell him that his last excuse is very clumsy. Why should he insist on obtaining the agreement of the province concerned before producing these documents, since my question did not refer to any correspondence exchanged between his department and the province of Ontario or any other province. I merely asked for the correspondence exchanged between the federal government or one of its departments and any other person or association concerned. Moreover, I must say that the documents I asked for are not numerous and that a secretary could have prepared them in two hours at the most. However, I am still waiting.

Mr. Chairman, as Le Droit so rightly puts it:

The conspiracy of silence, at Rockcliffe, must come to an end.

We are not behind the iron curtain, but I note that there are certain curtains which should be ripped open. And I think that the curtain—be it made of velvet or some other cloth—which closes the opening of the tent under which the Minister of National Defence takes cover, and which will not admit our search into his department, should be the first to be thus ripped open.

Mr. Chairman, in closing I urge the Minister of National Defence to prove his sincerity by deeds and not by words; to remedy the unfortunate and iniquitous situation which exists in the school and educational field at Rockcliffe air base, only a few miles from our parliament. I would also ask him to produce at long last the papers which I asked for more than ten weeks ago.

Mr. Chairman, I ask the hon. members of the House of Commons to excuse a young member, a newcomer, a backbencher who admitted being quite ignorant about military matters, for having been so bold as to stand up in order to stress the glaring injustice inflicted upon his fellow citizens at Rockcliffe. If I have done so, it is because I believed, and still believe, that it is my duty to defend the principle involved. Like the chief of the apostles, I could say, in the very words of Peter to the sanhedrin:

For we cannot but speak after what we have seen and heard.

(Text):

Mr. David A. Croll (Spadina): Mr. Chairman, I have been following the defence debate in the house rather carefully, as hon. members well know. It appears to me that the official opposition has given the debate a new twist. Something new has been added. In previous debates on the same subject their slogan was: Waste, extravagance and inefficiency. We on this side of the house said: "Point to the evidence. Where is the proof?" The opposition have now added a new twist to the slogan by adding: We have inadequate home defence. Thus a new plank is being added to their platform, and the new slogan will go something like this: The official opposition will be saying to the Canadian people: "You are spending five billions of dollars. You have inadequate home defence, because of waste, extravagance and inefficiency." That will be repeated on many platforms throughout the country. I think the place to say it is here, and I say it now—that that is the greatest hoax ever played on the Canadian people. It is a nice trick if you can do it; but you will not.

Let me for a moment examine this question of waste, extravagance and inefficiency. Let us take the normal case we all understand, of the possession of a refrigerator. A refrigerator in the home of a civilian worker is a normal requirement. When this government provides the same refrigerator, but at a lower cost, in the serviceman's home, it immediately becomes waste.

Let us take the case of the landlord who plants a tree, sods his grounds, and keeps the place in good repair. We consider him a good Canadian citizen and also a good landlord. But when the government provides the same service to the serviceman, at once it becomes landscaping, and therefore an extravagance.

Then, wading pools, which are normally provided for children of civilians in parks throughout the country, when provided for servicemen's children under similar circumstances become frills and fancies.

The small carpet, when provided normally in a civilian's home, becomes, when it is provided for a serviceman, a rug. And when it is described on the hustings, it seems that the servicemen are walking knee deep in them, or perhaps, only ankle deep.

Let us take the case of the bed lamp found normally in most homes. When a bed lamp is provided for a serviceman it becomes a boudoir lamp, with all sorts of connotations.

Mr. Adamson: That was the official name given in the committee.

Mr. Croll: Then, when we ask where those luxurious camps are located, when we ask about those houses with the gilded door knobs, the usual answer is: Wainwright. We are told there is a swimming pool at Wainwright. Well, Wainwright is in the middle of the prairies, and if there is any place in the country that needs a swimming pool, it is Wainwright. Isolated as it is, if we provide a bowling alley and a gymnasium, and a chapel, I do not think we are doing too much for our servicemen.

The official opposition has the advantage of hindsight which, of course, is a great advantage. They can say what should have been done, and act like the Monday-morning quarterback. However, I think that before they pursue that course any further—and I am of the opinion that they believe they have made about as much political capital as they can out of waste, extravagance and inefficiency, because they are not playing that record with as much vigour as they did on other occasions—they should listen well to what the Canadian public are thinking. I suggest that the editorial which I am about to read, and which appeared in the Canadian Military Journal, an independent defence forces review, reflects the views of the Canadian public. This is what appeared in the Easter issue under the heading "Unjust Criticism":

For many months past there have been many disparaging comments by Canadian newspapers and news commentators about the pampering of the personnel of our armed forces.

Such critics have appeared to resent the fact that our National Defence Department has seen fit to spend money on furnishing our soldiers with bedside tables and lamps, with carpets, mirrors, bureaus and other such whatnots.

In our opinion such resentment and carping criticism are entirely unjustified. It should be remembered that the great majority of the well paid working men in Canada have all of these things in their homes. So, why should the men who work in our armed forces be deprived of them? These same harsh critics of reasonable comforts for sailors, soldiers and airmen, when off duty, are the first to belabour the Department of National Defence if it fails to secure the number of recruits necessary for our armed forces. The very fact that we are apparently now getting an adequate supply of recruits is, we think, in some measure due to the publicity that has been given in the press to the fact that, by joining the armed forces, a man will not be deprived of the amenities that he has become accustomed to as a civilian.

No! The days of old when it could be truthfully said that, "a soldier's life was one of extreme hardship, unremitting toil and damned poor pay" are over—and we are glad of it! But, even in peacetime, there are still lengthy periods of each year, the training season, when a soldier still has to undergo much more toil and hardship than a civilian,—but, if he is reasonably well paid, as he is now, he has no complaints.

We think that it is high time for the critics, above mentioned, to cease their misguided attempts to deprive the men of our armed forces from enjoying the same home comforts as the civilian workers. They may not have much longer to enjoy them. If they happily do, it will be because their strength, added to the strength of our allies, is forcing on Soviet Russia the necessity of continuing to postpone world war III.

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary East): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) has a vivid imagination and a good flow of language, and he has let them both have full swing in the last few minutes, when he has been setting up straw men and then proceeding to knock them down again.

He appeared to be trying to create the impression that those of us who have criticized the conduct of the defence affairs of this country have been thereby criticizing the airmen, soldiers and naval ratings in our armed forces. That has not been done, and there is no justification for trying to give an impression of that kind.

Mr. Croll: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry if the hon. member got that impression; I did not say it, and I did not intend to say it. I merely read an editorial.

Mr. Casselman: Read your speech.

Mr. Harkness: The hon. member was certainly trying to give the impression that those of us who have been criticizing waste and extravagance in the country's defence effort would deny to the members of our defence forces the minimum of comforts to which they are entitled. Of course that is absolutely wrong. It was quite evident that the hon. member was making a speech with that purpose in mind, hoping to convince the people throughout the country, and members of the forces, that that was what we in the opposition have been doing. I think he will find that he will fail in his efforts.

Then the hon. member for Spadina said that a new twist has been added to the criticism of the defence department, and that instead of placing that criticism on waste and extravagance, as has been done in the past, it is now being put on the fact that there is no defence of Canada itself. If the hon. member will cast his mind back or, if he fails in that respect, if he will look at the defence debates for the last four or five years, he will find that I placed the chief emphasis in my criticism of the defence department each year on the fact that we have had no effective defence for Canadian soil. That was the point made by myself, and by other hon. members associated with me on this side of the house.

So that his contention that we are giving a new twist is completely at variance with the facts. As I say, we have been emphasizing that feature for years. And that leads me to a comment I should like to make concerning the speech made last night by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) in connection with this very matter. The Minister of National Defence, in referring to the accomplishment of the first and third objectives of our defence effort—and I would remind you, Mr. Chairman, that the first objective is the defence of Canada itself—said that we are just on the way of getting there, in other words, of achieving the accomplishment of the first objective, the defence of Canada. I must say that the minister apparently takes a considerably more realistic view and speaks in a more realistic way now than he did three and four years ago, because when we brought up this matter three and four years ago and stated time after time that there were no effective defences for Canada in the event of a raid across the north or anything else of that sort which might be anticipated, and which the government said might be anticipated, when we insisted that there were no defences against that sort of thing which amounted to anything, the minister kept reiterating and reiterating in a most definite way that we had all the defence forces we needed to guard against any possible contingency. He said that over and over again.

Mr. Claxton: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I have asked the hon. member on previous occasions to cite one single case where I said that. I ask him again. He is distorting any words that I have ever used. I should like him to give a single instance where I have used language which would justify the words he is now trying to put into my mouth.

Mr. Harkness: It is very easy to look up the defence debates of three and four years ago and hon. members will find—

Some hon. Members: Do it.

Mr. Harkness: —that the minister made these assertions time after time. It is very easy for the Liberal members to roar "Do it, do it", but they know quite well that when a man is on his feet in the house he cannot take several hours to look up defence debates which cover several hundred pages of Hansard.

Mr. Claxton: Then if the hon. member does not do it and does not choose to do it he should not make such assertions.

Mr. Harkness: I will have the material looked up and produce it at a later time. It is quite apparent that I cannot produce it out of my hat at the moment.

An hon. Member: You are too busy talking through it.

An hon. Member: Nevertheless it is true.

Mr. Harkness: Certainly it is true. As a matter of fact there is no question as to what the minister said three and four years ago about our defence forces. He kept reiterating that we had all the defences—

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Chairman, I have raised a point of order and the hon. member goes on putting words in my mouth which he cannot prove I said. He has had ample opportunity. This debate has gone on for three days, and I think this is the twentieth day on which defence has been discussed this session. He has had endless opportunities but he does not produce the evidence and continues to put words in my mouth which I did not use. Let him produce the evidence.

An hon. Member: Put up or shut up.

Mr. Harkness: Apparently the minister's recollection and mine differ, but I will produce what he had to say in these debates of past years in the course of time, as I said a minute ago.

The next point I should like to comment upon is that the minister said that we had plenty of C-119's and Dakotas to lift our airborne brigade or air defence troops, I think he calls them now. That is not in accord with my information with respect to the matter. The minister cited, as evidence of the fact that we have sufficient of these planes to lift the airborne brigade, that various exercises had been held and these troops had been dropped. Unless the newspaper reports that I have read were incorrect, the largest number of airborne troops ever dropped in one of these exercises was a battalion. Generally it was less than a battalion, and when they did drop a battalion they were not all dropped at once. They had to be taken in two or three lifts in order to drop them. Therefore I do not think that the evidence that we have a sufficient number of these planes is very good.

Mr. Claxton: Once again, I wish the hon. member would stick to what I said. I never suggested for a second, yesterday or at any other time, that we had the airlift to drop an airborne brigade at one time. No words of mine can be distorted to mean that. What I said was quite different. What the hon. member is now suggesting is not in accordance with our plans at all.

Mr. Harkness: This happens to be one thing that I believe is right in the speech which the minister made yesterday and I can probably find it in about a minute.

An hon. Member: Make it up.

The Chairman: Order.

An hon. Member: Bingo!

Mr. Harkness: I do not exactly remember just when the minister made this particular statement.

An hon. Member: Neither do I.

Mr. Harkness: I do not remember what part of his speech it was in but I know it is here.

An hon. Member: Take your time.

Mr. Harkness: Here it is. At page 3921 of Hansard for yesterday the minister, replying to the criticism that had been made on this particular point, said:

> What is more, we have the transport to enable that force to be used.

The reference is to the airborne force. The minister says that nothing he has said can be interpreted as meaning that we have sufficient transport to lift an airborne brigade. What other interpretation would any reasonable man take out of that statement?

Mr. Claxton: What is after the word "used"?

An hon. Member: A period.

Mr. Harkness: Yes, there is a period there. The minister went on to say:

> Hon. members have referred to the fact that hitherto we have only had Dakotas to use for this operation, and very good they were too. A good many countries in the world still only have Dakotas, but to them we have added a number of C-119's. They are coming along at the rate of several per month. Therefore we believe that today we have an airlift sufficient to meet the kind of situation envisaged by the concept on which we are working. Exercises are held regularly.

I have already referred to that.

An hon. Member: Keep on reading. It is better than your speech.

Mr. Harkness: The only impression an ordinary citizen of Canada or someone who had perhaps paid some attention to these matters could get would be that we had sufficient of these aircraft to transport the airborne brigade. As I say, I am quite sure we have not got them, and in fact the minister has now admitted in what he has said that he never said we had them. His statement in that regard is the same as many other statements he has made, and I have complained about them every year in the past and in the speech I made the other day. I complain again about the same sort of thing. He makes statements in a way which can only give a wrong impression to the people of Canada as to what our defence resources actually are.

The next matter with which I should like to deal has to do with ack-ack guns. The minister said we have ack-ack guns of the latest type and that others have been modified in some cases to the most modern standards at very great expense. I believe it is true that we have these guns and that some of them have been modified, but once more the general impression the people get from such a statement is not correct. I had quite a long discussion with the minister on this same subject last year at which time we went into the matter of guided missiles and so on. I think it was a useful discussion, and I brought the matter up at that time because the minister had made a somewhat similar statement on that occasion. The general impression the people got was that we had plenty of ack-ack guns in the country to defend important cities, industrial targets, etc. In actual fact that is not the case.

We have a certain number of guns, but where are they and who is manning them and who is prepared to man them? Unless my information is entirely incorrect, we have two or three regular force ack-ack batteries in Canada, and that is all we have. These are the only ack-ack defences which are manned. In addition, we have a considerable number of reserve batteries and reserve regiments. As was pointed out yesterday, the reserve batteries and reserve regiments are supplied with ack-ack guns on the basis of two per battery or four per battery or eight per regiment or twelve per regiment, something along that line. They have at the most possibly a quarter or a third of the guns they are supposed to have. In addition, in most cases they have not been able to secure sufficient personnel and to do sufficient training to be able to man even the guns they have effectively. So, in order to make any effective use of those ack-ack guns, as I say, you would have to have the batteries fully equipped and staffed with well trained men. To say that we have plenty of ack-ack guns merely creates a false impression for the people of Canada and lulls them into a false sense of security—something which the government has no right to do.

Mr. Claxton: I agree, if anyone said that.

Mr. Harkness: I do not think the minister will deny that he said yesterday that we have ack-ack guns of the latest type, many of them modified to the most modern standards. He has been saying that for the last two or three years. It is not a new thing at all and it has been brought up here on many occasions, but he still insists on making these statements which I say give a wrong impression.

An hon. Member: You are trying to give a wrong impression.

Mr. Harkness: The next thing the minister said was that we have Vampires and Mustangs which would be pretty good defence against all the bombers known to be in the possession of the only enemy. I wonder if the minister has been completely asleep and is not really aware of what has been happening in the way of aircraft development in the last several years. I wonder if he has paid no attention to reports that have appeared in American magazines, reports before the Senate committee on defence in that country, and so on. There seems to be in the United States, and amongst people who should know, a very strong presumption at least—in fact it is a certainty—that the Russians have a considerable number of high altitude jet bombers. Against such bombers these Vampires and Mustangs are just useless.

The fact that the minister would make that statement indicates to me that he has no true realization of what the needs of modern defence are. Nobody with a realization of the needs of modern air defence and what the modern air situation is would make a statement of that sort. The minister went on to say, as he has said several times in the past, that the F-86E Sabre jet is the finest aircraft of its type in the world today. Maybe it is, and I am not disputing that it is—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Harkness: But I would draw your attention to the fact that a very large number of pilots who have been flying these Sabres in Korea have come back and complained bitterly that the Russian MIG was able to outfly them and outmanœuvre them. One of the reasons for that is that the F-86E is a considerably heavier aircraft. It weighs more than the MIG and it would take a great deal more thrust, which it just has not got, to make it as manœuvrable as the MIG. In that connection I would refer to a report appearing in the newspapers in which a fairly high technical ranking officer of the R.C.A.F. said that the trouble with the F-86E, and with other planes too, is that they have too many gadgets which slow them down and their performance is not nearly as good as it might otherwise be. He particularly referred to the double landing gear which this plane has and to other safety devices which, according to him, were designed to prevent training accidents. They were designed to protect in training the one man in ten who is perhaps slow or careless. But, as a result of these safety devices, the whole weight of the plane has been made too great and therefore its performance is not nearly as good as it should be. He says that we should get rid of these gadgets and cut down the weight of the plane. I do not know the technical details of these things well enough to be a judge, but that at least is the story, as reported in the newspapers, of one of the technical officers of the R.C.A.F., and it appears to me to be very sound reasoning.

The next matter was the construction of barracks and the minister said that he had not heard from anybody that the costs were too great. He said that anyone who thought that was the case should have said so, and that no one has said so. Well, I would refer the minister to the report of the committee on defence expenditure of last year. He also said that we had had all kinds of opportunity to go into this matter. But last year, as a matter of fact, we had one day in which to hear a long report on construction and there was only time for a short bit of questioning at the end. The minister says that nobody complained about excessive cost, but I point out to him that I did refer to the excessive cost of some barracks and asked why the costs were so great. The explanation was given that they were no greater than for comparable accommodation which has been built in recent years for college students. That did not seem to be a very reasonable explanation of the high cost of these barracks.

This year in the defence expenditure committee, to which I am really not supposed to refer, we put a considerable amount of time on construction; but I think the chairman of that committee, the hon. member for Spadina, will agree with me that we have not so far really gone into the cost of barracks.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Harkness: The next thing which the minister protested against most vehemently concerned something which I have done myself on several occasions in the past, as has the hon. member for Moose Jaw. He did so only yesterday, I think, in this debate. I refer to making a comparison of the cost per man of our forces compared with the cost per man of the forces of the United States, Great Britain or any other country. The minister said that the comparison of cost per man was absolutely invalid and he took strong exception to any comparisons of that sort being made. He did not give any good reason why a comparison was invalid; he just said it was invalid and did not give any good reasons, except one. The one reason he did give was that construction costs in Canada have been a great deal more per man than they have in the United Kingdom or the United States. He said that we did not have any permanent barracks and things of that sort when we started on this program whereas they did in the United Kingdom and in the United States. Now, I will admit that we have had to spend more per man on construction in Canada than they have had to do in the United States or in Great Britain. However, if you throw out the entire cost of construction as far as Canada is concerned—throw it out altogether, but do not forget that the people in the United Kingdom and the United States have also been constructing things of various kinds such as airfields and barracks—and leave it in for the others, our costs are still a great deal more than they are in the United States and Great Britain per man. The argument by the minister that the cost per man has only risen because of construction costs flies right out the window.

An hon. Member: They do not have below zero weather in Great Britain.

Mr. Harkness: They certainly do in the United States, and particularly in the Alaska area. As a matter of fact, I would like to ask, Mr. Chairman, what other yardstick we can use to compare costs here and in the United States or Great Britain or any other country. There is no other yardstick that you can use, and the cost per man is a good yardstick to compare the situation in this country with that in other countries—the cost now and what it cost four years ago or fourteen years ago. I think that a yardstick of that kind is extremely useful and one that can serve a useful purpose. I see no reason in the world for the minister to say that it is invalid.

In addition to that I would point out that, although our forces are costing so much more per man than those of Great Britain and so much more than those of the United States, those countries are providing extremely heavy and expensive items of equipment. They are providing large ships, submarines, heavy bombers and things of that kind which are most expensive. We are not providing any of those things, so their costs really should be higher than ours because they are buying more of the expensive items.

Now, the minister made what I thought was a very unworthy attempt, and one which was in bad taste, to write down Wing Commander Rohmer because of the statement he made. Why the minister should say that he was so far down on the promotion list, and what relationship that had to this debate, I do not know. As I say, I think it was a very unworthy attempt to try to write down a man who was doing his duty, and who had given considerable service to this country, not only in the air force but also by putting forward his views as to what was needed for the defence of this country. In other words, this man acted as a good citizen, and the minister more or less tried to write him down. The minister also said, of course, that we had seized upon what Wing Commander Rohmer said about the lack of defence in this country, and were now trying to make a great deal of it. As I have already pointed out, what Wing Commander Rohmer said is confirmation of what we have been saying here for several years. We have been insisting that the defence of Canada itself was neglected, that we did not have the defences that we need. This statement by this gentleman was confirmation of that, and proof that it is true.

In speaking here the other day I said something about overblown staffs. The minister said that the only proof of this that I gave was the number of men in the deputy minister's office. He spoke about the number of people that were there and what they were doing, and why the number had been increased. This was not the only proof I gave, but that was the only point to which he gave attention. There are many more that could be mentioned. One of the other things I mentioned, and I mention it again now because I think we should have some explanation of it later on, is the tremendous growth that has taken place in the civilian personnel in the administrative headquarters of national defence.

The Chairman: Perhaps the hon. member could wait until the general policy discussion is over, or is it agreeable to hon. members that we now start on the question and answer period? If not, I would rather that hon. members pursue the policy discussion. Perhaps the hon. member wants to include this one question in his remarks?

Mr. Harkness: I am not going into detailed discussion. I am merely citing this as proof that what the minister said was not correct. The minister said I gave only one instance of overblown staffs, and I say I gave two other specific instances. I am referring to one that I gave. Civilian personnel in administrative headquarters, as shown in the estimates for this year, has increased from 2,512 to 3,599, an increase of nearly 1,100. Last year the increase was from 1,200 to 2,500; it more than doubled the year before, so that in two years we have more than a 200 per cent increase in the number of civilian personnel here at Ottawa.

Then, of course, I also mentioned the increase which had taken place throughout the services, the navy, the army, the air force and so on. I mentioned particularly the large increase which had taken place in the number of stenographers, typists and so forth, and the way in which, apparently, the paper war was being stepped up. Another thing that I mentioned was the great burgeoning of staff that there had been in the training and staff duties branch of the army. I shall not go into the details of that again. If anyone wants to see some examples of it, all he has to do is to get one of the officials sitting in the gallery to supply him with a telephone directory for national defence headquarters. He will see there the great multiplication of staffs that exists, particularly if compared with what the situation was during the war and before the war.

The minister had something to say in answer to the Leader of the Opposition and me in regard to the lack of equipment in the reserve forces. The minister did not really deal with this lack of equipment, but mentioned particularly carriers and jeeps. He said that if the units were losing carriers, they had been taken away for repair, I think it was, and the jeeps had been taken away but were being replaced by some kind of general service truck. That may be, but I know that I have been getting these complaints that units have lost their jeeps, and I certainly do not hear that they have been replaced by anything comparable. The minister did not go into some of the more important complaints, such as the lack of directors in the artillery and other technical equipment of that sort; the lack of guns themselves, and so on. He did say something about breech rings. These guns were being sent back to have the breech rings changed as a safety measure, although the guns have been in use for years and years. However, it may be necessary to do that, but I certainly do not think you needed to take away all the guns from the unit at one time in order to do that. The removal of the guns could have been staggered so that a unit could have continued training. There was no necessity to interrupt or destroy unit training in order to change the breech rings. The lack of directors and other technical equipment was not dealt with.

The minister said something which really discouraged me. He said the units were trying to get down to the amount of equipment that they need so that they could carry on more efficiently. I would ask him if any of the units were trying to get rid of their directors; have they been trying to get rid of their jeeps or their guns? It is complete nonsense to say anything of that sort. The units have been complaining very strongly about the way in which equipment has been taken away from them. The minister says it was taken away to please them. It is really not a very sensible statement.

So far as equipment generally in the reserve forces is concerned, I do not think there is any question at all but that there was no need for any of the units to suffer in their training or in their morale as a result of the removal of material from them. It could have been removed in shifts if it were being taken away to be repaired, and then returned. If it was being taken away to be sent overseas, it should have been left with the unit until the new equipment had arrived to be put into their hands. In this way the unit would not have been left without anything.

In that connection, one of the particular complaints concerns the anti-tank regiment, with which I happen to be personally familiar. Some two or three years ago the anti-tank regiments lost their guns. In some places those anti-tank guns were replaced by 25-pounders, and the units were told to train on them. Since that time none of these units have known what their situation is. They do not know whether or not they are anti-tank regiments. The generally expressed opinion is that the anti-tank branch of the artillery is being eliminated, and that the job is being taken over by the armoured corps. It may be a good thing to do that. Certainly a reserve force unit which is designated in a certain way, and left to train in a certain way, should not be left up in the air that way, with their regular normal equipment taken away and replaced by different sorts of things, and more or less in a position where they do not know where they are at. I think perhaps the time has come for the minister, during this debate, to make a definite statement as to what is to be the fate of the anti-tank artillery, whether they are to continue with that or whether they are going to be converted into something else; and if so what it is and when this will take place, so that these units will have something definite to strive toward in the future.

Mr. E. T. Applewhaite (Skeena): Mr. Chairman, I have endeavoured to follow this whole debate as carefully and as steadily as possible, with the exception of a while I missed on Monday night, and it seems to me that now we are on the second time around, so I should like to say a few words about it. We have apparently reached the stage where the same speeches are being made by the same opposition members, as I say, for the second time around.

There is one thing that I think must impress itself upon every member in the chamber as a result of this debate and that is that quite obviously the true worth of the Minister of National Defence and of the Department of National Defence is recognized, if not admitted, by the members of the opposition. That is quite obvious from the ineffectual and ineffective nature of the criticisms which so far they have attempted to bring against the minister and his department.

In this debate there was one matter only of major importance which caused me considerable worry, and that was the suggestion of belittling the theory that the defence of Canada should be carried out as far away from Canadian shores as possible. In the whole world picture, including such projects as the stopping of aggression in Korea and the building up of an army in Europe, I understand that we on the North American continent have been perhaps a little bit selfish but that it has been our idea and our intention that the only potential enemy which we can see shall be stopped at the other side of either the Atlantic or the Pacific ocean. If, at this stage of world affairs, that is a wrong premise, on which to build Canadian defence policies, then I think perhaps we have definitely failed. The statement was made by the hon. member for Nanaimo, as reported at page 3819 of Hansard of April 14:

> We are told that we should defend Canada as far away from Canada as possible. That is a delightful dream, . . .

He continues a little bit further down the page:

> The long and the short of this matter seems to me to be that we have left our front door wide open while we have sallied out through the back door.

If the members of the 25th brigade and the 27th brigade have sallied out through the back door and are now holding potential aggression at bay in Asia and in Europe, I should like to know which is the front door that we have left open.

Mr. Chairman, you were gracious enough to permit the hon. member for Greenwood to make rather extensive references to parts of the Currie report. At that time the hon. member for Greenwood was permitted to place upon the record extracts from a radio speech by a Liberal and which referred to the Currie report. I like the hon. member for Greenwood so much that I should like to have the privilege of returning the compliment, and for his benefit I should like to place on the record a quotation from a speech on the Currie report made by a Conservative, one who was frankly introduced on "This Nation's Business" program as a Progressive Conservative candidate in the forthcoming federal election. But before coming to that matter, I would remind the committee that, as reported at page 3934 of Hansard, the hon. member for Greenwood said with great emphasis:

> —there has not been a dent made in the Currie report.

I think that most likely he is correct. But while the Currie report may at the present time remain undented, Mr. Chairman, it has been rather severely twisted. On the program "This Nation's Business" on March 31, 1953, one Sybil Bennett—quite frankly I do not know whether to say Mrs. or Miss—

An hon. Member: Miss.

Mr. Applewhaite: I am told it is Miss. Referring to the report she said this:

> The general answer—

That is to the inefficiencies of this government.

> —is the elimination of waste and extravagance and wild spending which it appears runs into hundreds of millions of dollars. As Mr. Currie pointed out in his report "nobody knows how many millions are being wasted".
> There is no way of knowing because the government refuses to investigate or to allow anybody to investigate this spending.

I would draw to your attention, Mr. Chairman, that what I have in my hand is supposed to be a copy of the official text filed with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and the words attributed to the Currie report, "nobody knows how many millions are being wasted" are in quotation marks. Heaven knows that by this time I should know the Currie report almost by heart, and those words are not in the Currie report. Let us see what Mr. Currie did say. He was investigating losses at Petawawa. He was referring to Petawawa and here are his exact words:

> No reliable estimate of the total loss can be prepared. It does, however, appear probable that the total loss resulting from misappropriation and irregularities by military personnel at Petawawa was not large.

Incidentally he praises the personnel at other depots he investigated for not having the same losses and "praise" is the word he used.

Mr. Fulton: Would the hon. member read the next sentence?

An hon. Member: Make your own speech.

Mr. Applewhaite: I have no doubt whatever that the hon. member for Kamloops will place on the record anything which he considers to be pertinent. Perhaps he will afford me the courtesy of allowing me to make my own speech.

In connection with that item I would point out that it has been variously estimated, so far as I can learn, that these losses run somewhere between $35,000 and $85,000. Let us take the bigger figure. There is a large difference between $85,000 and many millions.

Mr. Chairman, this political business is never too pleasant. I think all of us enjoy a good, honest opponent. I for one—and I pick two names out of the hat—appreciate the type of speech which will be made by such members as the hon. member for Vancouver East and the hon. member for Eglinton. But when certain individuals find it necessary to coin non-existing quotations in order to—

Mr. Bryce: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of privilege. Does the hon. member not mean the hon. member for Ottawa East instead of the hon. member for Vancouver East?

Mr. Applewhaite: No; I said Vancouver East.

Mr. Bryce: I cannot understand why he should blame the hon. member for Vancouver East.

Mr. Croll: He is praising him.

Mr. Applewhaite: I am not blaming him; on the contrary. I am afraid that my hon. friend was not doing me the courtesy of listening to me as closely as I should like to be listened to.

Mr. Bryce: We cannot hear you over here for the chorus.

Mr. Applewhaite: I had said that the hon. member for Vancouver East is an outstanding example of a good, honest political fighter, a comment which I regret I cannot apply to the author of this particular speech. So much for the efforts being made to twist the Currie report, which perhaps still remains undented.

There is a natural, legitimate and praiseworthy unanimity in this chamber in honouring the qualities, the efficiency and the activities of the members of the 25th brigade and the 27th brigade.

[Mr. Applewhaite.]

If there is one subject that comes under the heading of national defence upon which we are all united it seems to be that one. I am reminded of the story of an investigation of a unit during the second world war in which it was reported, allegedly, that the privates and the N.C.O.'s were the finest and most efficient type that it was possible to find anywhere, but that the officers of this unit left much to be desired. It was pointed out that it is practically impossible to have an efficient unit of privates and N.C.O.'s unless you have efficient, competent officers training or leading them, and I think that is pretty well admitted. I should like to know how it is that we can have such an efficient brigade as we have in Korea, such efficient units as we have in Europe, without an efficient Department of National Defence sponsoring them.

It has been, as I said, our unanimous effort to show our support to the individual members of these overseas brigades. We vie with one another to hand them compliments, and rightly so. In the civil service, members working for the Department of National Defence are also a cross-section of Canada. We have a great many individuals who could not be in Korea or Europe, either on account of sex, disabilities such as short sight and so forth, on account of age, or on account of the fact that there is a limit to the numbers we are sending.

I cannot conceive any valid reason why we should have apparently such a tremendous difference in honesty, in efficiency, in desire to serve between those Canadians who are overseas, or who are in uniform, and those who are working for the Department of National Defence and who are the subject of the criticism which is being levelled at the Department of National Defence at the present time. It is beyond argument that those servants of the Department of National Defence could make a great deal more money and would have to work no harder, if as hard, if they were to be employed by private industry in Canada today. Therefore something should be said also for them, though I admit that for some reason I do not quite understand it is not politically quite as popular to defend a civilian as to defend a man in the armed services.

Another criticism levelled at this government, which would be a very valid criticism if it were well founded, is that not enough information is being provided, or that not enough opportunity is being allowed, to discuss defence matters properly, with particular reference to the present session. I have been in this house only since the fall of 1949. I do not think I can recall a session I have attended, except perhaps the special session of 1950, when the same complaint was not made in much the same words. It is a stock Tory argument which, if they use it often enough, becomes so ingrained that I honestly think some of them believe it themselves. It has been used ad nauseam at this session which began on November 20, and I think this is the 87th sitting day.

I have had a rough check made of Hansard of what we have discussed and the time we have taken discussing defence in this session. You will find in Hansard 47 pages of debate on the bill to appoint an associate minister of national defence; 79½ pages on the Currie report; 160½ pages on the debate before the defence expenditure committee was set up; 20 pages in the budget debate and 201 pages dealing with this sort of thing in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. If you assume that the average time taken per page is seven minutes, which I am told is what it is, then we have had over 15 full days so far discussing defence in this house, irrespective of the meetings of the committee that may be held, and you can add two or three more days for this current debate.

We hear that in the United Kingdom they get more information and more time to debate, that the opposition, private members or some others are given better opportunity to take their part in this type of debate than we get in Canada. Well, I have the white paper of the United Kingdom in my hand; I have the parliamentary debates of the United Kingdom for the period which I am going to discuss, namely March of this year. I am told that 26 days is their usual debate on the estimates, of which 4 are allocated to national defence, or what is their equivalent of our Department of National Defence, and 1 day to debating the white paper. In these parliamentary debates, if hon. members will read them, they will find that not many questions are asked or answered. They consist more of debates on matters of policy and on matters allied to war.

I hold in my hand the English white paper headed "Statement on defence, 1953." In my opinion there is far less information in that white paper than in the white paper tabled in this house by the Minister of National Defence at the beginning of this debate, and there is certainly less information in it than that same minister has given to us during the course of this and other debates. It may be suggested that the reason for that is that in the United Kingdom they have a committee on estimates. They have. It holds all its meetings in camera; it is a very small committee. I understand it does not have a report, and I cannot find that it has reported so far this year. We also have a committee on defence expenditure in this house.

Let us go back to 1951. That committee sat only 4 days in 1951. In 1952 it sat for 17 days, during which time I know of no officer or employee of the Department of National Defence who was asked for and not produced, and I know of no questions that were asked which were unanswered, other than those which were classified and came under the heading of security. In that connection may I say that the opposition never endeavoured to push a question where security was involved. In 1953 the committee has sat from January 27 up to now, and until a date yet to be determined, but it has sat so far on 21 or 22 days.

With particular reference to last year's committee, of which I was a member, it was given so much information that we could not digest it; we could not handle it. The information was given to us in answer to questions. It was given to us day by day at approximately the same time that we were being told by the opposition that they could not get the information they wanted, with the natural result that every question they asked was answered. I have a filing case full of the answers of last year that I have never thoroughly sorted out even yet. I am told by people who have been here five times as long as I have that never in the history of the Canadian parliament has a committee of any description received so much information, and so much information which there were precedents for withholding, as was provided to that committee in 1952. In its report that committee used this sentence:

> All information sought by the committee was obtained except that no action was taken with regard to the following matters: component parts of certain fighter aircraft, ships and armament considered secret.

I believe it is honest to say—and I stand corrected if I am in error—that no opposition member on the committee objected to that paragraph going into the report. Not only that, but a large number of members of the House of Commons, in the short time I have been here, whether they have been members of that committee or not, on more than one occasion have been afforded opportunities by the Department of National Defence to visit various types of military establishments. The committee visited Plouffe Park. The parliamentary group which visited Churchill was not confined to members of the committee. There were trips to Canadair and trips to Kingston. There have been several trips laid on by the Department of National Defence for the advantage and information of hon. members. If there is any criticism in all this now being levelled at the department which will not stand up, surely it is the criticism that information has not been obtainable, or that opportunities for discussion of matters connected with the department have not been afforded.

May I conclude these rather disjointed remarks by paying a compliment to all those members of the opposition who thus far have taken part in the debate. I think I have heard all but two of them, and have read their speeches; and I compliment them upon the good judgment one and all have shown when they have declined to say either "We could have done better", or "We could do better".

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): Mr. Chairman, I should like to join with other hon. members who have taken part in the discussion of the first item in the estimates of the Department of National Defence, and in doing so I shall deal with a matter vitally connected with the community in which I live, and one which has been close to my heart through many years. I refer to the plants of A. V. Roe Canada Limited at Malton, Ontario, where aircraft and the Orenda engine are produced. This subject has been debated in the house on former occasions. Perhaps the background of the Malton plant should be described, because up to this time that phase has not been mentioned by the minister or others.

The Chairman: Order. Perhaps it has not been mentioned by the minister because it might be discussed more properly under the estimates of the Department of Defence Production. If I am inaccurate in that I should like to be enlightened. It seems to me, however, that there is nothing in these estimates that has anything to do with the Malton plant.

Mr. Graydon: I think there is, Mr. Chairman. It will be realized as I go along that the Malton plant plays a very important part in these estimates, and that a considerable amount of the money to be voted will go to the production of aircraft at that plant.

In the late thirties Malton airport site was chosen. Since 1936 the airport located there has developed until it has become the greatest in Canada. Alongside it grew up, first of all, the plant of what was known as the National Steel Car Company. Then Victory Aircraft was established. And now, after the close of the second world war, we have located there A. V. Roe Canada Limited. All three of these organizations manufactured aircraft.

At the present time A. V. Roe Canada Limited employs in its two plants—the original one and the new Orenda engine plant—over 13,000 men and women. The company is one of the largest employers of labour in the whole metropolitan area of Toronto and, I suppose, one of the largest employers anywhere in Canada.

It has been a matter of considerable pride to me, as the member of that constituency and living close to the plant—because I suppose I live closer to it than any other member, and for that reason have been able to see it more often—that we have at that point in Canada such a magnificent industry, which not only has made a good record up to the present time under almost impossible circumstances, but which also is giving to Malton the distinction of being the centre of the Canadian aviation industry, both in peace and in war.

I am one who has always championed and supported the industry at Malton. It has not always been popular to take that position because, as most hon. members know, there have been criticisms. These have not been confined to parliament or to any political party, but have been made because people have not always understood the gigantic difficulties and obstacles those three companies, including A. V. Roe, have faced from time to time; difficulties which are being overcome today by A. V. Roe Canada Limited in connection with the production of the Orenda engine and the CF-100 with its various marks which are now being designed and will be produced later on.

I have always felt that if there be criticism it should not be directed against the management or the employees of the plant, but rather against the departments of government. It can be said, in simple language, that in an aircraft manufacturing policy there are, speaking roughly, three alternatives that could be followed. First of all, the plant could build large numbers of obsolete aircraft on a high-speed production line, and show to the public a tremendous record of numbers produced. But when they were produced it would not necessarily follow that such aircraft would have any major value in our defence program.

A second alternative would be to do no designing and no original research work at the plant, but rather to obtain licences from someone, or from some other country, that has originated designs. Then those models could be put on the production line and, again, a great showing could be made as to the number of aircraft coming off the assembly line.

Those alternatives, however, have not been followed at Malton. I am one who believes that the alternative chosen has been the proper one. In the plant, since the close of the last war, with a large amount of government assistance the A. V. Roe plant has succeeded in setting up a research, designing and developing team which has now reached the point where there are few better such teams to be found anywhere in the world. They have produced in their plant what we believe, and I think the government believes, is the best jet airplane engine, and the best aircraft of its type in the form of the various marks of the CF-100.

Having chosen that alternative, one cannot expect the same amount of production, or the same quantity off the assembly line, as if the other alternatives had been followed. After all, the very last word in production, design and manufacture of both engines and aircraft is coming off the assembly line in the Malton plant.

That brings up another aspect which is of very great importance to that area. We feel that the designing, research and development team ought to be kept intact so that when the current international tension and impasse have subsided there will be a great peacetime centre of the civilian aviation industry there which will of course be of great importance to Canada in the days that lie ahead. That is the reason I think the proper course has been followed, and I hope the government will not change its policy in that respect but will pursue it despite the fact that there has been considerable criticism from time to time of the number of planes that have come off the assembly line at Malton.

There is one other matter to which I should like to refer, and that is the untold difficulties and almost impossible obstacles that have faced the management and employees of the plant during the last few years. It is hard enough to produce aircraft and engines in a pioneering atmosphere such as we have had at Malton, but one of the greatest problems arises from the fact that just when the design is ready to go on the assembly line for manufacture the Royal Canadian Air Force or some department at Ottawa asks for some minor, or sometimes major, change in the design which again stops production for weeks and sometimes months. It is a pretty discouraging situation to find that from time to time such changes, which seem to occur more often perhaps than is necessary, are holding up production on the Malton assembly line.

I think the minister should consider having a somewhat closer liaison between those who are experts at the plant in these matters and the Royal Canadian Air Force and his own department, so that consultations may be held and agreement reached to bring about fewer of these minor and sometimes major changes in the structure of the plane itself, thus allowing the plant to proceed more rapidly with its manufacture. If that were done I am quite sure there is a possibility of the planes and engines coming off the assembly line much more quickly than they have in the past.

I make that constructive suggestion to the minister because I am anxious, just as he is, to see to it that the position of A. V. Roe Canada Limited is brought to as high a position in Canadian estimation as it is possible to achieve. It does seem to me that perhaps the Malton plant is now, to use the language of the street, over the hump, and I am satisfied that the plant has a management team and group of employees who are capable of doing an extremely efficient and effective job for Canada and our forces generally. I think it can be said that those in the present set-up at Malton know where they are going and how to get there. I think that sizes up the situation the department will now find in the plant. I believe the plant deserves an opportunity to show what it can do, and I should like to see it get that chance with as few obstacles as possible placed in its way by those who are directing or giving orders with respect to the requirements of the air force.

If this is done I am convinced that the plant will turn out in satisfactory numbers the kinds of planes and engines that are expected of it by the people of Canada. I can remember quite well when the little village of Malton was not a very important point on the old Grand Trunk line and later on the Canadian National system running west from Toronto. It has grown since 1937 until it is now a major centre in industrial Canada. I believe that the plants there now, together with the airport, will be responsible in the days that lie ahead for Malton not merely being a village or a town but one of the great industrial cities of Canada and the central point of our aviation industry in Canada, and perhaps even in a broader sphere.

I wanted to make that point clear because the question of Malton's success is a matter affecting a great many people in my constituency. I am not sure how many people in the county of Peel work there, but there must be somewhere between 3,000 and 5,000. Generally speaking working conditions are good, and I think the employees are, in the main, satisfied with conditions. I am anxious, however, that there shall be full co-operation between management, employees, the research, designing and development team and the department so they may all go forward together in a co-operative enterprise and demonstrate that today there is no better or more effective plant for manufacturing engines and aeroplanes anywhere among the NATO nations than the plant at Malton.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to go over the same course twice, as was suggested by the hon. member for Skeena, but unfortunately the Minister of National Defence in making his reply yesterday omitted to answer two of the questions that I raised and rather brushed me aside on the third one. Therefore I must return to the attack.

I was endeavouring to find out in the first part of my remarks yesterday, which dealt very briefly with casualties, the exact figure of our casualties to date. I pointed out to the minister that in response to a question I had raised in the house in the first week of February I received a reply to the effect that our casualties as of the 31st of January numbered 1,335. Today's paper contains casualty list No. 172, which gives the total as 1,304. In his remarks yesterday the minister mentioned a figure of 1,300. Why can we not have the exact number? I asked for a correct statement in so far as casualties are concerned.

The second point I dealt with was the problem of ammunition, and I have been dealing with this ever since the last week of November. Not for the first time did the minister suggest that to discuss this problem would have a bad effect on morale. Yesterday he said, as appears at page 3927 of Hansard:

> I suggest that this is a matter on which hon. members should exercise the usual caution which should be applied to matters affecting the morale and welfare of the troops.

A similar remark was made by the minister in December. I would suggest to the Minister of National Defence that questioning in the House of Commons concerning the ammunition situation on the field of battle is all to the good, that the morale of the troops who are actually engaged in battle and the morale of the troops about to go to the field of conflict will be heightened by their knowledge that the House of Commons is intensely interested in their equipment and supplies, and particularly with regard to the amount of ammunition on hand. Their morale will be heightened because the House of Commons is eager to see that no pains are spared to ensure that a full supply of ammunition is available. That will raise their morale, and not lower it. I think the worst thing for men serving overseas in any type of war is to feel that they are forgotten and that their interests are being neglected. There is nothing in what we have said here in the House of Commons that would tend to do other than raise the morale of the troops overseas. It shows that we are not forgetting them and that we know what is going on.

My regret is that the minister yesterday and the day before did not give us a full account of the situation in Korea. For example, I asked him if we were employing Korean soldiers in conjunction with our troops. I had a question on the order paper some time ago asking for that information and the answer I received was no. One week later there was a press report to the effect that Korean troops were going to be used within our Korean battalions. Well, we are left in the air again.

Yesterday I asked the minister whether we were making use of the protective clothing that has been devised, clothing which has some armoured component in it. The minister did not comment on it, but I think it is an important matter and that we should know about it. The thing which disturbs me so much about the matter of defence is that a veil of secrecy is drawn over things that need not be secret, and we are depending so much on press reports. We are not getting information here in the House of Commons. I think a great deal of credit is due the people who furnish us with so much of this information, but I think it would be better if we received that information directly in the House of Commons.

With respect to the ammunition problem that I have raised, the minister considered that my argument was dismissed by certain quotations which he made from a debate in the House of Commons at Westminster and from a newspaper report of what President Eisenhower had said. The minister, at page 3927 of Hansard, quotes from a reply by the British prime minister to Mr. Shinwell as follows:

> I am informed that the ammunition supply in Korea has always been sufficient to meet the operational requirements of the United Nations forces, and shortages of ammunition have not restricted the planning of operations.

I would draw the attention of the house to the fact that Mr. Winston Churchill has admitted in his statement that there have been shortages of ammunition. Why we cannot get the same admission in the House of Commons here, I do not know; but on March 9, when I asked a question of the Associate Minister of National Defence with regard to ammunition supply the answer was given, as it appears on page 3726 of Hansard, in these words:

> —there is no shortage of ammunition in respect of actual operations.

Then the Minister of National Defence quoted from a press report concerning what President Eisenhower had said, and I shall just repeat four lines which appear on page 3927 of Hansard:

> President Eisenhower said yesterday there is sufficient ammunition in Korea for present scale operations and then described the supply situation as perfectly sound under current circumstances.

I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that these statements do not stand up under analysis. Mr. Winston Churchill's statement admits that there has been a shortage of ammunition. He says that shortages of ammunition have not restricted the planning of operations. Well, of course not; they never do. You can always plan if you have one round or a thousand rounds. If you have a thousand rounds you may attack, but if you have one round you plan to sit tight or perhaps retreat. You can plan under any circumstances, having regard to the amount of ammunition you have available. General Van Fleet pointed out exactly the same thing in his testimony. Of course, you keep your planning going; but during the last several months it has not been possible to plan for anything more in Korea than to sit tight and take it, and I think that is what our troops have been doing. They have been sitting tight and have been shelled unmercifully by the Chinese. I think we have not had sufficient ammunition for counter-battery work to knock out enemy guns.

We have President Eisenhower's statement that there is sufficient ammunition in Korea for present scale operations. Of course there is sufficient for present scale operations. If you are not doing anything, if you are not going to fire any ammunition, if you are not going to make an advance, perhaps you do not need any.

I will recall to the minister's attention the situation that prevailed on the western front in 1915 of which he is aware, either from first-hand knowledge or from reading about it. There was a shortage of ammunition in those days and operations were planned continually; but the operations were cut short, as I pointed out in an early speech in this house, on instructions from the high command that the operations should come to a conclusion. The reason? No ammunition. That is why I have been raising the question of ammunition in the house, hoping to get a reply along somewhat different lines than I have received.

We have the admission from the minister that whereas in December we were on the American supply line, now, for certain types of materials, we are on the British supply line. That is useful information and perhaps we are better off on the British and Canadian supply lines for ammunition for the 25-pounder gun, a type which is not American and which is used in the commonwealth division. I understand that our supply of ammunition for those guns has been reasonably adequate.

Will the Minister of National Defence, who should have the information, say whether we are on the American supply line for other things which General Van Fleet said were in short supply, such as mortar shells and grenades? I do not know, and who does know? Unless the Minister of National Defence can supply the information we are left in the dark. The suspicion is that there is a shortage of mortar shells and grenades.

The average Canadian who understands the productive capacity of this country fails to see why we cannot come forward and offer to assist. Are we supplying ammunition from Canadian sources, and, if so, why can we not be told? I have seen press reports since this disturbance in the United States with regard to ammunition shortage indicating that Canadian sources were being tapped to supply ammunition. That is all to the good, but why cannot we be so informed?

As the situation stands at the moment I think my queries with regard to ammunition have been rather brushed aside and we are left in the uncertain position of not knowing whether our troops in the field have a full and complete supply of ammunition, not only to sit in the trenches and be shelled until casualties occur every day, but ammunition sufficient to knock out enemy guns. Also I asked a question about our ammunition supply in Europe, which press reports say is below the required amount. No answer was given to that.

My third point yesterday had to do with the Royal Canadian Armoured Corps, and I emphasized the fact that it was being neglected under the present circumstances. To my regret the minister failed to heed that particular section of my speech yesterday, for I thought he would make some comment on it. He did say one or two things with regard to armour. We have been suggesting from this side of the house that more armour should be made available. We have suggested an armoured brigade for Europe. My statement on that is in Hansard on more than one occasion.

I have noticed, Mr. Chairman, that you can have a first-class argument if those who are participating do not talk about the same thing. It might even develop into a row. For purposes of this debate, however, I think we should discuss the same thing, and I suggest to the minister we should discuss the same thing. The point I was discussing was an armoured brigade, and according to page 3921 of Hansard for April 15, 1953, he transforms that into an armoured brigade group. Here are his words:

> We have the type of unit we were asked to provide and which fits into the scheme of things on the other side.

I would be inclined to ask for more explanation with regard to that particular sentence, but I shall pass on to the next.

> It enables us to train and operate independently as a unit, but an independent armoured brigade group working in isolation from a division or a group, as I have said before, is a military monstrosity. We have never heard of such an organization, and it could not operate.

Then farther down he says:

> —in order to create the unit that has been suggested, as we understand it, we would require larger forces than the present ones.

Let us talk about the same thing. Let us talk about an armoured brigade, and let us not talk about an armoured brigade group. I have never mentioned an armoured brigade group. I am talking about an armoured brigade. I say that if we maintained an armoured brigade in Europe and an armoured brigade at home, we could then train the Royal Canadian Armoured Corps as it should be trained and deserves to be trained. We would maintain a proper balance in the army.

Mr. Claxton: Perhaps we can find out if we are talking about the same thing. May I ask the hon. member if that would mean an armoured brigade in addition to the present infantry brigade or in substitution for it?

Mr. Churchill: I suggested yesterday it would be in substitution for it. I suggested an armoured brigade in Europe and one at home, and an infantry brigade in Korea and one at home. You would then have replacements. There would be an infantry brigade in Korea and an infantry brigade at home.

Mr. Claxton: And an armoured brigade in Europe?

Mr. Churchill: And an armoured brigade in Europe, as well as an armoured brigade at home. The situation now is that we have an infantry brigade in Korea, one in Europe, and what have we here? There is one at home. There is one on its way to Korea and one on its way back; that is about the way it works out. There is a parachute brigade, and then the one in Europe.

If we are talking about the same thing, an armoured brigade would use about 510 fewer men than an infantry brigade. You would have increased fire power and effectiveness through mobility with an armoured brigade as compared with what you have in an infantry brigade. I am speaking now of the situation in Europe. With about 510 fewer men, you would have 144 heavy guns in the tanks which would exceed the artillery component now attached to the brigade over there.

I wish to draw that to the attention of the minister, because I felt we were certainly discussing things which were not normally comparable. He was able to brush aside this suggestion of an armoured brigade for Europe because he said we were talking about something which was a military monstrosity. I think, Mr. Chairman, that it would be possible to devise formations that are not necessarily in accordance with war establishments as to the last man or the last gun that is required. During the course of the war that was done frequently. All sorts of formations were organized which might be called, by some people, military monstrosities. They turned out to be very effective. I suppose some people would suggest that Wingate's forces which were used in Burma were a military monstrosity, or that the desert patrol which operated in North Africa was a military monstrosity, or the special service battalion, and so on. I have not been discussing anything of that nature. I have been discussing simply the well-known armoured brigade.

In the last war we had the first and second armoured brigades. The British had several of them. The eighth British armoured brigade was very well known, and its strength was effectively used in conjunction with infantry formations. Why could that not be done now? The infantry formations supplied by other nations in Europe could be supported by the Canadian armoured brigade. That is what I am suggesting to the minister. I think this neglect of armour in the Canadian army is a very serious matter indeed, and could be corrected if steps were taken along the lines I have proposed.

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Chairman, two or three points remain on which hon. members have asked for information and on which I shall be glad to do my best to give them that information.

With regard to the question asked by the hon. member for Gloucester relative to the school at Rockcliffe, we were in the position where we had a considerable number of married quarters, and no school accommodation was provided by the local school authorities. In accordance with the practice we have followed right through the Department of National Defence wherever that condition exists, we established a school at Rockcliffe. It was established in accordance with the laws of Ontario. We follow that practice in each case where we have to establish a school.

The school was set up, the teachers were appointed, the curriculum was established and it was operated in accordance with provincial practice.

Then the school was later taken over by the city of Ottawa. The area surrounding it became part of the area of the city of Ottawa. It has continued in operation in accordance with the provincial law. If anyone has a suggestion to make that it should be divided or dealt with in some other way, I suggest that is a matter to be dealt with in accordance with the law of Ontario, and in accordance with arrangements made between the city of Ottawa, the province of Ontario and the Department of National Defence. We are complying with the provincial law.

Mr. Gagnon: Does that mean that the Department of National Defence has nothing to do with the school at Rockcliffe?

Mr. Claxton: Oh, yes; we operate the school in the same way that we operate every other school we have. We have about 40 schools for the children of serving personnel. We have them in nine out of the ten provinces in Canada. In each case we operate the school in accordance with the law of the province. We make arrangements with the board of education, under which a school board or similar body is set up to operate the school. In Ontario, we have schools at Barriefield, Borden, Rockcliffe and a number of other places as well. All are operated in accordance with arrangements made with the province.

The most usual arrangement is that we contribute the capital cost of the school, just as the local school corporation would ordinarily contribute the capital cost, and then the province contributes whatever proportion it would contribute to a school of that size and in that locality. Usually it is 50 per cent of the cost of maintenance. The province approves the selection of teachers, who must meet provincial requirements.

Academic standards, textbooks, inspection and the like are all according to provincial standards. The school operates in the same way as does an ordinary school operating under the provincial system, the only difference being that instead of having a school corporation there is the Department of National Defence which usually appoints the commanding officer at the station and the required number of others to constitute the school board or committee. In the case of Ottawa, however, because of the fact that the school is in the area which has been taken over by the city of Ottawa, we are now working under arrangement with the city of Ottawa.

With regard to casualties, I overlooked the fact that the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre had queried the number. The number he gave was apparently picked out of the Canadian Press report which was arrived at by totalling the figures of casualty lists as they are issued without making subsequent adjustments. The number, as at April 15, 1953, is 1,322 battle casualties and 77 deaths from ordinary causes, making a total of 1,399.

The hon. member for Nanaimo called my attention to an error I certainly made, but which I might explain by saying that when we refer to a destroyer escort vessel or ship we think of a new modern type, none of which has yet been commissioned. The article in question referred to destroyer escort ships and in that more general category were included the modified destroyers which he had in mind. The hon. member for St. John's East also made some remarks with regard to the statistics relative to ships, and in order to make this matter perfectly clear perhaps I had better go over the facts again.

On April 14, 1953, at page 3810 of Hansard, I was reported as saying that we have in active operations 56 ships. That is not correct. If Hansard correctly reported me, then I was speaking without notes at the time and I did not make the full statement that appeared in the white paper as I intended to do, because in the white paper I stated that we expected to have 56 naval vessels in commission during 1953-54 and, in addition, a number of other auxiliary vessels.

With regard to naval vessels under construction, we have actually placed orders for 53 naval vessels, including auxiliary vessels, and are preparing to let contracts for 18 others, making a total of 71. Of these, 26 naval vessels and 10 auxiliary vessels are as of this date actually under construction.

This all relates to orders placed in Canadian shipyards. In addition there is H.M.C.S. Bonaventure which is being pressed on to completion at the shipyards in Belfast on the other side.

With regard to the observations of the hon. member for St. John's East with regard to discrepancies, between the article in Canadian Shipping by the chief of the naval staff and other statements, I would like to say again that these deal with different time periods. At page 25, paragraph 129 the white paper shows a total of 52 new vessels on order.

The article by the chief of the naval staff, at page 82 of the March issue of Canadian Shipping, shows the total number of ships in the approved program as 72. This latter figure includes 18 ships the construction of which had been approved but for which contracts had not been let at the time the white paper was drafted. It so happens that the white paper and this article were prepared at a time when considerable changes were occurring in the figures. This article also includes five Gate vessels which, as is noted in the table on page 82 of the article, were completed but not under construction.

The white paper, in paragraph 130, states that six of the fourteen minesweepers have been launched and the article refers to eight having been launched. Two were launched during the period between the dates used in the white paper and in the article.

In my statement at page 3920 of Hansard for April 15 I said that all these minesweepers had been launched. By this I meant that I was informed that all had reached or passed a state when launching would have been practicable; but as hon. members know, in certain shipyards—for example, in Saint John, New Brunswick—construction is continued on the ways while in other shipyards the hull is ordinarily placed in the water while the ship is being completed.

Then the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre referred to the question of body armour. I must say that I had not known of his inquiry at the time. We are using the lightweight body armour that has been developed in the United States. It is on issue to units of the commonwealth brigade in the proportion we agree on. We also have developed in Canada and have under further investigation a material which is comparable in stopping power to that at present in use. It shows promise of improvement in some other characteristics.

With regard to mutual aid, on checking over my notes I find that I did not answer a question asked by the hon. member for Nanaimo as to the shortfall. There it appears that, on the best figures so far available for the fiscal year 1952-53, there will be a shortfall of approximately $90 million. This is made up as follows; direct production, $9 million; air crew training, $7 million; equipment from the second world war, $32 million; a change in the method of charging for F-86's on mutual aid account, $9 million, although in the latter we are 40 per cent over our target on deliveries; equipment, $6 million. That makes a total of approximately $93 million. On other accounts we have delivered $2 million more than is estimated, arriving at a net shortfall of about $90 million.

With regard to the question of ammunition, raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, the objection I take to his remarks—and I hope he will not mind my repeating it because it seems to me to be a perfectly reasonable objection or comment when one is responsible for raising troops—is in the use of such phrases, if I have noted the words correctly, as "shelled unmercifully because of lack of counter-battery activity." I think that was the phrase the hon. member used.

We have no evidence or report, and there is nothing in the record anywhere to indicate any basis whatever in fact for that assertion or suggestion. It is on that account—and I hope the hon. member will excuse me—that I say that on such matters one must speak with a great sense of responsibility. I described the situation with regard to ammunition before proceeding to the last meeting of the North Atlantic council, as we understood it, and I supplemented that description yesterday.

We are in this position in the Korean war. We are part of the commonwealth division and as such, with respect to most items, we are on the commonwealth supply line which largely comes from British sources. Sometimes we put articles of equipment into that supply line, but do not ship them direct to the Canadian brigade. In this way we sent at one stage 200,000 25-pounder shells to the commonwealth supply line. They were used by all the forces of the commonwealth, all of which are equipped with 25-pounders. But for other types of equipment Canada, unlike the other commonwealth countries, is relying on the United States supply line and that applies to other guns, our Sherman tanks and some other weapons. It would be totally uneconomic and impossible, I think, for us to set up a separate supply line of our own. And we work in close co-operation with the other countries.

The situation regarding ammunition was as described in the statements of Mr. Churchill and President Eisenhower, but I will go on, if the hon. member wishes, and read from the testimony of General Van Fleet when speaking before the Senate armed services committee on April 1:

Senator Kefauver: I believe you testified in previous testimony that all of the troops in Korea, from whatever nation they came—except perhaps the English and Canadian troops—were supplied with American ammunition. Is that correct?

General Van Fleet: No, sir. The British supply their own ammunition.

Senator Kefauver: I say all except the British are supplied with ammunition from this country.

General Van Fleet: Yes.

Senator Kefauver: Do the Canadians supply their own ammunition, or do we supply them?

General Van Fleet: We supplied them. They were equipped with our ·105 Howitzer initially; but as I understand that today, they are using the British ·25 calibre.

We were never equipped with the ·105. I continue:

Senator Kefauver: So we are probably supplying some of the Canadian units, and the English are supplying some of the Canadian units.

General Van Fleet: No, sir. I think it is all British today. The British division has organic artillery entirely of British make.

Senator Kefauver: How did your ammunition supply for our troops and for those that we were supplying compare with the reserves and the use by the British division that is in Korea?

General Van Fleet: I have never heard of a shortage of British ammunition.

Senator Kefauver: Do you know whether they had a larger proportionate supply than we did?

General Van Fleet: Their commanders stated they had a good supply.

Senator Kefauver: You do not know the details about that?

General Van Fleet: Yes, sir, I know the quantity they mentioned to me, which was greater than our quantity. I think that quantity is confidential. I will tell it to you in executive session.

I suggest that these statements taken together indicate that for the purpose of operations we have had the ammunition we needed. Now it is perfectly clear to anyone who has had any experience in battle that nobody has ever had, or ever will have, all the ammunition they want. General Bradley made an amusing reference to that in his own evidence in answer to a Republican congressman, Dewey Short, General Bradley said:

No artillery man ever had enough ammunition to shoot, any more than any preacher ever had a large enough congregation.

That is well known to all of us. Therefore in times of relative inactivity like the present the troops are rationed in the use of ammunition—they are often rationed during battles, as everyone knows—they are not rationed and they are not short when they need the ammunition for purposes of fighting, on occasions of great danger; and that is the position as I understand it today. But I think the fact is that despite all this talk about the shortage of ammunition, the United Nations forces have been firing ammunition at a rate which is ten times that of the forces who oppose them, and very much greater than all but the most extreme rates of either the second or the first world wars.

The hon. gentleman suggested that it would be better if he got this kind of information in the house rather than from press sources and press releases. Well, if the house spent its time getting this kind of information or that on aeroplanes, as suggested by the hon. member for Brandon, it would not have time to do anything else. This requires full-time operation by very large staffs of people to look after it, and to provide the house with up to the minute information on changes and developments in aircraft, ammunition, guns, equipment and the like, would very soon weary the house and prevent it from doing anything else. We also assume that hon. members have available to them the ordinary information that appears in the press or in magazine articles.

Reference was made by the hon. member for Calgary East to the F-86E aircraft, in which he questioned the statements that had been made about the superiority of this aircraft. The fact is, as I understand it, the new F-86E aircraft have earned a combat ratio of nine to one over the MIG-15 in Korea. That is quoted in the white paper, from the actual words of the report of the Hon. Robert Lovett, former secretary of defence in the United States.

The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre again referred to our playing down the armoured corps. There is no intention of doing that and there is no indication of that being done. Everyone appreciates the great importance of armour and its proper place in any fighting team. What we have said is that it would not be in accordance with Canadian practice and would not meet the wishes of the Canadian people to have a Canadian armoured brigade which was not capable of operating independently. A brigade group which would be capable of operating independently would be a very large and much more costly team than what we have.

Mr. Churchill: What does the minister mean by saying that an armoured brigade cannot operate independently? Under what circumstances would he expect it to operate independently? Armoured brigades normally co-operate with infantry formations. Could not Canadian armoured brigades co-operate with British divisions in this way?

Mr. Claxton: Yes; but in peacetime in Germany, in order to have it exist, it would be necessary to integrate it very closely indeed with British units, British formations, so that it would have the services of supply, R.C.E.M.E., signals, army medical corps, hospital, post office and all the other services that our brigade groups have in order to permit them to operate independently. If you added all this to an armoured brigade so as to make it what I understand an armoured brigade group to be it still could not operate independently; it would operate always in conjunction with one or two infantry divisions, whereas our brigade group is in effect a small division with armour, with artillery, with signals, with engineers, capable of operating independently, and until recently it actually has been so set up as part of the army reserves.

Finally the hon. member for Calgary East referred again to some of the remarks that have been made about the equipment of the reserve forces. This has been gone over time and time again and I have no intention of going over the ground at length. But I must say this. We at national defence headquarters—and when I say "we" I mean the officers advising me, the chief of the general staff, the adjutant general, the quartermaster general—know of no shortage of equipment such as those referred to by the hon. member. They had not been called to my attention before except in the article in the Calgary Herald. What is extraordinary is that they had not been called to our attention in the meetings of the reserve association.

The meeting of the artillery reserve association took place in October after these changes had been promulgated. I have their resolutions here. Not one of them refers to any shortage of equipment for training. We met the officers of the association, and exchanged views in the freest possible way, as is the practice, and this was never raised. Then, later, the conference of defence associations met in a three-day session at Ottawa, and raised every conceivable question they could, bearing on the work and the good relations of the reserve forces. No question of this kind was raised by them.

What was done was that, in order to permit artillery regiments to make the best possible use of equipment that could be supplied to them for training purposes, the general officers commanding were given a pool of guns on the basis of entitlement of four 25-pounders per unit, where a regiment was located in one spot. That was done so as to reduce the amount of equipment on charge, to reduce maintenance costs and to reduce the need for storage space. There is no shortage of 25-pounders. We have been giving them away to our European allies and we still have ample left to meet all our needs until such time as they are replaced by 105's out of our own production.

With regard to tractors the entitlement was precisely the same, that is, four per regiment. Again there is no shortage. It is entirely up to the discretion of the general officer commanding. If one of the regiments has three instead of four, then no doubt it has been due to the exercise of discretion by the general officer commanding, or to the fact that one was being repaired, or for some other reason.

In respect of jeeps, we have decided to replace service jeeps for operational training with more modern types. That was done by putting in the hands of general officers commanding pools of jeeps to be used for this purpose. That was begun simultaneously with the beginning of their withdrawal, to renovate them and send them abroad. However, to replace jeeps at regimental headquarters used for administrative purposes, vehicles of commercial types have been issued. That issue is 80 per cent complete, and should be completed within the next month.

I hope I have answered all the questions, but if I have not perhaps we could deal with them when we are discussing the details.

Mr. Harkness: What about anti-tank regiments?

Mr. Claxton: I am sorry; I had forgotten to mention that. It is a difficult question; but the role of anti-tank regiments is a matter being considered by the British, the Americans and ourselves in close conjunction. It has not yet been decided, so far as Canada is concerned, whether this role will be carried out by armour or by artillery. However, it looks to me as if the old self-propelled anti-tank gun will be replaced right across the board by armour—that is, by tanks. As hon. members know, there has been very little difference between the two. The tanks we are getting have heavier and more powerful guns. However, so far as we can judge, the units will be the same, and will occupy the same roles, but will simply change their names.

Mr. Harkness: Does the minister mean that likely they will be transformed from artillery units to armoured corps units?

Mr. Claxton: That point is still receiving consideration. I said it was likely. However, I do not like to anticipate military decisions that have not yet been made, and the matter is still receiving consideration.

Mr. Pearkes: As reported at page 3822 of Hansard I asked a question regarding the plan being followed in the construction of permanent and non-permanent buildings. I asked as to where these were being built, and the number of troops that were to be employed permanently in Canada, for which quarters were being provided. Perhaps the minister would answer that question either now or when we reach the detailed part of the estimates.

Mr. Claxton: I would have to get the figures for the hon. member. However, when I dealt with the matter yesterday I referred him to those places in the report of the proceedings of the defence expenditure committee where that matter had been discussed. I referred specifically to June 12, 1952 and March 17 and 24, 1953. If the hon. member wishes to have additional information, or would like to have it in some other form, I shall be pleased to get it for him.

It looks as if the minimum number of troops we would have for Canada would be upwards of 104,000. Of that number 43 per cent are married. The proportion living in would depend of course upon our commitments in Korea and in Europe, as well as the number at sea, engaged in exercises and the like. However, it has been found necessary, as hon. members know, to build a very large number of barracks across Canada to accommodate the men actually there. We have not yet finished that operation. For example, on Sunday I visited Clinton air school. Most of the men there are doubled up, in order to take care of the peak load of those engaged in radar and wireless training. We expect that condition will continue in several of the air stations until we have passed the peak.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Do I understand the general discussion has been completed?

Mr. Pearkes: I have one further question to ask. In the committee we were told we would have to ask the minister for a statement of policy. Do I understand it is the policy to provide permanent quarters for 104,000 troops, of all arms, whom the minister visualizes as being stationed in Canada in the future?

Mr. Claxton: Oh, no, sir. I was saying that the numbers we have reached are 104,000. However, 43 per cent are married. A very considerable number of those live either in married quarters, of which we now have about 20,000 units, or in privately-owned houses. Then we would have to subtract those who are serving abroad, so long as the Korean and North Atlantic treaty commitments continue. Then we have those serving in training schools in isolated units. What we aim to do is provide accommodation in our barracks for the balance, the steady population.

Mr. Pearkes: What is the steady population for which the minister is building permanent accommodation?

Mr. Claxton: I can get that figure for the hon. member.

Mr. Pearkes: I can understand the provision of temporary quarters to meet the Korean situation, which may not go on at the same scale for an indefinite length of time. But I would like to know the permanent population for whom the minister is making this provision.

Mr. Claxton: I shall get the figure for my hon. friend.

Mr. Fulton: I should like to ask a further question before the conclusion of the general discussion. My question arises from a statement made last night by the minister when he was discussing the present staff establishment of the deputy minister. The general explanation the minister gave for the fact that at the present time the staff of the deputy minister exceeds the total of the three staffs of the three deputy ministers for the navy, the army and the air force during the war years was that a number of functions formerly discharged by the strictly civil administration are now assumed by the deputy minister's office.

Perhaps I have not put it quite accurately; but the point I had in mind was that, as the minister said, while the three services were formerly responsible for the preparation of their own estimates, that is now done by the deputy minister's office. As I followed the minister giving the figures of the differences that would be accounted for by changes in function, I came to a total of approximately 50 which would be accounted for by increase in function within the office of the deputy minister, which would mean that at the present time, comparing the size of the staffs to the staff of the three deputies during the second world war, there would be 64 people in the office of the deputy minister now doing the same sort of jobs that were done during the war by 98, which was the maximum on the staffs of the three deputies. I know that a straight mathematical calculation does not always give rise to a valid comparison, but the discrepancy is still so large that I would ask the minister to give some further explanation.

If you take 64 on the staff of the deputy minister doing the same jobs that were previously done by 98 and then bear in mind the size of the forces today as being approximately 100,000, you get a ratio of about 1 to 1,500, whereas if you take 98 on the staffs of the three during wartime and divide them into the number in the services during the active stages of the war, being approximately 900,000, you get approximately 1 to 9,000. Therefore your ratio is 1 to 1,500 as against 1 to 9,000. It is a sufficiently impressive difference that I think we should ask the minister for some further explanation as to whether in fact there is not a tendency to increased staff which is not warranted by the size of the operations being undertaken.

Last night the minister, in starting that portion of his remarks dealing with the problem, gave the following explanation in partial justification for the tendency to increase staff. He said, as reported at page 3925 of Hansard:

Hon. members have referred a great deal to the Currie report, and some hon. members have heard that report discussed before the special committee on defence expenditures. They will find from the evidence that the statement I made in the house on January 13 was completely confirmed, that is, that a major factor in the lack of control which gave rise to my appointing Mr. Currie and the making of his report was the lack of sufficient staff to do the job. Actually we are understaffed today in the Department of National Defence.

That is the minister's statement, which must be read in the light of the fact that there is this disparity in the ratio of the deputy minister's staff to men on strength as between now and wartime of 1 to 1,500 as against 1 to 9,000. This also makes me ask the minister for a further explanation when I read that statement which I have just quoted in the light of what the minister was saying back in 1948 as to the basis on which Canada's defence forces were then being organized. In 1948, I might point out, we were appropriating approximately $250 million for defence purposes, which was a very large figure up to that time for peacetime establishments. The minister, in outlining Canada's defence objectives and programs and the reason why that amount was being asked for, made the following statements as reported at pages 5784 and 5785 of Hansard for June 24, 1948:

Against this background it is now possible to set down Canada's present defence aims and objectives. They are: . . . (2) to provide the operational and administrative staffs, equipment, training personnel and reserve organization which would be capable of expansion as rapidly as necessary to meet any need.

Then at page 5785 he said:

Our plans are being made now for up to five and even ten years ahead, with changes provided for to meet expected developments.

Then a little later he said, "Our plans are flexible." Finally, at the bottom of the first column on that page there is the following:

Secondly, the active army is to provide the administrative and training staff—the cadre of officers, N.C.O.'s and tradesmen—to train the reserve army and with it form the nucleus for as large a force as Canada may need.

With reference to the first quotation from 1948, namely to provide the operational and administrative staffs, equipment, training personnel and reserve organization which would be capable of expansion as rapidly as necessary to meet any need, I realize of course that this must be read and taken in the light of the fact that it was pre-Korea, and that the staff then actually in being had to deal with personnel numbering in the neighbourhood of perhaps 35,000. But it must obviously be—and I think this is surely a correct statement—in the contemplation of any minister or department of national defence and their planning staffs that their eventual job in the final analysis is to meet what may happen but which we hope will not happen, the eventuality of war. Therefore when the minister said "would be capable of expansion as rapidly as necessary to meet any need" I think we must take it that ultimate eventuality was in mind.

We are left confronted with the situation that two years prior to Korea the minister said that plans were being made then to provide the staff and administrative organization capable of expansion as rapidly as necessary to meet the need and form the nucleus for as large a force as Canada might need. One can understand that in 1950, on the outbreak of the Korean war, there would necessarily be a considerable period when expansion of the organization lagged behind the immediate requirements. That would be inevitable and necessary and not open to criticism; nevertheless the possibility of a shooting war must have been foreseen, although not in the exact form it has taken, and it seems to me that we require an explanation as to why in 1953, three years after Korea, the minister is still saying that "actually we are understaffed today in the Department of National Defence".

Two years before Korea, five years ago, we were told that Canada's defence program then provided for a staff capable of expansion as rapidly as necessary to meet any need. The need arose in 1950, two years after that statement; but now, three years after the eventuality which occurred in 1950, we are still told that we are understaffed.

I put these considerations before the committee and the minister because, while I know we cannot be dogmatic in these matters and cannot be unfair, it does seem to me that the situation, with all the serious consequences of a breakdown as revealed in the Currie report—a breakdown which might not have exposed the department to criticism had it been confined to the first year following the outbreak in Korea—does raise very serious considerations when we find it still continuing three years after the outbreak in Korea, especially in the light of what the minister said two years before that outbreak.

It seems to me that it also requires quite a lot of reconciliation of the circumstance that we find at the present time in one part of defence headquarters, the staff of the deputy minister, numbers of staff giving us a ratio of 1 to 1,500 men in the forces against a ratio of only 1 to 9,000 during the period of active war. I would ask the minister to please enlarge on the difficulties and give us some explanation of why it is that he is compelled to say, three years after Korea, that they are still understaffed in the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Claxton: I would be very glad to, Mr. Chairman. The reason is that the operations, measured in terms of construction and acquisition of equipment—that is, measured in terms of material or money—have been much larger since Korea than they were at any comparable period of the second world war. They consequently have required and should have required a larger staff. Unfortunately we have not had that larger staff and, as Mr. Currie said, there was a breakdown of the accounting, not in the department but in a single branch, the army works services. That was something we knew before. Mr. Currie did not tell us that because it had been reported on before and we were seeking to get staff to remedy the situation. We are still short of staff and having difficulty in getting it.

With regard to the size of the deputy minister's staff, ratios are very interesting indeed; but with an operation of the size and nature we have with the navy, army and air force totalling 104,000, located in six different countries, carrying on all the operations of training and fighting and doing those in peacetime, then I suggest that you have a situation which is far more complex in character, though not nearly as large in size, than anything that existed in the first or second world wars.

The office of the deputy minister of national defence today in its burdens, in its day to day grind, in the volume of work that he has to see to and also in the number of conferences with other countries and other departments at which he must be represented, I venture to say is at least as great as the sum of that of his three predecessors in the department. When we co-operate with the United States and Great Britain so closely it may take only one man to represent Canada for any one purpose, but it does take one. Because Canada has one-fifteenth of the effort of the United States, or whatever the fraction is, it does not mean that we can send one-fifteenth of a man to a conference. We still have to be represented by one man, and that is the reason ratios are not so relevant in this regard.

With regard to the build-up, we have always had these objectives. In 1948 the objective was to get staff to do the job. The staff was just good enough and just big enough to enable us to get into the Korean business without too great dislocation. What we are doing today is representative of about 25 per cent of the war effort. It is about 25 per cent, measured in terms of men, money and materials, of our wartime activity.

Having raised the Korean force we were immediately faced with the consequences of having done the job pretty quickly and then, at once, we were landed with the job of raising the 27th brigade and the units for Germany and Europe. While they were very much smaller in size they were just as complicated in the arrangements that were required, as would have been the case in sending abroad a force ten times larger. But once again, when you come to measure the thing in terms of construction and equipment, materials and money, the development during this period has been greater than that in any corresponding period during the second world war. That was the only relevance of the figures I gave, comparing the defence activities with the figures I gave yesterday.

Mr. Fulton: From the first part of the minister's answer do I understand him to say that what has happened in the sense of construction, accommodation and other installations of that sort, post-Korea, is of a nature and scale not envisaged at the time his statement was made in 1948? That was the indication I took from the minister's answer.

Mr. Claxton: It was envisaged, but that did not affect the staff in 1948. The plans in 1948 provided for a build-up of staff to do a major job, but we did not get the build-up of staff in the time we wanted although we still had to do the job. The same situation exists today. If we were to be landed with a third world war overnight we of course have very full plans for mobilizing the effort of the nation and getting the thing going so that all our resources would be used to the fullest possible extent in the shortest possible time. That very operation would involve taking into headquarters here and across the country in the commands officers and civilians whose names we have set opposite their places.

Mr. Fulton: Do I take it—and the minister will appreciate that the question is not intended in any personal sense—that three years after the outbreak in Korea, in the light of the statement he made in 1948, it is still logical and satisfactory that he is still understaffed in the headquarters of national defence? Is the minister satisfied first that he is actually understaffed and second, that it is unavoidable that three years after the outbreak in Korea he should still be understaffed?

Mr. Claxton: The minister is never satisfied with anything; but I do take the view of the chief auditor, Mr. Currie, and the deputy minister that we are understaffed in respect of services having to do with financial control.

Mr. Fulton: Only in that respect?

Mr. Claxton: Although I am speaking from memory I think there are between 1,500 and 2,000 civilian vacancies in the establishments that have been created by the civil service commission and approved by the treasury board and the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Fulton: That was the figure given with respect to the army works services, as I recall the discussion on the Currie report. Do I understand the minister to use the word "understaffed" now and last night in the sense only of accounting control personnel, or to apply it generally to all activities of the defence department?

Mr. Claxton: It would be necessary to look up the schedule. The shortage of staff does not apply only to the army works services, although it does not apply right across the board.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It would appear that the general discussion has terminated and I might remind hon. members that it was agreed on Tuesday that following the termination of the general discussion we would proceed to call items in the blue book, commencing on page 295, subhead by subhead. Therefore if it is the wish of the committee I shall proceed in that manner.

Departmental administration, including inspection services.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I spoke in the general debate in connection with the large increase that had taken place in the number of personnel under this heading and also under similar headings for each of the other services. The minister has not yet given any explanation of why it was necessary to increase civilian staff under "departmental administration" in Ottawa from 1,200 odd in 1951-52 to 2,512 in 1952-53 and then to 3,599 for this current year. That seems a very large increase, and I think we should have some explanation of why an increase of 200 per cent in two years is necessary.

Mr. Claxton: A single item accounts for much more than half of the increase, and it is the size of the inspection service. That is due to the increased load we have to carry for the acquisition of equipment.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, it seems that the acquisition of equipment could hardly account for this 200 per cent increase, because we were acquiring a considerable amount of equipment in 1951-52. As a matter of fact, that was the equipment we acquired over the period we were looking into last year in the defence expenditure committee; and very large amounts were involved. Since that time we have had this 200 per cent increase, and it seems to me that either there are other explanations or there are too many people there.

[Mr. Claxton.]

Mr. Claxton: The increase is, as I said, almost entirely due to the increase in the size of the inspection service. The number of positions in 1952-53, as set up, was 2,512. The increase since is 1,087, for a total of 3,599. Of these, 1,833 were in the inspection service in 1952-53, an increase of 953 for a total of 2,786. In other words, out of a total increase of 1,087, 953 are in the inspection service. That is accounted for by the increase in the amount spent on equipment. You will see that going up year by year. In 1950-51, it was $144 million; in 1951-52, $486 million; 1952-53, $692 million; 1953-54, $923 million.

Just to complete the picture I should add that we do the inspection work for the United States armed forces, and additional inspection officers have to be taken on to cover this part of the operation. We now supply the United States with a considerable amount of equipment.

Mr. Nickle: I was interested in the minister's explanation of the increase in civilian staff in the administration of the Department of National Defence. If I may, I should like to ask the minister some general questions concerning the total number of civilians employed by the Department of National Defence both in the administration and in the three services. I notice that the total amount in the new estimates set aside as civilian payroll for the defence department amounts to about $87,999,000, which is an increase of $18 million over last year and represents an increase of about 26 per cent. This includes, of course, the classified employees plus the casual and prevailing rate help.

In terms of numbers, the classified establishment of civilian staff presents some rather interesting increases. These estimates show a total of 25,090 civilian staff plus, according to the white paper, approximately 19,800 currently engaged as casuals and prevailing rate help. The total classified civilian staff for the current year represents an increase of about 22 per cent over the past year, an increase in numbers of about 4,460 people. I notice that as between the past fiscal year and the year prior to that there was an increase of 30 per cent, again an increase in the total number of civilian personnel of 4,835. The minister has given an explanation as to why the civilian personnel engaged in administration increased so sharply. It was mainly due to an increase in the inspection staff. However, in the total number of civilians employed in the Department of National Defence, we have some rather remarkable increases in what you might call the junior classifications.

I notice that in the matter of typists we have an increase as between last year and the current year of 518, the total being 1,861. This figure corresponds roughly, I believe, to about one civilian typist for every man we have engaging the enemy in Korea. Percentagewise the number of typists has increased 39 per cent compared with last year. I might add, however, that there has been a decrease in one type of civilian help which, while I am glad to see it, may perhaps not be for the best in the light of the large increase in the number of typists. I refer to the number of civilian typewriter inspectors and repair men employed. In this category we have a 25 per cent decrease compared with last year. The number dropped from a total of 12 to a total of 9. In view of the fact we apparently have such a large increase in the number of typists engaged, and thus in the number of typewriters used, the minister might give some consideration to ensuring that an adequate staff of typewriter inspectors and repair men is engaged to service this large increase in typewriters engaged in the paper war.

In another classification we have stenographers. During the current year the total number of stenographers engaged by the department in the civilian establishment is 1,345, which is an increase of 253 compared to last year. Percentagewise it is an increase of 25 per cent in that particular class. In the classification of clerk we have an increase over last year of 931 the present total being 4,471. This represents a percentage increase of about 27 per cent in that category. According to the white paper the members of the active force currently engaged in our commitments under NATO, for Korea and for the defence of Canada number about 43,200, whereas we have in the classification of administration just over 25,000 civilian employees, something like 6,000 service personnel engaged in commands and administration, and of course an additional 19,800 civilian employees in the category of casual and prevailing rate. This makes a total of 50,800 civilians or military personnel who may be said to be engaged in administration. This figure of 50,800 exceeds by a very substantial degree the total number of active service personnel, 43,200, who are actually engaged under NATO, for our Korean commitments or in the defence of Canada. I wonder if the minister could give us some explanation for this sharp increase in the number of civilian personnel this year as compared with last.

Can we assume that these increases, ranging from 20 per cent to over 30 per cent in the various classifications of civilian employees, are going to be reflected in any comparable increase percentagewise this year in the number of men actually engaged in the active forces of our country?

Mr. Claxton: Well, sir, the activities of the men engaged in Korea have, as the hon. member knows, no relationship to the number of stenographers, and vice versa. I do not need to press that point. The fact is that we have tried to get just as big a proportion of the job of national defence done by civilians as possible, for reasons which I have made clear on a number of occasions. Upon comparison I find that we have just about the same proportion of service to civilian personnel as they have in the United Kingdom and in the United States; that is about 1 to 2.5, one civilian to 2.5 service personnel. Since we believe the number of operational troops is comparable, that would seem to be, on any basis of comparison, a fair result.

With regard to the various categories which the hon. member mentioned, as he knows the establishments are set up only after an examination by the civil service commission. We have working in the commission a team consisting of service personnel, representatives of the deputy minister, of the treasury board and of the civil service commission itself. They look and see whether or not it is necessary to have an additional employee in any spot. Before an additional employee is appointed the establishment has to be created. I can assure the hon. member that there are far more refusals to create an establishment than there are approvals. This can be turned down at probably 15 to 20 stopping places before it gets approved. However, in the last result, if it does pass the civil service commission it then has to be approved by the treasury board, which has its own officers right in our department checking up to ensure the greatest possible efficiency. Therefore if a civilian establishment is created it is because a job needs to be done and it is usually created about six to nine months after it is first requested.

With regard to typewriter repairs, they are done to the greatest possible extent under contract. We hope to get out of the typewriter repair business ourselves as much as we can. These typewriter inspectors are able to service typewriter machines. We try to replace civilians by civilians in continuing non-combatant jobs, and we also try to replace service personnel by civilians in continuing non-combatant jobs. In the work of ordnance depots and other similar activities, we should like to see the depots run or managed by civilians with as few service personnel as possible in order to secure continuity and a professional attitude on the part of our civilian service. We are endeavouring to acquire more civilians of a higher quality or grade in order to bring that situation about. I can assure the hon. member that this matter receives the most continuous attention not only from the department but from the civil service commission and the treasury board.

Mr. Harkness: In view of what the minister has just told us about replacing military personnel with civilian personnel at national defence headquarters here and at other places, can he give us the comparable numbers of military personnel employed here at national defence headquarters for the years 1951-52, 1952-53 and an estimate for 1953-54, something like the figures we have shown on page 297 of the estimates, for 1952-53 and 1953-54.

Mr. Claxton: March 31, 1950, 2,207; March 31, 1951, 2,229; October 31, 1951, 2,310; January 31, 1952, 2,362; April 30, 1952, 2,425; January 31, 1953, 2,447.

The Chairman: Shall we pass on?

Mr. Harkness: I take it from these figures that the policy of replacing military personnel by civilian personnel at the headquarters, although a large number of civilian personnel have been added, has not succeeded in reducing the number of military personnel. The number of military personnel has continued to mount.

Mr. Claxton: In just a year we have had an increase of 22 in a total of 2,425; that is 1 per cent. During the year the operations have increased more than that extent in complexity.

Mr. Harkness: The general point I was making was that it appears from the various figures the minister gave as at the end of March, 1950, 1951 and 1952 and so on, that there has been an increase in the number of personnel, so it would appear that the policy of replacing military personnel has not been unduly successful; at least it has not been successful to the extent of reducing the numbers of military personnel at headquarters.

Mr. Claxton: I think that is correct.

The Chairman: Shall we pass on?

Mr. Adamson: No. I want to ask the minister a question as to the three officers mentioned here, the co-ordinator of works and accommodation, the director of bureau of current affairs and the director of public relations. I should like to know what are the functions of those three officers.

[Mr. Claxton.]

Mr. Claxton: The co-ordinator of works and accommodation has charge of the acquisition of real estate, the handling of real estate matters, the settlement of claims and the like. For example, recently his time had been almost fully occupied in connection with the acquisition of an area of 440 square miles at Gagetown. The director of the bureau of current affairs is in charge of the information services supplied to the officers and men of the armed forces, including the publication of Current Affairs, the supply of wall maps, movies, news and so on to the troops at home and abroad, courses that are given to officers in instruction and group leadership and so on—the kind of thing that was mentioned by the hon. member for Cape Breton South a few days ago.

The director of public relations handles releases of information with regard to casualties, promotions and other matters of general news, and generally facilitating the flow of news to the press and other agencies for the dissemination of information.

Mr. Adamson: Has the minister any estimate of the cost of these two officers, the directors of public relations and the bureau of current affairs? What is the over-all cost in the current year of the operation of these branches? Just the salaries are given here.

Mr. Claxton: The directorate of public relations has salaries, $52,360; travelling and removal expenses, $30,000; freight, express and cartage, $500; telephone and telegraph, $3,000; maps, engravings, information material, $40,000; office equipment and supplies, $37,000—that is largely photographic supplies; and sundries, $5,000; or a total of $167,860. The bureau of current affairs has salaries of $112,290; travelling and removal expenses, $20,000; printing and publications, $100,000; office equipment and supplies, $5,000; sundries, $40,000; or a total of $277,290.

The Chairman: Shall we pass on?

Mr. Adamson: No. It is six o'clock.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Adamson: I have one question I should like to ask the minister. I have been trying to get an answer to it for a number of years. I notice that this administration service covers a great number of people. At the camps I have had—as I think most men who have visited the army establishments have had—some criticism from the training administrative and also general staff officers about the excess work they have had to do on the housekeeping level. I refer particularly to looking after the accounts for such things as the grocery store, the general stores and the other stores that are set up to look after married quarters.

In these major camps there has to be some sort of place where the groceries, food and other things can be bought. At Petawawa, for instance, the turnover is in the nature of many hundreds of thousands of dollars a year. While it is not public funds, the auditing and the administration of those stores is a matter for which staff officers have to take a certain amount of responsibility. It takes a great deal of their time which could normally be devoted to training, to organization, or, as we used to say, to getting on with the war.

It seems to me a very strong case could be made for the establishment under our military set-up here of an organization similar to the NAAFI in the United Kingdom. I have had a number of officers in the permanent camps complain to me that they had to spend so many hours per month auditing the books or answering complaints of soldiers' wives about goods they had bought in the grocery store. That is something which should be taken away from the military side and put on the civilian side, or put on some sort of permanent basis. The training officers, the responsible officers in these camps should not have to be bothered with the organization of these grocery stores and other stores that serve the civilian personnel. Can the minister say whether that is under consideration, or whether anything is likely to be done about it?

Mr. Claxton: Yes, it is under consideration. We have a great number of establishments in the navy, army and air force. We try to keep them on about the same lines in so far as their functions are the same. At isolated centres they have to operate stores. These stores are usually operated by regimental institutes, or the like. We have given a great deal of consideration to the introduction into Canada of a system like NAAFI. We were going to call it CAAFI in Canada, but we have decided not to do it at once but to look further into the possibility of introducing this type of civilian organization to operate service stores and establishments. Of course this is all outside government moneys.

Mr. Adamson: Yes, I realize that.

Mr. Claxton: And they are profitable institutions. The question is how they are to be operated. Who is to operate them and who is to get the profit from them? And of course who is to control them? Well, the navy and the air force are quite content with their service set-up. The army would prefer to have something corresponding to NAAFI, and these differences relate quite a lot to the difference in function of the three services. The navy has ships which do not quite fit into the ordinary NAAFI pattern. The air force does things very well in its permanent stations. The army feels it would be desirable to have these stores operated by a civilian agency.

We have given a great deal of thought to that; we have had a great deal of experience on it in the post-war period in the three services in Germany, in France and in England, as well as in the Far East. I can say that the matter has been given very close consideration indeed. The great thing must be to secure effective control of an efficient operation. So far we believe that we have both the effective control and the efficient operation; but it might be more effective and more efficient as regards the army at least if it were put more in civilian hands.

Mr. Adamson: My point in raising the question was the amount of time that has to be spent by the executive headquarters staff at a camp like Petawawa or Borden in looking after these stores. I am glad to know that something is being done, because I know it will relieve the officers of a great deal of responsibility, since very considerable sums are involved.

I should like to ask the minister a question about the messenger service. I see listed here a senior messenger and confidential messengers, and another item with the general heading "messengers". I assume that this service is rendered at headquarters. I cannot say whether or not it covers the commands. I note that about $100,000 or more is involved. What is the sum spent on messengers and how many of them are at national defence headquarters? How many vehicles are there under the director of supply and transport that are doing a job connected with the messenger service?

Mr. Claxton: The hon. member has indicated the total amount in all these pages spent on the messenger service?

Mr. Adamson: Yes.

Mr. Claxton: I do not find in any item a total figure such as the one he mentioned. It would be necessary to go through these items and get the information he has requested.

Mr. Adamson: How many motor vehicles are there at national defence headquarters doing the jobs of messengers? What does the minister do when he wants to send a messenger from the House of Commons to his office at national defence headquarters? Does he have his own confidential messenger with a car?

Mr. Claxton: Cars would be made available from the Canadian army service corps garage on Catherine street to meet those requirements. Then there is always one attached to the Prime Minister's office in the east block, and one attached to the minister's office in the Department of National Defence. They are kept pretty busy going back and forth. Apart from that, no cars are earmarked for messenger service.

The Chairman: Then may we pass on to the next group of items?

Royal Canadian Navy—Active force and general.

Mr. Adamson: I see here five items for gardeners totalling about $50,000. Why does the navy have to spend that amount of money on gardeners? Are they attending marine gardens? It does seem unusual, particularly in the navy.

Mr. Claxton: Hon. members know that the navy derived some of its best support during the second world war from the wheat farmers of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba. Perhaps some of the so-called gardeners are there. This relates to the work of keeping in order the grounds at Esquimalt on the west coast—which are quite considerable, I might say, but still inadequate—as well as those at Halifax in the east, and at Dartmouth across the harbour. Then there are 22 naval reserve divisions, all of which have grounds to be kept in order. Altogether there are more than 40 major divisions of the navy ashore, all of which have grounds around them which must be kept up.

Mr. Adamson: So far as I can see the other services do not have expenditures for gardeners. It is somewhat incongruous to find the navy, which is supposed to operate at sea, with this expenditure for gardeners.

Mr. Claxton: I find at page 304 of the details several items for gardeners in that part of the estimates concerning the army.

Mr. Adamson: In my day in the army the defaulters used to do that sort of work.

Mr. Claxton: We do not have enough defaulters.

Mr. Pearkes: When I spoke the day before yesterday I referred to the conversion of the former destroyer Algonquin to an escort vessel, and pointed out that the work of changing her from her former role was carried out by Yarrows at Esquimalt. According to a statement made at one time by the minister the Algonquin was to be the prototype of other vessels which were to play a similar role. Then the next vessel to be converted from a destroyer to that of an escort vessel, namely the Crescent, had her conversion carried out at the dockyard at Esquimalt.

It seems to me the experience gained at Yarrows in connection with the original conversion, and in drawing up the prototype plans, was lost when the second vessel was taken to H.M.C. dockyard at Esquimalt for conversion. Surely it would have been more profitable to have the same work carried out at the same shipyard, instead of going to a competitor in the form of a government-sponsored dockyard. If the information I have received is correct, the original contract for Crescent was given to Yarrows, but after the work had been started it was switched to the dockyard. Surely that type of operation not only discourages the civilian shipyards but also means delays in production. There must have been delays in the converting of the second vessel. Would the minister tell me why the switch was made from Yarrows to the dockyard?

Mr. Campney: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I might be permitted to deal with the hon. member's question. The conversion of the Algonquin, as he states, was done at Yarrows, and reconversion of the Crescent at the naval dockyard is following the same pattern. It is my understanding that when a lead yard —and we try to keep a number of them fully occupied—does a job such as was done on the Algonquin the plans and specifications and all the details of what has been done become the property of the navy and may be used in any other yard.

That is the first point. The second point is that the maritime commission keeps under surveillance all the different lead yards in Canada, and the disposition is to see that they are all occupied as far as is reasonably possible. With respect to reconversion of the Crescent, whatever yard might do the work would, as I have said, have the advantage of all the work that was done at Yarrows because all plans and specifications accrue to the crown. The disposition of these ships made by the maritime commission is such that they go to different yards at different times for different purposes in order that all lead yards may be reasonably utilized.

Mr. Pearkes: I presume the minister realizes that Yarrows shipyards are a private concern whereas the dockyard is government-owned and in this case is in direct competition in shipbuilding with the civilian shipyard located in the same city. I should think that the original purpose of the dockyard was to repair government ships, and it is hardly its role to enter into the shipbuilding business and undertake work which is normally performed by private shipyards. I think the minister will agree with me that the job done by Yarrows on the Algonquin was excellent, and there would seem to be very little encouragement for the civilian shipyard on the west coast where there are not too many orders, I can assure you. Men have been laid off by Yarrows because of these switches of contracts, according to the information I have received from these yards.

I feel that very little encouragement is offered to the civilian shipyard to go into naval construction if, after having had all the difficulties of producing the prototype vessel, the next vessel, in connection with which they could have utilized the experience gained by their draftsmen and technicians in producing the first vessel, which would make it easier for the shipyard to produce the second, is taken away from them and given to a government dockyard. I hope the minister will bear in mind that it is most essential that we keep shipyards on the west coast alive, and I think some restraint must be exercised in giving orders to the government dockyard in preference to the private enterprise shipyards.

I do not know that I can say any more about it. I do feel that is a consideration which should be borne in mind. Does the Minister of Defence Production wish to say something?

Mr. Howe: My hon. friend suggests that the lead yard should do all the work in the type of vessel in which it leads. Of course that is not the idea of preparing Canada for war. We try to give several shipyards experience in the type. For instance, Vickers is the lead yard in the new type of escort destroyer and perhaps could turn them out like sausages, but instead of that we have several yards working on the escort destroyer, including two yards on the west coast. The purpose is to build up an industry that has the technique to meet a war situation. That explains the Algonquin and why the sister ship, the Crescent, was put in another yard. My hon. friend says we should always use private industry in preference to government industry.

Mr. Pearkes: I did not say that.

Mr. Howe: I can assure him that we have civilians working in both, and they all have to be kept employed. As a matter of fact, about a third of our war contracts for ships are placed on the west coast, which is about the proportion that should be placed there. I think the yards on the west coast engaged in purely naval work are employed to the full extent of any yards in the east. Of course some of the eastern yards supplement such construction by commercial work which they find through their own initiative, but I doubt very much if an analysis of purely naval work would show any lack of attention to the west coast.

Mr. Pearkes: Of course I did not say that all the work should be given to civilian shipyards. The minister put words in my mouth which I never used, and the record will show that. All I am saying is that a fair share of the work should be given to the civilian shipyards, and I question very much whether there was any advantage in this particular case in placing the second vessel in the government dockyard rather than giving it to one of the civilian shipyards. There are two shipyards in Victoria, but instead of giving the second vessel to one or other of them it was given to the dockyard.

However, the explanation has been given and the contract has been let. We cannot take it back. I can only express my regret that some consideration was not given to the civilian shipyards, and I can only hope that in future the civilian shipyards, as opposed to the government dockyard, will be given their full share of shipbuilding construction. If we are in a hurry, and if we are anxious to get these vessels built by the target date, we shall have to take full advantage of the experience that has been gained.

The second point I want to discuss is the question of the removal of the magazine from Colwood to Rocky Point. According to information I have, which information has been given in the house and in the press, the Colwood magazine is being removed to Rocky Point. I think Rocky Point is somewhere between 15 and 20 miles to the west of Esquimalt. Colwood magazine is located on the western side of Esquimalt harbour.

Can the minister say when Colwood magazine was completed and how much its construction cost? My recollection is that it was only built in recent years at very considerable expense. It is not a storage but an expenditure magazine. It is not for the purpose of storing reserves of ammunition but merely to have sufficient ammunition on hand to replenish the supplies carried on vessels which may be expended during training or operation. The main reserve magazine is at Kamloops, and in the past the reserves have been railed to the expenditure stores at Colwood.

According to our information the magazine is being moved to Rocky Point, which is an exposed promontory of pretty flat ground. As it is outside the inner defences of Esquimalt harbour, ships that come into Esquimalt harbour will be required to move around to Rocky Point where additional jetties will have to be built, and where there will be very limited if any opportunities for concealing ammunition stores. If this ammunition was going to be placed back in the hills farther inland and concealed I could understand the advantage of moving it from Colwood; but they are placing these buildings on an exposed and very conspicuous promontory of land.

The expenditure, we have been told, is to be somewhere between $5 and $6 million, which is a pretty considerable expenditure of money. I do not know whether that will cover all the construction work. I would like to know when the Colwood magazine was completed, and the real reasons which are behind the move of this magazine from Colwood to Rocky Point.

Mr. Campney: Mr. Chairman, may I make a few observations with regard to the hon. member's question regarding shipyards on the west coast. I am reasonably familiar with the situation, I think, and the principal shipyards are being constantly surveyed by the maritime commission and are all being kept busy. I happened to be in Vancouver last week when they took the hull of one of the new destroyer escorts from the Burrard shipyard at Vancouver to Yarrows at Esquimalt for completion there. I think careful investigation by the hon. member would show that all the principal yards are kept busy.

The reconstruction of the Algonquin was not reconstruction as a ship but rather reconversion in many respects including the electronic side. The naval dockyard has the capacity to do that type of work. The desire generally is to keep all shipyards reasonably busy for the reasons which the Minister of Defence Production has mentioned. I think that is being done on the west coast and probably on the east coast as well.

With regard to the Rocky Point magazine, my information is that there were three major reasons for the establishment of this magazine. It is a large project, admittedly, but it is located in a district where there is not now and where there is not likely to be any housing development or expansion of the rapidly growing city and its environs, and therefore there is a large safety belt around the magazine. That is important. Also a study of the terrain, according to the experts, has shown that it is suitable to the type of construction envisaged. Lastly, the magazine is close to Esquimalt, which facilitates transportation of ammunition from ships coming in for overhaul or maintenance. They take all the ammunition off, I understand, when a ship goes into the yards for refit, and pick it up later. The new magazine will be a permanent installation of some magnitude to serve Esquimalt in the future.

Mr. Pearkes: It is some considerable distance from Esquimalt, as I have already pointed out, and it will mean that the vessels which have been in to Esquimalt will have to go out again.

There is another point in connection with it, and that is that the area of Rocky Point has been served in the past by country roads which have not been constructed in any way to meet heavy traffic such as is bound to occur during the construction of this magazine and when the ammunition is being put into the stores. That is what is known as an unorganized area. There is no municipality there. The roads are country roads with country bridges, and there is a prosperous farming area lying between the city of Victoria and Rocky Point known as the Metchosin district. The residents in that area are not in a position to maintain their roads, bridges and so forth in order to carry the heavy traffic which is inevitable when the construction period starts.

I hope that in the $5 million to $6 million being set aside for the construction of the storehouse, the roads within the area, the jetties, the administrative buildings and so on, provision is also made to assist the district in maintaining the roads leading from Esquimalt or Victoria into that area even though the approaches are outside of the actual property which the department has bought; because I can assure you, Mr. Chairman, that it is quite beyond the capabilities of that rural district to develop roads in order to carry the heavy traffic and then to maintain them when all that heavy military traffic is being carried. Has a sum of money been included in the estimates in order to maintain the approaches to that magazine?

Mr. Campney: We have not arrived at the stage of allocating various amounts of money for specific purposes, but I can assure the hon. member that his representations in regard to that question will certainly receive attention.

Mr. Pearkes: Thank you. That will be very much appreciated because I know it is a real need.

The only other question I have to ask under this item is in respect of the hours of work of certain classes of civilian employees in the dockyard and at Naden. Can the minister tell me whether the majority of the employees in the dockyard and the civilian employees at Naden are on the 40-hour week, and whether the firemen employed in those establishments are also on the 40-hour week? I have had numerous letters sent to me complaining of the hours which the firemen are expected to work in the dockyard or at Naden, and that they exceed the 40-hour week which I believe is generally in vogue in so far as employees on the Pacific coast are concerned. I believe that it applies to the majority of other classes employed in the dockyard and at Naden, but can the minister tell me?

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Chairman, as I think the hon. member knows, in establishments in which the Department of National Defence employs civilians, the kind of worker who works in a civilian occupation, the rates are fixed by the Department of Labour on the basis of rates and conditions of service prevailing in the community. Hence we have the description "prevailing rates employees". The Department of National Defence conforms to the general pattern of government policy as determined by the regulations, and the Department of Labour is asked to advise the Department of National Defence, and then the treasury board, whether the conditions of work including the hours of labour and rates of pay are correct. In that respect we follow whatever is the pattern of civilian employment in the community.

Mr. Pearkes: I realize that, but from the information I have received, and I might say petitions which I have received from the employees, they feel that they are not receiving the same privileges that are granted to civilian firemen in the area; and the prevailing hours of work are not applied to the firemen at Naden and the dockyard. The hours of work which they are asked to carry out are governed more by the hours of work carried out on the Atlantic coast, and they do not conform to the prevailing hours of work and rates of pay on the Pacific coast. I would ask the minister to look into that matter and see that the prevailing rates, as they exist on the Pacific coast, are applied to the firemen in the naval establishments on the west coast.

Mr. Claxton: I would be very glad indeed to look into that further.

Mr. McLure: I only have a couple of questions to ask, and before the minister arrived I was going to ask them of the associate minister. I am glad to see him getting into harness, and I want to congratulate him on the new position he occupies. I should like to bring to the attention of the associate minister, as well as the minister, the fact that we have been promised a naval barracks for some time. I see a large amount in the estimates for buildings, and I was wondering whether or not our naval barracks would be included for erection this season. I understand that a site has been selected by the minister himself. I should like him to say whether or not this deal has gone through, and whether the naval barracks will be erected this season.

At the same time I should like him to say whether or not we are to get the new armouries we are expecting. I am not pleading with the minister that he is spending too much money. I see there is a large amount in the estimates for this purpose, and I thought we might as well get what justly belongs to us on this occasion. Our naval men should have a good barracks for their training, and I am sure our soldiers deserve the very best building that can be provided. I thought this was the proper place to mention these things, and I would ask either the minister or his associate to reply.

Mr. Claxton: On the question of the location of the naval reserve division of Charlottetown, I can assure the hon. member that the premier of Prince Edward Island, the member before him and quite a few others have brought me around to the site. I have looked it over and I regard it as a very desirable site indeed. The only trouble is that it would cost much more than we have to put the site in condition so we could erect a barracks for the naval division there. The site is superb but the wharf around is broken away, and there has been a certain amount of siltage in the passage in front of it. In addition to that most of the ground is fill, so that all the heavy construction would have to be put on piles. This would lead to considerable expense.

I recognize the need for a new site for our naval reserve division in Charlottetown. As I say, I have been there a good many times and I have seen it. I am familiar with every inch of the ground. But so far, having regard to other priorities, we have not seen fit to put an amount in the estimates to proceed with that work. I hope that some day we will have money for an expenditure of that kind. At the present time the naval reserve division is well housed in a building belonging to the provincial government. That government would like to get it back, but so far we have held on to it. I can assure the hon. member that the matter is receiving continuous consideration.

With regard to the army barracks, I may say that is one of the oldest in Canada. On the other hand it has been well maintained. It is well located, and we have a good many other places in Canada which need a barracks more than Charlottetown. Having served alongside the artillery that came from there in the first world war, and having met them in the second, I can appreciate that this is a good place to put a new barracks some time.

Mr. Knowles: I should like to ask the minister a question that comes under the general discussion of the navy, but a similar question could be asked when we get to the section dealing with the army and another when we come to the air force. I can throw them all into one. At the end of the items dealing with the navy we come to a gross total, and then appears this entry:

Less the estimated amount to be paid from the special account and the estimated credits from transfers of equipment charged to mutual aid, $44,700,000.

That is on page 303. Similarly over on page 310, at the end of the section dealing with the army, there is the same entry only it amounts to $94,077,000. Likewise on page 316, at the end of the section dealing with the air force, there is the same entry, only in that instance the amount is $108,195,000. Those three entries, which in each case are subtracted from the gross total, add up to $246,972,000. By a little more simple arithmetic I find that the grand total of these major items we have been discussing is $1,960,159,633, which does not include those amounts that have been subtracted. In other words it appears to me that if it were not for these credits at these three points the actual total of this item would be not $1,960,159,633, but $2,207,131,633.

Will the minister comment on whether or not that is a correct analysis as to the total amount that is actually being spent for the items included in this general item, and also would he explain what is involved and what the reason is for these subtractions by reference to a special account?

Mr. Claxton: Well, Mr. Chairman, there has been a change proposed in these estimates with regard to the handling of the mutual aid account. This is described on page 30 of the white paper. I shall not weary hon. members by reading it, but I think the point made by the hon. member is covered by paragraph 167 on page 30, which reads as follows:

Consequently, in the 1953-54 estimates, the detailed amounts in the service votes and the mutual aid vote together exceed the estimated appropriation requested by some $247 millions which is made up of $84 millions to be expended from the special accounts and the estimated transfers of equipment as mutual aid from stocks acquired by the services since April 1, 1950, amounting to $163 millions.

Mr. Gillis: I should like to ask the minister about an item that appears on page 301 of the estimates, the 11th line from the bottom of the page, "Professional and special services, corps of commissionaires". Mr. Chairman, I think the time has arrived when that organization should be brought under some department of government. Members of the corps of commissionaires work for all departments of government. In addition they are employed in many cities around theatres, as doormen around hospitals and so on.

The corps of commissionaires are a group of old soldiers, the older fellows who have reached the days when they are no longer productive in industry; and they are taken then, in most of the provinces, by a private employment agency. Some smart fellow organizes that corps on a provincial scale, and he farms out their labour to any organization that desires watchmen. I notice that the Department of National Defence has an item of over $1 million in the naval section. They are employed around the airports and around public buildings under all departments of government.

I think the method employed of having these men work for private employment agencies who farm them out and make money off their labour should come to an end. I think the corps is sufficiently large at the present time that its members should be brought under some department of government, preferably the Department of Labour, so their duties could be made more uniform, their wages fixed at a more reasonable rate, and some uniformity brought into the question of remuneration as far as that corps is concerned. The organization at the present time leaves much to be desired, and it is badly confused because its members are working for different rates of wages in different provinces, and are working in the same provinces and in the same communities for different organizations.

I am not making any criticism of the item that appears here in the estimates. I am merely raising that general question for the benefit of the members of the cabinet. In my opinion the time has come when these people should be brought under some department of government and when some regulation should be brought about with regard to their employment and remuneration; and I say the proper department to handle that corps of commissionaires is the Department of Labour.

Mr. Higgins: Mr. Chairman, I shall be brief. I wanted to comment on an article dealing with comments made by Vice-Admiral Mainguy and appearing in the Gazette of December 18. I obtained it from the C.C.F. library, of all places, from the hon. member for Kootenay West. The reason I am using this article is that it would appear that not only is the naval program long delayed but, as to one item, it has cost about three times what it was estimated to cost. The article reads in part:

Reviewing the navy's needs and plans for 1952, the admiral said:

And I quote paragraph 3.

3. Shipbuilding programs started in previous years will bring fruit, with four more of the new anti-sub escort vessels being launched—

He says four more. The minister's white paper says two. Last night the minister said three. In 1951 the admiral said four. The article continues:

—and the coastal minesweeper program of 14 vessels being completed.

The admiral's statement in this book that I quoted before, namely Canadian Shipping of March of this year, said eight were launched. The minister's white paper stated that six had been launched; and last night I believe the minister said all had been launched. The last part of that paragraph in the Gazette of December 18, 1951 reads as follows:

In addition, the navy's arctic patrol vessel, H.M.C.S. Labrador, will be completed.

In the white paper this sentence appears:

The northern patrol vessel, H.M.C.S. Labrador, originally scheduled for 1952, will be completed before the end of 1953.

The minesweepers were estimated to cost $950,000 each, I understand, and they have actually cost somewhere about $3 million. Is that correct or is it not?

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Chairman, I made a fairly full statement following the hon. member's speech this afternoon.

Mr. Higgins: I did not mention this item.

Mr. Claxton: I thought I had dealt with it. I must apologize for not being here when he spoke, but I was away with Field Marshal Montgomery and I was in the chamber before the hon. member concluded his remarks. But I thought I had dealt with the question of the numbers of ships and the like at that time.

With regard to costs of ships, contracts are let by the Department of Defence Production. The allocation of contracts is done in accordance with recommendations of the maritime commission. I do not quite gather what additional point the hon. member wishes to make.

Mr. Higgins: The point I am asking the minister about is this. First of all, does he agree that the building of the ships was unduly delayed? The chief of the naval staff stated in 1951 that all these ships would be completed by 1952, whereas they are not completed yet and the best we can hope for is completion by the end of this year. Moreover, the cost of the minesweepers has gone from $950,000 to $3 million each. I only ask whether that is correct.

Mr. Claxton: I shall have to look into that matter, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Gibson: I wonder whether this is the time, while we are discussing naval estimates, when the Minister of National Defence would like to make a comment on the possibility that he might forward his training program in the navy by some kind of co-ordination between the naval program and the coastguard service which has been mooted many times in Canada as a desirable feature on both the Atlantic and the Pacific coasts. It has always occurred to me, particularly with vessels of the smaller type that we are speaking of, such as minesweepers, that perhaps the finest training we could give our younger sailors in naval tactics might be in co-ordinating the services of the navy and those of the coastguard. I should be grateful for a comment from the Minister of National Defence in regard to that suggestion, which I am sure has been made to him before.

Mr. Claxton: Generally speaking I think it has been found in all navies that it is a good thing to have the young naval personnel receive their first training at sea in a naval vessel; and for that purpose we have training ships. Quite a large number of those in commission for the Royal Canadian Navy are specially earmarked as training ships. After that training period it might be desirable to work them in on other types of training including coastguard or the like if that exists; but that would have to be worked out.

With regard to the provision of coastguard service—and that is the question the hon. member really raises—that is a matter which concerns much more the Department of Transport, the Department of Justice through the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and other departments of government. At the present time the job of search and rescue, which is an important operation, is co-ordinated in Canada through the R.C.A.F., and it has the closest possible tie-in with the Royal Canadian Navy, the merchant marine and civilian enterprises of all kinds. So far, my colleagues who have been concerned with that aspect of the problem felt that the co-ordination of search and rescue under ICAO should be left with the Royal Canadian Air Force, and the other questions should be dealt with as they arise.

Mr. Harkness: By some method which was not quite discernible we seem to have become concerned chiefly with naval matters. However, my understanding is that we are still really on departmental administration. I have two or three questions under that heading which I should like to ask.

The Chairman: No; the understanding is that we go from one heading to the other. I asked if the committee was ready to pass on to the heading "navy".

Mr. Harkness: When was that?

The Chairman: That was some time ago. The hon. member for York West was the first to rise, and then the hon. member for Nanaimo; and all the questions have pertained to this heading "navy" ever since that time, I would say about half an hour ago.

Mr. Harkness: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman; I did not hear you say that. I still thought we were on departmental administration. However, I can ask these questions just as well under navy as I can under departmental administration. It really makes no difference. What I wanted to get at was the thing which we really did not get to, namely the total number of civilian employees in the navy, army, air force and throughout. We have a figure of around 26,000 civil servants, I believe, and in the report of the Department of National Defence for 1952 at page 91 the figures are given up to March 31, 1951 and up to March 31, 1952, for the skilled and unskilled classes of labour. At March 31, 1952, they numbered 19,369. Can the minister give the figure for March 31, 1953, which would then give us the total of all civilian employees?

Mr. Claxton: The closest estimate of that is in the white paper. It is 25,200 classified civilian employees and 19,800 non-classified.

Mr. Harkness: Then we come to the amount of money for travelling and removal expenses, which is quite a large item. In so far as the navy is concerned we find it was $3,098,000 last year. This year it is $3,950,000. Rather than take it up under navy, army and air force and so on, perhaps we can deal with it as one item. The total amount is $34,691,000. These travelling and removal expenses have been constantly increasing as a result of the increase in the number of service personnel; and as a result of the increase in the number of such personnel naturally one would expect—

Mr. Claxton: We really must have some order about this. You yourself, Mr. Chairman, announced on three occasions that after we had got through with the general discussion we would proceed item by item, and for at least three-quarters of an hour we have been on navy. Now the hon. gentleman wants us to reverse that process and get back to general administration. I suggest we should move on.

Mr. Harkness: I am not asking it to be reversed at all. I started out to deal with travelling and removal expenses for the navy. I said I thought it would save time if, instead of taking it up under navy, army and air force, reserve force and so forth, we took it up as one group item, and I said the total amounts to $34,691,000.

The Chairman: Can the hon. member inform me where he sees travelling and removal expenses?

Mr. Harkness: On page 301.

The Chairman: That is under navy?

Mr. Harkness: Yes.

The Chairman: And there is a similar item under air force, I understand.

Mr. Harkness: And army.

The Chairman: The hon. member can ask his question under the various headings, a separate question for each.

Mr. Harkness: I am quite prepared to ask it under each. I suggested it would save a considerable amount of time if we could deal with them together, and the question I wanted to ask particularly, as far as the travelling and removal expenses are concerned, is this. What means are taken within the department to ensure that the amount of this travelling is kept down to a minimum? As I say, these expenses mount year after year. Some assurance should be given to the committee that every effort is made to keep these expenses, which have now reached such a large sum, to the minimum consistent with carrying out the duties of the services in an appropriate manner?

Mr. Claxton: I can assure the hon. gentleman that the utmost is done to reduce travel to the minimum; but with one-half of the navy that is operational on the west coast and one-half that is operational on the east coast, with the necessity for posting every now and then, in addition to filling in the complement of crews and taking courses, travel continues to be a very big item. You have also to take into account the fact that if a service person is posted for more than a year to a post in Canada or abroad he is entitled to have his wife and family and furniture moved at the government's expense. Consequently we reduce to the minimum possible the amount of posting but in a time of active service, where we have ships on each coast doing various duties, where we want to avoid inflicting on any serviceman more than the minimum term of duty abroad and where also we have to fit in his service abroad with his posting to take courses for promotion, the transportation expenses are apt to be high.

I am afraid that is an inevitable result of the geography of our country. But I can assure the hon. member that the rates allowed are so low that most personnel say they lose on every single movement, whether it be for meals on a short trip, or on hotel bills on a trip to Washington to confer with opposite numbers, or on a long trip to London. I have yet to hear of a service person who has received what he regards as a fair recompense for his travel. That is regrettable, but it indicates that we are tough about it. We would like to be more generous.

Mr. Higgins: At the risk of repetition, I did not quite gather the minister's answer to my question about the fourteen minesweepers. I said the cost had been estimated at $950,000 and that they cost $3 million each. Is that correct, or not?

Mr. Claxton: I told the hon. member I would look into it. It sounds quite impossible. It is a matter really for the Minister of Defence Production, but we will look into it. I did not recognize the figures as likely to be correct.

Mr. Higgins: Does the minister recognize the original cost as being correct?

Mr. Claxton: I do not know.

Mr. Higgins: What was the original cost?

Mr. Claxton: I would have to look that up. The contract is placed not by the Department of National Defence but by the Department of Defence Production.

Mr. Higgins: Three were actually completed and launched. Does the minister know what was the cost of these?

Mr. Claxton: That would be available in the Department of Defence Production. We shall get that for you.

Mr. Harkness: The matter of the cost of recruits applies not only to the navy, but to the army and to the air force as well. If the minister wants to answer for the three services at one time, that is fine as far as I am concerned. If he wants to answer for each of the three services individually, that will also be agreeable. A certain amount of publicity has been given to the amount spent for advertising in the general cost of recruiting. I wonder if the minister could give us what the figures were in connection with advertising, and also any other costs in connection with getting recruits last year. Would he give the amount per recruit. If he can give it for each of the services, well and good; however, if he has only a bulk figure that will still be satisfactory.

Mr. Claxton: The cost per recruit as related to the active force intake in 1952 was $70 per man. But much of the recruiting advertising was related to other purposes, including recruiting for the reserve forces; and if we include the cost per addition to the armed forces of Canada, both active and reserve, the average cost is $43 per man. The advertising also had to do with bringing home to young Canadians the opportunities of service in the Canadian services colleges and the like. All this is included in the average cost per intake I have given.

Mr. Harkness: Is that $70 entirely for advertising? If not, what is the breakdown? How much is for advertising and how much for other costs?

Mr. Claxton: All of it is for advertising.

Mr. Harkness: If that is entirely for advertising, would the minister let us have the other recruiting costs, such as those for maintaining recruiting stations, staff and so on.

Mr. Claxton: There are no figures on that.

Mr. Harkness: Then as I understand it the minister's department does not know what it costs to recruit a man. The cost for advertising alone is $70, to which must be added other general costs of recruiting. Last year the amount spent in advertising for recruits in Alberta was $87,213, according to a return tabled in the name of the hon. member for Assiniboia. The cost in British Columbia amounted to $138,821. Can the minister explain how these advertising sums are allocated as between the different provinces? Is there any policy in this connection? There seems to be some disparity so far as other provinces are concerned. Is there any policy, or on what basis is the allocation of advertising for recruiting carried out?

Mr. Claxton: Recruiting advertising is handled by a number of agencies appointed by the government. They confer with the joint service recruiting committee and the joint service advertising committee, representing the three services. They report to the personnel members' committee which consists of the adjutant general of the army, the chief of naval personnel, and the air member for personnel of the air force. They put up a plan to the deputy minister. In turn he places it before me, and we have a session—sometimes lasting several days—to go over the program.

When that is agreed upon the agencies spend the money in accordance with the plan, so as to produce the best possible results. That plan is related to the possibilities in each part of the country, and in the result has proved very successful. The fact that some amount of money should be reported as having been spent in Saskatchewan or British Columbia indicates that in those two cases that was the payment made for the services rendered through the advertising agencies.

Mr. Harkness: I do not know that the minister has answered my question as to what policy is followed in regard to advertising. I have mentioned only two provinces. I might point out that for Quebec the amount is $836,900 and for Ontario $639,000.

Mr. Claxton: I thought I had answered that.

Mr. Harkness: But the minister did not give any explanation to how these various amounts are allocated, or the policy followed. He said it was decided by this committee to which he referred, in conjunction with the advertising agencies. Has any compilation been kept as to the efficiency of this advertising? Did they get more recruits where they spent more money on advertising, or did they get fewer?

Mr. Claxton: Every possible computation and every possible test has been made. We have had tests made of the recruits coming into the three services: "Why did you join? Why did you choose this service in particular?" Then after the recruit has been in for a time, these questions: "How are you getting along? How do you like it?" This is all related to the job of getting the ultimate number of men we need in the armed forces of Canada. That has been a pretty difficult job in the last three years, because of the numbers involved.

I can assure the committee the amount spent is exceedingly low having regard to the job that has been done and the intake we have had. There were 29,000 last year for the active force and 21,000 for the reserve force. Those are very big figures, indeed, for Canada. And if we compare the figures spent on advertising in Canada with those of the United States, where they have another system, one would be surprised at the results we have obtained.

Everything is checked up, and everything is related to the job of placing before the young men of Canada the idea of the opportunity of rendering a service to their country, meeting a need, and having a career in the public service.

Mr. Nowlan: In replying to the hon. member for Calgary East the minister made reference to travel and removal expenses, and said that the dependents of those who had been transferred away for a year would have their expenses paid to their places of origin. Is there any difference in the three departments on that score? I have received letters from some dependents who claim that in one of the armed services a family in a service house is permitted to remain there, while in one of the other services they are required to vacate. Is there any difference in the regulations in this connection as they apply to the three services?

Mr. Claxton: The hon. member would have to bring my attention to individual cases. We have 60 or 70 service communities across Canada for the navy, the army and the air force. I could not speak from memory or generalize as to what the rules are right across the board.

Mr. Nowlan: What I had in mind particularly was the statement that in the army, for instance, dependents who are living in a service house at an army base would be permitted to remain there after the service member had been posted to Europe, whereas if he were serving in the air force the dependents would be required to vacate within a certain number of days. Complaints have been received from dependents indicating that there is a different policy entirely in these two branches of the service. I know we are now dealing with the navy, but I was wondering if the procedure was uniform for all three branches.

Mr. Claxton: We began by having a 90-day vacation period because of the shortage of married quarters, but since then we have added to the married quarters and we now have about 20,000 married quarters either constructed or in process of construction. Our object would be to enable every service person who is posted abroad to leave his family in a service home until he returns, but that is most difficult in some localities such as Shilo, or other places, where a whole unit may move out. What is going to happen to the wives of the members of the unit who are left? It is a very difficult problem. I could not generalize on it, but I can assure the hon. member that it is receiving the most serious attention. My own view would be that we need very much more accommodation for dependents of servicemen than is now available.

Mr. Nowlan: Then there is no distinction between the three services with respect to the treatment?

Mr. Claxton: No, I think it relates to the particular situation.

Mr. Nowlan: We have an item here of $23 million for the construction of buildings and physical assets. I was wondering if the expenditures for the seaward defence project at Halifax are included in that amount and if the minister can give us a breakdown of the amount which has been expended and tell us where the matter stands at the moment.

Mr. Claxton: The hon. member is quite right in suggesting that the item for seaward defence at Halifax is included. I would not like to give a breakdown at this stage, if he would permit me not to do so.

Mr. Nowlan: I am not asking for information in great detail, but can the minister tell us where the matter stands at the moment, approximately how much has been spent and how much will have to be spent before the project is concluded?

Mr. Claxton: I was in Halifax on October 17 last, and a very successful exercise had just been held in which they closed half of the harbour on fairly short notice. The project is moving on and it is getting to the point where it is a pretty good seaward defence.

Mr. Nowlan: Can the minister tell us something of the cost?

Mr. Claxton: We expect to spend $800,000 there this year.

Mr. Nowlan: How much has been spent altogether so far?

Mr. Claxton: I have not got it.

Mr. Nowlan: Can the minister get us that information?

Mr. Claxton: Yes.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): On page 3 of the white paper I find the following with respect to the air force:

> In accordance with joint Canadian-U.S. plans for aerial defence, a number of the stations in Canada which are of primary usefulness in the defence of the United States will be manned by U.S.A.F. personnel—

The Chairman: Did I understand the hon. member to say that he was dealing with the air force?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): No, I am only referring to this and then I am going to ask a question about the navy. On page 3 it says that there is a certain policy of co-ordination and co-operation existing between the United States air force and the Royal Canadian Air Force. Does that policy of co-ordination and co-operation exist with respect to the use of naval facilities, naval installations and seaward defences?

Mr. Claxton: Yes.

Mr. Harkness: At page 302 of the details, under "materials and supplies", there is an item of $2,100,000 for fuel for heating, cooking and power-generating units. Last year the amount was $1,300,000. In other words it is nearly double this year. Can the minister explain why so much more fuel for heating and cooking is needed?

Mr. Claxton: It has been found that the estimates for 1952-53 were below requirements. Other contributing factors are higher costs and the provision being made for several more establishments.

Mr. Thomas: When I spoke the other day I asked the minister if he would comment on whether or not the government had considered making use of light convoy escort aircraft carriers of the same type as the converted merchant escort carriers we had during the war. Does he think that is practical?

Mr. Claxton: That matter has been looked into and nothing satisfactory has been found. I am afraid the trend is entirely in the opposite direction. More and more escort carriers are going into operation with flight decks capable of handling jets, and they involve much more expense, difficulty and complexity for us all. We have not found anything along the line he has suggested.

Mr. Thomas: I might point out that those we had during the war were quite cheaply converted from merchant ships and used an obsolescent type of aircraft. The aircraft were also cheap. They certainly did a wonderful job, and without them I do not think we could possibly have held back the U-boat attacks during the latter part of the war.

Mr. Claxton: I agree.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want to ask a question which comes under the item with the heading "Professional fees—architects, engineers, land valuation and legal", and also with respect to the item headed "Medical and dental consultants and special services", and the item headed "Fees for special courses". If your ruling, Mr. Chairman, is that I should confine myself entirely to the navy, well and good, but it seems to me that it would save time if I could deal with the matter generally. I assume I must deal with the navy.

First of all I want some information about the staff of engineers and architects. I draw attention to the amount to be spent for architects and engineers for the navy, $800,000, the amount of $250,000 to be spent for medical and dental consultants for the navy, and the amount of $500,000 to be spent for fees for special courses for the navy. I want to know what staff we have, what staff is in the minister's own department and also what is available in the allied departments of defence production and so on. Then I want to know the amounts that have been paid to architectural firms and others in some considerable detail. My first question is, what professional staff have we, dealing for the moment only with architects, engineers, etc.?

Mr. Claxton: The hon. member has asked what professional staffs we have in the navy, army and air force, as I understand it.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Whichever way you rule, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Claxton: I do not mind. That is the kind of question that could be put on the order paper and answered very easily.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Probably not as quickly as the minister can answer it.

An hon. Member: It might be quicker.

Mr. Claxton: I will have a shot at it from memory. I would say that the navy has about eight architects, the army about fifteen and the air force about ten. I would say they are totally inadequate in number to do the job. Also we have employed two or three hundred architectural firms across the country in connection with the construction program. We have been engaged in the build-up of construction necessary for the armed forces, navy, army and air force.

I had no notice of the hon. gentleman's question so I cannot speak except subject to correction, but I would say that we have completed something in the nature of about 40 standard plans for standard buildings of a permanent character, each one involving navy, army or air force architects, and sometimes all three, and each one involving as well the hiring of outside architects. I would say that we have probably completed standard designs or plans for something of the magnitude of 30 emergency buildings involving the services of the same people. After all, you cannot administer $358 million worth of orders for construction and place 1,048 major contracts without hiring architects. As far as is possible we hire just as few and just as good ones as we can. I would like to have heard of any easier way of doing this job before because we took longer than we wanted. There were not enough architects and there were not enough engineers in the services to do the job. Consequently we are a bit behind in our construction program to cover the period 1951 to 1954, which will amount to a total of $655 million.

The number of contracts handled by architects, construction firms and professional engineers would have to be worked out, but it certainly runs into many hundreds. I have said that there were 1,048 major contracts placed last year, in addition to other work. We have been continuously short of architects and professional engineers on our inspection staff, and have had to hire a great number of outsiders.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I realize that I cannot fairly expect the minister to give a detailed answer to what I asked, but what he has said has certainly interested me and makes me feel that I want to know a great deal more about this. Apparently I have to plead guilty to being quite wrongly informed when I spoke on the budget because at that time, after making what inquiries I could, I thought I had discovered that there were 15 architects in the three services. Adding up what the minister has given me now I find there are 33, and he has referred to the employment on the work of two or three hundred firms.

Mr. Claxton: I am sorry, but if the hon. member will excuse me I have the figures available for him now. The number of architects employed as civil servants is precisely 15—navy 5, army 7 and R.C.A.F. 3.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): After all that difference is not too important.

Mr. Claxton: They are far too few.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): But I was surprised at the figure of two or three hundred architectural firms employed.

Mr. Claxton: Far more than that.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want to know a little more about that, and perhaps the minister would give me a statement in some detail when the committee discusses this next. For example, the minister spoke about 1,048 major projects, as I understand it, which were placed last year. Are we talking about the calendar year or the fiscal year?

Mr. Claxton: The fiscal year 1952-53.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Would the minister explain a little further what he means by a major project? If I understood him, he also spoke about 30 emergency buildings.

Mr. Claxton: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I come back to the 1,048 major projects. It would be very important to know to what extent those were standard buildings. If they were 1,048 individual major projects requiring full architectural preparatory work and all the development which goes with individual buildings, then it was a rather tremendous job. It comes to me as a surprise, and there is no point in my expressing any opinion about it. All I can do is ask a further question, and if the minister wishes to answer now so much the better. When he says 1,048 major projects, what does he mean? Will he explain that further? Perhaps they can be divided into classes. I take it the figure is for the three services?

Mr. Claxton: That is right.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Perhaps they can be divided into classes and perhaps the minister can give us illustrations so we might understand better what is meant by the very imposing phrase "1,048 major projects". Let me repeat that I do not want to be asking questions which it is unfair to expect the minister to answer off the cuff, and if he prefers to give me that information when the committee sits again that will be perfectly satisfactory to me. It is just as he wishes.

Mr. Claxton: Well, Mr. Chairman, I was not too far out in my recollection of the figures. We prepared 39 standard designs for permanent construction for the three services. Out of those 39 designs which were prepared, some before Korea and some since, 35 have so far been used. We have 28 designs for emergency buildings, and so far we have used 10 of those, all at Wainwright. It is quite easy to put on the record the places, the details of the type of construction and so on in each case, but my information is that this has been gone into before the committee on defence expenditure.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): We are not allowed to talk about that.

Mr. Claxton: I am told that not only were you allowed to talk about it, but that you insisted on talking about it, and it was gone into at great length. However, if there is any item of information which the hon. member would like, we will certainly have it available for him.

Mr. Adamson: Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the minister about what appears to me to be the penultimate item under departmental administration and navy, "additional positions to be established". As far as the navy item is concerned it is $625,000, increased from $435,000. For the general administration item it is a very much larger figure, $2,256,704. For general administration there was an increase of 294 in these unclassified persons and for the navy an increase of 100.

The thing which is interesting and on which I would like some comment is that under general administration if you divide 294, the number of unclassified persons to be added, into the figure given you find that the average cost or average salary works out at about $5,640, but in the same category for the navy the average salary works out at $1,860. First of all I should like to ask what are these additional positions to be established. Are they of considerable number and do they go right through the schedule, or are they one single item?

Mr. Claxton: The positions relate to inland stores depot, Montreal, for handling, packing, maintenance and inventory of the main R.C.N. stores depot, 425; maintenance of ships in inactive reserve at Sydney, Nova Scotia, including security and fire protection and servicing of dehumidifying plant, 80; at naval stores headquarters, Ottawa, an increase in office workers to provide necessary assistance for the administration of the expanding navy, 125; on the east coast in the dockyard, stores, depots, armament depots and magazines to meet the increased requirements of the fleet and to provide for the installation and maintenance of new equipment from current production, 460; on the west coast in the dockyard, stores, depots, armament depots and magazines to meet the increased requirements of the fleet and to provide for the installation and maintenance of new equipment from current production, 410.

Mr. Adamson: Well, that is for the navy. I just added this up and there seems to be some discrepancy in the salaries. You have an increase in general administration of approximately half a million, and then for this item you get $425,625. Why is there such a discrepancy in the rates of pay, or are my calculations correct?

The Chairman: While the minister is looking up the answer to this question, perhaps I might ask hon. members if I may have their co-operation. I do not want to appear to be restricting discussion nor to be disagreeable, but if we are to follow the agreed procedure I should like hon. members to avoid referring to items which have already been discussed. Two years ago we studied these details at the end of the book line by line. Last year it was suggested that we proceed heading by heading. Yesterday I asked hon. members if that procedure would be agreeable this year. I asked for comments upon that, and there were none. Hon. members agreed. We have discussed the first heading, which was departmental administration, including inspection service. Then I asked, shall we pass on to navy? The hon. member for York West was the first member to ask a question relating to navy. We have been carrying on discussing the details under the heading "navy".

I know there are some questions of a general character which hon. members may like to ask, but I hope they will confine those questions to the pertinent heading. If we carry on with questions under the details for half an hour and then have a wide-open question, and then return to restrictive questions, we shall never finish. It makes it a much more difficult task for those who have to prepare the answers for the minister. Hon. members will realize that. I do ask hon. members for their co-operation.

Mr. Claxton: In answer to the hon. member for York West, I might say that the difference is due largely to the proportion of technical staff on the side that he mentioned.

Mr. Nickle: A question has come up in the study of the white paper and the estimates, and it is this. Is our navy of such a nature that it requires far more administration than either of the other two services, the army or the air force, both from the point of view of service personnel and civilian employees? In checking the figures presented by the minister, I find that in dealing with personnel of the active forces only, out of a total active force of 15,400 in the navy, 1,400 are listed under command and administration. Of course there are additional numbers of men in training staffs and trainees, but I have not included them under administration. On this basis of 1,400 in administration within the service, one out of every eleven men in the navy is engaged in command or administration.

In so far as the army is concerned, referring again to the figures on manpower presented in the white paper, one in every seventeen men is engaged in administration. In the air force, only one in twenty-two men is engaged in administration. In other words the air force requires half as much administration in terms of personnel as the navy.

Turning now to the classified establishments for civilian employees, I find that there is one civilian employed by the navy for every 2·3 members in the active forces; in the army there is only one civilian for every 5·1 members, and the air force is almost three times as good as the navy and 50 per cent better than the army because they have only one civilian employed for every 7·4 members of the active air force. Can the minister explain the reasons for the very wide variation in the percentage of the total personnel, service and civilian, required for the handling of the administration in the three services?

Mr. Claxton: I am not ready to admit the computations the hon. member has made, but quite apart from that the navy have traditionally employed a very high percentage of civilian employees in their dockyards and similar activities. This is true of the Royal Navy, the United States Navy and the Royal Canadian Navy. A very high degree of skill is required there, and that skill is usually related to some previous service in the navy, then service ashore in a civilian occupation of that kind. The navy very largely has these dockyard employees do the job of dealing with their ships, armaments, electronics and so on.

Mr. Nickle: The minister referred to the prevailing rate employees and dockyard workers for the navy. In the figures I presented a moment ago, I included only those civilians in the classified establishments, and did not include any of the 3,600 civilian employees in the Department of National Defence administration and inspection service, nor did I include any of the 19,800 casual prevailing rate employees of the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Claxton: The navy has a very high proportion of people who in ordinary industry would be prevailing rate employees, but who in the dockyards are leading hands and the like, timekeepers and so on, who are classified civil servants.

Mr. Harkness: One of the larger items under navy is that for ammunition and bombs, which is $28,461,000 this year, and was $7,402,000 last year. I should like to ask the minister if that large increase is due to the fact that this year there has been what you might call stockpiling of ammunition for navy or mobilization stores, and does that represent the major portion of the $28·5 million?

Mr. Claxton: I am afraid we have not reached quite that point yet. We have been firing a great deal of ammunition in Korea, but in addition we have been endeavouring to build up stocks of ammunition in Canada. While we have some stockpile, it is not such that I should like to regard it with equanimity yet.

Mr. Harkness: From what the minister says I take it that most of this is for current use in Korea and for what you might call normal consumption in ships and so forth.

Mr. Claxton: A lot of it, yes.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I notice that the plant formerly operated by the Canadian navy at Bay Bulls, Newfoundland, has been repurchased. Is it to be put in operation this year, and will it be similar to what it was before?

Mr. Claxton: Yes. I have visited the place myself. I think perhaps this was taken over when I was there. Bays Bulls was disposed of. Then after Korea it was felt that this was an important place so we got our hands on it again, and it has been held that way.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): You are not doing any work there at the present time?

Mr. Claxton: No.

Mr. Higgins: What will you do with your R.D. stations on the road? I refer to your R.D. stations on the road to Bay Bulls.

Mr. Claxton: Army?

Mr. Higgins: No. R.D. stations, navy.

Mr. Claxton: Nothing more has been done about that at the present time.

Mr. Higgins: You are building a new station out there for ammunition. Is that right?

Mr. Claxton: That is right.

Mr. Harkness: Another of the large items of equipment under the navy is "Armament and equipment, $25 million" this year. Does this represent chiefly the armament for new ships which have been laid down this year, such as 3-inch 50-calibre naval guns?

Mr. Claxton: That is right; not only the armament of the new ships but the refitting of the old.

Mr. Harkness: Will this item include all the armament to modernize the 56 vessels, I think it is, which we now have in service? I think the minister said the number was 56.

Mr. Claxton: Yes, that will cover the 56.

Mr. Harkness: Does it cover any of those which are under construction?

Mr. Claxton: Partly.

Mr. McLure: Mr. Chairman, I should just like to bring one little item to the attention of the minister. What I have to say is not in the form of a question, but I might not get an opportunity again to mention the matter. Last fall a young soldier was being returned from Korea to Charlottetown owing to sickness. He landed with other soldiers in the United States and died in the hospital there.

The Chairman: Order. I cannot allow the hon. member to proceed with this matter at the moment. We have had a general discussion which lasted for some time. During that discussion there was ample opportunity for him to raise a matter of this sort. We are now proceeding to the study of the details. I therefore think the hon. member should reserve what he has to say for another occasion.

Mr. McLure: Mr. Chairman, it would take only a minute or so.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member will realize that it is not a question of how long it will take. If I allow him to proceed in this fashion I shall have to allow other members to do so as well. If they each have a little question like this which may take only one minute, we might lose about two hours. Shall we pass on to the army?

Mr. Harkness: No. There are one or two other questions I wish to ask. There is an item here, "All other expenditures, $945,000." Last year it was $813,000. Last year we took some objection—and in fact I think in every previous year we did so—to these more or less omnibus items and requested that, as far as possible, the expenditures covered by them should be listed under these numerous other headings instead of being put down as "sundries" or "all other expenditures" and things of that sort. I would ask again that that practice, as far as possible, be followed and that items of this sort be reduced to the smallest sums possible. Can the minister give us any indication of what these "other expenditures" of nearly $1 million consist of?

Mr. Claxton: We conform to the system of allocation of expenditures as fixed by the comptroller of the treasury. As hon. members will notice, the allocation of expenditures for defence is the same as that for other government departments. We are extremely anxious indeed to follow the suggestion of the hon. member for Calgary East and reduce these omnibus clauses to the minimum. The largest single item here is customs duties—we pay customs duties—of $400,000.

The Chairman: Shall we pass on to the army?

Mr. Harkness: No. There is one other item to which I wish to refer, namely the Royal Canadian Naval Reserve. I was surprised to see that the estimated expenditure for pay and allowances for the naval reserve is reduced this year. As a matter of fact the entire expenditures for the Canadian naval reserve are reduced. The number of civil servants employed there is down; the whole thing is down. That would seem to indicate that the department thinks the Royal Canadian Naval Reserve will be smaller in numbers this year than it was last year. If that is the case I think it is a great pity, and I should like the minister to explain the reason for this reduction.

Mr. Claxton: No. There was too large an estimate last year. The estimate for this year is an actual increase on our experience of last year, and we expect that we shall spend the whole sum. Therefore the naval reserve will be up.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to ask the minister if he thinks it is a sensible thing for the staff of his department and that of another department to be spending their time in working out how much money is to be paid for customs duties by the Department of National Defence to the Department of National Revenue? It seems to me that it is a prize waste of time. What I rose to ask was this. If the minister will inquire further about the matters that we are not allowed to discuss, I think he will find that his idea is wrong when he intimates that the information I was asking for has been given already. I hope he will find that.

I do not want to get involved in a whole lot of reports which are going to waste everybody's time, but I want further light on one or two questions. The minister has spoken about 1,048 major projects. I want to know —perhaps not tonight but at some time— what a major project is. Is it defined just by the cost? Then I should like to have the major projects grouped, if possible. I suppose there would be so many barrack blocks; so many messing halls and so many such and such. That procedure might reduce this matter to manageable proportions.

The minister spoke about working out standard buildings. I want to know how many of these would conform to standard and, for that reason, I presume would require a minimum of architectural assistance. Those are the questions that I wish to raise. If the information can be available when we meet again, then it would take that much less time.

Mr. Claxton: I shall be glad to give that information tomorrow.

Mr. Adamson: May I ask the minister this question. Do you pay sales tax as well as customs duties?

Mr. Claxton: Yes.

Mr. McCann: Of course.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): It is a prize waste of money.

The Chairman: Do I understand that the discussion on the navy is terminated?

Mr. Harkness: No, Mr. Chairman; I have another question or two as a result of some returns I have. I could quite readily take them up under the army but you might then rule me out of order. For that reason I think I should prefer to leave this navy item open.

Mr. Claxton: Could we pass to the army on the understanding that you will have that opportunity?

Mr. Harkness: So I may be sure that I will not be ruled out of order, I should like the navy item to be held open.

Mr. Claxton: Could the hon. member ask his questions now so we could look at them?

Mr. Harkness: It would take me some five minutes, perhaps, to explain just what I want.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we shall consider Bill No. 338, respecting co-operative credit associations. After second reading this bill will be referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce. Then we shall take up estimates of national defence, trade and commerce, citizenship and immigration.

Mr. Fleming: In that order?

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, April 17, 1953

The house met at eleven o'clock.

CANADIAN PRISONERS OF WAR

MEETING OF REPRESENTATIVES OF NATIONAL COUNCIL WITH GOVERNMENT

Hon. F. G. Bradley (Secretary of State): On Monday last, April 13, the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) asked me if the government had arranged to meet representatives of the national council of Canadian prisoners of war and if so when such meeting was to take place. I only received notice of the question as I came into the house and did not have the relevant details. During the last few days I have been absent from the house but I would now like to answer the question by saying that my colleague, the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe), received representatives of the national council of Canadian prisoners of war on February 18 last, after which he brought their representations before the government. After a great deal of consideration I was authorized to address a letter to the secretary of the national council of Canadian prisoners of war, a copy of which I now table.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the Secretary of State a supplementary question concerning the reply which he has just given to the question of the hon. member for Royal? Has consideration been given to the recent request of that association that a committee of theirs be given an interview with a committee of three members of the cabinet?

Mr. Bradley: Some days ago three members of the organization did call at my office, and asked me if I would give consideration to a further interview in connection with these matters. After giving some consideration to the subject I came to the conclusion that, unless there was some further material which had not been submitted, no good result would be served by any further conferences with the government, and I advised this organization accordingly.

Mr. MacInnis: May I ask a further supplementary question? As this letter is in answer to a question asked on the orders of the day could it not be printed in today's Hansard as part of the minister's reply?

Mr. Bradley: I have no objection.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreeable to hon. members?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR MINISTERIAL COMMENT ON STATEMENT BY PRESIDENT EISENHOWER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. Bradette (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a request to the Secretary of State for External affairs (Mr. Pearson), of which I gave him notice.

Would the minister care to comment on the important statement made by President Eisenhower yesterday on the subject of world peace?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the president's statement to which the hon. member has referred is, I think, an inspiring and heartening declaration of the specific purposes and policies of the United States and as such it is of very great importance indeed. With the consent of the house it might be useful if I did put on the record one or two sentences from that statement because I think they embody principles to which we would be glad to subscribe in this house and in this country.

The president emphasized in his statement the "readiness of the free nations to welcome sincerely any genuine evidence of peaceful purpose enabling all peoples again to resume their common quest of just peace." Then he went on to state in this connection that a new leadership has assumed power in the Soviet union. "This new leadership," he said, "confronts a free world aroused, as rarely in its history, by the will to stay free," and "this free world knows—out of the bitter wisdom of experience—that vigilance and sacrifice are the price of liberty." Mr. Eisenhower then added:

> This is the kind of free world which the new Soviet leadership confronts. It is a world that demands and expects the fullest respect of its rights and interests. It is a world that will always accord the same respect to all others.

The president stated that "the first great step along this way must be the conclusion of an honourable armistice in Korea," and that "this means the immediate cessation of hostilities and the prompt initiation of political discussions leading to the holding of free elections in a united Korea." In that connection, Mr. Speaker, some additional hope has been given to the possibility, at least, of an armistice taking place by a unanimous decision of the United Nations political committee yesterday on a resolution on this subject.

The president went on to indicate in eloquent words that "the peace we seek, founded upon decent trust and co-operative effort among nations, can be fortified not by weapons of war but by wheat and by cotton; by milk and by wool; by meat and by timber and by rice. These are words that translate into every language on earth. These are needs that challenge this world in arms. This idea of a just and peaceful world is not new or strange to us." Then Mr. Eisenhower made a proposal which must, I am sure, arouse the interest of all peoples, to the effect that the United States government "is ready to ask its people to join with all nations in devoting a substantial percentage of the savings achieved by disarmament to a fund for world aid and reconstruction. The purposes of this great work," he added, "would be to help other peoples to develop the undeveloped areas of the world, to stimulate profitable and fair world trade, to assist all peoples to know the blessings of productive freedom." He said:

> I know of nothing I can add to make plainer the sincere purpose of the United States.

This statement of purpose which I have just mentioned is one to which I am sure, Mr. Speaker, this house and the people of Canada would be glad indeed to subscribe.

WHEAT

INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT—STATEMENT OF MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. E. Cardiff (Huron North): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce which relates to a press report appearing in this morning's Globe and Mail in which the minister is reported as having said he had no intention of making a special trip to London in an attempt to get Britain's approval of the new international wheat agreement. Does the minister not consider the signing of the wheat agreement by Britain as of vital importance to Canada and the Canadian farmer?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I subscribe to that statement and consider it is important to Canada that Britain does sign the wheat agreement. I believe also, however, that we in Canada must make our decision and Britain has to make hers. I know of no new facts that I could put before the British government if I went to Britain. All we Canadians could do during the long negotiations was to make the facts known and let the United Kingdom government reach its own decision.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I should like to ask a supplementary question arising out of the reply the minister has given. Would he be prepared to comment on a story appearing in yesterday's Winnipeg Free Press, which reads:

> As matters stand at present Canada is entitled to sell 250 million bushels to participating countries and the United States 270 million bushels, in a total market which includes Britain.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If I might just add one more line, then I can base my question upon that.

> However the United States will not accept this ratio with the British staying outside the agreement.

Is the minister prepared to say whether or not, if Britain does not enter the agreement, Canada would be entitled to the ratio of 250 million bushels as compared with 270 million for the United States?

Mr. Howe: The United States, Canada and Australia are signing the agreement. There are about 600 million bushels spoken for under the agreement. Without Britain, there will be around 400 million bushels. I might say that in arriving at the 600 million bushel quantity we received applications for something over 75 million bushels from importing countries, which was in addition to the amount that could be provided under the allocations the exporters were willing to make. In any consideration of the future, we must keep in mind that the British will require 200 million bushels of wheat from the world supply. Whether they purchase it under the agreement price or the class II price does not alter the fact that the United Kingdom will require wheat. I do not think Canada, the United States or Australia would like to commit themselves, within the agreement, to the point where they cannot take care of Britain's needs. I do not know what the agreement will look like. If after the middle of July it is found that Britain has not acceded there will have to be a meeting and a new allocation made. Just what that will be, I do not know.

INCREASED FREIGHT RATE—CROWSNEST PASS AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. I. Hetland (Humboldt): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Transport. In view of the board of transport commissioners' intention to lift the ceiling on rates on grain moving in the west to Canadian markets, according to a report in this morning's Ottawa Citizen, will the minister say whether or not this constitutes a threat to the Crowsnest Pass agreements?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): The hon. member was kind enough to send me a copy of the article which appeared in this morning's Citizen. I have read it and, from my understanding of it, it would not appear that the Crowsnest rates are affected in any way whatever by the application now before the board for equalization. In any event, it is this parliament which determines whether or not the Crowsnest rates are to be changed, and thus far there has been no move in this house to amend the Crowsnest rates agreements.

POST OFFICE

REQUEST FOR REOPENING OF OFFICE IN HOME OF WILLIAM ROSS, WINNIPEG

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Postmaster General whether or not he has received from the historical and scientific society of Manitoba a request for the reopening of the post office in the old home of William Ross in Winnipeg?

An hon. Member: Order paper.

Mr. Knowles: Is the Postmaster General in a position to make an announcement on this matter?

Hon. Alcide Cote (Postmaster General): I received the hon. member's notice of his question on my way to this house. Unfortunately, I have not had time to communicate with the department. I shall take this as notice of a question and will give him a reply as soon as I receive the information.

HOUSING

ALLEGED REFUSAL OF WINNIPEG INSTITUTIONS TO LEND MONEY FOR HOME CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Is the Minister of Resources and Development aware of the strike of lending institutions in Winnipeg against lending money for the building of small homes? What steps does the government intend to take to make sure that the purposes of the National Housing Act are fulfilled?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): There is no such strike by lending institutions against the lending of money for the construction of small homes in Winnipeg.

Mr. Knowles: That is not the way we hear it.

FISHERIES

NEWFOUNDLAND—INQUIRY AS TO SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE STORM DAMAGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, is the Minister of Fisheries now in a position to answer the question which I asked him on Wednesday and which he could not read?

Hon. James Sinclair (Minister of Fisheries): The hon. member was good enough to repeat the question to me afterwards. It had to do with the report of a committee which he had thought was inspecting storm damage in Newfoundland. The committee down there is making a report of the losses over recent years in the hope it will be able to suggest a policy of insurance for fishermen's boats. It has nothing to do with the specific storm losses of last winter.

CO-OPERATIVE CREDIT

MEASURE PROVIDING FOR ORGANIZATION AND SUPERVISION OF ASSOCIATIONS

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 338, respecting co-operative credit associations.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this act provides for the establishment of co-operative credit associations operating in more than one province under the supervision of the superintendent of insurance. Before any such national association may operate it will have to come to parliament for incorporation by a special act.

This legislation is introduced at this time because a group of provincial central co-operative societies has announced its intention to apply to parliament to be incorporated as a national co-operative association. It is the government's view that if parliament is to approve such legislation it is desirable that there be available suitable safeguards.

The main object of a national association will be the receiving of deposits from its members and the loaning of money to its members and making other approved investments. This is the fundamental function of provincial co-operative credit associations. Hon. members will realize that at certain times there will be surplus cash on deposit with a member operating in one part of the country while there may be a demand for loans in another part of the country. However, with the establishment of a co-operative credit association, it will be possible to loan surplus funds to members requiring cash for loans on a national basis thereby overcoming the present provincial limitation.

The members of an association will be co-operative credit societies incorporated by special act or declared by parliament to be eligible to become members of an association, not more than ten co-operative corporations (not being co-operative credit societies) and not more than fifteen natural persons.

It is provided that before an assocation commences accepting deposits and making loans it must obtain a certificate from the treasury board. This certificate will be granted only after the association has satisfied the board that it has complied with the provisions of the act.

The lending and investment powers of an association are subject to adequate safeguards in order to prevent its assets from being too heavily concentrated in one particular form and to preserve liquidity. For example, an association may not make any loan or investment if its cash on hand and on deposit with the chartered banks is less than five per cent of its own deposit liabilities.

There is provision for the appointment of auditors in a manner similar to that in the Bank Act. In addition there is a requirement for submitting annual reports to the government. The superintendent of insurance, who now has supervision over certain insurance, trust and loan companies, will have supervision over an association, and penalties are provided for violations of the provisions of this act.

I believe that hon. members are fully aware of the necessity of this legislation. The growth of co-operative credit societies in Canada in recent years has been widespread. As the operations of these organizations will undoubtedly include operations which are clearly of a banking nature, it is desirable that if these associations are going to operate on a national basis they should be under federal legislation as are the chartered banks.

I propose that when this bill receives second reading it be referred to the banking and commerce committee. At that time the superintendent of insurance and the officers of my department will be available to explain its provisions and discuss them with members of the committee.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, from what the minister has said it will be clear to hon. members that this is an important bill. It has eighty-five sections. It has come into the hands of members, I believe, only within the last few minutes. Notwithstanding the fact that it is proposed to refer this bill to a committee, it does not seem to me that we should be asked to give it second reading with no chance to hon. members to have digested it or to have put themselves in a position even to make general comments on the principle of it. For that reason I hope the minister will agree that we shall not be asked at this time to pass the motion for second reading and to refer it to the committee.

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker, the principle of the bill is an extremely simple one. I have outlined it. Under ordinary circumstances I would perhaps be only too happy to accede to my hon. friend's request; but as he knows, it is necessary for me to leave tomorrow and I shall be away for over a week. I am attending the NATO meetings in Paris. I would hope that this bill could be given second reading, the principle approved, and that it could be referred to the banking and commerce committee for detailed study. It was announced in the speech from the throne. The reason that it has not been presented earlier is that the drafting has been going on in consultation with the Department of Justice, the superintendent of insurance, the officers of my department and the officials of some of these provincial co-operative societies, and it has been a longish job. While it is a long bill, in the main most of the provisions are closely analogous to the supervising provisions in the Trust Companies Act and the Loan Companies Act. I think we should try to give it second reading today.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to be un-co-operative but I would point out to the minister that if the motion stands until Monday, only one day will have been lost in the committee proceedings; certainly it can go forward while the minister is away and should do so. When the resolution came before the house, it was passed automatically. This is the first time there has been any explanation. I still hope, Mr. Speaker, that the second reading may wait over until Monday. I assure the minister that there will be the utmost co-operation then in dealing with the matter. I would hope that he would agree, and I therefore should like to move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If there is a motion—

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker, ordinarily I would agree to the suggestion which has been made but, under the circumstances, I really do not feel that I can do so. I am sure my hon. friend can have ample opportunity to speak on the bill on third reading. The principle of the bill is extremely simple. We provide, by special act, for incorporation of these credit societies and allow them to operate in the general way that I have indicated. The detail is extremely important, but the principle is extremely simple.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I just want to add one thing, Mr. Speaker. It is perfectly true that in one sense the principle is familiar because these co-operative associations have been operating in various provinces, as we know, with the concurrence of everybody. But I still maintain that, however simple the principle may be, to have an important matter of this kind taken through the resolution stage and the second reading with no opportunity for informed discussion is a procedure that is unsound.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted to say one word, I should like to suggest to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) that they should not press for this second reading this morning. After all, the debate on second reading is the main debate on any measure. When the Minister of Finance says that the matter can be debated on third reading, that is setting a practice which is extremely unsound. I believe that we are being reasonable in asking that the second reading be allowed to stand over until Monday so that we can at least read the bill.

Mr. Abbott: It was announced last night as part of today's business.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, I rise at this time to support the second reading of this bill.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If there is to be a motion for adjournment it will have to be dealt with. I might point out that at the moment there is no motion regularly before me.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Abbott: With some reluctance, Mr. Speaker, I must take the position that I think we should proceed this morning. I cannot agree to the suggestion which has been made.

Mr. Fleming: May I ask the Minister of Finance a question?

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Speaker, I wonder who has the floor? It seems to me that my friend the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) has been trying to get the floor for some little time but has not been recognized.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) is not going to speak further, I will call on the hon. member for Assiniboia.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the principle of this bill. I believe the principle is simple, namely that of establishing, by law, provision for central credit societies. While I have not had the opportunity to look at the bill carefully, clause by clause, I feel that the principle is a good one. I for one can support second reading of the bill at this time. I believe that our credit unions have provided excellent credit facilities and a real service to the membership in the various credit unions in the different provinces in Canada.

Credit unions are in the intermediate and short-term credit field. They are prepared to lend money to their members, many of whom could not obtain loans through the regular lending facilities of the chartered banks. I feel that they have provided a very beneficial service, a service that is not provided and will not be provided to the same extent by the chartered banks.

Another thing, the membership of credit unions support the co-operative philosophy. They believe that by banding themselves together and forming a co-operative for the purpose of pooling their available cash so that it may be lent to their members upon application they are taking profits out of this particular business, namely, the lending of money. They feel that the philosophy of credit unions, the philosophy of co-operatives, is good and sound philosophy, and so they support credit unions not only because of the facilities they provide but because they believe in the principles behind co-operatives and credit unions.

I have had some experience in my own province with the workings of credit unions, and I know countless people who have been able to obtain money from credit unions without security, who would not have had any opportunity to obtain that money through chartered banks, and who, if they obtained the money from small loan companies, would have had to pay an excessive rate of interest. There are many farmer members of credit unions who have been able to borrow money to pay off their obligations when they had an opportunity to pay them at a considerably reduced amount because of a cash discount that was provided.

These credit unions are making loans to their members for the purchase of home furnishings, automobiles, farm machinery, and, as I said, have lent money for the purpose of paying off indebtedness on their property.

It is difficult for a single credit union to have the necessary reserves each and every year and each and every month of the year. So within the provinces, or within certain provinces, central credit societies have been established. In that central credit society the membership is composed of credit union associations. By a hundred or two hundred individual credit unions becoming members of the central society they can pool their funds; they can provide for credit unions that need a large amount of money for the purpose of loans, moneys in addition to that available in the local credit union.

This bill is merely extending the principle that now prevails in the central credit societies within the province. When this bill is finally passed, as I am sure it will be, and becomes the law of the country, and after credit unions have made available to them the provisions of the act by forming co-operative credit associations, I believe they will provide greater stability and greater security for the functioning of the various individual credit unions.

I have before me a publication of the Department of Agriculture for 1951 called "Credit Unions in Canada". It shows the very large number of Canadians who are now members of various credit unions in Canada. For example, in 1945, 590,000 Canadians were members of credit unions. By 1951, six years later, that number had almost doubled to 1,137,000 members. Credit union history is short in Canada; it extends back only 50 years, but progress has been rapid. In 1920, for example, there were only some 30,000 members in all the credit unions in Canada. That shows the phenomenal growth of credit unions and the fact that they are playing an increasingly important role in Canada.

I believe that credit unions are very desirable and that this bill will assist in the functioning of the credit unions in the various provinces. I know that the bill will be referred to the banking and commerce committee, where we shall have an opportunity to go over it clause by clause. If there are any questions on any specific items that we wish to raise I know that we shall have an opportunity to do so and shall receive a full explanation.

I am prepared to support the second reading of this bill today; but if it should be the desire of the house to postpone discussion to another day I would have no objection to that being done. My main interest is to welcome the bill and to see that a bill of this kind becomes law in Canada, because I feel it will serve a very useful and important purpose.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to make clear that I was opposing only the procedure; that I, like others, am in favour of the principle of the bill. What I am against is this hurried procedure.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): I feel that we should have had the bill in our hands earlier than we did in order to be able to give it some study. But if it is thought desirable to go ahead with the second reading today, as the minister indicated he should, then I should like to say a word on the principle of the bill, although it might have been better to leave it over until the first of the week so that we would have had more time to study it.

I listened to what the minister said in his short statement. With his exposition of the principle of the bill I found myself in complete agreement. On behalf of my group I should like however to reserve the right to enter into a somewhat longer discussion of the bill at another time, if that can be arranged; when clause 1 is called in committee I presume that will be possible. We shall have an opportunity of studying the bill in the banking and commerce committee and of hearing any evidence that anyone wishes to give in that committee.

I support the principle of the bill; I think it is excellent. Anything that will strengthen and stabilize the individual credit unions throughout this country is good; it will help them to extend the services which they have been giving to the people of the country.

The credit unions, many of which are being organized every year throughout all of Canada, are organizations for the extension of short-term loans mainly to those who may require accommodation but who may not be considered to have enough of the kind of security that is asked for by the chartered banks. No source of small loans has as yet been provided for this type of borrower except by the small loan companies in Canada, and everybody knows that most of these small loan companies are nothing but loan sharks. They do prey upon the unfortunate who seem to have no other source of short-term financial assistance.

I want to say that anything we can do to extend and encourage the principle of co-operative self-help upon which credit unions are based is providing assistance to those people who now have to go to the loan sharks. Under the law of Canada these small loan companies are able to charge 24 per cent—they call it 2 per cent per month. But I want the house to know my investigation shows me that by compounding on their monthly balances they raise that interest to a rate of more than 30 per cent simple interest per year.

Mr. Nowlan: Service charges.

Mr. Low: Yes, service charges. I say it is not right that we have not provided in this country some organization that can extend to those borrowers who are forced into the hands of the small loan companies the amount of accommodation they require at a decent rate of interest they can afford to pay.

I say that anything that will encourage co-operative self-help, the basis of the principle of credit unions, is good. For that reason I welcome the introduction of this bill, and certainly I shall give it very careful study between now and the time we go into committee.

Mr. F. H. Larson (Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, co-operative credit unions hold a high position, and the government obviously is supporting that position by the introduction of this bill. I do not feel the bill will interfere particularly with the operation of commercial banks or with banking business generally because, as has been said before, these co-operative credit unions are not normally operating in the fields in which banks would be interested. The financing of the purchases of heavy machinery for individual farmers and for others is covered by farm improvement loans which have been instituted by the government.

It has been stated before that these unions cover a field which normally is not covered in any other way. My reason for believing that there is a certain amount of urgency in connection with the immediate passage of the bill, and the setting up of the legislation, is that these co-operative credit unions have a large amount of money on deposit, and they are and for some time have been making loans. They do not appear to fall into any classification under which they would be brought into line with normal banking procedure and banking regulations.

As I understand the principle of this bill, the intention is to do that. The bill gives protection to depositors who put money into these credit unions, and sets up some sort of regulation as to what percentage can be lent to private individuals, without security, and what percentage must be held on deposit for reserve. This is timely legislation. I think it should be hurried through as quickly as possible, because even the co-operative members themselves, who sponsor these unions, realize that regulations such as are set up in the bill are necessary and vital to the health of the co-operative unions and to the successful carrying on of their business for a number of years, no matter how economic conditions may vary one way or another.

I support the bill and believe it should be brought before the committee as quickly as possible.

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, as one who has had something to do with the formation of credit societies in Newfoundland, and who is familiar with their growth in that province, as well as in the neighbouring province of Nova Scotia, I feel that while this is a good measure it does not pay a great compliment to those who are interested in the co-operative movement, when they are treated in this cavalier manner by having the bill rushed through in a hurry. This is a subject of such vital interest to so many people throughout the country that in my view it deserves a full-dress debate, so that many of the features and ramifications of the measure might be brought out, and hon. members could be informed about the value of the co-operative movement, as well as the benefits it has extended since its organization many years ago in the province of Quebec by the celebrated Alphonse Desjardins who, in my opinion, is deserving of a monument somewhere in this country for the great work he has done.

This is a wonderful movement, and I regret time does not permit our giving more careful consideration to a measure of this kind which has historic significance. It was only yesterday the Minister of Public Works gave notice that this bill was to be proceeded with this morning. I made inquiries to see if I could secure a copy of the bill, but it was not until this morning at eleven o'clock that our copies were received. How can we give proper consideration to a measure comprising 28 pages and 85 sections, which is going to affect the co-operative societies and credit unions throughout the country, when we are permitted to see the bill only a few moments after the house opens in the morning?

Mr. Fleming: A bill no one has read, except the minister.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Yes, that is so. We are told the minister has to go away, but surely his presence is not necessary to effect the passage of a measure of this kind. He has a parliamentary assistant who has shown his ability to handle much more complicated legislation than that now before us. Therefore I feel sure that he could with great confidence delegate to that hon. gentleman the handling of this measure.

However, since the minister appears to be adamant, and we have no recourse except to accept his dictatorial decision that we go ahead this morning, even though the heavens fall, I should like to say a few words about this great movement.

The debate on this measure affords an opportunity to pay a tribute to the marvellous work accomplished by St. Francis Xavier university in Nova Scotia in creating what has been known throughout the world as the Antigonish movement, in which the chief workers have been the Rev. Dr. Coady and Father Tompkins, or Dr. Jimmy Tompkins as he was popularly known throughout the maritimes, as well as in Newfoundland.

These men between them acquired a great knowledge of the business of, and an insight into the needs of the workers, the farmers and the fishermen, in their respective environments. They had the ability to inspire those people to assist themselves. I do not know how far hon. members are familiar with the humble beginnings this movement had in Nova Scotia. In the days of the depression following the first world war, when the fishermen did not know what to do to earn a dollar, Dr. Tompkins came to them with the idea that they might help themselves, and showed them that if they would pool their resources and ship their lobsters alive to the Boston market they would get a greater return. Soon they would be able to lift themselves out of the depression and poverty which had been their lot for generations.

One can imagine the enthusiasm with which they greeted the first cheque returning from the Boston market showing them that they had received many times more for their produce than they would have received had they carried on in the traditional way and sold to the merchants. This credit union movement, which deals with money, sprang from that humble beginning in the little village of Canso. The credit union movement has spread throughout the country as well as in the United States. In that country they have a national association with headquarters at Madison, Wisconsin. Their organization is known as CUNA, the Credit Unions National Association.

There is another feature about the movement that is of particular interest, in that there is complete harmony between the members of credit societies in this country and those in the United States. Not only is there harmony, but fraternity, co-operation, and an anxiety and willingness to help one another. It is a marvellous movement and one which is not merely confined to dollars and cents. When you are dealing with a co-operative it is not like going to a banker who will look at you with a cold eye trying to appraise your resources. When you go to a co-operative credit union officer you go to a person who is a friend, and if he possibly can, he is going to find a way by which he can help you, not only in such cases as were mentioned by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) but also in the case of medical and hospital expenses, money for holidays and for the building of houses. Money has been furnished in all these instances by such credit societies.

The growth of the movement in Nova Scotia, particularly in the island of Cape Breton, has been miraculous. I have seen houses being built there co-operatively which were financed partly through co-operative credit societies or credit unions. People obtained loans from the credit union to buy the land and they all worked together to build their homes. These societies have financed the building of many homes in the island of Cape Breton and in other places where the movement exists.

The progress of the movement in the province of Quebec is not so well known to members who do not come from that province. They may not be so familiar with what has happened there. The growth of the credit union movement or caisse populaire in the province of Quebec has been astonishing. It exists all throughout the province and is just as much a part of the business life of the communities as the banks themselves. While I recognize the desirability of having legislation to provide for the proper inspection and supervision of a national movement of this kind, yet I feel, as I said at the beginning of my remarks, that it is a pity that we have not had more time to go into the matter. I am only speaking now extemporaneously and without giving any lengthy consideration to the matter, but I want to repeat that it is a marvellous movement and anybody who has been connected with it knows that. The spirit that can be and has been developed amongst members of co-operative societies wherever they have been established and the benefits that have been brought to the members are really astonishing.

I think of a case now of a man who came to me last summer and asked me for a loan. I said, "Do you not belong to the civil service co-operative credit society?" As I happened to be one of the prime movers in establishing it, I knew all about it. He said, "No." I said, "All you have got to do is to go to the treasurer and ask for a loan and you will get it in a very short time without any trouble at all. I will tell you what I will do. I will send you to the treasurer and you go there, join the credit society, ask for a loan, and see what happens." He went to the treasurer and got his loan. I have seen that happen many times.

It is a marvellous thing for people with large families who get into financial difficulties and are not able to go to the bankers. They cannot go to the bankers but they go to their friends in the credit society. It is a pity that this movement is not better known, and I am astonished that it is not when one realizes how important it is.

I am sure that careful consideration will be given to the clauses of the bill in the banking and commerce committee, and I only regret that time does not permit us to give greater attention to it at this stage.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, as a member representing a constituency which has a very highly developed credit union movement, I personally am particularly interested in the bill, as are a good many of my constituents. I want to take this opportunity to say how pleased I and my constituents are to see this legislation come before the house. I happen to be a member of a social credit club—

Mr. Abbott: Of what?

Mr. Casselman: Truth will out.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, that was slightly inaccurate. I meant to say that I am a member of a credit union which was one of the first in British Columbia to study the question of the necessity for central credit associations and legislation such as that now before the house. That was some twelve years ago. I remember being at a meeting of the organization which gave considerable thought to the question. I am sure there are a good many people who have worked hard for the credit union movement—I must be careful to remember to use the right words—in my constituency who will be very pleased to know that the minister has introduced this legislation.

The credit union movement in Kootenay West has been of great value to industrial and office workers in the constituency and now it is spreading widely among the farming population. I want to pay a tribute to the half a dozen or so people who some fifteen years ago started out to organize the movement. It was hard going at first and on occasion they were ridiculed by those who thought that the movement would not amount to anything. As a matter of fact, at the present time we have credit unions with hundreds of thousands of dollars on loan all the time. Once again, may I say that I am very pleased to see this legislation come before the house because I believe that it is another step in widening the field of co-operative action in Canada.

Mr. G. C. Nowlan (Annapolis-Kings): Mr. Speaker, since the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Browne) referred to Nova Scotia, I should like to speak on this matter for a minute, and also because of the fact that I have been associated professionally with the credit union movement and the co-operative unions of the maritimes as solicitor and counsel for some ten or fifteen years in the past. I perhaps would be misunderstood if I did not support the passing of this legislation at this time. I concur entirely in what the hon. member for St. John's West has said. I think it is rather cavalier treatment that a matter of this importance should be rushed through on such short notice, and really without complying with rules of the house for proper consideration of the legislation.

I should like to refer to the work which has been done in Nova Scotia by societies such as these, and particularly to the great leadership given by Dr. Tompkins, and by Monsignor Coady, who has given his whole adult life to the co-operative and credit union movements and to whom the people of Canada owe a tremendous debt. He will be recognized in years to come as one of the great citizens of North America, a world citizen and a leader in Nova Scotia. I am very proud to pay this tribute.

The work of credit unions is so extensive today that some legislation such as this is absolutely necessary. There is no doubt that a set-up must be created on a federal basis whereby the work can be properly supervised. As the hon. member for St. John's West has said, the spirit is tremendous; but spirit alone is not sufficient to control financial institutions, and sometimes a little less spirit and more control may be better. Therefore I welcome the legislation, as I am sure we all do on this side of the house. I know that it will receive consideration by the committee and I trust that it will deal with it rapidly so that the machinery will soon be available.

Mr. J. A. Ross (Souris): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word on this matter. First of all I should like to say how surprised I am that the minister should only present this bill at eleven o'clock this morning and ask to proceed with it now. After all, when we have dealt with the principle of the bill and the committee has given consideration to the clauses, of which there are some 85, and it comes back for third reading, that will hardly be the proper time to debate the merits and demerits of the legislation. However, it is to be proceeded with right away and I want to say that I am entirely in agreement with the principle and endorse all that has been said about the wonderful work that has already been accomplished by credit unions throughout the country. There is a great deal of credit coming to those who pioneered in the setting up of these organizations. They have accomplished a very worth-while work in many sections of the country. I do not want to take more time to repeat what has already been said. I am in favour of the principle and am wholeheartedly in support of the measure.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask one question. When the bill has gone through the committee and comes back to the house can it not be discussed in the house at that time just as well as now?

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: If the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

(Translation):

Mr. P. H. Spence (Roberval): Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a few words regarding this bill, which we have not had time to study. Following the comments I have heard, may I say that in my opinion, this bill will render new services and facilitate the development of co-operative credit associations, that is our "caisses populaires" as we call them in Quebec, our credit unions.

Mr. Chairman, I have taken an active interest in the credit union movement for the past fifteen years or so. I myself founded a credit union of which I was manager for seven years. As you are no doubt aware, credit unions were started in the province of Quebec over forty years ago by Commander Alphonse Desjardins, and they have been greatly beneficial to the rural and working people.

The credit union movement in the province of Quebec stems almost entirely from good citizenship and the practice of the virtue of charity. That is why in the last fifteen years or so, the number of credit unions has increased threefold and their capital has expanded from thirty or forty million to the present total of approximately $300 million, if I remember well.

I hope that the bill now before the house will not interfere with the development of the "caisses populaires" in the province of Quebec nor dampen the spirit of collaboration that must exist between those and the credit unions in other provinces. I like to think that the government, before introducing this new bill, was wise enough to consult experienced people who were anxious to safeguard, so to speak, the autonomous character of the "caisse populaire" of the province of Quebec.

The services rendered by credit unions, as I said a moment ago, have been extremely valuable to the people. I would like to point out to the members of this house, for their guidance, that the first loan granted by the "caisse populaire" at Dolbeau was a $10 loan. It enabled a poor workingman, who was then earning only $15 a week, to pay the hospital a $25 bill. When he handed in the $10 which had been lent him by the "caisse populaire", he managed to settle this $25 account, thus saving $15, plus charges. Later on he paid back the credit union through bi-monthly one dollar payments, with almost no interest charges whatever. He therefore managed to get rid of this debt at no hardship to his own family. On another occasion, thanks to the Dolbeau credit union, about twenty citizens of that community were enabled to build houses, through loans of approximately $300. Of course this was some years ago when construction costs were lower than they are these days. The credit union made loans of $300, the borrower buying materials for that sum until there was no money left. Then he came back for another $300 loan. In this way the credit unions caused a large number of houses to be built.

They are still rendering extremely useful services in a field where banking institutions are unable to act. In the case of larger loans, the banks must require repayment within 12 months, while co-operative credit unions grant their borrowers the privilege of repaying these sums according to their means. In other words they may repay a $2,000 loan through monthly payments of $25.

It is with pleasure that I have taken this opportunity to say a word about our "caisses populaires"—co-operative credit unions—in Quebec, for they perform very laudable work and have rendered great services. Therefore, I hope that under this bill our credit unions may be able to increase the services they have already rendered in Quebec since their inception.

(Text):

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, in supporting this bill, very briefly, it occurs to me that the French term for this institution is much better than the English—much more expressive. Caisse Populaire means in direct translation "the people's bank". It is owned and operated by the people, and perhaps small people in the financial sense of the word. Its benefits go directly to themselves.

Representing a constituency in a province in which business is becoming more and more co-operatively owned and operated I cannot do other than support this particular bill. The credit union is just another manifestation of the co-operative idea. It is the manifestation of that idea applied to the lending of money. As an active teacher a number of years ago I was one of the first members and, if I remember rightly, I was the president of the first teachers' credit union in my own city of Saskatoon. Many other groups of employees, for instance the employees on our newspaper there, have credit unions of their own. The credit union is only an instance of people helping each other and by so doing directly helping themselves.

Another thing which has perhaps been mentioned here already is that these unions tend to keep the small borrower out of the hands of the small lending companies whose reputation as far as I can see—although I have had no direct connection with them nor direct experience with them—is not always so savoury. Small people are fortunate in not having to rely on such institutions when they can lend each other money as the occasion requires and then receive it back. If there is any profit in the matter may I say that it is not profit in the ordinary sense of the word but rather a saving to them through their work.

For these reasons I have great pleasure in supporting this bill and I shall look forward with some interest to studying the details.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I would consider that I was remiss in my duty if I did not say something on this bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gillis: I consider it to be one of the most desirable pieces of legislation which have been introduced in the House of Commons since I have been a member of the house.

Mr. Ward: Let us get along with it then.

Mr. Gillis: That is what we are doing. We are trying to push it along and we are trying to give the banking and commerce committee some information for their use when they are considering the bill in case there are too many like yourself on the committee. The bill requires a little elucidation.

Mr. Ward: We have not heard anything fresh this morning.

Mr. Gillis: As I say, Mr. Speaker, I consider it to be one of the most desirable pieces of legislation to come before the house since I have been a member of this house. I know something about the early stages of the credit union movement in this country. It had its roots back in the days of the depression when the banks were not pushing any money out and there was no Household Finance, and the people of this country realized that they would have to do something for themselves. I have always been convinced that the future of this country and the future of this world depends on more ownership on the part of more people.

Mr. Ross (Souris): You are coming along now.

Mr. Gillis: In this bill the ordinary people are linking up the community to co-ordinate developments that took place away back in the early days of the depression when there was no money available for their needs—for any purposes. These men and women banded themselves together at various places across this country, and formed these credit union organizations. In the very early days, I had the pleasure of working for that movement with men like Dr. Coady and Dr. James Tompkins—those are the Nova Scotia people, but there were others right across Canada doing the same kind of work. This bill today is the means, on a national scale, of tying up all these community and provincial organizations which, in my opinion, will be a challenge to the regular banking system of this country in the days to come. It at least has driven them into the small loans field. All these new chains, like the Household Finance and many others which exist today, are attempts to duplicate or offset the credit union movement.

When the industrial development bank was proposed in this house, I said that it was a waste of time to establish another branch of the chartered banks which would merely underwrite doubtful investments in the aftermath of the war. I suggested at that time that a national co-operative bank should be set up to co-ordinate these credit unions. Then, this new chain of finance should be thrown open to the people on a share basis with shares of anywhere from $10 to a maximum of $100, thus enabling all the people of this country to become shareholders in that chain of finance and to develop subsidiary industries across this country for which capital cannot be found. The industrial development bank was set up and our ideas at that time were not accepted. I am glad to see that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) is now introducing this bill, which will enable hundreds of thousands of small people across this country, through their membership in their local credit societies, to share in this new chain of finance which is being set up at this time.

I hope that the banking and commerce committee will realize how important it is in the future development of society in this country, and will not only accept the bill as it is but will improve it. I believe it can stand some improvements, but it is a long step in the right direction. I have no desire to hold up the bill. I merely wanted to say these few words, because it is one subject in which I am particularly interested, and I am going to watch its development with a great deal of interest.

Mr. Speaker: If the minister speaks now, he will close the debate.

Mr. Abbott: First let me thank hon. members for their co-operation in proceeding with this measure this morning. I should say that if it were not being sent to the banking and commerce committee I would not, of course, have insisted or urged that we proceed to give it second reading today. But I feel we should do so for a variety of reasons in addition to the ones I gave. I am informed that the various provincial co-operative credit societies are very anxious to proceed with their application for the special act which will be authorized under this bill, so I think it is desirable that the banking and commerce committee should start consideration of the bill as soon as possible, get it back to the house and then to the other place so that the complementary piece of legislation, that is the application for incorporation by special act of the national credit association, can be proceeded with at this session.

As the house will appreciate, this bill is a purely enabling measure. It permits the incorporation of a national credit association by special act, and outlines the powers of such an association. It provides for inspection and supervision by the superintendent of insurance. I agree with what has been said about the splendid work which is being done by these credit unions, and I think it is now desirable that there should be federal legislation to authorize the incorporation, organization and supervision, as the member for Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan) has pointed out, of these financial institutions. I hope that the bill will commend itself to the members of the banking and commerce committee and, as the member for Peace River (Mr. Low) has suggested, when it comes back to the house it will be quite proper for members who wish to elaborate on some of its provisions to do so on the first section of the bill when it is in committee of the whole.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Robinson in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Defence services—

241. To provide for the Canadian forces, the defence research board and other expenditures relating to defence, including contributions toward the military costs of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization; to authorize expenditures in the current year out of the amount hereby provided, not exceeding $324,000,000, under the provisions of section 3 of the Defence Appropriation Act, 1950, and to provide that, notwithstanding subsection 3 of that section, where equipment or supplies acquired by the Canadian forces after March 31, 1950, are transferred, the estimated present value thereof shall, if the governor in council so directs, be credited to this vote instead of being paid into the special account mentioned in the said subsection 3, and when so credited may be expended for the purposes of the Canadian forces; and notwithstanding section 30 of the Financial Administration Act to authorize total commitments for the foregoing purposes of $3,994,895,578 regardless of the year in which such commitments will come in course of payment (of which it is estimated that $1,971,926,275 will come due for payment in future years), $1,960,159,633.

The Deputy Chairman: The committee was considering the subheading "navy", page 298 of the blue book.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, some considerable time ago I received information from two sources that some new Cadillac ambulances were being driven about by the defence forces. My informants looked upon this as a needless extravagance in the provision of ambulances, and requested that I look into the matter. I therefore put some questions on the order paper which were answered first on March 4, in this form as recorded at page 2603 of Hansard. The first question was:

How many ambulances have been purchased by or for the defence forces, since January 1, 1952?

The answer was 95 units. Question No. 2 was:

What was the number of each make, e.g., Ford, Dodge, etc., and what was the price paid for each make?

Now, the answer to that was that there were 36 purchased from the Ingersoll Body Corporation at a price of $5,390 each, and there were 37 purchased from the Flexible Funeral Car and Ambulance Company of Canada, at a price of $5,950, 22 from Chrysler Corporation of Canada, Limited, which were ¾ ton 4 × 4, M43, at a price of $5,833.83 each. These latter 22, of course, were field ambulances adapted for cross-country work and so forth. It is the other 36 and 37 to which I refer.

I put another set of questions on the order paper in this form which appear at page 2958 of Hansard for March 16, 1953. The first question was:

> Of the 36 ambulances purchased for the defence forces from the Ingersoll Body Corporation, what was the make of the chassis and engine, or if more than one, how many of each make, and the cost per ambulance for each make of chassis and engine.

I asked the same question concerning the 37 purchased from the Flexible Funeral Car Company, and the answer given was as follows:

> The 36 heavy cars ambulance purchased from Ingersoll Body Corporation were supplied with standard Commercial General Motors chassis and engines for which Ingersoll Body Corporation metropolitan type body was designed.

The same answer was given for the 37 ambulances. I should like to ask how many of these ambulances were actually on Cadillac bodies with Cadillac engines, and how many were of other makes, and what was the cost of each?

Mr. Campney: I understand that the chassis of the 36 Ingersoll Body Corporation ambulances which were purchased were Cadillac chassis. These ambulances are standard metropolitan ambulances. The quotations by the Ingersoll Body Corporation were on the Cadillac chassis $5,390 and on the Dodge chassis $6,434. The lower price was accepted.

Mr. Harkness: If I understand this matter correctly, the cost of a Cadillac ambulance is less than that of a Dodge ambulance.

Mr. Claxton: That is right.

Mr. Campney: The quotations on the chassis showed the difference which I have quoted.

Mr. Harkness: In spite of the fact that an ordinary commercial Cadillac car is, I think, three times the price of a Dodge?

Mr. Claxton: That is right.

Mr. Harkness: That seems to be remarkable.

Mr. Adamson: Last night I was about to ask about the major item in the navy estimates, namely $140 million for ships this year. The question I should like to ask is this. I do not see the matter referred to very clearly in the white paper. Can a progress report be given of the ships expected to be delivered or some progress report on their construction, or as to what we might expect in this calendar year? I gather that the new carrier, the Bonaventure, is to be paid for by Canada. I wish to compliment the navy on that fact because I think we have grown out of the stage where we can borrow ships from the United Kingdom. I think we have got to build our own ships and own our own ships, and not be in a position of borrowing them. Can the minister say what the situation is?

Mr. Claxton: Yes, Mr. Chairman. The estimates include the Arctic patrol vessel, $1,635,000. That is expected to be delivered.

Mr. Adamson: That is not the C. D. Howe?

Mr. Claxton: No.

Mr. Adamson: That is the new one?

Mr. Claxton: That is the Labrador. It was launched last year. On the 14 escort vessels the estimate of further funds needed is $124,605,000; on the 14 coastal minesweepers, $10,060,000. Ten are expected to be delivered. Eight patrol craft, $1,700,000. Two are expected to be delivered. Thirty-nine auxiliary vessels, $9,389,000. Thirty-one are expected to be delivered. On the Bonaventure, the estimate is $11,700,000. On the modernization of 16 frigates, $7,800,000. Fifteen are expected to be delivered. On the modernization of 18 Bangors, $3,400,000. Ten are expected to be delivered. On other incidental expenses in this connection, $1,155,000.

Mr. Adamson: The minister did not say—or if he did so I did not catch the figure—what was the cost of the escort vessels.

Mr. Claxton: A further $124,605,000.

Mr. Adamson: For how many?

Mr. Claxton: Fourteen.

Mr. Adamson: About $10 million each?

Mr. Claxton: Yes.

Mr. Adamson: And for the Bonaventure, $11 million?

Mr. Claxton: A further $11,700,000.

Mr. Adamson: What percentage is that of the total cost? Can the minister tell us what she is likely to cost altogether?

Mr. Claxton: Of the order of $20 million, without aircraft.

Mr. Adamson: That is an escort vessel. I suppose that includes armament?

Mr. Claxton: Complete.

Mr. Adamson: Then I suppose an escort vessel costs approximately half the price of a carrier?

Mr. Claxton: We got the carrier at less than the cost for a carrier that commenced today because it had been partly completed at a time when prices were lower.

Mr. Adamson: I am asking approximately what would be the cost of the carrier or the increase in cost if it were built now or if we had to pay full price for her.

Mr. Claxton: It is extremely hard to say because these are all special jobs. I do not think any of them are done on a tender basis. But for a fleet carrier, equipped as this one will be, the cost might be in the order of $30 million, or probably $35 million, without aircraft.

Mr. Adamson: And the cost of the aircraft for the carrier will be what?

Mr. Claxton: Again it is extremely hard to say because they are only beginning to produce jet aircraft for carriers. Also that is in part a matter for the Department of Defence Production. There are only two types of aircraft so far developed for use from carriers, the one American and the other British. The British is a heavier one than the American. I would think they would cost about half a million dollars each.

Mr. Adamson: How many of them does the carrier hold?

Mr. Claxton: Thirty-two on the carrier itself. Then as a rule there is a group on shore of another thirty-two. Then there are the reserves to provide for maintenance and wastage for at least a year. That would be, I should say, another 50 or 60 aircraft. Altogether there would be about 120 aircraft at $500,000 each—say $50 million approximately for the aircraft.

Mr. Adamson: That means then that your total capital cost of the modern carrier, including aircraft, would be in the nature of say $50 million or $60 million, plus $35 million, or approximately $100 million?

Mr. Claxton: Something under $100 million for a carrier of this type; but for a carrier of the type of the Forrestal, my recollection is that it would be about $1½ billion.

Mr. Adamson: The Forrestal is the new United States carrier?

Mr. Claxton: Yes.

Mr. Adamson: And it is—

Mr. Claxton: A super carrier.

Mr. Adamson: Yes; it is a super carrier. The minister says the cost would be about $1½ billion for that?

Mr. Claxton: Yes.

Mr. Adamson: It seems to me that an extremely large number of eggs are riding in one hull.

Mr. Claxton: Then of course, before a carrier like that can move safely to sea, it must have an attending appendage of destroyers, battleships, cruisers and a complete galaxy of vessels to protect it.

Mr. Adamson: Yes, the minister is correct. I just wondered whether the minister is correct in saying that the cost of the Forrestal was $1½ billion or $1,500 million?

Mr. Claxton: That is what I understand.

Mr. Adamson: Then there are the auxiliary craft. In other words, when one major carrier goes to sea, it is almost a fleet action?

Mr. Claxton: Yes.

Mr. Adamson: With all its auxiliary craft and everything?

Mr. Claxton: That is right.

Mr. Nowlan: Last night the minister said he could give us some information with respect to the cost of the seaward defences at Halifax. At the same time, in view of what has been said about the Bonaventure, I would ask the minister if he would comment on the suggestion that there will be built at Eastern Passage a pier or wharf for the accommodation of possible aircraft carriers in the future. Just what is to be done? Is that construction starting now and what will be included in it?

Mr. Claxton: Yes. That is intended; and the provision is made in these estimates for the commencement of a jetty. That has been approved also by treasury board, so we anticipate to begin work on it this year. As regards the seaward defences, up to December 31, 1952, $2,467,000 has been spent in Halifax harbour.

Mr. Nowlan: What is the estimate of the cost of the pier which is to be built at Eastern Passage?

Mr. Claxton: $900,000.

Mr. Pearkes: I should like to ask one question supplementary to that which has just been asked with regard to the progress of vessels. Of course there is a great deal of difference between the launching and the commissioning of a ship.

Mr. Claxton: Quite so.

Mr. Pearkes: Can the minister give us any idea as to how many of these escort vessels will be commissioned this year?

Mr. Claxton: None.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the subheading "navy" pass?

Mr. Claxton: I beg your pardon; I am subject to correction. It may be possible to commission the first late in 1953, but I doubt it. That would be very good progress, and it would be escaping with a minimum of difficulties that are likely to arise.

Mr. Pearkes: I realize that.

Mr. Claxton: I have one answer I should give the hon. member for Greenwood in reply to his question yesterday about major construction projects. I mentioned in my speech that we had 1,048 major construction contracts. By this we mean contracts involving more than $10,000. They vary from several million down to $10,000. We have information available for each of the three services, navy, army and air force, detailing each major construction contract showing the items comprising the contract with the expenditure incurred as known at the end of the year. That is the end of the calendar year, December 31, 1952. A great part of this information has already been put before the defence expenditure committee, and if anything further is desired it can be dealt with there in detail.

A breakdown of construction contracts which might be useful here is that showing those supervised by Defence Construction Limited or other agencies which constitute the major construction contracts. We have no major construction contracts that are let by the Department of National Defence itself. They are handled for us by Defence Construction Limited or by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. The only contracts that we supervise are those for renovation, repair, alteration and the like, and most of these are under $10,000. The number and value of major construction contracts since April 1, 1950, are: major contracts supervised by other agencies, 968; under construction during 1952-53, 749. Major contracts supervised by the Department of National Defence, total 1,100; under construction 1952-53, 299. The totals are 2,068, or under construction in 1952-53, 1,048, the figure I gave at the outset.

In addition there are contracts for married quarters which are constructed by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, which is responsible for design, layout of the contract, inspection and supervision.

The question of standard buildings was raised, and it was suggested that in view of the fact that we use to a great extent standard building designs that have been worked out, we shall not require the service of consultants. This unfortunately is not so. The standard buildings have to be modified to suit the site condition. This involves the design of foundation in each case. There also has to be supervision by engineers and architects during the course of construction for which they receive the fees that are set by the architectural association and which are current in civilian practice. I might point out that in major construction in apartment housing, it is estimated that rather more than 50 per cent of the cost today goes for what is called engineering, a much bigger proportion than in building up to recent times. Therefore, in almost every case it is necessary to have an engineer. The normal design fee in commercial and industrial practice for individual buildings is 3 to 4 per cent of the cost.

Owing to the use of standard buildings as high a percentage as this is not usually paid for design in the case of buildings for the Department of National Defence. For example, in the case of 460 standard buildings constructed by the R.C.A.F. from standard designs the consultant fee paid represented approximately 1·5 per cent of the cost, or much less than half of the cost usually paid by civilian purchasers on individual contracts. Already the total number of buildings constructed or being constructed to designs which are standard is 754. One design has been used 45 times, and 27 designs have been used 10 or more times each, so that this practice of having standard designs, which we started as far back as 1948, has paid off very substantially from the point of view of saving money and also of speed in getting on with the job.

I should add in answer to the question about the commissioning of ships, it is hoped that eight new minesweepers will be commissioned in 1953-54.

Mr. Adamson: That is to the end of the calendar year 1954?

Mr. Claxton: No, that is the fiscal year.

Mr. Adamson: By March 31, 1954?

Mr. Claxton: Yes.

Mr. Adamson: While the minister is on that can he give the committee an estimation, apart from these minesweepers, of the total number of ships that we expect to be commissioned in 1954?

Mr. Claxton: Fifty-six.

Mr. Adamson: What are they? They are the minesweepers—

Mr. Claxton: I have given a great deal of information about the battle order of the navy. Does the hon. member really want me to spell them out?

Mr. Adamson: No. I mean the minesweeper is the largest—

Mr. Claxton: No. These are not all new ships. The total number that will be commissioned by the end of the fiscal year 1953-54 is 56.

Mr. Adamson: Are these the total number of ships that will be in commission at the end—

Mr. Claxton: That is right. These are naval vessels quite apart from auxiliaries. In addition there will be 83 auxiliaries.

Mr. Adamson: That was up to 1956?

Mr. Claxton: No, by March 31, 1954, we will have a total of 56 naval vessels; that is vessels entitled to fly the white ensign. We will have a considerable number in reserve, but in addition we will also have 83 auxiliaries in commission.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The minister gave a lot of figures in answer to my question last night. I am afraid that it has got me groggy because there were so many. The one thing I want to stick to, the one bit of solid ground I can get on for the moment, is this. I understood the minister to say that the definition of a major project or contract which I asked about last night is a contract of $10,000 or over. Incidentally I do not know how the minister can get down to that because we were just talking about a ship costing $1½ billion—

Mr. Claxton: I have no exact information about the cost of a ship. That must be understood. I am giving my recollection of what I have read in the press. I am sure that no official figure has ever been given.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I realized at the time that the figure was of a great magnitude but I thought that it included one nought too many. I can hardly grasp an amount that large. I thought he meant $150 million. But apparently that is nothing. Now the minister gets down to small figures and he calls a contract at $10,000 a major contract. I confess that even from where I sit it does not look major even in our scale of expenditures. I would recall to the minister that I am interested in the fact that we have 200 or 300 architectural firms called in on these jobs to assist. I should like to have some yardstick to establish what a major contract would be, and which would meet with the judgment and the common sense of an ordinary man. I would say that one of $10,000 would not be major. I would say even that, considering what you get for $100,000 today, that would not be major. Therefore, I would like to ask how many contracts or projects there are over, we will say, a quarter of a million dollars. Perhaps the minister would let me have that information after the lunch hour.

And when I ask that I would ask also to have the minister let us know at what stage he feels it necessary to call in an engineer and an architect. I would presume that on a $10,000 job he would not have an engineer or an architect—and if I am wrong he will correct me. I do not wish to labour the point.

I was taken aback last night when I found that there were 1,048 major projects. I realize of course that it all depends upon how one defines the word "major". I cannot believe that in any man's language $10,000 would be considered major; so I have selected at hazard the figure of $250,000. Perhaps he could tell me how many are in that category.

Mr. Claxton: I shall be glad to get the information. However, I can tell the hon. member that I am sure he will have found in his own experience that in most contracts made by individual users involving the construction of houses costing $10,000 or more, they would use an architect, and the architect would probably employ a heating engineer. That is ordinary practice.

We do not do that, because we have houses by the thousand.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Yes, that is what I mean.

Mr. Claxton: And, in connection with our housing projects, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation employ all the people necessary. I do not think they use architects even on the big camp sites.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Now the the minister is getting right along to the point. He has answered one question when he says that where a private individual spends $10,000 he certainly has to have someone to look after it. Yet, here we have units by the score being built. However, I shall wait until I receive the answer to my question. I have taken an arbitrary figure when I have defined my understanding of the word "major", for my own purposes.

Mr. Adamson: My reason for asking about the capital cost of ships is that, as the minister knows, I have advocated that Canada should at least consider the advisability of having a submarine branch in the navy; and that now, with the atomic submarine apparently costing about $19 million, it is not a very great sum in comparison with the cost of major ships.

Mr. Claxton: I am prepared now to give the hon. member for Greenwood some figures. The number of consultant contracts in existence since April 1, 1952, is 334. A consultant contract is where a consultant has been employed for the Department of National Defence. We do not employ them; they are employed for us by Defence Construction Limited. We do not ever engage an architect or engineer as a consultant directly. The number of consultant contracts, or contracts involving the use of consultants, awarded between April 1, 1952, and February 28, 1953, is 123, making a total of 457. During this period, 87 of the contracts involving the use of consultants have been completed. So that the total number of contracts, under administration today, involving the use of consultants is 370.

Mr. Catherwood: Has the turkey producers association made any request to the department to have turkeys served on the menus of military establishments across Canada and in the armed services at least once a week? This matter was brought to my attention by the organization. We all know turkey is a real delicacy on any menu. I hope the matter is being considered by the department.

Mr. Claxton: I do not know whether it has been coincidence, or whether they have been dressing up because the boss is around, but I have never gone into a cookhouse without seeing either steak or turkey.

Mr. Knowles: Did they not have Lake Winnipeg goldeye?

Mr. Claxton: I am sorry to say there are not enough of them.

Canadian Army—Active force and general.

Mr. Harkness: I should like to inquire first about the educational standards required in the army, and the way in which they have been changed. Some time ago I placed a question on the order paper, to which I received an answer on February 5. In that question I asked the following:

1. What are the educational standards at present required for enlistment in the (a) navy; (b) army; (c) air force?

2. On what date were these educational requirements put into effect?

The answer I received dealing with the standards required by the army was as follows:

The suitability of applicants for enrolment in the Canadian army is tested by aptitude and intelligence tests.

In other words there are no educational requirements at all. As a matter of fact I understand that a certain number of men who were unable to read or write were taken into the army. On the other hand the educational requirements of the navy stipulate the completion of elementary schooling. The same applies to the air force, except for aircrew, where junior matriculation is required.

Why were the educational requirements for the army abolished on November 13, 1951? How can men who cannot read or write, and who are taken into the army, be usefully employed; because, in the light of the technical development that has taken place in that branch of the service, it would seem to me that educational requirements equal to those of the navy or the air force are necessary in the army for practically all jobs, particularly those jobs in any of the technical corps.

Mr. Claxton: I have never heard of there being in the Canadian army any soldier who could not read or write. If the hon. member has knowledge of that, it is news to me. Such a case has never been brought to my attention. I have never heard such a suggestion before, and I would doubt it very much.

I would agree with him that it is quite inconceivable that useful work could be found for anyone in any of the three services who could not read and write. The educational standards are precisely the same as those for the soldiers in the second world war, namely the aptitude test and the M-test, and the same score is now required as was required at that time.

It is difficult to relate a common educational standard to school grades. It is even difficult to talk in terms of grades because there are ten provinces in Canada and the grades, as we find, do not correspond. Generally speaking, however, a man who passes the aptitude test and gets the required score is likely to have at least sixth grade and probably more likely seventh. In the navy and air force the educational requirements are just about the same. They both use a combination of grade measurements and aptitude tests.

Mr. Harkness: I should like to ask the minister if it is not a fact that up to the 13th of November, 1951, there was an educational requirement of elementary schooling, in the army as well as in the other two services, which has now been abolished. He has not explained really why there should be this difference between the services.

Mr. Claxton: At the time of Korea, in June, 1950, we had raised the standards to a very high level because we were getting more men than were needed to provide for the planned build-up of the three services, and intake was controlled by raising the standards. However, in the case of the 25th and 27th brigades we applied the wartime standard and that has been applied since.

Mr. Harkness: I want to get at this point. Is this one of the cases in which the standardization as between the three forces, which was put into effect some years ago, has now been departed from?

Mr. Claxton: No; it was never achieved. The three services each had their own methods of selection. There is a committee which has worked on common standards but the navy and air force prefer to keep their own separate systems because of different requirements, including a higher proportion of other ranks in the navy and air force able to take technical training, and I mean technical in the precise sense, to train as artificers, mechanics and electricians. In view of the fact that these standards were well worked out and well known in the three services, I did not feel anything was to be gained by making them uniform. In fact we would have lost rather than gained by it.

Mr. Harkness: In a dispatch by Bill Boss a few days ago I noticed that the great majority of the people in the brigade had educational attainments of less than grade 8, and that a considerable amount of work was being done, or proposed to be done, to provide education for these people in the army. Can the minister tell us what progress has been made? According to the article, the majority of afternoons are spent in educational activities and so forth. Has the minister any definite figures as to how much the educational standards of the men of that brigade have been raised? I think it is an excellent thing to be doing.

Mr. Claxton: I made a statement on this matter the other night in answer to the hon. member for Cape Breton South.

Mr. Harkness: So that there will be no repetition, perhaps I might interject that what I want more particularly is the number of people taking educational work and what progress has been made.

Mr. Claxton: I would have to get the precise information from abroad. We have arrangements made under which education is carried on by correspondence courses in the same way as during the second world war when the system was organized by the Canadian Legion, which had an excellent committee on the subject under the chairmanship of Colonel Wilfrid Bovey, who is well known to a number of hon. members. We have carried that on since with the co-operation of the Canadian Legion and the Department of Veterans Affairs.

My recollection is that at the present time there are about 1,500 courses being taken. In the case of the 27th brigade, it would probably be a fair estimate that the other ranks are all about grade 8. If you consider the matter, that is a very good grade indeed for peacetime forces and for people engaged in corresponding work in civilian life. The men there are encouraged to take voluntary work and we are instituting a system whereby compulsory education is given to other ranks to bring them up to grade 8 as a minimum. That is just being instituted now. The facts I gave are to be found at page 3924 of Hansard for April 15. There are 5,360 serving personnel taking D.V.A. courses in the army alone.

Mr. Fair: It seems to be almost one o'clock, and I want to discuss with the minister the question of housing at Wainwright camp. I wonder if we might call it one o'clock.

Mr. Claxton: I am afraid I cannot be here at 2.30. I would be glad to answer the hon. member because I have been at Wainwright camp.

Mr. Fair: For quite a few months the question of housing in the town of Wainwright has been under discussion and has been causing quite a little dissatisfaction. Because of the building up of the camp over past years there has been quite a heavy influx of civilian personnel with their families into the town of Wainwright. As a result thereof and because there is insufficient accommodation, it has made it particularly hard for some of the residents of Wainwright who do not have their own homes, and the necessary housing is not available. On the 12th of February I received a letter from the secretary of the Wainwright and district chamber of commerce and agriculture dealing with this matter. He reported that at a recent meeting they had representations from the Wainwright branch of the Amalgamated Civil Servants of Canada with respect to the matter.

The chamber pointed out to these representatives that the only reason for the high rents and lack of accommodation was that the camp was not a permanent one. I asked the minister about the matter of permanency a couple of weeks ago and he told me it was permanent in the same way as Camp Petawawa and certain other camps are permanent. But apparently that has not fixed the trouble. Is any provision being made by the department to provide housing for married men on the permanent staff there and also for civilians working in the camp in a civilian capacity?

Mr. Claxton: As I said in answer to the hon. member the other day, Wainwright is a permanent camp, but we do not expect to have large units or numbers of soldiers there permanently. It is to be used for training units in field operations. These will be sent there, as has been done in the past two summers, for periods of one, two, three or four months. Generally speaking they wil be under active service conditions and will be engaging in field operations on a very large scale.

Therefore we do not plan to have a very large permanent staff in the camp the year round. In the winter the camp will be used for winter exercises as was done, for example, in preparation for exercise Sweetbriar when we had some 2,200 men there for ten days. But it will not be used in the same way as Petawawa or Camp Borden where troops are stationed permanently. Therefore it will not have a large permanent staff. The staff who will be living there throughout the winter will be the minimum necessary to keep the buildings and the camp going. So far we have 26 permanent married quarters for which contracts have been placed. If we see any need for building any more we will build them, but so far that need has not been seen. Generally speaking, it is not our practice to build married quarters for civilian employees. We think that it is difficult enough for us to be in the landlord business on the scale we are with regard to service personnel without going into it for civilians as well. It is very unusual for us to have civilians in married quarters.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Fair: Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose at one o'clock I was endeavouring to secure from the Minister of National Defence some favourable consideration with regard to the housing situation for permanent officers and for those people who have moved into Wainwright in order to work at the camp. The information I received from the minister was not very satisfactory. He pointed out that the camp was mainly used for three or four months during the summer, and was occupied in the wintertime by a staff of caretakers, if one could use that term. He did not feel that the department wanted to provide homes for the people concerned with civilian work at the camp. The people of Wainwright are not satisfied with that explanation.

I pointed out to the minister that I received a letter from the Wainwright and district chamber of commerce and agriculture informing me of the delegation from the Amalgamated Civil Servants of Canada, and that letter in part reads as follows:

> The chamber could only inform the delegation that high rents were due to two things: first, to the inability of the town to provide rent accommodation for more than a small fraction of those who desired it; and, second, the failure of the department of defence to make Wainwright a permanent military camp.
> Much rental property, some of it of a very unsatisfactory nature, has been provided by the permanent residents at considerable cost. As long as the use of the camp as a permanent training grounds remains in doubt, the owners of this rental property will seek to recover their capital investment in as short a time as possible to avoid serious loss. It would seem, therefore, that it is the duty of the government of Canada to protect their employees against excessive rents by providing a proper amount of competitive housing in order to force rents down to a more reasonable figure. If the department of defence would provide living quarters for married personnel on the permanent staff of the camp, the same result would be achieved.

The letter goes on to say that the rents being charged are very high, and in some cases there is a dearth of the most elemental conveniences, and then adds:

> Therefore, the morale of those who live in town is generally low. It is particularly unfortunate that our men in uniform should feel unfairly treated in their own country. The high ideal of the western allies in the "cold war" must lose some of its idealism in the eyes of those who, understandably, become disgruntled.

After the delegation went back and discussed the matter again with their own organization, I received this resolution from the secretary of the Wainwright branch of the Amalgamated Civil Servants of Canada, under the heading "Housing—Wainwright, Alberta." It reads as follows:

> Whereas, the present housing and rooming shortage in the town of Wainwright, Alberta has led to exorbitant rentals being charged for existing inferior accommodation; and
> Whereas, the Wainwright chamber of commerce and agriculture maintain that this condition is due to two things; first, the inability of the town to provide rental accommodation for more than a small fraction of those who desire it; and second, to the failure of the Department of National Defence to make Wainwright a permanent military camp; and
>
> Whereas, it is generally agreed that the town of Wainwright cannot, under these temporary conditions, adequately take care of the influx of both army and government civilian personnel seeking accommodation; therefore
> Be it resolved: That the government, on behalf of the said army and government civilian personnel, investigate immediately the housing conditions in Wainwright and render all possible assistance in the promotion of a low rental housing scheme to alleviate present conditions.

I may say that condition has existed for many months, and the troubles are not yet cleared up. I was hoping that today I would get some encouragement from the minister with regard to this matter. In any event, his answer was not very satisfactory.

While I am dealing with this subject, perhaps I should deal also with the matter of education of the families of these men in the military camp as well as the families of those civilian workers who moved into Wainwright, seeking work at the camp itself.

This movement has been the cause of a lack of accommodation in the schools which is costing the school board a great deal of extra expense. The board is now compelled to build more classrooms because of the presence of these people in the town who are not by any means permanent. As soon as the work at the camp is completed, then these people will move out again. I was wondering whether or not the government has considered giving any assistance in this connection. Perhaps the associate minister could give me some information on that, and then I may have one or two more questions to ask.

Mr. Campney: As has already been intimated to the hon. member, Mr. Chairman, the department seeks, so far as possible, to house its permanent service staffs at permanent camps, and those civilians who must necessarily remain at the camp practically all the time. Otherwise, the department tries to engage local civilians on the civilian side and most of these people look after their own housing needs. I might say that the situation at Wainwright is under consideration at the moment, and the particulars which the hon. member has mentioned will be considered and discussed with the housing authorities. Until now there have not been enough service children permanently located at Wainwright to justify considering school facilities, but I can assure the hon. member that both the problems which he has mentioned are being reviewed.

Mr. Fair: I thank the minister for that information. I hope that no time elapses in having both these matters investigated, because I do know from the letters I have received, and from a personal visit there not many months ago, that conditions are not satisfactory. The additional number of children present in the town as a result of workers moving in to take part in the building program at the camp has caused the members of the school board to make provision for additional classrooms. I believe those rooms are to be built just as soon as it is possible to do so. I think the department has some responsibility in that connection. If we should have peace in Korea—which is hoped for by many people, although not by some—then the camp may be closed or perhaps cut down materially. That would leave the ratepayers of the Wainwright school division putting up money that would not be necessary. I therefore hope that the department will see to it that an early investigation is made and that something definite is done to relieve those conditions which I have brought to the attention of the department.

There is another matter with respect to which I have had questions on the order paper for some time, namely the supply of milk to the Wainwright camp. I have asked for the price being charged to the camp during 1950, 1951, 1952 and 1953 to date. I understand an exorbitant price is being charged there, and I wanted to have that understanding confirmed before saying anything further about it.

Mr. Campney: I have not particulars of any contracts of that nature. I assume that tenders for milk supply would be called for and contracts let by the Department of Defence Production. The Department of National Defence would not necessarily have the details of any of those contracts. The question should be addressed to the Department of Defence Production.

Mr. Fair: I have placed those questions on the order paper. I realize that the departmental officials have been extremely busy providing information for the defence expenditure committee that is now sitting dealing with these matters, but I hope that information will be brought down soon because I want to say something about the matter before the session closes.

Mr. Higgins: Last evening the minister promised me an answer to a question I asked. Possibly the associate minister could give it today. It is in connection with the amount paid for 14 minesweepers. I suggested to him that the cost of these was estimated as $950,000 each whereas the actual cost was $3 million each. The minister promised to look the matter up and let me know today. I have not received the answer.

Mr. Campney: With reference to the hon. member's question, may I say that I understand the figure of approximately $900,000—

Mr. Higgins: $950,000.

Mr. Campney: —was not really an estimate of the completed cost of a minesweeper. It was only a preliminary estimate of the first elements, which go to make up a minesweeper. The ancillary things which go to make up a minesweeper's equipment and armaments, etc., were not included. The figure was in other words the initial estimate of the partial cost of a minesweeper. I am told that the cost of a completed minesweeper of the type to which the hon. member referred is in the order of $3 million.

Mr. Higgins: Is that not an extraordinarily large discrepancy? I refer to the difference between $950,000 and $3 million?

Mr. Campney: What I endeavoured to tell the hon. gentleman was that the $950,000 figure was not really at any time a full estimate of a completed minesweeper. It was a preliminary estimate made of the first elements of a minesweeper when the construction program was being set up. It was not the full estimate of the cost of a completed minesweeper at any time.

Mr. Higgins: I am not disputing what the minister says. But was it not announced, at the original time the announcement was made of this fact, that the cost would be $950,000?

Mr. Campney: Not to my knowledge. I have no recollection of any announcement to that effect.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That is not an answer at all.

Mr. Campney: I think the hon. member for Greenwood asked for some further information from the minister during the morning session. He asked what were the number of construction projects involving a cost of a quarter of a million dollars or more. The figures which I have been given show that from April 1, 1950, to February 28, 1953, the number of such projects was as follows: In the navy 29, having a dollar value in the aggregate of $28,579,438; in the air force 319, having a dollar value of $364,035,050; and in the army 102, having a value in dollars of $88,042,107; or a total of 450 projects having an aggregate dollar value of $480,674,595.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I hope hon. members on the other side of the chamber will not think anything has gone wrong with me when I say that I am rising to extend a compliment to the Department of National Defence. It arises out of a matter which a number of hon. members have referred to during the course of this discussion with regard to the army estimates. I refer to the provision which is being made, or which some members feel should yet be made, with repect to the education of children of service people stationed permanently in various locations.

The compliment I wish to extend is in respect of the arrangement made between the Department of National Defence and the school board of the city of Winnipeg. As the associate minister knows, the department has stationed a large number of service personnel permanently at the Fort Osborne barracks. That fact created a tremendous problem for the school board of the city of Winnipeg. Perhaps I must qualify my compliment by saying that negotiations seemed to be unusually protracted and that the chairman and the members of the school board of Winnipeg thought at times that it was taking too long to complete the arrangement. However, when the arrangement was finally completed, it was highly satisfactory. It involved, in the main, a considerable contribution of federal money to the school board of the city of Winnipeg in order to enable it to put up the necessary building and to provide the necessary equipment.

I may say further that the members of the school board of the city of Winnipeg are perfectly satisfied that there will be no interference with their handling of the affairs of this new school and that there is no interference with provincial jurisdiction over education involved in this financial assistance. In other words, I rise to offer this compliment and I express the hope that other members who are concerned with similar problems in their locality will take heart from the fact that in this case a satisfactory agreement was concluded. Of course, we have an extremely progressive group of people on the school board of the city of Winnipeg, and they pressed the matter until there was this satisfactory agreement. I want to say also—as I said the other day—that in a case like this we are glad to know that the government's reluctance to provide federal aid to education did not interfere with the need for dealing with this problem. We in the city of Winnipeg are pleased with the arrangement, and we hope that this principle of federal financial aid to education will be extended.

Mr. Campney: I wish to thank the hon. member for his kindly words.

Mr. Dinsdale: I should like to ask a few questions of the associate minister. They arise out of a return that was tabled yesterday concerning welfare services. I have a fairly comprehensive report on the present situation of welfare in the various services. Question No. 2 reads:

> What staff at unit level is detailed exclusively to welfare service duty in (a) Korea; (b) Germany?

I find that the reply indicates that one officer and an assistant is delegated exclusively to welfare work. My specific question is this. Does that indicate that there is on foot a move to militarize welfare services? It seems to me that formerly there was no officer designated as such for welfare services. My question is, does it mean that welfare is going to become an integral part of the military organization?

Mr. Campney: In response to the specific question, it is my information that in each battalion or equivalent unit—I know it was so when I was in Korea a year or more ago—there is an officer and an assistant who is delegated to carry out what might be included in the general term of welfare duties in that unit. I think that has been the established practice and has been fairly generally used for quite some time.

The question of welfare, as the hon. member knows, is one that is under continual study, and up until the present time it has been felt, after much study and consideration, that to carry on these services within the service itself—the army in this case—is the most satisfactory way of handling the situation in the circumstances which obtain at the present time in our Canadian army.

Mr. Dinsdale: It does not necessarily mean that it is going to be a process of militarizing welfare. If voluntary services would appear to do a better job, they might be resorted to, if circumstances change?

Mr. Campney: I think it would be fair to say this. In the consideration of this problem there is no intention at all, as the hon. member puts it, to militarize welfare services. If we are convinced at any time that whatever arrangement is worked out by study and experimentation could be improved upon, we shall give consideration to that fact, but up to the present we have felt that the present method of handling that part of the interests of the troops is best.

Mr. Harkness: I should like to bring up the matter of desertions. I got a return on December 18 which showed that at that time a total of 2,005 persons were listed as deserters from the armed services. There is an article in the Calgary Herald of November 29 which bears that out. I will read part of it. It says that the armed services really make no efforts to apprehend deserters or to deal with them. This particular article deals with a soldier who came back from Korea. He was a deserter for some three or four months during that period. Whilst he was a deserter he drew $260 in gratuities which were paid over to him anyhow. He went across the border through our immigration people, and so forth, came back and eventually, after several months, gave himself up. After dealing with all these circumstances the article says:

> During that time—

That is the time that this man was a deserter. I continue:

> During that time my acquaintance was making fruitless attempts to persuade the army to collect its missing soldier, providing them with information which would have made it quite simple for him to be picked up. At no time did the army display the slightest interest in the matter, and one letter from the adjutant-general's department in Ottawa makes the astounding statement that "the primary responsibility of an absentee of the Canadian army is for him to return to his unit or to the nearest Canadian army establishment" . . . It is in the absentee's interest to report as soon as possible and thus terminate his offence.

The comment on that is:

> This is like saying that it is the duty of all offenders against the laws to surrender themselves to the police.

What steps are taken by military authorities, by the department, to apprehend deserters and to cut down on the number of deserters? The number of 2,005 is quite a large one; in fact it is approximately a little more than 2 per cent of the total number in the services, or it was at the time this article was published.

Mr. Campney: The question of deserters of course is a serious one in any service. I suppose it is reasonable to say that it is likely to be much more common in a cold war than in a hot war. The problem is with us, and I am informed that we do try to apprehend all deserters. But as to the degree of the effort that is put into the search, the number of people required in the provost corps to carry on such duties in addition to their regular duties is an important consideration. Generally speaking, we do apprehend as many as we can as quickly as we can. The figure of 2,005 quoted by the hon. member includes I am told a considerable number of deserters who have since been apprehended. Naturally I do not know the specific facts about the case to which the hon. member has just referred.

Mr. Harkness: On that point, the statement in this return put out by the department is that the deserters not subsequently apprehended or returned to duty were 2,005.

Mr. Campney: As of that time, yes; but we still continue to apprehend them as fast as we can, and have obtained a good many of them since, I am told. I am also advised that in connection with the apprehension of deserters the provost corps work with local police in the cities and provinces and also with the R.C.M.P., and that they do continue at all times to search for the missing men.

Mr. Harkness: What does the minister say about this article I have just quoted, which states that the soldier's absence and his situation, where he was staying, were reported to the army and no action was taken.

Mr. Campney: Frankly I would not say anything until I looked at the case and the file. I do not want to express an opinion on an excerpt from a newspaper article, but if the hon. member will give me particulars I will have the matter looked into. I would not care to comment further on the case until I know more about the actual facts.

Mr. Gillis: I have a question which has to do with this problem. A lot of the service personnel returning from Korea and being discharged from the 27th brigade are boys who went into the service with no previous employment. They are now coming out of the service and they are still unemployed. The government has set up a system whereby their unemployment insurance credits are paid for them while in the service, but when they register for employment or unemployment insurance, it is necessary that their record of credits come down from Ottawa to the unemployment insurance commission office. I have had cases myself that go back over the last year. In one case the boy had anywhere from two months to five months of his unemployment insurance commission credits returned to the local office. I have had considerable correspondence with the defence department, and I do not think the trouble is there because the mechanics that have to be gone through are that national defence reports the discharge. Then veterans affairs have something to do with it, but in the final analysis it must come through to the Department of Labour. I have seen boys who were married and unemployed who waited all that time to get those credits through. Is any progress being made in linking up the three departments necessary to get these credits through as quickly as possible?

Mr. Gregg: Speaking on behalf of the unemployment insurance commission, this is the first time that such a complaint has come to my attention. For my part we will certainly look into it to see what can be done to prevent any delays of that kind occurring in the future.

Mr. Gillis: I have written the minister's department through the deputy minister, and apparently there is no co-ordination there. I do not know where the roadblock is, but it is somewhere between national defence and the Department of Labour.

Mr. Gregg: I should be glad to look into it.

Mr. Harkness: To return to this matter of deserters, the total number listed as not having been apprehended at November 20, 1952, for the previous year was 2,005. Can the minister tell me how many of these have been subsequently apprehended, and what is the total number of people listed as deserters at the present time?

Mr. Campney: I will try to get that information later.

Mr. Fulton: I should like to ask the minister some questions regarding two pieces of army property. The first of my questions is concerned with the armouries at Quebec city. I noticed, according to an article in the Ottawa Journal of February 11, that there had been three explosions in the armouries in that city. The implication in the report, as I understood it, was to the effect that while the authorities did not wish to express any official opinion at that time, they did use words which raised the question as to whether or not those explosions had been set, or whether they were accidental. I am particularly interested in knowing whether anything has been found out since that time which would establish whether they were deliberately set, and the damage done by the explosions.

Mr. Campney: I am informed there were three separate fires which originated in the armoury to which the hon. member has referred. I think no great damage was done; but each of those fires is now being investigated. I have no report as to the causes of any of the three fires as yet.

Mr. Fulton: Was I correct in understanding that the words used were to the effect that it was felt investigations might establish that they were set deliberately? If so, has anything further developed?

Mr. Campney: I think that was the view of a newspaper. We will have no definite views in the department until we receive a report.

Mr. Fulton: The impression left by the article was that it had been based on a statement by the authorities. Would the minister let the committee know, as soon as he can, what the exact situation is?

Then I have a further question concerning the ordnance depot at Plouffe park. It has come to my attention during this week that certain buildings there are being dismantled. They are not part of the main structure, although they are within the fence around the depot. These are buildings which, I understand, were erected at some considerable cost, and they are now in process of being dismantled. What is the reason for their dismantling, and what did it cost to erect them?

Mr. Campney: I am not aware of the circumstances to which the hon. member refers, but I shall be glad to get the information.

Mr. Fulton: This is not based on personal observation, but on the observation of someone who reported direct to me that this is in fact the case. I would be interested in knowing the reason for it. They are being dismantled, and I should like to know how much they cost, because I am informed they were constructed within the last year and a half.

Mr. Campney: I shall be glad to obtain the information.

Mr. Green: I have two questions to ask the minister, the first of which has to do with benevolent funds. It has been my understanding that men who have served in Korea with the army do not have the same privileges in the matter of benevolent funds as are available to the men from the air force and the navy. On March 30 answers were tabled to the following question I had asked:

1. Are veterans with Korean service eligible for assistance from the navy, army and air force benevolent funds?
2. Is there a difference in the treatment of such veterans depending on the branch of the service to which they belong?
3. If so, for what reason is such distinction made?

The answers I received were as follows:

1. (a) Canadian naval service benevolent trust fund: Yes.

So it appears that the Korean veterans of the navy have the widest possible privileges. The answers continue:

(b) Army benevolent fund: No.

The army benevolent fund was established by act of parliament to administer funds remaining from canteen operations during the second world war. It provides assistance for veterans who served in the Canadian army during the period September, 1939 to September, 1946. To be eligible for benefits, a Korean veteran must also have served during the above period.

Then, the answer in respect of the air force was that their veterans were eligible. From these answers it would seem clear that a difference is made, and that the young lads who served in the army in Korea cannot get any help from the army benevolent fund.

During the discussion of the estimates on April 15 the Minister of National Defence made a brief statement on the point, which is reported at page 3928 as follows:

I should add, however, that it has been decided to institute a Canadian army welfare fund similar to the benevolent funds for the air force and navy for the purpose of extending benefits to serving personnel. That has been set up and a statement to that effect will go out tonight.

Will the associate minister tell us exactly what provision has been made, and the method in which these funds are to be made available to the Korean army veterans?

Mr. Campney: The statement by the hon. member is essentially correct. The difference in utility of the benevolent funds depends upon the terms of charters under which they were organized. The navy benevolent fund and the benevolent fund of the air force are fairly wide in their scope, and include service after world war II. The army benevolent fund, on the other hand, as indicated by the hon. member, was set up to deal only with funds accumulated during world war II. As the minister stated in the house, a benevolent fund is now being established to be known as the Canadian army welfare fund. This will be a continuing fund, will be administered by the same officials and trustees as the army benevolent fund, and will operate in respect to army personnel subsequent to world war II in the same way and under the same conditions generally as the army benevolent fund operates in respect of those who served in the army in world war II. I am not sure if the fund is actually in operation, but if it is not it soon will be.

Mr. Green: At the present time are there not greater privileges for men from the navy and air force than there are for men of the army who served in the second world war? I understand the navy and air force funds are operated by private trustees, whereas the army fund is administered by one of the government departments, and that the soldier is not able to get loans or help of other kinds to the extent it is available to sailors and airmen.

If that is so, the present plan merely stretches out that disadvantage to include the Korean veterans of the army. I should think that from now on Korean army veterans should have exactly the same privileges as are enjoyed by Korean navy and air force veterans.

Mr. Campney: I might not be correct but I was of the view that the army, navy and air force funds to which we have been referring were administered almost on the same basis. I believe the army benevolent fund is administered under the direction of the army benevolent fund board and that at the present time General Murchie is the chairman of that board. I cannot say categorically that the hon. member is not correct as to there being some difference in methods of application of the three benevolent funds, but I was not aware of it. I shall be glad to look into the matter.

Mr. Green: I think the minister will find that there is quite a wide difference. I would ask him to find out, for example, whether a soldier can get a loan from the army benevolent fund. I may not have the correct information but it is my understanding that the army man cannot get a loan whereas the navy man and the air force man can do so from their funds. I also understand that the army benevolent fund is administered by the Department of Veterans Affairs. Is that correct, or is it not?

Mr. Campney: I am informed that the hon. member is correct in stating that the army benevolent fund does not make loans, but the Canadian army welfare fund now being established is being empowered to make such loans. I shall look into the situation.

Mr. Green: Is it the intention that the Canadian army welfare fund now being set up will be used to give the army veterans of Korea exactly the same privileges as are enjoyed, and properly so, by naval and air force veterans of Korea?

Mr. Campney: I understand that is substantially correct.

Mr. Cruickshank: What is the procedure with respect to packing plants tendering for the provision of supplies such as meat at army camps? My understanding is that the contracts are given to a select few, and I cannot quite follow the reason for that. I would presume that any licensed packing plant should be permitted to tender, but apparently that is not the procedure. Why is that not so?

Mr. Campney: As I mentioned in reply to another question some time ago, the question of tenders for supplies is entirely within the hands of the Department of Defence Production. All we do is requisition what we want. The obtaining of such supplies, whether by tender or otherwise, is in the hands of that department. I am afraid therefore that I cannot answer the hon. member's question as to the basis on which the commodity to which he has referred is obtained.

Mr. Cruickshank: Then I think it would be a good idea if we left Korea for a while and some of the departments got together. I have a series of letters in my file, and the Department of Defence Production says that it is the Department of National Defence that has the say. The Department of National Defence sent me to the Department of Agriculture, and I expect to land in the Department of National Health and Welfare or maybe external affairs before a concern in the province of British Columbia is able to obtain the opportunity of bidding. I am not suggesting that any particular firm should get a contract but I do insist that any packing plant which is fully licensed by the federal and provincial governments should have the opportunity to bid.

The correspondence does not merely date back a week or two. It runs over a period of months, and if it takes that long for the department to decide among themselves who has the authority, possibly Russia will have declared peace before this concern is able to sell any meat. I am asking for a definite answer. If the minister cannot give it now, then I ask him to have some of his officials—and I understand from the records that there are plenty of officials—check and find out why any licensed packing plant in the Dominion of Canada cannot tender on meat supplies particularly for the Department of National Defence. As has been said by someone behind me, Canada Packers and Swift's can get contracts, but Canada Packers, Swift's and Burns should not be the only concerns in the packing line recognized in Canada. If they are, I want to know why they are. Will the minister get me that information?

The Chairman: Order. I allowed the hon. member to put his question and to comment upon the reply, although he received the answer from the minister that tenders are called for by another department. Obviously the minister will give the same reply.

Mr. Cruickshank: Mr. Chairman, this is the first time I have taken part in the debate.

The Chairman: Order. It is not a matter of how many times; it is a matter of whether or not the hon. member is in order. He was in order when he asked his question the first time. I permitted him to comment upon his question although he had received a reply, but I tell him now that if he insists upon getting a repetition of a reply he has already had he is not in order any more. In any event, if the minister wishes to comment—

Mr. Cruickshank: All right. I should like to ask another question if I may, which will be in order. Will the minister get for me the names of the packing plants supplying meat to each camp in British Columbia and the amounts of the contracts awarded by each camp within the last fiscal year? Will he also get for me the names of any packing plants in the province of British Columbia which have not been awarded contracts but which have applied? Surely that is in order.

Mr. Campney: I do not know that it is in order for me to get that information, but I will certainly call the attention of the Department of Defence Production to the inquiry of the hon. member. I cannot speak for them but I assume that the information he wants will be given him. We do not even have it in our department and I can only refer the question to the people who do have it. I suppose they will have to determine whether they are able to answer all or part of the question.

Mr. Green: There is one other matter I should like to place before the associate minister. Press dispatches some weeks ago indicated that Canada is to erect a building in Washington, D.C., for the Canadian joint staff mission. Would the minister tell the committee how much the building, site and equipment are to cost, and also how many people will be occupying the building when it is completed?

Mr. Campney: A site has been acquired in Washington, and I am trying to get the exact figure of the cost of that site. In view of the very extensive and close relationship that exists between our defence forces and those of the United States, and the staff that we have to maintain in Washington in that connection, it is proposed to construct a building on the site and I understand that the estimated cost of the building, for which plans are being prepared, is approximately $2 million. I am also advised that between 150 and 200 people will constitute the staff who will be using the proposed joint staff building. I have not got the price of the site but I will get it. By way of further explanation, the building will be utilized for offices not only for the representatives of the Department of National Defence but also for the representatives of the Department of Defence Production, which maintains a considerable staff in Washington.

Mr. Green: What accommodation do these people have now in Washington?

Mr. Campney: The present situation is that all these people are accommodated in rented quarters. One of the things that has precipitated the necessity of constructing this building is that one of the larger buildings now being occupied by our people is owned by the Australians, who want it and have served notice on us that they wish to repossess the building.

Mr. Green: What rental is being paid for the present accommodation?

Mr. Campney: I shall get that in a minute.

Mr. Green: The minister has said that the building is to cost about $2 million, and as he is going to get the cost of the site will he also get the cost of the equipment for the building?

Mr. Campney: I am informed that there ought not to be any, or at least very little new equipment required beyond the equipment in our various offices which will be transferred to the proposed building. The cost of new equipment will therefore be very small.

Mr. Green: How many officers does Canada have in Washington?

Mr. Campney: I will have that in a few minutes.

Mr. Green: I would like to know the respective duties of those officers in Washington.

Mr. Higgins: I have a question to ask the associate minister which I asked the minister on two occasions yesterday, but he overlooked replying. May I preface by saying, so that the associate minister will understand, that I am informed unofficially, but I believe quite correctly, that in Canada today there are some 1,500 armouries. There is an armoury in every capital city in each of the provinces, and there are two or three in some of them. The terms of union between Newfoundland and Canada provide that Canada will provide for the maintenance in Newfoundland of appropriate reserve units, which will include the Newfoundland regiment.

The Chairman: Order. My recollection is that the hon. member has asked this question before.

Mr. Higgins: It was not answered.

The Chairman: There was a reply by the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. Higgins: He did not answer it—or at least I cannot read it in Hansard.

The Chairman: It may not be a satisfactory answer to the member.

Mr. Higgins: It was not answered at all.

The Chairman: I heard an answer.

Mr. Higgins: May I put the question to the associate minister again so that I may have an answer.

An hon. Member: It was answered.

Mr. Campney: I think the hon. member's statement of the total number of armouries in Canada is not far off the mark. As far as additional armouries are concerned, it is largely a question of priority based on relevant necessity. There are a good many places where armouries are actually required. The rate at which we can build them is governed by the conditions which obtain. The order in which we build them is a matter of study of the priorities established. I cannot go beyond that.

Mr. Higgins: It is rather inconclusive. May I ask whether study is being made at the present time of St. John's with reference to the building of an armoury for reserve units.

Mr. Campney: I cannot give any specific information in regard to any specific location offhand beyond saying that we are reviewing all places where armouries appear to be called for. Those are matters which are considered by the relevant officers of the army and recommendations are brought forward in due course. What they are actually considering at the present time I do not know.

Mr. Higgins: One final question. Whom would I have to ask to find whether it is being considered or not? Who would know whether the matter is being considered?

Mr. Campney: I am informed that the question of an armoury at St. John's has been and is being considered.

Mr. Higgins: That is all I wanted to know.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the minister if he will explain why it takes approximately five months for a man being discharged from the service to receive a return of his contributions to the pension fund. This may sound like a small thing but it is not. For example, some of the boys who have returned after spending a year with the 27th brigade in Europe are released from the service after having put in two and a half or three years. When they come out they receive no clothing allowance and, as some of them went into the service at 18 or 20 years of age, they are much bigger when they get out and the clothes they left behind are now no good to them. They need the money to purchase clothing. In correspondence with the department I was told that it takes approximately five months to refund that money. Why should that be? All the documents of the boys are there when they are discharged and the amounts coming to them are known. I think it is unreasonable that they should have to wait that length of time for the return of their contributions. Can the minister explain why it is?

Mr. Campney: I do not know that I can explain why it is, but I can say that I agree with the hon. member that it certainly should not take that length of time. In recent months that whole situation has been studied and reviewed and the time is being shortened very materially.

Mr. Gillis: Thank you, sir.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I have here a return entitled "Canadian firms receiving large defence orders during the period March 16 to 31, 1953", which is put out by the Department of Defence Production. On page 5 I find this item:

Petawawa, Ontario. Removal of ashes, $18,600.

How many tons of coal are required to produce ashes which cost $18,600 to remove?

Mr. Campney: I imagine that would require the assistance of the dominion coal board or some organization able to compute coal in terms of ashes. All I would be prepared to say at the moment is: that is a lot of ashes.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I think it must be an enormous amount of ashes and it is why I think perhaps we should know the amount of coal necessary to produce those ashes.

Mr. Fulton: I want to ask the minister about another matter in connection with the 27th brigade in Germany. I am sure the minister and all in his department will have been reading with great interest a series of dispatches from Bill Boss, Canadian Press representative, who has recently gone there. In this particular dispatch, reported in a number of papers, and I am reading from the Ottawa Journal of April 13, in dealing with the difficulties the correspondent states that unit commanders—the three battalion commanders—are experiencing difficulties in connection with the maintenance of regimental traditions and affiliations within their units. The minister will be aware, of course, that when the policy of recruitment of this brigade was announced it was stated that the three infantry battalions—the rifle battalion, the highland regiment and the infantry battalion— would recruit each company from a separate reserve force unit in Canada. That policy was designed to maintain regimental traditions although we on this side said, and I remember that I personally raised the question, that it would in fact make it impossible to preserve regimental tradition. Nevertheless the official answer was that it was felt it would preserve regimental tradition and give each reserve force unit in Canada a spur to recruitment and also an incentive to look after its affiliated company in the corresponding battalion in Germany.

This article reports that cross postings within the battalions from one company to another, which of course are absolutely necessary in the administration of a unit, create enormous difficulties because these men have to take down shoulder patches and, in the case of the highland regiments, they have the wrong kilts, the wrong cap badges and so on. He instances certain cases where complications have arisen as a result of these facts. It is concluded here that the only way to overcome these difficulties is to do what, in fact, we forecast would have to be done, and that is to tell the men to forget that they came originally from the Seaforth or 48th Highlanders or the Royal Regina Rifles, whatever it may be, and tell them that they now belong to simply the First Canadian Highland Regiment or the First Canadian Rifle Regiment, as the case may be.

I want to ask the minister whether, in view of these difficulties which are reported, the department is taking a good look at this system and policy of recruiting, and whether it is not now realized that this system, which was designed to preserve regimental traditions, is in fact having the very opposite effect in making it necessary to tell the men that they can no longer regard themselves as having any affiliation or connection with the parent regiment from which they may have been recruited in Canada.

Mr. Campney: The hon. member has touched upon a very difficult and serious problem; there is no question about that. The whole matter is, of course, under consideration. I might say that the system of rotation has added to the difficulties the hon. member has enumerated. The principle that was involved when the idea originated is, I think, a good one, and it is sound because it interests every unit across Canada. These difficulties are being studied with a view to seeing what might be done in that connection. The difficulties are great, and the matter is quite complicated, as the hon. member knows.

Mr. Fulton: Does the associate minister not think that ultimately the solution will have to be to name the units over there as entire units, that is if you do desire to maintain regimental traditions and perpetuate that which has been so valuable in infantry formations, that is the regimental spirit? It will be necessary, I believe, to name the units over there by one or other of the reserve force unit names in Canada, that is the whole battalion, instead of trying to keep five separate companies of the five separate regiments. Is it not logical that you will have to arrive at that sooner or later? I want to ask the associate minister whether or not that is the thought in mind, as I hope it will be, rather than that they will simply go on calling it the First Canadian Rifle Regiment or the First Canadian Rifle Battalion, which has no significance or connection with any past Canadian military formations whatever.

Mr. Campney: I appreciate the views and suggestions of the hon. member, but at this time I would not care to hazard an opinion as to what the ultimate solution will be. I do recognize, as do all the officials of the department, the difficulty to which the hon. member is referring.

Mr. Fulton: May I ask the minister whether consultations on that question are going forward between the department and the reserve association of the infantry corps, so that their views may be known and considered.

Mr. Campney: I understand that it will be taken up by the association at its next meeting.

Mr. Knight: I should like to ask the minister a question or two on the expropriation of land for defence purposes. A constituent of mine in Saskatoon has a lot in Winnipeg, about which I have recently written the minister and I have not yet had time to receive an answer. I make no apology for raising the matter here because I have written once or twice since October, 1952, when the matter was drawn to my attention. I am concerned, of course, particularly in regard to this man's case, but I am concerned also about what I think is the general slackness of the department in attending to either payment or compensation for these various expropriations.

I am referring now to the district in Winnipeg known as the parish of St. James. This lot is in a section close to or adjoining the Carpiquet barracks. There is no necessity for dragging the owner's name into this, but I shall give the minister the number of the lot, lot 18 in block 15, plan 935. This expropriation took place in the year 1941, no less, and is dated December 12. According to a letter which I have, and I think it is over the signature of Mr. Drury, that expropriation was stated to last for the duration of the war and twelve months thereafter. I suggest that many more months have passed since that time. Then, in a letter which I have from the Minister of National Defence himself, dated some time in October, 1952, he said that arrangements have been made now with the city by which this arrangement was to continue until 1956. Well, he mentions arrangements which had been made with the city of Winnipeg, but he did not mention any arrangement made with the owner, and that is exactly the complaint the owner wishes to have brought up in this house.

Then in October, 1952, I have a letter from the assistant deputy minister, one Basil B. Campbell, in which he says to the owner that if the owner will settle on some reasonable price every effort will be made to expedite the transaction. Well, that is fair enough, but so far as I know it has not yet been translated into action.

Mr. Campney: What was the date of that last letter?

Mr. Knight: It was October 21, 1952. The letter reads in part as follows:

> If you will make a prompt reply to this letter setting out the price that you wish to receive for the property, the subject will be given careful consideration and if the price is acceptable, every effort will be made to expedite completion of the transaction.

Mr. Campney: Was there a reply to that letter?

Mr. Knight: I have no idea as to that, nor have I any idea as to whether or not the lot has been definitely bought. As I said at the beginning of my remarks, I am introducing this matter not so much because of this particular case as because I think the whole method is somewhat slack when a man is permitted to go along for 12 years in this state of uncertainty.

I may state that, to my own personal knowledge, a few years ago this man had a definite offer from a potential purchaser. I even knew the price he was offered. He was prevented from making the deal because he could not turn over title to the property. This man is now 74 years of age, and this little bit of property was what he looked upon as his security for his old age. The property has been tied up since 1941 without one cent of compensation being paid. Further, to add insult to what I think is undue injury, this man has had to pay the taxes on the property in the meantime. I can see no justification for that. If that is the system, I think it should be changed quickly. If the government defence department or other departments want to take an option on a piece of land, when the due date for the option comes along, why does not the department take it up or let it go? Why do they not do it by that method and either decide to abandon the property and return it to its rightful owner or pay the agreed price in the terms of the offer?

That is all I have to say in the matter. I hope that this particular case will receive attention. In all fairness to the minister I want to state that the minister has not yet had time—or at least he has not yet found time—to reply to my latest communication and I am looking for that reply in due course. But as I repeat again, I raise the matter in particular to show the general attitude towards expropriations of this nature. I had one close to my own city which had relation to a farm close to Dundurn military camp. We had something of the same sort of trouble about that. I wish to ask the minister to take this matter under his consideration and to let us know what the score is.

Mr. Campney: I am sorry that I am not personally familiar with the case cited by the hon. member but I will undertake to have it looked into at once. I am not personally familiar with the case.

Mr. Knight: There is a long file about it.

Mr. Harkness: I wish to ask a question with relation to this large pile of ashes. The only information we have from the minister is that it must have been a large pile. I think we must all agree with that statement. I wonder whether he could produce figures showing the amount of coal that was consumed there to produce this pile and also the price which was paid per ton or per cubic foot to remove these ashes. I ask this question because it seems to be an amount which is out of proportion. Possibly the minister could get those figures and produce them a little bit later, along with the other information he was going to get me with regard to deserters.

While we are on the subject of Petawawa there is another matter which I should like to take up. It concerns the sawmill which was built there and in regard to which I have had three separate questions on the order paper. In answer to one of those sets of questions the minister made a statement at page 2509 of Hansard. The numerous questions elicited information that, during the time that the mill was being operated by the Department of National Defence, lumber was produced to the amount of 1,550,000 board feet, which was valued at $100 per thousand, which makes a value of $155,000. During the first year that this mill was operated, it was operated by day labour, according to the return. During the second year it was operated on contract, at a contract price of $16.30 per thousand. If we assume that the contract price and the day labour price were the same, or approximately so, the cost to cut this amount of 1,550,000 board feet would be $16.30 per thousand multiplied by 1,550, which gives $25,265. The cost of logging in 1949-50 was given as $6,400 and in 1950-51 it is given as $39,999.25. So the cost of logging to provide the logs for this operation was $46,399.25. The total cost of the operation to the department was therefore $71,664.25. To that I would add the cost given for erecting the mill, which was $5,000. Hence the cost to the department of the 1,550 thousand board feet was $76,664.25. They estimated that the value of that was $155,000. Therefore they made a profit on it, or at least they got the lumber for $78,395.75 less than it would have cost them to go out and buy the lumber on the market, according to their own figures.

In spite of that fact, the fact that they got this lumber for less than half of what they valued it at or what they would presumably have had to pay for it on the market, on June 2, 1952, the policy was changed and the 500,000 board feet of lumber which they had on hand and which had cost quite a considerable sum to log off—

An hon. Member: Write them a letter.

Mr. Harkness: We will not bother going into the exact figures, but the 500,000 board feet which they had already there on hand in the form of logs were sold at $29 a thousand to another firm which presumably has cut or is cutting those logs into lumber. If this amount of 500,000 board feet had been cut into lumber, the cost per thousand for cutting the logs into lumber, according to these figures—$16.30 plus $20 they sold them for—would have been $45.30, a saving of $54.70 from what they could have bought the lumber for. The question which therefore arises is this: Why was the policy changed? If they were getting that lumber for half price, why did they change the policy, sell off these logs at a bargain price and then presumably go ahead and buy lumber at twice what they could have produced it for or more than twice what they could have produced it for? The whole operation just does not seem to make sense. Possibly the answer to the thing is to be found in the answer to one of the questions I put on the order paper about this matter. The question reads as follows:

For what purposes was the lumber, produced at the Department of National Defence sawmill at Petawawa, used, giving the amount used for each project or building.

The answer to that question is a wandering one. It is as follows:

The lumber was used for such things as forms for concrete for the construction of sidewalks, sewers, manholes, etc, the rehabilitation of temporary buildings and temporary married quarters to accommodate the units under training, routine maintenance, summer camp buildings such as shower stalls and field kitchen shelters and other miscellaneous projects, such as targets. Since the lumber used in these projects was drawn from day to day as required over the last four or five years, it would require a great deal of research and analysis to determine the specific quantities used on each particular project.

I just wonder whether all that means is that this large amount of lumber which was produced here they found just dribbled away and they were unable to produce any figures in answer to this question because they did not know what had happened to the lumber; and that possibly the reason that the policy, which seemed to be such a profitable one, was changed was that a great deal of the lumber was lost or had disappeared, and therefore they decided the best thing to do was not to carry on because they were losing the lumber anyway. I should like the minister to answer these questions I have posed and give us some information with regard to this sawmill.

Mr. Campney: Mr. Chairman, I hope the hon. gentleman did not expect me to follow his arithmetical calculations throughout as he read them. Generally speaking the situation is this, as I understand it: this operation was carried on by the army for some time, possibly not as efficiently as private industry could carry it on. The fact that it is an unusual industry for the army to engage in, plus the fact that there was a large accumulation of lumber at Petawawa, plus the fact that the price of lumber was falling, all together led to the change in policy which led to closing down of the sawmill at Petawawa.

[Mr. Harkness.]

As to the details which the hon. member has mentioned, I am not going to attempt to deal with them because I did not follow them completely.

Mr. Harkness: It is not a question of dealing with the details. The question is: When lumber was being produced, according to the figures provided by the department themselves, at half or less than half the cost at which they could have bought it and less than half of what they estimated it was worth, why did they change the policy, and go ahead and sell off the logs they had on hand at a bargain price?

Mr. Campney: As I have mentioned, I think the principal reason for a change in policy was that we had a sufficient stockpile of lumber at Petawawa.

Mr. Harkness: The minister says they had a sufficient stockpile for immediate purposes at Petawawa. They are still carrying on building at Petawawa, I believe, and I have no doubt they are using more lumber. They are certainly carrying on building at numerous other places. Why should this lumber, costing them, according to their own figures, less than half what they could have bought it for, have been discontinued?

Mr. Campney: I would have to check the hon. member's figures. I am not accepting his conclusions, not that I doubt the hon. member's arithmetical capacity, but he has come to a deduction from a long calculation which may or may not be right. I am not admitting his proposition at all.

Mr. Harkness: These calculations are not long or complicated; they are very short, and they are not over four or five figures. As a matter of fact they are taken directly off the return which the minister supplied himself.

Mr. Pearkes: There are two matters which I wish to receive information about. In the minister's speech on April 14 and in the white paper on page 17 he referred to the regular officers' training plan, R.O.T.P., part of which includes the encouragement given to cadets at the services colleges. Part of that plan includes the fact that from now on service at these services colleges will be pensionable. That is a new departure from what has been the practice in the past. This new departure comes into effect only this year. The result is that there will be certain young officers who have graduated from these services colleges in the army in the future who will be able to count their service at the Royal Military College or Royal Roads, as the case may be, for pension; whereas there will also be young officer graduates of those services colleges who will not be allowed to count their service for pension. I raised this point during the debate on the speech from the throne before Christmas and asked that consideration be given to permitting all these officers who are graduates of these colleges and who are today serving in the forces to count their time at the services colleges toward pension. May I have a reply to that question, please, because at the time I was told it would receive consideration, and that was several months ago.

Mr. Campney: The question that my hon. friend refers to involves this consideration, as I understand it. Those who sign on in the services when they enter service college become contributors to the pension scheme, which is a contributory scheme. If their entry into these institutions does not involve that, then they are not eligible for the benefits of the pension scheme. In other words, if they are committed to the service by signing up, they become contributors then and though they are attending these institutions, the time counts. If not, they do not become eligible for the benefits of the pension scheme and do not contribute.

Mr. Pearkes: I am perfectly aware that it is a contributory pension scheme; but a young graduate from the services colleges now going into the regular army has the privilege of contributing to that pension scheme; but the graduate of last year, before this new plan came in, does not have, as far as I know, the privilege of contributing toward the pension scheme. I am asking that all those who are now serving, whether they graduate four years hence, or whether they graduated last year, be permitted to count their services at the college and make a contribution to cover that time toward their pension scheme. Can that be done?

Mr. Campney: I am informed that that matter has been given study, but up to the present time it has not been deemed advisable to accede to the position that the hon. member takes. I do not know whether it has been finally considered—I would not want to say it has been finally and irrevocably considered—but it has been considered and it has not yet been deemed advisable to do it.

Mr. Pearkes: I hope it has not been given final consideration. The injustice and unsatisfactory conditions of having two men serving in the forces under such totally different conditions should be reconsidered.

My other point has to do with the policy in connection with the construction of the permanent quarters. I raised that question in a general way yesterday but I was not satisfied with the answer that I received. Barracks and permanent stations are being built to take care of these forces which we may expect to be permanently stationed in Canada. The information I would like is: Are the plans going ahead to prepare quarters for the airborne brigade so that all the units of the airborne brigade will be closely associated when serving at what one might call their home station, or is the old-fashioned policy, which has been in existence for many years, of building barracks in various parts of the country whereby the units in the same formation did not associate closer together, being continued?

Mr. Campney: I am informed that the airborne brigade referred to by the hon. member as the mobile striking force will not operate as a brigade. It operates as a series of service units stretched across Canada. I believe that the various units which will constitute this mobile striking force will have permanent establishments at different points in Canada.

Mr. Pearkes: Can the minister say where the various units will be permanently established? For instance, we have the Princess Patricia's Canadian Light Infantry, the Royal Canadian Regiment, the Royal 22nd Regiment, the artillery regiments, the Royal Strathcona's Horse and the Royal Canadian Dragoons. Where will the permanent stations of these units be?

Mr. Campney: I understand that the units of the mobile striking force change from time to time in view of the considerations involved in our other commitments. I do not want to convey the impression that there is a permanent establishment for each given unit. They will be distributed in accordance with the requirements. In other words, the mobile striking force I would say internally rotates similarly to the units abroad.

Mr. Pearkes: I should like to make this observation. I was hoping the minister would be able to say that there were permanent quarters for these various regiments. If they are going to be changing from one place to another, then I have this to say. I would call attention to the fact that 40 per cent of the personnel of these units are married, and these constant changes in stations will add a great deal to the expense of maintaining the units, particularly in the matter of married quarters. Again, I think there should be careful consideration as to whether it would not be advisable to allocate to these different units a permanent home.

Mr. Campney: I am glad to have the hon. member's views.

Mr. Gillis: I would bring to the attention of the associate minister a matter that has been brought to his attention, and to that of the deputy minister, on previous occasions. I am wondering if anything has been done to protect the member of the permanent force who contributes to the superannuation fund while he is in the service. In the case to which I referred on at least two occasions, the man was in the service ten years before he died, leaving a wife and two children. No pension can be established because the commission has decided his death was not directly attributable to military service, due to the fact that he died from heart failure. The widow is not eligible for war veterans allowance because she is too young.

His contributions made to the pension fund while he was in the service have been returned to her, but the income tax branch has deducted as income tax the sum of $600 from the contribution which was returned. Both the deputy minister and the minister will recall that I raised this matter in the defence committee when we were revising Q.R. (Can.). I brought it to the attention of the committee and said that, at least on the grounds of service loyalty for the benefit of those who had been in the service, some action should be taken as between the Department of Finance and the Department of National Defence.

It is most unfortunate to leave a young woman under those circumstances, and then to add insult to injury by deducting $600 by way of income tax from the contributions made by her late husband. On the occasions I mentioned this matter before, the Minister of Finance indicated that he did not know anything about it. I suggest that, in the interests of those in the permanent service, something should be done to protect those who contribute to the fund and who may run into a similar situation in respect of dependents who are left behind. Has any thinking been done in the matter, and is any action contemplated?

Mr. Campney: The point the hon. member has raised has been the subject of discussions between this department and the Department of Finance. I cannot tell the hon. member at the moment just what the results have been, or whether the decision has been finalized. However I do recall his observations, and I can say that we have initiated discussions to see what can be done to remedy this situation.

Mr. Gillis: Continue the pressure.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I should like to draw two or three small matters to the attention of the minister. The first of these has to do with seaward defences. A great deal of damage has been done to the south side wall at the city of St. John's. This matter was discussed before with an official in the department. Has anything been done? The road in question was subject to unusually heavy traffic in the nature of trucks loaded with stone, and the like.

Then I would support the position taken by my colleague the hon. member for St. John's East in connection with the armoury. I know that members of the Canadian army have been looking for an armoury at St. John's. They did inspect a building of which I had knowledge, but for one reason or another they did not find it suitable. I have heard reserve army officers complain about the embarrassment and difficulty they have with the facilities available in connection with the training of men. They say the present accommodation is not suitable, and if we want to have a reserve force down there we should give serious consideration to the question of the armoury. I support that view strongly.

My third question is a much broader one, and has been raised before. It has to do with our troops in Korea. Have they had associated with them at any time any South Korean troops, as has been the case in connection with United States forces? I understand that about a third of the personnel under United States army control are South Koreans. Has the Canadian government given any consideration to the idea of training South Koreans by integrating them with the Canadian forces, or giving them training elsewhere, or by supplying them with arms and other equipment?

Mr. Campney: With reference to the hon. member's first question, let me say that negotiations are now going on with the city, and we hope to work out a satisfactory solution so far as the road is concerned. Then I have noted his further representations with regard to the armoury.

In connection with the training of South Koreans, I am informed that steps are being taken in that direction through the commonwealth division, and that we are now waiting for a further report from our own officer commanding in regard to that question.

Then replying to the hon. member for Calgary East, I would say that the contract for the removal of ashes at Petawawa to which he referred also covers refuse generally. The fuel burned at Petawawa amounts to approximately 8,500 tons per year. In addition to other buildings, this includes the heating of 517 permanent married quarters and 415 temporary married quarters.

Mr. Harkness: The minister did not mention the number of tons or cubic yards of ashes removed for this sum of money.

Mr. Campney: I have not that information.

Mr. Harkness: If one can judge from the cost of removing the ashes, it would seem there were more tons of ashes than tons of coal burned.

Mr. Campney: I would have to get the information from the officials of the Department of Defence Production. I do not have it here.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I find here large figures concerning equipment of all kinds. I shall not deal with all of them, but there is one item about which I would ask for the figures because I believe if we had them it might be possible to make useful comparisons. We cannot compare airplanes or tanks with other items, of course; but I would like to have the figures showing the amount spent throughout the whole service on photographic supplies and photographers. I see there are photographers in the army and the navy, but I have not been able to pick out, and I doubt whether the minister can, the amounts showing what has been spent. I want the over-all figure for photographic supplies and persons employed, so that we may have some idea of the total expense in that respect for the services.

Mr. Campney: I shall be glad to see what can be done about providing the information the hon. member has requested. I might point out that there are many categories; for example, air photography is done for the geodetic survey and guns on our fighters are equipped with cameras. There are all sorts of supplementary forms of photography. I am not sure how we can narrow it down, but we shall do our best to give the information.

While I am on my feet, I should like to put on Hansard the reply to a question raised by the hon. member for Kamloops regarding dismantling buildings at Plouffe park, although I see that he is not in the house at the moment. I am informed that the two buildings to which he referred were temporary shelters erected after the fire there to compensate for some of the storage space that had been lost. These shelters, two large and one small, were of wooden frames with galvanized roofs and tarpaulins over the sides. I understand that the materials cost $12,250 and the labour $6,600 and that the materials are over 90 per cent salvageable. The buildings are now being dismantled because accommodation is becoming available at the new ordnance depot at Cobourg for the stores that have been housed in them throughout the winter.

Mr. Harkness: Referring specifically to some of the items on page 307, I notice that a number of these items are down considerably from last year, particularly clothing, personal equipment, and barrack, hospital and camp stores. I presume that reflects the fact that mobilization stores of all these items have now all been laid in and that what will be required in future is chiefly what you might call monthly or yearly needs. However, I notice one very large increase in ammunition and bombs, an increase from $38 million to $71 million odd. I should like to ask the same question in connection with this item that I asked with respect to naval ammunition. Does this represent the laying in of mobilization stores or, as in the case of naval ammunition, is it merely ammunition to meet current needs in Korea and for each unit to have a normal stock on hand?

Mr. Campney: I understand that the increase will not serve to provide a war reserve but that we are increasing our initial stocks because production is now running fully in many of these items. We are really just completing the accumulation of our necessary permanent stock.

Mr. Harkness: How much of the heavier calibre gun ammunition is included in that amount? I refer particularly to 25-pounder and/or 105-millimeter and 155-millimeter shells.

Mr. Campney: While that information is being sought, might I put on Hansard some observations with respect to the question of the hon. member for Fraser Valley as to how a meat packing plant can qualify to tender. The information I have been given is that in order for a meat packing plant to be eligible for listing with the Department of Defence Production and to receive invitations to tender for the supply of meat and meat products for the Department of National Defence, it must be approved by the dominion Department of Agriculture and is subject to the acts administered by that department. In addition, the prospective tenderer must meet the requirements of Canadian government specifications board, and in order to obtain certification to enable it to tender the packing house must therefore make application to the Department of Agriculture, health of animals division, Ottawa, for plant inspection and approval.

Mr. Harkness: Still on the matter of ammunition and bombs, can the minister tell us how much of this ammunition is being supplied to our forces in Korea? I think the Minister of National Defence said yesterday that 200,000 rounds of 25-pounder ammunition were supplied in the first year of the Korean war. This amount is not really for war stockpiling. The minister said that all this ammunition really is for current needs and therefore I would think that a considerable proportion of it possibly is going to Korea. Could we find out what amount that is, if any?

Mr. Campney: I understand that the 200,000 rounds referred to by the hon. member were a contribution we made to the commonwealth pool, but that generally speaking our ammunition, so far as the British type is concerned, is being obtained for Korea at the present time from Great Britain and Australia where some of it is manufactured, and the American type is of course being obtained from the United States. The ammunition covered by the items to which the hon. member referred is mortar ammunition, 60-millimeter, 81-millimeter heavy, ammunition for 90-millimeter anti-aircraft, 105-millimeter howitzer, 105-millimeter recoilless rifle, small arms, ammunition for 3·5 rockets and some other miscellaneous items.

Mr. Harkness: I am not clear from the associate minister's answer whether any of the $71 million is for ammunition which will go to our forces in Korea.

Mr. Campney: This item does include the cost of ammunition of the various sorts I have mentioned which we will use in Korea.

Mr. Harkness: Can the minister give any indication of what proportion of this total that amounts to?

Mr. Campney: I understand about 2½ per cent, in rough figures.

Mr. Harkness: If only 2½ per cent of this amount, which would be about a million and three-quarters, is for ammunition for Korea, the remainder, amounting to approximately $70 million, seems to be a very large sum just for current army needs at home where the only ammunition being expended is that used for training.

Mr. Campney: I understand some is to enable us to build up our initial stock, as I mentioned a few minutes ago, and I think it includes certain tooling in some plants that have to do with new types.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I have more than once expressed concern as to the over-all organization of this tremendous enterprise, and I want to draw attention to a few of the departments that I find in the telephone directory of the Department of National Defence. I want to draw attention to the extraordinary division of functions there is now, and then I want to ask a general question. How do we satisfy ourselves that the departments do not become like parallel lines which, produced ever so far both ways, do not meet? In other words, how is there over-all liaison and inspection and dovetailing of the departments?

First of all let me deal with the directorate of organization which has a personnel of about 30. Then I want to come back and draw attention to some of the departments which are quite heavily staffed. My question again is the broad question of who is responsible, with all the burdens that various people are carrying for their individual work, for saying: This is a good organization; it is functioning as it should, and its relationship is as it should be. I have asked that in the past and I will not take up the time of the committee but I say that there should be fresh outside minds brought into this, even if they are no better than the minds inside.

Having said that, I turn to some of the groups I find here. On pages 11 and 12 I find the inspection service with personnel of about 60. Now, I have no reason to think that is too large.

The Chairman: To what document is the hon. gentleman referring?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): This is the telephone directory of the Department of National Defence setting out the personnel. On page 13 there is the directorate of civilian personnel, and there are 20 there. On page 15 I find the director of central registries. I am not quite sure what central registries are but there are something like 15 people there. On page 23 I find the director of publications and printing, and there are a dozen or so in that directorate. On page 26—and here you may be getting after me, Mr. Chairman, but it only takes a second to say what I have in mind—I find the directorate of naval information and the directorate of naval intelligence. The directorate of naval information has 9 and the directorate of naval intelligence has 15. I do not know just what the difference between them is.

By anticipation I find a partial answer to my question of a few minutes ago on page 30 I find that there is a superintendent of photography with a staff of about 10. I realize that the question I am asking is a very difficult one to answer, but I feel that it stands out. I feel that when we have this tremendous organization we should in some way be satisfied that people skilled in that sort of thing are used to vet this organization. The most gallant officer in the world, the best man in the field, the man you would choose above all others to command men going into action, may not be good at organization. My own belief is that a man, unless he is a genius, has to learn organization as he has to learn anything else. I throw that question out and leave it to the minister to answer as best he can, and I believe it is an important question.

Mr. Campney: May I just make this general observation, Mr. Chairman, on the point raised by the hon. member, which I am sure he does not expect me to develop in detail. These different branches have been set up for specific purposes. For example, in the inspection service there is a controller of inspection who is responsible for the activities of that branch. These branches have been correlated and knit together as time has passed. In addition, there is the director of organization of the civil service commission who, in the Department of National Defence as in every other department, is continually making surveys along the lines of the observations of the hon. member and bringing to our attention suggestions for improvement and change. There is also the treasury office which, just the same as in other departments, is constantly making suggestions and reviewing the operations of these phases of the department. The fact that the department is large is occasioned, of course, by the magnitude of the things it is endeavouring to do. I do feel from my short association with the Department of National Defence that the different groups are co-ordinated and are under continual surveillance so that the standard of efficiency that is being developed is high and compares very well with other departments. Beyond that I do not know that I should make any detailed comment at the moment.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am not going to labour the matter, but I just make this point. We have something here that is as far as the east is from the west from the situation in an ordinary department by reason of (a) its magnitude, and (b) the rapidity with which it has to be developed. I realize, as I said before, that I cannot ask the minister to give me a detailed statement of how these things fit, but I shall reiterate what I said before. I think the situation cries out for the best outside brains that can be brought in to assist. That is not without precedent in this government, as I understand it was done in one quite small department. At the risk of being tiresome I am going to reiterate that it should be done, unless there are reviews going on that I know nothing about and of which we have not been told.

The Chairman: Shall we pass on to air force?

Mr. Harkness: No. In referring to the details on page 307, I notice an amount of $17 million odd this year for tanks and armoured fighting vehicles. Last year it was $22 million. I wonder if the minister can tell us how many up to date tanks, Centurion tanks, we secured last year and how many more it is expected we are going to get. Also, what other items might be covered by this particular expenditure in addition to the Centurion tanks.

Mr. Campney: I think the hon. member will appreciate why I do not wish to give the figure in regard to tanks either for stocks or anticipated purchases. I think they have not been given at any place or at any time, and probably it is not desirable to do so.

Mr. Harkness: I might just say that at this time last year the Minister of National Defence gave the number of Centurion tanks we had purchased up to that time. I have forgotten it exactly, but it was a small number and it was given.

Mr. Churchill: Would the minister agree to say whether or not the two permanent active force regiments, Lord Strathcona's Horse and the R.C.D.'s, are going to be equipped with Centurion tanks?

Mr. Campney: The answer is yes.

Mr. Pearkes: Before we pass from the army to the air force I want to ask one question regarding the northwest highway system which is allocated under army. Are any funds placed under the heading of the northwest highway system allocated to that portion of the system known as Haines cut-off?

Mr. Campney: The appropriations for the northwest highway system includes an appropriation for that.

Mr. Pearkes: Is there any intention to keep Haines cut-off open all year round in the future? In the past it has only been kept open during the summer months.

Mr. Campney: I am informed that this particular phase of the highway system is a joint operation by Canada and the United States. At the present time it is intended to continue keeping it open throughout the summer season only.

Mr. Pearkes: Can you tell us how much was spent on the Haines cut-off last year? I know it is a joint operation between ourselves and the United States, but from the point of view of national defence it can hardly be considered a contribution to the defence of northern Canada, although I realize it is a very considerable contribution to the defence of Alaska.

Mr. Campney: I will have to get that figure for the hon. member and I shall do so. I have not got it with me.

Mr. Pearkes: The reason I am asking this question is that it must be realized that if we are spending a great deal of money on this Haines cut-off, it will be in direct competition with the White Pass and Yukon Railway which runs through Canada, and which operates on a very narrow margin. If considerable traffic is going to be trucked over the Haines cut-off it will affect the interests of the railway.

Mr. Harkness: Reverting to this matter of the armoured fighting vehicles, the minister told us that two reserve force armoured units are being equipped with Centurion tanks.

Mr. Campney: Those are regular force units.

Mr. Harkness: Did I say reserve? I am sorry; I meant to say regular force units. My question is, are the reserve force armoured units to be equipped with these Centurion tanks also?

Mr. Campney: We are endeavouring to complete arrangements to provide for the training of reserve forces on Centurion tanks.

Mr. Harkness: I am glad to know that the reserve units are going to get some Centurion tanks for training purposes. I hope they will get them at an early date.

There is an item for mechanical equipment, including transport, which is up from $30 million to $33 million. In the defence expenditure committee last year we received details concerning a number of vehicles which had been ordered at that time. When we were dealing with the matter at that time very few of these vehicles had been delivered. I wonder if the minister could tell us how the deliveries of these vehicles have been, and whether the vehicles on order at that time are now in the hands of defence forces.

Mr. Claxton: I can get the details if the hon. member wants them, but I can say that very substantial progress is being made. If my recollection serves me correctly I think one type is completed, and they are all very close to being completed.

Mr. Harkness: Those are the ones with which we were dealing in the committee last year?

Mr. Claxton: That is right.

Mr. Harkness: Then this $33 million represents the sum available for more vehicles of the same sort; is that correct?

[Mr. Pearkes.]

Mr. Claxton: Yes.

Mr. Harkness: The next item is armament equipment, which would be guns and so forth. It is merely $23 million this year and was $17 million last year. Last year the minister said very good progress had been made toward beginning to produce 105- and 155-millimeter cannon in Canada. I wonder if he can give us a progress report on that and let us know to what extent that type of equipment is being substituted for the 25-pounders and 4·5's and 5·5's which were used within the last year or two.

Mr. Claxton: We are still making good progress with the 105 and 155's. We have an order for our own account as well as that of the United States under production.

Mr. Harkness: Would the minister care to give any figures on the production of those?

Mr. Claxton: There are no deliveries yet, except of what might be called tool room or prototype models.

Mr. Harkness: The minister says we have not yet got into production?

Mr. Claxton: They are producing, but we have not had deliveries yet.

Mr. Harkness: Then this item of $23 million covers chiefly cannon and things of that sort, or is there any appreciable portion of that for small arms? If so, what type of small arms would it cover?

Mr. Claxton: A large amount, more than $15 million, is for fire control equipment in the 90 millimeter ack-ack guns to which I referred before. It can be understood that that is very expensive equipment. For engineering, bridging, boats and so on, there is about $12 million; field artillery equipment of various types, $10 million; small arms, mortars, $4 million; maintenance, spare parts, ancillary, $8 million; that is a total of $50 million.

Mr. Harkness: Excuse me, but where does the minister get this $50 million? That must be the expenditure for the past two or three years.

Mr. Claxton: That is the commitment authority and forward program. The actual cash to be spent out of that is $22,950,000 but it is not allocated, because how much cash is spent on each item will depend on the progress we can make.

Mr. Harkness: In connection with the $4 million which is for small arms—

Mr. Claxton: Yes, but none of it is for rifles.

Mr. Harkness: I was just going to ask what type of small arms was meant.

Mr. Claxton: Almost entirely for mortars of new types.

Mr. Harkness: I was going to ask particularly if anything had been done in regard to submachine guns. I had a question on the order paper back in February as to what type of submachine gun was issued to Canadian troops in Korea. I asked if this type of submachine gun was found satisfactory in action, and if not, what were the deficiencies. Has a different type of submachine gun been issued? The answer I received at that time was that the carbine machine Sten 9 mm. Mk. 2 was being used. It was stated that, while not entirely satisfactory, it is regarded as being as satisfactory as other available types. It has certain disadvantages, particularly in the magazine. I was informed that a different type of submachine gun had not been issued for operational use, but a more recent type has been issued for user trials.

I wonder if any progress has been made in arming the entire brigade with this new and, I would take it, more satisfactory type of submachine gun?

Mr. Claxton: There is not yet, that I am aware, a better submachine gun than the ones we have. We are subjecting both a British type and an American type to trials at the present time. The Bren gun is still a very satisfactory weapon.

Mr. Harkness: Could the minister say what is this more recent type which has been issued for user trials, and what have been the results of those trials?

Mr. Claxton: I would have to get some technical details on that. I am not in a position to give very much information. We are in the hands of our friends the Americans and the British who designed the weapons, and we could not give very much information on the results without their concurrence.

I have one answer that I wanted to give to the hon. member for Nanaimo. He asked the principle upon which married accommodation was being provided for the active forces. We have made an actual count of the number of people in the active forces as presently constituted, and arrived at an exact figure for all for whom accommodation is to be provided in the program. It has not yet been provided, but we are working toward it, and the figure is just over 25,000.

Mr. Bater: Mr. Chairman, before passing on to the next item I notice that there is an item on pages 309 and 310 relating to the northwest highway system, amounting to nearly $9 million. I take it that refers to the highway from Edmonton through to Alaska. If so may I again avail myself of this opportunity of suggesting that the department add to that highway the portion of No. 5 highway running from Edmonton to Winnipeg. We have been discussing this afternoon many of the various kinds of mobile units, not that we hope we shall have to use them in our own country, but a time might come when we would be glad to roll them from the east to the northwest. I think consideration should be given to the inclusion of No. 5 highway from Winnipeg to Edmonton, leaving Winnipeg and going through Saskatoon, North Battleford, Battleford, Lloydminster and on to Edmonton. I would suggest to the minister that this proposal still be given serious consideration.

Mr. Claxton: The hon. member for The Battlefords and other hon. members have drawn this matter to the attention of the government on a number of occasions. It came up for consideration during the course of the discussion on the estimates last year. In addition, representations have been received from the governments of the three prairie provinces.

I am afraid I must say there is little likelihood of the federal government or the Department of National Defence ever reaching that satisfactory position with regard to its defences—equipment, construction, manpower and everything else—where it would be able to engage in such an activity as the grading, from the defence point of view, of a highway for which the provinces should ordinarily be responsible. Everything which adds to our communications or transportation system is, of course, of some benefit in defence. But having said that, I must say there are so many more things that we cannot afford to buy and do not expect to be able to afford to buy for our defence and which are more urgently required, that the highway is fairly low in priority.

Mr. Green: Will the minister tell the committee the present situation with regard to the Canadian Rangers? As he will remember, there were units known as Pacific Coast Militia Rangers during the second world war, and they served a useful purpose in outlying districts of British Columbia. A few years ago the defence department decided to establish ranger units again not only in British Columbia but also in the Northwest Territories. Can the minister tell us how many units there are at the present time and the number of men who have been enrolled?

Mr. Claxton: The purpose and general scope of the activities of the rangers have been described on previous occasions, so I know the hon. member does not want any information of that nature. At the present time the strength is something over 1,500 which is intended to be a nucleus to which we could add quite rapidly. Companies are being formed quite regularly from time to time wherever we can get people in an outlying district to agree to serve. They are issued with a rifle and some ammunition and some instructions; and they form a part of the defence forces in places where there are no organized defence forces.

Mr. Green: How many units are in being? The minister said that 1,500 men are enrolled.

Mr. Claxton: I would have to get that information.

Mr. Green: In what part of the country are they located?

Mr. Claxton: Very largely in the western part of the Arctic, west of Hudson bay out to the Pacific coast. There are some east of Hudson bay, but very few.

Mr. Green: The minister will get the number for me?

Mr. Claxton: Yes. I shall be glad to give that information to the hon. member.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I have just one further question which I think might come here. I want information with regard to contracts where the plans and specifications have been amended in the course of a contract and where that has inevitably involved additional expenditure. I am not going to carry that to extremes, into every small contract. I am quite ready to accept a suggestion as to a floor, so to speak; but I should like to get information as to the important cases where that has happened.

Mr. Claxton: This would involve an analysis of every construction contract, in detail; and it would be necessary to go to my colleague, the Minister of Defence Production—

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): If I may interrupt, I want to make it clear that I am willing to accept a reasonable floor so we will not run into useless work.

Mr. Claxton: Even with a reasonable floor you would get hundreds or thousands.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I do not suppose we will run into thousands that have been amended.

Mr. Claxton: No; but in order to find out whether or not it is amended you have to look at it; and this would mean an examination of individual contracts through the Department of Defence Production and its agencies, Defence Construction Limited and Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. I would think that in a considerable number of contracts there had been additions and amendments made in the course of the construction which had led to additional expense. We would be glad to arrange for that information to be worked out and put before the defence expenditure committee, if it was desired.

An hon. Member: Carried.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): No, it is not carried. I am informed that there is a question as to the amount of work involved. I am not dropping this matter; I shall not pursue it at the moment. I am ready to accept a suggestion as to a floor. I am willing to make it, within reason, as high as the minister would like. I am ready to accept a suggestion as to only those cases where there has been a substantial addition. I do not want to run the department into a lot of unnecessary work, but I want some information on that matter.

Mr. Claxton: I have given the hon. member the information I have. I have checked with my colleague the Minister of Defence Production, who has more knowledge of this matter than probably anyone else in the country, and I am told that it is hard to recall a single contract where you do not have some additional expense. It would therefore mean bringing forward details with regard to every contract, or virtually every contract, no matter what floor was set. If the hon. member wants us to do that, we could do it. The Minister of Finance informs me that this afternoon they had at least 50 for consideration at treasury board. If that is a useful exercise, then I suggest that the place to do it is in the defence expenditure committee.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I myself was going to make that suggestion. If that is satisfactory to the minister we will leave it there. I should like to add that I like to think I am fairly reasonable, and I think we can work out something so there will not be a whole lot of useless clerical work to do.

Mr. Claxton: My officers in charge of the matter will be glad to see the hon. member and find out exactly what he wants.

The Chairman: Shall we pass on to the air force?

Mr. Fulton: There are two questions which I asked earlier this afternoon.

An hon. Member: They answered one.

Mr. Fulton: I understand that one has been answered. I was going to ask that, if the information is not available, we should have the right to revert to the army later on.

Mr. Claxton: We shall be glad to give the information as soon as it comes to hand.

Mr. Fulton: There might be some other discussion, although we may then have passed the army details.

The Chairman: The further debate we would have would be with respect to the question or the reply to the question of the hon. member.

Mr. Fulton: Yes.

The Chairman: Subject to that understanding, shall we pass on?

Mr. Claxton: I am afraid that we cannot fairly hold out to the hon. member any hope of getting any additional information. In the cases of the three fires to which he referred, there is a court of inquiry at work investigating them. It may be a matter of weeks before the information is available, so I cannot promise to have it today. But as soon as it is available I will give it to the hon. member.

Mr. Fulton: I had to be out of the chamber for a minute or two. Do I understand that the question with regard to Plouffe park has been answered?

Mr. Campney: Yes. I put it on Hansard in the hon. member's absence. I did not know whether he was coming back.

Mr. Fulton: If the information with regard to it is now here, can the minister tell me for what reason the buildings are being dismantled?

Mr. Campney: Perhaps the hon. member would look at the statement I made, or does he want me to make it again?

Mr. Fulton: No. I was waiting for the reply before asking certain other questions. Let me put it this way. The minister told me he did not have the information here. There were certain other details I was going to ask him about which I forbore to ask about at that time. Has the removal of these buildings anything to do with fire precautions?

Mr. Campney: These were temporary buildings, which were erected at the time of the fire to provide adequate storage facilities. They were made of wood with galvanized roofs and tarpaulin sides. They are salvageable, and as the ordnance depot at Cobourg is now ready to receive the material that these temporary shelters were covering they are being removed.

Mr. Fulton: I should like to be certain that their removal now is not being done prior to what had been intended with respect to them. Is their removal at this time being influenced in any way by the fact that representations have been made with respect to their constituting a fire hazard?

Mr. Campney: I am not aware of that factor entering into the situation at all.

Mr. Fulton: Is there any information on hand which would show whether or not the fire marshal of Ontario or any of his officials in Ottawa have discussed this question with the minister or with the department?

Mr. Campney: No, none whatever.

Mr. Fulton: Is the minister saying there were no discussions or no information?

Mr. Campney: No information.

Mr. Fulton: Will the minister have that question looked into?

The Chairman: Shall we pass on to the air force?

Mr. Green: The associate minister was to get some information for me concerning the army benevolent fund, and also the new building for the Canadian mission in Washington. Has he that information?

Mr. Campney: Yes. As far as the facts constitute an answer I thought I had answered the hon. member with regard to the army benevolent fund. The other question he asked had to do with the cost of the site and the new building in Washington. I am informed that the cost of the site was $115,000.

Mr. Green: In addition to the cost of the site the minister was to let me know the rentals which are being paid for the present accommodation and also the number of Canadians who would be housed in this building.

Mr. Campney: I am informed that the present rentals are $47,488 a year; that the number of staff who would be housed in this building at the present time is 228.

Mr. Green: This is a proposal that merits some comment. This afternoon the associate minister said that this Canadian joint staff mission building in Washington was to cost $2 million. He now says that the site has cost $115,000 and the rentals being paid for the present accommodation amount to $47,488. This appears to me to be another instance of money being wasted, of Canada trying to live up to the Joneses in the matter of buildings beyond our country's boundaries, and a very unfair burden on the taxpayers of the country. The press dispatch which first announced this building was dated December 29, 1952. I am reading from the Vancouver Province:

> Canada has purchased a site here for a new $1 million building to house the Canadian joint staff mission, the Evening Star says.

Hon. members will notice that the cost of that building has now gone from $1 million to $2 million. Then the dispatch goes on:

> The property involved now occupied by a fraternity house is in a fashionable area on Massachusetts avenue. It is several blocks from the British and Canadian embassies.

I cannot see the reason for the construction of a $2 million building for a Canadian joint staff mission in a fashionable area in Washington. It is about time the government got back to the old Canadian virtue of thrift. Here we have a situation which will not be permanent. For the time being 228 Canadians will be housed in that building. I presume that they will all be living elsewhere, and living accommodation will have to be provided in addition. It will only be a matter of time until that joint staff mission will be greatly reduced. Surely here is one place where we could get a building for a good deal less than $2 million. I take it that the building has not yet been constructed, and therefore that it is not too late for the department to give some further consideration to its cost.

A similar situation arose in the committee on external affairs with regard to an embassy in Italy. The tentative plans called for an embassy which, with equipment, would cost over $1 million. As a result of the complaints made in the committee the Department of External Affairs is to review the plans in an effort to cut down the expenditure. I would hope that the same plan will be followed by the Department of National Defence with regard to this joint staff mission building in Washington. I do not believe the Canadian people should be saddled with an expense of $2 million for a building of that kind.

Mr. Claxton: The hon. member has made some observations which of necessity were made without knowledge of the facts. Almost without exception, Washington is the most difficult place to get accommodation in that we know of. The joint staff mission is now located in two buildings on Massachusetts avenue, but they are the property of the Australian government. We succeeded in getting the leases to them at a time when space was not quite so tight and because we were a friendly government engaged in the same kind of operation. It was a fair lease, but the buildings are by no means suitable for the purposes for which they are used. Nevertheless we would like to stay there but unfortunately we are being put out in October of this year. I myself have appealed to the Prime Minister of Australia to let us stay on for another year; otherwise we will have to house this joint staff in temporary accommodation, probably in a hotel or an apartment house at terrible expense.

We searched the city of Washington for any building that could be used for this purpose. We had the leading real estate agents in Washington conduct that search for us. We had representatives of the Department of Public Works and the Department of External Affairs work with us to try to find any type of building. We did not want to build, and we just could not find anything suitable. If the hon. member knows of a better place in Washington we would be glad to take it, but I do not believe there is such a place.

As for the land, we got it at a very favourable price. It is between $2 and $3 a foot which, as the hon. member knows, is a very favourable rate indeed for land in any large city, and particularly a city like Washington where prices are very high.

If it should turn out that we can reduce our joint staff there, then the building is sufficiently close to our embassy to enable it to be used as an annex of the embassy. That is one useful thing about this location. However, our experience is that in the case of relations with countries like the United Kingdom and the United States the extent of governmental business, whether it be defence or otherwise, has tended to increase; thus it appears we will always have the need for this place, either for civilian or service purposes. As I say, the location happens to be convenient to the embassy. But the land at between $2 and $3 a foot is a very good purchase, and at a very low cost. We could not find anything comparable in any suitable area in Washington.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Robinson): It being five o'clock, the house will proceed to the consideration of private and public bills.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR ABOLITION OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

The house resumed, from Friday, February 20, consideration of the motion of Mr. Thatcher for the second reading of Bill No. 108, to amend the Criminal Code (capital punishment).

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I am inclined to think that when this bill was first introduced exception might have been taken to it, by way of a point of order, that it touched upon a subject matter already covered by another bill then before the house and which had been forecast in the speech from the throne, namely a bill to consolidate the Criminal Code. In any case, as it happens we are at the present time debating this subject of capital punishment on the bill before us in the name of the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher), and at the same time a House of Commons committee is discussing the identical subject as one of the sections of the Criminal Code bill.

I do think, with all deference—and in this I believe I express views with which those who have taken part in the debate would agree—that the question as to whether or not capital punishment should be retained is one of great importance, complexity and difficulty, and perhaps is deserving of somewhat more profound attention than has been given it in the debates which have taken place almost every year in this chamber.

For example, we have the argument as set out in the Mosaic law: Thou shalt not kill. And in the very next chapter of Exodus, the book of the Bible in which that occurs, we have set out, as related to that statement of a crime, the punishment for that crime, where in the 12th verse it says:

> He that smiteth a man, so that he die, shall be surely put to death.

And in the 15th and 16th verses:

> And he that smiteth his father, or his mother, shall be surely put to death.
> And he that stealeth a man, and selleth him, or if he be found in his hand, he shall surely be put to death.

So when we make this quotation, and it is a very common quotation, against capital punishment, as it is set out in the Mosaic law—and I am not adopting it for the purpose of any argument I am advancing—

Mr. Knowles: There is such a thing as the New Testament.

Mr. Garson: I quite agree; but it is the Old Testament which is quoted. The injunction "Thou shalt not kill", which is the definition of a crime, is suggested as a reason why capital punishment should not be inflicted, whereas just a few lines farther on in the same chapter, and from the same authority, the suggestion is made that capital punishment is a punishment suitable for the crime so defined. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has said there is such a thing as the New Testament, and of course I entirely agree with him. I agree also with what I take it he implied, and that is that the New Testament might adopt a different attitude toward capital punishment.

May I, as having some bearing upon what the hon. member has in mind, refer him to the contribution made by the present Archbishop of Canterbury, as it is set out in the parliamentary debates in England for 1947 and 1948, where he makes this statement:

> The statesman—even the Christian statesman—has to deal with society as it is at any given moment; and though he be guided and impelled by Christian doctrine and ethics, he will have to decide constantly how far, in the fulfilment of his trust as the guardian of society, he must rely on preventive and deterrent methods of punishment only and how far he can mitigate them and make them constructive by the operation of the law of love. It is the same question which every citizen and every Christian has to consider, and it has to be decided by each man according to his own judgment, discrimination and experience.
> The church, in its corporate capacity, does not pronounce in such a matter. Each Christian has the duty of conscientious private judgment, and Christians very naturally and rightly differ in their estimate of what is practicable.

Then he makes this further observation:

> The duty of the state is to protect society against this horrible crime. There is, shall I say, a prima facie case for the law of the state to inflict the death penalty upon one who takes the life of another. It goes to the self-preservation of society. The state must begin by asking, not what is for the good of the murderer—that must come second—but what is necessary for the good order of society, life and the safety of its citizens.

I think as good a statement as can be found as to the relationship between jurisprudence, or the law at large, and the question of capital punishment, is that contained in the ninth edition of Jurisprudence, by the late Sir John Salmond. This is the classical statement on the subject and it states:

> The ends of criminal justice are four in number, and in respect of the purposes so served by it, punishment may be distinguished as, (1) deterrent, (2) preventive, (3) reformative, and (4) retributive. Of these aspects, the first is the essential and all-important one—

That is, the deterrent.

> —the others being merely accessory. Punishment is before all things deterrent, and the chief end of the law of crime is to make the evildoer an example and a warning to all that are like-minded with him.

Thus the prime object of criminal law is, in the words of the great English political philosopher, Locke, to make every offence very obviously a bad bargain for the offender. After the deterrent aspect is placed preventive punishment, for we are not concerned merely with deterring offenders but also with preventing them from repeating the offence by such penalties as imprisonment or, in capital cases, death.

Sir John Salmond in that connection makes what seems to me a very profound observation, although it is a short one. He says, "Offences are committed through the influence of motives upon character" and thus "may be prevented either by change of motives or by a change of character. Punishment as deterrent acts in the former method; punishment as reformative in the latter". It is clear, he concludes, "that there is a necessary conflict between the deterrent and the reformative theories of punishment". And it is necessary, in view of modern tendencies, "to insist on the primary importance of the deterrent element in criminal justice". He puts it this way:

> The reformative element must not be overlooked, but neither must it be allowed to assume undue prominence. To what extent it may be permitted in particular instances to overrule the requirement of a strictly deterrent theory is a question of time, place and circumstances.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, if I were to cite, as I could cite, for example, the records of the six states of the United States of America in which capital punishment has been abolished and which show that their rate of murder, according to the figures I have here, is something of the order of three times as high as it is in Canada, or if I were to cite the fact that during the interval between when New Zealand abolished capital punishment in 1941 and restored it in 1950 their rate of homicide was several times higher than in Canada, I would not suggest for a moment that these statistics necessarily have any great force or relevancy as applied to the problem before us.

I say that because we know that one of the most elementary rules of logic is that if you are going to compare two separate countries statistically in that way you first have to be able to say that the only factors which differ as between the two you are comparing are whether they have capital punishment in one case and no capital punishment in the other, and that all the other factors which might influence the rate of homicide are identical in the two countries.

Mr. Fulton: How do their own rates compare before and after?

Mr. Garson: I could not say. I have just compared during the period.

Mr. Knowles: Does the minister know how the rates in these six states compare with those in other states?

Mr. Garson: Again I suggest to my hon. friend that there are numerous factors which might account for the difference. Therefore, if we are making a serious attempt at thinking our way to a proper solution of the problem, I do not really believe it serves any purpose for those who favour the retention of capital punishment to cite the case of the six American states or of New Zealand, or that it serves any purpose for those who favour the abolition of capital punishment to cite the experience of the Scandinavian states where you have a very high homogeneity of population speaking the same language in each case, largely of the same religion, having the same outlook upon life and with no frontiers in the sense in which we have one on the North American continent.

Therefore if we are going to do any useful thinking in this field we have to get above the matter of basing it upon newspaper clippings and casual statistics of the very sort to which I have just been referring generally myself. That is why I think, if I may be permitted to transgress slightly in view of the fact that we are discussing a matter which I suggest should not be before the house at all, that perhaps the best method of dealing with it is the one that was suggested in the special committee on the Criminal Code the other day, namely that when we have accomplished the really monumental task to which we are now addressing ourselves, the consolidation of no less than 60 odd years of amendments to the code into one entity, we might then either set up a parliamentary committee or a royal commission for the express purpose of considering such matters as capital punishment or the rule of legal insanity, as in the M'Naughton case, and other major problems of that character.

It was suggested that along with the resolution reporting the Criminal Code bill back to the house a recommendation might be made that, while the committee had not considered these major matters and did not think it appropriate to do so in conjunction with another very large and complex task, the government and the house at a later date might either set up a parliamentary committee or a royal commission to consider matters of that sort. I think there will be general agreement not only by those who have taken part in the debate this year and in similar debates of previous years but by every member of the house that in the question of the retention of capital punishment we have a very large, difficult and complex problem, and we are not living up to our responsibilities if we consider it in any other light.

Before we reach any conclusions we have to get beyond newspaper clipping logic and consider the matter carefully over a period of time, hear competent people who are for it and competent people who are against it and then, having gathered a mass of reliable data, reach our conclusions and apply our own reasoning to that data in order to bring about, if it is thought advisable, a change in the law; or, if it is not thought advisable, to have a much better informed opinion ourselves and a much better informed public opinion upon the subject.

For that reason, if I might be permitted to do so, I should like to suggest to my hon. friend that he might consider withdrawing the bill and leaving the matter to be dealt with by the parliamentary committee which has a bill before it upon this same subject which is in order and which they are considering in the manner in which I have indicated.

Mr. Fulton: I should like to ask the minister a question. He gave us certain statistics and information regarding states and countries which have abolished capital punishment. Has the minister figures showing not a comparison of their rate with Canada's so far as homicide is concerned, but showing their rate of homicide while they had capital punishment and the rate after they abolished it? I think he would then be comparing something under circumstances which are similar.

Mr. Garson: No, I have not. The restoration of capital punishment in the case of New Zealand was in 1950, and the time lag with respect to the securing of these statistics is such that I doubt very much if any reliable statistics are available. Then, as I am sure my hon. friend will agree, statistics of this sort, which are not plentiful in any country, are only reliable, it would seem to me, if they are examined over a fair period of time.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on this bill. I am constrained to do so as much by what the minister has proposed as by my support of the bill of the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher).

I am opposed to capital punishment and I am supporting the bill. I think, whether we agree with the purposes of the bill or not, that the member for Moose Jaw should be commended for bringing it before the house. I appreciate that it is a question upon which there is very wide difference of view, but I believe an ever-increasing number of people are coming to realize that capital punishment is not only ineffectual as a deterrent to homicide but it also has other psychological effects that are not beneficial to society. I think the penalty of "a life for a life" which we now carry out with capital punishment was an act of revenge in other and more primitive days. Civilized society everywhere is getting away from the old idea of revenge and taking the much broader view, as the minister said, of protecting society.

A little while ago I read somewhere a statement made by a retired officer of the metropolitan police in London. After many years of experience in dealing with crime he gave it as his opinion that the difference between the state of mind that resulted in crime and the normal state of mind was very, very narrow indeed; and that no one could say when he would be himself in an emotional state where a crime of violence would seem to be the natural thing to do. If that is the case, the person who commits murder is not in any normal state of mind; and whether he is insane or knows what he is doing is not a question of great importance. I think we will agree that such a person really has not much control over his actions, and for that reason I think it would be much better to protect society by seeing that he is not allowed to mix with society again than by going through the very brutal proceedings by the infliction of capital punishment. I think the method we use in carrying out capital punishment is the most revolting of any being used at this time.

The suggestion made by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) is a good one, even though the member for Moose Jaw may not agree. I do not know whether he will agree, though I imagine he will because it is a reasonable suggestion. If the hon. member does not agree the likely result in connection with this bill would be that it would go to a vote and be defeated in the house, and that would be the end of it for this year. However, if the committee on criminal law should bring a recommendation to the house concerning capital punishment, and the other things the Minister of Justice referred to, to the effect that they should be dealt with by a royal commission or a parliamentary committee, then I would think the member for Moose Jaw had made some progress by the introduction of his bill.

I do not think there is anything further I need to say; but if my advice is of any value to the hon. member, I would suggest that withdrawing the bill in view of what has been said by the Minister of Justice would be the proper course at this time.

Mr. J. J. Smith (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a few comments on this bill which has been presented to the house by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher). I am not a lawyer and I cannot talk about the legal aspects of the bill, but I do believe the bill has considerable merit in it. I think the abolition of capital punishment is something we might well consider in this day and age. I think, too, that we have considered bills in this house which have had much less merit than this present bill.

I am not too greatly concerned about how a criminal is put to death. I do not think it makes a great deal of difference to one who is going to lose his life whether he is to be guillotined, hanged or sent to the electric chair. I understand that in France they still use the guillotine. In Great Britain individuals are hanged for the offence of murder, and in this country we follow that same procedure. In the United States the electric chair is generally used.

My concern in regard to capital punishment is for the immediate friends and relatives of those who are to be hanged. It seems to me that hanging is a pretty cruel death; but again I say that I do not think it makes too much difference to the man who is going to be hanged just what happens to him. He has been found guilty in the courtroom and the judge has said that he will be hanged until he is dead. I do not think the method makes too much difference to the criminal, but I do have in mind possibly parents, a brother or sister or close relatives and friends of that criminal, and I think the effect on them is very important.

The minister has suggested that this matter may be referred to the committee on criminal law and I think in this day and age it is time we looked into capital punishment and, if we are going to continue to have it in this country, see if there might not be a better method. I repeat that my concern is for those who are close relatives of the one who is to be hanged. I have a family, and it seems to me that if one of my sons got into trouble and had to pay that penalty under the law of the country, then it would be some consolation to me, if capital punishment could not be abolished, if we had a more humanitarian way of taking the life of that individual. My hon. friend in front of me says I may be hanged myself, but I will take that chance. In the United States they use the electric chair, and I think that is a more humane way for one to be put to death.

That is all I am going to say and I suppose that the hon. member for Moose Jaw will withdraw his bill. However, if it goes to a vote I will support it.

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): I do not know why I am entering this debate, Mr. Speaker, because the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) has pretty well expressed the views I hold. When I read in the newspaper about a man or woman going to be hanged, it makes my blood run cold to think we would do such a thing in this modern world. I feel that there should be some other method of punishing these people. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) argues that you have to hang someone for deliberately murdering another person. However, during my lifetime there have been many occasions upon which people have been hanged and I have wondered whether they should have been.

When I was a little boy in Glasgow, probably in 1893 or 1894, I recall that a man by the name of Oscar Slater was sentenced to be hanged, which sentence was commuted. After he had served 20 years in Peterhead prison he obtained a pardon and was granted £20,000 by the British government. In my opinion it would be far better not to hang anyone than to run the risk of punishing an innocent man. The circumstantial evidence which convicted this man was given by a servant girl who said he was the man she saw run out of an alleyway. I have been in the cell in which that man lived for 20 years. Before it was renovated it was only 4 feet by 6 feet, and I think that was a terrible punishment to inflict upon a man for which no amount of money could compensate him.

There may be cases in which men should pay this penalty, but I believe such cases would be very few. As has been suggested, I believe the matter should be discussed in the committee on the criminal law, with a view to taking into consideration the nature of the crime and the condition of mind in which the man was when he committed it.

I do not have any more to say on this subject, since my colleagues have spoken on it. If the bill is withdrawn, I hope the minister gives the subject the consideration to which it is entitled. If the bill is not withdrawn, I shall support it.

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Speaker, I merely want to say that I support the bill, and I congratulate the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) for having brought this matter to the attention of the house as he has done year after year. I tried to follow the minister's argument to discover whether or not he was in favour of capital punishment. I think everyone reading his remarks will find it rather difficult to conclude which way the minister was arguing. I would gather, however, that the minister is not prepared at this time to support the bill. If the minister is not prepared to support it, and if he is speaking for the cabinet, then of course the bill has not a chance in the world of passing the house. The only recourse open to the hon. member is to follow the minister's suggestion, unless he wants to see the bill defeated by an overwhelming majority.

I think there is a growing number of people throughout this country who are opposed to capital punishment. The committee which is revising the Criminal Code has had a number of representations made to it expressing that opinion, and a number have asked that a commission be set up this session in order to study the question of abolishing capital punishment and abolishing whipping. I am pleased to gather from the minister's remarks, whether or not he is in favour of abolishing capital punishment, that he will support a resolution coming from that committee recommending the setting up of a parliamentary committee to study this matter at some length. In the light of that fact I shall support the withdrawal of this bill, if it is withdrawn. If it is not, I shall vote in favour of it.

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I want to say quite frankly that I am entirely in disagreement with the principle of the bill. The chief purpose of punishment, as I understand it, is the prevention of crime. If you want to prevent crime, as I view it—and I have talked to much wiser people than I shall ever be—and from what I have read, the only way to prevent a crime of this nature is by humiliation. Hanging not only extinguishes the life of the chief felon, but it also imposes a very severe punishment on the family of the felon.

Mr. Knowles: The government might want to prevent you from doing some of the things you do.

Mr. Higgins: Quite possibly. I do say there may be people with strong ideas on the other side of the fence, but as I view it, I do not agree with them. Again I am speaking in the presence of my important seniors at the law—I was going to say my seniors at the bar, but that might be misunderstood. I am unalterably opposed to the principle of this bill, and I intend to vote against it if it comes to a vote.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw): It is obvious that this bill is fairly contentious. It is also fairly obvious that if it does go to a vote the bill will be defeated. I may say that when I first introduced this bill to the house it received very little support. I have been pleased that there have been quite a number of members on this occasion who have spoken in favour of it. I believe the speech which the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) made this afternoon was most reasonable. He has suggested that if his colleagues on the committee consolidating the Criminal Code will go along with him, at the next session there will be a committee of some sort or a royal commission which will go into the matter in the proper way.

Since the matter is so contentious, I do think it needs a good deal of study. I should like to accept the suggestion which the minister has made and withdraw the bill at this time. In doing so, may I say that I hope in the intervening period the cabinet will exercise its prerogative of clemency in capital cases wherever possible. I have noticed that in recent months the cabinet seems to have been doing that on quite frequent occasions. I hope the Criminal Code committee will accept the suggestion which the minister has made today, and that parliament will accept that recommendation when it comes. I would ask then, Mr. Speaker, for permission to withdraw this bill.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member leave to withdraw the bill?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Order discharged and bill withdrawn.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

AMENDMENT REGARDING POLL CLERKS AND ADVANCE POLLS

On the order:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of Mr. Adamson for the second reading of Bill No. 224, an act to amend the Canada Elections Act.

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): I do not want to hold up the house, Mr. Speaker, since the officers of the Department of National Defence are here and the minister is going to leave shortly. But I would ask that this bill receive some consideration at the next hour given to public and private bills. I feel that the bill—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Probably the bill should stand today.

Mr. Adamson: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: Stand. The business on the order paper for private and public bills having been disposed of, the house will resume its business which was interrupted at five o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

SUGGESTION THAT PAGE BOYS BE EXCUSED FROM ATTENDANCE THIS EVENING

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Before you leave the chair, Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege because it is a matter which is of some concern to several members of the house. We have had a long and heavy week, and so far we have sat every evening. The page boys have been kept extremely busy. I was wondering, Your Honour, whether you would give consideration to allowing the page boys to go home after the dinner hour this evening in order that they may get some rest. We shall have another heavy week ahead of us next week.

Mr. Speaker: That is a good suggestion. If the members of the house can look after their own wants themselves, I will direct the chief page to allow the boys to go home after six o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house resumed in committee of supply, Mr. Robinson in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

The Deputy Chairman: Do I understand that we have disposed of the subheading "Army"?

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, while the house was considering private bills I had an opportunity to check up on the reports of the earlier discussion. The associate minister was to get me further information with regard to this army benevolent fund. In his earlier remarks he did not make it clear whether the Korean army veteran will now be able to get loans and have all the privileges which are enjoyed by a Korean navy veteran and a Korean air force veteran. As the associate minister will remember, he was uncertain of the situation at that time. I would ask for a further explanation now.

Mr. Campney: To reply to the hon. member's further question, it is my understanding that under the new fund to which I referred and which will be applicable to the Korean veterans of the army, called the Canadian army welfare fund, they will be permitted to obtain loans and generally speaking—I cannot say in every specific detail—the purview of this new fund will be similar to that of the navy benevolent fund and the air force benevolent fund. These are private funds, as the hon. member will understand; they are not government funds. They are administered in trust. I am told that the general field covered by the new Canadian army welfare fund, together with the benevolent fund, will be parallel to the other two.

Mr. Green: Will the funds be administered by the same board which administers the army funds from the second great war?

Mr. Campney: Yes. I understand that the administration will be carried on by the same agency that administers the army benevolent fund.

[Mr. Herridge.]

Mr. Green: Then the veteran of the second world war will not have the same rights as the veteran of the Korean war? Will that be the position? In other words, this army board will be administering two different funds in different ways. There will be more privileges pertaining to the fund which is now being set up for the Korean army veteran.

Mr. Campney: The hon. member is correct. Unless and until the army benevolent fund is changed, it has a limitation which does not obtain in respect of either the naval benevolent fund or the air force benevolent fund or the new Canadian army welfare fund which will be available to the veterans from Korea.

Mr. Green: When will that fund be set up?

Mr. Campney: It is in the process of being set up now. I think the organization part is practically completed.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the subheading carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

The Deputy Chairman: We shall then proceed to the subheading "Royal Canadian Air Force—Regular and General", found at page 311 of the blue book.

Mr. Dinsdale: On the subject of the air force there are several questions I should like to raise, and I think I will present the whole group of questions while I am on my feet, if I may. During the minister's remarks on April 14 he had this to say as reported at page 3811 of Hansard:

> During 1952-53 there were 19 regular airfields, stations and schools opened bringing the total number used by the air force up to 108. Another 13 regular and 7 auxiliary schools and stations will be opened during 1953-54.

That statement indicates that an expansion of air force training facilities is contemplated for the current fiscal year. I should like to ask the associate minister whether he could give further details as to the expansion contemplated. For example, would it be possible to indicate where and when these 13 regular and 7 auxiliary schools are going to be located?

Continuing along that same line dealing with the expansion of auxiliary schools, I do not know whether that refers to reserve training or not, but in the estimates I notice that the expenditure for auxiliary operations is decreasing from $5,718,162 to a figure of $5,286,200 for the forthcoming fiscal year. I should like to discover the reason for the decrease. That would tend to indicate that no further expansion in the auxiliary operations is contemplated, something which seems to be contrary to the statement I have read from page 3811 of Hansard.

If the auxiliary operations are to be extended, if there is to be an expansion of the number of auxiliary squadrons, I should like to remind the associate minister that for some two or three years now the air force association in the city of Brandon has been very interested in participating in this form of reserve activity. They are a very keen group; at the present time they are not tied to any active program of reserve training. They have won a pennant award for their participation in association activities this year, and they would be interested in any expansion of reserve activities of this nature that might be undertaken.

That brings me to the mobilization assignment training program. I am getting all sorts of information these days about defence matters in general and air force matters in particular. This morning in my mail a circular letter reached my desk. It is the first issue of what is called the M.A.T.P. officers' training school. I believe they are going to circulate a monthly information sheet of this kind. As I read this circular it would seem to me it is expected that there will be some expansion in this form of reserve training. On page 2 of the circular it is indicated that the first course for mobilization air training personnel is to get under way in September of this year, a course in flying control activities. It is hoped that circumstances will soon permit additional courses for personnel engaged in other types of employment. That seems to deal with one of the complaints I made the other day to the effect that reserve people having a special background of training are not being fitted into the area of service for which they are most suitably prepared.

I should like to commend the department for its activity in this regard. A list of the personnel already participating in the M.A.T.P. is attached, and the implication I get from this list is to the effect that more and more reserve people are to be absorbed in this type of training program. I think it is a very worthy activity. If the minister has anything further to say on this matter I would appreciate having it.

Finally, coming back to the association problems again, I am wondering just what form of assistance is available to air force association wings across the country. It is a veterans' group that is officially recognized by the R.C.A.F. and the Department of National Defence. Up to the present time most of its activities have been of a social nature, but they are trying to contribute in some more concrete way. I know that our own wing, the 502 wing, has recently established a club and they are interested in knowing whether any assistance is available in the form of furnishings and that sort of thing that could be used in equipping a mess. At the present time we have not been able to get any concrete information in that regard. That covers most of the questions I had in mind.

Mr. Campney: With reference to the first question asked by the hon. member for Brandon, I have not a list of the 13 regular and 7 auxiliary schools and stations that are referred to on page 3811 of Hansard, but I would observe first that these figures include major Royal Canadian Air Force formations and units, including wing headquarters, ground and operational units, supply depots and radar units as well as actual flying units.

With respect to the auxiliary units, I can give the hon. member the location of the 7: Saskatoon, 2; Calgary, 2; Saint John, New Brunswick; Windsor, Ontario; London.

On the second point as to the apparent decrease in the air force estimates, I am told that the discrepancy to which the hon. member referred was owing to the fact that there was an overprovision in the estimates of last year. It is not owing to an actual decrease in the activity.

With regard to the air force association, it is my understanding that a grant of $15,000 a year is given to the association and the members are given a free subscription to the Roundel; but no other assistance.

Mr. Dinsdale: I take it that no movement is under way to increase the number of auxiliary squadrons in operation in Canada?

Mr. Campney: Not flying.

Mr. Dinsdale: Not flying squadrons?

Mr. Campney: No.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the subheading carry?

Mr. Pearkes: It is six o'clock.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The Chairman: We shall continue consideration of item 241.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I see an item here for 28 air traffic control assistants, listed in the civil staff. Does that mean that civilians have replaced service personnel in this employment, or does this represent a new category of employment?

Mr. Claxton: The Royal Canadian Air Force took over from the Department of Transport a number of air stations. At the present time there are 28 air traffic control assistants located at seven air traffic control centres across Canada, namely at Saint John, New Brunswick, Moncton, Dorval, Toronto, Winnipeg, Edmonton and Vancouver. Their job is to pass on flight plan information concerning all aircraft in their area to the air defence control centre, so that particular flights may be identified. This is part of the air defence of North America.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I see that under the civil staff there appears to be an appreciable increase in the number of clerks and stenographers, as well as diesel power plant operators. Are these additional employees, or are they civilian personnel who are replacing service personnel in certain categories of employment?

Mr. Claxton: The diesel engine operators are stationary engineers at radar stations where power plants are located, and the others mentioned by the hon. member represent an endeavour to use civilian rather than service personnel wherever possible.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I have mentioned a considerable increase in the number of clerks and stenographers in the civil staff. It seems to me there has been a considerable increase in the number of service stenographers employed by the air force in the last year, due to the fact that women are again being recruited in that force. Would the minister give us some indication of the over-all increase in the number of stenographic employees?

Mr. Claxton: The increase in stenographic employees is related to the increase in the activities of the R.C.A.F. generally. The number of man-years is one way of measuring it. In the year 1952-53 the number of man-years in the R.C.A.F., as related to this point, was 37,073, while in 1953-54 it is estimated the number will be 44,309. The civilian increase is related to that.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Last year an item appeared in the estimates for the employment of chauffeurs in Brussels and Moscow. No doubt this was in connection with air attachés. This year the item does not appear. I presume these chauffeurs are now service personnel; is that the explanation?

Mr. Claxton: The service personnel in Brussels have been changed so there is no longer an air attaché there. In Moscow it has to be a serviceman.

[Mr. MacLean (Queens).]

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Then under the heading of major procurement of equipment I find an item for aircraft and engines, which has been increased from $223,545,000 to $420,232,600. What does that increase represent? Then I see a separate item for armament equipment, and another item for signal and wireless equipment. Does this include airborne equipment, or is the cost of airborne armament included with aircraft and engines? Does the sub-item of armament equipment include airborne as well as ground equipment?

Mr. Claxton: The first item of $420,232,600 covers aircraft of all types, and everything that goes into aircraft. The major components are, for the Sabre, $65 million; for the CF-100, $77 million; for the C-119 Packets, $3 million; for the de Havilland Comet, $700,000; for the Otter, $660,000. Then there is an item for customs, excise, sales tax, etc. of $9,810,000 and an item for the Lockheed trainer, which is the T-33, of $1,703,000. The figures I have given relate to the total program, and the amount of that total program of $1,146,640,000 which we expect to spend in 1953-54 is $420,232,600.

The second item to which the hon. member referred is armament. The estimate for cash required is $4,515,000. That includes ground armament, airborne gun and rocket-firing and sighting equipment, guided missile equipment, test and handling equipment, passive defence equipment, freight, express, customs and excise.

Mr. Harkness: I was a little surprised to have the minister give a breakdown of the $420 million as between the amount for Sabres, the amount for CF-100's and so forth in view of the fact that when I tried to get that information last year in the defence expenditure committee with respect to the item of $687 million which had been spent on aircraft up to that time I was refused the information on the grounds of security. But as the minister has now given a breakdown as far as the $420 million is concerned, I wonder if he would be prepared to give one with respect to the item of $687 million which we had up to this year.

Mr. Claxton: I did not give a breakdown of the expenditures involved in the $420,232,600. I gave the division with respect to the total program, which I do not think would have any security attached to it.

Mr. Harkness: I understood the minister was giving a breakdown of the $420 million. He gave so much for Sabres, so much for CF-100's, so much for T-33's and so on. What does that refer to if it does not refer to the $420 million?

Mr. Claxton: The balance of the authorized program totalling $1,146,640,000.

Mr. Harkness: I am not quite clear as to what the breakdown the minister gave referred to unless it had reference to the $420 million. Is that what it referred to?

Mr. Claxton: I am afraid not. I gave the figures with regard to the total program, but not the amount of cash that would be spent this year.

Mr. Harkness: I certainly do not think the figures the minister gave referred to the total program which includes this $420 million up to January 1 of last year, I think it was. There is over a billion there alone, and the figures he gave certainly do not add up to anything like that. I did not put them down, but having kept rough track of them I would say that they do not even add up to $420 million.

Mr. Claxton: The figures are made up of a carryover from the program of $981,022,000, that has already been entered upon and committed, and the new program of $165,618,000, or a total of $1,146,640,000, of which $726,407,400 is to be liquidated in future years.

Mr. Harkness: We seem to be talking at cross purposes. What exactly was the breakdown that the minister gave? He mentioned $65 million for Sabres and $3 million for C-119's. I have forgotten what the other figures were.

Mr. Claxton: The items I mentioned plus some others that are similar total $165,618,000, which is the new program in addition to that already put before parliament and in respect of which we have commitment authority.

Mr. Harkness: What relation do these figures have to the $420 million? Are they included in it or are they in addition to it?

Mr. Claxton: The $420 million that I mentioned will be used to finance the carryover, plus new program, less commitments to be liquidated in future years which total $726,407,400. The details I gave, including the $65 million odd for Sabres and $77 million for Canucks, are the new program.

Mr. Harkness: If I understand this properly, the $165 million is all of the new program which is included in the $420 million. The $420 million is the previous commitments from last year and the year before but which is going to be spent this year, less the amount that the minister indicated.

Mr. Claxton: Less the amount that will be spent in future years; that is right.

Mr. Harkness: Less the amount to be spent in future years. In other words, this consists of money commitments which were made in past years, plus the $165 million which is a new commitment to be spent this year, plus commitments for future years.

Mr. Claxton: Less commitments for future years.

Mr. Harkness: The $420 million includes commitments for future years too, does it not?

Mr. Campney: That is the cash element to be spent for this present fiscal year.

Mr. Harkness: If that is the cash element, then the $420 million minus the $165 million, which would be approximately $260 million, represents cash expenditures on commitments from past years.

Mr. Claxton: That is right—to be made this year.

Mr. Harkness: There are no commitments for future years included in this at all?

Mr. Claxton: No.

Mr. Harkness: Not in the whole $420 million.

Mr. Claxton: No.

Mr. Harkness: We have a breakdown of $165 million out of the $420 million. Can we get a similar breakdown for the remaining $260 million odd?

Mr. Claxton: We have not got a breakdown of that. The way in which I put the figures was that we have a commitment authority carryover of $981,022,000 and a new program of $165,618,000, or a total of $1,146,640,000, from which $726,407,400 is to be subtracted because it is to be liquidated in future years. The difference is the cash required for this year of $420,232,600, of which $165,618,000 is covered by the details I gave.

Mr. Harkness: As I understand the picture now, there is a carry-over of $981 million included in which is $260 million odd which is included in this item, for which cash is going to be put out this year, and of which we have not had a breakdown.

Mr. Claxton: That is right.

Mr. Harkness: And the remainder, which would be about $720 million, has still not been committed. Is that correct?

Mr. Claxton: It is committed but it will not have to be met in 1953-54.

Mr. Harkness: May I put it this way. Of this $981 million there is a further amount of approximately $720 million which will not be spent this year and which has not been spent up to date.

Mr. Claxton: That is right.

Mr. Harkness: But it has all been committed?

Mr. Claxton: Yes.

Mr. Harkness: For this total amount which has been committed but not spent can the minister give us any breakdown—although I am not insisting—of how it is to be spent?

Mr. Claxton: I think the same reasoning would apply here as applied in the defence expenditure committee.

Mr. Harkness: In view of the fact that we have had a breakdown of part of this $420 million which is actually to be spent this year, it would seem to me that we should be able to have a breakdown of the whole thing. I would think that as far as security is concerned the rule which applies in one place should apply in the other.

Mr. Claxton: A partial breakdown does not give you or anyone else anything, except as related to the amount we are seeking here in the total breakdown.

Mr. Fulton: It does if you give it year by year. The minister has given it this year and he will presumably give it in future years.

Mr. Claxton: Is it desirable to give it?

Mr. Fulton: I cannot see why not unless the minister is going to say in some future year that he will not give the breakdown for that year. If he is going to give the breakdown year by year, as he has for this year's operation, when the whole program is completed we will have the whole picture. Is there any difference between giving it for the whole program and giving it year by year until the whole program is completed? If there is some valid security reason perhaps we would be able to understand, but I cannot see it.

Mr. Claxton: Perhaps I was wrong in giving it a moment ago, but that does not justify us giving the whole thing which would enable one, by a simple process of division, to arrive at the total production of fighter aircraft, something that is not we believe in the public interest to give.

Mr. Harkness: May I ask the minister how much cash has actually been expended since the three-year program started? It is very difficult to keep track of these things, with these commitments, hold-overs and so on. As far as I can make out, $165 million of new expenditure is to be made this year and there is a $981 million carryover from money which was authorized by parliament in past years. In addition to the $981 million authorization or commitment or whatever you wish to call it, how much has actually been expended as far as the three-year program is concerned?

Mr. Claxton: The total amount expended for each service—

Mr. Harkness: I mean just for the air force.

Mr. Claxton: —on that major division is given in the white paper at pages 36 and 37.

Mr. Harkness: Where on pages 36 and 37 would we relate this $981 million to the total amount voted and the total amount expended? That is the thing I do not see.

Mr. Claxton: What the hon. gentleman was asking a moment ago was the amount that had been spent during the past three years?

Mr. Harkness: Yes.

Mr. Claxton: Well, that is included in the item on page 37: procurement of equipment.

Mr. Fulton: Not for aircraft.

Mr. Claxton: No.

Mr. Harkness: It was aircraft I was asking about because I was trying to relate it to the total $981 million carryover and also to the total amount that had been voted.

Mr. Claxton: I would be glad indeed to get for the hon. member the total expenditure on aircraft provided that we do not have to break it down into types. I will get it for the hon. member.

Mr. Pearkes: May I ask a question? Have the CF-100's which are now being organized into squadrons at North Bay been equipped yet with electronic gun sights?

Mr. Claxton: They are being equipped with radar sights, yes.

Mr. Pearkes: I know they are to be equipped but they are not so equipped at the present time.

Mr. Claxton: Well, they are.

Mr. Pearkes: They are or they are not equipped?

Mr. Claxton: They are equipped.

Mr. Pearkes: They are equipped with electronic gun sights now?

Mr. Claxton: Yes. While this is a field which is pretty technical for me, as I understand it they are equipped now; and there are developments occurring which are resulting in their being equipped as they come off the line with a subsequent development, the very latest thing.

Mr. Pearkes: There is one other observation which I am forced to make. On April 14, at page 3811 of Hansard, the minister said that the radar system would be largely completed in 1953. I know this is highly bound up by security, but that estimate is so far from the estimates that I have been given by other sources that I just wanted to ask the minister whether by any chance a mistake had been made in his estimates.

Mr. Claxton: No, that is correct. As regards the Canadian part of the radar chain, as it is presently planned, we expect that it will be largely operational in 1953. A good number of the permanent stations are operational now.

Mr. Higgins: Last year there was $223 million spent for aircraft and engines. Of that amount more than one-third was spent outside of Canada. From the returns I have here this year we plan to spend $420 million on the same item. How much of that will be spent outside of Canada?

Mr. Claxton: That is a matter for the Department of Defence Production. From the figures I have seen it will be very much less in proportion because for one thing we are producing the Orenda engine in quantity. It will go into the F-86E Sabre—it is going in now—and that will mean a very large additional element of each aircraft of that type will be produced in Canada.

Mr. Higgins: You expect the same ratio of purchases as last year would follow?

Mr. Claxton: No, I think it would be very much less.

Mr. Higgins: You have no idea how much less?

Mr. Claxton: No.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): In that connection, I want to ask how much of our defence money has been spent in Britain up to date?

Mr. Claxton: That is in the white paper, in so far as it can be sorted out into the main end items, and it appears at page 34. During 1951-52 we have spent $9,962,000; in 1952-53, for ten months, $15,732,000, and that is largely for Centurion tanks. In addition to that we have spent considerable sums on components that have gone into these new ships.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I was given a figure of $100 million from the department up to the end of 1952. It seems to me it is a matter of very great importance having regard to the balance of payments between Britain and ourselves. I am wondering if the minister can hold out any hope that more can be done. I was told at one time that deliveries were slow, but later I was told that the difficulty was clearing up. I wonder if the minister can say something about it, as I think it is a matter of great importance.

Mr. Claxton: My colleagues the Minister of Defence Production and the Minister of Finance are continuously directing their attention to this subject. We have had also, of course, a number of conversations with representatives of the British government and their department of defence, to see in what ways we could enlarge these expenditures. There are considerable difficulties in the way of getting delivery and also of having equipment of the types that we want. We are getting all the Centurions we can from Britain, but in the case of F-86E Sabres the flow is the other way.

We are exploring, for example, the possibility of acquiring or getting the right to make a new type of long-range aircraft for production about 1956-57.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I do not want to labour the point, but when we are having difficulty selling things from this country, such as cheese and things of that sort, I am wondering if the minister can assure us that it is a matter of constant effort on the part of those who are responsible for purchasing to have it in mind that, all other things being equal or nearly equal, we should purchase in Britain. We are trying all kinds of ways of adjusting the balance, and it seems to me that here is a way because we are here spending many hundreds of millions of dollars.

I would not disagree that there are difficulties; I know they exist. There is an old music hall maxim, however, which says "where there is a will there are three ways." If everyone has it in mind, it seems to me that a great deal could be done.

Mr. Claxton: That is right. This is the business of my colleague the Minister of Defence Production. I assure the hon. member he has this problem very much in the forefront of his mind, just as his officers have. They are doing everything possible in that direction.

Mr. Higgins: Following the hon. member's remarks just now, I notice that according to a return I have here it would appear that we purchased last year aircraft engines and planes from Britain to the value of $22·5 million and from the United States to the value of $54 million. Is that correct?

The Chairman: The minister has said twice that the Minister of Defence Production is the minister dealing with that problem, together with the Minister of Finance; therefore I think we ought—

Mr. Higgins: It is in the minister's estimates.

The Chairman: That is the amount to be spent, and if you want to ask for any information concerning the purposes for which the money was spent, that is quite relevant. Information concerning where the contracts are being let is a matter, according to the minister's statement, that is left to the Minister of Defence Production.

Mr. Higgins: With deference, Mr. Chairman, this was a return of the house which is in Hansard of March 30, 1953 at page 3397. It shows the sum of $54 million having been spent for aircraft and engines in the United States, while $22·5 million was spent in Britain.

The Chairman: Was the return filed by the Minister of National Defence or the Minister of Defence Production?

Mr. Higgins: Is it material who files it?

The Chairman: It is when we are studying the estimates. The estimates of the Minister of Defence Production will come later, and questions relating to his department should be asked at that time. It will be quite proper for the hon. member to ask the question then. I do not want to get involved in a long discussion on procedure.

Mr. Higgins: There is an item here, "aircraft engines". What other item would enable a member to ask a question except this item "aircraft engines" in the minister's estimates?

The Chairman: It seems to me that if the Minister of National Defence requisitioned the Minister of Defence Production to purchase aircraft engines, it would be for the Minister of Defence Production to inform the house as to where he let his contracts, whether it is in Britain or the United States. That is my view.

Mr. Harkness: May I point out that the Minister of National Defence asks the Minister of Defence Production to purchase aircraft, and he specifies the kind of aircraft or engines he wants. In other words he specifies whether it is a British engine or a United States engine. I think, therefore, it is proper to ask questions of this sort because the minister is the one who specifies the type of engine to be secured.

Mr. McIlraith: With respect to the reference by the hon. member for St. John's East to the question and answer appearing on page 3397 of Hansard for March 30, 1953, about which he is now seeking to question the Minister of National Defence, I may say that the information does not relate to the procurement of aircraft engines for defence at all.

[The Chairman.]

It is a statistical figure showing the number of airplanes and engines imported into Canada, and includes all sorts of commercial aircraft, engines and that sort of thing. It has no bearing upon defence expenditures in any way.

Mr. Green: May I point out that the Minister of National Defence, in his own white paper, sets out how much money has been spent in the United Kingdom and how much has been spent in the United States. Surely the hon. member for St. John's East is entitled to ask a question along that line. As I understood it, that was what he was doing.

The Chairman: My remarks were made in the light of the reply which the minister gave. In any event the minister wants to take the floor.

Mr. Claxton: There is no doubt about the right of the hon. member for St. John's East to ask the question, but the question is whether I can answer it. None of the figures I have here will answer it. The Department of Defence Production have the figures and can give the answer. I suggest, as the chairman did, that is the department to which the hon. member should put his question.

I may say, in a general way, that during the year we bought some Bristol freighters, some Merlin engines and at the end of the year we bought two Comet aircraft. Apart from that I do not recall that we made any purchases of aircraft or their parts from Britain during the year.

Mr. Higgins: It is correct to say that the Minister of National Defence does not actually keep a tabulation of the orders that he places?

Mr. Howe: Well, why should he?

Mr. Claxton: I ask the Minister of Defence Production to procure some equipment. He is the person who selects where the equipment is to be procured and keeps the figures on the contracts and so forth. We provide him in the end with the money.

Mr. Higgins: Would it be fair to ask him to answer the question?

Mr. Howe: No.

Mr. Fulton: May I point out to you, Mr. Chairman, that as I see it, unless we were to do it under the first item of the defence production estimates, there is no item under which this question concerning the money spent for aircraft engines could be asked. If you look at the defence production estimates on page 12 you will find there is no particular item to which that particular question is relevant. I would imagine that even with a generous chairman such as you have been, if I may say so, you would be bound to rule the hon. gentleman out of order because there would be no item in these estimates on which he could ask his question. It seems to me the sensible thing to do is have both ministers here, and if one cannot answer the question then the other should.

Mr. Knowles: One cannot answer and the other will not.

Mr. Howe: As the minister charged with responsibility, I shall be pleased to bring in that information when my estimates come down, if they come down. I suppose that will depend on the length of the session.

An hon. Member: I thought the minister was always an optimist.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Noseworthy: I note that the item for clothing and personal equipment is reduced from $31 million last year to $15 million this year. Will the minister comment on that matter?

Mr. Claxton: Yes; I should be glad to. That is owing to the fact that in 1951, as I announced on February 5, we entered a period of stockpiling equipment for the purposes of mobilization. We also had to replace stocks that were used to equip the forces as they were rapidly built up. Therefore during 1952-53 we spent much larger sums on clothing than were necessary for a normal year. Having replenished our stocks that were necessary to equip the forces and provide something for stockpiling, it is now possible to reduce the amount sought for clothing.

Mr. Noseworthy: Have any changes been introduced in the style of uniforms for the air force within the last couple of years? For instance, I have been told that last year before one issue was completed the style had been changed and a new style of uniform was introduced.

Mr. Claxton: No, that is not so.

Mr. Noseworthy: How many changes of style have been introduced within the last year or two?

Mr. Claxton: The only change of any significance at all that occurs to me as having been made during the last three years is that there is a new working dress for air crew and ground crew along the lines of battle dress.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): To revert again to civil staff, there are a couple of questions I should like to ask. I notice that the department apparently employs one meteorologist. Since ordinarily these men are employed by the Department of Transport, perhaps the minister would explain this one exception and tell us how it comes about that he is employed by the Department of National Defence. Then as a second question I would ask this. I notice that the estimate for payment of the corps of commissionaires has increased considerably, namely by about $150,000. Does this mean that there is an increasing program in effect for replacing service guards by commissionaires for guard duties? Is that the explanation of the increase?

Mr. Claxton: On the first point, may I say that I am informed that we have one meteorologist attached to air force headquarters, on loan or seconded from the Department of Transport. He is there as an adviser to co-ordinate civilian and air force meteorological activities, and we pay his salary. On the second point, my answer is that the general policy is to reduce the number of service guards to the minimum and to have the corps of commissionaires wherever we can. I might also say that there are 19 new units this year.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Further on there is an item for the purchase of real properties, land and buildings. There is an increase there of about $5 million. Can the minister explain that increase?

Mr. Claxton: Yes. This is largely for the purpose of a new air weapons range at Cold Lake, Alberta. That accounts for a great proportion of the increase.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): In connection with the purchase of land at Cold Lake, can the minister tell the committee how the value of this land was arrived at? Was it bought by tender, by some independent arbitration to set the value, or from whom was it bought?

Mr. Claxton: I am informed that this matter was gone into in great detail in the defence expenditure committee where actual unit costs, the procedures and so on were explained.

The Chairman: Shall we pass on to defence research and development?

Mr. Harkness: No, Mr. Chairman. There is an item here which I was rather surprised to see, namely "gasoline, fuel oil and lubricants for aircraft and mechanical equipment". Last year the amount was $17 million; this year it is about $13,700,000. There is a considerable decrease in spite of what the minister has told us about the increasing activities of the R.C.A.F. and the increasing numbers of aircraft. I found it difficult to understand why the cost of gasoline and lubricants for these aircraft had come down so much.

Mr. Claxton: The entire reason is, I am told, that the estimate that was made last year was higher than it proved to be necessary.

Mr. Harkness: Can the minister tell us how much actually was expended last year on this particular item?

Mr. Claxton: Of course the figures for the year are not complete yet, but I am informed that the figure of expenditure will be approximately $13 million.

Mr. Harkness: The estimate for this year is being made the same as the amount actually expended last year?

Mr. Claxton: Yes.

Mr. Harkness: I suppose the minister actually expects there will be considerably more flying this year than there was last year?

Mr. Claxton: About the same.

Mr. Harkness: About the same?

Mr. Claxton: Yes. There will be some increase because we will have two more training stations in operation.

Mr. Harkness: I would think there would be bound to be more flying this year.

Mr. Claxton: Yes.

Mr. Harkness: There is an item for ammunition and bombs which is about half a million dollars more this year than it was last year, being $10,900,000 as against $11,500,000. That is quite a different situation than we had in the navy and in the army, particularly in the army where there was a large increase with regard to ammunition and bombs. So far as the air force goes, can the minister explain why the estimate is approximately the same? The air force is supposedly our chief defensive arm, or the arm upon which we are placing the most emphasis. Why is the estimate approximately the same as last year, and why is it a much smaller amount than is shown in the case of the army and the navy?

Mr. Claxton: It is owing to the fact that the air force operation does not involve the use of highly expensive rounds as does that of the army and the navy. As to the air force, it is largely small calibre ammunition used in practice. It is only toward the end of the year that we shall be coming into the rocket field in any considerable way.

Mr. Harkness: What this means particularly, I presume, is that the air force used a comparatively small amount of ammunition last year and it is anticipated that they will use a small amount this year in comparison with the other two services.

Mr. Claxton: They will use a great number of rounds but each round costs much less, on the average, than a round in the navy or the army.

Mr. Green: A few moments ago the minister referred to two Comets. Are these the de Havilland jet air liners which we were to obtain in the United Kingdom?

Mr. Claxton: Yes.

Mr. Green: Are they now in the possession of the R.C.A.F.?

Mr. Claxton: Yes. They have been handed over in the United Kingdom and are now engaged in familiarization flights over routes that have been flown previously with Comets so that the experience can be passed on to our pilots who are being trained to use them, and also so that the aircraft can be tested out over the same flights and results arrived at concerning fuel consumption, load-carrying capacity and so on.

Mr. Green: How much do these air liners cost apiece?

Mr. Claxton: They cost something more than $1½ million each.

Mr. Green: I suppose the idea is to bring them to Canada once they have been tested.

Mr. Claxton: That is right.

Mr. Green: To what use will they be put here?

Mr. Claxton: Very largely for the purpose of training the fighter defence and the radar coverage, so the fighter defence and the radar stations can be trained on high speed, high altitude aircraft of the most modern type known.

Mr. Pearkes: The cabinet are not going to the coronation in them?

Mr. Claxton: No.

Mr. Green: Are they to be used for transport purposes as well?

Mr. Claxton: Not so far as I know.

Mr. Green: Were they bought by the Minister of Defence Production?

Mr. Howe: Yes.

Mr. Claxton: Yes.

The Chairman: Shall we pass on to the next heading?

Mr. Hansell: Before we pass from the air force estimates may I ask the minister whether it is expected that the air force will be so extended that further training schools will be needed? If so, where is it expected that these air training schools will be built or reopened? The minister knows that in the past there have been quite a number of air training schools in southern Alberta. Just as soon as some little activity takes place in some of these localities people come to me and ask whether this or that school is to be reopened. Rumours get around.

I think I asked the minister a similar question a little while ago. I have particular reference to the air training school at Vulcan, Alberta and the one at Macleod, two schools that were quite active during the war. They are now almost closed and partially dismantled, but the one at Claresholm has been opened and is, I understand, doing very good work. Is it expected that the air force will be expanded to such an extent that it will require the reopening of any of these other schools?

Mr. Claxton: We do not expect to be opening any additional schools. The one at Moose Jaw and the one at Penhold will be opened next month, I understand, and that will complete the requirement to meet our estimated need.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I have a couple of questions that are somewhat related to the last one. The first is this. Are some of the schools that have been functioning at full capacity being closed down in the near future? I have in mind especially two air navigation schools. Will both of these continue to function, as well as the central navigation school?

My second question relates to buildings on stations which are now open. From time to time new buildings are erected on certain stations, of necessity, and I was wondering whether there are some stations where buildings of a permanent nature are erected that were opened during the war, and are there other stations where only temporary buildings are erected with the idea that these second-class stations are on a temporary basis and might be closed down at any time? Is there any division along that line as to possible permanency of stations which are now functioning, and which were built during the war as temporary establishment stations?

Mr. Claxton: The only change which I think the hon. member's question refers to is the transfer of the navigation school from Summerside to Winnipeg. That is being done for the purpose of bringing together two schools, because we can meet the needs of both at Winnipeg. The need for training navigators is being met progressively, and we can handle the job both for ourselves and for the NATO countries at Winnipeg. However, the air station at Summerside will continue to be operated on at least its present level through the transfer of the operational training unit for maritime reconnaissance from Greenwood to Summerside, so the facilities at Summerside will be fully used.

With regard to the second question, wherever it is possible we renovate old buildings, where that is profitable. Where it is not profitable, then if we need a building we replace it with either a class I or II or a class III building.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): With regard to the reconnaissance maritime squadron, a coastal type of squadron, what action is being taken, if any, that the minister might explain to the committee with regard to replacing their present Lancaster aircraft?

Mr. Claxton: I did mention that the other night. These Lancasters are converted for this purpose because there was no aircraft particularly suited for this purpose in this or any other country. To meet our needs the Lancaster as converted was the most suitable aircraft. Of course they will be gradually used up and worn out, and we are looking around for a new type of aircraft to replace the Lancaster. So far we have made no decision about it. That replacement will begin about 1956 or 1957.

The Chairman: Shall we pass on to defence research and development?

Mr. Nickle: I should like to ask the minister some questions concerning the northwest staging operations. When we compare the estimates for the current year with the estimates of last year there seems to be a change-over in the nature of the work, or a change in the emphasis on the nature of the operations on the northwest staging route. There appear to be a number of reductions in some items which are not in keeping with the increases in other items for the northwest staging route.

For example, in pay and allowances for military personnel there has been a reduction of approximately 20 per cent when compared with last year. There also appears to be a substantial reduction in the number of civilian personnel engaged in that operation. There is an increase of about 75 per cent in the appropriation for gasoline, fuel oil and lubricants, which would appear to indicate some substantial increase in the operation of aircraft on the northwest staging route. At the same time there is a reduction in the item under fuel for heating, cooking and power generating units. There is an increase of 375 per cent in the item for the acquisition and construction of buildings and works.

Then getting down to the smaller items I see that three for which there was provision last year are eliminated from the list this year. There is another small item of postage with which, presumably, typists and stenographers would have some connection. I notice that the item for postage is increased to the extent of 150 per cent.

Would the minister give us some explanation of the nature of the operation of the northwest staging route this year as compared with last year, as to why in some instances there are increases and in others decreases, which do not appear quite consistent.

Mr. Claxton: The hon. member is correct in his assumption that there has been a considerable change in the functioning of the northwest staging route. Owing to the increase in the range of the aircraft flying from Edmonton to Alaska, the operations of the various stations on the route have been substantially reduced. There is a consequential reduction in staff and activities. They are being maintained at the lowest possible figure to keep the route open. Then the amount for postage was increased because the amount set aside last year was quite inadequate. As I have said, the other operations have been reduced.

Mr. Nickle: Would the minister explain the item of $705,000 for the acquisition and construction of buildings and works. This, as I have said, represents an increase of about 375 per cent over last year.

Mr. Claxton: This is entirely accounted for by an addition at Whitehorse, valued at $565,000, for the mechanical engineering section, including a drill hall, renovation of and putting cubicles in the barracks block, some work carried over in connection with the storage building and barracks block, and some other items.

Mr. Nickle: I see here an item of $1,090,000 for fuel for heating, cooking and power generating units. This represents about a sixth of the total amount to be voted for the northwest staging route. In view of the high percentage to be voted for fuel, would the minister give us some indication of how fuel costs, which of course would be high in the remote northwest, compare with fuel costs for heating and cooking in other parts of Canada.

Mr. Claxton: This represents a reduction from last year, when the figure stood at $1,443,520. The reduction this year is due to the reduction to which I referred in my remarks a moment ago. As the hon. member knows, the cost of fuel in that area is very much higher than it is in other parts of Canada. It is very cold there, and a large amount of fuel is used for heating and cooking.

[Mr. Nickle.]

Mr. Higgins: Before passing the item for search and rescue I should like to take this opportunity to pay tribute to the unit stationed at Torbay, St. John's, Newfoundland. The men of the unit have done and are doing wonderful work not only in mercy flights but in various other activities. This has gone on for some years. The first name that comes to my mind in connection with the original unit is that of Flight Lieutenant Mike Pearson. The present pilot, I believe, is Flight Lieutenant Carl Ensom. Under great difficulties they have evacuated many sick people from various isolated settlements and under trying conditions, at risk of their lives. The last item about which I remember reading was in connection with the recent ice blockade of St. John's harbour, upon which occasion a number of ships were caught in the ice. The search and rescue unit, headed by Flight Lieutenant Carl Ensom, dropped food and other items to the trapped ships.

This gets me down to a further point. They have been greatly assisted in their work by the coastguard service of the United States, stationed at Argentia. The other evening the hon. member for Comox-Alberni asked the minister about the situation in connection with the setting up of a coastguard service. I do feel that something definite should be done. My recollection is that about a year and a half ago an interdepartmental committee was set up to study the situation and make a report. Whether that report has been made, I cannot say. I was absent from the house for a period of time, and the report may have been made while I was away. However, I do not seem to recollect any decision in the matter.

As the work of search and rescue is being done under this department, I feel it is only proper to urge upon the minister that some decision should be made in connection with the establishment of a coastguard service.

Mr. Claxton: I appreciate the hon. member's remarks about the search and rescue operations, which, I agree, have been admirable. I might point out that the coastguard service concerns a number of government departments. I said a word about it the other evening.

Replying to a question by the hon. member for Calgary East, I would say that the amount spent in the last three years on aircraft and engines has been $682,500,000.

Mr. Harkness: That figure does not include the $165 million the minister mentioned before?

Mr. Claxton: That is right.

Mr. Harkness: Can the minister give a breakdown of the $682,500,000?

Mr. Claxton: I have not that information; no.

Mr. Harkness: Before we leave these defence items, I believe there are two other questions outstanding which the associate minister was going to answer. One was with reference to the number of deserters, and the other concerned the contract for the removal of ashes at Petawawa.

Mr. Campney: I have no further information on either point, but the search is still continuing. I will see that the hon. member receives an answer.

Mr. Harkness: When am I going to get it? If we close out the defence estimates now I am sure I will not have an opportunity to get these answers.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Oh, yes.

The Chairman: We still have several items.

Mr. Harkness: The items remaining will go through rapidly, because they concern smaller matters.

An hon. Member: I hope you are right.

Mr. Harkness: The minister says he will produce the information, but if we pass all the national defence items I will have no opportunity to say anything more.

Mr. Campney: It would take some time to check the figures on deserters; and so far as the other matter is concerned, I have not been able to figure out the cubic footage of the pile of ashes to which my hon. friend referred.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): How about my photographs?

Mr. Harkness: I know the minister will need some time with his foot rule to get the figure for the pile of ashes.

Mr. Claxton: We will give you the figures.

Mr. Harkness: I would suggest that we leave the last of the defence items—

Mr. Claxton: No.

Mr. Harkness: —so the minister can answer these questions when he gets the answers. There are also certain other questions which have not been answered.

Mutual aid—

Mr. Knowles: I should like to ask the minister a question under this general group headed "mutual aid". My question may involve two or three of the headings that we have just passed, but at any rate they all go together. Can the minister tell the house the form in which we extend mutual aid? I note from the item before us that we are asked to appropriate $324 million for mutual aid but it is broken down into the usual items of civil salaries and wages, pay and allowances, pensions, other expenditures and so on. Perhaps the minister knows what I am driving at. In what form do we render mutual aid?

When he is answering that question, will he relate what we spend on mutual aid to the last two headings, namely contributions toward the military costs of NATO and defence expenditures by other government departments? Can he give us this picture in an intelligible form?

Mr. Claxton: I think it is in the white paper at page 33. The figures are given there. When the hon. member refers to items like civil salaries and wages, those are largely in connection with the air training plan where we charge the direct costs to mutual aid. The mutual aid program includes NATO air training plan, radar No. 4 sets, walkie-talkies and so on. These are the heads under which expenditures are made on mutual aid.

With respect to the second part of the hon. member's question, the form of mutual aid is summarized on page 33. It includes transfers of stock of existing equipment and some equipment of world war II that has subsequently been taken into our own stores. Then there are transfers from new production under which are aircraft and engines, radar sets and ammunition. Then there is NATO air crew training, and the total is set forth there. I think I have given the actual items before. They largely consist of world war II equipment for three divisions plus what we have transferred to the Netherlands, Italy and other countries. With respect to new equipment, it includes radar, walkie-talkies, howitzers, ammunition, explosives, Wasp engines, communications materials, propellants and so on. The program for 1953-54 will in addition include some ships.

Mr. Knowles: Then am I correct in my understanding that what we spend on mutual aid is spent either here in Canada or by procurements made by Canada in the usual way? We spend it on hiring technical aid, buying equipment and so on and then we either turn that equipment over to our partners or we make it available to the common pool. Is that a correct statement?

Mr. Claxton: The procedure under which we do it is that we arrive at a figure which we propose to give by way of mutual aid and we ask parliament to vote it. Parliament votes it. Before that is done we have made up a catalogue of things that we think the other countries need and that we can provide. As soon as parliament authorizes the vote we offer specific items of equipment to the standing group at Washington. The standing group notifies the North Atlantic treaty nations about them. They bid for them; they ask for them if they want them. The standing group arrives at an appraisal, judgment or recommendation as to which country should get the equipment. It makes that recommendation to us. We usually act on it. Then the cabinet approves the allocation of the equipment and it is shipped at once.

In the case of some equipment which countries like Britain, for example, happen to need particularly, they may make a direct approach to us but we still go through the form of telling the standing group about it and getting their approval in each case. That occurred in the case of aircraft, some propellants and other things. The only item of dollars that has so far entered into this has been that where we agree to pay towards infrastructure a larger proportion than that arrived at on the basis of capacity to pay as judged by national income, we then charge the excess over what we think is the right proportion on the capacity to pay basis to mutual aid. That accounts for probably two or three million dollars.

Mr. Knowles: I gather from what the minister has been saying that he has been describing the procedure with respect to the item we are on, namely mutual aid. What is the procedure with regard to the last two items which we passed over? I deliberately let them go because it seemed to me they were related to this one. I refer to contributions toward the military costs of NATO and defence expenditures by other government departments.

Mr. Claxton: Contributions to the military costs of NATO are set out at page 34 of the white paper. They include contributions to the military budget of SHAPE of $1,750,000, infrastructure $15,150,000, and accommodation, etc. $3,700,000, a total of $20,600,000 for the year 1953-54 compared with $27,500,000 for 1952-53.

Mr. Knowles: None of this can be regarded as coming under the heading of economic aid? This is only what is known as mutual aid?

Mr. Claxton: Perhaps the supply of some explosives and other materials which are not end items could be called economic aid, but they are quite minor.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Why are pay and allowances for distribution of the same amount of money almost twice as much as last year?

Mr. Claxton: Because the air training plan will be working at full peak.

Item agreed to.

246. Government's contribution to the permanent services pension account, $35,252,291.

Mr. Harkness: I have no question on 246 but I suggest, as I did earlier, that it stand so we might get the answers to the questions which have not been answered and to which the minister has agreed to produce answers.

The Chairman: The hon. member will realize that unless there is unanimous consent the item cannot stand.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I wish to make exactly the same point. I had some questions this afternoon which were held over and to which I expect to get answers. The hon. member for Calgary East is right when he says that if these are allowed to go through then our rights are all gone. I think it is a reasonable concession; otherwise the only alternative we have is to go ahead.

Mr. Harkness: I would point out that the ordinary procedure in the years since I have been a member of the house is that when the minister concerned, no matter for what department, did not have the answer the item was allowed to stand until he did produce an answer. That is the ordinary procedure we have followed.

The Chairman: Not necessarily. Sometimes a minister has given members an undertaking. It is up to the minister to devise the procedure, but as far as the rules are concerned I could quote Beauchesne's third edition and the citation which says that when the committee of supply has a resolution before it, it has either to vote for it or vote against it, and if it is allowed to stand that is by consent. I imagine that the matter can be settled amicably.

Mr. Pearkes: Might I ask the chairman if there are any supplementary estimates for this department? If so, perhaps we can get the answers when we are dealing with them.

Mr. Claxton: Yes, we will have supplementaries.

Mr. Harkness: On the understanding that we will get the answers to the questions on the supplementary estimates I am quite agreeable to let this go through.

Item agreed to.

Mr. Claxton: I appreciate that. I think there are only three questions, and we will try to get the answers long before the supplementaries come on.

Before we close I would like to make two brief announcements with the permission of the committee, if I may, because I feel certain that members would rather have them here than learn about them later; and they are rather important.

The first relates to the provision of transportation for the dependents of service personnel in England and Europe. We had hoped that by the principle of rotation it might be possible to rotate married personnel so they would only be separated from their wives and children for a year. Despite that, however, a number have taken their wives and children overseas without government assistance, and it is now proposed that regulations shall be introduced under which the ordinary rules regarding postings shall be applied if the commanding officer of the unit is satisfied that a service officer or man has secured proper accommodation for his wife and family. Transportation will be paid and they will be treated as married persons abroad on the condition that the posting is for a minimum of two years. This will be of major importance to the welfare of our troops abroad.

The second change which was just authorized by the cabinet yesterday is a change in the arrangements regarding subsistence under which the amount payable for subsistence to married personnel in the armed forces is increased substantially. This was done also to meet the condition that has arisen in consequence of having these large peacetime forces with frequent postings, some of them abroad, and the fact that we have not yet been able to provide everyone who wants them with married quarters. The details of these changes are worked out in a schedule that will be made public at once. Both of them are very much to the advantage of the service personnel.

Mr. Knowles: Could that schedule be placed on Hansard?

Mr. Claxton: I hardly think that desirable. It is being made available at once. We do not usually place schedules of that kind on Hansard, but I will include it in the revision of the white paper.

I might say in conclusion that the associate minister and I have appreciated the co-operative spirit of the committee.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

General administration—

426. Departmental administration, $588,333.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Chairman, in previous years I have used this opportunity to make a statement about economic conditions in Canada and about the efforts being made by the Department of Trade and Commerce to maintain and expand Canada's trade with the outside world. To some extent both have already been covered by my colleague the Minister of Finance, in his budget speech; and during the budget debate I gave an account of my trip to Latin America.

It seems to me that hon. members should have before them when they consider the estimates of my department a brief account of what has been happening under the economic and trade policies followed by the government. The simplest way I can describe the present economic situation in Canada is to say that at no time in the past have Canadians been more prosperous. In spite of the predictions of recessions and depressions that were made from time to time the fact is that the pace of Canadian production has rarely faltered since the end of the war. Our country has attracted the attention of the world because of its economic stability and rapid development.

Of course it has not all been smooth sailing. There have been times when shortage of key materials interfered with the attainment of maximum output. There have been times when loss of external markets caused distress to some producers. But in the end most of these difficulties proved to be limited in their scope or of relatively short duration. New records of national output were attained from year to year.

At the beginning of 1952, for example, there were many uncertainties. On the one hand, some industries were handicapped by lack of materials arising out of the demands of the defence program. At the same time other industries, particularly those producing consumer goods, were operating well below capacity. The outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease cut off exports of our livestock and meat to the United States.

During the course of 1952 the Canadian economy adjusted itself to the defence effort and achieved balance at a high level of activity. The establishment of new capacity in raw material producing industries helped to eliminate shortages of key materials such as steel and cement. Internationally, the supply situation improved to the point where it became possible to get along without international allocation of most essential materials. Just a few scarce materials remain under international allocation.

Here in Canada consumer buying gradually increased during the year and gave a substantial boost to employment in the industries producing both hard and soft goods. In the final quarter of 1952, for example, about 14 per cent more goods passed over retail counters than in the same quarter of 1951.

To show the extent of the improvement let me particularize for a moment. Comparing the latter part of 1952 with the same period of 1951, production levels were running about 20 per cent higher in the case of motor vehicles; 67 per cent higher in the case of refrigerators; 92 per cent in the case of washing machines; and 135 per cent in the case of electric stoves. And now we have a new television industry which sold about 75,000 units from the factories in the fourth quarter of 1952.

The suspension of consumer credit regulations and the removal of special excise taxes in the budget of 1952 helped to stimulate consumer buying. Those restrictions had been essential at an earlier period, and they were taken off as soon as they were no longer needed. But the more important reason for the upturn in consumption was the steady increase in personal incomes and the levelling off and decline in consumer prices. The statisticians tell me that during 1952 the per capita average real income of wage and salary earners increased by about 9 per cent, a 7 per cent increase in money incomes and a 2 per cent drop in consumer prices. There was also some reduction in the rate of personal saving, that is a higher proportion of incomes was spent rather than saved in 1952 compared with 1951, which added still further to consumer buying.

By the end of 1952 most of the soft spots previously in evidence had disappeared, although a few others developed during the year. A reduced demand for wood pulp brought about a reduced pulpwood cut this season. The winter shutdown affected a large amount of construction work under way in outlying areas. On the whole, however, market forces are in good balance and, with few exceptions Canadian industries are working at close to capacity.

As a result total output, the gross national production, reached $23 billion, compared with $21·4 billion in 1951. The physical change, after eliminating the effect of prices, was about a 6 per cent increase. Even after excluding the effects of the phenomenal crops harvested on the prairies, the increase compared favourably with that achieved in any previous post-war years. It was a year of notable progress in standards of living for the Canadian people. But it was also a year devoted to the development of our resources and to the building up of capacity to make possible an even higher standard of living in the future. Capital investment absorbed no less than 22 per cent of our national output.

[Mr. Howe.]

So great indeed has been the rate of capital investment in post-war years that many people have wondered how long it could continue. Yet each year when we survey the intentions of businessmen and public bodies we find that they are planning to spend more on capital account than they did the year before. This year is no exception. There is every reason to believe that investment outlays will show a further significant increase in 1953.

During the past two years an increased proportion of capital outlays has been directed toward expansion in industries of particular importance to Canada's over-all preparedness such as mineral and hydro developments, strategic raw material processing and new plants for the production of defence and other heavy equipment. While this expansion of basic industry is still proceeding, some of the major programs undertaken within the last two or three years are well on their way to completion. For example, expenditures for new capacity in the steel and chemical industries is expected to be lower in 1953 than in the preceding year.

The substantial development taking place is certain to involve extensive supplementary investment in services and other related fields. In view of the limited resources available in 1951 and 1952 much of this secondary expansion has been delayed. This postponement was encouraged by government measures specifically designed to make way for more urgent projects. Meanwhile, productive capacity in building materials industries has been increasing and in addition supplies from abroad have become more readily available. The deferred depreciation measure, restrictions on the use of steel for construction, and other measures designed to discourage less essential investment have therefore been removed. There are now indications that outlays for housing, trade establishments and so forth will be considerably increased in 1953.

In total it is now estimated that the 1953 capital expenditure program will involve outlays of $5·4 billion compared with $5·1 billion expended last year. This estimate is based for the most part on a recent survey of the investment intentions of business, institutions and governments. Some weeks ago I tabled two reports which give details of these forecasts.

If investment plans for 1953 are realized, this will be the sixth consecutive year in which capital outlays have reached more than 20 per cent of total national production. Some upturn in capital expenditure following the establishment of the new rearmament objectives was to have been expected. However, as I have previously indicated, we have now made a good deal of progress in adjusting to these new goals. For capital outlays still to be increasing substantiates the view that Canada's present expansion is not based on temporary boom conditions. It is not a flash in the pan. Instead, it reflects the growing diversity and adaptability of Canada's industry and the capacity to produce economically an increasing proportion of the world's requirements.

It is important to note that whereas much of the investment spending made in the immediate post-war years was for replacement needs, a much larger proportion of today's investment represents new additions to capacity, based on the expectation of adequate markets for many years to come. Future markets can never, of course, be fully assured. Canadian industries remain vulnerable to dislocating influences, particularly from abroad, and future growth will depend to a very large extent upon continued progress toward sound and vigorous world trade.

Now let me turn to the record of Canada's external trade. Exports continued to advance last year. They amounted in total in 1952 to $4·4 billion, an increase of $400 million over 1951, the previous highest year. The total value of imports in 1952 remained at about the same level as the year before.

Each time in recent years that I have reported further advances in our exports, I have been asked whether we are really selling larger quantities of goods or whether the increased values may not simply reflect higher prices. In 1952 the volume of exports increased by even more than their total value. Export prices actually declined during the year, although not by any more than 1 or 2 per cent on the average. Since 1950 the total value of our exports has risen by about 39 per cent and the physical volume by 23 per cent, a remarkable and sustained record. Of course not all exports have fared equally well during this period. There have been some real difficulties in the export of manufactured goods, although this has been more than made up by strong demand in the domestic market.

As I have said, livestock producers experienced a major setback in 1952 owing to the outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease. The ban on exports to the United States has now been lifted and normal trade is being resumed. In the meantime, many adverse effects of the meat surplus situation have been avoided by the use of price supports and by special arrangements made to deal with surplus stocks.

On the other hand, grain producers have benefited from a record crop accompanied by a strong world market for their product. In the present crop year we expect to export all the wheat that can be handled by our transportation and storage facilities. The continuing world-wide demand for our major export products and the relative stability of our export prices provide evidence of the basic strength of Canada's position in world trade. This strength has been created in large part by sound policies, and it has buoyed us up during a period when many other countries have suffered setbacks. By wise though sometimes unpopular measures we have succeeded in avoiding most of the damage that inflation has inflicted upon the trade of many other countries, which is one reason our dollar is so strong.

During 1952 major downward adjustments occurred in the prices of many of the basic commodities and foodstuffs which move in world trade. Price declines of as much as one-third or one-half were quite common in 1952. As examples of commodities thus affected I might mention rubber, tin, cotton and wool. Canadian importers and consumers have benefited from these reduced prices. On the average, the prices of imports fell by 12 per cent during 1952. Our exports, with a few notable exceptions such as lead, zinc and lumber, have been relatively exempt from drastic price adjustments, which is evidence in itself of the demand which exists for our goods.

Two or three years ago there began to be a good deal of concern expressed that too large a proportion of our exports were being marketed in the United States. The totals were satisfactory but perhaps we were getting too many of our export eggs in one basket. As Minister of Trade and Commerce I stated on a number of occasions that this situation was mainly a reflection of the financial difficulties through which the sterling area countries and western European countries were passing. There has at no time been any lack of desire in overseas countries to obtain Canadian goods.

In my view we have been fortunate in Canada, during this period, to have the great markets of the United States open and receptive to our goods. We have certainly taken advantage of our opportunities in that direction, and Canadian exports to the United States have risen to a level of $2·3 billion.

During these years the government has done everything possible to encourage and assist the recovery of our exports to those countries overseas which are our traditional customers. I am pleased to say that almost all of the $400 million increase which took place in our exports in 1952 went to countries overseas. Very little of the increase took place in exports to the United States, where we just about maintained our position last year and even improved it a little bit. Consequently the percentage of our exports going to the United States has declined steadily, which I am sure all hon. members will agree is a healthy sign. In 1950, 65 per cent of our total exports went to the United States; in 1951 the figure was down to 59 per cent and in 1952 it was down to 54 per cent. Our efforts to diversify our exports have been paying off.

It has been encouraging to see the way in which the trade and financial position of the United Kingdom has improved in recent months. Such improvement is a good thing for Canada from every point of view. Canada participated fully in the recent commonwealth economic conference, as hon. members are aware. We may be greatly encouraged also by the increasing amount of international agreement about what needs to be done to solve the trade and financial problems of the sterling area and western Europe. Many of the countries concerned are showing signs of moving in the right direction.

In our attempts to overcome barriers to trade we have not by any means as yet had all the success we would wish for, particularly in regard to the British countries. Many of our manufactured goods are still excluded from overseas markets because of import restrictions. Nevertheless, in 1952 the value, quantity and proportion of our exports to British countries did increase and for the first time their value amounted to over $1 billion. Greater shipments of wheat and metals to the United Kingdom account for most of this increase.

Canadian imports from the United Kingdom were relatively low in the first few months of 1952 but have been increasing lately with the upsurge in consumer buying in this country. I am glad to see that the United Kingdom have been able to increase their sales to us of many types of machinery and that their sales to the United States are increasing. It has been said before, but it bears repeating, that there is a large and continuing market in this country for many goods which the United Kingdom can supply in greater quantities.

We have substantially improved our sales to Europe, Latin America and other foreign countries overseas. The total of these exports increased by $240 million to just short of $1 billion. Germany has increased its Canadian purchases substantially so that it is now the second largest European market for our products. Here again wheat accounted for much of the increase. Most other European countries are now buying more Canadian goods, including Belgium, our largest European market.

In Asia the most notable increases took place in our exports to Japan. Sales to Japan rose to the point where they were in excess of $100 million in 1952. From the Canadian point of view the increasing importance of the Japanese market has become more and more apparent in each recent year.

In Latin America also we have expanded our sales. Whereas in Europe we are largely selling raw materials, in Latin America manufactured goods constitute a much greater proportion of the total. Exports of such essential manufactures as trucks, machinery and electrical equipment to Latin America have all increased. As I have already reported to the house, there is no doubt that there are great possibilities for further sales in Latin America of manufactured goods of all kinds. To make the most of these opportunities it is necessary for Canadian businessmen to make personal contacts. There is lots of competition, but the opportunities are very real.

Canada and the United States continue to be each other's best customers. This extensive trade is both a cause and a result of the cordial commercial relations which have been developed over the years. Both countries have fostered the development of trade, across our joint borders and with the world at large. Both Canada and the United States have attempted as much as possible to solve numerous trade problems, not by restrictive measures but by reducing trade barriers and expanding the opportunities to trade. With the recent change of administration in the United States government, I feel confident and hopeful that problems of commercial relations between Canada and the United States can continue to be dealt with along these lines.

This is not to say that there have been no problems or differences between Canada and the United States. At every appropriate opportunity the government has made clear to the government of the United States that basic principles are being infringed by the imposition of import controls upon dairy products in the United States. We have made clear, furthermore, the importance we attach to the passage of customs simplification legislation in the United States, to facilitate trade and to fulfil the agreements which were entered into at Geneva in 1947.

Negotiations of profound importance for the future of trade and commercial policy will have to be conducted during 1953. Consideration will have to be given by the major trading countries to the future of the international program which has been established under the general agreement on tariffs and trade. Canada and the United States have helped themselves and the world as a whole through the negotiation of extensive trade agreements, before the war in 1935 and 1938, and since the war under GATT at Geneva in 1947 and at Torquay in 1951. The unprecedented flow of trade between Canada and the United States today is conducted in accordance with the general agreement on tariffs and trade.

Since the tariff undertakings of the general agreement on tariffs and trade are firmly bound only until the end of 1953, decisions will have to be made amongst the countries concerned as to what further steps to take to safeguard the future of international trade. There may be a further opportunity to take steps forward in the reduction of tariffs and the elimination of trade restrictions, as an alternative to moving in the other direction. The interest of Canada in this matter is perfectly clear, because we require other markets to be open to our goods on an expanding scale.

The role of the United States will be a crucial one and, as always in such circumstances, I am sure that constructive American leadership will not be lacking when it is needed.

Over the years Canada has become one of the world's most important trading nations, and our standing in that respect has never been higher than it is today. That this is so is due primarily to the capacity and enterprise of the Canadian people and to the extent and variety of the resources which they have at their command. Government policies, too, have played an important role, and I wish to refer briefly to some of the trade promotional activities of the Department of Trade and Commerce, particularly to the work of the trade commissioner service which is well known to many of you in a general way.

This is both an old and a new service. Its origins go back to the very early days of the department, but it was not until the period immediately following world war I that it was built up and organized on such a scale as to give Canada a really competent trade service in most of the world's principal commercial centres. During the ten or twelve years following world war I the extension of this service was carried out in a vigorous way. In fact Canada, by reason of circumstances which were peculiar to our national development, reversed the usual order of events. We were more or less compelled to equip ourselves with strong and world-wide trade representation before we had made more than a modest start on the establishment of our political or diplomatic foreign service. It was Canada's rapid commercial growth that accounted for this marked departure from the ordinary sequence of events.

Our first venture into foreign representation on a large scale having been dictated chiefly by our urgent commercial needs, it was natural that special attention should be given, and was given, to developing a service that would be as efficient as we could make it from the trade promotion standpoint. The recruits to this service were selected and trained entirely with that object in view.

The young men who came into the trade commissioner service did so with a commercial career in mind. Emphasis was laid upon their having some business experience to start with, on top of which they were put through a thorough course of training before being posted abroad. Great importance was attached to having them gain a firsthand knowledge of Canada's major export industries by actual visits to plants in all parts of the country and by becoming personally acquainted with the export managers and other business executives through whom their subsequent work abroad could be made most effective. That close contact between the trade commissioners and businessmen throughout Canada has been responsible, more than any other factor, for building up the reputation of our trade commissioner service and the good will which it has enjoyed in business circles for many years past.

That reputation is not just local, for I believe it is widely recognized that Canada's commercial representation abroad is not excelled by that of any other country. We intend to keep it that way, and it is a matter for congratulation that whatever administration has been in office in Canada at any time during the past 30 or 40 years, there has never been any difference of policy, or of practice either, in regard to the importance of seeing to it that we support and maintain this service on a most efficient basis.

It is, as I have said, both an old and a new service—new in the sense that at the close of world war II we had a pressing problem to deal with in reopening offices abroad that had been closed and in finding personnel to man these as well as a number of new offices which have had to be established during the past seven or eight years. In fact we have virtually had to re-create the trade commissioner service, but we have now reached the stage where we can truthfully say that it is not only back on its feet but in better shape than ever.

Three new offices were opened during 1952 at New Orleans, Ciudad Trujillo and Beirut. These offices will serve territories which we have reason to believe will afford good opportunities for the expansion of Canada's exports. We now have 51 offices in 40 countries, manned by 102 trade commissioners and assistant trade commissioners. I take particular satisfaction in pointing out that during the course of rebuilding this service we have paid great attention to the need for men whose training has been specialized along the lines of promoting the exports of agricultural and fisheries products.

Coupled with this greater degree of specialization, we now have the advantage of a foreign commercial service in which there is a much improved balance as between the older and more experienced personnel and the younger group who, in another few years, will be stepping up into the senior positions.

Apart from the trade commissioner service there are, of course, other divisions of the department, centred here at Ottawa, that are responsible for carrying on important trade promotional activities, notably the international trade relations division, which is concerned especially with trade agreements and trade negotiations with other countries, and the commodities division, whose officers provide an essential link between the business community at home and the trade commissioners abroad.

May I close with a word regarding the Canadian international trade fair. This fair has been held annually since its inception in 1948. The 1952 fair was, we believe, the most successful that has been held to date, although in point of size it still fell somewhat short of the opening fair in 1948. We are now well advanced in the preparations for the 1953 fair, to be held this coming June, and I am glad to be able to state that this will be, without exception, much the largest fair that we have had yet. Moreover it will have, on the exhibit side, a good division between the amounts of exhibit space taken respectively by Canadian firms and by firms from other countries. Exhibit space for the 1953 fair is now at a premium. We have reached the stage at which, from the standpoint of improving the fair as a business undertaking, we are having to give at least as much attention to building up the attendance of bona fide business visitors as to the attracting of either Canadian or foreign exhibitors. This Canadian trade fair has already won wide recognition abroad, and I think we can safely say that its success represents one of the outstanding advances made by Canada in many years in the field of international trade promotion.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): On Monday we shall consider legislation. Most of the bills on the order paper are amending bills, and many of the amendments are of a minor nature.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That is true. As far as possible we shall proceed in the following order: Bill No. 191, to amend the Canada Shipping Act, 1934; Bill No. 37, to amend the Indian Act; Bill No. 337, to amend the Radio Act; Bill No. 190, to amend the Canadian Citizenship Act; Bill No. 335, to amend the Veterans Benefit Act, 1951; Bill No. 336, to provide assistance for the higher education of children of certain deceased members of the armed forces and other persons; Bill No. 332, respecting the Canadian forces; Bill No. 48, respecting food, drugs, cosmetics and therapeutic devices; Bill No. 316, relating to trade marks and unfair competition. I understand this bill will be referred to the committee on banking and commerce. Should we be fortunate enough to pass these bills, we shall move to go into supply.

Mr. Knowles: What departments would you call if you got in?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Finance and legislation.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

APPENDIX

Letter to Secretary, National Council of Canada Prisoners of War

OTTAWA, March 10, 1953

Major G. T. Prefontaine,
Secretary, National Council of Canada
Prisoners of War,
3721 Henri Julien Street,
Montreal, P.Q.

Dear Major Prefontaine:

Following on the meeting of your group with the Hon. Mr. Lapointe, representing the Prime Minister, your representations regarding compensation to prisoners of war on account of maltreatment were examined by the government, and I now have to inform you of their conclusions.

While your proposals were considered as sympathetically as possible, it is not felt that you have adduced any arguments which require the government to modify its previously announced decision, that is, to put into effect the recommendations made by the Right Hon. J. L. Ilsley, the commissioner on war claims.

The proposition which your group advanced is that, as the prisoners of war who were interned in Japanese camps in the Far East have been paid compensation at a per diem rate, similar payments should also be made to those who were prisoners of war in German and Italian camps, as it is your contention that all of the latter group suffered maltreatment.

It is the view of the commissioner, in which the government concurs, that there was a substantial difference in the treatment of prisoners of war by the Japanese on the one hand and by the Germans and Italians on the other hand. However, the relatively few prisoners who were held in custody by the gestapo and other organizations declared illegal at Nuremberg are to be treated the same as those in Japanese operated camps.

The commissioner's reasons for arriving at this conclusion in regard to Japanese controlled camps are set forth in detail on pages 41 and 49 of his report, and seem to the government to be valid. On page 50 of the report he gives evidence from the "British Hand Book" to the effect that conditions in the German and Italian camps were not such as to support any presumption of general maltreatment.

The British government, by paying a small lump sum grant to those who were interned by the Japanese, and by not doing so to those who were interned by the Germans and Italians, has acted in conformity with the finding that conditions in the two theatres were vastly different. This finding is confirmed by the following facts which are on record as a result of the post-war experience of the Department of Veterans Affairs and the Canadian pension commission with prisoners of war from both theatres.

As for the Far Eastern prisoners of war, their food was so limited that nearly all who survived showed clinical evidence of avitaminosis while in camp. A high percentage had also clinical evidence of dysentery, etc. Roughly 20 per cent of all Far Eastern prisoners of war suffered permanent damage as the result of avitaminosis. Autopsies on a number of deceased Far Eastern prisoners of war who had certain symptoms but no physical signs of disability proved that they suffered from avitaminosis. Records of the rehabilitation and welfare services branches of the D.V.A. show that a high percentage of survivors have had occupational difficulties and impaired general health.

On the other hand, as regards European prisoners of war, there is no record of any avitaminosis occurring while in camp, or discovered subsequent to liberation. While there is evidence of intestinal infestation (dysentery, etc.) it is much lower than among the Far Eastern prisoners of war. In the summer of 1946 instructions were issued that all prisoners of war were to have a complete physical examination including an X-ray of their chest and any other indicated special examinations. There have been no indications as a result of these examinations or subsequent surveys that any considerable number of prisoners of war in the European theatre suffered impairment.

Canadian army statistics of death from non-battle causes, while prisoners of war in the two theatres, are, however, probably more decisive than any other evidence. In the campaigns in Italy, Sicily, and North West Europe and in the Dieppe operations some 4,005 unwounded prisoners of war were taken, and of these only 37 died from non-battle casualties while prisoners of war—a death rate of less than one in a hundred.

In Hong Kong, however, 1,289 unwounded prisoners of war were taken; of these 264 died of non-battle causes or a death rate of approximately one in five. These figures speak for themselves, indicating the difference in conditions in prisoner of war camps in the Far East and in Europe.

Your group advanced arguments that all prisoners of war in German and Italian camps suffered more or less from poor shelter, interruption of mail, the fear of death and various indignities. It is not felt that any concrete evidence has been offered to offset the conclusions of the commissioner, and that in any case hardships of that kind cannot be said to entitle those who have suffered them to receive a payment which would be denied to the front-line soldier who is in greater danger of death and at the same time frequently suffers equal or greater hardships.

It was represented that individual prisoners of war would have considerable difficulty in proving maltreatment through lack of evidence, and lack of facility in expression. In order to eliminate any unfairness on this score, the government decided to make the services of the pensions advocates of the Department of Veterans Affairs available to any prisoner of war who may wish to make a claim in respect of maltreatment. These officials will be well able to obtain the available evidence and advocate the claims effectively. A considerable number of former prisoners of war have already taken advantage of these facilities, and it is hoped that all who feel that they have a claim for compensation for maltreatment will do so.

In conclusion I am instructed to say, that after most careful and sympathetic consideration, the government feels that the proposals for settling the claims to compensation of prisoners of war laid down by the commissioner and set forth in the report dated 25th February 1952, are essentially sound and equitable, and that any prisoner of war, having a valid claim for maltreatment, will be able to obtain the compensation to which he is entitled.

Yours sincerely,

F. GORDON BRADLEY,
Secretary of State.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, April 20, 1953

The house met at eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE OF DISTINGUISHED VISITOR IN GALLERY—THE CROWN PRINCE OF JAPAN

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think all hon. members would wish me to mention at this time that we are honoured today by the presence in the diplomatic gallery of His Imperial Highness the Crown Prince of Japan. I am sure we are all unanimous in wishing to extend to him a most warm welcome on this occasion. His Imperial Highness is visiting Canada on his way to London to attend the coronation of our own beloved sovereign Queen Elizabeth. The devoted affection we all have for our own sovereign makes it quite easy for us to understand the high regard in which his illustrious father and the imperial family are held by the people of Japan.

His Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Japan is a symbol of his state, and of course the history of the relations between Japan and the western world was darkened by heavy shadows during the tragic years of war. But that is now something of the past. I think that the presence here of His Imperial Highness the Crown Prince, and the important mission on which he is engaged at this time, is a happy confirmation of the fact that those tragic years were of short duration and were, in fact, repugnant to the intimate feelings of all the peoples of the nations who were engaged in war during those tragic years. This mission of His Imperial Highness is a happy omen of better relations between our peoples, and of a more effective and keener desire in all our countries to work together for the welfare of the whole free human race.

We are most happy to welcome His Royal Highness and to say to him that we hope he is enjoying, and will enjoy, his visit throughout Canada, and that he will take back to his country the knowledge that there is a genuine good will towards his country in this land of ours which, like his own, borders on this great highway of the Pacific ocean which has been, and will continue to be, a highway for the maintenance of political, economic and trade relationships that will be mutually beneficial to our two peoples.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to join with the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in extending a hearty welcome to the Crown Prince of Japan who in himself here today expresses the similarity between our own monarchical system and that which he represents. As the Prime Minister has already said, the relationship between our respective nations has had its unhappy period. It would also be well to remember that we had an earlier period of alliance in which our relationship was warm and friendly. It is part of the genius of our free system, which is now represented in the parliamentary system of Japan as well as that of Canada, that out of conflict we seek friendship in the years afterwards.

I would hope that the visit on this occasion of His Imperial Highness to this country may emphasize in the minds of the people of his own nation as well as of ours that, with the lessons of the tragic years still clearly in our minds, we are seeking to build stronger understandings of the value of freedom.

We recognize the great achievements of a nation which has reached a proud position in the world as a producer of goods of high quality. We recognize the industry of the people of Japan. We recognize their loyalty to their own traditions. In extending this welcome today to His Imperial Highness, who is part of the system of democratic monarchy which has been established in Japan, we earnestly hope that during the future these nations may come closer together in striving for great achievements along the paths of peace.

WHEAT

TABLING OF REVISED INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I wish to lay on the table two copies of an agreement revising and renewing the international wheat agreement. This is, of course, the document signed on behalf of Canada in Washington on April 13. Printed copies of this agreement cannot be made available until after the period of signing ends a week hence. I would therefore suggest that the agreement be printed in Votes and Proceedings for the information of hon. members.

I may say at this time that all the exporting countries have signed the agreement and that more than 50 per cent of the wheat, by quantity, included in the agreement has been signed for by the importers. Therefore there definitely will be a wheat agreement over the next three years.

QUESTIONS

MERCHANT SHIPS OWNED BY CANADIANS

Mr. Higgins:

1. What is the total number of merchant ships owned by Canadians?
2. How many seamen are employed in manning these ships?

Mr. Benidickson:

1. 391, with an additional 96 on United Kingdom registry, and manned by United Kingdom crews.

2. 18,231. The number of seamen employed in manning the 96 ships on United Kingdom registry is not known.

NAVIGATION AIDS, NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Higgins:

Has a decision been made to give Newfoundland priority in the rehabilitation and modernization of aids to navigation?

Mr. Benidickson: No. Since union, the department's annual program for the Newfoundland district has been a substantial one, the work has been prosecuted as rapidly as was practicable and creditable progress has been made in overtaking the very substantial amount of rehabilitation work that has to be done in that district. That policy will be continued.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES POWER COMMISSION

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. How many men are employed by the Northwest Territories power commission, Snare river, Northwest Territories?
2. Are they entitled to holidays with pay after a period of service? If so, has consideration been given to placing them in the same position as power-house operators, linemen and other employees?
3. Is payment made to them for overtime? If so, what is the rate for overtime?
4. What arrangements are made for providing moving picture shows and other entertainment?
5. Who operates the moving picture shows and what is the price of admission?

Mr. Winters:

1. Eleven.

2. Employees paid on a monthly basis receive holidays with pay after a period of service. Employees paid on an hourly rate basis do not receive holidays with pay.

[Mr. Howe.]

3. Overtime is paid to the power-house operators and hourly rate employees where they are required to work longer than the standard working day. Overtime pay is paid at the same rate as their normal pay.

4. Films are rented by the Northwest Territories power commission and shipped to the Snare river plant at the expense of the commission. A new program is supplied weekly.

5. The films mentioned in question 4 are shown on the projector owned by the Northwest Territories power commission at Snare river which is operated by the members of the staff. There is no price of admission.

IMMIGRANTS SETTLING IN NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. Balcom:

1. Of all immigrants entering Canada in 1952, how many settled in Nova Scotia?
2. What percentage of Canadian immigration in 1952 would this represent?

Mr. Harris:

1. 2,702 immigrants gave Nova Scotia as their destination.

2. 1·7 per cent.

ITALIAN IMMIGRANTS

Mr. Balcom:

How many Italians were admitted to Canada in (a) 1951; (b) 1952?

Mr. Harris: (a) 24,532; (b) 21,554; these statistics are by racial origin.

POST OFFICE BUILDING, WINNIPEG

Mr. Sinnott:

1. Are plans and specifications completed for the new post office building in Winnipeg, Manitoba?
2. If not, when are plans and specifications to be completed?
3. What is to be the type of construction?
4. Is Tybdall stone to be used or specified?
5. Have tenders been called for construction?
6. If not, at what date are tenders expected to be called?

He said: Mr. Speaker, I notice a typographical error in part 4 of this question. It should read "Tyndall", which stone is similar to that used in this building.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Stand.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

PRIME MINISTER'S RESIDENCE

Mr. Hodgson:

1. What was the original cost of the Sussex street property purchased as a residence for the prime minister?
2. How much has been spent to date in repairing, rebuilding and furnishing the properties?
3. How much has been spent to date on lawns, hedges, parapet wall, etc.?
4. How much has been paid to date in salaries and other expenses for domestic and other help?

5. What is the total government cost of the project from the date of its purchase to the 31st of March, 1953?

MOTION FOR PAPERS

CANADA-NEWFOUNDLAND—ITEM 39 OF TERMS OF UNION

Mr. Higgins:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents since 31st of March, 1949, which have passed between the government of the province of Newfoundland and/or any person or persons in Newfoundland and the government of Canada, dealing with the application of term 39 of the terms of union between Canada and Newfoundland.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the consent of the house to delete the words "and/or any person or persons in Newfoundland". I do that following discussion with the Secretary of State (Mr. Bradley).

Mr. Bradley: In this connection, Mr. Speaker, I should like to add also that the motion would have to go, as far as we are concerned, subject to obtaining the consent of the provincial government for the production of these documents.

Mr. Speaker: Does the motion carry subject to the remarks which have been made by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. Higgins) and also by the minister?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Carried.

FISHERIES

CONVENTION FOR PRESERVATION OF HALIBUT FISHERY OF NORTH PACIFIC OCEAN AND BERING SEA

Hon. James Sinclair (Minister of Fisheries) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to approve and confirm the convention between Canada and the United States of America for the preservation of the halibut fishery of the northern Pacific ocean and Bering sea, signed by Canada and the United States of America in Ottawa, on the 2nd of March, 1953, and to provide for the carrying out of the provisions thereof.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

POLICY AS TO COAL PURCHASED IN NOVA SCOTIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): May I be permitted to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has the minister seen a press dispatch from Ottawa in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald of April 17, captioned: "Plan to work out allocated purchase system with C.N.R." If so, can the minister inform the house as to the details of the new policy of the C.N.R. to purchase Nova Scotia coal?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): The hon. member was kind enough to send me a copy of the Halifax Chronicle-Herald which I read a few moments ago. He will recall that during the sittings of the committee on railways and shipping the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. McCulloch) and himself raised this question, which prompted a statement by the president of the Canadian National Railways. Since then the dominion coal board has decided to conduct a survey on the on-company's service charges of the Canadian National Railways in conjunction with an officer of the economics branch of the transport commissioners' office; and, dependent upon the result of that survey, it may well be that the policy of the Canadian National Railways with reference to purchase of coal will change somewhat. Meanwhile, the Canadian National Railways are purchasing from the mine referred to here—I think it is the Intercolonial Coal Company—additional quantities of coal.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS

TENDERS FOR SUPPLIES—APPROVED LISTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): May I inquire of the Secretary of State when I may expect the tabling of a return for which I made previous inquiries which was ordered on February 11? May I also ask whether his attention has been directed to citation 450 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, second edition? If not, I take the liberty of referring him to it now in that connection.

Hon. F. G. Bradley (Secretary of State): I shall take immediate steps to secure the production of this return as soon as possible.

RECREATIONAL BUILDING, H.M.C.S. "NADEN"; HOUSING—CONSTRUCTION AND FINANCE

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): May I ask when I may have a reply to questions that were passed as orders for returns on March 9 and on March 19?

GRAIN

INQUIRY AS TO INITIAL PRICE FOR WHEAT, BARLEY AND OATS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): May I direct to the Minister of Trade and Commerce a question based on the importance to farmers of knowing the initial price that will be set for this year in order that they may allocate their crop acreage? Can the minister say what initial price will be set for wheat, barley and oats produced this year? If he is unable to do that at this time, can he say when such an announcement will be made?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I am not able to make an announcement at this time. The matter is under study, but there are several difficulties this year which must be taken into consideration. As a matter of fact, it is not customary to make an announcement as early as this—it has not been in the past years—but at some indefinite date, when we have been able to analyse the various factors, an announcement will be made.

Mr. Argue: I may point out to the minister the announcement was made last year on April 8.

TELEVISION

INQUIRY AS TO INSTALLATION OF SET IN ROOM 16, HOUSE OF COMMONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to you, through the Minister of Public Works. I have sent him a copy. When may the members expect to have a television set placed in Room 16? Is the minister aware that there are several reasons, which I will not elaborate on at this time, why one should be there?

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to transmit to you the question that was asked by the hon. gentleman. Everything taking place in this building is under the jurisdiction of Mr. Speaker, and I am only the liaison officer between Mr. Speaker and the government. We have not discussed this question as yet, and I have not discussed it with my colleagues. It would be interesting to have a television set, but I have always thought that we would have the installation completed in Ottawa before we would consider that. As to the other reasons that I know, I will await another question.

CONSTRUCTION

REFERENCE TO ANNOUNCEMENT OF PARLIAMENTARY ASSISTANT TO MINISTER OF FINANCE TO REFORM CLUB, QUEBEC

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the announcement made over the week end by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance at a meeting of the Reform Club in Quebec concerning plans which he said the government has for housing, public works and other developments, will the Prime Minister say whether these plans are included in a white paper or other document? If so, will such document be tabled?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I was not present when the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance was supposed to have made the declarations referred to by my hon. friend and I have not even seen newspaper reports of what he said. I shall have to get further information than what has been conveyed or implied in the hon. member's question before I attempt to answer it.

Mr. Knowles: See the Montreal Star of Saturday evening.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING STEAM AND MOTOR ENGINEER CERTIFICATES, RADIOTELEGRAPH INSTALLATIONS, ETC.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. 191, to amend the Canada Shipping Act, 1934.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

The Chairman: May I point out that this bill has been carefully considered by the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, and was reported to this house with amendments.

On section 1.

Mr. Green: This bill was amended rather extensively in the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. I wonder whether the parliamentary assistant is going to give any explanation of these amendments.

Mr. Benidickson: The amendments, as the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra says, are somewhat extensive. They appear in Votes and Proceedings of March 31, but there is no controversy, as I understand it, in connection with the clause that is now before us.

The committee heard representatives and counsel of the shipping industry, and in particular the British Columbia Tug Boat Association, the British Columbia Coastwise Operators' Association, counsel and representatives of the Dominion Marine Association and some of the individual shipping companies.

The major amendments that were made in committee had to do with radiotelephone equipment. As the bill was originally drafted, it was suggested that radiotelegraph should be compulsory in vessels of the sizes described in the bill. In committee the officials of the Department of Transport indicated that, provided there was adequate radiotelephone equipment, it was their intention to provide exemptions from the telegraph requirements up to certain limits and in certain waters if radiotelephone was carried. The industry made representations that practically all vessels of the size we were concerned with, particularly on the west coast plying in coastal waters, were now equipped with radiotelephone equipment. It was therefore suggested that although radiotelephone equipment up to now had been provided by them on a voluntary basis, instead of requiring them to come and seek exemptions for this large number of vessels we should make radiotelephone equipment mandatory, and then have a higher tonnage limit for the requirement of radiotelegraphy. That I think in essence is the nature of the amendments that were made in committee. The amendments were made after legal and other officers of the Department of Transport consulted with counsel for the shipping companies, and I think that, with the exception of the continuing insistence upon the original radiotelegraph stipulations in the bill in respect of passenger vessels, counsel for the shipping industry and all members of the committee were satisfied with the amendments made.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, I could not hear everything the parliamentary assistant said, but I gathered he went a little far in his statements concerning the use of the radiotelephone. As the bill was originally drawn it provided for the installation of wireless equipment, and extended that requirement right down to the tugs on the west coast used to tow booms of logs.

When the committee sat, representatives of the west coast tow-boat industry protested a provision under which they would have to carry on their tugs wireless operators and wireless equipment. I believe they had a just ground for complaint on that score. As the parliamentary assistant knows, in the final analysis their tugs were exempted from such provision and, instead, were placed under the provision covering ships on the great lakes and the upper St. Lawrence, in respect of which the primary requirement is the provision of the radiotelephone as distinct from the wireless.

I would not want the impression to get abroad however that the amendments to the Canada Shipping Act have eased up the requirements on passenger vessels to carry wireless operators and equipment. For some time there has been a campaign on the part of ship owners to have the wireless replaced by radiotelephone, the latter being operated by one or other of the ship's officers. There has also been a tendency on our coast to have the wireless operators carry on other work. For example, they might act as pursers or as freight checkers, or in some other capacities.

There is no doubt it was the desire of the shipping companies to reduce so far as possible the number of passenger ships on which wireless operators would have to be carried. As the act will stand when these amendments go through, the primary requirement for a passenger vessel will be the carrying of a wireless operator, and exemptions will be granted only at the discretion of the Department of Transport.

I believe that is the way the law should stand—in other words that wireless operators should be carried unless the Department of Transport sees fit to exempt any vessel, or to exempt certain trips. I hope the department will be most careful in granting such exemptions. Let the officials of the department remember that, in the final analysis, if lives are lost on either of our coasts because of a relaxing of regulations, the responsibility will rest squarely with the department.

We have heard the suggestion, for example, that it should not be necessary to carry wireless operators on passenger vessels plying between Vancouver and Victoria. Some of those ships carry as many as two thousand passengers; and while the radiotelephone may be ample protection in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, there may very well come the hundredth case when, because of there being no wireless operator on a vessel, a good many hundred lives might be lost.

Because of the international convention it is necessary for those ships to carry wireless operators between Vancouver or Victoria and Seattle. But it is suggested that, while they have to do that, perhaps the shipping companies could be freed from the obligation of carrying wireless operators between Vancouver and Victoria. I do not believe the department should make any such exemption.

There is the further suggestion that there need not be wireless operators on passenger vessels, so long as they are in the waters between Vancouver island and the mainland. It is admitted that once a ship gets beyond the northern tip of Vancouver island wireless operators should be required. The companies are suggesting however that they should not have to carry such operators between Vancouver and the northern tip of Vancouver island. Let me remind the committee that Ripple rock lies in that inside passage between Vancouver island and the mainland, and that it represents one of the greatest marine hazards on the west coast. I am afraid that some day there will be a terrible wreck because of that rock. In any event there should be no relaxation such as has been suggested. Wireless operators should be required on that trip up to the northern end of Vancouver island just as they are required in the waters lying to the north of the island.

I would point out that last summer there was a very serious wreck on our coast when the Princess Kathleen ran aground and was lost. Fortunately no lives were lost; but the vessel, the flagship of the Canadian Pacific Railway fleet, was a total loss. I understand that at the time of the accident the radiotelephone was of no use. I am told by responsible men that the radiotelephone on the Princess Kathleen was not able to do the job it was expected to do. Apparently nothing was sent out over the wireless because of orders to that effect by the captain.

Certainly the radiotelephone is a great help; but the time has not yet come when it can be relied upon exclusively and the wireless dispensed with or the wireless operator given other work to do. Let me point out again that responsibility for any undue relaxation in the terms of the Canada Shipping Act will rest with the Department of Transport, and I would hope that the department would be most careful in granting exemptions.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, I could not hear all of the explanation made by the parliamentary assistant. However, it is my understanding that certain modifications or amendments have been made in the bill as it was before it went to the committee. He said also that these changes or modifications were acceptable to the owners and I believe to the officers of the Department of Transport.

[Mr. Green.]

In that connection may I ask if representatives of the personnel on the ships appeared before the committee, and did they agree to these modifications? This matter has been discussed by the personnel and crews of ships and sailing vessels for a long long time. I have had much correspondence from and many interviews with representatives of those who sail the ships. They are the people who are concerned because they are the ones most likely to lose their lives in case of accident.

I can well understand that the owners would approach this question, not with the idea of saving lives but with the idea of saving dollars. They could very well agree with the modifications, but are those modifications acceptable to the crews who sail these vessels and who are likely to lose their lives in case of accident at sea? I think we have been most backward in enacting safety measures and certainly the time has arrived when we should make them the best possible.

I should like to refer also to the matter mentioned by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, that is that the personnel in charge of radiotelegraph and radiotelephone equipment should be full-time employees and should not be asked to carry out any other work. Unless they are full-time employees the possibility is that they may not be on hand to receive a particular message and certainly would not be there at all times to see that the equipment was kept in proper condition so that it functioned at all times.

I am apprehensive of the effects of these modifications. I imagine that all I can do at this stage is to express the hope that the Department of Transport will be most careful about granting exemptions in this matter. We have had some serious marine accidents in different parts of this country during the last few years. When regulations were proposed by the Department of Transport in an effort to prevent such accidents in the future I supported the Minister of Transport as strongly as I could. I felt that if we are going to put the onus on the minister to provide safety regulations at sea he should be supported in doing that by members of this house. I do hope that the lives of the crews on these ships and the lives of the passengers who may be involved were taken into consideration, as well as the cost of the installations.

Mr. Benidickson: Probably I should reply at this point to the hon. member for Vancouver East and assure him that while there have been some modifications of the proposed amendments in the committee, actually the bill as it comes before us from the committee is a considerable advance over the present law. There has been no relaxation in the case of passenger vessels from the intent in the bill as drafted originally. The evidence given in the committee was that most cargo vessels of over 500 tons were voluntarily carrying radiotelephone equipment. This bill makes it mandatory so that these safety measures are considerably advanced from the law as it has been up to now.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Mr. Chairman, I should like to take a few minutes to deal with one or two matters which are of great interest to those who sail the waters of the bay of Fundy. There would seem to be some difference of opinion between members on the east coast and on the west coast with regard to the value of radiotelephones. I think I can say without any fear of contradiction that on the Atlantic coast and in the bay of Fundy area the radiotelephone is considered to be one of the greatest advantages that the fishermen, the boatmen, and all those who go down to the sea in ships have ever had in so far as the protection of their ships is concerned.

To the best of my knowledge and belief there are only two steamships plying the waters of the bay of Fundy, one being the Princess Helene, which plies between Saint John and Digby and—

Mr. Benidickson: Two passenger steamships?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): —the Grand Manan III, which plies between Grand Manan and Saint John. Of necessity these ships are furnished with telegraphic equipment, but if anything should happen to one of these ships there would be only one other ship in the area which could pick up the message. If anything happened to the Grand Manan III, the only ship in the bay of Fundy that would by able to pick up the message would be the Princess Helene, and vice versa.

Mr. Benidickson: Or a large cargo vessel.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): There are no large cargo vessels in that area. I would point out that 90 per cent of the boats that ply these waters are equipped with radiotelephones. Another great advantage in the use of this type of equipment is that anyone can operate a radiotelephone whereas it takes a trained operator to operate the telegraphic equipment. For that reason I would submit that radiotelephone equipment is necessary in the bay of Fundy area. I would think that the installation of telegraphic equipment in the boats I have mentioned would be a step backward rather than a step forward. There would be much more protection afforded by the use of radiotelephones because of the greater number of boats that could pick up a message. It would take an enormous amount of the responsibility off the shoulders of those who operate these boats if they knew that they could get in touch with their home offices or with other boats.

I would suggest also that criticism with regard to the equipment on passenger boats is always justified. I feel that these boats should have every type of equipment necessary for their proper protection. I do not want to give the impression that I am opposed to that, because I believe it is right. As has been pointed out by hon. members who have spoken previously, there have been a number of marine disasters in this country in the last few years, which fact clearly indicates that perhaps we should be more severe in enforcing the regulations.

There is one other matter I should like to bring to the attention of the parliamentary assistant. There seems to be some misunderstanding between the customs officials in some of the ports in Saint John and Charlotte counties and the officials of the Department of Justice. When this bill was in committee I was given to understand that no effort would be made to force small cargo boats to comply with all these regulations. The particular type of boat I have in mind is one on which there would be a master or skipper or captain and an engineer. These men realize the dangers that may be encountered and they have made provision for their own safety.

Recently a boat from Grand Manan island, whose skipper I know very well, came into Saint John, but when the captain went to get his clearance papers to return to Grand Manan he was told by the customs that they were unable to give them to him until he had got in touch with the steamboat inspector. As I said before, I believe that there is a very definite place for steamboat inspection, but I cannot think of any argument in favour of enforcing steamboat inspection in connection with fishing craft and small cargo boats that do not carry passengers. I would ask the parliamentary assistant and the officials of the department to give this matter their serious thought.

I have received a number of letters and telegrams about this matter, and I sent the minister a copy of one particular letter. So far as the equipment on his boat is concerned, he had fire extinguishers, he had a dory, which is considered to be a lifeboat, and he had covers for the dory to keep out the winter weather. He had all the equipment that was necessary. When the inspector looked over the boat he suggested that he should have rails and wire cables for his protection. In the particular type of work that this man carries on it would be utterly impossible to have rails on the boat. It would be helpful in some cases but in the sardine industry it would be impossible to have rails and guards of the type that would satisfy the steamboat inspection service.

I ask the parliamentary assistant to go into this matter very carefully because I feel it would impose a hardship upon these men, who are finding it difficult to get along at this time. If they were forced to purchase, for their own protection, expensive equipment which they feel is not necessary, I believe it would be a step in the wrong direction. I support 100 per cent any regulation to protect the travelling public, but I really believe that fishing vessels and small cargo ships should be exempt from steamboat inspection.

Mr. Gibson: It is a pleasure to hear a seaman like the hon. member for Charlotte get up and take part in the discussion of the bill. I am also an old-time sailor. I admire the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra greatly as a lawyer and for his common sense. I also admire the hon. member for Vancouver East, whose judgment I am sure is very good in a great many matters; but I think he went a little too far this morning when he suggested that the operators of steamboats were more concerned with the saving of dollars than the saving of lives. I am sure he meant it to be a fair comment but I think he would not care to repeat it after giving the matter due consideration. I do not think it is generally known that the whole concept of safety at sea has changed completely in the last ten years, as the hon. member for Charlotte said, with the installation of radiotelephones on hundreds and hundreds of vessels plying the waters on the Pacific coast. A new era has come into being so far as safety of life at sea is concerned.

I should like to offer to the parliamentary assistant another comment which I hope will be of value to his department. I must say that these amendments to the Canada Shipping Act were brought in with very little notice to the shipping industry on the Pacific coast. As a matter of fact there was almost a panic in the industry when those engaged in it finally learned what the contents of the bill were after it had been printed. When a bill of this kind is introduced in the other place and is passed by the gentlemen there it carries with it a certain stamp of approval, and one naturally considers that a body of that kind would give such a bill very mature consideration. But we find that it went through the other place with a minimum of discussion and examination and then came to the House of Commons. As hon. members who were on the committee all know, very substantial changes had to be made in the bill because as first presented to us it was ridiculous so far as the west coast industry is concerned. In making these comments, I do not wish to cast any reflection on the Department of Transport, but I hope they will make the gentlemen in the other place feel that when legislation is presented to them for the first time they should give it very careful examination before according it their stamp of approval.

Mr. Higgins: I want to support the hon. member for Charlotte with respect to one particular phase of the bill having to do with wireless telegraphy installations on ships operated by Canadian National Railways in the Newfoundland service. As the parliamentary assistant knows, these particular ships are left out of the descriptions in section 406 of the act. One description is ships carrying fifty or more persons and travelling more than 200 nautical miles, and the second is ships carrying 250 or more persons and going on a voyage.

Mr. Benidickson: Is not my hon. friend referring to the law prior to the proposed amendment?

Mr. Higgins: The amendment merely extends this particular section.

Mr. Benidickson: The hon. member is referring to passenger vessels?

Mr. Higgins: Passenger vessels. Unless there has been a change fairly recently, the situation is that the purser on the ship operates the wireless telegraphy system. I am thinking of voyages in particular between the mainland and Newfoundland, from North Sydney to Port aux Basques. The purser on that run takes care of the passengers and he has to take care of the manifests. In doing all that work he is a very busy man, and the result is that for quite a long time he is not able to be in the wireless room while the ship is actually en route. There are two factors with respect to that situation. The purser is not only seriously overworked, but I submit there is also a danger to the ship itself and possibly a danger to other ships that may be imperilled and cannot reach this particular ship for assistance.

I understand that there is a radar system on the ship, and although I am not certain I believe it is also operated by the purser. If he is not there to oversee the radar system, it is not of very much avail. I think that is correct but my information is not of recent date. The last time I remember discussing the matter was about a year and a half ago, and the situation then was as I have described it today. If that is the case today—and I presume it is—I suggest that there should be a separate wireless operator for the ship independent of the purser, and I am not certain that that should not apply to all Canadian National ships in the Newfoundland service. It may not be required on some voyages, but there are a number of long voyages running from St. John's to Labrador in the coastal route, and the purser is an extremely busy man at times. I submit that provision should be made to include the particular type of ships now used by Canadian National in the Newfoundland service.

Mr. MacInnis: I wish to say a word or two with respect to the remarks made by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni as I believe there was some contradiction in what he said. He said that it was a fair comment but one which I perhaps would not care to repeat. I do not see why anyone would not care to repeat a fair comment, and I think my remarks were fair comment. The fact of the matter is that the hon. member for Comox-Alberni and myself have been looking at the question from different sides. He has been looking at it from the side of the employer and I have been looking at it from the point of view of the workers. There is an easy way in which it can be proved which one of us is right. The records can be searched to find out who have been advocating safety measures and who have been opposing them. I will be quite willing to let my case rest there. With respect to the reasons for opposing safety measures, I shall leave that for the hon. member for Comox-Alberni to explain.

Mr. Gibson: I do not know whether the hon. member for Vancouver East is being as fair as I thought he would be. When it comes to ships I think he will agree that it is fair comment to say that he does not know his elbow from the anchor of a ship. He has a very extensive knowledge about many things, but so far as safety of life at sea and the operation of ships are concerned he knows extremely little. He has talked about getting the comments of those who are most competent to judge this matter. If he will discuss it with his fishermen friends as I have discussed it with mine and also with his sailor friends, he will find that so far as safety of life at sea is concerned the radiotelephone has made by far the greatest contribution to the welfare of those concerned and, incidentally, to their domestic happiness. I know that has only happened in the fishing industry in recent years. I might tell him that pilots going aboard ships not equipped with radiotelephones very often take a walkie-talkie telephone aboard so that they can make full use of the radar equipment on the ships. In many cases they found it much easier to get into the harbour of Vancouver if they were allowed to talk with the operator on the bridge concerning the traffic which might be coming through. So far as the member for Vancouver East is concerned, I ask him to please give me credit for perhaps not always looking at things from an economic angle. Incidentally, I do not happen to be operating any passenger ships now myself.

Mr. MacInnis: I did not take any credit from the member for Comox-Alberni. He was the one who started the discussion reflecting upon my fairness in the matter. Now, he does not like what I said. Well, he asked for it. So far as my lack of knowledge of ships is concerned, the hon. member can come to that conclusion if he likes. As I understand it, a person does not have to sail ships to know something about them, and if it comes to that I imagine my knowledge would be just as extensive as that of the member for Comox-Alberni.

In so far as the other matters he mentioned are concerned, they have nothing at all to do with what we are discussing. I am not denying that there have been some improvements. What we disagree about is, who urged those improvements; who advocated them and who opposed them?

The Chairman: Could we not get into a study of the different clauses? There are several amendments.

Mr. Green: There is one point I should like to make. I do not think anyone is questioning the value of radiotelephone. I realize it is used very extensively on the west coast, and it will be used on passenger vessels regardless of whether or not they are required by law to use it. The point I am trying to make, and I think the member for Vancouver East is also, is that we do not want the law which requires a wireless installation and a wireless operator interfered with. We are demanding that the Department of Transport see to it that this equipment, which is designed for saving lives, should not be discarded in favour of the radiotelephone; that is as far as it goes.

For example, the ships of all nations come into these ports, and they have crews that do not speak English. While the radiotelephone may be of great value to those people whose business lies mainly in coastal waters, the wireless is certainly of great value in so far as the ships of other nations are concerned. We do not wish that precaution for the saving of life to be interfered with under the Canada Shipping Act. The way the bill is drawn now, I think it will not be interfered with, provided the Department of Transport does not start issuing exemptions indiscriminately.

On section 2—Other passenger steamships.

Mr. Benidickson: In connection with section 2, I think I should point out that there appears to be a typographical error in Votes and Proceedings of March 31, in the report of the committee, because it says that,

Clause 2 is amended by deleting subsection (5) of subclause (1) and inserting therefor the following:

This should read subsection (3) rather than (5).

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall this bill be read a third time? Shall it be read a third time now by leave?

Mr. Knowles: You do not need leave; second reading was given on a previous day.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps I do because of the amendments. It is understood that this bill had second reading some time ago, but because of the amendments I am not too sure that the hon. member is right when he says that I could have third reading today without having leave.

Mr. Knowles: We do not need to argue the point; we will give you leave.

Mr. Harris (for Mr. Chevrier) moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

INDIAN ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING LOANS, SEIZURE OF GOODS, ETC.

The house resumed, from Monday, April 13, consideration in committee of Bill No. 37, to amend the Indian Act—Mr. Harris—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

[Mr. Green.]

On section 1—Loans to Indians.

Mr. Harkness: Is the minister going to make a statement in connection with this bill?

Mr. Harris: Mr. Chairman, the amendments are quite simple and can be explained very briefly. Section 1 has to do with adding to the powers of the department the power to grant loans to Indians for the clearing of lands, an authority which the department does not have at the moment and thinks we should have in order to encourage the Indians to break up the lands and put them into production.

Section 2 has to do with adding a section number, that is 92, to the section which gives authority to seize goods which are illegally taken from the reserve. This was a typographical error on our part in not having this section mentioned in the bill which went through the house two years ago.

Section 3 has to do with another legal difficulty. I think I explained to the committee when we amended the bill two years ago that, in some cases, we had found that orders in council had not been passed by the governor in council as required according to a decision of the supreme court at that time, validating the surrender and sale of land. The amendments in the bill at that time provided for the conditions which are now in subsection (a) of section 124. At the time we overlooked the fact that there were still some sales of land which had been made some time before but which were only evidenced by agreements for sale, that is the money had not yet been fully paid, and when the letters patent would be granted eventually they would not be covered by subsection (a). Subsection (b) is, therefore, added in order to validate these sales which may take effect from time to time when the final payments are made and the letters patent granted.

Mr. Harkness: So far as any improvement in the welfare of the Indians is concerned, I think the first of these clauses is the most important. I am very glad that loans will now be available to the Indians for breaking up the land. As a matter of fact, I should like to see the department handling loans to Indians for farm purposes undertake a more vigorous program which would enable the Indians to make a better livelihood. So far as I can make out, that has not been done in the past.

I am informed that a large number of Indians have had difficulty in getting loans for the purpose of buying machinery and other things which would enable them to carry on farm operations more efficiently and thus make a better living. I would ask the minister at this time how many loans are now in effect under this particular section of the Indian Act, that is for agriculture and other allied purposes.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Chairman, I am not in a position to give that information. I had expected to do that on my estimates. I might say, however, that I discovered last year the situation which my hon. friend mentioned, namely that the revolving fund which we had voted for the purpose of making loans was not in use to the extent I had expected it to be. My recollection of the figures is that not much more than half of the amount voted was in use. I explained to the officials of the Indian affairs branch that parliament intended that money to be used if the circumstances were at all justifiable and that if the security looked to be reasonable they need not necessarily look for the last ounce of security in order to aid an Indian. Since that time there has been a liberalization of the terms on which loans are made. However, if my hon. friend would not mind, I would prefer to give the details on my estimates.

Mr. Harkness: That is agreeable, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Fulton: There is a question or two which I should like to ask the minister. While there may be some reservations with regard to some of the amendments contained in the second section of the bill, on the whole I think there is no reason not to support this legislation and, as has already been said, to ask that it be further implemented. I should like to ask the minister whether he is aware of the situation which surrounds another bill, known as Bill Z, which was introduced in the Senate, which has been read the first time, and which received its first reading about the same time as did the bill we are now considering, and was ordered for second reading in the other house. I have not been able to find any record of its having been proceeded with further. If it were passed, I think it would undo a considerable amount of what the government has been trying to do, with the support of this house, in connection with the conditions of Indians. I should like to ask the minister whether he can advise the committee whether that bill has been proceeded with or whether it is anticipated that it will be proceeded with at this session. I hope it will not be proceeded with.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Chairman, that was a private bill introduced by one of the hon. members of the other house. I would have no control over its future except in so far as I might take a position on it here.

Mr. Fulton: It has not received second reading there, has it?

Mr. Harris: No.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): In extending loans to the Indians, I wonder whether the minister would consider the encouragement of the credit union as a vehicle for carrying on this work? I notice a steady progress among the Indians in my part of the country, as a result of the great attention being paid to them by the minister and the officers of his department. In many cases we find them becoming quite self-supporting in agriculture in engaging in the cattle industry and the operation of saw mills and in the shipping of produce. There is at Pemberton in the adjoining riding a co-operative which is composed largely of Indians who grade and ship seed potatoes and do so very profitably. As I say, I know of groups of them working in the saw mill together successfully, manufacturing and delivering lumber and sharing the profit in the usual way. The way they could be encouraged would be to set up credit unions throughout the country where large sections of the population are Indian. They have a strong sense of responsibility. I think that it would be a step forward to initiate these credit unions and to encourage them to do their own banking and their own borrowing—always, of course, with the support and encouragement of the department.

Mr. Higgins: The last time I discussed Indians with the minister I think he informed me that the Indians in the province of Newfoundland were more or less being taken care of by the provincial government. I do not know whether that statement still applies or whether this act will have any application to them or not.

Mr. Harris: All we are doing with respect to the Indians of Newfoundland at the moment is to grant them welfare through the provincial government, and through the Department of National Health and Welfare certain action is being taken with respect to their health and the like. The situation is precisely as it was in each of the last three years that my hon. friend has asked me the same question.

Mr. Higgins: Will this bill apply to these Indians in Newfoundland or will it not?

Mr. Harris: My recollection is that the Indian Act, when proclaimed, was proclaimed for the whole of Canada with perhaps the exception of the mainland of Newfoundland; but I would have to check that matter in order to be sure.

Mr. Higgins: If that is so, there is only one suggestion I would make to the minister. It is that the term "fishing equipment" might not be sufficiently extensive to apply to sporting equipment such as canoes. If that is so, and if there is any doubt about it, I suggest that the words "sport fishing equipment" be used.

Mr. Fulford: Some years ago the Indians at the Caughnawaga reserve did me the great honour of initiating me into their tribe.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fulford: Mr. Chairman, others have called me an Indian, but I now have just cause to be called one. The reason I rise at this time is this. These Iroquois Indians recently travelled to the capital of the state of Vermont to plead a case before the legislators of that state, and asking for moneys which they felt were owing them for a period of well over a century and a half. They have sent other missions down there and met with the same result, namely a decision which was not favourable to their claim. The reason I rise is this. I just wanted to explain to the minister that these Indians are a decent, God-fearing, energetic and hard-working group. They are one of the finest bands in Canada. Their village needs improvement. I was through it a few months ago. If they need money for further development I trust that, under this amendment to the act, it will be possible for them to have it made available.

Mr. Harkness: As far as loans authorized are concerned, the money in the revolving fund which has been used for loans has been fairly well confined to the purchase of livestock, machinery and things of that sort. I should like to ask the minister whether, by the addition of these words "for the clearing and breaking of land within reserves", it is meant that money will be available only for Indians to buy equipment to be used for that purpose, or whether the money can be borrowed and paid out to a contractor, whether white or Indian, who is in the business of clearing land.

Mr. Harris: It is sufficiently broad, so I am informed, to cover any form that clearing and breaking land might take. If an Indian, having had certain land allotted to him, desires to have it broken up and cleared and is not in a position to do it himself, we could lend him the money equivalent to the cost of having a contractor clear it.

Mr. Harkness: In other words, I understand that he can borrow the money from the revolving fund to pay a contractor for clearing that land?

Mr. Harris: Yes.

[Mr. Harris.]

Mr. Gibson: Has the minister with him any figure which would indicate how much money is on loan for fishing equipment for Indians, or would he prefer to answer that question on his estimates?

Mr. Harris: On the estimates.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Seizure of goods.

Mr. Fulton: Will the minister tell us whether this amendment, which is indicated at the end of the clause at the bottom of the page, extends to permitting one of his officers mentioned in the section to make this search without a warrant? That is something which would be important, I think, particularly in so far as the right to make this search off the reserve is concerned. I think we need to give fairly sweeping powers to the peace officers in order to protect the Indians, but I just wonder whether we should go so far—as it seems to me this goes—as to give the right to enter and search on suspicion without a warrant off a reserve.

Mr. Harris: When the act was drafted three years ago, as my hon. friend knows, we discussed this particular section. It is clear that the superintendent and the peace officer should have all the authority which would be applicable in the case of an ordinary police officer. We also said at the time we hoped that it would not be necessary to authorize this authority off the reserve, since the ordinary police facilities would be available there, and that presumably there would be cases where the superintendent might conceivably follow a motorcar and the like, which was creating this offence, and might perhaps overtake it outside the reserve; that with these exceptions it would be expected that we would use the ordinary police facilities where they are available.

Mr. Shaw: I was going to raise the point that was raised by the hon. member for Kamloops. I am still a bit concerned about this section. It is proposed that any peace officer or a superintendent, or any person authorized by the minister, may enter, open and search any place or thing in or upon which he reasonably believes any such goods or chattels may be found. I have no objection to this authority being extended to the peace officer or the superintendent, but I am surprised that this authority should be extended to any person designated by the minister and to be exercised apparently anywhere. As far as the reservation itself is concerned, I have no objection to any officer of the department, we will say, employed upon that reservation doing whatever is necessary upon the reservation in order to protect the Indians; but when you authorize any person whom the minister may designate to go into any place off that reservation and make a search, then I for one believe we are going too far. I have enough confidence in the peace officer and the superintendent to think that they can do the job without extending that further authority under this act.

Mr. Harris: Our difficulty is that there may not be a superintendent. Superintendents go on vacation and they are ill. Sometimes they are out of office, retired and may be out some time before another is appointed in their places. This is intended to cover an instance of that kind. I have no desire and no intention of appointing anyone who is not familiar with the work that he is bound to do. It is only to cover the cases where you have not a person designated under the section but who is performing the functions of that person that you can designate another person.

Mr. Shaw: It is a fact that a peace officer is always available. The R.C.M.P. have jurisdiction on the reservation and off. It occurs to me that while the superintendent himself may be away, some person upon the reservation, some authority associated with his department, would probably have the power to carry on in place of the superintendent on this kind of thing in places off the reservation. It occurs to me there will always be an officer of the R.C.M.P. available to conduct that search off the reservation. I for one am not satisfied that the power should be given to a person designated by the minister.

Mr. Harris: Let me add one word. As my hon. friend knows, the R.C.M.P. are often called to give some evidence in court and the like, and while I admit it is probably making a rather fine point, nevertheless we do believe that there are occasions when all the officers designated here will not be available. It is only in that case that we want to designate some other person, and it would be someone familiar with our work, and presumably a person in our employment, if at all possible, who would be clothed with this rather extraordinary power, which I am sure is not used very often in any event.

Mr. Knowles: Would the minister consider meeting the point by writing in a few words? It seems to me it could be met by adding after the word "minister" in line 18 the words: "when a peace officer or superintendent is not available".

Mr. Harris: I have no objection to doing that, Mr. Chairman, if my hon. friend realizes the difficulty we are trying to overcome. We are trying to overcome the difficulty of making a seizure of goods being taken illegally from the reserve. You must have persons available to take that action as quickly as possible. Therefore he is imposing upon me the obligation, or rather upon the department, the necessity of sending a wire to the minister from some remote part advising me that neither of these persons is available, and asking me to designate another person. And presumably after that time we may or may not be able to recover the goods. I would ordinarily follow this practice, anyway. The superintendent and the R.C.M.P. are clothed with the authority under the section. I would normally make a blanket authority, and in their absence the senior clerk grade III, or whatever it may be, in the reserve, would be able to perform this function under this section in their absence. Then it would be left to him to decide at that time in their absence what he should do. But I do not think there would be time for us to take the action he mentions and get the necessary results.

Mr. Knowles: It would be in their absence, but only in their absence.

Mr. Harris: I am quite agreeable to that.

Mr. MacInnis: What kind of document would the person making the seizure have so that he could be recognized as having been authorized by the minister to act in a case of this kind? In ordinary civilian life he must have a warrant issued by a court. Would he not need something to indicate that he was authorized by the minister, so that there would be no mistake in the matter?

Mr. Harris: That was just my point. I will sign an authority which will refer to this section saying that Mr. Jones is authorized, in the absence of so and so, to perform the functions of the superintendent, and in particular to be clothed with the authority under this section, and in every other way, and that remains in the custody of the superintendent and is there available at any time when the action needs to be taken. We do that under the Immigration Act. I sign authorities for immigration officers to perform certain functions under the act, and it is an authority which is kept in the local office.

Mr. MacInnis: Would that authority cover only one case, or would it be an authority for any case?

Mr. Harris: Any case under this section.

Mr. Fulton: Is the minister able to tell us whether it has been necessary to use this authority in the reserve yet?

Mr. Harris: No, I could not, but I will deal with it on the estimates.

Mr. Shaw: Would the minister object to an amendment to that section in line 2 so that, instead of referring to a person authorized by the minister, insert "in the employ of the Indian affairs branch", or something to that effect? I fully appreciate that the minister may be able to visualize a situation where the police may not be available and so on. But that just would not happen very often. The same argument could be advanced in connection with the ordinary administration of the law. We might say, every day a case may arise when a police officer may be out of town. Some offence is committed within a town, and by virtue of the absence of the police officer at that particular moment they were not able to arrest the guilty person and security was affected. It does seem to me that under this argument the minister is bringing forth an example which is not very strong. I still feel rather strongly about this authority being granted to anyone, and I would imagine that the minister would be a bit hesitant about taking that authority on himself.

Mr. Harris: May I point out that the hon. member was a member of the committee that revised the Indian Act, and I am quite prepared to say that he, and I think perhaps the hon. member for Kamloops, passed this section with that authority in it.

Mr. Shaw: I was not a member of the committee.

Mr. Harris: I thought the hon. member was.

Mr. Fulton: It is true we passed it, but it is now being extended, and it causes me concern. It is being extended to give the right to search.

Mr. Harris: We are extending it to the right to search.

Mr. Fulton: The right to search anybody's premises even off the reserve on the mere suspicion that there may be something there which has been stolen from the reserve, or even only used in the process of stealing from the reserve. It is not the answer to say that because we gave you authority in one place therefore we should be agreeable to the extension of the authority. It will make us more reluctant in future to give initial authority, if you follow that argument.

Mr. Harris: I follow that argument, but I think my hon. friend should realize that with the power to seize goods which are being used for illegal purposes must go the power to search, and it was through oversight in 1951 that we did not have that power in this section. I am bringing it forward for that purpose.

The arguments which have been used against the use of the words "or a person authorized by the minister" are arguments which were contemplated at the time. I believe if I went over the ground I could find cases in remote areas which would meet my hon. friend's point, when neither police nor superintendent is available, and when we want to have the power.

I think he will realize the minister does not want to give this extraordinary power to anyone who would be likely to discharge it in a manner which would bring about complaints concerning the work of the Indian affairs branch. However, he ought to realize that under the Indian Act, when one is dealing with Indians, and persons who come under the act, he must have all the powers which normally are attributable to police action.

Mr. Shaw: Had the last three lines been in that section two years ago I would not have supported it. I do not want to hold up the bill, but I must say that I do not like the section in the form in which it exists.

RADIO ACT

AMENDMENTS TO DEFINITIONS, REMOVING LICENCE FEE, ETC.

Hon. W. E. Harris (for the Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. 337, to amend the Radio Act, 1938.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I should make a few remarks on second reading of the bill. The main purpose of course is to implement government policy as announced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) in his budget speech with respect to the elimination of the licence fee for private radio receiving stations.

The Minister of Finance stated that the order in council setting the present licence fee of $2.50 would be revoked, effective from April 1. The Radio Act, under which this licence has been levied in the past, requires that all private receiving sets used for the reception of broadcasting must be licensed. So that if the licence fee is abolished it follows that there is need for an amending act.

Where radio receiving equipment is operated for commercial gain, such as commercial subscription radio receiving systems where sound or television programs are received by a centralized apparatus and retransmitted to different receiving sets on a charge basis, it is considered that the operation of this type of station should be controlled and licensed. Provision therefore is made in the bill for licensing broadcasting receiving stations operated commercially for gain, with the licence fee to be fixed by the governor in council.

Provision is also made in the bill for the transfer to the Radio Act of a section that for some time has been in the Canadian Broadcasting Act, and was section 23 of that act. This section authorized the governor in council to make regulations prohibiting or regulating the use of any machinery, apparatus or equipment causing or liable to cause interference with radio reception. The house will recall that in 1951 section 23 of the Canadian Broadcasting Act containing these provisions was repealed, as it was recognized that the proper place for this provision was in the Radio Act.

However, it was provided that the repeal of the section would not come into force until proclaimed; and it has not been proclaimed until now because, until this time, it was not possible to transfer it to the Radio Act. Thus the amendment to the Radio Act covering the transfer of section 23. The scope of the section has been enlarged slightly to cover the sale as well as the use of any machinery, apparatus or equipment causing or liable to cause interference with radio reception.

There are regulations now in force which were made in 1941, under section 23 of the Canadian Broadcasting Act, for the purpose of controlling radio interference, and these regulations will be continued in force under the Radio Act.

The other amendments in the bill delete the references to private receiving stations where these references are no longer required in the act, by reason of the elimination of the licence fee for private receiving stations.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, this bill seems to be one which merits support, particularly that part of it which does away with the necessity for the payment of a radio licence fee by all those people in the country who have radio sets.

As the parliamentary assistant knows, the Progressive Conservative party for many years has been advocating that this licence fee should be abolished, and we are glad to see that at long last our advice has been followed and that the licence fee is to be done away with.

The other day some questions were asked about the men who had been collecting these licence fees. When we get into committee I shall ask the parliamentary assistant to tell us what steps have been taken to see that these men are continued in the government service. Many of them are veterans, and I would hope it might be possible to give them other work. They have been carrying out a pretty thankless job. Many of them have been doing it for a long time, and we believe they deserve every consideration from the country. I would ask the minister to clarify that point when we get into committee, upon which occasion it will be possible to discuss the sections of the bill.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we, too, welcome the introduction of this bill, which is a corollary to certain changes made in other legislation following the introduction of the budget. As has been pointed out, its main purpose is to abolish the necessity for imposing a licence fee on private radio receiving sets. I think we all grinned a bit when the parliamentary assistant said that the purpose of the bill was to implement government policy by abolishing the radio licence fee. He would have been more correct had he said that this bill implements the policy of opposition parties in the house. After all, for many years it has been government policy to collect this licence fee or tax.

However, we are glad to know, and I am sure people throughout the country are glad to know that at long last the request by many people that this nuisance tax be abolished has been met by the government. The other changes set out in the bill would seem to be appropriate, and therefore we are pleased to support second reading.

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, we on this side of the house also welcome this legislation. That is the reason we brought it in.

Mr. Knowles: Just before an election.

Mr. Cruickshank: Most of the good legislation is brought in from this side. There is a question I should like to ask, but possibly I will have to wait until we get into committee. I am getting some advice from the rear here on dredging. But I do want to make it clear that we on this side of the house welcome this legislation. After mature thought by myself, representing the group around here, I advised the minister in this connection.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Commercial broadcasting receiving station.

Mr. Green: Can the parliamentary assistant tell us what the fees are to be for these broadcasting stations?

Mr. Benidickson: That has not yet been determined. It would be within the powers of the governor in council to establish the fee. I would point out that one important reason for including this particular type of commercial broadcasting receiving station is to ensure that there will be continuing authority in connection with the erection of masts and that sort of thing which might interfere with aviation.

These centralized systems redistribute by wire lines programs that they receive and generally their antennae occupy high ground. It was felt that when we eliminated the phrase "private receiving station" we should clarify the legislation with regard to the type of receiving station that is developing both in connection with television and sound broadcasts. There is thus a possibility that you might have a private receiving station set up for gain. We have seen this type of thing in airport terminals and other public places where there are two companion screens, one showing a current television program while the other showed advertising. That is a type of centralized commercial broadcasting receiving station that might develop.

Some years ago reference was made in the act to commercial receiving stations. That was put in at a time when it was felt that receiving stations might be set up in theatres for entertainment purposes. That did not develop because the individual programs were too short and the program changes were so frequent that an audience could not be held. But there are other types of receiving station being developed now for gain and the fee itself will be determined by cabinet authority.

Mr. Green: Are there any receiving stations under licence at the present time?

Mr. Benidickson: Yes, they are licensed but because they are considered to be private receiving stations we want to make it clear that those that were on a commercial basis and were being operated for gain would be under control. It was necessary that that be particularly so with regard to antennae and things of that sort.

[Mr. Cruickshank.]

Mr. Green: Can the parliamentary assistant answer my question regarding the employees who have been collecting the licence fees?

Mr. Benidickson: A return was made on March 30 in answer to a question asked by the hon. member for Moose Jaw. In the outside offices away from Ottawa there have been 30 or so employees who were not only doing licence work but more or less were acting in a general stenographic or clerical capacity. They assisted the personnel who were responsible for the supervision of the licences and for checking radio equipment as to quality and general interference. Those people were paid out of the grant for the licence division. Most of them will be retained by the department because of the other work that they were doing. The personnel that they were assisting will have more time in the field to look after interference and the supervision of radio equipment generally. Someone must be on hand in the outside offices.

The department itself has vacancies from time to time, and vacancies occur in other departments of government. Many of the people engaged in the licence division were experts on the operation of calculating machines and they can be employed by other departments. It was not the particular work that they did, but the fact that they can operate these machines, that will make them readily placeable. Some of them are competent stenographers and there is a continuing need for this type of employee in other departments as well as our own.

It may not be possible to place the few female married personnel, but their number is quite small. In so far as the majority are concerned, a few will be required for the next sixty or ninety days to continue the mopping-up of the licence work and the getting back from the numerous issuers of the money they have collected. There will be a few vacancies in our department from routine staff turnover and if we did not employ these people we would have to employ new employees. The civil service commission is co-operating to the utmost and where vacancies occur in other departments they are attempting to absorb these people of the transport department.

Mr. Green: What about the men who have been going around actually collecting the licence fees?

Mr. Benidickson: They were on a commission basis for the most part and the necessity of keeping them is eliminated by the elimination of the fee.

Mr. Green: Could they not be placed in other work?

Mr. Benidickson: It was part-time, casual employment.

Mr. Cruickshank: Would it be possible to use some of these officials to check the programs. At 6.45 p.m. on Saturday there was a program on CFRA entitled "Hook, Line and Sinker." Would it be possible to have a check made on that?

Section agreed to.

Sections 2, 3 and 4 agreed to.

On section 5—Search warrant.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): This reads:

> Where a magistrate or justice of the peace is satisfied by information on oath that there is reasonable ground for believing that a radio station has been established without a licence . . . he may grant a search warrant—

Is there not some central registry which would indicate whether or not a man had a licence?

Mr. Benidickson: The purpose of this amendment is simply to eliminate the search warrant rights that have existed hitherto in respect to the place wherein it was suspected there was an unlicenced private receiving set. Supposing a man did not have an aerial and had not bought a licence, in the past this provision enabled an inspector to be given a search warrant to enter the premises. In so far as radio apparatus other than a private receiving set is concerned, there is no change in the law. Suppose a person were illegally keeping hidden in his premises an apparatus that might enable him to even carry on some subversive type of radio broadcasting; we might not see the exposed type of antenna. That is why the right to obtain a search warrant is taken there. There is no change in the section other than to eliminate the right of a search warrant with respect to searching out a private receiving station.

EMERGENCY POWERS ACT

ORDER IN COUNCIL WITH RESPECT TO CONTROL OF TRADE BY SEA WITH MAINLAND CHINA AND NORTH KOREA

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, may I have permission to revert to motions and to table two copies in English and in French of P.C. 1953-604, an order in council passed on Friday, April 17, under the provisions of the Emergency Powers Act with respect to the control of trade by sea with mainland China and North Korea. This order provides that no ship registered in Canada shall, after the 20th day of April, 1953, proceed to the mainland of China and North Korea without a licence. This order is being passed pursuant to discussions which took place between the British and the Americans in Washington following the visit here of the Right Hon. Mr. Eden, and after those discussions the hope was expressed that we in Canada would pass a similar order in council.

Mr. Green: May I ask the minister whether the United Kingdom and the United States have adopted similar measures?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, both countries have.

Mr. Green: Is this order identical with the provisions made by the British and the Americans?

Mr. Chevrier: I can say that it is identical with the British order because I have seen it, but I have not seen the American, although I am told that it was the hope of both the American and British governments that this be done.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): May I ask the minister what effect, if any, this will have on the much discussed ships of the Ming Sung line?

Mr. Chevrier: The Ming Sung position is not altered by this order in council. Under the present arrangement, if my recollection serves me, the Ming Sung ships are still ships registered in Canada and subject to a mortgage, and we hope that it will be possible to collect the balance of the mortgage at some future time.

Mr. Green: Have the Ming Sung ships still the right to fly the Canadian flag?

Mr. Chevrier: No. My hon. friend will remember that that exemption has been withdrawn, and that was stated in the house. What is being done is another story. I am not in a position to say what is happening, but I do know that the exemption has been withdrawn and that the ships are still registered as Canadian ships, so that we may be able at some future time to collect the mortgage.

CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP ACT

DEFINITION OF CANADIAN DOMICILE, CITIZENSHIP CERTIFICATE, ETC.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) moved the second reading of Bill No. 190, to amend the Canadian Citizenship Act.

Mr. Fulton: May I ask the minister if he will not make a statement at this stage? There was quite a discussion in the other place, and I understand that the bill was amended in some particulars there. I think it would be helpful if the minister would be kind enough to make a statement with Your Honour in the chair as to the nature and intent of the bill and as to the effect of the amendments. Then we can consider the details later.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, I have no prepared statement as to the purposes of the bill other than the general one that it amends the citizenship act in a number of instances. With respect to the discussion in the other place, my recollection is that there was an attempt to amend the bill in one particular which failed in committee and was not then pursued in the other proceedings of the other place. With respect to that particular point, I can assure my hon. friend that I propose to have the relevant section stand for the course of the next hour and a half, and it is possible that we may suggest some alternative when it is reached. Therefore my hon. friend can be assured on that score that further consideration will be given.

Generally speaking, the amendments to the act extend to persons not now covered by the citizenship act the right to be Canadian citizens. Furthermore, in the case of persons who lost that citizenship on the first of January, 1947, by reason of being naturalized Canadian citizens who were living abroad for a period of six years and who had not registered and thereby retained their right of citizenship, we have extended that period of six years for another four years, so that they may continue to have the opportunity of registering and retaining their citizenship in that way.

There are other provisions consequent upon the Immigration Act, which I hope is going to be proclaimed soon, so that the definition of domicile will be in conformity with that act. There are other provisions extending the authority of the governor in council to name persons and courts who may do the work of citizenship under the act. I think I can show that is necessary in order to make it more convenient for persons to become Canadian citizens than is the case at the moment. Generally, the amendments are as the result of five years' experience, and I think they are more liberal than anything we have had up to the present time. While it is the desire of the government that citizenship should not be taken lightly nor obtained lightly, nevertheless the experience we have had indicates that the act when first passed did not contemplate all the possible combinations of circumstances that existed under the old naturalization act, and as time goes on we desire to clear these up so that persons who have the right to be Canadians will have the legal right under the act and not by administrative process.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Canadian domicile.

Some hon. Members: One o'clock.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Cruickshank: I should like to direct a question to the minister, and perhaps I could do so best by explaining the circumstances under which the question arises. While one of my constituents was in the armed forces overseas he became engaged to a German girl who was in England. She came to Canada, and they were married. Unfortunately, before they had lived together in Canada for one year he was killed. It appears now that she cannot apply for citizenship papers owing to the fact that he was killed prior to their residence in Canada together for one year. Her father-in-law wants to take the girl to the coronation, and it seems unfortunate that she is unable to apply for citizenship. Is there any amendment or permissive legislation to cover such a case?

Mr. Harris: My recollection of the citizenship act is that, under those circumstances, there is a reference to a wife of a Canadian citizen. The wording is as follows, "who is a wife and has resided in Canada with a Canadian citizen". There is no provision for widows as such, and apparently the word "wife" does not include a widow under those circumstances. It is regretted that in this particular case there is no discretion in the minister to grant citizenship. But if the hon. member is concerned about the possibility of the young lady's being able to go abroad and return, we could give a letter of identification which would assure sufficient in the way of travel documents to go abroad and return without any difficulty.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Persons born before January 1, 1947.

Mr. Fulton: This is quite a lengthy and complicated section. Indeed, the whole act is quite complicated, and the amendments seem to be quite technical. I am particularly concerned about subsection 2 of what will be section 4 in the act. It seems to me that under paragraph (b) there is room for the possibility of abuse. It seems to me that it makes it possible for a person who has lived outside of Canada for any length of time you may care to mention, say 10 years or more, without any intention of retaining his Canadian citizenship, suddenly finding that for some reason or other it was advantageous for him to do so, to try to get it back. He then files a declaration of retention and gets a certificate of Canadian citizenship, even although he may, in the meantime, have abandoned his intention of retaining Canadian citizenship.

I think there should be something in that section requiring a person, under those circumstances, to make some affirmative proof that he had never abandoned the intention of retaining Canadian citizenship. Otherwise, it seems to me it would open up the possibility that he may, after 10 or 15 years abroad without having the actual intention of retaining Canadian citizenship, find it advantageous, for some real or fancied reason, to file his application, and he may in fact get back his Canadian citizenship.

Mr. Harris: I quite agree that we ought to take precautions against any person under those circumstances, but I think the hon. member has not quite appreciated the class of person to which this subsection applies. This only applies to the person who is born abroad of Canadian parents and who, by all citizenship acts, has the right to elect which nationality he may have when he reaches 21. This amendment alters the existing law only to the extent that, instead of forcing him to make the election within one year after reaching 21, he would have three years. In a number of cases we have had some difficulty with people who say, "We did not know that was the law." We have to realize that the act is still only six years old and a good many people, including Canadians born abroad of Canadian parents, are still finding out their rights. We ought to be a little generous towards them. There is no possibility that anyone could wait for a period longer than three years after his 21st birthday to exercise this right.

Mr. Fulton: But it does apply to people who may have been born and lived abroad for 21 years up to January 1, 1954. Really, perhaps my question comes down to this. Does such a person have to give any positive proof or any affirmative proof that he never intended to give up Canadian citizenship? Supposing he became 21 years old last January, he would have until January, 1954, to file his declaration. Is it sufficient for him just to file a declaration or does he have to give any proof of his intention to retain Canadian citizenship?

Mr. Harris: In the declaration, Mr. Chairman, we require him to state a number of facts, including the statement that he has not chosen any other nationality. In other words, he has to affirm that he has not applied for papers in the country in which he is resident or taken any similar step.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I understand the time has been extended from one year to three years?

Mr. Harris: Right.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): It might be argued that this, after all, is quite a privilege. It might be argued that if a man did not take it up for three years it would be evidence that he was not very keen about it. Presumably there is another side to the story which I have not thought of, and perhaps the minister would say a word about it.

Mr. Harris: The reason for the extension is the one I gave a moment ago. In the past, a great many people, after the one year, have written in wanting to elect. They have no right of election. These are persons who, apparently, did not know they had this privilege under the Canadian Citizenship Act or that there was a limitation of one year. For the time being at least, until there is greater knowledge of the act and greater acceptance of it, we think we ought to be as generous as we can, although this limit might be reduced at some future time when we have had more experience with it.

Mr. Herridge: I understand that there were quite a number of people who were formerly residents in Canada, or who were Canadian citizens, who left Canada just prior to the war and served in the armed forces of a country at war with Canada during the second world war. I am informed also that quite a number of these people are now making application to become Canadian citizens. What is the minister's attitude to those applications?

Mr. Harris: I do not quite understand the hon. member when he says they are now making application for Canadian citizenship. If they had citizenship in the first place, it is not necessary for them to apply now.

Mr. Herridge: Maybe I should say "make application to re-enter Canada".

Mr. Harris: That comes under the Immigration Act and I would be prepared to discuss that matter on the estimates on immigration.

Mr. Green: I should like to ask the minister one question on section 1. The new paragraph (mm), which is the definition of "Place of domicile", is a little bit different from the present definition in that it substitutes the word "or" for the word "and" in the second line. I am wondering whether that is a mistake. The paragraph reads:

"place of domicile" means the place in which a person has his home or in which he resides or to which he returns . . .

In the present definition the language is: "and to which he returns". It seems to me that by using the word "or" there instead of the word "and", the result is that the place of domicile would be the same as the place of residence. Surely that is not the intention. In other words, the clause "or to which he returns" would stand by itself. Was it the intention that that should be so?

Mr. Harris: No, Mr. Chairman. It is not the intention to allow him to claim one of those privileges. The definition is all-inclusive and he must conform to all of them. As to this particular definition, if my hon. friend will permit me to say so, it should be borne in mind that this does not confer domicile, and this definition will come in use in another amendment later, to indicate in some cases the right of persons of British origin who have lived in this country for a period of 20 years but, because they came and went, never did acquire domicile at one time. We are saying later on that if they have lived here for 20 years, and if they had their place of domicile here, the minister could grant a certificate under certain conditions. This definition is additional to Canadian domicile which they must acquire under the Canadian Immigration Act in all cases except the one I mentioned.

Mr. Green: The minister will notice that there has been a change to the word "or" from the word "and".

Mr. Harris: Yes.

Mr. Green: I am wondering whether that is intentional.

Mr. Harris: I shall have to look at it. I noticed the difference.

Mr. Higgins: May I read to the minister section 43 of the terms of union between Newfoundland and Canada and ask him to comment. Section 43 reads as follows:

Suitable provision will be made for the extension of the Canadian citizenship laws to the province of Newfoundland.

What does the minister say about this section?

Mr. Harris: In this bill there is no amendment dealing with the subject of Newfoundland citizens prior to the enactment of the terms of union. I have only this to say. I have known one or two cases where it would seem that the act was not sufficiently clear to cover them. It is my hope that in the next session we shall have a general revision of this act in the light of six years' experience and that if there are any cases that require attention we shall give it to them.

Mr. Higgins: It may be that we are not really citizens of Canada at all now.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Chairman, I want to assure the hon. member that every single one is; and I do not think he would mind my saying that he is a distinguished Canadian citizen.

Mr. Higgins: The minister thinks we will be able to vote, does he?

Section agreed to.

Section 3 agreed to.

On section 4—Resumption with approval of minister.

Mr. Fulton: On this section may I ask the minister what is the purpose of the provision, whether it has been widely used, and in what sort of circumstances it would be necessary to use this discretion to authorize a person to resume Canadian citizenship?

Mr. Harris: There may be others, but the circumstances we contemplate are in the case of naturalized Canadian citizens who go abroad and who because of other circumstances over which they have no control—such as living in areas where they may be under restraint—will not be able to exercise their rights to notify consular offices and others of their desire to retain Canadian citizenship within the six, at the moment, but the about-to-be ten-year period; but at some future time they may become free to do so and they would then apply for resumption of Canadian citizenship. At that time it is thought desirable that the minister should be free to grant them the resumption of citizenship as of some date which could be ascertained, which would restore to them the rights which, if they can prove it, they never abandoned, although we did not know that they had that desire.

Mr. Fulton: The act has not been in force for very long by comparison with the life of nations but this amendment in clause 4 amending section 6 of the act it appears to me is giving the minister a wider discretion than he had under the original section 6. Have cases arisen in which the absence of that discretion has worked a hardship?

Mr. Harris: No particular case has arisen but we believe some may, and we have been so advised by some of the members of the interdepartmental committee who are dealing with the subject.

Section agreed to.

Section 5 agreed to.

On section 6.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, with respect to section 6 there is a point which I should like to take up with the minister. I gather that this is one of the sections he had in mind when, in the course of his remarks on second reading, he said that one of the purposes of this legislation was to provide greater facility to people desiring to become Canadian citizens.

I notice that this clause seems to give effect to that idea in that it widens the ways in which a person can file a declaration of intention under section 10, subsection 1, of the citizenship act. In this connection, Mr. Chairman, I may say that I have had correspondence with the clerk of the peace in one of the county courts of the minister's province, and that he feels that an error is possible in the change that is being made. At any rate, I wish to bring to the minister's attention what this gentleman complains about, in the hope that the minister will see fit to find some way in which to deal with it.

The person to whom I refer informs me that in the past the general practice has been for these declarations of intention to be filed with the clerk of the court. That clerk is usually a barrister with many years of experience, and he is well versed in the provisions of the citizenship act. On that basis he understands who should file a declaration of intention and who should not. My correspondent also draws to my attention the fact that the clerk of a court is an officer of the crown and therefore responsible to his attorney general for the conduct of his office. Therefore, if such a clerk makes a mistake and files a form that should not have been filed, the applicant gets his fee paid back. That takes place, so I am told, without any fuss or bother.

But I have in my hand a declaration of intention which a gentleman in this country sought to file in this particular court and which he had had made out for him by someone else. I gather that that someone else was a lawyer. Certainly he was a notary public, a commissioner or a justice of the peace. When this gentleman seeking Canadian citizenship sought to file this document which he had had made out elsewhere, the clerk of the peace in this particular court immediately recognized that it was not necessary for this gentleman to file this document because he is the spouse of a Canadian citizen. As the minister knows, such a person is exempt from the necessity of filing such an intention under the terms of section 10 (1) (a). The rest of the story as it is given to me is that this gentleman had to pay $10 to have this form filled out. I assume that was the fee of one of those friends of mine who are called lawyers. There is no way for this gentleman to get his money back. The form was filled out quite unnecessarily, and yet, as I say, this applicant for citizenship is out that $10. The gentleman who has written me about the matter feels that although the intention of the minister may be good in that he wants to make it easier for people to apply for citizenship and to declare their intention to do so, yet he may in fact be opening the door to the possibility of many people having to pay fees of this kind.

One does not expect every lawyer in the country to know the details of every act that is on the statute book; that would be utterly impossible; but it does seem to me that perhaps there was some merit in the previous arrangement whereby the people who took these declarations of intention, although they may be limited in number, were familiar with the terms of the legislation.

There is more that I could say about it, but I think I have made the point, and I wonder whether the minister would comment on it.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): If the minister would permit me, I have a letter which is as like as two peas to the one that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has just read, and therefore I should like to associate myself with him. Perhaps there are one or two points that are similar but said here somewhat more emphatically. In speaking of the amendment he says this:

> This procedure has worked out most satisfactorily and there are no valid objections to the present practice. The clerks of the court are in the vast majority of cases barristers-at-law with considerable experience and who are capable of construing this statute.

That is certainly a man who has had some experience. Then he says something which is very similar to what my hon. friend has indicated. He points to the position of the clerks of the court who are mostly lawyers, and then he says that this wide opening, broadening, which is done here is such that anybody can do it, and he thinks it will have two bad effects. First of all, people will go to those who are not familiar with the law and who may lead them astray, and second, they will go to those who very naturally and properly will charge them. In one case here there is an amount charged for a declaration which I think the minister would agree is very high.

I come back to this. That seems to me a prima facie reason. If it does turn out that the present practice is not offering these facilities, that is another matter.

Mr. Harris: I think I understand the viewpoint expressed in the letters that my hon. friends have received, but I think probably the writers assumed from this amendment that we were going to withdraw from the clerks of the courts the privilege of accepting these declarations.

Mr. Knowles: No; he thinks you are going to extend it to—

Mr. Harris: I will explain the extension in a moment. We have had many instances where people have written in to say that it seems unfortunate that one has to go hundreds of miles at least three times for the purpose of becoming a Canadian citizen. They must appear before the clerk of the court to file their declaration; they must appear before him to file a petition; and then they must appear later on to take the oath of allegiance. I think all members would agree that Canadian citizenship should not be something that, as I said this morning, would be available lightly. Nevertheless, there does seem to be an inconvenience. In the particular case I have in mind I think it was 180 miles that the person concerned had to go three times over a 15-month period in order to obtain his Canadian citizenship; whereas had we had someone available locally to take the initial step of the declaration he could at least have avoided one of these trips.

In addition to that, our liaison officers who are dealing with ethnic groups all the time have on more than one occasion been asked if they could not fill out the declaration of intention and mail it here to the registrar of citizenship. There are occasions when it would be convenient and desirable that they should be able to do so. In addition to that we will get this declaration mailed to us anyway at the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. The point that my hon. friend wants to make is this: These declarations are on file in the office of the clerk and they are available there for the subsequent filling in of the petitions, and therefore the information is available, and so on. Actually what happens is that two copies of this form of declaration are made. One is sent immediately here to the citizenship registration branch; the other is posted up in the office of the clerk for I think it is three months, after which time it comes forward to us in any event. While I agree that the clerks over the years are acquiring experience and certainly can fill in forms better than others apparently do, I do not suggest that we could not overcome the weaknesses of persons to fill in these applications and send them to us. For the reason that there are instances where in our opinion it would be desirable to have these declarations taken locally, we think we should have the right to appoint, not as I think my hon. friend said, anyone, but a person who would be duly authorized and instructed and responsible to the minister.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That leads me to ask the minister this question. How far are the regulations determined on, and may not one of the points made in this letter be a good one, namely, an extension of the appointment or an extension of the people who are qualified to take it but who might take it without being in a position to receive fees. I should like to read this:

> At the present time the applicant has the protection of the court, and the courts are headed by the attorney general of the province who can use disciplinary action as he may see fit to these clerks who take advantage of their position. There will be no such supervision over these agents—

He means the new agents to be appointed. I continue——and they can do as they please.

The Chairman: Will the hon. member disclose the source of the letter?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): No. I assure the chairman he is a responsible person and I prefer not to mention the writer's name, unless he wants to mention it himself.

The Chairman: I am not going to insist, but as the hon. member knows, if anyone reads a letter he must quote the source; otherwise it becomes an imaginary letter.

Mr. Fulton: As has been said here many times, I am quite sure Your Honour will find the hon. member is free to read the letter if he takes responsibility for the statements which are contained in it. He does not have to give the source or name the person who wrote it if he takes responsibility for what is in it.

Mr. Graydon: That is right.

The Chairman: The hon. member has quoted a letter. I can recall instances which took place, and one in particular, in which the leader of the C.C.F. party was involved. It happened about two and a half years ago.

Mr. Fulton: That is quite right.

The Chairman: At that time it was decided that no document should be quoted unless the member quoting it was prepared to divulge the signature.

Some hon. Members: Oh, no.

The Chairman: Oh, yes, the source. I do not have the reference at my fingertips; but if a letter is quoted and the source is not revealed then it is similar to an imaginary letter.

Mr. Graydon: It cannot be imaginary if the hon. member takes the responsibility.

The Chairman: But that is similar to an imaginary letter, if the source is not revealed. That is the position.

Mr. Harris: Perhaps I could comment on my hon. friend's recitation. The attorney general of a province is the superior officer of the clerk of a court, but I think my hon. friend should remember that any corrections that are made with respect to the work carried on under the Citizenship Act are made by our citizenship branch here. As I said before, one copy of these declarations is sent to the citizenship registration branch. If there are weaknesses in the way it is filled in or if there is other information required, correspondence then takes place between the citizenship registration branch and the clerk of the court.

The only thing in which the attorney general of a province is interested is the fees ultimately collected for this work. I do not say that in any disrespectful sense. But we do supervise the work of the clerks under those circumstances. I hope hon. members do not think we are going to withdraw this from the clerk of the court. We are only going to make it easier in places where clerks are not available readily, so that someone else may take declarations, or so the person affected may send such declarations by mail to us here.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Why would it not be feasible to make a definite extension so as not to leave it wide open? For example, could not the provision be made whereby a justice of the peace could do this work, where there is no clerk of the court? Could not a definite extension be made without leaving it wide open? That would meet the point which the imaginary writer of the letter makes. It would give the protection he feels is necessary. He gives some substantial instances of fees charged which in my opinion were unfortunate, to put it mildly. And it does seem to me that, without expense, such procedure might be possible. Is that not practicable? If so, could not the minister entertain that idea?

Mr. Harris: No, it is not practicable, because we do not know at this moment what particular person in a remote northern community in Canada we would like to designate. It could be the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and it could be someone else.

I think I now understand some of the concern of my hon. friend with respect to these exorbitant charges. I did not understand he was making a point about them before. We have had these difficulties for some time. We are aware of the fact that charges are made by people for this particular service. There is no reason why they should not charge for the filling in of this document, because it takes time to do it. Any professional man is entitled to charge for his service.

There is no restraint upon lawyers, except by way of county tariffs, and the like. However, I have not heard of any exorbitant charges having been made. I have heard it said that instances have occurred but, so far, I have had no written complaints to that effect. In a case where they fill in a declaration of intention and do not need to, I agree some redress might be proposed. But clerks of courts do not protect the public with respect to that, any more than we do. We get these complaints and we have correspondence about them. And the unfortunate person who applies and finds he has made a mistake learns quickly from us about it, through the citizenship registration branch.

I am not going to multiply the difficulties we have with Canadian citizens by appointing someone who is unqualified to do the work. Rather, I would hope to aid by appointing someone who would be qualified and who would do the work where it is not now being done, and without great inconvenience.

Mr. Knowles: If the minister is not prepared to meet the point the hon. member for Greenwood and I have presented to him in the way suggested, let me offer as an alternative one or two other suggestions. I feel—and in this I agree with my correspondent—that a wrong has been done to the man who filled out this declaration of intention. There is nothing imaginary about it at all. I could give the name, but there would be no point in doing so. I am prepared to show it to the minister. The picture of the applicant appears on it. One of the lines filled in reads as follows:

My wife's citizenship is Canadian.

The lawyer who typed out this form typed in the word "Canadian" as applying to the spouse of the applicant. It would take about half a minute or less, by reading section 10 (1) (a) of the citizenship act, to discover that this applicant was not required to fill in such a form because he was the spouse of a Canadian. Yet he paid $10 to a lawyer for filling in that form, which did not need to be filled in at all.

Often I indulge in these sideswipes at my hon. friends who are lawyers, and I think I am justified in this case. The point that should be pointed out is that although lawyers frequently do things for nothing they sometimes charge fees they should not charge. In this instance I am amazed that $10 was charged. I showed this form to an hon. friend who sits near me, a member who is a lawyer, and he was amazed that such a charge was made. He seemed to think that $5 would have been plenty, and in some cases $1 would have been enough. And the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings says that, being in politics, he would not charge anything.

I am going to make two suggestions, the first of which is that there should be printed on the form, in type that any lawyer can read, a statement to the effect, using the wording of the act, that if an applicant is the spouse of a Canadian citizen, or a British subject, or comes under any other exemption indicated in the act, the filling in of the form is not required. My other suggestion is that there might be some limit imposed as to the fee to be charged for filling in the form. If the minister is not prepared to accept the other suggestions surely he should consider these.

Mr. Harris: Perhaps I misunderstood my hon. friend. If he is complaining about the charge made for the service rendered in this case, he is not arguing against the present system. Under this section we are talking about the filing and filling in of these documents. Anyone can fill in a declaration of intention. The point is: Where do you file it? The amendment makes provision for the filing of them in our citizenship office, in addition to filing with clerks of courts, and other persons whom we may designate.

There are hundreds of declarations of intention filled in by lawyers and other people which find their way to clerks of courts. We have no control over what a professional man might charge for the service here. We have control only over the fee charged by the clerk for filing. That happens to be a fee of $1. So far as I know they charge more than that, under some arrangement through their provincial act. So, as I say, we have no way of imposing a tariff of fees upon those who fill them in. That is entirely up to the applicant, when he decides whom he will hire to do his work. I should add that we are going to revise the fees for filing later on; but that is another matter. If my hon. friend thinks we should print on the form the various requirements in a manner which would be obvious to anyone reading that form, we would give consideration to his suggestion.

I do not know whether the person to whom he referred was one who spoke English, or whether it might be someone from whom the lawyer would take a long time to get the facts. It may be that an hour would be spent in extracting the information. I have had lawyers write to me to say that it does take a long time. I would not want to prejudge these particular charges.

Mr. Knowles: I offer my apology for laughing a bit while the minister was speaking, but I was not laughing at him. An anonymous member sent me a note which reads, "What makes them think lawyers can read?" I think we have it clear that what the minister and I are discussing at the moment is not the filing of this declaration but the actual business of filling it in. My point is that the lawyer to whom this gentleman went should have known that it was not necessary for him to file this form, particularly when he had to indicate one of the factors that made that unnecessary. In this case it should not have been filled out at all. I am glad the minister will consider the possibility of having printed on this form in clear type that lawyers can read something to indicate that under certain conditions the filling of the form is entirely unnecessary.

Mr. Harris: I should like to ask permission of the house to withdraw subsection 2 of this section.

Mr. Fulton: Would that leave the law as it now stands? That is to say, that they must have an adequate knowledge of English or French and it would be left entirely to the judge to decide whether they have that knowledge despite the fact that they have been here for twenty years?

Mr. Harris: The question of whether they had been here twenty years would be the relevant question and citizenship could be obtained in that case in lieu of having knowledge of one or other of the languages.

Mr. Winters: I move that subsection 2 of section 6 be deleted and that subsections 3, 4 and 5 be renumbered.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. McLure: I should like to ask what would be the status of a Canadian girl who married a British naval seaman during the last war. After his discharge from the service they went to England to live but after some ten years they are desirous of coming back to Canada with their family. What would be the status of that man and woman and their children, the children having been born in London, England?

Mr. Harris: I take it that the marriage was during the war years?

Mr. McLure: Yes.

Mr. Harris: I would have to look it up. There was a change in status in 1941 or 1942. I think the answer will probably be that she is a Canadian citizen, but that he and the children are British subjects.

Sections 7 and 8 agreed to.

On section 9.

Mr. Green: I notice that subsection 5 (b) creates quite a drastic change in the law because it gives the power to designate, in any part of Canada, any court or person to act as a court for the purposes of this act and any such court or person so designated shall be deemed to be a court for all purposes under this act. As the law is at the present time that power can be exercised only in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon, and I can understand why it would be necessary there. But this proposed amendment would make it possible for the minister or the department to designate a person in British Columbia or any one of the ten provinces to act as a court, I presume to hear applications for naturalization.

I doubt very much whether that would be wise. Courts are available in the provinces, certainly in every part of British Columbia, and there should be great solemnity about this matter of naturalization. In recent years there has been an increasing degree of solemnity in the ceremony conducted. I suggest that such a ceremony is better conducted by a judge than by some other individual who is not a judge. Our judiciary rightly commands great respect from the populace at large and I deprecate this idea of taking away from the courts the right to hear applications for naturalization. I think it is cheapening the whole process and I urge the minister to give further consideration to this proposal.

I may have misinterpreted the meaning of the paragraph and I may have based my argument on a wrong premise, but if it means that it will be possible, in British Columbia or any other province, for a person not a judge to hear a formal application for naturalization, then I think the change is wrong. I have no doubt that in some cases it would be simpler to have naturalization granted in this way, possibly in the more remote places, but the advantage would not be as great as the loss that would be suffered by taking away from the courts the power to conduct these hearings.

Mr. Harris: I think my hon. friend has misinterpreted the intention of the amendment. We are taking away no power from any court. We are only asking for legislative authority to designate someone to act as a court. As my hon. friend has said, that means that we could designate people in remote areas who are not judges. We expect to do that under certain conditions in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon, although that may not be necessary now that there are additional judges there.

Northern Quebec is another instance where there may not be courts to handle these cases. We would like to have the power to designate someone in lieu of a court where a court is not available to hear the application within a reasonable time. This is not entirely academic as there have been cases where a judge has died and because of delay in appointing his successor it has been impossible to have these hearings held within a reasonable time after the application is made. There is no intention whatever of taking away from any existing court any of its present privileges and powers. The only desire is to supplement them should it be necessary in the interests of granting citizenship reasonably soon after the application is made.

I quite agree with my hon. friend about the solemnity of the occasion. Since I became minister we have done our best to make the granting of naturalization a solemn occasion. As I said in my opening remarks, we do not want to have a uniform ceremony, we want to leave to the judge a little bit of individuality and expression. But we would hope that they would impress upon the applicant, and upon themselves and the court officials, the fact that this was something that should be remembered by the applicant until he died. He could make the ceremonies simple and perhaps even short if court work required it, but nevertheless solemn and impressive. We would not appoint anyone who would not carry out these particular objectives.

Mr. Green: The administration of justice in a province is just as important as the hearing of applications for naturalization. Why should this plan not be tied in with the administration of justice in a province?

Instead of doing that, the minister is going much further and is asking for the power to designate an individual to hear an application for naturalization within a province. I suggest that power should be tied in with the actual administration of justice in the province. Assizes are held in all the leading centres of British Columbia and the county court judges go to the more remote centres. In my view they go there frequently enough to hear applications for naturalization. If it is necessary, a county court judge could be flown into a centre to hear applications for naturalization. I am afraid that this is a retrograde step. It will detract from the solemnity of the occasion on which an application for naturalization is heard.

Mr. Harris: Let me say one more word about it. I am sure that my hon. friend is wrong and that we will not take anything away from the solemnity of the occasion at all. I think he knows that in my province, and likely in his, there are occasions on which persons who have served at the bar for many years may be appointed temporary members of the judiciary. I think that is true in the province of British Columbia. It is in Ontario in any event. That is the kind of thing we have in mind. We may need an additional person at a particular time to do a job.

I can give one instance where I had a letter from a woman out west who said that the R.C.M.P. had called on her to get a declaration of intention. She was delighted that the time had rolled around. It would be six months before the R.C.M.P. called again. This was the only outside contact she had and she was looking forward to the time when the R.C.M.P. would come back with the petition for her to sign. I admit that such conditions are rare, but I think that we should have the opportunity of making that woman a citizen right where she lives because she is doing useful work in that particular area. The kind of person would be a person who would be responsible and would not treat this thing lightly.

Mr. McIvor: I should like to ask the minister a question. First I would congratulate him on the number of citizens he has brought out from Ireland.

An hon. Member: Where is that?

Mr. McIvor: I can assure him that these people who have come from the north of Ireland will compare favourably with the best in the world. They will fight for their country or take part in the development of our natural resources. What is the possibility of getting more of them?

[Mr. Green.]

On section 10—Determination of Canadian domicile, etc.

Mr. Fulton: Is this a broadening of the powers to determine the question of domicile? I observe that under the present section 38 it is provided quite simply that where any question arises under the act with respect to whether any person had Canadian domicile immediately prior to the coming into force of the act, the question shall be determined in the same manner as if it had arisen under the Immigration Act, whereas under subsection 1 the power is now given to the minister. The decision of the minister is made final and conclusive. Perhaps I may be labouring a point that does not exist, but my recollection is that the minister is not given that broad sweeping power under the Immigration Act to determine all such questions and to be able to make a final and conclusive determination. I should like the minister to correct me if I am wrong and also answer the question as to whether this is a broadening of his power to determine the question of domicile.

Mr. Harris: It is not a broadening; it is an elaboration of the power I have at the present time under the Immigration Act. But the wording of subsections 2 and 3 limits the power of the minister in making a decision under subsection 1. In other words, under subsection 2 he is obliged to follow the records of the department if they exist, and if they do not then under subsection 3 he can call for any information on which he can make up his mind about domicile. I am free to admit to the committee that occasionally we find that the records do not disclose the landing of a person in Canada. In such a case we want evidence from him of the landing and will accept it if it looks proper and indicates that he did in fact come at that time, although our records do not actually disclose it.

Mr. Fraser: Do you issue an order in council in such cases to clear them up?

Mr. Harris: No, we do not need an order in council to grant landing at the present time. I can grant landing to a person who has shown that he has been in the country, although our records do not indicate it.

Sections 12 to 21 inclusive agreed to.

On section 22—Coming into force.

Mr. Fulton: With respect to the coming into force of the legislation, on reading the debate in the other place I saw a statement that the revised Immigration Act passed at the last session had not yet been brought into force. Do I understand that it is the intention to bring the two acts into force at the same time, the citizenship act and the whole new Immigration Act? If so, when is it actually intended to bring them into force?

Mr. Harris: We may bring the citizenship act into force as soon as it is given royal assent, but the Immigration Act is to be brought into force as of the first of June if the regulations which are now practically completed are available and printed in sufficient time.

Section agreed to.

On the title.

Mr. Harris: I did not want to introduce this amendment until we had passed section 9, concerning which the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra made some remarks. With respect to the appointment of any person to act as a court, there is a cross-reference to section 2 (f) in the act which I shall read. It has to do with the clerk of the court and reads as follows:

"Clerk" or "clerk of the court" includes all officers exercising the functions of prothonotary, registrar or clerk of any court having jurisdiction under this act, and, where a person is designated by the governor in council as a court under this act, means the said person.

We did not want to necessarily have one person act as both judge and clerk of the court. Therefore I have a proposed amendment, which I will ask the Minister of Public Works to move, which would amend 2 (f) to read as follows:

(f) "Clerk" or "clerk of the court" includes all officers exercising the functions of prothonotary, registrar or clerk of any court having jurisdiction under this act, and, where a person is designated by the governor in council to act as a court for the purposes of this act, means any such officer approved by the minister and available to assist the said person as his clerk or, if no such officer is so approved, means the said person.

This will give us the opportunity of continuing the present system. In other words, if under the circumstances we have to appoint someone to act as a court, the clerk of the court having jurisdiction at the present time continues to have it, but if that is inconvenient or impossible we may designate someone else to act as clerk for the temporary purposes of the other court. I should point out one additional matter to my hon. friend. The appointment of the additional court is not made by the minister but by the governor in council so that there is that additional protection with respect to the minister's exercise of this right.

Mr. Knowles: Maybe the same question is in your mind, Mr. Chairman, as is in mine.

The Chairman: I have solved the problem. I have found where it goes.

Mr. Knowles: Good.

Mr. Harris: I beg your pardon, it comes under section 1.

The Chairman: As a matter of fact, it comes in subsection 3 of section 9, where it reads paragraph (f). It would read that subsection 1 of the said section 34 is repealed and the following substituted therefor. I think that this is paragraph (b).

Mr. Harris: May I point out that section 1 of the bill amends section 2 of the act, and this is amending section 2 of the act so it should go in as subparagraph 5 of section 1 of the bill.

Mr. Nowlan: What happens under this proposed amendment which was just introduced? I agree with the member for Vancouver-Quadra that it is dangerous to designate persons to act as courts, but I can assume that under some circumstances such a thing might be necessary. In any event, you have to have a record of this kept somewhere. Surely the records must go through a court, and there must be a court office in every district no matter where it might be located in Canada. I would think, Mr. Chairman, that it would be highly dangerous to not only designate a person to act as a court but designate some other official to act as registrar.

A few moments ago the minister said he was frank to admit that there was the occasional time when records of entry were missing. To my mind, therefore, if you have a person designated as a court and you have somebody else designated as a clerk, you are only adding to the opportunities for error because these people will only be acting for a day. What is going to happen to the records which are under the control of one or the other of these people? I wonder why it is necessary to appoint a registrar or person to act as well as designating a person to act as a court?

Mr. Harris: The act as it stands now contains this provision because of the situation in the Northwest Territories at the time when they did not have the judges they now have. I can conceive of the case I cited to the hon. member, where this lady, who is a doctor and who has been giving medical service to an area that never had it before, wants to remain there after she becomes a citizen. I can understand the minister trying to see that she is made a Canadian citizen on the ground, and for that purpose designating someone, the clerk of the municipality or somebody like that, to act as a clerk of this court for that purpose.

Under the act as it stands, if I appointed someone locally to be the court, to act as a judge, he automatically became the registrar or clerk of the court as well, which we did not want for the reason the hon. member gives that we want the records. You have a better chance of having the record if you have two people than if you have one.

Mr. Nowlan: If it is simply to cover the case referred to of the doctor who wants to become a Canadian citizen and to whom you want to grant Canadian citizenship on the ground, I cannot quite follow the minister. Does she not have to send her records into the court in any event? You have an officer of that court, a registrar or clerk of the court, and those officers are now in existence. These courts may be a thousand miles away from the lady to whom the minister refers, but it would be a simple matter since her application has to be posted in some place in any event. Then, if you are going to post these applications in any store or some Hudson Bay trading post, they are all going to be lost and you would not want to have that happen. I am not going to labour the matter. The member for Vancouver-Quadra raised it with respect to designating the court, and as I said I am prepared to follow the minister on that question with some qualifications, but I think he is getting on dangerous ground in designating a clerk.

Mr. Harris: It is quite true that in this particular instance the declaration of intention is filed in a court hundreds of miles away. There is no point in altering that court or the registrar of that court for the purpose of these documents. I imagine that only when some minister wanted to have this done on the ground, and have a clerk appointed who would administer the oath for the judge, would it happen in any other way than the normal. The intention here is not to take the power to appoint clerks, but is to avoid having the man who is going to be the judge also become the clerk.

Mr. Green: I think this amendment put forward by the minister strengthens my argument against his other amendment which allows him to designate a person as a court. By this amendment the minister is taking the power, not only of designating a person as a court but also of designating someone else as a clerk of that court, and if there is nobody available to act as clerk of the court then the man who is designated to be the court itself can also act as the clerk. I think that Canada has advanced far enough in her settlement and in her system of government for it to be unnecessary to have a provision of that kind.

This amendment reads:

"Clerk" or "clerk of the court" includes all officers exercising the functions of prothonotary, registrar or clerk of any court having jurisdiction under this act,—

[Mr. Harris.]

That, of course, refers to the courts as they are set up at the present time.

—and, where a person is designated by the governor in council to act as a court for the purposes of this act, means any such officer approved by the minister and available to assist the said person as his clerk or, if no such officer is so approved, means the said person.

So, in this case the governor in council does not have to approve the clerk of the court. The minister can appoint a clerk to assist the said person. If no such officer is so approved, it means the said person may act. In other words, the person designated as a court can also act as the clerk. I submit to the minister that the keeping of the records is of great importance, as well as maintaining the solemnity of the naturalization hearing. By this amendment he is endangering the keeping of the records. If he can appoint somebody to act as clerk for one particular application for naturalization, then it is very likely that the records will not be kept as they would be in a court or if they are kept at the moment will eventually be lost. We will not be able to find them in our provincial courts, because there is no procedure for filing them in the provincial courts. I think the minister, in order to grant naturalization to this doctor, is endangering his whole system of naturalization hearings. I would urge upon him that in the ten provinces he restrict the power of hearing naturalization applications to the courts.

Mr. Knowles: I was going to make a suggestion that has probably occurred to you by now, Mr. Chairman. It is that the proper place for this amendment is as a new subsection 3 of section 1 of the bill. If I may respectfully suggest this to the minister, I think his motion should have been that it be inserted as subsection 3 of clause 1, and that subsections 3 and 4 should be renumbered as 4 and 5. That would put the amendments to paragraph (f) in between (d) and (j). This would seem to be the proper place.

The Chairman: I am sorry. I find that I was trying to fit the amendment into section 9, but it does not go in there. It is probably a good thing that hon. members of the committee did not follow my lead. It does fit into section 1 as the hon. member has explained. The amendment, therefore, is that a new clause 3 be inserted and that subsections 3 and 4 be renumbered 4 and 5. The amendment moved by the Minister of Public Works is as follows:

That section 1 be amended by inserting:

(3) paragraph (f) of the said section 2 is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"(f) 'Clerk' or 'clerk of the court' includes all officers exercising the functions of prothonotary, registrar or clerk of any court having jurisdiction under this act, and, where a person is designated by the governor in council to act as a court for the purposes of this act, means any such officer approved by the minister and available to assist the said person as his clerk or, if no such officer is so approved, means the said person;" and renumbering paragraphs 3 and 4 as 4 and 5.

Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. Green: Can the minister tell us whether it is his intention to appoint his representatives in the provinces as a court or to designate them as a court? In some of the provinces at least he has a representative of the department. For example, in Vancouver we have Dr. Black who is an excellent representative. Is it the intention to designate the minister's own representatives as a court for the purpose of hearing these applications for naturalization?

Mr. Harris: At the moment there is no intention to designate any particular person. If it happened that it was necessary, under this amendment, to designate someone and if Mr. Black were available and were agreeable to the other persons who would have to do the work under the act, I presume that he would be considered. But I had more in mind the necessity of having someone trained at the bar if we were in that position at all.

Mr. Green: Has the minister given any thought to my suggestion that subsection 4 of section 1 should be changed? He deferred consideration of that section. I refer to the word "or" which appears for the second time in the second line.

Mr. Harris: I have not been able to give any further consideration to that matter than what I said at the time. I do not think it alters the meaning at all from that of the old section. But I must say that an explanation was not given me as to the change to "or" from "and". I think what I said was correct, namely that this does not alter the fact that we are trying to describe a place, and give the same reasons why this place would become the place of domicile. For example, if my hon. friend will look at the subsection again, he will see that these are all terms to explain where a person has his home or in which he resides, although that can be the same thing, and to which he returns as a permanent place of abode. That would imply that he did not have a home as such but had a residence. I think they all fit into the definition. I do not think the change to "or" from "and" would make any difference in our interpretation.

Amendment agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall the bill carry?

Mr. Knowles: May I suggest that the minister put the same amendment in section 12 of the bill?

The Chairman: That is in the corresponding section in part II.

Mr. Knowles: Yes.

The Chairman: I think that is understood. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall the bill carry as amended?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time? Now?

Mr. Knowles: By leave.

Mr. Harris moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

VETERANS BENEFIT ACT

CHANGE IN DATE OF EXPIRATION

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved the second reading of Bill No. 335, to amend the Veterans Benefit Act, 1951.

Mr. Brooks: Is the minister going to make an explanation of the bill?

Mr. Lapointe: I hardly think any statement is necessary, Mr. Speaker, on the second reading of the bill. As I explained at the resolution stage the other day, this is the annual bill to extend the Veterans Benefit Act, 1951, for a further period of a year; that is until the last day of the session of 1954.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Chairman, I just want briefly to say that I was not here when the resolution preceding this bill went through, and I want to say that we certainly welcome this bill again. The evidence of the value of the legislation is to be found in the credits the minister mentioned, namely the 150 men who are taking university or vocational training and the 89 who have made application for benefits under the Veterans Land Act. This federal aid to education in this respect has been most successful. I hope it convinces the government of the soundness of the principle and that they will see fit in years to come to extend this legislation to other Canadian citizens.

Before concluding I want to say that I notice generally that the administration of this legislation is becoming smoother all the time. I have talked to a number of men who have taken benefits under this legislation on returning from Korea, and I have not had a veteran make a single complaint as to the administration of the legislation or as to the treatment received from the various officials concerned with the administration of this act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Expiration.

Mr. Brooks: As the minister has explained to us, Mr. Chairman, this amendment is simply carrying out the same act as was put through last year, giving to the Korean veterans all the benefits under the veterans charter and subsequent legislation. I should like to ask him this question. In view of the fact that there is another bill to be considered, namely Bill No. 336 which grants additional assistance to the children of deceased members of the armed forces, is this act broad enough to include children of Korean veterans?

Mr. Lapointe: The answer is yes, Bill 336 will include them, Mr. Chairman. While I am on my feet may I say this. The other day, at the resolution stage, the hon. member for Royal asked me for certain figures which I did not have at the time but which I told him I would give him when we were in committee on the bill. He asked what was the average amount of gratuities paid to Korean veterans under this act. I am informed that as at April, 1953, the average amount was $261.80. He also inquired as to the number of contributions that had been made to the unemployment insurance fund on behalf of men serving in Korea. Contributions have been made on behalf of 15,332 members of the forces who have enlisted since July 5, 1950, and who have been discharged.

Mr. Brooks: I also asked for some information with reference to the Veterans Land Act, as the minister will recall.

Mr. Lapointe: I believe I gave at the time the information as to the number who had applied under the Veterans Land Act, and the number of applications received and approved.

Mr. Brooks: The figure was 89?

Mr. Lapointe: Yes.

Mr. Brooks: I think that is correct.

Mr. Quelch: Under this act is a veteran able to avail himself of any of the benefits under schedule A? Can a veteran obtain any of the benefits under schedule A of the act?

Mr. Lapointe: I believe the hon. member asked a question along that line the other day. He wanted to know whether any veteran could apply for these benefits or whether it was necessary for an order in council to be passed before the benefits were made available. The latter case is the correct one. The hon. member will see that section 8 of the act reads:

> The governor in council may by regulation provide that all or any of the enactments set out in parts I and II of the schedule to this act shall, in such manner as the governor in council may prescribe, apply to . . .

And then the two subsections follow. In other words, the governor in council passes an order making the various acts which appear in the schedule applicable to the classes of servicemen which the acts are intended for.

Mr. Brooks: There was another question that I asked regarding the payment of re-establishment credits to those still serving in the permanent force that could be paid the same as gratuities were being paid.

Mr. Lapointe: Up to now the benefits under the rehabilitation act have not been made available to members of the regular forces other than those who had originally joined up with the special force and transferred to the regular forces before the end of their term of enrolment. But extension of these benefits to other Korean veterans who were in the regular force is under consideration at the present time.

Mr. Brooks: Nothing definite has been decided yet?

Mr. Lapointe: No.

Mr. Fraser: I should like to mention veterans who are on small holdings under the Veterans Land Act. Some of those small holdings have now been incorporated into cities and these veterans are finding that their taxes have gone up, naturally. As I understand the regulations, if a veteran is on a 50 per cent pension he has a right to sell part of his holding, if he is on a half-acre holding. If he is not on a pension he has no right to sell. Of course when the land is sold the Veterans Land Act takes the money which would help to reduce the amount of the veteran's indebtedness to them. On account of the high cost of living and the high taxes at the present time would it not be possible to permit the veteran to sell off a portion of his holding and help to pay his indebtedness to the Veterans Land Act and also make it easier for him to pay his taxes, because it would reduce them somewhat?

Mr. Lapointe: This of course is a serious problem, and one into which the administration of the Veterans Land Act is looking at the present time. It is something that relates directly to the Veterans Land Act, though of course any change that might be made along the lines of those suggested by my hon. friend would also be applicable to benefits conferred under this act. If I may suggest, I think it would be more appropriate to deal with it when my estimates come down, when we can discuss the administration of the Veterans Land Act. At that time I might be able to give a more thorough answer to my hon. friend and deal with the points that he has just brought up.

Mr. Fraser: I hope the minister and his department will have a chance to study this point because these veterans are now finding it extremely hard to make their payments.

Mr. Lapointe: Their investment has increased in value also.

Mr. Fraser: The value has increased, yes, but they have burdens to bear, their families are coming along, the cost of raising a family has increased, and they are finding it that much harder to pay the charges.

Mr. Green: As I understand this bill, it merely extends the Veterans Benefit Act until the last day of the 1954 session of the house. That means that in order to find out just what it really does we have to go back to the original act which was passed in 1951, and which by the way was supposed to be merely a measure to fill in for a brief period until it was possible to make the Korean veterans eligible under the terms of the different acts in the veterans charter. My first question to the minister is: When does he think it will be possible to get rid of this temporary measure and make these veterans eligible for benefits under the basic acts contained in the veterans charter?

Mr. Lapointe: I did touch on that point when I introduced the resolution. I explained that we thought it advisable for the time being to continue with this procedure which was followed during the course of the second war. It is pretty difficult to say when we shall be able to come to a final decision in this matter and bring forward the act so that all of the benefits which are now given by order in council under authority of this act may be specifically provided for by a statute. That of course depends to some degree, as I explained the other day, on the situation in Korea, or on the time that it may take for all those who are affected by this legislation to be discharged or absorbed in another capacity in the armed forces.

Mr. Green: Then the minister cannot give us any idea as to how long it will be before these Korean veterans are placed in the same position as the veterans of the second world war in so far as coming under permanent legislation is concerned?

Mr. Lapointe: Well, they are enjoying the same benefits under this act which, of course, is extended from year to year. It is a yearly act. Like my hon. friend, I would like to be able to say when we will be able to put this legislation in a permanent statute, but like my hon. friend I am not in a position to say when the situation in Korea will permit that.

Mr. Green: It is not the situation in Korea—

Mr. Lapointe: It is to some extent.

Mr. Green: —that makes the difference; it is the possibility of passing legislation in Canada, which is of importance. I understand that 25,000 young Canadians have served in Korea, and I should think it would be possible for us to get their benefits in the shape of permanent legislation. The minister has said that they have the same rights now. That is hardly correct, because all they have now is the Veterans Benefit Act, and the governor in council may or may not say that certain parts of the veterans charter apply to these men. It is not a matter of right at all, as it would be if they came under the veterans charter itself. They merely come under this other act under which the cabinet have the power to say that they shall or shall not get certain benefits.

Do all of the veterans charter acts which are mentioned in the schedule to the Veterans Benefit Act apply, namely sections 28, 29 and 30 of the Civil Service Act; the Veterans Land Act, 1942; the Veterans Insurance Act; the War Service Grants Act, 1944; the Department of Veterans Affairs Act; the Veterans Rehabilitation Act; the Veterans Business and Professional Loans Act and the War Veterans Allowance Act, 1946. These are the acts listed in the first part of the schedule. These are the ones listed in part II: subsection 2 of section 2, section 5 and subsections 4 and 7 of section 7A of the Civil Service Superannuation Act; the Pension Act; part IV of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940 and the Reinstatement in Civil Employment Act, 1946. My question is whether all those acts have been made fully applicable to the Korean veterans and, if not, to what extent they are not applicable.

Mr. Lapointe: They have been made available to Korean veterans who enlisted in the special force. I explained a few moments ago that they are not all available to Korean veterans who serve in the regular forces, but that the matter is now under consideration.

Mr. Green: Are all the benefits under all those acts applicable to the Korean veterans?

Mr. Lapointe: I have just answered my hon. friend.

Mr. Green: Then answer it again.

Mr. Lapointe: I explained—and my hon. friend can look at Hansard—that they were available to Korean veterans who enlisted in the special force, and that so far as Korean veterans who are members of the regular force are concerned, they were not all available. I said that the matter as to the acts not at present available was under consideration, and that I hoped to tell the house at an early date what was being done.

Mr. Green: Let us consider the benefits under the War Service Grants Act. Is there a restriction on the benefits a Korean veteran can get if he has served less than a certain number of days in Korea?

Mr. Lapointe: I did not follow my hon. friend's question. Would he please repeat it?

Mr. Green: I understand—and I hope I am wrong—that there has been a provision whereby, unless a Korean veteran has served in Korea for 183 days, he cannot get any benefits under the War Service Grants Act, even though he may have been wounded.

Mr. Lapointe: I have not the regulations before me, but my understanding is that that is not correct. I certainly will look into the matter and let my hon. friend know. However, I am inclined to believe that he is wrong. I do not think that limitation exists.

Mr. Green: Is there any time limitation affecting Korean veterans in respect of benefits under the War Service Grants Act or any other acts I have mentioned?

Mr. Lapointe: Not to my knowledge.

Mr. Green: Will the minister look into the matter?

Mr. Lapointe: Yes, I will.

Mr. Green: Then, are the benefits available to the men who serve with our forces in Europe?

Mr. Lapointe: The answer is no. They are available to members of the forces who have served in an area which has been declared a theatre of operations. Germany has not been declared a theatre of operations for the purposes of this section.

[Mr. Lapointe.]

Mr. Green: Under the Veterans Benefit Act I understand the cabinet is given power to designate what constitutes service in a theatre of operations.

Mr. Lapointe: That is right.

Mr. Green: Apparently the cabinet has designated only Korea; is that correct?

Mr. Lapointe: That is right.

Mr. Green: Then I suggest some provision should be made to extend the benefits to young Canadians who are serving with our forces in Europe. We have a few thousand of them over there and, upon completion of their service, they will be handicapped in their re-establishment in civilian life. I submit the time has come to extend at least some of the benefits to these men.

Let us consider, for example, the Reinstatement in Civil Employment Act. Do they come under the provisions of that act, which gives a veteran some rights to get back his former job? I suggest that is one act which should be made to apply to them. Then there are several others which could be made applicable to the men serving in Germany. Has consideration been given to following that course, or is there any reason why the acts I have mentioned could not be made to apply to the men serving with the forces in Germany?

Mr. Lapointe: Well, I suppose there are some reasons. My understanding is that members of the regular forces who are serving in Germany at the moment are doing a tour of duty there as part of their regular duty in the regular forces. They have enlisted directly to the regular forces for a period of three years, as anyone does who enlists in those forces. In the course of that duty they may be called to serve in Canada or they may be called to serve in Germany as part of their training in the regular force. But they are not serving in a theatre of war.

I think my hon. friend will agree with that. However, as regards reinstatement in civil employment, my understanding is that any member of the regular forces who enlisted therein after July 5, 1950, and who serves in those forces for a period not exceeding three years—that is, one term of enlistment—

Mr. Green: Not less than three years.

Mr. Lapointe: Yes, not less than three years—is given the privilege of reinstatement in civil employment when taking his discharge.

Mr. Green: I submit these men should not be regarded as ordinary enlisted soldiers in our peacetime army.

Mr. Lapointe: Why not?

Mr. Green: We are now engaged in an unusual type of military activity under which we are sending forces to Europe, and I doubt very much whether very many of these young men have decided to make the army their career. They have enlisted for a short period of time.

Mr. Lapointe: They enlisted for a regular term of three years, like anybody else.

Mr. Green: It is pretty obvious that the minister is not very much impressed by the need for giving them assistance of the type covered by the Veterans Benefit Act. Nevertheless I do urge upon him that the government give consideration to extending at least some of these benefits to the men serving in the forces in Europe.

Mr. Lapointe: I might say that the government has given and will continue to give consideration to that matter; and I can assure my hon. friend that I am quite as interested as he may be in the fate of our men serving in Germany or anywhere else. And I think his remark was slightly uncalled for.

Mr. Green: Slightly what?

Mr. Lapointe: Uncalled for.

Mr. Green: Well, the minister should not be so touchy. Ministers of the government must expect to have suggestions made to them.

Mr. Lapointe: It is not the suggestions I object to; it is the suggestion that I am not interested.

Mr. Green: He may resent them; nevertheless I am entitled to make suggestions to the minister, and I propose to do so when I feel they should be made.

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Chairman, I just wish to straighten out my hon. friend. I am very pleased to have any of his suggestions as regards legislation or the treatment to be given to veterans or to men serving at the present time. What I objected to was his suggestion that I was not interested.

Mr. McLure: I happened to be absent when this bill was called; therefore I did not hear the statement by the minister. This bill received considerable publicity because it created the impression among many veterans that it would deal with increased veterans allowances. I should like to know whether any consideration has been given to increasing the allowance to single and married veterans.

Mr. Lapointe: That would not come under this bill.

ARMED FORCES

ASSISTANCE FOR HIGHER EDUCATION OF CHILDREN OF CERTAIN DECEASED MEMBERS

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved the second reading of Bill 336, to provide assistance for the higher education of children of certain deceased members of the armed forces and of other persons.

Mr. Brooks: Is the minister going to give an explanation?

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Speaker, as I mentioned the other day on the resolution, the purpose of this bill is to provide financial assistance for the children of veterans who died as a result of military service during world war I, world war II or in Korea. It is intended to assist children who are pensioned under the Pension Act to obtain an education above the level of high school matriculation.

The bill provides for the payment of university fees and a monthly allowance while in attendance at a university for a period of four years. As I mentioned the other day, there are approximately 12,000 children receiving pension under schedule B of the Pension Act, all of whom would be potential university students. Under this legislation, when a child has graduated from high school he will be in position to obtain assistance for his higher education, or vocational training of the type that calls for high school matriculation such as teachers' college, provincial normal schools or nursing schools at Canadian universities.

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): Mr. Speaker, when the resolution was before the house the other day we had an explanation from the minister, and a number of hon. members spoke. Since I have received the bill and read it I have been greatly disappointed, and I am satisfied that that will be the general feeling. There was general approval in the press and among all concerned when it was intimated that something would be done toward assisting the children of war veterans who had been killed overseas to obtain a higher education.

Since the war ended it has been generally realized that the children of deceased war veterans should receive special consideration as far as education is concerned because they had a special claim on the public of Canada. It was hoped that a bill of this kind would have been brought in long ago. Everyone realized that the widow of a soldier who had been killed overseas would not be in position with her limited means to provide this type of education for her children. Like everything else, the cost of education has increased greatly, and it was realized by the war veterans committee as far back as 1946 when we were considering the veterans charter that this matter should be considered. It has been brought up practically every year, either in the house, by the Legion or by some other veterans' organization. As I said a moment ago, there were great expectations as far as this bill was concerned.

The bill certainly does not go as far as we had been led to believe it would. My opinion was that the children of deceased war veterans were to be given the same educational opportunities as the veterans themselves were given on their return from overseas. I should like to read the recommendation of the Canadian Legion submitted to the government on November 12, 1952, which was as follows:

> Recommendation—in respect of children of deceased service men
> That the federal government instigate a policy for the children of deceased service men similar to that in force for single student veterans attending university or vocational training schools and receiving a monthly allowance under the rehabilitation act.

They recommended the adoption of a policy similar to that which had been adopted in connection with single student veterans. Anyone who is familiar with the veterans charter and who considers what is intended to be done under this bill for the children of deceased war veterans will realize that there is no comparison at all. As a matter of fact, I think in this bill the government is being very niggardly. It is not permitted to refer to the different sections, but the bill does mention what the government intends to pay and the amount is very small when compared with what is necessary to provide an education.

When we consider the cost of living, when we consider the cost of room and board, of clothes, of books, of travelling, of all these necessary things, and then consider the small monthly pittance provided under this bill we cannot help but realize how inadequate it is. I would point out that the children concerned are comparatively young, 16, 17 and 18 years of age; they are not to be compared to the men who came back from overseas. During the four months of vacation these mature men can earn a good deal of money, but young people of 15, 16, 17 or 18 years of age, many of whom will be attending university, will have very little opportunity to earn money to assist in obtaining their education.

There is another matter I wish to bring up when we are considering the bill. I do not see any retroactive feature in the legislation. Owing to the fact that it was not put into force four or five years ago, as it should have been, many sons and daughters of deceased veterans have already attended universities and have paid for their own courses. They have probably borrowed the money to do so or the widowed mother, the pensioner, has borrowed the money to assist them in obtaining an education. I see no provision in the bill to treat those who have already received and paid for their education in the same manner as those who will come under the act when it is brought into force this year. I wish to express this complaint now, before we deal with the various provisions of the bill.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, we in this group certainly endorse the principle of the legislation and are very pleased to see the bill introduced. I know the Legion has made proposals along this line to the government and the veterans affairs committee for a number of years. It is my recollection that the matter was first discussed, as was said by the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) and as the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) reminded me a few minutes ago, in the veterans affairs committee of 1946 when a number of members of the committee tried to get this type of legislation incorporated in the veterans charter.

While the government is late in bringing the legislation before the house, we are very pleased to know that at last, so far as the principle is concerned, they have responded to the pleas of the Canadian Legion. I think it is quite fair to say in that respect that it is the good and continuous work of the Legion and the national council of veterans that has finally caused the government to give consideration to their repeated representations and recognize the principle of educational assistance to the children of deceased veterans.

In addition, the subject has been raised a good many times in the house by members particularly on the opposition side, and as far as the principle of the bill is concerned I am sure we are very pleased that the government has recognized it. However, I am not clear as to the exact meaning of one or two of the clauses, and I am sure when we get into committee a number of members will want the minister to explain the meaning of certain clauses. If I understand the bill correctly that $25 per month is the sum total, together with educational costs, then under present day circumstances that appears to be too small an amount. But we will wait until we get into committee, and I hope the minister will be able to give us further information as to those sections which concern us having to do with the amounts payable.

Once again, we are pleased to see the government recognizing this principle, and once again I say that I am quite sure no bill affecting such a relatively small number of persons in Canada will produce more happiness than this one, particularly if the government sees fit to raise the amount payable to a satisfactory figure.

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, we in this group commend the government for introducing legislation of this type, and we are fully in accord with the general principle thereof. But I was under the impression that under the legislation both the cost of the education of the dependent of the veteran and a living allowance of $25 a month would be paid. I now have some doubt in my mind whether or not the full cost of education is to be met. Therefore before I say any more I should like to get a further explanation from the minister regarding section 4 (2) particularly. I should like to know exactly what it means, because if it does not mean that the full cost of education is going to be met then I shall not be quite so complimentary in my remarks.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few remarks about the measure. As hon. members who have already spoken have said, for some years there has been a demand by the members of the great Canadian veterans' organizations and also by many members of the house for some legislation which would assist the children of Canadians who gave their lives for their country. It has been felt that such children were bound to be under a handicap compared with other children because of the fact that their fathers had lost their lives in one or other of the services. There has also been a feeling that these young people should be put in a position where they could take pride in the service their fathers had given, and that the service of the fathers should be recognized by some measure of assistance to the sons and daughters.

The measure does go part way to meet the suggestions that have been made, and I join with other members of the house in commending the minister and the government for the start. It took a great deal of pressure to get this far, but now we are here a word of commendation is in order. But I believe the measure will not help a very large number of such children. During the debate on the resolution the minister explained that only those who had completed their secondary education would receive any benefit, and he said in effect that only those children intending to take university training would be eligible for help. He pointed out that whereas there were 12,000 children who had lost their fathers, only about 10 per cent of them would benefit under the legislation, or approximately 1,200.

It must be evident that those who are not going to go to university will constitute the largest group of these children. They are the ones who will be entering one of the trades or some occupation which does not require a university degree. Yet these children appear to get no benefit whatever under the measure. They are left to what they can get from the regular public schools, and I think that is unfair. They get no living allowance whatever, and of course that is an important feature of the assistance given by the bill. It provides for the payment of university fees. Children who are not going to go to university of course would not have to pay fees in a technical school but their maintenance must be provided, and I suggest they should be eligible for this payment in the same way as children who are going to university.

Under the rehabilitation plan in effect for the veterans themselves, no such distinction was made. If a veteran wished to take vocational training he got his allowance just the same as a veteran who went to a university. But here we come to deal with the children of the veteran who lost his life, and under the definition only the one who goes to university can get help. I am very glad that he or she will get that help, but the one who wants to take up a vocation gets no help whatever. To me that is one of the great weaknesses in the bill.

We always understood that the assistance would be on the same basis as that given to the veterans, but the allowance is only to be $25 per month whereas the amount payable to the veteran himself was two or three times that amount. This payment of $25 per month is merely a token payment, and obviously was not intended to provide for the subsistence of the veteran's children while taking a course.

Then there is one other point I should like to draw to the attention of the house, and that is that this bill is of no help whatever to the children of the man who, at the time of his death, was in receipt of war veterans allowance; at least that will be true in most cases. These men only received war veterans allowance, at least a great majority of them, because they were front-line soldiers. The war veterans allowance is based on front-line service. I suggest that the children of these men should be made eligible for this assistance, in addition to those coming under the schedule of the Pension Act.

I hope these suggestions will be considered by the minister, and that it will be possible to have some amendments made as the bill goes through the committee. This year we should have had a committee on veterans affairs to deal with this measure and the one which has just been passed. Here we have another good example of the folly of not having a veterans affairs committee of this house. This bill will not receive the consideration from the committee of the whole house that it would have received from a special committee on veterans affairs. I hope that during the next session provision will be made for the setting up of a permanent committee on veterans affairs.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Definitions.

Mr. Brooks: According to the definition, Mr. Chairman, an educational institution means a university, college or other school of higher education in Canada. During the time when the veterans themselves were attending schools, provision was made to enable them to take educational courses outside of Canada if there was not a course in Canada that suited their requirements. I wonder if that same provision will apply so far as these children are concerned?

Mr. Lapointe: The hon. member for Royal is quite right, Mr. Chairman; that principle was followed when the veterans legislation was applied. The education had to be obtained in a Canadian institution, unless it was established that the course which the veteran desired and which was necessary for his rehabilitation could not be provided in Canada. It is not felt that the same situation exists merely in providing what I may call ordinary university training for these children.

Mr. Gillis: I should like to ask the minister if a university, college or other school of higher education includes vocational training schools?

Mr. Lapointe: It will depend on the type of vocational training which is sought. The purpose of this act, as the title shows and as the explanation pointed out, is to give assistance to those seeking a higher education, in other words, university training; or for that type of vocational training which requires a high school education as a preliminary. It has been felt, and this is the experience of the department and the people who are in the educational spheres in this country, that that is the type of education which is most costly and which is most difficult to obtain because of financial reasons.

If the type of vocational training desired is one which can be provided by the provincial institutions which exist throughout this country, and does not call for a high school education as a requirement for entering the course, then the provisions of this bill will not be applicable. If it is vocational training such as nursing, which I mentioned before, or other types of technical training which I understand call for high school education, then the provisions of this bill would apply. In other words, I might say that the criterion is the need for a high school education as the requirement for entering the course.

Mr. Gillis: I certainly am not in agreement with that definition. As the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra pointed out, there will not be many who will benefit by this bill. Since the end of the last war the whole emphasis has been on university training. Practically all of the government assistance has gone in that direction. Today you can go to the employment offices across this country and find queues of unemployed who have no training of any kind. At the same time you will find vacancies listed calling for skilled tradesmen such as bricklayers, pipe fitters, carpenters and glass fitters. I am afraid that if we continue this type of assistance in the field of education, in a few years there will be no hewers of wood and drawers of water but everyone will be running around with a university education and not producing very much.

I feel that the minister would be well advised to consider including vocational training schools in this definition. For example, a young girl taking a commercial course which requires a year or eighteen months of study in a local school would receive no help. There are many of these schools across the country, and some of them are costly. There is transportation involved. According to the definition in this bill, such a girl would not be eligible for assistance because she is not attending a recognized university but is merely attending a school which teaches a commercial course.

The time to iron out these definitions is now, and not by correspondence after the bill has passed. There are these vocational training schools across this country in which young men do not get a high school education, but they receive a basic education which is sufficient to enable them to take a course in the trades.

In many cases the people who require the assistance most are those who cannot afford to send their children through high school but have to take them out in the ninth or tenth grade and send them to a vocational training school because they cannot afford to put them through high school and thus give them university entrance. If the government is desirous of helping the largest group of veterans, in my judgment they should include vocational training schools in this type of assistance. If they do not do that, I think most of the assistance will be going to people who could perhaps afford to send their children through; because if you can get them through the university entrance, you are not badly off. But as to the great majority of the ex-service personnel who will raise a family and try to educate them, the vocational training school is the spot, in my opinion, where we should try to give them the greatest assistance.

As I pointed out before, the lack of trained tradesmen in this country is terrific. The whole emphasis of the Department of Labour in immigration has been to bring skilled tradesmen from Europe. The importation of stenographers right here to this city from Great Britain only a few months ago is an indication that a great deal of assistance is necessary in relation to this type of work. There are thousands of girls running around the streets and standing behind counters for low wages because their parents could not afford to put them through the commercial course that would enable them to take such a job. I believe the thinking of the government in the field of education must be focused on the need for training in these skilled trades in this country rather than depending on immigration as we have been doing since 1945. This would be a good place to start, by including vocational training schools in the definition under section 2 of this act.

Mr. MacDougall: Mr. Chairman, I must agree with many of the things that have been said by the hon. member for Cape Breton South. This whole system of education, as we are seeing it develop across the length and breadth of Canada, it seems to me is creating a number of square pegs to be fitted into round holes. Those who returned from the first world war know that the assistance in the matter of education was completely and utterly inadequate. Those who returned from world war I certainly had to make their own decision as to what line of education they were going to take up, and rightly or wrongly they pursued what they considered to be the type of training they were to follow.

The day is going to come, it seems to me, when we shall find this situation if we continue the type of education that is mentioned here in the bill—not that I am particularly opposed to it, except that I think it should be broadened. For instance, today in the great Kitimat development in British Columbia we have dishwashers on the job who are earning more than are university graduates. That is a fact. The reason they are earning more is certainly not that they are more skilled but rather that they are willing to take on a type of work that is not particularly edifying. All through the industrial set-up of the Dominion of Canada, as we continue to prosper and develop, we are going to find increasing numbers of instances similar to that which you find today in this developmental work at Kitimat.

Further than that, if the children of civilian residents of Canada are going to pursue university courses and the veterans' children are going to be subsidized by governmental action to do likewise, then the day is not going to be too far distant when most of the so-called workers of this country are going to be working for the government. It seems to me that the idea behind any legislation of this type should be that we are building up the boys and girls of today who are going to be the men and women of tomorrow, and who are going to be producers for the economic development of the Dominion of Canada.

Rightly or wrongly, we may be critical of university graduates but the fact still remains that the real basic principle upon which our development depends is not in having men and women who have possibly a greater than technical school education, but in having men and women who are ready and willing to throw themselves into the economic development of this country. For a long time I have been of the opinion that we have been stressing the university too much and neglecting our secondary and trades schools all across Canada. In my opinion they are the institutions that will turn out the real men and women for the development of this country in the future.

I have to go along with the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra and the hon. member for Cape Breton South in pointing out these facts. For our future economic development, in my opinion it is necessary that consideration should be given to the interpretation of this bill that is now before us; not that by any manner of means we should exclude university graduates, but we certainly ought to have a complete definition of the type of person this legislation is going to benefit. When it comes to children in an orphaned family, I certainly do not think the higher university education is going to be particularly applicable, because a university education today costs a great deal of money and it certainly takes the head of the family all his time in toil, tears and sweat to earn sufficient to put a boy or girl through university. Where the head of the family has been removed, the onus of responsibility will fall upon the remaining parent. I feel strongly that this type of definition as to beneficiaries under this act should now be explicit.

As far as schools are concerned, I believe the trade schools and the vocational training schools are the real schools that are going to build boys and girls into men and women of tomorrow for their purposeful tasks in developing and increasing the economic advantages of this country of ours.

Mr. Harkness: I agree with a great deal of what the hon. member for Cape Breton South had to say. Certainly I think at the present time there is a much more acute shortage of people with commercial training and trades training than there is in some of the more learned professions. It seems to me that this act should be broadened to include people who are going to attend commercial schools and trade schools.

There are two specific questions I should like to ask the minister. From what he said I take it—but I should like to have this matter clarified—that students who attend a normal training school for teaching will be included even although in some provinces matriculation from high school is not required to enter that normal school. I should like the minister to clear up that point. From what he said I think it follows that those people would be included and would be eligible; but as I say, I know that in some provinces in order to enter normal school students do not have to have matriculation. They take a less onerous course or at least one that is directed along other lines than those of the matriculation course which gives entrance to university.

A second group of people whom I have wondered about were those taking accountancy. In most instances students taking accountancy do not actually attend a university. They pay certain fees and take their accountancy in the form of an apprenticeship. I wondered whether the fees they have to pay, and so forth, would be covered by this bill. I believe they do require matriculation in order to enter into accountancy.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to comment on this without delving too deeply into the merits of this or the other kind of education. I find myself largely in agreement with what the hon. member for Cape Breton South had to say. As I understand it, this is a measure to benefit the children of men who lost their lives in the service. Why should we pick out some of them and educate those who are taking this type of education mentioned here, and say we will not educate the others? I can see no argument in favour of that at all.

Mr. Lapointe: Perhaps I might answer the questions of the hon. member for Calgary East. As regards his first question, I would say the bill contemplates that the people he describes will receive the benefit. As he says, there are some provinces where there are regular high schools, and where matriculation may not be necessary to enter normal school, but where an equivalent educational background is necessary. In such a case, it would be considered as one of the kinds of vocational trainings for which the act could give assistance.

Mr. Green: I think the resolutions passed by the Canadian Legion indicate very clearly what a great weakness it is in the bill that no provision is made for vocational training. I hold in my hand two resolutions which were passed at the dominion convention of the Legion last year on this point. One was in these words:

> Resolved that all such entitlements and credits, etc., which the veteran would have received had he been spared to return be made available to his family.

The other was more specific. It read as follows:

> Be it resolved that the federal government be requested to instigate a policy for the children of deceased service men similar to that in force for single student veterans attending university or vocational training schools and receiving a monthly allowance under the rehabilitation act.

When the Legion came before the cabinet in November of last year they had this recommendation to make on the point:

> Recommendation—in respect of children of deceased service men
> That the federal government instigate a policy for the children of deceased service men similar to that in force for single student veterans attending university or vocational training schools and receiving a monthly allowance under the rehabilitation act.

Therefore it is perfectly clear that the Legion had in mind benefiting the whole range of children of deceased veterans; and we all know that the great majority of these children would be more apt to benefit from vocational training than they would university training. The minister himself said on second reading of the bill on April 13 that only 10 per cent of the 12,000 would get any help under this measure. In effect what he is doing is giving the green light to the children who propose to take university training, and putting up a red light against the other children who would like to get vocational training.

He explained on page 3754 of Hansard what type of training would be covered when he said, in addition to the university:

> Teacher training, through the provincial normal schools, and nursing, through the teaching hospitals, are cases in point.

But he has not given the house or the committee one example of assistance in vocational training, and there is where the great need exists. With regard to vocational training he takes the position that any of these young people who want to get vocational training can get it in the provincial schools that are already set up. That may be true in so far as paying fees is concerned; they may not have to pay any fees for their vocational training, but they will have to have someone pay for their subsistence while they are attending those vocational schools. If the assistance provided by this act is not extended to cover them, then I am afraid the result will be that many of these young men and women will not get vocational training at all. They will simply be cut off.

I would urge that the definition of an educational institution be broadened to include commercial and vocational training schools, just as was done in the case of the veterans of the second world war. They were not put to the obligation of going to university if they wanted to get help. They could choose themselves whether they wanted university training, vocational training or commercial training, and they got help no matter which course they followed. I suggest that exactly the same provision should be made to apply in this present measure.

Mr. Knowles: It seems to me that the point at issue at the moment is not a debate as to the respective merits of university training on the one hand and vocational training on the other. I think we all agree as to the value of both. Certainly there is no question but that our country's life is richer because many veterans of world war II were enabled to go on and take university training. I for one am very glad to see that provision for university training is included in this bill. But we also recognize that Canada's well-being is advanced by everything that is done to increase the vocational skill of those who are not able to go on and take university training. In other words, it seems to me we are not indulging in an academic debate between those two types of training. What we are asking is that there be no discrimination between them, but rather that this assistance be available in either case.

I recognize that the Minister of Veterans Affairs may be sitting there thinking that we did not hear what he said a while ago, when he made it clear that the criterion would be whether or not the student had been through high school. I heard that, and I can see what might be involved in lowering that criterion; but this question presented itself to me. What about the student, be he interested in university training or in vocational training, who is unable to get through high school? Is not there a case for assistance in some instances at that level?

The minister may say that in most provinces of the country high school education is free, at least so far as tuition is concerned. But the financial circumstances in the home may, in many instances, prevent young people from getting to high school, whereas with a little assistance they might be able to do so. On the ground that the country is richer, both for vocational training and for university education, I think both should be included.

I think consideration should also be given to providing at least the allowance of $25 per month which would make it possible for students to get through high school who otherwise would not be able to get through. That would at least put them in the position of being able to go on with their university training or their vocational training.

Mr. Quelch: I understood it was not so much a question of whether or not a young person had gone through high school but rather whether, the young person having gone through high school and then applying for vocational training, such type of training would require that the applicant had gone to high school. That is the difference. It seems to me that if the young person prefers that type of vocational training which does not require high school, then at least some allowance for the cost of living could be made. I should think that $25 a month might well be allowed, even though there would be no cost of education involved.

Mr. Nowlan: The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra is right in pointing out the definition of an educational institution where reference is made to a university, college or other school of higher education in Canada, as approved by the minister. Of course the expression "higher education" is elastic, and the minister can define that so as to include technical schools and the like. But I think he will agree that ordinarily higher education would not include trade schools.

The minister did make the point at the outset that this grant was payable only to those who had graduated from high schools, or had equivalent status. I must say I have some considerable sympathy for that. The hon. member for Cape Breton South made reference to secretarial schools and business schools, and suggested that the grant should be made to assist persons going through those schools. My thought in the matter is that before they go on to business schools they should first go through high school, learn how to spell and be able to take a letter reasonably well. Many of them cannot do that.

I doubt whether this grant should be made available as has been suggested. Certainly in every province of Canada, and I think in almost every centre, high school education is available. It may be that in some instances the students would have to live with relatives, or something of that kind, but we do have consolidated schools as well as big high schools in our cities and towns. I should think those children should first of all go through high school. Then, having done that, this assistance should be made available to them if they wish to go to a secretarial or to a trade school. We have such places in Halifax. I think there is some confusion in the minds of hon. members as to whether they have to go through high school first.

Mrs. Fairclough: I do not wish to disagree with one of my colleagues, but I cannot agree with the last speaker because I have had far too much experience in this particular field. I know that many of these boys and girls simply drop out of school as soon as they are permitted to do so, perhaps at about 16 years of age, in order that they may contribute to the family budget.

I could not be more heartily in accord with anything than with some remarks made this afternoon suggesting that in this bill there should be provision for vocational and technical training. I believe it was about two years ago that I received a summary from the employment service in Hamilton showing the number of women available for employment. Most of them were seeking work which did not require any particular training. It appeared from the breakdown that out of some 90 about 8 or 9 were quite capable of taking commercial training, but they had been unable to do so because of financial circumstances.

I do not think there is a centre in Canada today that is not short of stenographers. There is a great need for and shortage of them. I am told that at the new Ford plant which is to open shortly at Oakville they are assured of every type of worker except stenographers, and that these cannot be secured. I firmly believe that some provision should be made in the bill because, from the experience I have had and the instances which have come to my attention, I am sure that many of these young people who could benefit by vocational training are going to drop out of school at the age of 16, or whatever age their school system permits. Henceforth they will become untrained labourers in a wide field where we need skilled workers of many kinds.

Mr. Brooks: Mr. Chairman, I agree with most hon. members who have spoken this afternoon. I am sure it was the intention of the Legion and others that all should be treated as nearly alike as possible. We recall that the returned men who could not take the educational facilities offered were given the advantages of the Veterans Land Act, or some other advantage.

One hon. member has said that this is discriminatory legislation. If a boy wants to be a carpenter or a girl would like to be a stenographer, then it seems to me that he or she should be given the same opportunity as the boy who wants to be a lawyer. Some provision should be made in the measure to provide that this boy or girl shall have his or her opportunity, just the same as the boy or girl who may wish to become a lawyer or doctor.

I do not agree that there are too many college graduates in this country. We all know there is a scarcity of doctors and engineers as well as those in other professions. There is also a great scarcity of people who are technically trained. I would hope that the minister might see his way clear to amend the measure so as to give us a more comprehensive definition of what an educational institution might be, and that in so doing he would include technical and vocational education.

Mr. Lapointe: I appreciate the debate that has taken place and the suggestions made by hon. members. I was pleased to hear the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre suggest that the debate should not degenerate into one in which the relative values of university and vocational training would be set out. That is not the purpose.

This is something completely new in the way of veterans' legislation. Representations have been made to us upon various occasions and have been discussed at various times with people who are interested in the subject. It was pointed out that secondary high school, technical and commercial education in most cases could be obtained in provincial-controlled institutions throughout the country. It was said, however, that assistance should be given to the son or daughter of a widow, or to an orphan who would go to university if the financial means were available to do so. It was urged that similar assistance should be given to those wishing to enter various other professions which do not call for university training, but training for which would require a high school education as a preliminary.

We looked into all the kinds of assistance that could be given, and as a result this plan was evolved. I think it is incorrect to say that it represents discrimination. As I pointed out before, the bill is designed to assist the children of deceased veterans to obtain a higher education. That does not mean that vocational training is not necessary in the economy of the nation. I think this bill marks a step forward in veterans' legislation. Hon. members can look at veterans' legislation anywhere else in the world, and they will find that this is the first legislation of this type introduced in any parliament.

Mr. Brooks: Let us make it good.

Mr. Lapointe: I think we should do what we have done with other legislation, wait and see what the results will be once it is put into effect. It is quite possible that certain adjustments will have to be made. But I think it is going somewhat beyond the real situation to denounce the legislation as being unfair.

Mr. Gillis: I hope the minister is not trying to create the impression that anyone is debating the merits or demerits of university training versus vocational training.

Mr. Lapointe: It sounded like that.

Mr. Gillis: It certainly was not that. As far as the bill goes, there is nothing wrong with it. This is another move in the direction of federal aid for education. It is the second step we have taken during this session. Federal aid has been extended to the provinces in connection with the education of displaced persons. We are not doing too badly in that field.

There is no doubt in my mind that the legislation is discriminatory. It does not meet the demands made by the Legion at their last convention. What concerns me are the vacancies listed in the employment offices across the country for skilled tradesmen as compared with the queues to be found outside of men with no training at all who are looking for work. Obviously there is a gap in our training of people in the skilled trades.

If we make this step we should definitely remove any discrimination. Before he finally puts his seal of approval on the definitions I think it would be interesting if the minister or some member of the house found out how many of the pupils who start out in grade 1 finally graduate. There is a great number of children in this and every other country who just have not the capacity to graduate in high school subjects, but they have aptitudes for other things.

The ordinary person who does the necessary work of this country to produce our wealth does not need French, Latin, geometry or a knowledge of economics that he would get in grades 11 and 12. Only last year I saw some of the papers that had to be written, and I doubt if many of the ministers or parliamentary assistants could sit down and write that examination today.

Mr. Lapointe: That is probably true.

Mr. Gillis: Those papers dealt with the new economics that came out of this war, the changes in currency and all that kind of thing. That is an angle that must be taken into consideration, the small percentage of the pupils who are able to go right through the different grades and graduate. There is a very high percentage who cannot do that.

There is a great waste in education when no aptitude tests are given to determine just exactly what a boy or girl may be fitted for. This legislation closes the door to vocational training schools. I am sure if the officials of the Department of Labour were asked their opinions they would tell you in no uncertain terms that the great need in this country is for skilled workmen. Many of our provinces, particularly the maritime provinces, are having an awful job maintaining or establishing vocational training schools in sections where they are badly needed.

There is an obvious situation that exists in all the industrial sections of this country, as is indicated by the vacancies for skilled workmen in all the employment offices. Some hon. members seem to be of the opinion that if they do not get through high school they can walk out on the street and find jobs. What kind of jobs can they take? An industrial employer is not going to take an untrained man and train him. He has expensive equipment and machinery in his plant. The employer in the building trades wants trained carpenters, bricklayers and lathmen because they are not so apt to waste materials.

If the policy of the government is that everyone in Canada is going to have a diploma, is going to be an economist, a chartered accountant or something like that, and we are going to draw from Europe by way of immigration our tradesmen and general labourers, that is fine. But what are you going to do with the Canadians who are here today, who are raising families and who are not able to put their children through university? Those children are going to end up as the displaced persons in a program of this kind.

I am not going to argue this any longer, as I have been arguing it since 1940. Apparently we are not making very much progress. I am certain that the elimination of the commercial and vocational training schools is not going to settle the matter as far as the Legion is concerned. I am certain it is not going to settle it as far as I am concerned.

Mr. Knowles: The minister made a fairly satisfactory statement on this point on April 13, as reported on page 3755 of Hansard, when he said:

> In other words, the criterion is secondary school graduation—regardless of whether the proposed occupation requirement is regarded as university or vocational.

My point is that when the minister made that preliminary statement he put academic and vocational training on the same level. What disappoints hon. members now is that the wording of the section does not carry out the spirit of what the minister said.

Mr. Lapointe: I think it does. Perhaps I did not express myself clearly enough. What I had in mind was that the criterion was the completion of secondary education. Whether the course to be followed afterward was a university course or something else, it had to be one which required the completion of secondary education, high school or its equivalent. That was the explanation I meant to give.

Mr. Knowles: It would seem that the statement made the other day and the provisions of the bill do not completely correspond and I wonder—

Mr. Lapointe: I hope the statement I made just now makes it clearer, because that is what it means.

Mr. Knowles: We are governed not by what the minister says but by what is written in the law. I wonder if it would be too much to ask the minister to let this section stand so he can take another look at it during the six o'clock recess.

Mr. Green: I think—

Mr. Lapointe: I do not think it would serve any purpose to do that.

Mr. Knowles: That means that the door is closed.

Mr. Lapointe: I am sorry. I did not realize the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra was on his feet.

Mr. Green: If the minister were willing to agree to let the matter stand I would be glad to sit down.

[Mr. Gillis.]

Mr. Lapointe: My hon. friend is free to stand up.

Mr. Knowles: That is an academic way of putting it.

Mr. Green: I should like to point out that the preceding paragraph on page 3755 gives the real picture. There the minister had this to say:

> Statistics indicate that some 60 per cent of young people entering high school leave without completing the usual four year program, and not more than 10 per cent—

That is 10 per cent of the total group, not 10 per cent of the 60 per cent.

> —or about one-quarter of those who do graduate proceed, or are likely to proceed, with further school—post-secondary education.

That shows exactly what the minister had in mind, that only 10 per cent of these children would benefit. The figures are right there as given by the minister himself. I would ask the minister whether there would be any serious administrative difficulty if the act were extended to cover vocational and technical schools.

Mr. Lapointe: At the time I gave the figures I think I explained that they were simply estimates. My information was that that had been the experience in high schools throughout Canada, and that 10 per cent of the over-all group who enter high schools eventually proceed to higher education. Whether or not that will be the percentage in the case of veterans' children is of course something which only the implementation of the legislation will show us. I do not know whether or not it will be 10 per cent.

Mr. Brooks: Even if we enlarge the legislation as has been requested, I do not think for one moment that 100 per cent of the children concerned are going to ask for vocational training. As a matter of fact many of them will become lumbermen, fishermen or farmers, and very few of them will bother with this legislation. I suggest to the minister that the definition of "educational institution" might be enlarged to read as follows:

> "Educational institution" means a university, college, technical school, vocational school or other school of vocational training in Canada . . .

By "vocational training" I mean training to be a nurse, teacher, stenographer or whatever it might be.

Mr. Mutch: You would have to define "vocational". It is too broad in the last part.

Mr. Brooks: You would have to define "vocational training".

Mr. Mutch: May I suggest that under the definition as it now stands there is nothing to prevent the minister in his discretion including, for the purposes of the act, technical high schools.

Mr. Knowles: He has already closed the door by saying that a student has to graduate first.

Mr. Mutch: Provided they are proceeding to matriculation.

Mr. Lapointe: No.

Mr. Green: They are expressly prohibited by section 3 of the act.

Mr. Mutch: I stand corrected.

Mr. Herridge: There is a distinction between high school graduation and matriculation. Which does the bill mean? Does it mean high school graduation or matriculation?

Mr. Lapointe: It depends on the provinces. What we have in mind is the equivalent. There are some provinces where matriculation is necessary to proceed to higher schooling. In other places pass certification, I think they call it, is all that is required. It varies with the provinces. The purpose is to provide assistance for schooling higher than high schools or their equivalent. I can give an example. In my own province secondary and post-secondary education leading to a degree in arts is usually given in the same institution. Upon graduation at the end of what would be the fourth year in a high school the student goes on to the fifth, sixth and seventh years, and eventually gets his bachelor's degree. For the purpose of the act dealing with veterans of the second world war, the years following the first four years in these institutions were considered as being the first, second and third years of university. The regulations will be made in such a way as to adapt the legislation to the existent circumstances under each provincial educational system.

The Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): No. I do not think the minister has given a satisfactory answer, certainly not as far as I am concerned, to the arguments we have made. I would remind him that in one of the budget bills of the Minister of Finance, if my memory serves me correctly, a change was made in a somewhat similar situation extending the operation of the bill.

Let us look at this case. The minister's answer to the arguments, as far as I understood it, was to say—and I am glad that this is so—that in bringing in the legislation we are stepping out ahead of other countries. That is very satisfactory, but it seems to me that merely because we are a step ahead of other countries is no reason why we should get off on the wrong foot. So far as I am concerned he said nothing to answer our comments. He merely said: "We will see how it has gone at the end of another year, and if we want to amend it we can". But if in fact these arguments, which I am glad to point out were not made wholly by the opposition, have weight, then why in heaven's name can they not be considered now?

So far as I can see they have not been considered. We are getting very near the position in the house where those of us in the opposition are merely expected to bow the knee. There was a time, even during my short experience in the house, when suggestions from this side of the house were considered and adopted. It has happened before and, as I have said, it happened in connection with the budget bills. I would think there is a very reasonable case for the minister holding the bill over until after the dinner hour in order to see if he cannot give some effect to the suggestions that have been made, or else answer them and point out that they are wrong, which certainly was not done.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Minister may make allowances and pay costs.

Mr. Knowles: Will the minister clear up a point that seemed to be a bit confusing as we listened to the speeches on second reading of the bill? Does the legislation provide for both an allowance of up to $25 a month to a student and payment of tuition and other fees?

Mr. Lapointe: It provides for both.

Mr. Harkness: I should like to ask the minister what is meant in subsection (b) by "pay in whole or in part". In view of the answer he has just given, why is it "in part" if the whole cost is going to be paid?

Mr. Lapointe: I think it is purely a question of discretion. I believe the same wording was used in the other legislation, but the intention is to pay the tuition and the allowance. Just why it is "in whole or in part" I really cannot say. It might be that a student would be getting a scholarship under another scheme. For instance, there is the case where a student gets a scholarship under the youth assistance act to which the federal treasury contributes. Such a scholarship might be taken into account in considering the amount of fees, if that scholarship were paid directly or were contributing to the payment of tuition. It is contemplated that this act should operate in a similar manner to the old veterans act.

Mr. Knowles: Is it necessary to read (b) of section 3 with subsection 2 of section 4? When I put those two together, I wonder whether it is the intention of the government, by regulation, to prescribe the extent to which tuition fees would be paid, or could we now have the assurance of the minister that tuition fees will be covered in full, except in cases where there is a scholarship?

Mr. Lapointe: That was just an example I gave. The cost that it is felt should be determined by regulation is again based on the same system we followed previously. I think there must be certain restrictions, otherwise students might take other things with their courses for which we would have to pay extra fees, and which would not be part of the curriculum they must follow to obtain a certain degree.

Mr. Knowles: In other words, a limitation is going to be imposed?

Mr. Lapointe: Let me give an example to illustrate this point. Suppose a student were taking science, and his tuition fees were paid for science. Suppose that he wanted, in his spare time, to follow some lectures given in the medical school to the medical students. We would hardly be expected to pay for his university training in two separate courses.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Amount of allowances.

Mr. Brooks: I am not altogether clear, but I understand that the tuition fee is paid. What about books that are required?

Mr. Mutch: The bill refers to other fees and costs as may be prescribed by regulation. It could be stretched to cover that.

Mr. Brooks: The only amount we are sure he will be obtaining is—

Mr. Lapointe: Registration fees, tuition fees, yearly fees and dues.

Mr. Brooks: And $25 a month is paid outside of that?

Mr. Lapointe: That is correct.

Mr. Brooks: Out of that he has to pay his board, clothing, travelling expenses and so on. That was my understanding of it when I read it before. I do not think it is enough.

Mr. Green: How was this figure of $25 reached?

Mr. Lapointe: The figure was arrived at after investigation into the average tuition fees in universities throughout Canada. We were advised that the average tuition fee was around $300. Of course there may be some cases where it is considerably higher, and on the other hand there are some faculties in some universities in which it is lower. To that amount was added $25 a month for the academic year, making the amount roughly $500.

Mr. Green: On an eight months' basis?

Mr. Lapointe: Yes; that is the average academic year in a university.

Mr. Knowles: Is it not nine, in view of the reference to 36 months or four academic years?

Mr. Lapointe: No. The reason for the 36 in there is, as I understand it, that nurses are on continuous training for 36 months.

As I was saying to the hon. member, we calculated an average of roughly $500 per student, and this was discussed with various authorities. I might point out that that is the amount mentioned in the Massey report. That commission recommended that, on the basis of need, bursaries of $500 a year should be given. In this case the element of need does not enter into the calculation, but the average amount of $500 was arrived at and that is what set the allowance at $25 per month for the academic year.

Mr. Fraser: When the Massey report was drawn up the dollar was worth a lot more than it is today. It is only worth 50 cents now.

Mr. Lapointe: I do not think I could add an escalator clause to this bill, based on the cost of living index.

Mr. Green: What was the amount payable to a single veteran?

Mr. Lapointe: The tuition fee plus $60 a month.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—Age limit.

Mr. Knowles: When one first looks at section 5 it seems reasonable in that it imposes an age limit of 25 years. But I wonder if there are not too many limitations of that kind in this bill. For example, in section 4 we have limited this assistance to four academic years. Likewise, when we get to the next section there is a limitation, at least in so far as those who completed their matriculation before the coming into force of this act are concerned. I wonder if we are not running the risk of denying the benefits of this legislation to the children of veterans who might profit from it, and whose profiting from it might lead to the good of the nation. Surely there will be people 23 or 24 years of age now, who might desire assistance for a four-year course. This clause imposes an additional limitation. I have no objection to the limitation of four years, but I wonder if it is fair to have both the four-year limitation and the limitation of 25 years of age?

Mr. Lapointe: I think there are very few children of veterans of the second world war at the present time who have reached 23 or 24 years of age and who are still in high school. Most of them will have chosen another place in society than going to university. I hardly think there would be any cases such as the hon. member suggests.

Mr. Knowles: It is true that they might already be out of school. However, the act does contemplate the possibility of such children, who completed their matriculation 15 months ago, re-entering school. What bothers me about the section is that it leaves no latitude at all to the minister, whereas in some other section, where I am not sure it is necessary, discretion is left to the minister. So far as this matter is concerned, even if the minister comes upon a deserving case such as the type I have described, he will be prohibited from assisting that student by the ironclad provisions of this section.

Section agreed to.

Section 5 agreed to.

On section 6—Time limit.

Mr. Nowlan: With respect to clause 6, this limitation of that few months is bad, particularly in subsection 2. Clause 6 provides that, when this bill passes, anyone who has qualified himself must start to school within 15 months thereafter. Then there is also provision that at any time hereafter—years from now, as long as this section is in force—the student must commence his course of higher education within 15 months following his matriculation.

I wonder what is the basis for that strict limitation. The minister admits, and it is obvious, that the grant of $25 a month is simply a grant in aid. It is simply to help him to carry the load, and it is not nearly enough to enable a student to enter college or to carry the full load himself. In other words, this act envisages the necessity for students earning money. If they do not earn money, they will not be able to take advantage of the act because $25 a month will not enable them to carry it.

I am thinking of boys whom I know who have left high school, have stayed out for two years working in a bank, and then have gone to college. One of them, if I may make a personal reference, was my own boy. I am sure he was a much better student in college because he decided to stay out for two years and work. Having spent two years in the bank he decided to go back to school, and he is in college today. I mention that case as an illustration. I am sure there are tens of thousands of boys and girls who stop after high school and go to work, and then decide to go on to college. But under this section they will be precluded from doing so.

There is, of course, an escape clause which is not very wide. The section contains the phrase "because of ill health or any other good cause". Of course "good cause" is fairly general, but I suggest it is fairly well limited with those words "ill health". In other words, if a boy is sick he can go to school two or three years later and still get assistance. But under this act, as I say again, the boy has to go to work to earn enough money to go through school; yet if he does not start within 15 months he loses the benefit of the act entirely unless the minister exercises discretion, a gate which is not too wide open to him, and I am sure he does not want it to be too wide open. I think we are making it altogether too narrow, particularly in subsection 2, with respect to students who go on; I think they should not be limited to 15 months, but that this provision should be widened to two or three years.

Mr. Lapointe: All I will say, Mr. Chairman, is that the 15 months referred to in that section is the delay which was given, or which would have been given, to the veteran, the father. That was the delay which was mentioned in the veterans' legislation on education, and it is exactly the same period. In the other act there was also ministerial discretion as there is in this one. My experience since I have been minister is that it was sufficient to give relief in cases where there was real reason that it should be extended. It has been my privilege to do so at various times, and it has also been my duty to refuse it at times when I did not think it was justified. But generally speaking, no really serious problem has arisen.

Mr. Nowlan: Is the minister not making a slight error when he says that this legislation is the same as the veterans' legislation? Under the veterans' assistance they got much more than $25 a month.

Mr. Lapointe: I am saying that the delay of 15 months was the same period which the veteran had. He had to decide on his university training within 15 months of his discharge unless he was able to show cause for delay.

Mr. Nowlan: But the veteran could go on and get paid his allowances and do reasonably well. Here any boy or girl has to earn money, and is not in as good a financial position as was the veteran. It is for that reason that I think the 15 months should be extended.

Mr. Fraser: I should like to ask a question of the minister. In the act we find this language: "who completes his matriculation". Does that mean senior or junior matriculation? In some cases universities will accept junior matriculation and allow them to go into the arts course.

Mr. Lapointe: I would say it is junior matriculation because students can enter university after junior matriculation, generally speaking. They can also obtain their senior matriculation at high school and save the first year of the arts course, as I understand it.

Mr. Fraser: That is what I wanted to bring out. There might be some who thought this was junior matriculation and wondered whether this act would allow them to go to university.

Mr. Lapointe: Yes.

Mr. Fraser: They might not be able to afford it otherwise.

Mr. Mutch: That brings me to my feet to point out to my friend the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, who checked me about the collegiate institute in his own province, that it is possible to take first year university on completion of matriculation, and be admitted to the second year university. That is what I referred to when I said that if they took their first year university then and there it can be counted, and I still think that is right.

Mr. Knowles: I am glad the parliamentary assistant has made that clear. Now at least we are talking about the same thing. We understand that assistance under this act would not be available for vocational training in Winnipeg for that portion which is of high school standing. What he was saying, and has now corrected, is that if you stayed on there for work that is post-graduate, that portion would qualify.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Shall this bill be read the third time now, by leave?

Some hon. Members: Next sitting.

[Mr. Nowlan.]

CANADIAN FORCES ACT

AMENDMENTS TO NATIONAL DEFENCE ACT, DEFENCE SERVICES PENSION ACT AND CANADIAN FORCES VOTING REGULATIONS

Hon. R. O. Campney (Associate Minister of National Defence) moved the second reading of Bill No. 332, respecting the Canadian forces.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, before we give second reading to this bill I think the minister should perhaps make a statement in connection with it.

Mr. Campney: Mr. Speaker, this is an amending bill. It amends two statutes and a set of regulations affecting service personnel. In speaking to the resolution on April 2, as reported at pages 3550, 3551 and 3552 of Hansard the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) generally reviewed the contents of the bill which was later presented to the house. I think he covered all the salient points in the bill. The sections of the bill are not all related to each other nor to one specific matter. It would probably be more helpful to hon. members—or at least I hope so—if we were to go into committee and I were to explain the various sections as we come to them.

Mr. Harkness: I find it extremely difficult myself to speak on second reading as far as this bill is concerned because the only principle I can see in it is the principle of amending the Canadian Forces Act. There are at least four distinct matters involved. One makes it possible for Canadian military courts to try offenders against the laws of the country in which a military force happens to be stationed. The transfer of custody of offenders is the second one. So far as the first of these is concerned, the general principle is one that probably everybody in the house would be agreeable to, namely that Canadian courts should have the power to try Canadian personnel serving in Korea, Germany, Japan or wherever it may be. In regard to that and in regard to this matter of transferring offenders from civil custody to military custody there are several points which do not, on first reading at least, appear to one as being entirely reasonable, and some of these require a fuller explanation.

As I see it, one regulation in particular makes it possible for a soldier who has been found guilty on two or more counts—although the conviction on one of these counts may be quashed by a higher authority, or by an appeal, or by anything else along that line and therefore the sentence which is awarded is quashed also—to receive whatever sentence the army authorities deem reasonable for the charge which was not quashed. Under that provision it is made possible for the soldier to be awarded a heavier sentence for the one charge that is not quashed than he received for the two or three offences for which he was sentenced in the beginning. That does not seem quite a reasonable proposition. Perhaps the minister will have some explanation for that particular matter.

Then the Defence Services Pension Act is also a matter which is quite technical, and perhaps it is no use to say anything about it at this moment.

The fourth matter dealt with is the voting regulations for the Canadian services. In connection with this I hope the minister will be prepared to tell us, when we get into committee, how the lists of service voters are to be prepared; whether they will be available; how the candidates can secure lists of the service voters who will be voting in their particular constituencies, and to what extent national defence headquarters and command headquarters will be required to co-operate in providing these lists. I trust he will deal with questions of that nature.

Mr. G. C. Nowlan (Annapolis-Kings): The last speaker has said that several specific matters of legislation are included in this one bill, and it is pretty hard to discuss the underlying principle affecting it because there are at least four underlying principles contained therein.

A moment ago the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness) referred to the voting regulations and asked certain questions with respect to them. I am glad to see that the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Harris) is in the house, because I am quite sure he will have to reply to the last speaker that if this bill passes in the form in which it now is it will be impossible to answer any of these questions, since no one can tell what will be done in that situation.

There is a matter of principle here, Mr. Speaker, to which some reference should be made. Some time ago this house appointed a special elections committee, which gave a great deal of detailed consideration to the revision of the elections act. I am not sure how many times that committee was organized before I became a member of it in 1951. If my recollection is correct, that committee sat in 1950, and in other years. However, it did not complete its work to the extent that it could report. In 1951 the committee sat for many, many weeks. We had numerous sessions. The evidence was printed. I think hon. members will agree that the committee worked reasonably hard. Among other things we considered were the defence voting regulations. Finally we achieved a unanimous report, recommending a certain procedure which should be carried out. For the first time it was thought we had the basis whereby the candidates who might be involved in an election, the service personnel who were voting and the government which was responsible might all feel there was some reasonable hope of the matter being worked out satisfactorily and well. The report came into the house and was accepted, and finally legislation was passed which was based on the committee's report.

I suggest that when you look at the regulations, when they are before us in committee, you will find that all the work which was done by this committee has been scrapped, and we are back again somewhere below the surface. It is hard to understand what has taken place. We had provided for certain forms, for instance, that should be completed. We regularized the matter in two different ways. In the first place, provision was made for those who were then in the armed forces—that was 1951—to complete certain forms within three months after the act came into force. That was form 50. We also went further and said that once a year every year thereafter they would change the form. That was to provide a revolving situation so they could adjust to changing circumstances. Then we had another form for those who came in after that date.

Therefore the mechanism was set up so that the whole matter was put on an orderly basis in 1951, and from then on presumably it would work in that way. If the department carried out its responsibility under that act, one would assume there would be no necessity for changing the act now; but as the matter stands—and this will appear in the committee when we come to the bill—we will find that all these things have been changed. Instead of this work being done in 1951, as it was supposed to have been done, it now can be done up to the date of dissolution, whenever that may be, and if it is not done by then it will be done up to the election date.

I do suggest, Mr. Speaker, that a principle is involved there, in so far as legislation which was considered as carefully as this was, which we now find to be virtually repealed and scrapped, and which is to be dealt with in the house now when we are almost within the shadow of prorogation. Some very definite explanation must be given of that. I think it is not a principle which this house should accept nonchalantly. All of that work should be not scrapped without more of an explanation than the very casual one that was given here this afternoon. I do not want to go into detail on this now, because it is a subject that can be dealt with in committee.

I would ask you to call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Offences out of Canada.

Mr. Harkness: This section uses the following language:

> An act or omission that takes place out of Canada and would, under the law applicable in the place where the act or omission occurred—

That is, the country in which our troops were stationed.

> —be an offence if committed by a person subject to that law, is an offence under this part, and every person who is found guilty thereof is liable to suffer punishment as provided in subsection two.

Is there any loophole or provision whereby that which might not be an offence in Canada, but would be in a country in which our troops were stationed, would not be looked upon as an offence if committed by one of our troops stationed there? I am thinking particularly of liquor laws and things of that kind, which constitute a problem in every province of Canada because the laws differ from province to province. Let us consider particularly troops of ours who might be stationed in a Mohammedan country where liquor is not allowed. What provision is there to cover a situation of that kind?

Mr. Campney: Mr. Chairman, under the circumstances outlined by the hon. member we would not have to prosecute. This section is in the interests of our own troops in Europe and other countries so that, by the enactment proposed herein, we may make the laws of another country part of the law which we can administer. We do this by giving our service tribunals authority to deal with offences committed by our service personnel against that law rather than have such offences dealt with by the criminal courts of that country.

This becomes important because in our treaty with West Germany, in our NATO treaties and in countries such as Japan where, as yet, we have no arrangement in this connection, the section gives us jurisdiction pursuant to which we could deal with these matters. I understand that under the West German treaty we will be required to administer the law of that country in accordance with its tenor. Under the NATO agreements, if it is an offence under our law we have concurrent jurisdiction. In other countries we have the right to negotiate, the idea being that we take all possible power to handle in our own military tribunals all offences which may occur by reason of the activities of our forces in those countries.

Mr. Harkness: I am in full agreement with our having power to deal with such offences in our own military courts. I believe that is an extremely important move. The only point that concerns me is something which might be considered an offence in another country, one in which our troops might be stationed, but which would not be an offence in this country and subject to punishment. I am thinking particularly of sumptuary laws, and things of that kind. In other countries there are laws which we would consider quite peculiar. It would seem to me unreasonable that a soldier serving abroad and living in the way he was accustomed to live in Canada, but breaking a sumptuary or other law which would not apply here, should be subject to military discipline under this section.

Mr. Campney: If military personnel are to be dealt with on the basis of offences under the law of the receiving country, then it seems to me it is better for us to have power to deal with them ourselves. Otherwise that country would have power to deal with them, and might regard such offences far more seriously than we do. We would deal with the situation in the light of our own legal background.

Mr. Harkness: I would agree with the minister so far as that is concerned, that it is much better for us to have power to deal with them ourselves. I think there is no argument on that point. My only thought was that we might have an amendment whereby a man who broke a law such as I have mentioned in a foreign country, but had committed an act which would not be considered contrary to law in this country, would not as a result be liable to military punishment.

In subsection 2 it says that where a service tribunal finds a person guilty of one of these offences—

—the service tribunal shall impose the punishment in the scale of punishments that it considers appropriate, having regard to the punishment prescribed by the law applicable in the place where the act or omission occurred and the punishment prescribed for the same or a similar offence in this act.

And the explanatory note say this:

This is necessary because foreign law in some cases makes provision for types of punishment unknown to Canadian law.

I think there is another basic objection to subsection 2, in that the scale of punishment is not definitely set down. The scale of punishment laid down here will be what the tribunal considers appropriate. In other words it places much greater power in the hands of a military tribunal than resides in an ordinary court of law under any other circumstances; because a judge or jury, or whatever the case may be, in an ordinary court of law, or a court martial in respect of a military tribunal, can impose only those punishments which are definitely laid down. In this case the military tribunal is put in the position where it decides what the scale of punishment shall be. That is a basic weakness, and the sort of thing which should be avoided if at all possible.

Mr. Campney: Perhaps I should point out that, as provided in subsection 4, any offence that is within the code of service discipline, and also against the law of the country in which the troops are stationed, can still be tried under the code of service discipline.

Replying to the hon. member, I would point out that in my view where subsection 2 refers to a punishment which a service tribunal considers appropriate, having regard to the punishment prescribed by the law applicable in the country in which the troops are located, it means that our service tribunals would take cognizance of the laws applicable in our own country to such offences as well as in the country where the offence was committed. It does not say that our military tribunals must apply the penalties which would be applicable to people within that country who committed these offences; it is the penalty which the tribunal considers appropriate, having regard to all the circumstances. When you are dealing with offences under the laws of another country which are foreign to our laws, I do not think you can very well set out a scale of punishment. I think it must be left to the service tribunal. The point is that we have endeavoured to give as wide a jurisdiction as possible to our service tribunals.

Mr. Harkness: I can understand the difficulty of laying down a definite scale of punishments, but I would think this section would be much safer if an addition was made to the last phrase. This reads:

—the punishment prescribed for the same or a similar offence in this act, the Criminal Code or any other act of the parliament of Canada.

I suggest that the words "not greater than" should be added before that phrase. As it stands now, the scale of punishment is entirely in the hands of the tribunal. What tribunal A might think appropriate might be only half as much or might be twice or three times what tribunal B might think was appropriate. In other words you are going to have a great deal of variation if you leave it in the hands of the particular tribunal.

Mr. Campney: May I point out that in this section we are dealing with offences which are not offences under our laws; they are offences only under the laws of the country where the troops are located. I do not see how we can apply an exactly parallel construction to that obtaining in our own Criminal Code. I might observe that in any event the punishment meted out by the service tribunal under this section would be subject to review the same as any other sentence.

Mr. Harkness: I do not quite follow the minister when he says that this is for offences which would not be offences in Canada. If that is so, why put in the words "punishment prescribed for the same or a similar offence in this act, the Criminal Code or any other act of the parliament of Canada"? Those words make it quite definite that what is envisaged here is the meting out of punishment which will be similar to the punishment prescribed by the Criminal Code, or any other act of the parliament of Canada.

Mr. Campney: I think those words are used simply to direct the attention of the service tribunals to our Canadian law. It is a recognition of the fact that the offences will not be similar but that some guidance may be obtained from the Criminal Code. When the offence committed is somewhat akin to that covered by the Criminal Code, the service tribunal is directed to look at it and have regard for it.

This section deals with an admittedly difficult and unusual situation. In the interests of our own service people we are trying to enact a situation which will give us as wide jurisdiction as possible. I do not think we can very well lay down anything too specific in the way of punishment for crimes committed in other countries, which may be similar to crimes in this country or quite different.

Mr. Fulton: The difficulty is obvious, but does it not leave the military tribunal in a rather impossible situation? They are going to be asked to deal with cases which may be very serious from the point of view of the country in which they are committed, and which may not be recognized as offences from the point of view of our laws. I imagine that we are desirous of maintaining good relationships with these countries; and if a tribunal should impose only a nominal sentence, the country in which the offence was committed might be extremely offended. Then in what position would the tribunal be left?

It seems to me that all sorts of pressures might be brought to bear upon the tribunal in a country where the senior officers might be trying to maintain not only good discipline but good relations with the authorities of the country. Pressures might be brought to bear on tribunals to impose sentences for that purpose out of all proportion to the seriousness of the offence in the eyes of purely domestic Canadian law. The tribunal is going to have no defence, no backing which it might have by the simple provision of maximum sentences. They would then have the opportunity to say, "We have tried this offence, we regard it as serious, but the maximum penalty provided in our act is so and so."

It seems to me that it would be open to all sorts of misunderstandings and the possibility of the creation of ill-will if a tribunal simply imposed a nominal sentence, or what was regarded as nominal in the eyes of the country in which the offence was committed. That country might consider that the Canadians were treating it as a joke when they regarded the offence as serious.

The tribunal should be in the position of being able to say, "We will try our soldiers", or whatever rank it may be, "for having committed this offence, but the maximum penalty provided by our act is so and so." Then the authorities of the country in which the offence was committed could not say that the tribunal was treating the matter as being merely of petty importance and just going through the motions of a trial. It seems to me that it places the tribunal in a most difficult position. It is placing what is in effect a court of law in the position of being an instrument of diplomatic relationship, and I do not think a court of law should ever be placed in that position.

The minister has the judge advocate general in front of him, and I would ask him if he does not think it possible to examine the laws of the various countries in which Canadian troops are operating and work up a scale of punishments for offences against the laws of those countries which are not offences against the laws of this country. Something could be worked out so the tribunals could have a guide.

Mr. Campney: It is the opinion of the officials who have studied this situation that to attempt to set up any code of maximum punishments to fit the different countries in which we have or may have troops would lead to complete confusion. I think what actually will happen in the cases which come before our military tribunals under this section is that the tribunal will look at the offence in the light in which it is regarded in the country where it takes place. If there is anything in the way of a parallel crime under our Criminal Code, the tribunal can consider that; but the tribunal will have to take the responsibility, having assessed these things, of deciding what is the proper punishment to mete out in the case of a particular offence. It is not anticipated that this section will apply to too many countries, and it is felt that we cannot do more than, as it were, rely on the sense of appropriateness and fairness and understanding of the military tribunals. They will be operating outside the ordinary type of jurisdiction entirely.

Mr. Fulton: What are the provisions of the corresponding legislation in the United Kingdom and the United States whose forces are also in large numbers in countries other than their own?

Mr. Campney: I am informed that so far as we know neither of the jurisdictions to which the hon. member refers has formulated laws in this particular.

Mr. Fulton: Why do we hasten to expose our soldiers to the possibility of being tried for offences in foreign countries which are not offences against Canadian law if neither the United States nor Great Britain has done so?

Mr. Campney: The reason we are taking this step is to hasten to provide, as far as we can, that the substantial number of troops which we have abroad are not tried for offences by foreign courts but by our own tribunals. This section, as far as we are able to make it, is entirely in the interests of our military personnel.

Mr. Fulton: Does the minister say that United States troops and British troops are now tried by civilian courts in the foreign countries in which they may operate? Take the case of Germany, where all three countries have troops operating.

Mr. Campney: As to Germany, I understand that United States and British military personnel still come under the terms of the occupation. They are not in the same position at all that we are. So far as Japan is concerned, without dwelling on it too much I understand that since the Japanese treaty was ratified the Americans have been experiencing a good many difficulties. We have tried in Japan, and so far have succeeded, in avoiding jurisdictional difficulties. As we are going to be asked to approve treaties to enforce the laws of the countries where our troops are stationed in respect of offences against their own laws, we feel that we ought to be in a position to do that. All this section does is put us in that position. Otherwise we have no jurisdiction at all. This provision puts us in a position where, to the extent that we can under our treaties or by arrangement or in any other way secure jurisdiction, we will be in a position to assume that jurisdiction.

Mr. Fulton: Then I take it from what the minister says that neither United States nor British troops are liable to be charged with offences against German law, and Canadian troops are.

Mr. Campney: No.

Mr. Fulton: Does that arise from the fact that we were kicked out?

Mr. Campney: They are not subject to German law now, but I think we are the first nation that has not had any proper arrangements to meet the situation, which will shortly arise.

Mr. Fulton: It arises out of the fact we were kicked out.

An hon. Member: Oh, now, now.

Mr. Fulton: What do you mean, "now, now"? It must arise out of the fact that we were kicked out or left out of the occupation arrangements.

Mr. Lesage: What brilliance.

Mr. Campney: I understand that at present we are under the same regulations as the British and Americans and have the same rights; but that will probably end for all of us soon and we want to be in a position to protect our troops to the maximum possible for us to do so when the situation changes.

Mr. Fulton: What are these other two countries doing about it?

Mr. Campney: I do not know that I want to develop what they are doing about it. We are trying to look after our own interests.

Mr. Gillis: I am not going to argue points of law with a Rhodes scholar, but having read the section and the explanatory notes it is my opinion that it does just the reverse of what the hon. member is arguing.

Mr. Fulton: You are so often wrong that it does not worry me.

Mr. Gillis: Following the hon. member's line of reasoning, if we had troops in Ethiopia and it was the law there that toenails had to be pulled out with a pair of pliers, his argument would be that we should amend our law to make it necessary to pull out toenails also.

Mr. Fulton: I knew you would misunderstand. That is why I was not concerned with what you said.

Mr. Gillis: What the hon. member said was that if we had troops in another country it would look kind of bad to that country if we were rendering decisions that were not in accordance with the laws laid down in that country. That is what I understood him to say.

Mr. Fulton: The section would provide for putting our troops under Ethiopian laws, and I object to putting our troops under their laws at all. You want to have their toenails pulled out, and I don't.

Mr. Gillis: That is exactly what you were arguing. You may have been thinking the opposite, but I understood you to say that. An act was passed in this house in 1946, I think it was, making United States troops immune with respect to our laws. It provided that in the event such troops stationed in Canada committed an infraction of our laws they would be tried by their own tribunals and in accordance with the laws of the United States. I think this provision protects our troops who serve abroad. If they commit an act contrary to the rules and regulations as we lay them down, then they will be tried in these countries by our own tribunals, which will be guided by the wording of this section in meting out punishment. In so far as possible punishment will be as laid down in this legislation or according to the Criminal Code. With troops all over the world, I think it is good protection. I would not want to see the boys in Korea tried under Japanese law.

Mr. Fulton: That is what you are giving them here.

Mr. Gillis: I think it is protecting them against that.

Mr. Fulton: You are applying Japanese punishment.

Mr. Gillis: The explanatory notes are very clear.

Mr. Fulton: Would the hon. member permit a question?

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Gillis: The explanatory note to subsection 2 of the new section reads as follows:

> Subsection 2 of the new section would authorize the imposition of suitable punishments for such offences. This is necessary because foreign law in some cases makes provision for types of punishment unknown to Canadian law.

Mr. Fulton: Read the first subsection.

Mr. Gillis: That has to do with the section under discussion, and I think it protects Canadian boys serving in other countries in that they are not going to be subjected to punishment laid down by the laws of other countries. I think the hon. member for Kamloops is a bit twisted.

Mr. Fulton: Would the hon. member permit me to read him the first subsection of this section; and would he also permit me, although a Rhodes scholar not claiming any special knowledge by that fact, to point out to him what is a rule of the house and of every court in Canada, namely that it does not matter what the explanatory notes say. It is what the act says that counts when you are in court, and subsection 1 of the proposed section reads as follows:

> An act or omission that takes place out of Canada and would, under the law applicable in the place where the act or omission occurred, be an offence if committed by a person subject to that law, is an offence under this part, and every person who is found guilty thereof is liable to suffer punishment as provided in subsection 2.

Acts or omissions committed by Canadian troops in other countries, even though those acts or omissions are not offences against the laws of Canada, are now going to be offences under this measure if the bill becomes law, and they will be punished by an act of the Canadian parliament. Perhaps the hon. member would deal with that situation, quite apart from the fact that the explanatory note to subsection 2 deals with something which is not law but merely an explanation made by the department.

Mr. Johnston: I have a problem that I think should be dealt with at this time. I notice that the legislation is referred to as the Canadian Forces Act. The minister will recall this particular problem because I have taken it up with him. It has to do with the navy rather than the army. In this case it was an offence committed by Canadian forces. From what information we have, it would appear that two Canadian navy boys from the ship Crusader were on leave in Hong Kong. They were arrested for being in possession of arms without a licence, and one was sentenced to 18 months while the other was sentenced to 12 months.

When I took this matter up with the minister he was good enough to make some investigation of it. He wrote me a letter explaining in part the difference between the two sentences, the one of 18 months and the other of 12 months. I think perhaps I should put on Hansard a clipping from the newspaper so hon. members will have the information before them.

The Chairman: Order. Before the hon. member reads that newspaper clipping, I want to ask him in all seriousness if he thinks it is proper for him to bring individual cases to the minister's attention under this section. We are now discussing section 2 which is related to an examination of offences committed by our troops abroad. I know that the offence to which the hon. member was referring occurred in Hong Kong, but it looks as if the sentence had been passed. Here we are studying future cases. I think it would be more appropriate for the hon. member to bring up this case when the supplementary estimates of the Department of National Defence come before the committee.

Mr. Johnston: May I say to you that the clipping is not commenting on this legislation at all. It deals with an offence committed by Canadian troops in a foreign land, and that seems to me to come under this section.

The Chairman: I was not complaining about the clipping itself; I was just complaining about the fact that the hon. member is introducing individual cases which, apparently, have been dealt with by the court in Hong Kong, and in which sentence has been passed. Here we are dealing with a section contemplating future cases and offences committed abroad.

Mr. Johnston: What I am endeavouring to find out, Mr. Chairman, is whether or not this legislation will cover a case such as I have in mind. If it does not, then I think possibly some amendment to the legislation should be introduced now. Otherwise we are going to get into the same difficulty. The only reason I am trying to put this clipping on Hansard—I have already shown it to the associate minister—is that I was about to make some comment on the difference between the two sentences for the same offence. Then when I had read this clipping I was going to point out that while one sentence was for 18 months and the other for 12 months, the civil court in Hong Kong had reduced the 18 months sentence by 2 months. The minister explained to me that there was a mistake in the newspaper clipping, and that there had been a reduction of 2 months in the 18 months sentence. This brought the one sentence down to 16 months, while the other sentence remained at 12 months, and both sentences were for exactly the same offence.

The ridiculous aspect of the case, Mr. Chairman, is that a civil court in Hong Kong can take possession of two of our boys in the Canadian navy and impose entirely different sentences upon them for the same offence. In this particular case the lieutenant commander in charge of H.M.C.S. Crusader objected to this procedure. He used every means that was available to him to persuade the civil authorities in Hong Kong to turn these boys over to him for punishment. He could not do that because the authorities would not listen to him. We have, therefore, these two boys—particularly this one from Drumheller—serving sentences in Hong Kong which were imposed by a civil authority, yet apparently our own naval forces are supposed to administer justice to our own boys when they are in a foreign land.

It seems to me that, if necessary, this legislation should be amended to take care of such cases. I would ask the minister just where the justice comes in if our forces serving in a foreign port—I do not suppose you could call Hong Kong a foreign port, because it is a British possession—are subject to the jurisdiction of the foreign civil authorities and we have no say whatever over that. In my judgment the two sentences have no relation to the crime at all. Surely our government here should do something about this. I know the minister is concerned about it. He told me there were some doubts in his own mind as to just how much power the Hong Kong civil authorities had to deal with our forces.

I wonder if the minister would explain what has taken place in connection with that case, and what is going to be done in such cases in the future. If it is necessary to have some revision of this legislation in order to deal with such cases, then I think this is the time that should be done. Will the minister comment on that?

Mr. Campney: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member discussed this case with me, and I may say that representations are being made concerning it. I do not think I gave him the impression, at least I hope I did not, that we could by unilateral action do anything about it. Jurisdiction to try these two sailors did exist in the courts in Hong Kong. This section which we are discussing goes about as far as this parliament can go to put our service personnel in a position to make arrangements with a colony such as Hong Kong with regard to the handling of our own criminal cases. Without this section we have nothing to stand on at all. We have no jurisdiction even if they handed the men over to us. This section represents a step toward meeting the situation, and there is another step provided in the next section.

By ourselves we cannot legislate a colony or another dominion out of its own criminal jurisdiction, but unless we take unto ourselves the right to deal with our own service personnel, as this section endeavours to do, we could not even ask the other colonies or dominions to give us jurisdiction.

Mr. Johnston: The minister maintains that by passing this section provision will be made to enable us to deal with these cases?

Mr. Campney: We shall try, with the authority given, to negotiate arrangements in these cases to handle our own personnel. You cannot do it arbitrarily, but we would have under this section the jurisdiction if they will negotiate.

Mr. Quelch: Has the minister any reason to feel that any foreign power will agree to this legislation we are passing? Unless they will agree to it, it seems to me it is worthless.

Mr. Campney: As I understand it, under the arrangements which now exist with regard to Germany we will be charged with the administration of their criminal law as affecting our troops. Under the NATO status agreement I think we will have concurrent jurisdiction over our forces in that respect. In countries like Japan, where I may say we have been quite fortunate in negotiating temporary arrangements from time to time because they have been very co-operative, it will be a case of negotiating permanent arrangements. There will be, therefore, two or three different categories, but all of them rest on the basis that if we do get jurisdiction either by treaty, by mutual arrangement or by negotiation, this section enables us to carry out and exercise the jurisdiction we shall have obtained.

Mr. Johnston: Did I understand the minister to say he was making a further investigation concerning the case I brought before him?

Mr. Campney: Yes.

Mr. Pouliot: I read the words "service tribunal" in lines 15 and 17 of this section. I ask the minister to be kind enough to give us a definition of those two words.

Mr. Campney: I would say, Mr. Chairman, that the military tribunal would be a service tribunal as defined in the act which means a court martial or the person presiding at a summary trial such as the commanding officer, depending on where the jurisdiction rests.

Mr. Pouliot: Is there anything in the act to the effect that a service tribunal would operate only in certain definite countries, or in any particular country?

Mr. Campney: The service tribunal can, I suppose, in varying degrees—depending on treaties and so on—operate in any country where our troops are actually stationed. The extent to which it has exclusive jurisdiction is a matter of treaty or arrangement. It can actually deal with service offences of our troops that are in a country and offences outside of that within varying limits.

Mr. Pouliot: Is there any treaty with one or several countries with regard to the recognition of such a service tribunal?

Mr. Campney: Mr. Chairman, there are conventions. I shall give two or three illustrations to the hon. member. There was a convention concluded with the federal republic of Germany on May 26, 1952. That will come into effect when the Bonn treaty is ratified. It provides—and this would be applicable to our service tribunal—among other things the following provision:

> The members of the forces shall observe German law and the authorities of the forces shall undertake and be responsible for enforcement of German law except as otherwise provided in the present or in any future applicable convention or agreement.

That gives us jurisdiction in respect of their criminal law. The NATO status of forces agreement has a clause in it that gives each NATO country jurisdiction unless the offence is also an offence under our law. That is provided in this section. In some other countries we have a practical working arrangement, as in Japan. So the extent of our status depends on various factors.

Mr. Pouliot: Does Canada have such treaties with all countries, or with only a few?

Mr. Campney: We have the one to which I have referred, namely that with Western Germany. We have one with the 14 NATO countries, and at the present time we are engaged in negotiating one with Japan. I think that is the extent of our treaty effort, as far as I know.

Mr. Pouliot: I will explain to the minister where I am heading. Germany is divided into two parts, East and West Germany. In virtue of the treaty to which the hon. gentleman referred, service tribunals are recognized in western Germany but nothing is mentioned with regard to eastern Germany. We have not any troops there yet. But if a Canadian soldier crosses the boundary between western and eastern Germany and is found guilty by a service tribunal of an offence under the laws of eastern Germany, then this legislation will support the legislation of eastern Germany with whom there is no such treaty as the one which exists with western Germany. Then our Canadian soldier will be found guilty by a Russian tribunal in eastern Germany, in virtue of the laws in force in eastern Germany. That is why I suggest to the minister that he should be extremely cautious with regard to that legislation.

I am sure the department means well, but our soldiers may find that provisions like these may remind them of a double-barrelled gun. It is quite difficult to understand. If the minister cannot say that the service tribunals which can operate under this legislation should be only those of countries which have treaties with Canada, it may happen in other countries with which we have no treaties, and therefore it would be rather embarrassing for the Canadian soldier who may be there. It is true that we have no troops stationed now in eastern Germany, but it is easy for anyone to cross the border. If the one who crosses the border is a civilian he will fall under the law of eastern Germany, and the same thing will happen to the Canadian soldier who may cross the boundary on reconnaissance or otherwise. This therefore shows the minister how careful one must be in drafting legislation of this kind when international matters are concerned. It is an extremely difficult matter.

I would suggest to the minister the redrafting of that provision in order that consideration may be given to the Canadian soldier, the Canadian serviceman, who may have to appear in a country with which we have no treaty and who can be found guilty of any offence in virtue of the legislation of those foreign countries with which we have no binding treaties at the present time. We should be extremely careful about the matter. I am sure that it is enough to draw the attention of the hon. gentlemen to the difficulties that may arise from legislation like this, in order that some change may be made to clarify the legislation.

In addition, Mr. Chairman, one may take advantage of a tribunal that already exists. Military tribunals have existed for all time, from the time crusader King Louis IX of France rendered justice under the oak of Vincennes, from the time of the old warrior kings, to the time of the ordinary courts martial. A tribunal may be very useful upon one condition, namely that advantage is taken of it. What is the use of having military tribunals which decide nothing, as was the case after the notorious loss of the plans of the invasion of Normandy? I referred to that last week. Apparently the matter has not been submitted to any tribunal. What is the use of having a tribunal if offences as grave as that are not referred to them? There was also the case of the careless officer who had left a top secret document on the upper shelf in the clothes closet of his hotel room. No one knows if he has been punished. Apparently he has not, because if he had been, just as much publicity would have been given to the punishment as was given to the reward of those who corrected that situation.

Another suggestion I make to the minister is that if tribunals are established or recognized, I hope they will be taken advantage of in due course.

The Chairman: Shall clause 2 carry?

Mr. Higgins: It is obvious from this and the preceding section that servicemen will be tried or may be tried by civil tribunals in foreign countries. I am not moving ahead too rapidly, I hope, but there is no provision in the next section for a review either of the sentence or of the evidence. All the original section says is that the punishment will be on the scale that is considered appropriate, but that is before a military tribunal; it is not before a civil tribunal. And as I said before, a serviceman can be tried before a civil tribunal and receive grave punishment for an offence that would not be regarded too seriously in Canada. In the next succeeding section there is no power of review of the sentence of a civil court. There is provision if the offence is committed in Canada, but not if it is committed in a foreign country. I suggest to the minister that there should be power of review, in all such cases, of the evidence and of the punishment before any final decision is made.

Mr. Campney: May I inform the hon. member that under the section we have under consideration, the finding of any military tribunal will be subject to the same review and the same right of appeal to the court martial appeal board, as in the case of findings of military tribunals held in Canada.

Mr. Higgins: I am referring to civil courts in foreign countries. I think they should be subject to appeal.

Mr. Harkness: I am beginning to be a little sorry that I ever started this argument. It seems to me that it is a very dangerous thing for us to incorporate in a section here in the Canadian Forces Act what actually constitutes a contradiction of our ordinary concept of how justice should be carried on. It places in the hands of a court not only the ordinary powers which should always reside in a court, of determining whether a crime has been committed and then imposing the sentence which is laid down by the law, but in this instance it also gives to a military tribunal a legislative power. That is what it amounts to. It has the power of legislating what the punishment for the particular crime committed will be.

It seems to me that is completely contrary to all our concepts of how justice is administered. That is the reason I took objection to it at the beginning, as the minister will remember. I say that is particularly dangerous when you are dealing with the ordinary sort of court martial which is bound to be set up as far as our forces in a foreign country are concerned. As is usual, the court martial set up will be composed of whatever officers happen to be available at the time.

Having been unfortunate enough to be a member of a very large number of courts martial myself, I know that most people who sit on them are not too well adapted to that particular position. It just happens to be one of the military duties which an officer who is present and available has thrust upon him. In these circumstances I say that these military tribunals in most cases will not be composed of members of the judge advocate general's staff or other officers with legal training. It seems to me to be a particularly dangerous principle to put in the hands of that court what you might call legislative powers as well as ordinary powers of administering justice.

I ask the minister whether, when this section was being drafted, the advice of the deputy minister of justice and of the Department of Justice was taken in regard to this particular point especially.

Mr. Campney: The deputy minister of justice and the officials of the Department of Justice were consulted with respect to this section, as well as other sections of the bill.

Mr. Harkness: What advice did the Minister of Justice give in regard to the point I have raised, or was that point raised by him?

Mr. Campney: I am not able to answer specifically these two questions, but the section as it stands was dealt with by the Department of Justice and approved by them. I do not know all the minutiae they considered or what their views were. I should like to say this, that in all countries abroad where we have troops we now have a deputy advocate general who sits on every court martial. He is well versed both in military and civil law. Lastly, I should like to ask the hon. member what would be the alternative to what is proposed. Would he be in favour of handing all our military personnel over to the criminal courts of these countries? Unless we take some action such as proposed that would be the only alternative.

Mr. Harkness: I have already said I am not in favour of handing them over. As far as the language of this provision is going to keep these people in our own hands to deal with, I am all in favour of it. I do suggest to the minister that some words might be put before the final phrase to the effect that the punishment awarded would in no case be greater than that for the same or a similar offence under the military code, the Criminal Code or any other act of the parliament of Canada.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): While the hon. member for Temiscouata was speaking he reminded me of what seems to be an omission from this section, and it is a very important one. The note on the side under "Part I" says:

> 2. Subclause (1) would add a new section 119A to the National Defence Act. Subsection (1) of the new section would make it possible for Canadian service tribunals to enforce, in respect of members of the Canadian forces, the law of foreign countries where such members are serving.

I take it that is the intention of the section, but when you read the section you find there is nothing in it about where the forces are serving at all. It says:

> An act or omission that takes place out of Canada and would, under the law applicable in the place where the act or omission occurred, be an offence if committed by a person subject to that law, is an offence under this part, and every person who is found guilty thereof is liable to suffer punishment as provided in subsection 2.

That does not say anything about where the person is serving. The hon. member for Temiscouata referred to eastern Germany. But suppose a member of the Canadian forces leaves his billet in West Germany and goes on a tour through Holland, Belgium, France and Italy, and commits an offence in each country. It is not in the place where he is serving. He is not in the country where our troops are serving at all. Yet the act or omission which he commits has taken place out of Canada, and under the law applicable to that place where the act or omission occurred is an offence. Therefore it is an offence against this act; that is what is intended. What you are dealing with are offences committed by troops in countries where they are actually serving. Is that not so? This bill does not cover that at all.

Then the minister said it refers to countries with which Canada has treaties. I should say that it refers to countries with which Canada has an understanding or agreement, because notwithstanding the passage of this bill I think it will be necessary to have understandings with the authorities of the countries concerned that the personnel charged are liable under this act, and will receive due punishment for the crimes committed.

Mr. Campney: This section would give us power to exercise jurisdiction over our own military forces. So far as East Germany and other places of that category are concerned, the hon. member will understand that they would pay no attention to our legislation anyway. We have no troops there and, in any event, they would not recognize our law at all. They do not have to recognize our law, and would I am sure pay no attention to it whatsoever.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): But to put it another way, perhaps a soldier returning from Korea will come by ship by way of Australia, New Zealand and Honolulu. The same situation would apply there. I suggest that the minister is concerned with the country in which the troops are serving. Why not say that?

Mr. Hunter: Mr. Chairman, may I point out that what the hon. member for Calgary East has suggested is the very antithesis of the meaning of the section. When he suggests that we make the punishment similar to what the punishment would be for similar offences under our law, his suggestion of course was frankly absurd. I am sure he was not serious; because the very purpose of the section is to cover things which are not covered by our law.

I have also listened to the hon. member for Kamloops with some interest. He seems to be appalled that we are introducing new crimes into the act. Of course we are. The very purpose of the bill is to introduce a whole series of new crimes so that we have a point of negotiation with these countries, and can say, "We can try these people, because what has been committed is now a crime under our military law as well." That is the whole purpose of it; and I am sure the hon. member for Kamloops is aware of that. But I do not understand his argument when he brings that forward as a reason for not passing the section.

Then, so far as the argument of the hon. member for St. John's West is concerned, I would say it is simply a question of interpretation of the section. There have been quite a few legal minds working on it, and I would suggest that his interpretation is the wrong one.

Mr. Fulton: Obviously the hon. member has been a commanding officer too long. He loves to introduce new crimes.

Mr. Churchill: Our discussion of the section has to be in general terms. Would the minister give us some specific examples? We are talking about the application of a foreign law to personnel of the Canadian forces, and talking about new types of punishment unknown to Canadian law. That is the expression we see in the explanatory note.

The section as it now stands, if passed, would give to a service tribunal the opportunity of imposing upon Canadian citizens who happened to be in uniform in a foreign country types of punishment unknown to Canadian law. Could the minister give us some examples that were brought to his attention, or to that of members of his department, when the amendment was drafted? Would he give some examples to indicate the foreign law which differs from Canadian law, and the types of punishment which differ from or which are unknown to Canadian law.

Mr. Campney: I did not make any statement about military tribunals operating under this particular section imposing punishments foreign to Canadian law. This section is to permit military tribunals to deal with offences under foreign law. There are many different offences under the criminal laws of different countries. In arriving at a punishment military tribunals would look at what would seem to be appropriate, having regard to our own Criminal Code and presumably to the type of offence and the punishment in the country in which it was committed. The tribunal would have to arrive at what it considered to be under all those circumstances a proper punishment. I did not say at any time that we propose to administer punishments as contained in foreign criminal codes.

Mr. Churchill: What further explanation would the minister make of that part of the section which says:

—the service tribunal shall impose the punishment in the scale of punishments that it considers appropriate, having regard to the punishment prescribed by the law applicable in the place where the act or omission occurred.

And what is meant by the explanatory note where it says:

This is necessary because foreign law in some cases makes provision for types of punishment unknown to Canadian law.

Mr. Campney: All I can say is that as I interpret the section—and I have said this two or three times—it means that our military tribunals in those cases where they can obtain jurisdiction, by the various means I have mentioned, are to mete out the punishment they consider appropriate, having regard to the Criminal Code or other acts of the parliament of Canada, so far as they can assess and apply them in regard to the offences charged under foreign law.

Punishment under such circumstances is admittedly like any other punishment, even the punishment meted out by the judges in our own criminal courts from day to day, in that it is almost entirely a matter of discretion with the judge in each case. There are various opinions held by various judges. This does not change the basic principle that the judge or tribunal must assume the responsibility for the punishment meted out. All this section seeks to do is indicate to those tribunals, if one can use a general term, that there should be a Canadian type of punishment. Beyond that the tribunal, subject to review, subject to appeal and to all the other safeguards in the National Defence Act, in the first instance uses its own discretion, having regard to all the circumstances.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Why is not the minister willing to insert in the section a clause to the effect that where Canadian troops are serving is the only place the service tribunal will have jurisdiction? It will not have jurisdiction over offences committed at points outside of where the troops are serving, or the NATO countries to which he has referred. When our troops were training in the state of Washington was there any agreement with the United States government whereby the Canadian service tribunal could try a man for an offence committed against United States law at that time?

Supposing a man were on leave from England or Germany, and committed an offence in some place such as Ireland or Sweden, outside the NATO countries; would such offences be regarded as offences against the National Defence Act of Canada and render a man liable to punishment?

Mr. Campney: They could be, I suppose; but we would have no jurisdiction in other countries, in any event, in respect of this or any other section.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): That is not really an answer to the point I raised. Supposing one of our soldiers is on leave in Sweden, a country with which there is no agreement, and commits an offence against the law of that country. Under this section it becomes an offence against this act. Thus the offender is rendered liable to punishment under the act, and trial would be by a Canadian service tribunal. But there is no agreement with the Swedish government regarding that. My understanding from the sidenote is that the amending section is intended to cover an offence where our troops are serving.

Mr. Campney: In the case of an offence committed in Sweden, we could do one of two things. We could not seek to assert jurisdiction but we could go to the Swedish government and say, "We have authority under our act to try this serviceman; will you hand him over to us?" We could not willy-nilly exercise jurisdiction, but he would be no worse off if he were in our hands. I do not think any person in the services or any other civilian is going to fare any worse by being tried by his fellow Canadians than he would if he were tried by someone else.

Mr. Higgins: Does not the minister feel that there should be the power of review under that section?

Mr. Campney: There is a general power of review under the act which would apply to this section just the same as any other.

Mr. Higgins: The power of review of a civilian tribunal?

Mr. Campney: These are not civilian tribunals at any stage. We are dealing with the military.

Mr. Higgins: You have no review over civilian tribunals; you have no control over civilian tribunals in foreign countries.

Mr. Harkness: In addition to the matter we have been talking about, this section deals with certain other matters. The provision for the transfer of offenders seems to be quite reasonable. Subsection 3 reads:

> Where the court martial appeal board has set aside a finding of guilty but another finding of guilty remains, the board shall forthwith refer the proceedings to the minister, or to such other authority as he may prescribe or appoint for that purpose, who shall
> (a) affirm the punishment imposed by the court martial if the court martial could legally have imposed that punishment upon the finding of guilty that remains; or
> (b) subject to section one hundred and seventy-five, substitute for the punishment imposed by the court martial such new punishment or punishments as he considers appropriate.

Then in subsection 4 we find this:

> Where an appellant has been found guilty of an offence and the court martial could on the charge have found him guilty under section one hundred and twenty of some other offence, or could have found him guilty of some other offence on any alternative charge that was laid—

There you have the position that the minister or his appointee has the power to substitute for the punishment imposed by the court martial such new punishment or punishments as he considers appropriate. A man might be tried on a certain charge and found guilty. The court martial appeal board finds that he is not guilty of that charge, but they have the power to say that he is guilty of some other charge for which he was never tried, and to award such punishment as they consider appropriate on that other charge. That is not in consonance with the ordinary methods of discharging justice.

[Mr. Campney.]

Mr. Campney: The sections to which the hon. member refers provide merely for the adaptation to the procedure under the Canadian Forces Act of the present procedure contained in the Criminal Code. In other words, to save a multiplicity of trials and for various other reasons these provisions were put in the Criminal Code to allow the court of appeal to vary the charge and to change the sentence. There is nothing new about this; it is simply adopting the criminal practice of our civil courts.

Mr. Harkness: It is not the court of appeal that varies the sentence; the sentence is varied or a new sentence is imposed by the minister or his appointee without the man being heard on that charge.

Mr. Campney: The minister imposes the punishment, but in the other particulars it is the court martial appeal board which acts. Section 175 of the act provides that the minister cannot impose a greater sentence; he can reduce the sentence, but he cannot step it up. I think that is covered in the act itself.

Mr. Harkness: That may be covered in the act itself, but it is not covered by these particular subsections.

Mr. Campney: It does not need to be; it is in the substantive sections of the act.

Mr. Harkness: The minister spoke as though it were the court martial appeal board which was doing this. If the court martial appeal board had heard the appeal and imposed a different sentence than that which had been imposed by the court martial originally, I think that would be in consonance with the general way in which justice is carried on. But it is not the court martial appeal board which does that; it is the minister or somebody appointed by him. I think it would have been better to have left the power of imposing a new sentence in the hands of the court martial appeal board.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. Harkness: Is the minister not going to make any comment about leaving the matter in the hands of the court martial appeal board?

Mr. Campney: My understanding is that the changing or altering of the charge rests with the court martial appeal board, but the punishment is not under the court martial appeal board and never has been. That position runs through the whole chain of sequence. The last appeal with respect to the quantum of punishment is with the minister under the act.

Mr. Churchill: In replying to my other question the minister did not give any specific examples. I should like to ask what purpose is served by having the service tribunal, in the words of this section, have regard to the punishment prescribed by the law applicable in the place where the act or omission occurred. What purpose is served by having the service tribunal examine the types of punishment if, as the minister says, they are to apply only to the types of punishment which are applicable under this act, the Criminal Code or any other act of the parliament of Canada?

Mr. Campney: I have already given as clear an explanation as I can. I think the intent of the section is that the military tribunal trying an offence pursuant to this section is instructed by the subsection to impose such punishment as it considers appropriate. If I interpret the words correctly, that is a discretionary direction. In other words it puts the onus on the tribunal of deciding on the punishment, "having regard to the punishment prescribed by the law applicable in the place where the act or omission occurred".

In other words, the tribunal must first look at the law of the place where the offence was committed, then at the punishment prescribed for the same or similar offences if they can be found in the Criminal Code or any other act of the parliament of Canada. I think that simply means that the tribunal looks at the punishments of the country where the offence occurred, it looks at the law of Canada and at offences under the Criminal Code or similar statutes which it thinks relevant, and then imposes the punishment that it considers appropriate. I do not think I can make it any clearer.

Mr. Churchill: I come back to my original question. What types of punishment might be imposed by a service tribunal, for example in Germany, France or Belgium?

Mr. Campney: I have not a list of those punishments. It has just been called to my attention that in some of those countries they have what used to obtain in England, that is the punishment of transportation for life or for a fixed period of time to some place where I suppose nobody would want to go to. That is one example, and there are many others although I have not further examples in mind.

Mr. Higgins: Apparently I have not made myself clear, because the minister has not answered me. Let me put this to him in conclusion. Is it not conceivable that a serviceman in Korea could commit some crime as a result of which he could be sentenced to death by a civil tribunal, and that there would be no power of review in that case by military authorities. Is that not correct?

Mr. Campney: In reply to the hon. member, I would say that I am informed with respect to Korea specifically that the civil courts have no criminal jurisdiction over our troops. With respect to many countries, if one of our troops went to any of them and committed an offence, later had a proper trial in accordance with the law and procedure of that country and was sentenced to death, we could not do anything about it except make representations.

Section agreed to.

Section 3 agreed to.

On section 4—Ordinary residence of members of regular forces.

Mr. Harkness: So far as the Canadian forces voting regulations are concerned, can the minister inform us what lists of Canadian service voters are maintained, where they are maintained and in what way they can be made available to candidates who have service voters in their constituencies?

Mr. Campney: As I understand it, the provision of lists and relevant matters is covered by regulation 27 of the Canadian forces voting regulations which, as they are a schedule to the statute, I understand have the force of law. If he will refer to page 16 of the voting regulations—

Mr. Harkness: Page 16 of what?

Mr. Campney: Regulation 27 of the Canadian forces voting regulations, which constitute a schedule to the elections act, provides for the compilation of certain lists, etc., and as I understand it that is the law in that regard.

Mr. Nowlan: That is the very difficulty with which we are faced in dealing with these regulations tonight. As I pointed out this afternoon in dealing with the principle on second reading of the bill, these matters were considered for a long time by the elections committee and certain procedures were finally agreed upon. As I understand it, these regulations have been in operation for quite a few years. They started during the war when we had troops overseas and it was proposed to give them the right to vote, which of course they should have. Regulations were drafted for that purpose. These regulations were continued, and the whole matter came up for review before the elections committee, which spent some two years in dealing with it.

The original regulations provided for service personnel filing certain statements even up to the time of the election or on election day, and having filed those they could then vote. That was the declaration on the back of the envelope, and some adaptation of that was carried on for some years. When the committee met in 1950 and 1951 and dealt with the matter, by agreement of all parties represented on the committee the machinery was amended and, I think, improved. Provision was made whereby service personnel had to file a declaration within three months after the adoption of those regulations. That was done by section 23. They then filled out what was known as form 15. Another provision was made whereby those who came in after that date would fill out form 16 showing their place of origin. Another provision was made that in December of each year thereafter, and only at that time, could service personnel change their declaration as to place of residence.

Therefore you had three forms, and a regular and orderly procedure was set up whereby records could be maintained. As was suggested by the question a moment ago, you could get access to those records to find out who was entitled to vote and who was not. As the associate minister pointed out a moment ago, section 27 of the regulations is the first procedure to be set forth in the regulations whereby lists were to be prepared and records could be obtained. As provided by that section, once a candidate is nominated the machinery is not too comprehensive. First he has to be nominated; but once nominated, and after the election has been declared, the candidate or his agent may go to the unit headquarters or national defence headquarters and obtain certain information. That was the result of the work of the committee.

We have not yet been given any suggestion as to the reason for the amendments now proposed. If the regulations have been complied with, and I presume they have been because we have been told by the associate minister and the minister that the Department of National Defence is most efficient, then by three months after June of 1951 when these regulations were passed all these declarations should have been signed, and in December, 1951 and December, 1952 anybody who wished to change his place of residence would have done so. Presumably one set of those records is at national defence headquarters and the other is following the man wherever he may be posted. If an election is called tomorrow or a month from tomorrow, it will be open to any hon. member to obtain access to these records through his agent.

When you read the proposed amendment you see that for some reason it is proposed now to scrap all that machinery and extend the time for the filing of these declarations to the date of dissolution of the present parliament. That can be found in subsection 2 which reads as follows:

> Every member of the regular forces who was such a member on the twenty-first day of June, 1952, shall before the dissolution of the twenty-first parliament complete in duplicate—

Then there is a reference to form 15. Presumably they were completed two years ago or a year ago, and I think the committee is entitled to some explanation of why these records are apparently being scrapped and new records are now going to be made.

We go on to the amendment to paragraph 34 of the regulations, and we find that if these declarations are not available on election day the voter can complete a declaration at that time. The amendment reads in part as follows:

> —or, if no such statement appears to have been made, he shall subscribe to a statement in form No. 16 . . .

And so on. Everyone is anxious to see machinery set up whereby every serviceman obtains the vote. There is no question about that; but it is in the interests of service personnel as well as the government and the candidates that that be done in an orderly and regular way.

Something was said a while ago by the hon. member for Calgary East about officers being detailed for court martial work who have sometimes lacked experience. I think the Associate Minister of National Defence will probably agree with me that officers detailed for the purpose of superintending the election procedure are not very senior officers. They are probably junior officers on the stations. I have heard that some of them have used the slang expression, whatever it may mean, that they were "Joe'd" for this particular task. Some non-commissioned officer will be detailed to assist them. It is now proposed to create a situation by these regulations whereby even on election day these officers can be swamped with requests to complete these declarations.

We have had a long and interminable legal argument tonight, which shows how lawyers can become involved. I am quite certain that if the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, the Associate Minister of National Defence and I were to sit down calmly in one of our offices tonight and discuss the meaning of some of these regulations, we might spend an hour and in the end we would scratch our heads and have to admit that we were quite confused. I ask you what is going to happen when junior officers, N.C.O.'s and so on are faced with the rush and hurly-burly of an election, and twenty fellows come in and want to vote and get away on leave. How are these regulations going to be set out; and why should they be changed now?

The questions which the hon. member for Calgary East has suggested have to be answered. There should be an explanation as to why it was necessary to change these regulations now, and why the time should be extended up to the time of dissolution. If there was no necessity for it, then we certainly will be facing a situation which I am sure none of us want, either for ourselves or for our respective parties or for the service personnel who are involved.

I would hope the minister can give us some explanation, first as to why this is proposed, and secondly I think if the time is to be extended undoubtedly there is some reason for it. If the time is extended to the date of dissolution, then that is as far as it is possible to extend it.

After all, we are not in the confidence of the government. Frankly I do not suppose the associate minister himself knows the date of dissolution as yet. I do not assume it is going to be tomorrow or the day after tomorrow or two weeks from now. There has to be some reasonable application, and surely a provision can be made which can be followed. There could be a provision passed by this house that a declaration should be made before a certain date. After that you could get a list of the records; you would have access to the departmental records, and you would have the names and addresses of the men. There would be some order to the procedure. The matter should not be left until the election date, when there is absolutely nothing that can be done.

Mr. Campney: There is nothing mysterious or subtle about this proposed amendment. It is an attempt to meet a situation which I should like to outline briefly. As the hon. member has just said, the voting regulations which came into effect on June 21, 1952, provided that within three months, that is by September 21, 1952, each member of the services should complete a form declaring that in the event of an election for purposes of voting his residence should be either (a) the residence of his wife or other relative; (b) the residence of himself arising out of his service; or (c) the residence he had prior to his enrolment.

Subsequently, as I understand it, those entering the service after June 1, 1952, were required to disclose on form 16 the place where they enrolled. They were limited to that place. They could not take advantage of the other two alternatives open to those who had completed form 15. Those service personnel who elected and completed form 15 or form 16, as I have indicated, may in December of each year elect to change to one or the other of the three alternatives.

There has been very little trouble with respect to the last category, that is those who came into the services after June 21, 1952, because along with their attestation papers and all the other papers which they have to complete, most of them completed their declaration forms with regard to residence. But there has been a great deal of difficulty with respect to the other categories, those who entered the services prior to June 21, 1952, because they are all over the world. There have been, I think, all reasonable efforts made to get their forms completed, but the fact is, as the information has come to me, that there are about 20,000 personnel in the services who should have completed form 15 before September 21, 1952, who have not done so.

Of course that raises a problem as to whether or not these people shall be entitled to vote. The law officers of the crown, notwithstanding what may have been intended by the committee which dealt with these regulations, are of the opinion that these people who have never elected can, if they so desire, present themselves for a ballot and complete, under form 7, the declaration of their place of residence for the purpose of having their vote recorded in a certain constituency, and in that connection can select any one of the three original alternatives that were permissible in connection with form 15. If that is so it means that in certain areas where there were large numbers of service people many could present themselves in one constituency and demand to vote there. On the other hand, if the law officers of the crown are wrong, then such personnel are disfranchised; they cannot vote at all.

Unfortunately, it is probable that the adjudication of this question would not take place before an election; and whichever contention is correct, it might have the effect of invalidating quite a number of elections. For these reasons, not wanting to disfranchise such military personnel and not wanting to put them in the position where they could become the subject of agitation en masse by candidates, it has been felt that they should be given a further right of election.

I do not know how many of them will take advantage of it. There may not be any great number. However, they were serving in the forces before this procedure came into effect and it is felt that those who wish to have the right of election should have a further time to make the election which should have been made before September 21, 1952, thus declaring in what constituency they want their residence fixed for the purpose of recording their vote. If they do not do that before dissolution, then along with any other people who have not taken the proper declaration they can only do one thing. They can exercise their right to vote, but they can only vote on the basis of having their vote recorded in the place from which they originally came.

In other words, on the one hand we want to prevent any activities that might lead to agitation among groups of people in places where the service people are in great numbers, and on the other hand we do not want to deprive them completely of their franchise. It is felt that the procedure proposed is fair and reasonable in both respects. That was the reason for these two amendments. It was primarily to give some further opportunity to the 20,000 servicemen who are distributed all over the world and have not so far elected. Practically all of them were in the services when these regulations were drawn, but still many of them have not complied with the regulations. Instead of just washing them out, we felt that they ought to have these two opportunities: One, to make their declaration before dissolution; or failing that, to vote if they so desired, their vote to be recorded in the constituency in which they enrolled.

Mr. Nowlan: That could very easily be rectified, then, without extending the time to the election date. The minister could move an amendment to these regulations to provide that those men who have not filed a declaration under (a), (b) or (c) shall be deemed to have the right to vote at their point of origin. We have their service records and we know the points from which they originated, so we would not have to wait until the election date to find out whether or not they were going to complete one of these forms. No one wants to see a man disfranchised.

I am rather surprised that the Department of Justice should say they have the right to vote anyway, despite the fact the regulations say they shall do certain things. If that is right and these men could come in and demand the right to vote, I do not see why we are passing any regulations. They had the right to vote before they filed the declaration, and if they failed to file a declaration or set forth a new declaration then they vote at the place from which they came originally.

I think if we had an amendment such as that we would be meeting the situation. But to permit the matter to go on I do not think should be allowed. After all, as to section 27 to which the associate minister referred my hon. friend, about the list and obtaining information, I think the minister will admit that, under this present machinery, that is useless. It may be that all the men will file declarations. But someone has obviously fallen down on the job if over 20,000 have not filed declarations. Possibly they are not interested. We know perhaps that, as in all walks of life, some are not interested in the franchise. But it would look to me as though somebody has slipped badly is not giving these orders and not having seen that these declarations were filed. Will this give further time for the completion of these declarations and then provide that those who have not completed them can vote on election day by voting in the place from which they originally came at the time of enlistment?

Mr. Campney: Is that not what we are doing?

Mr. Nowlan: No. You are providing that they can go on right up to election day and nobody knows who is who or what is what.

Mr. Campney: No.

Mr. Nowlan: I think the minister is mistaken.

The Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the minister what arrangements will be made for advising these 20,000 to whom he refers of this extension of time? Is it just a case of the act being passed by parliament and the news possibly getting to these men or possibly not, or can they be informed directly? If they can be informed directly, could arrangements not be made for a more definite date?

As to the suggestion that is made here, I can see the point of it, namely the date of the dissolution of parliament; but we here do not yet know what that date is although it may be that before this debate is over we shall get that information. I know that in 1949 we were informed about a week ahead as to when dissolution would be. In 1945 we were informed several weeks ahead. Mr. King talked about the efflux of time. But there have been dissolutions in history which were just like that, on the spur of the moment. If that sort of thing were to happen this time would it not be better to fix some definite date or some definite point of time and make the necessary arrangements to get that information to the 20,000 men who are affected?

Mr. Campney: The intention is, if this amendment is passed, to do two things—one, certainly. The other is still under consideration. The first is to have set out in orders to all units the course still open to those who have not complied with regulations. Second, we are also considering sending to each member of the personnel in the services a personal letter setting out the course open to him and the time within which he can take advantage of that course. We are going to make a last endeavour.

This matter has been pressed in the past but it is rather difficult to get a man to complete these forms if he is not too interested. The protection of his vote may not mean too much to him. We are intending to make a thorough final effort. How much will result from it I do not know; but we do feel that we should at least impress on service personnel the importance of the vote, because otherwise men will begin to think of their franchise only when the election approaches, and when it may be too late.

Mr. Knowles: May I press again the other point I was making, namely the fact that the phrase "the dissolution of parliament" does not mean much to the average serviceman. I realize that to suggest a specific date may in effect provide a shorter time, but what I am afraid of is that some of these men will confuse that phrase "dissolution of parliament" with the date of the election or the date of nomination day, or what have you. "Dissolution of parliament" is something that is known perhaps to most of the members of the House of Commons. We know what it involves and what happens. But some of these men may just put it off and decide to file the necessary form when the date of the election is announced. The time the date of the election is announced might be the very night that parliament is dissolved; and he wakes up next morning intending to attend to the matter and finds it is too late. If the minister cannot do anything else about it I suggest that in the communication to the men there should be an indication that the dissolution of parliament may happen at any time, and that they had better deal with this matter right away.

The Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Churchill: I want to support what has been said with regard to setting a definite date for the completion of these forms rather than waiting for the indefinite date of the dissolution of parliament. I am a bit surprised that 20,000 members of the armed forces have not completed these forms. From the minister's statement I gathered that there was a voluntary aspect to this thing; but the clause, as it now stands in the regulations, is mandatory. The suggested clause uses the words "shall . . . complete, in duplicate, before a commissioned officer" and so on. There is no choice in the matter. It is a military order. There must have been some breakdown in administration whereby 20,000 personnel have not completed the forms which were required to be completed. It strikes me as being a strange thing indeed.

The fact that the forces are scattered all over the world is not an impressive statement, because surely the high command is in touch with every unit, no matter where it may be. In the past the promulgation of orders has always been considered to be the only thing that was essential in order to get duties performed. The minister suggested that perhaps they might communicate with the individuals who had not yet completed the form. Again, surely that is not necessary. The commanding officers of the units, with their adjutants to do the work, are the people responsible. The publication of an order from national defence headquarters should be sufficient. But no matter how it is done, we hope it will be done quickly and that by the time the date arrives we shall not find half the number with forms not completed.

The actual date for the signing of the form I think should be set within a reasonable time; and a reasonable time for the services does not require a long period of months. This thing surely can be done quickly. Where are the man's papers? They should be in the keeping of the unit to which he belongs or at the headquarters of the formation to which he is attached. Surely the personnel who have not completed these forms can, in the usual service manner, be paraded—whether it is on pay day or on some other occasion—and these forms completed. Certainly the date should be set, I would say, within a matter of weeks and should not be extended to the indefinite time of the dissolution of parliament.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Nowlan: No. I should like to ask the minister what happened to those that have filed forms. We are told there are 20,000 that have not been completed. We have 104,000 in the armed forces, or so we were told the other day. From that I assume that approximately 80,000 have been filed. I notice a shaking of the head by the minister. I am simply taking it from the statement that 20,000 have not been filed. We have some number, which we may call "X"—whether it is 80,000 or 50,000—which have been completed. What is going to happen there? They are now told: You shall go ahead and file declarations. The section says:

> Every member of the regular forces who was such a member on the twenty-first day of June, 1952, shall before the dissolution of the twenty-first parliament complete, in duplicate, before a commissioned officer, a statement of ordinary residence.

Are you going to file another one?

Mr. Campney: The section is only to take care of people who have not filed.

Mr. Nowlan: It does not say that. It says that every member shall file, and certainly we need a negative in this thing somewhere. We need a prohibition this time if we did not have it before. Then it goes on to say: "If it appears." How it appears I do not know; by a looking-glass, by a mirror, or what have you. But if it appears to somebody on election day that the declaration has not been filed the serviceman may file one. I am suggesting that this regulation should be amended to provide a definite time within which the declaration should be filed. It could be done in two weeks very easily, and after that the matter should be closed.

Mr. Harris: Perhaps I might be permitted to say a few words about this because the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings mentioned my name earlier in the debate. He is now suggesting that we do what we did two years ago. He is now saying, let us fix a time limit within which these people are to file these declarations. We did that, and they did not do it.

Mr. Nowlan: Whose fault was it?

Mr. Harris: It is not the fault of the government.

Mr. Fraser: It certainly is.

Mr. Harris: No; let us be perfectly frank about it. Everybody in this house who knows anything about the armed forces knows how these things do not get done for one reason or another, and I am not reflecting on the army a little bit. We are just facing the fact that 20,000 soldiers have not done what our committee thought they should do, and fixed a time limit within which they should do it. Now, in order not to disfranchise these people, in order to regularize a way of voting, we have suggested an amendment which will extend the time within which they will do this, and then after that those who fail to do so may still vote under the following subsection.

When my hon. friend suggests a time limit, in reference to dissolution, is he going to say a month from the passing of the bill? I do not know. Under these circumstances if you had dissolution—

Mr. Nowlan: That is what we had before. We had December there before.

Mr. Harris: No, that is a different matter. We are referring to the filing of the declaration now. The December act was the annual transfer of his place of residence. Of course he can still do it, but he can only do it—

Mr. Nowlan: After he has filed.

[Mr. Nowlan.]

Mr. Harris: After he files it. That is the trouble; he has not filed it. Let us face the facts, and let us provide an amendment to the service regulations which would permit him now, I hope under pressure, and having this thing drawn to his attention, to carry out the wishes of the committee which worked on this for two years.

I am frank to admit that none of us at the time contemplated that this would not be done at this time, but when we found it was not done we provided this amendment. By subsection 2 we have provided that it shall come into force on the 21st day of September, which was the date by which they should make this declaration, and that I think overcomes my hon. friend's objection.

Let us remember that these people should vote. They are some of the best citizens of Canada, and they should be given another opportunity to conform to the wishes of the committee as to the form in which they may vote. I suggest to my hon. friends in all jocularity that they would have more time between now and dissolution if we passed the bill tonight.

Mr. Knowles: It might also help if the minister would tell us the date of dissolution.

The Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): No. I am quite unable to understand the answer to one question asked by the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings. I realize that 20,000 men have not made their returns. I do not want to disfranchise them. That leaves two questions, the first of which is the date by which they are supposed to come in and register. Though at first the Associate Minister of National Defence shook his head, I understand that if they do not come in by that time, then they can come in on election day at their headquarters and seek to vote then.

That seems to me to be just full of possibilities of all kinds of confusion. I would certainly like to know whether the suggestion of the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings has been seriously considered; that if they do not come in within the period of the delay which has been given, from that time on their votes be counted at their homes, not at their stations. That is what I understand the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings to say. He does not want them crowding in at the last moment and causing confusion there. Perhaps the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings will correct me if I have not properly interpreted his suggestion.

Mr. Campney: If you want this latter group of people who have been delinquent in filing to vote at all, then they will have to vote where they are at their stations. I think your point is being covered because at that time they will only be allowed to have their vote counted in the constituency in which they enrolled. They cannot elect to have it counted where they are living at the time of the election or in any other place than where they lived on enrolment. How would they actually vote in their constituencies if they are scattered all over many remote stations; how could they get to their original constituencies?

Mr. Nowlan: How do you know they are going to complete the form in this way? That is the danger when you let it go until election day. You could get a group of men in one room, and somebody would fill it out for them, as has happened before; he would fill out 20, 30 or 40 certificates and pass them out while they were smoking cigarettes. That has happened on more than one occasion. We have sworn evidence to the effect that it has happened. That was the very thing we attempted to avoid, but that is the very thing we are effecting here.

I do think there should be some further consideration given to this. The Associate Minister of National Defence and the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration should put their heads together. If they did that I am quite sure they could come to a solution which would be satisfactory. In any event, there certainly ought to be some amendment to regulation 27 to give us a better opportunity to secure information than is now possible. The whole machinery that has been set up has been nullified, and I think overnight the Associate Minister of National Defence and the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration should talk this over. Both these gentlemen are benign Christian gentlemen as well as the soul of honour and integrity. Since they realize the position in which they have put this house I am sure they can work together and come to a conclusion which would satisfy everybody.

Mr. Harris: Before we postpone this another night perhaps I might add one word. I think everybody realizes that if this amendment is carried there should not be 20,000 people on election day who will have to use form 16. We certainly hope that by the time this parliament is dissolved the number will have been materially reduced, to the point where there will be few left; and of this few, probably few will vote. But at the same time I think the committee would want those soldiers who for one reason or another, inadvertence, inability, on leave or one of a dozen reasons, have not completed the declaration, assuming that they are honest men, to vote on election day somewhere, to cast their ballots in the dominion election.

Now then, the way to do that is to follow form 16, which is referred to in the section that we are dealing with. If he has not filed his declaration there, the subsection reads that he shall subscribe to a statement in form 16, and the place of ordinary residence to be declared in form 7 shall be the place of ordinary residence shown in form 16; and form 16 reads:

> That my place of ordinary residence in Canada, immediately prior to the date of my enrolment, as prescribed in paragraph 23 of the Canadian forces voting regulations, was—

So and so. So we bring it down to the few people left, those who are going in on the final day to say, "On the date of my enrolment, I was living at such a place." These are the people who gave us trouble on one former occasion. I think we have a large percentage of them at this time. I am quite sure that the army, having been conscious of the difficulties which arose after the 1949 election, will do their best in the meantime to minimize it, and on election day see that it does not occur again.

The Chairman: Shall the section carry?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): No, it does not carry. I have a better suggestion than that of the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings, and that is that the two ministers whom he has so highly praised, with himself as a third, might be able to work out something better. I do not see why we should let this go. I do not share with the minister the feeling that one day is going to matter so much.

Mr. Chevrier: Don't get angry.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I was never more angelic.

Section stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we shall take up the third reading of Bill No. 336, to provide assistance for the higher education of children of certain deceased members of the armed forces and of other persons; then Bill No. 48, respecting food, drugs, cosmetics and therapeutic devices; the resolution in the name of the Minister of Resources and Development respecting the National Housing Act, 1944; the resolution to amend the Canadian Broadcasting Act, 1936; Bill No. 332, respecting the Canadian forces; Bill No. 316, relating to trade marks and unfair competition. If we are fortunate enough to pass these items of business we shall move to go into supply and call two departments, finance and legislation, with the items to stand, following which we would go ahead with the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Better call the house at nine o'clock for all that.
