tion in Vogue That Keeps Them in Good Repair-Good Highways Means Something More Than to Build Them.

COMMON STREETS OF CITIES.

The organization which cares for the French roads has made them famous all over the world. For comfort of travel for man and beast they surpass the common streets of cities. They are as smooth as asphalt, infinitely more satisfactory to travel over, free from mud and dust, and altogether satisfactory. It is not the organization which had to do with the building of the roads which gives such grand attogether satisfactory. It is not the organization which had to do with the building of the roads which gives such grand results. It is the system of repair and constant attention which so the French roads in perfect condition. Gangs of men are not seen working on the roads. From the neat piles of broken stone on the grass plats along the roadside, an occasional workman picks a few pieces, puts them into a place which shows a slight weakness, hammers them down and passes on. This one "stitch in time" keeps the road good. The road is not allowed to wear out or show evidences of decay. There is a man watching every spot which shows the slightest weakness, and, because of this constant attention, extensive repairs are never necessary. French roads are renewed by the handful. One man caree for miles of roadway. The people of France have, at a moderate cost, a highway which never deteriorates. The road is always in ideal condition. The gutters are trimmed, the grass plats along the side are always neat and clean, and the main ditches on the outside are free from all rubbish. The surface of the roadway is kept dry by small open drains across the grassy borders are about three inches above the road, the sod is cut out about eight inches wide and four inches deep, with a spade, and the drain neatly scraped out. The bottoms are not lined with stone, and very little work is needed to make or keep these small drains. They are placed from lifty to eighty feet apart, and if the road slopes, they run diagonally down the slope. It is entirely possible to devote a large amount of thought and money to the construction of roads. To, have good highways means something more than to build them. It means a system of maintenance, a system for their care, which is far more complex, far more difficult of organization, than that which has to do with building them. The building of a road is an engineering problem, involving knowledge, specification and superintendence. These will build a good road, but the mind which builds has its application only during the process of letting the contract and attending to its execution. The

A COMMON LOAD IN FRANCE. of a relatively short time. Road maintenance is an organization which must extend over all time. It is something more than knowledge. It means continuous vigilance as well as knowledge. The community which organizes for the purpose of doing work which extends over a certain limited, definite period, should also thoughtfully organize to perpetuate a successful working plan which will continue satisfactorily in operation during a long term of the living that expenditure of the living that expenses the same cause they themselves have created this danger. Let them exercise common business sense in electing honest and competent men to work the roads, and the danger will disappear.—Philip Snyder, in the Cultivator.

The Necessity of Good Roads.

The need of improvement in the quality of county roads is so severely felt in every state of the Union that every intelligent effort in that direction is worthy of recognition.

Most of the states can be a successful to the county roads is so severely felt in every state of the Union that every intelligent effort in that direction is worthy of recognition. persistence, a farther-reaching mind to organize for the care of roads than it does for their construction. All good roads, if neglected, soon become bad roads, and roads, if well cared for, soon become good roads. The best and the easiest way to get good roads is to begin by taking care of those we have. Many broken-stone roads are far from being smooth, clean, elegant roadways. They are full of ruts, and many places are filled with mud and water. A little constant everyday care would make good roads again. The mud and water should be scraped out of the depressions, and the opening filled with broken stone and gravel. This should be rolled, or pugged according to the size of the depression. As other low spots make their appearance they should be treated in the same way. Slight but constant attention after rains would keep nearly all roads in most excellent condition.

Most of the states can better afford to have good roads than to worry along, as at present, with bad ones. Our roads, as they are, cost us vast sums of money directly, and a far greater amount indirectly in the increased cost of getting profuce to sion, better methods of construction and repair are absolutely necessary. The work a vast one, but it is indispensable, and it amount be prosecuted to diligently. — Louisville Courier-Journal.

A Frank Explanation.

Guide—This room, ladies and gentlemen, is the one in which the Duke of Guise was assassinated.

Tourist—Are you sure? A different room was shown to me when I called here there years ago.

Guide—That's easily explained, sir. You see, this part of the building was being repaired just about that time.—European

Through the agitation of the manufac-turers of bicycles, in behalf of their indus-try, great interest has been awakened in the interest of better roads in the farming districts. Now that the subject has been districts. Now that the subject has been presented, the farmers begin to realize somewhat the pitiable condition in which they have been during all these years of rapid advancement in all respects, except in road making. Several States of late have had road conventions, and in Iowa the State is being organized by counties, for systematic work in behalf of more permanent improvement than the ordinary grade of a prairie roadway provides. grade of a prairie roadway provides.— Western Rural.

The Advantage of Good Roads. Good roads are not only a local advan-age, but are related to the industrial devel-opment of the whole community.

aind, judging by the papers and various mphlets; but most writers seem to be divious of the first practical step necessary to carry forward the agitation. It is not to be supposed that because writers ere and there favor the movement strong-r, or that the L. A. W. (League of Amrican Wheelmen) is unanimous for better oads, that therefore a great reform in road effort. People who think so are not well posted as to the conservatism of the farmers and their dislike of innovation and increased taxes. Besides, the farmers are the very last to hear of a reform agitation on any subject, and probably not half of them have yet heard that it is seriously roposed to abolish the present system of oad making, and to substitute something better and more expensive to start with— for that is certain to be the case. It will not be expensive as now in the long run, but that is never an effective argument with the farmer. He looks to the present rather than to the future, and a tax saved now is about as high say high extrapmentaling. ow is about as high as his statesmanship mprehends. The first thing to do to bring this agita tion before the great mass of the people, and particularly before the farmers, is to change the law under which the roads are now worked. It is by no means certain what system is to be finally adopted as the now worked. It is by no means certain what system is to be finally adopted as the best, but the present system in this state is about the worst that can be conseived for a civilized community, and stands as a bar to any improvement until it is overthrown. It offers a premium to laziness and inefficiency, and there is no way to stop it, visible to mortal eyes, unless to abolish it. What is first needed is a law that abolishes the chance to work out the road tax and to substitute a cash tax in its place. Even if the money thus raised were placed in the hands of the local pathmaster, to be spent at his discretion, it would be an improvement, as not many men would tolerate loafing or idleness in men hired to do a day's work. But that would be a short-sighted reform, because there are few men who know how to make good roads now, and are qualified to spend the money wisely. It is a new business to this country, and many mistakes will undoubtedly be made before the art becomes general.

Until a more comprehensive law can be devised, the new law should go sufficiently far to acquire that the road tax should be paid in cash to the collector of the town along with other taxes, and by him paid out on the order of a town superintendent of roads, or of three commissioners of highways, who shall appoint a road expert, in or out of town, who shall have charge of all the town roads, but his main plan for working to be submitted to the commissioners in advance for their approval. This would bring the great road question directly before the people en masse, and if there was any hidden wickedness about the agitation it would soon come out. Most farmers have given the question not hought directly before the people en masse, and if there was any hidden wickedness about the agitation it would soon come out. Most farmers have given the question no thought whatever, and will not until forced to face it by a new law of this sort. A great many—possibly a majority—will see then that the plan is a good one, needing only such changes as experience suggests, and will work for these. Others will "kick," and kick mightily too, just as some men fight all improvements that cost anything; but the final victory will be with the road reformers. Our roads now are a shame to our civilization, and with more agitation and exposure of their failings, a large majority of the people will favor a system that abolishes this disgrace.

In the discussions thus far carried on, one important point has received little attention. Much has been said about the road bed, and about drainage, both of which, of course, are of great importance; but in my judgment nothing is of more importance than to get rid of many of the hills that now impede travel and are as unsightly as they are useless and damaging. Many of them can be avoided by a slightchange of route, either by a road alongside of the hill instead of over it, or by going around the base. In many other cases the hills can be cut through, and the earth and rock necessary to be removed utilized in Boucherville has agreed to retain office for the present. Feeble and capricious appetites are best regulated by the use of Ayer's Cathartic Pills. They do not debilitate, by excessive stimulation; but cause the stomach, liver, and bowels to perform their functions properly. As an after-dinner pill, they are un Twenty tous of turkeys and goese were shipped from Kemptville, Ont., for European markets last week.

But this is a danger they have brought upon themselves through their neglect of political duties in order to "sustain the party." Their course has made it almost a settled rule that any man who can, by settled rule that any man who can, by hook or crook, get a party nomination is nearly sure of the support of every man of his party. As long as farmers heed that custom they must expect more or less rascality in office, and they can blame themselves for it as the leading cause. But road reform is not to be switched off because they themselves have created this danger. Let them exercise common business sense in electing honest and compenses of the compenses of t

"CIRCUS COMING, MARY." The Children Need Much Looking After When the Show is in Town. The head of the family lingered over his coffee. Clearly, something lay heavy on his mind. Now and then he darted a quick look at the partner of his joys and sorrows across the table and coughed lightly, only to turn his gaze again into his cup. At length he spoke.

He sought to create the impression that he was voicing a casual reflection. The demure lady across the table nodded affirma-"It's a good circus, I think.

The "orchestra" consisted of a bad pianist and a fairly bad violinist.

Hearing that the great virtuoso was stopping at the house, the piano smasher sauntered up to Joseffy and saluted him fraternally.

"You're a musician, too?" said hc. familiarly.

"Yes," said "Rafe" modestly.

Their twinship seemed absurd, even to casual acquaintance. Not a feature or trick of tone or manner betrayed it. Lucy was a tall brugette and June square in huild.

A wave of color, so faint that best friend described as a "volcano shut up in an iceberg," once spoke to me of his "agony of incommunicableness."

Let these where clearly formula to the color of the color betrayed it. Lucy was a tall brunette and Junesque in build. She looked like a Medea whose very calms were deadly, and portended tempest. Her family knew her as an amiable pack-horse, her friends as the meekest and shyest of social lay figures, conscientious to a fault, patient to a miracle.

"You have no more character"

Sara stared at her in intensest scorn.

"If I say another word I'll be sorry for it," she uttered in desponsible, practical fellow and very much in love with his second choice.
