CONSTITUTION TREKING.

France has been for a long time in a very peculiar condition. It has been fairly prosperous. Its people have had no great or general grievances to complain of. There have been no disturbances in the country worthy more than a passing notice. The public have been in various avocations without let or hindrance, and it appears that they have taken full advantage of the peace and quiet which have been enjoyed. But, although the country has been internally tranquil and at peace with nearly the whole world, yet, precisely it has been in a state of constant turmoil. The politicians have been divided into a number of factions both in and out of the legislature, who are continually contending against each other with the utmost violence. So jealously do these parties and sections of parties of one another and of any temporary combination that may be made that ministries have been defeated almost as soon as they were formed. Governments in France have become proverbially short-lived. The necessity of terms has made French Governments exceedingly weak. They have not been able to perform their functions effectively. A government has had scarcely time to form a policy before it found itself in a minority. The cabinet has not been able to last so much as a year in the constitution of the State as in the turbulent, factious spirit that prevailed among the representatives of the people. The best constitution that the wisdom of man ever formed would break down when administered by such men who were continually doing their utmost to mar, and render useless, each other work. French politicians do not see this. As the governmental machine does not work well, they believe, or affect to believe, that the fault is in the machine and not in themselves, and they propose to revise the constitution. Boulanger might claim to be the inventor of this remedy for the ills which afflict the French Republic. But when he proposed his scheme of revision the majority of the Chamber of Deputies were in opposition to him, and with the least possible delay they kicked him out of the House. Boulanger's ideas could not be so easily expelled; they lived and germinated, and are now producing fruit. M. Floquet a few days ago, immediately after the opening of the Chamber, proposed a scheme of revision which he hopes will effect the double purpose of dishing the Boulangerites and making it possible for governments to live and work. The leading features of the French Republic are: 1. The Chamber is to renew itself by thirds every two years. The senate, which is to be elected by universal suffrage in two degrees, is also to be renewed by thirds at the same time as the Chamber. The senators are to be under special election by the Senate and Chamber of Representatives, which can also demand their dismissal by a formal declaration that they have lost the confidence of the nation. The fourth feature of the new constitution is the creation of a new Chamber of Representatives, having a consultative voice in the preparation and discussion of laws from a judicial point of view and including some more specially charged to inform the assembly by official advice on great questions of the industry, commerce, the arts and agriculture. It does not appear that any party, or a section of any party, in the Chamber look upon the constitutional changes proposed by the Prime Minister with any great degree of interest. It will be found that, with the material of which the Legislature of France is composed, they may be found to work no better than the present unrevived constitution. In fact, there are good grounds for believing that the new constitution will be a down-trodden country, where almost everyone through the tyranny of landlords and the evil effects of bad laws lives in misery. There is a notion, too, that crime abounds in Ireland. That the jails are full, and that it is hardly safe to travel in the country. But this appears to be a very great extent a fancy picture. There is a large number of poor people in Ireland, it is true, but there are millions there who are as happy and as comfortable in their own way as the people of any other country. It will be remembered that the late Earl of Salisbury, who had no object in misrepresenting the state of the people of Ireland, declared that they were more comfortable and lived better than the peasantry of many European countries, who were suffering little and now we have the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland bearing testimony in many respects similar to that of the late Earl of Salisbury. His Lordship takes a cheerful view of the condition and prospects of Ireland. He, in a speech which he made at the opening of the library in Belfast on the 14th of last month, said that he was convinced that prosperity is surely and certainly returning to Ireland. He finds that trade is steadily reviving in the country. The harvest has been a good one, and the prices of cattle, corn and other products are
