I knew that my case was gained.

My brief was soon finished now with complete satisfaction to myself, and my next step was to write to Mrs. Manchester (the aunt of the Misses Rushfon), requesting her to be in town on the day of the trial, and acquaint me of her whereabouts that I might call her if I deemed it necessary. And on the day preceding that of the trial I received a note from that lady stating that she could be found

The first witness for the rame even. But I would not ask my friend just then. for I knew that I could not do so without betraying the interest I felt; and Winfield would be sure to laugh at me, and I have a horror of being laughed at even by a friend.

At length I took my way to my lonely office, and seated myself for business.

Collecting my scattered thoughts, and resolutely shutting out from my mental that of the trial I received a note from that lady stating that she could be found at the house of her sister, Mrs. Morton Rushton, and expressing her willingness to aid as much as possible.

ston Wentworth?" she said inquiringly.

"I have that honor, madam," I returned.

"Well, sir, I wish to put you in possession of a few facts."

"Proceed, madam. I am all attention," I said.

I must commence by telling you that I am the daughter of Morion Rushton, Esq., one of the directors and heaviest stockholders of the Hillside Bank. Altenston Wentworth was, as you have doubtless been apprised, a clerk in the bank. He is innocent of this great charge against him. He is, also, poor. But work for him as though he were rich, for him as though he were the hands that clasped warmly that of the best of my ability, though I were the hands that clasped warmly that of the prisoner, and Allenston Wentworth went forth from the court room leaning in the court room leaning upon the arm of Morton Rushton, that gentleman taking him to his own house.

"Where is Lilly?" he cried, as he entered the hall door: "Lilly," he repeated, "Here I am, papa," she cried.

"Had—I think—I did not call there," he again stammered out.

"Officer," I said, turning to my assistant, enter this stud and see if it will match Mr. Thornton's lonely one, if so, collect the reward offered for its recovery, and give it to him.

The villain's eyes seemed starting from their very sockets as the officer held the gem beside its fellow.

It was of course an exact fac simile.

I then began to relate how and where I had found it. The prisoner was immediately discharged, and shout after shout rung through the court room, and many were the hands that clasped warmly that of the prisoner, and Allenston Wentworth went forth from the court room leaning in the court room leaning in

"I want Lilly."
Something in the tone reassured Lilly,
who came bounding down the stairs.
"Here I am, papa," she cried.
"Come, darling, and give papa a kiss."
Poor Lilly could not suppress the cry of surprise that rose to her lips, as she saw Allenston Wentworth at her father's side.

Mr. Rushton clasped his daughter for a moment to his breast, and tears actually filled his eyes as he said:

"Here, Ally, take her; you deserve just such a dear little wife as Lilly will make."

And Allenton Wentworth placed a warm and loving kiss upon his affianced, and murmured:

And Allenton Wentworth placed a warin and loving kiss upon his afflanced, and murmured:

"God is good."

"There, go to the parlor, children," said Mr. Rushton in a husky voice, "for I have something else to do besides watching a pair of foolish lovers."

Melville Thornton was tried in a few days, found g filty, and sent to State Prison for a term of ten years. I was greatly astonished an hour after returning from the court-room on the day of Wentworth's trial, as I sat in my office musing over the exciting events of the past few days, to receive a visit from Morton Rushton, Esq., who grasped me warmly by the hand, thanking me over and over for having brought the true criminal to justice, and wanting me to dine with his family that night, an invitation which I was not inclined to refuse.
