In 1873, a change came over the state of affairs. We know what political party obtained control of matters in Canada at that time. The Liberals came into power, and the administration of government railways passed into the hands of the late Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, who managed them under his subordinate officers. What took place then? Why, from then down to the time that the Liberals were driven from power and down to the end of the next year for which they were responsible, this state of affairs had been brought about that an average surplus of $60,969 had been transformed into an average deficit of $618,119. This was largely due to the fact that the Intercolonial Railway was projected through a country that did not pay, part of that country, it is true, in the north-west portion of New Brunswick, but the greater portion of it in the province of Quebec to Rivière du Loup. Well, affairs were very serious. The western members were complaining of this enormous annual deficit. The administration of the railways passed into the hands of the present leader of the opposition, and he set himself to remedy the evil. What took place? The first year of his administration, without lessening the efficiency of the Intercolonial Railway in the slightest degree, he cut down that deficit from $716,000 to $97,000, wiped off in one year $620,000. The next year he converted that deficit into a surplus, a small surplus, it was true, but the hon. gentleman had a surplus of $542. The next year he had a surplus of $9,600; the next year, $10,547, and the next year, $6,981. Then a change came over affairs. Now, I will tell the hon. gentleman what the secret of that change was. In 1885 that surplus was changed into a deficit of $78,000, increasing until it reached the enormous figure, in 1890-1, of $684,000. Now, I will tell you what is the cause of that deficit. The hon. gentleman who had control of the Intercolonial Railway undertook just the same scheme that the present Minister of Railways and Canals has undertaken, he undertook to fight geography, he undertook to fight the territorial lay of the country, and to carry through oceanic traffic between the west and the east via the Intercolonial Railway and to carry coal and other material at cheap rates to the west. I have before me a table which is a perfect object lesson. I put together all the tables bearing upon this matter which are found in the reports of the Minister of Railways and Canals, and I find that synchronous with the taking up of that through traffic is the increase of the deficit. When the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals took charge of the department he dropped that scheme. He did not undertake to further this through traffic and to stimulate, as it were, the carrying of the oceanic goods, and the coal and raw sugar trade. What was the result? Owing to that more than anything else, more even than to the cutting down of expenses, was the fact that within one year that deficit of $493,000 was changed into a surplus of $20,000. If you will look at the trade returns of the country you will find that synchronous with that change was the decrease of the through traffic and the oceanic traffic that was borne by the Intercolonial Railway. Coal fell off, goods imported into St. John and Halifax fell off, and the futile attempt was given up of competing against the Grand Trunk Railway at Portland, and the Canadian Pacific Railway at St. John by way of the Intercolonial Railway to Halifax, with such an enormous disadvantage in the increased mileage against the latter. The hon. gentleman, if he goes on with his scheme, I am afraid will repeat that history; and to-day I have no hesitation in saying to him that if the maritime provinces depended on that railroad, and if that railroad was not sucked of its revenue to pay the deficit over the northern part of the line, he would have a surplus on what is purely the maritime province part of the Intercolonial Railway, not of one or two hundred thousand dollars, but of several hundred thousand dollars. Then the hon. gentleman could increase the wages of his employees, track men and others upon the line, and make all necessary capital expenditures without drawing upon the treasury of the country.

The hon. gentleman claims credit for the purchase of the Drummond County Railway and its extension, and compares the results with those that flowed from the purchase of the Rivière du Loup branch from the Grand Trunk Railway by the leader of the opposition. Now, let me tell the hon. gentleman this: Conceded his own contention, that the purchase of this line of railway has increased the revenue by $780,000, conceded the absurd contention, as I will show it before I am through, what would the same train of logic lead to if adopted in the case of the management of the Intercolonial Railway by the leader of the opposition in connection with his scheme in 1880 of the purchase of the Rivière du Loup line. That line was purchased in 1880. In 1883, under the increased revenue of the Intercolonial Railway, after the purchase was made, no less a sum than $1,076,000 or about $300,000 more than he claims after the purchase of his one hundred and seventy miles was realized.

Now, the hon. gentleman has attempted to answer some newspaper criticisms, which were to the effect that the surplus of $62,000 was an imaginary and not a real surplus. Well, I must weary the House by going into many details on this matter, but I shall have to call attention in detail to this point. The surplus of $62,645, the hon. gentleman said, was not brought about by charging to capital what should have been charged to revenue account. As a mere matter of book-keeping, apart altogether from the history of the Intercolonial Railway, I am willing to concede that a great deal of what the hon. gentleman charges to capital account should be charged to capital account. The former system of bookkeeping in the Intercolonial Railway from the standpoint of scientific railway bookkeeping was faulty, but it was the system which prevailed. And when he changes that and attempts to build up an argument, as I told him a few years ago he would attempt to do, he is guilty of a very fallacious piece of reasoning. The hon. gentleman last night said he was doing exactly what had been done in previous years. We told him that in previous years the charges for reconstruction and strengthening of bridges had been charged to revenue account. The hon. gentleman indignantly denied it, he said that in three cases only was that so. I knew he was entirely in error, and I ventured to suggest one case that I had under my own eye in the town of Sackville. The hon. gentleman said :

We are proposing to spend—not all at once, but in two or three years—$200,000 or $300,000 ; and in referring to the expenditure made by the late government for the strengthening of bridges, I pointed out that they had only strengthened two or three bridges; I think they were the two Miramichi bridges and the one across the Restigouche.

Mr. POWELL. And the Sackville bridge.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I beg my hon. friend's pardon. Not one beyond those three I have named.

Mr. POWELL. The Sackville bridge was not charged to capital.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. If rebuilt or strengthened, it must necessarily have been built out of capital, because I have had the whole records of the correspondence upon all the bridges of the Intercolonial Railway searched with the utmost thoroughness from beginning to end, with the result that there were only these three bridges, the two Miramichi and the one on the Restigouche, and upon those the total, laid out for strengthening, was only $36,000, or about $15,000 a year extended over two years.

Now, there is a plain statement. I do not accuse the hon. gentleman of wilfully misstating the facts. He has been misled by the information, because, it seems, that he relied on the officers of the department for his information. He either did not know what information to ask for, or they did not give him what he desired. Not only were there a great many bridges which were strengthened in order to accommodate the traffic of the Intercolonial Railway and carry the engines that were introduced upon the line about 1890, but, Sir, I go farther than that, and I tell the hon. gentleman that in rebuilding bridges which were of wood, with steel, almost invariably the cost of the reconstruction of these bridges was charged up, not to capital account, but to revenue account. I go further; the hon. gentleman here, today, has brought down in the supplementary estimates, a vote of over $400,000 for rails on the Intercolonial Railway, which he proposes to charge to capital account. I tell the hon. gentleman that not only during the regime of the hon. ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Haggart), but during the regime of every Conservative Minister of Railways, from 1889, at any rate, down to the time that the late government left office, in 1896, not a rail that was replaced by a higher rail on the Intercolonial Railway in any way or shape, entered into capital account, but every new rail was charged up to revenue, and the hon. gentleman must know it. In order to show the utter and complete absurdity of the hon. gentleman's statements, in reference to this matter, I will take 1889. I am quoting from an abstract I have before me, and if the hon. gentleman wants to look at the statement, I will give him an opportunity of looking at it so that he can see if it is correct. In 1889, the Conservative Minister of Railways relaid 129 miles of track with 67-pound rails, instead of 56-pound rails, and not one dollar of the cost of the work was charged to capital account. Forty-six sidings, aggregating, in the total, 23,221 feet, or more than 4½ miles were put in and railed and charged not to capital account, but to revenue account. Not only that, Sir, but in that year, thirty miles of new fencing, which was put up at a place where never before a fence had existed on the line, was charged not to capital account, but to revenue account, because at that time it was considered advisable that the capital account of the railway should be closed. The Miramichi bridges were strengthened at a cost of $25,400. There was the Little River bridge over the road which was replaced with iron and masonry at a cost of $3,591, every cent of which was charged, not to capital account, but to revenue. There was a Howe truss bridge of two spans of 100 feet each replaced by two steel spans of the same length. In addition, there was lateral bracing provided for the Elm Tree bridge with a span of eighty feet, the Wicodoo bridge, with a span of eighty feet, and the McKinnon Brook bridge with a span of eighty feet so as to strengthen them for the purpose of carrying over heavier engines and cars. Then, in addition to that there were no less than eight bridges with a lineal extension altogether of 2,749 feet, under which were placed masonry work and upon which were put standard floors, every dollar of which was charged, not to capital account, but to revenue account, and still the hon. gentleman has made the statement that he has. That is one year.

Now, coming to the next year, 1890, the Conservative government laid down 125 miles of track, substituting a 67-pound rail for a 56-pound rail, every dollar of which was charged to revenue. The hon. gentleman denied my observation about the Sackville bridge. He will find the facts in the Railway Report for 1890. I was there, I knew about it being strengthened, and I inquired about it at the time. It was strengthened at a cost of $15,769, every dollar of which amount was charged to revenue and not to capital. The Restigouche bridge was strengthened at a cost of $10,775, and five other bridges were strengthened by lateral bracing, the New Mills bridge, the Nash Creek bridge, and the bridges over Louison's Brook, Jacques River and Little Forks. In addition to that there were fifty small bridges with wooden trusses, every one of which wooden trusses was removed and replaced by iron, and every dollar of the cost was charged to revenue account, and not to capital. The hon. gentleman can take his own report, and see whether my statement is correct or not.

In 1891 there were sixteen miles of track laid with 67-pound rails, replacing 56-pound rails, on the Intercolonial Railway. Every dollar was charged to revenue account, and not one cent to capital. The hon. gentleman talks about no other bridge. Could he not remember the Rivière du Loup Bridge, which was built of steel at a cost of $23,900, which was charged to revenue, and not to capital? The Murphy bridge, near Antigonish, was built of steel in that same year, and every dollar of it was charged to revenue. Besides that, there were strengthened by lateral bracings, four bridges, the Caucapsal, the Red Pine bridge, the North River bridge and the Salmon River bridge, all of them three-span bridges with one exception, the spans varying from forty feet to 100 feet, with the exception of two spans of 100 feet, all charged to revenue and not a dollar to capital. Yet the hon. gentleman claims that he is following in the steps of his predecessors. There were fifty-two bridges, of a lineal measurement of 3,691 feet, provided with new and improved floors, all the cost of which was charged not to capital, but to revenue. There was one wooden overhead bridge replaced by an iron bridge, charged to revenue and not to capital.

Now, I call the hon. gentleman's attention to this particular statement. Four new locomotives were bought and charged, not to capital, but to revenue account, and they were not in substitution of those which had been disused, but were additional rolling stock. In addition, there was one overhead wood trestle at Durlotte's Crossing replaced by steel, at a cost of $1,400.

Now, we come to 1892. Forty-three miles of track were laid with 67-pound rails, and the 56-pound rails were taken up, the cost of which was charged to revenue, and not to capital. Three miles of siding were constructed and charged to revenue. The Lorne Flag station was built. An extension to the Mon-ton erection shop, a very large extension indeed, 201 x 110 feet, was charged to revenue, and not one cent to capital. There was a brick roundhouse built at Moncton, sufficient to contain twenty-seven locomotives, which was charged to revenue and not to capital. There was a new steel span of 160 feet to replace a wooden one which cost $10,983, and which was charged to revenue and not to capital. Seventy-five steel plate girders were put in to replace Howe trusses, and these were charged to revenue and not to capital. There was a fifteen foot culvert at Frosty Hollow, which cost $9,200, which, I think, on principle, as a matter of book-keeping, should be charged to revenue and not capital. There was the Missiquash bridge, with a steel span of 100 feet, to replace a Howe truss, costing $5,000. That was charged to revenue and not to capital. There was the Loch Broom trestle, which was piled; there was sixty feet of an overhead bridge at Rogerville built of iron and charged to revenue, and the Charles bridge was rebuilt of steel to replace a wooden one, which was charged to revenue and not to capital. There was at River Ouelle eight spans of 44 feet each, steel girders, and there were 44 feet steel girders west of River Ouelle. West of St. Thomas there was a bridge of two spans of 64 feet each span, replaced by steel and charged to revenue and not capital. There was a bridge of six spans of 64 feet each, made of plate steel, and charged to revenue and not to capital. East of St. Thomas, there was a 54-foot steel plate bridge to replace an old one, charged to revenue and not to capital. East of L'Islet there was a 44-foot span, and east of St. Rochs there were two of 44 feet spans each, charged to revenue and not to capital.

In 1893 thirty miles of railway had the light rails taken up and replaced by heavy rails; there were two miles of siding; there was a bridge, 83-foot span, to replace a wooden bridge; there were fifteen steel plate girders, 40 to 60 feet; there was one station building, and there was one agent's dwelling, and all these were charged to revenue.

In 1894 there was charged to revenue and not to capital, twenty-seven miles of railway relaid with heavy rails; two and a quarter miles of siding; two steel bridges of 85 feet span, one steel bridge of 100 feet span to replace a wooden one, and one steel 40-foot span at Union.

In 1896, the last year the hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart) was in power, he laid down forty-five miles of track, three miles of siding; he put in two steel bridges, 160 feet and 40 feet; one iron bridge removed and a new and stronger bridge put in; improved the strength of several other iron bridges; and replaced the wharfs at Halifax and Richmond, which were burned, at a cost of $52,475. All of these works were charged to revenue.

Now, we come to another item. In that year ten engines that were condemned were, I believe, not only rebuilt, but they were enlarged and their capacity increased 50 per cent. Every dollar of the expenditure there, amounting to $17,000 or $18,000, was charged to revenue and not capital.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Would the hon. gentleman (Mr. Powell) be good enough to give me the references, so that I may be able to inquire as to just what these statements are?

Mr. POWELL. I will tell the minister where he will find them. If he will look in his department and get the annual reports of Mr. Pottinger and the annual reports of Mr. Archibald, the engineer of the railway, he will find all the information I have given.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Where did the hon. gentleman procure them; where are they published?

Mr. POWELL. Would the minister like to know that?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes.

Mr. POWELL. If the hon. minister will promise me he will not take the head off some official, I will give him the information.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I see.

Mr. POWELL. That is what the minister is at? I thought the minister knew all about it, but I will enlighten him. They are published in the public reports, and if the minister just looks at the reports he publishes every year he will get the information there.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The statement made by the hon. gentleman is not correct.

Mr. POWELL. What is that?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman says that in the annual reports is published all the information he has read.

Mr. POWELL. Will one of you page boys just carry this lot of books over to the minister? They are open at the correct pages.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Can you give me the pages?

Mr. POWELL. You can get the page as well as I can. The books are open at the exact page. Now, I want to tell the Minister of Railways this: If last year he had charged up to revenue what his predecessor had been charging to revenue, and had kept up the full proportionate expenditure in connection with the road, he not only would have no surplus of $62,000, but he would have had a deficit of, probably, $200,000. If you take and add to these expenditures in 1897, the proportionate increase in connection with these services I have mentioned, you will find that the deficit this year would be over two hundred thousand dollars, but, of course, I cannot give the figures exactly. As respects that matter, I have a word or two more to say. The hon. minister last year and the year before undertook a new and unheard-of policy. I have heard of new ways to pay old debts, but this scheme of the minister was an old way to wipe out deficits. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) instead of repairing his engines and his cars, introduced the policy of purchasing cars and engines and charging them to capital account. I am informed—and the minister will correct me if I am wrong—that this year he has sold quite a number of the old engines of the Intercolonial Railway that were then upon the register. If the information given to me is wrong, I desire to have it corrected now.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I think the hon. gentleman would be correct in saying that some of the old engines have been sold for scrap. They are really not worth any more. But I hope the hon. gentleman will not assume that the engines so sold have not been replaced, because for the current year there have been four large new engines built in the works and five large engines purchased on revenue account, making nine engines of a greatly increased tonnage.

Mr. POWELL. The hon. gentleman may be correct in that, and I take his word for it, so far as the engines are concerned. I will have to let that go, because the information is not yet to hand, but I have some information with respect to the cars. The hon. minister bought last year 250 box cars, and every one of these cars was charged up to capital account. Now, we will have a little more revelation as to how the minister is working out his surplus. Would you believe that last year the hon. gentleman closed his year with 528 cars disabled and condemned. In his regime he allowed 330 cars to fall into decay, and has not replaced one of them by rebuilding, as was done by the late government. He bought 250 cars to take their places, and charged them to capital account.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman's statement is not correct as he puts it. There were, no doubt, a large number of cars condemned, but they were cars that were absolutely worthless in 1896, the same as the locomotives were worthless in 1896, and the same as other portions of the equipment was worthless. They were condemned now, but they ought to have been condemned before.

Mr. POWELL. So far so good. The identical men are in the railway to-day who were there in 1896, with the exception of Mr. Joggins. The same principles, I presume, determine matters now that determined them then. The hon. gentleman admits that literally I am correct. I will give the figures. All through it has been the habit on the Intercolonial Railway of condemning a certain number of cars every year. When the ex-Minister of Railways left office, there were 198 disabled cars condemned by the inspector and ordered to be rebuilt during the following year. That was the condition of affairs then. It was all right enough for the hon. gentleman to say that there were a great number of cars that should have been condemned. What does he personally know about it? Or, I might say, what do I know, who live in Westmoreland and see twenty cars for every one that he sees? Simply what I get from official records. I can assure the hon. gentleman that that statement which has been supplied to him by some person, is not, according to my information, in exact accordance with the facts. In the next year, 1897, not under an inspectorate, governed by Conservative men and ordered to condemn what cars they saw fit, but by the hon. gentleman's own administration, there were only 247 cars condemned. Since that time, with an examination by an inspectorate which we must presume was honest, made under the direction of the hon. gentleman, doubtless without any feeling of clemency to the former administration—

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The same officers were there in 1897.

Mr. POWELL. That is exactly what I said. The same officers condemned five hundred and twenty-eight that condemned the one hundred and ninety-eight. The next year was 1898. Again under the administration of the hon. gentleman the inspector made the inspection and at the end of that year the condemned cars amounted to three hundred and thirty-three, making under his regime three hundred and thirty cars that were condemned. In 1899 another inspection was made and at the end of that year there were 528 condemned cars. The number of condemned cars which were not replaced or rebuilt increased during his regime was 330. The minister purchased 250 cars and the fraud had been perpetrated in this country of charging two hundred and fifty cars to capital account—that is, a fraud on book-keeping. I do not use the word in an offensive sense; but I say it has the effect of fraud. Then, the hon. gentleman says: 'I have managed this railroad in a most masterly manner.' Now, I will give the House some facts with respect to the traffic increases. Of course, we would necessarily look for an increased traffic on the road.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Is the hon. gentleman professing to quote my language or the effect of anything I said?

Mr. POWELL. I am putting upon the hon. gentleman's language and demeanour the evident and exclusive interpretation that should be put upon them. Leaving out such charges as those for railway engineers, firemen, brakemen, conductors and men of that class, in which we necessarily expect a very large increase running concurrent with the increase of traffic and bearing some ratio to it, there is quite an increase in one matter in which the hon. gentleman certainly determined the road to fall into disrepute. I refer to the cost of general management. In 1896, when the ex-Minister of Railways went out of office, the cost of general management was $199,985. In the last year of the present minister's management of which we have record, the cost of management jumped up to no less than $50,000 over and above that amount. I called for a return from the hon. gentleman as to what additional offices had been created since he assumed control of the Intercolonial Railway. Apart from the officers in connection with the Drummond County line there are additional offices costing $22,478. Some of these may be useful: some are certainly not. Now, we will pass on to the consideration of a question which has been discussed by both of the preceding speakers; that is, the effect of the Drummond County Railway upon the Intercolonial Railway. In respect to this matter I cannot speak with positiveness. The only gentlemen who can speak with positiveness in this matter, if they care to do so, are the gentlemen who control the Department of Railways. But the Auditor General has given us a statement which is a very fair guide, of the money receipts at each station on the Intercolonial Railway, and I have taken the pains to have these collated according to provinces—Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. In 1897, the last complete year of the Intercolonial Railway before its amalgamation with the Drummond County and a portion of the Grand Trunk to Montreal, the total receipts in the province of Quebec were $343,427; in 1899 they were $759,787; a difference of $416,360. In New Brunswick the receipts in 1897 were $975,407, and in 1899 $985,348, an increase of $9,641. In Nova Scotia the receipts were in 1897 $1,563,933, and in 1899 $1,803,182, an increase of $237,249. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman knows, as every man in the maritime provinces knows, that the development of business in the Cape Breton section has been perfectly phenomenal. We all know to what it is due. I will ask the House to follow me as I look at

Nova Scotia and see where these enormous increases have occurred. In North Sydney alone there has been an increase, owing to the great works undertaken there, of $18,000. That is in no way due at all to the Drummond County Railway. In old Sydney there has been an increase of $22,000. If you pass now to Pictou, where the iron works have developed quite a trade in coal, you will find a very large increase indeed. You will find a very large increase in New Glasgow of $27,000. You will find a considerable increase at Stellarton. You will find a large increase at Trenton, on the Pictou line, and in Pictou itself, and also in Amherst, owing to the fact that from Amherst there is a good deal of trade with Sydney, and the large firm of Rhodes, Curry and Company have the construction of houses down there and patronize the railways to a large extent indeed.

The increases in Nova Scotia are in those few places, and they total up an increase of $273,000. That is not due to the Drummond County Railway. That freight would have come there whether the Drummond County Railway had been bought or not. If we look to find the effect of the Drummond County Railway, we must look particularly to those places that are in its immediate vicinity. I find that in Montreal and Ste. Rosalie section or the joint section of the extension the receipts were, in round numbers, $260,000, and that altogether is very little more than the increase in the province of Nova Scotia. Now, on the whole Drummond County system the total receipts were only $46,000, including the little branch down to Nicolet. I ventured the assertion last year on the floor of this House that these receipts or earnings of this railway as given in the returns to the Railway department were cooked, that the company had not bona fide receipts to that extent. Well here is the first regular record we have, and the receipts are not in the vicinity of $100,000 as given in that report for the year 1897, but are only $46,000.

We have got the joint section and the Drummond County Railway in detail as to their station receipts. We have also all the station receipts on the line of the Intercolonial Railway in the Auditor General's Reports for the years 1897 and 1899. If you were searching for a place in which you would expect to find a large increase of receipts, you would expect to find it at Quebec city itself, which is virtually the terminus of the extension at one end. It was only physically that Lévis, opposite Quebec, was the terminus of the old line, and there would expect to find a large increase in the receipts because the Intercolonial Railway had and has an office at Quebec where tickets are sold and freight collected. Well, at Quebec, in 1897, the total receipts—and I call attention particularly to this because this is a place where you would expect to find a very large increase—in 1897, the last year of the administration of the Intercolonial Railway before this scheme took effect, the total receipts were $22,276. In 1899, the total receipts were only $23,123. There is this magnificent railway that was going to transform the whole country; and at the place where you would naturally expect to find the largest increase, you find only an increase of $846.

At the Chaudiere Junction there is an increase. In 1897, the receipts were only $2,500, and last year they were $12,000, or $10,000 of an increase. But, I find that a very large traffic comes up the Intercolonial Railway which has nothing whatever in the wide world to do with the Drummond County Railway or the extension to Montreal, because it is handed over to the Grand Trunk Railway before it gets there and the increase in the Chaudiere Junction is almost entirely the result of that freight.

At Lévis, there has been a considerable increase, but let us see what it is. In 1897, we had $65,000, and last year $92,000, or an increase of $27,000. This is largely due to freight passing over the old Intercolonial Railway to the Quebec Central. These are the places where you would expect an enormous increase.

If you go down in the province of Quebec again and take in the Metapedia, you will find a considerable increase there, an increase of $24,000. But is that due to the Drummond County Railway? No, it is due largely to the fact that a railway has been opened there, and it results from the transfer of freight from one road to the other. A large trade is also established there in sleepers, &c.

So that, on analysis, the hon. gentleman's case has no substance in it, but fades into the realm of myth. Let me give you an idea of how this surplus really stands. The alleged surplus is $62,645. But the deficiency in expenditure on the maintenance of cars and engines and track, compared with the previous administration, was $148,297. That is an outlay which should have been made in order to bring the expenditures up to their normal figures, to bring up even to the expenditures the minister regards as starving expenditures. Then in addition he has charged to capital about $60,000, which should be charged to revenue. In addition, the interest on his capital expenditures would be $40,000, so that the total amount would be $210,000, which he should have expended on revenue account and did not expend. From that you must take the surplus of $62,000, so that the balance would be a deficit of $146,000. On the basis of book-keeping that prevailed before the advent of power of the present administration, that would be near the actual state of affairs.

Does Drummond County road pay? Let us see. A proportionate share of the maintenance of the Drummond system of 133 miles would be : track and stations, $130,000; maintenance of track and station on the joint section, according to the Auditor General's report, $70,000 in good numbers. Take the share of the engines and cars maintenance upon the joint section and the Drummond County, which would be $230,000. Extra cost of general management, $48,492, which I add, as it has also made an increase in the general cost of management. Add the rental, $210,000, and you have a total charge against the Montreal extension of $688,573. What do you credit it with? Credit it with the earnings on the Montreal section, which I think is fair, and add a proportionate increase to bring it up to the full revenue of the road and you get a revenue of $320,911, leaving a deficit on that part of the road of $367,342—and this is exclusive of any charge on interest account. That is as near as we can come to it by the data at our disposal. If that is wrong, it was the duty of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) to have given us as fair and definite information as possible, so that the country would know the exact state of the expenditures and receipts of that portion of the road.

I shall not, at this time, touch upon the proposed capital expenditures, or the estimated surplus for the current year ending the 30th day of June, instant, it is not necessary. I am confining myself to what is historic and drawing from the facts such deductions as I think are fair. I think I might refer to the anticipated surplus of $100,000. His improper charges to capital account alone would reduce this amount to nothingness and produce a deficit. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) said that hon. members on this side were seized with a kind of rabies—that is not the word, perhaps, but it was what he said in effect—against the extension to Montreal. I can inform the hon. gentleman that the objection to extending to Montreal is not a matter of principle but a matter of detail. This side of the House did not quarrel with the extension of Montreal, but with the means taken to get to Montreal. They said there were other means of getting to Montreal without violating sound economic principle.

THE MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. For instance, by the Canadian Pacific Railway on the north side.

MR. POWELL. Yes, that would have been a very good way. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) laughs. But I tell him, that, though he tells us he has a good road, the Canadian Pacific Railway on the north shore can outstrip him ten miles an hour on the way from Montreal to the city of Quebec. They can make faster time, having one of the best road-beds in the country.

THE MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I beg pardon, they cannot.

MR. POWELL. I beg pardon, they not only can but do—at least they did last summer.

THE MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Whether they do now or not is another question. What I say is that they cannot make faster time.

MR. POWELL. When you make as fast time as they do, you will be in a position to say you can. I say that the course of the government on this question violated a sound economic principle—that you should never duplicate a railway service unless it is necessary. There was no need to duplicate in this case. The same policy of joint operation that he pursued in connection with that part of the road from St. Rosalie to Montreal he could have acted upon in connection with the road from Quebec to Montreal, and an arrangement could have been made with the Canadian Pacific Railway. I have no doubt, on the basis of running rights, from Halifax to St. John. I may say just a word upon the relations that exist between the present management of the Intercolonial Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway. One of the great reasons for having a road to Montreal was said to be to drive the Canadian Pacific Railway off the Intercolonial Railway. But they are there; their status is the same as before, their trains are running over the Intercolonial Railway just as they did before. This grant evil was sucking the life blood of the Intercolonial Railway, as we were told, but the monster is as active as ever.

I have shown conclusively, so far as there is any data, that instead of a surplus being attributable to the Drummond County Railway, that surplus is a myth. The only gentlemen who have the information under their control do not bring it down, they do not give us the benefit of their information; but I have shown that from the data before us this is the only deduction to be drawn. I have shown, and the records show, that the surplus of $62,000 which the hon. gentleman claims is equally a myth, and that by the ordinary method of book-keeping on the road, as established before the advent of hon. gentlemen opposite to power, that surplus does not exist, and that if the road were maintained in a state of efficiency, there would be a considerable deficit. The hon. gentleman boasted of his train service. Why, it is easy to have a magnificent vestibule train. He could have fifty such trains, for the credit of this country would afford him the means for them. He could have a vestibule train that would put the most elaborate trains of other roads completely in the shade. The Chicago express would not be worthy of consideration alongside one that the hon. gentleman might have, for the resources of the country are sufficient if the hon. gentleman chose to mis-apply them to pay for the greatest magnificence in this respect. But that is not the true test of correct management of a railway. The test is cutting your garment according to your cloth, making the best of your opportunities. I think it would be a poor consolation to the poor men of this country, who pay the great bulk of the taxes, to know that the rich man has a vestibule car with velvet cushions on which he may recline, a better than ordinary Pullman in which he may sleep, a splendid dining car in which he may enjoy the luxury of a dinner at 75 cents or a dollar, while the poor man is obliged to carry his lunch with him or be content with cheaper food at a restaurant. It will be no consolation to such a man to know that the Minister of Railways has imported cars from the United States and has an elegant vestibule train on which he and other men of means may ride about the country.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. What did these cars cost?

Mr. POWELL. They cost about $20,000 apiece. I think the hon. minister's policy of building these cars in the United States, and especially of building these engines in the United States is a very bad policy. The construction of these engines led to an outlay of $150,000 or $160,000. These engines could just as well have been built in this country. All that was required was a little time. There was no rush about this matter; their construction might have proceeded slowly. Canada had moved along at a tolerable rate of progress for years without vestibule trains and without these large engines. By remodelling the old engines and building new ones leisurely, that $150,000 or $160,000 could have been distributed among the artisans of this country. As it is, the money has gone out of this country to the Baldwins; Canada has their engines and they have Canada's money. If these engines had been constructed at home, Canada would have had the money and the engines too. That policy is a very short-sighted policy and one the government should not push, because it is against the interest of labouring classes of the country as a whole. I shall have further observations to make when the estimates come up in detail.

Railways and Canals—Chargeable to Revenue—Prince Edward Island Railway.. $20,000

Mr. HAGGART. The item under consideration was one in reference to canals.

Mr. CHAIRMAN (Mr. Ellis). That item was passed before dinner.

Mr. HAGGART. I objected to that item being declared carried; it was understood that it was not carried.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I understood that the item was passed.

Mr. POWELL.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, the Chairman said it was carried, but the hon. member for South Lanark (Mr. Haggart) said he had risen to speak and then it was considered not to be carried.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. There seems to be a misunderstanding, and I am perfectly willing that it should be regarded as not carried, if anybody wishes to discuss it.

Lachine Canal—To build a quadrant pontoon gate ..... $20,000

Mr. HAGGART. I understood that three of these canal items were reserved on which we would have a right to discuss any other item. There is an item of $500,000 for the construction of a lock on the Lachine Canal. I want to know something about that.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The explanation I gave the other night when the hon. gentleman was not present, I presume, I will repeat. This is for rebuilding lock No. 1. We want to construct a lock suitable for vessels drawing at least twenty feet of water, which the present lock will not do. The present lock is in a very dilapidated condition, described by the officers as in a tumble-down condition. The estimate is that a lock 350 feet long, 50 feet wide, with 20 feet of water on the mitre sill, could be constructed for $500,000.

Mr. HAGGART. I understand the lock is to allow ocean-going vessels to utilize a portion of the Lachine Canal as a harbour. How far above the lock have you the 20-foot navigation? In order to be of any use there must be a portion of the canal up the St. Lawrence deepened to over 20 feet.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman knows there is a much increased depth up as far as St. Gabriel basin, about a mile and a half up from the mouth of the canal.

Mr. HAGGART. Will these amounts you are asking for the Lachine Canal complete the whole expenditure required on capital account?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That is the view of the engineer.

Mr. HAGGART. There is the Galops Canal, to which I wish to draw the attention of the hon. gentleman, and the contract with the Gilbert Dredging Company. I wrote the hon. gentleman a note telling him that I wanted the full information and papers regarding that contract. The hon. gentleman was not in his seat, and I told the page to put the note on the desk under his clip.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have to say that the note did not reach me. I was not aware that the hon. gentleman wanted the papers with regard to the Gilbert dredging matter. But I can explain to him, perhaps, what he desires to know. I am informed that the original contract for dredging what is called the Galops Rapids was made with Mr. Davis, during, or perhaps prior to, the hon. gentleman's entrance upon the department. During his day the contract was changed, transferred or sold out, with the consent of the department, by Mr. Davis to the Gilbert Company, who were the only people having the necessary plant to do such work. With regard to the cost per yard, the hon. gentleman, I am informed, is in error in attributing to the work which is done in this channel the cost of 50 cents per yard, it does not cost any such money. There were soundings made originally as to what would be required in this channel, and upon the basis of those soundings it was supposed a small amount of dredging would be required. It turned out lately that through the fall of water it would be necessary to make a much deeper dredging, and this conclusion was arrived at during the regime of the late government. Mr. Reid, one of the members of this House, strongly urged upon the attention of the ex-minister the necessity of having deeper dredging done. He pointed out that it would be impossible to get more than six or seven feet of channel with the amount of dredging which was then contemplated. It proved that the hon. member was correct, and as a result a much deeper dredging had to be done and much more material had to be excavated. The cost, while upon the basis of the original subdivision a very little amount of dredging would be required, would seem to be, as the hon. member has stated, very large, perhaps running up to a very high price per yard; yet as there has been much more dredging done, the cost has been much less than the hon. member has represented. I can procure the information showing just exactly what it has cost. I have not it with me, nor has the deputy minister it in his possession. If the hon. gentleman desires to have that information we can procure it for him tomorrow. I am willing to have it understood that the hon. gentleman may discuss that on any one of the canal items.

Mr. HAGGART. If my memory is right, there was a contract at so much per yard let to Davis & Co., and that contract was transferred to W. A. Allan. He had the contract for deepening. This contract with the Gilbert people for deepening the Galops Canal has been let by the hon. gentleman himself. There has been no tender for it, and I would draw the attention of the hon. gentleman to the enormous expenditure that has taken place:

Use of all plant required in testing and surveying the bottom of the existing 'new channel' and removal of all loose material therefrom as found above the original contract grade (exclusive of rock in situ above said original contract grade), this latter to be removed at the contractor's expense.

It has been applied to 244 days at $425 a day, or there was paid last year on this contract $103,734. This does not give the number of years, but it gives the number of days. I was frightened to state the amount that I have been informed this dredging is costing. I was informed that this work is costing the country over $125 a yard, and that the contractors do not average four yards a day. You are paying $425 a day for a tug and scow for carrying the material away, which are hardly employed at all, while, on the same page of the Auditor General's Report you will see that more work is done per day for which only $100 a day is paid. If there were to be an expenditure of $300,000 or $400,000 for this work, other parties could provide dredges and submit tenders for the work. The hon. minister is giving to these people $425 a day, or a sum four times in excess of the amount that is shown as being paid in the Auditor General's Report to other parties, and this work is costing the country for every yard of excavation at least $25 or $50.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman knows the conditions which prevail there very well, and he knows further that so far as the Gilbert dredging people are concerned they have been at work there for a long term of years. I did not bring them there, but I found them on that work.

Mr. HAGGART. Not on the Galops.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No, but on that class of work. The hon. gentleman knows that the Gilbert dredging people are the only people in Canada who have the expensive plant which is required to do the work where this dredging is being carried on. He knows that this is being done in the rapids, which is very difficult, a very expensive and a very trying piece of work. They cannot do a very great deal of work in these rapids. I think the hon. gentleman would not be prepared to say that $425 a day would be an unreasonable amount to pay these people for the use of their dredge. The matter came before me in the first place on the recommendation and report of the superintending engineer. That report was made to the chief engineer and deputy minister. He concurred in it, and recommended unhesitatingly that we could not make any better arrangement, and that it would be advisable to make a contract with the Gilbert Dredging Company at this price for doing work at these rapids. If this is a high price I do not know it, and I do not think the hon. gentleman will say that it is, under the circumstances. At all events, the engineers who could have no interest in making any recommendation to pay a higher price than they believed would be reasonable, are of the opinion that it was a very proper contract to make.

Mr. CLANCY. Could you not let this work by contract?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. You could not get a bid from any other person in Canada. We were carrying on no undertaking to the amount of $300,000 or $500,000. We started out with the idea of moving some of the boulders from the channel in these rapids. The policy of the department is not favourable to making a great deal of excavation there. We do not want to do anything more than is absolutely necessary in order to enable vessels to work their way up the channel, while the canal is being constructed, and to get down again. We do not want to do a great amount of work there, and it is not proposed to spend any such amount of money as the hon. ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Haggart) has named. We have a vote of $100,000 in the estimates, and it is not certain that we will require to spend the whole of that. We want to make the St. Lawrence channel, from one end of it to the other, satisfactory to the shipowners and to the shippers who use that channel.

Mr. CLANCY. Have the engineers who made the recommendation to the hon. gentleman that it was a very fair price, reported to him the amount of work that is being done for that money from time to time?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes, certainly. There is not a dollar paid, except on their certificate.

Mr. CLANCY. Have they reported the number of yards removed? The hon. ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Haggart), stated a moment ago that he had information which was so perfectly frightful, that he hesitated about making a statement. It is a very serious thing if there have been no reports of the quantity taken out when this large sum is being paid.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The superintending engineer, either personally, himself, or by some of his competent subordinates, keeps a record of the work that has been done. It is called to my memory that there are two contracts with these Gilbert dredging people. There is one contract under which they get $425 a day, which is for making soundings and ascertaining where the dredging is required to be done, besides removing loose rocks and boulders, what they can handle without resorting to blasting and subaqueous excavation. When the obstacles in the channel are ascertained, the engineers determine the extent of the subaqueous excavation, and the contractors are paid a price per yard for the work.

Mr. BLAIR.

Mr. CLANCY. The minister should present that report of the engineer to the House.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. We will furnish the information that the hon. gentleman desires. I am given to understand that the estimate month by month is at hand.

Mr. HAGGART. The minister has $317,000 which he intends to spend on this work and he gets a friend—a dredging company—

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. They are no friends of mine. I do not know them.

Mr. HAGGART. I do not say that they are, I corrected that. The minister employs a dredging company and makes a contract with them contrary to the order in council and contrary to the law, and he gives $425 a day for doing that work, and it is notorious in every part of Canada that the man is getting $300 more than he earns. You have in your department what it cost under contract to do the work on the Galops channel and the party who had the contract got so much a yard and nearly made a fortune out of it, but this party without tender and without competition gets a job amounting to $325,000. He makes a private tender with the minister to receive $425 a day, and I allege that that is far in excess of the value, as is notorious to every contractor from Kingston to Montreal. I make the charge and court an inquiry, and I say it is one of the most disgraceful contracts that ever was let by a minister. If a man gets five or six times the value of his work by open competition there may be some excuse for it, but when a minister, contrary to the law, makes a private contract like this, it is a bad state of affairs, and the House will be shocked when they come to get the figures from the engineer. Who is the engineer that recommended the minister to give $425 a day? What number of yards have been excavated? Let the minister bring down the contracts made by his predecessors for the same work by open tender.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am surprised to hear the hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart) using such language.

Mr. HAGGART. It requires very strong language to express my opinion about it.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. If the hon. gentleman thinks there is any fraud in the transaction let it be investigated and let the responsibility be put where it belongs. If he does that he will find me assisting him to the full extent of my ability. The hon. gentleman talks about an illegal and a wrongful contract without public tender. But, what opportunity did he afford to the public to tender for the Sheiks' Island dam, which cost over $400,000? There were circumstances in the case before us which it was represented to me justified the awarding of the contract to this company, and if there was any misrepresentation, and if the statement of the officer was incorrect and he was deceiving me and deceiving the chief engineer, then it is proper it should be known in order that the responsible person may be dealt with. I will bring the papers down with the greatest possible satisfaction.

Mr. HAGGART. I do not say that the minister is guilty of any fraudulent transaction, but I charge himself and the department over which he presides with letting a contract contrary to the law. Whether there is a fraud perpetrated upon the country or not, there is what is equally as bad, namely, stupidity and blundering. I never entered into a contract for the Sheiks' Island dam without tenders. Davis & Co. had the contract, and Mr. Davis claimed that the work on the Sheiks' Island dam came within his contract. His contract was extended at the prices and on the schedule which he had honestly and openly tendered for before the whole world. I did it on the recommendation of the deputy of my department, and I did it within the law, and gave the work to the party who had fairly tendered. I object to this constant violation of the law in that department. There is a law which states that in the Railway Department and the Public Works Department, any expenditure over $5,000 should be put up to public competition and tender, but here is a contract for $125,000 given without tender. If he got only a fair rate for his work, still the principle would be violated, but it would not be so bad. I say that this contractor is given four times the amount for what an equal service could be obtained for elsewhere. The minister says he has the report of his engineer recommending this.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. My deputy tells me he has a report in the office, but I do not remember it.

Mr. HAGGART. Of course, you are relying upon the statement of your deputy. When you give us the report of your deputy recommending this it will be, I suppose, sufficient justification for the minister.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have no information of my own. I get it from those in whom I have confidence, and who know what would be a fair price to pay. When the hon. gentleman says that this price is excessive, there is a fair way of ascertaining whether it is or not. If it is excessive, somebody is to blame for having that contract entered into. The hon. gentleman says that the Davis contract in connection with the Sheik's Island work was better because it was an extension. They claimed it at all events to be an extension of the work which they might fairly and reasonably expect, because they had a contract for other works in the same locality. That is a very proper defence for having made a contract for that work.

Mr. CLANCY. The Liberal party of this House did not think so.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am not speaking either for the Liberal or for the Conservative party at the present moment. The hon. gentleman must not think that I am precluded by what was said by gentlemen who were in opposition at the time this transaction occurred. Let us take the facts as they are, and deal with them, irrespective of what any person or party may have said in reference to it. What I say is that if a contract should have been properly made by the hon. gentleman with the Messrs. Davis for the Sheik's Island dam, because they claimed that it was an extension of the other work, then I would apprehend that if this work were claimed by the Gilbert Dredging Company to be in the same locality and an extension of the work they had under their previous contract, it would be exactly in the same position and run on all fours with the other case. They may be wrong. It may be claimed there was misrepresentation. The hon. gentleman says that is a fact. His opinion makes it proper that there should be an inquiry as to what was a fair price to pay for this work. I will bring down the papers.

Mr. CLANCY. Is not that an extraordinary statement of the Minister of Railways and Canals, especially within the hearing of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who I am sure, is perfectly shocked, because he made some warm speeches on that Sheik's Island dam affair in past years, and it was referred to in a campaign sheet issued by hon. gentlemen opposite as one of the most gigantic scandals that ever took place in Canada. Yet the hon. Minister of Railways says in the hearing of some of these hon. gentlemen that this may or may not be a proper expenditure. Does this indicate that they deceived the public in the past? If the hon. gentleman is not prepared to discredit his friends in the House, he is bound to profit by what they declared as to this work being a gross wrong to the people of this country. There is absolutely no way of reconciling their statements with a transaction of this kind. My hon. friend has pointed out that there is an order in council that every work involving an expenditure of over $5,000 must be let by contract. The Minister of Railways and Canals is a little hazy as to whether or not he has a report from the engineers stating that they were obliged to pay $425 a day, or they could not get the work done at all; because the hon. gentleman stated in an earlier part of the debate that no other person would undertake the work, and that the department were driven as a last resort to paying $425 a day on a special report of his engineers. The work was not so pressing that they were bound to yield to circumstances of that kind. The hon. gentleman is not now prepared to say that that was a fair price.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No, I am not.

Mr. CLANCY. Is that not a reason why the contract should not have been let so hastily? I do not understand that there is a parallel between this and the Sheik's Island dam work. I am not aware that there has been a contract of the same kind let to this Gilbert Dredging Company. I do not understand the hon. gentleman to say that they had a contract for work at a similar price.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. They have two contracts—one for the excavation of solid rock, which my deputy tells me is exactly at the same price as previous contracts given to the same people by the ex-minister for the same class of work.

Mr. CLANCY. Is there a similar contract let at this enormous price of $425 a day?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Why does the hon. gentleman say an enormous price? They are doing all they can do in the day.

Mr. CLANCY. Has it ever occurred to the hon. gentleman to inquire as to whether they are doing work for that large amount?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not sit over them. The officers are supposed to see that they do a day's work.

Mr. CLANCY. The ex-Minister of Railways and Canals says that a small amount of work is being done.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. He may have been mistaken.

Mr. CLANCY. Whoever is at fault, it seems to me that this is a very loose transaction.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman is jumping to a very hasty conclusion.

Mr. CLANCY. I do not think it is a hasty conclusion at all. I think the hon. gentleman ought to be ready to state specifically what amount of work has been done. I think he must have been very busy that he did not direct his own attention to it.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Did I not tell the hon. gentleman that I did not get the note? Unfortunately it went astray. I left it on the Table, and probably it was swept off.

Mr. CLANCY.

Mr. HAGGART. The minister cannot expect us to vote $100,000 for the Galops Canal without the information being placed before us.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Am I asking the hon. gentleman to do it? I am prepared to have the item stand until I get the information.

Mr. HAGGART. These are the estimates of the canals, and the deputy minister should be prepared to hand over all the information with reference to canals.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. My hon. friend is entirely unreasonable. There can be no occasion for the deputy tumbling over files of the whole department in the expectation that some one out of a thousand might possibly be asked for. Had the hon. gentleman's note reached me—and it was no fault of his that it did not—I would have had the papers here, and I will bring them down to-morrow. I have no disposition to conceal anything in connection with the matter. If there is anything wrong I want to know it just as well as the hon. gentleman. I think that the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) is not sufficiently informed with regard to the value of the work to give an opinion.

Mr. CLANCY. I did not express an opinion of my own, but based my argument upon the opinion given by the ex-Minister of Railways.

Mr. B. M. BRITTON (Kingston). Some times a great deal of harm may be done unintentionally to innocent persons by charges hurled across the floor of the House. Is the item to which the ex-Minister of Railways has referred, to be found on page 22 of letter R., Auditor General's Report?

Mr. HAGGART. It will be found on R-105.

Mr. BRITTON. There are two distinct firms of the Gilberts, one called the Gilbert Engineering Brothers Blasting Company, and the other the Gilbert Blasting and Dredging Company. It is rather important that this item should be applied to the company it belongs to. It is the Gilbert Brothers Engineering Company that this discussion refers to, I understand.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes.

Mr. R. R. McLENNAN (Glengarry). Is this Galops Canal finished?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No.

Mr. McLENNAN (Glengarry). Is navigation completed through it?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No.

Mr. McLENNAN (Glengarry). The Governor General in the speech from the Throne, announced that navigation was completed all through along the St. Lawrence. How did that come to be placed in the speech from the Throne?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That is not stated in the speech from the Throne.

Mr. McLENNAN (Glengarry). Yes, it is stated that navigation was completed the entire length of the St. Lawrence from the great Lakes to the Atlantic seaboard. I am told that the contract on this Galops Canal is extended to one year longer on condition that the contractors take the boats and vessels up the natural channel with a small tug. If a tug can take the boats up the river, it is most extraordinary why we should spend so much money. When a small tug can take up any boat, I do not see the necessity for this expenditure at all. The hon. Minister of Railways said a while ago that he did not know anything about it, but left it to his employees. But as minister, he should know something about it before he asks this House to pay this amount of money for this useless piece of work. When he is paying so much a day for the deepening of this work, he should be in a position to give us some information. It is all very well for him to get cross and angry, but that is not the kind of explanation this House requires. We require something else, and expect something else from the minister. He has been over the work, yet he has told us that he knows nothing about it, but when my hon. friend alongside me (Mr. Clancy) made some remarks, he asked my hon. friend what he knew about it. And he asked him this after admitting that he knew nothing about it himself.

This item, I believe, is charged to capital account. The minister is charging very large amounts against capital, and then he, his supporters and his party press profess to have a surplus. To charge so much to capital account, and then boast of a surplus is misleading the country. If these hon. gentlemen would give the country the total amount of expenditure, the people would be in a position to know how they stand, but these hon. gentlemen say they have a surplus, and at the same time they are running into debt, and have not money enough to meet the requirements of the country. The hon. gentleman is charging enormous amounts to capital account, much larger than were ever charged before, and he is charging to capital account works that never were charged to capital before, so that his statement is simply misleading.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). The only thing misleading is the observation of my hon. friend who has sought to convey the impression that the method of keeping accounts by the present government is different from that followed in the past. The hon. gentleman says that if we have not sufficient money to pay all our expenses, capital and revenue charges, therefore, we have no surplus. And when we state that we have a surplus after paying all ordinary expenses, the hon. gentleman says that is misleading and deceptive. Now, his speech is misleading and deceptive, because he should have stated that the accounts are kept now precisely as they have been ever since confederation. And, though the hon. gentleman makes the general statement that services are charged to capital account which were not charged to capital account before, he will not be able to substantiate that, because it is not correct. The only case where such a thing has been even alleged was that of a few thousand dollars spent for strengthening the bridges on the Intercolonial Railway which, during a few years, were charged to income by the late government. The Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) discussed that subject. But, even if the contention of hon. gentlemen opposite is correct it would only make a variation of about $30,000 in the accounts. The statement that we are charging to capital services that were formerly charged to revenue is unfounded.

Mr. McLENNAN (Glengarry). The government have increased the gross debt by over nineteen millions in the last three or four years and have increased the net debt by seven millions. And yet they claim to have a surplus. The Minister of Finance admits that there are some things chargeable to capital account on the Intercolonial Railway that were never charged to capital account before.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I did not admit anything of the sort.

Mr. McLENNAN (Glengarry). The subject of the Intercolonial Railway expenditure was fully gone into by the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell). Another point is that for the year ending last June, the government had a vote as a supplementary estimate of $2,500,000 which has not been placed before the country at all. And in the supplementary estimates for the year ending the 30th of June, this year, they have $3,500,000, which is not being placed before the people. No doubt, it will appear in the public accounts, but it is not before the people generally—the public know very little about it. I do not say that this is done with the intention of deceiving the people, but it has that effect. The government are spending a larger sum of money than they let the public know. They profess to have a surplus. They pretend to be spending less money than they are and to put smaller votes in the estimates than they really are. As to the expenditure of $56,000,000, I think we have before us this session estimates for over $61,000,000, and we must not forget that there will be supplementary estimates yet to come for the year ending June, 1901. What I contend is that the accounts ought to be placed before the people so that they will know what is being spent. The expenditure on capital account is enormous, and the government should not claim a surplus when they have no surplus; they should not pretend that they are saving money for the people when they are extorting large sums from them.

Mr. HAGGART. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) remember what I want for the further discussion of the item?—the report of the engineer recommending it, the recommendation of the deputy minister; and then, I suppose the hon. minister has got an order in council for the expenditure of $325,000, allowing him to let the contract without tender?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I will bring down all the papers.

Mr. CLANCY. Was this item about the quadrant pontoon gate on the Lachine Canal carried?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes.

Mr. HAGGART. As I understood from the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) there were three items reserved in the Railways and Canals with the understanding that we could have a full discussion on any item. They were the items for the quadrant pontoon gate, Farran's Point Canal, and the Welland Canal improvements at Port Colborne. As to the Soulanges Canal, I wish to inquire particularly as to the contract on locks 1, 2, and 3. As I am informed the contract was held by Mr. Archibald Stewart. The minister cancelled that contract. After the minister had delayed Mr. Stewart nearly a year by refusing to allow him to use the stone he had been authorized to use, he called him in and told him that unless he would enter into an agreement to finish the work in October, 1898, he would cancel the contract. He did cancel the contract, and then, without tender—I mean public tender. I think he asked three parties to tender—he gave the contract to Ryan & Macdonald at an advance of $200,000. The work was to be finished in 1898, and as I understand, it is not finished yet. I want to know the condition of the work that has been done by these parties on the locks. I understand the concrete was badly done, that the locks are cracked, that some of the gateways above are giving away. I think also that the engineer in my time made a mistake in his estimate of the quantity to be taken out of the canal, and that he put a pipe in it which is entirely too small for the purpose of draining the land.

Mr. McLENNAN.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. With reference to what the hon. gentleman has stated with regard to Mr. Stewart's contract, there are some things which I think are not strictly accurate. Mr. Stewart was not progressing with the work at all satisfactorily. He was not delayed a year by reason of any difficulty about the stone, I think he was only delayed about three months, and that is the time he claims he had been delayed. When I came into the department, the first difficulty that was brought to my attention, was that with regard to the stone under Mr. Stewart's contract. It was represented to me that there were objections to the stone that he was using, and there was a difference of opinion among people who had examined the stone, whether it was proper to be used in that work. The superintending engineer was entirely against the use of the stone, but after an examination into the matter, it was decided rather against Mr. Monro's contention. It was decided that there was good stone which might properly be used, but there was some which was not good, and which the engineer thought should be rejected. But it was thought not proper to condemn all the stone as unfit for use. The question of the stone being settled, then Mr. Stewart was in a position to resume the work, had he been so disposed. I do not say he was not disposed to do so, but I am willing to acknowledge that he was not able to do it. It required perhaps more means than he could command, and he could not organize the work, he could not get the plant necessary to prosecute it within a reasonable time. A long period, two or three years, had lapsed beyond the date at which he had contracted solemnly with the Crown to finish those sections, and they were not half done. At the rate he had been going on before this difficulty about the stone arose, he would have taken an eternity to finish the work. The government determined that they would have the Soulanges Canal, together with the other canals that were in progress, completed within the earliest possible date, and we were willing that Mr. Stewart should do it if he would take hold of the work and push it vigorously. We held out every inducement to him to do it, we encouraged him in every possible way, but without avail. We gave him notice that we would have to take the work out of his hands if he did not prosecute it with more despatch. He took no notice practically of our communication. It came to be a question as to whether we would give Mr. Stewart control of the whole work as to when it should be finished and how, at all events as to when it should be finished, or whether the department should exercise control; whether it should be finished in two or three years, or in ten, fifteen or twenty years. We thought we could not afford to give Mr. Stewart any control in this matter. He claimed that he had control, that as a legal proposition, he was entitled to say when he should bring this work to completion. As a consequence of this difference of opinion, we took the work out of Mr. Stewart's hands after having exhausted every possible effort to have him continue it. When we came to the conclusion to get somebody else to undertake the work, we invited tenders from five, not three, leading contractors, the most responsible and, as we thought, the most competent contractors who were to be found in Canada. Some of them had been doing work on the canals. We made no political choice in the matter, as we felt that the main object was to get this work into active, responsible and vigorous hands, and to get it done as speedily as possible. We thought we could attain the object better by asking a limited number of first-class contractors to offer. There was ample competition, and the work was given to Messrs. Ryan and McDonell, as a result of this competition. The hon. gentleman says he is informed that the work is going to cost some $200,000 more at the prices we pay these contractors, than at the prices we were paying Mr. Stewart. The hon. gentleman, I am sure, is in error about that. I do not carry in my mind, at the moment, how much the quantities would figure out, but I understand the opinion of the deputy is that the difference would not be half as great, and would not exceed $70,000. That is my impression. I do not state that definitely, but I will be able to get more accurate information on the subject.

Mr. HAGGART. I remember perfectly well when I was in the department, the difficulty about the stone, when Mr. Monro was in charge. I took every precaution to see that the stone was of a good quality, and ordered the deputy to go down himself and examine it. I told him to get stonemasons, the superintendent of stonework on the Intercolonial Railway, and several other parties to examine the stone, and the consensus of opinion was that it was perfectly good for the work. I believe the stonework to be first-class stonework. But what I asked the hon. gentleman about was in reference to Bissonette Creek. I do not know whether that is on the Stewart section, but it must be very near it. There were pipes laid under it for the purpose of drainage, and what is the amount paid. Then I want to know as to the character of the work done, whether it is true that the walls of the locks have cracked? I understand that the arches above the groynes are built in such a manner that they are falling down at the present moment. As to the difference between the contracts, I understood it would amount to $200,000. The deputy informs the minister it was only $70,000. I would like to know the particulars, which may be given on some other items coming up in the supplementaries. I wish to know the difference between the amount which would have to be paid to Mr. Stewart under his contract, and the amount that is paid to these contractors, who have the contract at present. I would like also to know whether the contract can be finished within the final estimate given by the department?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I can answer at once, that there has been no final estimate. I understand that the hon. gentleman wants to know whether any difficulty developed in the walls built under the O'Leary contract.

Mr. HAGGART. No, I mean on the locks.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The deputy minister informs me that there is what is called a hair crack on one side of the wall. But the work has been well done. Certainly it is a most superior class of work. It is a fact that this difficulty has developed, but it is not regarded as serious. Then, in regard to the culvert I may say that it choked. The hon. gentleman said that it was projected in his day and laid down. It is not large enough, it choked, and we were obliged to pump it out. It was being pumped out when I was down there not many days ago, during the past session.

Mr. HAGGART. Who has the contract for pumping? I think it is the Collins Bay Company.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. They are Kingston people.

Mr. HAGGART. What are you paying?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The deputy minister does not recollect the amount. We are paying so much a day.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman did not say anything about the arches between the reaches in the canal. I understood that they gave way.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. They are all right now.

Mr. HAGGART. But did they give way?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Not the lock, but one of the arches.

Mr. HAGGART. Are these repairs being done at the expense of the government or of the contractor?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. There are no repairs being done.

Mr. HAGGART. I mean in reference to the arches and groynes. There was a falling in of the embankment too. The banks gave way on Lock No. 1, and there was a falling in of the arches between the reaches. Were the bank and groynes repaired at the expense of the government or the contractor?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. At the expense of the government, because it was the fault of our own engineer.

Mr. McLENNAN (Glengarry). I have before me the speech from the Throne as it appears in Hansard.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Read it.

Mr. McLENNAN (Glengarry). It reads as follows:

I am pleased to say that our canal system, connecting the great lakes with the Atlantic seaboard, have been completed so as to allow vessels having a draft of fourteen feet to pass from the head of Lake Superior to the sea.

That is not the case. The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals cannot at this very moment claim that it is true.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I differ with the hon. gentleman.

Mr. McLENNAN (Glengarry). They are not completed. The hon. gentleman admitted a moment ago that the time of the Davis contract had been extended for one year, and that the canal was not completed. At the time that this was placed in the mouth of the Governor General there was a boom around the Farran's Point Canal and vessels were not allowed to go into it. Everybody knows that the contract of Davis & Co. has not been completed, and that the time has been extended for one year on condition that they tow vessels up the rapids with their tug. These are the conditions, and neither the right hon. Prime Minister nor the government can claim that this work is completed, or that the statement placed in the mouth of the Governor General is correct. It is a serious matter to place a statement of that kind in the mouth of the Governor General, and put it before the public, when they know well it is not true.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman is directing attention to it at the wrong end of the session. He would not propose to move a vote of want of confidence at this late period of the session, when we are in supply.

Mr. McLENNAN (Glengarry). This is dealing with the canal, and it does not matter at what time of the session we take it up. We want to know what the government have to say about it. They placed this matter before the country in this way. There is not a man in the government, on the other side of the House, who will claim that navigation is completed between the points that are mentioned in the Governor General's speech.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman will have to slip down and see the Governor General about it immediately.

Mr. BLAIR.

Mr. McLENNAN (Glengarry). I am not looking after the Governor General just now. It is all very well for the hon. minister to try and put it off in that way. If I were in the position that the hon. minister is of going to the Governor General and putting speeches in his mouth which are solemn assurances to the country, I would tell him the truth. I would not mislead him.

I would ask the hon. minister, in regard to the expenditure for which $425 a day is paid, how many men there are on that work?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman might allow that to stand, because I have already agreed that it will come up to-morrow.

Welland Canal—Improvements to Port
Colborne entrance ..... $100,000

Mr. HAGGART. Will the hon. minister be good enough to explain the improvements that he intends to make?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It is proposed to deepen the entrance to twenty-two feet, and then to the first lock, having a channel ranging from 500 to 700 feet in width. Two piers are to be built, so that upon these piers arrangements may be made with the government by any persons desiring to build elevators. We have invited tenders, and awarded the contract for the work. The contract price, I think, when extended, will make the cost of the whole work between $950,000 and $975,000.

Mr. HAGGART. Is this outside and independent of the proposed plan of the hon. Minister of Public Works?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Quite independent of it. All that his work embraces is the breakwater a mile or so beyond.

Mr. HAGGART. Does the hon. Minister of Public Works contemplate making any other expenditure than this?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That is all he expects to lay out before another session of parliament.

Mr. HAGGART. How much will complete the work?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Speaking for my own department, $1,000,000 will cover it.

Mr. HAGGART. And how much in the Public Works Department?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I judge from discussions I have heard between the engineers and the minister that it will approach very nearly another million dollars to carry out the breakwater.

Welland Canal—Renewal of west pier at Port Dalhousie ..... $32,000

Mr. HAGGART. Will this finish that pier?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. This will finish the Port Dalhousie pier?

Renewal of docking below lock 1..... $11,800

Mr. HAGGART. What docking is there there?

Mr. GIBSON. There is a large wharf and roadway leading from the foot of lock No. 1 right to the end of the pier at Port Dalhousie. It is not a dock in the proper sense of the term, but is the face of the wall at the entrance.

Mr. HAGGART. Is it utilized for a dock?

Mr. GIBSON. The daily steamers from Toronto and all the steamers coming in land there. It is on the government reservation below the foot of lock No. 1.

Mr. HAGGART. I would like a promise from the minister that all these contracts will be given by public tender.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That is the course which I almost invariably adopt.

Mr. HAGGART. We would like it without the 'almost invariably.'

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not think that any one will say that he has just ground for criticism of the letting of contracts in my department. I have striven to adhere to the contract system, although I have not always been satisfied that it was in the public interest to do so. I do not require any reminder from the hon. gentleman, because I feel that even though the results are not satisfactory in every case, it is much more comfortable for the minister to let by tender. This work is being done by tender and contract.

Mr. DAVIN. How much a yard are you paying for the concrete work here?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I really do not remember, but the contract was awarded to the lowest tenderer.

Mr. DAVIN. I suppose we can get that information to-morrow.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Certainly.

Lake St. Francis—To complete protection walls ..... $9,000

Mr. HAGGART. On what principle does the hon. gentleman protect the shores of Lake St. Francis?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not know that I can really say whether or not the principle is a sound one. All I can say is that this was commenced in 1884, and has been continued down to the present moment.

Mr. HAGGART. Is that at the village of Valleyfield?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. This is on the north side.

Mr. HAGGART. I suppose it was one of the promises of the Minister of Public Works when he contested Beauharnois.

Lachine Canal—To rebuild wall of basin 2..$10,000

Mr. HAGGART. What is the matter with the wall?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I understand it is being completely undermined by frost.

Mr. HAGGART. Will this finish the work?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No, I think it is going to cost six or seven times this much; but this is all we can expend this year.

Mr. GIBSON. The only piece of wall that is any good, is that which the hon. gentleman built in connection with the two bridges. All the other walls are in a dilapidated state, and if the water were taken out, they would fall down of their own weight.

St. Ours Lock—To rebuild dam and ice breaker ..... $10,000

Mr. HAGGART. What will it cost to finish that?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The $10,000 is presumed to be sufficient.

Carillon and Grenville Canals—To rebuild guide piers ..... $30,000

Mr. HAGGART. That is an enormous amount for guide piers.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. We are going to build them of concrete, with stone filling.

Mr. HAGGART. What is the amount required to finish them?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Thirty thousand dollars.

Railway statistics ..... $2,500

Mr. HAGGART. Why is this increased?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It is increased by $900. We are getting out a new map this year.

Mr. JOHN McALISTER (Restigouche). When was the last map got out?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. In 1896, I understand.

Salaries of extra clerks, copyists and messengers ..... $2,600

Mr. HAGGART. Who are the clerks who get the increases?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Mr. Mothersill, Mr. Johnson and Mr. Leslie, $100 each. Then there is $700 for a clerk to fill a vacancy caused by the promotion of a third class clerk to the second class. It appears that the demands for returns and other things during the session have increased very much, and we have not had enough to pay for the sessional service.

Mr. HAGGART. Who is the extra clerk you are getting?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not know.

Mr. McALISTER. I would ask the hon. minister if he has received a petition from shingle manufacturers along the county of Bonaventure, complaining of an increase in the rates of freight, or at least an increase in the billed cars? Cars weighing 40,000 pounds were billed before at twenty-seven hundred weight, and 60,000 pounds at thirty-two hundred weight.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I received a petition and some letters on the subject and sent them to Mr. Pottinger, with the request for a report, but have not heard from him.

Mr. McALISTER. It is unfair that these cars should be billed at their full weight because the shingles are manufactured from lumber taken out of the water, and a large percentage is water. The manufacturers are paying freight on water. If the shingles were dry, they would not weigh one-half or one-third what they do when shipped green. The manufacturers are at a great disadvantage this year, because they made their season's contract on the strength of the old rate. If the new rate is imposed, they will be at great disadvantage on account of their contracts. In addition, we know there has been a fall in the shingle market lately, and the manufacturers will not be able to pay this rate and will have to ship their shingles by water. The difference in the rates amounts to $10 or $15 a car. This shingle industry is one of the most important on the north shore, and every encouragement should be given it.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I sent the papers on to Mr. Pottinger and should have heard from him by this. I cannot understand why I have not heard from him. In explanation of the other item, if you will take the civil government vote you will find that there is not $700 difference. The civil government vote is less this year by $650 than last year, because we have one clerk less paid under the civil government vote, and by virtue of the provisions of the Civil Service Act.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman has got a great many estimates through tonight; it is now half-past twelve, and we want to get to bed.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I cannot complain very seriously of the treatment I have received.

Committee rose and reported progress.

Mr. BLAIR.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. HAGGART. What is to be taken up to-morrow?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. We hope to proceed with my hon. friend's (Mr. Blair's) estimates.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I will try to have all the papers here in the morning. I am not sure I shall be able to take up my estimates to-morrow, but I will let the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Haggart) know in the morning.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 12.30 a.m. (Thursday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, JUNE 28, 1900.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Eleven o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 186)—from the Senate—respecting the Red Deer Valley Railway and Coal Company.—(Mr. McGregor.)

REAL PELLETIER.

Mr. DECHENE asked:

What is the pay of Réal Pelletier, who is employed on the wharf at L'Islet; by whom was he recommended for the post, and what work does he do?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). In reply to the hon. gentleman, I beg to state that the name of Réal Pelletier is not known in the Department of Public Works. There was given, on October 30 last, $1,000 for expenditure upon this wharf, under the foremanship of Raymond Normand. During the winter materials were procured for the work which, on June 6, was reported as near completion. The bills, however, have not yet been received. The acting chief engineer has telegraphed asking if Réal Pelletier is employed upon the work.

J. H. OSBORNE, UTTERTON, ONT.

Mr. McCORMICK asked:

1. Upon what authority did officers Floody and Franklin, of the Inland Revenue Department, search the premises of Mr. J. H. Osborne, of Utterson, Ontario?

2. If authorized by the department, what were the instructions given to said officers?

3. By whom was the information laid against Mr. Osborne, and what was the substance of said information?

4. Did the officers discover any violation of the Inland Revenue law on the premises of Mr. Osborne?

5. What was the nature of the officers' report to the department?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I have only to repeat the information which I gave yesterday in the absence of the hon. gentleman. The department has not yet received any report from the local officers on this matter, and it is impossible at this moment to give the hon. gentleman the information which he requires. But I will call the attention of the department to it again so that we may have a report.

VOTERS' LISTS.

Mr. CASGRAIN asked :

1. Has the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery received the voters' list for the locality called Pointe aux Esquimaux, in the county of Saguenay?

2. If so, on what date?

3. Has the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery transmitted the said list to the Queen's Printer, and on what date?

4. Has the said list been printed and distributed, and on what date?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). 1. Yes. 2. April 27, 1900. 3. Yes; June 21, 1900. 4. I presume the list has not yet been printed.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.—MR. BENNETT.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT (East Simcoe). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to say that yesterday afternoon I was not in the House when the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. Stubbs) read an extract from a newspaper, in which I was credited with having stated that he attended the caucuses of the Liberal party. If I am charged with having stated that, I have only this to say, that I did not state that the hon. member attended the caucuses. I did state that he attended in the caucus room of the Liberal party, and I furthermore stated, and I have every recollection of it, that I thought the Liberal party had no more subservient supporter than the hon. gentleman, and furthermore, that he was always at the behest of the Liberal party.

Mr. STUBBS. I am willing to accept the hon. gentleman's statement, and I am glad he made the apology.

• SUPPLY—SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. G. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.). Mr. Speaker, before you leave the Chair I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) whether he can tell us if the appropriation powers of the government are exhausted so far as this session is concerned, or are we to look for another supplementary estimate?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Unless it shall appear that something has been inadvertently overlooked there will be no further supplementary estimate. It may be quite possible that there may be something, but I do not anticipate anything.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to ask the right hon. leader of the government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), if he is able to give me an answer in reference to a notice of motion which I have on the paper. My notice of motion is for :

Copies of reports, papers and correspondence with the government or any member thereof, all orders in council and statements of all moneys paid in respect of the bridge over the Richelieu River and the $35,000 voted therefor by parliament.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I am sorry to say that at this moment I cannot give an answer to my hon. friend (Mr. Foster). I had very little time to speak to the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) yesterday about it. But, as I understood, the last time I spoke to him upon the subject, the correspondence had not been completed. I will have to ask my hon. friend to defer the matter until to-morrow and then to repeat his question.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not suppose that there is any objection to bringing these papers down, because they relate to a matter in reference to the expenditure of public money, and the House, of course, has a right to information in regard to it. Technically, I am barred from making the motion in the regular way, but that ought not to affect the general principle. I would also ask the government if they are in a position to say when the railway resolutions will be brought down. The right hon. gentleman told me some time ago that there would be some subsidies to railways. I would like to ask him whether he is in a position to state when they will be down, and before his making any statement, I want to say to him that this side of the House is anxious to facilitate the rising of parliament just as soon as possible, but our digestion is limited, and we ought to have, in all conscience, a little time for these immense supplies, whether emergency or otherwise, that are set before us at this late hour of the session.

The PRIME MINISTER. I am sorry to hear that the digestion of my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) is limited. I thought, on the contrary, that it was unlimited, and that he could digest almost anything.

Mr. FOSTER. Looking at the supplies which have been set before us there is some justification for that idea.

The PRIME MINISTER. Without binding myself absolutely I see no reason why they should not be brought down on Monday or Tuesday at the latest.

Mr. FOSTER. Next Monday?

The PRIME MINISTER. Yes, because we will have to sit on Saturday.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Are you going to sit on Monday?

The PRIME MINISTER. Yes, on Saturday and Monday.

Mr. BERGERON. Dominion Day?

The PRIME MINISTER. Yes, Dominion Day. I think the best way of celebrating Dominion Day is to do the business that we have to do.

ADMINISTRATION OF THE YUKON.

Mr. A. C. BELL (Pictou). Mr. Speaker, on the motion to go into supply I wish to move a resolution in connection with a matter very much discussed in this House during the present session and during the past session. It is a matter in reference to the administration of the Yukon territory. Of course, it will be remembered that at the last session of parliament a resolution was moved asking for an inquiry, which was refused by the House, and afterwards Mr. Ogilvie was appointed as a special commissioner to conduct the commission of inquiry into the matters in respect to which charges had been made. In respect to that objection was taken, at the time and since, that the scope of the inquiry was not as great as it should have been, that the time limit of the inquiry made it almost inoperative and practically useless as a means of discovering the truth of the charges that had been made against officials of the government in the Yukon and against the administration of the Yukon territory in general. In contrast with that there might be cited examples in several of the colonies of Great Britain and of the mother country as well. In Australia an inquiry was conducted, the scope of which was so ample that it was a complete inquiry. The same thing was done in connection with the charges made against trades unionism as a source of outrage in Great Britain.

Again, the inquiry into the conduct of the Metropolitan Board of Works in Great Britain was conducted in such a manner that, although no specific charges had been made by any member of parliament on his own authority, the powers of the commission were made inquisitorial, and the investigation was conducted in such a manner, as not simply to throw the burden of proof upon the persons complaining, but practically to make it a genuine commission of inquiry, that could get at the facts. In connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway Commission, issued by the government of Sir John Macdonald, the same course was followed. On the ground that dissatisfaction existed, and that charges were made against the conduct of the government, an inquiry was ordered which was ample, searching and complete. Again, under this administration, an inquiry was made into the conduct of the person in charge of the Crown Timber Office in New Westminster, and instead of hampering the action of those who were prosecuting the charges, the utmost latitude was allowed, and the government encouraged in every way the prosecution of the investigation, so as to secure the desired results, not limiting it to one locality, but practically constituting it so that it might move about to discover any evidence that might be obtained in any part. The commission that was issued last year was extraordinary in its character. It was much more restricted in its character than was the order in council upon which it was based. The order in council, in its terms, was wide enough, but the commission, issued to Mr. Ogilvie, either bore, or was construed by him to bear, such an interpretation as to prevent him from carrying on his inquiry into anything that occurred subsequent to August 25. The consequence was that those gentlemen who represented the inhabitants of the Yukon territory withdrew from the inquiry, and that practically the inquiry failed of its results. Then, again, no provision was made for the payment of witnesses. These witnesses, for the most part, came from a great distance. They were men who had not the means at their disposal to come to Dawson and to remain there in residence. Mr. Ogilvie asked them to keep an account of their expenses, promising that he would submit it to Ottawa for consideration. Then, this matter was very much delayed. It came up before Mr. Ogilvie in February, the commission closed in May, and Mr. Ogilvie did not communicate with the government at Ottawa, so far as we know, until the month of November of that year. This commission of inquiry was conducted, apparently, judging from the report made by Mr. Ogilvie and laid before the House, in an unfair manner. In some portions of the inquiry Mr. Ogilvie laid less stringent regulations upon the questions of some parties conducting the inquiry than he did on those of others.

In other cases he rather encouraged the idea that he wished to search for evidence and to get at the facts which might lie beneath any allegation or information that was laid before him. In the course of this session information has been laid before the House, in the shape of returns and reports and papers, which goes to show that a great many acts have been perpetrated in the Yukon which were certainly irregular, and which, in some cases, have been pronounced by the law officers of the Crown to be unconstitutional and to be arbitrary. The cases of the Yukoner, the John C. Barr, the McDonald royalty, the water front leases, and many others, have been proven, from papers laid before the House, to be cases in respect to which gross irregularity and misconduct was committed, and which would not have been committed elsewhere in Canada. That really gives ground for the feeling that in so far as the administration of the Yukon is concerned, that respect for law and order and for property, which runs elsewhere, I am glad to say, in Canada, do not prevail in the Yukon. On the whole, the results have been unsatisfactory, and although it may appear that ample evidence is in existence and can be got at, to establish the fact that there was wrong-doing, and, to effect that very proper purpose that was announced by the Premier when he granted the commission, namely: that no official should rest under suspicion, but that he should either be proven guilty or be exonerated; yet that most proper purpose has not been achieved up to the present. Now, Sir, the reply to the charges which have been made in this House at various times during this and the preceding session, practically amounts to the minister in presence, or the acting minister in his absence, giving a direct denial to these charges. They plead not guilty in fact, a plea which in court, and, probably in this parliament, certainly does not prove innocence. That plea of not guilty is practically the only answer that has been given to the charges made. Most definite statements were made and names given last year in support of the charges, and statements as to maladministration will again be made in the course of the resolution I am about to move. Several of these acts of maladministration will be cited in the resolution, and sufficient grounds will be advanced to warrant the House in calling for a searching and complete and satisfactory commission to inquire into the charges that have been made and are again made now: that the administration of the Yukon by this government, and by the officers acting under it, has not been in the public interest, and that, in the language of the London Times, the relations between the officials and the public in the Yukon have been everything that they should not be. I therefore beg to move:

That up to the time of the commission of inquiry into charges against officials of the Yukon district, commissions of inquiry into charges respecting corruption and maladministration of public affairs were of the widest scope, whether in England, Australia or Canada, and were of an inquisitorial and searching character, untrammelled by formal procedure or technical rules.

That the following paragraphs from a minute of the Executive Council in Victoria, Australia, approved in 1854, indicate the scope of the inquiry made in that colony into the administration of mines:—

3. Has the conduct of the officers generally in the camp at Ballarat, either during the execution of their duty or at other times been such as to inspire respect and confidence amongst the population in general?

4. Charges of corruption having been publicly advanced against the officers of the Ballarat Camp, it will be the duty of the board narrowly to search and inquire whether there is any foundation for such serious accusations, and they will specify the individuals (if any) who they believe to be guilty. Victoria, Votes and Proceedings of Legislative Council, 1854-55, vol. 1.

That the public mind in England was in 1867 exercised as to whether the trade unions were responsible for certain outrages. The inquiry ordered was a judicial and general inquiry into acts alleged by any one against these trade unions or associations. The commission was to ascertain as far as possible the whole truth about the grievances, and into the scandals which had moved the public mind. (Eng. 'Hansard,' vol. 329, p. 271.)

That the president of the said commission was the then late Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas. (Vol. 189, 1867, Eng. 'Hansard.') The composition of the commission was considered as most important, because, as was said, unless constituted in such a way as to give confidence to those whose interests were concerned, it would produce very little benefit. (P. 191, 'Hansard' above.)

That in 1888 Lord Randolph Churchill referred in parliament to the extent of the metropolitan area under the management of the Board of Works, and claimed:—That a body administering affairs so large was bound to possess, if it was to be efficient, the most entire public confidence which could be imagined.

He charged, though not formally, or on his sole responsibility as a member of parliament, that members and officers of the board had been interested in property required for public use and that parties on the board were practically paid for some of their advice given on the board. That members of the board engaged outside in professional duties, had used their personal influence inside the board in favour of the scheme submitted in which they were professionally interested.

These charges had been mainly made by newspapers. Lord Randolph Churchill also referred to a statement by a newspaper that the Board of Works was the most corrupt public body in London. ('Hansard,' 51 Vic., 1888, p. 322.)

That a Royal Commission of inquiry was appointed to inquire into the Metropolitan Board of Works and it retrospectively included everything from the foundation of the board.

That respecting the Royal Commission for inquiry into the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, Sir John Macdonald stated in the House:

'It was announced in the House, press and country that there has been gross improprieties—this had been made the battleground of both parties, there had been charges and counter charges of misconduct of official subordinates, and even insinuations as well as assertions with regard to members of the government. ('Hansard,' 1880-81, vol. 1, p. 21.)

That the said commission went on to recite, 'The questions which have arisen have become the subject of discussion both in and out of parliament touching the propriety and responsibility for large expenditures connected with this work.' And again, 'That allegations have been made as to diverse irregularities and extravagancies, neglects and other derelictions of duty on the part of the officers and others employed on the said work and that sundry irregularities and improprieties have taken place in the obtaining of contracts for portions of said work and in the performance of the same,' and the commission was empowered to inquire fully and report. (C.P.R. Commission, p. 1853, 'Hansard,' 1899.)

On February 2, 1897, a Minute of Council approved of a memorandum from the Hon. Clifford Sifton, then, as now, the Minister of the Interior, in which he stated he had received such information in regard to the affairs of the Crown Timber agent in British Columbia as would appear in his judgment to require to be investigated immediately.

A commission accordingly issued authorizing Mr. Archer Martin, a barrister-at-law, to inquire into and report upon the affairs of the Crown Timber agent in British Columbia.

Upon the issue of the commission the Crown Timber agent was suspended.

On March 4, 1897, and after the issue of the said commission, the assistant secretary of the Interior Department wrote to the manager of the C. P. R. Telegraph Company, requesting that his officers at New Westminster would allow all necessary information to Mr. Martin, the commissioner, as it was desirable to check the telegraph account of the Crown timber agent.

The deputy minister, on March 6, 1897, and after the issue of the commission, and after the suspension of the Crown Timber agent, reported to the minister that: 'No definite charge was made against the Crown Timber agent.'

On March 11, 1897, a detailed statement of the contingent expenditure of the New Westminster office, from June, 1885, to December, 1896, was transmitted to the commissioner.

The Deputy Minister of the Interior on March 15, 1897, wired the said commissioner as follows: 'Investigation to be as thorough as possible.'

On March 20, 1897, the commissioner wrote indicating he had evidence against this official, and, referring to a contemplated visit to Kamloops, reported: 'I think that it would be cheaper and more satisfactory for me to go up there, where I might pick up other evidence.'

Sess. Paper No. 112. Ref. 115, New Westminster Crown Timber office.)

That an order in council of October 7, 1898, after reciting the charges next hereinafter mentioned, went on to say: 'The minister, therefore, recommends that, under the authority of Chapter 114 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, entitled "An Act respecting Inquiries concerning Public Matters," a commission do issue appointing William Ogilvie, Esquire, the commissioner of the Yukon territory, a commissioner under the said Act, to inquire into the charges and complaints set forth in the said communication, and into any other charges or complaints that any other person in the Yukon territory may desire to prefer against the officials of the government of Canada in that territory, and to report thereon, and upon all other matters incidental thereto.'

(P. 1 and 2, Ogilvie Report. Return 87, 4th Session, 8th Parliament, 62 Victoria, 1899.)

That on October 7, 1898, a commission issued in favour of William Ogilvie, Esquire, under the provisions of Chapter 114, R.S.C., to hold an investigation and to take evidence under oath with regard to certain charges made against officials of the Dominion government in the Yukon territory, in which it was alleged that many of the government officials of the Dominion government had forfeited their claim to the people's confidence and respect by their conduct and action in certain matters, and that the Gold Commissioner's office was practically closed, and has been for a considerable time, to the miners who had not the means and desire to bribe the clerks in order to obtain knowledge of the record which ought to be public, and that wholesale information with regard to the unrecorded ground was conveyed to certain individuals outside the office, who obtained men to stake and record the ground in consideration of an interest in the same, and that dissatisfaction had arisen with respect to decisions in claim contests, particularly owing to the Crown Prosecutor, who, while retained as advocate of one of the contestants, was giving legal advice to the Gold Commissioner. The Dominion Lands agent was charged with serious breaches of trust and malfeasance in office, and some of the officials connected with the Recorder's office were said to be incompetent, and it was charged that hardships had been caused to many of the claim owners owing to the want of experience of the mining inspectors, and that the Crown Timber agent had granted such concessions and laid down such stringent regulations that only a few parties had the privilege of supplying cordwood for the winter of 1898-9.

That instead of the wide scope of the commissions hereinbefore referred to, it was stated in said commission that inquiry should be made into the 'foregoing charges,' which were contained in a communication dated August 25, 1898, and the said commission did not provide for any other charges or complaints as in terms directed by said order in council before recited.

That this commission did not open until the 6th day of February, 1899.

That neither the statute, as amended, nor the said commission provided for a thorough, complete and searching investigation into the frauds which were alleged, or which had taken place, or into the administration of the laws in the Yukon district, and the conduct of officials therein.

That no provision was made for the purpose of indemnifying witnesses who might be required to answer or who answered questions, the answer to which might criminate or tend to criminate them (as in Section 9 of Chapter 10, of the Revised Statutes, entitled 'An Act respecting inquiries as to Corrupt Practices at Elections of Members of the House of Commons.')

That no provision was made respecting the travelling fees and maintenance of witnesses, as in the last mentioned Act is enacted by section 11 thereof.

That no provision of any kind was made for payment of witnesses during the sittings of the commission.

That on February 22, 1899, the representatives of the miners' committee stated to the commissioner, as follows:—

'Mr. Ogilvie.—The court is now open for the hearing of charges under the Royal Commission.

'Mr. Percy McDougal.—The representatives of the miners' committee want to bring evidence to show that money was paid to gain access to the Gold Commissioner's office. We are anxious to see where the blame is attached and find out to whom that blame is due.

'Mr. Armstrong.—I wish to define our position somewhat. We don't wish to be understood as prosecutors alone in this hearing of charges. We understand that you are holding a commission to inquire into matters of public interest in this territory, and we wish to give our time and help in this investigation without any fee or recompense of any sort.

'There is a matter which I wish to call your attention to, that is the matter of expenses. You have told us there is no arrangement in regard to expenses; but I would call your attention to the fact that many of the miners, especially those residing outside of Dawson on distant creeks, have no money whatever, and very little food, and that they have no cabins in Dawson, and no friends to whom they can have recourse ; and that to call such men into Dawson is an absolute piece of cruelty, and we are put in a position to ask these men to come and help the government to make an inquiry into matters of government interest. This seems to us an act of cruelty. I would ask you to make an order that witnesses might apply for such expenses as might be necessary for their maintenance during the times they are before the court.

'The Commissioner.—There is no authority in the commission as I told you before—nothing about paying expenses, and if I did what you suggest I might be held responsible myself. That I cannot afford.

'Mr. McDougal.—Could not the council make some provision for this ?

'The Commissioner.—No, this matter the council cannot deal with. It has only to deal with local matters. What I suggested was, that these men keep track of their expenses and put in the accounts, which will be submitted to Ottawa.

'Mr. Armstrong.—But these men have no money now ; how can a satisfactory commission of inquiry be held without paying the men their expenses ?

'The Commissioner.—If I trespass beyond the point of this commission I may be held personally responsible.

'Mr. Armstrong.—Then the only thing to do is to recognize the commission as limited and work within the limitation as best we can.

'The Commissioner.—I will help in every way I can.

'Mr. McDougal.—Is it not understood that under a Royal Commission the witnesses' fees are paid ?

'The Commissioner.—That question I cannot decide at present. We are considering that. There is no mention made in connection with expenses at all ; it is not referred to in the remotest way.

'As to the matter of witnesses coming in, as I told you, I will take that into consideration and suggest that they keep track of their expenses and submit the account to me, which I will forward to Ottawa. This is all I can do.

'Mr. McDougal.—The need for relief in such cases is immediate, as I would call to your attention, a number of the men called in have no shelter.'

Report of Ogilvie Commission, p. 12-13.

That the commissioner ruled that he was limited in his inquiry to the charges in the petition, and to such facts as occurred prior to August 25, 1898.

That Mr. Ogilvie concluded his inquiry under the Royal Commission on May 17, 1899.

That it was not until November 18, 1899, Mr. Ogilvie communicated with the Department of the Interior on the subject of witnesses' fees.

That instead of proceeding as in the inquiry into the Crown Timber office at New Westminster, the commissioner conducted the proceedings somewhat after the character of a court of assize and gave notice that the charges would have to be formulated and presented so that the accused persons might receive notice of such and be prepared to defend themselves, and that as soon as he received these charges formulated specifically, he stated he would notify the accused and appoint a day for hearing the cases, that regular rules of evidence would apply and that opinion evidence would not be satisfactory to him (pages 7 and 8, Ogilvie Commission), and he referred to parties charged as defendants (page 13, Ogilvie Commission).

That no provision was made for the conduct of the charges by counsel learned in the law, while parties implicated in the said charges were permitted to attend before the said commission represented by counsel.

That having decided that legal rules as to evidence should apply, the following incidents occurred on the investigation. Mr. Calpin was examining a witness respecting the opening and closing of Dominion Creek :—

Q. You don't know whether Captain Bliss gave that information to anybody ?—A. No.

Q. Was Captain Bliss on the council ?—A. Yes.

Mr. Calpin.—I think I should have mentioned that I bought a claim on Dominion from a person, a man who has since left the country. He said that he was given information by Captain Bliss, and says that others as well knew of it, and he met people going back ; this was before the notice was put up.

The Commissioner.—That is only a statement ; we can't take it as evidence.

(Pages 93 and 94, Ogilvie Commission.)

The commissioner was examining a Mr. Pulford and was pressing him as to the authority for his statements. Mr. Pulford having been imprisoned for not answering the commissioner.

By the Commissioner :

Q. I think that is a fair question. If he is willing to give the name of any informant, I think it is legitimate. We want to know these matters ?—A. I can't exactly tell you the name of the man who told me this matter, because I don't remember it. Not now ; I can't think of his name. If I was given two or three days to find him I could bring him into court.

Q. Have you any objection to answering what the information related to ?

Mr. Gwillim.—I object. This is hearsay evidence.

The Commissioner.—Well, if we can get a clew, what it relates to—

Mr. Gwillim.—I think the same rules of evidence should obtain here as obtain in other courts of law. You can't take what every Tom, Dick and Harry tells, nor believe all sorts of stories.

The Commissioner.—Suppose we take the trouble to ascertain what these are worth ?

Mr. Gwillim.—You might go on for a month or two if you did that.

The Commissioner.—If we hear rumours I think we might establish whether they are worthless or not.

Mr. Gwillim.—If the same rules apply in this court, with regard to witnesses, as apply in others, anything that is not evidence I object to.

The Commissioner.—In this case we will ask the witness the question though it is not a case of evidence.

That having written to the Minister of the Interior on February 20, 1899, a letter treated as private by the minister and not disclosed to parliament till ordered by the House in 1900, as follows :—

'The question of the withholding of McDonald's royalty has been brought up and we will have to investigate it. At the same time, this matter is a serious one : McDonald presumably owed the government some $70,000 for royalty due, out of which only about $2,000 was paid. Under ordinary circumstances the man would lose all his claim, but, as this was authorized by the late commissioner, of course, McDonald could not be made to suffer for his acts ; but it will have a very bad effect on the minds of the public when it becomes known that such was done.'

'Hansard,' page 5384, May 14, 1900.

Mr. Ogilvie reported as a Royal Commission on this subject as follows:—

'You will also see that some inquiry was made into the laying over of Mr. Alex. McDonald's royalty and an explanation furnished for the same. All the evidence submitted in this connection was that furnished in the letters between Major Walsh, Mr. McDonald and Mr. Fawcett.

'There appears to have been no wrong-doing in this, at least none was made manifest, Major Walsh taking the view that it would be impossible to exact Mr. McDonald's royalty, as it would put him to considerable hardship if he was compelled to pay it, and later on, his paying it would benefit the country as much as if he had paid it last spring.'

That as a matter of form, Mr. Ogilvie did not ascertain how much McDonald owed the government for royalty nor did he give any reason for changing his opinion expressed in February, 1899, that the matter was 'a serious one.'

That it does not appear that he attempted to secure the confidential letter which Mr. McDonald wrote to Major Walsh on that subject.

That no inquiry was made into the relations of Major Walsh and Mr. McDonald, the parties to confidential correspondence, respecting the indulgence regarding royalty and the violation of the law in this connection.

That Mr. Ogilvie was connected by marriage with the Minister of the Interior, the Hon. Mr. Sifton.

That Mr. Ogilvie's salary at the time when he was appointed commissioner for the Yukon district was $1,800, and as commissioner his salary was made $5,000, with quarters and provisions.

That after his report as commissioner under this special Royal Commission and upon the recommendation of the Minister of the Interior, the Hon. Mr. Sifton, his salary was made $6,000, living allowances, $2,000, rent $3,000, house-keeper $720, or $11,720 a year in all.

Shortly after the appointment of the commissioner, namely, on February 20, 1899, the commissioner advised the Minister of the Interior as follows:—

(a) 'Commissioner's Office, Y.T.,
Dawson, Feb. 20, 1899.

'Sir,—I regret to inform you that the Royal Commission for the investigation of charges against officials has, to an extent, fallen through.

'Mr. Armstrong, chairman of the miners' committee, who drew up the memorial which led to the issuance of the commission, and Dr. McDougall, the secretary of the committee, withdrew from the investigation when they learned that the scope of the commission only included what occurred previous to August 25, the date of the memorial.'

That the acting Minister of the Interior stated in this House on June 11, 1900:

'The people of this country have heard so much about this matter that they are tired of it and they thoroughly understand that the parties who got up these charges, were irresponsible, miserable vagabonds. All of them, I understand, without exception, have left the country and are afraid to return lest they should be prosecuted. . . . And whatever irregularities may have occurred, the great majority of all these statements and charges consisted of nothing but gossip from the lowest kind of characters.'

Mr. BELL (Fictou.)

That Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper, having made a series of charges in this House respecting the maladministration and corruption in public affairs in the Yukon territory, beyond and independent of the charges aforesaid which were before Mr. Ogilvie, and which were not limited to the date of August 25, 1898, as in the case before the commission or to any date, the Minister of the Interior informed this House, when asking to have the request of Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper for a judicial commission and a full inquiry voted down:

'We will give every fact, every alleged fact, that is brought before the government and brought before parliament, our fullest and most careful consideration. And if there is the least ground for finding that there should be any further or more complete investigation, we will provide that that further and more complete investigation shall take place.'

The Right Hon. Prime Minister said in the same debate:

'I will say this, speaking under my responsibility as head of the government, that if this investigation is not sufficient another investigation will be ordered. We must probe these Yukon delinquencies, so-called, to the bottom. No officer of the government must be allowed to rest under any suspicion.'

That on September 2, one Robert Anderson applied to Mr. Fawcett, the Gold Commissioner, for a lease of a tract of land for the purpose of hydraulic mining—a flat through which Hunker Creek runs—for a distance of about 2½ miles.

Mr. Anderson represented that this portion had not been located by miners, it being impossible to work it by crude methods, and that hydraulic mining alone would be successful.

Mr. Anderson added:

'I therefore make this application in good faith, for the purpose of obtaining a grant or lease to that portion of Hunker Creek lying between the Troandik River and about one thousand feet below the mouth of Last Chance Creek, an approximate distance of two and one-half miles, for the purpose of conducting and operating a hydraulic mine thereon.'

That promptly on September 3, 1897, Mr. Fawcett reported to the Minister of the Interior favourably.

That on November 30, 1897, the following petition was forwarded to the Minister of the Interior:

Dawson City,
November 30, 1897.

To the Hon. Mr. Sifton, Minister of the Interior,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—

We, the undersigned humble petitioners most emphatically protest against the granting of a two and one-half miles lease, more or less, of placer diggings on Hunker Creek, Klondyke Mining Division of the Yukon District, for hydraulic mining purposes.

The cause for this petition being the refusal of the Gold Commissioner to record our applications for the usual placer claims of 500 feet, 'it being an old creek.' As an application had been forwarded to your honourable self for the above grant of two and one-half miles, we most respectfully beg to say that this ground cannot be worked by hydraulic process, having scarcely any grade for dumping, and sixteen to eighteen feet of frozen black muck before reaching the pay gravel. We consider it very unfair to the miner and prospector, after months of hard la-hour, and when prospects are getting a little brighter, to have to stand by and see a company monopolize a whole creek. We humbly pray your honourable self to give this matter due consideration, and most respectfully hope you will advise the Gold Commissioner of this district to accept the records of those claims as staked by your petitioners as soon as possible, in order that we may go on with development work while everything is frozen, as we can do nothing in the summer months on account of water.

Awaiting your reply, your petitioners will ever pray.

That on January 8, 1898, the Minister of the Interior caused the application of Mr. Anderson to be noted and directed that no entries for mining claims under the lease applied for be granted.

That on January 12, 1898, an order in council was approved, the Minister of the Interior, the Hon. Mr. Sifton, 'submitting that Mr. Robert Anderson, mining engineer of London, England,' had applied for the said lease and that 'the tract applied for is a flat through which the creek runs, that it has been passed over by individual prospectors, as it is altogether too wide to prospect in search of a pay streak; that a claim of a less area than the one applied for would not justify the expenditure necessary to procure machinery and to give the experiment a fair trial,' and he recommends that the application be granted.

That on the 19th day of April, 1898, a committee of miners was informed, through Major Walsh by the Deputy Minister of the Interior that on the representation of the Gold Commissioner 'Mr. Anderson was given a lease of these bars, and I do not see that anything can be done to cancel it, at all events in the meantime.'

That the said order in council of January 12, 1898, went on to provide as follows:—

'The minister states that he is of the opinion that it is desirable to introduce hydraulic mining in the Yukon district, and that Mr. Anderson, who is an experienced miner, should be given an opportunity to ascertain whether or not this kind of mining is practicable on the tract applied for, and he recommends that the application be granted upon the following terms and conditions:—

'That the lessee shall have the necessary hydraulic machinery in operation on the ground within one year from the date of the lease, and if, during one season when operations can be carried on he fails to efficiently work the same, the lease shall become null and void, unless the Minister of the Interior shall decide otherwise.'

That instead of a lease being issued to Mr. Anderson and the conditions enforced, the area covered remained closed to prospectors under the order of the Minister of the Interior of January 8, 1898, and Mr. Anderson proceeded to England, and on December 12, 1898, cabled to Hon. Mr. Sifton as follows:—

'Have transferred benefit of Order in Council relating to Hunker Creek concession to Klondyke Government Concession Company, I authorize and request grant of lease direct to company, whose solicitors are cabling you.'

That without any other information before it, the Department of the Interior cabled on December 13, 1898, to Mr. Robert Anderson as follows:

'Belcourt advised lease; will issue to you forthwith, and sent London for your execution. Department will consent assignment to company if in proper form.'

That Mr. Belcourt, a member of parliament, cabled from London, to Hon. Mr. Sifton, on January 10, 1899, as follows: 'Anderson's Company has acted on Smart's cable that lease would issue forthwith and transfer assented to lease and assignment approved before my departure further delay will be most damaging here to Canadian interests good faith on your government at stake will expect immediate answer that lease completed.'

On January 12, 1899, Hon. Mr. Sifton cabled Mr. Belcourt that the lease was executed that day.

That on May 28, 1900, the acting Minister of the Interior informed this House that the lease which the Minister of the Interior was authorized to grant under order in council of January 12, 1898, was not granted until December 24, 1898, and that at the request of the Klondike Government Concession (Limited), the assignee of Mr. Anderson, a lease under the regulations of December 3, 1898, for the disposal of mining locations to be worked by hydraulic or other mining process, was issued in their favour on February 12, 1900, and this lease was in substitution for the one issued under the order in council of January 12, 1898, and having been asked what has been the result of the experiment referred to in the said order in council up to date the minister replied: 'No reports have been received, the department is not in a position to furnish this information.'

Mr. A. W. Taylor, formerly of Victoria, B.C., now of Dawson, wrote to Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper requesting him to ask for the papers granting the two and a half miles on Hunker Creek aforesaid. In this letter he states: 'This property is perhaps the richest aggregation of claims in this country,' and also 'as a matter of fact the ground as applied for can in no way be hydraulised, the work can only be performed by sinking. The guise was to get same on the hydraulic property plea.'

That it has been announced in this House, in the English and Canadian press and throughout Canada that there have been and still continue to be gross improprieties in the conduct of public affairs in the Yukon and charges of misconduct of officials and assertions made with regard to members of the government.

That in addition to the statements formally made in this House during the past session the following statements are now brought to the attention of this House:

'That one J. E. Whiteside, was sent by Collector Milne, of Victoria, to Skagway, on February 24, 1898, and subsequently he was transferred for service at White Pass. He left the service on May 27, 1898.'

That Mr. Whiteside has since then been a member of the firm of J. E. Whiteside & Co., real estate, mining and customs brokers in Dawson.

That Mr. Whiteside has advised a member of this House as follows:

'The following few facts are given to you with the understanding that I am not seeking for political favours, but rather that it is necessary that the country should know how things were carried on both at the Summits of White Pass and Chilcoot, by the Collector of Customs, during the spring of '98, and one item I can vouch for that was ignored and pooh-poohed at the Royal Farce held at Dawson by the Hon. Wm. Ogilvie.'

I was, as you are aware, sent by Collector Milne, to Skagway, as a Canadian bureau of information to aid intending prospectors to pass through the American customs. How I performed that work I leave others to tell you, but I might say that one American gentleman from Dawson told me on his return in that I was the first official he met who was honest, and afterwards when I was in Dawson he told me I could not make money in consequence, concerning the collection of duties at the Summit of White Pass, I was sent there by Col. Steele, after I had reported to Collector Milne, in detail. I found the state of affairs just as I had reported there and in consequence of doing my duty as a customs officer, I was treated as a spy by the officers in charge; this latter fact was written by the officer commanding the post to Col. Steele, who told me of it. I numbered the entries and entered up the cash-book which was not done before. The book is now in Ottawa. There were two items entered up twice in cash-book and yet the cash balanced(?) I was never allowed to check the cash, I asked twice, but was refused. The first item that was found entered twice I altered and reported as clerical error to Col. Steele. The second I refused to alter, but it was manipulated at right by the officer commanding and his sergeant who lived in the hut—I, as a customs clerk having to live in a tent. The business method I introduced was never adopted.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Does the hon. gentleman say that the charge is against the officer commanding, Col. Steele?

Mr. BELL (Pictou). I am reading a letter—

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But, I asked the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bell, Pictou) if he was saying that the charge—

Mr. BELL (Pictou).

Mr. FOSTER. No, he was not saying anything, simply reading a letter.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But I wish to ask whether, when the charge was against the commanding officer, that means Col Steele?

Mr. BELL (Pictou). I am reading a letter sent to a member of the House.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Surely the hon. gentleman knows whom it refers to?

Mr. BELL (Pictou). The letter speaks for itself; I cannot say as to which particular Steele. I do not know the record of the whole Steele family.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But I merely wished to ask.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). I have no authority to answer. There may be a dozen Steeles for all I know. Apparently, from the facts known on this side of the House, there have been a good deal more than a dozen Steeles.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. Speaker, I do not think the question I asked was unfair. I was following the hon. gentleman as closely as I could, and merely wished to know to whom he referred?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I think my hon. friend (Mr. Sutherland) has not allowed for the fact that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bell, Pictou) is reading his motion and cannot be asked to be interrupted in the middle of it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I merely wished to know to whom he refers; that is all.

Mr. BELL (Pictou)—(reading):

Concerning the Chilcoot Pass, I only have information from prospectors and they told me in Dawson that they never paid for one-half of goods. Invoices, &c., &c., were torn up and put away by brokers and others. I was informed a few days ago that entries were missing, invoices, and in fact chaos reigned supreme.

Concerning the administration at Dawson, it was scandalous in summer of '98. In the first place passes by the side door were given and signed in my own case by the health officer, Dr. Thompson, who is, I believe, a cousin of Mr. Hurdman, recorder of bench claims. That was ruled down by Mr. Ogilvie, as impossible, as an Indian half-breed kept the door and he could not read. The hon. gentleman was not aware perhaps that a police constable was holding the side door whilst the half-breed was at the main entrance. If the administration was so immaculate why was it found necessary to purify the office by dismissing three of the most imprudent officials, recorders of benches, creeks and another—because the public demanded it. The little paper called the 'Nugget' (so much abused by government organs) had too much truth in it to be palatable. I myself have made inquiries at a wicket in the recording office, and the recorder could not tell by his books if such and such a claim was recorded, but had to refer to a slip in his pocket for guidance as to whether the unfortunate prospector could record his claim. These are only a few of the facts. I made out a report of customs work for Major Walsh in detail and said report to be delivered to the Minister of Customs. Has that report ever reached its destination?

That one J. J. Seabrooke, writing to his father on October 16, '99, from Dawson, said :

'First the intended miner in the spring of '98, was informed by the people in Seattle that they would have to pay very little, if any, duty, as the Collector of Customs on the Summit was so loose that five dollars or ten dollars would let any one through. Seattle sent men up who brought back this information which is only too true. I would estimate that Canada had lost in customs $500,000. Many have told me that they would have outfitted in British towns if Seattle had not advised them in reference to the slackness of the Canadian customs. The rush is over, still the bulk of trade is from the United States where it will remain until the customs are enforced. There must be a million dollars worth of machinery in here from the States. . . . I have got good authority for all I am writing.'

That one William Catto, M.A., M.B., C.M., Edinburgh, who lives in Dawson City, writes under date March 31, 1900, respecting the Yukon administration, and says : 'This administration has been nothing but a high-handed confidence game. Whatever may be the individual respectability of the members of the government, the fact remains the same. Being a stranger in Canada, I hardly know who to refer you to. But if you will communicate with the Earl of Aberdeen, I think he will satisfy you as to my reliability. It is only because it is impossible to keep silence longer that I have said a word. He also states that he has been practicing medicine and surgery in Dawson for nearly two years, and is therefore well acquainted with the circumstances.'

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). To which department was that letter sent ?

Mr. BELL (Pictou). It is not in the department, I think.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Was it addressed to the hon. gentleman?

Mr. BELL (Pictou). It was addressed to an hon. gentleman of the House. I am not prepared to give you the letter, I am giving the contents.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). If you are not prepared to give the letter you should not quote it.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). The government does not always follow that rule and give the documents from which they quote. Besides, a private member is not under the same obligation. However, I have no doubt the letter can be produced if an inquiry is ordered :

Dr. Catto continues:

'Do not suppose that I have written from an alien's point of view. Though I am a stranger in Canada, I am a British subject, born in Scotland, and a graduate of two Scottish universities, and have many friends in all parts of Great Britain, who know that I would disdain to write a single word except in the interest of my country and in the interest of Canada.'

'On whom then rests the responsibility of this chaotic administration of affairs on the Yukon ? It rests on the government and its agents. Overcome by a sense of official importance, and drunk with unmerited power, they have been capricious, unjust, tyrannical and foolish. Stirred only by motives that are despicable, they have carved their country with a pitiless hand. In doing so, they have cut the conduits of all precious currents, moral, political and economic, that are the life-blood of a community—currents that, allowed to run in their proper channels, would have been, in this case, a source of rejuvenation to Canada.'

'Any one living for some time in Dawson finds that he is not living in a social community. There is no classification of the present inhabitants of the Yukon district. They have, however, been forcibly and roughly cut into two divisions. The government, with its various rings; and the people, the armed and the defenceless, the oppressors and the oppressed, the gatherers of fines and taxes and their victims, the private dealers in monopolies and permits and the unwilling purchasers of monopolized goods; on the one side, those who sell, barter and give away not only the land, but the liberties of the Canadian people in such a manner as to raise a continual suspicion that they participate privately in the benefits they bestow; on the other side, a people compelled to pay from their own hard-laboured hands the price for which their lands and their liberties are bought and sold.'

'Such was the treatment dealt us by an administration that had renounced the commercial and industrial regulations of the country, that ignored the mining laws and the Criminal Code of Canada, and was already discredited by a great series of wholesale scandals in connection with the town site, the water front, Dominion Creek, Dominion benches, and by a host of individual affairs whose name is legion.'

'Observe how matters stand in consequence of the various changes in the mining regulations. All fractional claims, all groups of ten alternate claims, all claims that have not been prospected and represented, now fall into what is euphemistically called Crown reserve, but more appropriately known as Sifton's reserve, since the Minister of the Interior disposes of it privately as he privately determines. Has he always been careful to dispose of this valuable reserve belonging to the people of Canada to absolutely reliable friends, deservers of their country's love? Much of this so-called Crown reserve has already proved valuable. As time goes on the miners working on adjacent ground will give a prospective value to more and more of it. In the meantime, it remains idle, costing the Minister of the Interior nothing. Thousands of men in the Yukon territory are unable to find employment or ground to prospect. But they dare not touch this precious reserve, which already amounts to more than nine-tenths of the gold-bearing area of the Yukon district—a territory larger than Great Britain. What do the people of Canada think of all this being in the hands of the Minister of the Interior and his estimable friends? Think of it—all this disposed of in accordance with section 16 of the mining regulations "in such manner as may be decided by the Minister of the Interior." A variety of methods have been practiced in the disposal of reserve ground known to be valuable.'

Method No. 1.—Engineering a survey to make a full claim out of a fraction.

Method No. 2.—Compensation to a man with an alleged grievance. The man states his grievance and gets his choice of a claim in the Crown reserve. Of course, he chooses a very valuable one, and the affair is very satisfactory to everybody concerned in the transaction. The law that safeguards a man against official errors is more than complied with. It would be cheaper for the government, but perhaps not so satisfactory to the Minister of the Interior and his friends, to give the man a straight compensation in currency on valuation of his "grievance."

Method No. 3.—Hydraulic concessions, including what is known to be a spot of rich placer ground. Without referring to the question of Yukon hydraulic concessions in general, we may state that a concession has recently been granted to include a spot that we are told prospects about $5 to the pan, being the continuation of the pay streak withdrawn from the owners of the adjoining claim by a capricious and irrational survey. Of course, as in the case of other "hydraulic concessions," we expect to see that rich spot worked out as ordinary placer ground, and the concession sold to company promoters or allowed to lapse. If the owner of the concession does not know that rich spot, we shall be very pleased to show it to him for a half interest in 200 feet. That would be a trifle in the concession of ten square miles, since the same man owns a valuable timber concession covering that ground.

The claims in that Dominion Creek reserve were, in the first instance, illegally withheld from their locators by Walsh, who had no more power to close Dominion Creek than he had to close the Yukon district, but nevertheless ratified Fawcett's closure with his fine monarchical sweep as if he had been autocrat of Canada. The Minister of the Interior advertised these claims for sale, with the usual governmental proviso that the highest or any offer would not necessarily be accepted. This proviso, which works no injustice when we are dealing with an administration that acts in good faith, reduced the sale to such an open farce that honest business men and miners who were not in the ring, and who knew the bold proclivities of the Department of the Interior, were well aware that it was useless for them to make an offer. Notwithstanding this, the Dawson offers were far higher than those of Ottawa. But the claims were sold to a ring in Ottawa for the price of a solitary third-rate placer claim. Will the Minister of the Interior explain to the people of Canada why he accepted those Ottawa offers, and sold their ground for less than one-twentieth part of its value?

The Yukon policy of the Minister of the Interior is very simple. It is simply a policy of private aggrandizement at the expense of Canada. His plan of campaign is equally simple. It consists in a temporary suspension of law and suits his convenience and the convenience of his friends. It is a plan of campaign applicable to the appropriation of every square inch of the surface and every cubic inch of the contents of a new unappropriated country. It is applicable with equal effect to the timber of Manitoba and to the gold and timber of the Yukon. All that he has to do is to suspend the laws for a short time so as to declare a closure on the country. This has the remarkable effect of converting the country into 'Crown reserve,' to be disposed of 'in such manner as may be decided by the Minister of the Interior.'

Every saloon pays a license of $2,500. There are ten large saloons in Dawson City. Every road-house pays a license of $500. Say there are fifty such road-houses in the Yukon district. That would give $100,000 in two years from saloons and road-houses. Prior to the imposition of those licenses, a large number of business houses of different descriptions were selling liquor. In the fall of 1898 they were fined $200 each, near the time when the government came down with its most rapacious swoop of all to fill its local treasury with a universal fine on the prostitutes and gamblers of $50 each and "costs." Every gambler pays $56 per month, $672 per annum. There are not less than 100 professional gamblers. That gives $134,000 in two years from gambling.

Every prostitute pays $56 as a commencement of the business, thereafter $10 per month, $176 per annum. Say there are 150 prostitutes, again a low estimate, and we have a revenue of $26,400 from prostitution.

Meantime, the people are being openly and secretly robbed of the ground, the gold, the timber, and most of the privileges promised them in the mining regulations, and by the agents of the government, when they were booming the country to attract an army of victims to come and develop it for them.

It is reservation of alternate claims, reservation of fractions, reservation of unrepresented claims, secret appropriation of rich fractions, so-called "sale" of reserve ground to a ring of friends in Ottawa, closure of valuable creeks and miles of rivers, so-called hydraulic concessions of valuable placer ground; secret records that can be dated to prove anything; concessions of timber that compel the poor to go twenty miles in search of fuel or cut wood in jail, private sale of monopolies and permits, heavy taxes on what few natural products of the country are left for the prospector and miner, it is everything suspicious and suggestive of malfeasance, it is a politicians' feast. It is laws that are a puzzle, litigation made compulsory, capricious interpretation, disputed surveys, records that are worthless, insecurity of title, insecurity of everything, it is paralysis and general dissolution of the insane, it is the corpse of justice alive with maggots, it is a lawyer's carnival.

Public gambling is a crime in Canada. Dawson City contains at least ten large gambling saloons, in which the police are to be seen daily; but no attempt has been made to suppress gambling. On the contrary, it has been in a manner, legalized by the sanction and connivance of the police and the magistrates, who collect the monthly revenue from the tables in the shape of what they call a fine. They may call it what they please. The plain English of it is that the government runs the gambling on something better than a percentage basis, because it collects the revenue whether the house has lost or won during the month. A man from each house goes to the "sacred temple of justice," and pleads guilty for the gambling fraternity of the house, and pays $56 per month for each of the gamblers in the house. We have heard of one house paying $830 per month, and Mr. Marjoriebanks informs us that his monthly contribution for gambling in the Horseshoe was $728. They wanted him to pay $500 extra because there were girls in the house. The direct revenue from gambling in Dawson City cannot be less than we formerly stated, namely, $67,200 per annum.

This is not all. In each saloon there are arrangements from which the government draws $2,500 per annum in addition to the secret monopoly, for restoring the victimized miner to a state of physical and mental comfort, provided he has enough money left to pay for them. There is monopolized fire-water made in Dawson City, and called whisky, at the rate of 50 cents and $1 per glass. There is an invitation to an exhilarating dance; and then to the private boxes with the smile and comforting touch of perfumed ladies, dressed for their work, who order monopolized effervescent drinks called champagne, for which the miner has to pay at the rate of $30 per bottle. Complete intoxication follows, and the miner is arrested on the charge of drunkenness. The Yukon administration, which has been robbing him indirectly throughout the whole performance, now comes forward courageously and empties his gold sack by a fine of $30 and costs. And this is called government. And thus hundreds of young men who never saw the inside of a court-room till they came here, are decaying to slaughter in the Dawson 'temple of justice.'

Prostitution is a crime in Canada. Dawson City contains several rows of women, perhaps 150, set apart by the government, publicly engaged in that trade. The police magistrates collect the revenue from the women in the shape of what they call a 'fine.' The plain English of it is that the government runs the public women of Dawson as a source of revenue, just as it runs the gambling. Their 'medical officer of health,' a Dr. Good, in the shadow of whose acquaintance Mr. Sifton stands, and talks cheaply to the simple people of Winnipeg as if he had a parental interest in the public health of the Yukon district, goes round and collects monthly fee of $10 from each woman, and certifies that they are 'healthy.'

The 'legal adviser' to the Yukon council recently assured us that it is not in his capacity of "medical officer of health" that the doctor visits those women. This from Mr. Clement is only an indication that the Yukon administration is losing courage.

We asked how the certificates of 'healthy' come to be signed M. H. O. after the doctor's name, and why a policeman sometimes accompanies the doctor. He said he did not understand it. We remarked that the women could refuse the doctor's visits, and might lodge a charge of indecent assault against him. 'Well,' replied Mr. Clement, 'it must be remembered that those women are liable to imprisonment at any time.'

We have a criminal water carriage system, the result of the franchise to an American colonel. How did that escape the 'medical officer's veto'? We have several deadly epidemics of typhoid fever. What has the 'medical officer' done to ascertain the source of infection? We had an outbreak in one of the hospitals this winter, but it does not seem to be the duty of the medical officer to look for a local contamination of that criminal water carriage system.

The law of Canada says you must not gamble in public; the administration says you may gamble in public, but you must not cheat a policeman, and if you are a gambler by profession, you must pay $56 per month whether you cheat or not, whether you win or lose. The law of Canada says a woman shall not engage in prostitution; the administration says she may trade in that way; that if she does, she must contribute a share of her earnings and receive the visits of 'the medical officer of health' at his own terms.'

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Who is the author of that—I will not call it a letter—document, that the hon. gentleman read in his motion?

Mr. BELL (Pictou). Dr. Catto.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Where does he profess to hail from?

Mr. FOSTER. He refers to Lord Aberdeen for a testimonial of character, so that you can easily find out for yourself.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). In the meantime, does the hon. gentleman think that is a proper letter to be spread upon the records of parliament?

Mr. FOSTER. In the meantime it is copyrighted, and will be published in England.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is what it is for. It is the most infamous and disgraceful letter that was ever written.

Mr. BELCOURT. How do you spell his name?

Mr. BELL (Pictou). William C-a-t-t-o. He is a master of arts, and a doctor of medicine, of Edinburgh. (Reading)

That one Robert Adams writes to his mother, Mrs. Robert Adams, Newdale, Manitoba: 'I located a good claim on Dominion Creek, and came in after a 200-mile tramp to record it, and was refused, although I was first to locate it and had witnesses to prove it, but the same afternoon a government official recorded it himself without leaving Dawson to even stake the claim.'

Alexander Clark writes from Dominion Creek, March 3, 1900, stating: 'The corruption here is something frightful.' Again, 'the officials are corrupted by the Americans. If there is a contract to be given out here, the Americans are nearly sure of it every time, and even the carrying of the mails to the creeks is given to them.'

That on March 23, 1900, it was stated at a public meeting in Dawson by Mr. Sugrue that a most corrupt and vicious system of administration was instituted by Hon. Mr. Sifton and Hon. James M. Walsh, and other officials, and has been continued, with some periodical improvements in some departments of the administration, up to the present time.

That the Yukon district has no representation in the parliament of Canada nor in the executive council for the Yukon district.

That this House is of opinion that a high judicial commission should be appointed with full and adequate powers, to be conferred by suitable legislation to fully inquire into, hear and report upon all of the said charges heretofore made, or which may be brought to the notice of the said commission during its sittings.

Mr. Bell (Pictou) having read the amendment,

Mr. Speaker having taken the amendment.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Read.

Mr. SPEAKER. I wish the House would excuse me from an hour's reading.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. But we cannot remember what is stated in the amendment.

The PRIME MINISTER. Let the Clerk of the House read it.

Mr. Speaker having continued to read the amendment for some time.

Mr. FOSTER. Would you allow me for one moment? This will all have to be read again when we come to vote, because there are a large number of members at present in the committee rooms, and until you come to the Anderson and Catto charges, this is simply setting out what appears in Ogilvie's report. I would suggest that to save time, Mr. Speaker should commence to read from the Anderson and Catto charges.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. More time would be saved by not putting this amendment in.

Mr. FOSTER. Time would not be saved by not putting it in, and much more has to come, and it will be continued to be put in, until the government grant an inquiry.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. In the meantime, let it go on.

Mr. FOSTER. My suggestion was in order to save time.

Mr. MAXWELL. You were not saving much time yesterday.

Mr. Speaker continued to read the amendment.

It being One o'clock, the House took recess.

The House resumed at Three o'clock.

Mr. JAMES SUTHERLAND (North Oxford). Mr. Speaker, I understood from the hon. junior member for Pictou (Mr. Bell) last evening that he did not intend to bring up this resolution to-day; so that I had not the opportunity of listening to his remarks; and you will admit that it is almost impossible, even after having heard this long resolution read by yourself, to understand all that is in it, or even to appreciate to a small extent what it contains. I quite exonerate my hon. friend from having perpetrated upon the House and the country the placing in your hands of such a resolution. We all know that it is a legacy from the senior member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper); and, Sir, after having heard a portion of that resolution read, I am not surprised, even though we know the record of the hon. senior member for Pictou, and what he did and said in this House last session, that he has been ashamed to face the House and the country and to place such a resolution in your hands himself. Sir, it is history repeating itself, only worse. In 1878 the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie and his government were attacked by all kinds of slanders and calumnies; and the policy of the present opposition appears to be, as they are not able to criticise successfully the administration of the government, to throw broadcast the most unfounded slanders against the characters of members and officials of the government, without any regard to what is right or fair. It is my humble opinion, Mr. Speaker, that there is not a member sitting on the opposite side of the House who believes that there is one word of truth in this resolution or one just reason why any action should be taken upon it. It is put forward for one purpose only; that is, because hon. gentlemen opposite are unable to find any just or fair policy with which to go to the country, they have adopted this unfair and improper—

An hon. MEMBER. Immoral.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes, I may say immoral policy of throwing unfounded slanders against members of the government; and in this disgraceful resolution they are not only directing their slanders against the Liberal party and the Liberal government, but they are discrediting our fair Dominion. There seems to be no limit to the length to which these gentlemen are willing to go in discrediting and destroying the country if they can only make it appear that there is some cause for censure upon the government. On this occasion we have not had extended to us the usual courtesy which prevailed in this House in days gone by, that of furnishing the Premier, at least, with a copy of the resolution: but this thing is sprung upon us without a moment's notice, in a resolution which it takes hours to read in the House before it can be voted upon. So far as I can understand the resolution, it is a rehash of what we have heard from the hon. senior member for Pictou time and again in this House and out of it—affecting the collection of the McDonald royalty, the closing of Dominion Creek, the attacks on Major Walsh, and the Anderson concession. We have heard of these things over and over again; but in the hope that some political capital might be made out of them, they are once more placed before the House and the country. The only thing that is new is a letter, written, it is not known to whom; but if nothing were known of the person who wrote it, as soon as it is read, any person with any judgment must come to the conclusion that the man who wrote it is not only a lunatic, but a vicious and immoral character. One might well allow this discreditable document to go to the judgment of the people without a word of criticism or comment. I wish, however, to say a few words with regard to some of these matters; and I may say that neither this government nor the Department of the Interior require any suggestion from any member of the opposition to hold an investigation into the conduct of any of their officials if there is any reasonable ground for such investigation. Why, Sir, during the present year, a citizen of Dawson unknown to the minister or to any other person in the department, so far as I know, wrote to the Minister of the Interior over his own name, making certain charges against the gold commissioner, a gentleman of the very highest character whom no one would believe guilty of any impropriety. But on that simple letter, in which the writer had honour enough and courage enough at least to take the responsibility of stating that he could prove certain charges—unlike the senior and junior members for Pictou, who place these outrageous statements upon Hansard, in resolutions, and in the press of the country, without taking one iota of responsibility for them—what did the minister do? He at once issued a commission to the judge of the territory to hold a judicial investigation; but, on looking at the papers reporting the progress of this case, what do we find?—showing how the authorities may be abused by characters of this description. This man is asked to come to court, and has to be forced by the judge to come to court. He said: 'I did not think the minister would take any notice of my charges.' The judge insisted that he should go on and show why he made the charges, and that the official should have an opportunity to exonerate himself. Even this favourite paper of the hon. gentleman, the Nugget, which I suppose is his organ in the district, says:

All the complainant's testimony was of a hearsay character.

So the country is put to the expense, and this honourable man is subjected to whatever disgrace there may be connected therewith, of having a judicial inquiry into his conduct. If any hon. member of this House or any reputable citizen of the country will represent to the minister that there is anything to be inquired into, it will be inquired into to the fullest extent. My hon. friend has stated in his speech—about all he did say—that the investigation held by Mr. Ogilvie was not sufficient. That statement has been made several times. I will admit that, perhaps, Mr. Ogilvie did not have the restraint upon the people in the conduct of the investigation that a judge or a court of judges would have had.

I appeal, however, to any unprejudiced person to say whether that investigation was not held by Mr. Ogilvie in such a way as to give every one an opportunity to come forward and tell anything he might know, without being hampered by any legal or technical rules of evidence? I am satisfied that the members of this House do not agree with the hon. member for Pictou that this inquiry was limited and unsatisfactory. Let me read a few extracts from Mr. Ogilvie's report to show how the investigation was conducted:

To allay as far as possible this irritation and discontent, I felt it my duty, as far as lay within my power, to investigate every statement made to me, no matter how trivial it might be, because, though it appeared trivial to me it was very serious to the one giving the information, and I may say that in no case have I yet found that anything could be proven; in fact, I may say that in a great measure the statements made, when traced to their foundation, were proven to be simply hearsay, the party making the assertion generally shielding himself or herself by some one else though that some one else often proved ignorant of the whole matter.

Could greater efforts have been made by the commissioner? But what was the result? The result was, as Mr. Ogilvie points out, that the parties making charges shielded themselves behind somebody else, just as the hon. member for Pictou has done on that side of the House. They relied upon hearsay evidence, without any regard whatever to the character of the persons from whom they got their information, and I must say that I fail to understand how any hon. member of this House can, with any sense of self-respect or the dignity of his position, make statements reflecting on the good name of Canada which have their origin in such discreditable sources. Mr. Ogilvie said:

One thing soon became apparent, and that was, that whatever crookedness there might be in the office, there was a great deal of crookedness outside of it. It soon became evident to me that men were obtaining record of claims in improper ways, and in ways that were criminal. It was nothing unusual for men to resort to the gold commissioner's office and obtain record for a claim which they had never seen, though, in their affidavits of application, they swore that they in their own proper person staked out the grounds for which they had applied. This affidavit was held in contempt by a great measure of the people around Dawson, and no more was thought of perjuring one's self in that way than saluting a comrade on the street.

Well, this is the class of people that the hon. gentleman brings forward as witnesses when he asks for a judicial investigation against prominent citizens and officials of high character.

These cases, of course, seemed to the general public to imply that the officials in the gold commissioner's office were corrupt. I believe that the true explanation of a large amount of this lay in the fact that there was no privacy in the gold commissioner's office—the accommodation being too limited. Crowds were within the doors and it was perfectly easy for a bystander to hear answers to every question that was asked; the answers to these questions reaching the ears of many others than the questioner, some one of them a few hours afterwards returned to the office and obtained record of the ground described.

I wish to say here that I have not the slightest intention of defending any officials who may have done wrong. If it can be shown that any one has been guilty of wrongdoing, I would be the first to say he should be punished if any one respectable man will come forward and say he has reason to believe that any official has done anything wrong. I would be the first to vote for an investigation. But I say that these officials are entitled to ordinary fair-play.

These were held over for trial on the charge of perjury, and also for obtaining improper record. As the decision in the matter would be most important, great care was taken in the prosecution to have the cases properly presented and leave no stone unturned to secure a conviction if the parties were guilty. Two of the cases were tried and the individual in the first case was acquitted by the jury for the reason that the evidence did not conclusively indicate his guilt; in the second the jury disagreed, though the evidence was conclusive, and it was laid over until the next assize for retrial, and the jury disagreed again.

This shows that Mr. Ogilvie was making every possible effort to ferret out and punish any wrong-doing committed in that country :

As some of the delinquents had confessed perjury and admitted the charges made against them, the officers of the court and myself, after conference, felt that we had secured the object of our attempt.

I wish to read one or two more extracts from Mr. Ogilvie's report, so that those who have not had the opportunity of reading his previous report will know something of the character of the position taken by hon. gentlemen opposite :

From the evidence submitted, I think any unprejudiced person would consider that the charges made against Mr. Fawcett on this occasion totally failed.

References have been made to the farcical nature of this investigation by the newspapers here and others.

The others include, no doubt, my hon. friends opposite.

I readily admit the charge; it certainly was farcical, but not in the way they put the term; it was farcical in this, that it utterly failed to show any ground for the accusations made, more than common rumour; and that, I regret to say, is entirely irresponsible in Dawson, perhaps more so than elsewhere.

If it would not take up too much of the time of the House, I would make further references from Mr. Ogilvie's report to show that not only did he, as commissioner, give the greatest possible latitude to every one who appeared before him, but he himself went out of his way to find out if there was any foundation at all, even for this hearsay gossip against the officials. A short time ago, when I read to the House the letter of Mr. Lithgow, the accountant in Dawson City, in which he reported upon the McDonald royalty and forwarded a statement of that royalty, I ventured to say, that if there had been any irregularity, Mr. Lithgow, as a professional accountant and an officer holding a high position in the government, would have referred to it in that letter. But, on the contrary, he made no reference to any irregularity, and we had every reason to assume that this matter was perfectly regular and that there was no foundation for the insinuations and charges made by the hon. member for Pictou. But the hon. gentleman thought differently, and the ex-Minister of Finance could see nothing but corruption and irregularities and stealing going on because Mr. Lithgow had not referred to McDonald's affidavits in his letter with the statement to the department.

I stated on a previous occasion that the Auditor General had sent an officer to the

Mr. SUTHERLAND.

Yukon to investigate matters there and audit the books of account. He was asked for a statement with regard to this particular matter. And, to show how unfounded the statements of the hon. member are, I wish to read the statement of that officer. It would be well for the House and the country to know that this gentleman is, as I understand, an officer in the Auditor General's department; he was sent to the Yukon district by the Auditor General; and he was not under the control of the Department of the Interior or the government, but was an independent officer who, though I do not know him personally, I have reason to believe was perfectly competent to carry out the work he was sent by the Auditor General to do. This is his statement, addressed to the Auditor General :

Auditor General's Office, Canada,
Ottawa, June 19, 1900.

Sir,—During the course of my inspection at Dawson during the summer of 1899, I went over the royalty affidavits in the office of Mr. Lithgow, both for the season 1897-8 and 1898-9, and noted the particulars of each affidavit. With regard to the case of Alex. McDonald, I found that he reported on seventy-four claims, as shown in the accompanying statement. Of these claims, sixty were practically unproductive, the declared output being in each case less than $2,500, the amount of exemption allowed at that time; on the other ten claims the royalty payable amounted to $41,490.13, as follows:

	Net output.	Royalty.
1 and 2, Skookum.....	$10,000 00	$1,000 00
2 above Bonanza .....	117,400 00	11,740 00
35 above " .....	21,000 00	2,100 00
6 below " .....	62,062 50	6,206 25
19 Eldorado .....	9,000 00	900 00
22 " .....	42,000 00	4,200 00
27 " .....	31,000 00	3,100 00
30 " .....	51,000 00	5,100 00
34 " .....	2,620 00	262 00
36 and 37, Eldorado.....	48,658 80	4,865 88
3 below Hunker .....	16,000 00	1,600 00
6 " .....	4,160 00	416 00

Mr. Speaker, I am taking up the time of the House because so much has been said, and we know will be said, by way of insinuation and even bolder charges, to convey the impression that there was something wrong in the conduct of Major Walsh in relation to this matter. I think it is only right, not only to Major Walsh, but for the credit of Canada, that these matters should be made perfectly clear, so that the people may understand exactly what was done.

The royalty being calculated on a 10 per cent basis, this represents a gross output of $414,901.30. In addition to this, the exemption on the whole seventy-four claims must be taken into consideration. If we allow $2,500 for each claim, this represents a further output of $185,000, or a gross output of $599,901.30, or say $600,000 in round numbers. This latter estimate, it must be remembered, is the maximum. The probability is that the average output of the sixty unproductive claims would fall considerably short of $2,500.

The payments were made as follows:

In 1897-8 on claim 30, Eldorado..... $ 4,000 00

This is part of the $14,429 appearing in the Lame of W. Chappell on page H-91 of the report for 1897-8.

In 1898-9, on claim 30, Eldorado..... 1,100 00

Collected by H. H. Norwood from W.
Chappell (see Auditor General's Report, 1898-9, page H-88), on claim
35. Bonanza (see same page)..... 2,100 00

Collected by gold commissioner in June, 1899 ..... 34,028 13

$41,228 13

Due on claim 34, Eldorado. of the payment of which I could find no trace.. 262 00

$41,490 13

In the case of claim 30, Eldorado, though the royalty was paid by Wm. Chappell, the affidavit was made by McDonald. Chappell appearing to be a partner of his. In last season this claim appears under the name of McDonald & Chappell.

When the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) asked as to the discrepancy that appeared between the statement in the report of Mr. Ogilvie and the actual return furnished by Mr. Lithgow, the accountant,
I ventured to suggest that the difference was, as is fully explained here, due to the fact that some of the amounts were paid on claims not appearing in Mr. McDonald's name or legal exemptions. But the hon.
gentleman could see nothing but that some person had been stealing, or that something crooked had been going on. I knew nothing of the account or of the audit that was made, except that there was a report. I said then, and I say now, that if the Auditor General's officer had found anything wrong when he examined the books of the district, he certainly would have so reported to the Auditor General; and I had the right to assume, from past experience, that if the slightest irregularity had been found, it would have been reported to the department by the Auditor General. For that reason, I felt every confidence in refusing to accept statements made by hon. gentleman opposite.

Claim 34, Eldorado, appears also under the name of H. M. Smith, who paid $44.50 royalty.
In this case the $2,620 may represent the gross output instead of the net output.

I examined all the affidavits for royalty for the two years, and found no difference between the manner of determining the claim against McDonald and that followed with reference to the other claim-holders. The only thing peculiar to Mr. McDonald's case was his being allowed time to pay his royalty.

I have the honour to be, sir,

Your obedient servant,

J. W. REID.

J. L. McDougall, Esq.,
Auditor General.

Now, I wish to call the particular attention of the House to this statement :

I examined all the affidavits for royalty for the two years—

We had to listen for hours to hon. gentlemen opposite trying to prove that there was something wrong because the affidavits were not laid on the Table of the House.

I examined all the affidavits for royalty for the two years, and found no difference between the manner of determining the claim against
Mr. McDonald and that followed with reference to the other claim-holders. The only thing peculiar to Mr. McDonald's case was his being allowed time to pay his royalty.

I have the honour to be, sir,

Your obedient servant,

(Sgd.) J. W. REID.

I think that if there ever was any doubt in any honest man's mind as to this transaction, the case has been made so clear that no self-respecting person will again say that there was anything irregular in it.
So far as allowing time to Mr. McDonald for the payment of these royalties is concerned, as I said before, so I say now—that when we examine the case, we find Major Walsh showed good judgment in taking the action he did. There was no chance of loss to the country, and it was in the interest of the country, on the other hand, that he should take that action at that particular time.

The next charge that we have heard so much about in this House was as to the closing of Dominion Creek. Hon. gentlemen opposite have tried to make it appear that Major Walsh did something that was improper or discreditable or corrupt. It seems unfortunate that the time of the House should be taken up in discussing these matters. But, these charges are being rehashed from time to time, and statements are made again and again concerning Major Walsh which are discreditable to those who make them, but not Major Walsh. I shall have to ask the House to bear with me while I read the report from Mr. Fawcett with regard to the closing of Dominion Creek to show how baseless are the statements that are being made. The Yukon being so far away, and the people of eastern Canada not understanding the conditions, they may possibly think there is some ground for these false and malicious statements which are made on the floor of this House, insinuating a partnership or some understanding between Major Walsh and some of the parties who staked out claims. It is necessary, therefore, for the good name of Canada, that these matters should, if possible, be given the fullest publicity, so that the people can see for themselves how foundationless these statements are :

Commissioners Office,

Dawson, Y.T., May 9, 1900.

To the Secretary of the Department of the Interior, Dawson, Y.T.

Sir,—In further reply to yours of March 6, file 552579, I have to forward a report that Mr.
Thomas Fawcett, gold commissioner, made to the commissioner, respecting the closing and opening of Dominion Creek.

I have the honour to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,
J. N. E. BROWN,
Secretary to Commissioner.

This is Mr. Fawcett's report :

Dawson, October 3, 1898.

Sir.—As you desired some information regarding the closing of Dominion Creek and my reasons for refusing all applications for claims on a portion of that stream, after November 15, 1897; I have the honour to submit the following :

About June 17, 1897, it was reported that some one had discovered gold on Dominion Creek. A report of that kind is generally followed by a stampede to the creek, and a staking race amongst the various aspirants for claims. Some of the claims were numbered and some were staked without a number. They started to number the claims from two points. Arrivals at Dawson from Dominion Creek were just commencing at the time. I reached Dawson, viz., June 15, 1897. For a few days after my arrival I was absent at Fort Cudahy, taking over the returns, and during my absence a good many applications had been taken by Mr. Davis, the customs officer, which was turned into the office subsequently. Among these was one from Albert Fortier for the claim located as Discovery claim which subsequently was changed to Lower Discovery to distinguish it from another claim which I had accepted an application for from one Frank Beiberman, who recorded the claim as Discovery claim, the claim subsequently being described as 'Upper Discovery' to distinguish it from the claim recorded by Fortier.

This was the origin of the two Discoveries (so-called), and the people located their claims in reference to both points and numbered from both Discoveries up and down the stream. No one seemed to have any idea how far the discovery claims were apart. At the time the first staking was done the regulations were recognized which allowed sixty days from the time of staking to the time of recording, and any claims staked prior to June 15, was held for the original stake and until after the expiry of the sixty days. A great many of the claims were relocated, and persons desiring to record them were not permitted to do so because the time allowed the original locaters had not expired, but many were recorded that had never been staked, and a few were recorded by description, having been described from some tributary which joined Dominion Creek a certain distance above or below one of the Discoveries.

During the summer a great fire swept along the creek and many of the stakes disappeared entirely, and the ground was staked over again regardless of the fact that many of the claims had been recorded before. Between the two Discoveries we found some time about the end of August that Nos. 12 and 13 above Lower Discovery covered the same ground that a man claimed as No. 37 below Upper Discovery. Having recorded the ground known as Nos. 12 and 13, I refused to complicate matters by placing 37 on record. The man who claims the ground as 37 has made application for a hearing this summer, but as the owners of No. 12 were absent the hearing could not take place. Prior to that time No. 17 above Lower Discovery had been recorded, and it was subsequently found that this covered the same ground which was recorded as 34 below Upper Discovery. The contestants for this claim were heard last summer by Chief Justice McGuire, who kindly gave me his assistance in the investigation of several of the more difficult cases which came up for hearing. The decision was in behalf of the party who claimed to have staked first, and an appeal has been taken from that decision to the Minister of the Interior at Ottawa.

On towards fall there were a good many applications for claims below Lower Discovery. Among some of the first below were claims Nos. 70, 71, 72, &c., this having been carried on for some time, we received information that these numbers were estimated from Upper Discovery, and we had previously learned that there were some fifty odd claims between the Discoveries, so it became unsafe to accept applications for number below 18 from Lower Discovery for fear that they would cover ground already covered by other numbers. About the same time several persons who had put their claims on record by description found men in possession who had recorded the same ground under some number, and several certificates which had been given had to be cancelled.

Applications, however, were received for claims further down, where there was no danger of conflict, on until word came to the office that a number of persons were over restaking the claims. That they would destroy the stakes of two or three claims; for instance, they ignored claims 3 and 4 below Lower Discovery, having removed the lower stakes of No. 2 a thousand feet, or in that neighbourhood, down stream and then staked the ground which they had created by wiping out the other claims as fractions, having reported at the office that claim No. 2 was 1,500 feet long. This was just before the middle of November when the creek was found to be rich; so, to put an end to this fraudulent work, I closed all that part of the creek which had been recorded, until after a survey could be made, as I knew that accepting any more applications would only add to this difficulty of straightening things out. No one up to this time ever thought of staking any further down this stream, and it was generally reported that anything that remained below was not worth staking and that it was nothing but a moose pasture.

I have thought it was desirable to take up the time of the House by reading this report of Mr. Fawcett's, and giving his reasons for acting as he did. I must admit that I do not, any more, I suppose, than do many other members of this House, understand all these reasons for closing up that creek. But miners and other persons interested in these matters will understand why Mr. Fawcett acted as he did, and will realize that he had no intention of committing any fraud, but his desire was solely to straighten out matters and do justice to all. As to the charge that Major Walsh consulted with others and advised the closing of the hill and bench claims, I do not think there is any dispute, after it is understood that the hon. gentleman in his charge separated the closing of the creek from the hill and bench claims, closed after the arrival of Major Walsh in that district.

Now, you will remember, Mr. Speaker, and the country will remember, the vicious attack made on Major Walsh a year ago by the senior member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), an attack which he and the others have kept up to some extent, at least, by insinuations against that gentleman, although knowing that there is not a word of truth in the statements that were made, and having in view to try to make it appear that there was some irregularity, some corruption, some scandal in the administration of the Yukon, which does not really exist. As the resolution of the junior member for Pictou (Mr. Bell) again reverts to this attack on Major Walsh, I wish to take this opportunity, the first I have had, of reading Major Walsh's answer to all these statements made in this enormous mass of charges that no one can understand. Hon. gentlemen smile. They know that even if there were anything in these statements, Major Walsh is not now and has not been for a long time connected with the department. These charges are made against him and against other officers for no other purpose than to try to discredit the government. I am prepared to say that not one of these hon. gentlemen would dare to go outside of this House and make the statements they have against Major Walsh and the other officials. These men would have their remedy. Do you suppose that any one of these hon. gentlemen would go outside and make the statement that any one of these gentlemen had been guilty of stealing or of corrupt acts, as officials of the government? Not one of them, because there would be an opportunity of putting their statements to the proof:

Brockville, Ont., June 4, 1900.

The Honourable
The Minister of the Interior,
Ottawa, Ont.

Sir,—Referring to Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper's charges made against me in the House of Commons on May 31 last, I beg to say they are false and unfounded.

I beg to call your attention to the following points:

1. Dominion Creek was closed by Mr. Fawcett on November 15, 1897, see pages 80, 81, 87, 109, Ogilvie's report.

While an attempt is made to separate the creek from the hills and benches—I fully understood the closing of creek included also hills and benches. This was opinion of Mine Inspector McGregor and myself and of members of the council. I had former for consultation, and evidently of Fawcett too, as shown by his granting permits to prospect hills and benches, which would not have been needed had creek not been closed—page 81.

See also my declaration.

2. Mrs. Koch—I did not grant this woman a permit or ask or instruct one to be given her. She was not my cook, and I only knew her from seeing her on business in the office.

See my declaration.

3. Louis Carbeno—I knew nothing about any agreement between Louis Carbeno and Louis Walsh until I saw report of Ogilvie's investigation.

I did not threaten or coerce him. See Carbeno's declaration and mine. Also Carbeno's evidence in Ogilvie's report. Does not bear out what is tried to be made out of it.

Carbeno's wages were not increased until I was leaving the country; he had a new position, with more labour.

Carbeno and Indians did this staking just before they were leaving, and all but Carbeno did leave and go out of the service.

I did not give Carbeno or any other person any information, directly or indirectly, about opening of Dominion Creek. He shows how he got word, from McBeth—see his evidence, and says he did not get word from me. I did not know myself; mistake had been made of 8th instead of 11th July in notice, till after Carbeno had left for the creek.

Carbeno's evidence shows a number of people going out to the creek. See also Cyrette's declaration, corroborating Carbeno, which declaration was made at Fort William, thousands of miles away from where Carbeno made his.

I asked Louis Walsh why he did not tell me about agreement with Carbeno, and he said he did not consider it a matter of consequence. It was just to secure himself in case he sent Carbeno money to develop a claim. The proportion is not high, in view of expense (50 per cent) of working a claim, which would leave 25 per cent each for Carbeno and Louis Walsh. Louis Walsh had known Carbeno for many years, knew he had no money, and had promised to help him if he staked any claims. Carbeno's and the Indians' claims proved to be no good.

Date of opening.—No secret was made that the creek was to be opened on 11th. Notices were put up.

As originally intended, everybody would have had to go to the office and get a permit before they went to the creek.

Owing to Mr. Fawcett's urgent letter of July 7, see page 90, the permits were done away with.

The new notice was directed to be issued, but a mistake was made in its date. See Fawcett's explanation, page 92, and my declaration. We came to the conclusion, after inquiry into the matter by myself and the mine inspector, that the date of the 8th instead of the 11th was put in the poster by some one in the gold commissioner's or printer's office, and that information as to this change was given out by this same person or persons, and this started the stampede. Latterly this was the general impression, but we could not obtain sufficient evidence to justify an investigation.

The notice I expected to see and the draft which I believe I read was that Dominion Creek would be opened on the 11th without permit, and that this would be posted on the 9th, and this is what Mine Inspector McGregor and others of council expected. Fawcett's theory, page 93, that notice was to be put up on his office on 11th, does not agree with helping to instruct Corp. Wilson, page 21, and there would have been no sense in printing notices in quantities if they were only to be put up in Fawcett's office.

The agreement L. Carbeno and Louis Walsh, page 259, shows that it is only the outfit and expenses necessary for working the claim, Louis Walsh was to furnish—not that Louis Walsh was to get any advantage from the government's expenditure in taking Carbeno to the Yukon.

I have the honour to be, sir,

Your obedient servant,

(Sgd.) J. M. WALSH.

Dominion of Canada, province of Ontario, county of Leeds, to wit:

I, James Morrow Walsh, of the town of Brockville, in the province of Ontario, Esquire, do solemnly declare:

1. That I was formerly commissioner of the Yukon district.

2. I have read the report of certain charges made against me by Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper on the 31st day of May last.

3. I say positively that I did not close Dominion Creek, referred to in said charges, neither did I give any instructions to have the same closed, nor did I know it was going to be closed.

4. The said creek was closed by the then gold commissioner, Mr. Fawcett, on or about November 15, 1897, as appears by his evidence, taken before the commission of inquiry before Mr. Ogiivie, page 87.

5. I did not know of its being closed till long after, viz., in May, 1898, and after hearing the gold commissioner's reasons for doing so, I approved of such closing. My understanding of the matter was that the closing of the creek necessarily involved the closing of the hills and benches as well. This was the understanding of the other members of the council and was corroborated by the fact of Mr. Fawcett's granting the permits.

I think it is only fair to say here, Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, that after the fullest investigation, there was a difference of opinion in regard to these matters which is not material to any of the charges that are being made, or to the matter under consideration at the present time.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, I intend to insist on the rules of the House. The hon. gentleman is clearly out of order. Where shall we get to in this House, if, whenever an hon. member rises, as a representative of the people, and makes certain statements, the person who is spoken of, or mentioned, shall appear by proxy here, and make a long statement in rebuttal or contradiction?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. What is the point of order?

Mr. FOSTER. The point of order is this—

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. If the hon. gentleman wishes to raise a point of order, he must state the point of order, and not make a speech.

Mr. FOSTER. If the hon. gentleman will allow his intelligence to have proper play, he will allow me to state the point of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. State your point of order.

Mr. FOSTER. The point of order I raise, is that we cannot proceed in a parliamentary way, if any hon. member of the House is to make himself the mouthpiece of every person outside who happens to be mentioned by a member of this House. The hon. gentleman undertakes to—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. FOSTER. I can stand here. I do not want to go on by the grace of the minister, but because it is my right to fully state my point of order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. FOSTER. As soon as there is order I will finish my point. The hon. minister rises to-day and reads a letter written by Mr. Walsh, not a member of this House, contradicting every statement made by an hon. member of this House, as a representative of this House. Now, I say that this is not according to parliamentary rules, and I raise that point of order.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Mr. Speaker, speaking to the point of order, I must say, that it is rather a new doctrine to lay down in this House, that a gentleman who holds an official position under the government, can have his character, which he values more than anything else, destroyed, or attempted to be destroyed, by a member of this House, and that forsooth, he is not allowed to make a plain statement in reply. The position that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) contends for, seems to be, not only contrary to parliamentary law, but contrary to that higher law of common justice which should pervade and prevail everywhere.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, if you will allow me, I will read from Bourinot?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Dispense, dispense.

Mr. DAVIN. It will be found at page 408. He says:

Nor is it in order to read articles in newspaper, letters or other communications—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN. Will hon. gentlemen give me their attention, and then they will see that there is no necessity for a guffaw, and they will see probably that that guffaw is ignorant.

Nor is it in order to read articles in newspapers, letters or other communications whether printed or written emanating from persons outside of the House, and referring to or commenting on, or denying anything said by a member or expressing any opinion reflecting on the proceedings within the House.

We have had this ruled on time and again. The law of parliament is perfectly well understood, and I cannot help thinking that my hon. friend (Sir Louis Davies), knows the law of parliament too well not to make us suspect that his anger is a little assumed.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman misunderstood me. I was not referring to contradiction of statements made by a member of his own knowledge. I was referring to statements which members of this House choose from time to time to repeat on hearsay evidence, attacking and impugning or attempting to destroy the character of officials and others in this country. I say that if a member of this House repeats second-hand and hearsay evidence, that the person whose character is attacked has a perfect right to have his statement read by any member in this House.

Mr. DAVIN. Allow me to read the following from Bourinot, which meets that point:

During a debate on the tariff in the session of 1877, Mr. Mills referred to the opinions of Sir Alexander Galt, formerly a member and Minister of Finance. Subsequently one of the Canadian papers published a letter from Sir Alexander in answer to some of Mr. Mill's remarks; and the latter rose and proposed reading from the paper in question; but the Speaker interrupted him and questioned the propriety of this course—a decision entirely in accordance with the English rules of debate.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). The issue is this: The senior member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), and several others read statements without even giving the names—not an affidavit like this in solemn form—saying that so and so said so and so. But now because a gentleman comes into this House and makes a solemn affidavit contradicting the nameless slanders that have been hurled against him, we are not to have it read forsooth. Do hon. gentlemen opposite think that there is no redress left to members on this side of the House.

Mr. HAGGART. I have been a long time in this House, and I know, that whether it infringes on a higher law than parliamentary law: the law of morality or the right of an individual to have his case set before parliament, there is no doubt that it is out of order to contradict the statement of a member made in this House by any written document. That is a parliamentary rule which has been strictly adhered to.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. One member after another on that side of the House has got up and read statements from outsiders against this man's character—

Mr. McDOUGALL. Asking for an inquiry.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Asking for nothing, but merely for political purposes. The gentlemen opposite have read statements calculated to bring disgrace on this man and his family, and his relations, and he was too much of a gentleman, and too well known to take notice of these slanders, until his friends asked him to make a statement. Is that statement not to be read in this House? The idea of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), talking about not reading from newspapers! Why month after month, we hear nothing else from him but articles from newspapers and statements of others. I am perfectly in order in reading this reply to the statements made.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I find that in the statement which is being read, there is a reference to something which happened some time ago in this House. As far as that part of the statement is concerned, it is referring to a past debate, and is not in order. Once a discussion has taken place in the House, and statements made, these statements cannot be contradicted afterwards, because it would be referring to a past debate. Consequently that particular part of the statement would not be in order. I was not here when the motion before the House was read, but as I understand it refers to certain charges against Mr. Walsh. I think it would be perfectly regular to read the statement of Mr. Walsh, defending his conduct. I find the following quotation from Speaker Denison's decisions:

When a member proposed to read a letter in the 'Times' from General Hay, Mr. Speaker Denison interposed and said that 'the hon. member had exercised a wise discretion in not doing so.' The House, however, is generally very indulgent allowing this rule to be suspended, in special cases when the conduct of a member is in question, or when it requires more information on a matter of controversy.

Mr. DAVIN. That refers to a charge against a member.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I do not see that there is a difference drawn there between the fact of the charges being made against a member or an outsider. I do not see much difference in that, and consequently I do not say that it would be against the rules of procedure, just to read this statement. There is another consideration. The statements which have been made have not been made on the personal knowledge of the member who has made them, but upon information from others, and consequently I do not believe it is irregular to permit the official charged to answer such statements.

Mr. SPROULE. I would remind you—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Chair, sit down.

Mr. FOSTER. Will you allow me a word?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The rule is that when a decision is rendered by the Speaker, there is only one recourse if the decision is not correct.

Mr. FOSTER. It is on that account that I wish to be clear as to the decision of the Speaker, in order that I may know of what to appeal to the House, and consequently I shall ask if I am correct in my interpretation of the Speaker's ruling. I find that Bourinot says:

Nor is it in order to read articles in newspapers, letters or other communications, whether printed or written, emanating from persons outside of the House, and referring to, or commenting on, or denying anything said by a member or expressing any opinion reflecting on proceedings within the House.

Now, if I am correct, what has happened is this. The senior member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), in the course of the proceedings in this House—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that if he intends to appeal from the decision of the Speaker, there is no debate allowed.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. I want to ask the Speaker a question.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. If the hon member wants only an explanation from me, I have no objection to give it. But if he wants to make an appeal from my decision, he knows very well that the rule is that there should be no debate on such a motion.

Mr. FOSTER. What I want to ask the Speaker is this: Is it in the conduct of good business that I should thoroughly understand what the Speaker's decision is before I take the extraordinary proceeding of appealing from his decision?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Perhaps I did not make myself very clear to the hon. member, and perhaps I shall be obliged to repeat myself to some extent. I understood from the statement that has been made by the hon. minister that reference was made to a previous debate, and on the strength of the quotation that was made by the hon. member I said that was not regular. I understand that it was decided the other day by the Speaker, that when a statement has been made in the House, a member has no right to contradict that statement in a subsequent debate by reading a letter or something of the kind. But if I understand the present situation, it is this. A charge is made against Mr. Walsh, and a statement is read by the hon. minister denying that charge. I think, so far as that is concerned, that is perfectly regular; but so far as it might relate to a previous debate I do not think it is regular.

Mr. FOSTER. Then will the Speaker allow me to say that there is a misunderstanding between himself and me?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Chair, Chair.

Mr. FOSTER. There is no charge made in the present resolution against Mr. Walsh—

Mr. LANDERKIN. There is.

Mr. FOSTER—to which Mr. Walsh can by any possibility reply by a statement that he has written on June 4, for this is June 28. The point, as it seems to me, is this, that the hon. member for Pictou on a former occasion.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Chair, Chair.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I may be mistaken—

Mr. FOSTER. I am afraid you are, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER—but I have given my decision in good faith, and according to that decision some charges have been made against Mr. Walsh, and the statement read by the minister is simply a contradiction of those charges by Mr. Walsh.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the Speaker allow me to make a statement?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I have given my decision.

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. FOSTER. Then I have no recourse but to appeal. I do not wish to appeal if there is a misunderstanding.

Mr. LANDERKIN. You want to slander as much as you can. It is very manly.

Mr. FOSTER. If my dear old friend would only keep quiet. The point of order was not raised as to the previous debate.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Chair, Chair.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I wish to call the attention of the hon. member to this fact. Perhaps we do not view the facts in the same light, but I have given my decision, and I think there is only one recourse if the hon. gentleman wants to take it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the rules of the House permit the reading of this statement, and that you rule it is perfectly regular.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I may say that during the twenty odd years that I have been in this House I have not taken up much time, and I have always listened courteously to hon. members on the other side. I believe the rules of the House ought to be observed. No person pretends to say that I do not observe these rules and have not always done so; and as the Speaker has ruled that I am in order in making this statement, I hope I shall be allowed to go on without these improper interruptions. I am only glad to know that the rules of the House allow what would appear to the ordinary individual to be the simplest measure of fair-play to a person who has been so accused.

6. I arrived at Dawson City in May, 1898. Some time after my arriving there Mine Inspector McGregor reported to me that the gold commissioner was issuing permits allowing parties to prospect on Dominion Creek hill claims.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I want to ask that that portion of the resolution which makes a charge against Mr. Walsh be now read to the House. The resolution is not in my hands. I have my idea of what it is, and I think it is only fair to the House that we should know it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. There is a rule of the House providing that an hon. member has a right to ask that a motion be read, but certainly not during the speech of another hon. member.

Mr. FOSTER. I rise to a point of order. It is this, that there is no charge made in the present resolution against Mr. Walsh, and that consequently—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. FOSTER—the minister is out of order in reading Mr. Walsh's letter.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The question of order has been decided. There is no point of order now before the Chair.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I wish to say a word on the last point of order raised by the hon. member for York. I wish to say that to my mind it is improperly taken. The point of order was first raised when the minister was reading a certain statement and affidavit. Your ruling was given upon that. An irregular debate followed, and it was pointed out that the course to pursue was to appeal from that decision. No such appeal has been taken. Your ruling was in favour of the contention of the minister who is reading the statement to the House, and I would say as an old member that the House should remember what is due to this parliament and this House of Commons. We must have some semblance of order, some respect for the Chair, and some respect for the rules.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I was under the impression that this was a serious matter, and that there was a desire on the part of the members of the House that the truth should be known. I was endeavouring to give the facts, if there was any doubt in the mind of any person in the country, and leave him to judge for himself.

The creek being closed he considered this an injustice to the general public and recommended that this should be stopped. At a meeting of the council, held on May 30, 1898, a resolution was passed that locations made on a creek after it had been closed would not be recognized, and stating that Dominion Creek had been closed since the middle of November, and that it had been decided that the creek should remain closed until further notice and that the decision applied to hill and bench claims as well as to creek claims.

7. Mrs. Koch referred to by the said Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper was not a friend of mine. She was not my cook. I only knew her by her coming to the office on business. I did not give her a permit to prospect on Dominion Creek, and I did not instruct her to call on the gold commissioner to give her a permit.

As soon as I was informed that the gold commissioner had given her a permit, I immediately instructed the gold commissioner to withdraw such permit. I further instructed the gold commissioner to cease issuing permits till said creek was properly opened.

8. It is absolutely untrue that I had anything to do with the signing of the agreement by Louis Carbeno and Louis Walsh, either on the steamer 'Guadra' or anywhere else, and I did not know of said agreement till I saw it in said Commissioner Ogilvie's report.

9. I did not coerce nor threaten said Carbeno into signing any such agreement on the steamer 'Guadra' or at Salmon River or anywhere else, neither did I have any knowledge of any similar agreements made by any one else of the guides or employees with either Louis Walsh or Philip Walsh.

10. Said Carbeno was engaged to work for sixty dollars per month, and these were his wages during the time he was working for me. His wages were not raised until I was leaving Dawson City on August 4, 1898, when he was engaged by me to work for the staff, and look after their quarters at the rate of $100 per month. At this time cooks were receiving $100 or $150 per month at Dawson City.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman is reading a statement from a man who is not a member of this House, in reply to something that was raised and disposed of in a former debate; and I ask your ruling.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I was under the in this resolution. It is contrary to all common sense, justice and decency that when an hon. member reads, not affidavits, but mere statements made by other people against an official of the government, the statement of that official or his explanation or affidavit cannot be read in his defence.

Mr. FOSTER. I would ask your ruling, Mr. Speaker, on the point of order.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). This affidavit is specifically a reply to charges made in a previous debate, and in that respect is utterly out of order. It refers to a previous charge and a previous debate.

Mr. B. M. BRITTON (Kingston). If there is anything in the resolution before the House, it is a charge against the administration of the Yukon. That long motion which it took an hour and a half to read, and which covered all sorts of things imaginable in the Yukon, when boiled down, means simply a charge against the administration of that district. For a part of the time, Mr. Walsh was administrator there, and surely his statement should be read.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. This is a motion of want of confidence in the government, and is it to be held that the minister defending the department involved is not to be allowed to give an explanation of the administration of that department?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I am at a disadvantage because I was not present this forenoon when the debate began. I was in the Railway Committee, and consequently did not follow the discussion which took place this morning. It is not in order to refer to a previous debate, and if nothing has been said to-day concerning the matter brought up by the hon. the acting Minister of the Interior, he would not be in order in making any reference to it, because he would be simply referring to a subject disposed of in a previous debate. I am simply giving my ruling on the general principle.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. One of the principal charges in this resolution has to do with Dominion Creek, and I am simply giving an explanation of what took place with regard to that creek. Surely, when the government is charged with irregularities and a judicial investigation is asked for with reference to this particular creek, I am entitled to read to the House the explanation of the official responsible, more especially when the hon. member for Pictou has read the statements of most disreputable people, reflecting on the administration of the Yukon.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. If the matter is a subject of the present debate, I do not think it is irregular for the hon. gentleman to refer to it.

Mr. FOSTER. There is no statement in to-day's debate either remotely or directly connected with that subject of Louis Carbeno and the statement made in rebuttal.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I understand that there is a reference to Dominion Creek in the motion.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. More than that, the terms of the resolution cover the whole field of the administration of the Yukon. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Bell) has read in this House a lengthy resolution including a letter from one Catto which covers every form and shape of the administration of the Yukon, and I submit that any statement or any reply of any officer past or present with reference to that is within the terms of that motion.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I do not think that the hon. member for Pictou could have read the resolution or he would not have submitted it to this House.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I was reading the clause with regard to Dominion Creek:

I say positively that I did not directly or indirectly inform or advise said Carbeno or any one that said Dominion Creek would be opened on the 8th July, on the contrary, the resolutions of the council and my own wishes and intentions were that the same should be opened on the 11th July, and I was greatly surprised when I was informed late in the evening that a notice had been printed and posted up stating that it was then open and that numbers of prospectors had started for said Dominion Creek.

12. Said notice, as it appears in the report of the evidence, page 90, is not in the form of the notice as shown to me, the date of the 8th July was not in it nor the diagram.

The council at a meeting had decided to cause Dominion Creek to be opened and directed notices to be given that permits to prospect would be issued on the 11th day of July at the office of the gold commissioner. Subsequently on the 7th July, the gold commissioner wrote me a letter urging that the permits should be done away with, and it was decided to act on the gold commissioner's advice, and that the creek would be opened as agreed upon on the 11th July, without permits, and the gold commissioner was requested to notify the public of this change.

13. In some way, either by error or intentionally, the 8th July was put in as the date instead of the 11th July. I say positively that the 11th July was the date I gave instructions that the creek should be opened as agreed by the council, and I was much surprised and annoyed that the mistake was made.

That the various charges made against me by Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper, accusing me of improper conduct in my administration as commissioner of the Yukon district, are false and untrue.

That the charges that while I was commissioner I was guilty of intoxication and of immoral conduct, are false and untrue.

Mr. FOSTER. I rise to a point of order. Last session the charge was made and debated and disposed of in this House that Mr. Walsh was guilty of certain irregularities. To-day the Minister of the Interior wants to read a statement from Mr. Walsh denying the charge made in this House a year ago, and concerning which not a word has arisen in this debate. I contend that he is out of order.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. If it refers to a year ago, it is not a previous debate at all.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not think it is necessary for me to state the rule concerning previous debates. It is well known that a previous debate means a debate during this session and not a debate in a previous session, so that I do not think the point of order can stand.

Mr. FOSTER. It arose last session and this session as well.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If I understand this resolution at all—and I know there is nothing serious in it and that its object is simply to damage people's characters—but if there is anything in it that is intended to have a bad effect on the minds of the people, it is that there was something irregular and corrupt in the closing of Dominion Creek, and it would be very strange indeed if I were not to be allowed to read the affidavits or explanations of the men, whose names the hon. member has used in his resolution, before we are asked to vote. If the hon. member wants to know the truth before voting, he would not object to my reading to the House what Louis Carbeno and the others have to say. I would not use these affidavits were it not for the tactics adopted by the hon. gentleman of making statements based on anonymous letters and the letters of disreputable people, and I submit them to the House and the country so that they may judge whether there has been anything irregular or corrupt. If there are any people who know whether the charge made with reference to Dominion Creek is true or not, they must be Louis Carbeno and Amor Cyrette. These affidavits give a truthful statement from these people as to how the information reached them, and clearly show to the House and the country that Major Walsh had no knowledge or connection with the matter whatever. Am I not to be given an opportunity to read them?

Mr. DAVIN. Why would not the hon. gentleman give him an opportunity to go before the court of inquiry?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I can tell the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) this—that if he dares to stand up in his place and make a charge against the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) or any official, he will get a committee so quick he will not know how it is done. Dare he take an honourable and manly course. Dare he say a word against the Minister of the Interior or myself concerning the insinuation against me in his speech of a few days ago, made under the shelter of the privileges of parliament. I want the country to know the character of the men who do such things. I deny, and dare, and challenge him to rise in his place and say one word upon his responsibility of the dirty insinuation that he threw out the other day against me. He knows that there is not a word of truth in it.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Sutherland) is a fighting minister, isn't he?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes, I am a fighting minister. Mr. Speaker, I am glad and proud to know that my public life has been such that I can stand here and defy the hon. member for York, N.B., (Mr. Foster) to say a word, if he dare, on his responsibility as was insinuated by the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). I am proud to be able to speak out, proud that I do not need to shirk any charge; and I dare any member on his responsibility to say a word against me. I am glad to submit these affidavits to the House, so that hon. members, if they wish to know the actual facts with regard to the closing of Dominion Creek may know them. To my mind, this is not a party matter: this is far above any party matter. The credit of Canada depends upon whether these statements are true or not. My anxiety is not to shield the character of Major Walsh or of any other individual, but to show that the statements made not being true are detrimental to the credit of public officials and so detrimental to the country they serve and that these men have conducted themselves as honourable men and good Canadians. In corroboration of the statement I have given to the House as to the closing of Dominion Creek, I will read the affidavit of Amor Cyrette of Fort William:

District of Thunder Bay, province of Ontario, to wit:

I, Ambrose Cyrette, of Fort William, do solemnly declare that I was in Dawson City during the Dominion Creek stampede; it was on Friday, July the 8th, of last year. I saw a lot of people going over the hills early in the day, but did not know where they were going. I was around the camp of Major Walsh, and we all wondered where they were going. The people continued going all the afternoon. In the evening I saw Robert McBeth, a dog-driver for the government, who returned to the camp, and said that Dominion Creek was to be open on Monday. He said he had seen the notice in a saloon down town. The persons present when he told this was Simon Valin, Louis Carbeno and myself. This was the first and only information we had received of the date of the opening of the creek. We all intended staking on this creek if possible, but could get no inside information from any of Major Walsh's party or any of the officials. Louis Carbeno and myself left for Dominion Creek between eight and nine o'clock p.m. On the way Carbeno told me that Major Walsh did not know he had gone, and that he had put a man in his place till he returned. We arrived at Dominion Creek at noon of the 9th of July (Saturday) and found a man staking a claim. He was blazing a tree with a pocket knife; he had one tree already marked. I asked him what he was doing, and he said, 'Staking my claim.' I said you are too soon, Monday is the day. He said if you do not stake to-day, you will be left. I lent him my axe to cut his tree. I do not know the man's name or the number of his claim, but could go to this post at any time; it was on the left side of the creek. Carbeno and I went on the other side and staked our claims. We returned to Dawson City on Sunday. We staked about two o'clock p.m. on Saturday, July 9. Claims had been staked hours ahead of us. When we arrived the creek was alive with men, and had we not crossed over the creek, we would not have been able to stake a claim at all. I positively declare that our only information regarding the opening of Dominion Creek came through Robert McBeth only.

Mr. SUTHERLAND.

And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing the same to be true, and knowing it to be of the same force and effect as if made under oath and by virtue of the Canada Evidence Act of 1893.

(Sgd.) AMORE CYRETTE.

Declared before me at Port Arthur, in the district of Thunder Bay, this 20th day of April, 1899.

(Sgd.) THOS. A. GORHAM,

Notary Public in and for the Province of Ontario.

(Seal.)

I understand that the signer of this affidavit is a Canadian citizen of repute. I have another document here bearing on the same point:

Dawson, N.W.T., June 23, 1899.

Major J. M. Walsh,
Brockville, Ont.

Dear Major,—Louis arrived here on the 20th inst., and in talking with him he informed me that my evidence had been sent to the Department of the Interior to Mr. Sifton. If Louis has explained the matter to me right I must say that there is something wrong. The evidence that I gave in court did not in any way reflect on you; it would be impossible for me to make any charges against you, for I could not do this if I chose. I understand that it has been stated that you forced me to sign the agreement between Louis Walsh and I, and if any person made this statement then I can only say it is false. I cannot understand how such rumours could get out, for I never made any remarks about this agreement or anything else. Louis Walsh and I had an agreement which was in every way satisfactory to me.

I might mention, for your information, that while I was on the stand, that Mr. Fawcett did all he could to make me acknowledge that you were interested in the claims which were staked by Cyrette, Collin and myself. I told him that you had no interest whatever in mine. He asked me where I received my information from as to the staking of Dominion Creek. I answered that I heard it in camp from one McBeth, a dog-driver. Then he asked me if I had permission from you to go out and stake. I answered 'yes.' Then he asked me if I thought it was of any interest to Philip Walsh in my staking the claim. I answered and said I did not know.

I cannot understand what reason they had in calling me, without it was for the purpose of connecting you in some way with the staking of the claim, which, in my opinion, was ridiculous.

When I left Dawson I understood the creek was to be open for restaking on Monday. I left at 9.30 p.m. Friday, July 8, 1898, and on getting over the hill I saw hundreds of people who had left before I did. John Labby overtook me at the Dome, and told me that the creek was opened, and advised me to push on. This should be sufficient to show that you had not given me any pointer.

Now, I wish to be more plain in closing this letter, and I desire to state that you had no connection, directly in any claim or interest in any property I took up, or did I on any occasion secure or get any pointers of any kind from you, and further that when the evidence which was printed in the paper here, I called their attention to the fact that it was not published as I gave it.

Yours truly,
(Sgd.) LOUIS CARBENO.

It is not necessary that I should ask that the statements of the men, or even their oaths be accepted as proving the case. The circumstances and everything connected with the matter show clearly to the House and the country that there was nothing irregular on the part of Major Walsh in regard to this matter: they show that he was in no way connected with any claim in the Yukon. I am perfectly satisfied—it is only fair to Major Walsh to say that I do not believe that he ever was or that he is now interested to the extent of one cent in any claim in the Yukon, though he held the position of commissioner for one year.

So much for the McDonald royalty and the closing of Dominion Creek. With reference to the Anderson concession, I have only this to say: I admit there were no regulations with regard to the granting of concessions of this kind, but the evidence will show that the minister was most cautious with regard to granting these concessions, and that he would grant even a small piece of ground only after careful inquiry, and having satisfied himself that it could not be worked as a placer claim. We have ascertained from further experience, that these claims are granted not only in two and a half mile sections, but in five mile sections, and in greater numbers now under the regulations; and any one can go to the department now, and without seeing the minister, but on complying with the regulations, can get similar grants to these all over the country. I, therefore, conclude that in granting this concession to Mr. Anderson, there is no foundation whatever for the charge that it was a case of favouritism, and I am prepared to say upon my responsibility here, and after full examination of the facts, that there is not the slightest foundation in fact, or a syllable of truth in the charge, that there was any favouritism on the part of the minister of the department in regard to this matter.

Now, Sir, we come to the most discreditable and most disreputable political act that I have ever known in all my experience, and that is the placing upon Hansard, in this resolution, of the letter of this man Catto. I do not know personally anything about Dr. Catto, but I took the responsibility of saying that any person might know, from the language and style of his statement, that he was a man of unbalanced mind, and a vicious character. Since saying that, there has been placed in my hands a recent issue of a paper published in the Yukon, containing a reference to this man, Dr. Catto:

Dr. Catto's amendment to Mr. Sugrue's motion was as ridiculously superlative in senility as ever emanated from the brains of men who have spent many years inside the walls of asylums. Little did the Burser of 'Auld Reikie' dream that from its walls should drift into the Klondike one of his pet pupils.

Mr. McDUGALL. Is that paper edited by gamblers and prostitutes?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the hon. gentleman wants to put himself on a par with Dr. Catto, and these other low characters, I am perfectly willing he should do so. The Yukon council is created by an Act of this parliament, and certain powers are given them: and I would ask the hon. member for Pictou or any other member of this House whether any ordinance has been passed by that council in any way encouraging gambling or houses of prostitution. Mr. Speaker, this charge shows the length of degradation that some people are prepared to go, even though they have an opportunity of knowing what the facts are. I acknowledge that the Yukon council, being appointees of this government, are more directly responsible to the government for their conduct than they would be if full provincial government existed in the Yukon. But still, with regard to a great many of these matters, this parliament has granted that council power to pass ordinances and administer affairs in that district. Now, if any facts should come to the knowledge of any member of this House that the Yukon council had acted improperly, this government has power to remove them, and that would be a proper occasion for hon. gentlemen opposite to make a motion to that effect. I can assure this House that if the government became possessed of any information, showing improper conduct on the part of the members of that council, the government would not delay a moment in removing them. Now there is another matter that I regret to have to refer to, but I must do so, as it is referred to by this discreditable resolution that has been placed in your hands. A rumour did come to the ears of the minister, that the police surgeon had given certificates of health to some prostitutes in Dawson City. The first thing the minister did, on hearing that rumour, was to telegraph to Mr. Ogilvie that if anything of that kind had been done, it was immediately to be discontinued. I believe, from information I have in the department, that instead of encouraging and promoting gambling, or other social evils, Mr. Ogilvie and the other officials, have been very severe; and the hon. member for Pictou himself has read a letter contained in his resolution, showing that a large amount has been collected in fines imposed upon gamblers and disreputable characters in Dawson City. What better evidence could you have that Mr. Ogilvie and his associates are trying to enforce the laws of this country and maintain good order, than the fact that they are prosecuting the people and fining them heavily whenever they are found guilty of improper conduct? I do not think there is any city in Canada, even in Ottawa, where the hon. gentlemen live, where the municipal coffers are not sometimes enriched by fines imposed upon houses of prostitution and upon unlicensed or licensed houses, who sell liquor contrary to law. I can say that in whatever respect Mr. Ogilvie may have failed, or his associates may have failed, in administering the affairs of that country, I believe that no administrator could have enforced the laws more rigorously than he has been doing in these matters referred to. Mr. Speaker. I am sorry for many reasons, that I have had to take up so much of the time of the House in reading documents, but I have done so because I was anxious that the House and the country should know the truth with regard to these matters. Why, Sir, can you suppose for a moment, when we have thousands of good, decent, hardworking men in the Yukon, Canadians and others, that some of them would not come forward and make complaints, if there was anything particularly wrong with the administration of the laws in that district? We have hundreds of them visiting Ottawa, men of good repute, men of character, men engaged in mining and other business. Do you hear one word from these people in regard to this matter? Not a word. I challenge the opposition in this House to bring up here, on the floor of parliament, any statement made by any reputable citizen of this country in regard to any matter connected with the administration of the Yukon, and an investigation will be held at once.

Mr. DAVIN. Why do you not give it?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. You do not want it. You have given no reason for an investigation. Departmental investigations are going on all the time. I only repeat that I want the people of this country to know, that, in my opinion, there has been only one object since the first day that these so-called Yukon charges started, and that was, that hon. gentlemen opposite might throw a heap of dirt in the hope that some of it might stick upon the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), or upon some of his officials, and thus create in the public mind the impression that there is something wrong in the administration of the Yukon. Little do they care how much injury they do to individuals or families; little do they care how much discredit they put upon Canada's fair name. While we are doing everything we can to bring people into this country, while we are making every effort to assist Canadian enterprises in the financial markets of the world, more harm has been done by the action of these hon. gentlemen than all the irregularities and corruption that could exist supposing they had existed for years. I know that the people of this country recognize that the hon. Minister of the Interior, in spite of all the difficulties that he has had to contend with, has administered his department in an energetic, businesslike and capable manner, that he has administered it in such a way as no man ever administered it before, honestly and capably. We find that from one end of the country to the other, and especially in Manitoba and the North-west Territories, there is no dissatisfaction as to the efficiency of the administration of the hon. Minister of the Interior.

Mr. DAVIS. There is no rebellion.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. And no dissatisfaction. I know this to be a fact, because, having occupied the position of acting minister for several months, I can say that I have hardly ever had a complaint as to the way in which business is transacted in the Department of the Interior. We know that when the late government were in office people were thronging the hotels of this city and the corridors of this House asking to have their business attended to, and we know that the incompetency of that administration created a rebellion in the North-west. Referring to the charges regarding fractional claims or Crown reserves, we have a minister in charge of the department who is capable, energetic and honest, who has shown no favours to any one of his friends, and that there is no justification for these improper, disreputable and disgraceful references to the hon. Minister of the Interior. No claim was ever given to a friend of the hon. minister. Not one of these claims was ever disposed of excepting in the regular way, and on the second of the next month every one of these claims is advertised to be sold at auction. Could there be any charge made against the administration of the hon. Minister of the Interior that he had, contrary to the regulations, given to his friends or any person valuable claims, when the fact is that every one of these claims was advertised and sold at public auction to the highest bidder? I can only repeat what I have said before, that if any member of this House will make, upon his responsibility, one charge of dishonesty or favouritism against the hon. Minister of the Interior, the fullest inquiry and investigation will be granted him.

Mr. NICHOLAS FLOOD DAVIN (West Assiniboia). Mr. Speaker, last year and this year efforts have been made on this side of the House to have an investigation into matters connected with the Yukon, but no speech and no motion that has been made on this side of the House has furnished such a strong reason why we should have an inquiry as the speech of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Sutherland). Now, Sir, what is the character of the speech we have just listened to from the hon. gentleman?

An hon. MEMBER. A 1.

Mr. DAVIN. What it has consisted of is in bringing forward statements and affidavits made by persons whose conduct was impugned not merely in this House, but impugned before the investigation conducted by Mr. Ogilvie. And, Sir, towards the close of the hon. gentleman's speech, what do we find? He introduces a statement from Mr. Carbeno, written to Major Walsh, in which he contravenes what he stated before Mr. Ogilvie's investigation, and also an affidavit contravening what Mr. Fawcett said before Mr. Ogilvie's investigation. If the hon. gentleman felt it necessary to produce these affidavits and statements, the affidavit of Major Walsh and the statement of Mr. Carbeno and others, Mr. Cyrette, I think was the other, does it not suggest the need for an inquiry in which Mr. Carbeno could be cross-examined? The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) knows very well that there is a great difference between an ex parte affidavit made in that way and a sworn statement made in court, or before a commission, where the person making it can be cross-examined. The hon. gentleman who has just sat down accused the hon. member for Pictou of bringing forward this matter for political purposes. Sir, what we say to the hon. acting Minister of the Interior, and to the government that is backing him, is this: A series of charges have been made which have not brought up these things for the first time. We observed the mock indignation of the hon. acting minister at the close of his speech, because a cloud had been cast upon the good name of the country in consequence of these scandals having been brought up. Who brought up these scandals? Who reiterated them throughout the length and breadth, not merely of Canada, but of Europe? You have the best correspondent of the Times, you have the statement of Liberal editors, of men like Mr.

Mr. SUTHERLAND.

Miller, owning a Liberal paper, so that the assertion made by the hon. gentleman that honest or honourable men never make these charges is utterly unfounded. Men as respectable as any man in this House, or as any man in Canada, men occupying good positions, men closely connected with friends of the hon. Minister of the Interior—I mean the Minister of the Interior who is on his travels—have made statements to me, but, when I have said to them: 'Cannot I use these statements?' they said: 'No.' When I said: 'Cannot I use your names?' they said: 'No.' But, they have then said: 'If there is an inquiry, and you subpoena us, we will go before the committee or the commission and make our statements.' The reason that the hon. member for Pictou has been forced to bring this matter before parliament is, that throughout the length and breadth of Canada, and throughout the empire, scandal has been brought upon Canada's name by the statements of misconduct, misgovernment, and corruption that were made in regard to the Yukon. And the acting minister commences his speech to-day by telling us that we are bringing forward these statements because we cannot make any charges against that government. Why, Sir, that government is battered and riddled with the successful charges we have made against it. And in regard to these charges that have been made by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Bell), the conduct of the government supporters shows that they are afraid of an inquiry. I am not going to say any more than I said at any previous time; I do not know whether Major Walsh has been guilty of any misconduct or not, but for Major Walsh's own sake, as well as for the sake of the government, we ought to have an inquiry, in order that we might sift the conflicting statements that have been made here. The acting minister (Mr. Sutherland), towards the close of his speech, used defiant language in regard to his motion. Why is it that he does that in the dying hours of the session? What is the use of defying us now? Suppose even that any one was in a position to come forward and make a statement on his own personal knowledge, how could we have an inquiry this session? It is out of the question. The fact is that the action of my hon. friend (Mr. Sutherland) has too much altogether of the element of bluff. I want to call attention for a moment to the monstrous position we are placed in here, partly by your ruling, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. DAVIN. I do not impugn your ruling, Mr. Speaker. I say that in consequence of your ruling, and these matters having been brought before the House in consonance with your ruling, we have statements on the pages of Hansard contravening the statements made by Mr. Fawcett before the commission in the Yukon. At page 79, Mr. Fawcett gives his evidence, dealing with Dominion Creek, as follows :

By the Commissioner :

Q. Have you got a copy of the notice ?—A. I have a copy of the notice which the council passed with reference to the issuing of permits.

Q. What is it ?—A. I will find it in a minute; it is a notice of a meeting prior to that held on the 27th of June.

Q. What was resolved at that meeting ?—A. I don't know whether it was passed on that evening or not; but I think it must have been, or, on the evening following. The date is not given but it says: 'A meeting to discuss the questions of administration. Present: Major Walsh, commissioner of the Yukon district and Messrs. Fawcett, Wade, Bliss and McGregor, T. D. Pattullo, secretary to the commissioner. Agreed, that on the opening of Dominion bench claims for location, permits to be issued to prospect the ground, after which the claims may be recorded if the work has been done to the satisfaction of the mining inspector.'

'Agreed that notice be given on Thursday, 30th inst., to the effect that permission to prospect bench claims on Dominion Creek will be issued at the office of the gold commissioner on and after 10th July, 1898. T. D. Pattullo, secretary of the commissioner Yukon district.'

The date 10th July, has been changed to the 11th.

Mr. Fawcett.—I don't know but that was the last meeting of the council.

By the Commissioner :

Q. I would like to ask you a few questions about the history of Dominion Creek; when was the creek closed—not the hills and benches?—A. The 15th day of November was the last date on which any applications were taken.

Q. What year ?—A. 1897.

Q. Why was it closed then ?—A. Just before this I had learned that a great many claims were being relocated over others that had been put on by description but the last of the group that I heard of was just below second Discovery—Lower Discovery; when it was recorded number two consisted of some three claims, and A, B and C were recorded.

Q. This was number 2A, B and C ?—A. Yes, 2A, B and C, I think, in this locality. I am speaking from memory now. That number or one of the others adjoining. The owners of the claims covering all these came in and told me of it—that the claims covered their ground. The next thing I learned was that there was no number '3' and that there was no number '2'; some one told me so. After I found that people were staking fractions over claims, which in this case as subsequently proved to be true by the survey, as, out of three full claims as applications that were recorded, there is only one fraction of a few feet. About No. 27 below Upper Discovery, the same thing was going on. When I found that this was going on, that there was no means in the office of finding out whether in staking these fractions, or even in staking the claims, that they were not staking over ground already occupied, I came to the conclusion that the only thing I could do was to receive no applications until the creek was surveyed, and that is what I did.

Q. You closed it ?—A. I closed it.

Q. The date of closure you have given; did you immediately report that to Ottawa ?—A. Yes, and also to Major Walsh.

Q. Was it endorsed by Major Walsh ?—A. It was.

Q. He approved of the creek being closed ?—A. He was called in evidence on that same point in August up in court that would have been blocked on the ground. The question was brought up and at least one of the attorneys took the ground that the creek was never legally closed, so Major Walsh was called in. Major Walsh in his instructions had power over the mining regulations, and he was called in evidence. He was asked: 'Were you aware that Dominion Creek was closed?' He said, 'Yes.' Then he was asked: 'Did you approve of it?' He said, 'Most certainly I did.'

Again, later on :

Mr. Fawcett reads from the minutes of a meeting held in the commissioner's office, Dawson City, May 30, 1898, to discuss questions of administration :

'Any locations made on a creek after it has been closed will not be recognized or put on record; this includes hill and bench claims as well as creek claims.'

'Dominion Creek having been closed since the middle of November last, it has been decided that the creek shall remain closed until further notice. This decision applies to hill and bench claims, as well as to creek claims.'

Mr. Fawcett.—I may say that this was moved by Mr. McGregor in council, and he gave as his reason for bringing up this resolution that he had told people on the creeks that the hills were not open, and said he was not going to be made a fool of, and so he presented this resolution.

Q. You were present at this meeting ?—A. I was present.

Q. Did you object ?—A. I did.

Q. On what ground ?—A. On the ground that men had gone out there under my permission and had prospected, staked their claims, made applications at the office, and their applications had been accepted, and I thought that this would simply throw them out, undoing the work I had done. It was no longer the rule of the gold commissioner; I was overridden by the council. That occurred on the 28th of May, and the creek was considered closed then.

At an earlier period, speaking of a certain lady which Major Walsh denies was his cook, he deposed :

So that this lady comes to me on the 27th of May (I think some time then) one morning after I had had information about the closing of these hills and she says, 'Major Walsh says I have to have a permit to prospect on Dominion hills, creeks and benches.' Well, I told her: I knew about no permits; I had heard nothing about any permits. About an hour after, Major Walsh came to me and said: 'I think we will issue permits for Dominion Creek hills and benches;' that was the first intimation I had had of any permits being issued. 'All right,' I said. Of course I came to the conclusion that they concluded I was about right, and to prevent a hasty stampede they had accordingly decided to give a permit to any one who came.

Well, Sir, later on we have this evidence :

Q. Well, then, were the hill sides open after all ?—A. They were open upon the publication of that notice (pointing to the notice.)

Q. What led to the issuance of this notice ?—A. There was a good deal transpired between; there was a notice posted in June notifying the people that after a certain date permits would be issued.

Q. What date ?—A. I think it must have been about the end of June, or somewhere near this; it was to have been posted on the 30th of June or the 1st of July, stating that permits would be issued on the 11th.

Q. Have you a copy of that notice now?—A. No. The first time I noticed that notice with my name in large print was when I saw the notice posted up. My objection to the whole thing was, their considering that I didn't say anything that would seem to be in favour of my idea that there was no occasion for closing the hill sides.

Q. Was that your signature?—A. Yes.

Q. Did you issue it?—A. Well, on one occasion Mr. Pattullo came with a notice asking me to sign it; it was in relation to closing the hill sides, but I objected on the ground that I considered there was no basis for the hill sides being closed; I still maintained my objection to what had been done in council as gold commissioner, and I refused to sign the notice. Major Walsh sent and summoned me before him, and he gave me a very strong reprimand. As near as I can remember, he said: 'Mr. Fawcett I want you to understand that it is impertinent on your part to question anything that has been decided in council, and when I sent that notice for you to sign, I want you to sign it.' On the spur of the moment I signed this notice without reading it.

Later on:

Q. What was in this notice?—A. It stated that on and after 11th July that permits to prospect bench claims on Dominion Creek would be granted—for prospecting and staking, and I think there was something that applications would be accepted if approved of by the mining inspector. The evidence goes right on contradicting completely the statement made by Major Walsh, and then, when we come to the evidence sworn before the commission by Louis Carbeno, it is as follows:

Louis Carbeno, called and sworn.

By Mr. Fawcett:

Q. Where were you on the 8th of July?—A. Well, I was in camp until about 10 o'clock.

Q. Where?—A. It would be at the hospital.

Q. In what capacity were you working?—A. I was working for Major Walsh.

Q. Were you there all that day?—A. Yes, sir, I was.

Q. On the evening of the 8th of July?—A. Until evening.

Q. Where were you later on in the evening?—A. I was up Bonanza.

Q. For what purpose?—A. Going up to Dominion.

Q. Why were you on the way to Dominion?—A. Because I was informed that it was going to be opened on the 9th.

Q. Informed when?—A. About 5 o'clock in the afternoon.

Q. On what date?—A. The 8th.

Q. Where did you acquire the information?—A. I received that from one of our dog-drivers.

Q. Who?—A. McBeth.

Q. Is he here now?—A. Yes; he is an Indian.

Q. And he told you it was open?—A. Well, he didn't tell me; it was rumoured about the camp. I asked Major Walsh's brother if the creek was going to be thrown open on the 9th, and he said he thought it was.

Q. Where was McBeth at this time?—A. He had been down the street.

Q. Where was he when he gave you this information?—A. In camp.

Q. Where was McBeth?—A. He had been down the street, and he came back to camp.

Q. Was Major Walsh present?—A. No.

Q. Was McBeth working for Major Walsh?—A. Yes.

Mr. DAVIN.

Q. And he told you that the creek would be opened on the 9th?—A. He said he heard it would be opened on the 9th.

Q. That was on the afternoon of the 8th?—A. Yes.

Q. Did he tell you how he came by that information?—A. No, sir.

Q. When did you stake your claim?—A. I staked it on the 9th about 10.30.

By the Commissioner:

Q. In the morning?—A. Yes, sir.

By Mr. Fawcett:

Q. You subsequently recorded that claim?—A. Yes.

Q. What time did you start?—A. At 10.30 on the evening of the 8th.

Q. Would anybody have any interest in giving you any information as to this creek being opened on the 9th?—A. No, not that I know of, except Major Walsh's brother.

Q. What interests had he?—A. He didn't have any interests. I suppose it was his interest, in one way, to give me information.

Q. What arrangement was there between you and Major Walsh or any of his brothers with reference to any claims you might stake?—A. There was a document drawn up between him and his brother to give me a three-fourth interest in anything I got in the country, providing he paid all my expenses, and the working of any ground I took up in the country.

Q. Would you recognize that agreement if you saw it?—A. Yes, sir.

Then the document is set forth. On page 260 you will read:

By the Commissioner:

Q. Why did you give this to Philip Walsh and not to Louis?—A. Because Major Walsh instructed me he did not want Louis' name brought into the office, and it would be just as well to have the property made over to him. I told him that it was not proper; that the agreement would not stand law, and I couldn't get anything, and asked him to make out another agreement. He argued the point, and I told Mr. Pattullo, and Pattullo drew that agreement up; he said it would be all right, and I went to work and signed it.

Q. What consideration did you receive?—A. Not a cent.

Q. What were you to receive for the three-fourths; you were to receive one-fourth instead of what belonged to you?—A. He was to look after it, and pay any expenses of any mine I took up.

Q. Had this agreement been made before you left down east?—A. We talked the agreement over, but the agreement hadn't been drawn up, and it had to be signed at the Big Salmon.

Q. Did you think at that time that this was a fair agreement?—A. I didn't.

Q. Why did you sign it?—A. Because I was in a position and I couldn't very well get out of it; I didn't want to go out of the country.

Q. If you had refused, what would have been the result?—A. I wouldn't have been permitted to go; I would have had to have gone out.

Q. What position did you hold?—A. He promised me the position I have now—cooking for the officials, and I suppose if I hadn't signed that document I would not be in the position I hold now.

Q. Who promised you?—A. Major Walsh.

Q. Do you think you would have been in the same position now if you hadn't?—A. No, I don't think I would; nothing said about that.

Q. Was there any compulsion of any kind used to make you sign that?—A. He laid in his tent not over fifteen feet away; he knew it was wrong and I knew it was wrong.

Q. He didn't in any way try to compel you to sign it?—A. No.

Q. What reason have you for saying that you did not think you would be here?—A. I said I wouldn't have held the position I am holding now if I had not signed it.

Q. What were you doing then?—A. Cooking.

Q. How much were you getting?—A. $60 a month.

Q. What now?—A. $100 per month.

Q. When did you get an advance in your wages?—A. Last August; but he told me he would give me one hundred and twenty-five, then he cut it to one hundred. I said I would take the hundred and stayed in.

And later on :

Q. The government paid you wages and living expenses, so that has nothing to do with the case?—A. I think about $40 or $50.

Q. You would place the value of an outfit to stake a claim at $40 or $50. Well, before you left the camp to go on that trip did you ask Major Walsh's permission?—A. I did.

Q. Did you tell him what you were going for?—A. I told him I was going to Dominion Creek.

Q. What did he say?—A. He said yes.

Q. Did you tell him you were going to stake?—A. I did not.

Q. Do you think he knew?—A. Yes, he would not think I was going for a walk; that was in the evening about eight and ten o'clock.

By Mr. Tabor:

Q. Did any other officials go with you?—A. Yes, one, an Indian; and when I had gone five or ten miles I was joined by another Indian.

Q. Were these Major Walsh's Indians?—A. Just two of them.

Q. Who were they?—A. Two of the Cullum boys.

Q. In saying an outfit worth $40 or $50, what do you mean?—A. Going to Dominion Creek and coming back.

And later on :

Q. Did they transfer a three-quarter interest to Philip Walsh as you did?—A. Yes; you will find duplicates there in the recording office.

Then, on page 262 :

By Mr. Fawcett:

Q. In your examination yesterday, Mr. Carbeno, in answering one of the questions, you stated that you thought that your present position was the result of signing that agreement, or something to that effect?—A. Yes.

Q. Was there not part of the evidence in that connection which you forgot to give us yesterday?—A. I forgot to say that other papers were drawn up and I would not sign them.

Q. When was this?—A. Coming up on board the 'Quadra.'

Q. You would not sign them, why?—A. I said the papers were not legal, and would not sign them until I got legal ones. That afternoon I was called to Major Walsh's stateroom, and he asked me if I had made an agreement at Port Arthur before I left.

Q. You said you did?—A. He said, 'Why didn't you sign the papers?' I said I didn't because they were not legal. He said, 'If you don't sign those papers when this boat goes back, I will send you back on it.' That was all that was said until we got to Big Salmon, then other papers came on and therefore I signed them.

Then, on page 263 :

Q. How could that be, when the government was paying your expenses?—A. That was stated in the agreement before I left.

Q. That was understood at Port Arthur—that they were to pay your expenses to come into the country?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. At at the same time you were employed as a government servant. Don't you think it was inconsistent to offer to pay your expenses if you came in as a government employee?—A. Well, I was giving the way it was agreed to.

Q. Then this lead pencil document admitted that?—A. Yes, it is in this way only. (Mr. Carbeno reads the document.)

The Commissioner.—There is no reference there for your expenses to be paid into the country. It would grant the expense of working the claim, but not the expenses in connection with your entry here.

By Mr. Fawcett:

Q. You refused to sign this lead pencil document on board the 'Quadra'?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And you were told if you didn't you would be sent back?—A. Yes, sir; and I said I would not sign any until a proper one was drawn up.

Q. When you signed this at Big Salmon did it seem strange to you that it was dated at Port Arthur?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What was the actual date of the signature?—A. I could not exactly tell you. I think it was in June some time.

Q. Three months after the agreement had been entered into?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was there any cause—was the question mentioned at all? Was it dated at Port Arthur—why not at Big Salmon?—A. Well, I didn't ask any questions; they brought in the document and I signed it, that was all. I saw the signature and I knew it came from him.

Q. Whose signature was it?—A. Louis Walsh's. His signature is on the bottom of it.

Q. Have you reason to know his signature?—A. Yes, I will swear to it.

Q. You have no reason to assign why the document was dated September 23, and executed at Big Salmon some time in June?—A. No.

Q. This agreement you entered into at Port Arthur?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. This document you refused to sign, on whose behalf was that made?—A. Louis Walsh's.

Thus you have Carbeno utterly contravening what he states here. What is the meaning of this? They are doing by indirection the very thing they were asked to do.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. DAVIN. When six o'clock was called, I was referring to the challenge thrown out by my hon. friend, the acting Minister of the Interior, and that challenge was broader even than the challenge thrown out in 1899 by the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton). I took down my hon. friend's words. He said that if any one would make a charge against the Minister of the Interior or allege that he had reason to believe the charge, and made the statement on his responsibility as a member of this House an inquiry would be given forthwith. Let me now read the challenge that was thrown out by the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) on April 4, 1899. In the course of the debate on a motion of the hon. member for East Prince (Mr. Bell), the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) had made a very long speech and a series of most grave charges against the administration of the Yukon. Mr. Sifton replied, and concluded as follows :

I challenge the hon. member for Pictou, or any man in this House, to lay upon the Table of the House the charges that he has to make and declare his ability to substantiate them by evidence, and he will get his investigation—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN (reading)

—and I will be able to convince the hon. gentleman that makes that charge that discretion on his part would have been the better part of valour.

That is the challenge. On the 7th of June, the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) took it up. He made a series of charges, taking full responsibility, placing his position in this House in jeopardy. He used very strong language on that occasion.

In addition to what responsibility attaches to the government in this matter, I am prepared, if the commission is granted on the terms suggested to abide by the results, to consider that by failure to substantiate the charges made I will forfeit my right to a seat in parliament or to hold any office under the Crown.

On page 6046 of Hansard he said :

But I waive all that, and in this parliament, in the face of the country—my native country—I am prepared practically for all the pains and penalties in the discretion of parliament. I am prepared for more than that; I am prepared, that great good might come out of this investigation, as great good will come out of it, and great benefit to Canada, to incur the risks I have mentioned—no small risk to a man of even of ordinary ambition, that is to be considered that he has, by failure, after taking an important step of this character, disintitiled himself to the confidence of his fellow-countrymen in any public matter, and disintitiled also to the confidence of the representative of the sovereign in connection with any matter of political preferment within the gift of the Crown.

Later on, he concluded as follows :

I say seriously, Mr. Speaker, that I do charge the government with gross neglect and incapacity, followed by a carnival of corruption in the Yukon; but bad as all the crimes may have been in that district, it will be a national scandal and a national change for this parliament to refuse a judicial commission of inquiry upon the fair and reasonable terms covered by my motion, which I have put in your hands, and the statement of which I have already read; and wish to be considered responsible therefor as stated.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. My hon. friend, I am quite sure, does not wish to misrepresent the charges made by the hon. member for Pictou. I think he will admit that the hon. member for Pictou expressly disclaimed making any personal charge against the Minister of the Interior. If he looks at the resolution then moved, even with the speech by which it was supported, he will find that the hon. member for Pictou expressly declined to make any personal charge against the Minister of the Interior. If he had made such a charge, he would have got his committee at once as he would get it now if he should make it.

Mr. DAVIN. Is not that an example of the way this question has been dealt with? I will not use any strong language. Just take the language of the Minister of the Interior :

I challenge the hon. member for Pictou or any man in this House to lay upon the Table the charges that he has to make, and declare his ability to substantiate them by evidence, and he will get his investigation.

There is not a word here said about personal charges against the minister. He said: Make your charge. It was a challenge thrown out in the same spirit of bravado as the acting Minister of the Interior displayed in throwing out his challenge this forenoon. I have seen my hon. friend in many moods, but this is the first time I have seen him in his king Cambyses vein, and I may say I congratulate him because it was edifying. He threw out the challenges; he was a fighting minister. Let a charge be made, he said, and you will get your investigation. Brave words these, but the same challenge was thrown down in 1899 by the Minister of the Interior, and when it was taken up by the hon. member for Pictou, what resulted? The hon. member for Pictou put his position as an ex-minister of the Crown, as a member of the Privy Council, as a member of parliament, in the scale, and said he was willing to stand discredited before this House and the country if he did not establish his charges. Did he get the inquiry? Does any one suppose for a moment that if I were to imitate the course of the hon. member for Pictou, I would get an inquiry. No, the hon. gentleman would slide out of it by some means. He would probably set sail for England and stay there until the session was over.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. To avoid misunderstanding, I tell the hon. gentleman, on behalf of the government, that if he is prepared to make any charge of personal wrong-doing against the Minister of the Interior, he will have his committee within ten minutes after he makes the charge.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN. These be brave cheers and brave words. Here are the charges made by the hon. member for Pictou. Let me read them :

That the Hon. Clifford Sifton, Minister of the Interior, has been guilty of scandalous neglect, delay and mismanagement in the administration of the department in the Yukon district.

That commissions to officers in the Yukon were issued illegally and without authority.

That the chief authority in the Yukon was reposed in a man whose official record did not justify an appointment to any position of trust.

That the Minister of the Interior had made incorrect and misleading statements on various occasions in this House.

That the mining inspectors, appointed in July, 1897, were incompetent and untrained, while one was a United States citizen and uncertified captain of a whaling vessel, and the other a livery stable-keeper.

That the government appointed, on the recommendation of Mr. Sifton, officials who were incapable and corrupt, to positions requiring experience and technical knowledge.

That the Minister of the Interior had been guilty of favouritism and partiality in the administration of the Yukon laws and regulations.

That a former law partner of the Minister of the Interior, while endeavouring to induce another to join him in Yukon mining ventures, represented in writing that Mr. Sifton and the chief commissioner were also interested with him, but that their names could not appear, as he wrote, 'for obvious reasons.'

That Mr. Sifton gave to his former partner a permit or authority, contrary to law, which the latter offered for sale for a large sum of money.

That gross abuses had prevailed in connection with liquor permits.

That official favouritism had been shown to a Chicago and Seattle trading company.

That the chief commissioner and head of the executive in the Yukon was guilty of misbehaviour in office, and of other great offences, permitting favourites to violate the law by trading on the Sabbath and selling liquor contrary to the law.

That a lawyer, friendly to the minister, was enabled to charge large sums to secure the good offices of the minister in respect of liquor permits issued contrary to law.

That the chief commissioner illegally exempted individuals from the law and regulations respecting the payment of royalties.

That the Crown prosecutor appointed by Mr. Sifton, appeared before the court of the district and the gold commissioner as the paid advocate of private parties having business transactions with the government.

That the gold commissioner's legal adviser accepted retainers and fees for procuring or promising to procure grants or titles or possession of Dominion lands or mining claims.

That an officer of the government was guilty of blackmailing persons engaged in the sale of liquors and the keeping of gambling saloons.

That officials in the employment of the Canadian government in the Yukon were guilty directly and indirectly of accepting gifts, promises and considerations for their assistance and influence in procuring mining claims and other interests and information from public officers and public records, contrary to the Criminal Code.

That officials have been guilty of fraud and breaches of trust.

That official records were kept secret, so that among other abuses that prevailed was one by which, after application for a mining claim was made, the property, if found to be of value, was staked and recorded in the name of another than the first and rightful applicant.

That private fees were exacted for public work.

That a system of bribery among government officials was rendered necessary by inability otherwise to get them to perform their duties.

That blackmail by officials of persons applying for claims prevailed.

That unfair and fraudulent use was made by officials of knowledge obtained in the discharge of their duties.

That similar crimes and offences as mentioned above, pertained also to the disposal of timber by inspectors and other officials.

That grave scandals and abuses occurred in the Department of Customs and Post Office Department, as represented in the Yukon.

Now, these were the charges, and the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) assumed the responsibility of them as I have shown. And what does the government do? The government votes them down and slides off by a little excuse, such as that the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) has just made. If I were to accept the challenge made and make charges such as these against the department at this period of the session—or even supposing we were at the beginning of a session—we know very well that I should be met in the same way by the acting Minister of the Interior, and, in the end, should be voted down. And it will be remembered that when it came to the vote, the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver), the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) and another hon. member who is no longer in this House, three strong Liberals, revolted from the government and voted against them. And what was the reason they gave? The hon. member for Lisgar, who represents a western constituency, whose people are aware, as those of eastern constituencies probably are not, of the scandals and calamities and corruptions and misdeeds that were rampant in the Yukon, said: How can I go back and say that I was in favour of a free and full investigation, if I am not ready to vote for this motion calling for investigation? And the hon. member for Alberta, whose constituency is near the Yukon and in close touch with it, called for inquiry and punishment, but was voted down. And what have we seen? Everybody knows that the hon. member for Pictou is not a man to abandon a serious responsibility when once he has taken it upon him. Everybody knows that he is a man with the courage of his convictions. It was well known that this year he would bring forward these charges; and not only that, but it was known that others would bring forward charges against the department which my hon. friend (Mr. Sutherland) thinks is so impeccable, and, on whose account he, at this stage of the session, challenges us and defies us. Then, what happens? The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) goes away, and he has remained away. But the ostensible cause for his going could not have detained him up to this time. And we never learned of his spreading his wings to cross the Atlantic until the rumour crossed those waters that the closing hours of parliament were at hand. And, therefore, we have been unable all this time to examine him.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. He will be here on Monday, in all human probability.

Mr. DAVIN. But suppose we want to examine him about the Burrows job, how shall we be able to do it? The hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies) knows that the time is set for the close of the session. When the session opened, the hon. member for Picton came forward, not with the old motion, but with these charges put separately and specifically, they were again voted down and no inquiry was given. It must be remembered that what the miners urgently called for was a commission of inquiry. The miners were the first to petition. The ministers know that in their council chamber they have petitions from the miners of Dawson sent in before a word was spoken in this House, asking for a commission of inquiry.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin), of course wishes to be fair. He knows that the petition was dated the 25th of August; that petition was received, I think, on the 10th of September; and within five days after that the Royal Commission was issued.

Mr. DAVIN. Of course, I know that the miners asked for a Royal Commission, and a Royal Commission was given—a brother-in-law of the minister.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Brother-in-law?

Mr. DAVIN. A word against Mr. Ogilvie I will not say—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Is he a brother-in-law? I never heard it.

Mr. DAVIN. Well, he is a close relative.

Mr. INGRAM. He is his uncle.

Mr. DAVIN. This is like the case of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte). When he was asked if Gauthier was a relative of his, he said 'No.' Then he was asked, 'Is he your son's father-in-law? His answer was, 'How can I help it if my sons have fathers-in-law?' The miners asked for bread and were given a stone; they asked for fish and were given—I will not say a serpent, but what they got was of no value to them. They asked a Royal Commission and they got Mr. Ogilvie as commissioner to inquire into their charges. And Mr. Ogilvie himself has admitted that he was not equipped either by legal knowledge or ability to draw the truth out of a witness, to be a commissioner. But suppose he were the best lawyer in Canada, the scope of the commission chronologically was so limited that it could not be effective. The miners refused to go before that commission. I will take an illustration from my hon. friend's (Sir Louis Davies's) profession. If he had to argue a reference when the order of reference was improperly made out, all his legal knowledge would avail him nothing; he would go there with a cord around his neck, knowing that the decision would be against him. The miners knew that before that commission they could not establish their case. Mr. Ogilvie himself wrote and apprised the government of the fact that the commission could not be as effective as the miners desired, owing to its limited scope. And he suggested, as I remember, that the scope of it should be extended. But that was never done. The commission reported. And what do we find here to-day? The acting Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sutherland) finds it necessary to come here with affidavits, the testimony of witnesses whom we cannot cross-examine, one of Louis Carbeno, contradicting point-blank what we find in the report, and one of Walsh contradicting the sworn statement of Fawcett. Does not this show conclusively that the commission could not bring out the truth in regard to these charges? What was needed at the beginning of the session, this commission having notoriously failed, was that we should have a judicial commission of inquiry that would sift these charges, charges of robbery—

Mr. DAVIN.

An hon. MEMBER. Oh.

Mr. DAVIN. What is braying over there? To sift these charges of misconduct to the utmost—that is what we needed. Now, that commissioner on whom the hon. gentleman builds his defence of the government, had originally from the government of Canada, $1,800 a year; he got as commissioner of the Yukon, $5,000. After he sends in this report he gets $6,000 a year; he gets $3,000 a year besides, and he gets $720 a year besides—the whole amount he receives is $11,000 a year. Was a man in the position, being a relative of the Minister of the Interior, and further, being an officer of that minister, and further, being in a position to be rewarded by that minister, as he was rewarded—was he in an independent position to pronounce judgment on the man whose conduct was assailed? Remember that all the charges of incapacity came to the minister at Ottawa. Why was the administration of the Yukon rampant with corruption? Because the heelers, the sluggers and the pluggers of the party, the confidants and the familiars of the Minister of the Interior, were swarming around him like bees round a sugar barrel; and they thought, being at that distance, they could do what they liked and make a vast haul; because they were like the ministerial father who created them, they were on the make, and the very moment they went up there they were determined to make as big a haul as they could. I say here that the people of Canada feel—and all the indignation of the acting Minister of the Interior will not drive that feeling from their minds—that the Minister of the Interior himself, from the very moment he took that great office, has been as determined to be fruitful and multiply, in the sense of adding to his worldly wealth, as any minister, forgetful of his duty—

Mr. DOMVILLE. That is false.

Mr. DAVIN—ever could have been. Now, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of the Interior is coming back after having been absent from this House and this country. I say that in the face of this matter, and in the face of other matters, his absence from this House is itself a thing from which the people of Canada will draw their own conclusions. In reading these affidavits, the acting Minister of the Interior was trying to counter-vail, as far as he could, the impression that has been made on the people of Canada; but, I tell him that the conduct of the government in shrinking from any inquiry is of itself a kind of confession of guilt that alone has made such an impression that it will take more than the efforts, great as they are, successful as they are, of my hon. friend the acting Minister of the Interior to remove.

Mr. N. A. BELCOURT (Ottawa). I doubt very much if the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Bell) has given a moment's careful consideration to the obligation and duty which one member of this House owes to another member and to the House, I doubt if he has given a moment's thoughtful consideration to the honour, the good name and the fame and credit of Canada, when he undertook to repeat in this House the fould, dirty and violent insinuations of men who are either scoundrels or lunatics, contained in the letter which he has read to us this afternoon, and which I can qualify in no other terms than scandalous and infamous. If the hon. gentleman has given that subject a moment's careful consideration, then, I must say that his conception of his duties and of the respect that is due to this House, is one that I cannot approve, and I believe very few men in this House will agree with him. Now, it seems to me that party politics have got to a very sad pass when, in order to reap a doubtful party advantage, men will come into this House and repeat the wild, violent and grossly malicious talk indulged in on the street, in bar-rooms and in gambling dens. Sir, I protest against it as a member of this House. I must say that I was anything but edified this afternoon when I saw hon. gentlemen opposite listening to the vile stuff, which was read with evident delight and amusement. I do not propose to say anything more on that branch of the resolution; the acting Minister of the Interior, in a speech full of information, full of vigour, full of patriotism, resented these foul charges, and I think, in a clear and conclusive manner, vindicated the administration of the department.

Now, I want to refer to a subject mentioned in the resolution, with which I am somewhat familiar, and upon which I want to give the House the benefit of my knowledge. But, before doing so, I would ask the hon. member for Pictou if, in mentioning my name in connection with the Anderson matter, he intended to make any charges against myself, and if that was his intention, I would like to know what the charge is.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). The hon. gentleman has the resolution in his hands, he can read, I think. He has the advantage of having heard that read twice, and if his understanding is so defective that he cannot discover the meaning of the reference to himself, I am sorry to say that I cannot help him.

Mr. BELCOURT. I put a very fair and polite question to the hon. gentleman, and I got from him a very rude answer. I suppose the answer was rude because the hon. gentleman had no other answer to give, and he has made up in rudeness what he was lacking in information. I have read very attentively the resolution which is before me, and it is quite evident, so far as I can see, that no charge is made, and I suppose no charge was intended. But, I want to tell the House what I know about that particular matter. Mr. Robert Anderson, as described in the resolution, is a mining engineer from Sweden. Mr. Anderson went into the Yukon country in the early part of the winter of 1898, with the object of putting to profit the experience he had gained in mining in Australia and in South Africa; and he went out prospecting in the Yukon District. He discovered this ground at the lower end of Hunker Creek. It is a flat about two miles in extent, lying very low, which was discarded and passed over by every miner. All the claims on Hunker Creek were then staked out, and this part of the creek was discarded and passed by as of insufficient value to be staked as placer claims. Mr. Anderson prepared a petition, in which he represented to Mr. Fawcett, the gold commissioner, that this ground was not susceptible of being worked as an ordinary placer mine, and he made application for it in order that two miles of it might be worked under one management, as it required large and expensive machinery. Mr. Fawcett made a recommendation to the Minister of the Interior, and Mr. Anderson came to Ottawa and applied to the hon. Minister of the Interior for the claim. The firm of which I am a member acted as solicitors for him. An application was made to the hon. Minister of the Interior, and the hon. minister recommended to council that the grant should be made. I want to point out to the House the particular conditions upon which that grant was made. One of the conditions of the order in council was that machinery should be put upon the ground sufficient to work the property within one year, and another was, that failure to work the property during any one year would entail the forfeiture of the whole claim. Mr. Anderson proceeded to England, and if there is any charge in this resolution of the hon. gentleman it is that Mr. Anderson went to England and sold the claim there. If there is anything at all in this long and tedious resolution in the nature of a charge about the Anderson matter, it is that Mr. Anderson was given a concession which he was allowed to sell in England. I fail absolutely to see how and why this is reprehensible in any sense. Mr. Anderson went to England, and from the time he got the order in council, in January, until December, he looked about to procure the capital necessary to work this property. He associated himself with some of the best men in London, and it was found that in order to work the claim to advantage it would require the formation of a company with a capital stock of £350,000. These gentlemen that I have referred to formed a company and subscribed between themselves £55,000. Where is the harm in that? Is there any hon. member in this House who would say that one individual could have found money sufficient to work a property of that kind? No one individual could have found £5,000. We want to procure all the capital we can legitimately secure to assist in the development of that country. Surely there is nothing wrong in that. I know from personal knowledge that this company has expended on that property at least $150,000, and I know from personal knowledge that these gentlemen who put up their money to the amount of £55,000 or £60,000 have not yet received a single cent in return. They have put very expensive machinery on the property, and the claim would have remained unworked if these gentlemen had not put their money into it. The complaint made afterwards by some miners, when they found that Mr. Anderson had obtained the claim, is the usual complaint of disgruntled and disappointed miners. They had passed over this property and would have nothing to do with it, but the moment that Mr. Anderson discovered that it could be profitably worked, these men protested. That is the history of the Anderson matter, and I know, of my personal knowledge, that these facts cannot be controverted. I have had considerable to do with Yukon affairs, and I know from experience, professional and otherwise, that this is a most difficult country to govern, for reasons which are well known to this House, amongst them those of distance and of difficulties of communications; but there are reasons well known to professional men, and which become apparent the moment any one is in any way connected with the professional affairs of that country. Quite recently the hon. acting Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sutherland) was called upon to decide an appeal from the gold commissioner's office. In that case the gold commissioner had declared that an entry which had been obtained by a man named McGregor, of a certain claim, had been obtained fraudulently. It was said that he had not staked the claim personally, and that he had obtained a fraudulent entry. There were nine or ten witnesses heard before the gold commissioner. They went before the gold commissioner and swore that McGregor had not been personally on the claim and that he had not staked the claim in person. As a result the gold commissioner was compelled to take the claim away from McGregor. McGregor appealed to Ottawa, and the appeal was heard here. A man named Stone, an adventurer, a solicitor from somewhere in the United States, and a man named Stanford, who was his pal, made affidavits which were sent to Ottawa, and which were presented when the appeal was heard. I will read a few paragraphs from these affidavits to show the House what kind of people are gathered in that country and how difficult it is to administer that country. Let me read one or two paragraphs from the affidavit of Stone. This is an affidavit made by Stone, on February 17, 1900. He says:

3. My evidence was untrue, in so far as it differed from the evidence of the defendant McGregor as to his personally stating the said creek claim No. 2, Magnet Gulch.

4. The said McGregor, the defendant, did stake said claim No. 2 on March 12, 1898, as sworn by him in his evidence given before the gold commissioner on the hearing of this protest, and I was personally present and saw the said McGregor stake the said claim.

This was one of the men who went before the gold commissioner and swore that McGregor had not staked the claim at all.

6. My evidence given before the gold commissioner, where it differs from the above, is untrue. The evidence of all the other witnesses called on behalf of the plaintiff, where it differs from the above, is also untrue.

10. The plaintiff's whole case was worked up by myself and the plaintiff and her said husband, with the assistance of Walter Stanford, also a witness called on behalf of the plaintiff. All of the witnesses were obtained by myself with the assistance of said Stanford, and all the evidence, in so far as it goes to show that the defendant McGregor never went to the above claim No. 25, below on Bonanza, on March 12, 1898, and all evidence which states or implies that said defendant McGregor remained in my cabin upon claim No. 25, and that I went alone to Magnet Gulch, is untrue.

12. The evidence of every witness called on behalf of the plaintiff was manufactured by myself, assisted by M. J. Kelly, the plaintiff, E. L. Kelly, and Walter Stanford. Said evidence was often rehearsed before the trial in the gold commissioner's court, at the plaintiff's cabin in Dawson, and in her presence.

These are the kind of people, some of them, at all events, that are in that country. I want to read one or two paragraphs from the affidavit of Stanford:

3. The evidence given by me on said protest, where it stated that on March 12, 1898, the day the defendant McGregor staked the claim in question, the witness Stone and McGregor came out of the cabin upon No. 25 below on Bonanza, and spoke for a few minutes, and that the defendant McGregor returned to the cabin and said Stone then went up Bonanza, was untrue. The said McGregor did not return to the cabin, but accompanied the said Stone up Bonanza.

4. The evidence given by me before the gold commissioner on the said protest, where I stated that I followed the said Stone up Magnet Gulch and saw him writing on a stake upon No. 3, was untrue. I did not follow the said Stone up Magnet Gulch, nor did I see him writing upon the lower stake of No. 2. I did not see either Stone or McGregor after they left the cabin upon No. 25, and started up Bonanza Creek, until they returned together late in the afternoon of the same day.

5. I never saw Stone write upon any stake on Magnet Gulch, either on claim No. 2 or No. 3 on said March 12, 1898, nor was I with Stone upon said Gulch on that day.

6. With reference to the evidence of all the witnesses called on behalf of the plaintiff, such evidence was obtained by said Stone and myself. All such evidence, in so far as it goes to show that the defendant McGregor did not go above claim No. 25 below on Bonanza on said March 12, 1898, and in so far as it states or implies that said McGregor remained in our cabin upon said claim No. 25 below on Bonanza, is untrue.

11. The plaintiff's whole case was worked up by myself and said Stone, and the plaintiff's husband and the plaintiff herself. All of the witnesses were obtained by myself and said Stone, with the assistance of the plaintiff and her husband.

12. The evidence of every witness called on behalf of the plaintiff was manufactured by the said Stone and myself, assisted by the plaintiff and her husband, and said evidence was often rehearsed before the trial in the gold commissioner's office at the plaintiff's cabin in Dawson.

It would not, I imagine, require much evidence of this sort to satisfy hon. gentlemen that in addition to the other difficulties of administering the Yukon, this kind of thing renders the administration all the more difficult. To my mind the foul and violent language of the letter incorporated in the amendment constitutes the best answer to the wicked and wanton charges made and is a sufficient refutation of the statements it contains. In my opinion the administration of the Yukon for the last four years has been remarkably successful. The department took charge of a new country, the conditions of which were absolutely unknown; it had to be governed at a great distance from Ottawa; there were large interests at stake, calling for most careful attention; people came there from all quarters of the world, most of them not British subjects, and they had to be looked after very carefully. All this made the administration of the Yukon difficult. I have had some personal experience of the Department of the Interior professionally and otherwise since I came to Ottawa, and, in my judgment, the department has never been more efficiently and more progressively administered than it has been by the Hon. Mr.

Sifton. It has not only been efficiently administered, but it has been administered so as to be productive of the best results. The experience of the Minister of the Interior, his hard work, his untiring energy, have brought about in his department results which are a credit, not only to himself, but to the government, and to the country as well. I imagine that the success of his administration is the chief reason why hon. gentlemen opposite are so vicious when the department of Mr. Sifton is up for consideration. There is no other way to account for the fact that an hon. gentleman like the member for Pictou (Mr. Bell), who, I believe, is a mild and genial gentleman, would forget himself to the extent he did this afternoon, in reading the foul, infamous and scandalous letter to which we were obliged to listen.

Mr. T. D. CRAIG (East Durham). I am sure we must all be edified by the lecture given us by the member for Ottawa (Mr. Belcourt), on political partisanship and morality, and so forth. Hon. gentlemen supporting the government have imputed a great many motives to the senior member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), and to the junior member for Pictou (Mr. Bell), for having brought this matter to the attention of the House. They have declared that the motives of these gentlemen are entirely political, and that their object is to injure the Liberal party. Well, what is wrong about that? For five years I listened here to speeches made by the Liberals when in opposition, and the whole object of these speeches was to injure the Conservative party. It made no difference whatever whether there was any foundation for the charges which the Liberals then made, so long as they thought they could impress the people of the country with the idea that the Conservatives were as bad as they said they were. However that may be, these gentlemen opposite have no right to attribute any but the highest motives to the hon. gentleman from Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper). He has been obliged to leave for home, but he has gone to a great deal of trouble to collect these facts and to place them before the people of Canada. I admit that the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) took up a great deal of time last session and this session, in making these charges. But gentlemen opposite have no reason to complain of that, because if the government had been willing in the first place to grant a commission to investigate these charges, as they should have done, then all this time would have been saved. What we ask on this side of the House is, that a Judicial Commission shall be appointed by the government to investigate these grave charges. What is and what was the answer of the government to that demand? First of all, the government said to us: Take the responsibility of making definite charges on the floor of this House, and then we will give you a commission without five minutes' hesitation. Judging from that statement of the government, it looked as if there was nothing to conceal and it sounded well to have it published in the newspapers of the country. But what happened? The senior member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) did make his charges, and he made them as definitely as charges could possibly be made. He charged the Minister of the Interior with mismanagement, and he charged most of the officials in the Yukon with mismanagement, and in some cases with corruption. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) told the government that if he could not prove these charges before a Judicial Commission, he was willing to retire from public life, but did the government grant a commission, as they promised? Not at all. They called on their followers to vote down the demand for a commission of inquiry, and to-day they turn round and offer the lame excuse, that what they wanted, was for some one on this side to make a personal charge against the honesty of the Minister of the Interior. That indeed was a strange request from the government, and it is not at all necessary, in my opinion, to justify the issue of a commission to investigate the grave charges formulated. We have charged mismanagement. We have charged that officials appointed by the Minister of the Interior, have been corrupt, and that he has retained them in office. We have charged these officials with bribery. We have charged that there has been favouritism towards friends of the government; we have charged that a partner of the Minister of the Interior received favours from him; surely these charges are definite enough and surely they are brought pretty close to the minister. What a humiliating position for the government to take in a grave matter of this kind. The acting minister (Mr. Sutherland) was very indignant at the junior member for Pictou (Mr. Bell), for making these charges to-day, because he said they would injure the country. Why, the acting minister (Mr. Sutherland), must have been blind and deaf for a year or more, if he does not know that these charges have been made in the public press, and as for any injury which might come from publishing them in the English press, does he not know that the correspondent of the London Times made the charges in that influential journal, and that they were circulated all over England. Why, Sir, if the government did what was right, instead of casting imputations on the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bell) for making these charges here, and giving the government an opportunity to deny and investigate them, they would congratulate him on the service which he has rendered to Canada. Not only did the London Times make these charges, but a Mr. Miller, of Pembroke, a supporter of the Liberal party, went to the Yukon, and wrote a letter to his newspaper, in which he made serious charges against the officials of this government. What happened to him? His motives were not impugned. He was silenced by getting a government appointment. That of itself looks rather suspicious.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I must say that I am rather surprised that when these grave charges were made by the hon. senior member for Pictou, the government did not at once appoint a judicial commission to investigate them, and why? Because if a judicial commission had investigated these charges, and it had been proven that the officials of the government had conducted affairs in that country properly, the result would have been not only that the government would have been vindicated before the country, but that the hon. member for Pictou would have been discredited, and, according to his own declaration, would have lost his seat in this House, and any chance of promotion in official life in this country. He took that risk when he made these charges; he offered that challenge to the government; but they were not ready to take it up. What is the effect on the public mind of this country? I know that if I were not in parliament, and read these charges, and saw that the government refused to have them investigated, but were satisfied to stand up in this House and deny them, not on their own evidence, but on the evidence of the very officials who were charged, I would begin to think there was something seriously wrong. The acting Minister of the Interior reproached the hon. junior member for Pictou (Mr. Bell) with making these charges on hearsay evidence. I maintain that everything the hon. gentleman himself has said to us to-day, is on hearsay evidence, and hearsay evidence of a less credible kind than that on which the hon. junior member for Pictou based his charges; and why? Because the letters and affidavits which he read are from the very parties accused. I can easily imagine a man who is accused, being heard on his own behalf; but I am not willing to accept his evidence as final and conclusive. I want to place him on trial; and we wanted to place these men on trial before a judicial commission. The acting minister says: 'I do not want to place these men on trial, if they say they are not guilty, I do not want to investigate any further; I am satisfied; and I think the members on the opposite side ought to be satisfied too.' Well, we are not satisfied, and we do not think the people of the country will be satisfied. I have no doubt there are men so partisan that they will accept anything from their own side; but the great mass of the people want to know the truth; and when they read these charges, they will say: 'We think there is something in these charges, and why should not the government have them in-investigated by an independent judicial commission? What is the reason they are not willing to do so?' I suppose we may be told there is the cost. The cost does not amount to anything in a matter of this kind. They talk about the fair fame of Canada. If they want to vindicate the fair fame of Canada, they should grant this judicial commission, and have this investigation. The fair fame of Canada would be vindicated, if it were shown that everything was right. If it were proved that these men were guilty and they were punished, then the fair fame of Canada would be vindicated. But when we find very serious charges definitely made by a member of high standing in this House and in the country, it will not do for the government to say: 'We know where these charges come from; they are made for political effect, and we will not have anything to do with them; if they wish to make a charge against the honesty of the Minister of the Interior, let them make it, and they will get a commission in five minutes.' We do not propose to do any such thing. We make charges against officials who have not conducted the administration of affairs honestly. But if the government are not going to grant this commission, they can vote down the resolution, and the people of the country will have to judge for themselves who is right and who is wrong.

Mr. JAMES DOMVILLE (King's, N.B.) Mr. Speaker, when a man goes into a business of some kind, such as lecturing, I suppose he has to put in the time with something. I never was a paid lecturer myself, and that is perhaps the reason why the House is not bored with me all the time. Had I gone into that profession, I suppose I would have been so influenced by the cacoethes loquendi that I would have found it necessary to talk all the time. After sitting here for five months, it is like playing football at one time of the year, and cricket at another time. We have had a great blowing off of wind, a lot of eloquence. Some of us will be able to go home and point to what we said in parliament. Nobody cares one iota. Some gentlemen will attack the government for this, that and the other. The people will not believe them. They will say, you have, no doubt, made that statement in the House, but you were in a peculiar position there; you got free postage, free paper, and free advertising through Hansard, which you could not get in any other way—the press would not take it up. Gentlemen here—I presume it is within the rules of the House to say gentlemen, although hon. members is the correct expression, and not gentlemen—take advantage of their position to damage the country with their speeches. After five months, cannot we get down to a little common sense in this House? This is not a political idea at all. I could take the gentlemen on the other side of the House, and label them like the horses I saw running in Toronto the other day: No. 1, No. 2, No. 3, No. 4. One jockey had a blue jacket with white stripes, another a red, another a green. Could we not get all these men together, and put them in the Railway Committee room, and let them talk to one another, fling their hands about, and throw themselves at the Speaker; could we not confine them there, and let them do what they want, so that we could get on with the public business? The opposition have a right to say what they like. They are here to fill a position; that position is an honourable one; they have been destined by the people of this country to go into opposition and stay there. They had not been there more than a few months in 1896, when they tried to impress the country that they were the right men for the government, and that the country had no right to put them out, and they have been trying to do it ever since. Why not let the people of this country judge for themselves? Do not be too precipitate; allow the cake to cook; do not want to get back so quickly. I see my hon. friend from York looking at me, why should they not take him back to King's County at the next election? The people there do not want him, but still he might go down and try his chances. But he did not elect to try that county at the last election, but went away to York with his carpet bag and secretary, and his secretary's carpet bag. If we were to go into all these charges, where would we stand?

Mr. CLANCY. On your head.

Mr. DOMVILLE. My hon. friend from South Lanark (Mr. Haggart) laughs. Would he like to have charges made against him? Would the hon. member for York like to be charged, and some more gentlemen on that side? No, but there is a clique in this House, like a little school association in a country district, quite willing to fling charges broadcast. They will not stop at any kind of wild charges in the hope of putting the government out.

We hear a great deal about the Yukon from gentlemen who have never been there and know nothing about it except what they have crammed from books in the library. Some of these hon. gentlemen make quite good speeches on the Yukon, which shows great industry on their part collecting other people's ideas. The art of stealing somebody's brains is one which is brought to a great stage of perfection in this House. I know a number of hon. gentlemen who have done very well on it. It may be all right to steal other people's brains, but I have tried to view this matter from the standpoint on which the great public will look at it. Here is the Yukon territory. Probably I know as much about it as anybody in this House, and more than most of them. People went in there from all parts of the world trying to win gold—not brass. And what were the conditions? Food was scarce. We had to see whether we could get food enough to keep the people alive. The American government sent reindeer out there and devised many plans to supply food for American Alaska.

Mr. PRIOR. Emergency food.

Mr. DOMVILLE. My hon. friend from Victoria says 'emergency food.' I have seen the day when the hon. member would have been glad to eat it. We were dealing with a country where it was very difficult to lay down any hard and fast lines as to what should have been done to keep things right. Take these charges. Why should Col. Steele be charged, by implication if not by fact. Col. Steele is at the front, in South Africa. We see by the telegraphic despatches how gallant a part he is taking in the struggle there, but still he must come under the condemnation of hon. members opposite because they want to make a point against the government. Is there nobody on this side of the House that can be credited with any decency, and have the opposite side a monopoly of all the virtues and decencies? I am addressing myself to the leader of the opposition, the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) to-night. I ask him why he should indulge in this business of throwing stones. He ought not to forget the adage that applies to certain people to whom such a practice is likely to be dangerous. Do you suppose for a moment that the good common sense people in Canada are going to take any stock in these charges? No, they will glance over them in Hansard and ask each other: What are these people gammoning about? And they will not be slow to draw their own conclusions, which will be simply this, that a certain set of gentlemen who were in power many years and who feel that they were unjustly turned out of power, want to get back again, against the will of the people, and think, by the use of such sophistical charges, to induce the people to send them back. Do you think, Mr. Speaker, that that fly will catch on? No, Sir. When you throw your fly for a salmon and you have hooked your salmon and then lost him, you have to sit at your pool quite a long while and put on another fly before you can attract the salmon again. You must try a new fly—a dark fly on a bright day and a bright fly on a dark day. You have to try something the fish will take. These hon. gentlemen opposite have not got the right fly yet. My hon. friend from York knows they have not. They have the spider but not the fly.

Why should they attack Major Walsh? Major Walsh is no personal friend of mine, and I have no particular feeling in his favour except from seeing him in the Yukon and believing he should have somebody in this House man enough to stand up and defend him. Major Walsh is not a man you could attack with impunity outside or in the corridors. He can take his own part anywhere except in the precincts of parliament, but here he cannot do anything because those who attack him are too well protected. I would say to these hon. gentlemen to bear in mind the advice in the Book to which we all ought to give more study: 'Let him that is without sin throw the first stone.' If Major Walsh has been injudicious, if he has made mistakes, why should he be attacked here, where he has no opportunity to defend himself? I say that such attacks are unmanly and cowardly. As to Mr. Ogilvie, and his connection by marriage, I know nothing about it, but I do know this. I come down to the 29th section of the complaint. There is a charge beginning here, 'gambling is a crime in Canada. What is gambling? Is it putting a chip on a roulette board and seeing what you will get, or is it getting stock in a mine in order to get other people in to pay for their stock, when you get yours for nothing? My hon. friend (Mr. Foster) looks at me. I thought perhaps he would ask me some questions. We read here that saloons in Dawson are a secret monopoly from which the government gets money. That is false, and everybody knows it. Then we are told of houses of ill-fame. What do they know about this, Mr. Speaker? How do they get the information? Have they been there? The answer is that they have not, because they are here. They have not been there, but they have been here. Is there any community that we know of where there is not something wrong? Why is everything made an excuse for throwing dirt at the government? They have been four and a half years in power, and in that time the country has made greater progress than at any other time. My hon. friend from West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) talks of scandal—we have scandal from him all this session. Statements in these charges are attributed to Dr. Good. I know him well; he is a thorough gentleman, and would not say anything but what he thought was right. But, on the other hand, he is a most prejudiced Conservative. But why not take the evidence of people here who have been in Dawson? Everybody went into that country. I have a boy who came from Dawson after selling a property there. After he left, they took out on that property the biggest nugget ever found in the Yukon—seventy-seven ounces of gold. Mr. Speaker, they might as well have said the government had given him that property, and that he had got this big nugget out of it. Unfortunately, he did not get it. It would be better if we could get down to some other basis on this whole matter. Let us recognize the fact that hon. gentlemen opposite, led to-night by the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) want to get into power. Let them make a square fight on that plea. Let us get all these charges set before us, then give us, say until to-morrow, and take a vote on them—and let us go home to our families, those of us who have families to go to. These hon. gentlemen should remember that those against whom these charges are made have feelings, and the members of their families, and their friends had feelings. Is it right that they are to be slandered, that every man in that country is to be tasked as a rascal? Hon. gentlemen opposite speak as if they had made that country. They did not do anything for that country. It is very much as in the case of South Africa—they had a great deal to say, but none of them went there. All this talk of scandal, whatever may be its object, has the effect of injuring Canada. Why should it be continued? We have been here for nearly five months; and why cannot we agree to disagree, and not continue this talk of scandal which will cause our country to be unfavourably judged abroad? Hon. gentlemen opposite think they will put the government out of power on this Yukon question. But the whole thing is exhausted, and nobody takes any stock in it. Would it not be better if we could unite to show the world that above our desire to get into office we have pride in being Canadians, and that when a Canadian is struck at we will defend him. Let us unite to build up the Yukon country. It is but a gamble at the best, because we do not know what will come out of it. We should unite to bring credit to our country rather than infamy. Because, after all, it is the people who send this cabinet here, and who keep this party in power. The people may be wrong, and the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) right—I have no doubt he knows more than all the people of Canada, and thinks himself quite fit to lead them, to dictate to them. But would it not be better if he and his friends would seek to advance the reputation of their country instead of casting slurs upon public officers who are not able to defend themselves. Instead of trying to cause the world to look upon Canada as corrupt from top to bottom, let them seek to have Canada regarded as a country of pure men and pure women.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). Most of the matters that are mentioned in this resolution have been fully dealt with by the acting Minister of the Interior; and I think the House will agree, I think even the hon. gentleman who moved the resolution and the hon. gentleman who seconded it, will agree that there has been put into your hands in the shape of a resolution one of the most disgraceful documents that was ever read in parliament. If those hon. gentlemen thought it was necessary that certain things should be alluded to, there was another way open to them, they could have availed themselves of the opportunity without reading the letter from that man in its full text, they could have made the points which are contained in it in language which, at any rate, would not have so much disgraced the public records of this country. But they thought differently, and they have put upon the records of this House that which any one would be ashamed to read in the presence of any gathering of gentlemen, and they have asked this House to endorse it. Well, I do not need to go into that matter any further. It seems to me, as the acting Minister of the Interior has said, that the language of that letter is the language of a man who is not perfectly sane, indeed I think it would be charitable to him to take that view, for if we take any other view you have to come to the conclusion that he was wholly vicious.

But there is in this resolution a charge against the North-west Mounted Police in their capacity as officers of the Customs Department, to which I wish to allude, and with the permission of the House I will read that portion of the resolution, and make some comments upon it. I must express my surprise at the member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), a gentleman who in times past has been pleased to say that the members of the North-west Mounted Police were men of honour, men of character, now saying by speech as well as by his vote—for I suppose he will vote for this resolution—that these men are corrupt and unworthy of holding their positions. If he takes the position that Inspector Cartwright, Inspector Strickland and Major Steele are corrupt men—

Mr. DAVIN. No.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Yes, he has sanctioned this, or will do so if he votes for it. If he charges these men with corruption the force will take note of it. I will read you what is said with reference to that:

That in addition to the statements formally made in this House during the past session, the following statements are now brought to the attention of this House—

Reiterated when these men are away fighting for their Queen in South Africa.

That one J. E. Whiteside was sent by Collector Milne of Victoria to Skagway on February 24, 1898, and subsequently he was transferred for service at White Pass. He left the service on May 27, 1898.

(‘Hansard,’ 1900, p. 6797.)

That Mr. Whiteside has since then been a member of the firm of J. E. Whiteside & Co., real estate, mining and customs brokers in Dawson.

That Mr. Whiteside has advised a member of this House as follows:

‘The following few facts are given to you with the understanding that I am not seeking for political favours, but rather that it is necessary that the country should know how things were carried on both at the summits of White Pass and Chilkoot by the collector of customs during the spring of 1898, and one item I can vouch for that was ignored and pooh-pooed at royal farce held at Dawson by the Hon. Mr. Ogilvie.

I was, as you are aware, sent by Collector Milne to Skagway as a Canadian bureau of information to aid intending prospectors to pass through the American customs. How I performed that work, I leave others to tell you, but I might say that one American gentleman from Dawson told me on his return in that I was the first official he met who was honest, and afterwards, when I was in Dawson, he told me I could not make money in consequence. Concerning the collection of duties at the summit of White Pass. I was sent there by Col. Steele after I had reported to Collector Milne in detail. I found the state of affairs just as I had reported there, and in consequence of doing my duty as a customs officer, I was treated as a spy by the officers in charge. This latter fact was written by the officer commanding the post to Col. Steele, who told me of it. I numbered the entries and entered up the cash-book, which was not done before. The book is now in Ottawa. There were two items entered up twice in cash-book, and yet the cash balanced. I was never allowed to check the cash; I asked twice, but was refused. The first item that was found entered twice I altered and reported as clerical error to Col. Steele. The second I refused to alter, but it was manipulated at night by the officer commanding and his sergeant, who lived in the hut—I, as a customs clerk, having to live in a tent. The business method I introduced was never adopted.

They solemnly put this down as a charge upon which they want a judicial investigation. This man Whiteside says:

Concerning the Chilkoot Pass, I only have information from prospectors, and they told me in Dawson that they never paid for one-half of goods. Invoices and so forth were torn up and put away by brokers and others. I was informed a few days ago that entries were missing, invoices, and in fact chaos reigned supreme. Concerning the administration at Dawson, it was scandalous in the summer of 1898. In the first place passes by the side door were given and signed in my own case by the health officer.

I made out a report of customs work for Major Walsh in detail, and said report to be delivered to the Minister of Customs. Has that report ever reached its destination?

That is with reference to Mr. Whiteside. Then there is another gentleman who gives evidence:

That one, J. J. Seabrook, writing to his father on October 16, 1899, from Dawson, said:

'First, the intended miner in the spring of 1898 was informed by the people in Seattle that they would have to pay very little if any duty, as the collector of customs on the Summit was so loose that $5 or $10 would let any one through. Seattle sent men up who brought back this information, which is only too true. I would estimate that Canada had lost in customs $500,000. Many have told me that they would have outfitted in British towns if Seattle had not advised them in reference to the slackness of the Canadian customs. The rush is over, still the bulk of trade is from the United States, where it will remain until the customs are enforced. There must be a million dollars' worth of machinery in here from the States. . . . I have got good authority for all I am writing.'

That is all that is contained in this document with reference to the administration of the customs in the Yukon.

Mr. PATERSON.

Mr. DAVIN. Where is the charge against Col. Steele?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I will tell the hon. gentleman where the charge is. These gentlemen who were acting for the customs in the spring of 1898, are here charged with looseness of method, are here charged with being responsible for a loss of revenue, and this Mr. Seabrook states that the customs of this country have been defrauded for $500,000, and that these officers were approachable if you would only give them $5 or $10 each.

The officers in charge of these passes were Inspector Cartwright and Inspector Strickland.

Mr. DAVIN. I venture to say that these gentlemen would welcome an inquiry.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. We will see whether Inspector Strickland will welcome the hon. member for Assiniboia back when he votes for this resolution. When he votes for this resolution he goes the length of saying that the word of this man Seabrook, whom no one knows, is sufficient to damage the character of Inspector Strickland, that he justifies the charges against Inspector Strickland. I do not think much of this man's statement.

Mr. DAVIN. Nor do I.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Every hon. gentleman on that side of the House who votes for this resolution endorses this statement of this man Whiteside, and every hon. gentleman stands here as charging Inspector Strickland and Inspector Cartwright, men who stand high in this country—

Mr. DAVIN. No.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Do they not stand high?

Mr. PRIOR. They do not stand any higher than Mr. Whiteside.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. That is the hon. gentleman's opinion of the officers of the North-west Mounted Police. Let him place this stigma on the men who are away in South Africa, who have volunteered for the defence of the empire, let him place them in that position if he chooses.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Louder, louder.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I am speaking sufficiently loud for hon. gentlemen to hear. I want to speak sufficiently loud that the country will hear. I want the country to judge whether the word of Whiteside is to be taken against the word of two officers who stand high in the estimation of their fellowmen, and the hon. member for Assiniboia dare not deny that they stand in the highest rank amongst the citizens of Canada. I think the hon. gentleman will not deny that Col. Steele occupies a position of prominence in this country. When Lord Strathcona made that munificent offer to send 500 mounted troops to help to fight for the Queen in South Africa, he selected Col. Steele as the man to lead these men. Col. Steele was the superior officer of Inspectors Cartwright and Strickland, who were doing duty on the Summits, and when this man Whiteside preferred his charges, Col. Steele had an investigation of these charges, and he reported that there was not an atom of truth in them. If the hon. member for Assiniboia votes for this resolution he will vote that Col. Steele's word is not to be taken against the word of Whiteside, but that the word of Whiteside is to be taken against the characters of two of the finest officers in this Dominion. Well, it has been proved before their superior officer that the statements of this man were untrue. More than that, Col. Steele reported the result of his inquiry to the collector of customs, than whom there is no man in the service of the Customs Department who stands higher in the estimation of my predecessors in office, and in the estimation, I venture to say, of the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Prior), than the collector of customs in Victoria.

Mr. PRIOR. What about him?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The collector of customs in Victoria says—

Mr. PRIOR. Do not get excited.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I am not getting at all excited. I do not deny that I am a little indignant that the best men in this country should be slandered, Mr. Speaker, by resolutions put into your hands and put upon a page of the history of this country. Collector Milne, in a report in reference to this man Whiteside, states:

Re Charges by John E. Whiteside.

Collector Milne, Victoria, June 8, 1898, reports:

This person has been writing some disagreeable things about the North-west Mounted Police, which no one would give the slightest credence, as Inspectors Strickland and Cartwright are both highly honourable men, and I believe they have endeavoured to do their duty under trying circumstances.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Prior) express his belief in the statements of Whiteside?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I suppose he will. He will, if he votes for the resolution, and so will any one who votes for that resolution, as he is evidently prepared to do. I suppose that the hon. member for Western Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) will not be prepared now to vote for this resolution after his remarks. It says that this man Seabrook, whom nobody knows, wrote a letter to his father, in which he said that $500,000 had been lost to the Customs Department.

Mr. DAVIN. When did I say that?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Tonight.

Mr. DAVIN. No, I did not.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Yes, the hon. gentleman virtually said so. Here is this man Seabrook, that we know nothing about, who makes this absurd statement that $500,000 has been lost to the Customs Department, and that men like Inspector Strickland and Inspector Cartwright, who were in charge of these posts, could be induced, by $5 or $10, by certain parties, to allow these goods to go through. On the mere statement of a man like that the hon. member for Western Assiniboia says that Inspectors Strickland and Cartwright ought to be delighted at the opportunity of having an investigation to prove that this man lied in reference to them. Does he not know now that this man lied? Does he believe that he did? I ask him if he believes Seabrook. If he does not, why does he make a charge of this kind? If he does not, he has no right to vote for this resolution. I have nothing more to say in reference to the Department of Customs. I have given the House the facts, the resolution may go before the House, and those who are willing to take the responsibility of backing up these unsustained charges against these men, who stand high in the estimation of their fellow-countrymen, who are risking their lives in the service of their country, and who are bravely doing their duty, take upon themselves a responsibility that involves a course which I, for one, cannot endorse.

Mr. G. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.) Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) to lay the report from Collector Milne, and the other report from which he quoted, on the Table of the House.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Yes, I will lay the extracts I have quoted from on the Table.

Mr. FOSTER. No, I want the report from which the hon. gentleman has quoted. I do not want simply a line taken out from it. I want the whole report.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The hon. gentleman will find this a little stronger than I put it. I thought I would lead hon. gentlemen, perhaps, into this.

Bennett, N.W.T., June 28, 1898.

To the Controller
North-west Mounted Police,
Ottawa.

Sir,—Referring to your letter of the 25th ult., re Mr. Clute, I have the honour to point out that the customs officers previously sent to this country from Victoria made a point, from the date of their arrival, to endeavour to ruin the reputations of the officers of the North-west Mounted Police stationed on the Summits.

One John E. Whiteside was sent up from Skagway, for what purpose I know not, unless it was to obtain private information on the merest hearsay.

He wrote some of the most atrocious letters that I ever read—false, vile, officious emanations from his own disordered brain.

A good deal of correspondence has passed between myself and Collector Milne with reference to letters of this sort, and he appears to have placed no credence in these false reports, but I would respectfully suggest that he be called upon to send through his departmental head to the hon. the Minister of the Interior copies of all letters on this subject which have passed between him and the said Whiteside; also copies of all letters between him and other parties in reference to this matter.

I have looked into every accusation which has been made, and find out that there is not an atom of truth in any of the charges.

I have the honour to be, sir,

Your obedient servant,

(Sgd.) S. B. STEELE,

Supt. Commanding Upper Yukon District.

Mr. FOSTER. The minister referred to a report from Collector Milne, and made statements with reference to it. The House is entitled to that report as well.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I have not that with me; I have an extract from it here.

Mr. FOSTER. I should like to have the ruling of the Chair on that.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I am not objecting, but I cannot give it to you, when I have not got it here. This is the extract given by the Commissioner of Customs, which I read.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to take up very much time in the remarks that I shall make with reference to this motion. The Minister of Customs, who has entertained the House to a most excellent hustings speech of the pattern which he most approves, and to which I suppose he is much wedded as an instrument of power in his canvassing tours; has not, however, by that hustings speech, gone at all to the kernel of the matter which we have been discussing, or ought to be discussing here to-day.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I thought I got pretty near the kernel.

Mr. FOSTER. You will have to have some correspondence with the Minister of Militia and Defence, before you get near an honorary 'coloneley,' but there are plenty of them going around, and the hon. gentleman may live in hopes. The answer of the acting Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sutherland) to the statement of my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Bell), and to the resolution which he submitted to the House, was rather an answer in a peculiar way to statements which had been made in previous debates and in previous years, and it was an answer consisting chiefly of statements, with some affidavits, from gentlemen who do not belong to this House, and who took that method of contradicting statements which had been made by members of this House in previous debates. Now, Sir, we had the Speaker's ruling on that, and we had to bow to it. But, I think I will be supported in this by all level-headed members of this House when I make the statement that it is not a proper way to try charges which are preferred on the responsibility of a member, and as to which the member when he makes these charges gives the evidence by which he proposes to support them, and asks for a proper commission to adjudicate upon them; I say that there are not many members in this House who will support the proposition, that a sufficient answer to these charges is to refuse a judicial commission, and to attempt to refute them by affidavits and statements made by the parties who are accused. No person will maintain that a trial conducted in that manner can be considered a sufficient trial. One of the rights of a member in this House is to make, consistently, with what he considers his duty to the public interest, any statements and draw the attention of the government to these statements. He is not obliged to prove the truth of the statements to which he calls the attention of the government, but it is sufficient for him, in the discharge of his whole duty, if he believes that they form a substratum upon which to challenge the attention of the government, and upon which to ask for an inquiry in order that the truth may be known. That is a fair position to take. No lawyer who takes up a case to be carried before a legal tribunal, is absolutely certain of all he proposes to prove, but he satisfies himself that he has fair and reasonable evidence, and upon that he goes to trial, and upon that evidence, sworn and tested by cross-examination, his case stands or falls. Every member of the House will, I think, agree with me, that you do not have to call a minister a thief or a rogue in order that the government should take some notice of the charges that you make as to the condition of that minister's department, or the methods of his administration. It is one thing to charge a minister with stealing the public funds, or with any other crime known to the criminal calendar, but it is quite another thing to charge that the department is being maladministered, and to demand that the charge shall be looked into before a proper tribunal. To-day the acting Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sutherland), and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), put up an admirable piece of bluff, it has been said, when in this the last of the fifth month of the session they said: Bring down your charges of personal dishonesty against the Minister of the Interior, and you shall have your commission within fifteen minutes. Why, Sir, have we come to this pass in the carrying out of responsible administration, that a government will sit secure on the Treasury benches, having confidence in its following behind it, and will refuse to investigate before a competent tribunal any charges that may be made with reference to the administration of the different departments of government, provided that you stop short of charging the minister with actual thievery and subordination in his office. Has it come to that? They ask us to make our charges. Why, Sir, for two years charges have been made in this House in the most responsible way. I ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), or any other minister: If the charges preferred by Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper had been put before a Royal Commission and had been proven, could the Minister of the Interior have retained his seat in this House as a member of any government in this country? There is a simple way of testing it. A man may be a minister in a department; he may not have stolen the public money, but he may have so erred in his administration; he may have by negligence, culpable or otherwise, made it possible that his department has been, in its administrative details, full of everything that is against the best interests of the country; but the very moment that is proved against the minister, that very moment he must shoulder the responsibility; and if he is culpably negligent, no cabinet can keep him within its confines, and no electorate will condone his offence. Make your charges, they say. The charges have been made here by a responsible member of this House over and over again; and the reputation, the place and future prospects of that member in this House and in this country have been pledged upon his being able to prove those charges or his not being able to prove them. No more responsible and definite charges have ever been made in this House against the administration of any department than have been made by the senior member for Pictou against the Department and the Minister of the Interior. And, Sir, for two years the hon. member for Pictou has been making those charges, and he has been adding to them evidence upon which he proposes to prove them, until the great accusation against him has been that he has taken up too much of the time of the House, that he has been too prolix, that he has run too much into detail, that there is so much of it that it confuses the mind. But that the charges were not definite, that they were not backed up by the hon. gentleman's reputation, his place in this House as a member, his future as a public man in this country, no one on either side of the House can for a moment assert; and after two years have passed by, and the ministry individually and collectively have refused to give him the simple machinery he has asked for, a judicial commission, now at this, the end of the fifth month of the session, after that hon. gentleman has had to go from the House, these gentlemen get up and declare in stentorian tones, 'Make your charges, and you shall have your commission inside of fifteen minutes.' Why, the thing is so transparent that I wonder that gentlemen lose five minutes in making such a transparent bluff as that. What were the reasons why these gentlemen should have given an inquiry? What have we been treated to since the first of these rumours, the first of this information, the first of these charges began to percolate from the distant regions of the Yukon into every portion of Canada, every portion of the empire, yes, and every portion of the globe? What has been the attitude of the ministry? That they courted a fair inquiry? That they were willing that the whole light of day should be thrown on this matter? That they were favourable to the fullest and freest investigation? No, Sir, nothing of the kind; but from the very first, led by the Minister of the Interior, they have joined hands together, and stood as a steady and firm phalanx against any attempts to break through that line, and let in the light of day. That is not a healthy sign in public life. I do not think any government in a constitutional country has ever taken a position of that kind and persisted in it, when members of equal respectability and equal prominence in the country have staked their whole political reputation upon the charges they have made, and have asked for an inquiry. Oh, but, says some one, they gave an inquiry. What did they give? An inquiry such as was asked for? An inquiry such as would command the confidence of the country? No, Sir. The best that can be said about it is that they put on perfunctory and partial official inquiry—that and nothing more. That is not what is asked for. That was not the efficient machinery for trying these charges, which any government that did not fear the results would have been glad to have given—the fullest inquiry before a judicial commission. But that is exactly the kind of inquiry which these gentlemen up to this hour have refused to give. And yet, for two years testimony after testimony has been accumulating, and has gone into every quarter of this country and through the empire to its widest bounds, all going to show that maladministration was rampant in the Yukon territory, and that the fair name of Canada was being smirched when it should have been kept pure and undefiled. These gentlemen get up now and, in tones of thunder befitting a hustings, they declare that the opposition are smirching the fair name of Canada. In what way, Sir? Has a single member of this House originated any rumour, any report, any statement with reference to the Yukon administration? Not one. They have simply brought to the attention of this House the statements, the rumours, the information, the charges, the accusations which have been crowded upon them from the people who have been in the Yukon territory, have lived there and have come out. It is a part of a public man's duty to see that those accusations which are widely spread, in which after investigation he believes there is truth, are brought to the attention of parliament, to have them inquired into by a competent authority, and that is simply what the opposition have done. They have endeavoured to fulfil their duty and their whole duty; and again I go to the record and I say that no more important charges, charges more definitely made, and more thoroughly backed up by prospective evidence, have ever been brought against the administration of a government than those which have been laid on the Table of this House month after month during the last two years; and if hon. gentlemen opposite were so solicitous for the fair fame of Canada, they would have at once given the inquiry in order that the fullest investigation and the fullest publicity should be given to the facts of the case. What have the hon. gentlemen to fear? Did they fear the expense of such an investigation? They have not shown themselves as being so rigidly economical in the matter of commissions as not to be able to afford the money to carry on a judicial investigation in this case. Hundreds of thousands of dollars have been spent by these gentlemen on commissions; so that that could not have been the reason. The country always has money for the purpose of looking into charges that affect the fair fame, the public service, the best interests of the country. Were they afraid of the results? If they were not, why did they not assent to the investigation? Why did they not welcome the evidence? Why did they treat every man who had his quota of his experience and his observation with reference to the maladministration in the Yukon, as if he were a malefactor, an untruthful man, a disreputable man, a man who had no claim to their credence or confidence. That is the way they have met every one of these allegations, no matter from what source they have come. If they even deigned to notice them, they have thrown them away with the statement that the men who have made them are disreputable and unworthy of confidence.

We have had examples of that to-day. Hon. gentlemen have risen on the other side, and in their desire to prevent investigation and discredit any attempt at investigation, they have not hesitated to condemn men of whom they know absolutely nothing, and of whom they have confessed here to-day that they know absolutely nothing. But they go on the general assertion that these men must perforce be disreputable and unworthy of confidence, if they dare to make any charge against the administration in the Yukon. That is not a creditable position for hon. gentlemen opposite. They could afford the money for an investigation. If they had nothing to fear they would be benefited as a party by it. If there was nothing to these charges, if everything were right and proper, the fair fame and name of Canada would have been best cleared and kept pure the wide world through, and it was a duty that these gentlemen owed to Canada herself that there should be a sufficient investigation into that district in order to show up the facts of the case, and disprove these charges and allegations which these hon. gentlemen declare to be wanton and unfounded. Why then have we not had an investigation? Have not investigations been granted under circumstances of less definiteness and particularity? What happened in 1896? The Dominion elections had been held. In Manitoba they were over, and they were scarcely over before a private individual wrote down to the then prospective Premier of this country saying: I have a strong suspicion that there has been wrong practiced in the elections in Manitoba, and I want to make my suspicions good if possible. I ask you to promise me that out of the Dominion treasury you will come to my aid and enable me to trace out my suspicions. Am I overstating the case? Not one whit. What was the reply of the prospective Premier of Canada? I wish you God speed in your work, and I hope you will unearth the iniquities in the province of Manitoba, and to help you to trace out your suspicions, I will pledge you that the Dominion treasury will stand at your back and meet your expenses. And on that pledge of the present Premier, Mr. Clifford Sifton set his police at work, put on his myrmidons, and for month after month he traced the lines of his suspicions through the byways, and concessions of the different districts in Manitoba, and at last ran up a bill, which the Dominion government paid, of some $20,000. And what was the result of it all? One single conviction, and that of a man who was more the party's own tool than the confederate of his political opponents. Have I overstated that case? I defy any man in this House to dispute the substantial accuracy of my statement. Why was that done? Because Mr. Sifton, not then a member of this parliament, not a minister of this government, but a private individual in the province of Manitoba, scented a very substantial advantage for his party, and the Prime Minister to be, scented a very substantial advantage to his party if these suspicions could once be proven; and so the two of them joined hands and the Dominion treasury was put under contribution. What for? For a party advantage, as we believe, but give them the benefit of a higher motive, and what was it? It was to vindicate the purity of the electorate in the province of Manitoba.

Now, here is a case, not a case originated by Mr. Sifton or by any member of his party, but one that comes from the four-quarters of Canada, it is the consensus of statements and rumour and charges and accusations that things are wrong, and very wrong, in the Yukon district. It is taken up by correspondents in the Yukon, investigating on the spot, and in papers like the London Times is given voice to in no doubtful terms. All over this country, and throughout the British Empire this spreads and spreads, it comes to the ears of members of both sides of the House. Hon. gentlemen from that side travelled up to the Yukon and investigated affairs in the Yukon themselves. Whilst there, they were shaking their heads and saying: It is very bad, but when they come down here, they sit behind the government benches, and if they say anything at all, they say: Oh, it is a difficult place to govern. The distances are very long out there, and after all things were done about as well as they could be. They are quiescent, there is no party advantage to be gained by them, they have no keen and burning desire such as Mr. Sifton had in 1896. They sit still and are quiet. But on this side members also have had these charges brought to their notice. They have made investigations, and have risen in their places in parliament and stake their reputation and future on these charges, and they ask for what? Take your lowest ground, the Sifton ground in 1896, and for mere party advantage we will say—but it is a fair thing to take in party warfare—to make these charges to prove that the people opposite, who claim to be righteous and perfect governors, are guilty of maladministration. Why should not the Premier of this country come to the support of those who make the charges, on their own reputation and responsibility, with a portion of the public funds, in order to enable them to prove the charges or enable the government to show that the charges were unwarranted, and thus get the advantage in this House and country. Let us go a little higher, let us take a higher view—and I think we are capable of taking that higher ground on this side as well as hon. gentlemen are on the other side. Suppose that it be conceded for a single moment by hon. gentlemen opposite that the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) is actuated by a desire to see that good government should be carried on in the Yukon, and that maladministration shall cease, and the interests of the public service and the fair name of Canada be advanced—grant for a moment that that could be the motive which is in the hearts of, and minds of the Liberal members, then we come before this House on higher ground, and on this higher ground and for this higher purpose, we ask that a competent board of jurisdiction be appointed in order that we may try those charges and purify the administration in the Yukon.

Why should they not have the right to do it? When hon. members are animated with a desire of that kind, speaking for the electorate of this country, what right have the government to step in and prevent them from securing an adjudication upon these matters from a competent commission of inquiry. Granted—whether the acting Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sutherland), can or cannot believe it—that we are acting here from a sincere, though you may say a mistaken belief, as to what should be done with reference to the public life of this country, and that we want to test these charges and prove them, if they have not been proven, and have them disproved, if they can be disproved—why, in the name of all that is good in government, should the administration refuse to use a little of the people's money to carry out this investigation, and so enable us to perform our public duties? That is the plea I put, and I believe it is a fair plea, and one the people of this country will recognize. But for two years we have been trying to get a tribunal before which we could bring these charges, and so, from our point of view, do something to purify the public administration and the public service—trying, from our point of view, to clear from the fair name of Canada the foul blot that rests upon it by implication, if nothing more, on account of the administration of the Yukon. And two years have passed, and we have not been able to gain the paltry favour from this government, of a competent board of inquiry before which to take our charge and have them proven or disproven. I do not think that the government has treated the country right; I do not think they have done their duty to parliament; and I believe that amongst the electorate there will be a very large proportion who will agree with me on that score.

I do not wish to take up too much of the time of the House on this point, but I want to allude to the kind of side issue raised by the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson). He stood up in this House with all its intelligence—so much of it as is left—around him, and endeavoured to convince himself, first, and the members of this House afterwards, and the country, I suppose, if he could, that there was a charge preferred against an absent soldier, a commander in the Canadian forces, now doing battle in South Africa. How he laboured. How he raised his voice. How he thundered. And yet how hollow it all was to any one who sat back and thought for a moment of the circumstances of the case. He himself, when he ventured to read the proof he had—it is a pity he had not read it before he thundered—found that no charge was made in any form or manner against that absent commander of the Canadian militia in far distant Africa. But the hon. minister thought he was on the hustings, and that he could, for a moment, sway the popular mind by appealing to a prejudice of that kind. He forgot that he was a responsible minister amongst thinking men, and in a parliament which pretty well gauges that kind of effort. I venture the statement, and not for a moment will any one in this House attempt to deny it, that not in any single line or word, was there a charge, either by direct accusation or by imputation, against Colonel Steele. The hon. minister (Mr. Paterson), tried to fasten it upon members on this side of the House, in his large and generous way, that they swore to the truth of every statement made by Whitesides, by Seabrook, and by the others whose information was contributed to the House, the attention of the House being drawn to it.

Mr. BRITTON. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster), state whom hon. gentlemen opposite do charge in connection with the administration of the Yukon?

Mr. FOSTER. That is a fair question, and I will answer my hon. friend. We charge, first and foremost—and have from the first—the Minister of the Interior, as the responsible head of that department, for everything that has gone wrong in the administration of the Yukon. Is that constitutionally right?

Mr. BRITTON. It seems to me that the constitutional practice of this country is for the parliament of this country to determine whether the minister is acting right or not.

Mr. FOSTER. And it is exactly upon that ground that all these resolutions have been moved. The fallacy in the argument so often used, the fallacy in my hon. friend's (Mr. Britton's) implied statement is this: That we want a commission of inquiry in the Yukon, to try the minister. Nobody ever ventured to suggest that. Let us come down to common sense ground. When, in any charge that has been made in this House, have we asked that a commission of inquiry shall be instituted to try Mr. Clifford Sifton, and pronounce judgment upon him and punish him accordingly? Nowhere. All that we have asked—and I call my hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Britton) now to witness—is that a commission of inquiry should be appointed to investigate the facts of the alleged maladministration in the Yukon and report to this House; and when that report is received, we will try the minister. Is not that constitutional? There is no other way. But I would appeal again to the hon. gentleman from Kingston. Here we are, the members of this House. Granted—I suppose I shall have to ask it to be taken for granted—that we on this side have just a little sincerity and are in earnest in this matter; granted that we believe there has been maladministration in the Yukon, is it not clear that we are simply powerless to judge of that maladministration in quantity, in degree or in distribution? We could not appoint a commission here to adequately investigate the facts, because that commission would sit here, 3,000 miles away from the Yukon. The only way you can do is to send some delegated authority into the Yukon, hold your investigation there and report to this House. That is all we have ever asked. And how futile it is and how insincere it must be for any hon. gentleman to obstruct a motion of this kind on the ground that we ought not to try the minister by a commission of inquiry. No. This House is the competent and the only competent authority to try the minister, outside of any criminal or civil action against him. This House has authority to try the minister, but the House would be foolish to try him, without first getting information. And how shall we get the information? By affidavit from Mr. Walsh? By statement sent in from Mr. Carbeno? By having affidavits read in this House, with no opportunity for analysis or cross-questioning? The only way is by judicial inquiry and the reporting of the facts to this House. Why should we not have it? No man in this House has given attention to affairs in the Yukon, has followed events there, has talked with the people who have been there, lived there, and come out, without feeling that there has been much, in the Yukon, that was wrong. I will give you all the latitude that is right for distance, difficulty in government, and I am generous enough to make a large margin for small peccadillos and for negligence owing to these circumstances. But over and above all that, it is for the public weal, it is in the interest of good government, that we should look into these matters, have them inquired into by a competent authority and reported to this House, and then be in a position to pass our judgment upon the information thus gathered. No man free from party bias will dispute the correctness of that position. Now, why can't we have it? We have judges enough, we have money enough, we have time enough. Why can't we have an investigation and have the facts reported to this House? I do not think anything can be validly urged against an investigation except it be that the ministers have joined hands in a circle, and they stand as one phalanx against any attempt to make an investigation into the charges that have been made of maladministration in the Yukon.

Now, Sir, need I go back any further to refute the argument attempted to be made by the Minister of Customs, that when we prefer these charges we must become sponsors for every bit of information and prospective evidence that is given to us? Some gentleman, in speaking, said: Then if you do not know that they are true, and if you do not absolutely believe in them all, why do you come with them before parliament? Why, Sir, where would you get inquiry in the world if you went on that basis? You go on the reasonable basis of such statements and information as you may have been able to get, and after conning it over you come to the conclusion that there is a reasonable prospect that you can prove your case on that evidence. Then you go before your judge and your jury, and you do the best you can to sustain your case. If you gain it, justice is promoted; if you lose it, justice is equally promoted; and whether you gain or lose, much is done for the good name of Canada and for the service of Canada. But is it illogical and absurd to think that every bit of information must be vouched for, must be sworn to, must be known to be absolutely correct by the gentleman who brings it to the attention of the House.

Now, Sir, I do not know Mr. Catto, what gentleman in this House does? Does the acting Minister of the Interior know Mr. Catto? What right, then, has the acting Minister of the Interior to pronounce Mr. Catto, a man he does not know, whom he has never seen, and perhaps never heard of until to-day, a disreputable character, a lunatic and a crank? Does not that show a rather prejudiced mind? Is it not of a part with all that has been done by the ministry, who close their ears and close their eyes against any statement made with reference to their administration of the Yukon? But surely no reasonable man will get up in this House and declare that a man whom he does not know, concerning whom he has no information, must forthwith be a lunatic, a disreputable character and a crank, because he writes a letter giving his experience of a year and a half in that district. Mr. Catto tells you who he is. He is a surgeon of the University of Edinburgh, he is widely known, he says, in Great Britain. He gives a reference which is of the highest, and he writes a letter. You may say that some parts of that letter have extreme statements, but that is not a letter written by a lunatic or a crank. I want to say this to the House, that many of the statements made in this letter are in perfect consonance with statements that have been made to me by gentlemen whom I believe, who had lived in the Yukon, and who have talked with me with reference to the way matters have been carried on there. Now, let the Minister of Marine and Fisheries take his pen, and dip it in ink and write down this query: Why does he not tell the name? Well, and when I tell the name what good will it do? I am told that the man is a lunatic, a disreputable character and a tramp. When the name is not told, they are aggrieved; when the name is told, they are indignant because you bring such disreputable men to give information.

Now, let us for a moment be reasonable, let us go over the points that I have mentioned to-night, and let each member of this House call them to mind and say whether we have made out a fair case for an inquiry. Now, I want to say this one word to the government, that things are going on within the domain of the Yukon government, under the sanction of an irresponsible council made up of paid officers appointed by this government and from the responsibility of whose acts the government cannot for one moment disassociate themselves—which, if they were known to the people of this country, would bring a blush of shame to every household in the land. Now, I make that statement upon what I have heard personally from men who have lived in the Yukon, who have told me those things, and I make it as corroborated by the statements which are sent down here from the Yukon itself in the moneys collected, the revenues which are used by that irresponsible council in the Yukon. It is not a nice subject to talk about, but it is a fact to-day which burns itself into the mind of any man who gives attention to these things, that the Yukon council, in this expenditure of $250,000 which they are making totally irresponsible to any one, which they are making during this year, are gathering most of that money from vice and from the liquor traffic, both of them in their most awful and most repulsive forms.

The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries ventured the opinion in reference to it that this government must not accept so much responsibility. Talk about fines as much as you like. There are fines and fines, and there are fines which are simply the authorised official license for what is carried on in the places that are fined. I make the statement to-night from the information that I have that the system of fines, so-called in the Yukon, on these two things does not embody fines which are to suppress the malefactor, or to suppress the vice, but it embodies fines which give the official sanction of the Yukon council to all the gambling and all the vice that are carried on under the public protection of that council. Now, Sir this is somewhat serious. The hon. Minister of the Interior can get up and say: I am not responsible for that. How? Why not? The hon. Minister of the Interior at one time said: I will not issue any permits, and he can go out to the country and say: Not a dollar's worth of liquor goes into the Yukon under my permit, but, he can write to Mr. Commissioner, he can give him the sole issuing of permits, and when any one applies to Mr. Sifton here, Mr. Sifton can write him a letter and say: I have handed that all over to the commissioner in the Yukon: apply to him and get your permit. That is what was actually done. The hon. Minister of the Interior can say: I am not responsible for what you would call simply fines, but which act in the way of an official approbation of what is carried on under them. I have nothing to do with them. This is done by my paid officials up there constituted into the council. But, the hon. Minister of the Interior and this government are actually responsible. Who else is responsible? By a contrivance of that kind shall the minister and the government escape their responsibility? I trow not, and I do not think that the people of this country, and I do not think the parliament of this country will consent to any doctrine of that kind. Now, Sir, put on your investigation if you dare. Put on your judges, let them go into the Yukon, let them investigate all the charges, and I am prepared to say, from the knowledge I have, that their report will somewhat astonish the hon. gentlemen sitting on the front benches in reference to just these three things and these three things alone—drinking, gambling and vice.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) has appealed to me a number of times.

Mr. FOSTER. I hope you will be reasonable.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not object to the appeal by any manner of means to express my opinion upon certain phases of his argument, and I may say here to the House that I rise with the greatest confidence on this occasion to answer the challenges which the hon. gentleman has from time to time made. I did feel a very great degree of pain and sorrow this afternoon at the painful spectacle which was exhibited by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Bell) when he had to read a statement of the most extraordinary character, which he evidently had not mastered, and for which he was not prepared to take the responsibility. The hon. gentleman who read that statement this afternoon evidently read it without a previous knowledge of what its contents were, and he had the prudence, for which I had to admire him, to take care that in no way, or sense, parliamentary or legal, did he commit his good name or good fame to any statement in that resolution. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Foster) has asked with a great deal of oratorical warmth if the government are prepared, in the face of these charges, to grant an investigation. Sir, there is no hon. member in this House who knows better than the hon. gentleman that there has been no parliamentary charge made, that the resolution has been purposely and carefully drawn so as to avoid making any parliamentary charge. I listened to the reading of the resolution by the hon. member for Pictou, and I noticed the absence of those words which heretofore have always been considered necessary when a charge is preferred by an hon. member on his responsibility in this House. For fear my ears had deceived me I insisted upon that resolution being read a second time by the Speaker, and then I took the resolution myself and read it over carefully. I wanted to find out whether it contained two things. I wanted to find out in the first place if there was a member of this House who assumed the responsibility for making one statement in that resolution. I wanted to see if the phrase, the formula which has been crystallised now and well understood that: So and So on his responsibility, makes the following statement was in the resolution. That was absent, and there was more than that absent. There was absent that without which no charge is worth a rap, that the hon. member making it believes upon his honour, as a member of this House, that if he is granted a committee he will be able to prove the statement that he makes. Is there an hon. member on that side of the House who is prepared to take the responsibility of saying either that he believes these charges to be true or that he believes, if he is granted a committee, he will be able to prove them? Not one. The hon. senior member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), who drafted the resolution went away to British Columbia without moving it in the House, and left it to his junior colleague. He did not take the responsibility. Whether these statements were in it originally or whether they were cut out there was not a word, when the hon. junior member for Pictou (Mr. Bell) moved the resolution, stating that he believed one word in it or that if the committee which he asked for was granted he believed he could prove one single statement in the resolution. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) talks about parliamentary precedent. I remember when he was, if not the leader of this House, some years ago, at any rate, the Finance Minister, and a leading member of the Conservative party. I remember when the present Judge Lister brought his charges against the then Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Haggart) in connection with section b, which hon. members who were here ten, twelve, or thirteen years ago, will remember when the hon. gentleman, not only brought his charges and brought them on his responsibility as a member of the House, but stated that he believed if he was granted a committee, he would prove their truth, the first man to rise up and refuse a committee was the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Foster). When the late Speaker, Sir James Edgar, preferred his charges against the hon. ex-Postmaster General, now the member for Three Rivers (Sir Adolphe Caron), and stated his charges seriatim, not stating a lot of hearsay, but stating the conclusions which he drew and which he said he could prove if granted a committee, the first man to get on his feet to refuse a committee was the hon. gentleman. He comes here to-night, Sir, with a long list of statements, to not one of which he dares to commit himself; for not one of which he dares to become responsible, and he eliminates from the resolution the one cardinal statement which is absolutely essential, namely: That he believes he can prove this to be true if he is granted a commission.

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. FOSTER. Suppose these words were added, would a judicial committee be granted?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Then, my comment to the extent I have made it, would be unnecessary, but it would not alter the fact that my hon. friend voted down the resolutions I refer to. What is the use of asking what I would do if the words were there? They are not there. They carefully abstained from putting them there. The merest tyro in parliamentary constitutional law knows the form to be adopted in such resolutions, but the essential words to which I refer were carefully eliminated and eliminated for a purpose. What have we in this resolution now before the House? We have, first, three or four pages of a rehash of what the writer believes to be constitutional law, referring to precedents of Great Britain, to resolutions moved by Lord Randolph Churchill, and to something about the board of works. The first five pages of the resolution is a brief which the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) intended to speak to when he addressed the House. He then goes on, not to make charges on his responsibility, but to make certain statements with reference to Major Walsh, and with reference to other old matters which occurred some years ago in the Yukon. Up to that point I may remark that every one of these statements has been already investigated. When my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) asks across the floor of the House with all the fervor which he assumed tonight: Why does not the government grant an investigation; I tell him that so far as three-fourths of this resolution is concerned the investigation has been held, and the member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) read from the report this afternoon. With two or three hundred pages of evidence before these gentlemen opposite, have they dared to arraign the Minister of the Interior, or this government, or any member of this government on that sworn testimony. Where is the charge against us? Where is the resolution saying that under this evidence we have been guilty of malfeasance or wrong-doing. They had a commission; that commission took evidence; that evidence has been in the hands of gentlemen opposite for over twelve months, and they have not dared to formulate a resolution of condemnation against us founded on any part of that evidence. They say they want a judicial inquiry. What is the matter with the inquiry made by Mr. Ogilvie? Was there a man in this country of experience; was there a newspaper of standing that did not come forward to add its testimony to the fitness of the appointment when Mr. Ogilvie was selected. Was there not a perfect chorus of approval throughout the country when Ogilvie was appointed, that we had got the right man in the right place? And why was that? It was because Mr. Ogilvie had been for ten or twelve years mixed up with these miners; he was one of themselves, he knew their habits and customs, he was conversant with the way in which they liked to give evidence; he knew how to get at the facts from them better than a judge could, and I say that his appointment was not only approved of by friends of the government, but it received the stamp of approval from every newspaper and public man in this country. Mr. Ogilvie held his court. Did he establish cast-iron rules of evidence, which prevented the truth from being obtained? No. On the contrary he said: I will not bind myself by these strict rules of law which judges in the court are bound by; I will not refuse even hearsay evidence; my object is to get at the truth in whatever way I can, and therefore, I will give extra latitude to those who come before me; I will invite them to give the names of the witnesses, and I will give them blank forms and fill up summonses for all whom they seek to have before this commission. I will sit die in diem, or I will adjourn to suit the convenience of these men.

Mr. DAVIN. Could he pay them if they came from a distance?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) read this afternoon the statement that Mr. Ogilvie was not aware whether he had that power but that he would report the facts to the government at Ottawa, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) knows very well that there was not much pay required, as I will prove from the circumstances of the case. I call the attention of the House and the country to one or two significant facts. Why was that commission appointed in September, 1898? It was appointed because a large number of miners had formulated a memorial to the government making certain charges against the officials in the Yukon. That memorial was dated the 25th of August, received by the government on the 10th September, and on the 13th or 14th of September the order in council passed appointing the royal commission. Not an hour was lost. That royal commission was appointed to inquire into the charges which had been formulated in the petition to the government, dated the 25th of August. Complaint is made now that we did not enlarge that commission to inquire into charges which might be preferred subsequent to the issue of the commission. I believe that when we issued the commission of inquiry into the allegations made by the complainants we were doing all that was required. We never dreamt, nor was it asked of us to give a commission of inquiry into future charges. I say here that the scope of that commission was all that any honest man could desire, because it embraced every charge direct or indirect which had been made to the government by the miners of the Yukon. Turn if you will to the plain unvarnished report made by Mr. Ogilvie as the result of the holding of that commission. He sent 300 pages of the testimony of witnesses, taken under oath, and I will trouble the House, to listen to his report as to the manner in which the inquiry was held:

The charges against the officials in the Yukon territory led you, sir, to issue a royal commission to myself to conduct an investigation as to the truth or falsity of these charges.

Intimation of such appointment was conveyed to me through a private source by the last incoming mail before winter set in last year, but I did not receive official intimation of it for some months after, and the delay of the arrival of the commission itself, and, further, of the arrival of the legal adviser, prevented any action in that direction until the month of February.

As soon as I possibly could, I held a sitting in the court-house at Dawson. This was intended to be simply a preliminary meeting for the purpose of arranging with the public how and where the business should be conducted. This sitting passed off very quietly and agreeably. The public were invited to present any views they might see fit at this meeting. I stated particularly that my one desire in connection with this investigation was to have such a complete and full examination that there would be no reason for any discussion after its labours were concluded, and I invited all those present to make any charges or to give the names of any witnesses they had any reason to suppose would be able to give any information of importance.

Notices were printed calling on the public generally to submit charges and furnish names of witnesses in support of their charges. Every aid was offered and it was guaranteed to any one who might wish to submit any charge, that the investigation would be as full and complete as possible.

The papers of Dawson discussed the matter pretty fully and invited the public to respond to the invitations sent out. The 'Nugget' especially called on all those who had any statements to make or evidence to offer, to 'come forth and do it, or for ever after hold their peace.'

It touched at considerable length on the importance of the investigation and the serious nature of the charges which had been made; and invited the public most earnestly to attend to the matter at once.

The editor of the 'Nugget' (Mr. George) saw me once or twice, and I offered that gentleman every aid in my power to have the investigation made as full and conclusive as possible. He was furnished with blank summonses signed by myself, in which he could fill the name of any witness he saw fit; all I asked him to do was to acquaint me with the name of the witnesses, the charge in connection with which they were summoned, and the date when they were expected to reach Dawson. I offered the same privilege to any one who might wish to act in the same way.

The first sitting of the investigation was held in the court-house in Dawson, on February 22, and continued from time to time until all the charges which had been submitted were disposed of.

The sittings were then adjourned until the arrival of Messrs. Waite, McGregor and Norwood, whose names had been brought in as guilty of malfeasance.

They arrived in the month of April, and another sitting of the commission was held soon after their arrival.

The evidence submitted at these sittings and my report thereon have long ere this been printed, and I simply wish to put myself on record here as showing that my one desire, and I am quite sure the desire of the other officials in connection with the investigation, was to have the truth established. To this end, every possible facility was offered complainants. They had the fullest and freest opportunity of examining all the witnesses; and, after I had examined them myself, I would invite any one in the court-room to ask the witnesses any questions they might see fit, deeming it expedient that the public generally should have the opportunity of asking such questions. On a few occasions this request was responded to and a few questions asked; but, generally, the witness was examined by the party who summoned him and myself, the public seeming to take no other interest in it than attending and occasionally laughing at the expense of the witnesses and at the questions asked by some of the complainants, whose object, it appeared to me, from many questions asked, was to play to the galleries and attract a little public attention. During the course of the proceedings, the utmost latitude was allowed every one, and I think I can say without fear of successful contradiction that, in an ordinary court of law no such procedure as was allowed in this case would obtain for one second. I was remonstrated with by several, in regard to the latitude I allowed complainants, but my reply was that it was better to do this than appear as restraining the course of justice. As these people, I was fully impressed, had made statements which they could not substantiate, I felt it incumbent on me to allow them as much liberty as possible, in order that they might convict themselves. This, I might say, proved to be the case; but instead of placing the blame where it properly belonged, many of them still persisted in stating that the charges were true, and, in discussing it, took a very one-sided view of the evidence presented, drawing from it conclusions which they were certainly not warranted in doing. My belief now is that the sittings of the commission were rather a disappointment to those who asked for it. It swept from under them their vantage ground, that is, the possibility of being able to make statements which they did not expect to be called upon to prove.

In order to get out of this they took advantage of what is termed the limitation of commission; that is, no charge made after August 25 could be entertained. As has been stated in my report, submitted along with the evidence, I induced the complainants to take up one charge made after that date, that is, the Kelly-Miner case. Of course, oaths could not be administered to the witnesses in this case, but they agreed that they would make a statutory declaration to their evidence. This was done in one or two instances, but to have done it in every case would involve so much delay that it was deemed desirable to abandon it and send the evidence out as it was.

From the evidence submitted, I think any unprejudiced person would consider that the charges made against Mr. Fawcett on this occasion totally failed.

References have been made to the farcical nature of this investigation by the newspapers here and others; I readily admit the charge; it certainly was farcical, but not in the way they put the term; it was farcical in this, that it utterly failed to show any ground for the accusations made, more than common rumour; and that, I regret to say, is entirely irresponsible in Dawson, perhaps more so than elsewhere.

Considered from a proper and honourable standpoint, the investigation certainly resulted farcically; but the term 'farcical' does not apply to the honest endeavours of the officials connected with it to have it conducted properly and have it as conclusive and reliable as possible, under the conditions.

Now, Sir, I have read every word of the report made by Mr. Ogilvie as to the manner in which that inquiry was held, and I am within the judgment of this House, when I say that if a scintilla of wrong-doing has been proved in that great book of evidence which has been brought here, it is the duty of hon. gentlemen opposite to bring it forward or for ever hold their peace. If these gentlemen cannot prove from these pages any of the charges, then they have a right to come forward and say that the limitation of August 26, prevented the investigation of charges arising after that date which they now formulate; and I, as a member of the government, tell them that if they formulate any charge or series of charges, regarding matters that occurred after August 26, which have not been investigated, a Royal Commission will be issued, and those charges will be probed to the bottom, and the truth established, no matter what it costs. We gave that pledge last year, and we repeat it now. But we will not allow these gentlemen to make wild, declamatory charges in the House which have no evidence to justify them, and then, playing to the galleries, to submit a resolution which they have not the pluck or the courage to say they will assume the responsibility for.

Now, Sir, we have heard read in this House, a letter which my hon. friend the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) designated as obscene and scurrilous. Sir, I wonder if that letter went through the post office, if it could not be stopped by the Postmaster General as an obscene and scurrilous communication. It is not the kind of letter that should find a place on the records of this parliament. It is a disgraceful effusion—disgraceful to the man who wrote it, as it would be to the gentleman who moved it, if he knew what was in it, which I doubt very much. This man, they say, is an M. D., and was a resident of Dawson all along. Does his name appear among those who came before Mr. Ogilvie and made a charge? His name is not in the record. Did he dare to go before Mr. Ogilvie, and on his oath, attempt to prove one single statement he has made in that letter? He did not; and I ask sensible, honest, honourable men opposite me, what weight can they attach to the effusion of a man who is termed a madman, and who had the opportunity to go before the court, established by the Royal Commission, and make his charges, but skulked behind the doors of his office, and did not say a word about them? I say it is disgraceful that a man should shirk the responsibility of making his charges on oath, and should then make scurrilous statements in a letter which not a member of parliament dares to take the responsibility of. There are charges made here which were not made before Mr. Ogilvie. What are those charges? It does not require one moment of my time to refer to them, because they have been criticised and thoroughly dissected by my hon. friend the Minister of Customs. The charges are that two trusted officers of the government, Inspector Strickland and Inspector Cartwright, were guilty of malfeasance in office, when in charge of the custom-house at the Summit—and that these men were in a conspiracy with their subordinates to rob the public exchequer of this country—that men whose characters hitherto have been above reproach or suspicion, became petty sneak thieves, who were not above taking a five-dollar note or a ten-dollar note for robbing the government which they were sworn to serve. That is the charge made here. Is there a man who believes it to-night? Why we had here produced in this House—fortunately we had it at hand—the investigation made by Colonel Steele, their superior officer in charge, and he pronounced that every charge embodied in this resolution is a malicious falsehood, and yet these charges which Colonel Steele declared to be false, after a full investigation into them, are going to be voted on as prima facie proof by every hon. member who supports this resolution.

Mr. DAVIN. Not at all.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. How dare my hon. friend attempt to shirk the responsibility of the vote he is going to give. I will read the charges from page 21 and we will see, after this letter is read in connection with this investigation and report of Col. Steele, which has been laid on the Table, how many men are prepared to get up and say that Col. Steele has lied in his report and that these men are thieves and scoundrels. Here is the report of Col. Steele. Whiteside is the man to whom my hon. friend gave a certificate of character.

Mr. PRIOR. What are his initials?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not know, he is called Mr. Whiteside. This is what he said:

I was, as you are aware, sent by Collector Milne to Skagway as a Canadian bureau of information to aid intending prospectors to pass through the American customs. How I performed that work I leave others to tell you, but I might say that one American gentleman from Dawson told me on his return that I was the first official he met who was honest, and afterwards when I was in Dawson, he told me I could not make money in consequence. Concerning the collection of duties at the summit of White Pass I was sent there by Col. Steele after I had reported to Collector Milne in detail. I found that state of affairs just as I had reported there, and in consequence of doing my duty as a customs officer I was treated as a spy by the officers in charge. This latter fact was written by the officer commanding the post to Col. Steele who told me of it. The inspectors were Inspectors Cartwright and Strickland.

Mr. PRIOR. I do not care who they were.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman may not care, but the parents and the wives and relatives and friends of Inspector Strickland and Inspector Cartwright care for their good name and fame and credit which never yet was attacked. Never yet in this House or country has any one dared to cast a slur on any member of Sir Richard Cartwright's family. So far as we are concerned, we do not require Col. Steele's report to know that the statements of Whiteside were lies, because the mere fact that he made this charge against Inspector Cartwright was sufficient to convince us that the man was a liar.

Mr. PRIOR. He is no more a liar than the hon. gentleman.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES—(reading).

I found the state of affairs there just as I had reported, and in consequence of doing my duty as customs officer I was treated as a spy by the officers in charge. This latter fact was written by the officer commanding the post to Col. Steele, who told me of it. I numbered the entries and entered up the cash book which was not done before. The book is now in Ottawa. There were two items entered up twice in the cash book and yet the cash balanced.

And a query is put.

Mr. PRIOR. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman endorses it.

Mr. PRIOR. Hear, hear. I do, I know Mr. Whiteside.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman endorses this falsehood.

Mr. MAXWELL. I know Whiteside to be absolutely unreliable.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. An hon. gentleman sitting in this House, as a colleague of my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce, says he believes that his son was guilty of stealing and falsifying the accounts. That is what Whiteside says, and I have no hesitation in pronouncing that statement to be as infernal a lie as ever emanated from any source. No man bearing the honoured name of Cartwright was ever a thief or a liar. I feel sorry for the hon. gentleman to-night, and I am confident that he will not find a man on that side of the House, and certainly not in the province of Ontario, who will back up his libel against the Cartwright family.

I was never allowed to check the cash. I asked twice but was refused, the second I refused to alter, but it was manipulated at night by the officers commanding and his sergeant who lived in the hut.

Here we have charges of thievery and manipulation and falsification of accounts, which, Col. Steele says, are pure falsehoods from beginning to end, and yet there is one man in the opposition who has the hardihood to stand up and say that he believes in these charges, in spite of the records of Inspectors Strickland and Cartwright, in the face of their past history, and in spite of the investigation and the report of Col. Steele—in spite of all this, we have an hon. member on the opposition benches declaring his belief that Whiteside's lies are true and that these men, against whom he makes his charges, are infamous scoundrels. I am glad that this debate has taken place. I am glad that we have a distinct issue which hon. gentlemen opposite will have to meet. They cannot escape that issue now, and I have still faith that the manly instincts of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) will prevent him from following the hon. member for Victoria into the lobby and endorsing the charges of this man Whiteside. Will that hon. gentleman brand Inspector Strickland and Inspector Cartwright as thieves and falsifiers of accounts? Will he say that Col. Steele made a false report? Is he ready to denounce and to destroy the character of any man in the community if he can thereby gain a paltry party advantage. If that be the case, things have come to a dreadful pass.

Mr. PRIOR. They have.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am glad to-night, deplorable as the spectacle is, the hon. member for Victoria, stands there alone, and I am sure that the morning's reflection will convince him that he has made the mistake of his life when he endorsed these charges, pronounced by Col. Steele to be a tissue of lies, and has taken a step which he will regret to the last day of his life.

We did not know what the meaning of this was. We asked the hon. member who preferred the charge who was the Col. Steele referred to, and he told us he did not know, that there might have been ten or twenty Col. Steeles for all he knew. But the hon. member for Victoria knows. He knows that Col. Steele is the commander of the Strathcona Horse now in South Africa, and he knows the meaning of it all. He knows who the man that made the charge was, and he alone endorses it, and he calls on his friends to rally around him and endorse it, and I will be curious to see how many will follow him into the lobby.

We had another charge made the other day. We had the charge made that there was something wrong in the dealings of the officials with Mr. McDonald, the lessee of the Dawson water front. That matter was discussed the other night by my hon. friend from Guysborough, but since then we have had the acting Minister of the Interior coming in here—with what? With the report of an independent commissioner appointed by the Auditor General, over whom the government have no control at all, and that investigator reports that he has investigated—

Mr. CLANCY. No, no.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman must have been asleep.

Mr. CLANCY. I was awake.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Did he hear the hon. member read the report?

Mr. CLANCY. I heard it all and the whole House heard it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman is so eager to jump to a conclusion that he will not wait until I have finished my sentence. We have a report from the man sent by the Auditor General, that he investigated the affidavits accompanying the payments of royalty, and he found that the payments of royalty and the affidavits tallied in every case, and that the same course was pursued with reference to Mr. McDonald as was followed in the case of everybody else. He reported that the amount was correct to the dollar. I would insult the intelligence of the House by reading the report the second time. It is there on the records. This is one of the old charges and this report of Col. Steele's deals with a new charge.

The only charge we have not investigated before is this charge about the liquor dealers and prostitutes in Dawson City. It is not a savoury subject to deal with, and I do not propose to deal with it at length. The hon. member for York made, at any rate, the oral charge, although it is not in the formal resolution, that a large portion of the revenue of Dawson City are derived from the fees in these matters. Why, the hon. gentleman knows well that if ever there was a remorseless prosecutor of these people, it is the man who today administers affairs in the Yukon. Why is there a large sum of money in the exchequer of Dawson City? Because these people have been remorselessly fined, because every violation of the law brought down the penalty of the law. If the exchequer there is full of money from this source, it is because the officials of the government were obeying the law, and fining the people who were disobeying the law. I would ask the hon. gentleman what fault he finds with that? Does he desire that Mr. Ogilvie should let these people go, that the law which says they shall be punished shall be evaded, or its violation winked at? If Mr. Ogilvie had refused to put the law in motion and had not exacted the fines, I could understand my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) holding the government responsible for vice stalking abroad in that city. But, if, on the contrary, as the facts show, Mr. Ogilvie has prosecuted and almost persecuted these liquor men and these women from day to day, from week to week, and from month to month, and filled the treasury with the fines he has imposed upon them, I ask why do hon. gentlemen complain? Sir, I remember when the acting Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sutherland) was speaking, he referred to one of these charges made by this man Catto, namely, that some order had been given to one of the officials there to the effect that these women should be countenanced by the officers of the law. What was the conduct of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton)? Did he accept it quietly and take no action? No, Sir. As quickly as the telegraph could flash an order, he directed that they should cease countenancing vice, and that order was obeyed. He did not wait to consult his colleagues in the government; he knew one and all they would be with him. He flashed his order by wire, and that order was obeyed, and, so far as vice was concerned, it was dissociated from the government and the officers of the government. As a member of the government, I challenge hon. gentlemen opposite to say in plain language, that either the Minister of the Interior or any member of the government in any way countenanced vice or improper practices. If they cannot do that, let them hold their peace. Hon. gentlemen evidently think these light charges to prefer against a government. We do not so regard them. The men in this government hold their character above everything else in this world; and, thank God, so far, they have been able to maintain them. But if hon. gentlemen opposite have a charge to make against us, we are ready; let them make their charge and in five minutes they shall have their committee of investigation. But let them not go through the farce of throwing on the Table of this House a series of letters, which they will not take the responsibility for, and which they will not dare to say they can prove if a committee is granted.

The other charge was dealt with by my hon. friend from Ottawa (Mr. Belcourt), and no further word from me is required on that subject. I have followed, as far as I could, the remarks of the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster), and I have but a word or two more to say. I would call the attention of the House and the country to the fact that while an attempt was made in these letters placed before the House, to blacken the character of men who had hitherto stood high in the opinion of their fellow countrymen, the moment they sent here sworn affidavits to meet these charges, every desire was manifested by hon. gentlemen opposite to prevent them being read. It was all right that foul, infamous charges should be made upon the floor of this House against Major Walsh and other men, and placed upon the records of the House; but, when Major Walsh said: Give me a chance to say whether the charge is true or not, for one hour hon. gentlemen fought against it, contending that not a word should be said in reply to the charge. We do not decline the responsibility for the action of the municipal body in the Yukon. We say that when they had powers granted them by parliament, we were responsible for the way in which they exercised those powers, because the men were appointed by us. And we say that more than once, when they unwisely exercised the power given them, and attempted to grant permits improvidently, we cancelled the permits they had granted, and withdrew the power from them. My hon. friend (Mr. Sifton), who is not here now, but who will be here in a day or two, has watched closely and critically the actions of this municipal body, for which he is responsible; and whenever he has known them to go astray, he has checked them. He is a man who rules. He rules because he is a man with a strong mind and a firm hand. Attempts are now made to blacken his character in his absence. But there is not a man who stands higher in the regard and the affection of his colleagues than does Mr. Sifton. I have been as closely, if not more closely, associated with him in the administration of his department, than any other of his colleagues, and I can say, in his absence, what I would not say if he were here—that a truer and better friend does not live, and I am sure an honest man does not live. I have consulted with him day after day on many matters, including these fractions of mining claims, concerning which charges were made. I knew of hundreds, and even thousands, I may say, of applications that came pouring in to him from people all over the country, from people who thought they could get a pull or a cinch, or gain some favour in some way, in regard to these fractions. But he was firm; he was inexorable. In not one single instance did he deviate from the path of honour. He acted, as I knew he would act, faithfully to his country, faithfully to his Queen, and faithfully to his colleagues.

Mr. JAMES CLANCY (Bothwell). I do not expect to detain the House more than a few minutes, and during those few minutes, I shall not imitate the example of the hon. minister (Sir Louis Davies), who has just taken his seat. I do not think that an hon. gentleman with a good case need show so much heat. But the energy of the hon. gentleman was in proportion to his want of logic, and was evidently intended to draw attention from the actual case, as it was put here to-night. There might be some excuse for some hon. gentleman in this House making such an exhibition of themselves as the hon. minister made of himself to-night. But he is a gentleman of high standing, and a good lawyer, an old parliamentarian, there was no need for any exhibition on his part.

Mr. Speaker, I regret that the noise is so great that I fear I cannot make myself understood. I can say that in the short time I have been in this House, I have never shown discourtesy to any member; I have not been one to interrupt or make undue noise. I do not know whether they select me particularly for attentions of this kind, but I can say this conduct does not become those who are guilty of it. I am only going to occupy the time for a few moments to direct attention to what the hon. minister has said. The very first thing he said to-night, was that these charges were not made in a parliamentary manner. Now if the hon. gentleman is going to be a stickler for form, does he really say that it is sufficient reason for denying the investigation, that the charges were not brought in proper form?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman has quite misapprehended my argument. It was not that the matter of form was wanting, it was that the matter of substance was wanting.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman said more than that, he said that the charge was not put in parliamentary form. Now he says there was no substance. Does he mean to say and to repeat that the charges were not made in the most specific manner?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes, I say they are not made in a specific manner at all. I say that the parliamentary rule is that anybody making a charge must state that he makes it on his responsibility as a member, either believing it to be true, or that if granted a committee he believes he would be able to prove it. Both these essentials are wanting in this resolution.

Mr. CLANCY. In substance those essentials are both present in the resolution. If the hon. gentleman is prepared to lay down one rule for this side of the House and adopt another rule for himself, then he is quite right. What was the ground work upon which these charges were made? They were made according to a procedure followed and sanctioned by the hon. gentleman who is endeavouring to explain it away just now; they were based upon action taken by the very gentleman whose conduct is under criticism, namely, the Minister of the Interior. Before he became Minister of the Interior he was granted all the means of having an investigation in Manitoba. The hon. member for Pictou has declared in the most unmistakable manner that if he is granted similar means he will undertake to prove the very charge that is being made. The hon. gentleman says: Give us the names, you must be able to state in advance the particular persons and the particular charges in detail, you must prove your case in advance. Now, I put this question to the hon. gentlemen opposite: Are you going to lay down one rule for Mr. Clifford Sifton before he became a member of this House to investigate charges, and to lay down another rule in a similar case after he has become a member of this government? In the Manitoba case one rule was meted out to him, and to-day a different rule is meted out to the hon. member for Pictou, and to the hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. No hon. member on the opposite side has dared to rise and put the two cases side by side and say that there should not be given the same means in the one case as in the other.

Mr. MAXWELL. Did the senior member for Pictou approve of what the Minister of the Interior did in that case?

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman thinks now it will be necessary to approve of that course. If the hon. gentlemen carried it out and approved of it themselves, they are bound by their own action. It matters not what we have thought on this side of the House. Nothing could be more idle than for the hon. gentleman to ask a question of that kind—do we approve of it.

Mr. MAXWELL. You did not approve of it, though.

Mr. CLANCY. It is not necessary I should offer an opinion one way or another. But the hon. gentleman had power to act and did act in the one case, and they failed to act in the other case. Now, the hon. gentleman made an argument upon the Lister charges and he sat down without saying that Mr. Lister had had an investigation.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman is mistaken, the resolution was voted down.

Mr. CLANCY. Then it was the Edgar case I had in my mind. I venture to say that the hon. gentleman was loud in his protests against that. If the hon. gentleman spoke from the bottom of his heart, if he believed he was right then, is he right now? Is not that a fair question? The hon. gentleman cannot be right in both of them.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes, because an investigation was granted, a royal commission was issued.

Mr. CLANCY. No royal commission has been issued in the sense asked for at all. I am sure hon. gentlemen on this side of the House need not fear to have what the hon. gentleman read from that report go to the country. I ask him if that is a dignified report. Is it creditable to any hon. gentleman? The hon. gentleman made another statement here to-night, that Mr. Ogilvie's appointment was heralded with gratification from one end of the country to the other, in every newspaper. Was it heralded because he was appointed for that particular purpose or for other purposes? Was Mr. Ogilvie's appointment approved of by the newspapers because he was appointed for holding that investigation on a royal commission, or was the appointment approved of for other reasons? I ask the hon. gentleman that question, because he made his argument upon it. He gave the House to understand that after Mr. Ogilvie had been appointed to investigate, the newspapers from one end of the country to the other approved of his appointment. I think the hon. gentleman did violence to his memory, for I never heard of a newspaper that approved of such a thing.

Mr. MAXWELL. The leader of the opposition was the first man in this country to recommend that Mr. Ogilvie should be appointed as commissioner in the Yukon territory.

Mr. CLANCY. That is just what I wanted to draw attention to, that the newspapers approved of Mr. Ogilvie's appointment as commissioner to the Yukon territory and not for the purpose of holding an investigation. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries declared, or gave us to understand, that the newspapers from one end of the country to the other applauded the appointment of Mr. Ogilvie for a single purpose, for the purpose of holding that investigation. I have no hesitation in saying from the statements of the hon. gentleman himself and from what he has read from the reports, that Mr. Ogilvie did hold a farcical investigation.

Now, what was done there? He said that these witnesses are irresponsible persons. Let the hon. gentleman investigate and see whether they are irresponsible or not. What do we do to punish crime in this country? How far do we go under the law to punish crime? We take people out of the jail and the prisons of the country, we take prisoners into court, those who have confessed themselves to be guilty of crime, and men's liberties have been imperilled by taking these very persons in the province of Ontario to prove the guilt of people accused of crime. Is that not an answer to the hon. gentleman who, when a serious charge is made, takes the ground that we should not employ the ordinary means of investigation. It is an easy thing to stand up in this House and discredit people. I do not know whether these people have good characters or not, but when a serious charge is made it is not fair-play to say that those who have made these statements are unreliable persons. That will be proved afterwards. It is a serious thing that an hon. gentleman should get up in this House and cast an imputation of that kind upon a man's character. What did Mr. Ogilvie do? Did he put the law in motion? No, but he said: I am going to hold an investigation at which people who desire to give evidence may do so. I would like to know how much crime could be punished, in the city of Ottawa, for instance, if the judges or magistrates were to give notice that they were going to investigate any charges brought forward. No crime would be punished. We have no evidence that he put the law in motion or that there were any independent officers appointed to search out crime in that country. A more bald and idle proposition was never made in any country in the world. There were no law officers to put the law in motion. Mr. Ogilvie was the officer who should have put the law in motion. It was a most farcical investigation from start to finish, and that Mr. Ogilvie found everybody innocent was the most natural thing under the circumstances. That he should find that there was not a single charge proved was what everybody expected. Hon. gentlemen opposite took good care not to instruct Mr. Ogilvie that the witnesses should be paid. If they were anxious to ferret out crime they would have exhausted every means of searching out crime in that country. No such provision was made because hon. gentlemen opposite did not want crime to come out. Nothing could be plainer than that, and that was the natural thing to expect. Now, I promised that I would not detain the House, and I am just going to say that I do not think the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries did himself justice when he was trading upon the character of a very estimable gentleman's family in this House. I did not think he did the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) very much good. I do not think he paid him a very high compliment. If his family is innocent, and I do not charge any guilt against it, I say the greatest justice he could do to the hon. gentleman's family would be to grant this investigation.

THE MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Has there not been an investigation?

Mr. CLANCY. There is no man in Canada to-day who can disregard public opinion and declare that his family is pure and innocent. There has been no attack made on the family of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce. If there have been any insinuations made against the hon. gentleman's family they were made by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries. It was in bad taste and wholly unnecessary and did not bear at all upon the case. The case is that Mr. Whiteside is sent up there. He declares: I went up there on instructions from the collector at Victoria. Then, he went to Col. Steele, and Col. Steele sent him on a mission. The hon. gentleman has said that a charge has been made against Col. Steele. No charge has been made against Col. Steele. Mr. Whiteside says: I went to certain places, and I was treated as a spy there. What proof is there that he was not treated as a spy; they may have thought that he was an interloper or a dangerous man. Whether they treated him as that or otherwise, does that indicate that he was not an honest man? I do not know whether the charge which has been made is well founded or not against this gentleman, but the hon. gentleman cannot disregard public opinion and he cannot forego the demand for a searching investigation. What is their position? Nothing short of saying to the public that the charges must be all proved before an investigation will be granted. That is the same as saying that you want a man to prove a negative position. It is no negative position. While the hon. gentleman boasts that they had an investigation held under Mr. Ogilvie I would like to point out that some important things came out. Has it not been shown that the officials of the government had disregarded the law? Have they ever been reprimanded or dismissed? So long as the hon. gentlemen opposite continue in the course they are taking now they are inviting, they are permitting, they are aiding and abetting all sorts of crime in that country. It is not a question of the life or fate of a minister. There is more in it than that. Hon. gentlemen may think that is the sole question at issue. Have they thought of the condition of the country? No, they are defending a minister, and they are endeavouring to save his political life. There is infinitely more in it than even the life of a minister or of the life of the government of the day. There is the interest of the country at stake. Hon. gentlemen are standing between the people of the country and justice, and they are taking a course which can only result in the encouragement of crime. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries said that the hon. member for York, N.B., (Mr. Foster) had declared that there was a class of crime going on there, that license fee had been paid by the way of fines, and he replied that that was not so. He declared that the public exchequer was full, and that the public administration there was against crime.

THE MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I said that that was the statement of the hon. member for York, N.B., (Mr. Foster).

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman declared that crime had been punished because there was a full treasury.

THE MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No.

Mr. CLANCY. It was only a sort of punishment intended to encourage the continuance of a full treasury.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). Can you tell me any city in Canada where such crime has been put down?

Mr. CLANCY. It would not be put down in the city of Ottawa in which we live now if we did not imprison those who are engaged in it. We would have a large revenue from it. You do not get revenue in our great cities from that class of crime, for in this part of Canada it is suppressed with a firm hand. If the hon. gentleman's logic is good, then prosecution avails nothing. Does he mean that prosecutions increase crime? Does he deny that the assertion of the law minimizes crime? It would seem that he did from his argument. On the whole, our Canadian cities are moral. I am not prepared to say that there is no immorality, but, anyway, Yukon methods are not applied for its suppression, and so long as the public treasury is filled from gambling houses and houses of bad character, so long will immorality be encouraged. From the very beginning of this business, gentlemen on this side of the House have made a fair demand and have been fair in their criticisms. If the government believed there was room for the unsatisfactory investigation they did make, is it not a reasonable request on our part that there should be a proper judicial investigation into all these charges?

Mr. LANDERKIN. I failed to catch who it was who sent Mr. Whiteside out there.

Mr. CLANCY. I know nothing about Mr. Whiteside, but I am informed that the collector of customs at Victoria sent him there.

Mr. PRIOR. And he says he has the utmost confidence in him.

Mr. CLANCY. My hon. friend from Victoria (Mr. Prior) says that Mr. Whiteside is a gentleman of respectability.

Mr. MAXWELL. If he knew him he would not say that.

Mr. PRIOR. You do not know him as well as I do. He is a gentleman.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Maxwell) is very courageous to insinuate that against Mr. Whiteside, under the privileges of the House.

Mr. MAXWELL. I insinuate nothing. I say that the man is absolutely unreliable, and that is plain enough.

Mr. CLANCY. We can quite understand the frame of mind of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Maxwell), and how readily he can uphold crime. We can see how steadfast he is in wrong-doing. I would not insinuate that any person was guilty of a crime, but I say that there is the appearance of crime in the Yukon, and for the credit of Canada, and for the credit of the ministry, an investigation should be held before a proper tribunal.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Is Mr. Whiteside yet in the employ of the government?

Mr. CLANCY. I am not dealing with Mr. Whiteside in any sense, and the question is, therefore, not pertinent. I state here that the charges made as regards the Yukon are shocking; so shocking that if they were made upon the responsibility or the irresponsibility of even a criminal, the government would not be justified in withholding investigation. It is all very well for these gentlemen opposite to say that they are trumped-up charges, but if that is the only defence offered, then the greatest criminal could escape punishment if, before his trial, you refused to proceed because you thought the charges were not well founded. The public suspect, and have every reason to suspect, that the reason investigation is denied is to save the government or to save a minister. I repeat, that the good name of Canada is involved, and if they want to maintain our country's fair name—about which they appear so solicitous at times—they must grant a judicial investigation. No matter what the fate of the ministry or of a minister may be, it is the duty of a government to see that Canada is protected in her standing before the eyes of the world. No one knows better than the Minister of Marine and Fisheries that under our constitutional system it is not necessary to charge direct crime against a minister. Under our system of responsible government, the minister must be punished and held responsible for the acts of his subordinates, and more than once men have been driven out of public life in Canada for matters about which they had no knowledge, but for which the country, and justly so, had to hold them responsible. I again state that it is of the utmost importance, for the preservation of the good name of Canada, and of the utmost importance for the credit of the government, that there should be a proper inquiry into these charges before a judicial commission.

Mr. D. C. FRASER (Guysborough). I would not take up a moment's time in answering the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) were it not that I want to refer to something that was said before. It goes without saying that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) gave us bad constitutional law and rotten theology that had nothing to do with the matter before the House, in his effort to assume the role of a man who is able to teach the House morality. Let us see where we stand. Last year we had the denunciations of the senior member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) about the Yukon, and he was so answered on the floor of this House that it took him a year to recover from the shock. This year he comes forward with four distinct want of confidence motions. In the first place, he desires that the government should be defeated because the collector of customs in Dawson had kept $5,000 to pay the wages due to the men on a certain ship. In his second motion he asked that the government should be defeated because the collector of customs had valued a vessel at $10,000 that was valued by the appraiser at Ottawa at $25,000. In his third motion he asked that the government should be defeated because they rented, at $30,000 a year, a certain property, the next highest bid for which was $24,000, and the other bids going down to $2,500. Lastly, he asked that the government should be defeated because Major Walsh saw fit to permit the royalty in a certain case, due in 1898, to remain unpaid until 1899. That is the whole of the charges of the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) this year. Then, he gathered all the garbage that he could collect, he strung out the most infamous letters one after the other, and he left the unsavoury task of reading them to his decent junior from Pictou (Mr. Bell). There is no man in this House who felt more chagrined at having to do that than did the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bell), but his generous soul felt that he must do it to oblige his senior in the county.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). Mr. Speaker, that is a very personal remark, and I think I am entitled to say this much, at least, that it is a most ungenerous and most unfair—I would almost say an indecent statement, only I am not entitled to reply.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I merely say that I do not believe the hon. gentleman would of his own motion read that resolution which he read this afternoon—he is too generous and kindly a man to do so. I can understand that the senior member for Pictou, being in this thing, would want to see it through. Now, let us collect the evidence, especially as to the statement made with regard to the collectors of customs at the Summit. Two respectable men are branded as thieves, as liars, as perjurers.

Mr. DAVIN. I do not think there is a word of their names there.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Oh, no, because their names are not there, hon. gentlemen opposite think they can escape the consequences, but they were the only men there. Hon. gentlemen opposite cannot get out of that. They have got to take it, and take it for the whole North-west and the whole mounted police. That is the statement made about these two officers; and it is further proved that the matter of this very letter which is now taken as the basis of the accusation against these men, was heard before Col. Steele, who went fully into it, and who branded this man as a liar; and against that the only opinion we have is that of the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Prior), who says this man is a gentleman, and he would believe him. But on the other side we have the evidence, which is just as good, of the hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Maxwell), who says that what Col. Steele says about this man is the truth.

Mr. PRIOR. He knows nothing about it.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I think he knows as much as the hon. member for Victoria. I do not think that hon. gentleman is possessed of supreme wisdom or knowledge. I ask the hon. member leading the opposition, in all sincerity, if we ought to inquire into the conduct of decent, respectable men—men of character not only when in the mounted police force, but when acting as customs officers. Suppose I made a statement about two hon. gentlemen opposite who always had a good character, based on what some person told me about them; and suppose a gentleman as honourable as the two hon. gentlemen about whom I made the statement, informed me that the man who had spoken to me told lies about these two hon. gentlemen, would he say that ought to be the subject of an inquiry? We must draw the line somewhere. The truth of the matter is that these so-called Yukon charges, based on statements made by people who were ashamed to give their names, have so run out this session that this is the dying gasp. Hon. gentlemen opposite know that they have had defeat after defeat on the statements they made. There was not the least possible vigour thrown into the discussion of this resolution; members fell asleep under it; and but for the speech of the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster), the monotony of it would not have been relieved. They know that this thing is dead. But a man from Dawson City writes a letter, and says so and so. Now, I know something about Dr. Catto. I know, for example, that he had to be protected at a public meeting, and was ejected as a man not fit even to be there. I know more than that; I know that he made statements about certain officials at Dawson, particularly Dr. Brown, and when a writ was issued for his arrest for slander, he crawled before the commissioner and begged him not to arrest him, confessing that he had lied. When a decent man makes a statement, his name is not given; but when a scalliwag, like Dr. Catto, does so, his name is given—Dr. Catto, a failure professionally, a failure as a miner, a failure as a man; an agitator out there, who is looked upon with profound contempt; a sort of a cross between an imbecile and an agitator. That is the man whose letter is the foundation of the greater part of this charge, a letter which is disgraceful to any human being to write, and disgraceful to any man to bring before this House. I was very much charmed when my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance assumed the moral role. It was a sight to make the gods weep; his heart-strings were struck. I tell him that there is less crime in all the directions he indicates in Dawson, in proportion to its population, than there is in the majority of the cities of Canada. Everybody knows that where miners congregate there will be more or less drinking and gambling and other things; but, there is a better observance of Sunday, for instance, in Dawson than you will find in many of the cities of eastern Canada—no drinking, no gambling nor anything else. The regulations are carefully observed in Dawson, and I can bear testimony of Mr. Ogilvie as one of the most severe men against wrong-doing of any kind. There were fines collected. I could understand hon. gentlemen opposite if they said that licenses were granted, and that there was a partnership with the officials in crime; but there is no such thing. The fines are large, because everything done in that country is done on a large scale, so far as money is concerned. Nothing is thought there of a fine of $100, where a fine of $2 or $3 here would be considered large. I heard of gamblers there who were fined $100, $200 and one even as high as $700, and sent to jail besides. Hon. gentlemen can understand that in this way the fines would reach a very large amount. The fact is, that today there is not one-twentieth of the gambling or drinking in Dawson that there was before. The people there are very busy. I admit that, just as when sailors, who have been on a long voyage, come into port, so when miners, after their winter's work or after their wash-up, return to the city, there will be a considerable amount of drinking and gambling; but so far as the Yukon council is concerned, the law is carried out more vigorously than in the majority of cities in eastern Canada. Consider that the statements contained in that letter will be put upon the records of this House for all time. As the hon. member for Western Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) expresses it, they will be embalmed—and what an odor there will be about them—on the records of this House. Is it either dignified or proper or does it conduce, either in the older provinces of the Yukon, to the betterment of the country, to take that course? I can understand a direct statement being made of a direct case, and such a statement ought to be made if any such case exists; but this lengthening out, this attempt to gather in by a drag net process everything criminal that ever the heart of man conceived, every crime that ever was committed, and everything undesirable that might happen in all the varied cities of the world put together, in the hope that something may be caught, shows the plight to which these hon. gentlemen are reduced. I ask in all seriousness if ever the like was seen before; and if it is necessary to expand the indictment to such a length. I submit that is the best evidence that there is no case to be inquired into. There may be things out there, as there are here, that we do not wish to see. That I do not deny, but the same statement might be made of every village, town and city in the country. But these hon. gentlemen thought that by this expansion upon the record, the case would appear to be so enormous—to use an expression which we sometimes hear in this House—that the people would think it was simply monstrous; that they would think that the gigantic length of the resolution was some indication of the magnitude of the crime, and that the quantity of words used, and the extremely voluminous sentences would indicate at once that there is something terrifically wrong going on in that district. Why, the amount of paper used is out of all proportion to the population of the Yukon. I venture to say that to read or listen to the number of words contained in this motion would kill half the people in Dawson, had they the misfortune to be compelled to read it or listen to it to the bitter end. I do hope, Mr. Speaker, that you will be kind enough not to read that resolution again, because it may be the end of some of us if we have to listen to it. Was it necessary to cover so many sheets of foolscap to show the alleged wrong-doing in Dawson. No, Sir, I never saw anything like it. It is neither business nor according to parliamentary usage. One thing more. I want to draw the attention of the House to this fact, that from the day the senior member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) made his first statement here, with the exception of Catto's letter—and that refers to nothing new—there has not been a single word coming from the Yukon of any wrong-doing. It is very extraordinary, if these statements were correct, that we do not find that this mass of crime, which is alleged to have existed in that district at that time, has not been perpetuated. We do not hear of any wrong-doing in Dawson now, and when we have the statement of the hon. member for York that crime is still rampant there of the very worst character, crime of that description which degrades men more than anything else, it is very extraordinary that nothing has since come to light to give colour to the charges made by these hon. gentlemen. How does it come that for the last three years, since that commission closed its proceedings, not a single case of wrong-doing has come to light? You would suppose that these newspaper correspondents, who are so fond of writing, would have found some new material to write about. One would hardly imagine that in those three years such a reformation could have taken place in the Yukon that these correspondents have not been able to succeed in finding something new with which to startle the public. Are we to assume that all these wrong-doers have left the country, and that such a change has taken place that, for the last three years, not a single case of wrong-doing has taken place? The fact is that any one going into that country will discover that while of necessity there could not have been at the outset the same order observed and business carried on in the regular way in which it is conducted in the older provinces, on the other hand, with the knowledge gained by experience, business is conducted in a more regular manner, and everybody is satisfied.

In the absence of Sir Richard Cartwright, I want to bear this testimony in favour of his son.

Mr. DAVIN. Who makes any charge against his son? What nonsense!

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Every one does who votes for this resolution.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). That is a sore point with hon. gentlemen opposite. I do not believe that any one of them read this resolution or knew anything about it until it came down. I do not think that the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Bell) could have read it because he still looks as healthy as he always has done, and I do not see how he could preserve his usual healthy appearance if he had read it.

Let me point out this fact. I remember meeting a gentleman from Seattle, who had gone into that country under the impression that things were conducted there as they were in similar localities in the United States. I met him in Skagway, and speaking of the Yukon he said: When I came to this country direct from the United States, I thought that the official placed on the summit there, with nobody to watch him, and with the official to whom he has to make his return a thousand miles distant at Victoria, I would have no difficulty in dealing with him, and I had no hesitation in offering him a bribe of $200 in cash. But to my surprise Inspector Cartwright merely smiled, and just went on entering everything at its full value. He taught me my first lesson, and I never made a similar attempt afterwards. There is the experience of a gentleman who had admitted that he would have no hesitation in resorting to bribery if he thought that he thereby could have accomplished his object.

So far as Inspector Strickland and Cartwright and Major Walsh are concerned, there is not a man, woman or child in the Yukon who will not unhesitatingly say that three better men never went into the country. Major Walsh's name is such a household word for everything honest and honourable there, that I believe there is not a man in that country who would not contribute to pay him an addition to his salary in order that he might remain in the country.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough).

Hon. gentlemen opposite may think that they are making a point, but I venture to tell them that no attempt to revise the corpse of the Yukon so-called fraudulent charge can ever restore it to animation. It died a year ago when the Minister of the Interior gave his reply, and the attempt now to resurrect that corpse and make it presentable before the electorate is doomed to failure. The fact that the Yukon is doing so well as it is, the fact that the gold increase there is larger this year than it has been in any other year, the fact that there is not a single hint of any wrong-doing there, even by those who would like to believe these charges, is sufficient to show how unfounded they are. It would be absurd to suppose, if there is any foundation for these charges, that that carnival of crime should have suddenly ceased. Why, there are men in Dawson City to-day who never heard of the charges made in this House until they read the speech of the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper). The thing was never spoken of except by a few agitators, men for example, like the editor of the Nugget, Mr. George, and a few others—the worst of them have left the country—and some professional perambulating agitators like Catto. They are attempting to make a living on that, and not in the best interest of the country.

One word about the Minister of the Interior and I am done. Despite all that hon. gentleman opposite may say—and I am glad the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster), at least, set himself right with regard to that—from beginning to end, this has been an attempt to kill the Minister of the Interior. No matter what name it may have come under, though nominally directed against one man or another, the whole attempt was against the Minister of the Interior. Why, because it was discovered that the Minister of the Interior was not a man who could be manipulated, he was not a man who would grant anything in the Yukon except what was fair. Because, moreover, he came from the western country and was making for himself a reputation. That reputation has been eloquently spoken of from the point of view of the government; may I say a few words from the point of view of a member of the House? While all the ministers have the attachment of members on this side of the House, there is not one of them toward whom we feel more warmly than towards the Minister of the Interior. No man in the government has given more ardent, undivided attention to the business of his department than the Minister of the Interior has done. Consider what he has accomplished. Here was a new country, for which a system of government had to be provided down to the smallest rules and regulations. The marvel to me is that he did not break down with the weight of business resting upon him. Previous Ministers of the Interior had nothing to do except with the North-west Territories—and the work was nothing in comparison with that which the government undertook in the Yukon—and yet they did not do it well enough to prevent the people rising in rebellion. The work of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) stands as a monument to his labour, an honour to the government and an honour to the party under which it was done. There is no man in public life in Canada who deserves better of this parliament and the people than the Minister of the Interior. It is idle for hon. gentlemen opposite to think that they can strike him by subterfuge. The people of this country like a fighter, and the Minister of the Interior is a fighter. I think he is a fair and even generous fighter, and for such a man the people of Canada have nothing but generous thoughts. His work there was well done. Major Cartwright, Inspector Strickland and Col. Steele were the best types of the mounted police in the Yukon, and saying that is to say that they were the best types of the best class in Canada. When they went into the Yukon with all its opportunities, they stood firm, they did not touch a dollar, but had the soldiers' instinct to carry out the law to its full extent, finding their reward in gratifying the soldier's pride in doing what is right and fair.

Mr. DAVIN. Hear, hear.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) include Major Cartwright and Major Strickland in that 'hear, hear.'

Mr. DAVIN. Yes.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Then, there will be one less vote to-night, if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) is honest. These men went their and did their work, whether in summer or in winter, and I am very sorry that—

Mr. HAGGART. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fraser, Guysborough) please state what charge is made against Major Cartwright or Inspector Strickland?

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). They have been stated a dozen times. I know that hon. gentlemen opposite want to get out of it now, but they cannot. They want the benefit of the charges, but they would like to avoid the responsibility of them. However, the demand was for a commission to inquire whether the officers at certain points could be bribed with $5 or $10, that they manipulated the accounts, that they perjured themselves in making false returns—and the two officials who were there at the time were Mr. Cartwright and Mr. Strickland.

Mr. HAGGART. I listened to the charges, and I never heard that.

Mr. CLANCY. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question? From the way the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fraser, Guysborough) is treating these charges, it is evident they have substance in them. But, did not the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries state that there was no substance in the charge—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I did not state that there was no substance in the charge. I stated that the words which ought to be there but which were not there, were not mere matters of form, but matters of substance.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Lest there be some misunderstanding, I will read the charges:

I was, as you are aware, sent by Collector Milne to Skagway as a Canadian bureau of information to aid intending prospectors to pass through the American customs. How I performed that work I leave others to tell you—

Whenever you find a man prefacing his remarks with expressions of modesty, look out for him. But, he does not leave others to tell us; he goes on:

—but I might say that one American gentleman from Dawson told me, on his return, that I was the first official he had met who was honest, and afterwards, when I was in Dawson, he told me I could not make money in consequence.

Here is an honest man for you. 'For he himself had said it, and it is greatly to his credit.

Concerning the collection of duties at the summit of White Pass. I was sent there by Col. Steele after I had reported to Collector Milne in detail. I found the state of affairs just as I had reported there, and in consequence of doing my duty as a customs officer, I was treated as a spy by the officers in charge. This latter fact was written by the officer commanding the post to Col. Steele who told me of it.

That letter could be written only by Major Cartwright or Inspector Strickland. These were the inspectors who were there.

I numbered the entries and entered up the cash book which was not done before. The book is now in Ottawa. There were two items entered up twice in the cash book, and yet the cash balanced.

That is theft.

I was never allowed to check the cash. I asked twice but was refused. The first item that was found entered twice I altered and reported as a clerical error to Col. Steele. The second I refused to alter, but it was manipulated at night by the officer commanding and his sergeant who lived in the hut.

There is forgery against those two men.

And I, as a customs clerk, have to live in a tent.

There is the meanest kind of forgery.

The business method I introduced was never adopted. Concerning the Chilkoot Pass, I only have information from prospectors, and they told me in Dawson they never paid for one-half of the goods.

There is a man who was collector of customs so reporting on his oath.

The invoices were turned up and put away by brokers and others. I was informed a few days ago that the entries were missing, in fact, chaos reigned supreme.

That is the character given to Major Cartwright and to Major Strickland. And he added afterwards that half a million dollars was lost. Now, the half a million dollars could only be lost by the act of these two parties, and they either got the half a million dollars and had it in their pockets, or a lesser sum.

Mr. DAVIN. Are these officers' names mentioned there ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The responsible Minister of Customs has said that these were the officers in charge.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). You cannot get away from it, it was on the summit where these two officials performed all that ; and with the exception of the member for Victoria, no man has said that the unattested letter, not sworn to, from the man that made that accusation should be taken against the character of these two officials.

Mr. DAVIN. Does the hon. gentleman assert that any one voting for the inquiry endorses that letter ?

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Certainly, because it is the thing that was put before this House on which to make the motion, and the hon. gentleman cannot vote for a part of it and leave another part out. If there are things there that the hon. gentleman does not believe or dare not vote for, why does he not simply move a resolution for a general inquiry ? It would be just as reasonable. But when it comes to details in that particular case, backed up by the report of Colonel Steele, who investigated the very substance of that letter, and the statements made in it, and who pronounced them a tissue of falsehoods, are you going to vote for it, notwithstanding all that ? The hon. gentlemen are jurors, and they are going to say that all that is true ; otherwise they should have been wise enough to see that the parts they did not like, were eliminated. But they gulped it down greedily, as they do anything relating to the Yukon, without inquiry.

Now, the North-west Mounted Police need neither apology or vindication at my hands. Let me say this about those men. The life of a soldier is of such a character as of necessity, makes him a more honest and straightforward man than others. Take a sober soldier of good character, and you have a man who will honestly fulfil his duties better than any other man. Now, let me make a suggestion to the hon. gentlemen opposite. I feel sure that while this motion might be considered light reading in the days of Hilpa and Shalum, at the present time, when only three score and ten constitute our term of life here below, it is too short to read resolutions of this length, nor do I think it fair in the junior member for Pictou to take up so much of the valuable time of men who have other work to do. Let them formulate charges specifically and of sensible length, state that on the evidence they possess, they are able to prove certain charges, when that is done we will have something substantial. I say the people of Canada are proud of the Yukon. There is no brighter page in our history than the history of the Yukon so far. There was a time when men were rushing in there in crowds from the south, many of them who had neither character or reputation, men whose only boast was that they had killed their man, they went in there by hordes, and these police kept them in order. Now, order prevails everywhere. I say Canada is proud of them, and Canada is going to treat the hon. members opposite, who make these unfounded charges as somebody else has said they ought to be treated. An hon. gentleman gets up and says : I was informed by a man I met on the street, who told me he was informed by a man he met in a shop, who told him the man in the shop was informed by a man who was out hunting, that the man who was out hunting had informed him that he had heard from a man up the creek, that somebody had said some weeks before, that there was something wrong in the Yukon. What will be thought of evidence like that ? The Yukon is all right, and hon. gentlemen cannot hurt it. I venture the prophecy that hon. gentlemen, within five years, will be exceedingly sorry, that, without thought or consideration, and with an utter lack of evidence, they attempted to smirch, for political purposes, the character of a territory like the Yukon, instead of cheering the men who have gone into that country and of helping them, forgetting even their shortcomings, to make it, as it is now and will be in the future, one of the brightest parts of the Dominion of Canada.

House divided on the amendment (Mr. Bell, Pictou).

YEAS :

Messieurs

Beattie,
Bell (Pictou),

Amendment negatived.

Mr. HAGGART. I was paired with the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock), but I find that he has another pair, and I have made a mistake as to the vote. I vote 'yes.'

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman was not in when the question was put.

Mr. GIBSON. I desire to call attention to the fact that the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Poupore) has a standing pair with the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Lewis).

Mr. POUPORE. Perhaps my hon. friend (Mr. Gibson) is correct. I supposed that the hon. member for Albert was in the House and I voted, but otherwise I would not have voted.

Mr. DUGAS. I understood that all pairs were done away with.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Mr. Speaker, I do not suppose the House desires to resume work in committee at this late hour, and I beg, with the permission of the House, to withdraw the motion.

Motion withdrawn.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. FOSTER. What is to be taken up to-morrow ?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Yukon.

The PRIME MINISTER. I think the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) will be here to-morrow, and if he is we will take up some of the Bills standing in his name and then go into supply.

Mr. HAGGART. I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) if he has brought down the papers in reference to the Galops Canal ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I think the papers are all ready. I did not understand the hon. gentleman to ask that I should lay them on the Table of the House.

Mr. HAGGART. I want to see them so that I can read them over.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The probability is that the estimates of the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) will be taken up to-morrow morning.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 1.10 a.m. (Friday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, June 29, 1900.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Eleven o'clock.

PRAYERS.

EMERGENCY RATIONS.

Mr. FREDERICK D. MONK (Jacques Cartier) moved :

That the report of the select committee with respect to the purchase of emergency rations for the use of the Canadian troops in South Africa, together with the minutes of the proceedings, the evidence taken and the exhibits filed before the said committee, be printed forthwith, and that Rule 94 be suspended in regard to said report.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. N. A. BELCOURT (Ottawa). Mr. Speaker, I want to give informal notice that the consideration of the report of the select committee on the emergency rations might possibly be taken up on Monday. With the consent of the House, I would like to have an understanding as to whether it is agreed to take it up some time on Monday. I would suggest after three o'clock.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). Monday after 8.

Mr. BELCOURT. Monday, after 8; will that suit the convenience of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) ?

Mr. MONK. That will be all right.

Mr. G. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.) Does the right hon. leader of the House (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) agree to that ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). No, we will have to see the report printed first. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) has just moved that the report be printed, which is quite proper, but before we fix any time to discuss it we should have the report in print.

Mr. MONK. I understand it will be printed by that time.

Mr. BELCOURT. I am under the impression that the report is practically printed now.

Mr. FOSTER. Then, if the right hon. leader of the House wishes to see it, probably he will look at it to-day, and we can settle the time to-morrow morning or to-night.

The PRIME MINISTER. We will settle it to-morrow morning.

Mr. MONK. Would it not be possible to settle it now ?

Mr. FIELDING.

The PRIME MINISTER. No, wait until to-morrow morning.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

The PRIME MINISTER moved :

That when the House adjourns this day (Friday) it stands adjourned until Saturday at 11 a.m., and that the order of proceeding on that day be the same as on previous sitting days.

Mr. B. M. BRITTON (Kingston). Mr. Speaker, I suppose it as well in speaking to this motion now, as at any other time, to present the views of quite a number of members in reference to sitting on Monday. It was announced by the right hon. First Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) that it would be necessary to have a sitting on Monday, and I would ask now if it would be possible that the matter might be considered and the announcement be made that we should have Monday as a Holiday. I am quite aware of the urgency that exists now after such a very long time spent in session here, but, still, I cannot help thinking that not very much progress would be made by a session on Monday. Arrangements have been made by a great many hon. members, to my knowledge, from conversation with them, so that they cannot be here on Monday. It is the family day, and it is the day that we regard as a holiday. If it is consistent with the duties that we owe to parliament to have that as a holiday, I should be glad if the right hon. leader of the House and the government would consider the matter.

Mr. E. G. PRIOR (Victoria, B.C.) If there are Ontario and Quebec gentlemen who cannot be here there will be a sufficient number of members from British Columbia and maritime provinces present to take their places, because they cannot get home. We will guarantee to carry on the work. I do not see why we should be kept here a day longer than is necessary. I have not been home since the 28th of January.

Mr. J. V. ELLIS (St. John City). Mr. Speaker, I do not care so much about Monday, but I think there should be some let-up to the work. So far as one can judge from the past there will be three weeks of this session yet. Members cannot stand the work that is imposed upon them. I was called out at ten o'clock this morning to attend a committee, after sitting up until one o'clock this morning, and then I have to attend the sittings of the House. We cannot stand these long hours. It seems to me that there should be an agreement on both sides of the House to limit all speeches to ten minutes for the remainder of the session, and there be one night off so that a man could get a clear night's rest.

Mr. T. D. CRAIG (East Durham). Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a word in support of the view of the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton). I think this House should not sit on a day that is kept as a holiday all over this country as Dominion Day. It is a national holiday, and the only national holiday you have in this country. There have been differences of opinion about other questions, but I think we should all agree in being Canadians. We talk about urgency and all this sort of thing but after all the urgency does not amount to so much, when we can spend days making long speeches on both sides of the House. It is not confined to one side of the House. If matters are now so urgent, why did they not become urgent long ago? They have only become urgent in the last few days of the session, but this is no reason why we should sit on Dominion Day. Those who may be here in the future may always expect to have long sessions, and it may happen that Dominion Day will always come during the sessions, and the same plea will be put forward. I wish to enter my protest against sitting on Dominion Day, because this is our national holiday, and, after all, one day is not such a serious matter that we should decide to sit on that day.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The answer to the view put forward by my hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Britton) has just been given by the hon. gentleman from Victoria (Mr. Prior). Those hon. gentlemen who have made arrangements to be away on Monday can, I should think, fulfil their engagements. I must rely on the precedents of the past, both under Sir John Macdonald and Sir John Thompson, to sit on Dominion Day if the business of the House requires it. I believe I voice the universal wishes of the House when I say that we should make every effort to bring the session to a close as quickly as possible. Whether the speeches are long or short must be left to the good taste and judgment of the House, and if the speeches are long it is all the more reason why we should not lose a day. I am sorry to say that the government cannot agree with the views of my hon. friend, and that we will sit on Monday.

Mr. DAVID HENDERSON (Halton). Whilst we would be glad to meet the views of the First Minister, in my opinion there will be a strong feeling against sitting on Monday throughout the country. In Sir John Thompson's time we did sit on Dominion Day, but so strong was the feeling against it that my recollection is that the House did not sit after six o'clock in the evening. I am sure that throughout the country there will be a very strong feeling against this Canadian House of Commons sitting on Dominion Day. I wish the Prime Minister would permit us to regard Monday as a holiday.

Motion agreed to.

SPEECHES OF THE HON. MR. TARTE IN FRANCE.

Mr. G. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.) Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to draw the attention of the First Minister to a matter to which I alluded some days ago; that is with reference to the reports of the speeches made by Mr. Tarte, the representative of Canada at the exposition in Paris, and which have since then been somewhat fully reported in the press. At that time the right hon. gentleman who leads the government stated that he was in communication with Mr. Tarte, and I think in reply to a suggestion from myself he proposed to take cognizance of the reports of that gentleman's speeches, and at a later date give the results of his investigation to the House. Since that time the reports of Mr. Tarte's speeches have become very particular, and I think there can be very little doubt now as to their authenticity, more especially as they receive constant insertion in La Patrie, which is, as is well known, the personal organ of the Minister of Public Works. I think the government ought to be able to tell us whether they approve of such utterances as these or not. Mr. Tarte is there as the representative of this country, not of any section of it. He is the representative of this government, and he is supposed to voice the position of this government and of the country in his utterances, which must necessarily be more or less official. I notice that some of the right hon. gentleman's own papers have expressed the same views as I am expressing to-day, and that takes it out of the category of simply a party matter. I read from the Montreal Herald, the government organ in that city, as follows:

It is difficult to know what idea Mr. Tarte intended to convey to his Rouen audience when he informed them that the French Canadians have remained French, that 'we are more and more French; we are more French than we were twenty years ago, aye, we are more French than we were one year ago.' But whatever meaning may have been intended, it is still more difficult to understand what possible motive could have prompted these and other expressions in the same speech. One has to remember, what it is charitable to hope he himself did not, that the speaker is the representative in France of a British country, that he is a minister of the Crown in this British colony, and that, whether he is right or not about Canada, or even North America, ultimately becoming French in the majority of its population, just at present there is in Canada a considerable majority of English-speaking people, and that he is in France to represent these even more than the minority from which he springs.

That is a statement made from a quarter which is not hostile at all to the government. I think the matter is a serious one, and I hope to hear from the Prime Minister that he has under the circumstances—as they appear to be undoubtedly—peremptorily ordered Mr. Tarte to return home.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Speaker, I informed the House on a former occasion that I had received a communication from Mr. Tarte, complaining that his speeches were not properly translated. I have been in communication with him ever since, and I have asked him, if possible, to send me the reports of his speeches which he approved. Every man who is asked to speak in public knows—and my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) himself, who is a public speaker of great eminence—knows very well that it is impossible to expect that any man should be held responsible for the speeches which are placed in his mouth by newspaper reports. The reports of the present day are too speedily made out to ensure accuracy in every case. Mr. Tarte, if he is anything, is a loyal British subject. Everybody knows that. He has never disguised his views upon this matter, and it is not later than the 24th of this month that something authentic came from his pen in the message which the French Canadians now in Paris sent Her Majesty the Queen assuring her of the loyalty of her French Canadian subjects. This ought to be an answer to the inferences which may be drawn, and which are drawn, from some expressions alleged to be used by Mr. Tarte, but which I doubt his having uttered in the sense, at all events, that is attributed to them. If Mr. Tarte said that the French Canadians were more French this year than last year, I do not exactly understand what is the practical fact which has made us more French this year than last year. We are just as much French this year as last year, and just as much last year as we were before. We are French by birth; we are French by origin; we certainly have the pride of our origin; I have, for my part, the pride of my origin; and I will never disguise it. I will say it in every assembly.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The PRIME MINISTER. But whilst I have the pride of my origin, and whilst I pride myself on belonging to a chivalrous race, I take it that it is a further evidence of loyalty to the Crown under which we have received the liberties we now enjoy. I do not believe that Mr. Tarte meant anything else, and until I have received the official correspondence which I expect from him, with an authentic version of his speeches, I am not prepared to admit that Mr. Tarte meant anything else but that. Mr. Tarte spoke with some pride of his race, and he had reason to do so. He spoke perhaps with greater hopes of it than I have myself. He expected that the French Canadians would become the most numerous race in this country. That is a very laudable ambition, and I do not think that any one would blame him for that. For my part, if I did entertain the hope that the French race would become the most numerous, I would be but paying a tribute to the well known fecundity of my race; a tribute, however, which I am afraid to say will not be fulfilled.

We shall endeavour to maintain our own. We have no sources of recruit from the other side of the Atlantic; our resources are within ourselves, and I am sure my hon. friend opposite will not object if in that way we try to become more numerous than the race to which he belongs. For my part I cannot find any fault with Mr. Tarte's expectations. I do not know that he meant anything more than that. Whatever he may have meant, I claim this for Mr. Tarte, that if there is a man who has the pluck and courage of his convictions, it is he. He never scruples to declare his views. Perhaps the expression he has used may be tortured out of its real meaning, but I am not prepared to admit that that expression meant anything else than that the French Canadians are loyal to their origin and take a pride in their origin, and that they are loyal to the British Crown as well. If that is all Mr. Tarte meant, I am quite prepared to stand by him.

Mr. FOSTER. If I may be allowed a word, I would be very sorry indeed to take away from my right hon. friend and his compatriots the store of future joys which are opened up by the ambition to which he has alluded; and I certainly cannot but wish for himself and all his compatriots the greatest success in that peculiar field of endeavour. While allowing him that laudable ambition, and in so wide and pleasant a field, I still think that the hon. gentleman, as leader of the government, has not quite treated as he should do what seems to be a rather serious statement made by a representative of the Dominion government. I do not wish to bind public men down to newspaper reports of what they say, which are often extravagant and sometimes incorrect; but at the same time I think the circumstances show that the main features of these remarks are not attributed to Mr. Tarte with inaccuracy. I think they bear all the marks of being substantially true, and as such I think the right hon. gentleman is scarcely dealing fairly with the country if he approves of such statements from a man in such a representative capacity.

WRECK OF THE SCOTSMAN.

Mr. M. K. COWAN (South Essex). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to say that I have placed in the hands of the Clerk of the House a notice of an address asking that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries bring down all papers that may be in his possession concerning the wreck of the Scotsman off the coast of Newfoundland on the 22nd day of last September. There was a formal investigation held in the Admiralty Court of Quebec, on the 23rd, 24th, 25th and 26th of October, 1899, before W. H. Smith, Wreck Commissioner; and in view of the fact that a large number of Canadians were on board of that vessel and lost both life and property, it seems to me that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries ought not to have any objection to bringing down what papers may be in his department. I do not want the private correspondence which may have passed between private individuals concerning their personal losses, but I would like any correspondence that passed between the steamship company and the department, together with the evidence taken and the finding of the Admiralty Court, to be laid on the Table for the benefit of the House.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I gather from my hon. friend's statement that he has placed a notice on the paper for these papers. Recognizing the period of the session which we have reached, I do not propose to take advantage of the fact that he cannot reach his motion in the ordinary course so as to have it formally made in the House; and the moment I see his motion and learn exactly what he wants, I will give instructions to have the papers looked over, and will have those which can be brought down prepared and laid on the Table.

SUPPLY.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

Post Office—Mail service..... $2,297,000

Mr. G. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.) Before the details of the post office estimates are gone into, I want to call the attention of the Postmaster General and the House to a matter of some importance which we discussed partially on another occasion. I refer to the nonpayment by the Postmaster General of expenditure for the carrying of the mails, and the practical substitution of other departments for his own in these expenditures, taking for himself the total revenues of the post office and charging to other departments tens of thousands of dollars for the carriage of the mails which should have been charged to his own department. Now, this is important in more ways than one; and last year, when we were going over the estimates, I pointed out the absolute necessity of the expenditures for carrying the mails being borne by the proper department, that is, the Post Office Department. And I think that the Postmaster promised me on that occasion that the vote which was then taken, I think, for the Yukon service—not the post office service, but for the general Yukon service—would be distributed, so that the amount of money which was properly chargeable to the post office should be thus charged, and consequently we should have a fair means of estimating the revenue and expenditure and the financial results of that department. That, however, I am sorry to say has not been done, and we come to the present year with a state of things something like this, that very heavy carriage expenses of the mails have been assumed by other departments whilst the Post Office Department has escaped.

No one will dispute that every department is responsible for its own expenditure and should undertake its own work and pay for it. If we are not to conduct our business on that basis, we will simply have a state of chaos as regards all comparative and proper considerations with reference to the different services of the country. We have had some very extravagant and persistent claims made by the Postmaster General himself with reference to the diminution of the deficit in his department. But it is a very easy matter to cultivate a surplus, if you can get some other department to take a large share of the expenses off your shoulders, while at the same time you keep the revenues. It may be said that the revenues in 1896, 1897 and 1898 from the Yukon were not large, but that does not in the slightest degree affect the principle. In this country, every department takes the bitter with the sweet, the lean with the rich, and the Post Office Department must bear the expenses of its non-productive as well as to enjoy the profits of its productive areas. But what has happened? From an examination conducted before the Public Accounts Committee, I find that in 1896—that part of 1896 which was administered by the present government—the post office carriage into the Yukon district and out of it was so light that, according to the comptroller of the North-west Mounted Police, a man could carry it in a despatch bag. During that year the Post Office Department paid for nothing, with the exception of the transport of 65 pounds of mails, for which it paid $100. A contract was entered into in that year which it is well to take note of, as showing the costs which would have been incurred from any regular carriage of the mails. According to that contract, the cost incurred was $600 for the transport of 65 pounds of mail, which is about $10 per pound. Misfortune dogged the footsteps of the carrier, the mail was lost, and in the end he received $100 as compensation. I call attention to the fact, as showing the cost of carriage in that year. However, the fact is this, that in 1896 we may dismiss the mail carriage into and out of the Yukon, because it was very light; but whatever expenses were incurred in that year were met by the Post Office Department only to the extent of $100.

When we come, however, to 1897, a distinct change takes place. Under instructions, the comptroller of the mounted police arranged for posts and undertook to carry the mails into and out of the Yukon during the season of navigation by at least a monthly service. To that end posts were established, and the general paraphernalia of carriage was gathered together and put into operation. It was an expensive proceeding, and not altogether successful, in so far as the regular carriage of the mails was concerned; but I find that, outside of the two boats which carried the mails around by the sea route and river route at a cost of $750 and the North-west Mounted Police Department, there did go out from Skagway monthly mails during the season of which I have spoken. Very few of these got through regularly to Dawson. Generally speaking, the majority of them, owing to the circumstance of putting in the troops, supplies and the like of that, which took precedence—the majority of the mail bags so carried in remained near the river during the remainder of the winter and spring, and were, when navigation opened, carried down to Dawson. But the fact remains that the North-west Mounted Police, under instructions, I presume, from the Post Office Department, undertook to establish and did establish posts and the necessary paraphernalia for carrying the mails once a month up as far as the river, and some of them through to Dawson, and the remainder, near the river, were carried in the spring up to Dawson at their own costs and charges. Not one single dollar of all the expenditure to which the mounted police was put in 1897 for the carriage of the mails, has been charged to and recouped by the Post Office Department. It is impossible to estimate what was the increased cost to the North-west Mounted Police body, but it is not impossible to estimate what it would have been to the Post Office Department, if it had undertaken the carriage of the mails and had performed that carriage in just the same way as it was done by the mounted police. The cost would have amounted to something like $10 per pound for everything that went in and out during that season.

We now come to the year 1898. In that year the North-west Mounted Police branch had the sole charge of the mails.

Early in the autumn they made their arrangements, sent in what paraphernalia was necessary, took the mails and carried them fortnightly during that season into Dawson and its neighbourhood. And, not counting anything but the extraordinary expenses that the North-west Mounted Police Department was put to for the carriage of mails, the estimate made of the expenditure entailed on that department for the season, as given by Mr. White, the deputy head of the department, is the sum of $47,400. And he made the estimate, which he considers a reasonable one, that if the Post Office Department itself had established these posts and put on the machinery necessary for carrying the mails, that department could not have done the work at a less expenditure than $100,000 for the season. Now, will the House believe—but it is true—that not one single dollar of that expenditure of the North-west Mounted Police branch for the carriage of the mails has been debited to or paid by the Post Office Department? It has all been charged up to mounted police, and appears in our public accounts as part of the expenditure of that branch. I do not suppose there is any man in this House who will, for a single moment, deny that that modified and partial charge of $47,400 incurred by the mounted police, calculated upon the basis of the extraordinary work they did solely and entirely to carry the mails, is a charge which the Post Office Department should liquidate, and which should appear in the expenses of that department. But this is not all. I find that the Department of the Interior in 1898-9 paid $3,000 for carrying mail bags—something over 1,500 pounds in all—into Dawson, at the rate of $2 per pound. This is also significant as showing the cost of the independent service, if the Post Office Department had undertaken that service itself. The Department of the Interior was in position to perform this service at a less cost than the Post Office Department if it had taken it up at first hand and done the work outright. With $47,400 paid by the mounted police and $3,000 paid by the Interior Department, you have a sum of $50,400 altogether—even at the reduced rate—which is properly chargeable to the Post Office Department for the carriage of mails into and out of that north-western country during the season of 1898-9. If you take any fair estimate of the year preceding, I think you will have to admit that the cost for that year would have been just about the same. Therefore, arguing from that basis, there is a charge of at least $100,000 which has been paid by other departments for the sole purpose of carrying the mails into and out of Dawson, not a single cent of which has the Postmaster General assumed or the Post Office Department paid. Now, I say that is not right in a financial point of view; it is not right in a comparative point of view; and the Postmaster General is entirely precluded from boasting of his large surplus in any of these years until he has subtracted from the revenues of his department, as recorded in his books, the amount of money which has been incurred for carrying his mails into and out of the Yukon. I cannot conceive any reason why the Postmaster General and the Finance Minister, in the interests of sound book-keeping and proper financial administration, have allowed a state of things like that to exist; more particularly, considering that last year, the attention of both these gentlemen was called to it, and that they promised that an equitable distribution of a joint vote should be made in order to make that book-keeping right and distribute those burdens as they should be distributed. If this system is carried on in the different departments of the government, what confidence can we have in the records of any department. There comes out annually a report under the seal of the Postmaster General, in which the people of this country are told: Here is what the post office service cost the country last year, and here is what the post office business brought into the treasury of the country last year. But when you come to take a proper view of it—which no man outside can do, because he is not conversant with the facts—you find that in 1898 alone another department shouldered more than $50,000 of the expenses of the Postmaster General's department for carrying mails into and out of the Yukon. On a fair basis of estimate—and it can only be estimated—for 1897, I think you can count that at least $100,000 has thus been manipulated, and wrongly manipulated, and a false and distorted view of this department and the other departments as well has been given to the country. Why should any man in the country, when taking stock of the North-west Mounted Police service and what it does for the country, and what it costs, be put into the false position of charging up to the mounted police service $100,000 which is properly chargeable to the post office service? If hon. gentlemen are going to keep their accounts in that way, it will be very difficult for the people of this country to have any confidence at all in the published reports of ministers. Now, I have placed this matter fairly before this House, and I shall await with interest the reply of the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock). I refer him to the report of the Public Accounts Committee, in which the evidence is given on which I have made the statement I have just had the honour to lay before the committee.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) toward the close of his observations, appeared to give an explanation of his indignation of what he called a manipulation of public accounts. He appears most anxious, if possible, by this method, to prevent the public drawing the proper and legitimate inference as to the administration of the Post Office Department, thinking that in this way he may discredit the accounts of that department. He pretended to be anxious to have a full and fair display of the receipts and expenditure on the records of the department, in order that a proper comparison might be made—I suppose between the administration of the post office under the present government and that under the previous government. If it is comparison he wants, is it not fair, considering that the late government had practically no Yukon service to maintain, that the accounts of the Yukon service should be separated so that there can be a comparison of the same services in the same parts of the country. But the hon. gentleman forgets his own record, and I am surprised, in view of the reminder I gave some time ago, that he should again assume such an attitude as he has assumed to-day.

I told him when we were in committee the other day that his own government, when they were opening up the North-west, charged only a part of the expenditures to the Post Office Department, for carrying mails into the North-west, but a very large portion of the cost of carrying the mails into the North-west Territories when they were being opened up was deliberately charged not to the Post Office Department, but to the Indian Department, to the North-west Mounted Police, and to the Interior Department. His government for years maintained that principle. The hon. gentleman knows that I told him that two weeks ago, and here he gets up to-day with professed indignation, because we were doing the same as his own government did, and more fairly, because you find nothing in the departmental returns showing that his government made known to the public, that they were charging the post office mail service in the North-west Territories to other departments, you find no reference to it whatever in the post office reports, whereas as regards the expenditure for mail service in the Yukon on which the hon. gentleman has specially dwelt, it is most explicitly set forth upon the Postmaster General's report for the year 1898-9.

Now, let me for a moment say that in order properly to compare the administration of the department over which I have been permitted to preside for the last three years or more, with the administration of that department under the late government, it is far better for the purposes of comparison that the Yukon service should be dealt with separately in order that service for service may be compared. But I am not saying that in order to withhold from the public the true position of the matter, because even if it has happened that the Auditor General, or whoever adjusts the public accounts, has not chosen to carry into other accounts, the cost of the Yukon mail service, at least the Post Office Department has made it perfectly clear in its annual report, what it is costing the country to carry the mails, and the exact receipts and expenditures in respect to the Yukon service are fully set forth upon the Postmaster General's report presented to the House this session. Now, if you want to compare the Yukon service with the Yukon service, we might separate the accounts for the services of old Canada from those for the Yukon, and compare the administration of the Post Office Department in the Yukon by the late government and by the present government and compare the administration of the service throughout the rest of Canada by the two respective governments, and in that way a fair comparison of these two services can be made. Let me give an illustration. The hon. gentleman alludes to the Yukon mail service under his government. Let me briefly show what sort of a mail service in the Yukon that they boast of, and see how much of the administration of the Yukon mail service has gone into the Post Office accounts. I propose to indicate the sort of mail service in the Yukon that they carried on, and to discover, if possible, how much public money was ever expended upon the Yukon by the Post Office Department.

The first attempt of the late government to establish a mail service in the Yukon, was in September, 1894, when they appointed postmaster, Mr. C. H. Hamilton, who happened to be the manager of a steamship company, and they arranged with him to carry the mails in and out of the territory by his steamers, between Seattle and the ports on the lower Yukon. The first arrangement of this kind was carried into effect in July, 1894, and it continued with some degree of intermittence for some years afterwards. Under that arrangement with Mr. Hamilton, he was not to be paid anything for the service, and nothing was paid by them to him. In 1895, the hon. gentlemen's government placed the conveyance of those mails in the hands of the North-west Mounted Police. Is the hon. gentleman aware of that fact? In 1895, the North-west Mounted Police, under the late government inaugurated the system of carrying the mails in and out of the Yukon; and point if you can to any one item of expenditure which the late government included in any account to show that the Post Office Department was ever charged with any services of that kind rendered in the Yukon by the mounted police. The hon. gentleman's government inaugurated it, they established the basis on which this was done, they allowed it to go on, perhaps in a greater volume; and ultimately as soon as it was safe to do so I terminated it, and obtained the services of private contractors. They attempted also to organize a mail service through Captain Healey; the hon. gentleman has alluded to that service. They arranged with him to take a mail in from Juneau, sixty-five pounds. The hon. gentleman says it costs $600. Was there any of that $600 charged by the hon. gentleman's government in the post office accounts? Does the hon. gentleman pretend that any portion of the moneys paid for that service was ever charged to the post office accounts during their administration? Why, Sir, their attempt to get a mail in there in that way was an absolute failure. The man neglected or abandoned his work for months and months, and it remained for the department under my administration to pay the cost of recovering that mail, and the expenditure for it, went not into the hon. gentlemen's accounts when they were in office, but it went into the post office accounts of the year that we assumed office. So you fail to find any expenditure by the late government in the post office accounts in respect of the Yukon mail service, unless it may be a paltry sum of $100 or so, here and there. The late government arranged with a Mr. Moore, in the spring of 1896, to carry in certain mails, and just as in other cases, they did not pay Mr. Moore, and left the accounts unpaid. You find that they never charged the carrying of mails by Mr. Moore in the report of the Postmaster General for 1896. What did they do with it? They left that uncharged, because they left it unpaid, and it was for the department under my administration to pay their accounts, and we charged it in the accounts of the Post Office Department.

Now, I admit that we utilized the North-west Mounted Police, and I admit it was in the interests of the taxpayers to do so. It was an economical mode of establishing that service, it was the only effective mode, and it was necessary, therefore, if we wanted to maintain the service, that it should be so conducted. For the sake of a comparison, I admit, that the comptroller of the mounted police fixed on the sum that the hon. gentleman named, the sum of $47,400, as the cost of the police for carrying the mails in 1898-9. I would further say for the sake of a comparison, taking the gross expenditure by the police and taking the gross revenue, the difference of the expenditure over the revenue for that fiscal year amounted to $58,503.78. Add to it, if you like, the $3,000 which were said to have been paid by the Department of the Interior, and you get $61,503.78 as the total amount which could by any possible means be carried into the post office accounts for the year 1898-9. If you do carry this $61,000 into the accounts for the year 1898-9, it would just by that much and no more have altered the results. I appeal to the judgment of this House whether the hon. gentleman is justified in making such observations as he has made to-day, and as he has made on a former occasion as to the manipulation and cooking of accounts in this department. I refer the House to the Postmaster General's report for the year closed June 30th, 1899, page xiv, which contains the information which the hon. gentleman says has been withheld from the public. This is the kind of statement which he calls manipulating and cooking:

The post office revenue for the Yukon and Athlun districts for the year amounted to $10,846.61.

And it gives the points at which the sums making this total were collected. Then, under the head of 'Expenditure—Yukon and Atlin districts,' the report proceeds to say :

The expenditure, including the sum so fixed as the value of the services of the North-west Mounted Police, amounted to $69,350.39, the cost thus exceeding the revenue by $58,503.78.

Under the head of 'Financial Operations,' it says :

The financial operations of the year ended June 30, 1899, not including the revenue and expenditure in respect of the service in the Yukon and Atlin districts as above mentioned (the same being above set forth), have resulted—

And then follows the statement. There it is placed in unmistakable language. It shows plainly on the face of it that it is an explicit statement of the gross revenues and expenditures last year in respect to the Yukon and Atlin service, and it distinctly declares that these different items of revenue and expenditure are kept apart where they may be seen. Here they are placed where they may be read and understood by any one who desires to understand them. The report then proceeds to give the financial results of the service for the rest of Canada. As if that was not a sufficient reference to the revenue and expenditure of this service, you again find on page 4, under the head of 'Revenue and Expenditure,' the gross revenue and the net revenue of the department for the year in question, and at the foot is an item to the effect that :

Revenue of the Yukon and Atlin districts ($10,846.61) not included.

I should like to understand on what authority the hon. gentleman said that we had included in these accounts the revenue from the Yukon and that we had excluded the expenditure. I call his attention to this, and I challenge him to make good his statement. It is without foundation ; it is not correct. I again repeat my remark, as, perhaps, the hon. gentleman was not paying attention. Page 4 of this report gives the revenue of the department for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1899, below which is found this foot-note, to which the hon. gentleman's attention is called :

Revenue of the Yukon and Atlin districts ($10,846.61) not included.

Then, if we turn to the expenditure column on the same page, we find that the total expenditure for the year is also given, and below the statement is this foot-note :

Expenditure on account of Yukon and Atlin services not included.

What deception is there in that? What cooking of accounts is there shown? I call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that we are keeping a separate account of the Yukon and Atlin services, of the revenue and expenditure, and that we are incorporating it as a separate account in the

Postmaster General's report. If the hon. gentleman thinks that the fat and lean of the service are not taken together all he has to do is to add $58,503 to the expenditure, and he has the actual total according to his contention. If he desires to test our actions and those of his own government by the practice that he established in the Yukon and handed down to us, the best way to deal with our accounts is the way in which they appear on the face of this book here. The hon. gentleman is extremely solicitous on occasions about my department, and I am proud of it. I am not quite sure that it is deserving of his attention, but since he is so ready to point out how accounts can be manipulated, permit me to ask what explanation he can offer to the country for not having placed, in the Postmaster General's report, or in the public accounts, the fact that he had incurred liabilities and debts in the Post Office Department, amounting to no less than $680,000, which were not paid when his government left office, which were in excess of every parliamentary appropriation, and which the hon. gentleman himself must have known existed? A debt existed at the commencement of the fiscal year 1895 of over $600,000, representing obligations due, and instead of the hon. gentlemen opposite coming down to parliament and frankly reporting the proper expenditure of the department for the year, he simply withheld that information from parliament, took a lump sum vote, and when June 30 expired, when the vote for the next year's services became payable, when they could draw upon it, they reached into the appropriation made by parliament for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1896, and paid with it over $600,000 which they should have paid in the previous year. Not only so, but they came down to parliament after that transaction with their estimates for the year 1896. They maintained the service throughout the year 1895-96, and they reported to parliament what they wanted for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1896. By that time their concealed expenditure, the amount which they had incurred in liabilities in excess of the appropriation, had grown from being $616,712.99 at the commencement of the fiscal year, to such an extent that when they went out of office they left unpaid liabilities amounting to $685,447.03. For some years, I believe, that sum had been accumulating. It cannot be believed that it was the result of two or three years' management. I think it is fair to assume that it had been accumulating for years. If so, what excuse can the hon. gentleman give for the sort of accounts which he presented to parliament year after year, and which he presented in the years 1894-5 and 1896? After I took office, I found the expenditures of the department suddenly, in the early part of my tenure of office, within the first two or three months, showing very large proportions, and being unable to understand how such an expenditure could be justified in view of the short time that I had been in office, I employed two expert auditors, who spent months to try and find out what was the matter with the accounts of the Post Office Department. We have their findings in a report signed by them, W. H. Cross and W. F. Munroe.

That report of theirs was embodied in the first report I had the honour to lay on the Table of parliament. The accuracy of that report has never been challenged. On the contrary, parliament recognized its accuracy and my hon. friend the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) had to come down to parliament and ask for a vote of $685,000 to pay these unpaid bills of the Post Office Department which the hon. gentleman never honoured with a place in the public accounts during his regime. The hon. gentleman from York (Mr. Foster) is most solicitous lest the public may give some little measure of credit to the government for the administration of the Post Office Department, and he and his friends seem most anxious to try and explain away the why and the wherefore that we do not have such enormous deficits now as in the good old times when they held the purse-strings. The other evening the hon. gentleman from Three Rivers (Sir Adolphe Caron) endeavoured to give an explanation of the decreased deficits, and much as I would desire to do so I cannot credit him with any degree of accuracy or thoroughness. He gave an explanation why the expenditure of the Post Office Department since I have taken charge of it was much less than in former days, and his explanation was, that I withheld from the civil service increases of salary amounting to $74,217, and that this answers to that extent for any betterment of our accounts. I will point out to the hon. gentleman (Sir Adolphe Caron) where he fell into an error. To arrive at the sum of $74,217 he took the amount expended for salaries in the last year of his administration, and the amount expended for salaries in the year 1898-9, and deducting one from the other he found a balance of $74,217, and so he jumped to the conclusion that the lesser expenditure in 1899, was accounted for by withholding increases from the staff. It did not occur to the hon. gentleman that that decrease in expenditure might have come about by other methods, and as a matter of fact it did, and I will just explain to him how it was. It is true, Mr. Speaker, that I did not recommend every one in the post office service for increases, but we did exercise a wise discretion having regard both for the needs of the service and the needs of the taxpayers who pay the salaries of those in office. We did not withhold $74,217 of increases of salary from them, but we did withhold a small sum. Let me point out to the hon. gentleman (Sir Adolphe Caron) that if every one on the outside staff had received every possible increase of salary, he could have been eligible for from the time we took office until the year 1898-9, it would only have amounted to the gross sum of $19,087.16 in excess of what they were actually paid. When, in speaking on a recent occasion, the hon. gentleman (Sir Adolphe Caron) said that we withheld from the outside staff $74,217, he was astray to the extent of $55,000 out of the $74,000, and therefore three-fourths of his statement was an error as I have explained. The reason why we did not pay so much money out in 1898-9, as he did, was that we had a much smaller staff. There is no great mystery about it. I will give my hon. friend the figures: When the hon. gentleman left office the number of the staff in the outside service was 1,610, and in 1898 the number had fallen to 1,486, and for the year just closed the number has fallen still further, namely, to 1,473. In other words, the number of our outside staff after three years was 137 less than it was during the regime of my hon. friend (Sir Adolphe Caron). By this reduction of staff we will be able to account for over an economy much exceeding the $74,000. I might also add, Mr. Chairman, that there were other ways by which economy was practised. For example, I found when I took office that a very great degree of improvidence had been displayed in the letting of mail contracts, and the particulars of which were summarized in the preface to the supplementary report which I submitted to parliament in 1897. The first page of that report contains the following:

In explanation of this supplementary report, it may be proper to state the circumstances which called for it. Shortly after entering upon my duties as Postmaster General information reached me from persons who had tendered for mail services, but who had not been awarded the contracts, to the effect that their lower tenders had been passed over and the contracts awarded at higher prices, and I accordingly called upon the officers of the department to produce and enter in a register all tenders so passed over.

This was accordingly done, when it appeared that tenders for 330 services had not been considered when the contracts were awarded, and in upwards of 100 instances the department, at the time of awarding the contracts, had received tenders to perform the services at lower rates than those at which the contracts had been awarded. Most of such contracts were renewals of existing contracts. In numerous cases, contracts were renewed many months in advance of the time when they would in ordinary course expire. These various methods prevailed, to a great extent, in the year 1895-6. As these investigations appeared instructive as illustrating the serious extent of the loss to the treasury by the renewal of contracts without tender, a statement was prepared showing the dealings of the department with the mail contracts during the last year of the administration of the late government, from which it appears that 1,416 contracts had been made during that year, and that of these 598 had been let without tender. That is 42½ per cent in number of all the contracts entered during such years were let without tender. In looking at the aggregate of the amounts for which these contracts had been made, the results are even more striking. The total of these amounts was $856,953.14, and of this sum the contracts let without tender amounted to $457,952.70, or 53½ per cent of the whole.

There is a statement of the particulars showing among other things that during the last year of my hon. friend's administration of the department he let over 100 contracts at higher prices than the prices at which he had tenders to perform the services then in the department, and that in many instances contracts were let without his even opening the tenders to see what was in them. I may say that in re-letting these contracts, which were so improvidently let by my hon. friend, we did so at prices, obtained by tender, which resulted in a saving to the country of the sum of $415,740. It is not very difficult to understand how our accounts are better balanced and so nearly in equilibrium when I point to items of this kind. I would ask my hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster) who, I believe, has taken a great interest in education and in the elevation of the standard which is to be the example of young men, to say whether he thinks the method I have indicated was a correct method of dealing with public contracts. It appears to me that he must have been unaware of these transactions, or they would not have received his sanction. Now that I have called his attention to them, I trust that when he again addresses the committee he will express his unqualified disapproval of them.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I would like to ask the hon. Postmaster General whether he states that new contracts were let without any tenders being called for, or whether he refers to contracts which had been let by tender, but were continued without tender under the law and under the practice of the Post Office Department ever since it has been in existence. If that be so, it changes the question completely, and that is a point which the hon. gentleman in fairness should state.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I refer as the foundation of my statement to the printed particulars which have been on the files of parliament for three years. The hon. gentleman will find all the details to make good my statement in the supplementary report of the department presented to parliament in the spring of 1897. I know that in the Post Office Act authority is given to renew contracts. That is a perfectly proper provision, and I am not directing my remarks against any proper exercise of that authority. The cases I referred to were those in which contracts were entered into in some cases by way of renewals without calling for tenders, in some cases without regarding tenders that were called for—over a hundred cases in which lower tenders were passed over and higher tenders accepted, resulting in a loss of $415,000 to the people of Canada.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The point I want to get at is whether in the 330 cases in which the hon. gentleman says tenders were disregarded, they were existing contracts which were continued without calling for new tenders. That is the law and the practice, as the hon. gentleman knows.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I understand that the law gives to the minister the right to renew, under certain circumstances, without calling for tenders. If he renews a contract without calling for tenders, he assumes the responsibility of being justified by parliament in that renewal. In three hundred and thirty cases, the hon. gentleman chose to assume that responsibility. In one hundred other cases he chose to disregard the lower tenders that were in the department, and let the contracts at higher amounts. I took those cases in which he acted improvidently. I took the three hundred and thirty cases, where he had renewed without calling for tenders, and the one hundred cases where he had passed over lower tenders, and cancelled those contracts, and put them all up for public competition, and in every case awarded the contract to the lowest tenderer qualified to perform the service, with the result that we saved to the country $415,000. That, at all events, the country will understand as one method whereby the expenditure may be brought within a measurable distance of the revenue.

I propose for a moment to allude to the record of the late administration in the matter of annual deficits. The financial success or failure of the Post Office Department depends upon whether or not a faithful, careful regard is had to details. The post office administration is essentially one of details, and any laxity in matters of detail will have a serious effect upon the general result. I know of no other department of which that can be so truthfully said. We have eight thousand or nine thousand small contracts, representing an aggregate of the best part of a million dollars a year, and the least wastefulness on each contract aggregates a large sum. We have 1,500 employees, and if you choose to add a few hundred, as a careless minister may, you can unnecessarily increase expenditure, and so all along the line a faithful regard for detail is absolutely essential.

Taking the net revenue and the net expenses of the department from 1889 to 1896, when the hon. gentleman left office, what do I find? I find the following:

Resumé of the financial statements of the Post Office Department for the last ten years, and the rates which the deficit bears to the revenue in each year:

Year.	Revenue.		Expendi- ture.		Deficit.		Ratio of Deficit to Revenue.
	$	cts.	$	cts.	$	cts.
1889...	2,220,503	66	2,982,321	48	761,817	82	34·31
1890...	2,357,388	95	3,074,469	91	717,080	96	30·42
1891...	2,515,823	44	3,161,675	72	645,852	28	25·67
1892...	2,652,745	79	3,316,120	03	663,374	24	25·01
1893...	2,773,507	71	3,421,203	17	647,695	46	23·35
1894...	2,809,341	06	3,517,251	31	707,920	25	25·20
1895...	2,792,789	64	3,593,647	47	800,857	83	28·68

In 1896, the year the late government left office, not counting the enormous debt that was left unpaid, but simply what they did pay, they expended $700,907 in excess of all the post office revenue collected, or in other words 23 per cent more than the revenue. We then took office. These hon. gentlemen had established a degree of expenditure that could not be curtailed all at once, but nevertheless at the close of the next fiscal year, 1897, the deficit was only $586,000, or 18 per cent of the annual revenue. Never since 1899 had the percentage of expenditure been as low as it was in 1897.

We then come to the year closing the 30th June, 1898, and the deficit that year was $47,602, or 1·35 per cent of the net revenue. It was in that year, when I came to the conclusion that by good management it was possible to make the department self-sustaining; that the public interests and the condition of the department fully warranted us in entering on a policy of reduction of postage which has since been so happily carried into effect.

Take the year closing 1899, although the country had enjoyed six months of this reduced postage, the deficit was only $398,000, or 12 per cent of the net revenue. Let me give the figures in detail for the years I have just mentioned :

Year.	Revenue.		Expendi- ture.		Deficit.		Ratio of Deficit to Revenue.
	$	cts.	$	cts.	$	cts.
1896...	2,964,014	23	3,665,011	30	700,997	07	23·62
1897...	3,202,938	42	3,789,478	24	586,539	92	18·31
1898...	3,527,809	69	3,575,411	99	47,602	30	1·35
1899...	3,182,930	92	3,581,848	71	398,917	79	12·53

Take the whole of the period from 1889 until the late government left office, the lowest percentage of expenditure as compared with the revenue was 23 per cent. And if you take the expenditure of the department for 1898, and wish to ascertain what according to the methods of hon. gentlemen opposite, the deficit would have been—take their best year, the year 1895, when their expenditure was 23 per cent—of their net revenue, and apply that measure to our administration of 1899, and you will find that our deficit for 1899 ought to have been, according to that method, $823,740.40. But instead of that, it was but $47,602.30.

It being One o'clock, the Committee took recess.

The Committee resumed at Three O'clock, o'clock.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). Before recess, in answer to a question by my hon. friend from Three Rivers (Sir Adolphe Caron), I gave what I thought was an explanation of a point he raised, namely, as to the meaning of a paragraph in the preface of the supplementary report of the Post Office Department in 1896. The hon. gentleman wanted to know the meaning of the following words: 'It appeared that tenders for 330 services had not been considered when contracts were awarded, and, in upward of one hundred instances the department, at the time of awarding the contracts, had received tenders to perform the services at lower rates than those at which the contracts had been awarded.' I gave my hon. friend the most favourable version of what I took to be the meaning of the reference to 330 tenders. I thought this referred to 330 cases where the hon. gentleman had exercised his right as Postmaster General to renew a contract without tender. But, on inquiry, I find that I gave him too favourable a reply. I find that the facts are that in the case of 330 contracts, he had received tenders, but did not open them, and the contracts were made without reference to these 330 sets of tenders; and also, that when the tenders were opened, it was found that a certain number of these tenders were for prices much lower than the amounts at which the contracts were let. I endeavoured to illustrate the policy of the department since the present government took office in regard to this department, and I think the illustration I gave will fairly enable the public to understand that our policy was to administer the department on proper business principles, with a due regard to efficiency and to the interest of the taxpayers. The carrying out of that policy, begun in the summer of 1896, warranted the conclusion which was reached within less than eighteen months, that, by the continuous employment of these methods, the department might reasonably expect, within a short time, to be a self-sustaining department, and it would be the part of wisdom at the earliest moment to endeavour to establish a lower rate of postage not only within Canada itself, but also between Canada and Great Britain and the British possessions generally, and between Canada and the United States. As soon as the government reached the conclusion that it was to the interest of the country, at the earliest possible moment, to bring about these freer postal facilities—for the lower the rate the freer the facilities—it became my duty to study somewhat the utterances of hon. gentlemen on the subject generally, with the view to forming an opinion how far it would be wise for us to proceed. One great question that had been attracting public attention for a length of time, the question of reduced postage within our own country—the domestic letter rate as it is called—had been discussed both inside and outside of parliament. I began to study the subject, if I may say it, by referring to the official records, among them the report of the Postmaster General for the year 1893. In that report, I find the following opinion expressed by my predecessor with reference to this question. I quote from page xxvi of that report :

Whilst the department is thus being assailed on one hand by those who consider that its revenue and expenditure should be more nearly equalized, it is at the same time being urged to reduce to 2 cents an ounce the postage on letters, the inevitable result of which would be so large a reduction in the revenue, and as a necessary consequence so vast a discrepancy between the revenue and expenditure as to materially cripple the operations of the department for years to come. That this is no mere hasty assertion, unsupported by facts, may at once be demonstrated. The lowest estimate of the effect of a reduction to 2 cents in the rate of postage is a loss of revenue of at least $750,000, which, even if postage on newspapers were reimposed, by which an additional revenue of $100,000 would be obtained, would still leave a deficiency of $650,000, which, added to the present amount, would make $1,250,000 a year to be provided by parliament over and above the revenue, and what Postmaster General could be expected, in the face of such a deficiency, to entertain propositions for additional expenditures to improve the service, however necessary they might appear.

That was the deliberate opinion of the government in 1893. In 1894, Mr. Coatsworth, then member of this House for East Toronto, a supporter of the government, moved the following resolution :

That it is expedient to reduce the general rate of postage on letters from 3 cents to 2 cents.

Referring to Hansard of 1894, page 2206, I find that the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Adolphe Caron) is reported as expressing himself as follows:

The proposition of my hon. friend would represent a loss to the revenue, not of $650,000 per annum, but of $800,000. . . . Without attempting at all to discuss the financial question, I think we shall all admit that by reducing the tariff we have been relieving the people of some of their obligations, and, therefore, it seems to me this is hardly the moment when any of the friends of this country, or any who wish well for its future, should expect the government again to reduce the revenue by $800,000 more.

My hon. friend in these remarks, had reference solely to the domestic rate. He an-icipated a loss of revenue of $800,000. He did not appear to consider at that time the loss of revenue from the reduction of the Imperial rate, because, at a later period, he intimated that if we reduced the letter rate from Canada to England—I presume he meant to the colonies as well, though I do not know that he said so—such reductions would involve a further loss of revenue to the extent of $100,000. That is, his estimate was that the reduction of the domestic letter rate and the reduction of the Imperial rate would mean an annual loss of revenue of $900,000. In 1896, the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster), at that time the Finance Minister, in his budget speech, delivered on January 31, 1896, said :

In the Post Office we have an increased estimate of $240,780, which is a large increase. The demands for the opening up of new lines, and for greater frequency and greater thoroughness in the delivery and despatch of mails, are continually pressing upon the Post Office Department, and a large expenditure has necessarily to be made if we are to keep at all even with the requirements of the times, which we are bound to do. There is now a deficit of somewhere near $800,000 between the total receipts and the total expenditures of our post office service, and this, I fear, makes the time somewhat distant when, what otherwise might be fairly asked for, can be granted, that is, a reduction upon the rates of postage in this country. Considering the large extent of country, the sparseness of the population, and the great expense necessarily imposed for carrying letters and papers in our North-west and in other parts of the country, there is no doubt that the carriage of letters, newspapers and parcels in this country is cheaper, for the population, than you would probably find it in any other country in the world.

That was the opinion of the ex-Minister of Finance as expressed in the last budget speech he ever delivered in this House.

Well, Sir, the government came to the conclusion, notwithstanding these unfavourable opinions, that the untoward results anticipated would not follow. When in 1898, parliament was asked to authorize the government to reduce the domestic letter rate from 3 cents to 2 cents, I expressed the opinion that, whilst there would be a temporary loss of revenue amounting to about $650,000 a year. I regarded that loss as but temporary and believed that in a reasonable period of time, about three years, the revenue would recover the position it had prior to the reduction. It will be for those who study the fact to say how far that prophecy has been fulfilled. We reduced the postage on domestic letters on January 1, 1899. A week before that, the letter rate from Canada to Great Britain and a good many of the British possessions had been reduced from 5 cents to 2 cents.

On the 1st of January, 1899, we also reduced the rate from 3 cents to 2 cents on letters passing from Canada to the United States, and thus we may say, commencing on that date, we had three reductions, these three different classes of reductions all influencing the revenue at the same time. A few days afterwards the leader of the opposition, addressing a public meeting on the 14th of February, 1899, at Clinton, with reference to the action of the government in reducing the letter rates in Canada, expressed himself as follows :

To the large banking institutions and important mercantile interests, who are wealthy, do an enormous amount of business, and write a great many letters, the reduction of postage is a very important thing. But I have yet to learn that the mass of the women of Canada will relish to have to pay on the tea they drink—tea which was made free by us—in order to put money into the hands of the bankers, commercial men and other wealthy classes.

Again, Sir, since this session began, the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Adolphe Caron) expressed himself as follows :

But to come back to the reduction of postage from 3 cents to 2 cents, I say, there again, it does not apply impartially. Whom does it benefit? The great commercial houses who write to Bombay, to China and Japan for the purposes of their trade. The farmer does not write any more letters than he used to, but he has to make up, out of his hard earnings, the difference between the 2 cents and the 3 cents, and the 2 cents and the 5 cents.

My hon. friend is not only opposed to the reduction from 3 cents to 2 cents in Canada, and to the reduction from 3 cents to 2 cents to the States, but also to the reduction from 5 cents to 2 cents to Great Britain and her colonies. He proceeds to say :

It is the poor man who has to pay that. The wealthy men and the wealthy houses who have to communicate for their own purposes with the great commercial centres of the world write their letters, whether they pay 5 cents or 1 cent, and to make up for the loss of revenue the poor man, who writes one letter a month, or two letters a month, has to put his hand into his pocket and contribute the amount necessary to make up the difference between 2 cents and 3 cents, the postage which formerly existed. I have stated that I was in favour of reducing the postage from 3 cents to 2 cents if we could have afforded to do so. I met a gentleman in England, Mr. Henniker Heaton, when I was Postmaster General, and we discussed the whole question. I admitted that it would be a good thing to have one rate of postage for the whole empire, but I said Canada could not afford it, as we would be losing $800,000 revenue a year.

Now, Sir, those were the encouraging words, some of them, prior to our taking the step we did, and some of them discouraging statements made since. Now, let us fit these prophecies and statements to the facts as disclosed by the revenues of the Post Office Department since the reduction, and see whose judgment was right and whose judgment was wrong. The hon. member for Three Rivers and his friends opposite, seem to agree, and I will not quarrel with them in their figures, that the reduction in question would involve an annual loss of revenue of $800,000 on the domestic letter rate and $100,000 on the Imperial rate. Well, we had all these reductions in force for six months in 1899 from the first day of January, or practically so—the Imperial rate went into force a week earlier. They were in force for six months of the last fiscal year. If the hon. gentleman's prophecies were correct, they involved a loss for the six months of $450,000 of revenue, being one-half of his total estimate of the year's loss of $900,000. Well, Sir, the hon. gentlemen opposite put themselves on record as saying that the department could not be carried on, no matter what the rate of postage was, without the loss of at least $800,000 a year, as when they were collecting these higher rates. Accordingly, if you add to their uniform annual deficit approaching $800,000 a year, in round numbers, a deficit which they had for many years, if you add to that the $450,000 loss of revenue from reduction in postage for the half year ending 30th June, 1899, which amount we left in the pockets of the people, not exacting from them the higher postage of the previous regime, but the lower rate of our time, leaving this $450,000 in the pockets of the people—it would add to the deficit of $800,000 for the year 1899 and make it $1,250,000. Now, I do not care whether the contention of the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster), that this $57,000 in the Yukon should or should not be estimated. I give him any crumb of comfort he can take from that. But take the Postmaster General's Report, as laid upon the Table of the House, and what does it show? It shows that for the fiscal year ending 1899, notwithstanding the fact that we left $450,000 money in the pockets of the people which they at a higher rate would have taken out, it shows that instead of our deficit being $1,250,000 for the year, or even the $800,000 which they always had, the people enjoyed that reduced rate for one-half of that year at an expenditure of only $398,917.79 in excess of revenue. Why, Mr. Chairman, if you double the deficit of last year, it would not give you $800,000, and it thus means, comparing administration with administration, that the people get their reduced rates at no increased cost of taxation. The deficit of $800,000 in our predecessors' time would pay for a deficit of $800,000 in our time, and give the people reduced postage as well. Now, Mr. Chairman, let me say that it is quite easily understood that when a reduction in postage takes place it is attended at first by a substantial loss of revenue; but as the days go by the revenue increases. I am a believer in the theory that the cheaper you make these charges the more you encourage the use of the service, and it is a narrow policy, I think, to maintain high rates if these high rates have the effect of diminishing the use made of the postal service. Now, let me tell you what the result of the financial operations of the department was for the fiscal year 1899. Permit me to say for the comfort of those desponding people who thought we should have always an annual loss of $800,000 or $900,000 a year because of the reduction in the rates, for the comfort of those gentlemen who have so little confidence in the resources of their country, let me tell them how the revenue for the eleven months of this fiscal year compares with the revenue for the eleven months of the fiscal year under the higher rates. Taking the eleven months of the fiscal year of 1897-8 and comparing them with the eleven months of this present year, what do we find? We find that the increased gross revenue for the eleven months of 1897-8 amounted to $4,051,489; and for the eleven months of this current year it was $3,716,092, or a gross decrease of $335,397. If the decrease for the month of June should be continued rateably with the decrease for the previous eleven months of this year, it will show that the gross loss of revenue from these reductions, instead of being for this year, as hon. gentlemen opposite expected, $900,000, does not even reach $350,000.

I am gratified to be able to tell you, Mr. Chairman, that the reductions have been steadily marked by growing increases in the revenue. Whilst the gradual decline of loss has not kept actual step with each month—that is, some months showed more and some less—still, there has always been a downward movement in the loss. That is to say, there has been an upward movement in the revenue. At the earlier stages of this reduction, the loss, month by month, was quite what was anticipated, and even a little more.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Would the hon. gentleman allow me to interrupt him? Where has the chief gain been in revenue?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Will my hon. friend (Mr. Montague) permit me to deal with this point first? During the earliest periods, after this reduction was in force, our monthly loss of revenue embraced such sums as $80,000, which represents, perhaps, $1,000,000 a year, if maintained uniformly throughout the year. But such months were exceptional, and month after month the revenue has been growing and has been getting nearer to what it was in the corresponding months under the higher rates of hon. gentlemen opposite, until, at last, in the month of May, just closed, the revenue was only $4,386 less than in the month of May, 1898, when the higher rates prevailed. This means that we have practically recovered the loss of revenue brought about by these reductions. I cannot give the revenue for the month of June as it has not yet been made up. It will not be made up until the 16th of July. The hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) asks me how these increases have been made up. If he will turn to the Postmaster General's Report he will find it stated there that there have been very considerable increases in the number of domestic letters. I am told that there has been a discontinuance, to a very large extent, of the practice of sending unsealed printed, etc., letters which formerly passed at one cent, but which, when sealed up, paid 3 cents. Under the reduced rate, namely 2 cents, many people who formerly sent letters open, circulars and so on, now, under the reduced rate, seal them. I am also told that the cheap letter rate is attracting people to the use of letters instead of post-cards. This is the information I have received from Mr. Stanton.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Where can that information be found in the report?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I think, if the hon. gentleman (Sir Adolphe Caron) will turn up the report, he will find a falling off in the number of postal cards issued.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What I want to get is something for the purpose of comparison. Has the hon. gentleman taken two years some time during the decade previous to the 2-cent rate being adopted, and two years since, and compared the increase in the letters carried?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. If the hon. gentleman will kindly renew his question, I will think it out in a moment. I wish to answer one of his questions first. The hon. gentleman asked me some of the sources of increased revenue, and I was giving them to him. I will give him another.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes, but—

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Will the hon. gentleman permit me? I want to finish my sentence first. I was answering the hon. gentleman's inquiry, and I propose to mention another source of revenue under this new policy of the government, and I am sure that what I am about to announce will be most gratifying to every member of this House and to every citizen of Canada. Although it may not mean a very great increase, it means a substantial increase. I refer to the revenue derived from letters from Canada to Great Britain, and those British possessions which have come under the new inter-Imperial penny rate. When the 2-cent rate had been in force some fifteen months I requested the secretary of the department, Mr. LeSueur, an old and experienced officer, one in whose judgment and integrity every one can place the utmost confidence, to have an account taken and to inform me, if he could do so, to what extent the correspondence despatched from Canada to Great Britain and to British possessions, had been affected by the reduced postage. Perhaps I cannot do better than read his letter on the subject. He informed me of the result at the time that it was known, and yesterday I asked him if he would put it in writing. He has addressed to me the following letter :

Ottawa, June 28, 1900.

Dear Mr. Mulock,—In reply to your inquiry as to the effect of the reduction in the rate of letter postage from Canada to Great Britain and those British possessions which adopted the reduced intra-Imperial penny rate which took effect on December 25, 1898, I have to say that, from a careful count made of the correspondence despatched from Canada to Great Britain and such British possessions, I am able to state that the amount of postage which is now being collected on the correspondence in question quite equals, and probably exceeds, what was being collected at a corresponding period prior to the reduction of the postage.

This implies, I need hardly observe, an increase of 150 per cent in the volume of correspondence forwarded.

Faithfully yours,
(Sgd.) W. D. LeSUEUR, Secretary.

The Hon. William Mulock.

Mr. MONTAGUE. He does not give the figures.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I am sure, Mr. Chairman, that the information is most gratifying to hon. gentlemen. I have read all he has given me. My hon. friend (Mr. Montague) desires to know in what other way the revenue has been increased. I refer him to the Postmaster General's Report, and if he will kindly turn to the portion of it which gives an estimate of the letters sent for the year, he will there find a statement showing the estimate of the increase in the number of domestic letters.

I have just one word more to say, and it is generally in reference to the operations of the department for the fiscal year 1899, and the fiscal year 1896. I make these comparisons representing, as they do, the last fiscal year under this administration for which we have accounts, and the last fiscal year of the late administration. I give now a comparison in the work and cost of the department during these two years. In 1899 there were in operation in Canada

9,420 post offices, and in 1896 9,103. We increased the number of post offices by 317, or an increase of 3½ per cent. In 1899 the number of savings bank offices was 838; in 1896 it was 755. We increased the number by eighty-three, or an increase of 11 per cent.

In 1899, we had 2,640 offices engaged in the issue of postal notes. This is an entirely new branch of the service, established about two years ago. There was no such convenience in olden days.

In 1899, there were 142,141 accounts in the savings banks of the post offices, and in 1896, there was 126,442, or, in other words, during these three years, there was an increase of 15,699.

We have increased the number of money order offices from 1,310 in 1896, to 1,779 in 1899, an increase of 469, or an increased percentage of nearly 26 per cent.

The amount of money orders issued by this department in 1899 exceeds the amount issued in 1896 by $1,386,136.79, or an increase of over 10 per cent.

Those who may think that we have cramped the service in other respects will have their fears allayed when I mention the increase in the mileage. I have pointed out the increase in the number of post offices; the increased work done in the Post Office Department, and now I beg to say that, for the fiscal year beginning 1899—the fiscal year covered by the accounts now under discussion—we are carrying the mails 1,438,095 miles more than they were ever carried in any previous year.

As to the volume of general mail matter, of all kinds, which passed through the post office during the fiscal year just closed, and comparing with it the volume during the fiscal year 1896, we find that the total number of articles of all kinds carried in the mails during 1896 was 177,178,130, while during the fiscal year of 1899, the department carried through the mails 228,024,900 pieces, or an increase in three years of 50,846,770 pieces, equal to an increase of 28½ per cent.

Now, Sir, as to the revenue during these periods. The annual revenue for the year closing in 1896, under the late administration, was $2,964,014.23, but during the last fiscal year, notwithstanding the loss of this $450,000 in reduced postage, we did so much more business for the less money that the total net revenue of the post office was $3,182,930.92, or a net increase of revenue in 1899 over 1896 of $218,916.69. The following table gives the precise figures :

Mr. MULOCK.

This increase in the work, and consequent increase in revenue represents an enormous amount of work done by the department in 1899, as compared with the work done in 1896. I hope it will be gratifying to hon. gentlemen opposite; at all events, it will be gratifying to the taxpayers of Canada to know that this increased service, representing, probably, an increase of 25 per cent in additional postal facilities to the public, has been obtained, not with a deficit of $800,000 a year as formerly, not by a rapid increase, it is true, but at a cost of $83,162.59 less than was spent by the late government in performing the post office service in 1896.

With reference to the future of this department, I join with others in very modestly venturing into the realm of prophesy. It can hardly be called unwarrantable for me to state what I think is the immediate future of the Post Office Department. I consider that within a month or two the revenue of the Post Office Department will be equal to what it was when it reached its highest point under the higher rates of postage. I do not think there is any possible doubt upon that point, because for the month of May it was within about $4,000 of the highest amount reached in any corresponding month of May on the higher rates. In spite of what may be said to the contrary, these cheapened rates have brought the post office nearer to the people of Canada, and not merely the bankers and the commercial men, and the men who write to China, Hong Kong and Japan—not merely those, but the masses of the people have availed themselves of the cheaper rates, as can be found by the returns in the Postmaster General's Report, from the humblest post office in Canada. You will find the same steady growth in the rural post offices as in the city offices. If it were only the wealthy that were taking advantage of the extra facilities now offered by the Post Office Department, we would find an enormous increase in the cities and we would find an enormous decrease in the country. That is not the case. The total revenues from the city offices is about one-third of the total revenues of the Post Office Department, and the increase keeps pace fairly between one and the other, so that from the increase in the city post offices we can make an estimate of what would be the increase in the rural districts. It is an entire error for any hon. gentleman to assume that the reduced postage has not been fully taken advantage of by the humblest people as well as by that class for which my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) thinks we should not be solicitous. The post office is an institution for the masses, and we are bringing it nearer and nearer to them every day by cheapening the rates, increasing the post offices, extending the facilities. In no better way can you bring it within their reach than to make it cheap and accessible to the poorest in the land. The post office is intended for the poor as well as for the rich, and the masses of the people have recognized our policy of giving cheaper postage, and have profited by it to their own advantage and at no loss to the service itself. I have very carefully studied the matter month after month since the reduction; indeed, I might say, that from day to day I have watched it at every point, the outgoing of stamps and the revenues from every part of this country, and I say here, unqualifiedly, that a careful analysis of the revenue from all parts entirely disproves the contention that the reduction of postage does not enure to the benefit of the poor as well as of the rich. And, Sir, having thus brought the post office within the reach of the masses as well as of the classes, we shall have a much more rapid growth in its revenue, which will enable it to become a prosperous, if not a self-sustaining department. I say here, that when this fiscal year we are now entering upon closes—the fiscal year of 1900-1901—the post office will show, under good management, a surplus, if you choose to work it for a surplus, or it will show a greatly increased service out of the legitimate earnings of the Post Office Department. I hope, Mr. Chairman, that this result will satisfy hon. gentlemen that we have not been unmindful of the best interests of the country in the policy that has characterized the administration of this department under the present government.

Mr. FOSTER. I propose just to take up for a very short time, the points of divergence between the hon. Postmaster General and myself, and then turn him over to my hon. friend at my right (Sir Adolphe Caron) with reference to the details of the post office business. The Postmaster General did not stay long on the burning ground which I opened up for him this morning. It was too hot for his feet, and he left it as quickly as he could. But while he did stay there, he made a lot of assertions which he could not prove, but he did not in the slightest degree dispose of the charge which I made, of cooking and manipulation of the post office accounts. He first went off on the ground that it would be perfectly fair and right to eliminate the lean and barren ground of a newly-opened district from the receipts and expenditures, in order that you might have a fair comparison. Well, Sir, that has never been attempted in the administration of any department of the government before. They have had to take the greater with the less, the long with the short, the barren with the rich: and I do not think my hon. friend will find a single man behind him who will follow him in that lead, by which he keeps the receipts for himself and shoulders the expenditures upon another department. That is what the hon. gentleman has done. He has not denied it; he cannot deny it. Here are the public accounts; that is where we go for the records, and not to any footnotes hidden away in the hon. gentleman's own report; and I challenge him to show one single dollar of these expenditures of 1897, 1898, 1899, which go into the sum total of the Post Office Department, as shown in the public accounts. But these public accounts show the $10,000 of revenue, which he got out of the Yukon postage business. In other words, in the public accounts, as they go to the country, he takes credit for the revenues, but he sedulously and carefully refrains from taking to himself the debit of costs. These are borne by the Department of the North-west

Mounted Police. The hon. gentleman knows it, because in his own report he states in one footnote that the expenditures in that country during 1898-9, were about $69,000; but in the public accounts, these expenses are not included in the expenses of the Post Office Department. My hon. friend may call that what he likes; I call it a manipulation of the public accounts; I call it going before the people of this country under false pretenses; I call it taking a mean and paltry advantage of $10,000 of revenue for the Post Office Department in one field, and shouldering upon a companion department all the expenses of the Post Office Department in the same field for a single year. My hon. friend has not cleared up that point. Nor has he cleared up the other point which I made, that last year he promised this House, that he would make the apportionment, and he has not done so. I find in his own report that he acknowledges that the services in the Yukon during that year, including a fixed sum for the services of the North-west Mounted Police, cost $69,350.39, the cost thus exceeding the revenue by $58,503.78; and this morning, in his address to this House, he acknowledged that there was a deficit of $58,503, as between working expenses and revenue in the Yukon mail-carrying service for 1898-9, which was shouldered by him upon the North-west Mounted Police department in the public accounts. The hon. gentleman may call that what he likes; but in plain English it is simply presenting the public accounts to the people under false pretenses. The hon. gentleman started out with a tu quoque argument. He said: 'You taunt me with having a post office service for the Yukon paid for by the North-west Mounted Police, and you did the same thing.' Well, I had his own Deputy Postmaster General on oath before the Public Accounts Committee, and I will read the answers I got from him, and which I have no doubt are correct. First, the Postmaster General said that in 1895, 1896 and 1897, the government had the mails carried into the Yukon, and did not pay for the service through the Post Office Department. Then he said there were three contracts, one for sixty-five pounds, at $10 per pound, with a man named Healy, and two others with a man named Moore, at $600 each. Now, mark what the Deputy Postmaster General said:

Q. Previous to that period is there any record of weights in the department?—A. Not of any definite service. There were isolated services.

Q. What are these?—A. In 1896 there were sixty-five pounds sent in by a man named Healy, for which he was to receive $600.

Q. That contract was made by whom?—A. By the Post Office Department.

That part of the Postmaster General's charge falls to the ground, if the information sworn to by his deputy minister is correct. His charge was that we were guilty of doing the same thing that we were charging against him, and his deputy minister on oath, declares that the contract was made with the Post Office Department. Well, we shall see as to the payment :

Q. Was he paid that?—A. No. He lost the mails at Chilcoat Pass in December and they were not recovered until the following spring.

Q. That was sixty-five pounds for which you were to give him?—A. $600. He carried it as far as the Chilcoat in 1895, where the mail was lost, and it was afterwards found by a miner who was going in the following spring, and who carried it to Dawson, for which he was paid $100.

So that not only was the contract made with the Post Office Department, but of course the payment, such as it was, was made by the Post Office Department.

Q. That is one item—any others?—A. Then Mr. Moore, who carried two mails, he made two trips at $600 a trip; he took them in in 1896.

Q. How much did he take in per trip?—A. There is no definite statement of the mail, although Mr. White assures me that it was about sixty pounds.

Q. Each trip?—A. Yes.

Q. When was that?—A. They were carried in June and July, 1897, for which he was paid.

I think that is probably a mistake for 1896, which is mentioned before.

Q. Any others?—A. That is all the special trips.

Q. That is all the information you have in the department with reference to trips, weights and amounts paid?—A. Yes, for the special trips.

Q. Two sums of $600 each and one of $100 were paid by the Post Office Department?—A. Yes.

Q. Charged in their account?—A. Yes. Then there was another trip made by Mr. Mahony in 1897.

That was in 1896. That also was made by the Post Office Department.

Q. And after looking over the records, these are all you could find?—A. These are all of the special contracts made by the Post Office Department.

Q. And those that were not special contracts you have in your statement?—A. Yes.

Q. And after looking over the record, these are all you could find, these are all of the special contracts made by the Post Office Department, and those that were not special contracts you have in your statement?—A. Yes.

There is the testimony of the Deputy Postmaster General, and it is directly contradictory of the statement made by the Postmaster General this morning.

The hon. gentleman went on, leaving this charge which he has not disproved and which stands as clearly as anything stands, namely, that he had got the work done for him to the tune of about $50,000 in 1898-9, and a large sum in 1897, the year preceding, as to which you can only make an estimate, looking at the conditions and circumstances, that he charged that to another department, and took good care to take to his own department whatever revenue came from the postal matter which was thus carried leaving this charge he went on to say, in a 'tu quoque' style of argument, you talk about keeping accounts, why there was a balance of $600,000, which I found in the department when I came in to administer it, that was due on the preceding year and there was no vote to cover it, and it had been the practice in the department to pay the last quarter of the preceding year out of the vote which was taken in the succeeding year.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I said nothing about the last quarter.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman said that there was about $600,000, which, after July 1, 1898, had no vote in that year just past.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Not 1898.

Mr. FOSTER. Any year. 1895 then, we will say that there was $600,000 after July 1, 1896, which had no appropriation for the year just then past to cover it. That is the statement the hon. gentleman made. There are several things to be said about that. In the first place, the hon. gentleman endeavoured to create the impression that these were concealed accounts. Not in the least. Every bill, every account, every voucher went through the regular processes of the department and was ultimately paid and then went through the audit by the Auditor General. There was no concealment of any single bill or voucher, and everything was paid and audited according to the usual processes of the department and the Auditor General. Where is the concealment? Where is the cooking of accounts? But, I tell you what did take place and what took place for a long number of years in that department. The accounts of the last quarter of every year, falling due on June 30, ran into the succeeding year before they could be adjusted and paid. A certain lapse of time, half a month or three-quarters or a month passes before these bills are in, and the practice has grown up in the department of running that balance of the last quarter of the preceding year into the next year and paying it out of the appropriation for the succeeding year. You can find fault with that system if you please. I would be inclined to find fault with it myself because the proper system is that each year shall cover its expenditure by its own proper vote, and that matters shall be closed at the end of the year. Only a few days ago, we had to vote in this House the sum of $75,000 over expended in the Immigration Department alone, for which they have no vote, and the minister had to come down and get a supplementary vote to cover the expenditure which had not been authorized, which had not been estimated for, and consequently had to be met simply and solely by a supplementary vote. That was the practice in the department and that balance of $400,000 or $500,000 or $600,000, ran over and was paid out of the succeeding year's vote. At the end of the next year, the same thing was repeated. I do not say that that is the best method to adopt, but that was the method which became the practice in that department and it was the practice which obtained while I was there. But there was no concealing of cooking effects. Nothing of the kind. Every item came out in its proper course, went through the auditing and investigating branch of the department, was paid in the regular way, and came to the audit in the regular way under the Auditor General. So much with reference to that. I am not going to go into the details of the hon. gentleman's long speech with reference to the Post Office Department. I will leave that to my hon. friend the member for Three Rivers, who is more conversant with it.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. My hon. friend did not deal with that part of my observation in which I stated that his administration in 1895, utilized the North-west Mounted Police for the Yukon service.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to deal with that?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Yes, and I will mention other matters at the same time. He did not deal with another statement I made, namely, that the late government had conducted portions of the mail service for many years in the North-west Territories and charged the cost of those services to the Department of the Interior, the Indian Department and the North-west Mounted Police, in three equal parts.

The hon. gentleman pretends that because the accounts for the $680,000 of over due bills were in the department and passed in the regular way to the Auditor General, there was a full statement of them upon the public record of the government. The hon. gentleman is contending that the public accounts shall show all the expenditure and the revenues in the year charged and credited to each particular department, will he explain why he did not charge against his department the $680,000, owing at the end of the year 1896, for which there was no parliamentary appropriation? If he can not, will he show any place in the public accounts that discloses to the public that there was owing and outstanding for past services the sum of $680,000 by the Post Office Department.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman is quite insistent in his demands that I shall answer his statement, which I am quite willing to do, and I would like to have equal courtesy on his part in answering the charges I prefer against him. What was the first question? It was that in 1894-5, the Yukon mails was sent up into the Yukon at the cost of the mounted police.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I said 1895

Mr. FOSTER. Very well, will my hon. friend read over the statements which was made by the comptroller of the mounted police, in which he will find what I quoted this morning, namely, that up to and including 1896, the mail matter which went into the Yukon was so small that it could be carried in a small despatch bag, let him read the statement of my hon. friend (Sir Adolphe Caron) that we made an arrangement for sending the mail from Seattle at no cost at all to the department, and the statement of the Deputy Postmaster General that the contracts which were made in 1895-6, were contracts made with the Post Office Department and paid by the Post Office Department. And I think it is an absolutely fair statement to make, that for 1895 and 1896, and the first part of 1897—certainly for 1895 and 1896—it was stated to have been contracted for by the post office and paid for by the post office. Very little mail, if any, went into the Yukon, and that was at no cost to this government. I questioned Mr. White particularly with reference to that, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) can satisfy himself on that point by a perusal of the evidence. That mail, up to 1897, was mail which absolutely cost nothing to the government outside of what was paid by contract with the Post Office Department, and the fact that it was so very small was a reason why it cost so little. The steamer carried the mail in its despatch box, and nothing was paid for it.

Now, the hon. gentleman raises a point as to the North-west service. He says that in the early part of the North-west Territories administration the same thing was done, that the mail carriage was charged up to the department which had their work in the North-west Territories, and were carrying on their operations there. I cannot speak by the book with reference to that. The Postmaster General might have brought down the particulars that we might have had something tangible to speak about. But, it must be noted that, in the early development of the North-west, the mails that were carried were almost entirely the mails for the benefit of the departments interested in the North-west, and, consequently, they were a fair charge upon those departments. As soon as the population began to come in and the necessity for the carriage of letters for the public had to be satisfied, the cost ought to have been charged to the Post Office Department. Whether it was or not, I do not know; but I am inclined to think that if you investigate it you will find that it is as I have stated. You may take a copy of the public accounts and you will find that every year's statement of the expenditure of the Post Office Department includes everything that was paid for as being of the service of that year, even though the amounts were held over or paid out of the next year's appropriation. Consequently, there is no manipulation, no falsifying of the public accounts. If it was paid after July 1, 1896, it would still go into the accounts for the fiscal year of 1895, and would appear among the expenditures of 1895—because, as the hon. gentleman knows, the period of four months is allowed after the beginning of the fiscal year for the adjustment of accounts. So, whatever was contracted for service given during the year, even though the account was not adjusted for four months afterwards, was charged to that year, and goes into the public accounts as being an expenditure for that year. And I do not think it possible that creditors of the government would allow their bills to go unpaid for year after year—that seems to me an improbable thing, considering the usual course of creditors.

Mr. JAMES McMULLEN (North Wellington). I feel sure that it was a matter of very great gratification to every hon. member on this side of the House, as well as to some on the other side, to hear the magnificent presentation that the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) made of the handling of the department over which he presides with so much ability and with so much satisfaction to the people of this country. My hon. friend (Mr. Foster) has tried to criticise. He says that the government surely would not refuse to acknowledge their indebtedness and to meet their accounts. He evidently has a very short memory. When the present government came into power, in 1896, they were compelled to pay accounts that had been standing over, that were not acknowledged and that were not provided for, amounting to somewhat over a million of money. These accounts were gathered from the different departments, put in the estimates and flung in the faces of hon. gentlemen opposite, and they sat dumb—they dare not get up to challenge the correctness of the accounts. But they had never provided for them. Has the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) forgotten that the very newspapers on file in the reading-room remained unpaid for, some of them, for twelve years, and the accounts were not provided for? And why? Because hon. gentlemen opposite wanted to hide their responsibility from the people, to keep it hid until after the elections, when they would consider the idea of acknowledging their indebtedness and paying what was honestly due.

Since the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) commenced to make his statement, I got under my eye the supplementary report that he issued in 1896. That report tells a tale the most marvellous I ever saw in a blue-book. Let me give a few of the items. Here, for instance, is the case of the mail service between Albert and Marysville :

In this case a contract was made for $300 per annum, and at the time the contract was authorized there was a tender in the department for $265 per annum. The action of the department resulting in a loss of $35 per annum, or $140 for the full term.

Here is another, the service between Appleton and Carleton Place :

This contract was renewed without tender at the rate of $195 per annum, notwithstanding the inspector's report that a lower rate would be obtained if the service were put up to tender, and that at the time a tender of $15 less was in the department. The loss was $60 for the full term.

Here is another—Arthur and Fergus :

This contract was renewed without tender for $190 per annum, while there was in the department a tender for $149.50 per annum.

A tender lying before the eyes and under the thumb of my hon. friend the ex-Postmaster General (Sir Adolphe Caron) to perform the work for $149.50 less for the term of the contract. Then, again, there is the service between Athlone and Tottenham :

This contract was made without tender for $300 when there was a tender in the department for $197 per annum. When this fact was brought to the attention of the present Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) he cancelled the contract at $300 per annum and awarded it to the lowest tenderer at the rate of his tender, $197 per annum.

The net saving by cancelling that contract and taking the lowest tender was $412 for the term the contract had to run. Let us look at a few more. At Avon, Putnam and station, the contract was let without tender for a period ending the 31st of March, 1896, for $350 per annum, though there was a tender in the department for $310 per annum to do the work, involving a loss of $200 for the time the contract had been let in that way. Then we have another, Ayton railway station. This contract was renewed at $140, while there was a tender in the department under the eye of the ex-Postmaster General to perform the work for $100.94. Then take another, Barrie and Midhurst. This contract was let without tender for $160 a year, while there was in the department a tender to do the work for $130. But the hon. gentleman renewed the contract at the higher rate and refused to open a tender at a lower rate. Then take Belleville and Tweed. This contract was let without tender for $666.70 per year, while there was a tender in the department to do the work for $600, resulting in a net loss to the country for the four years of $266.80. Then take Bluevale and railway station. This contract was let without tender at the rate of $139 per annum, while there was a tender in the department to do it for $93.90, resulting in a loss of $45.10 per year, and during the contract period of $180.40. Then we have the notable contract in connection with the transfer of mails at Brockville. In that case Mr. Cavanagh, who had the contract for the sum of $406, got appointed afterwards transfer agent, and as he could not perform double duty, it became necessary to give the contract to somebody else, and it was put into the hands of his brother, an engine driver living at Smith's Falls, fifty miles away. Still he drew the payment and got for the double service $806 per year. He performed both services and he drew all the money. I will now confine myself to Ontario. Now, we will take another case, Caldwell and Caledon, and Caledon and railway station. This contract was awarded without tender, though the inspector was of the opinion that a lower rate might be obtained. The contract was cancelled and new tenders were invited by the present Postmaster General, resulting in a saving of $85 per annum, or $720 altogether. Then we have the case of Centerville and Tamworth. In that case the contract was let for $207 per annum, while there was a tender in the department to do the work for $175 per annum. Then there is the case of Combermore and Mayworth. This contract was let without tender at the rate of $190 per annum, while there was in the department a tender to perform the work for $148 per annum. In this way a sum of $190 was lost during the contract period. Downeyville and Omeme. This contract was let without tender for $160 per annum, while there was in the department a tender to perform the work for $140 per annum. Erin and railway station. This contract was let without tender for $50 per annum, while there was in the department a tender to do it for $38 per annum. Erinsville and Napanee. The contract was let without tender for $475 per annum, while there was in the department a tender to perform the work for $400 per annum, resulting in a clean loss of $300 during the four years. Then you have the case of Gravenhurst and Affington. This contract was let without tender at $138 per annum, while there was a tender in the department to do it for $118. Humber and Weston. This contract was let without tender for $300 per annum, while the department had before it a tender for $240, resulting in a clean loss of $240. Then you have Janetville and Pontypool. This contract was let without tender for $440 per annum, the amount of the highest tender, while there was in the department a tender for $340 per annum. There were seven tenders in the hands of the Postmaster General for less than the amount at which the contract was let. Then Kemptville and Millar's Corners. This contract was awarded without tender at $172 per annum, the department having cancelled the acceptance of a tender at $150 per annum for the same service. A large saving was also effected there. This was the condition in which the present Postmaster General found the department when he took over its administration. Leaskdale and Sunderland station. The contract was let without tender at $271, while there was a tender in the department for $249 to perform the work, resulting in a loss of $88 for the contract term. Lindsay and railway station. This contract was renewed without tender, and the result was a clean loss in the four years of $298.56, which would have been saved had the lowest tender in the hands of the Postmaster General been accepted. Loch Garry and Maxville, Maxville and railway station. This service was let without tender for the term ending 30th September, 1892, at $494 per annum, and there was a tender in the hands of the Postmaster General to do the work for $300. The loss in that case was $967 for the contract term.

Mountain and Vancamp.—This contract was let without tender at $140 per annum, while there was in the department a tender for $99 per annum, the loss involved being $164 for the contract term.

North Keppel and Owen Sound.—This contract was let without tender at $275 per annum, while there was a tender in the department for $229 per annum, the loss involved being $184 for the contract term.

Rockford and Railway Station.—This contract was let without tender at $145 per annum, while there was in the department a tender for $110 per annum.

Seaforth and Railway Station.—This contract was let without tender at $187.80 per annum, while there was in the department a tender for $125.20 per annum. The loss has been $250.40 for the contract term.

Snyder and Railway Station.—This contract was made without tender at $125 per annum, the department cancelling the acceptance of a tender for $105. The transaction involved a loss of $80 for the contract term.

These are simply a few items that I have pointed out.

Kincardine and Port Elgin.—This contract was renewed without tender at $617 per annum, notwithstanding the statement of the inspector, who was instructed to report on the question of renewal, that there were others who desired to tender for the service. In view of the facts, the present government cancelled the contract and invited tenders, the result being that a contract has been obtained at the rate of $398 per annum, and a saving effected of $219 per annum, or $876 for the contract term.

That simply refers to Ontario. I beg to read the following correspondence in relation to Hockley and Mono Centre contract :

Ottawa, January 25, 1894.

Dear Sir Adolphe,—I inclose you a communication that has been addressed to me by our warm friend who resides in Orangeville, Ont., Mr. J. S. Leighton. You will observe that what he says about the contract for carrying the mail between Hockley and Mono Centre, that is again being tendered for by Mr. Caldwell. If you can renew this contract to Mr. Caldwell at the old figure, I shall be very much obliged. Kindly drop me a line saying what you can do, and return the inclosed letter.

I am, faithfully yours,

N. CLARKE WALLACE.

Hon. Sir A. P. Caron,
P.M.G., Ottawa.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Is that one of the letters marked 'private'?

Mr. McMULLEN (reading):

(Inclosure.)

Box 104, Orangeville, Jan. 22, 1894.

Dear Sir.—Mr. R. Caldwell has sent with this mail a tender for renewal of contract for carrying the mails from Hockley to Mono Centre. This tender is the same as the contract he already had.

I understand the parties who are tendering against him are McCarthyites, and they deserve nothing at the hands of the Dominion government. Mr. R. Caldwell is and always was a thorough Conservative.

Yours very respectfully,

J. S. LEIGHTON.

N. C. Wallace, M.P., Controller of Customs.

If hon. gentlemen will turn to page 320 of the supplementary report of the Postmaster General, they will find the following results which were disclosed when the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock), came into office in 1896:

	No. of Contracts.
	With Tender.	Without Tender.
Ontario .....	321	180
Quebec .....	148	108
Nova Scotia .....	120	124
New Brunswick .....	45	83
Manitoba and North-west Territories .....	67	31
British Columbia .....	16	52
Prince Edward Island .....	101	20
Total .....	818	598

That was the condition of the department, as far as letting of contracts was concerned, when the hon. Postmaster General came in. Now, I say that he deserves great credit for the manner in which he has cancelled many, I might say, all of these contracts, and made new contracts.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Would my hon. friend (Mr. McMullen), allow me to put a question to him? The hon. gentleman has mentioned, I think, 500 contracts as having been let without tender?

Mr. McMULLEN. Yes, 598.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I want to ask the hon. gentleman whether his statement is that the contracts which he alludes to, were let without any tenders having been asked for, or if he means to say that the contracts referred to were contracts continued and renewed, which had been originally let upon tenders having been asked for?

Mr. McMULLEN. I am prepared to say to my hon. friend in reply to his question, that in the majority of these 598 cases, there were in his department, at his fingers' ends, tenders for sums very much less than those at which he renewed these contracts.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The hon. gentleman does not wish to reply to the question.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am going to reply if the hon. gentleman will allow me. I admit that the department renewed contracts, but I am not charging my hon. friend with having simply renewed contracts for period after period. I am charging him with renewing contracts while there were in his department tenders to do the work at very much less.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. How many?

Mr. McMULLEN. I am charging him with having withdrawn advertisements on the suggestion of political supporters, and of having refused to open tenders, in order that he might be permitted to renew contracts.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I deny it.

Mr. McMULLEN. You say you deny it?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I do.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. Postmaster General read case after case to-day, and I was amazed. I got this return and went over it, and I was very much surprised to find the condition of this that existed. It is a matter of amazement that any person who undertook to serve the country in the capacity of a minister of the Crown, could justify the condition of things that existed during the time that the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Adolphe Caron) was in office. In every case that I have read out to-day, in which he renewed a contract, there was at the time in his department a tender to do the work for very much less, but notwithstanding that fact, he renewed these contracts. I do not say there were tenders in all of the 598 cases to which I have referred, but I say that if you go over the report you will find that in the majority of the 598 cases, there was a tender within his reach to do the work for the country at a much less sum. Notwithstanding that, for the sake of satisfying his political friends and of meeting their requests, he renewed these contracts and shut his eyes to the fact that he could have saved the country money, by accepting these tenders in place of renewing the old contracts. I had a case with the Postmaster General myself. I admit that it is a very hard thing to cancel a contract say for $5 less. A very esteemed friend of mine had a mail contract which he got by tender from the hon. gentleman (Sir Adolphe Caron) for $60. Tenders were advertised for by the present Postmaster General and another man tendered to do it for $55. I thought it was hardly worth while to change it for five dollars, but the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) had laid down the principle that in every case where the lowest tenderer gave security to perform the work he would get the contract, and so he took the contract from my friend and put it in the hands of an opponent who did the work for five dollars less. Can the ex-Postmaster General (Sir Adolphe Caron) cite a single instance where he ever did a thing like that?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Yes.

Mr. McMULLEN. Well, we will surround him with roses if he gives us an instance where he ever cancelled a contract to save $5 to the public treasury. When my hon. friend (Mr. Mulock) took office he found the Post Office Department in a rotten condition from garret to cellar and he has purged it of its rottenness and put it in an honest, clean statesmanlike condition. Today the country is reaping the benefit of his administration and I am certain the people will acknowledge his services when he goes before them at the polls.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Would the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) tell me what is the postal revenue from newspapers for the eleven months of this fiscal year.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I can only give an estimate; it is perhaps $80,000 or $90,000 for the eleven months.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I think it is close on $100,000, but, however, that estimate will do for my purpose. The hon. gentleman from Wellington (Mr. McMullen) has been rather severe in his criticism and rather unfair, because he dealt with matters and made deductions from them without stating, and without knowing, the circumstances and the conditions surrounding each case. I can tell him that when I was Postmaster General the contracts that were given without tender were old contracts which were renewed, but for which tenders were called for originally, so that they were not in the sense he means, new contracts. In the rather long resumé which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) gave of the work of the post office since he came into power, he said there were quite a large number of contracts given without tender, but he should have told the House and the people of this country that these were not new contracts, but were contracts which had been renewed; tenders being called for in the first instance. I can say further, that so far as my recollection goes, no contract was ever renewed without a certificate from the post office inspector that the price was fair and reasonable, and that the service had been satisfactorily performed.

Mr. McMULLEN. Did the hon. gentleman (Sir Adolphe Caron) exact that certificate in every case where there was a renewal.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. In every case.

Mr. McMULLEN. Then that is a very serious reflection upon the inspector, because the minister had in his own office tenders offering to do the work at 25 or 30 per cent lower than the contracts were renewed for.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. That statement of the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) shows how unfair his whole argument is. How can we discuss the reasons why the inspector recommended to renew a contract without knowing the identical contract referred to and the reasons why the inspector recommended it. Any man who has been in that department knows how many different things have to be considered in the letting of contracts. In many cases the first contractor had carried out his work to the satisfaction of the department and I called for tenders and new tenders were often sent in at a lower rate. But when it became a question of getting security from the tenderer to carry out that work or when the inspector had to ascertain whether or not the tenderer was capable of carrying out the contract; very often it was found that the new tenderer was unable to do so, and we had to fall back upon the original contractor. That occurred time and again and I have no doubt that the present Postmaster General knows of instances where the contracts were not given to the lowest tenderers because it was found impossible to get security, or the inspector was unable to satisfy himself that the man was in a position to do his work satisfactorily.

Mr. McMULLEN. I will give the hon. gentleman (Sir Adolphe Caron) one case. Take the contract from Belleville to Tweed. Before renewing the contract the department had notice from the inspector that there was a strong desire in the district that it should be put up to public tender, but in the face of that statement from the inspector, the hon. gentleman (Sir Adolphe Caron) renewed the contract.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. That again proves nothing at all. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) reads a statement from the Postmaster General's Report, but if that question were investigated, I would have the inspector to examine and cross-examine, and I would find out the reasons why the officers who were advising me recommended that this contract should be renewed.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question? He has made a statement with reference to the inspectors. Here is the case of a contract in the district of Saskatchewan that was held by the firm of Leason & Scott for a great many years. A gentleman of the name of Stovel, of the town of Prince Albert, offered to perform the work for $2,200 a year less than the amount paid to the old contractors.

Mr. BERGERON. That is not a question.

Mr. DAVIS. The hon. gentleman said the inspectors had not reported in favour of the new tenders because in some cases the parties tendering were not able to carry out the work.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I allowed the hon. gentleman to put a question, but I did not expect him to read to the House the report of the Postmaster General until I had finished the few remarks which I have to make. I am going to reply to the question of the hon. gentleman. That was a case which was strongly recommended by the inspector, because it was considered, rightly or wrongly, that Leason & Scott were the men most capable, indeed the only men capable, of carrying out the contract at that particular moment. Now, I claim that the manner in which these questions are dealt with is misleading and unfair, because every case should be considered upon its own merits. If there is any charge of maladministration in the department, let it be investigated, but let every case be specifically brought down, and let us go into the circumstances under which these renewals or contracts were given. The hon. Postmaster General this morning stated that contracts were let while hundreds of tenders were left unopened in the department. This is my answer to the point I wish to make. In case of a renewal, after notice had been given for some time, it may have been that tenders were sent in which were not opened. I am not saying that such was the case; I am not aware of any such case; but I am putting it as it was explained to me by my officers when I occupied the position now occupied by my hon. friend. It is possible that some of these tenders may not have been opened when the old contract was continued or renewed; and if so, the reason was that the department had considered the matter and decided upon renewing the contract and disregarding the tenders which had been sent in. Now, Sir, I find it extremely difficult to judge from the report of the Postmaster General the exact state of the department. In my time we had schedules which showed exactly the position of different matters connected with the department, such as the postal exchanges between Canada and Great Britain, or between Canada and China or Japan. All these schedules have been omitted from the hon. gentleman's report, so that it becomes almost impossible to make a comparative statement. I see no great or material reduction in the number of employees. For instance, in the inspector's branch of the outside service, between 1899 and 1900, I find a difference of only two. In the railway mail service I see an increase of twenty, so that I do not see how the hon. gentleman can have economized very much. My hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance has spoken of the manner in which the Yukon accounts were treated. I fully agree with him, and there cannot be a man in this House or in the country who will deny this one fact, that the hon. Postmaster General has taken the revenue from the sale of postage stamps in the Yukon territory, while the cost of the service has been charged to the mounted police. The hon. gentleman spoke of the mounted police carrying on the postal service of the Yukon in 1895. In that year, as my hon. friend from York has said, the service could not have been organized, for the simple reason that there was no mail service at all. The whole of the mail was carried in a small leather bag thrown across the shoulders of a man who was riding. But look at the change. As soon as the wonderful wealth of the Yukon region became known, hundreds and thousands of people went there, and it became an absolute necessity to organize the postal service. It is impossible for a miner to be without communication, with the outside world. His business requires that he should be in communication with the men who advance his money or furnish him with his supplies. He requires rapid and constant communication, and if it had been possible to have a telegraph service instead of a postal service, at whatever cost, the miner would have had the more rapid system.

Well, the hon. gentleman could not plead ignorance. He knew that the country was filling up, and what did he do? Did he organize a service and show in the public accounts the amount he was paying to carry on that service and the amount he was receiving from it? He did not. But, he put all the disbursing work on the Department of the Interior and kept the revenue from the mail service of that country. When we used the mounted police in the North-west and charged the expenses against the various departments, the hon. gentleman knows well that the mail matter carried was really the mail matter belonging to those departments operating in that country. The Hudson Bay Company had their own postal service, and it was only shortly before the completion of the Canadian Pacific Railway, when the country was filling up with immigrants, that we organized a postal service, the expense of which we charged against the Post Office Department, and the revenues from which that department was credited with. So that, there is no similarity between the two cases. In the one case, the hon. gentleman, knowing that it was absolutely necessary to have a postal service in the Yukon, credited his department with the revenue and charged the expenditure to the mounted police.

The hon. gentleman made this statement, that when he took charge of the department, he had the books audited by two competent auditors, and found that the amount of $600,000 had been left over from the previous year and was not included in its expenditure. I wish to tell the hon. gentleman—and that is a fact which can be easily verified—that the accounts of the year were closed every year. The hon. gentleman may have any number of commissions to investigate the matter, but he will find nothing different from what I have said, that every year the accounts were closed, and the amount of $600,000 indicates the deficit for that year, but had nothing to do with any transactions belonging to another year. Of course, I heard of this commission—

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. It was not a commission, but two auditors.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I have tried to find out, but in vain, how much that investigation cost the department. I do not know whether it is to be found in the public accounts.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Certainly, it was paid by the department in the usual way, and must be in the Auditor General's Report for 1896-7.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. It would not be under another head, such as 'commissions'?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I never saw it in the Auditor General's Report, but do not see how he could have made a proper audit without putting it in.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I come now to the increase in the number of letters, which the hon. gentleman ascribes to the change of policy in reducing the postage.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I did not intend to advance the claim that the total increase in correspondence is due to the reduction of postage. I only said that that was one of the contributing causes.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I quote now from the hon. gentleman's own report:

This change has been accompanied by such marked and continuous increase in the number of domestic letters as to warrant the conclusion that the loss of revenue consequent on such a reduction will soon be overcome.

I find that the percentage of the increase in letters posted in 1899 over the number mailed in 1896 was very nearly 7 per cent, and the increase in 1899 over 1898 was 11½ per cent, so that this marked and continuous increase amounts really to 4½ per cent above the normal rate.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The reduction was only in force for half a year.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I give the figures as I find them. The hon. gentleman must see that the increase has not been such as to warrant him in stating that within a short period the deficit can be overcome by the additional amount of mail matter. When the reduction took place in the United States, one of the reasons urged was exactly the one advanced by the hon. gentleman, namely, that the increase in the number of letters written would make up for the loss of revenue. But, such did not prove to be the case. Experience showed that the result was not what had been anticipated, and the hon. gentleman knows that there has been a deficit ever since, whereas there had been a surplus before the change took place.

Now, I want to refer to the hon. gentleman's claim to having affected a great saving. I propose to take the figures from the blue-books, and to ask the hon. gentleman how he can come to the conclusion that the saving has been so much larger since he has occupied his present position. I find that a comparison of the statements contained in the reports of the Postmaster General for the years 1896, 1897 and 1898, shows the following expenditure:

	Stage or other vehicles or by hand.	Steamboat service.
1896 .....	$847,080	$79,218
1897 .....	347,660	83,734
1898 .....	765,660	84,743
For Railway Mail Service—
1896.....	$1,285,383
1897.....	1,350,786
1898.....	1,352,257
For Salaries (Outside Service)—
1896.....	$1,249,402
1897.....	1,250,609
1898.....	1,175,185
Total Expenditure—
1896.....	$3,665,011
1898.....	3,575,411

The reduction of the total expenditure for 1898, compared with 1896, was $89,600. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) has not given me what I would like very much to have, an estimate of the amount of money which was economized, that is, not expended, through the action of the department in not paying to the clerks the annual increment, which, according to my belief, they were entitled to—an increment of $50 for some members of the service, and of a smaller amount for other classes, such as the letter carriers. I estimate that amount to be $74,217. I admit, the hon. gentleman this morning said that the reduction was not only by the non-payment of the annual increment, but that he had contributed to that reduction in expenditure by reducing the staff. As I have previously stated, I am not able to find where the staff has been so considerably reduced as to make any considerable change in the figures from which I have stated. The saving, I believe, has been by refusing to give the officers this annual increment, which I claim they were entitled to, and which I believe, if they were to go into a court of law that court would compel the government to pay.

Mr. TAYLOR. And also by starving the mail service in the country.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. And as my hon. friend (Mr. Taylor) remarks by starving the mail service in the country. The hon. gentleman made a statement which surprised me when he said that he believed that in the near future the Post Office Department would be a self-sustaining department. I hope for the sake of Canada, and for the sake of the hon. minister, if he remains there, that it may be so. But it is impossible for me to believe that in a country like Canada with enormous distances, with a population going into our extreme northern and North-west regions, such an expectation can be realized until our population is much denser than it is. We are only beginning to open up these vast regions, and every year the population there will become greater, requiring more expenditure. The reason why the postal service in Great Britain is so much more economically carried on than it is here, is that the distances there are so small and population so dense. In almost every part of Great Britain the letters are delivered four or five times a day; letter carriers go from house to house and give a most efficient service at a smaller cost than we can hope to reach in this country.

Then the hon. Postmaster General forgets that in making up his revenue he has had the advantage of the new issue of postage stamps. I know two people who paid a thousand dollars each for postage stamps to distribute among their friends in the old country. How can we find out what is the revenue from that source? I have looked through the returns, but have found no statement of it. I compute it at $250,000 or $300,000.

Mr. CLANCY. More than that.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. It may be more; I am quite certain it is not less. I think the hon. Postmaster General should have taken parliament into his confidence, and should have stated what he received from the sale of these postage stamps. The reason why I refer to this is that when I was Postmaster General a proposition came to me from stamp collectors, that if I would make a new issue of stamps, the sale of stamps would more than pay for the new issue of stamps. I also asked the hon. gentleman, when I rose to address the House, what revenue he had derived from the postage on newspapers for the eleven months of this year. Hon. gentlemen know that under the peculiar circumstances of this year, with a war in South Africa, the sale of newspapers has been enormously increased. My opinion is that the Postmaster General took a retrograde step when he re-imposed the postage on newspapers. In a democratic country like Canada, the newspaper is the mental food of the people, and is one of the means, the only means in very many instances which people who are not blessed with much money have of informing themselves upon the events of the day, and of what the country is doing, and how it is getting on. But, even if it were right to reimpose this tax, it has not been impartially reimposed. I estimate that the revenue from this source would be about $70,000 a year. I have heard since that it would possibly be less, say $60,000. But the point I wish to make is that a year when the government can boast of a surplus of seven millions, is hardly the time to reimpose a duty upon newspapers, and to force the reading public to pay that tax. Probably the hon. gentleman reimposed that tax for the purpose of making up the deficit caused by reducing the Imperial postage from 5 cents to 2 cents. The hon. gentleman has quoted from the Hansard some remarks of mine made in 1895 or 1896, where I stated that I believed, while we could not do too much to assimilate our postal rates to those of Great Britain and the large self-governing colonies, I believed that Canada at that time was not rich enough to permit of such reduction in the revenue. I looked into the matter very carefully at that time, as I was about visiting London, and my officers estimated that the loss of revenue would be $800,000 per year, without considering the imperial postage.

Now, Sir, I stated that the hon. gentleman must have derived a large revenue from the imposition of postage on newspapers, and he should have given us some idea in his report, or in the blue-books, of the amount of money received under that head for the eleven months.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The hon. gentleman will find the figures at page xi for the current year.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. It says here the total amount of revenue realized from the postage for six months ending June 30, was $22,154.41. Well, the hon. gentleman knows that there has been a great increase in the circulation of newspapers by the war in South Africa, and that is the reason why the statement remains unaffected that was made by the department when I was Postmaster General, and when we removed the postage from the newspapers, so that the people might have them cheaper. But, contrary to the position we had taken, the hon. gentleman imposed a duty, which has given him a large increase in revenue. Let me say that I think the postage on newspapers has not been applied in an impartial manner. I find that the newspapers in the city of Montreal pay nearly one-half of the whole tax. What is the reason of this circumstance? I cannot understand why there should be so large a proportion of the whole tax raised from Montreal alone. I think the hon. gentleman should publish a list of the papers which pay this postage. At present we are really in the dark. We do not know whether the hon. gentleman imposes that postage impartially on papers who are friendly to the government, or whether he does not.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Of course I recognize that information of that sort should be made public, and when some time ago I laid a return upon the Table, in obedience to an order of the House, some of the newspaper proprietors complained that we were giving publicity to their business. Still, if the House thinks it ought to have the information, it can order it to be given. At present, however, I have not the slightest objection to giving the information to any member of the Privy Council, to satisfy himself.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. That is quite satisfactory to me, but it does not explain away my objection. How is it possible that the revenue from that source is $70,000 only? If Montreal pays one-half of the amount, and if all the other papers paid in proportion, there ought to be a much larger revenue than $70,000. Now, I take the position that when we removed the postage from the newspapers, the people of Canada got the benefit by making the circulation of the press freer; and now when the hon. gentleman comes down with a surplus of $7,000,000, he proceeds to re-impose a tax on newspapers, a proceeding which seems to me contrary to the principles of a liberal and progressive government, as the hon. gentlemen opposite claim to be.

Now I want to refer to the position taken by the government in refusing to pay the annual increase of $50 to their clerks. When I spoke on a former occasion, I told the hon. gentleman that I would submit to him the reason why, in my opinion, the $50 cannot be withheld from the civil servants. Section 18 of the Postal Inside Service provides:

The minimum salary of a first-class clerk shall be $1,400 per annum, with an annual increase of $50, up to a maximum salary of $1,800.

Now, hon. gentlemen will remark that is how the law says that the civil service shall be paid. It states that the minimum salary of a first-class clerk shall be $1,400 per annum, 'with an annual increase,' which must mean that added to the amount which he receives will be an increase of $50 a year until the maximum of $1,800 is reached. Until he gets $1,800 he is entitled to an increase of $50 per annum, and the law, to be still more precise, goes beyond that, and indicates the only reason why a man would not get such an increase.

The increase of salary of any officer, clerk or employee, authorized under this Act, for the then current year, may be suspended by the head of the department for neglect of duty or misconduct, and may be subsequently restored by such head of the department, but without arrears.

That is a very important matter. I have called the attention of parliament to this once before; I renew my remarks upon it on this occasion when the estimates are being discussed. I say, according to my judgment and to my reading of the law, that these clerks are entitled, under the Act, which constitutes the department of the hon. Postmaster General, to receive that increase. I think if the hon. gentleman consented to give a fiat to any of these employees the courts would decide, as I read the Act, that they are entitled to receive the amount of money which has been without reason kept from the members of the civil service.

Now, in regard to the estimates, I wish to say just a few words as to some points which have struck me and in regard to which we require some information. I see under the head of 'Mail subsidies' an increase of $23,466.77. I do not wish, at the present moment, to go into these estimates, because it would be inconvenient, possibly, at this stage of the discussion, when the statement of the hon. Postmaster General is more immediately under consideration. But, when the estimates come up they may be taken up separately in the order in which they come, and then we may get all the information. I merely wish to say that this increase of $23,000 seems to be an anomaly. Every man in Canada knows that the mail service between Great Britain and Canada is very inferior to what it used to be, and if it is inferior why should there be this increase? I want to tell the hon. gentleman that it is impossible to look into that matter, and I have looked into it very closely, without being struck by the want of careful attention given by the government to a service, the importance of which to Canada cannot be exaggerated. I see that the contract between the government and the Elder-Dempster Line terminates with the close of St. Lawrence River navigation in 1900. I want to call the attention of the committee to the contract entered into by the hon. gentleman with a very inferior line and to the manner in which it was carried out; and I propose to question the hon. gentlemen who are in charge of that branch as to whether they have treated Canada properly in not using their authority to put an end to a system which is detrimental to Canada and which is ruining our commercial reputation abroad. The contract calls for an eight-day service between Moville and Halifax.

When time exceeded, evidence to be given by contractor as to cause of delay.

I have taken that out of the return which the hon. gentleman was kind enough to bring down during the absence of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright). I want to know if, whenever there has been any deficiency in carrying out that clause of the contract, any evidence has been given by the contractor as to the cause of delay. The contract time has been adhered to only twice during the term covered by the return. The return covers the whole of last year and part of this year. I want to show the hon. gentleman how this line is being run and why it is that we should pay more money to these contractors than we gave to the Allans and the Dominion Line when they were doing the service, is something that I cannot understand. In round figures the Allan and Dominion companies received $125,000 per annum under their contract, while the Elder-Dempster Line receives $150,000, making an increase of $23,466. The hon. gentleman knows well that we were fiercely attacked, when I was Postmaster General, because we provided the Allan and Dominion Lines with a tender at Rimouski. Hon. gentlemen said: That is included in the contract of the Allan and Dominion Lines, and we should not be put to the cost and inconvenience of keeping a tender at Rimouski to perform the service which these lines undertook to perform. But the tender at Rimouski is still kept. That is one of the terrible mistakes of the late government that was not remedied by hon. gentlemen when the spirit of reform was blowing over this government. One voyage of the Ashanti occupied 19 days, 16 hours and 30 minutes; one voyage by the Yola, over 14 days; two voyages by the Lake Huron and Lake Superior, over 13 days; one by the Lake Huron, over 12 days; two by the Lake Ontario and Etolia, over 10 days, five ranging between 9 days and 10 days and five between 8 and 9 days. The average time of the Allan and Dominion Lines was less than 10 days. That was the average time of the service carried on by these lines. The hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), in speaking of the Allan and Dominion Lines, said that they refused to make a terminal port in Canada. I think, for a reason that I know well, that the hon. gentleman was mistaken in his statements. I recollect well that Mr. John Torance, of Montreal, speaking on behalf of the Allan Line, as well as of the Dominion Line, told me that they had for some time recognized that they had to abandon going to any other terminal port than one in Canada. They carried the mails to Halifax and went to St. John during the winter of 1898-9 at a heavy sacrifice and a lower price than was paid the Beaver Line the previous winter for a service so unsatisfactory that it was taken from them. In consequence of the service being so unsatisfactory letters were nearly all sent via the United States to New York.

Let me point out the great disadvantage under which we labour. We are paying $150,000 a year for carrying the mails from Great Britain to Canada, and would you believe it that nearly the whole of the Canadian mail matter is now being carried by American bottoms to New York, and is sent to San Francisco, across the United States, while we are subsidizing the Elder-Dempster Line at a cost of $150,000 a year, subsidizing steamers on the Pacific Ocean, and have as we know spent an enormous amount of money to build the Canadian Pacific Railway across the continent. All this enormous expenditure is wasted because of the fact that nineteen days is consumed in carrying our mails across the Atlantic, so that the merchants have to send all their mail matter by American ships. Surely this system cannot continue. It would be far better to abolish the subsidies altogether. If we are going to leave it to the Elder-Dempster Line which takes nineteen days and nine hours to cross the Atlantic Ocean, it would be just as satisfactory to give it to sailing vessels. The service still continues extremely unsatisfactory. I was in Montreal the other day, and I found that the Lake Superior, of the Elder-Dempster Line left Liverpool on May 29, and passed Cape Ray at two p.m. on June 11, while the Parisian which left Liverpool on May 31, was in Quebec at noon on June 9. It must be remembered that the new and best boats of the Allan and Dominion Lines are chartered by the Imperial government to convey troops and supplies to South Africa, and if we had these new vessels on the Atlantic service the time of the Allan and Dominion liners would be reduced considerably. I quote from the Free Press of June 7. the following despatch:

London.—The Hon. William Mulock, Postmaster General of Canada has written to Mr. Henninger Heaton to express his satisfaction with the operation of the ocean penny postage. Owing to an increase of nearly 150 per cent in the volume of mail, the revenue under the penny rate now equals the old revenue under two pence half-penny rate.

It would be very interesting to know how this information was obtained. I know of no means of ascertaining whether the number of letters have increased or decreased unless every letter is actually counted. If this has not been done, I do not know how the calculation was made, and I want to know who has gone into this actual count if there has been a count, and when and where it has been done. To show the difference between the old and the new system it would be necessary to count the letters when the five cent rate existed, and to count the letters since the new rate has been introduced. The Postmaster General will agree with me in that. I think I am perhaps absolutely correct in making the statement that nearly the whole of our mail matter is carried by American ships, in consequence of the poor Canadian service, and I should like to know how much is due to the United States post office for transit rate. We pay the United States land transit rate for conveyance of British mails over United States territory, and sea transit rate for carriage of mails by sea from New York to Liverpool. This is information which we should have before we can intelligently discuss these matters. Before we can give the Postmaster General credit for all the improvements he claims, we must have all the information which I have set out so that we may know whether his claim is valid or not. Again I wish to refer to the time taken by the steamers of the Elder-Dempster Line. There is a penalty attached to that contract for not conveying the mails within the time specified. I want to ascertain whether the time has been broken, except in two voyages to the extent of nineteen days and sixteen hours instead of eight. I want to know whether the contractors were called to account, whether they explained the delays, and whether the penalty has been imposed. Now, Sir, with regard to the tenders of which the hon. gentleman has made so much, I wish to say that I never interfered with a contract, in regard to calling for tenders or renewing, or in any other way, without acting on the advice of the officers who had charge of that branch; and it would have been impossible to do otherwise. As the hon. gentleman has stated, there are 9,000 post offices in Canada, and in some instances the service had to be divided among two or three or four people, according to the distance to be covered; and it is unfair to charge that these contracts were given without tenders, without bringing down the identical contracts referred to, so that we might see the conditions and circumstances which induced the officers of the department and myself to do as we did. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) read a letter from the Hon. Clarke Wallace. I hope that is not one of the letters which were marked 'private and confidential,' and which, among civilized people, are always recognized as private. It seems to me that if a man values his character as a gentleman, he will not break the secrecy of a letter marked private even to fight an opponent. The parliament of England has been called a club of gentlemen. If means of that kind are resorted to in a parliament representing the growing importance of this Dominion, it will not be to our credit, and will not be regarded by others as doing any credit to those who have used such means to fight an opponent. Those letters were marked private, and they were private to all intents and purposes. I do not know under what circumstances they got into the hands of those who used them; but, by whatever means they obtained them, their own personal honour should have induced them to respect them as private. When the information which I have asked for comes down, it will be easy for us to discuss the matter from the standpoint of the relative merits of the two administrations of the Post Office Department, the present one and the one that preceded it.

Mr. T. O. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). The hon. gentleman has made the statement that so far as he knew he acted in each case on the advice of the officers of his department, and, therefore, I presume he wishes to leave the impression on the House that he was not personally responsible. But, I wish to point out, that being the head of the department for the time being, he had to assume the responsibility for everything done in that department. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that the renewal of the contract held by Messrs Leason & Scott was made in the public interest and on the advice of the officers of his department. Messrs. Leason & Scott had that contract for, I think, ten years. They had several contracts in the North-west Territories; but the contract I allude to is the one for carrying the mail between Saskatoon and Battleford, a distance of ninety miles, for which they received over $7,000 a year. When that contract expired, it was renewed without tenders being called for. Now, I understand that all the letters found in this blue-book were found on the files of the department, and they are, therefore, public property. Before this book was issued at all, this whole matter was public property in the district of Saskatchewan, because, after the renewal of this contract with Messrs. Leason & Scott at $7,000 a year, a gentleman named Stovel, in the town where I live, wrote to the Postmaster General of that day and offered to do this work and give a better service for $5,000 a year. I wish to draw the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that Mr. Macdowall, the member for Saskatchewan at that time, wrote a letter to the Postmaster General of that day, which appears in this book, recommending that this work be given to Mr. Stovel, because he offered to do it for $2,000 a year less than Messrs. Leason & Scott. Now, we will come to the post office inspector at Winnipeg, Mr. McLeod, who, the hon. gentleman said, recommended that the contract with Messrs. Leason & Scott be continued at the old figure. Here is what he said when the matter was submitted to him:

Sir,—I return herewith the letter from C. R. Stovel, of Prince Albert, in which he offers to perform a semi-weekly service between Battleford and Saskatoon, making the trip each way in thirty hours in summer and forty-eight hours in winter for $5,000 per annum.

Regarding the standing of Mr. Stovel, the postmaster of Prince Albert, in a letter dated the 10th ulto., informs me as follows:

'Mr. Stovel is quite capable of conducting such a service, and also there appears to be no doubt as to his responsibility. I think you may safely conclude that he is well qualified in every respect.'

Notwithstanding the fact that Mr. Stovel offered to do this work for $2,000 a year less, that the member for the district, Mr. Macdowall, recommended that it be given to Mr. Stovel, and that the post office inspector in the city of Winnipeg stated that he was able to carry out the work, we find that the contract was again given to Messrs. Leason & Scott, at over $7,000 a year.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

AFTER RECESS.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 93) to confer on the Commissioner of Patents certain powers for the relief of the Servis Railroad Tie Plate Company of Canada, Limited.—(Mr. Fraser, Guysborough.)

Bill (No. 185) to authorize the sale of the Yarmouth Steamship Company's property to the Dominion Atlantic Railway Company.—(Mr. Flint.)

SUPPLY.

(The House resumed in committee.)

Mr. DAVIS. I do not propose to take up much of the time of the House. I am sorry the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Adolphe Caron) was not present, as I propose to continue my reply to some statements he had made before the Speaker left the Chair. The hon. gentleman said that while he was at the head of the Post Office Department, he never gave his consent to the renewal of a contract without having a favourable report from the officials of his department. I drew his attention to the fact that he had not a report from these officials in favour of renewing the contract with Leason & Scott, and yet he renewed it at the old price. There was a party who offered to do the work for $2,000 a year less, and that party had the recommendation of the member for the district, and also of the post office inspector at Winnipeg, and yet the contract was given to the old firm at the old rate, without even calling for tenders. It appears, however, that Mr. Daly, then Minister of the Interior, wrote a letter to Mr. White, the then Deputy Postmaster General, in which he asked that the old contractors be allowed to continue the work at their former rate of $7.043 per year. I also find that a gentleman by the name of Davis, who then represented Alberta in this House, also wrote to the Deputy Postmaster General recommending a renewal of the contract with Leason & Scott, and apparently these two recommendations outweighed the recommendation of the member for the district.

After the present Postmaster General took charge of the department, this contract was cancelled and tenders called for in the regular way, and the work was taken for something like $1,800 a year. There was therefore, a clear saving of at least $5,000 a year on that little contract alone. Calculate that during the ten years when Leason & Scott had the contract, and you will find that it makes a total of $50,000 public money wasted by the late government on this one item alone.

We are told by some hon. gentlemen on the other side that the service is being starved at present. Well, if taking away the contracts from contractors who were getting three times for the work more than it was worth, is starving the service, then I admit the charge. There was something very strange in the way that particular mail contract to which I have referred was manipulated. There were rumours about the streets of Prince Albert that the contractors were going around the stores and purchasing moose and deer heads and everything of that kind to ship to the department, I suppose to try and influence certain of the officials to give them the contract at the old rate. And in view of the fact that the contract was renewed with Leason & Scott at $2,043 more than other parties offered to do the work for, and that in spite of the recommendation of the member for the district and the post office inspector at Winnipeg, the statement made by the hon. member for Three Rivers that he never renewed a contract, except on the advice of his officials, falls to the ground.

There are hundreds of cases in which tenders were received, and yet the old contractors were allowed to continue the work at higher rates. There is the case to which the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) referred this afternoon, the case of the mail service between Hockley and Mono Centre. Tenders were called for. The tenders for that service were as follows:

Robert Deadman .....	$300
Samuel Fleming .....	348
Robert Moffit .....	350
Nelson Montgomery .....	388
Robert Colwell .....	400
James Stenson .....	420
W. J. Hunter .....	448
R. Turnbull .....	448
Robert Caldwell .....	370

There were, in all, nine tenders received lower than the contract price. If the department was conducted on business principles, one of these gentlemen would have received the contract, their tenders being lower and there being nothing to show that they were not perfectly competent to do the work. But this is not done, and we find the cause in some of the letters that are published. Here, for instance, is a letter written by Mr. J. S. Leighton, a gentleman who was interested in the old contractor. It is dated January 22, 1894, and addressed to N. Clarke Wallace, who was then controller of customs:

Dear Sir,—Mr. R. Caldwell has sent with this mail a tender for renewal of contract for carrying the mails from Hockley to Mono Centre. This tender is the same as the contract he already had.

I understand that the parties who are tendering against him are McCarthyites, and they deserve nothing at the hands of the government. Mr. R. Caldwell is and always was a thorough Conservative.

I never knew that because a man was a McCarthyite, he should be deprived of his rights as a citizen, or that he should be refused the right to tender for a mail contract. Now, if Mr. Leighton had written this letter to the Postmaster General, or the Deputy Postmaster General, we should not have thought it worthy of such special notice. But this letter was written to Mr. Wallace, who was then not a member of the cabinet, but controller of customs. Mr. Wallace incloses this letter of Mr. Leighton with one of his own, written to the Postmaster General of that day (Sir Adolphe Caron), as follows:

Ottawa, Jan. 25, 1894.

Dear Sir Adolphe,—I inclose you a communication that has been addressed to me by our warm friend—

Our warm friend——who resides in Orangeville, Ont., Mr. J. S. Leighton. You will observe what he says about the contract for carrying the mail between Hockley and Mono Centre, that is again being tendered for by Mr. Caldwell. If you can renew this contract to Mr. Caldwell at the old figures, I shall be very much obliged. Kindly drop me a line telling me what you can do, and return the inclosed letter.

I am, faithfully yours,
N. CLARKE WALLACE.

That is to say, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) incloses this letter of Mr. Leighton, thus agreeing in what Mr. Leighton says about the McCarthyite, and asks that the contract be given to this party at the old figure. The only reason given in either of the documents is that the other gentlemen who tendered were McCarthyites and the old contractor was a thorough-going Conservative. According to the views of the ex-controller of customs (Mr. Wallace), it is evident that a person who happened to be a McCarthyite was not entitled to consideration at the hands of the government of which he was a member. In other words, one who did not feel inclined to be chained to his chariot, was to be ostracized and not allowed to have any rights. On the next page, we have the ex-Postmaster General's (Sir Adolphe Caron's) letter:

Ottawa, Jan. 27, 1894.

My dear Mr. Wallace,—I am in receipt of your letter of the 25th inst., inclosing a letter from Mr. J. S. Leighton—

Thus he acknowledges that he has read this letter, and the views expressed in it as to the McCarthyites——recommending the renewal of the contract of Mr. R. Caldwell of the mail service between Hockley and Mono Centre.

Mr. DAVIS.

In reply, I beg to say that, in accordance with your recommendation, I have authorized that this contract may be renewed for a further term.

Yours faithfully.

ADOLPHE P. CARON,

According to the documents, this action on the part of the hon. gentleman who was then Postmaster General, must have been taken on account of what was said about McCarthyites, because there was no other reason given why the contract should be renewed, except that the old contractor was a thorough Conservative, and the other tenderers were McCarthyites, and the country had to suffer on account of that.

There are many other cases in this book very much the same, not only in Ontario, but throughout the Dominion, from the Atlantic to the Pacific—hundreds and hundreds of cases where there were tenders in the department to do the work at lower rates than those at which the contract was actually given, and the correspondence shows that this was done often on the recommendation of the members from the district in favour of the old contractor. In other words, the department was run on the principle: 'If you do not see what you want, ask for it.' Here, for instance, was the case of Brockville. A gentleman named Kavanagh had the contract for carrying the mails on the Canadian Pacific Railway to the Grand Trunk Railway, and was getting something like $406 a year. But he was not satisfied. He thought he ought to have somebody to watch him—I suppose he had a feeling that he was not doing the work properly, and should have somebody to see that the work was done well. As shown by the hon. member for North Wellington, this same man was appointed transfer agent; and for a long time, he was paid $406 for carrying the mails across the platform from one train to another, and he got also $400 a year as agent, to watch himself. The hon. gentleman (Sir Adolphe Caron), says he depended on the officers of his department, and so we should not blame him. But it is apparent that the Post Office Department was run in a very loose manner, when such things could take place. If the Postmaster General and his officials were aware of what was going on, and took no means to stop it, they were to blame; and if they did not know, they were to blame—they can take either horn of the dilemma they please.

I may say, in conclusion, that the people of this country are well satisfied with the way the Postmaster General has run his department. He has wiped out an enormous deficit of $700,000 in four years, and has given us penny postage, not only throughout Canada, but practically throughout the empire. Hon. gentlemen say that the reduction of postage does not benefit the labouring classes and the farmers, but I contend that it is a benefit to every person.

Moreover, we have a better service from one end of the country to the other than we had before. My hon. friend from Leeds (Mr. Taylor), says that the service is being starved. I must say I have never heard any complaints on that ground. The Postmaster General deserves great credit for carrying on his department in a business-like way. We do not hear of any Brockville cases, or any Leason & Scott cases, since he took charge of the department. Hon. gentlemen complain that private letters were published. I do not know whether they are private or not. Those letters were on the public files, and therefore I say they are public property, and any person in this country had a right to see them if he asked for them in the way provided. So I say there is nothing here to show that the business of the Post Office Department under the hon. member for Three Rivers was conducted in a business manner. There is no use in him trying to defend it in face of the letters over his own signature and over the signature of scores of members in this House asking for the contracts to be renewed.

Mr. T. D. CRAIG (East Durham). I have no disposition to protract the proceedings of this House, but the fact is that members on this side of the House are compelled by members on the government side to do a little talking in order to defend themselves. One would imagine, coming into the House, that we were trying to get the estimates through and that the government side were trying to keep them back. I am rather surprised to see members like the hon. gentleman from North Wellington, the hon. gentleman from Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis), taking up so much time in talking when the Postmaster General is anxious to get his estimates through. In fact I noticed the Postmaster General tried unsuccessfully to get the member for Saskatchewan to refrain from making a speech. Under these circumstances I do not think the opposition can be blamed for placing their side of the matter before the public. I am glad to know that such an impartial paper as the Montreal Witness has a little piece in it talking about prorogation being postponed owing to the attitude of the opposition. Well, I shall be very glad if the Montreal Witness will take note of the proceedings today and say that prorogation will probably be postponed owing to the attitude of the government members. We do not want to stay here much longer, we have been here too long already; and I would just take this occasion to say that this session has not been prolonged by the opposition. I have an opinion that the sessions will generally be long from this time out, as the country is growing, and we have so many eloquent orators coming here from the west, on both sides of the House.

Now, the Postmaster General is trying to put his estimates through and the members on this side of the House have criticised them, but they have done it fairly and moderately. And what reply do they get? Members on the other side get up and read out of a book containing letters of Conservative members to the then Postmaster General, and try to make political capital out of it, making stump speeches in the House. Now, that is a nice sight for the country to look at, and it shows, to my mind, what a desperate condition the government side are in when they cannot let this side of the House alone on any one occasion, but must continue raking up all these old matters. Now, Mr. Chairman, there are two or three of my letters in that book, and I am not ashamed of those letters. They are very short, and were written to the Postmaster General asking if he could see his way to renew certain contracts—there is nothing wrong about that—and I am glad to say the contracts were renewed. Why did I ask them to be renewed? Because they were fair contracts, because the price was not excessive, because the work was well performed, and because the people in the neighbourhood were perfectly satisfied with the men who had the contract, and satisfied that they should get the renewal of it. There was no agitation for a change, nobody wanted a change that I know of. These men had been carrying on these contracts for some time, some of them had horses for that purpose, and another man was dependent upon them for his living. Was it not right, therefore, that I should ask the Postmaster General to renew these contracts? I am not ashamed of what I did, and if our party was in power I would do it again, if the contract was a fair contract. The law expressly provides that the Postmaster General should have power to do that.

Now, a great deal has been said in this House which I hold is very apt to mislead the people. It has been said that these contracts were given without tender. Now, I absolutely deny that. I was going to say that it is not true, but I say that is not a correct statement of facts. The true statement of the case is this: These contracts were made on tenders being put in for them, and when these contracts expired, on the recommendation of somebody, probably the member for the constituency, these contracts were renewed because they were considered fair and in the interest of the public. They were renewed under the advisement of the officers in the department as having been well carried out. Now, I would ask what objection there is to that. It is all very well for members of the Liberal party to say that they have not done so and so. No, they have not done some of these things because they have been in power only a short time. If they should happen to remain in power for a good many years I will guarantee that we shall find them doing the same things that they are criticising to-day. They have only been in power about four years, and the contracts made at that time have not expired yet, some of them, they have had no opportunity to do these things. But I really believe, from what I know of a great many of them, that they would do the same things they are condemning the Conservative party for doing, and I would not blame them for it, provided the contract was fair. The way this matter came up is this: The Postmaster General claims a great deal of credit for saving over $400,000 on these mail contracts. I have just this remark to make, that this $400,000 was taken out of the very men that could not afford to lose it, out of poor men. The expression has been used, 'starving the mail service.' I do not know as that is true, but I know that some of these contractors are about half starved, and their horses as well. Men have been compelled to put in low tenders in order to get contracts, and I will guarantee that some of them are sorry they got the contracts, because they cannot afford to carry them on. I do not think the Postmaster General has a right to take as great a sum as $400,000 out of these men in this way. For my part, as a citizen of this country, I would rather these men should get fair pay for doing the work than to have the country credited with $400,000 taken out of their pockets, and I believe that is the feeling of the people. This $400,000 is practically taken out of the pockets of these mail contractors in order that the Postmaster General should have credit for this revenue.

Now, there is one letter from myself in that book recommending that Mr. John Caldwell should have his contract renewed for collecting letters from the letter boxes in the town of Port Hope. I find on referring to the Postmaster General's report that this man had to make two trips a day. It is said in the Postmaster General's report that there were twelve trips a week, but there were thirteen trips a week. I know he made two trips every week-day, and one trip on Sunday night. The first trip commenced at ten o'clock, and he had to travel four miles and a half on that one trip before he got home again, and collect from about five or six boxes on each trip. He made another trip beginning at nine o'clock at night. Now, what exorbitant sum did he get for making each trip? That is the way to look at this matter. I want to mention that to show that I was perfectly justified in recommending that this contract should be renewed. He received the munificent sum, for travelling four miles and a half and collecting letters from these six boxes, taking them to the post office and then going home again, I suppose, of 30 cents each trip. Well, now, I do not think any member of this House would be willing to undertake the job at that price.

Mr. PRIOR. Why did he take it?

Mr. CRAIG. I suppose he took it because he had nothing else to do. This man was a tailor by trade and he found that sitting on the bench gave him dyspepsia. The doctor told him that he had to take outdoor exercise. He got this contract and everybody was perfectly satisfied with the way he did his work. The man is dead now, so that it does not make much difference what we say about the contract. He received thirty cents for each trip of four and a half miles. This trip had to be made no matter what the weather was like, whether it was raining, or snowing or blowing. He received what he considered a very small compensation. He thought he should have more. I got that contract renewed for him, after which another man got it. I do not know whether I got it renewed for the other man or not. Now, the contract has been let by the hon. Postmaster General for a smaller sum. Of course there is a saving to the country, and the hon. Postmaster General takes credit for having saved fifty dollars. But, as a citizen of this country, I do not want to make money in that way for the country. I suppose the hon. Postmaster General feels compelled to accept the lowest tender, but I would be very glad if he did not have to accept the lowest tender when the price was far too low for a man to live upon. I take another case. There was the case of the service between Port Hope and Elizabethville where the service involved a daily trip of thirty-two miles. The man who had the contract had to keep two horses, using one horse one day and one horse the next day, and he travelled the distance every day whether it was dry or wet or warm or cold. What did he get? My text now is 'improvident contracts,' because the hon. Postmaster General used that term. This is what I would call an improvident contract. This man had to travel with his horse and buggy thirty-two miles every day to fulfil his contract. He had to get his dinner, to feed his horse, and he drew one dollar and fifty cents for making that trip every day in the year. Yet, the hon. member for North Wellington can stand up and talk about letters in that book asking for a renewal of these contracts. I would write a letter like that any time for the renewal of such a contract. Another man has the contract now, and he gets one dollar and thirty cents a day. The Postmaster General has saved to the country the large sum of seventy dollars a year. I do not want to save money in that way for the country.

Mr. McMULLEN. I know a man who took a contract in my section recently, and he carries the mail thirty-two miles every day for one dollar a day.

Mr. CRAIG. I would just expect that from where the hon. gentleman comes. I suppose he thinks that is quite enough for the man too. I have no doubt he is praising the hon. Postmaster General so much because he gets work done for one dollar a day. If the hon. member for North Wellington is satisfied with that, I am not satisfied.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Craig) was saying that the amount paid to the man to whom he referred was very low, and I was pointing out that there are other people who do the same work for less money. My hon. friend is very liberal. I do not know that he is as liberal with his own funds as he is with the funds of the public.

Mr. CRAIG. That is very flattering to me. I do not know what reason the hon. gentleman has to make that remark, but I do not see what point there is in any remark the hon. gentleman has made. While I am saying that one dollar and thirty cents a day is paid under this contract, and asking the House whether that is sufficient for a man who is travelling thirty-two miles a day, he gets up and says it is not too little because in my part of the country there is a man who does the same work for one dollar a day. I do not want to live in the hon. gentleman's part of the country.

Mr. McMULLEN. We do not want you either.

Mr. CRAIG. The hon. gentleman will not find that the workmen of the country will approve of the doctrine which he enunciates in making that statement, and I would be glad if the people of the country would remember that the hon. gentleman thinks that when a man is getting one dollar a day for travelling thirty-two miles he is well paid.

Mr. McMULLEN. I did not say so. You are putting words in my mouth.

Mr. CRAIG. It can stand right there as far as I am concerned.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). If he offers to do it for that should the government pay more?

Mr. McMULLEN. Hear, hear; that is the point.

Mr. CRAIG. There is some common sense in that question. That is the difference between the Minister of Finance and the hon. member for North Wellington. I am very glad that the hon. Minister of Finance has asked me that question because that is a question to be considered and it is a question that I was coming to. I do not think the government should give contracts at such starvation rates. I would like, if the hon. Minister of Finance and his colleagues could find some way of overcoming that difficulty.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. We will have to amend the Act first.

Mr. CRAIG. I do not think the country wants that sort of thing. The reason I speak of it is that the Postmaster General is taking credit for it.

Mr. McMULLEN. You do not know what the country wants. That is the reason you are there.

Mr. CRAIG. That is just like the hon. gentleman exactly. A remark of that kind is just about his calibre. We have to get used to him. I repeat what I have said that I do not think the country wants money saved in this way. I am criticising this because I do not think the hon. Postmaster General should take credit for such contracts as I have referred to, and which I would call, improvident contracts. I do not say that there were not some contracts made which were not improvident under the late government, but I think if we look through the record of the Liberal party since they have been in power we will find some improvident things done by them. I am not justifying everything done by the late government or by the Conservative party, but I do not know why you should find fault with these contracts unless there was something wrong about them. I am satisfied to leave it to the people of the country, to the fair-minded people, the liberal-minded people to say whether they think one dollar and fifty cents a day is too much for carrying the mails thirty-two miles. There is one thing that I would say in answer to the question of the hon. Minister of Finance and it is this: we have heard something about a resolution introduced into this House to provide that contractors do not sub-let contracts in such a way as to oppress workmen, and that the current rate of wages shall be paid. That has been considered a very important resolution. It says:

That every effort should be made to secure the payment of such wages as are generally accepted as current in each trade for competent workmen.

This is the resolution that the hon. Postmaster General has introduced into this House and it strikes me as being very strange that the very man who introduces this resolution, wanting the House to declare that the government should see that contractors pay their men the current rate of wages, should wish to take credit for compelling men to do work at starvation wages, at almost Chinamen's wages.

Mr. PRIOR. A Chinaman would not do it for this price.

Mr. CRAIG. I do not think he would. If the government are really in favour of the resolution which they have brought into this House, they should be willing that under those contracts a man should earn fair wages. I have no objection to the Postmaster General trying to make the postal service self-supporting, and as far as it goes he deserves credit for that, but I do think that he should not boast of making money out of these small mail contractors. I believe these men are very foolish to tender at so low a price, but I do not think the government deserves much credit for getting the work done at far less than what would be ordinary fair wages. Economy is all right, but the government is certainly not economic in other ways. The estimates this year amount to nearly $60,000,000, which will afford, no doubt, great pleasure and gratification to the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) when he thinks about it and rolls it over in his mind. After all, $60,000,000 is a pretty nice little sum for a country like this to spend in a year. If the government want to be economical they can turn their attention in other directions, and not try to be saving at the expense of these poor men throughout the country. It may be that some of these contracts were let at too high a price, but I guarantee that in almost every case mentioned in these letters the price paid was a fair price and nothing more. That is my opinion, but the member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) may think differently. I can easily imagine that a man who thinks $1 a day good wages for a workingman would think $1.50 a princely remuneration for him.

Mr. McMULLEN. Who do you refer to? You have a very bad habit of making insinuations.

Mr. CRAIG. Why, I am making no insinuation at all. I state very plainly that the hon. gentleman upheld a dollar a day as being fair pay for a workingman.

Mr. McMULLEN. I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. CRAIG. Then, why do you not complain about the Postmaster General paying such small wages?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. It is not a question of wages; it is a question of contract.

Mr. CRAIG. But, the Postmaster General is taking credit for saving $400,000 out of these poor hard-working men.

Mr. McMULLEN. How would you do it?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Order. Address the Chair.

Mr. CRAIG. Let the hon. member for North Wellington keep cool. He made a long speech this afternoon, and he might let me make my little speech without interrupting.

Mr. PRIOR. He is jealous.

Mr. CRAIG. I hope he is not jealous of me. If I thought he was I would sit down at once. I hope we will hear the last in this House of gentlemen quoting from these letters and trying to make the people of the country believe that improvident sums were paid to these poor men for carrying the mails. I am willing to leave it to any fair-minded farmers or workingmen in Canada, as to whether they do not think that the contract prices paid for mail carriage by the late government were only fair and reasonable.

Mr. CRAIG.

Mr. FOSTER. The Postmaster General states in his annual report that a certain expense was incurred for carrying the mail into the Yukon. Is that money, and also the $3,000 paid by the Department of the Interior for carrying the mails, to appear in the public accounts as the proper expenditure of the Post Office Department or not?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I have nothing to do with the making up of the Public Accounts book, nor do I know the form of procedure in connection with it. I do not know why there was not an apportionment of it in that way. So far as my own department is concerned, I felt that I was doing my duty by giving instructions in my department that when the amounts were ascertained they should be chronicled in the Postmaster General's Report. Probably the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) is technically correct. Is it the Auditor General who makes up the Public Accounts book?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The Finance Department.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. It took many months for us to obtain the balance of the accounts from the comptroller of the North-west Mounted Police, and probably the Public Accounts book was prepared before we got the figures.

Mr. FOSTER. I thought the statement made by the Postmaster General last year settled that. His statement then was, not that he was going to put a note in the Postmaster General's Report saying that this expense was incurred by another department in doing his work. My criticism was that the post office work was charged to another department, and I asked that in the distribution of the accounts the charge should be properly made. Now, the Postmaster General thinks he has done his duty—no; I do not think he thinks he has done his duty.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I do.

Mr. FOSTER. Then, the Postmaster General thinks he has done his duty by simply putting a paragraph in his report stating that so much was incurred in carrying mails into and out of the Yukon by the Interior Department. I think it is incumbent upon every department to do its own work, as I think it is incumbent upon every man to pay his debts. What would you say, if the Inland Revenue Department having had a certain amount of money appropriated for it, persuaded the Customs Department to carry on part of its work at an expense of $50,000, and then have it entered up against the Customs Department vote? If one department can do this, so can another, and then what confidence can we have in our public accounts? I am not debating this in a partisan sense, but as a simple financial transaction, and I do not think the Postmaster General has risen to that point of view.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) must know full well that there was no desire in the slightest degree to misstate the financial working of the Post Office Department. The Postmaster General's Report shows the whole transactions in connection with the mail service. The account for the Yukon mail service and the account for the mail service for the rest of Canada is given, and the simplest child could add them up. The whole information is in the Postmaster General's Report, so that he who runs may read. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) may be technically correct.

Mr. FOSTER. I am not talking of technical matters, I am simply speaking of a question of fact.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The hon. gentleman is wonderfully precise in exacting something from others which he never performed himself. There is no use of our threshing out the old subject again. I can only repeat that what he is so severely criticising to-day, he and his government did yesterday. If he starts in that way, I might ask him what he is going to do about his accounts. Is he going to have the government tear up those books and issue new ones? He understands the situation perfectly well; and with his intelligence and his experience, knowing that everything has been done in good faith and was intended in good faith, that everything is frank and above-board, and stated in print over and over again in my report, I fail to see what good purpose he accomplishes, though he may continue in this course. I therefore repeat that if he presses his point, perhaps he would include his own transactions and ask generally how you are going to deal with such cases. They did not begin under my regime, but in the hon. gentleman's time.

Mr. FOSTER. I will try to reason with my hon. friend in another way. He is an honest man in his own transactions, and he would no doubt admit that the same line of definite statement ought to be pursued with reference to public transactions as with reference to private transactions. Suppose, for instance, that he was carrying on a business, the proceeds of which were so much and the expenditure so much; and every year he sent out to the shareholders of the business a statement of the receipts and expenditures, showing consequently the profits of the business. Now, suppose he had persuaded some one else who was carrying on an entirely different business, to allow him to reap a certain percentage of profit from his own transactions, while that other person shouldered $50,000 worth of work which belonged entirely to his own company. When he makes his statement to his shareholders, is it an honest statement if he gives the revenues and withholds the fact that he has not paid for the $50,000 worth of work which was the proper work of that company? There is an easy object lesson for even the Postmaster General.

Mr. MCGREGOR. Not the same, though.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, I am very glad the Postmaster General finds some one else to stand by him in that. Now, I will try and give an object lesson to my hon. friend who thinks this is not the same. When any one wants to find the results of the work of the different departments, he takes up the book in which the government purports to give the public accounts of the country. He looks in that book and he finds that the Post Office Department in the year 1899 had a revenue of so many millions of dollars, and on the next page he finds that the Post Office Department expended for the postal services of the country so many millions of dollars. He puts these two columns of figures side by side and strikes a balance, and says that the post office of Canada in its workings, as shown by the public accounts of the Dominion, has a surplus or deficit of so much. Now, does the Postmaster General think it is fair that these public accounts, purporting to give the condition of his and the other departments, should bear a falsehood on their face, that, so far as his department is concerned, they should be $50,000 out of the truth, because another department which was not constituted for that purpose, which had no vote for that purpose, and ought not to have spent a single dollar for that purpose, has taken $50,000 worth of the burden of the work, and has paid for it out of another and altogether different vote? Does the hon. gentleman think that is good book-keeping or honest book-keeping? Again, I quarrel with the other phase of it. When parliament was asked for a vote for the mounted police, it was asked for a well-known vote for a well-known service, and it gave the vote. Now $50,000 of the vote for the mounted police has been taken and used for postal services. If that can be done in the case of these two departments, I want to know where the limit is. When we give a vote for Inland Revenue, is the government to apply $50,000 of that vote to carry mails into the Yukon? If the money can be used for one department, it can just as well be used for another; and

I quarrel with the action of the government in taking $50,000 of the vote which was for the mounted police service and for that alone, and using it to carry mails in and out of the Yukon.

Mr. MCGREGOR. Did you not do that?

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend does not seem to have any view at all of a question solely on its merits. If he is accused of committing a murder, he does not seem to think that any crime is laid at his door provided he can look at anybody else and say, 'You did the same.'

Mr. McMILLAN. Then, your own language is the strongest condemnation of your own conduct at the time you were conducting the affairs of the country.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, have we come to this, in this House, that an old and I believe respected member of the House should keep his hat on and talk across the House.

Mr. McMILLAN. That is a strong argument you are using.

Mr. FOSTER—and without asking your permission to speak, or addressing the Chair? It seems to me you are growing oblivious to your duties as the hon. member is growing oblivious of the rights of a member of the House. But now we will go on with the argument after this good-natured interruption. I want to carry the question still further. I want to ask whether or not, when the Minister of Railways comes down to this House for a vote for railway purposes, and gets his vote, he is justified in taking $50,000 of that vote, and using it for carrying the mails into the Yukon or anywhere else, and then letting the accounts show that his expenditure for railway purposes and railway purposes alone was $50,000 more than it actually was. What right have the government to take away these votes from the purposes for which they were granted and devote them to an entirely different purpose.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. This money was devoted to the purpose for which it was voted.

Mr. FOSTER. The money for the North-west Mounted Police, I take leave to say, was not voted for any such purpose.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I beg your pardon.

Mr. FOSTER. The money for the North-west Mounted Police was voted for the services of the North-west Mounted Police.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. And for this mail service, by express provision.

Mr. FOSTER. On a general vote last year on which this same principle came up, I asked that that diversion of public money should be stopped, and the minister pledged himself to this House, that he would see that the proper distribution was made, and that the Post Office Department was charged with that which was its due. The Post Office Department has not been charged with a single cent of this $50,000 which was paid for by the other departments. If the hon. gentleman claims that his deficit for 1898-9 is $398,000, he states it $50,000 less than he should. The hon. gentleman knows it. He knows that $50,000 was expended in carrying his mails to and from Dawson and the Yukon. He cabbaged the revenue and flaunts that in the face of the country, but he takes good care not to assume the legitimate charges of his department. We ought to have an answer from the government, as to whether they propose to carry on this kind of playing fast and loose with the parliamentary appropriations, and fast and loose as well with any kind of reliable book-keeping.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I really do not know how many times the hon. gentleman has to be reminded of the facts, but I will once more remind the committee, at all events, and then leave the subject. He has said that for the year 1898-9, I carried in the general revenue of the post office, the receipts from the Yukon. I have already told the hon. gentleman that he is deceiving himself. In my report it is distinctly stated that the revenue from the Yukon is not included in the revenue of the post office service. On page xiii. of the report, the hon. gentleman will find the following:

Mails were also conveyed at about fortnightly intervals between Log Cabin and Atlin. The total value of the services so rendered has been fixed by the comptroller of the North-west Mounted Police at $47,400.

Revenue—Yukon and Atlin District.
The post office revenue for the Yukon and Atlin districts for the year amounted to $10,-846.61, collected at the different points as follows:

Atlin .....	$ 748 15
Dawson .....	9,411 28
Lake Bennett.....	637 18
Log Cabin .....	50 00

The expenditure, including the sums so fixed as the value of the services of the North-west Mounted Police, amounted to $69,350.39, the cost thus exceeding the revenue by $58,503.78. The financial operations of the year ended June 30, 1899, not including the revenue and expenditure in respect of the service in the Yukon and Atlin districts, as above mentioned, have resulted in a deficit of $398,917.79.

And then, on page 4, we get the gross receipts and the net receipts, and the gross expenditure and the net expenditure, for the year, with the exception of the revenue and expenditure from the Yukon. And at the foot of that statement, there is this note:

Revenue of the Yukon and Atlin districts ($10,-846.61) not included.

We simply divided the revenue and expenditure into two separate accounts, because it is much fairer, for the purpose of comparison, to separate the Yukon from the general post office service, and compare that portion of the Dominion service administered by the Post Office Department up to 1896, with the same portion administered since 1896. How is it the hon. gentleman only realizes now that I am dealing with these expenditures in this way. Does he not know that we voted that money to the Northwest Mounted Police, to be expended by them in supplying a postal service to the Post Office Department? The expenditure was perfectly proper. There was nothing illegal in it. On the contrary, it was in entire harmony with what took place in the House. The only question that could arise is as to the book-keeping, but there can be no question about any misspending the public money, which the hon. gentleman seems to argue there has been.

But if the hon. gentleman is inclined to be critical as to what is accurate book-keeping, will he be good enough to explain how it is that when he went out of office he had used up the whole parliamentary appropriation for carrying on the mail service to June 30, 1896, and had left unpaid accounts, up to that time, for the same service, amounting to over $680,000. He laid on the Table in the spring of 1896, a statement of the assets and liabilities of Canada, and the cost of administration for the fiscal year closing June 30, 1895, and yet at the commencement of the fiscal year of 1896, there were $616,000 of unpaid liabilities from the former fiscal year, which did not appear in the hon. gentleman's statement. I do not say that he was intending to conceal these accounts, but I say it was a lax practice. The hon. gentleman did not disclose this indebtedness in his statement for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, to which it properly belonged, but the moment he entered upon the fiscal year of 1896, his government took $616,000 out of the appropriations for that year to pay accounts that were due in 1895. Does the hon. gentleman call that honest, straightforward book-keeping? He should remove the beam from his own eye before finding fault with the mote in his brother's.

Mr. FOSTER. We will talk about this mote first. I do not intend that the hon. gentleman shall get away from a point in question until it is settled, and afterwards I am quite willing to explain to him, as I have done before, the matter he last brought up. Now, I am dealing with the post office revenue and expenditure for the fiscal year 1898-9, not for the current year. So, we are not concerned with the vote taken in this House last session for the current year which is just now about to conclude, nor for the wording of that vote. Let me take the hon. gentleman's own report first. He says that he has done all that is necessary when he has made certain notes in his report, when he has divided the Yukon and Atlin districts off from the rest of the post office field, and has declared that the receipts of that portion were $10,000, and the expenditures were $69,350. Having done that, he thinks he has effectually settled the question as to the book-keeping either in its principle or in its honesty as making a complete representation to the country of what took place in his department. I do not think that is a very satisfactory answer. He goes on directly afterwards and details the financial operations. Financial operations of what? Of the Post Office Department.

The financial operations of the year ended June 30, 1899, not including the revenue and expenditure in respect of the service in the Yukon and Atlin districts, as above mentioned (the same being above set forth), have resulted in a deficit of $398,917.79.

This is the deficit the hon. gentleman sets before the public as being the deficit that has arisen out of the administration of the post office in this country. In his departmental report, he says: 'not including the revenues or expenditures from the Yukon.' But when he is giving to parliament and the country an account of the operations for the year and adding up receipts and expenditures and deducting one from the other to find out his deficit, why does he not give the whole operation? What justification is there for him dividing up the field and leaving out the portion of the field which, when left out, favours his own peculiar method of calculation? To-day, I followed the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) when he was making his speech; and he will find it reported in Hansard that he talked of the deficit for this year as $398,000. The deficit of his department, is $398,000 plus over $50,000.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. That is all stated.

Mr. FOSTER. It is not stated. Nor did the hon. gentleman state that in the speech he made here to-day. Nor will it be stated to the country, nor is it stated in the public accounts which people go to learn the operations of every department of the government. In the public accounts which the people look to—and I challenge the hon. gentleman to deny it or disprove it—that $10,000 and over is included in the revenue, while in the expenditure of the post office as shown in the public accounts that $50,000 is excluded. There is one simple answer to a statement of that kind—that these public accounts give the Post Office Department and the Postmaster General the benefit of $10,000 of the revenue which is included, and they give equally the benefit of over $50,000 which is taken off his expenditure. And every country in the world which puts out comparative statistics, every man in the country who goes to the public accounts to find out what the operations of the department are, is misled by the statement, because the accounts do not show the actual results. I take exception to the hon. gentleman boasting that his deficit is only $398,000 when his deficit is $50,000 more. But, if, at any time, he happens to be taken up in making that statement, he will bring out his post office returns from his coat pocket and say—there is a paragraph which tells you with reference to the Yukon and Athin district that there is $10,000 of receipts and $69,000 and over of expenses that are not included in the deficit I have been talking about. Now, the hon. gentleman is a business man, and he knows as well as he needs to know anything, how the public accounts ought to be run so far as such matters in connection with the Post Office Department are concerned. What right has he to divide the field when he makes his general summing up? He can divide the field into five hundred different sections if he likes. But when he comes to summing up, he does not give a fair representation of the facts if he does not give every cent of income and every cent of outgo. And so he seeks to stand before the country with $50,000 less of deficit than he ought to have, than he would have if he shouldered the responsibilities proper and germane to his own department, and which he pledged himself in this House that he would have properly distributed. I believe the North-west Mounted Police actually made up the calculations, either at the request of the hon. gentleman or of his department, in order that the settlement might be made. But the hon. gentleman has not paid his bills, and he is sailing about with an advantage of $50,000 to himself and his department. Now, dear knows, no one wants to take away from the Postmaster General anything to which he is entitled. Let him have the benefit of his operations in the Post Office Department—no one grudges him that. But, surely he does not want to take an unfair advantage; he does not want to go before the country in a false position. The British post office collects all these statistics and publishes them in an abstract and sends them to every quarter of the globe. In doing so it publishes a statement in regard to the post office of Canada that is false to the extent of $50,000. Why is it false? Because, in summing up the details of receipts and expenditures in the public accounts, the Postmaster General had put $10,000 of receipts as being from a certain section and has sedulously withdrawn from his proper expenditure over $69,000 of the expenses in that locality. He cannot possibly stand up and say that that is right for himself or for the government. It is not right, and everybody knows it. I challenge the hon. gentleman to go to the estimates that were brought down for the year 1898-9, and show any authority given by this House to the North-west Mounted Police to use this money appropriated for their purposes to the carrying of mails into the Yukon. We should be all confusion, chaos, if we were to divert votes solemnly given for certain purposes and expend them for purposes not authorized by parliament, in order to lighten the burden of certain departments and enable them to make a favourable showing before the country. It is not fair to either department from which you filch, nor is it fair to the department in whose interest you filch. We have a certain clear standard and principle upon which we make parliamentary appropriations, and that has been certainly violated in this respect.

Now we come to another point that my hon. friend has stated over and over again. He says: Why did you not in the early times of the North-west do the same thing? Well, my answer is, first, that I was not Minister of Finance at that time, nor Postmaster General. But that does not affect the principle. What I would like the hon. gentleman to do is, to give us the figures with reference to how the accounts were kept in those early days in the North-west. I agree that if for the general public a post office service was put on in the North-west, the payment for that service should be debited to the Post Office Department alone. I am inclined to think that the hon. gentleman will find, if he makes this investigation, that it can be explained as I explained it this afternoon, that the burden was borne by the post office the moment the burden became in the public interest. Now, I take up the other point. How unfair of the hon. gentleman to state that six or seven hundred thousand dollars of debts owing by the Post Office Department for the year 1896 were cooked, or manipulated, or concealed. The contracts were running, made according to law, properly signed, and properly in force, and under these contracts the mails were being carried. As the quarters came round the payments were made for the department and the accounts went into the Auditor General. You come up to the quarter ending June 30, 1895, and the department finds that the money necessary to pay the bills is not provided for, that is before the accounts are payable.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. No, they were payable in June.

Mr. FOSTER. The accounts are technically due on the 30th day of June, but no contractor's accounts, scattered as they are all over the country, could ever be collected and paid until sufficient time elapses for the processes necessary for payment. So that for these services which are performed up to June 30 and are owed for then, the department cannot pay until the accounts have time to come in and are certified, are examined, are ordered to be paid, and cheques are drawn therefor. So that, about July 20, and along to the end of July, these accounts get into a shape when they can be paid. Where is the concealment? Where is the manipulation? Where is the desire to keep anything out of the public accounts? When the time comes for payment, the Post Office Department has its vote, not for North-west Mounted Police work, but for its own post office work for the year 1896, and it pays the bills which run over from 1895 out of the vote for the very same kind and class of service under the Post Office Department.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. It never was voted for that.

Mr. FOSTER. It was voted for the contracts for carrying the mail, contracts which run generally for three years, and it is voted for those self-same contracts in that respect. Where is the concealment? Where is the manipulation? Where is the keeping of these off the public accounts? When do they get into the public accounts? They cannot get into the public accounts until they get into the departments, are paid, are audited by the Auditor General, which is some six or eight months after the last fiscal year is ended. Who kept them out of the public accounts? Were they kept out of them? Every dollar of the expenditure for 1898 is in the public accounts and debited to its proper year of 1895. But, says some one: The bills were left unpaid, some newspapers were not paid for twelve years. That is a silly argument. There is not a department in existence to-day but has some back bills running and claims upon them, may be, for twenty or thirty years. And you will not have to scan these present estimates long to find that bills which have been running for many years have been taken up and passed by the present government and included in these estimates. But there is no concealment. Every dollar of the service which was contracted for in 1895 was paid and was charged up to 1895, and if there was a dollar that was not paid it was on some contested claim which, for some reason, was not admitted. The whole head and front of the offending was simply what I have explained this afternoon, that the practice had grown up in the Post Office Department on account of these running contracts, for various reasons, whatever they may be—I am not saying now they are the best of reasons, but that was the practice—the last quarters bills were paid out of the succeeding year's vote. Condemn it if you like, say that there ought to be enough money left over from the appropriation of 1896 to pay every dollar that was incurred in 1896, and you are on correct ground. But it is a practice which, although it is allowed, is violated in certain cases, violated in this, violated in the hon. gentleman's time every year since they have been in office. They have been criticised for violating it, and rightly so, as every government should be. As I said this afternoon, the immigration department itself actually spent and was debtor for $75,000 more last year than was authorized, and the hon. gentleman had to come down here just a day or two ago and get a vote in order to pay what had actually been spent. That is an instance of the service of one year.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). For the service of the present year.

Mr. FOSTER. Last year the Minister of Finance got for his colleague the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) so many hundred thousand dollars and not a cent more. His colleague the Minister of the Interior, without parliamentary appropriation and authorization, spent $75,000 more than that, and the Minister of Finance had to come down and ask parliament to be good enough to make his vote larger. That was spent outside of the appropriation. So, in 1895 $600,000 was spent more than the appropriation for that year, and in pursuance of the long practice of years. Where is the concealment? Where is the manipulation? Condemn the principle of running over from one year to another, if you please, I will not quarrel with you for that. But, you say that there is concealment, or manipulation, or an endeavour to run things along so as not to pay for electoral reasons. The hon. member for North Wellington said that a wonderful example of this was the newspaper bills which had been allowed to run for twelve years, and he said that it was intended to pass the elections and then they could be paid as if, in twelve years we did not have three or four elections. There must have been another reason than that. So, again, I ask that the post office expenditure shall be shouldered by its own department, and that the public accounts shall certify to the people when they read them, that they are the representation of the receipts and expenditures for each service which they purport to represent.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) is extremely anxious that the public accounts shall contain a full statement of the affairs of this country.

Mr. FOSTER. A fair statement.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. A fair statement and a full statement. I admit that the public accounts should show the affairs of every department, and should show the liabilities of Canada of all kinds. What did the hon. gentleman do? It is not enough for him to say that these accounts were in the department, that they had been passed in various ways by various officers. He is contending that nothing short of everything being set forth in black and white, in the public accounts, will meet the requirements of the situation. Let us take him on his own ground. On June 30, 1895, you wound up the fiscal year, having spent every appropriation of parliament for that year for the post office, and you owed in addition to that $616,000. On June 30, 1895, or a few days afterwards, you closed up your accounts, and you printed your public accounts. You say that the public accounts are entitled to show the full state of affairs in the country. Where do you find, on the face of these accounts, in any shape or form, an acknowledgment that you still owe $616,000? You did not put it on the face of the public accounts; you put it nowhere except you say that it was in the department somewhere in the shape of accounts, receipts and vouchers.

Mr. CLANCY. Would the hon. Postmaster General allow me to ask him a question? Where did he put, on the face of the public accounts that $41,952 that he asked this House for to cover last year's expenditure on June 30?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I am discussing another point: I will come back to that. The hon. ex-Minister of Finance is claiming that nothing but a full and frank statement of the affairs of the country, on one book, one volume, the public accounts, will meet the requirements of the situation, so that the general public may take that book and ascertain the condition of the affairs of Canada. He issued that volume shortly after the close of the fiscal year of 1895, and from cover to cover, neither in that book nor in any departmental book, will you find an acknowledgment, a hint, or a suggestion of any kind of an addition to the liabilities of the country of $616,000. You cannot find it anywhere, in any record, except in the pigeon holes of the Post office Department.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the hon. gentleman want an answer?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I will complete my statement, and then let the hon. gentleman give me his answer. On July 1, or very shortly afterwards, he took the money that parliament had voted for the work that was to be performed from July 1, 1895, to July 1, 1896, to carry the department on for that year, he took $616,000 of that money, misappropriated it, mis-spent it, misapplied it, in violation of every principle of responsible government, in payment of accounts that had been unpaid, and which had never been made known to parliament. Parliament never voted money for 1895-6, to be expended in paying the liabilities of 1894-5. That is what the hon. gentleman did. This afternoon I was inclined to pass it by with only an observation, and the more so because the hon. gentleman himself, admitted, as he seems to admit even now, that what had taken place then, was extremely irregular. He speaks of it as being a bad practice. I do not think you could conceive of any worse practice than to take an enormous sum of money out of the appropriation for the current year, and apply it to a purpose for which parliament had never voted it, and of which parliament had no knowledge. If the hon. gentleman has so great a respect for the public accounts, then let him try to justify his own practices. That not only happened in that year, but my opinion is, and the report of the auditors who made the investigation, is that it happened in several preceding years, and if it did, what is the conclusion? The deficits which appeared on the face of the public accounts for several years prior to the hon. gentleman's leaving office, are absolutely unreliable deficits. There were altogether these unpaid accounts amounting to $685,000 and this $685,000 has to be either applied to the last year of their transactions or spread over prior years. If they had honestly closed up all their accounts each year, if they had paid their full liabilities out of the vote for the year, then, their expenditure would have appeared $685,000 greater, either included in one year, or distributed over the many years in which this expenditure had taken place.

Mr. JOHN HAGGART (South Lanark). According to the hon. gentleman's argument, the amount for the post office was voted for the year 1894-5, and the expenditure that was to be met, was for the year 1894-5. Besides the amount voted by parliament, the whole receipts of the post office were at the disposal of the Post Office Department. The accounts were all closed at the end of every year.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart), is enunciating a new doctrine. I think if we were to take the revenue of the post office which the law says shall be paid to the Receiver General every day, to form part of the consolidated revenue fund of this country, and spend it to carry on the affairs of the department, we would very soon hear from the hon. ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster).

Mr. HAGGART. What I say is the fact. The hon. gentleman must know that there are lots of funds which are not paid into the consolidated fund.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. A certain portion of the fund realized from the sale of postage stamps goes to the postmasters. Out of that, in the first place, the postmasters are entitled to take the cost of selling the postage stamps, but it is only a portion.

Mr. FOSTER. All you get is the balance.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Certainly. There is only a portion that accrues to the Crown. There is a contract made with these officers, that out of these funds, they are entitled to take their percentage, but the balance belongs to the Receiver General, and it cannot go out of the Receiver General's custody, except by the authority of parliament itself.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. Postmaster General is mistaken. It was only the deficit above these results that was voted by parliament every year.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I think that is a new doctrine. What I wish the hon. ex-Minister of Finance to explain now is why he did not carry that $685,000 into the public accounts. I will submit to the committee that in dealing with the affairs of Canada it is not simply one book you take, but you must read all our blue-books together; the one is more or less supplementary of the other. The Postmaster General's report sets forth frankly and fully the whole transactions of the Post Office Department both in respect to the Yukon and in respect to all the rest of Canada. It is far better, in order to an intelligent comparison of the administration of the post office under the present and former regime, that there should be that separation of accounts, so that a true comparison may be made. The whole statement appears on the face of the Postmaster General's report, so that the public can know fully the whole transaction. I do not propose to know the technical way in which the public accounts are kept. I do not compile that book. I compiled my own book and I suppose it is for others to compile theirs. I would tell the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) that I do not think his description of what takes place at the close of the fiscal year is correct. When the accounts for the fiscal year are due for the services up to the 30th June, the Auditor General keeps the accounts open in some way because it is not to be supposed that when the first of July arrives, that therefore we cannot include in the accounts of the fiscal year just closed, payments made after the first of July. The test is that the payments to be made in a certain year must be in respect to the services performed for that year. I have not yet been able to understand from the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) why he did not include in his public accounts the expenditure for the fiscal year in which these liabilities occurred. He has not yet explained what he did with that $685,000, and why he did not put it plainly on the face of the public accounts. Not one trace of it was to be found in any public accounts until the two auditors had investigated the affairs and made the discovery, and my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) reported the matter to parliament and got a vote to clear off these legacies which the hon. gentleman left.

Mr. FOSTER. I shall have to labour a little while longer with the Postmaster General, and I am going to start on the first point by a sort of shorter catechism method. Q. Who is responsible for the administration of the post office business of this country? A. The Postmaster General. Q. Did the Postmaster General administer the post office affairs of Canada in 1898-9? A. He did. Q. Did he take all the revenues, and were all these revenues returned into his receipts? A. Every dollar of them. The only exception is that referred to by my hon. friend (Mr. Haggart), namely, that the local postmasters are paid out of the sale of postage stamps and the balance thereof is all that comes into the consolidated fund. Q. Did the Postmaster General get $10,000 odd receipts for the Yukon service? A. He did. Q. Did it go into the consolidated revenue fund? A. It did. Q. Was it credited to the Postmaster General in that fund? A. It was. Q. Did the Postmaster General have postal service carried on into and out of the Yukon for that year? A. He did. Q. How much did it cost? A. $69,000. Q. Has he paid the bills? A. No. There cannot be anything more conclusive than that. If the Postmaster General did not pay the bills, who did? The North-west Mounted Police paid the bills. The Postmaster General acknowledged the debt, but he has not paid it. He grabbed the $10,000, but he let some other department do the work and shoulder the $60,000 of expenses, and he has not paid the bill. So much for that. Now, the hon. gentleman says that $670,000 of the year 1895, never appeared in the public accounts—though I am such a stickler for the public accounts showing the exact arrangements for the year—and was not known until the year thereafter, when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) had to come down and get a vote. I tell the Postmaster General that he is entirely wrong.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I spoke of the year 1895.

Mr. FOSTER. Very well, we will take the year 1895. Every contract that was running and every service that was performed for the year 1895 up to the 30th June of that year, was a debt owed by the Post Office Department. Before the Public Accounts for the year 1896, which show the statements for 1895 were put into the printer's hands by the Finance Department, every one of these accounts for 1895 that were adjustable were adjusted, were paid for, and appear as paid for in the 1895 statement. After the financial year is over time has to be given to close the accounts. The time used to be four months; now it is two, and in that time all these accounts come in, through their proper routine, are shown to be correct if they are correct, are paid, are then audited by the Auditor General, and every one of them goes into the public accounts of 1896, which is a statement of the matters for the preceding year. Every dollar of this went through that process and is shown in that preceding year. What did the Postmaster General find? He found that the practice in the department was, of paying out of the vote for the succeeding year the over-balance for the preceding year. For that same year for which the balance was over-paid in 1895, a similar amount went to pay for 1894. The Postmaster General asks: Can anything be conceived worse than that? I will tell him what can be conceived worse. The post office vote is given for the post office work, and the Postmaster General can go to-morrow to the Auditor General and consult with him and he will find that the Auditor General practices this: That with regard to the same department and the same kind of work, the vote that is given by parliament for one year can be drawn upon to pay for the bills of the preceding year until the last bill is paid. That is well known and acted upon. What would be worse than paying for the post office service out of the post office vote? I will tell you what would be worse, paying for the post office work with money which was appropriated for an entirely different purpose. That is what the hon. gentleman has done. That is all there is to it.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I do not think my hon. friend has answered the question. Let me try the shorter catechism method, but in a much briefer form. Was there on the 30th of June, 1896, a sum of $680,000 due to various parties in the Dominion of Canada for postal services? Yes, there was. There is no dispute about that. Was it paid within the year ending the 30th of June, 1896? No. Are you obliged to pay your accounts for the year before the 30th of June? No. Is there not a reasonable time allowed for payment? Yes. Allowed to the Post Office Department as well as to others? Yes. Did the Postmaster General, within that reasonable time which is allowed after the close of the year, pay that $680,000? No. Then, it was not paid at all within that period? No. Then it remained as a debt due on the 30th of June, 1896? Yes. Did it appear in any blue-book of Canada as a sum due? No. Then there was concealment, inasmuch as there was $680,000 due to citizens of Canada, and not a scratch of the pen in the public accounts to show it. I think my hon. friend will see that, applying the shorter catechism, his method of arguing can be turned very effectively against himself. There is no peculiarity in the treatment of the post office accounts different from that of any others. There is a reasonable time allowed after the close of the fiscal year. We admit at once that you cannot get from contractors their accounts by the 30th of June. My hon. friend assumed in his argument that this money was not paid at that time because it could not have been paid. Such is not the fact at all. There will possibly always be small sums—

Mr. FOSTER. Let us be clear on this, if my hon. friend will allow me. Does he mean to say that on Monday morning he will this year have every bill contracted by the Post Office Department for this service paid?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. No, certainly not. Parliament does not expect the Postmaster General to pay these accounts by Monday morning. It allows a period of one month or two months, varying under certain conditions—a reasonable and sufficient period—in which to collect these accounts and pay them. Although they may be paid on the last day of July, they can be and should be charged to the fiscal year ending the 30th of June. Therefore the argument that these accounts could not be paid because they could not be paid on the 30th of June is entirely fallacious. Nobody expected them to be paid on the 30th of June. They were due on the 30th of June, most certainly, and if they had to be paid afterwards, there was nothing wrong in saying that there were debts actually due by that date. It is very desirable—and to that extent I agree with my hon. friend's argument—that the public accounts should, for purposes of comparison, show the same in one year as in another year. It is very desirable that we should pay within the fiscal year all the accounts for that year. The closer you can get to that the better your fiscal system, and I do not think the Auditor General would be as wide and liberal in his interpretation of the law as my hon. friend would contend. But while I admit that that is desirable, I think my hon. friend presses much too far the distinction between departments. He appeals to my hon. friend the Postmaster General. He said: 'I appeal to him as a business man. If he were conducting the affairs of a company, and were to charge to that company a large sum of money for services rendered by another company, would that be fair and honest?' No, it would not be, because there are two distinct interests. But in this case, as between the North-west Mounted Police and the Post Office Department, the distinction, except for purposes of comparison, is very much like the distinction between tweedle-dum and tweedle-dee.

Mr. FOSTER. Why did you have any, then?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Because it is well to get the accounts in the fullest detail. But there is the greatest difference in the two cases. In the case of the private parties, there would be actual dishonesty in charging to one company the services rendered to another. But it is an account as between your right-hand pocket and your left-hand pocket, affecting the same paymaster, and surely it is a very trifling question whether or not this account is charged to the Post Office Department or to another department.

Mr. FOSTER. Then, what is the use, and what confidence have we in appropriating by Act of parliament a particular sum of money for a particular service ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. It seems to me that if the hon. gentleman has a quarrel, it is not with the Postmaster General, but the Department of Mounted Police. We have appropriated a certain sum of money for the purposes of the Department of the Interior and for the purposes of the mounted police. Let us see what happens. The mounted police, an organized body, is able to render a service to another department of Canada. Let us take another illustration. Suppose one of the steamers owned by the government of Canada, as represented by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, is sent out on the coast to seize a smuggler, and the smuggler is brought in. Are we going to say that it is a vital error if the Customs Department is not charged with that particular service ? Is it not all done for the government of Canada ? It would be a convenience, I grant, if you could in every case charge to each department the proper sums for services performed by that department ; but there will always be cases, I suppose, in which that will not be done. My hon. friend has admitted that in his own time it was not done in all cases in the Yukon ; but he pleaded that it was to a very small extent. He said : Would you defend a case of murder on that account ? In the eyes of the law there is no difference between murdering a baby and murdering a grown man ; and if my hon. friend wants to be exceedingly technical, the objection can be taken to his conduct in the past in reference to this very Yukon mail service. Suppose the Minister of Railways should, in managing a railway, neglect to bill the Postmaster General for carrying the mails, wherein would the public interest suffer ? My hon. friend the Minister of Railways would not have as good a balance sheet, and the Postmaster General would have a little better one.

Mr. FOSTER. How nicely they could work in with each other.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. But my hon. friend has not met the question. Wherein would the country suffer the smallest possible loss if a thousand dollars more were charged to the Railway Department and a thousand dollars less to the Post Office Department ? I am not arguing that it is not desirable to keep these accounts as separate as possible.

Mr. CLANCY. If the hon. gentleman's argument is good, there is no necessity for keeping them separate.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. So far as causing the loss of one cent to the taxpayers of Canada is concerned, the question is not one of importance at all. For purposes of comparison, for purposes of convenience, for purposes of statistics, it is quite desirable.

Mr. FOSTER. Only statistics ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. So far as the pockets of the taxpayers of Canada are concerned it does not affect them one hair's-breadth, and the hon. gentleman knows it. The hon. gentleman is trying to magnify a purely technical question as to whether one service is performed by one department or by another department of the government, both of these departments representing the same treasury and the same taxpayers. I say again, I do not minimize the importance of having these accounts separate ; but when parliament voted a certain sum to the mounted police, the question is whether the mounted police applied that money to its proper service. The hon. gentleman says that the post office is not the proper service. Well, if the mounted police, a well-organized body, could render assistance to the Post Office Department, and did so, and if the adjustment of the accounts between the two departments was not completed and given effect to until a later period, my hon. friend may well call attention to the fact, but he magnifies the importance of the question when it is the same paymaster, as I have pointed out. He asks, can there be anything worse than this department failing to pay another department for work done by that other department ? Yes, there can be. It is bad enough that the Postmaster General has neglected to pay the Prime Minister, as the head of the mounted police, a certain sum for work done by the mounted police for the Post Office Department, but it is much worse not to pay an outsider to whom the money is really due, and that was the case with my hon. friend.

Mr. FOSTER. We are at poles asunder on this point. Take the year 1894-5. Here were your mail contractors who, on June 30, 1895, had performed their services and sent in their bills, does the hon. gentleman say that these bills were not paid until 1897, and that these contractors were kept out of their money for a whole year ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. No, but I say that there seems to have grown up a practice of not paying these people until after a sufficient time has elapsed to keep the money out of the accounts for the year in which the services was done. They had to wait for a sufficient time, to prevent these moneys appearing in the accounts of the year in which they were due. Let us by all means give the hon. gentleman the benefit of the plea that such a practice had grown up, but the fact still remains that at the close of 1895, there was $616,000 or thereabouts due for the mail service of Canada. The bills were not all in, but they came in a little later, but instead of being charged up to the year 1895, they were charged to the year 1896.

Mr. FOSTER. What is that ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. In 1895, at the close of the year, there was $616,000 due for services performed within that year. That money was not paid within that year, or within the period after the close of the year contemplated by law, and consequently was not charged in the expenditure of that year, but was paid out of the appropriations of the following year, and the public accounts up to June 30, 1895, certainly did not show that that sum of $616,000 was due by the Post Office Department for mail service performed in that year. My hon. friend may say that the practice of that kind had grown up, and I give him the benefit of it, but that does not alter the fact.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend says that the North-west Mounted Police are a faithful body, and it was there on the field and consequently could help the department, and he draws the inference that it could help the Post Office Department without any expense to itself. But that is contrary to the evidence given by Mr. White, the comptroller, under oath before the committee. Here is the evidence :

Q. From October 1, 1898, until May, 1899, what estimate have you made of the cost of the mail service to your department, as an incidental part of the service?—A. $47,000.

Q. On what basis did you make that estimate?—A. On what I estimated to be the number of men employed. You see, we had the posts and buildings as part of the regular system, and I estimated the number of men who were employed extra and specially for this work and the number of dogs.

Q. You took no account of what you called equipment expenses, that is, the expenses of posts and the like?—A. Not of the posts, but of the men and the dogs.

Q. But as to the equipment of posts and the like, you made no estimate of what proportion the post office would have to pay with reference to that?—A. No, sir.

Q. And you included none of that?—A. No, my estimate was made up as follows—

He then goes on to give the details. Therefore his estimate was made simply on the extraordinary expenses and without including anything for the equipment and posts—just the men and dogs, their pay and their feed, that he had to employ for the sole purpose of carrying the mails. So that, to all intents and purposes, it was simply the mails that were carried and paid for out of an appropriation not intended for the mail service at all.

Mr. HAGGART. I understand the Minister of Finance to say that the accounts of the Post Office Department for 1895, which were not paid until 1896, were not charged in the Postmaster General's statement in the expenditure for 1895.

Mr. FIELDING.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I believe not. In each year, as a consequence of an old practice—which the ex-Minister of Finance is not prepared to say was a good practice—a sum of money due for the last quarter of one year was paid out of the next year's appropriations.

Mr. HAGGART. There is no doubt about that, but the point I make is this. In the statement of the expenses and receipts of the Post Office Department, every one of these accounts was balanced to the end of the year, and in the statement made to the public they were all included although not paid.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. In the Postmaster General's report ?

Mr. HAGGART. Yes.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. But the hon. member for York says we have no right to consider that report, but only the public accounts issued by the Finance Department. That is his quarrel with my hon. friend to-day. My hon. friend the Postmaster General has given this Yukon matter fully in his own published departmental report, but the hon. member for York says that is concealment and deception.

Mr. HAGGART. The Finance Minister made this further statement. He said that an amount due in 1895, but paid in 1896, was not charged in the accounts of 1895. If my memory serves me right, all these accounts were balanced at the end of the year, and the receipts and the expenditure for each year appeared in the statement of the Postmaster General, although certain accounts may not have been paid until a couple of months later.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. My hon. friend is cutting the ground from under the feet of the hon. member for York, because the hon. member for York says you have no right to consider the report of the Postmaster General. He says that when the public want to know the revenue and expenditure of a department they do not go to the departmental report, but to the Finance Minister's statement, which shows the revenues received and the amounts expended. That is the only statement my hon. friend from York is willing to consider. My hon. friend who has just spoken is correct, but he can only be correct by accepting the report of the Postmaster General, and saying that the financial statement and the Postmaster General's Report should be read together. That is exactly what my hon. colleague says, but what the hon. member for York says is deceptive.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman is altogether wrong. I repeat this statement, which I have already made a dozen times, that for the services of 1894-5, rendered up to June 30, that year—

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. That is not fair. My hon. friend (Mr. Foster) knows that this is not fair. When he dwells on that phrase 'rendered up to June 30 of that year' he knows that is not the way the accounts are actually paid. There is a further period allowed for the adjustment of accounts.

Mr. FOSTER. I never said anything else. If the hon. minister (Mr. Fielding) will hear me out he will see that there is no disagreement between us on that point. What I was arguing was, whether the incurred expenses of 1894-5 are, in the public accounts, entered up in that year, 1894-5. Is not that it?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Yes—well?

Mr. FOSTER. Now, I understand the hon. gentleman to say that there was $675,000 or so not adjusted within the delay left in 1896 for the adjustment of accounts of the previous year, and, consequently, they did not go where they should have gone—into the column for 1894-5—but went into the column for 1895-6. Now, he is wrong. And I have only to cite the figures to prove it. According to the public accounts, the post office expenditure in 1894-5 was $3,594,000. Now, if there was $671,000 in 1895-6 left over from the previous year, we do not find it, because the expenditure for 1895-6 was $3,665,000, or only $60,000 more than the year before. The statement I make is, that every dollar chargeable to 1894-5 appears as having been paid in the expenditure for that year.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I am not in the inner circles of the Post Office Department, and I am bound to take the information as it reaches me from the minister; and his statement is entirely at variance with that of my hon. friend (Mr. Foster). The hon. gentleman tries to show that he is correct, and to prove it says that the expenditures of 1895-6 were about the same as those of the previous years, and, therefore, could not have included $680,000 carried over from the previous year. But, surely he is not serious. He knows that in each of these years there was paid in the new year a large sum of money which properly belonged to the old year. If he means to say that the public accounts for 1895 included the payment of all services rendered up to June 30, 1895, all I can say is that that is entirely at variance with the statement of the Postmaster General—and, I believe, entirely at variance with the facts.

Mr. FOSTER. The Postmaster General's statement is made under a misapprehension. If that amount was carried over, find it in the public accounts, if you can. There is in these years only the difference of $50,000 or $60,000, the ordinary accretion that takes place. I make the statement that every dollar that is due on the service of the Post Office Department for any one year, so far as it can be adjusted in the time allowed—there may be some odds and ends that cannot be adjusted—appear in the public accounts of that year. It makes no matter whether they are paid out of the succeeding year's vote or out of that of the year in which they accrue.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Will my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) state that the accounts ending June 30, 1895, include the payments of all postal services rendered by contractors and others up to June 30, 1895?

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly, that is the statement.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. It is a marvellous statement to make, and one not in accordance with the facts.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. It is true, if you go on the basis of robbing Peter to pay Paul.

Mr. FOSTER. You can call it robbing if you like. But the Auditor General will not call it that. Even if we do take out of the succeeding year to pay for the past year—which I have admitted was the practice in that department for twenty years—that does not alter the fact that every dollar for the services of that year—barring small items unadjusted—appears in the column for that year.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. My hon. friend (Mr. Foster) endeavours to make good the accuracy of his accounts for 1895 by paying for that year out of the appropriations for 1896 which never were appropriated for that purpose. At the close of the fiscal year 1895, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) issued a balance sheet setting forth the assets and liabilities of the Dominion of Canada on June 30, 1895, and I have that balance sheet in my hand. On one side appear the liabilities, including not only the public debt of Canada, not only the trust funds, but every dollar that is recoverable from the Dominion of Canada as a debtor—moneys owing to depositors in the post office savings banks, moneys owing to contractors, and to all other creditors. On that date, the hon. gentleman's government owed for unpaid accounts in the post office, $616,000.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. They did not owe a cent, he says.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. But, they did; the money had been earned from the Dominion, the liability had accrued and was due on June 30, 1895.

Mr. FOSTER. When was the balance sheet issued?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. It was issued as a representation of the state of affairs up to June 30, 1895.

Mr. FOSTER. As adjusted afterwards.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. There is no such qualification here.

Mr. FOSTER. You could not issue a balance sheet any other way.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. There is no such qualification. If the hon. gentleman could disregard $616,000 and fail to place that in its proper place, he would fail to recognize $6,000,000 in the same way.

Mr. FOSTER. Monday will be July 2. On July 2, if my hon. friend's (Mr. Mulock's) contention is right, the Post Office Department will owe some $600,000 or $700,000, which it will not pay until some time in August—or perhaps later. It will not be due until some time in August, perhaps the middle of August.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. And yet you will issue the balance sheet. Now is that balance sheet for the 30th of June last in actual existence?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The money has been voted to pay that liability, and to the extent that there is money in the treasury to pay those liabilities it is not necessary in this balance sheet to take cognizance of the liabilities that are going to be paid with that money.

Mr. FOSTER. It is not a liability as long as it is going to be paid.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. It is a liability on the 30th of June.

Mr. FOSTER. Then I stand a good deal better than I thought.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The hon. gentleman knows full well, and he cannot get out of this position, that on the 30th of June, 1895, there had accrued $616,000, and the hon. gentleman did not have one dollar of an appropriation to pay it. Now, I want to know why he did not put that $616,000 on this balance sheet as a liability of Canada?

Mr. FOSTER. Because to have put it there would have been a thing which is wrong. What few accounts for the year have come in have been paid, have been audited by the Auditor General, and the balance sheet cannot be made out and never is made out until that adjustment has taken place.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Not if the accounts have been paid out of the next year's appropriation. That balance sheet does not show a penny of the expenditure of the country after the 1st day of July, except for the services of the past year.

Mr. HAGGART. The balance sheet and the statement made by my hon. friend are the same as were made in 1893-4-5. Here is what the statute requires:

Mr. MULOCK.

A report of the finances, receipts and expenditure of the post office of Canada for the year ended on the 30th day of June previous, in the form of a general account current, showing on the one side the whole amount of balances due to the department from postmasters or others at the time up to which the then last report was made, the whole amount of postage that accrued within the year elapsed since such last report, and any and every other item of revenue or receipt; and on the other side of the account, the charges and expenditures incurred by the department within the said year, of every kind and nature, showing in separate amounts the charges for mail transportation, for salaries and commission and allowances to postmasters, for printing and advertising, and for incidental and miscellaneous items of expenditure, showing also the balances remaining due from postmasters and others at the close of such year; and showing in the shape of a balance what the result of the operations of the department is for the said year, whether the revenue exceeds the expenditure, or the expenditure the revenue, and in either case, to what amount.

So what I said was perfectly correct, that in that statement made by the Postmaster General the balance showed the amount due at the end of the fiscal year.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. My hon. friend is talking of the Postmaster General's Report.

Mr. HAGGART. I am talking of the statement that was made by the Minister of Finance that at the end of the fiscal year there was no appropriation, or no charge of these amounts appeared in the Postmaster General's account.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I did not say that. The hon. member for York has been contending that we must conduct this discussion with regard to statements in the public accounts. He has refused to allow my hon. friend to bring in his own departmental report as bearing on the question at all; and if my hon. friend is not to be allowed to bring in his departmental report and to read it in with the statements in the public accounts, how can the hon. gentlemen opposite ask to do the same thing?

Mr. HAGGART. But the ex-Minister of Finance was arguing further than that, that the accounts that have been paid and the accounts that have been received have not entered into the public accounts at the end of the year.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. He rules out the post office report altogether.

Mr. HAGGART. No, he was stating that in the public accounts the cash that was paid out is not shown. There was $69,000 paid out, and $10,000 received, and he was complaining that it did not appear at all in the public accounts.

Mr. FOSTER. The $10,000 received does.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. But the hon. gentleman knows that the money that was paid out shows in the public accounts, but it does not happen to show in the Postmaster General's department. It shows as against the government of Canada, as a part of its total expenditure, and the only point was that it has not been shown as against the post office vote. The ex-Minister of Finance is contending that every dollar that is expended by one department for another department must be shown as against that department. It is impossible to do that, it is not done, and only ought to be done in large sums. The hon. member ought to know that the mounted police have rendered service to a number of departments. The mounted police does work for the customs in the prevention of smuggling; it is not charged against customs, therefore, the Minister of Customs is to be charged with deception. The mounted police does work for the administration of justice in prosecuting and looking after criminals; it is not charged against the Justice Department, therefore, the Minister of Justice is to be charged with deception. The mounted police does work for the Interior Department in the protection of timber; it is not charged against the Interior Department, therefore, the Minister of the Interior is to be charged with deception. The mounted police does work for the Post Office Department; it is not charged directly against the Post Office Department, therefore, the Postmaster General is to be charged with deception. Well, now whether my hon. friends the Minister of Justice, or the Minister of the Interior, or the Minister of Customs, may be open to the charge, the Postmaster General cannot be open to it, for he has taken the trouble to put in his own public report a declaration that a portion of the service which is charged in the public accounts to the mounted police, really is a charge against his own department. The hon. gentleman may send the Minister of Justice to Coventry, or the Minister of Customs, or the Minister of the Interior, each one of whom has filched—that is the word used by the ex-Minister of Finance—has filched some service from the Mounted Police vote, but though they may be sent to Coventry the Postmaster General cannot be, because he has come in and shown in his own public report exactly the facts of the case.

Mr. FOSTER. I never expected that a Minister of Finance in this country would take the position that the hon. gentleman has taken just now, a position which is subversive of all good book-keeping and of all honest presentation of the facts with reference to the departments. He satisfies his own conscience, and tries to satisfy some of his followers by telling them: Why, we must do little services for each other, little neighbourly services, and no one is picayune enough to follow out every little service that is given. But the argument which has been held by the Minister of Finance here to-night is a most vicious argument with reference to financial methods and with reference to Dominion book-keeping. A Minister of Finance ought to stand for clearness and definiteness of accounts. Every Minister of Finance in the past has done it. I do not think you can find, looking through the past, any Minister of Finance holding that position here in this House. The very moment he does it, that very moment he invites all kinds of cross work, and confusion inevitably ensues. If you carry that principle out, what is the use of having any departments at all? Now this is not a small matter. The Minister of Finance himself will admit that this is a grave matter. There is no doubt about the service, no doubt about the amount, it is a large amount, and yet they have not included it in the public accounts where it ought to be, and consequently it is not a fair presentation of the case. I had hoped that the Minister of Finance would say that that item of $47,400, and the $3,000, and the $750, which are plain, and have been agreed to, will be transferred to the post office account, as they properly should be, where they will take their rightful place. He cited the position of the Customs Department and the Department of Marine and Fisheries. Well, they do help each other, but they keep their accounts as distinct as they possibly can. They undertook to run the steamer Constance in the St. Lawrence River, each paying part of the expense. They tried to do it in that way for a time, but it was unsatisfactory, and at last, one department took over the vessel and paid the whole of the expenses. There is always that adjustment. If the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals carries post office bags for the hon. Postmaster General, he charges him on approved rates just the same as if the service were performed by the Canadian Pacific Railway or the Grand Trunk Railway. Is it a mere matter of book-keeping? Is it a mere technical matter? What is it that the people watch? They watch the improvement in the administration of the country on different lines. They are intensely interested in knowing whether the public works are productive and to what extent they are productive. It is essential that the service of every department shall be complete and independent in itself. If the Railway Department carry mail bags for the hon. Postmaster General they must receive credit for it. It does not make any difference in the end; it all comes out of the people's pockets or goes into the people's pockets, but, from the historic and administrative view in showing that each department is managed in a way to produce growth and progress it is desirable that the accounts of each department shall be separately kept and that each department, so far as it is possible, shall come face to face with its own history. That is not merely a technical matter. It is a matter which runs into the very warp and woof of the country's progress, so far as the administration is concerned. There may be cases of a few dollars where work is done which is not worth adjusting, but there is no excuse for it in reference to large items.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. My hon. friend and I, I am afraid, are surprising each other to-night. Although it is very desirable that every one should have correct opinions it is of very great importance that we should be correct in matters of fact. When the hon. gentleman, in answer to the question I put to him, alleged that the public accounts issued by the Finance Minister's department for the year 1894-5 included all the accounts of the Post Office Department in full payment of all the services rendered to the department up to the 30th of June, 1895, I am bound to say that I felt a shock. If the hon. gentleman would submit his statement to any officer of the Post Office Department who knows the facts, he will tell him that the statement he has made is absolutely monstrous.

Mr. FOSTER. I am not going to be responsible for anything but what I said. I said that there might be fringes and small accounts and the like of that. I made the statement I did, believing it to be true, and I still believe it to be true.

Mr. E. G. PRIOR (Victoria, B.C.). I want to call the attention of the hon. Postmaster General to a resolution that I have received from the council of Cumberland, B.C. That point is not represented by any hon. gentleman in this House, owing to the resignation of Mr. McInnes. However, these gentlemen have seen fit to send me the following resolution :

Corporation of the City of Cumberland, B.C.

Copy of a resolution passed at a council meeting held on the 28th day of May, 1900.

Whereas, the present manner of carrying mail to this town and surrounding country is very unsatisfactory and inconvenient for the transaction of business. The time between the arrival of the weekly mail by steamer on Tuesday and the departure of the return mail is too short. The overland mail on Saturday is too slow for business convenience; and whereas, there are two other regular steamship trips to Union wharf every week, namely, on Thursday and Saturday, when mail might be conveyed quickly and directly from Vancouver and Nanaimo; therefore, be it resolved, that this council of the city of Cumberland, B.C., respectfully urge the post office officials to cause mail to be carried to this place on Thursday and Saturday by the said steamship.

Moved by Alderman W. B. Walker, and seconded by Alderman W. W. Willard.

I can only say that I do not know anything of the facts, but, this motion has been sent to me, and I thought it my duty to lay it before the committee. I trust the hon. Postmaster General will give it that due consideration that he generally gives to matters which I bring to his attention.

Mr. FOSTER.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. This is the first I have heard of the matter. I am obliged to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Prior), who has brought it to my attention and I will see that it receives proper consideration.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I would like to ask the hon. Postmaster General if these temporary employees who are to be permanently appointed, notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act, will receive larger salaries than they would now be in receipt of, if they had been permanently appointed when they first entered the service, or do they have to pass the required civil service examination?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I find that in the service there are a good many persons appointed temporarily, some of them by the late administration and a few by my administration. I think most of the temporaries were appointed under the former regime. I want to make them permanent, if possible, without their suffering the loss of salary. It appears, according to the Auditor General's construction of the Civil Service Act, that if a temporary employee is in receipt of a salary in excess of the minimum salary paid in the class to which he might be appointed permanently, and if he should be transferred to the permanent list, he would have to accept the minimum salary of the permanent class. Suppose that a temporary clerk gets $700 and we desire to appoint him permanently as a third-class clerk, the Auditor General holds that his initial salary would be $400 and that he would lose the extra amount that he gained while he was temporary. I wish to avoid that, and when this Act, which is before the House, is passed, men who are only temporary and who are made permanent will retain the amount of salary which they are getting.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Have they passed the civil service examination?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Of course, the Civil Service Act must be complied with.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. But the hon. gentleman says that the Civil Service Act is not complied with. He says he is going to make a distinction in favour of those who may be permanently appointed, but who were appointed temporarily, notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. That has only reference to the salary. It has no reference to the requirements of the Civil Service Act.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Well, that is a very important matter.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Does my hon. friend press for requiring temporaries to begin at the lowest salary when they are transferred from the temporary to the permanent class ?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I am not called upon to lay down a policy. The hon. gentleman is in power. Here is the statement in the hon. gentleman's estimates :

Salaries and allowances, including in this amount the salaries of present temporary employees who are to be permanently appointed at their present salaries, notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act.

I ask the minister if these employees will be receiving a larger salary than they would now be in receipt of, if they had been permanently appointed when they first entered the service and had passed the civil service examination ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. No person will be transferred from the temporary class to the permanent class, unless he has passed the civil service examinations, as required by the Act. As to the salaries, it is intended by this to transfer them from the temporary list to the permanent list, and they shall take from the temporary to the permanent list whatever salaries they enjoyed when on the temporary list. The minimum salary of a third-class clerk is now $400. If a temporary clerk should have $500 and he is transferred to the third class permanently, he shall carry that salary with him, and have $500 as a third-class permanent clerk.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Does the hon. gentleman think that that is just to permanent employees who have been there for years ? It may happen that the new man transferred from the temporary list will get a larger salary than the man who has been on the list for a long time. The temporary clerk may have got increases which the other did not.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. That cannot be because in no case will you find temporaries receiving increases under the same circumstances that they have been held from the permanents.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). I think it may be possible that a temporary clerk will be receiving a larger salary than a permanent clerk. Suppose the minister denies a permanent clerk his statutory increase, and the temporary clerk gets it ; what would occur then ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I do not think there is any such case as that.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. But it may occur.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. This proposal has reference to no individual, and it will chiefly benefit a number of old temporary employees that I found in the service and have continued, and whom I would like to make permanent. I think that a greater number of them were appointees of my hon. friend (Sir Adolphe Caron), and all are to be treated in the same fair way by me. Those who are deserving of being put on the permanent list, I shall put on the permanent list.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I do not wish to prevent the temporary clerks from receiving all the justice they are entitled to. I fully understand that the Postmaster General has no particular person in view, and I am not speaking from a personal standpoint, because I have no particular man in view myself. However, it would appear that a temporary clerk might have a larger salary than a permanent clerk under the circumstances pointed out by the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule).

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I do not think there is any such case in the service.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. But the principle is there all the same.

Mr. A. B. INGRAM (East Elgin). I have already called the attention of the Postmaster General to a large number of temporary mail clerks who have been in the service for a number of years, and still remain temporary. I understand that this provision will make some of these permanent, and if that is the case, I will heartily support it, because these gentlemen are first-class officials and are entitled to be permanent clerks.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Ingram), is right. When the measure is passed, I intend to go through the service, and take all the temporary clerks (already the various officers have been asked to report upon them), and every one in the temporary service who is reported as being worthy of being transferred to the permanent service, will be transferred.

Mr. INGRAM. Hear, hear.

Mr. PRIOR. That is what the hon. gentleman is going to do ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. That is what I intend to recommend to council.

Mr. PRIOR. I call the attention of the minister to the case of two temporary clerks in the Victoria post office, who passed a qualifying examination in 1895, and I ask the minister to take their case into consideration and to see that they are put upon the permanent list. There is nothing against them ; on the contrary, they are excellent men. I presume the hon. minister will ask for a report from the postmaster on these two officials.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Yes.

Mr. PRIOR. In this connection, I would refer to the question of giving holidays to the temporary clerks. Is there any chance for these men to have holidays, the same as the permanent clerks? At present when the permanent clerks are away on their holidays the temporary clerks have to do their work and they get neither extra remuneration nor holidays.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. That cannot be altered until they are transferred to the permanent list. The Auditor General requires a certificate that every clerk, (unless he is permanent), before he draws his pay, shall have been actively at work. That is the Auditor General's construction of the Civil Service Act.

Mr. PRIOR. I presume that the Postmaster General intends to put on the permanent list, letter carriers as well as third-class clerks.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I intend to go through the whole list.

Mr. E. COCHRANE (East Northumberland). I would like to ask the hon. Postmaster General, if there is a permanent clerk in his department who has been employed for several years, and who is only drawing $400 now. I think it is a humiliating position for a man who has been a permanent clerk for a number of years to see a new man brought in at a higher salary, as under the new law a temporary clerk can be brought in at a salary of $800 a year.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The salaried clerks, whether temporary or permanent have received the same treatment in the way of increase. They run along pari passu.

Mr. COCHRANE. So that the grievance would not exist in the Postmaster General's post office department.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I do not think so.

Mr. COCHRANE. It has always appeared to me that it is putting a man in a very humiliating position to have a new man brought into the service and placed over his head so far as salary is concerned.

Mr. PRIOR. The hon. Postmaster General will remember that in 1897 and 1898, he failed to give the statutory increases to the clerks and letter-carriers in the Victoria post office, which I suppose was also the case in other post offices. Last year I asked him if he could not see his way to pay those men the amount kept back from them during those two years. It is a serious matter to them, as their salaries are small, and I would ask him if he could not see his way to pay them what I consider back pay long overdue. With regard to the provisional allowance, what rule is there for paying that on the Pacific coast, in Manitoba and the North-west? Who are entitled to receive it?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. All who receive $800 or under.

Mr. PRIOR.

Mr. PRIOR. Is it not a fact that the second-class clerks in the Winnipeg post office have for some time been receiving the provisional allowance?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The late administration granted a provisional allowance to the clerks in Manitoba to the amount, I think, of ten per cent on their salaries; and that applied to clerks in receipt of from $800 to $1,250. When increasing the provisional allowance, I did not interfere with anything above $800, but increased it to clerks in both British Columbia and Manitoba and the Territories who were in receipt of $800 or less. I increased it from ten per cent, which it was, to $15 a month.

Mr. PRIOR. How about the second-class clerks in receipt of $1,200 in British Columbia?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I did not make any reference to them.

Mr. PRIOR. Why should you give the provisional allowance to the second-class clerks in Winnipeg, who are in receipt of $1,200 a year, and not give it to second-class clerks in British Columbia where the cost of living is much greater?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I am afraid I must ask my hon. friend, who was a member of the government under which that arrangement was made, how it came about. When I took office, I found an arrangement to pay the clerks of the Winnipeg post office on a certain scale, which did not apply to the British Columbia clerks. My hon. friend was a member of the government when that was in force; I do not know whether he was when the regulation was passed. However, I did not interfere with the arrangements which I found in existence.

Mr. PRIOR. I would like to have some explanation, as this is the first I heard of it. I received a letter the other day stating that the second-class clerks in Victoria post office did not receive a provisional allowance similar to that received by clerks in the Winnipeg post office, and stating also that the railway mail clerks are to receive this allowance from July 1. I would like to ask if this is correct; and if the railway mail clerks are to receive it, why not the second-class clerks as well? Can the hon. gentleman promise that he will pay it?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I cannot promise that, because that depends on the government and upon His Excellency as well as upon me. The provisional allowance applies to all who are receiving $800 or under, whether mail clerks or others. As to those receiving salaries above that rate, I suppose that if they had good claims, my hon. friend's government would have recognized them. I really never heard of the matter before. The hon. gentleman asks me to explain a thing which his government did or did not do.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Would the hon. gentleman be good enough to bring down the information showing when this order was passed? I cannot recollect any discrimination being made in favour of Winnipeg when I was Postmaster General.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I will bring it down.

Mr. PRIOR. There is a manifest distinction made between the second-class clerks in Winnipeg and those in Victoria, and I do not think that ought to be allowed to continue. Whatever the last government did, I do not think there can be any excuse for the hon. Postmaster General not altering it when his attention is drawn to it. I would therefore ask him to promise that he will take it into consideration and have this wrong rectified.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I will promise to take it into consideration, but until now that the matter has been brought to my attention, I never heard of it.

Mr. A. W. PUTTEE (Winnipeg). As I understand the matter it is that you gave a provisional allowance of $10 a month, supposed to be based on the extra cost of living in British Columbia, and in the centre, Manitoba, you gave only 5 per cent? In Manitoba they got 5 per cent additional allowance. But 5 per cent on a small salary amounts to very little, and, of course, if any extra allowance was required to meet living expenses, it is these men with small salaries who require it the most. In Manitoba the additional allowance has been made $10 per month, the same as on the coast, and it seems to me that that is a very fair arrangement. There is no possibility of contradicting the statement that living west of Lake Superior is dearer than east; and although there are some things which make living dear on the Pacific coast, there are other things that are cheap, but which are dear in the centre of the country—such things as fuel, $10 per ton for coal in Winnipeg and $6 for wood. That makes the necessities of life in Manitoba come very high, and when they had only 5 per cent increase, on a salary of $400, that only made $20 per year, which was not enough. But now that they are getting $10 per month additional allowance, that makes $120 a year for the low-salaried as well as the high-salaried men.

I would like to draw the attention of the committee to some matters brought before the Postmaster General in Toronto a few months ago by a joint committee of the Trades and Labour Council and the letter carriers of that city, the latter acting for the letter carriers throughout the Dominion. They embodied their ideas and requests in the form of a circular, which they presented to the Postmaster General, and which are well worthy of his consideration.

There are some things fixed in the public mind, and it makes no difference what is said in this House or in the papers, you cannot eradicate them. There is one thing which I was surprised to hear some hon. gentlemen in this House trying to belittle, and that is the penny postage. It is certainly the opinion of the public that the penny postage is a first-class thing, one that was wanted, and which has given satisfaction to the whole country. It has brought the Post Office Department nearer the people, and the promise of the Postmaster General that probably inside of a year the receipts of the department will equal the expenditure is one particularly acceptable, because it gives rise to the hope that the department will be enlarged and take control of the telegraph lines as well. That is what the people require, and I should like to see at an early date, and the people are glad to see the department being run more on popular lines, because that leaves them to hope that some day we will find that department extending in the direction I have mentioned.

At different times during the session hon. members have discussed what they call the tax on newspapers. I do not know what warrant there is for the use of the word 'tax' in that connection at all. It is not rightly called a tax because it is nothing more than a toll, and the newspapers ought to expect that they shall pay a fair amount for the business done for them by the department. But there is a discrimination now that ought to be wiped away. All the newspapers should be put on an equal basis and pay a fair rate for the service rendered by the department. I have no sympathy for this cry against what is called a tax on newspapers. It is inconsistent for hon. gentlemen to talk about that as a tax and not say a word about what really is a tax, namely the customs duty on paper.

Mr. CLANCY. Why do not your friends take it off?

Mr. PUTTEE. I am speaking for myself. Coming to the resolutions of the joint committee at Toronto, let me read them to the House:

1. That on joining the service, prior to 1896, letter carriers were led to believe and informed that statutory yearly increases would be made in their salaries until the stated maximum was reached.
2. That all carriers from whom the statutory increases were stopped be now compensated and that they be placed on the same footing as if the annual increases had not been discontinued—the amounts due the men varying from $90 to $180.
3. That owing to the general prosperity of the Dominion during recent years, the cost of living has increased very much; that wages in all branches of labour have also largely advanced, as they continue to advance, to meet the increased cost of living, higher rents, &c. The carriers therefore respectfully ask that 20 per cent be added to present salaries, and that the salaries be payable semi-monthly instead of once a month, as at present.

4. That by reason of the general increase of population in the several cities of the Dominion, and the consequent increase of mail matter, which has more than doubled in that time, the carriers are very much overworked, the present staff being no greater in most offices than it was in 1894, and in some cases the staff is even less; that for the last ten years there has not been a new route made in the city of Toronto, while the population has increased some 25 per cent, according to the city directory, within the past six years; that the carriers suffer very much through this condition of affairs, both physically and mentally—physically because of the oftentimes very heavy loads to be carried; mentally from the strain consequent upon the performance of duties entailing both mental and physical force of no small amount; that in many cases men have to put in ten and a-half to fifteen hours to complete a day's work.

5. That an increase be made to the staff in the several offices in keeping with the present requirements prevailing in the service, so that every man would be allowed three weeks' holidays, the carriers being the only persons in the service who suffer in this respect.

6. That all employees on the carriers' staff who have served the six months' probation be appointed to the permanent staff, so that they may be entitled to the regular increases and holidays. Many now in this service for years have been denied this privilege, and these men lose their pay in case of sickness or other disability.

7. It is respectfully submitted that reasonable living wages ought to be paid letter carriers. By 'living wages' is meant wages that will enable the recipient to live in a healthy, decent house, adequate in size for an average family; to supply his wife and family with sufficient food and clothing and a certain amount of domestic comfort.

In conclusion, you are respectfully prayed to order that in cases of grievances complained of on the part of or on behalf of the letter carriers, and as to which it may be deemed necessary or expedient to make further inquiry or investigation, reasonable opportunity may be afforded them, personally or through representatives, to be heard in their own behalf, and that so appearing or being heard shall not operate to the personal detriment or ultimate loss of prestige or employment of any one speaking for or on any deputation on behalf of the letter carriers.

I believe these are very reasonable requests and deserve very close attention and consideration. The joint committee think that the cost of living has increased in Canada, and that, therefore, following the practice recognized in most other lines of employment, the salaries should correspondingly be increased. I think that that is a fair request to make. The other day the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) told us that on the Intercolonial Railway wages had been increased to the extent of $175,000 because the cost of living has increased. I think it is only right that the post office employees, more especially the mail carriers, should be considered as entitled to an increase on that same ground.

Then there is the question of the adequacy of the staffs of the post offices. I do not know about the conditions in Toronto. Of course, I would not deny that in any place where there were more men found than necessary to do the work, it was right and proper to cut these men off. But, we must not get down to a cheese-paring basis. There are different classes of cities in this country. There are cities whose population is so nearly stationary that you can nearly determine what staff they need, but there are others whose growth is more or less rapid. But, surely, in any business, the idea is to keep the working staff up to the demands made upon it. I do not know about Toronto, as I say, but I believe it is a fact that the city has increased 25 per cent, while the staff has not increased. There are other cities that have grown rapidly, and yet the same staff is serving them as served the smaller population. That is not business, nor is it fair dealing toward the people who do the work. It is also a reasonable request that the staff should be large enough to allow the men to get their proper holiday. I find complaint in many cases that the men cannot take their holidays, though they are entitled to three weeks. In some places, at all events, when one of the employees is sick, his time is stopped. But the staff is supposed to do the work, and does do the work in the sick man's absence. If he is temporarily employed and his salary is stopped, his sickness costs the country nothing; but, by stopping his salary, the country is the amount of his salary ahead. Then, the matter should be looked into of giving temporary employees permanent positions as soon as possible. It is not fair that men should be kept on the temporary staff for years and denied increases which they would get if they were appointed to the permanent staff. It is a fact that some post offices are undermanned, and that is the reason why some of the men cannot get their holidays. Then, as I say, if a temporary man is off on account of sickness, his salary is stopped, but nobody is put on in his place. In Ottawa, I believe, a couple of letter carriers volunteered to go to South Africa, and the country is very generously paying their salary. But then, nobody else is put on in their places, so we are able to do a generous thing very cheaply to ourselves. I hope the Postmaster General will give the representations of the Toronto committee—they are men who are thoroughly posted in these matters—fair consideration, and, at all events, grant as many of their requests as can be granted. I would urge particularly the granting of the last request. These men are an association, they have communication with one another throughout the country, and when there are matters—such as must come up at times—concerning which they wish to lay their views before the department, they should be allowed to do so through proper committees without it being counted to their detriment by the department.

Mr. NICHOLAS FLOOD DAVIN (West Assiniboia). Would the Postmaster General be kind enough to tell me what is paid for the services between Balgonie and Loon Creek; if Loon Creek is served from Balgonie; and if not, what is paid between Fort Qu'Appelle and Loon Creek?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. If the hon. gentleman will take the Postmaster General's Report for this year he will find under the head 'North-west Territories,' a list of the contracts in force there. In reply to my hon. friend from Winnipeg (Mr. Puttee), I would say that if he will be good enough to give me a copy of the memorial he has, I will see that every one of the suggestions or requests will receive most careful consideration. I think I have already received a communication of that kind, and some of the matters have already been dealt with. I am not aware of any post office in Canada that is not sufficiently manned to allow the clerks and letter carriers having their statutory holidays. It is not because of the insufficient manning that temporary clerks are not allowed holidays, but because of the ruling of the Auditor General as to the meaning of the Civil Service Act.

Mr. DAVIN. I wish to say a word or two with reference to the somewhat discursive debate we have had. The Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock), in the speech he made—which is a campaign speech—claimed credit for a small deficit as compared with previous deficits. He claimed that his deficit was $398,000. There cannot be the least doubt that there has been great advance and great expansion in this country. It has been a time of great commercial activity since the hon. minister took charge of the Post Office Department; and, necessarily, in keeping with what we naturally expect, there has been progress entirely independent of whoever was in charge of the department, the effect of which was to lower the deficit. If we examine the facts, we find that we have to add to his deficit $68,000 that he has got from the police department. Then, from what my hon. friend from Winnipeg (Mr. Puttee) says it is only a toll on newspapers and not a tax—though I do not know the difference between a toll and a tax—the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) will have got, I suppose, in the year ending June 30, 1899, some $90,000. He shakes his head. He said he would receive $90,000 for the eleven months of this year. What would he say he would get for the year ending June 30, 1899?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I think I said it was about $22,000.

Mr. DAVIN. That would make his deficit $488,000. Add the $10,000 earned, for which he takes credit; that makes his deficit, speaking by comparison, $498,000. I find that my hon. friend from Winnipeg has voiced a complaint that I believe is widespread with regard to the management of the department. The Postmaster General, while, as a member of the government and a member of the House, comes forward with motions and measures to adjust wages and to secure fair wages, and while he denounces the sweating system, he has introduced, as suggested by the speech of the hon. member for Winnipeg and the speech of the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), and, in fact, by his own explanation of how he has lowered the deficit—he has introduced into the management of the Post Office Department a kind of sweating system. Here we have the member for Winnipeg (Mr. Puttee), a supporter of the government, who complains of the way the letter carriers are treated. The member for West York (Mr. Wallace) and myself, in a previous session, gave expression to the demands of those letter carriers.

Now, reference has been made to the fact that letters have been published in the Postmaster General's Report in 1897. In publishing private letters he did a thing that I have no doubt he has regretted since. He took a lot of private letters that he found in the Post Office Department, and he flung them broadcast before the public. I do not think that any harm has been done to the writers of those letters, but surely the hon. gentleman, when he reflected on his conduct, must often have had honourable pangs for having taken a course somewhat remote from the code of gentlemanly honour. In a previous session reference was made to a letter of mine regarding the service from Balgonie to Loon Creek. There is nothing I ever did that I am more confident was just and in the interest of the public than when I wrote on the 18th of May, 1895, to the member for Three Rivers, then Postmaster General, urging him to renew the contract with W. Cockwill, for carrying the mail from Balgonie to Loon Creek, a distance, speaking from memory, of between 35 and 37 miles. He had to make fifty-two trips a year, and for this service he received $125. During six months of the year he had to make those trips when icy winds were sweeping over the trail, and often when blizzards were blowing, and the life of that lad was in danger. Nothing more bold or heroic can be done on the field of battle, has been done in South Africa, than was done by that lad in driving from Balgonie to Loon Creek in great winter storms. I find the tenders are set out here, and the late Postmaster General is reproached with not having accepted the lowest tender. I find that E. Edmonds' tender is $90; the tender from another is $94, and there is one from A. Meier for $175, and he gave the contract for $125. I have no hesitation in saying that the Postmaster General, if he had let that contract for $90 a year, might have been characterized as a slave driver, as an unjust man, false to the instincts of the people of Canada, for the people of Canada do not want their servants to be cut down to wages below living wages. Now, if the late Postmaster General had made reductions in these contracts proportionately to the difference between $125 and $90, it would of course have enabled him to reduce the deficit by probably from $150,000 to $200,000. So that if you take into account the $68,000 from the mounted police, the $22,000 received in taxes on newspapers that did not accrue to the former Postmaster General, the $10,000 earned in the Yukon; if you take into account the annual increment, but especially if you take into account the sum saved by grinding down the employees, if you take that sweating system into account, you would be face to face with a practical deficit just as large as the deficit of your predecessors. If he has accomplished a reduction, he has accomplished it in ways that will not meet with the approval of the people of Canada. Certainly keeping the offices short-handed—

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. What offices?

Mr. DAVIN. The member for Winnipeg has spoken of offices where they are short-handed, and my hon. friend beside me says they are short-handed at St. Thomas. I do not want to specify the offices from which I have had complaints. If you take into account all these things, and the cost of living of the contractors who have tendered at a lower rate, you have a sum of $200,000 accounted for. Then, you have the $68,000, which appears it is true, in the Postmaster General's Report, but, when he goes to the country he boasts that he has reduced the deficit. So that the deficit to-day, on the same plane of comparison, is from $700,000 to $800,000. The hon. Minister of Finance, when arguing across the floor with the hon. ex-Minister of Finance, argued altogether about book-keeping, but the very point that led to the discussion was ignored, namely, whether or not the hon. Postmaster General was appearing before the country in borrowed plumes. I am and always have been well satisfied with the step taken in the direction of 2-cent postage. I am satisfied, notwithstanding that my hon. friend (Mr. Clancy) says that he is not. I do not think that there has been any concerted opposition or antagonistic criticism of that step from this side of the House. There has been criticism, but I do not think that the step has been regarded with very strong aversion on this side of the House. For myself, I was satisfied with that step, and I was perfectly certain that in taking that step it would be followed by advantageous consequences. But, it was open to the criticism that was made, and which has been made here now. It is a fair criticism, that it does not redound to the advantage of the mass of the people so much as it redounds to the advantage of a large and important section of the people whose interests and whose prosperity are part and parcel of the prosperity of the country. But, it does not directly redound to the advantage of the mass of the people. It does not, for instance, redound greatly to the advantage of the farmers of the community. It does not redound greatly to the advantage of the artisans of the community, but I am not blind to the fact that the farmers and artisans are benefited in the end if any large section of the community has its prosperity enhanced because there is a solidarity in any great community, the result of which is that you cannot benefit any large portion of the community without benefiting all.

Mr. DAVIN.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Do not the farmers and mechanics write letters?

Mr. DAVIN. Yes. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Campbell) asks that. I think they do. Yes; it is a profound remark. I have heard, at least, that they do. I have heard that; yes. Before I sit down I must make a comment on the extraordinary spectacle we have seen here, not merely in regard to the estimates of the hon. Postmaster General, but in regard to other matters of public interest. I think we all want to get away, that we all want to close up, but when the hon. Postmaster General comes forward with his estimates, what do we find? He has to make a yard and yard long speech, evidently intended not for this committee, but for the people—a campaign speech. While the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Adolphe Caron) was speaking the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) went up to the hon. member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis) and placed before him this volume of the Postmaster General's report for 1897, pointed out the letters, especially these Leason letters to him, and evidently inspired him to make a speech. It was clearly going to be a long debate, because we had also the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), a supporter of the government, getting up and making a speech that certainly was not conducive to the despatch of business. Some change or other came over the dream of the government, if there is any solidarity in the government, and if the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries was really acting for the government, because when the hon. Postmaster General came back from dinner, he came to our side of the House and said: Here now, let us have no more speaking; let us have these items passed. I have made my speech; the hon. member for North Wellington has made his speech; something has been said by the hon. member for Saskatchewan, but now let us have no more speaking. Well, as we were anxious to get through and to close up, we said: Very well, that is all right. Then he went up to his supporter and henchman from Saskatchewan and asked him to dry up. But, no, Sir, not for Joseph.

The hon. member for Saskatchewan defied his leader and went on and gave us an edifying speech that no doubt some hon. gentlemen listened to with great delight, going over the same old speech that he made when first this improper report of the Postmaster General came out. It appealed to his congenial mind, and he gave us that speech over again with the same eager ardour as he had done before. The spectacle is one that I commend to the attention of the public because it is as certain as anything can be that it is consonant with the spirit that has been animating hon. gentlemen opposite from the beginning of the session to the present, that their object is not to close up. Their object is not to finish or to despatch the business, and we are the witnesses now that the government is its own obstruction.

Mr. FOSTER. I want to ask the hon. Postmaster General a question. I think he stated that in the vote taken last year an expenditure was authorized in the Mounted Police vote for assistance in the way of mail service. I would be very glad if he would point that out. I have gone very carefully through all the items, and I cannot find it. I find items for the North-west Mounted Police, and I find items for the police in the Yukon. I do find a strange thing here considering the fact that the hon. Postmaster General has put this service on the mounted police. In the vote for the year ending June 30, 1899, he has himself taken a vote amounting to $103,900 for the post office in the Yukon. Does the hon. Postmaster General know how much of that he spent in 1898-9?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I think the hon. gentleman is a little mistaken. My recollection is that in the supplementary estimates for 1898-9 I included an item of perhaps $103,900, which included the sum of $75,000, which was an estimate of what we might have to pay to the mounted police.

Mr. FOSTER. For post office work?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I think so. I moved in committee that we should reduce the item by $75,000, and stated that the North-west Mounted Police had been performing the service for the season, that when the accounts were got in there would be an apportionment, that it was included in an item in the supplementary estimates voted to the North-west Mounted Police, and in connection with that vote of $384,000 you will find a memorandum to the effect that there is included in that certain expenditure on mail service, and that the amount when it is ascertained will be adjusted.

Mr. FOSTER. The recollection is that that was put in when it was passing through the House.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. It was in the statute.

Mr. H. F. McDOUGALL (Cape Breton). I would call the attention of the Postmaster General to the condition of the mail service in the town of Sydney. We have had a great increase in population in that town during the last year, and there is a great deal of complaint about the condition of the mail service there. While there is a large post office in the town of Sydney, and while that post office was fitted up when it was erected, sufficiently to give the necessary accommodation, yet the increased population, and the fact that the increase has taken place suddenly, consisting as it does largely of strangers, make it difficult for the postmaster to perform the duties required of him in the delivery and assortment of the mail. Nearly all the mails come in between the hours of 6 o'clock and 11 o'clock in the evening. The larger portion of the increased population of the town consists of workmen who are employed during the day time, and who can only go to the post office for their mails after working hours, in many cases it being impossible for them to go even then. The promises for a further increase of population are very great, and I would point out to the Postmaster General the necessity for making a postal delivery over a large portion of the territory where the people live, and where the town is extending. About this time last year Sydney had a population of between four and five thousands, but now the population is between ten and twelve thousands. We are likely to have within another year a population of possibly 20,000. Under such conditions I would like to impress on the Postmaster General the necessity for immediately instituting a postal delivery. It is necessary because the greater portion of the population are working-people, who are unable to come for their mail in the daytime, and when they come in the evening the townspeople are congregated in the post office waiting for their letters. The mails coming in by train at the present time are a little earlier than formerly, so that the whole community is crowded around the post office during the evening hours, and often not more than half of the people can get their letters. This has been the case for months, and the people living at some distance from the post office found it necessary to suggest that there should be branch post offices established within a mile or a mile and a half of the central office. The town post office is a very good building, erected only a few years ago, and with some improvements it could be made to serve the requirements of a large town. To my mind, the expense of establishing a postal delivery would not be any greater than the expense of establishing branch post offices and having a mail service between them and the general post office. The additional convenience to the public of a mail delivery would be very great to that class of people who cannot go to the post office during the daytime. I do hope the Postmaster General will take the matter into his serious consideration at an early date and ask for a report from his inspector on the present condition of things. I have no fault to find with the present postmaster so far as he is able to discharge the duties devolving upon him, but the conditions are such that he cannot improve on what he is doing now. I hope the Postmaster General will ascertain what can be done; first, to improve the facilities within the post office building which are susceptible of considerable improvement, both as to sanitary arrangements and as to the fittings, and secondly, with regard to the establishment of a postal delivery. As it is now the mails come in in the evening, before eight o'clock. In the morning, when the post office opens the men have to go to work, and cannot return to the post office before the following evening. A man cannot get his mail that day. He must go to his work early in the morning before the post office is open; he must do without his mail all that day, and when he goes the next day for his mail he cannot get it, because of the congested condition of business in the office. I hope the hon. gentleman will give me some assurance that he will ascertain the present condition of things, and see whether he cannot provide a remedy.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I am glad to know that Sydney is progressing, and that its future seems so assured. We have already had some representations in the department with regard to this same condition of affairs. A short time ago it came before me as acting Minister of Public Works, and I had some increased accommodation provided to enable the postmaster better to discharge his duties. The Post Office Department also made arrangements whereby the postmaster could increase his staff; and should the population maintain the proportions which my hon. friend anticipates, in the near future, the matter will have to be considered somewhat in the light of his suggestion. I am not able at this moment to give any promise as to what will be done, but I promise that the matter will be referred to our officers and a careful report obtained, and that the department will give the matter its best consideration.

Mr. McDUGALL. May I ask the minister whether any request has been made for a post office?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. No.

Mr. McDUGALL. Or for the establishment of other post offices in the neighbourhood?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. No.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Would it not be the most economical way of getting over the difficulty to provide two or three deliveries?

Mr. McDUGALL.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I could not say off-hand. I will have to obtain a report.

Mr. D. D. ROGERS (Frontenac). I am loath to get up and talk at this hour of the night, and I would not do it but that the case is urgent. Hon. gentlemen opposite have often accused the government of being very extravagant, and I am surprised at their inconsistency, because when the government do attempt to practice a little economy, these hon. gentlemen call them to account for it pretty severely. When the civil service is under discussion, they make great complaints about the different officials not getting statutory increases. They make out that the poor fellows are too hard wrought and do not get enough pay; and pressure has been brought to bear on the government to such an extent that their pay has been increased in very many instances. I do not see on what just grounds these increases can be claimed. I am sure the Postmaster General has no dearth of applicants for positions. I am sure that when a position becomes vacant, there are a score of applicants for it. If the work of the civil servants is so laborious, and they are so hard driven, no person would ask them to stay. It is a matter that is regulated by supply and demand. I know that some gentlemen do not agree with me in that, but they look at the question from a city standpoint. When I heard the hon. member for Western Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) speaking about the overwrought letter carriers in the way he did, I wondered whether he represented an agricultural constituency or not, and I wondered how the toiling masses, whom he represents, would feel if he talked in that way to them. It is their labour which pays for all the rest. Why cannot the men who represent the farmers get up and say a word for them? I am sure there are enough men in this House representing the cities to speak for them, without one who represents an agricultural constituency doing so. I do not like to put on a poor mouth for the farmers, but I am sorry to say that the circumstances compel me to do so. I have no doubt that many of the farmers' sons would be glad to take a place as a letter-carrier. Of course, they have an independent spirit, and they like to remain at home; but I feel that the farmers should receive more consideration. Then, why is a plea not put in for the country postmasters? I spoke on their behalf last year. I say it is ridiculous that they cannot get more pay than they do. I wonder how the constituents of the hon. member for Western Assiniboia would take it, if they knew that he was appealing on behalf of the letter carriers, and did not put in a word for the country postmasters in his own constituency. People in the cities are far better paid than people in the country. Again, as regards the mail carriers in the country, it is marvellous how cheaply they do their work. But what is the remedy? The tenders come in, and if the government did not accept the lowest tender, the very man who put it in, would make the greatest cry against them. The very fact that people tender so low for this work, is an evidence of how little reward the toiling masses in the country get for their labour. I can see no remedy for it, except what is in their own hands. As regards the revenue, the privilege of free postage for newspapers was abused by many people using the mails for sending circulars and other things for advertising purposes. I am glad to hear that that abuse has been curtailed to a certain extent. I have heard very little complaint from the newspapers in that regard. The reduction of the postage to two cents I thought very hard on the people in the country who did not use the mail very much; but I am glad that it is operating so successfully. If it cost merchants, lawyers and other professional men who use the mails, a good deal, several hundred dollars, or $1,000 a year for postage, I wonder who pays for that? If any of these firms pay $1,000 more in postage, they add that on to the prices of their goods, and it is the plodding masses who pay in the long run.

I hope that the Postmaster General may in the near future see his way clear to pay the country postmasters a little more than he does. It is almost impossible, in some cases, to get any one to take charge of the post office. In many instances a man will only take charge of a country post office to oblige his neighbours, and I have known of localities where the neighbours raised a subscription among themselves to pay the postmaster sufficient for the work he performs.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman has made so pathetic a speech that I am moved by it, but it is rather amusing to find that he and the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Puttee), who are both such ardent friends of the toiling masses, are not able to agree in this House but seem always to meet each other at the cross-roads. The hon. member for Winnipeg wants the mail clerks to get additional pay for their work, and in that I think he is quite correct, but the hon. member for Frontenac objects. He says that the employees in the service of the country are too well paid and that there is no one here to raise a voice for the toilers of the country. I will leave those two gentlemen to settle their differences, but it is about time that they should be able to see eye to eye, and be able to agree that while one man may be engaged as a labourer in one quarter and another employed at a different kind of labour in another quarter, both are representative of the toiling classes and both ought to be fairly paid for their work. I was not aware until I heard the speeches of these hon. gentlemen that there were any hon. members who came to this House for the purpose of depriving the man behind the plough of his wages, on the one hand, and of propping up an unduly paid official on the other hand. It is a new doctrine to me that an hon. gentleman who poses as a leader of the agricultural class should feel bound, in order to prove that the agriculturists are underpaid, to show that men in other positions are overpaid. We had to-night, in reply to the statement that men were performing mail service in the country for less than half what it was worth, for instance that a man drove the mails thirty miles a day for one dollar and thirty cents, the answer of the hon. member for North Wellington that a man was performing a similar service in his constituency at the rate of one dollar a day for himself and his horse. I asked the hon. member for Frontenac what he thought of that and he replied: Oh, that was a contract. Well, I say that a government which seeks to get its work done for less than a fair wage is not an honest government. I say that a government which trades upon the necessities of the people is not an honest government. And I say that to cut down the expenses of the public service in such a way as that is not commendable to the minister or the government. The people of Canada can afford to pay reasonably for the work they require to be done. If there have been cases where men were paid too much, the contract should be cancelled, but if a man is carrying out his contract at a moderate rate, that contract should be continued and not be let to another man who will take starvation pay.

The hon. member for Frontenac complains that the country postmasters are underpaid, and so they are, but if we take some of the surplus money that is going to great commercial corporations, in which the farmers have no part, and give it to the postmasters instead, will the hon. gentleman accept that solution? But he will support this government when it beggars the people who are doing the mail service.

Mr. ROGERS. Why did you not preach that doctrine before to-night?

Mr. CLANCY. My hon. friend never made that pathetic appeal until to-night. Where does he stand? He applauds the government for having beggared those who were already beggared and who were doing the mail service for less than half what it was worth. I know of a case where a man was carrying the mails thirty-four miles a day for one dollar and twenty cents, and yet that contract was right. If the Postmaster General wants to build up a reputation for getting the mail service done very much cheaper than before, by taking such means as this, he has a good deal of assurance to slip in between the employers of labour and the employed, and say that the labourers should be fairly paid. He should first apply that principle to his own administration. It is a piece of mockery for the hon. gentleman to bring in legislation looking toward the protection of working people, and then seek to starve people who already have too little. But, hon. gentlemen opposite see no inconsistency in that. The hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Rogers) thinks it very proper that a man who works under a contract should work for half nothing. Suppose that a neighbour of his hired a man for half of what he was worth—that would be a contract, but would it be fair? Suppose he took advantage of a man's condition, would it be fair? The Postmaster General, in these cases, simply takes advantage of these people's position. Everybody knows that the man who has a small mail contract has an equipment which, if he loses the contract, is of very little value to him. And so, though any one with an ounce of judgment knows that he is doing the work for less than it is worth, he will cut the price still further even rather than risk the greater loss. In 1896, the service on the whole was performed for much less than it was worth. But the Postmaster General boasts that he has reduced it by $4,000. If he thinks there is any credit in that, let him claim it.

Mr. FRASER (Lambton). Is the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) opposed to the contract system? Would he not have tenders called for?

Mr. CLANCY. It is a proper system to call for tenders where tenders are necessary. But, can a tender be necessary when a man is already performing a service for half of what it is worth? What is the object of a tender? It is simply to prevent services being paid for at too high a rate. By putting up the contract to tender, the Postmaster General may find a person who is less wise even than the man who is already performing the service for less than it is worth. But, no government should secure any service for less than it is worth, any more than they should seek to deprive a workman of his fair day's wages. There are no two sides to a question of that kind; it is simply common sense and justice. If the Postmaster General seeks a reputation for a policy of this kind, let him enjoy it, the sweet sleep in which he is now lost. But the country is not asleep. I do not agree with my hon. friend who says that the reduction of postage under existing circumstances is a thing to be commended. I do not put it on any narrow ground, but upon the broadest ground. We in Canada cannot for some time look forward to being able to have a surplus together with an efficient system properly covering our territory. Our territory is so wide, the distances to be covered are so great that the service must always be expensive. Therefore, you can only have a reduction of the postage rate at the expense of some reduction of the service, either in range or in efficiency. The hon. member for Frontenac made an appeal for one class, but I hope he will go a little further and demand the same justice for all who serve the public, whether in the city or in the country.

Mr. PUTTEE. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) a question. Does he wish us to understand that those who carry the mails have no other revenue than what they get for that service, or do they get any other revenue? Is not the carrying of the mail with them usually a part of a business? Would the hon. gentleman lay down the proposition, that because a train carries the mail, we should pay the whole expense of that train?

Mr. CLANCY. These people get nothing from the government except what is stated here. The country is filled with railways, and country stages do not enjoy the patronage they once did. Yet, they have to carry the mail, though there is no other service to be performed in connection with it. If the men carrying the mail had other means of living, is that a reason why he should be grateful to the government for reducing what they pay him? He might as well say that a man in the post office in his own city, who had a little house of his own, should get less pay than a man who had to rent a house.

Mr. PUTTEE. I am informed and believe that most of these contracts in rural districts are taken by men who have some other business to do in connection with them, and are therefore able to take the contracts at a price below what they would be willing to do them for otherwise.

Mr. J. G. RUTHERFORD (Macdonald). I could not understand what the hon. member for Bothwell was driving at, but if he want some legislation to protect these poor contractors against themselves, there would be something in what he said. There is no doubt that while, as the hon. member for Winnipeg has said, there may be some cases where a man is driving a stage, and in that way obtains remuneration outside of the mail contract, there is no doubt that a large proportion of the mail contracts throughout the country are paid for at ridiculously low rates. That, however, is a matter that cannot be remedied by legislation. As long as people will tender for these contracts at these low rates, there is no way in which it can be prevented. There is no doubt that improvements are taking place in the mail service in rural districts in other countries. For instance, in the United States there is a rural mail delivery, and that is brought about in some districts where it would appear to be impossible, and still the service is actually carried out at a profit; that is to say, it costs less to deliver letters to the farmers in many rural districts than it does to keep up a post office. That is done by taking the post office to the farmers instead of the farmers going to the post office. There is no doubt that as settlement increases in this country some improvements of that kind may be introduced. There is another matter I would like to mention. A large number of rural postmasters are, as was mentioned by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Rogers), ridiculously underpaid, so much so that it is becoming difficult to get people who are respectable and responsible to take charge of these offices. If the offices are closed the community suffers a great loss. At the same time the remuneration is so small that it is almost impossible to get suitable people to take these offices. In rural districts in many cases, the man who has the post office has also a contract for carrying the mail, and in that way he makes a little remuneration from both sources. But in small post offices along the lines of railway there is the same complaint, that the remuneration is far too small. I have already, during this session, alluded to the advisability of the government taking over the telegraph system. I am sure if the telegraphs in this country were owned, as they are in the old country, by the government, the rural postmasters would get a very large increase to the small remuneration they now receive. I think this is a matter that ought to be considered by the Post Office Department. While I have no stones to throw at the administration of the department at present, while I consider it is a great credit to the Postmaster General, and to the government, and gives excellent service to the country, still there is no condition so perfect that it will not stand improvement. I think in some of these respects it would be well for the Postmaster General to consider the advisability of adopting new means of distributing the mails through the country.

Mr. CLANCY. On page N-39, of the Auditor General's Report, I see an item, D. F. Burke, arrears of salary as postmaster at Burke's Falls, Ont., from July 1, 1878, to June 30, 1896, $316. How does that arise?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Without remembering the details, I remember the claim being made that a postmaster was entitled to a larger sum than had been allowed him for a certain period of time. The matter was inquired into, and it was found that he had not been receiving the salary to which he was entitled. I looked into the matter myself and I can assure the hon. gentleman that he was well entitled to it.

Mr. CLANCY. Has the hon. gentleman a report from the inspector?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I have all the information in the department, and I am sure the hon. gentleman would be quite satisfied if he was acquainted with it.

Mr. CLANCY. Would the hon. gentleman tell us what is meant by another item I find here, W. G. Milligan, clerk in the post office, Toronto, travelling expenses to New York and Philadelphia, and return, ninety-eight dollars?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I sent Mr. Milligan to visit certain cities in the states for the purpose of studying the question of the utilization of street railways for post office purposes. He inquired into the matter and made a report. He is a very excellent man.

Now with regard to the Halifax vote, I would say for the information of Hansard, and for the satisfaction of the Auditor General, how the Halifax expenditure is to be divided. The amount is just the same, but there is a little rearrangement of the staff: One postmaster, $2,800; one assistant do, $1,800; eight second-class clerks, $8,300; fifteen third-class clerks, $9,890; twenty-four letter carriers; including three temporary employees, $12,680; one messenger, $600; total, $36,070.

Mr. J. V. ELLIS (St. John City). Is there much increase to the number of letter carriers of the Halifax post office?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. An increase of three.

Mr. ELLIS. I want to make this observation. The receipts of a post office do not appear to indicate in any way the amount of work done by the letter carriers, and I object to the statement that they are an indication of the number of letter carriers that should be employed. The city of St. John is like Rome, built upon seven hills, and a letter carrier there has a great deal more work to do than a letter carrier in Toronto.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. There is no doubt of it.

S. J. Carter, temporary clerk in dead letter office at Winnipeg, a provisional allowance to meet the exceptional cost of living in Manitoba, from July 1, 1899, to June 30, 1900, notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act ..... $120

Mr. CLANCY. My recollection is that S. J. Carter appears in the main estimates for $120.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I will explain that. S. J. Carter is a member of the inside service in the dead letter branch who was moved from Ottawa to Winnipeg. We control the dead letter branch. For departmental reasons we have not transferred the dead letter men to the outside service. We want to control them so that they will feel that they are under the control of the central office. Mr. Carter did not come in under the vote of a provisional increase for the outside service.

Mr. CLANCY. Is this to cover services in the past and a portion of the year when he was not in Winnipeg?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. No, Mr. Carter was removed from Ottawa to Winnipeg, and was there during the whole of the year 1899 and down to the present time. We have a vote in the supplementaries for the outside service. This is a provisional allowance which covers his case as a member of the inside service.

Mr. CLANCY. I am not objecting to the item, which is a very small sum, but I want to be clear about it. I understand that this vote is covered in the main estimates for 1900.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. There is nothing in the main estimates for this same period. We have voted this provisional allowance for the outside service for this current year, but we did not vote it for the inside service. Mr. Carter is in the inside service though residing in Winnipeg, and there is no vote giving him a provisional allowance for this year. The vote in the main estimates is for next year. If the hon. gentleman will allow it to go through without discussion, and if he finds that what I say is not correct, I will make it right.

Mr. PUTTEE. Is there any immediate or future prospect of the hon. Postmaster General appointing some one to take charge of the Winnipeg post office?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The matter is under consideration. I have had some recommendations and some applications. It has not been possible yet to deal with the matter, but I hope to be able to do so very shortly.

Mr. PRIOR. I would like to ask the hon. Postmaster General if he can explain why there is so much difference between the salaries of the postmasters at Quebec and at Victoria. I understand that they are paid according to the revenue they collect. In Victoria, where they collect $48,000, the postmaster gets $2,000, and the assistant postmaster $1,400. In Quebec, where they collect only $41,700, the postmaster gets $2,200 and the assistant postmaster $1,600. I see that the hon. gentleman has in his estimates an item of $100 which is an increase for the assistant postmaster at Victoria, but I do not see why he cannot make it $200 and make his salary the same as that of the assistant postmaster at Quebec. In Halifax, I find that they collect a revenue of $55,000, and the hon. Postmaster General is asking for a vote of $400 to enable him to increase the salary of the postmaster there to $2,800. It does not seem to me that that is treating us in a proper way. There must be some reason for this.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The salaries of postmasters are fixed by Act of parliament, and the schedule of the Civil Service Act sets forth what they are. There is provision for increasing them where there is an increase of revenue, but it is not compulsory. I have not altered the salary of the postmaster at Quebec or Victoria. In reference to the increase of the assistant postmaster's salary at Victoria by $100, that is the increase which he is entitled to. It is a matter of discretion, and it is a matter which has been considered.

Mr. MULOCK.

Mr. H. A. POWELL (Westmoreland). I think probably it will take less time tonight if I ask the Postmaster General a question concerning a matter I propose to bring to the attention of the House than if we were to allow it to lie over until there is a fuller House. I do not wish to consume very much time. I refer to the grievance that is complained of on the part of some people in respect to the cancellation of mail carriage contracts which has formed the subject of the discussion this afternoon and evening. I am informed, and I believe the information is correct, that a year or more ago application was made to the hon. Minister of Justice to test the legality of the cancellations in the courts of the country. Notwithstanding the fact that application has been renewed again and again, no action has been taken upon it. These people believe that they have rights, and in my opinion they certainly have rights. It is not a matter that is entirely free from doubt, but I think the great bulk of the legal opinion is that the cancelling of these contracts was entirely wrong. If there is anything like a fair case for contest the fiat should issue. We might as well have no Act granting a petition of right if any member of a department, when he feels that his action is going to be brought up for review before a court of law and there is a possibility of his action being condemned or shown to be illegal, can stand in the way of the issue of a fiat. It is a very serious matter, and I think that such a denial of justice should not be tolerated in this country or in any other country. If the hon. minister is satisfied that there is no case, why does he not make his report and have the fiat refused. This may be a doubtful case, these people are responsible for the costs, the matter can be tried out in the Exchequer Court thoroughly, judgment given, and the question decided. I can assure the hon. gentleman that there are quite a number of people who are very anxious to have the legality of the cancellation tested, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) is simply denying them an opportunity of doing what every British subject should be entitled to do—that is, to have his rights brought before the courts and adjudicated upon. I would like to know why he has refused to make his report, and why the fiat has been denied these people.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I have not refused to make my report. I have given my views to the Minister of Justice which is the same as making a report, and the Minister of Justice agrees with me that there is no merit whatever in these applications and no legal or moral claim. In these cases attempts were made to secure moneys illegally and contrary to what we think are good morals. There does not appear to be any good moral foundation for the claims.

Mr. POWELL. That may be so in the estimation of the Minister of Justice, but I can assure the Postmaster General that he is wrong about there being no legal claim.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Nor any moral claim.

Mr. POWELL. I will give him a case where there is a good legal case and a good moral claim in my judgment. I know a gentleman named Rye Wry, in the county of Westmoreland, who went to considerable expense to fit himself for the carriage of mails from a place called Jolicure to a place named Aulac. The Postmaster General cancelled his contract. There was no change whatever made in the service. The construction of the contract is that the Postmaster General can cancel it where there is to be a change of service, but where the contract has been legally entered into an arbitrary power does not rest in him. Now as respects the merits of this case. This gentleman suffered damage. The Postmaster General after cancelling the contract called for tenders. He got a tender that was lower than Wry's tender. But when he called on the party to give bonds and sign the formal contract the party found he had taken it at so ridiculously low a figure he would not do it, and the Postmaster General had actually to pray by letter that Mr. Wry should continue his contract. In the meantime he had disposed of his means of conveyance and refused to enter into an extension of the contract at his old figure and the contract virtually went begging. That is one of the contracts which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) cancelled, and for which he took a great deal of credit. I am not attacking the general policy of having these contracts let by public tender, for my own view entirely accords in that respect with the view of the Postmaster General. But where a contract is made between the government and a party, that contract should be most sacredly observed. It is absurd that the government should play the part of a bully and repudiate a legal obligation, and because it has in its hands the power to deny a man any damages, to assert that power regardless of law and regardless of justice. I have no hesitation in saying that not only in my opinion but in the opinion of dozens of other legal gentleman, the action of the Postmaster General was entirely unwarranted and entirely illegal.

Mr. DAVIN. The claim of the rural postmasters for higher salaries is one that ought to commend itself to the Postmaster General. The mail services rendered at present in my constituency are rendered at rates that seem to be ridiculously low. In a small post-office called Condy, north of Regina, I was amazed when I heard of the small amount that was paid for carrying the mail from the post office to the railway. It is true that in the North-west as well as in Ontario, as mentioned by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Rogers), it is sometimes very difficult to get a postmaster to do the work. From Moosejaw to Pioneer only $70 is paid; from Moosejaw to Wood Mountain, 129 miles over a trail in a country not settled $150 is paid. In my own constituency between Cottonwood and Pence, two trips, $130 is paid. I find that in Manitoba very much larger sums are paid in proportion. I would urge on the Postmaster General to consider the remuneration of country postmasters and to direct his attention to the North-west Territories and compare the amounts that are paid for transportation of mail in the North-west Territories with the amounts paid in Manitoba.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I will do so.

Mr. POWELL. I want the Postmaster General to make his report, on the cases I have mentioned, to the Minister of Justice and if the Minister of Justice will not grant his fiat let these people know.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I will make a formal report.

Mr. POWELL. I will leave it to any member of the government. There are gentlemen here; I appeal to the Minister of Railways; I appeal to the Solicitor General; I appeal to supporters like the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Russell), that if there is a fair case against the government in respect to these matters, the fiat should of course go and have it tested in the courts. I am satisfied, from what little attention I gave to the matter a year ago, that they have a good case; and why not grant them a fiat.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I would like to remind the Postmaster General of a petition that was laid before him some weeks or months ago from the inhabitants of the island of Boulardarie, in the counties of Cape Breton and Victoria, and I would like to ask him if he has arrived at any conclusion with regard to it. They petitioned for increased mail service.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I am not able to inform the hon. gentleman, but I will have a note made of the matter.

Mr. McDOUGALL. It is a very important service, and these people have a very strong ground of complaint. They have simply a semi-weekly service running parallel within a few miles of a daily service, over a long stretch of country. The extra cost of giving them a tri-weekly service, which they want, would not be very great.

Expenditure of the mail service in the Yukon district ..... $75,000

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. There was voted for that service $38,870, and this amount added will make the total for the Yukon mail service for the current year, $113,870.

Mr. HAGGART. What was the total revenue for this year?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. We have not yet got it, but I do not suppose it will be very much different from that of the previous year, namely, $10,000.

To complete the payments for post office service to June 30, 1900..... $31,473

Mr. CLANCY. What is this for?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The particulars are as follows: Increased cost of mail bags and mail locks, $2,250; increased cost of commissions to postmasters on savings bank business, $3,500; increased cost of labour at Vancouver and Winnipeg, $3,500; amount short on railway mail service, $21,623; to pay salaries, at $300 a year each, of four railway mail clerks to replace those on duty in South Africa, $600. It is quite impossible at the commencement of a fiscal year, to fairly anticipate the expenses to the end of the year of a postal service like ours, which is expanding in all directions.

Galops Canal enlargement ..... $104,000

Mr. HAGGART. What are the quantities taken out for which Gilbert Brothers were paid this immense amount of money, nearly 288 days at $425 per day?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). If the hon. gentleman will look at the contract which he has in his hand, he will see that there are two divisions in it. There is survey work and taking out loose rock, for which the company were paid $425 per day. Then there is the moving of the solid rock for which they were paid $8.40 per yard. The contract for which this is an extension, and which had been made with Davis & Co., varied from this in this respect, that Davis & Co. were allowed $9.50 per yard for that portion of this work. We improved upon that contract to the extent of $1.10 per yard for all the class of work, including at the higher price. These people engaged to do the whole work at the lower price. We had estimates from time to time of the work, which I will give to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. HAGGART. Give me the quantities under the first contract for removing down to grade, for which $425 per day was paid. What was the quantity moved down to grade?

Mr. McDUGALL.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The papers do not show the quantities removed. We had a man who remained on the work and saw that the plant was there in continuous daily operation. They were not paid according to the quantity they got out, but per day, so that all we looked to was to see that they kept constantly at work. They would naturally get out very much more one day than another, but as long as they kept constantly at work, they earned their $425 per day, and we did not require any return as to the quantity removed, the same as when paying by the yard. I have a memo. of the total amount paid. For all work done under this contract, the total number of days was 288 at $425 per day, which amounted to $122,595. There is rock excavations on the south side of the channel, $8,752.

Mr. HAGGART. Perhaps the hon. minister is not aware that for taking their work down to grade, Mr. Gilbert was paid in full before, and yet he is paying $425 a day for a survey vessel.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No.

Mr. HAGGART. I have read carefully the contract, and it states there was a grade line before, and that any material found above that grade line he was to excavate and was to receive $425 a day for this survey. Last year there was paid $103,734, and other payments $112,986, making on the whole over $216,000.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That is double the amount actually paid.

Mr. HAGGART. I have it here in the Auditor General's report. The amounts are for actual working hours, 244 days 8 hours at $425, $103,734; paid in 1897, $32,710; paid in 1898-9, $42,430; paid in 1899-1900, $26,550, and a drawback of $11,296.11, making in all $112,986, which added to the other amount makes over $216,000. And the minister estimates that it will cost $100,000 to finish it. Mr. Gilbert is getting a fair price for excavating the material in the rapids, $8.40 a yard, and was paid for taking it down to grade. And now he is receiving this large amount without contract or tender for the carrying on of the work. It is true that some time ago, when I was Minister of Railways and Canals, these barges were employed for the purposes of sounding. When the bill came in, I ordered the engineer in charge to discharge the barge at once, after fifteen or twenty days of work, because I thought it an imposition on the government, and that the amount paid was largely in excess of anything they were entitled to. This is said to be a renewal of an offer made in 1892. It was an offer made in 1897. The effect of this is to pay these parties for what they have already been paid for—to dredge this down to grade.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I read from the last estimate received for the whole work up to the 31st of May, 1900, duly certified. That shows that the total value of the work performed by the Messrs. Gilbert Bros.' Engineering Company up to that date was $131,848.31; drawback to be retained $13,188, net amount due $118,660. That is for the use of all plants required for the testing and so on at the rate of $425 a day. Here are the original estimates.

Mr. Haggart. If the hon. minister will refer to page R-105 of the Auditor General's report, he will see the figures I have quoted.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I think the hon. gentleman has misunderstood the Auditor General's report. It agrees with this entirely, and shows a total of $112,986.

Mr. Davin. Then there is $104,000 yet.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That $104,000 is for the full work. It is a vote asked to pay estimates of what the parties are entitled to for the current year on the work of the canal.

Mr. Davin. How much have Gilbert Bros. been already paid, and how much is due them?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The total amount is $131,841, that is the gross amount earned. They have been paid $118,000, with a drawback of $13,000.

Mr. Haggart. When I was in office I employed the same parties to make soundings of the whole channel, and a report of the work was made to the department. The report was, that the work which they had contracted for had been completed, except a small part. I think there was an arbitration about it, and the arbitrators were awarded the full amount of their claim to Gilbert & Co. The explanation the minister offers of the expenditure on the Galops Canal, of this latter item, cannot possibly be an explanation. It is an explanation of the things above the $103,000. That sum was paid, part in 1897, part in 1898, and part in 1899, and the whole amounts to $112,986.80.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Now the hon. gentleman is right.

Mr. Haggart. What is the amount due them at present?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Nothing, except the drawback. The total amount is $131,148.

Mr. Haggart. The excavation part of this is $8,750. That is about 1,000 yards taken out. The price was $8.40 a yard; and the balance of $103,734 is for a survey.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That does not form any part of the work done by the day, for which he receives $425 per day.

Mr. Haggart. I state that Gilbert & Co. have been paid for all the work done to grade line, and that there was nothing for them to take out of the channel unless boulders that had been washed in by the rapids. They have been paid in full for all the excavation that they did over and above their other contract at $8.40, and that for merely surveying it there has been a payment made up to this date of $103,000.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I think the hon. member has forgotten the explanation that I made to him the other day. If there had been no material lowering of the water everything would have gone on all right; and the arrangement which he refers to as having been made in 1892, under which they agreed at their own expense to remove all rock in situ above the contract grade line, would have been sufficient for the purpose, and we would have had no further trouble. Our engineers' report was that they could not get the seventeen feet, that the permanent lowering of the water compelled them to excavate deeper in order to get the seventeen feet of water, and, therefore, we had to continue the arrangement which had not only been recommended by Mr. Rubidge, but which had previously been strongly recommended and adopted by the late chief engineer, Mr. Trudeau. We did it upon the same terms and arrangements, except that, as I understand, the price which had formerly been agreed to be paid to the Davis Bros. was reduced as respects a large portion of their work, from $9.50 to $8.40.

Mr. Clancy. In the statement the hon. gentleman gave us to-night, are the sums due the contractor and earned up to a certain time, of which the hon. gentleman holds a statement in his hands? How much of that is at the contract price of $8.40 a yard, and how much of it is for doing surveying?

Mr. Haggart. The hon. minister makes the statement that the original contract provided for a depth of water of seventeen feet, and that on account of the lowering of the water, a new gradient had to be provided for, and that he had a different contract. There is no such thing in the contract. The contract is to carry the work down to the original grade.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No.

Mr. Haggart. I beg your pardon. You will see that there is no deepening beyond the original contract grade.

Mr. Clancy. Perhaps, while the hon. gentleman is looking up that matter, he will tell me if he has a report of the engineer for what becomes practically a new contract.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes, it has been read this evening. I have Mr. Rubidge's report, that owing to the lowering of the water, it was necessary to do additional work to get the channel:

The offer of the Gilbert Brothers Engineering Company of May 31, 1897, to supply all necessary plant for the purposes of survey, and of removing the alleged obstructions in the channel, is practically a repetition of the offer of October 22, 1892, made at the suggestion of the late chief engineer, Mr. Trudeau, with a view to act upon my previous reports recommending that a properly equipped dredging and blasting plant should be stationed in the channel, as being, in my opinion, the only means of making a satisfactory test and survey of the bottom, and at the same time of being prepared to remove any description of material which might be discovered above the original or contract grade.

It was reported to me in the first place that there was this additional lowering of the grade to be made. There was not seventeen feet of water there. Dr. Ried, before the hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart) left the department, insisted that they would not have a channel of that depth, and it was ascertained by sounding, that Dr. Reid was right. Owing to some cause, whether it was the action of the water or of the ice, a large amount of obstruction got into this channel after it was supposed to have been cleared out. I think a very great amount of the obstruction consisted of boulders and rocks. I am advised that the officers of the department do not know to what might have been properly attributed the placing of these obstructions in the channel. These came there and they had to be removed.

Mr. CLANCY. Has the hon. minister a report from his engineer, stating that the channel became filled up for some reason unexplained?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The engineer speaks of the necessity of removing the obstruction, which was above the original or contract grade. There were obstructions and the deputy minister tells me that the officers do not know whether it is attributable to the action of the water alone, or of the ice. The channel was obstructed, the obstructions required to be removed, and in addition to that, the grade had to be lowered, owing to the permanent falling of the water.

Mr. HAGGART. There is no such thing in the contract.

Mr. DAVIN. How much had the grade to be lowered?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. About a foot.

Mr. CLANCY.

Mr. HAGGART. The minister's contention is that for $425 a day, Gilbert & Son were to work down to the grade line, and he states that the line was lowered on account of the lowering of the water. What I say is that they were paid for the grade line, that there is no condition at all in the contract as to the grade line being changed, but that if there is anything found above the grade line, the line which they were paid for, the line that Mr. Rubidge certified before that they had excavated down to, there is no condition that they had to go below that.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. They have to give seventeen feet of water.

Mr. HAGGART. Not at all. There is no provision at all in the contract.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Seventeen feet of channel would be the depth, and the grade would be at the end of the seventeen feet.

Mr. HAGGART. Not at all. The very contrary is stipulated in the contract. The contract reads:

And whereas, the said assignment has been executed and deposited in the said Department of Railways and Canals, and the said cash security has been put up as required by the said order in council, and the said E. E. Gilbert & Sons were required by Her Majesty to enter into a covenant on their part to finish and complete the said contract;

And whereas, the said covenant was entered into on the 11th day of July, A.D. 1882, and is deposited in the said Department of Railways and Canals;

And whereas, the said E. E. Gilbert & Sons contend that they have completed the said contract;

And whereas, it is alleged that there are obstructions on the bottom of channel through the said Galops Rapids above the original or contract grade—

So that, they are only dealing with the original or contract grade:

—the nature of which is, however, undetermined.

The nature of which was undetermined. There was no condition at all, except in regard, perhaps, to the boulders which might have been washed in from the rapids above. They had been paid in full for the excavation down to the grade line, and there is no requirement in the contract at all that they shall be paid on account of the lowering of the water in the canal, and any deepening that is done under the other contract, for which they received $8.40 a yard for the work done. They have been paid $123,000, or, as it is in the Auditor General's Report, $112,000. They have been paid for surveying, $103,000; and for excavation, $9,000.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That is not correct.

Mr. HAGGART. That is absolutely correct.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. There is the moving of the obstructions.

Mr. HAGGART. What obstruction?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. They were to furnish a channel as soon as possible.

Mr. HAGGART. They had to get down to the grade line in order to give the necessary depth of water, on account of the lowering of the water in the St. Lawrence, and they have been paid for that. They have a contract for that at $8.40 a yard. The other vessel is only a survey vessel. With it they have to sound the channel, and if any obstructions are found above the grade line, they are to remove them, for which they receive $425 a day.

Mr. HAGGART. He is getting $425 a day for three years—

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. There have been only 248 days during the three years for which this plant has been employed. Mr. Rubidge believed it necessary to use this plant to remove certain obstructions which had been discovered; probably some of them come in each season. The deputy tells me that is what Mr. Rubidge alleges. You have to have a careful examination of this channel every year, particularly until we get our canal finished. It won't do to run any risks about that. The contract which I have read speaks of the original contract grade, meaning thereby the grade that was fixed according to the original contract, but which, by reason of the fall of the water, was not found sufficiently deep to give the channel required.

Mr. CLANCY. This gentleman is the assignee of the contract that was let originally to other parties, and he took it at the lower rate of $8.40 a yard. He stands precisely in the position of the original contractor.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. None of that portion of the work has been paid higher for than $8.40 a yard.

Mr. CLANCY. Has the minister the report of the engineer describing the new work?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have explained to the hon. gentleman that there was a permanent lowering of the water.

Mr. CLANCY. Where is the report about the lowering of the water and the work to be done in consequence.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The engineer states here, as I have read, 'in view of the permanent lowering of the water.'

Mr. HAGGART. Surely the minister is in a position to know the number of yards which are required to be removed under this contract for $425 a day.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. They were not removing by the yard for the $425.

Mr. HAGGART. I know that perfectly well, but suppose he was widening the banks for which he was receiving $8.40 a yard, how would the minister know whether he was widening the bank above the original contract unless he had a correct diagram of what was to be removed. There must be some report in the department of the number of yards that were to be taken out under contract.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. There was no taking out by the yard.

Mr. HAGGART. He was taking out by the contract for $8.40 a yard. There are two contracts—one for lowering the grade a foot and for removing the boulders, for which the minister alleges the contractor is to receive $425 a day.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No. Whatever rock excavation was required to be made, which was not known at the time this contract was entered into, was to be paid for at the rate of $8.40 a yard. But for the other portion of the work, wherever that plant was required to be used, it was to be paid for at the rate of $425 per day of 12 hours.

Mr. DAVIN. On what basis was the calculation made to pay $425 a day? It seems to me that is an enormous sum, and the ex-Minister of Railways tells me that no such sum was paid before.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not know what was paid before, but the superintendent engineer reported to the chief engineer that that was a proper price. I will read from the order in council the description of the plant which they were to furnish:

The minister further represents that this offer, the acceptance of which is advised by the superintending engineer, comprises the supply, equipment and use of the undermentioned plant, together with the help necessary for its proper working, viz.:

One large spoon dredge and the 'torpedo' drill scow.

One large tug.

Two dump scows.

Two flat scows.

One hauling scow, equipped with engines, drums, wire ropes, &c.

One floating boarding house.

Anchors, &c.

The government to pay for the services of such plant $425 per day of twelve hours; time to commence when plant is in position as designated by the engineer in charge. The length of time that the plant is to be so employed to be determined by the Department of Railways and Canals, and the arrangement to be cancelled at any time on three days' notice.

Down to this moment we have not had the recommendation of the superintendent engineer nor of the chief engineer that it would be prudent or wise to terminate this agreement. We can make no better arrangement, and we shall continue to use this plant as often as it becomes necessary, at all events until we get through with our main canal. Until the canal is finished, there is no way of getting down except by means of this channel.

Mr. HAGGART. Do you not know that there is a lock near the middle of the Galops Canal by which it is possible to go up or go down ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I was going to read the rest of the order in council :

The said company are to have the use free of charge of such chain and wire rope belonging to the government as may be on the ground, and was used by the company in their previous operations, as contractors for said works.

Any rock found in situ above the original contract grade line to be removed by the said company at their own expense.

Should it be required to still further improve the channel by deepening and widening, the company will perform such work of drilling, blasting and dredging as may be ordered, for the sum of $8.40 per cubic yard for rock necessarily excavated.

During the progress of the company's operations, vessels are not to be allowed access to the channel without such notice as will secure immunity for the company's plant.

The minister recommends, in view of the fact that this channel, costly at it was, remains of little or no practical use in its present condition, and that the Gilbert Company were the original excavators of the channel, a class of work which, by reason of the rapidity and depth of the waters, is one of peculiar difficulty, and calls for the exceptional experience which they possess; further, that the plant referred to, as to be used for the work, has been specially built for working in such waters, that the said offer of this company be accepted, and that he be authorized to enter into definite contract with them accordingly. The price above fixed, $8.40 per cubic yard, to cover all cost of removal and deposit of excavated material.

Mr. DAVIN. Does the hon. minister know how many yards of dredging have been taken out ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. We kept no account of the loose material taken out.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. gentleman is aware that there was a previous contract to pay for that by the yard.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Not for the loose material.

Mr. HAGGART. There was upon the old contract.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. There was no such contract.

Mr. BLAIR.

Mr. HAGGART. Oh, yes, there was.

Mr. DAVIN. What progress has been made in this work ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I like to see the intense interest this subject is exciting in the member for Assiniboia. I am gratified to find an hon. gentleman at his time of life beginning to study up these matters, but it is rather late in the session to start instructing him in the A B C of this kind of work.

Mr. DAVIN. Nevertheless, as a member of parliament and as an elector and a citizen of this country, I am interested in this matter.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am pleased to see the interest aroused in the gentleman on this subject.

Mr. DAVIN. It may strike the hon. gentleman himself that after all, as he himself is only a student in these matters, we have for that reason to cross-examine him.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have a work here from which the hon. gentleman will get much more information and he would get it much more comfortably.

Mr. DAVIN. Still it is only from the hon. gentleman we can get information in this House.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Why cannot you read the report.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. gentleman could tell me more about flour than about canal work. What progress has been made in the clearing of the channel or is the work to go on indefinitely ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Whenever it is necessary for the safety of the channel, we propose to have the necessary plant there to make it all right.

Mr. DAVIN. Is it to go on indefinitely ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Just as long as the difficulties continue.

Mr. DAVIN. Four hundred and twenty-five dollars a day for a dredge strikes my uninstructed mind as an enormous sum.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman is at the disadvantage of not knowing anything at all about the matter.

Mr. DAVIN. And the hon. gentleman is under the disadvantage of not having the politeness that usually belongs to a gentleman in his station.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman has given no information about this expenditure of $104,000, item 36.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That is the amount of money which we require to pay the bills that are now due or will be due on the 30th June for work done under the contract. If we had foreseen that the work would have progressed as near towards completion as it has, we would have put another $100,000 in the main estimates for the year.

Mr. HAGGART. Will this finish the Galops Canal ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I think so.

Increased accommodation at Halifax, Inter-colonial Railway ..... $5,000

Increased accommodation at Halifax, Inter-colonial Railway, along line ..... $67,000

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. This is to meet such items as the land at St. Eugene for further station yard accommodation, for putting in water service at Boisdale, in the county of Cape Breton, for completing the upper flat of the offices at Moncton, for putting in a tank at St. Leonard Junction, for extending the station at River du Loup and also St. Valier, and for buying land at Sydney. Also for putting in new semaphores at a number of places and telegraph and signal stations, also for a station at St. Sylvester, for dwelling houses at George Station, and other works of that description.

Mr. HAGGART. Why do you charge all those to capital account ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. They are entirely new.

Mr. HAGGART. Why charge to capital account the increased accommodation at your offices and semaphores and scales ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The station at Moncton has been paid for out of capital and was contracted to be paid for out of capital. The vote was obtained before we came in and we are completing the upper flats.

Mr. POWELL. Does the hon. minister refer to that building, being built out of capital ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. This is a very large building—the Moncton station. We are fitting up offices in the third flat. That building was charged to capital.

Mr. POWELL. This must refer to the general offices—there is no third flat in the station building.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes, this refers to the general offices.

Mr. POWELL. Let me call the attention of the hon. minister to the thorough absurdity of this. Here is a very large building which was put up to replace a small building. It was built entirely out of revenue. And now, to fit up the third story, the expense is to be charged to capital. Could a more perfect illustration of the means taken to make a good showing for the present management be given than this ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not know that the building was built out of revenue.

Mr. DAVIN. I would like to know on what principle the hon. minister charges a tank to capital. He is very frank in telling other people that they are ignorant, but it seems to me that he himself is rather ignorant as to how accounts should be kept himself.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not see any objection to charging an entirely new structure to capital.

Mr. DAVIN. A tank ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes, a tank. The tank at St. Leonard Junction is costing $2,200. At Boisdale the water service is costing $4,400. It is not the same as though we were repairing it merely. Tanks originally were built out of capital.

Mr. McDOUGALL. There was a tank at Boisdale before.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am told by the deputy minister that they are establishing a gravitation system there.

Mr. POWELL. We are not speaking of a scientific system of railway book-keeping, of course. I admit that the Grand Trunk and Canadian Pacific Railway and every other railroad that I have looked into—and I have read something about them—pursue the policy the hon. minister is pursuing as respects capital account, but not to the extent that he does. That is, they charge betterments to capital. As a method of scientific railway book-keeping, that is all right. But the point is that the hon. gentleman is changing the system of book-keeping, and taking credit for what the comparison of figures shows as though the changes had been made in the road and its business instead of in the system of book-keeping. The hon. minister's deputy is beside him, and I would ask him to ask his deputy if my statement that the general offices are built out of capital is not correct.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. If it is correct, I will let that item stand, and will find out the facts. I was under the impression when I saw the item, that it was connected with the station building. I know that that was built out of capital. If the other was not, I think the point is well taken and would say that this should come out of income.

Mr. POWELL. The hon. gentleman's deputy will tell him whether my statement is correct or not.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes, the deputy says that it is correct.

Mr. POWELL. Further, I can show the hon. gentleman the reports of the engineers on that road from 1880 down, to prove to him that almost all the items he has included in this $67,000 are of a character similar to those that have hitherto been paid out of revenue.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That may have been so at times, just as it is with us now.

Mr. POWELL. No, what I mean is that as a general thing, they were charged to income; and I could convince the minister of that if I wished to take up the time, which I do not. There are charges for sidings here. Before the hon. gentleman assumed the management of this road, there were sidings up to four and a half miles long built and charged to revenue. Last year this remarkable change was made in the system, and there was a siding of a mile and a half, one-half of which was charged to capital.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Should not these things be charged to capital?

Mr. POWELL. I suppose as a form of correct book-keeping they should be charged to capital. But these things are all turned against the old management and in favour of the new management for political effect.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I am sorry to see the hon. gentleman (Mr. Powell) dismiss so lightly the subject of a scientific system of book-keeping for this railway. I think it is important that we should get into a scientific method. The distinction between items that should be charged to revenue and those which should be charged to capital ought not to be difficult. Whatever improves the road or extends the road, gives you a big building where you had a small building—whatever increases the value of the property, I should think should be charged to capital. I think we have everything to gain by adopting a scientific system. If it has been the custom in the past to charge some of these things to revenue, let us frankly acknowledge that in any comparison that we make. But I do not think we ought to get away so lightly from the scientific method of book-keeping. Here is a large and expanding property, no doubt there will be extensions in various directions, and we might as well try to get down to a scientific system of book-keeping between revenue and capital on the Intercolonial Railway now as at any time. We had a case given one day when some items for strengthening bridges had been charged to revenue whereas they are now charged to capital. My hon. colleague, the Minister of Railways, has pointed out that, in the previous cases, the amounts were insignificant, while in his own case the amount required for betterment of bridges was so large that it could not be met from revenue.

Mr. HAGGART. The Minister of Finance evidently was not in the House before 1896, because he would have heard statement after statement made by the then opposition that there should be no capital account at all on the Intercolonial Railway. I have heard the Minister of Trade and Commerce state again and again that the capital account should be closed long ago on the Intercolonial Railway.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Did you say so then?

Mr. HAGGART. I did, and charged to capital account only large extensions like the purchase of property at St. John and Halifax. All these amounts that the hon. gentleman charges now to capital account, my instructions were to charge them to revenue. The opposition insisted that the capital account on the Intercolonial Railway should be closed. It is time it should be closed, it is better for both sides of the House that it should be closed, that there should be no humbugging and cooking of accounts as there is now. The hon. gentleman will perhaps come down with a surplus next year of perhaps $150,000 over last year. Over $300,000 of that amount ought to be charged to the annual revenue account of the year.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. It would not be in any other railway.

Mr. HAGGART. In some railways it is not charged. Every betterment that is of a permanent character is charged to capital account on most of the railways. No substitution of one locomotive for another is charged to capital account; but if there is an increase of locomotives on ordinary railways it is charged to capital account. But there was a contention that the capital account of the Intercolonial should be closed altogether. It prevents cooking reports, it prevents cooking surpluses on the Intercolonial Railway, as there evidently will be this current year beginning on the 1st of July; because there has been an expenditure of $335,000 on what is alleged to be capital account except two items, including equipments of stations, rolling stock, grain elevator at St. John and grain elevator at Halifax. Now, if a grain elevator at Halifax is burnt down and another one is put up, it is absurd to say that it should be charged to capital account. The Minister of Finance says we can point it out when the affairs of the Intercolonial Railway come up and that we can say that it should be charged to revenue instead of capital. But that makes very little difference. Now the Minister of Finance, in his own interest, and in the interest of the government, should take my advice. It will assist him in council, for I suppose he must have a great deal of trouble in resisting all these items that appear in the estimates. He should insist on carrying out the promise of his party when they were in opposition.

Mr. BLAIR.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I will reduce that by $7,000, and call it $60,000. Let me say, however, that it is not a reasonable suggestion to say that we should close the capital account of the Intercolonial Railway. You might as well say we should close the capital account of the canals, I wonder how many people the hon. gentleman will get to sympathise with him in Ontario where we have been spending two or three hundred thousand dollars every year for the last eighteen years in operating canals. Why should we close capital account there? We are keeping it on naturally. Of course there will be developments on the canals and developments on the railroads. It is impossible to realize the extent of the demands made on the Intercolonial Railway during the current year, and what the demands are going to be for a year or two to come in the way of extensions of all kinds. It is impossible to talk about making those extensions out of income. Last year we put down 120 miles of sidings, because we could not run our trains otherwise. We have not half of them down yet. We are hauling a greater number of cars, and the trains are larger. There is not an item which I have included in this estimate, so far as I know, nor in any of these estimates, as to which corresponding items were not charged to capital account by the hon. gentleman. For instance, snow fences, to which he takes exception. These are not renewals but fences upon entirely new ground. You put in a new water service where there has been none before, that is a fair charge against capital. What the member for Westmoreland said a moment ago is correct, that there were no doubt items of a similar kind that were paid out of income during the former regime; there are items of the same kind paid by the government out of earnings. But the test of the question is this: Take the items of the whole expenditure in respect of all these works that are included in the classes that I named the other day—does that amount exceed, or fall below, or where does it stand as compared with the similar expenditure previously? That is the way to make a comparison. Additional trains and cars and additional sidings are required to meet the increased business, and it is necessary that these things should be done altogether. You cannot dilly dally and spread the whole thing over a long term of years. The expenditure, I hope, will be over in a very little while and there will be no need for making material additions to the capital account.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. McDOUGALL. What improvements are to be made at Boisdale station?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. There is nothing in this vote for any further improvement than that of the water service.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Is there any proposition to make any improvement in the station at Boisdale?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not at this moment carry the facts in my mind. We have some supplementary estimates, but I do not recollect what is proposed.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Is the hon. minister aware of the fact that medical men, who attended patients who lived and died in that station, reported that the station was unfit to be occupied?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No, I am not aware of that.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Is he aware that medical men have made the statement that three deaths at least have occurred in the station caused by the unhealthy condition of the station, and that the present station-master has been put there and kept there by the minister against the recommendation of medical men?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS: Neither I nor the deputy minister has ever heard any such thing.

Mr. McDOUGALL. The information is in the department.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Well, I have not heard of it.

Mr. McDOUGALL. It is a cruel thing, if not worse, for the department to put a station-master with his family in a station under these conditions. The station-master was degraded, sent there from a higher station, where he received a higher salary.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. There is no difference in the salary.

Mr. McDOUGALL. There is a difference in the salary.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No, the hon. gentleman is in error.

Mr. McDOUGALL: There are several dollars per month difference in the salary received at that station and at the station from which he was transferred. I make the statement, knowing what I am saying, that the station master does not receive the same salary that he received at the station from which he was transferred. I refer to the case of Mr. Petrie. He was station-master at Grand Narrows, where he received $3 a month more salary than he does at Boisdale, and he received other perquisites owing to a difference in the classification of the station that he does not receive now.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That has nothing to do with it at all.

Mr. McDOUGALL. It has something to do with the position of the station-master. What I complain of more particularly now is the action of the management in insisting on keeping the station-master, his wife and family in a station under the conditions that I have referred to. In the name of everything that is fair, I make this protest against continuing it any further, and I say that the minister is guilty of one of the worst acts that a minister could possibly be guilty of if, when he becomes aware of the fact that the station is not in a fit condition for people to live in, he does not at once take steps to put that station in a proper condition.

Mr. DAVIN. Now, I think we cannot go any further to-night.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. We will take a few more items.

Mr. DAVIN. No, it is ten minutes to three, and I have to be here at eleven o'clock.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. So have I. We have made no progress at all. We must pass a few items.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Before these items pass, I want to get some information from him in regard to the principle upon which he has built a number of sidings along the line of the Cape Breton Railway during the past year.

Mr. POWELL. I suggest to the hon. minister that it would be better to work a reasonable time.

Mr. McDONALD (King's, P.E.I.) It was understood that we should not sit after twelve o'clock.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. We have not made any progress.

Mr. POWELL. Here is an item that might, under ordinary circumstances, give rise to a great deal of discussion, but it is passing through without much discussion. If he is going to try to force things and to compel people to sit here after three o'clock in the morning there will be no progress made.

Mr. McDOUGALL.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not want to be unreasonable.

Mr. POWELL. The hon. gentleman is being unreasonable. I appeal to him. I have no disposition to detain him by asking for unnecessary information. There is a little information I would like to have in respect to this item. The passing of the estimates would be greatly expedited by allowing it to stand.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. There will be plenty of opportunities for discussing the question of sidings, because there is provision for sidings in the supplementary estimates for the current year.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman was good enough to say that he had repeated things that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House could not understand. There are some things in this report which I cannot understand. I have a report here, made by some one, unsigned; I do not know whether it is by Mr. Rubidge or not. It is headed 'St. Lawrence district, engineer's office, Cornwall, June 12, 1897.'

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That is Mr. Rubidge's report.

Mr. CLANCY. He makes reference here to having made a former report.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That is away back in May.

Mr. CLANCY. I ask the hon. gentleman to give us the report at the next sitting of the committee. I want to be clear on the subject, and I am sure the minister will see that it is not an unreasonable request.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I think the hon. gentleman wants the previous report that Mr. Rubidge mentions there, and we will get that.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. We are all, I suppose, anxious to make some progress, and I find in the supplementaries for the coming year a number of items on any one of which all this can be discussed. I would suggest that this item pass, and there will be ample opportunity for full and free discussion on the supplementaries. Everything can be said then that could be said to-night.

Mr. HAGGART. It will take me half an hour on the small item of $846 to Mr. Jones. You can pass them all but that.

Mr. DAVIN. Oh, no. I want to say something about snow fences. The mind of the country is agitated on the subject of your book-keeping.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. We will promise you ample liberty on the supplementary estimates.

Mr. DAVIN. No ; no more items to-night.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) does not bow to the reasonable suggestion made by his leader, why, then, we will have to see it through.

Mr. McDOUGALL. If the minister is prepared to go on, I want some explanation with regard to the cost of sidings along the Cape Breton division of the Intercolonial Railway.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I will get the information.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I want the information now. Surely the minister does not want to pass a vote for sidings without the information.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I can tell the sidings, if any, this vote is for.

Mr. McDOUGALL. The hon. gentleman is not going to bluff me. This item will not go through until I get the information, and now is the proper time to get it. What are the sidings on which this money is being spent ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not know what the hon. gentleman means by bluff, and I think he could use more appropriate language. He first asked what was the cost of all the sidings on the Cape Breton branch ?

Mr. McDOUGALL. I asked what were the sidings that were to be put in for this money.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I can tell you that there are no sidings to be provided for in this vote.

Mr. DAVIN. Are we to understand that this is the kind of treatment that we are to get, that after the government arranges that the committee should rise, they change their mind and propose to go on? I do not think that the Minister of Railways, by attempting to browbeat the House, will facilitate matters.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not know what the hon. gentleman means.

Mr. DAVIN. As my hon. friend (Mr. Haggart) has suggested, let the last item stand, and let it be understood that we will have the right of full discussion.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Certainly, that is a fair proposal.

Mr. McDOUGALL. And I will get the information I asked for on the last item ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes.

Mr. McDOUGALL. In order that the minister may have no excuse—

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman had better not lecture.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I merely want to state what I want. I want the amount of expenditure on all sidings that were put in between Point Tupper and Sydney during the last eight or ten months.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. We will have to telegraph for that.

Mr. McDOUGALL. There is no need for telegraphing.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Perhaps the hon. gentleman knows better than I do ?

Mr. McDOUGALL. I want to know which of these sidings were put in at the expense of the government and which at the expense of the individual. I refer to two sidings, within a mile of the River Denny station ; extension of the siding at Grand Narrows ; two sidings near Christmas Island ; three sidings at Boisdale, one siding at Long Island, one siding within two miles of the Shuncadie station, one siding at George's River, one siding at Leitches' Creek, one siding at Ball's Creek, one siding at Sydney Forks, and one siding at about a mile from Sydney town.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I assent to the proposition that these items pass except one.

Mr. HAGGART. I wish that one of the items be reserved, with the understanding that upon it we can discuss all the items.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Very well, let it be so.

Resolutions reported.

JUDGES OF PROVINCIAL COURTS.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick) moved that the House resolve itself into committee to consider the following resolutions :

That it is expedient to amend the Act respecting the judges of provincial courts and to provide as follows:

That the salary of the chief justice of the Supreme Court of the North-west Territories shall be $5,000 and of the five puisné judges of the said court each $4,000 per annum.

That the salary of an additional judge of the Territorial Court of the Yukon territory shall be $4,000 per annum.

That the salaries of seventeen puisné judges of the Superior Court of Quebec, whose residences are fixed at Montreal or Quebec (including the judge to whom the district of Terrebonne is assigned) each $5,000 per annum.

Mr. POWELL. The hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) asked me to express his desire that this should stand until he can be present.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I have an arrangement about that. The understanding is that the resolution should pass through committee to-night and be concurred in to-morrow; and then I shall introduce the Bill, and we shall have the whole discussion on the Bill on Tuesday, when the hon. member for Montmorency comes back. I will require to amend the second paragraph of the resolution by changing 'five' to 'four,' puisné judges.

Motion agreed to, and resolutions considered in committee reported.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. HAGGART. What are you going to take up at the next sitting?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The Election Bill, and after that possibly the railway estimates.

Mr. CLANCY. I must protest against the proposition to take up the election Bill on Saturday, as there are some important matters in the Bill which several members who will be absent desire to discuss.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The only object I have is to get the Bill passed, so that it can go to the Senate.

Mr. J. G. RUTHERFORD (Macdonald). I protest against the remarks of the hon. member for Bothwell. (Mr. Clancy), as one who has been here for five months. It is simply disgraceful, the way members who live near Ottawa go home on Saturdays, and then expect the business of the House to wait to suit their convenience.

Mr. CLANCY. I think that is an uncalled for remark. I have only been home once since I have been in Ottawa. I do not know that I have accomplished as much as the hon. gentleman, but I think I have shown as good manners.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 3.10 a.m., Saturday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

SATURDAY, June 30, 1900.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Eleven o'clock.

PRAYERS.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN.

Mr. G. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.) I would like to ask the Prime Minister if he has yet had time to get me these papers with reference to the Richelieu bridge.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I spoke to my colleague, to the Minister of Railways, about that, and he tells me that the correspondence between the department and the Auditor General is still going on. Under the circumstances, the papers could not be brought down.

Mr. FOSTER. May I ask whether or not the money has been spent?

The PRIME MINISTER. The subsidy paid?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

The PRIME MINISTER. I am not aware that it has. I think some has been paid which is not disputed.

Mr. FOSTER. Then there must be some papers completed, and I think they should be brought down.

The PRIME MINISTER. I will take a note of that.

SUPPLY BILL.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I move that the House do receive report of Committee of Supply. This is for the purpose of facilitating the passing of an item in the estimates which is very urgent. The item is the $900,000 to cover the working expenses of the Intercolonial Railway for the current year, which expires to-day. I have mentioned the matter to my hon. friend (Mr. Foster), who sees no objection to taking this vote separately from the general supply Bill.

Motion agreed to, resolution read the second time and concurred in.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 188) for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money required for defraying certain expenses of the public service for the financial year ending June 30, 1900.

Motion agreed to; Bill read the first and second time; considered in committee, reported; read the third time, and passed.

ELECTION ACT AMENDMENT AND CONSOLIDATION.

The House again resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 133) to consolidate and amend the law relating to the election of members of the House of Commons.—(Mr. Fitzpatrick.)

(In the Committee.)

Mr. G. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.) I am sorry that this Bill has been treated in the way it has been, because the House came to an agreement that the Bill was to be taken up on Tuesday last, when those members who were interested in it were present and were ready to take it up. That day passed without the Bill being taken up, and we are taking it up now at a very disadvantageous time. At the same time, the date of the session is such that it is rather difficult to make a protest, which would involve delay; but if there is any other business which the government have ready, I think they might go on with that.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I understand that the Bill has been pretty well threshed out between the legal members on both sides of the House, and after taking the committee stage to-day, my hon. friend, the Solicitor General, will be ready to leave the third reading of the Bill till Tuesday.

Mr. FOSTER. I understand that there was an agreement last night that this Bill was not to be taken up to-day.

The PRIME MINISTER. No, quite the reverse.

Mr. JAMES CLANCY (Bothwell). Last night at the adjournment I requested that the Bill be not taken up to-day by reason of some members who take a great interest in the Bill being away, and I understood the hon. Solicitor General to assent to that.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). It is very desirable that we should have all the assistance we can upon a Bill of this kind; but a great many of the clauses which were held over are really acceptable to both sides of the House, because they are clauses which have been incorporated into this Bill from the Election Act, which has been in force for some time; and they are held over simply for the purpose of having certain explanations. If we come to an agreement on both sides that upon the motion for the third reading of the Bill any amendment may be brought up and discussed, we may make some progress. With reference to some of the amendments suggested by the hon. member for Montmorency, he and I have practically come to a conclusion. The other sections might be considered, and if there is any dispute about them, we might hold them over till the third reading.

Mr. CLANCY. That is another question. I understood the Solicitor General last night to assent to the proposition that the Bill should not be taken up to-day, for the reason I have given. The Bill is very general in its character, and this is a stage at which we can more conveniently and more quickly reach a conclusion on any matters which may be standing for solution. I hope the hon. Solicitor General will not insist on going on with the Bill, for while some suggestions were made, we do not know what they are.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. It seems to me that with the exception of the hon. member for Montmorency, we have here now practically all those who have taken any interest in the Bill.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) is not here, and the two members from New Brunswick, who took a special interest in it, Mr. Powell and Mr. McInerney, are neither of them here. But the main point seems to be that when a day is set for the consideration of a Bill, it ought to be taken up then, and if something else intervenes to prevent that, another day should be set. The hon. member for Montmorency informed me that he will be back here on Tuesday, and the government will be just as far ahead if they set the Election Bill for that day, and dispose of it then.

The PRIME MINISTER. It is desirable that this Bill should be sent to the Senate as early as possible. It has been put off two or three times at the suggestion of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. A. B. INGRAM (East Elgin). If it is determined to postpone the Bill till Tuesday, I would suggest that the amendments agreed upon by the Solicitor General and the hon. member for Montmorency be stated by the Solicitor General, so that we may consider them till Tuesday. I am satisfied that some of us from Ontario will not agree to some of the amendments proposed by the hon. member for Montmorency. They are too radical for us.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). There were quite a number of amendments suggested to certain clauses by hon. gentlemen opposite, and the Solicitor General reserved these to consider whether he would agree to the suggestions or not. It will take us all morning to get through with these clauses, without touching the suggested amendments of the hon. member for Montmorency. If we do not do that, it will take two days to get through with this Bill, if I can judge by the time spent upon it already.

Mr. FOSTER. I want it to be clearly understood that the fault is not with the opposition. We had agreed to take up the Bill on Tuesday, and we were ready to take it up then, but the government did not bring it on. The only point to consider now is, whether it is better to put the whole thing off till Tuesday and then go on with it till we finish it.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I would suggest that we go on, and if there is any clause which any hon. member desires to have stand, we might let it stand till Tuesday.

Mr. CLANCY. Has the Bill been reprinted with the amendments?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. No, not that I am aware of.

Mr. CLANCY. Then we are quite at sea. I do not see how we can consider an important Bill like this, with all these changes, without having it reprinted.

The PRIME MINISTER. When the Bill leaves this committee, that is the time to reprint it.

6. If a person declared ineligible by paragraph (a) or (b) of the next preceding section is nevertheless returned as a member, his election and return shall be null and void.

2. If a member of a provincial legislature, notwithstanding his disqualification as in the next preceding section mentioned, receives a majority of votes at an election, such majority of votes shall be thrown away, and the returning officer shall return the person having the next greatest number of votes, provided he is otherwise eligible.

R.S.C., c. 11, s. 11 ; c. 13, s. 2.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. This clause is exactly as it is in the old Act. It was held over at the request of the senior member for Halifax, who wanted to understand the reason for the difference between the disqualification in the first and second paragraphs, that is, why a person who is declared ineligible by paragraphs a and b for corrupt practices should be treated differently from a person who is a member of the provincial legislature. I do not see any reason for the distinction, but it has existed many years. The only reason probably is that a member of a provincial legislature would be publicly known as occupying a position which disqualifies him for a seat in the federal parliament.

On section 12.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. This section stood over because it was pointed out that paragraph h, which reads as follows :—

Persons who have been convicted of an offence under the provisions of the Criminal Code, 1892, or any amendment thereof.

Would disqualify a person who had been convicted simply of a common assault.

Mr. CLANCY. How few persons would know, in the appointing of those officers, what the Criminal Code means. I think we should not raise disqualifications unless it has been found in the past that a great evil exists. A man might be disqualified, under this section, for a very slight offence, such as a common assault.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. It would be very difficult to draft a clause to allow for that point without allowing for too much.

Mr. INGRAM. We should aim to have as good men as possible in these positions, and if a man has been guilty of a criminal offence he should be excluded.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I think we all agree upon the point. But the difficulty is to get some form of words that would distinguish those who have been guilty of serious offences from those who, while they have offended against the criminal law, have done nothing to bring a stigma upon their names. If a man has been merely guilty of a tu'penny-ha'penny assault, there is no real reason why he should be disqualified. But the difficulty is to frame the clause.

Mr. J. G. H. BERGERON (Beauharnois). I do not know whether it has been provided for, but I see that among those who are disqualified from being returning officers are members of the Queen's Privy Council, members of the House of Commons and so on, but I do not see that members of the North-west council are excluded.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The Bill does not apply to the North-west Territories, as now amended. It was originally intended to apply, but that has been changed.

Mr. FOSTER. The Premier has promised to give representation in this parliament to the Yukon district. I think it would be well to put the members of the Yukon council on the same level as you do the members of the provincial government in this respect.

Mr. NICHOLAS FLOOD DAVIN (West Assiniboia). I venture to suggest that that would not be necessary, because this law as at present framed, could hardly be made applicable to the Yukon. When you wish to give that district representation you will have to do it specially, as you will need to do for the North-west Territories.

Mr. A. McNEILL (North Bruce). What has been decided with regard to this subsection 8, as to persons who have been convicted of an offence under the Criminal Code. I understand that it is not intended to exclude a man who may have been guilty merely of some petty offence.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The effect of the Bill, as it stands, would be to exclude those to whom my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) referred. I, naturally, like to stand by the Bill as it is, but I would not object to amending it so as to cover the point raised. We might amend it to read :

Persons who have been convicted of an offence under the provisions of the Criminal Code, 1892, or any amendment thereof, punishable by more than two years of imprisonment.

As I say, I prefer to have the clause as it is than have it that way.

Mr. McNEILL. I would rather have it as it is than have it that way.

Mr. CLANCY. I am afraid, though the clause as it is seems objectionable, the amendment could be even more so.

Mr. FOSTER. It excludes persons who have been guilty of an offence under the provisions of the Criminal Code, 1892, or any amendment thereof. How far would that go back? If a man is convicted before 1892, would this cover his case?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Yes, any offence against the criminal law. No, I think I am mistaken. It would be applicable to convictions before 1892.

Mr. FOSTER. There is no purging effect in the date 1892. This would admit a man who had been guilty of a most serious offence before 1892, but it would exclude even the least offender after that date.

Mr. BERGERON. Make it a 'criminal offence,' without mentioning the date.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The old fellows have pretty well died out.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. How would it do to make it read 'persons who have been convicted of an indictable offence.' That would relieve the person charged with minor offences, which can be tried under summary conviction.

Mr. BERGERON. That is better.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I move that the section be amended to read 'persons who have been indicted of an indictable offence.'

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). If this were adopted, and yet one were to act as a returning officer who had been convicted of an indictable offence, what would be the result to the candidate?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. It would have no results; it would not affect the candidate.

Mr. SPROULE. It would not affect the election?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. No.

Mr. SPROULE. Would the person so acting, though disqualified, be amenable to punishment?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Yes, he would be punishable; and I am not sure that the person who would appoint such a man, with knowledge, would not be liable to the penalty also. But it will have no effect on the election.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. J. A. GILLIES (Richmond, N.S.) I would ask the attention of the Solicitor General to subsection g:

Persons who have been found guilty by the House of Commons or by any court for the trial of controverted elections or other competent tribunal, of any offence or dereliction of duty in violation of this Act or of the Act to disfranchise voters who have taken bribes, being chapter 14 of the Statutes of 1894.

I would like to know how the Solicitor General interprets that clause. Would persons that are proved guilty of a contravention of the electoral law in any province be disqualified under this section?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. No, he must have committed a violation of this Act.

Mr. GILLIES. I interpret it as the Solicitor General does, that these persons so disqualified under the local Act are not included in this section. I think the section should be enlarged so as to include any persons found guilty of violation of any provincial Act.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. What the hon. gentleman means to say is that we should make the provisions of this section applicable to those who are disqualified by reason of some infringement of a local Act so declared by a provincial court.

Mr. GILLIES. Quite so.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. This has been the law for a great many years, and I do not know of any special case which would justify us in making a new departure. The number of disqualifications covered by this Bill is already very considerable.

Mr. GILLIES. I know in my own province of persons having been fined $200 or $400 and disfranchised from voting for five years. Now, the provincial Act is just as sacred as any Act we are passing here, and why should not a disqualification under the provincial Act disqualify them under this Act?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. That would be opening the door very wide.

Mr. GILLIES. The Act then would read in this way, for instance: 'Persons who have been found guilty by the House of Commons of having violated the Controverted Elections Act in any one of the provinces of Canada.' That would include that class of offenders who violate the provincial Acts.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. My difficulty is not so much with the phraseology of the section which would be required to meet the point suggested, as with this aspect, that it might leave the provinces to determine that for a trifling infringement of the local election Act a man might be disqualified. It is wiser for us to keep control over these disqualifications.

Mr. McNEILL. I cannot take the view of the Solicitor General. After the discussion we have had on section 8 in the case of a man convicted of an offence so serious that he is disqualified by a law of the province in which he lives, to say that that man shall be permitted to act the part of a returning officer under this Act is, I think, going altogether too far. The hon. gentleman will scarcely suggest that the provincial authorities are likely to disqualify a man altogether unless he has been guilty of some offence that should disqualify him from acting as returning officer.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not see any ground or principle upon which such a case should not be included. The government itself, in adopting the provincial basis, has justified the good sense of each provincial legislature.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I would remind the hon. gentleman that while we accept their franchise we do not accept their disqualifications. We have made special provision against that.

Mr. FOSTER. That is evidence that this parliament had sufficient faith in the provincial legislatures to entrust them with the duty of saying who should be the electors for this house. We may safely assume that our provincial legislatures would not disqualify a person except for grave offences, in fact I think provincial legislatures are apt to be a little less strict on election matters than the Dominion parliament. But coming to facts, what a scandal it would be if you were not to preclude from this section a man who for an offence against the Franchise Act in a province had been convicted and disfranchised. I cannot see that there would be any harm at all, and I see there would be a great good if you would add such persons to the list of those who are disqualified.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I draw attention to the words 'dereliction of duty.' Don't you think we would be going very far if we were to include a man who has been guilty of dereliction of duty and violation of a local Act? We have not allowed in the past the provincial legislatures any right to disqualify.

Mr. FOSTER. There can be no conviction which would disqualify a man except it be a conviction in a province which arises out of due process of law. But what a terrible outrage it would be if these men who have been convicted under a local Act, in a local court, of these serious offences, should be allowed to act as returning officers for Dominion elections.

Mr. CLANCY. Independently of where the offences are committed, I presume the object of the subsection is to prevent undesirable persons from acting?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Those who have no regard for the Election Act ought not to be allowed to administer it.

Mr. CLANCY. Therefore, whether such an offence be committed in a local or Dominion election, it really makes no difference. They are undesirable persons in either case. The point seems to me an important one, and I think that such persons, no matter whether in Dominion or provincial elections, should be excluded.

Mr. FOSTER. Perhaps the hon. Solicitor General will take that into consideration.

Mr McNEILL.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I think we might make the exclusion applicable to persons guilty of offences under the local Acts.

Mr. INGRAM. The amendment should be drawn so that it would not only include persons who have been convicted, but persons who are liable to convictions.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. You cannot do that.

Mr. INGRAM. In Ontario we know that several men have committed offences. There is no question about it. It has been proven, but no court has declared them guilty of the offence. How are you going to prevent these fellows from acting? What about Bole, for instance, a man who has not been convicted?

Mr. CAMPBELL. What about your returning officer in London?

Mr. INGRAM. What is the matter with the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell). Does he want to have Bole up in his constituency?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Ingram) has been unjustly accusing Bole. I see by the morning papers that he is perfectly innocent. The Citizen says so.

Mr. FOSTER. I am glad that the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries recognizes him.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. How would this amendment meet the views of my hon. friend? Insert after the words 'in violation of this Act,' the words 'or of any offence in violation of a provincial Act relating to elections, conviction under which shall disqualify the person convicted from being so appointed for the purposes of a Dominion election'?

Mr. GILLIES. I would suggest to the hon. Solicitor General that it would be very much more simple and much clearer if the subsection were made to read as follows:

Persons who have been found guilty by the House of Commons, or by any court for the trial of controverted elections, in any of the provinces of Canada, etc.

That would cover the point in its entirety, and this Act would be applicable to all the provinces.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. If my hon. friend (Mr. Gillies) will allow me to draw his attention to the section, he will see that his suggestion will not include all we want. If we adopt that suggestion, it will then read:

Persons who have been found guilty by the House of Commons, or by any court for the trial of controverted elections, in any province—

You omit the words 'or other competent tribunal,' because a man might be found guilty of an offence by a criminal court.

Mr. GILLIES. The words 'or other competent tribunal' would follow.

Mr. FOSTER. I have just been reading over the amendment proposed. The amendment reads as follows: 'or of any offence in violation of a provincial Act relating to elections.' Why not stop there? That covers it all.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I suppose the hon. gentleman will agree that I should adopt this amendment as it now stands, and if it is necessary to change the phraseology it may be done upon the third reading.

Mr. SPROULE. There might be a difficulty, inasmuch as the provincial Act does not prevent these parties from acting as deputy returning officers.

Mr. BERGERON. It would apply if they have been found guilty in any court of an offence against the Electoral Act.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. By an election court or a competent tribunal.

Mr. SPROULE. But there are cases in which a commission have, on the evidence presented to them, determined that these parties are guilty. They should have no right to act.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. What would be the extent of their commission?

Mr. SPROULE. A commission of inquiry have determined that these parties are guilty.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I do not know about the scope of their inquiry. Inasmuch as they are not in a position to mete out punishment, I do not think they would constitute a competent tribunal within the meaning of the section.

Mr. SPROULE. They are not in a position to mete out punishment.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL moved:

That after the words 'in violation of this Act' in the 34th line, the following words be inserted: 'or of any offence in violation of a provincial Act relating to elections'

Motion agreed to.

On section 13.

Mr. J. B. MORIN (Dorchester) moved:

That section 13 be reconsidered.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. MORIN. The section reads as follows:

No person shall be appointed deputy returning officer or election clerk or poll clerk who is not a resident of the electoral district within which he is to act.

That part of it is all right. I would like to have added to it, that no person shall be appointed a deputy returning officer or election clerk unless he is twenty-one years of age and has the right to vote.

Mr. FOSTER. I think that is a very good idea.

Mr. SPROULE. The words 'duly qualified elector' would cover it.

Mr. MORIN. The reason why I make this suggestion is that we had, in my election, in 1896, a young man acting who was only eighteen years of age, and who could administer the oath just like a justice of the peace. He had the right to swear voters, although he had no right to vote himself. He had no property. I think before a man has that power he should be an elector, instead of having boys and women meddling with elections.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I admit that it would be very undesirable to have ladies acting as deputy returning officers, but I can see no reason why, if a young man, eighteen years of age, is otherwise qualified, he should not be allowed to act as returning officer.

Mr. MORIN. He was not qualified; he was only eighteen years of age, and he never had a cent in his life.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. With us if a man is not twenty-one years of age he is not qualified.

Mr. MORIN. A man should be twenty-one years of age and own some property. This person was not twenty-one, and he owned no property.

Mr. McNEILL. Will the hon. Solicitor General accept the words 'duly qualified elector'?

Mr. SPROULE. Why should he be there if he is not an elector of the district?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I think this is as far as we can go conveniently at the present time. It seems to me we will be limiting it too much if he has to be twenty-one years of age and have property. Take the case of a law clerk.

Mr. SPROULE. He would not require to have property under our manhood suffrage, but he must be of a certain age.

Mr. FOSTER. What constitutes a resident?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. A man is a resident where he has his legal domicile.

On section 14.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I was requested on this clause to consider why a professor in a university, college, high school or academy should not be liable to act as returning officer. It is quite evident that it would be extremely inconvenient if such a gentleman were obliged to act.

Mr. SPROULE. Are they free to act?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. They can do so if they wish, but there is no legal compulsion on them to accept.

On section 21,

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I move that the following subsection be added :

The instructions referred to in subsection 1 of this section shall contain the forms of the oath referred to in sections 65, 66 and 68 of this Act, and in the case of returning officers in the province of Prince Edward Island, they shall be accompanied by the sections of the provincial law relating to the qualifications of voters.

Instead of allowing the matter to remain discretionary, as it is now, with the returning officer to amend the form of oath, this amendment provides that we shall prepare the form of oath beforehand, and that it shall form part of the instructions sent out to the deputy returning officers so as to take all the discretion away from them with reference to this oath. I think that meets the difficulty raised by hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. INGRAM. You will include the form of oath in the schedule ?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I have not made up my mind as to that.

Mr. INGRAM. We must insist on that, because we are about to have courts of revision in the province of Ontario, and unless you have the form of oath you are working in the dark.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. My hon. friend (Mr. Ingram) will see the inconvenience that would result from the adoption of his idea. The Act is one of general application necessarily, and the form of oath will be, to some extent, dependent upon the changes in the provincial law. If, therefore, we adopt a form of oath, the provincial law might change the form of oath to be used when the elections take place. Under the present system, the form of oath will be part of the instructions and can be varied at each election according to the provincial law.

Mr. INGRAM. That will occur for all time to come, so long as we have the present franchise law. The question of the oath is one of the most important things that comes up in the court of revision.

Mr. G. V. McINERNEY (Kent. N.B.) I would call the attention of the Solicitor General to what appears to be an anomaly in this clause, when you compare it with section 22 of the Act. In section 21, you order the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to transmit the list, and in section 22 you say that the officer shall get the lists from the custodian.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. For the purposes of an election there may be two custodians, namely, the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, to whom the lists have been transmitted by the local officers, but in the case of the lists that have not been transmitted, the local official who remains in possession of the lists will also be the legal custodian of that portion of the list that has not gone forward. I have amendments to sections 21 and 22, in connection with which I have had the advice and assistance of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, and these amendments will, perhaps, meet the points raised by my hon. friend (Mr. McInerney).

Mr. A. C. MACDONALD (King's, P.E.I.) I wish to say that Mr. Martin, who had special charge of the amendments relating to Prince Edward Island, was not aware that the Bill was coming up this morning, and is not present.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The amendments were taken up ; we gave a whole day to them, and most of them were accepted.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The section is so amended that the form of oath for Prince Edward Island is sent out in the instructions to the returning officer, and the section is made applicable to the whole Dominion ; while the sections of the provincial Franchise Act are restricted in their application to Prince Edward Island. My hon. friend from East Elgin (Mr. Ingram), suggested that we ought to have the form of oath inserted in the schedule of the Act, because he said that for the purposes of revision it would be necessary to have it before the revising officer. As I understand the Ontario Act, the form of oath to be used for the purposes of revision is the form in the schedule to the provincial Act. The amendment which we will make to this Act will have no reference whatever to the revision.

Mr. INGRAM. But you will find that we have certain electors qualified under the Dominion Franchise Act who are disqualified under the provincial Act. If it is impossible to insert the oath in the Act so as to make it applicable to Prince Edward Island, I would suggest that you might meet the case of the province of Ontario, by inserting the oath of the election law of the province, with such changes as are necessary to make it applicable to Dominion elections.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The trouble about that is, that the form of oath might be changed at the next session of the local legislature.

Mr. FOSTER. Then you will have to call a special session of this parliament to change your law accordingly.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I think it will be a sufficient safeguard to have the form of oath issued in the instructions to the returning officers, under the sanction of the Governor General.

Mr. CLANCY. There seems to me to be no reason why we should give any power of legislation to the Department of Justice. If we place in their hands the form of oaths and so on, we practically to that extent give them the power of certain classes of legislation. I do not think that should be done. I think we ought to know what the oaths are. It is a grave thing to say that the legislature may change these in a year; but it is not so grave as to take the other view. So far as the province of Ontario is concerned, I feel very strongly that these forms of oaths should become part of the schedule of the Act, and I hope my hon. friend will consent to that.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. As the Bill was introduced, it provided that the provincial form of oaths, with certain changes, should be made applicable to elections for the House of Commons. Objection was made to that, that it was impossible to leave it discretionary with the deputy returning officers to make those changes. In order to meet that objection, which was a good objection, it is provided that the form of oaths shall be prepared under the sanction of the Governor General in Council, and be made part of the instructions to be issued to the returning officers. That is the amendment suggested. My hon. friend is not satisfied with that, and suggests that the form of oaths should be made part of the schedule to this Act. If we do that, you will have incorporated into this Act a form of oath which may be changed before the election takes place; that is the difficulty. My hon. friend has this guarantee, that the form of oath is not to be changed at the discretion of the Minister of Justice, or the Department of Justice—I quite admit that he has no right to have any confidence in that department—but it is to be prepared under the sanction of the Governor in Council who already, under the law, as we have had it in force for many years, has the right to draft the instructions to the deputy returning officers. He has already got the right to go so far as to draft the instructions which are to be sent to the returning officer, and this simply gives him the right to re-draft the forms of oath in force in any province, so as to make them applicable to Dominion elections.

Mr. CLANCY. It is absolutely necessary that the people should be acquainted with the form of oath, and that it should not be thrust into the hands of the election officers at the last moment.

Mr. McINERNEY. I agree with my hon. friend. It is quite elementary that in an Act of this importance the form should be included in the Act.

Mr. E. COCHRANE (East Northumberland). It appears to me that it would be a dangerous thing to have the form of oath changed and no one know anything about it until the instructions are given the returning officer.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The oaths to be used are, with the exceptions of those in the schedule of our own Acts, those already in force in the provinces and which are accessible to every one. The change is to be limited to the form of the oath so as to make it applicable to the Dominion election, but the substance remains the same. It is inconceivable that any change would be made as would have the effect of altering the substance.

Mr. COCHRANE. Why not put a clause in the Act making the provincial oath applicable to the Dominion election?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. We have done that, but we are giving power to make certain changes in the form.

Mr. McNEILL. This is an evidence of the confusion in which we involve ourselves by giving away our franchise. However, I suppose that is past praying for. What I would suggest is that we should adhere to the form of oath which is prescribed by the provincial authority at the time of the passing of this Act; and, if any change be made, let us change our Act. Let them dictate to us—we are their humble servants now with regard to our franchise.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I understand the hon. gentleman to say that we should approve a form of oath and make that part of the Act, and that form should remain in force until we amend it following an amendment by the provincial legislature. But if we adopt a form of oath and a session of the legislature is held during which an amendment is made to the Election Act and the form of oath is modified, and there is no session of the Dominion parliament before an election to modify our schedule, what position should we be in then?

Mr. McNEILL. My hon. friend (Mr. Fitzpatrick) knows as well as I do that the whole thing is in confusion; but the way I suggested seems the simplest way out of the difficulty. He will see the great weight of objection raised to the other suggestion, namely, that we should not have a form of vote in the schedule, but should use that established by the province from time to time. The result would be, as my hon. friend will see, that the party that happened to be in power at the time would have the advantage of knowing beforehand what the alteration in the form of oath would be. I quite see that there are objections to the suggestion I made, but it is, after all, a case of weighing objections and determining which proposition is the least objectionable. It seems to me that the objections are more serious in importance to the proposal that the deputy returning officer should be aware and the electors should not be aware until the very last moment as to what the change had been. That is a much greater objection than the objection that our oath would differ for the time being from that provided by the provincial legislature.

Mr. CLANCY. I am not going to enter into a discussion of the wisdom or unwisdom of adopting the franchise of the province. We must simply try to meet the difficulties as well as we can. Here is the point I wish to have explained. We adopt the provincial franchise, which, in Ontario has as one qualification, residence in the district. Suppose a person lives outside the electoral district of Bothwell as it is for the Dominion purposes, but within the provincial electoral district, can he vote under that oath?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The words to be construed are those in the oath under which the voter swears he is a resident 'in this electoral district.' That would be the district for Dominion purposes.

Mr. CLANCY. We cannot consider alone the oath a voter takes upon election day, but we must remember also the machinery we have for placing voters upon the list. Take the case of a man placed upon the list and resident in a municipality, he moves from one place to another in the same local electoral district, but out of the same Dominion electoral district. Now, this man had a right to vote in the local election, and the question comes up now, after he has become disqualified, if we are to carry out the essence of the local franchise Act, whether he could still vote in the local, but we want to prevent him from voting in the Dominion, because he is not in the same electoral district for the Dominion. The oath does not meet that case, nor does the Act meet it. I would ask the Solicitor General to let that section stand until three o'clock, so that we may be able to give it further consideration.

It being One o'clock, the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at Three o'clock.

On section 21,

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment of the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick).

Mr. CLANCY. I desire to make clear what my contention is. In the first place, we must keep in sight entirely the Ontario Franchise Act and all the machinery leading up to the preparation of the voters' lists, and finally, to the voter voting. We have no Dominion voters' lists in any shape or form. We have no Dominion franchise in any shape or form under the authority of any Act of this House. Therefore, we must be entirely guided by the rights of voters under the provincial franchise. Now, the voter comes up to vote and his right to vote depends not upon any Act of this House by an oath or otherwise, but, as complying entirely with the provisions of the Ontario franchise. I am speaking entirely from the point of view of the layman, but it seems to me that no oath prescribed by this House can alter his status as a voter at Dominion or provincial elections. What is the essence of the voter's right to vote? First, to be placed on the assessment roll, next, to be placed on the voters' list, and next to vote at a provincial election. All these Acts must be read one into the other and must be read as one Act, although they may be separate in many instances. If that be the case, if he complies by way of residence with the spirit of the local franchise Act, if he fulfils all the conditions of the local Act, then, no oath by the mere fact of his being a resident of another electoral district for the Dominion, but which is within the electoral district for which he is entitled to vote under the provincial Franchise Act, will prevent his right of voting at any election either for the Dominion, which has adopted that franchise, or the local. It seems to me to be perfectly plain that any person who is on the voters' list and is still a resident of the electoral district under the authority of the Ontario Franchise Act cannot, by an oath be prevented from coming forward and voting. What is the oath? The oath is that he is a resident within the electoral district. What is the meaning of the oath? The meaning of the oath, based on the franchise of the province, is, that he is within that electoral district for the province and nothing else. It can have no other meaning. You may read another meaning into it, but it is only reading a meaning into it. I take it that the Election Act has absolutely nothing to do with a man's right to vote. That is entirely to regulate other matters. But, when the voter is on the list and is still in the electoral district for local purposes no oath will alter his condition as a voter at either a provincial or a Dominion election, the Dominion having accepted and adopted the provincial franchise as the franchise for the Dominion. We have no franchise for the Dominion except by adoption. We have a franchise for the local, and it must be a condition of every man's right to vote under local existing circumstances that the local Act cannot be altered in the slightest sense for the Dominion. Take the case of where a man has complied with every condition and has voted at a provincial election. He is met with the oath and told: You cannot vote at a Dominion election because you do not live in the electoral district. His answer is: I have not altered any of the conditions affecting my right to vote. You have adopted the franchise of the province and you have not in any way altered my status as a voter. My condition has not been changed in any sense whatever, and if I have a right to vote in provincial elections, then, by the mere adoption of the Act, you have not altered my status and I have still a right to vote. If we are going to alter it to suit all the conditions, let us make it perfectly plain what the conditions of the voter are. There is no doubt, in my opinion, and it is only the opinion of a layman, that, if a man has the right to vote, the mere adoption of the Franchise Act, simply changing the oath to suit each electoral district, does not alter the status of the voter, and he has still a right to vote.

Mr. SPROULE. As I interpret it, it would mean that the electoral district mentioned in the oath for a Dominion election would mean the electoral district for an election to the House of Commons, while the electoral district mentioned in the oath for a local election would mean the electoral district for a local election.

Mr. CLANCY. No, no.

Mr. SPROULE. Although these are the same words, but coming from a different source, they must be applied to the sort of election which is being held.

Mr. CLANCY. The elector is deprived of his vote. He is still in the electoral district for the local. Surely it is not the intention of the Act to disfranchise the voter. From the fact that it has remained part of the local electoral district under the franchise which you adopt you cannot alter the status of the voter. If the voter has a right to vote at a local election he still has a right to vote at some election. I think my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) catches the point I am endeavouring to make, that you cannot and do not change the status of the voter. He still remains and has complied with every condition of the franchise you are adopting. You are taking away his right, which is not the intention of the Act you are adopting. You are running at cross purposes when you are adopting that Act.

Mr. SPROULE. Do I understand that you are speaking in regard to revising the voters' lists?

Mr. CLANCY. No, that is another thing.

Mr. SPROULE. Then, at an election for either House I do not see why the words would not apply to the electoral district in which the party is voting.

Mr. INGRAM. We have an explanatory clause at the beginning of the Bill, which describes the meaning of the words 'electoral district,' as follows:

The expression 'electoral district' means any place or territorial area in Canada entitled to return a member to serve in the House of Commons.

Mr. CLANCY. My hon. friend (Mr. Ingram) does not catch my point at all.

Mr. INGRAM. If the hon. gentleman will give me time I will explain it. The hon. gentleman says that you are taking away the status of the voter. Nothing of the kind. If the elector has the right to vote in Ontario he must be a resident of the electoral district.

Mr. CLANCY. It says that he must be, and the meaning of it is that he is, a resident of the local and not of the Dominion.

Mr. INGRAM. It means that he must be under the Dominion Elections Act and under the Dominion Franchise Act, applying to the province of Ontario, for instance, he must possess the qualification of being a resident of the electoral district. It is perfectly plain to me, and if a man moves from one municipality which is in the electoral district to another, but outside of the Dominion electoral district, he disfranchises himself. We do not disfranchise him. He disfranchises himself under the law.

Mr. WALLACE. Suppose he remains in the same Dominion election district?

Mr. INGRAM. Then, he is entitled to vote. He still continues to be a resident of the electoral district. For the life of me I cannot see how you can make it plainer than it is.

Mr. CLANCY. Let me suggest a case. Suppose he moves out of the local electoral district he could vote neither in the Dominion nor local election.

Mr. INGRAM. That is right.

Mr. CLANCY. If that be so, it is because he has violated, not the Dominion Act, but the local Act that we adopt and which we cannot change so long as we adopt it.

Mr. INGRAM. We are incorporating in this Dominion Act all the conditions that apply to a voter who comes forward to vote in a local election. We ask him in the oath if he has been continuously a resident in the electoral district and if he is now a resident in the electoral district. It is the same oath as in Ontario, and what more could we do?

Mr. CLANCY. I am not cavilling about the oath at all, but about the right of the voter to vote. I have not evidently been able to make myself clear. It is perfectly apparent that for the reason that he has not changed his condition in the least he should be entitled to vote.

Mr. INGRAM. Has he not moved from one municipality to another?

Mr. CLANCY. Yes, but he is still within the electoral district that entitles him to vote. We are not pretending to give him a vote. All that we do is to adopt such rights as he has under the Ontario Act, and which he will have under our own Act. We ought to settle that question now one way or the other.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Shall this amendment be adopted?

Mr. CLANCY. No, no; we cannot rush this.

The PRIME MINISTER. My hon. friend (Mr. Clancy) will agree with me that there is no possible chance for rushing anything.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. As the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule) has said, the Ontario franchise is residential manhood suffrage, subject to registration. If he is on the electoral list, he must in addition prove that he is a resident if he is challenged. If between the time that the electoral list is prepared and the polling day he moves into another district, he disqualifies himself from voting by his own act. He has no more rights under the Federal than he has under the local law, his position being absolutely the same in both cases. I cannot possibly explain it better than my hon. friend from Grey has done.

Mr. CLANCY. The Solicitor General is too good a lawyer not to see my point. My right hon. friend, the Prime Minister, I am sure, sees it. If we adopt the local franchise for the Federal elections, the man must be deprived of his vote.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Residence is an essential to his right to vote, and if he has no residence in the electoral district for the Dominion he has no more right to vote there than he would have in a local election.

Mr. CLANCY. But the man has not moved in any sense that affected his right to vote in the local. He has not invalidated his right to vote in the provincial elections because he still remains in the local electoral district.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Then he has the right to vote.

Mr. CLANCY. Then you are altering his right to the franchise.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. You do not.

Mr. CLANCY. You do by the oath.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Not at all.

Mr. INGRAM. Suppose a man leaves one municipality that is within the electoral district, and his name is left on the list, and he goes to another in time for the court of revision, and is placed on the voters' list there, would not that give him the right to vote as a resident?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Yes.

Mr. CLANCY.

The PRIME MINISTER. My hon. friend (Mr. Clancy) appealed to me a moment ago if I did not see the point he makes. But it is plain that both sides of the House are against him, and therefore, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) might be satisfied that he is wrong and that the others are right.

Mr. CLANCY. I am perfectly certain that there will be a good deal of confusion as to the right of the voter in the case I have mentioned.

Mr. WALLACE. I would ask the Solicitor General whether he has made provision for the vote of the volunteers in South Africa.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Their absence will not affect their position. If they are on the list they will be entitled to vote.

Mr. WALLACE. I am quite sure that I am safe in saying that there are several hundreds of the volunteers who have come of age since they went to South Africa.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. At the suggestion of the member for West Elgin (Mr. Ingram), the provision is made that those who were qualified to vote, and who were on the list, will not be disqualified by reason of their being absent in South Africa.

Mr. WALLACE. But I am putting another question altogether. I am asking: Will those who have come of age since they went away and who, if they had been here would have been qualified to vote; will they be qualified to vote in the Dominion elections?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. If they are on the list they have the right to vote. But if they are not on the list, then as it now stands, they would not have the right to vote.

Mr. WALLACE. But I say they are not on the list, and cannot be.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. They are absolutely in the same position as any other resident in Canada.

Mr. WALLACE. Take the case of my own son, and I know that hundreds of others are in the same position. He came of age on the 7th of May, 1900, and he cannot be put on the voters' list because he is not in Canada. What are you going to do in a case like that?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I understand my hon. friend (Mr. Wallace) to mean, that assuming the case of a man who was not qualified by reason of his age to vote at the time he left the country for South Africa, but becomes qualified during his absence, and not being a resident, an application cannot be made for him to be put on the list. That is the difficulty. That difficulty has not been considered, but it is proper to consider it. When the Bill is taken up again, I will be able to say what I shall do in that case. The provision now in contemplation is, that those now in South Africa who are qualified to vote shall not have their right to vote impaired by reason of their absence. This difficulty occurs to my mind with reference to the making of the provincial list. We cannot, by our legislation, say who shall have a right to vote under the provincial laws. For instance, if the provincial law requires that a man must be a resident in order to vote, we cannot say that if a man is not a resident he has a right to be put on the list.

Mr. WALLACE. You have done that in other cases. You have declared that men who are not eligible by the local laws shall be eligible to be put on the Dominion list. Therefore, having established the principle that you are not bound by the franchises of the provinces, but may add other names, I say you should follow the same principle in this case with reference to those who are away in South Africa and would have acquired the right, if they were here, to have their names put on. I am sure there are hundreds who will come under this description, and they are of the very class of young men who should not be disfranchised.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The very objection which the Solicitor General has expressed in regard to the power of this parliament to enact legislation to overcome the difficulty indicates the great inconvenience of the federal parliament having its franchise in the hands of the local legislatures. The case which has been referred to is that of a man who, under the sanction of the federal government, has gone to South Africa to fight the battles of the empire; and the hon. gentleman says, very properly, that having handed over our lists to the local legislatures, we are not able to tell them who shall or shall not be put on those lists. If we had kept the matter in our own hands, we could have provided that the men who are fighting in South Africa, and who are qualified to the fullest extent, should be put on the list of voters. But now, the franchise having been handed over to the local legislatures, they dictate to us who are to be put on our lists and who are not to be put on. I think it is one of the great inconveniences and objections to the system which has been adopted.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. My hon. friend has not overlooked the fact that this inconvenience existed from the time of confederation up to 1885, and also in the most intense form at the last general election, when we voted on lists four years old.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. They were our own lists.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. However imperfect they were, we recognized the baby. I presume.

Mr. WALLACE. My attention has been called to the first section of Bill No. 8, proposed by the hon. member for East Elgin (Mr. Ingram). I think that would exactly cover the case. Is there any objection to incorporate that in this Bill?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. That matter has been considerably discussed between the hon. member for East Elgin and the Department of Justice, and we have come to the conclusion that we must make provision for those in South Africa who have the right to vote, so far as their absence disqualifies them from voting; but, the difficulty which we have not been able to cover is, the right to put on the local list those who have not the right to vote under the local law.

Mr. WALLACE. I think section 1 of the Bill of the hon. member for East Elgin covers both cases.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Is my hon. friend aware whether any change has been made in the provincial Acts in that respect? Of course, it would be much more convenient to have that provision made in the law relating to registration than in this law. In my own province we had to consider cases of a similar character, and I remember devising a clause for our provincial Act, which was afterwards incorporated in the Dominion Franchise Act, providing that wherever residence is a matter of importance, the time spent by mariners or fishermen at their occupation away from home or by students at institutions should be counted. I suggested that that provision should be extended to the men in South Africa, and possibly it has been done in my own province. I do not know whether or not it has been done in the province of Ontario.

Mr. WALLACE. It was not.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. When we reach the clause bearing on that point, we will consider the suggestion of the hon. member for West York.

On section 32,

Mr. A. MARTIN (East Queen's, P.E.I.) I wish to call attention to sections 19 and 20. The Solicitor General and the Minister of Marine have laid it down that under this Act there is a fine imposed for any wilful act or omission in violation of it, but there are certain protections thrown around the voter in the Prince Edward Island Act which are not provided in this measure, and which will not be in force unless we make this measure extend to certain clauses in the Prince Edward Island law. For instance, in that law there is a provision preventing the returning officer from allowing any one to interrupt the polling by addressing the electors or by any other mode of proceeding. I would suggest that after the word 'Act' in section 19, the following words be added:

'Or in the Prince Edward Island of the provincial law.' That would punish the election official who refused and neglected to perform, not only any of the obligations required of him by this Act, but also required of him by the Prince Edward Island law.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I considered carefully what my hon. friend has said. These suggestions were adopted some time ago, and I would not like to change them now. I would suggest that the hon. gentleman should propose his amendment on the third reading and we then would consider it. By this measure we do not pretend to adopt all the provisions of every provincial Act, but only such provisions as are necessary in consequence of our having adopted the provincial franchises.

Mr. E. G. PRIOR (Victoria, B.C.) I would like to bring before the House a point with regard to the difference between the provincial lists and federal lists. In some portions of British Columbia, and I believe in some other parts of the Dominion, the boundaries of the provincial electoral districts do not coincide with those of the Dominion electoral districts. In my constituency, for instance, the lines cut off two or three corners of different provincial districts. Who has the authority to make up the lists according to the residence of the voters? When I get my lists, I find that they include the names of hundreds of men who are not in my constituency, though they properly appear on the provincial list. I suppose other gentlemen have the same condition of things in their constituencies.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The returning officer, under section 8 of the Franchise Act, will, in that case, get from the local authorities the lists and divide them according to the constituencies for Dominion purposes.

Mr. PRIOR. But, if that was left to the returning officer, it would be done only a day or two before the election.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. He has to do it immediately. This question has been discussed at length. It is the law now, under section 8 of the Franchise Act, passed two years ago.

On section 23,

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. When we last considered this clause, it was decided that we should make an amendment to provide that no polling division should contain, if practicable, more than 200 voters. I propose to add to the section, that 'so far as possible, no polling divisions shall contain more than 200 electors.'

Mr. McINERNEY. Does not the Franchise Act make it 300?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Section 7 of the Franchise Act provides that there shall not be more than 300, or less than 200. I think perhaps it would be better to follow the language of that Act. I move that after the words 'Dominion election,' in the 38th line, the following words be added: 'as far as possible no polling division shall contain more than 300, and, when practicable, not less than 200 qualified electors' names.

Mr. H. A. POWELL (Westmoreland). In the last Scott Act election that took place in New Brunswick, there was an enormous amount of trouble as to the polling divisions. In some there were as many as a thousand votes. The Liberal papers, such as the Transcript were much stronger in their denunciations than Conservative papers. Under the law as it stood before the Franchise Act—I think it was Mr. Blake who had to do with it—the sheriff divided the electoral list territorially into small sections. That did not work too badly. Under the local Franchise Act, the sheriff grouped them together in a district, and that could be done without very much trouble. But, when there are a thousand votes to be polled in one polling place, it is often very riotous, particularly when there is a good deal of drinking going on.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Have you polling divisions under provincial statute?

Mr. POWELL. Some polls are practically the whole parish. In some cases they are subdivided. In Sackville, for instance, there are two polling subdivisions, one with about 900 and the other with about 200.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. My hon. friend (Mr. Powell) remembers that the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) drafted section 7, especially to meet the New Brunswick case, and I understood that it was drafted in accordance with the provisions of the local Act.

Mr. POWELL. It was, but in the last Scott Act election, it was very bad. I do not wish to take up time, but if it could be done without too much trouble, I would be glad to see an amendment in that respect.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I would suggest that my hon. friend draft an amendment to meet the point, so that we may see exactly what he proposes.

Mr. McINERNEY. Is there a time fixed within which the returning officer has to make the divisions provided for under this section?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. 'Forthwith,' is the term used.

Mr. McINERNEY. Has he to put them in his proclamation?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. If the hon. gentleman will look at section 24, subsection c, and also the form 'E,' he will see how that is provided for.

On section 24,

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. In order to make the point taken by the hon. member for Victoria, N.B., (Mr. Costigan) clear, I propose to add after the word 'him' in subsection c these words: 'Including those fixed under the next preceding section.'

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. INGRAM. Considerable discussion has taken place as to the propriety of creating half a holiday on Dominion election day so that working men generally may have an opportunity to go up and vote. One reason for this amendment is to prevent intimidation as far as possible, and in the next place, to give all electors an opportunity of voting. I presume in case of a half holiday being provided for it would have to be done by proclamation by the Governor General in Council. I would propose an amendment to read like this:

Declaration of a half holiday on said day where a poll is demanded.

I have an amendment to amend form 'E' of the schedule as follows:

In case a poll should be demanded there shall be a half holiday in the forenoon of said polling day in accordance with a proclamation to be issued by His Excellency the Governor General regarding the same, and all persons shall govern themselves accordingly.

One advantage of adopting this half holiday would be to prevent personation. We all know that personation is indulged in more in the forenoon than it is in the afternoon, for the reason that workmen go to their work in the morning at seven o'clock, and usually do not get an opportunity of voting until the noon hour. Personators make a practise of personating that class of electors in the forenoon because the advantages are greater than in the afternoon. I have no objection to making a full holiday on election day, if that is thought desirable, but at least I desire to see a half holiday proclaimed.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. From my standpoint I do not think it is desirable to have a holiday on election day, that is a whole day. I would point out that an amendment has been suggested by the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) to section 52, that in all cities and towns having a population of 10,000 and over, the poll should be open at seven o'clock in the morning. My intention is not to go quite so far as the member for Montmorency, but to make a provision that the polls should be open at eight o'clock in the morning, and by that means give the workmen an opportunity of voting in the morning. We can consider that question when we reach section 52, but certainly at present I do not think that we can give a half holiday. It would cause an interference in arrangement between the employer and his employees.

Mr. WALLACE. I do not think that the evils the Solicitor General fears are likely to occur. In the province of Ontario we have the civic elections all over the province on New Year's Day, which is a public holiday, and no trouble has ever arisen therefrom. On the contrary it is on that day that the largest vote is polled. I would strongly urge, not a whole holiday, but at least that some part of the day should be given up during which every voter should be free and independent of his employers.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Do you propose that he should be paid for that time?

Mr. WALLACE. I am not so particular about that. My idea would be that the day's work for all classes should end, say, at two o'clock in the afternoon, and that the rest of the day should constitute a full day's work.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The difficulty there is that we would be interfering with contracts in the provinces. Of course I recognize that we have a right to declare a holiday.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. But why compel a master to pay men for hours that they do not work? That is the point.

Mr. WALLACE. Then let the day's work end at two o'clock, and let the question of compensation be adjudicated upon in other ways. I think it is of the utmost importance that the elector should have the privilege of voting freely on that day and should be given sufficient opportunity to do so. Every one in this parliament has had experience of the difficulty of getting men out to vote. In some cases this difficulty is with the employer, and in other cases the employee has difficulty in getting away from his work where, perhaps, he has charge of running machinery. It is inconvenient to workmen to rush them all up to vote between the hours of twelve and one. One hour is little enough for a man to get his dinner. There is always a great difficulty, and I say that we should fix some hours in the day. I am not particular which hours are selected, but it looks to me as if from two o'clock to six o'clock would be the most convenient time for electors, and the most suitable for business, workmen losing as little time as possible in order to record their votes. I would strongly urge the necessity of setting apart some time when men could stop work, and go and record their votes. It is necessary that something should be done. The evils are growing year after year. With such a large amount of machinery, men cannot leave their machines long enough to go out and vote. A large number of people say: We cannot let our men go out. The men, perhaps, are on the other side of politics from their employers. Every member of parliament has met with these difficulties, and we would be acting not only in our interest, but in the interest of the free and independent electors of the country, by affording them some opportunity for recording their votes. This is not a party measure, because it works both ways. I think it is a very great satisfaction to every member of parliament to know that every vote in his constituency has been recorded, or that the employees in his constituency have been given an opportunity of going out and recording their votes. We are legislating on this very matter, and here is a way to meet the difficulty which has been an acknowledged difficulty, which has been one of the great troubles of members of parliament, candidates and organizations, because they have been unable to bring out the vote on election day, owing to the inability of men to get away from their employments. Let us set apart a time, say four hours during which no employer or combination of any kind shall prevent an elector from recording his vote and doing his duty. It is a solemn duty that I think every person should be compelled to perform. I almost believe in compulsory voting. When you confine the franchise to a quarter or one-fifth of the population you should compel them to perform their duty. You have declared that it is the duty of every man to record his vote, and you have given him facilities for doing so, but you have stopped short of giving him an opportunity of getting out to record his vote without being under the thralldom and control of his employer or any other controlling influence. The employer has no right to prevent any man from having an opportunity of walking up to the polls and recording his vote.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I agree with a good deal that the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) has said, and I suppose most of the committee would like to attain the object he has in view. But, there are difficulties, some of which are inherent to the subject-matter, and the others arise out of our constitutional limitations which surround this subject, and which make it somewhat difficult equitably to carry out this idea. The idea of compulsory voting is one which deserves consideration, but the idea of compulsory idleness, and of compelling tens of thousands of workmen to remain idle for half a day is a different thing. If the hon. gentleman says that he does not propose to compel them to remain idle, but that he proposes to compel the masters to pay them when they are idle, then, he is infringing a provincial law.

Mr. WALLACE. I do not propose to do that.

Mr. WALLACE.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Then, if the hon. gentleman proposes to compel the workmen to remain idle without pay, he will find a mighty protest coming from the workmen of this country who cannot afford to give up half a day and lounge around the streets.

Mr. WALLACE. Let them work from seven in the morning until two in the afternoon. There is no half day lost then. They are working seven hours out of the nine hours that constitute a day's work, and therefore, there would not be more than a quarter of a day lost.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. You have not the power in this parliament to declare what shall be a day's work. In so far as anything incidentally necessary to voting is concerned, we have the power to legislate upon that. But, when you propose to say that a man shall not work for half a day, and that he shall be paid, you are infringing on a provincial law. Now, there is a good deal in what the hon. gentleman says in regard to the desirability of workmen having an opportunity to record their votes, but, I think that might be better considered when we come to take up the suggestion of the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain). The idea is to so fix the polling hours that a workman shall have the right and privilege of going up and polling his vote without interfering with his hours of labour. We do not want to compel any man to remain idle, and we do not want to compel the master to pay him when he is idle. If you compel the workman to remain idle, or if you compel the master to pay him when he is idle, you will do an injustice to either one or the other, which I do not think this parliament would be willing to do. I think, when we consider the amendment of the hon. member for Montmorency, because this difficulty only applies to large cities, we can meet the situation.

Mr. INGRAM. I cannot see that we are compelling workmen to remain idle or that we are compelling the employer to pay them if there is a proclamation issued that there shall be a half holiday. There are many shops and factories that would not close up because employers and men would mutually agree that the men should have time to go out and vote. I have known, in some cases, manufacturers to close up their works for a few minutes and say to the men: Go out and vote, and then come back to work. The idea of the proposal before the committee is to compel employers who will not allow their employees to go out and vote because they will vote against their personal interest, to have an opportunity of going to the polls. If the government declares a half holiday, and any employee wishes to go out and vote, he may do so. I do not say for a moment that we should compel the employer to pay the workman when he is idle, and I do not think that the workman would want anything of the kind.

Mr. PRIOR. Is there not a penalty now applicable to an employer who prevents his employee from voting?

Mr. INGRAM. There is, but it is disregarded.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The proposition is to declare a half holiday, the workman losing his pay?

Mr. INGRAM. Yes, if he wishes it.

Mr. POWELL. Declaring a public holiday would not help the thing at all. It is not bound to be observed. It has only to be observed by public officials, but it would not interfere with private contracts between employer and employee.

Mr. A. W. PUTTEE (Winnipeg). There has been a pretty general feeling expressed that there should be some definite free time provided in which men could poll their votes. The hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) has given notice of an amendment providing for the opening of the polls at seven o'clock in the morning. I have also on the Notice paper an amendment proposing to extend the hour of voting in cities of ten thousand and over, to eight o'clock in the evening. We are both trying to get at the same result, to get some free time on election day. Opening of the poll at seven o'clock, as the hon. member for Montmorency proposes, or at eight o'clock as the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) proposes, does not give the required freedom. I do not think it would be advisable even because it would be completely unnecessary to open the poll at such an hour in the morning as either of these suggested. It seems to me that the object would be better accomplished by extending the hours of polling in cities of over 10,000 to eight o'clock in the evening, the same as is done in Great Britain. It appears to me that the suggestion for a half holiday is far better than either of these proposed amendments. I do not think the morning would be the preferable time to make the half holiday, because it is the hardest time to get it observed. But when the Governor General or the lieutenant-governors in this country proclaim a holiday, I have noticed they are pretty generally observed, and I believe that would be sufficient. I am sure that such a half holiday would be well observed at first, and afterwards it would be as generally observed as our half holidays usually are. That is as much as I expect to get. There are some places where employers do not want to give their men an opportunity to vote, and if a half holiday were proclaimed, their intention would be obvious. If the employer refused to give the half holiday under such circumstances, it would make the employer's object very plain, and not many men would like to be known as doing such a thing as that. I believe we should include in the Act that a half holiday should be given on election day. If we cannot get that, the amendment to extend the hours to eight p.m. will, in my opinion, be better than to extend the hours in the morning.

Mr. FIRMAN McCLURE (Colchester). I would be inclined to agree with the member for Winnipeg (Mr. Puttee), that workmen should have an opportunity to vote in the evening, but from my knowledge of the conduct of elections in the maritime provinces, I would not be in favour of a half holiday on election day. I do not think there is any grievance there, as to people not having an opportunity to vote. My experience is that on election day, in our villages and towns, very good order is observed, and I am afraid that might not be so if a half holiday were declared. I think the evils resultant from a half holiday would be greater than the benefits that would be conferred.

Mr. A. T. WOOD (Hamilton). I am opposed to anything in the shape of a half holiday on election day. The fact of the matter is, that in large cities, such as I have the honour to represent—

Mr. FOSTER. Where is that?

Mr. WOOD. The hon. gentleman knows it very well. He has spent many a happy day there, but, perhaps, he would not be so cordially received now. As a matter of fact, there is scarcely any manufacturer in Hamilton who is not quite willing to allow his men the right to vote, but, to stop the whole machinery of all our works for a day would be a great inconvenience. I presume the matter could be arranged in some different way than by shutting down the machinery in all our large manufactories in the Dominion. In my opinion, it would be a great mistake to have a half holiday on election day.

Mr. WALLACE. I am surprised to find from all parts of the House such objections to the stoppage of mere machinery. Election day takes place once every five years.

Mr. McCLURE. The by-elections may take place every year.

Mr. WALLACE. My contention is, that if a man works until two o'clock in the afternoon, he has performed, we will say, seven hours work, and that might be regarded as a day's work, which in the ordinary course would be ten hours. To say that three hours less than an ordinary day would interfere with the manufactories of the country once in five years, so as to let the citizens of Canada perform their most sacred duty of voting, is, to my mind, absurd. The Liberals contend that if the full vote of the people were given they could swamp the Tories, and we on this side contend that if the full vote were polled the Liberals would have no chance to be in power. Therefore, both political parties must be in favour of the idea of getting out the full vote, and there is no political reason opposed to the proposition now before the House. Some people go so far as to say it should be compulsory to vote, and if we provide that every voter shall have an opportunity to vote and discharge his solemn duty, I do not see what objection there can be to it. We who have run elections know the difficulty there is to get men to leave their work in order to go to the polls, and if we give them an opportunity of doing so, I do not see how any one can object to it.

Mr. G. R. MAXWELL (Burrard). We can all agree with the hon. member (Mr. Wallace) that we should do everything in our power to get the full vote polled. I will give my own experience. In 1896, there was a pretty general feeling among the manufacturers of this country that the success of the Liberal party would be detrimental to their interests, and the fact that many manufacturers were opposed to their Liberal employees voting was one of the difficulties I had to contend with. I, therefore, sympathize very strongly with the proposition to give the workingmen a full and free right to record their votes. At the last provincial elections in British Columbia the poll opened at eight in the morning and closed at eight in the afternoon, and so far as I have heard, that gave every satisfaction to the workingmen. I think I am right in saying that the workingmen of British Columbia polled a larger vote than they ever polled before in that province.

On section 38,

Mr. INGRAM. This has to do with the withdrawal of a candidate. I suggest that that be amended by providing that the candidate shall have forty-eight hours after his nomination within which to withdraw. I see no good reason why a man should go to the polls when he has not the slightest idea of winning the election. If he intends to withdraw, every person should know it within forty-eight hours after the nomination, and the country should not be put to the expense of printing ballot papers, etc., just for the fun of the thing.

On section 41,

Mr. CLANCY. I would like to know whether it is proposed to furnish the candidates with copies of the Act and instructions, as well as the officers. I think the candidates should be supplied as well as the officers.

Mr. INGRAM. I understand that each candidate is to be supplied with twenty copies of the electoral list. Does that apply also to the registration list, which is not returned until the eve of the election?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. If the lists were prepared in time, of course, the candidates would be entitled to them. The Franchise Act provides that copies of the electoral lists shall be furnished to each candidate.

Mr. INGRAM. Take a constituency in which there is a city with registration, while outside of the city there is none. Does the government furnish twenty copies of the registration list as well as the electoral list outside?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I do not find provision for the point raised by the hon. gentleman.

On section 48.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I want to draw attention to an amendment suggested by my hon. friend from Montmorency. He suggested that section 48 be amended by adding thereto:

The ballot papers shall be bound or stitched so as to form a book and be numbered on the counterfoils by the printer from No. 1 to 350.

Mr. POWELL. The difficulty is this: That in most country printing offices, there is no numbering machine.

Mr. ELLIS. The hon. gentleman is quite correct in that.

Mr. POWELL. Could not the ballots be printed in blank at the office here, and numbered with the numbering machines and then sent loose to the local returning officers to have the names of the candidates printed in the blanks?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The difficulty would be that if the ballots are to be numbered, they must be stitched together in a book, so as to have the numbers consecutive, and the names cannot be printed in while they are stitched.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. This is a suggestion made by my hon. friend from Montmorency and it is my duty to submit it to the committee. I understand what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Casgrain) wants, and, if my hon. friend from Three Rivers (Sir Adolphe Caron) objects to it, perhaps I can explain it?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. My objection is that I do not see how it can be carried out. There are hon. gentlemen here who know a great deal more about the printing craft than does the hon. member for Montmorency, and they say that in most cases it will be impossible to carry out the suggestion. This is an objection which should carry weight.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. But I cannot see why it is impossible to carry out the suggestion. The suggestion is that the ballot papers should be bound or stitched so as to form a book, and numbered on the counterfoil by the printer from 1 to 250. The difficulty seems to be that they may not have a machine to print the numbers consecutively.

Mr. FOSTER. How long would it take a man to number them?

Mr. R. HOLMES (West Huron). If I may be allowed a word. I can speak so far as the Ontario ballots are concerned.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. HOLMES. I suppose I am an authority on that. The Ontario ballots are supplied by the department at Toronto and numbered on one side, and the reverse side, of course, is blank. These ballots are sent to the printing office in county town where the election is to be held or to some other printing office and they are printed on the face with the name of the respective candidates and the name of the riding. The Dominion government could print in its own office beforehand a large number of ballots, and put them up in pads of say 250, numbered seriatim. That would not be difficult, it would not entail much labour. The printing here could be done at any time. Any country printing office would be able to print them, but every country office would not be able to print them with numbers seriatim. It would be a simple matter to have the ballots prepared at any time and kept in stock here, and then, as they are required, send them to the returning officers with instructions to have whatever printing needs to be done in the locality.

Mr. CLANCY. Is the number to be put on the ballot?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. No, on the counterfoil; it is simply to know that the returning officer accounts for all the ballots he receives.

Mr. INGRAM. Has the Solicitor General thought out the form of ballot to be used?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I will adhere to the form published in the schedule. If there is any objection to it, I would like to know what it is. The disc has not proven a success.

Mr. INGRAM. I think the difficulty is not in the disc so much as in the fact that in the form 'L,' the voter is given instructions as to voting, but there is no illustration of the form of ballot used as it should be marked. If the form of ballot were published for the instruction for the guidance of voters put up in the polling booth, the elector would see exactly how he is supposed to mark his ballot. The form of ballot given in the schedule offers too much scope for collusion.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. In what respect does it offer more than the disc?

Mr. INGRAM. There is too much blank space about the name. We know that it has been the practice to some extent in some districts to direct a voter to mark his ballot in a given way—for instance, to put the cross under or over a given initial of the candidate's name. Finding a ballot marked in that way you know pretty well that the voter has voted as he agreed to do. Say there are only three votes arranged for in each of the forty polling divisions—that gives 120 votes which you can pay for and be pretty sure that the goods have been delivered. This allows too great scope for bribery. If it were provided that the disc ballot should be used and that the voter should put his cross in the disc, there would be less chance for that kind of thing.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. My hon. friend (Mr. Ingram) is aware, that with the disc ballot, it has been held that if the cross is in the white space around the name of the candidate, it is a good ballot. There is thus as much chance for the practice he refers to in the disc ballot as in the other. What I propose is to provide that the voter shall put his mark in the space to the right of the candidate's name.

Mr. INGRAM. Very well, make it so that the ballot shall be good only when it is marked in the space to the right of the name.

Mr. PRIOR. Why not have the disc?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. We have had some experience with the disc and have come to the conclusion that it is practically unworkable.

Mr. McNEILL. I would suggest to the Solicitor General that there should be a light perpendicular line to the right of the name on the ballot, and the ballot to be marked outside of that.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. At first sight that suggestion appears to me to commend itself. Then we might amend that section which provides that the cross should be put to the right of the perpendicular line in the question.

Mr. McNEILL. My hon. friend behind me (Mr. Cochrane), says they had that in the Ontario ballot at one time, and found it did not work.

Mr. SPROULE. Yes, and it was held by the judges on a recount that no matter which side of this line the cross was put, it was good as long as it was inside the white space.

Mr. COCHRANE. I understood the Solicitor General to say in connection with these ballots, that they should be numbered from 1 up to 250. I understand the law provides that you can have a polling subdivision containing 300 names.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The intention is to have the books in convenient form so that if there are 300 votes, you give two books instead of giving only one. From 1 to 350, would make the book too bulky. It is simply a matter of convenience for the deputy returning officer.

Mr. ELLIS. How are these ballots to be numbered? In countries distant from cities where there are no numbering machines, by whom are the numbers to be put on? Are they to be written, and if so, by the returning officer, or the deputy, or by whom?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The amendments provide that they are to be numbered by the printer. He can number them by a machine or otherwise.

Mr. INGRAM. What is the conclusion as to the class of the ballot we are to have?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I intend to advise the form of ballot we have in the schedule, with the understanding that we are to amend section 70—if that is the section—to the effect that the cross shall be to the right of the name, and in the instructions to be issued, provision will be made also that the cross will be to the right of the name.

On section 60,

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Subsection 2 refers to Prince Edward Island, and I want to make it conform to the words of the Island statute. I propose to add, after the word 'district,' in the 40th line:

Mr. McNEILL. I would suggest to the Solicitor General—I do not know whether this is the best place to do it—the advisability of having the counterfoils initialled, not only by the deputy returning officer, but by the agents of the candidates. That will prevent what is alleged to be so often done, the bringing in of a ballot which is really a bogus ballot, and substituting it for a properly initialled ballot at the time of voting. It would make it much more difficult to perpetrate fraud.

Mr. SPROULE. If there were three candidates, and in some cities, where they run together, there might be five or six candidates, you would have to put the initials of the agents of all these candidates in one column, which would be very inconvenient.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (reading):

Every elector qualified to vote for the electoral district in which he resides shall vote in such district in the electoral division, or in case such electoral division is subdivided, in the polling district thereof in which he resides and not elsewhere.

In connection with this I wish to point out that I omitted to mention to the Soli-

tor General that the following should be added to the section, being the section of the provincial Act:

Every elector qualified to vote in an electoral district in which he does not reside, shall vote in the electoral division, or in case the electoral division is subdivided, in the polling district thereof in which the property on which he claims to vote for such electoral district is situated and not elsewhere.

I am following the phraseology of the provincial Act to avoid difficulty.

Mr. MARTIN. Perhaps the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries will tell us where the clause, as it stands, falls short?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There is no provision made in the Bill as to where a non-resident shall vote.

Amendment agreed to.

On section 52,

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Before we proceed further, I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that I omitted to state that the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) suggested that we should amend section 52 by adding subsections 52a and 52b. His amendment was that 52a should be added, which provides: That in cities or towns having a population exceeding 10,000 souls, the polls should be opened at seven in the morning, and from that hour until nine in the morning, workmen, artisans, and employees being voters, should have the precedence in voting. That is the suggestion.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. How could you distinguish? A man might come up and say he was an artisan, and the discussion over whether he was or not would take more than an hour to settle the question.

Mr. FOSTER. That could be arranged by the government making a table of precedence.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I would not undertake to legislate as to that. I think, however, the time has come when all interested in the workingman's vote should deal with that difficulty.

Mr. FOSTER. I should like to see the time of voting advanced in the morning by at least one hour. I do not see why they should not commence at eight o'clock. I know it would be very convenient in a great many cases.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. For my part I should like to see the rule adopted which provides that the polls should be open at eight in the morning and remain open until eight at night.

Mr. McINERNEY. There is an objection to beginning so early in the morning, and that is the difficulty of getting your agents at the polling places so early.

Mr. PUTTEE. It is absurd to bring in some of those amendments providing for the right of the workingman to vote. If the polls open at seven or eight in the morning and remain open until eight or nine in the evening, that would settle the whole business.

Mr. SPROULE. If you open as early as eight in the morning, some of those connected with the elections would have to start out the night before.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Nine o'clock is early enough.

Mr. INGRAM. I think nine o'clock is quite early enough, considering everything.

Mr. McALISTER. The objection to the present hour is, that in my county there are quite a number of electors who have a vote in Bonaventure County, and if the poll opened at eight o'clock they could take the train to Bonaventure to record their votes, otherwise they could not.

Mr. ELLIS. What about the principle of one man one vote?

Mr. McALISTER. Surely he could have one vote in the province of New Brunswick and another in the province of Quebec?

Mr. WALLACE. I do not think the poll should open before nine o'clock. If the poll were opened before seven o'clock, when the workingman goes to vote, there would be some argument in favour of it. But, to open at eight o'clock would not be any better than the present hour, so far as the workingman is concerned. We find that it is very difficult to get our agents to the poll before nine o'clock, winter and summer. If there is one reason that can be given why the poll should open at eight o'clock rather than nine o'clock, I would be in favour of it, but I do not see that it would help any section of the community. To keep the polls open until eight o'clock at night is a very good suggestion, but the rascalities which have been exposed recently as taking place between nine o'clock in the morning and five o'clock in the afternoon are such that the temptations would be increased if you keep the poll open after five p.m. and until eight p.m. You would have the people interested subject to a strain of twelve hours, and as they would have to obey the demands of nature in getting their meals, the keeping of them for so long a time at a stretch in the polls would exhaust them physically and mentally, and the opportunities for wrong-doing on the part of those who wish to commit wrong would be increased. I believe that if you allow the workingmen to get off at three o'clock in the afternoon it would be a far better way. That would not be too much to ask in five years.

An hon. MEMBER. Four years.

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, I am ready to predict it will only be four years this time.

Mr. SPROULE. If I hire a man to do a certain amount of work for the day, I do not see you can interfere with the contract by declaring that he shall not work after three o'clock in the afternoon.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I think the right thing is to leave it as it is, so far as country districts are concerned, but in cities to have the poll kept open, as it is in England, till eight o'clock. At present, the workingmen have only the dinner hour. I would like to have every workingman perfectly independent, so that he could put in his honest day's work, and then have those two extra hours in which to record his vote without being under any obligation to his employer.

Mr. WALLACE. Give the opportunity to everybody.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). In the country districts it would be absurd.

Mr. INGRAM. To cities of what size would you apply that?

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). That would have to be a matter for consideration. I am only speaking for the principle. Some twelve or fifteen years ago it was adopted in England, and now nobody would think of going back on it. It was tried in the local elections in British Columbia, and proved a success.

Mr. CLANCY. Is there a general complaint in cities?

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I do not know that men do complain, but I do know that men have been put to a great deal of inconvenience. A large number of employers give their men a couple of hours at noon in which to vote; but the men have to depend on the clemency of their employers to get that. I want the employee to be perfectly independent.

Mr. McNEILL. While the proposal of my hon. friend has much to commend it, I am very much afraid it is a dangerous proposal to make at the present time. I think it would give an opportunity for fraud and corruption at the very time of the day when it would be most difficult to discover it. There is a great deal of force in much of what my hon. friend has said; but I should prefer to see an arrangement made such as that proposed by the hon. member for West York, by which the men would have from three o'clock.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). This parliament cannot do that. It is a matter of contract.

Mr. McNEILL. I cannot imagine that this parliament has not the power to deal with a matter of that kind. My impression is that an employer cannot prevent his employee going to vote.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. He can dismiss him if he does.

Mr. McNEILL. Do you mean to say that this parliament has not power to deal with a matter of that kind?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do.

Mr. McNEILL. I should like to get the opinion of the Privy Council on the question whether this parliament has not the right to make a regulation to enable the citizens of this country to discharge the highest function they possess.

Mr. WALLACE. I think that is the root of the whole matter, that this parliament has the power to enable a citizen to perform that duty. What do we do with regard to hotels? We do not grant the hotel-keeper a license; the local legislature grants him his license, and all his powers and privileges; but the Dominion parliament comes in and tells him that he must close his hotel from six o'clock on the morning of election day till seven o'clock on the following morning.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). That is his contract, when he gets his license.

Mr. WALLACE. It is nothing of the kind. He makes no such contract.

The PRIME MINISTER. That comes under the general power to make laws for the good government of the country.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). That is part of the contract—that they can make any laws governing him.

Mr. WALLACE. The local legislature, in giving him a license to sell liquor, may impose any conditions they choose. One of the conditions they impose is that he shall not sell liquor on the day of a provincial election. They do not say that with reference to a Dominion election. We have that power ourselves, and we require every hotel keeper, in the interest of good government, as the hon. First Minister says, to close his hotel on election day. Is it not equally in the interest of good government that every man in this country shall have the right to vote and the opportunity of voting?

Mr. INGRAM. The hon. gentleman for Guysborough placed great stress on having the polls kept open in cities of a certain size until eight o'clock in the evening. But we know that taking the small cities as a portion of the electoral district, the people know pretty well how the vote has gone outside, and when they have had an opportunity of counting that up at five o'clock, they are placed in the position of being able to report to the cities that the vote has gone a certain way so that those interested in the cities may do their best to carry the election the other way. In British Columbia, the law applies to the rural parts as well as to the cities so that the case is different there.

The proposition of the hon. member for West York is impracticable. You may have the power to create half a holiday or a holiday, but cannot go beyond that, and the only way to get over the difficulty would be to declare a holiday or half holiday and let the people use their own discretion whether they will enjoy it or not.

The PRIME MINISTER. We must come to a conclusion on this, and there is a good deal to be said on both sides. On the whole, I think the law has worked in this respect pretty satisfactorily. It is not perfect, but I have not heard very serious complaint, and until better advised we should leave the law as it is.

The committee rose and reported progress.

JUDGES OF PROVINCIAL COURTS.

Resolution respecting the judges of provincial courts read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. FOSTER. I wish it to be understood that in carrying this resolution there is no assent to the principle on this side.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I will move the House into committee on the Bill on Tuesday when the members from Quebec will be present.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 189) to amend the Act respecting the judges of provincial courts.—(Mr. Fitzpatrick.)

ADJOURNMENT—IMPERIAL DEFENCE.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. A. McNEILL (North Bruce). I beg to call attention to an item in the Globe of yesterday morning concerning a matter of very great importance, namely, the proceedings at the great conference now being held in London, and which is attended by delegates from all parts of the empire, dealing with trade matters. The cable despatch reads:

The Montreal resolution in favour of a conference on Imperial defence and suggesting a uniform ad valorem import duty as the best method for all portions of the empire to contribute, was carried, there being only one dissentient.

The House will see that at that conference the principle of preferential trade was approved with only one dissentient.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 5.50 p. m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, July 2, 1900.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Eleven o'clock.

PRAYERS.

INQUIRY FOR RETURNS.

Mr. JAMES CLANCY (Bothwell). Mr. Speaker, before you proceed to the Orders of the Day, I want to ask the Minister of Railways and Canals for some papers in regard to the Galops Canal channel. I see he is not in his place.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). If the hon. gentleman asks the question, I will draw the minister's attention to it when he comes in.

Mr. CLANCY. I want the offer of the Gilbert Bros. Engineering Company of the 26th September, 1892; the offer of the same company of the 22nd October, 1892, the 31st May, 1897, and the 12th June, 1897; the offer of E. E. Gilbert & Son, which was amended by the offer of the 22nd October, 1892; the offer of Mr. Gilbert or his company to add a torpedo drill scow to the list of the plant; the recommendation of Mr. Rubidge, the superintending engineer, of the acceptance of the offer of the Gilbert Bros. Engineering Company to reduce the bottom of the canal to the original grade or any further depth required; the contracts with the Gilbert Bros. Engineering Company—there must have been two of them; reports of Mr. Rubidge previous to the 22nd October, 1892, that a properly equipped dredging and blasting plant be placed in the channel; also, the date of the letter of Mr. Rubidge.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 176), to incorporate the South Shore Line Railway.—(Mr. Flint.)

TIMAGAMI RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. McHUGH moved:

That the first amendment made by the Senate to Bill (No. 118) respecting the Timagami Railway Company be disagreed to, because the person named in the amendment is unknown to the promoters of the said Bill.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think the Senate placed the name of a director in the charter without the consent of the promoters.

Mr. FOSTER. Is it a good name?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. It is a good French name—Chabot.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. McHUGH moved:

That the said amendment be disagreed to, for the following reasons:

277½

1. Because it would render it utterly impossible for the promoters of the Bill to make adequate financial arrangements for carrying out the scheme, owing to the great engineering difficulties that would have to be encountered in the construction of a railway between the points named in the measure and Lake Timagami.

2. Because a feasible line has been already surveyed between Sturgeon Falls and said lake—as shown by the surveyor's report—thus connecting the settlements in that section of the country lying north of the Canadian Pacific Railway with the thriving and rapidly growing town of Sturgeon Falls, where good markets will be found for such produce as the settlers may be able to dispose of, instead of connecting them with the unimportant and still unincorporated village of Verner.

3. Because the promoters have reasonable assurance that capital can be obtained to construct the railway provided the Bill is passed in the original form asked by the promoters.

4. Because the said promoters have already had a charter for two years with a starting point 'at or near Verner,' and have found themselves unable to induce capitalists to invest their money in the construction of a railway on that proposed line.

5. Because it is of the greatest importance to the settlers of that section of the country that they be provided with a railway at the earliest possible moment.

Motion agreed to.

ST. JEROME, CHICOUTIMI WHARF.

Mr. CASGRAIN (by Mr. Macdonald, King's, P.E.I.) asked:

1. Did Louis Desbiens, of St. Jérôme, in the county of Chicoutimi, sell lumber for the building of the wharf at that place?

2. If so, how many pieces, or feet, and at what price?

3. How much per day did he get for the board of M. Blais, engineer and builder of the said wharf, and what is the total amount paid him under that head, or payable to him in virtue of accounts rendered?

4. Have any other sums of money been paid to him, or are any such sums to be paid him, in virtue of accounts rendered; if so, to what amount and for what?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). 1. Yes. 2. 769 feet tamarack, 9 x 10, at 7 cents, $53.83; 2,811 feet tamarack, 10 x 14, at 12 cents, $337.32; 4,403 feet tamarack, 10 inches diameter, at 7 cents, $308.21; 188 feet tamarack, 8 inches diameter, at 5 cents, $9.40; 20 planks, 12 x 9 x 3, at 30 cents, $6.00; total, $714.76. 3. $1.00 per day for thirty-two days; $32.00. 4. $75.00 for timber.

Mr. CASGRAIN (by Mr. Macdonald, King's, P.E.I.) asked:

1. How many persons named Gauthier were employed in the construction of the wharf at St. Jérôme, in the county of Chicoutimi?

2. What is the total amount paid to each of them and for how many days?

3. How much was paid per ton for the stone used in the said wharf?

4. What price was paid for the iron used in the work, and from whom was it bought?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). 1. Four. 2. Ludger Gauthier, 8 days, at $1.00, $8.00 ; Arthur Gauthier, 22 days, at $1.00, $22.00 ; Johnny Gauthier, 22 days, as carpenter, at $1.50, $33.00 ; Anastase Gauthier, 9 days, at $1.00, $9.00. 3. $6.00 per toise. 4. 6 cents per pound ; from Joseph Singlelais.

Mr. CASGRAIN (by Mr. Macdonald, King's, P.E.I.) asked :

1. Did one Joseph Bilodeau work at the wharf at St. Jérôme, in the county of Chicoutimi ?
2. If so, how many days, at what price, and in what capacity ?
3. How much money was paid him out of the grant for the wharf, and for what service ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). 1. Yes. 2. Twenty-nine days, at $1.50 per day, as driver, with use of his own horse and cart. 3. $43.50.

PORTS OF ALBERTON AND TIGNISH.

Mr. MARTIN asked :

The number of wagons and carriages entered at the ports of Alberton and Tignish, in Prince Edward Island, for the fiscal years 1897, 1898 and 1899, to include buggies, farm wagons and bicycles. The value of each and the amount of duty paid ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). In reply I beg to say :

ALBERTON.

Fiscal years ending 30th June.

	1897.	1898.	1899.
Farm wagons .....
Other carriages—
Number .. .. .	1

THE ALIEN LABOUR ACT.

Mr. PUTTEE asked :

Has the Department of Justice recently ordered the deportation of some workmen from the town of Welland, Ont., to the United States ?

If so, was the deportation ordered under the provisions of the Act to restrict the importation and employment of aliens ?

Were such workmen citizens of the United States ?

If not, what were the grounds of such deportation ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The Department of Justice gave orders to put the Alien Labour Act in force in the town of Welland against certain workmen imported against the law from the United States. The government is not aware if they were American citizens or simply aliens under the American law.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

ELECTION ACT—AMENDMENT AND CONSOLIDATION.

The House again resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 133) 'An Act to consolidate and amend the law relating to the Election of Members of the House of Commons.'—(Mr. Fitzpatrick.)

(In the Committee.)

On section 64,

Mr. G. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.) What is the meaning of subsection 4 of this section ? It reads :

If in any polling division whereby (or under) the provincial law no list of voters is required or provided, he is found qualified, he shall be entitled to vote.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). This is intended to apply to Prince Edward Island. There are no provincial lists there. When a man makes an application to vote, he is required to produce his qualification, and the returning officer decides whether he shall vote or not.

Mr. A. B. INGRAM (East Elgin). According to subsection 3 :

If the elector's name is found on the list of voters of the polling district, of the polling station, he shall be entitled to vote.

But in Ontario and British Columbia we have men on the voters' list who are residents in other parts of the Dominion, and therefore not entitled, under the laws of these provinces, to vote. I would suggest this amendment :

That the following words be added : Except in any provinces where manhood franchise is in force, when such voter shall be subject to the provisions of the Manhood Franchise Act in such province.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I propose to introduce the following amendment, which will, I think, meet the case. It will make the clause read as follows :

If the elector's name is found on the list of voters for the polling district of the polling station, he shall be entitled to vote subject to provisions hereinafter mentioned.

That is to say, subject to the provisions with regard to the oath as to residents. Then I intend to amend subsection 5, so as to make it necessary that the oath shall be taken as to residence.

Amendment (Mr. Fitzpatrick) agreed to.

On subsection 4.

Mr. A. MARTIN (East Queen's, P.E.I.). I think we should strike out the word 'found' in this subsection.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I cannot agree to that.

Mr. MARTIN. I do not see that there is any necessity for this word in the clause. In Prince Edward Island judicial powers are conferred on the returning officer. Either a voter is qualified or not qualified.

But to provide that if he is found qualified may make his vote dependent rather on the returning officer than on his qualification. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) seems to object to the amendment. The extraordinary powers conferred on the deputy returning officers in Prince Edward Island may be a great advantage to his party. I move to amend that this word 'found' be struck out of that section.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I do not think the finding of the returning officer would be at all conclusive. If he happens to be wrong, if the returning officer allows votes that he should not allow, they are thrown out on the recount. I do not think there is serious objection to that word. If the returning officer decides that the vote is to go in subject to the objection and it is recorded it can be made the subject of scrutiny by a judge.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I would make this remark upon all these Prince Edward Island sections. We set apart one day entirely for their discussion and the committee decided them finally, as I supposed, and what is the sense of going over again the same discussion on the same points? In this case if a man comes up to vote on a statute labour certificate he must produce it, and the returning officer must say whether it is such certificate or not; therefore, he must 'find' whether the man is entitled to vote or not.

Mr. FOSTER. Supposing he has not the statute labour certificate, are you going to make the partisan returning officer the judge, without evidence, as to whether that man has a right to vote?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That has always been the case. I have seen hundreds of cases where a man comes up with a wrong certificate. The returning officer says to him that he has not the proper certificate, and the man is turned back.

Mr. FOSTER. Suppose he comes up with none.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Then he cannot vote; the law says he cannot vote.

Mr. MARTIN. Suppose he comes up with the right one and the returning officer says he cannot vote?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. You cannot help that, on a scrutiny the man's vote would be put in. But I never knew in my experience of a returning officer rejecting one improperly.

Mr. FOSTER. Who is it that gives this certificate?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The road overseer.

Mr. FOSTER. Suppose the road overseer objects, or refuses to give the certificate?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There is a penalty.

Mr. FOSTER. This is a wonderful condition of things. In the first place, the man comes up, and there is no list, and he must have a certificate from the road master. The man shows the certificate, and the partisan returning officer may say, I do not recognize that certificate, I will not allow you to vote. If he does not have that certificate the deputy returning officer may say, 'Well, I think this man is all right, I will let him vote.' If he has no certificate at all, but says he has done his work, but has lost the certificate, then the partisan returning officer fixes the right of the voter there and then, without any process of law.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That was the law from 1873 to 1882, and it worked admirably. We never had any complaint.

Mr. JAMES CLANCY (Bothwell). I want to call the attention of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries to the fact that it goes beyond Prince Edward Island. In unorganized districts in Ontario where there are no voters' lists, that power is given there as well. There is no statute labour qualification. Statute labour is not done there. The hon. gentleman will see that in a case of that kind it is a very extraordinary power to give a returning officer. It seems to me that a man's rights would not suffer by striking out the word 'found.' Unless it can be shown that you would deprive a voter of his vote, or that you would lay the foundation of having bad votes put in I do not think this very exceptional power should be granted. But, it does not affect these matters one way or the other. That would work out very badly where the conditions might be different from what they are in Prince Edward Island. There is no reason for retaining that word.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I can hardly believe that this clause will be kept in this Bill. It seems to me a most extraordinary thing that you should give to a partisan deputy returning officer the power of a judge. He decides the right of the voter without any evidence being brought before him. It is impossible that we should retain that clause in the Bill. There is no reason for it. It is antagonistic to every principle of common sense and of justice when you are going to permit a partisan deputy returning officer to exercise the powers of a judge without even imposing upon him the rules that a judge must follow before giving a decision, namely, that he shall have evidence produced before him.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Every man has to subscribe to an oath. The deputy returning officer can reject the vote under the present system, so that he is a judge, now.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Not to the same extent.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. On the island the law simply works like a charm.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I do not know where the charm comes in. It seems the most extraordinary proposition I ever heard of.

Mr. MARTIN. The system in the island works well at present, but some of the penalties imposed on the deputy returning officers have been eliminated from this Bill. When I proposed, a few days ago, to remedy that, the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries was the first man to jump up and say that these safeguards should not be inserted in the Bill. I would like to know if the Solicitor General can tell me why the word 'found' should be there. The intention is to confer these extra judicial powers on a partisan deputy returning officer, a man who is interested in the success of one party in the election and to enable him to say that a man has a vote whether he has or not. The penalties imposed upon the returning officer which are included in the provincial statutes have been omitted from the Bill. I think the aim is clear from the first clause in this Bill, to the last clause, so far as Prince Edward Island is concerned, is to give extra judicial powers to deputy returning officers. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries knows it, and when this clause came up he had only to shake his head gently at the Solicitor General to cause the Solicitor General to subside. I do not think legislation should be carried on in that way in the House. I asked the hon. Solicitor General to give me a reason why the word 'found' is there, and he cannot give me any except one, to confer upon the deputy returning officers powers which they have no right to have. I make this statement from my experience not very long ago in Prince Edward Island. I called the attention of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries the other day to what took place in the province where a deputy returning officer told a voter, although he was prepared to swear that his qualification was good, that he had no vote. This is aimed at backing up such a deputy returning officer as that.

Mr. FOSTER. I want to call the attention of the Solicitor General to another clause, No. 69. Look at the situation which may arise. Here is a partisan returning officer; we will suppose that he is a Duncan Bole, or any other man.

Mr. INGRAM. That is struck out.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is struck out.

Mr. FOSTER. If it were not it would be a most terrible business. But, I cannot find that there is any penalty for a man rejecting a vote.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Yes; in sections 19 and 20.

Mr. FOSTER. Neither of these touch this case.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Yes; there is the obligation to receive the vote.

Mr. FOSTER. But in these cases you give the person upon whom you put this obligation the right to decide, and if he decides there is no other person who can decide. If he decides neither of these two clauses would apply to him. I think the Solicitor General will have to try and reconsider something to make this matter somewhat parallel with the position in other parts of the country, because he will see what a power this is giving to a partisan deputy returning officer. He actually makes the vote and he is actually held outside of any penalties at all, because I think the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries will agree that this will not touch the decision of a deputy returning officer as to whether a man should put in his vote provided the deputy returning officer gave his decision in good faith and believed he was right.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If the hon. gentleman had the Prince Edward Island Act before him and understood it he would see, that whether the Act is right or wrong, this section is absolutely correct in its phraseology. I explained all this before, and we are only going over this again and again. If a man comes up to vote on a statute labour certificate I have shown that the returning officer and the deputy returning officer, under the provincial law, are made judges. The deputy returning officer must determine whether this is a proper certificate or not, and if the man takes the oath and the deputy returning officer rejects his vote improperly he is liable to a penalty.

Mr. FOSTER. Where is that penalty?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If he comes in to vote on real estate he is asked: Is it leasehold or freehold? He is asked: What is the description of your land, he has to give it, and the deputy returning officer has to decide.

Mr. INGRAM. Suppose he does not present a certificate, does the hon. gentleman say he cannot vote?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Of course he can not.

Mr. INGRAM. Then what is the meaning of those words in the section, 'Or in case such certificate or receipt cannot be produced he shall take the oath in such case prescribed.'

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is in case the certificate is lost.

Mr. INGRAM. Then if the certificate is lost and he is willing to take the oath he can vote.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Certainly, in that case, but suppose he produces the wrong certificate.

Mr. INGRAM. Who is to determine that?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The deputy returning officer.

Mr. E. COCHRANE (East Northumberland). I do not see any penalty in this clause against the returning officer whom you make a judge.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not make him a judge. I take the law as it has stood for fifty years.

Mr. COCHRANE. That is no argument. Why, the biggest old Tory on this side of the House would not say that he would legislate in that way. I am sure the most hide-bound Tory here would be willing to amend a fifty year old law if it was wrong.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. We are not making the law.

Mr. COCHRANE. Then if we are not making the law here we have had a great deal of talk for nothing. The absurdity of the thing is that you have no penalty provided against a partisan deputy returning officer whom you make a judge.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, you do not.

Mr. COCHRANE. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries shakes his head, but it is the easiest thing in the world to do that. It is no answer at all to an argument, for the minister to shake his head. Here you make a man a judge, you clothe him with power to accept or reject a vote and you provide no penalty against him, if he does wrong. You give him all that power and you place him above a penalty. The hon. minister's shake of the head will not get him out of that difficulty.

Mr. FOSTER. I want to ask the Solicitor General this. Does the provincial penalty which applies to a deputy returning officer in a provincial election, apply to the deputy returning officer who acts under the Dominion law in a Dominion election?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. No.

Mr. FOSTER. Very well. If I am right that sections 19 and 20 apply no penalty against the deputy returning officer who makes the decision, and if the Solicitor General is right, as he no doubt is, that the provincial penalty is lifted from off him, then there is no penalty. What is the use of the Minister of Marine telling us that there is a penalty under the provincial law, when the penalty under the provincial law is clearly inoperative.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I was simply asked the question: if there was a penalty under the provincial law.

Mr. FOSTER. The Minister of Marine gave the House to understand that the returning officers could be fined. Now we discover that clause 20 here does not provide a penalty against him, and that the penalty under the provincial law is wiped out. You give under this Act, the deputy returning officer the powers amongst others.

It shall be the duty of the presiding officer to prevent all unnecessary delay; no person shall be permitted to interrupt the poll by addressing the electors; for avoiding the needless factious questioning of voters the deputy returning officer can make provisions.

You see what powers you put in the hands of a partisan returning officer. Suppose I were representing one of the candidates, and I wanted to question a voter as to whether he has a vote or not; then for avoiding needless factious questioning of the voters the deputy returning officer, who is a judge, can waive me aside and stop the proceedings on the ground that I am guilty of factious opposition. If a deputy returning officer has in mind to be the least arbitrary, he can stop any questioning at the poll with a view to getting at the qualifications of the voter. I ask the Solicitor General if I am not right that this procedure in Prince Edward Island applies to the deputy returning officers in the Dominion election?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Yes.

Mr. POWELL. What clause of our Act incorporates that?

Mr. FOSTER. It is not incorporated, but that is the power the provincial law gives to the deputy returning officer, and our Act clothes the deputy returning officer with these powers. If these powers are the powers of a deputy returning officer in Prince Edward Island where there is no list, and if the penalties of the provincial Act are taken away, and if sections 19 and 20 provide no penalty, then the elector is simply there at the mercy of the deputy returning officer.

Mr. HAGGART. I would like to know from the Solicitor General what clause in our Act gives the deputy returning officer in Prince Edward Island the powers that have been referred to by the ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster).

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. In the province of Prince Edward Island a man who comes up to vote, not being on the voters' list, is obliged to prove he is qualified under the provincial Act, and in order that he may establish his right to vote under the provincial Act, it is necessary for him to conform with the provincial law. You have a dozen clauses in the Act to provide for that. The point that is taken by the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) as to the question of the penalty, is one that ought to be considered. If in the exercise of the duty assigned to him a deputy returning officer, acting in perfect good faith, should happen to reject the vote of a person who was qualified, of course there would not be any penalty against him, but if a man deliberately decides to reject the vote of an elector who is qualified, of course he would come within the operation of sections 19 and 20. Let me draw the attention of my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) to this. Take section 6 of the Franchise Act. It is there provided that no person who possesses all the qualifications generally required by the provincial law to entitle him to vote at a provincial election, shall be disqualified from voting at a Dominion election merely by any provision of the provincial law disqualifying him from having his name on the list of voters, &c.

So that a man might be entitled to be on the provincial list were it not for the fact that he is the holder of an office under the Dominion government. Suppose a man's name is on the list, and he happens to be a deputy returning officer, or some other disqualification arises, and when he tenders his vote it is objected to by one of the scrutineers; and suppose he answers the questions put to him in such a way as to show that he is disqualified. The returning officer is obliged, in the exercise of the powers conferred upon him, to find him disqualified or qualified, as the case may be. That is a necessary right inherent in the position he occupies.

Mr. CLANCY. Would it be any the less his duty to act in the manner the hon. gentleman has just described if the word 'found' were left out, or would it be more? We wish to avoid putting extraordinary power into the hands of the returning officer to do more than his duty.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. This simply defines what he must do. It does not give him any power in the world.

Mr. A. C. MACDONALD (King's, P.E.I.) If it does not give him any power, what is the use of leaving it there?

Mr. H. A. POWELL (Westmoreland). There does seem to be some point in the objection urged against the word 'found.' The duty of the returning officer ordinarily is ministerial and not judicial.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. When an objection is raised, what duty does he perform?

Mr. FITZPATRICK.

Mr. POWELL. The ex-Minister of Finance is urging that the duty of the returning officer be left ministerial, whereas the Bill makes it judicial. If his duty is merely ministerial, his action is subject to correction or he is subject to a fine if he acts in an improper or illegal manner. If his act is judicial, it stands as an absolute bar; for his decision in a matter that is within his duty under this section, is absolutely final. There is no opportunity nor provision for appeal. If you attempt to question the decision of the returning officer by way of a petition, you must fail. What the ex-Minister of Finance asks for is that the voter, if found qualified, and takes the necessary oath, shall be admitted to vote.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That would be contrary to the provincial law.

Mr. POWELL. If the provincial law is a perfect absurdity, that should not stand in the way. Because they have had an antiquated Franchise Act in Prince Edward Island for fifty or a hundred years, is Canada to be saddled with it to all eternity? I never heard such an argument. I suggest that the duties of the returning officer be left simply ministerial and not made judicial; that is, if the elector has the necessary qualifications, answers the necessary questions and takes the necessary oath, he shall be admitted to vote. By the terms of this section, as it now stands, I have no doubt, you make the returning officer the judge of the voter's qualification, and if he decides wrongly on one or a hundred votes his decision is final.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I look on that argument as absolutely absurd, if the hon. gentleman will permit me to say so; because the law expressly provides that on a scrutiny all these things can be gone into.

Mr. POWELL. The hon. gentleman is entirely wrong.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman has stated that, but I do not agree with him.

Mr. POWELL. I challenge the hon. gentleman to show me a solitary provision under which they can be gone into.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman surely knows what he is talking about. Under the Controverted Elections Act, they not only can be gone into, but I have seen them gone into in a hundred instances. I never heard a lawyer suggest that on a scrutiny, you could not go into the question of the validity of the votes polled.

Mr. POWELL. I have already conceded that in ordinary cases you can; but you put a provision in here by which you cannot.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. This does not alter the law at all. The hon. gentleman assumes a certain conclusion, and then argues from it. The hon. gentleman chooses to sneer at the law of Prince Edward Island. We are not here altering the law of Prince Edward Island. We have adopted the principle that the provincial franchises shall prevail. That principle has always worked admirably, there has never been any difficulty about it, and it will work admirably now.

If a man wanting to vote does not produce his road certificate the returning officer shall reject his application. He will act in like manner if the man refuses to answer the question or to take the oath. That law has worked admirably, and I do not believe that the word taken exception to in any way modifies the powers of the returning officer, but I think it is desirable, because it defines just what the law is.

Mr. POWELL. The hon. minister goes further than allowing the deputy returning officer simply to reject an application to vote if the applicant refuses to answer the questions or to take the oath. He allows him to reject the vote even if the man does comply with these conditions. He allows the returning officer to be the judge.

Mr. FOSTER. On the contention of the Minister of Marine himself, the word is not necessary, but only desirable. In that case, since we on this side object to it in toto, and since he himself says it is not necessary, why not strike it out?

Mr. HAGGART. What we object to is giving the deputy returning officer judicial powers when his powers are simply ministerial. If a party chooses to take the oath and to answer the questions, the deputy returning officer ought not to have the power to reject his vote.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. When there is no list, as is unfortunately the case in Prince Edward Island, the powers of the deputy returning officer must be ex necessitate quasi judicial. That is the provincial law, and we cannot change it. I am willing to reduce the powers of the deputy returning officers to a minimum and make their duties ministerial as far as possible, but I cannot consent to introduce, in the case of Prince Edward Island, a principle we have not applied elsewhere.

Mr. COCHRANE. It is a new doctrine that we are adopting the election law of each province. What we are doing is adopting the franchise of each province, but not its election law, and we are not interfering with the franchise of any province by restricting the duties of returning officers to merely ministerial acts.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I cannot understand the contention of the hon. gentleman that the question under debate is one affecting the franchise. The franchise is the right to vote, and with that we have no desire to interfere, but this is a question of giving judicial as well as ministerial power to the deputy returning officers, and that we do most strongly object to. If you give a deputy returning officer the power to reject a man's vote, even if he takes the oath and answers the question, you may give a partisan official the control of an election. And besides, you do not provide any penalty in the case of an abuse of such power.

Mr. FOSTER. I want to press the point again, that there is no penalty against this officer, as you have taken away the provincial penalty. I think that we will all agree that there should be some penalty provided; but, under sections 19 and 20, which have been referred to, the only provision is that the penalty should be recoverable if he is guilty of any wilful misfeasance or wilful violation of the Act. But his duty is to give a decision when the case of an elector comes before him. And, if he gives a decision, he is free from all penalty.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Well, what does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) want?

Mr. FOSTER. I want the deputy returning officer in Prince Edward Island to be ministerial in his duties, the same as in every other part of this Dominion. And, having that established, I want a penalty against him as against every other officer in the Dominion.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) need not get so angry about it—

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies) need not think I am angry because I am in earnest. But, if anything could make a man angry, it would be a provision such as this, when it is the evident purpose—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. But will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him? The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) puts one construction upon it and the Solicitor General puts another.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, I will leave it to the Solicitor General; he is fair-minded. Will the Solicitor General say that if a voter comes before the deputy returning officer and he gives his decision, then, under sections 19 and 20, he can be held guilty of wilful misfeasance and subject to a penalty? If he can, I am wrong.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I do not agree with the theory that has been expounded, that the duties of the deputy returning officer are merely ministerial. That, to my mind, is absolutely wrong. He is called upon to exercise quasi judicial functions, for instance, in the choice of the oath, and other conclusions that he comes to. I quite see the force of the objections raised by the hon. gentleman. But I would, naturally, be guided in these matters relating to Prince Edward Island by those who know more about Prince Edward Island than I can pretend to know. It is suggested to amend both sections 19 and 20 to make them applicable to offences against the local law as well as against this Act.

Mr. FOSTER. I will ask the Solicitor General—has he any objection to striking out the word 'found'?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I am not bound to come to a decision on that point.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I have no objection myself.

Mr. FOSTER. I think we should accept the Solicitor General's idea, that sections 19 and 20 be amended to provide a penalty and to strike out the word 'found.'

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. There is no necessity for both.

Mr. McINERNEY. I would suggest that this question as to the word 'found' might be settled, and there would be no necessity for dealing with the other.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I think so, and I am willing that we should do it and get on. This is the third day that has been taken up in useless discussion. It almost seems as if hon. gentlemen opposite were talking against time.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I move that the word 'found' in this section be struck out.

Amendment agreed to.

On section 72,

Mr. INGRAM. Mr. Chairman, we should not pass over sections 61 and 63. Those sections were allowed to stand according to my Bill as it is marked.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Sections 61 and 62 have been carried.

Mr. McNEILL. You are not passing over section 70?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Section 70 has been carried.

Mr. McNEILL. I wish to call the attention of the Solicitor General to a point with regard to section 70, to which I referred in discussing the matter with him the last time the measure was before the House. I think that it would be advisable that this clause should be amended to provide that not only shall the initials of the deputy returning officer be placed on the counterfoil, but the initials of at least two of the agents of the candidates, if present.

Mr. FITZPATRICK.

I think that would be a wonderful safeguard against corruption. It would make it much more difficult to substitute a bogus ballot for the real ballot. I would suggest that the clause read somewhat in this form:

The vote shall be given by ballot, and each elector who is entitled to vote shall receive from the deputy returning officer a ballot paper, on the back of which such deputy returning officer and the agents of the respective candidates, or at least two of them, if present, shall have previously put their initials.

Motion to reconsider section 70, agreed to.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I fear that would lead to unnecessary complications and difficulties. If you have two of the agents present to put their initials on in addition to the returning officer, it would take up too much time. In addition to that, the agents may change two or three times during the day.

Mr. McNEILL. I would say an agent of each candidate, where there are only two, placing his initials upon the ballot paper, would be sufficient for the purposes of identification. We know that one of the most prevalent sources of fraud is the substitution of a fraudulent ballot paper in place of the proper ballot paper, and the difficulty has always been to trace that. The fear has been that there may be collusion between the deputy returning officer and the agents of one of the parties. Now if you have the initials of the agents, or two of them, upon the ballot paper in addition to those of the deputy returning officer, it will make such a substitution of the ballot paper absolutely impossible.

Mr. A. SEMPLE (Centre Wellington). It appears to me this would lead to an endless amount of confusion. The cases are exceptional where any trouble has been found when votes are taken on the day of election. In the contest in which I was engaged in 1896, there were four candidates in the field, and their agents would require to initial the ballots if the proposed amendment was carried out, and it would lead to a great deal of confusion and waste of time, as many agents are poor men and slow of doing writing of any kind.

Mr. CLANCY. The suggestion seems to me to be a fair one, it is only for the purpose of identification. It does not make any difference so long as the initials of any two of the persons present with the deputy are on the ballot paper. There is no party advantage in it either one way or the other.

Mr. N. CLARKE WALLACE (West York). No one objects to the desirability of having additional identification of the ballot by the signature of others than the deputy returning officer, but it has been urged that it is going to cause delay. Suppose it does, is it going to prevent any body from voting in that polling subdivision? I have been in polling booths, and I can safely say that the officials have not been worked half their time on the average. If 200 ballot papers are to be initialled by two men who are sitting at the table—

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. If there are four candidates, or six candidates?

Mr. WALLACE. Suppose there are four candidates as in the county of Pictou, for instance, they are running in pairs, and the same scrutineer acts for two, there are only two scrutineers there. Suppose there are six, they would run in three pairs. Suppose there are three men to initial a ballot paper, it is only going to take half a minute.

Mr. R. HOLMES (West Huron). So far as its operation in towns is concerned it would involve a great deal of extra time. Would you initial before they are in the batch or after they are taken out? Suppose they are initialled after they are taken out, what is to prevent an agent substituting another ballot?

Mr. WALLACE. There are three men each watching that ballot paper, besides the man who is signing his name on it.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I do not want a ballot paper to be handled by more than one man or two men at the outside.

Mr. FOSTER. It would not take up much time. There are two agents, we will say, and the deputy returning officer, and they have their ballots for that poll. There will always be ten or fifteen minutes in the polling place during which time these gentlemen could put their names on the ballots and the matter of the deputy returning officer and two others signing them would really not take up any time necessary for voting. You would have the additional safeguard. I do not think there is any danger to be feared from the deputy returning officer and one agent from each side handling the ballot in so far as it is necessary to put their names on the counterfoil.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. It is not the counterfoil, but the ballot.

Mr. ELLIS. The other day we agreed that the ballot should be numbered.

Mr. CLANCY. Not the ballot, but the counterfoil.

Mr. ELLIS. It does not make any difference. It is hardly worth while to load up the ballot with all that work when the identity is absolutely safeguarded by this numbering.

It being One o'clock, the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at Three o'clock.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the hon. Solicitor General absolutely refuse to have the initials of the two agents go with those of the deputy returning officer in section 70?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I think that will be absolutely unworkable. However, it might be possible to bring about what is desired. I presume that what is wanted to be got at is the absolute certainty that the ballot which you give to the elector is the ballot he brings back for the purpose of being deposited. That clause has been adopted, but I have been considering the question as to whether or not we might find a better substitute for that which my hon. friend proposes. Suppose you have a ballot with two counterfoils, both of which counterfoils shall bear the same number. Take a ballot with the number 100, for instance, having two counterfoils, one at each end of the ballot, with the number of 100 on each counterfoil. Then, the deputy returning officer will take off the first counterfoil when he gives the ballot to the voter, and when the voter comes back, he has to bring back the ballot with a counterfoil having the number 100 upon it. You will then be absolutely certain that the ballot comes back that the deputy returning officer gave to the voter. I would like time to consider that.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, I will not raise the question now. I think that will be very useful.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. It strikes me that it would, but I will have to consider it.

On section 79,

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. My hon. friend from Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) proposes the following section as 79a, in lieu of this section:

In case, through accident or irresistible force, riot, removal of documents, or other cause of a similar nature, the nomination cannot be held, or the voting cannot commence at the hour fixed, or is interrupted before being closed, the returning officer, and the deputy returning officer, in so far as it concerns either, shall adjourn the nomination to the following lawful day at the same hour, and day by day if necessary, until the nomination of candidates is fully held; and in case of the voting, it shall be resumed on the following day at the hour fixed by sections 52 and 52a, until it has lasted eight hours or ten hours, as the case may be, so that all the electors who wish to vote may have had the opportunity of so doing.

Mr. FOSTER. There should be no objection to that, I suppose?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I think it is somewhat objectionable in form, and there are also other objections to it. I have not accepted it.

Mr. INGRAM. Neither would I.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. We talked about leaving discretion in the hands of the returning officer, but this amendment would certainly give him a great deal of discretion.

Mr. FOSTER. You make him take it at the next legal day.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. You would allow him to determine whether there is a riot or an obstruction.

Mr. FOSTER. Have we had any case ?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. There was a case of irresistible force in the local election in Russell, where, on account of a snow storm, they had to postpone the election. There is a provision in the Ontario Act to meet that.

Mr. INGRAM. There was another case in East Middlesex, where they ran short of ballots. I do not know of a single case where we had any such difficulty as this mentioned in the amendment, and a few persons might put their heads together, and kick up a riot in order to postpone the election. I think we are better without the amendment and that it should be allowed to drop.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I think so too.

On section 80,

Mr. INGRAM. I think this section is very incomplete. Our present system of closing the poll and taking the ballot is not a proper system, in view of the methods adopted by parties in some elections. There should be plain and candid instructions laid down to the deputy returning officers as to how they should count up the votes. We know well that it was in counting up the ballots that the switching took place. I have already moved an amendment to provide against this and unless it is accepted by the government now, I cannot move it until the third reading.

Mr. WALLACE. Read your amendment.

Mr. INGRAM. The amendment I propose is as follows :

That section 80 is repealed, and the following substituted therefor:

'80. Immediately after the close of the poll, the deputy returning officer shall, in the presence of the poll clerk and the candidates or their agents—and if any of the candidates is neither present nor represented by an agent, then, in the presence of such candidates and agents, if any, as are present, and of such electors, not exceeding three, as are at or around the polling station and willing to attend—proceed to examine the state of the ballot papers and count the votes in the manner following: He shall, before opening the ballot box, ascertain how many persons have voted and how many ballot papers should be in the ballot box, and shall carefully count the number of unused ballot papers and of spoiled ballot papers, and shall afford opportunity to the persons present to ascertain whether all the ballot papers are properly accounted for; after having so done, and not before, he shall open the ballot box and examine the ballot papers to ascertain that they are the ballot papers which he supplied, examining his initials on the backs, and shall count the whole number of ballot papers in the box to see that the number corresponds with the number of persons who voted, doing all this as far as possible, without opening out the face of any of the ballot papers or discovering or disclosing for whom any ballot paper is marked; and should the number of ballot papers found in the box exceed the number of persons who voted, he shall, if possible, ascertain and reject such as were not supplied by him. After having so done, he shall open and examine both sides of the ballot papers and count the number of votes given for each candidate, exposing to the view of those allowed to be present the face of each ballot paper, and, when so requested, affording them opportunity for thorough inspection of any ballot paper; and in so counting he shall reject all ballot papers which have not been supplied by the deputy returning officer, all those by which votes have been given for more candidates than are to be elected, all those which are not marked with a black lead pencil in the white space opposite the name or names of the candidate or candidates, all those upon the face of which there is any cross elsewhere than in the said white space or spaces, all those upon any part of which the voter has intentionally placed any mark with anything other than a black lead pencil, and all those upon which there is any writing or mark by which the voter could be identified, other than the numbering by the deputy returning officer in the cases hereinbefore provided for.'

The reason I move that is so that the deputy returning officer shall have no power to dictate to the scrutineers, as was done in West Elgin, where the deputy returning officers refused to show the face of the ballot to the agents. There is nothing in our Act at present providing that the agents can see the ballots. This amendment leaves the deputy returning officer no alternative but to count the ballots in the presence of the candidates, or their agents, so as to allow a proper inspection.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I have made provision for that in the concluding words of the first paragraph, of section 80: 'giving full opportunity to those present to examine each ballot.'

Mr. FOSTER. Would the Solicitor General have any objection to adding these words in line 31: 'he shall sign his name thereto in the presence and in full view of'?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I do not see that they are necessary, but there is no objection to them.

Amendment agreed to.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There was an amendment suggested on the other side of the House, which I think should be adopted; it is to insert, after the word 'shall,' in the second line of section 80, the words: 'first place all the spoiled ballots in an envelope and seal it up, and shall then' count the number of voters, &c.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. WALLACE. With regard to the proposed amendment of the hon. member for East Elgin, I think there are many features in it that should be adopted, but it appears to me there is too much manipulation of the ballot paper.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I think so. We have adopted, I think, the chief features of my hon. friend's amendment. Before we leave section 79, we ought to fix the minimum penalty for the returning officer who commits an offence. It is proposed to make the imprisonment not less than one year and not more than five years, and the fine not less than $100 and not more than $1,000. The penalty for others is a fine not exceeding $500, or imprisonment for not less than six months, and not more than two years. We make the penalty larger for the official than for others.

Mr. FOSTER. One hundred dollars is too small for the returning officer. Make it $500.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. We will make the minimum $300.

Amendment (Mr. Fitzpatrick) agreed to.

On section 82,

Mr. McNEILL. My hon. friend promised to consider some means of preventing the ballot boxes being tampered with. This provides that the envelope containing the ballots shall be received by the deputy returning officer and shall be marked with the signature of any agents present in the polling station who are willing to do so, by writing their signature across the flap thereof. Why not give the right to add a seal?

Mr. INGRAM. I would suggest that the following words be added to the section:

Such agents shall also fix their seals if they desire to do so.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I shall accept that amendment.

Mr. McNEILL. Subsection 4 provides that the ballot box shall be locked and sealed with the seal of the deputy returning officer, but we know, as a matter of fact, that those seals become broken in the handling of the boxes, and we ought to provide a more effective means of sealing.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. How can you arrange to prevent the seals being broken?

Mr. HAGGART. Why not put on a lead seal, as is done on freight cars?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. If a man wants to do what is wrong, he will do it, and I do not see that the suggestion is any solution of the difficulty.

Mr. McNEILL. As the ballot boxes are now, the seals may be broken without blame being attached to any one, but if you so arrange that when the seal is broken there is good ground for suspicion, the case will be different.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I would really like my hon. friend who has originated the idea to exercise his ingenuity in devising an amendment.

Mr. McNEILL. Later on I will suggest one.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Of course, I do not bind myself to accept any suggestion.

Mr. COCHRANE. The section provides that the ballot boxes shall be delivered by the deputy returning officer to the returning officer or the election clerk or to one or more persons specially appointed for that purpose by the returning officer. Under this section, the returning officer may appoint a couple of persons who will travel around the constituency collecting the boxes and stay over at some hotel at night with the boxes all lying in the bottom of a wagon. That is a very loose way of handling these boxes. Why should they go out of the hands of the deputy returning officers at all until delivered to the returning officer?

Let us see how it will work. For instance, two men appointed under this section start out and go travelling around all over a large riding. They get half way round the riding and stop at some village over night. The ballot boxes have been jamming round in the wagon or sleigh, and the seals are broken off, and in what condition are they? Does the Solicitor General think that is a safe way to take care of the ballots of the electors of a riding? I suggested that it would be better to have the returning officer appoint a place in the centre of a riding to receive the ballot boxes on a day named, from the deputy returning officers and not allow them to be transferred into the hands of the second man at all. Keep them in the care of the deputy returning officer until the returning officer appoints a day and place where the deputies shall deliver the ballot boxes to him. I am sorry that human nature is made up on the lines it is, but we know that when they will do such things as they have done, it is just as easy to tamper with the ballot boxes and the ballots after they leave the deputies' hands as at any other time.

On section 83,

Mr. INGRAM. I move that subsection 5 be added to this section to read as follows:

Notwithstanding anything to the contrary, all ballot boxes in any city or county towns, as described in this section, shall be returned to the returning officer or the election clerk within three hours after the close of the poll, and such person or persons shall, on delivery of the ballot box or boxes to the returning officer or the election clerk, take the oath as prescribed in form "BB" of this Act.

The reason why I say 'notwithstanding anything to the contrary' is because subsection 4 of this section says the ballot boxes shall be returned forthwith. That would apply to rural sections of the country, whereas this amendment would apply to cities and towns. Take the city of Ottawa for example. I can see no reason why all the ballot boxes should not be returned at eight o'clock in the evening. There are a large number of divisions in this city in which there are less than 200 votes polled during the day, and there is no difficulty of counting these within one hour, and so there is no reason why the ballot boxes should not be returned to the returning officer at night. That being done, there is no possibility of the deputy tampering with the ballot box or any person on his behalf. They would all be placed in charge of the returning officer and be perfectly secure. It is a fact that in nearly every case where ballot boxes are tampered with, it is not while they are in the possession of the returning officer, but it is generally while they are in the possession of the deputy returning officer.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. There is a good deal of merit in the suggestion of the hon. gentleman, but we have got to make a law which will be applicable to conditions that are unforeseen now and that may occur. With reference to returning them within three hours in cities and towns, I think there would be objections to that. I have known cases where the deputy returning officer was not able within three hours to return the box because of trouble in counting the ballots. With reference to the other suggestion that the deputy returning officer should himself bring the ballot boxes back to the returning officer, accidents may occur which would make it impossible for him to do so, for instance he might be sick, and many other contingencies might occur. The provision is made here that the ballot box is to be returned either to the election clerk or to one or more persons appointed by the returning officer. I think the difficulty suggested by the hon. gentleman has arisen in consequence of the insertion of the word 'collect,' that is to say, a man should be appointed to go around and collect the ballot boxes. I think we had better drop that amendment. That amendment was introduced merely for the purpose of satisfying the Auditor General that it would be wise on the ground of economy to have this provision. I think the economy would be misplaced, and that we had better leave the responsibility as far as possible upon the officials. We will omit the word 'collect,' but I cannot go any further than that.

Mr. INGRAM. Suppose the count is concluded in two hours?

Mr. FOSTER. 'Forthwith' enables them to sleep with the ballot boxes over night.

Mr. CLANCY. The practice has largely grown up with the deputies of keeping them over night, and the law is disregarded in that respect. If you fix the limit of time and say that 'forthwith' means within two hours, something will be accomplished.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. We have got rid of the word 'collect' in the 49th line after the words 'or receive.' That was an amendment suggested the last time the section came up. It was intended to insert the word 'collect' after the words 'or receive,' but that would have opened the door to these difficulties.

Mr. McNEILL. But, these difficulties now exist without the word 'collect.' The hon. gentleman should have the obligation resting on the deputy returning officer, and he could insert some words providing for an emergency, such as sickness.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. This has been the law for such a long time that I would like if my hon. friend would point out in what respect it has failed of its purpose up to the present time.

Mr. McNEILL. There has been a great deal of improper work going on in connection with elections. I think, from the very fact that these ballot boxes were entrusted to an individual who goes around the riding collecting them and who may leave them over night at a tavern. That is how the matter is worked, and that is what we want to do away with.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. That would occur in the case of a deputy returning officer.

Mr. McNEILL. But, in the case of a deputy returning officer he is responsible for it, and the responsibility rests upon one individual.

Mr. FOSTER. There is always the temptation to hand it over to somebody.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. It is the returning officer who appoints the deputy returning officer who has the responsibility of appointing other persons.

Mr. FOSTER. Does not the hon. Solicitor General believe that it would be better to put the whole responsibility on the deputy returning officer or the election clerk?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. In the case of the illness of the deputy returning officer it would be impossible for him to deliver his box to the returning officer.

Mr. INGRAM. In my own city where intelligent professional men acted one deputy returning officer retained his box all night, although the returning officer's office was open and not over three blocks away. In another case a man came in and gave his ballot box to the clerk in a hotel and asked him to look after it.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Then he failed in his duty, and ought to have been punished.

Mr. ELLIS. Would it not be well to make a deputy returning officer mail his return by registered letter, as it is provided for under this Bill, for the candidate himself, to the returning officer, so as to guard against the difficulty that might arise where the ballot box does not turn up at all, and let that return be the return that the returning officer should count?

Mr. COCHRANE. I am satisfied that the clause works out differently from what the Solicitor General intends it should. Why would not this clause be all right by striking out the words in the 49th line, 'who shall receive the same?' It works out just on the line that I have indicated, and instead of the ballot box being delivered by the deputy returning officer to the returning officer, as a general thing it is not delivered in that way at all. It is delivered to the persons named, and I say that is false economy. If that clause is put in at the whim of any official for the sake of a little economy, I say it is false economy.

Mr. JOHN COSTIGAN (Victoria, N.B.) As I understand it this is a new feature in the law, giving the power to a returning officer to appoint collectors of the ballot boxes. We have, so far, held the returning officer and the deputies responsible. The returning officer in rural constituencies in which there are a great many polling places, in my experience, would arrange with a deputy returning officer, in returning his own ballot box, to collect the ballot boxes from other deputy returning officers, so that there would only be one mileage to pay. If there is no other reason than the reason of economy to appoint a collector of ballot boxes outside of the returning officer, it is not a sufficient reason to change the law, because it would not result in a greater economy than can be practised under the present system, as one deputy returning officer can bring in the boxes from an entire district.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not think the question of economy should enter into it. Whether it costs $10 or $20 is a small matter. What I was not able to get over was the difficulty suggested by the Solicitor General. Supposing, on the night of election, there were fifty or sixty deputy returning officers of whom, perhaps, three or four might be ill and could not come to the city. Their ballot boxes must be returned.

Mr. COCHRANE. Let the clerk go after them.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The clerk would not be able to go to fifty or sixty polling places.

Mr. COCHRANE. He could go to three or four.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. But the law does not intend that the returning officer shall go around and collect the boxes. Suppose the deputy returning officer is ill or is unable to come in, then, the returning officer has to send for the box.

Mr. FOSTER. It is general here. It becomes a collector's business.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is not to be done except in cases where the deputy returning officer is unable to come in with his ballot box.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Well, then, how can provision be made to meet that otherwise than is proposed here?

Mr. HOLMES. I think if you leave that clause as it is, a good many would take advantage of it and send their boxes in by anybody.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. They cannot do that.

Mr. HOLMES. Suppose you stop at the words 'who shall receive the same?'

Mr. WM. MCGREGOR (North Essex). There is no doubt that the present system is not right under which you have people collecting these boxes. In 1891, in my constituency, the returns were not sent in for two weeks because the returning officer said he had no power to go to any great expense in the matter, and he allowed the deputies to send in the boxes whenever they thought necessary. I would be for providing that the deputy returning officer himself, or the clerk who acted with him, should bring in the boxes. Some of the boxes in my constituency laid around for several days in stores, and one was in a cigar store for two weeks. This gave the deputy returning officer the chance of coming down to see the city and bring the boxes with him.

Mr. FOSTER. I believe the whole responsibility should be thrown on the deputy returning officer. It may be that one or two deputies may be ill, but that is a day that the deputy returning officers do not propose to get ill if they possibly can avoid it. They should have the responsibility of delivering these boxes to the returning officer or to the clerk.

Mr. MCGREGOR. And to deliver them at once.

Mr. FOSTER. Forthwith, of course. In the case of illness, the deputy returning officer should give the box to some properly appointed person to whom he would administer the oath.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The deputy returning officer is supposed to be a very responsible man, and the deputy is not supposed to part with the box except to the returning officer, or to some person specially authorized by him. If you give the deputy returning officer the privilege of giving the box to any one he likes, I would be afraid of some of those ballot boxes.

Mr. FOSTER. You narrow it down to the special case of where the deputy returning officer is ill.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If they want to do wrong, I am afraid there would be a great many ill.

Mr. COCHRANE. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries should not make that insinuation. If the returning officer is a responsible man, he should not appoint a deputy who is not responsible. There would not be the difficulty the Minister of Marine and Fisheries sees in it. When this duty is confined to the deputy, or to his clerk, or to the man he may appoint, it is a great deal safer to have men perambulating about the country with forty or fifty ballot boxes and having no control over them.

Mr. McINERNEY. I think this clause as it stands is pretty near as good as you can make it. The returning officer is here made the responsible party and when the deputy returning officer is unable to return the box the returning officer assumes the responsibility of appointing a man to collect it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. You know who to look to in that case.

Mr. McINERNEY. Certainly. You look to the returning officer who is responsible for the man he appoints. That is far better to my mind than allowing the deputy returning officer to pretend he is sick and send the ballot box down with Tom, Dick or Harry; some perfectly unknown man. The provision as it is now, is I believe as good as you can make it.

Mr. COCHRANE. My hon. friend (Mr. McInerney), has not read of the transactions of some returning officers in Ontario when he makes that statement. I would be sorry to say that the deputy returning officers are irresponsible men. If the returning officer does his duty he will not appoint a man as deputy who is not responsible, and, therefore, the deputies would be as responsible as he himself is.

Mr. McINERNEY. Neither would he appoint a man to collect the boxes who is not responsible.

Mr. COCHRANE. Under the present system it is not alone when a man is ill that the returning officer sends out a man to collect the ballot boxes, for in my riding it continuously happens that the ballot boxes are never attempted to be returned by the deputies at all. The privilege is given to the returning officer now, and he avails himself of it; I will not say for pecuniary purposes, but it allows the returning officer to appoint who he sees fit to gather up the boxes, and he takes the financial end of it himself. There is great danger in allowing a man to start out and travel around a large constituency gathering up ballot boxes, when the seals are often broken. Sometimes these men stay over night in towns and villages, and leave the boxes around. The deputy returning officers are not going to be all sick on election day, so that that argument falls to the ground, and if the returning officer does his duty and appoints good men, then the deputies are just as responsible for one box as the returning officer is for forty boxes. If you put a fine from $300 to $500 on the deputy returning officer, his responsibility will be just as great as if you put a fine of $1,000 on the returning officer.

Mr. LOGAN. The suggestion might be a good one in a compact constituency, but what would my hon. friend do in a constituency like Algoma, which is about a thousand miles in length, or the district of Burrard, B.C.? Would he have fifty deputy returning officers travelling from 500 to 1,000 miles? I think we had better put the responsibility on the returning officer.

Mr. McNEILL. Why not, in case of sickness, impose the duty upon the deputy returning officer at the nearest polling division?

Mr. GILLIES. There is an evident desire on the part of the committee to minimize the chances of having the ballot boxes tampered with. I would suggest that in the event of the illness of the deputy returning officer, parliament should nominate the poll clerk as the person by whom the ballot box should be returned to the returning officer.

Mr. INGRAM. I think this section is as good as we can make it. If the deputy returning officer cannot act, the clerk is the person who assumes charge of the poll-book and ballot box.

Section agreed to.

On section 90,

Mr. INGRAM. This section provides that a deposit of $100 must be put up in case of a recount. In the province of Ontario there is no deposit required; but, if the majority is fifty or under, there may be a recount, while, if it is over fifty, there cannot be a recount. If there is a desire to have an increase of the deposit in Prince Edward Island, I have no objection; but, I certainly object to applying the same rule to the province of Ontario. The system in the province works well, and I think it would work equally well in the Dominion. I do not see why we should have one rule for the province and another for the Dominion. I would, therefore, move that from and including the words 'and if the applicant,' in the second line on page 23, down to the words 'to be elected,' in the tenth line, be struck out, and also subsection 11.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. This is the law now, and I would not like to alter it.

Amendment negatived.

On section 90,

Mr. POWELL. This section provides the grounds for a recount, but, it seems to me, there is one omission. A deputy returning officer may have counted the votes properly, but in totalling up the column and making his return to the returning officer, he may have made an error in the addition, and that should be a ground for a recount.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I have here the amendment suggested by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden), which I propose to add to the section: 'Has made an incorrect statement of the number of ballot papers cast for a candidate.' That amendment meets the difficulty.

Amendment agreed to.

On section 107,

Mr. INGRAM. The hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) proposed several amendments to this section, which are found in the Votes and Proceedings of June 4. For instance, 107a prohibits the selling, or giving in exchange, or supplying gratuitously to any person any quantity of spirituous or fermented liquor, except in certain cases to the sick.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I think it is practically impossible to accept that, I do not think it could be made workable.

Mr. FOSTER. That is pretty drastic.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. 107b, proposed by the hon. member for Montmorency, prohibits the bringing into the limits of the electoral district on polling day, or on the day previous, any spirituous or fermented liquors, but with this provision:

This provision shall not affect the sale, carrying, delivery or purchase of spirituous or fermented liquor, made in good faith and in the ordinary course of affairs, by a merchant or trader; provided that the cases, casks, bottles or envelopes containing the said liquor be not opened, broken or unclosed during the days above mentioned.

The trouble there is that it will make the offence depend on the action of the person who made the purchase, who breaks the seal, for instance. A man may sell in perfect good faith and be free from blame, but if the person to whom he sold breaks the seal, then the seller becomes liable. That seems to be an objectionable principle in legislation.

Mr. INGRAM. As regards 107d, we find it difficult in rural sections to get places for committee rooms except in hotels. By adopting this amendment it will shut us out altogether from hotels.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. We must not defeat the object that we have in view by making the law so stringent that it cannot be operated.

Mr. INGRAM. By adopting this we will be opening the door for corruption wider than it is now. Because a person can go to any place and offer to hire a room if the owner will vote for his party. He may hire forty rooms in forty different polling subdivisions on the same conditions, and by that means secure forty votes.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I call attention here to section 96, subsection 5, which provides that no candidate, clerk, agent or other person shall communicate at any time to any person any information as to the number on the back of the ballot paper given to any voter at a polling station or attempt to ascertain the number on the back of any ballot paper. There are two sections of the Act to which that must not apply, because the number is put on the ballot paper in order that this information may be obtainable, as in Prince Edward Island, section 67 of this Act, where a man's vote is objected to, and because of that a number is put on it corresponding with the number in the book. It is put on for the purpose of enabling the agent there to tell the candidate that number so-and-so was objected to. It is put on in order that he may be identified. This provision which prohibits any information being given, must not extend to that section, otherwise the object would be defeated. There is another section 74, regarding the case of an elector in whose name another person has previously voted. If somebody has voted in my name already and I come up and want to vote, I make an affidavit in form V, that I am the person entitled to vote, whereupon a ballot is given to me and a number corresponding with the number is entered in the ballot book. It is necessary that information should be given in these two cases as to the number, and I propose to add to subsection 5, which prohibits any information being given:

But this provision shall not apply to ballots marked under the 67th or 74th sections of this Act.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. McNEILL. I would like to ask the hon. Solicitor General if he would consider the advisability, in section 72, of providing that these numbers on the counterfoils shall be seen not merely by the deputy returning officer, but by the agents?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Yes, by everybody. The intention is that it shall be known to those who are present and who are interested in the vote that a certain ballot brought back by the voter is the ballot which has been given to him. It would be dealt with as openly as possible.

Mr. McNEILL. The hon. gentleman will introduce words providing for that?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. That is the amendment I propose. Of course, the adoption of the amendment will depend entirely upon the information I receive from the Printing Bureau as to whether it would be possible to print the ballots here and send them out through the country so that there will be nothing to do but put the names on them. Then, we will be absolutely certain that we will have a uniform ballot printed on a uniform class of paper.

Mr. POWELL. If the hon. gentleman is going to apply to the Printing Bureau I would like to say that the hon. member for St. John's City (Mr. Ellis) made a suggestion which struck me as being particularly good. His suggestion was, and it would seem to be very easy for the printer to put some mark on the paper while he was printing it which could not be imitated.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The idea of having coloured paper is also a valuable one, because it would prevent a person seeing how the cross is marked. Of course, all that depends on what information we get from the Printing Bureau.

Mr. FOSTER. I think we would get on more quickly if we were to leave these amendments until the hon. member for Montmorency comes and give him an opportunity of bringing them up.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I communicated with the hon. member for Montmorency by wire and asked him to be here to-day. I was sorry to hear that his wife was so ill that it would be impossible for him to come, and that he has gone down to the country with her. How would it be to have the Bill go through, and then on the third reading, if the hon. gentleman proposes any of these amendments, he will have an opportunity of explaining them with the understanding that we might go back into committee and take up some of them, because, I am sure, we cannot adopt them all.

Mr. INGRAM. The other day we went over these proposed amendments, and some of them are pretty well agreed on. One hundred and eight was agreed on.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) proposes this amendment:

Section 107e. Each candidate can have only one place paid for in each polling subdivision for his election committee, under penalty for each contravention to a fine not exceeding dollars and an imprisonment of months in default of payment.

Mr. FITZPATRICK.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If I understand the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ingram) rather objects to 107e.

Mr. INGRAM. Yes.

The DEPUTY SPEAKER. It is proposed to insert in section 108 after the 11th line the following subsection:

(i) Every person who immediately previous to or during an election and by reason thereof, with a view of promoting and securing votes or of interfering with the freedom and sincerity of the electors or the electorate, causes temporary work to be performed by electors whom he employs and pays:

Every elector who participates in such work becomes incapable 'ipso facto' of voting at such election and incurs a penalty of dollars and an imprisonment of months in default of payment.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It strikes me that this is very hard lines on an elector who is employed for a day or two and who does not know anything about it. He simply goes and works for a man and he loses his vote in consequence. Every elector who participates in such work becomes ipso facto incapable of voting.

Mr. INGRAM. It is to stop this kind of thing being done where a man says: I will give you so much a day, and so on.

The DEPUTY SPEAKER. It is proposed by the hon. member for Montmorency to replace the proviso at the end of section 108 by the following:

Every person shall be guilty of bribery and shall be punishable accordingly:

Who to induce a person to allow himself to be nominated as a candidate, or to refrain from becoming a candidate, or to withdraw, if he has so become:

(1) Shall give or lend money or any valuable consideration whatever, or shall agree to give or lend, or shall offer or promise to try to procure for such person or for any other person, any money or valuable consideration whatever, or

(2) Shall give or promise any office, place of employment, or shall agree to give or procure, or shall offer or promise, or shall promise to procure or endeavour to procure such office, place or employment for such or any other person.

Mr. INGRAM. This is a proper provision to put in this Act, because it is not a proper thing for a man to be put into the field for the purpose of defeating one or both of the candidates named by the other parties. Is it not a fact that sometimes men are used for the purpose of defeating one party or the other? There ought be something put in this Act which will make it unlawful to have bogus nominations. A man who is bribed to come out for the purpose of defeating one or other of the candidates should be guilty of unlawful offence.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. This amendment, if adopted, might reach a case which we certainly ought not to punish. Take the case of a young man who offers himself as a candidate and he is assisted by his father ; that would be perfectly legitimate. Take the other case of a young man who has political aspirations and his father or his mother do not wish him to run, or even a friend, and they give him some consideration to abstain, the young man ought to be in a position to accept such inducement. There certainly should be some provision, however, to prevent a man being induced to withdraw in order to permit some one else to be elected ; because that is the worst kind of fraud.

Mr. INGRAM. A man may be nominated and it is known that he has no possibility of election, and he may be bribed to withdraw.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. There are certainly some cases of that kind which ought to be met, so as to prevent a fraud being perpetrated on the electors. Of course a poor man might want some of his friends to pay his legitimate expenses, and that could not be prevented. Under paragraph 2 of 108a, he would be prevented from doing that.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. A good many candidates are obliged to borrow money to put up their deposits.

Mr. INGRAM. I am afraid that will be particularly the case after this session.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL I would suggest the following amendment as 108a :

Every person is guilty of bribery and punishable as provided in section 108, who, to induce a person to allow himself to be nominated as a candidate, or to refrain from becoming a candidate, or to withdraw, if he has so become, gives or promises any office, place or employment, or agrees to give or procure, or offers or promises to procure or endeavours to procure such office, place or appointment for such another person.

Mr. A. W. PUTTEE (Winnipeg). It would be a great deal better to let that section alone. I think we are getting on dangerous ground right here. The genius of our election law should be to assist the people to bring out candidates and not put difficulties in the way of their coming out. To put in anything in the Act that would make it a stumbling-block for a man to present himself as a candidate, would be altogether wrong. I know the case of an election where his friends went to a man and said : If you run it shall not cost you 10 cents, and they got enough money to pay his deposit, and the man won.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The committee are unanimous that the proposed amendment, so far as it prohibits a poor man from receiving his aid to pay his deposit, should be struck out. The provision which we are aiming at is to prevent a man being nominated, and then fraudulently withdrawing. I would, however, agree with my hon. friend (Mr. Puttee), that we had better leave this clause stand.

On section 112,

Mr. INGRAM. I think a specified term of imprisonment for intimidation should be inserted in this section. Therefore, I move:

That section 112 is hereby amended by striking out all the words in the said section after the word 'shall' in the 18th line, and substituting the following therefor: 'be liable to a penalty of $200 or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour, or to both.

There are complaints of intimidation, and the House has seen fit not to adopt a half holiday or a holiday to give men an opportunity of voting without intimidation.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. What the hon. gentleman is aiming at is already provided for. The section says that the offender is guilty of an indictable offence, which, under the Code, makes him liable to imprisonment for any term up to five years.

Mr. INGRAM. It may be for only a week or a month. I think we should state the period of time during which he shall be imprisoned.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If you do that you withdraw all discretion from the presiding judge, and visit the same penalty on a man who commits a venial offence as on one who commits a grave offence. You thereby simply ensure that he shall not be punished at all.

Mr. POWELL. As the section stands, I think the only penalty imposed is the $200 fine. We must remember that the criminal law is construed very strictly.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. What construction would my hon. friend put upon the term 'indictable offence' ?

Mr. POWELL. There are dozens of instances in the Code in which a person is said to be guilty of an indictable offence and is punished by summary conviction. You cannot punish for a statutory indictable offence, such as this offence is, as you would in an ordinary common law case ; you must take the punishment which the statute provides. Did this come within the common law, the $200 fine might be cumulative ; but as the section stands, I think this is the only punishment that could be inflicted. I would like to have the opinion of the Solicitor General on that point.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I think we might add to the clause, instead of the word 'also,' the words 'in addition to the penalty thereby incurred.' That would make the forfeiture of $200 provided by this special Act an addition to the punishment of the indictable offence provided in the Code.

Amendment (Mr. Fitzpatrick) agreed to, and section as amended agreed to.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Would the informer get part of the penalty?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. No.

On section 125a,

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I have an amendment to propose to be called section 125a:

All placards, posters, publications and printed matter whatever placarded, posted or distributed during an election, having connection therewith or referring thereto, shall visibly bear on the face thereof the names and addresses of the printers and publishers thereof, and whoever prints, publishes, placards or distributes any such printed matter without such names and addresses as aforesaid, is liable to a penalty not exceeding $500 or imprisonment not exceeding twelve months, in default of payment.

This is intended to prevent the publication of scurrilous or defamatory matter.

Mr. FOSTER. You are passing this and when passed it becomes law—and I suppose there are millions of copies of printed documents of one kind or another already issued and sent out through the country, left in the hands of the committeemen and so so, ready to be presented to the electors as soon as the election is announced, and, in many cases, without any printer's name upon them. This literature has been sent out by both parties and will be distributed throughout the country for the coming election. Many copies, no doubt, will be posted—many of those adornment—object lessons, showing the repudiation of Grit promises—have already been printed and stacked up somewhere to be put on the boards.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Personally, I think it should be confined to defamatory or malicious matter. This section proposed would cover anything—for instance, the report of a speech in parliament handed by one elector to another during an election. The hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) has good ideas, but I cannot agree with this proposal.

Mr. INGRAM. The night before an election where a strong feeling among the people is in one direction, some document may be issued—

Mr. CAMPBELL. A roorback.

Mr. INGRAM. Exactly a roorback—trying to convince the people that one candidate has gone counter to this thing that the people so much favour. No respectable printer or publisher would print a document of that kind if his name had to be put on it.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I agree with the hon. member for East Elgin (Mr. Ingram). Perhaps the present section is too broad, but if we could devise some form of words to meet this case it would be well to do so.

Mr. FITZPATRICK.

Mr. FOSTER. Suppose we ask the Solicitor General to take that into consideration and frame a section designed to prevent the circulation of false and defamatory matter.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Then, 125a stands.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I think it would be well that we should go through the Bill as we have and leave these amendments untouched at present. They do not fit in with the Bill as it is, and it will be necessary to recast almost every line to make them fit in.

Mr. INGRAM. Is the Solicitor General going to have the Bill reprinted before the third reading?

Mr. FOSTER. That was suggested by the Prime Minister.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I think there would be some trouble in getting it done in time. If my hon. friend (Mr. Ingram) would look at the Bill he would see that the amendments are not so many.

On section 147,

Mr. INGRAM. This is a section which should be amended. The present way of paying returning officers is altogether wrong. His fees are according to the number of polling subdivisions. The way it is now a premium is offered to the returning officer to create a large number of polling subdivisions in which only a few votes may be cast, and still the candidate requires to supply agents at every booth. In Toronto there are subdivisions where there are only five or six votes cast, and it is outrageous that a candidate should be obliged to provide officers at each one of these booths. Take the city of Ottawa. There are far too many subdivisions, as the hon. member for Ottawa will bear me out in saying. If there are thirty polling subdivisions in an electoral district, the returning officer gets $60, and he gets $2 for every additional subdivision he creates. The result is that he creates more than are necessary, and thereby throws upon the candidates a great deal of extra trouble and upon the country a great deal of extra expense. Some means should be adopted by which we could pay a lump sum to the returning officer in cities, while in districts of vast area such as Algoma and in British Columbia, the remuneration of the returning officer might remain on the same basis as at present.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It is a great convenience to people in cities to have a reasonable number of polling stations. So far as my experience goes, the number has not been excessive. The returning officer has a great deal of work to do and gets very little for it, so I do not think we should endeavour to diminish his fees. I really do not know of any case in cities where an unnecessary number of polling divisions is established.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. As I understand it, a polling division is created for not less than 200 nor more than 300 voters. Therefore, I do not understand how such cases could occur as those mentioned by the hon. member for East Elgin (Mr. Ingram) where there are only five or six votes in a polling subdivision. I never heard of any such cases myself, although I have represented a city and also a large rural constituency. I never heard of a subdivision being created for a less number of voters than is specified by law.

Mr. INGRAM. The law is now that if there are over 300 voters you should establish an additional polling booth. There may be a partition, on one side a subdivision for names from A to H, and on the other side of the partition one for names from H to Z. If there is one additional in either partition, do you mean to say that the returning officer shall establish an additional polling booth and have $2 additional? The hon. member for Three Rivers says he never heard of a polling division having only six, or eight, or nine votes. As a matter of fact there are many such. We find in the city of Toronto there is one with six votes, another with eight and another with nine.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. What election is that?

Mr. INGRAM. That is the plebiscite. But it does not make any difference, the same thing would occur in Toronto in any other election.

Mr. MCGREGOR. No.

Mr. INGRAM. Who says no?

Mr. MCGREGOR. I do.

Mr. INGRAM. If he can produce one voters' list in Toronto that does not contain a few diversions like this, I will resign from this House.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Is it not a fact that under the provincial law you have polling subdivisions?

Mr. INGRAM. We have.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Well, then, the returning officer is bound to take these.

Mr. INGRAM. Not at all.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I notice that the fifth section, subsection b of the Franchise Act, provides that the polling subdivisions shall be those established at provincial elections. Our Bill provides that where there are no polling subdivisions, the returning officer shall subdivide the electoral districts into as many polling subdivisions as he deems necessary.

That seems very reasonable. If the province has subdivisions he adopts those, but if there are no subdivisions he makes a subdivision with the limitation that there must be less than 200 and not more than 300 electors as far as practicable.

Mr. MCGREGOR. It works all right.

Mr. INGRAM. It works all right for hon. gentlemen opposite, but not for us. Hon. gentlemen opposite have the inside track on the information.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ingram) say that in Toronto there are polling subdivisions that have only six or eight votes?

Mr. INGRAM. Yes.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I can understand that in a rural division, where people have to drive a long way, it might be necessary to have a polling subdivision with less than 200 votes, but not in a city. There is certainly a convenience in giving people every facility to vote, but there is another object, and it is to prevent people gathering in large numbers in any one place which is always a temptation to disorder. I think one of the greatest improvements in our election laws is the increasing of the number of subdivisions, so that the number of people at any one place is hardly large enough to get up a row.

Mr. HENDERSON. My recollection is quite distinct that there are polling places in Toronto where there are not more than five or six votes polled. This occurs in the business districts of the city. Business men live in other portions of the city, and they are on the list where they live and not where they do business.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. These are established by the provincial law.

Mr. INGRAM. I want to show the hon. Finance Minister the number of voters on the revised voters' lists in each polling subdivision—six, ten, twelve, and so on.

Mr. MCGREGOR. Take the voters' list.

Mr. INGRAM. That is the voters' list. Suppose you were going to have an election to-morrow, that would be the voters' list.

Mr. MCGREGOR. That must be under your returning officers. The next time it will be ours, and we will have that fixed right.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The Franchise Act, fifth section, subsection b, provides that:

The polling divisions shall be those established by or under the laws of that province for the purposes of provincial elections within the territory comprised in the electoral district for which such election is held.

We are supplementing this by making a provision which states, that wherever no such polling subdivision exists, the returning officer shall divide the electoral district. Wherever there are subdivisions the law provides that you shall adopt them. So that, my hon. friend (Mr. Ingram) sees that he must be wrong on that point.

Mr. INGRAM. In the province of Ontario under the Ontario law the rule is 200 voters to a polling subdivision, and in my own city there will be fourteen polling subdivisions, but, under this Bill, it gives us the right to have 300. You would not pretend to say that because there are more than 200 voters in a polling subdivision for local elections you would establish another one. You provide for polling subdivisions to be set apart and to be put in the proclamation. We are not in a position to say how many votes there are in a division, so that we could not strike the number in a division exactly, because our registration is not completed until almost the day before the election takes place. According to our Bill, if there were 900 voters there would be three subdivisions to be made. That is the distinction between the Ontario Act and our Bill, and that is the reason why they have fourteen subdivisions in my city, whereas, we might only have six polling subdivisions, divided from A to H, H to M, M to Z, and then, the polling booths are all in one building.

Mr. MCGREGOR. There is another reason, and that is, that it is so difficult to get men to go to the right poll. If the local election takes place at one poll and the Dominion at another, it is quite difficult for men to find out where to vote. Voters should know exactly where they should vote each time an election comes on. I am strongly in favour of the law as it stands.

Mr. INGRAM. The hon. gentleman is in favour of paying the deputy returning officer a premium for creating a lot of polling subdivisions.

Mr. MCGREGOR. We will not do it now. We will have not less than 200 and not more than 300 voters in each subdivision.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I would like to have an assurance that there is no trouble about the minimum number of voters in a subdivision. There are many rural subdivisions where you cannot have 200 people voting at one place. The Bill says that the returning officer shall, as far as practicable, subdivide so that there will be not less than 200 and not more than 300 voters in each subdivision. That is all right as respects the maximum, but there must be in some parts of the country subdivisions in which there will be less than 200.

Mr. FOSTER. I think that is perfectly plain.

Mr. INGRAM. Under the Municipal Act in townships in Ontario they have certain polling subdivisions. Under this Act they will still have these polling subdivisions and know where to vote, because the returning officer in creating the polling subdivisions has that fact before him. But it is in cities where registration occurs that the difficulty will arise and where we will be offering a premium to the returning officer to make a lot of subdivisions.

Mr. MCGREGOR. It is not a very heavy premium.

Mr. INGRAM. In a city like Toronto it is a big premium.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Before we touch the forms, I would like to go back to section 72. We agreed upon something the other day, and we have all forgotten it. We agreed to amend section 72 by inserting in the sixteenth line, after the word 'vote' 'and to the right of such name or names.' That is, the voter must put his mark to the right of the candidate's name.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If that was agreed to by the committee, I am not going to press strongly any objection of mine. But everybody who has had to do with elections knows that in every polling division there are five or ten voters who will persist in making their crosses under the name or in the name, or some where else in the space marked off for the candidate's name than to the right. The Supreme Court has held that a ballot so marked is good. I understand the Solicitor General wants to run a line down the ballot after the names, and provide that the voter must make his mark to the right of that line within the space after the candidate's name. But, so long as it is perfectly clear who the voter is voting for, which is the case when the cross is within the space containing the candidate's name, why not leave that ballot good? The proposal to have a broad black line between the names of candidates is an excellent one. No question can arise then as to which side of the line the vote is marked upon. It would be better, it seems to me, to allow the ballot to be good if the cross is put anywhere within the space containing the candidate's name.

Mr. McNEILL. No, no.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am very strongly of that opinion.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. It is six o'clock, and we had better not dispose of that question now. I believe we can devise a form of ballot that will leave only one space to make a mark in. I have had an inspiration on that, which I have sent to the printer. I will not guarantee that it is right, but I think it is worth considering.

It being six o'clock, the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS.

(The House resumed in Committee.)

On form 'G' (oath of attestation of the nomination paper),

Mr. McALISTER. Section 35 provides that the returning officer shall require the person, or one or more of the persons, producing a nomination paper to make oath before him, whereas form G provides that the oath shall be taken before a justice of the peace. I would move that the words 'justice of the peace' be struck out, and the words 'returning officer' substituted.

Amendment agreed to.

On form 'L' (directions for the guidance of electors in voting).

Mr. INGRAM. I would suggest that the form of ballot be inserted in these directions, so that there would be no mistake about it.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. That is a reasonable suggestion, and I accept it.

On schedule 2,

Mr. PUTTEE. Is that note increasing the fee in Winnipeg to be put in there?

Mr. ELLIS. I have no objection to it, but I think it is a great mistake to legislate on the idea that Winnipeg is more expensive than other places. I do not think there is any reason for that.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. It seems to me that we should not distinguish between Winnipeg and the other great cities.

Mr. PUTTEE. It has been usual to do so by order in council.

Mr. FOSTER. I did not know it was because Winnipeg had to receive a double fee that it was left out so long.

Mr. PUTTEE. They refused to give it this time. As a matter of fact you cannot get a constable there for $1 a day. The candidates have to get their friends to act as constables.

Mr. FOSTER. You can get some Doukhobors down.

On schedule 3,

Mr. FOSTER. What is the effect of this amendment that you propose there?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. This will put Manitoba on the same footing as the other provinces. The only thing remaining now is as to the provision for the soldiers in South Africa, and the form of the ballot.

Mr. POWELL. I submitted to the Solicitor General the other day the following amendments to section 79:

(g) Who being a deputy returning officer, fraudulently puts otherwise than as authorized by section 70 of this Act, his initials on the back of any paper purporting to be or capable of being used as a ballot paper at any election, or

(h) Who without being authorized by the returning officer prints any ballot paper or what purports to be or is capable of being used as a ballot paper at any election, or

(i) Who being authorized by the returning officer to print the ballot papers for any election, fraudulently prints more ballot papers than he is so authorized to print, or

(j) Who, except for the bona fide purposes of this Act, has in his possession or gives or otherwise disposes of to any person any paper being or purporting to be, or capable of being used as a ballot paper at any election, or—

The Solicitor General pointed out that subsection a. of section 79, was in conflict with some of these provisions; apparently it is, but I think really they deal with different matters. Section a in the Bill reads:

(a) Forges, counterfeits, fraudulently alters, defaces or fraudulently destroys a ballot paper or the initials of the deputy returning officer signed thereon.

That contemplates meddling with the ballot after it is put in the box.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I think so.

Mr. POWELL. My amendment goes further than that, and it bears on what might be done before polling day, for the purpose of perpetrating a fraud.

(g) Who being a deputy returning officer, fraudulently puts otherwise than as authorized in section 70 of the Act, his initials on the back of any paper purporting to be or capable of being used as a ballot paper at any election, or

That would meet the case of the returning officer who was in league or fraudulent collusion with parties outside, to assist in putting fraudulent ballots in the box. They get his initials on the ballots, and take them outside, and these bogus papers are brought in.

(h) Who without being authorized by the returning officer, prints any ballot paper or what purports to be or is capable of being used as a ballot paper at any election, or

(i) Who being authorized by the returning officer to print the ballot papers for any election, fraudulently prints more ballot papers than he is so authorized to print, or

It does not include those which are destroyed in the process of printing. The words 'except for the bona fide purposes of this Act,' you will readily see protects the printer; and any man who outside of that fraudulently has in his possession any ballot paper, is liable to punishment. It is by means of having these ballot papers outside to distribute among the voters, that a great many frauds are perpetrated. I think when the Solicitor General looks into the matter, he will see there is no collision between the sections as they stand here with the exception possibly of subsection b: 'Without authority supplies a ballot paper to any person.' That is included in the one marked J, but I think, as mine goes further, it had better take the place of it. Suppose the printer is authorized to print 350, and he prints 400, he would be liable; but I will put in the word 'fraudulently' so that he would only be liable in case he printed them with fraudulent intent. The last clause I do not think should be qualified by that term :

(j) Who, except for the bona fide purposes of this Act, has in his possession, or gives, or otherwise disposes of, to any person of any paper being or purporting to be, or capable of being used as a ballot paper at any election, or

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman knows that in most districts, we have a form of ballot printed in all the newspapers for the instruction of the electors, and this might be taken to cover that.

Mr. POWELL. They can put on it 'this is simply for the purpose of instruction.' I would call the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to this fact, that it is absolutely necessary, by some very stringent measure to stop the circulation of these ballots. Fraudulent manipulation will take advantage of it. If you give any loophole at all, they will come in and perpetrate the fraud. The printers can guard themselves by putting on the face of it these words: 'This is for the purpose of instructing voters,' so it does not purport to be a bona fide ballot paper at all.

Mr. McNEILL. If we have concluded with the consideration of the Bill, I would mention to the hon. the Solicitor General, that he promised to allow me to make a suggestion with regard to sealing the ballot box. I would also mention to the hon. gentleman that I propose to endeavour to draft something which will, if possible, impose a mechanical difficulty upon the deputy returning officer in reference to some of the frauds that have been discussed.

Committee rose and reported progress.

SUPPLY.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. JAMES CLANCY (Bothwell). I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals if he is prepared to give us the papers I asked for in regard to the Galops Channel. I handed the hon. Minister of Finance a list of them at the morning sitting.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I received the memo. and gave it to the deputy minister who is getting the information. He will be here very shortly and I have no doubt he will have it.

Lake St. Louis Channel—Forming channel $10,000

Mr. G. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.) What is to be done here?

Mr. POWELL.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That is practically to clean up the bottom of the channel and finish it.

Lachine Canal—Dredge vessels ..... $2,000

Mr. H. A. POWELL (Westmoreland). What is that for?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Two additional dredge vessels.

Mr. FOSTER. One thousand dollars each?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. What kind of vessels do you get for $1,000?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. They are scows or barges. We require to keep a number of these on hand.

Mr. FOSTER. How do you get them built? Do you call for tenders?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. They are built, sometimes by our own men, and in the cases where we have them built by others we generally call for tenders.

Mr. FOSTER. Will these be built by tender and contract?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not know whether we will build them ourselves or build them by tender and contract.

Mr. FOSTER. Where do you build them?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. On the canal wherever they are required to be used.

Mr. FOSTER. Have you shops there?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I guess so.

Mr. FOSTER. You guess so?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. We have them on all the canals.

Grenville Canal—Enlargement ..... $5,000

Mr. FOSTER. Let us have the explanation.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The contractors have completed the work. They have been paid $87,150. There was an appropriation in 1899-1900 of $7,155, and we require $5,000 more to complete the payments under the contract.

Farran's Point Canal—Enlargement .... $140,310

Mr. FOSTER. Let us have the explanation of that.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. We require this amount to pay what we will owe at the end of the month for the work that has been done on the Farran's Point Canal. The canal construction company's estimates already passed amount to $65,335, and the drawback is $12,000. An estimate has come in and others will come in which we think will absorb this amount, perhaps not all, because, when this estimate was made three or four months ago, we judged that there would be that amount of work to be done. I am not quite so sure in regard to it now, but we cannot tell exactly what the amount will be. We may not require it all perhaps, but we may come very close to it.

Mr. POWELL. How much has been spent on that work up to date?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Including drawback the contractors have been paid $78,000.

North channel, forming ..... $208,700

Mr. FOSTER. Give us the explanation of that.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. This amount is somewhat larger than we are going to require. This case is somewhat analogous to that I have mentioned. It is because when we made up our estimates we expected there would have been $208,700 required during the current year. We are not going to require that amount. The most that will have been earned will be $170,000. I am proposing to reduce this vote by $38,700, which will make the vote $170,000. The estimate down to November, 1899, was $92,331. We judged when we made up the estimates that there would be required up to May, 31, $34,000, which, added to previous expenditure, would make $127,000, and that by June 30, the balance would be required. We find that we will require only $42,000 to pay the estimate due, which will make $170,000.

Mr. JOHN HAGGART (South Lanark). What is the total expenditure and the amount that will be required to finish the work?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. There has been paid to the contractors up to March, 1900, $703,480, and the expenditure in connection with engineers, &c., has been $718,984.

Mr. POWELL. Who was responsible for commencing the work?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It was strongly recommended by the engineer of the department.

Mr. POWELL. When was it commenced?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. In 1897.

Mr. FOSTER. How much has been spent on it so far?

Mr. POWELL. $718,984. The only object of this work is apparently to save distance, and I would ask how much distance has been saved?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I cannot tell the hon. gentleman. It was very strongly recommended by the engineers.

Mr. HAGGART. There is $1,100,000 spent on the work, and how much besides for the range lights?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. $1,000, which will be charged to income account.

Mr. HAGGART. I again enter my protest as I did when this vote first came up. I say it is entirely a useless work. There is no necessity for it at all. There is a deep enough channel on the American side right down to the top of the rapids, and this expenditure of $1,100,000 will make it no better, or as good a channel as the one we have already.

Mr. POWELL. Is it any deeper than the old channel?

Mr. HAGGART. No.

Mr. POWELL. I passed through it two or three times. I do not think at the most distant point it is a quarter of a mile shorter than the old channel. I could understand the advantages of a straight channel if it was going to save any distance.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It gives you a very direct course.

Mr. POWELL. But the other is not a circuitous course.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It is not by any means a very direct course. This north channel gives us a splendid waterway and a direct entrance into the canal. It has certainly very many advantages over the other, and it was very strongly recommended by the engineer. I brought down last year or the year before, the reports of the engineer giving his reasons for constructing this channel. Mr. Rubidge, who has exceptional knowledge of the St. Lawrence canals, recommended it very strongly, and his reasons were fortified by the chief engineer of the department.

Mr. POWELL. Because you save the quarter of a mile would be no reason why this channel should be built at such an immense cost. If there were obstructions in the way of navigation in the old channel, and it would be cheaper to construct this new channel than to remove them, there would be a good reason, but I am told there are no obstructions in the old channel which is a wide and a good channel.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It is not half as good as this channel.

Mr. POWELL. But the same argument would tend in favour of dredging every river and making a straight line from the source to the mouth.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. If you consult the shipping men they will tell you that it is most important to get a direct entrance into the mouth of your canal, and the old route and the American channel does not give you that. When you are doing such a work it is very desirable that you should make your improvements sufficient to give you an adequately wide channel for all purposes. There can be no question as to the advantages of this new channel over the old. The engineers and the shipping men are in favour of it. I do not pretend to have any expert knowledge of it myself, but the officers of the department very strongly recommended it. It has been discussed in parliament and money has been voted for it on three different occasions. The sum which is now being asked for is nearly sufficient to complete the work.

Mr. POWELL. The object is to get a direct entrance to the canal?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes, and a wider channel.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the length of that channel?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. One mile and a quarter.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the length of the old channel?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Following the United States channel?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It is about a mile longer.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. FOSTER. Let us have the correct mileage.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. My deputy tells me it is a mile longer, and the old channel would be two miles and a quarter, according to that.

Mr. FOSTER. I am told by people who have gone through there that there is very little difference between the two channels in length or in depth of water, and that the only difference is that the new channel is if anything more direct. A million and a quarter of dollars is an immense amount of money to spend in making a gain in directness to a very small extent comparatively.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The chief engineer says the old channel is about a mile longer, and according to the engineer's estimate it would cost more to deepen the old channel than to do this work. Of course, there is only a depth of nine feet in the other, whereas we are now getting fifteen or sixteen feet.

Mr. HAGGART. Notwithstanding the statement of the deputy minister, I beg to differ with him entirely as to the distance. From Prescott down, I do not think there is a difference of one-sixteenth of a mile. As to the depth of water being only nine feet, that depth is confined to one little point as you turn around the island, and the recommendation to the department, if I remember rightly, was that either that point should be removed or the north channel deepened. I stated to the engineer that under the Treaty of Washington we had as much right to navigate the American channel as the Americans, and I refused to entertain the proposal to deepen the north channel or even to incur the expenditure for deepening that little portion around the point, although that might be necessary. I am aware that it is a fad of the engineer, Mr. Rubidge to have the north channel deepened, and that he has recommended it to the minister.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. What was the superintending engineer's estimate of the cost of deepening the old channel?

Mr. HAGGART. If I remember rightly, it was in the neighbourhood of $200,000, and the deepening of the north channel, instead of being $1,500,000, was less than half that amount. Even if the north channel is deepened, I believe that nearly all the vessels going down, certainly those going down the Galops Rapids, will go by the American channel, and will not use the north channel at all.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman had these estimates before him, and if the chief engineer's memory is correct, the hon. gentleman is very much at fault. The engineer's estimate of the cost of dredging the channel to 200 feet in width was over $750,000. The shipping men and the newspapers complained that that would not be wide enough, and we met their expectations by widening the channel; and I think there has been no more popular change made in the St. Lawrence channel than the adoption of this new route. The hon. gentleman was averse to entertaining the recommendations of the engineer, but he stands almost alone in that respect. He will not find a shipping man on the river who does not prefer this channel instead of the other. In the other case, there is a sharp turn to get into the mouth of the canal, whereas here you have a wide channel giving the necessary depth and a straight course right into the mouth of the canal.

Mr. HAGGART. I suppose the minister is not aware that above the Galops Rapids there was a contract let for the deepening of the channel to sixteen or seventeen feet, the contractors being W. Allan & Co; and the only part to be deepened was that little part from the Galops Rapids to the mouth of the Galops Canal. Nearly every vessel that goes down will not go through the north channel at all, but will go down through the American channel and through the Galops Rapids.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman is absolutely wrong. They will do nothing of the kind. The shipping men say directly the reverse of what the hon. gentleman says.

Mr. HAGGART. It is not proposed to deepen the water from the north channel to the Galops Rapids, so that if the vessels go down the north channel they cannot get into the rapids. Any vessel going down the rapids will naturally use the American channel.

St. Lawrence River—Gas buoys..... $37,160

Mr. FOSTER. Are these in the canals or along the St. Lawrence River?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. They are not in the canals, but in the channel wherever there are any obstructions, and are for the purpose of guiding ships through the channel into the canal.

Mr. FOSTER. Is it the custom of the Department of Canals to provide all these lighting arrangements along the line of the canals and the river stretches leading to the canals, or is it done by the Marine and Fisheries Department?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. We have been required to do it. I think that there is no fixed rule, but an overlapping of jurisdiction as between the Department of Railways and Canals and the Department of Marine and Fisheries and the Department of Public Works in many of these things sometimes takes place. This is a very necessary vote. We require to put down twenty-four gas buoys. We have been erecting lights in some places on the reaches between the canals, but my department has not erected all the lights on the whole of the St. Lawrence system.

Mr. FOSTER. Have you any division of territory by which the Department of Railways and Canals undertakes the lighting of the canal system, including the river stretches between these on the St. Lawrence River, and the Department of Marine and Fisheries takes charge of the other lights. On the lakes, of course the Marine Department has always had charge of the lights. It would seem as though the navigation and aids of navigation were entirely in the hands of the Marine Department, and the question with me is whether there is not a confusion of jurisdiction between the departments.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. There is no conflict of jurisdiction. I do not know whether a conflict of jurisdiction might not possibly arise, but none has arisen. These buoys have to be placed, and we have assumed the expense of providing the necessary lights for the reaches between the canals.

Mr. HAGGART. Where are the buoys to be placed? The Marine Department has charge of the whole buoy system from Kingston to Prescott. I cannot understand where the hon. gentleman is going to place twenty-four gas buoys between there and Montreal.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. You cannot run on the river at night without lights. As to where these buoys are to be placed, they are located on the plan, and I will lay the plan on the Table so that the hon. gentleman can see for himself. I do not carry in my mind the names of points along the reaches where these buoys are to be placed.

Mr. POWELL. Will the maintenance be expensive?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No, these gas buoys are very cheaply maintained. They are a new description of buoys. Last year, or the year before, was the first time they were used on this continent, and they were used by the United States government. I decided last year to procure some of them and sent an order to England, which is the only place where they are manufactured. We found that the United States government had preceded us with an order for some ninety odd.

Mr. POWELL. They have them on the river too?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes. We could not get them last year, but are getting them this year. They are not all here yet, but we are getting them as rapidly as they can be furnished.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON (Three Rivers). The hon. minister is not au fait with the progress of Canada when he says that these gas buoys have only been known here since last year. They were introduced here several years ago. We have them between Quebec and Montreal, and we have them at the Traverse and all through the St. Lawrence River. They have been there to my knowledge five or six years at the very least. I cannot understand where these buoys are going to be placed, and I think that really we are not receiving the full information we are entitled to.

Mr. WM. MCGREGOR (North Essex). In the Detroit River the American government have placed seven or eight of those gas buoys, and there is not a buoy equal to them. In introducing them on the St. Lawrence, the minister will be doing a good work. On the Detroit River, in about twelve miles, the American government have placed seven of those buoys, and they have twelve other lights which they keep themselves and each one of which is in Canadian waters. Our Canadians have the same use of them as the Americans, and the Americans keep them at their own expense, at a cost of $4,000 or $5,000 a year, a large proportion of which is met by subscription outside the government.

Mr. FOSTER. It seems to me that the lighting of the channels along navigation belongs to the Department of Marine, and I do not understand why the Minister of Railways takes it up. But, if he is taking up the lighting of that portion of the river, he must be prepared to give us the details, just as the Department of Marine does. He must know where they are to be placed, and should tell us, and also where he gets them and the price.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. If the hon. gentleman wants to know the precise points where they are to be placed, I will have a plan of the channel laid on the Table.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the cost ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. They cost $1,570 each, so this sum of $37,000 will pay for twenty-four. The buoys the member for Three Rivers (Sir Adolphe Caron) speaks of must have been of a very inferior quality. These have recently come into use, they are being put down by the American government, and are better than any that have been used heretofore.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I do not pretend to be an expert in these matters, but I would like to refer the hon. gentleman to his colleague, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. When these gas buoys were introduced into the St. Lawrence River I have heard the Minister of Marine and Fisheries praising them up as being a great improvement, and I have no doubt they are. The hon. gentleman, if he refers to the estimates of the Department of Marine and Fisheries, will see that these buoys are laid down every spring and the cost of laying them down and filling them appears in the estimates. Now it would be hardly fair for the Minister of Railways and Canals to accuse his colleague of the Department of Marine and Fisheries of introducing an inferior article. But, I never heard before of the Department of Railways and Canals undertaking the work of the Department of Marine and Fisheries in introducing these lights. I have always understood that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries was charged with the duty of looking after the lighting of our rivers and our lakes. I want to say also that if the hon. gentleman will consult his colleague he will find that the buoys on the River St. Lawrence were imported from England, and they were supposed to be the very best that could be obtained for the purposes for which they were intended. If they are not, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries will have to explain why he imported an inferior article and allowed his colleague to steal a march on him and get a better article than he has introduced on our rivers, where the navigation is as important, if not more so, than it is on the Galops Canal where these lights are supposed to serve.

Mr. MCGREGOR. This is a new patent, this is a different light from the light the minister is speaking of.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Does the hon. gentleman know much more about it than I do ?

Mr. MCGREGOR. Yes, I do.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Then I would like the hon. gentleman to do better than the Minister of Railways and Canals, and to give some explanations to the House that the minister cannot give.

Mr. HAGGART. I think we will have to ask this item to stand over until the minister can furnish us the explanation.

Soulanges Canal—Construction ..... $263,000

Mr. HAGGART. Will the hon. gentleman just explain what this is for.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. This amount will be required in order to pay up the estimates upon the contractors' work down to the end of the last fiscal year. We have been short on our estimates, and quite a number of the contractors have been short therefor in their payments. I will give a statement of the details that are payable out of this sum. $70,000 are on progress estimates. Drawbacks after November and December: Poupore & Fraser, $1,467.05; C. H. Raynor, $6,059.09; Rogers & Taylor, $386.15; Manning & McDonald, section 9, $1,989.88; do, section 13, $3,978.05; Archibald Stewart, $16,693.48; James Battle, $2,592.76; Bellhouse, Dillon & Company, $735; Andrew Onderdonk, $7,105.51; M. J. Hogan, $20,094.21; Dominion Bridge Company, $1,752.40; Ryan & McDonell, $50,960.16; Charles H. Raynor, (culverts), $4,355.06; J. and R. Miller, $482.19; Dominion Bridge Company (stone sluices), $5,694; Manning & McDonald (dredging), $998; Canadian General Electric Company, $7,533.26. Total, $132,879.25.

Mr. FOSTER. Does that finish it ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No, that is required up to the end of the last fiscal year.

Mr. FOSTER. How much more will it take to finish it ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It will cost altogether $6,400,000 to finish the canal.

Mr. FOSTER. How much more besides this vote?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. With the estimates we are now considering, and the amounts heretofore paid, and what we are asking for next year, there will be $4,799,000. The balance will be required.

Mr. HAGGART. Will the minister please tell how he could make such a mistake in his estimate last year? He did not tell us then that it would require any such amount as $6,400,000 to finish the work. And he was to have had it completed last fall. Intending to complete it last fall, he surely asked for all that would be required.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It is hardly worth while for the hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart), to repeat that statement. He will fail to find that I made any such statement as that I expected to finish the canal last fall. We expected the canal to be sufficiently advanced towards completion to furnish a fourteen-foot channel through. But that is vastly different from saying that the canal would be completed—there is a great deal of work to be done before it is all finished. But the canal already furnishes a practicable fourteen-foot channel, that vessels can use, and great numbers of them are going through.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the work that yet remains to be done?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. There is a great deal of dressing and lining up, and also sodding. The masonry has by no means been finished, nor has the lock work.

Mr. HAGGART. Is it being used now by vessels going up and down?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes, by any number of them.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. minister must not say that I attributed a statement to him which he did not make. He said practically the canals would be finished last fall, except the Galops Canal, and they might have to fall back upon an arrangement they had made with Mr. Davis for a year for that.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That is another thing altogether.

Mr. HAGGART. If I remember rightly, it is stated from the speech from the Throne this year, that the waterway had been completed and a fourteen-foot navigation—

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Oh, no. If the hon. gentleman will read the speech from the Throne, he will find it says that the canals are sufficiently completed to enable us to provide a fourteen-foot channel. They are not finished in the sense of all the work being done.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. minister can give us, in any case, the estimated cost of the Soulanges Canal, as commenced, and whether it will be completed within the estimate—or how much it exceeds the estimate?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It was started under the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Haggart's) administration, and probably knows the estimate made when it was started.

Mr. HAGGART. A minister should not come to the House, asking votes for supply without being ready to give the estimated cost of the work under consideration, and also the expenditure upon it. He should have those figures ready.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I told the hon. gentleman what we estimate the cost will be.

Mr. HAGGART. I am asking what the department estimated to be the cost of completing the Soulanges Canal, and how it turns out in comparison with that estimate. Surely that is a question I am entitled to have answered.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart) called upon me to say what was the estimated cost of the canal when it was commenced. I suggested that he would probably have that information, as he commenced the canal, and I did not, I have given what we have estimated the cost to be, on completion, $6,400,000. If he wants to know what it was estimated at under the late administration, I will look up the information and give it to him.

Mr. HAGGART. I do not remember it myself. But that is information that a minister should have on every item. I never ventured to explain my estimates as a minister without having from the department the estimated cost and the actual expenditure on every work. Here are the words from the speech from the Throne.

I am pleased to say that our canal system, connecting the great lakes with the Atlantic seaboard, has been completed so as to allow vessels having a draft of fourteen feet to pass from the head of Lake Superior to the sea.

Mr. MCGREGOR. You are both right.

Mr. FOSTER. At least, we are having a very interesting commentary on the claim made by the Prime Minister last August. The right hon. gentleman, in the course of his peregrinations through Ontario, took occasion, at one or two of his large meetings, to claim the whole credit for the canal system, not only for the origination of it, but for its prosecution. And the opinion he expressed and the impression he left on his audience, was that these large expenditures of money were caused by the fact that his government had taken up the canal system, and whereas the Liberal-Conservatives had simply dawdled over the work from the time of Mr. Mackenzie down, and had done comparatively nothing, the present government had been bold enough to spend the money and complete the system. And the statement was made over and over again, that by the end of last year's navigation, the canal system would be completed so as to afford a fourteen-foot passage for all vessels.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. So it was.

Mr. FOSTER. Here is one canal unfinished, and it was put into the mouth of the Governor General when the House was opened, in the speech from the Throne, that the system was completed. Here is one of the portions of the canal system upon which $1,200,000 has been spent, and the minister is asking for millions upon millions of dollars to complete this very system which we were told last autumn had been completed and wonderful glory and praise were reflected upon this administration for taking hold of that system, spending money on it and completing it, that there was no dawdling about it, that it was no longer in embryo, but that it was now an accomplished fact. Well, it is not an accomplished fact. The hon. gentleman is spending millions and millions of dollars yet. I have listened to many explanations by the minister, but if I have ever listened to a lame explanation, this is one.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I would suggest that the hon. gentleman refresh his memory by looking back at the explanations made by his friend on his right (Mr. Haggart), when explanations were given by him on the estimates, and he will see how elaborate and detailed they were. He can make a comparison.

Mr. HAGGART. I suppose the hon. gentleman has no objection to letting the item stand until he can get the estimated cost of the construction of this work?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have the most decided objection to letting the item stand for such a purpose, because I have given the estimated cost three or four times. I have told the committee that the estimate cost of this canal from beginning to end is $6,400,000.

Mr. HAGGART. This is the actual cost. What I want to get is the estimated cost by the department before the work was undertaken.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That you ought to know; I was not there.

The DEPUTY SPEAKER. Shall this resolution be adopted?

Mr. HAGGART. No, it will not be adopted until we get the estimated cost. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) will please explain some things in connection with the Soulanges Canal which I intend to deal with. There was a quantity of lime—you cannot call it cement—from Thorold, put in there. It was contrary to the advice of the engineer, because the engineer reported to me when I was at the head of the department that it was not fit cement to use in the construction of locks. Notwithstanding the advice of the engineer, I think the hon. gentleman paid some $20,000 for this cement. It was a pity that such cement should have been used in good work of this kind. The engineer was examined before the Public Accounts Committee and said that the material was not fit to use. I would like to know what was done with the $20,000 worth of Thorold cement that was purchased.

Mr. FOSTER.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The question of Thorold cement has been the subject of a couple of debates in this House, and it cannot be that the hon. gentleman is desirous of obtaining information on that subject, because he already knows all about it. He knows that a contract was made with the company in Thorold for a quantity of their cement. I stated to the House that the cement was procured on the recommendation of persons who had used it. It had been used on the Welland Canal, and it had been used by Mr. W. B. Thompson, who had the highest opinion of its quality and value, and by other engineers, and on the strength of these opinions, and desiring to favour a home industry, I gave the Thorold company an opportunity of tendering with others for cement to be supplied on this canal. It was to stand a certain test the same as the other cements. It was tested and stood the test. We had it tested not only down on the canal, but up here by the expert in the Public Works Department, and it stood the test. There seems to have been a very serious defect in a portion of the cement furnished, because, after some of it had been put into the construction it failed, and we discontinued the use of it.

Mr. FOSTER. What was done with it ultimately?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. We did not take any more, and we did not pay for any more.

Mr. FOSTER. What became of what you did take?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. A portion of it went into the work.

Mr. FOSTER. What became of the other portion?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I suppose the other portion is lying there yet.

Mr. FOSTER. And the whole cost of it was $28,000 ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No, we paid no such money as that.

Mr. FOSTER. How much ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Not over $22,000 or $23,000. We paid no $28,000.

Mr. FOSTER. You paid $22,000 ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. We refused to pay any more, and a suit is now pending in the Exchequer Court upon the question of our liability.

Mr. FOSTER. Which the minister will not defend, I suppose ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Which the minister will defend, and is defending.

Mr. FOSTER. Not with much vigour ; that is a very favourite device, you know.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. My hon. friend may think that. I am not very much concerned about what he thinks. I say it will be defended. The cement was not of the quality that these gentlemen undertook to furnish us. A portion of it was not, at all events.

Mr. FOSTER. And what it happens to come to is exactly this, that the minister went against the advice of his engineers.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, against Mr. Munro's advice as testified before the Public Accounts Committee. He makes a contract for $20,000 worth of cement, which is useless, very little of which has gone into any kind of work, and when he is asked about the rest he states that it is lying there, and there is no doubt about it that the minister is here. We have lost about $4,000 on the emergency food, which presents itself as about as scaly a thing as has ever been before this House, and here is $22,000 which the minister, a tyro, who knew nothing about it, who went against the direct testimony and advice of his engineers in charge of the works, spent, $22,000, not of his own money, but of the people's money which is thrown into a sink hole and allowed to lie around as rubbish. He comes and says it is not much of a matter because, when I say it is $28,000 he says that it is only $22,000. It does not matter ; in this carnival of expenditure, $22,000 is nothing. What is the total amount of the claim pending in the Exchequer Court ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. We have in the department estimated that the gross amount that will be paid for this cement will not exceed $17,000. We have a deposit which we have refused to surrender, and we have a drawback which amounts to something over $5,000, so that $17,000 will be the amount that will have been paid for the cement. A considerable portion of that has gone into use in the back works of the locks, and while the gross loss is more than it should be, I do not imagine it will be more than five or six thousand dollars. It is entirely incorrect to say that all the engineers of the department were opposed to the use of this cement.

Mr. FOSTER. My only charge was that Mr. Munro, the engineer in charge of the work, was absolutely opposed to it.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Mr. Munro had a very decided opinion against the use of any cement made in Canada. He also had a very decided opinion against Stewart being allowed to take stone out of a certain quarry. While he is an excellent engineer he has strong opinions upon many questions in which other engineers do not agree with him. I took it upon myself, supported by engineers' opinions, to decide against Mr. Munro as regards the stone.

Mr. FOSTER. Was it an engineer of your own department or of the Department of Public Works ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The Railway Department.

Mr. FOSTER. Is the hon. gentleman certain ? My recollection is that it was the engineer of the Public Works Department.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The engineer of the Public Works Department expressed no opinion to me upon the subject.

Mr. FOSTER. That came out in the evidence.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not know what came out in evidence. I say that Mr. G. W. Thompson recommended the cement very strongly, as it had been used on works on which he was in charge on the canals.

Mr. GIBSON. The whole of the Welland Canal.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The whole of the Welland Canal, I am told, was built with the Battle cement. I can tell the hon. gentleman that Mr. Coste never expressed any opinion to me.

Mr. FOSTER. It was not Mr. Coste. The minister has made all this palaver and he has not yet told us what claim is made in the Exchequer Court.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The claim is made for the cement they furnished and which we declined to pay for. They are suing for the return of the deposit and for the additional cement that was furnished beyond that which we paid for.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. What does it represent in figures ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not know exactly what the figures are. They have not got along so far in the suit as to furnish the items.

Mr. FOSTER. The minister tells us that they have gone before the Exchequer Court and that they have not named the amount of their claim.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I refer to their petition of right.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the minister still persist in saying that they simply asked the Exchequer Court to give them back their deposit, and something for the cement without stating how much ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I suppose they also ask damages on their contract.

Mr. FOSTER. Is it usual to put a claim before the Exchequer Court in that indefinite way without mentioning the sum claimed ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The petition does not give the particulars of the claim. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) is evidently speaking of something he has no experience about. The petition usually sets the claim out in a general way and the particulars will have to be furnished later.

Mr. FOSTER. Seeing that I know nothing about it and that I am so anxious for information, will the minister tell me how many barrels of cement he bought, what was the price per barrel and what is the amount already paid.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I cannot tell you.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the hon. gentleman bring down the information ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. I find that the Premier, speaking at Bowmanville on October 16, last year, said :

To Alex. Mackenzie is due the policy we are now following. He commenced to deepen the Welland Canal.

Which is not true.

He deepened it to a depth of fourteen feet.

Which is not true.

But for eighteen years afterwards the work went on at snail's pace.

Which is still less true.

The Conservatives did practically nothing with these works, but when we came into office we undertook, and successfully, to complete them in three years.

Mr. BLAIR.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell) thinks it was completed in three years, but the Minister of Railways is asking us for millions to complete it this year, and on one link of the Soulanges Canal he has still to spend $1,200,000.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Not at all. It was estimated that it would take $6,400,000 to cover the whole cost from beginning to end. Our present appropriation in the main estimates brings down the total amount to $4,800,000, and, of course, there is a very considerable sum which will be due that will not come in until the final estimates. There are drawbacks and all that which we cannot tell what they will amount to now. The total will not exceed the estimate of $6,400,000.

Mr. FOSTER. And you spent $4,800,000 ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I explained to the committee that there will be considerable money necessary for lining up the canals, sodding it, making the roads, coping, and electric light and all that, and there is some dredging to be done.

Mr. FOSTER. When does the hon. gentleman think that canal will be completed ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The sum stated by me to the committee as the amount paid, $4,800,000, was only what was paid to the contractors. I did not fully state the whole amount paid, however, because the expenditure up to the 30th of June, 1899, including payment outside of contractors is $5,098,259, and from the 1st of July to the 1st of December, 1899, $330,743.88.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman was nearly $700,000 out in his first statement.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That is all.

Mr. FOSTER. That is the way we get information. If we did not persist in getting the minister to his feet after the greatest trouble, parliament and the country would not know that $700,000 more had been paid than the minister stated. We have not yet the answer from the minister which he started to give as to when the system would be finished.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The chief engineer's opinion is, that the work on the Soulanges Canal will be entirely finished by the end of the present year.

Mr. FOSTER. And it will cost how much ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. We will not pay the final estimates at that time; but it is estimated that when the final estimates are paid it will have cost $6,400,000.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Surely the Minister of Railways must have misapprehended the question put by the hon. member for York when he asked what was the claim made against the department by the contractors for the Thorold cement. The hon. gentleman knows that no claim can be made before any court of justice without the claimant stating what his claim is. The hon. gentleman is quite right in stating that particulars as to the way in which the amount was made up would be filed in court after the action was taken out; but, the hon. gentleman, as head of his department, must know what amount of money is being claimed by the people who furnished this cement, which could not be utilized except for bad work which never would be seen after it was finished. I do not see how we can discuss this matter until we know that. The hon. gentleman has paid a certain amount of money to contractors who undertook to furnish cement against the opinion of Mr. Munro, the engineer in charge of these works. The hon. gentleman says he was advised by some persons. Who are the persons who can advise him better than the man who possesses his confidence as Minister of Railways? If Mr. Munro did not possess his confidence, the hon. gentleman would have withdrawn him from the superintendence of the work. Mr. Munro stated before the Committee on Public Accounts that he advised that the cement should not be used, and the hon. gentleman stands up in parliament, as representing that great and important department, and says, 'I was advised to use it by persons who have used it on other canals.' The hon. gentleman has not disclosed the names of these persons. But, Mr. Munro advised against its use, and the best proof that he was right is the fact that the hon. gentleman is being sued to-day, and that he cannot utilize the cement which Mr. Munro condemned. Hon. gentlemen sitting on either side of this House are not going to be satisfied with the statement that the hon. gentleman is sued by contractors and does not know what he is sued for. Of all the extraordinary propositions I have ever heard that tops everything. If the hon. gentleman comes here in his responsible position as Minister of Railways and Canals and tells us that he allows an action to be taken out against his department without knowing what that action is, and whether the claim is for $100 or $100,000, I say he is not properly advised. If it were an action against himself, before he would go into it he would know what the action was brought against him for; but he should be more particular still when he is representing the people of Canada in one of the largest departments of the government. The question which I wish to put, and to which I insist on getting an answer, as far as I can do so, is: What is the cause of the action between the contractors who furnished the cement and the Department of Railways and Canals? What is the amount claimed? What is the amount acknowledged to be due by the department? And what is the amount which the Department of Railways and Canals refuses to pay to these contractors? That is a plain question, and I am perfectly certain that the hon. gentleman would have answered it sooner except that he must have misapprehended the question put by my hon. friend.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman has asked me to state for what Battle Bros. are suing the government. I have stated before, and I cannot do more than repeat it, that the Battle Company are suing the government for the drawback, for the price of the cement for which they have not been paid, and for damages for non-completion of contract. That is the scope of their action. He called upon me several times and also wrote to me to pay them the amount of drawback and to authorize the payment of the balance of the cement they had furnished. I have not the particulars of the amount and the number of barrels, but I may say that I declined to entertain their demands, because they had misled the department by supplying the article they did. Later on, some five or six months ago, they applied to me, through their solicitor, to be granted a fiat for a petition of right, and I consented and signified my consent to them and the Justice Department. I have not yet seen their petition, and the government may have not yet been sued, but the Department of Justice has been furnished by my department with all the papers relating to the matter. I know that the Messrs. Battle claim $5,000 on rebate and deposit and the balance of the quantity of cement for which they were not paid and also damages, but I cannot state what amount of damages they seek to recover. The hon. gentleman desires me to look up the papers in the department and find out what accounts they have rendered for cement, and I will gladly do it, but the chief engineer does not recall the amount nor do I, and I do not see any occasion for the tone in which the hon. gentleman has referred to me. When it is said that this cement was ordered against the opinion of the superintending engineer of the St. Lawrence Canal, that is not correct. On the contrary, he expressed no opinion to me as to this particular order. After some of the cement had reached him, I learnt that he said we ought not have had any of it, but I was in possession of a certificate from Mr. Munro expressing the highest opinion of the quality of that cement, and the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson), I think, remembers to have seen the certificate too as well as

Mr. W. D. Thompson's certificate on the subject.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I am sorry that my hon. friend considers that I have referred to him in any other way than I should have for the purpose of eliciting information, but I would state, if he will allow me to put those questions—which I do not consider are questions to which a minister representing a department should object—I would ask what is the amount of the drawbacks that the contractors claim. Before the hon. gentleman made up his mind to grant the fiat, he must have known what claim they were making.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. They claim damages and a return of the deposit and the rebate.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The minister's explanation is not of much value. He says they claim the amount of drawback.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. They claim the drawback and deposit both.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The deposit would probably amount to $5,000 on a contract of that extent.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Not so much. The chief engineer does not recollect exactly nor do I.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. It is unfortunate, when the estimates are submitted to us and we require information in order to be able to vote intelligently, that the hon. gentleman cannot recollect any of the details and that his deputy should not have furnished him with all the particulars required.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am not asking for any estimate to pay this bill.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. No, but before the hon. gentleman's estimates can be intelligently discussed, it is important for us to know how it comes that he is expending $25,000 upon cement which was condemned by his own engineer.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I spent no more than I spent last year.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The hon. gentleman could not, because he is being sued by the gentlemen who furnished this cement which he refused to receive and which he should have received, upon the advice of Mr. Munro the superintendent. I have elicited the information that the deposit and the drawback amount to about $5,000. Of course, I think that the hon. gentleman should tell me what the amount of the deposit was.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Does the hon. gentleman expect me to carry in my recollection the specific amount of deposit of every contract entered by my department?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I am not insisting on that and never did. The hon. gentleman cannot be expected to carry all those figures in his head, but it is not necessary that he should. You have books and records; you have a deputy—and the hon. gentleman has in his department a deputy who is the equal of any other in the government. I never expected the hon. minister to carry all the figures in his head or to come here with more information than would naturally be called for by the fact that he stated that an action was being taken against the department by the men with whom he had contracted for that cement. These figures must have struck him, and they must have been easily remembered, and I want to know the amount that is claimed. I do not know what the deposit was, but I do not think the deposit and the drawback could be covered by $5,000—I think it must be more. We are entitled to know the amount claimed.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am not suggesting that this is information the hon. gentleman is not entitled to. Any information, no matter how minute or how little it could have been anticipated, the hon. gentleman is entitled to ask. I will not question his right to it or attempt to withhold it, if it is in my possession. But I do not think he is serious when he suggests that I should remember—

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I said it was not necessary that you should remember.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman said the figures were sufficiently striking for me to remember.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. No—the ground of action.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I know the ground on which claimants are proceeding, but I cannot give the amounts claimed until the claimant has stated it, and I have not received information from the Department of Justice yet that they have so stated it. I cannot even say that he has obtained the fiat yet. I only know that they started to take proceedings. And, so far as my opinion was concerned, I was willing that they should have a fiat to prosecute their petition of right. The hon. gentleman cannot get the amount of deposit or drawback at this time with greater positiveness than I have given it, as I do not recollect the amount, nor does the chief engineer, whom I have consulted. If the hon. gentleman wished information on this subject, the least he could have done, as a matter of courtesy, was to have let me know, so that I could have brought the papers and all the information. He cannot expect that the minister or deputy minister will come here with all the papers referring to all the multifarious matters dealt with by the department—my office cannot be transported here bodily. It did not occur to me that this subject was coming up again. All the information was given last year, and the case is the same as it was last year, unless the suit has been started. But I am willing to repeat the information, and would have brought it with me if the hon. gentleman had sent me a memorandum telling me what he required, as some hon. gentlemen have done with regard to matters in which they were interested. Hon. gentlemen willing to treat an opponent with fair-play or even gentlemanly consideration would let the head of a department know that they wished matters of this kind dealt with, so that he might bring the information desired.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I am sorry that my hon. friend (Mr. Blair) should accuse me of being discourteous. I have been a long time in parliament, and have never been accused of that heinous crime before. The questions I asked were made necessary by the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Blair's) own want of information in answering the hon. ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Haggart). I do not wish to take up time unnecessarily, but I think I am right in saying that before the hon. minister (Mr. Blair) agreed to give a fiat, there must have been negotiations between the claimants and himself, and that the fiat was given only because the parties were too far apart in the amounts that one offered and the other was willing to accept. If he had not known the amount that was claimed, he could not have decided whether to give them a fiat or not. I believe the hon. gentleman is right in not recognizing their claim, as he agrees, for once, with his engineer. But all I wish to know is the amount that they were claiming, and I do not wish to confine the minister to the exact figures. When we are discussing a matter affecting the public, every member of parliament who represents the public has a right to know from the ministers how the people's money is being expended. I say to the minister: You have a difficulty with the contractors. I am not blaming the hon. gentleman, nor can I blame him, because I do not know what the facts are. I want him to tell me what is the difference between himself and his contractors. We know about the deposit and the drawback. Now, what is their claim for damages? Is it $20,000, is it $50,000, or does it approach towards $100,000? That is surely a question to which the hon. gentleman can reply. I do not ask him to give me any exact amount, but I want to know what the claim of these people is. When the fiat comes from the hands of the Minister of Justice the particulars will be filled in court giving details of that amount; but the amount must have been given to the hon. gentleman before he made up his mind to reject or accept that proposition.

Mr. WM. GIBSON (Lincoln and Niagara). We had a good deal of discussion last year when this Battle claim came up. If I remember rightly, the Battles supplied a certain number of barrels of cement. The cement was to be put to the standard required by the government, and after they began to deliver bad cement the government very properly, through their engineers, refused to accept any more, and consequently it was not allowed to go into the work. The hon. member for Three Rivers is very anxious to know whether the claim of these gentlemen is $100,000 or not. I may say that I have had several letters from these people, they live in the adjoining county of Welland, and I am familiar with their works. I have used a great deal of their material, in fact I have used perhaps fifty or sixty thousand barrels of their cement from time to time. I believe the difference between the amount retained by the government on the unpaid cement thrown on the contractors' hands, is something between $5,000 and $6,000, altogether $28,000 would be their claim, of that, $2,800 would be their percentage, and the difference between that and the amount unpaid would represent a sum between $5,000 and $6,000.

Now, I want to point out to the committee the impression that seems to exist about the character of this cement. As a matter of fact the conditions of this work are entirely different from those of any other work that has ever been done by the government. The government in this case is supplying the cement, and in consequence, if there is any loss at all, or if the government has used a cheaper cement, the country is getting the benefit. I want to say here that notwithstanding what has been said about Mr. Munro and his opinion regarding the cement used upon the Soulanges Canal, under Mr. Munro's superintendence, from Port Dalhousie to the summit level at Allsburg, and upon every lock upon the present Welland Canal, both when it was built originally to twelve feet as well as afterwards when it was increased to fourteen feet, every inch of masonry was built with Thorold cement, and the cement was burned in the same kiln and ground in the same mill in Thorold. I want to say this, that after the government decided to increase the balance of the Welland Canal to fourteen feet depth of water, the old coping had to be removed and the back of the ashlar had to be cut down in order to increase and carry up the wall to its full height. I want to say that after an experience of two years, while there was no trouble at all in removing the stone from their position, there was great difficulty in removing the cement. A man could practically carry in a bag his whole day's work. It had to be taken off with drills from the back of the work, so good was the cement. So I say the government deserves credit for not accepting the cement after the contractors began to supply bad cement.

But I want to point out to the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Haggart), what he did when he was Minister of Railways and Canals. On the Sault Canal the specifications called for Portland cement to be used in nearly all the works, and when that hon. gentleman was Minister of Railways and Canals, according to the testimony of Mr. Hugh Ryan, who is now dead and gone, answering under oath questions I put to him, he admitted that thousands of barrels of cement were used, and he bought it at a $1 to $1.25. The hon. gentleman allowed him to use Thorold cement where Portland cement was contracted for, and for which the contractors would have had to pay $2 to $3 per barrel.

Mr. HAGGART. If that is the statement, I will give it at once a direct denial.

Mr. GIBSON. I have to accept the hon. gentleman's denial, but I am in the judgment of the House and of the country that you can take up the report—it is printed in the blue-books of parliament—and you will find that Mr. Ryan and Mr. Haney, particularly Mr. Ryan whom I questioned for hours on the subject, finally had to admit that thousands of barrels of Thorold cement were used upon the canal. The way that question came up was this: In the accounts that were brought before the Public Accounts Committee, when that matter was under investigation, I called attention to the fact that Thorold cement was being used, and then when I cross-questioned him as to where he put all these barrels of cement, he said he put it on the work. I questioned him as to the number of yards that this number of barrels of cement would represent, and finally I got him down to say that under ordinary work one barrel of cement would build three yards of masonry, so that over a thousand barrels of that Thorold cement that was used would represent 3,000 yards of masonry. But in the retaining walls case he would not admit that, but finally he admitted under oath that it would at least build from one to two yards, so that whether he made it of almost pure cement or not, the fact remains that the contractors on the Sault Canal were paid prices for masonry to be built with Portland cement and were allowed to use Thorold cement, the very cement that the hon. gentleman is condemning to-night.

Now, in the St. Clair tunnel at Sarnia, 10,000 barrels of this very same Thorold cement were used in the brick-work of the lining of the tunnel, and that brick-work is to be seen to-day. Every piece of work that was built upon the canals was built with that Thorold cement, and I want to say that with the exception of parts of the work that may have been cracked by vessels running up against it, there is not a flaw in the masonry of the Welland Canal from lock No. 1 to the aqueduct at Welland. I may say that after an experience of thirty years in Canada I would sooner use fresh-made and fresh-ground Canadian cement to the imported Portland cement, and I will give my reasons for it. Unless you get the imported article direct from the kiln, direct from the manufacturer, it is liable to lay in England or Belgium or whatever country it is exported from, perhaps for years. When it arrives in Montreal it may lay there all summer, may lie there perhaps in storage for another year, and that cement cannot be used then. No man can tell anything about it until it is put where it is to be used. I say that thousands and tens of thousands of barrels of Portland cement are sent from Belgium or from Germany, cement that is not better than mush after it is put into the work.

Now, so far as the Thorold cement is concerned, I think that the government acted wisely in the matter. They used the article as long as it was up to the standard of the specification required by the government, and the moment that it failed, the government very properly stopped using the cement. The Battles blamed the government. This is their side of the story; they say that the government did not take proper care of the cement that was left over during the winter. Last year the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) laid great stress on the fact that the cement had turned hard. I will say to the hon. gentleman, in all fairness and frankness, that that is the best evidence you could have that the cement was good, because if it does not turn hard, it shows that there is no cohesion to it. The Battles claim that the cement was not well taken care of. However, I think the government have kept back 10 per cent of the amount that was unpaid at the time the cement turned out badly. Instead of the government being criticised by the hon. member for Lanark, they ought to be commended for doing what they have done. An inferior article was not accepted from the contractor; the government bought the cement and supplied the contractor with it. It was not the interest of the contractor to destroy or save cement. Whatever amount of cement the contractors required, the government supplied them with it. After an experience of thirty years, I can say, that, to-day, in Canada, there is no better native cement produced than the cement made at Thorold. There are circumstances under which cement may be inferior and that is, if these gentlemen in working the Thorold quarries, take the outcroppings of the quarry, the cement will be inferior, as the rock from exposure will have lost all its hydraulic qualities, but if they tunnel the cement rock out between the bed-rock of limestone layers, they will produce an article that gives good results, and that will compare favourably with any foreign Portland cement as long as it is finely ground according to the specifications made by the government. I am here to say that Thorold cement will stand the test with any foreign cement that may be brought into this country.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman made a statement which I intend to correct at once. I was not at the head of the department when Mr. Hugh Ryan took his contract for the Sault Ste Marie Canal. Under his first contract he was entitled to use Thorold cement.

Mr. GIBSON. Not a pound.

Mr. HAGGART. It is not so?

Mr. GIBSON. No.

Mr. HAGGART. It is so, Sir, except for the face work on the canal. He was entitled to use it for the other work. Hugh Ryan came to me and stated that as this perhaps was the last work he was going to complete in his lifetime, he was anxious that it should be a credit to him. He told me he could use this cement, but he would rather put in other cement, at the same cost, in order to turn out a piece of work which would be a credit to him in after life. He stated that this material was not fit to use. The material was changed for that work. The hon. gentleman states that this is not true. It is true; it is within my own knowledge. It is an imputation against the department, to say that they paid for any work which was built of Thorold cement at the price for other cement, which the contractor did not use in the work. I do not think there is any evidence of that kind, but the material was changed. Instead of using Thorold cement for building that work Portland cement was put in. There are a great many reasons why Portland cement is the best, which are known to Mr. Munro, and to every engineer of the department. There are certain differences between Portland and Thorold cements and certain peculiarities attaching to both. Thorold cement has not the tension or the crushing power, and when used in building a work, it sometimes expands and contracts when it is forming. As good cement as there is in the world is perhaps the Milwaukee cement, but it lacks the tensile or crushing properties. In order to test it, they put in into little glass vials, and if the vial cracks it is useless on account of lacking tensile or crushing properties. Perhaps the best engineers in the world in the construction of public works, use that kind of material. They are the United States engineers who constructed the Sault Ste. Marie Canal on the American side. The consequence was that the work expanded, and there were cracks in it. There is no cracking in our work at the Soo. When I went over the work on the St. Lawrence canals, I found the contracts had been entered into by which contractors were allowed to use Battles' cement and cement from the Rathbun's works in Deseronto. I tested the work with the deputy of my department. In a great many cases, the cement was found to be very little better than sand. It did not set, it did not harden, and it was of no use. On consultation with the engineers of my department I came to the conclusion that it was not material fit to be used in the magnificent public works of Canada, and that Portland cement was the best cement to be used. Most of it is got in Holland, but some of it in Denmark. The different engineers on the construction works had all the apparatus for testing it. When I heard that the hon. gentleman had bought this Thorold cement for the purpose of using it on the Soulanges Canal. I told him to take the advice of his engineers, because every honest engineer and every honest contractor will tell you that Portland cement is better than Thorold cement. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Gibson), says that some work on the Welland Canal was done with Thorold cement, and he says that the results are as good as on any other work. The hon. gentleman, as he has stated, knows that there is only one vein in the rock which has the peculiar qualities necessary for making cement. If they mix it with limestone or surface rock, it renders the cement perfectly useless. Every contractor on works knows that. The old Welland Canal and a great portion of the new Welland Canal were built with Thorold cement. The contracts allowed the contractors to use it. Mr. Page thought so highly of it, that he allowed the contractors to use it on the St. Lawrence canals, and a large quantity of it was also brought down in bulk from Deseronto. What is the consequence? The work is all cracking, so far as the cement is concerned. I believe that Mr. Rathbun is trying to make cement on the same principle as Portland cement is made. The safest plan to follow, is to have four or five barrels tested, to ascertain the tensile and crushing strength, how long it takes to harden under water and whether it expands and contracts. No matter what cement is furnished the government, they ought to see that it is of a character equal to Portland cement.

Mr. GIBSON. My hon. friend (Mr. Haggart) will surely admit that different results will be achieved from the same cement used by different contractors, and that it might be more the fault of the contractor, who puts too much sand in the cement, than the fault of the cement itself. I have seen masonry taken down about which there was no cohesion at all, and which was supposed to have been built forty years ago by honest men. There was nothing in it but sand; there was no cement at all. Cement is not going to be condemned because a man puts in a lot of sand.

As far as the expansion and contraction is concerned, surely the hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart) knows, a school boy knows, that if you put water on lime it will swell up, it is the same with cement; it remains swollen. Rock expands and contracts, a large bridge will expand and contract. As to Milwaukee cement, about which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart) speaks, I can tell him that I bought Milwaukee cement for the purpose of building the approaches to the St. Clair tunnel on the American side, but I got better results from the Thorold cement, and I preferred paying 40 cents a barrel duty to have that Canadian native cement brought to the American side. I do not think any gentleman here will give me credit for being so very patriotic at the expense of my own pocket, but I did it for business reasons and I was satisfied at the results obtained in using the Thorold cement in preference to the Milwaukee. Of course, there are a variety of makers in Milwaukee as there are in the old country. In this case the contractor had no advantage, because the government provided the cement, and it was a matter of indifference to him so long as the work stood. As to the settling qualities of cement, surely the hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart) knows that quick-setting cement is not a good cement. Good cement should be such that the stone might be lifted at least once, and with most of the Portland cement it is too quick setting. For all practical purposes I would not want better cement than the Battle cement.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman speaks about my knowledge, but I can tell him that he has not the knowledge of a boy as to the testing of cement. It does not expand after being put into the glass tube. The ordinary manufacturer tests the contraction or expansion in a little glass phial, and every manufacturer of Portland cement sends you the tools to test the expansion and contraction and explains the method in which it should be done. I have seen too much of that to learn anything from the hon. gentleman (Mr. Gibson) in respect to it. Where did he get his information, that I allowed Hugh Ryan to use Thorold cement when the contract was for Portland cement, and that I paid him for the latter? That statement of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Gibson) is, to say the least of it, incorrect. I contradicted him before in reference to that, but still he repeats it. I did nothing of the kind. Under the first contract Mr. Ryan could have used the other cement, but I changed it, and if a payment of the kind alleged has been made by the department it is a payment made without my knowledge, and the officer who did it should be discharged by any government.

Mr. GIBSON. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart) misunderstood me. The cement was bought by Mr. Ryan and paid for by him and not by the government.

Mr. GIBSON.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Gibson) stated that I allowed Mr. Ryan to use Battle's cement when he had a contract for Portland cement, and that I paid him for water lime obtained at Thorold at the price of Portland cement. That statement is entirely unfounded, and there is no evidence to sustain it. If Mr. Ryan was paid for it it was not to my knowledge.

Mr. GIBSON. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart) is entirely mistaken. What I said was, that he allowed Thorold cement to be used in the Sault Canal without any reduction in the contract price, for which there should have been a reduction made, and that the contractor was benefited to that extent.

Mr. HAGGART. What I state is, that the original contract was for Thorold cement, and that the contractor was entitled to use it, but I changed it to Portland cement because I thought it was the better. Any statement to the contrary is unfounded.

Mr. SPROULE. My recollection is that it was not the Thorold cement he used, but part of the Owen Sound cement and that made at Deseronto. It was distinctly provided in the contract that for a certain number of inches in depth the face should be of Portland cement, and the backing of the other cement where it was not exposed to the atmosphere. He stated that he did not use a single barrel except Portland cement for the facing, as his contract called for.

Mr. HAGGART. That was the original contract.

Mr. CLANCY. Will the minister give a statement of the quantity purchased from Battle Bros.; how much of it was in barrels and how much in sacks; how much in barrels and how much in sacks has been used and what disposition has been made of the balance.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I will do so.

Mr. FOSTER. There is a little bit of information that I would like to get from the minister. Was it on this canal that the trouble took place with reference to Mr. Archie Stewart's contract?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. That contract was taken away from Mr. Stewart on the ground that he was not finishing it in time.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. He was not getting on with the contract at all.

Mr. FOSTER. To whom was that contract given?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. To Ryan & Macdonell.

Mr. FOSTER. How will the cost of Ryan & Macdonell's contract there compare with Stewart's ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. About $75,000 more.

Mr. FOSTER. Have they finished yet ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Pretty nearly.

Mr. FOSTER. How soon will they finish ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. They will be entirely through this season.

Mr. FOSTER. At what time was Stewart's contract for ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Stewart's original contract expired in 1894 ; the chief engineer tells me a year earlier than that. In 1897 it was taken out of his hands.

Mr. FOSTER. I think the minister took possession of Mr. Stewart's quarry under the plea that he had a right to take it. How much has he had to pay for that little bit of business of his ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Whatever was done in connection with that was done through the Justice Department. The lawyers who were concerned in the suit which Mr. Stewart brought against the Crown were of opinion that it was doubtful whether or not the Crown had the rights which they claimed, and that Mr. Stewart would be likely to recover damages from the Crown in respect to it. Mr. Stewart placed the amount of damages at a very high figure ; but that branch of his case was, on the advice of his solicitors and counsel, concurred in by the Department of Justice, settled.

Mr. FOSTER. For how much ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. There are various details connected with it ; but the amount of damages that were settled as representing the quarry was $20,000.

Mr. FOSTER. What was the whole amount of costs and damages ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I forget the exact amount.

Mr. FOSTER. Over $30,000 ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No, not as much as that.

Mr. FOSTER. What part of the dispute between the hon. gentleman and Mr. Stewart still remains to be settled ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The claim made by Mr. Stewart against the Crown for damages for not being allowed to complete the contract, on the one hand, and a counter claim made by the Crown against Mr. Stewart for not completing it, on the other hand. That is still before the Exchequer.

Mr. FOSTER. So that the sum total of the hon. gentleman's management in this respect is that when he came into power he sat down on Mr. Stewart—

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No, I beg your pardon.

Mr. FOSTER—took away his contract, gave it to another firm for $75,000 more, with little, if any, amelioration in the speed. Then he seized Mr. Stewart's quarry in the idea that the Crown had a perfect right to take it ; a suit followed, and as a result the hon. gentleman was advised to settle the question of damages, which has cost the country somewhere between $35,000 and $37,000, and the remaining part of the suit remains yet to be settled. That may eventuate in one way or in another ; but the hon. gentleman's self-sufficiency and his idea of taking everything into his own hands have resulted in the first place in the country having to pay $75,000 more for the performance of the work, and in the second place in a payment of some $35,000 or $40,000 by the people for damages and costs in simply half the suit instituted by Mr. Stewart. That is another most excellent result of the hon. gentleman's management.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. If the hon. gentleman would only employ his imagination a little more actively, he might make a much more imposing statement than that. I do not see why he is so modest. My self-sufficiency, as he calls it, had nothing to do with the matter. There was no self-sufficiency in the case at all. I took no steps in connection with the taking of the contract from Mr. Stewart until I was advised strongly by the official staff of the department as to the need of it, and by the Department of Justice as to the proper method to pursue in connection with it. The hon. gentleman must know that the time for the completion of Mr. Stewart's contract had long expired before 1897—three, if not four years. The contractor had received instructions from his chief (Mr. Haggart) that he need not go on with the work ; and the fact that he had such instructions is apparent from the sworn statement made by the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals in this Stewart case that the ex-Finance Minister had strongly insisted that there should not be any expenditure on these canals—at all events that it should proceed very moderately and slowly, and that the contractors were notified not to hurry at all, but to take their own time. When the change of government took place, the government came to the conclusion that at the rate at which these contracts were being performed many years would necessarily elapse before there could be any means of utilizing these canals or before the shipping people of the country would have a 14-foot channel for the purposes of navigation. I think I am speaking within bounds when I say that at the rate of progress which prevailed during the three or four years previous on the Soulanges Canal alone, it would be fifteen years before that work would be done.

Mr. FOSTER. Where is the imagination now ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That is the fact ; there is no imagination about it. I can show figures in verification of the statement I make. When we came to the conclusion that the work ought to be pushed vigorously and be completed at an early date, we called upon all the contractors. Mr. Stewart being one of the number, to push the work actively. Mr. Stewart was in some little difficulty in regard to the stone ; through no fault of his, he lost two or three months of time, and we were prepared to allow him a fair compensation for the delay which ensued from the superintending engineer forbidding him to use any stone from that quarry. After that trouble was settled, Mr. Stewart expressed his willingness and ability to push the work vigorously. He made some request to us to allow him something out of the drawback so that he could take the work up, and I met his wishes in every possible shape and form. I tried to so arrange the matter that he could complete the work. I was very loth indeed to take it out of his hands. I had the very best feeling towards Mr. Stewart, and I felt very confident that he would be able to finish his contract. He promised me that he would undertake it and would do it, but he did not do it. When I spoke to him later about the time the work ought to be done, he told me that he was not under any obligation to finish it, but would take his own time that he had consulted counsel, and that they had advised him that after he had been allowed by the government to pass by the date fixed for the completion of the contract, he practically had it in his own hands, and he was going to hold up the whole question of the completion of those canals to suit his own whim and caprice. That is the position Mr. Stewart took. All this matter was gone over before the court. I gave evidence upon it myself ; other members of the government who were present and heard the discussions gave evidence ; the chief engineer gave evidence. Mr. Stewart was treated with every possible consideration. I made every suggestion to him that a man could make with the view of enabling him to go on and complete the contract. I even suggested that he had better get some strong financial man to go in with him. He refused to do that, because he said he should have a higher price than he was getting under his contract to complete it. After we took the contract out of Mr. Stewart's hands, we invited five or six of the leading contractors to tender upon the work. They did so, and the tender of Manning & Macdonald was the lowest.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the minister bring down—he fought shy of the quarry claim—a statement of the total claim, and the expenses which resulted from his unfortunate assumption of power ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. As far as the minister is concerned, there was no assumption of power at all with respect to the quarry. What was done was done through the proper department of the government. If there was any error, it was not an error of the minister or his deputy. These legal proceedings for expropriation were all taken in the usual and proper manner, and I do not see why the hon. gentleman persists in making these statements when he does not know that they are correct.

Mr. HAGGART. Did I understand the hon. minister aright that, under the new contract entered into with Ryan & Macdonell, he only pays something like $70,000 extra.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. My deputy says $75,000.

Mr. HAGGART. I may as well inform the hon. minister that he need not bring down the original estimate of the cost of the Soulanges Canal because I find that the department furnished me with an estimate, which I gave to the House a couple of years in succession. The canal was to have been built and completed for $4,750,000. Now it is going to cost $6,400,000. I do not now see the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) here. I suppose he is hunting up that evidence which, he said, was given before the Public Accounts Committee with reference to cement. I have the evidence here and would like him to show me anything in it to confirm his statement.

Mr. URIAH WILSON (Lennox). I understand the ex-Minister of Railways to have cast some reflections on the cement made by the Rathbun Company. Whatever they may have done a good many years ago, so far as I am informed, they make first-class cement now, and the government are using it largely, which they would not do if it were not first class. I do not know whether that was a slip on the part of the ex-minister or not, but I would like him to put it right.

Mr. HAGGART. I thought I had put that right. The Rathbun Company were manufacturing at that time what is called water-lime cement, which certainly was an inferior article. They have given up its manufacture altogether, and are now making cement upon the same principle as the Portland cement, which is probably equal to the Portland cement. What I was protesting against is the use of what is called the waterlime cement which the Rathbun Company had been manufacturing at the time I mentioned. Such cement should not be used at all in public works that require a first-class article.

Mr. CLANCY. I understood the hon. minister to say that Mr. Stewart's quarry was taken from him on the advice of the officers of the department and the mode of procedure taken was according to the advice of the Justice Department. Then after the quarry had been taken over, the Justice Department decided that the Railways and Canals Department had a doubtful right, if any, to take it over.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It was not so much the taking of the quarry but the way it was taken. It was taken in such a way as to exclude entrance upon the quarry and prevent the contractors from making use of the portion which we did not expropriate. There was some difficulty about the way in which the expropriation was made, and later the Justice Department gave the opinion that it was doubtful whether Mr. Stewart would not be able to recover damages on account of the way in which proceedings were taken.

Mr. CLANCY. It seems rather extraordinary that after expropriation proceedings had been taken on the advice of the Justice Department, the Justice Department should have doubts as to the procedure followed. The Justice Department decided one way first and then another way, and we have had to pay a very large sum of money.

Culbute Canal—Damages to land and expenses ..... $3,500

Mr. FOSTER. How long is that going on ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. These are the balances due for the flooded land, caused by the Culbute dam. I do not know how long it has been going on. I presume that these claims were in the department when I came in or many of them.

Mr. FOSTER. To whom are these to be paid ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. To the following individuals: Mrs. A. McFarlane, $200; George Rose, $60; Hon. G. Bryson, $1,000; Wm. Flood, $450; Jas. McGuire, $50; F. & W. Anderson, $100; D. T. Bertrand, $150; Theo. St. Denis, $20; B. Smith, $300; Bishop Hennesy, $100; John Flood, $475; Jos. Bonnie, $75; Philip Gervais, $225; Victor Lechance, $130.

Mr. HAGGART. On what basis did you give these damages ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. They have been settled and awarded by valuers. We have had three valuers on this work. Most of these amounts were examined and valued during the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Haggart's) term of office.

Mr. HAGGART. These claims were all valued and the report was acted upon by the department, I believe, and the parties paid in full. Then the dam was taken down so that no more damages could have accrued—I think I gave orders to have it taken down.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It has been partly destroyed.

Mr. HAGGART. Did these damages accrue before 1895? If so, why were they not included in the report of the parties sent out to find out what the damages were ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. These damages accrued before the removal of any part of the dam. Many of these items were reported to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart) or his predecessors by those sent to make a report and valuation.

Chambly Canal—

Drainage works at St. Johns..... $500

Wall at Ste. Thérèse Island..... 550

— $1,050

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I wish to change that item regarding Ste. Thérèse Island. When these estimates were made up we thought we could get the work done in the year for which these estimates were appropriated, but we could not do so. I would like to have this changed so as to read 'for general repairs.' Otherwise I shall have to have a supplementary estimate.

Mr. HAGGART. What drainage works are you doing at St. John ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. This is work upon the sewer there—we are digging out a sewer.

Mr. HAGGART. Why ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. We have had to do it.

Mr. HAGGART. What is the extent of the work ? Does this cover the cost ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The estimate of the whole thing is $18,507. This is an old item, and this $500 will complete the work.

Mr. HAGGART. I remember that they tried to get me to do it when I was Minister of Railways and Canals—it is to build a drain under the canal. But they did not succeed. It is the same principle as the drain from the Lachine Canal into the St. Lawrence.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. You started that.

Mr. HAGGART. No, I refused to do it. I do not know on what principle this is granted. Is it because the government erected the locks in the town?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The town must be drained, and if you block up the sewer—

Mr. HAGGART. But if I remember rightly they could get into the river without any such expenditure.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No.

Mr. FOSTER. What is this drain, how long is it, where does it start and where does it end? If we get that information, we shall understand the case better.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not recollect how long it is, nor does my deputy. However, it is a long ditch, following along the canal some distance. There is no manner of doubt, I think, that the canal does obstruct the drainage from the town.

Mr. HAGGART. Is not part of the drain that is being constructed at right angles to the canal?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes, it runs right across it. But you have to run alongside the canal for some distance.

Mr. HAGGART. I can understand the government being responsible for that portion of the drain which puts the municipality to the cost of building in order to get to the river. I can understand them building that part of the drain that went under the canal, but what business have they to construct any portion of that drain leading to it at right angles?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It runs along parallel with the canal for a considerable distance, I cannot say how far, it is an open ditch. Then, it crosses under the canal and afterwards runs directly to the river.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the minister bring down a plan of that, so that we can see how it does run? The cost is $18,500 altogether.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That is the final estimate.

Mr. OLANCY. I presume the town contributed a large sum towards the construction. I would like the minister to say how much, and also by whom it is to be maintained, and the whole cost of the work. The minister can give us that information also.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I can say at once that the town does not give anything towards this portion which we are constructing.

Mr. HAGGART.

Railways and Canals—Salaries of extra clerks and copyists other than those who have passed the civil service examination, notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act ..... $700

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. This is owing to the demands upon us for preparing returns and other information during the session of parliament.

Mr. FOSTER. But there is a general vote of $5,000 that parliament gives every year to pay for bringing down extra returns. The hon. gentleman has not been so expeditious or so voluminous in his returns this year.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. They have been very voluminous.

Mr. FOSTER. Why does not the hon. gentleman take from the vote given for that purpose as other ministers do?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Whatever the general vote has been, it has been absorbed long before we had a chance to get any portion of it.

Mr. FOSTER. In employing assistance, why do you not take those who have gone to the trouble, in accordance with our law, of having passed the civil service examination?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Most of the staff we employ for doing extra work are people who have been employed for many years. In other cases, where you employ them for only a short time, you cannot always pick up those who have passed the civil service examination. This vote is to pay some who have passed and others who have not.

Mr. FOSTER. Who are you employing for whom you have to make this exception?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I think Miss Grant has not passed, nor Miss Leseur.

To apply a system of electric lighting to the Governor General's car, worked from the axle ..... $1,400

Mr. HAGGART. Did you try that principle to find out whether it worked well or not? I think they had it on the Canadian Pacific Railway and they have abandoned it.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman is in error, they have not abandoned it. There was at first some difficulty about getting it to work, but I think recent experiments have satisfied the Canadian people that it can be done. In the States they tell me they have perfected the appliance so that it works satisfactorily. Mr. Shaughnessy has put it in his car quite recently.

To pay Ralph Jones half interest at 6 per cent on $38,915.37, amount reported by commissioner on Oxford and New Glasgow Railway claim respecting 'hard pan' of Stewart & Jones contract, No. 6 $847 50

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The amount voted a year ago, was payable to Messrs. Stewart & Jones. They were members of the firm who had the contract in respect of which this claim has arisen. But when we were ready to pay the amount we ascertained that Mr. Stewart was unwilling to have any portion of it paid to Mr. Jones, as there was some trouble between them. In consequence we could not pay a portion unless we paid it all, and we would not pay it all unless both of the gentlemen agreed in the payment of the whole. Since then the matter has been referred to the Department of Justice, and they have advised that under the circumstances it will be proper for us to take a vote for half the amount payable to each. We have therefore taken a vote for half the amount to Mr. Jones. We can settle very well with Mr. Stewart for his share, on adjusting certain matters which are still pending between himself and the department.

Mr. HAGGART. Is this the interest on the hard-pan claims?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It is the interest on the amount awarded against the Crown on a hard-pan claim.

Mr. HAGGART. Does the minister intend to pay interest to the other parties?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No, I think that is in a different position altogether.

Mr. HAGGART. What is the difference?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. We recognized our obligation to pay Stewart & Jones the amount of their claim. This claim was referred to the judge of the Exchequer Court, and he awarded $38,915, which was paid after it was voted by parliament. The firm asked payment of interest on this amount from the time the award was made until the payment was made, and it seems to me to be reasonable that interest should be allowed. In respect to any other 'hard pan' claims which have been pressed upon us they are pressing for the interest from the time they allege the amount was due, or when they say the estimate ought to have been allowed down to the time that payment was made. This is interest on the $38,000 from the time the award was made until the payment was made.

Mr. HAGGART. This was entirely a matter of grace. The Crown, legally, was not liable to pay any of these people anything. They abandoned their legal claim, and it was submitted to the Exchequer Court. The award of the court was a mere matter of grace, and not a matter of right. I think that the minister ought to be very careful in opening up the question of the payment of interest after the award of the Exchequer Court, because all of these claims will come in for similar treatment.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am not going back to all these claims.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman is now paying interest from the time the Exchequer Court made the award. It was not a judgment of the court. It was simply a submission to the court to find out what, under the circumstances, was due to the parties under these 'hard pan' claims, and as a matter of grace, an amount is put in the estimates to pay them. If you are opening up the question of interest then every other man who has a claim will have as much right as Jones & Stewart.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am not opening up the question of interest.

Mr. HAGGART. You are paying Mr. Jones interest on the amount of the award, $38,000, that accrued between the time that the Exchequer Court award was made and the time the amount was paid to Stewart & Jones.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes.

Mr. HAGGART. Then why is not every other person who had an award from the Exchequer Court entitled to interest just the same as these parties from the time of the award until the time the money was paid to them? They have just as much right equitably, legally and morally, to their interest as Jones & Stewart.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not think we could very well refuse to pay interest from the time the award was made until they received their money.

Mr. HAGGART. The minister mistakes my contention. My contention is that there was no legal claim paid to these people, that it was not a submission to the court that could be enforced by the court, that it was merely a finding for the information of the Crown, and that under this finding, as a matter of grace, the Crown paid this amount. Every one else who received payment under the award is as much entitled to interest from the time the award was made until they received payment as Stewart & Jones. There is another thing. This amount was voted last year to Stewart & Jones. The affairs of Stewart & Jones are at present in liquidation before the court. The court has appointed a receiver for the indebtedness that is due to Stewart & Jones. This amount has no business to be taken out of the control of the court and given to an individual. The receiver, under the direction of the court, is entitled to receive all sums which may be payable to Stewart & Jones. You propose by this to pay to an individual a sum of money to which he has no right morally, legally or in any other way. If there is a payment to be made, and the firm are entitled to that payment, let it be paid to the firm. It should be disposed of as the court directs. It is at present at the disposal of the court, and whomsoever the court says is entitled to receive it, let the court have the disposal of it. Evidently the intention is to get past the court, but I do not think you will accomplish your object, because you cannot take out an injunction against the Crown. There is nothing to prevent you taking out an injunction preventing an individual who is entitled to it, taking it from the Crown and putting it in his own pocket, otherwise than as the court directs, and there is no object in making a payment to one member of a firm that is entitled to a payment from the Crown. In so far as making that payment of interest to the parties who are entitled to it is concerned, I think this is a very objectionable form of putting it in the estimates.

Mr. B. M. BRITTON (Kingston). Mr. Chairman, I think, perhaps, there is a legal point which is worth considering in connection with this item. If this is a debt due to two persons, and if you assume to pay one man his half, I do not see on what principle you do not pay the other man his half.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have no objection to paying the other man his half.

Mr. BRITTON. One can hardly conceive of such an exceptional case, because there are two members of the firm, and you put into the estimates an amount to pay one.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The other man has an unsettled act. If he is ready to receive it we are ready to ask parliament for the money.

Mr. BRITTON. That does not seem to remove the apparent difficulty of paying half. This certainly would be the legal effect of paying half; if there is a debt due to two persons and you pay one man half and he gives you a general release for half, it would certainly release the whole debt. That is a well known fact. The debt is simply one owing to two persons, and any one person can take half of it and release the debt. It seems to me an exceptional position, and one that ought to be inquired into.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. My hon. friend is apparently not much impressed with what has been stated by the hon. ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Haggart). That hon. gentleman has pressed very strongly on the committee the view that this is a gratuity.

Mr. BRITTON. That is another matter.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I agree that it was a matter of grace in the first instance, whether this claim should be recognized; it was recognized, and it was afterwards set up with a good deal of reason and justice, that interest should be paid, after the judge gave his award. It may ease the conscience of my hon. friend, when I tell him that this vote is not asked for without the Justice Department, after careful consideration, advising that it was a proper vote.

Mr. H. F. McDOUGALL (Cape Breton). Will the minister now give me the information he promised a few nights ago with regard to the expense of the sidings?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am not in a position to furnish the information. There will be a number of other items upon which the hon. gentleman can bring the matter up. The first moment that I am in possession of the information, which I have not yet received from Moncton, I will furnish it.

Mr. FOSTER. We intend to have a general discussion on some of those items. They were left over for that purpose.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Not this one.

Mr. McDOUGALL. It was promised that we should have an opportunity for free discussion on this item.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. There is no question of sidings here.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Does the minister state that in this item of $67,000 there is nothing for sidings?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No sidings in Cape Breton at all.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Some are being built now.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I cannot help that.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Does the minister tell me there is nothing in this vote No. 30, to pay for sidings?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes, I have stated that there was nothing for sidings in Cape Breton.

Mr. McDOUGALL. From what sources does the minister get the money to pay for these sidings?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. If there are any being built now, the money would come from two or three sources. It would come from the ordinary revenue account.

Mr. FOSTER. But it must be voted before you can spend it.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I beg your pardon, we spend out of earnings. We spend money out of our general vote for the purpose of keeping up the road, undoubtedly.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the Minister of Railways pretend to say that the receipts for the Intercolonial Railway for one year can be dipped into by him and spent as he pleases, without an appropriation of this House?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not.

Mr. FOSTER. That is what you did say.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I said nothing of the sort. This year we got a vote amounting to something like $4,500,000, taking into account the supplementary vote, for expending on repairs, and maintenance and all other purposes connected with the Intercolonial Railway. If we are building any of these sidings in Cape Breton, we are doing that either out of our revenue vote, or we are doing it by arrangement with private persons who have asked for them, and who put up the money upon the customary conditions. There may be a vote in the main estimates, which is being expended now. There is nothing in these present supplementary estimates for sidings in Cape Breton.

Mr. McDOUGALL. On what conditions are those sidings put in for private persons?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The private individual makes a deposit of such amount as will cover the cost of the rails, and the cost of the work. One of the conditions which govern the arrangement is, that as fast as the earnings for the use of the sidings comes in, it is credited upon the deposit, and the amount of the deposit is paid back when the whole deposit is absorbed if it ever is. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McDougall), has an application of his now in, which I sanctioned not so long ago, in which he asked for a private siding. I presume he has heard of it. It is in accordance with the usual conditions which govern these things, and there are a great many sidings which are built in the course of a year upon the terms which I have mentioned.

Mr. McDOUGALL. What the minister refers to is a deposit simply covering the rails that are advanced by the department, and when a certain amount of business is done over these sidings for which rails are used, the government returns the money deposited. The money exacted from the person is absolutely for the use of the rails, and according as the business is done over these rails, the man who does the business with the railway gets his money back.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That is what I said.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Why, then, should any vote appear in the estimates for a purpose of that kind?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That only applies to private sidings. We are building sidings that are not private sidings.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Then what sidings are included in this $67,000?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have looked it over very carefully, and there is nothing in the item of $9,600 which applies to any sidings in Cape Breton. If there are any being put in there now, other than the way I speak of, they must come out of this year's appropriation.

Mr. McDOUGALL. The item I asked information on was the item of $6,700, and I find a separate item of $12,500 for sidings.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I was speaking of the item of $9,600. That does not include any sidings in Cape Breton, though there are some sidings in it—one at Killam's, one at River Savage, one at Granton, and one at Barnaby River.

Mr. FOSTER. Why does the hon. gentleman have two estimates—one for increased facilities along the line, out of which he builds sidings, and another item of $12,500 specially for sidings? Does he not see that he is making his estimates blind? He is taking $18,000 odd for sidings.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No. In the item of $9,600, there are a number of other things provided for. I suppose it would have been as well to put the sidings all in one vote.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Are any portions of these sidings, for which this money is voted, built by private individuals?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. None. These are public sidings.

Mr. HAGGART. As the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) has the evidence of the Public Accounts Committee, I would like him to point out where it is stated that Hugh Ryan was paid by me the price of Portland cement for water cement which was used in the Sault Ste. Marie lock. Will the hon. gentleman point it out? If not, I shall be obliged to read evidence directly contrary to the hon. gentleman's statement. There were about a hundred questions asked by Mr. Gibson before the committee. One of the last was the following:

I suppose the engineer, then, kept a correct account of the number of barrels of Portland cement used?—I don't know that.

Have you your account charging that?—We have not.

You have not put in your bill yet?—We have not put in our bill. We asked payment for it, but did not get it.

Mr. GIBSON. The statement I made is correct. The hon. gentleman said that according to the contract Mr. Ryan was justified in using native cement, and that, on account of his anxiety to make a better class of work, he voluntarily offered to use Portland cement instead of native cement. If the hon. gentleman will turn to page 2159, he will find the following :

Did you use Portland in the backing?—We did, a great deal. We did it under positive orders from the chief engineer.

Why?—Because he considered it a great deal better than the other.

Why did he allow you to use any Thorold at all if he thought the other was better?—I cannot tell you that.

But you were willing to take his orders and use Portland cement, although it cost you twice as much money, or 80 per cent?—We were told we would be paid for it.

You were told you would be paid for it?—Yes, sir.

You expected to be paid extra for that?—I did not know it would be extra. I expected to be paid for that cement.

That is what I said; and if you look further down you will find that there were about 34,000 barrels of native cement used in the Sault Canal for backing and retaining wall. In some cases they used it partly for face work and partly for backing.

Mr. HAGGART. The particular point between the hon. gentleman and me was, that he stated that I had paid for water cement from Thorold at the price of Portland cement.

Mr. GIBSON. The hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken as to that. What I did say was, that he allowed them to use the native cement without making a reduction from the contract price, and the hon. gentleman said that Mr. Ryan voluntarily offered to do the balance of the work with Portland cement. As a matter of fact, there were about 60,000 or 70,000 barrels in all used, and in that evidence Mr. Ryan says that when the chief engineer asked him to finish the balance of the work with Portland cement, he expected to be paid for it as promised, and further on he goes on to say that notwithstanding that, the native cement was used right along as formerly.

Mr. HAGGART. If the hon. gentleman withdraws the statement he made, that I allowed Mr. Ryan to use Thorold cement in the construction of the locks and he was paid for it as if he gave Portland cement, it is all right. The hon. gentleman said that Mr. Ryan has stated in his evidence that I had paid for Thorold cement the price of Portland cement in the locks. I said there was not a word of foundation for that statement, and that Mr. Ryan never gave such evidence.

Mr. GIBSON. He gives it at the top of page 118.

Mr. HAGGART. He was not paid at all. He put in a bill for cement at the time he gave his evidence, and he swore that then there was no settlement with him.

Mr. McDOUGALL. When will the hon. gentleman give the information about the siding he promised the other day?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Before we get down to the other railway items in my estimates, I hope to be able to hear from Moncton by telegraph. Let the present item pass, and there will be ample opportunity for the hon. gentleman to bring this matter up.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Will the hon. gentleman tell me what the position was with regard to that siding?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman's application was for a siding at Sydney, and I gave the order that he should have the privilege of getting a siding there on the usual terms.

Mr. McDOUGALL. That is, make a deposit equal to the value of the rails?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have had several cases, and the usual conditions are to make a deposit to cover all the costs.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I do not complain of any rule or regulation of the Railway Department that is made to apply in the same way to everybody, but what I complain of is, that in cases that I had with the department myself, I did not receive the same treatment as other individuals did.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Would the hon. gentleman not prefer to wait until I have all the information before we discuss this?

Mr. McDOUGALL. It is important there should be some discussion about it so as to put the hon. minister on the right track. He is putting in sidings at the expense of the country for private individuals on private property, which nobody will use except those who own the property. I refer to the siding at a place called Big Beach, within two miles of Shunacadie station. The siding was put in on the railway property, but there is no public access to it, and there is no public business there. I am told that up to last week, although the siding was put down in May, there was no business done at it except that two empty cars were put there two days ago. More than two months before that siding was put in I made application for one where I had a large quantity to ship from, having made my deposit, the work of putting in the siding was began, but before it was completed the men who were putting in my siding were taken away to put in a private siding. Where the minister made a mistake was in putting in the siding I refer to as a public siding when it was only required for private purposes. That is not all. Last winter I had to put in a siding at a place on the River Dennis, within a mile from the River Dennis station, where I had a mill. I made application for permission to put in the siding to connect my mill with the railway, and I was asked to make a deposit equal to the value of the rails. I put up the deposit and spent between $400 and $500 on the siding. The public are using that siding to-day. But, because a man who wanted to compete with me in the same line of business made application to the minister for the privileges of putting in a siding the minister granted it at the expense of the country.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. You meant he made application to the department, not the minister?

Mr. McDOUGALL. The application must come to the minister. Mine did, but the application of my neighbour evidently did not. I find that when I have to do business with the railway authorities, my application must be referred to Ottawa, but it appears that that is not necessary in the case of other people. I do not want to be misunderstood. I do not find fault with the hon. minister for putting in a siding in the neighbourhood of my work, if all were treated alike. But, a few days ago, for purposes of repairs to the railway, some people came and loaded eight cars on my siding and travelled twenty-eight miles for the privilege of doing it. And I find my private sidings not only used for the public convenience, but for the government convenience. My applications must go to the minister to see if he can tax me more than other people pay, as in this case. Now, I do not complain of having to pay, if he will treat everybody the same way.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. McDougall) is getting pretty pair play.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I would like to know how? The minister is carrying out his plans fully. After putting in these sidings at heavy expense and having secured a rate on freight taken from these sidings, when the minister found they were put in at my expense, he put up the rates from fifty to eighty per cent—in one case even up 100 per cent. The result is, as any business man would expect, that the business has been destroyed. The people to whom I was supplying a large portion of the material refused to take it. And so, I have no return from the money I have put into sidings, and the railway loses the business as well as I do. The railway was making money out of the rate first given.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Not a bit of it.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I beg the hon. minister's pardon. If they were not making money out of that rate, why do they do the same class of work for one-third the rate for other people? Why does the hon. gentleman carry coal from Sydney to Ferrona, from Springhill to Montreal, at very much lower rates—one-quarter the rate in some instances? Why does he carry flour for my hon. friend from Kent, Ont. (Mr. Campbell) at a very much lower price from Montreal to the maritime provinces, if my rates did not pay? The first rates paid the railway very well, and the hon. Minister of Finance admitted the other night that complaints were made about these rates—

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Other people wanted to get the same rates the hon. gentleman (Mr. McDougall) was getting, and we would not give them.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Why not?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Because the rates were too low.

Mr. McDOUGALL. The Minister of Finance admitted the rates charged me were good rates.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I said that I believed the complaints of discrimination and injustice on the part of the railway were without foundation.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Then the rates were all right?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. All the rates may have been too low. I am not going to discuss that—I know nothing about it.

Mr. McDOUGALL. The rates were put up, and now I have no business, and the railway has not the business, which shows that the rates are too high, so high that they are prohibitory. Inquire from other railway corporations, and you will find that the rates given in this instance are in keeping with those charged by other railways.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS. Not at all.

Mr. McDOUGALL. A contractor I met the other day told me he had to pay half a cent a ton a mile for sending the same kind of material over the road that I have to pay 2, 2½ and 2½ cents for. Surely other people engaged in that business have an opinion that is worthy of attention. But the fact is the minister's friends wanted to prevent me doing business, and they found a minister who was willing to carry out their wishes. May I ask the hon. gentleman if he had application for another siding near the town of Sydney within a short time?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No, I remember only one.

Mr. McDOUGALL. There is a siding being put in within a mile of Sydney for a private individual, and it will be a very strange thing if application was not made to the minister for it.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. How long since?

Mr. McDOUGALL. Within the last two or three weeks.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. A good deal of time often elapses between the receiving of an application and the putting in of a siding.

Mr. McDOUGALL. The necessity for this siding arose very recently. The siding was being proceeded with a few weeks ago, about the time that I applied for a siding at Sydney. I am surprised the same rule would not apply to every case of the same kind. I am informed, and I believe I am credibly informed, that that siding is being put in for a private individual at the expense of the railway, while the minister decides that I have to make a deposit for my sidings, and have to pay everything.

Mr. ANGUS McLENNAN (Inverness). The hon. gentleman (Mr. McDougall) secured his siding in the county of Inverness by simply coming up to Ottawa and interviewing the officials, and possibly, the minister. The fact remains then that shortly after his trip to Ottawa his sidings were in course of construction for the benefit of the hon. gentleman's business. As for the department discriminating against the hon. gentleman's business, I have an application for the firm of John McLean & Sons, of Cleveland, within a few miles of where the hon. gentleman has his siding—

Mr. McDOUGALL. How many miles? Is it not ten?

Mr. McLENNAN (Inverness). I cannot determine exactly. It is in the county of Inverness. Anyway, I made application to the Minister of Railways and Canals one year before that. And it was only in May last, three or four weeks ago, when these gentlemen had deposited their own money and paid every dollar of the expense that the siding was put in. These gentlemen are friends of mine, they are Liberals, and it took them about fifteen months to get a siding at Cleveland, a few miles from where the hon. gentleman has built his siding, and without any reference whatever to me, and in the most quiet and expeditious manner. Indeed, I do not know what the Department of Railways and Canals are going to do for the hon.

Mr. McDOUGALL.

gentleman to please him, unless indeed they hand over to him the whole track. With regard to the matter of rates also, I have some letters from Port Hastings, one of the terminals of the Intercolonial Railway in Cape Breton, where an increase of 100 per cent was made in the rates some weeks ago. I may mention the case of R. J. McDonald, Esq., brother of the gentleman the hon. member for Cape Breton the other day referred to, who represents the county of Inverness in the local legislature, and whom he considered very highly favoured by the Department of Railways and Canals. I have a letter in my desk from Mr. McDonald, in which he complains that freight charges went up 100 per cent in the case of small parcels and 50 per cent in the case of those of larger bulk. A neighbouring gentleman of his who is conversant with railway rates also complained in behalf of other interests in Port Hastings of the increase of rates. These gentlemen are Liberals. One of these letters I handed to the department, and I do not know what they are going to do with the matter. But I cite these instances to show the hon. gentleman and the House that he cannot complain of the Department of Railways and Canals as discriminating against him in the slightest. With regard to the sidings, I can assure him that a Mr. McLean, a strong Liberal, doing business there, desired that I should appeal to the Department of Railways and Canals for a siding at a place called Malagawatch, within a short distance of the hon. gentleman's siding. It was found his siding was so near that locality that the department would not listen to the idea. I may also mention another fact regarding the running of freight trains over the Intercolonial Railway in the island of Cape Breton. That road was built thirteen years ago. The hon. gentleman was in parliament at the time, and he and his associates then representing the island, all of whom supported the Conservative government, permitted the government to use old rails in the construction of the Intercolonial Railway in the island. These rails are there to this day, and it is only at this session of parliament that the Minister of Railways and Canals is taking steps to secure a vote to replace those old rails with steel rails.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Were the former ones steel?

Mr. McLENNAN (Inverness). My impression is that they were composed for a considerable part of rust, perhaps some iron or steel. But I can assure the hon. gentleman that they were old rails, and I can assure him also that if I had a seat in this House at that time I would have uttered a vigorous protest against the discrimination practised by the old government against the island of Cape Breton. It was a most unjust and humiliating discrimination. The five members representing the island at that time permitted the government to truck old rails across the Strait of Canso and use them for the only line of railway in that island. With regard to the rolling stock and the increase of traffic on the Intercolonial Railway traffic has increased at least ten-fold during the past year, and the Minister of Railways and Canals has asked for an appropriation to renew that track. Neither the hon. gentleman nor any other private individual can expect the Department of Railways and Canals to clog the business of the road to accommodate his or their private business. I say again that two or three private individuals doing business along that line are practically asking me at this moment to intercede with the department for the privilege of building sidings along that railway, and I feel loath to do so until the vote now going through will be available to put the track in proper shape so that trains and traffic will sweep along the line at a vigorous pace, and thus remove the congestion of traffic which the snail-pace that has hitherto been maintained, has created.

Mr. McDUGALL. The rails that were put down on that road thirteen years ago were steel rails, but if the government had listened to those gentlemen who were then in opposition, they would have put down wooden rails, because we were told over and over again by them that the road was never going to do any business. However, we made our complaints to the Department of Railways and Canals, and we were told that the rails were suited for the traffic; possibly they were, they served the purpose anyway up to a recent date when it was found the traffic was getting too heavy. It is only a few weeks ago that we had a fight in this House, and we heard a howl raised from the town of Sydney and the board of trade against the department sending old rails down there to replace those that are on the road now. Some of those were put in. The minister denied that any old rails were being put in on the Cape Breton part of the road to replace the old ones that were there before.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I hope to get money enough to put new ones along the whole line.

Mr. McDUGALL. It was decided that rails were somewhat heavier than those now on the road were to be taken off that portion of the line between Truro and Moncton and were to be brought to Cape Breton, and several car-loads of them were brought down and the operation of putting them down was begun. I saw them being put there after the minister made his statement. Now with regard to the siding, it is fifteen miles away from the siding of which I spoke as having been put in at my own expense. The hon. gentleman forgot to state that the government put in a siding within 1,800 feet of my siding, at public expense.

Mr. CAMPBELL. That is a public siding.

Mr. McDUGALL. Why should that be public more than mine? Mine is used by the public the same as the other. How can it be public when the government has not given an inch of ground for it?

Mr. McLENNAN (Inverness). Do you not charge for your siding?

Mr. McDUGALL. I do not charge for it yet, but I presume I will have to some day. If the government is going to run opposition to me by giving a siding to my neighbours I will have to do something to live. What I complain of is that one party should be treated differently from another. Why should this siding be put there at all and why should it be built at the public expense.

Mr. McLENNAN (Inverness). The public use it.

Mr. McDUGALL. This is a siding they put in at the expense of the public and it is only 1,800 feet from mine. The public are using both.

Mr. McLENNAN (Inverness). Do you find any fault with the public?

Mr. McDUGALL. I find fault with the government after having paid for mine.

Mr. McLENNAN (Inverness). If the hon. gentleman had had patience he would not have required to have built one but he could have used the public siding.

Rideau Canal staff ..... $267

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS moved:

That the item be reduced to $120.

Motion agreed to.

Intercolonial Railway ..... $900,000

Mr. HAGGART. I do not understand how the minister managed the two payments on the Intercolonial Railway, $900,000 there and $350,000 on revenue account.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. We did not get through with the payments. We had not enough to pay; we were short one-half of last month.

Mr. HAGGART. You put through a Bill to meet it?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes, but it is not through the Senate yet.

Lachine Canal—Dredge vessels ..... $2,000

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I wish to change this item to 'general repairs.'

Amendment agreed to.

Prince Edward Island Railway..... $20,000

Mr. MARTIN. I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals if a deputation was here some time ago from Prince Edward Island representing the employees of the Prince Edward Island Railway, asking for an increase of wages to bring them up to the rate paid the same class of employees on the Intercolonial Railway, and if so, what has been done?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. We had a call from a gentleman representing the employees on the island, and they maintained that there was really a difference between the rate of wages paid on the Intercolonial Railway road on the mainland and on the Prince Edward Island road, which was unreasonable and unfair. I forwarded their application with a memo. of their general statement to the department at Moncton, and they advised me that there is not the unfairness in the slight difference between the rates paid on the island and the mainland which there appears to be. However, the subject is receiving consideration at my hands, and I intend to take it up as soon as the session is over. It is maintained at Moncton that it costs more for the employees to live on the mainland than on the island. Whether that statement is correct or not I cannot say, but that is the impression that obtains at Moncton.

Beauharnois Canal ..... $26,850

Mr. HAGGART. Do you intend to keep up the repairs on that canal.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No, I am going to withdraw $25,000. I move that the item be reduced to $1,650.

Motion agreed to.

Unprovided items, 1898-9..... $73,166 66

Mr. HAGGART. What are the items in the Auditor General's Report?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. This is not an appropriation of money, but it is a ratification which takes place every year of certain odds and ends of expenditure which the Auditor General sets forth and which we always cover by a vote.

Mr. CLANCY. Would the Minister of Railways and Canals bring down to-morrow the papers which I sent him a memo. of this afternoon. If we have them we will get through more quickly.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have them here, except the contract. I want to make them complete, and I will give him the papers personally to-morrow. They are original copies, and he will have to take care of them and return them.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. BLAIR.

Mr. HAGGART. What business will be taken up to-morrow.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I think there is an understanding that the Bill relating to judges will be taken up to-morrow morning; if not some other business. In the afternoon the day is set apart for the prohibition matter.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 1.05 a.m. (Tuesday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

IMPERIAL DEFENCE AND PREFERENTIAL TRADE.

Mr. ALEXANDER McNEILL (North Bruce). As I find there has been a misunderstanding in some quarters of an observation I made to my right hon. friend the other night, on a motion to adjourn the House, I wish to make a brief explanation. I stated then, with reference to the resolution which was carried by the great trade conference now assembled in England, that its result meant the adoption of the principle of provincial trade by all the delegates assembled, with the exception of one. I am assuming, of course, that the report of the meeting of that conference in the Globe is correct. As there has been some misapprehension about the matter, perhaps the shortest way for me to explain to the House exactly the import of the resolution thus passed—which is really one of the most important events, in my judgment, that has taken place in the history of the empire—would be to read a few words that I said on a similar resolution which I had the privilege of introducing into this House in 1896. I said that we had passed two resolutions in the House—the first in favour of preferential trade—

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). My hon. friend is hardly in order.

Mr. McNEILL. I will not be a moment, and do not want to move the adjournment of the House. The second resolution was a resolution in support of a proposal to give armed assistance, in case of need, to the mother country, and I proceeded to explain the resolution I was then introducing in this way. (That was after I had read the resolution in favour of preferential trade):

The second resolution I need not read, because it is in the memory of all hon. members, and by it we pledged ourselves, when the occasion arose, to do our utmost for the defence of the empire. The House has therefore solemnly and formally pledged itself to these two principles : In the first place to the principle of Imperial reciprocity, or preferential trade within the empire ; and in the second place, to the principle that Canada is prepared to make substantial sacrifices for the defence of the empire. The resolution which I had the honour of placing in your hands a moment or two ago, Mr. Speaker, is of this nature, that it proposes to use this preferential trade, which is so much desired by the colonial part of the empire, as an instrument for producing the means of Imperial defence. It does so in this way : The resolution proposes that Great Britain and the other members of the empire shall impose a small preferential duty on all foreign products imported by them, not imposing any duty, so far as this matter is concerned, upon English or colonial products, upon products raised within the empire. Therefore, so soon as England agrees to this proposal and places a duty on foreign products imported into her markets and allows our goods to enter free, we at once have preferential trade, and, just in proportion to the amount of the duty thus imposed, do we have a greater or less amount of preferential trade. I hope that is clear to hon. gentlemen, because I know some members did not realize that this was in reality a resolution in favour of preferential trade as well as a resolution in favour of Imperial defence. So soon as these duties are imposed by England against foreign countries and our goods are allowed to go in free, then at once we have preferential trade with England. This proposal, Mr. Speaker, is not mine.

It was a proposal of Mr. Hoffmeyer, and known as the Hoffmeyer scheme. I wished to make that explanation, because there was some misunderstanding the other day, apparently, and since, as to the exact import of the resolution which was carried in this great conference, and I think the House will agree with me when I say that, if the report of the Globe be correct, and if it be true that in this great meeting of delegates, representing the chambers of commerce of all parts of the empire, this resolution was carried with only one dissenting voice, it is one of the most important events that has occurred even in this year of important events in connection with the empire—this creative era for the empire.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Mr. G. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.) Before the government orders are called, I would like to ask the First Minister if he has yet come to any decision with reference to the papers regarding the Richelieu bridge.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I can only repeat that there is correspondence going on at this moment between the Department of Railways and Canals and the Auditor General, and it would not be convenient to bring the papers down until the correspondence is completed.

Mr. FOSTER. Are these of a private nature?

The PRIME MINISTER. Not that I know of.

Mr. FOSTER. That ought not to apply to the correspondence with reference to the company and the payments to the company.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). There is no correspondence with the company that I know of going on. There are discussions and so forth pending between the department and the Auditor General. The matter has not by any means reached a conclusion yet, and until we conclude upon the negotiations pending, we cannot very well bring down the correspondence.

Mr. FOSTER. The correspondence is of two kinds. You are in controversy now with the Auditor General, which is not finished ; but the previous part of the correspondence, which refers to the payments and the conditions, and everything like that, the reports of the officers, surely can be brought down. Surely, that is not controversial, and can be brought down, if the minister—

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I prefer not to bring down anything until the whole business is through.

Mr. FOSTER. I think that is not treating the House fairly. This money has been voted by the House and spent by the government, and the House is entitled to know it at any time, to have the correspondence with reference to it. If there is any row on with the Auditor General that has not been fought to a finish, I do not insist on that part coming down. I have not yet received any of those returns which I, in confidence, handed over to the Prime Minister.

The PRIME MINISTER. I have the report ready, and will lay it on the Table. It is sent to me with a note from the Secretary of State, saying this return is complete except the Department of Railways and Canals.

Mr. FOSTER. And when shall I have that?

The PRIME MINISTER. I will try to get that also.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR (South Leeds). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to ask the Minister of Militia (Mr. Borden) if he has the report yet respecting Corporal Courtney ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). Yes, the papers came to the department yesterday. I asked the deputy minister to look over them carefully and make a report. I hope this afternoon to be able to give the information the hon. gentleman wants ; and if not this afternoon, to-morrow.

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—EMERGENCY RATIONS.

Mr. G. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.) Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to ask if the Minister is ready to set a day for the discussion of the emergency food report?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier.) It has not been printed, so far as I know.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, it has been printed and distributed.

The PRIME MINISTER. We will fix a day to-morrow.

Mr. J. B. MORIN (Dorchester). I desire to ask the Prime Minister if he would be kind enough to have printed in French the proceedings of the emergency food inquiry?

The PRIME MINISTER. That does not require any order from me. It is in the power of the House to do that, and I think the officers are attending to it already.

RAILWAY SUBSIDIES.

Mr. G. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.) Yesterday or to-day was the limit fixed for bringing down the railway resolutions. Are they ready?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). They will be brought down to-day.

COMPANIES' CLAUSES ACT.

On the order being called for the second reading of Bill (No. 183) to amend the Companies' Clauses Act.—(Mr. Fielding.)

Mr. G. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.) This Bill is not printed, and I do not think we should take it up before it is printed. At any rate, I do not think we shall make any progress by taking it up now. The hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) is not present, but he will be here in the course of the day, and he particularly wishes to be present during the discussion of this Bill. I spoke to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) with reference to it last night. He may not have seen the First Minister since then.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I do not remember that the question was raised as to printing.

Mr. FOSTER. No, the question was as to going on with the Bill this morning.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I understood there had been an agreement between the hon. member for Montmorency and the Solicitor General—

Mr. FOSTER. No.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). There was ; I was a party to it myself.

Mr. FOSTER. My version of that is, that there was an agreement with the Premier under which this Bill was to come up on Friday, and the hon. member for Montmorency was here on that day, but the Bill was not brought up. He is away, and is kept away by illness in his family.

Mr. JAMES SUTHERLAND (North Oxford). He has been away nearly the whole session.

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. FOSTER. He has not been away as much as the hon. gentleman's superior, the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), who has not shown his face here at all.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But he did not ask for any delay on his account.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think it would be well to push the Bill under the circumstances. I am sure there is no arrangement between the Solicitor General and the hon. member for Montmorency for this morning.

The PRIME MINISTER. My recollection is quite the reverse. Of course, I would willingly oblige my hon. friend from Montmorency. I know he is away because of illness in his family, and I certainly sympathize with him in that respect. I have a very distinct recollection that some day was set, although I am not so sure as to the day. My hon. friend (Mr. Fitzpatrick) will remember that there was a day fixed.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). Friday.

PILOTAGE ACT AMENDMENT.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies) moved the third reading of Bill (No. 11) to amend the Pilotage Act.

Mr. G. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.) What is the state of this Bill?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. member (Mr. Foster) will remember that after it came out of committee a desire was expressed to have the Bill reprinted. I did have it reprinted, but at the request of hon. gentlemen from time to time I did not bring it on.

Mr. FOSTER. What does it do with reference to this court?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It leaves it where it was in committee. It provides for the court, and if after, the Admiralty Court is established, it transfers the jurisdiction to the Admiralty Court.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the third time and passed.

INSPECTION OF GRAIN IN MANITOBA.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved that the amendments made by the Senate to Bill (141), respecting the grain trade in the inspection district in Manitoba, be read a second time. He said: I would like the attention of the hon. members for the North-west to these amendments. Most of them are purely formal. In section 38, subsection 1, leave out the words 'what grade or,' after the word 'report.'

Mr. G. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.). They seem to leave out the word 'grade' all through. How does that affect the Bill?

The PRIME MINISTER. I could not give the information to the hon. gentleman. I submitted the amendments to the hon. member for East Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas) and he approves of all of them.

Amendment concurred in.

The PRIME MINISTER. At the end of section 37 a new subsection is added called 37a :

37a. It shall be the duty of the owner, lessee or manager of every elevator now or hereafter equipped with grain cleaners to clean the grain before it is weighed, when so requested to do.

2. Persons interested in the weighing of any grain at country elevators shall have free access to the scales while such grain is being weighed. The net weight of the grain so cleaned shall be specified on the face of the certificate given the seller by the purchaser.

3. The proprietor, lessee or manager of any elevator failing to comply with the provisions of this section shall be guilty of an offence under this Act.

I move this amendment.

Mr. FOSTER. As I understand it, that does not make it obligatory that the owner, lessee or manager of an elevator shall be equipped for cleaning, but in case they are equipped then when requested they shall clean the grain. Is there any provision for a charge for the cleaning of the grain ?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Must they clean the grain at their own cost and charges ?

Mr. DOUGLAS. There is a certain recognized fee for cleaning the grain.

Amendment concurred in.

HILLSBOROUGH RIVER BRIDGE AGREEMENT, P.E.I.

Bill (No. 182) respecting the construction of a branch railway from Charlottetown to Murray Harbour, was read a second time; and House resolved itself into committee thereon.

(In the Committee.)

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). Mr. Chairman, this Bill is introduced in substitution of chapter 4, 63 Victoria, in reference to the arrangement between the government of Prince Edward Island and this government for the construction of the Hillsborough River bridge. Under the Act of last session, the Minister of Railways was authorized to enter into an agreement with the government of Prince Edward Island in the following terms :—

The Minister of Railways and Canals may enter into an agreement with the government of Prince Edward Island, providing that the bridge to be constructed over the Hillsborough River shall be so constructed as to be adapted and suitable as well for the purpose of a public highway as for the purposes of railway ; and before entering into any contract for the construction of such bridge the government of Prince Edward Island shall undertake and agree to contribute the sum of twelve thousand dollars a year as its share of the cost of the construction of such bridge, which contribution shall be deducted half-yearly from the subsidies and allowances payable to the said province ; and the Minister of Railways and Canals may, in such agreement with the government of the said province, provide for the regulation and control of the said bridge and of the highway traffic thereon.

These were the terms which were imposed last year upon the government of Prince Edward Island, and it was presumed that they would be accepted as satisfactory by the government of that province, although we had no final or definite arrangement with them to that effect. According to the estimate which we had made of the cost of the bridge, and according to what we conceived would be the charges incidental to its operation and maintenance, we concluded that $12,000 a year would not be an unreasonable sum to exact from the island, in consideration of our undertaking the work. Since, however, as a result of the revision of the plans and of a consideration of the circumstances likely to arise, we felt that we would ask parliament to authorize a revised arrangement reducing the amount which we would call upon the island government to pay in respect to their contribution somewhat, and we have placed in this Bill a schedule of the new agreement as it is entered into and as it awaits the sanction of parliament before it becomes binding and obligatory upon the parties. We have proposed to reduce the amount of the contribution by the government of the island from $12,000 to $9,750, and we arrive at the amount in this way : Our original estimate of the cost of the bridge was that it would be between $800,000 and $900,000. We felt that, under the circumstances, we could ask the government of the island to pay us interest on one-half of the cost of the bridge, on the round sum of $800,000, 3 per cent upon half of which would be $12,000. This is the way that we arrived at the contribution of the island government. In revising the plan of the bridge, we have reduced the cost somewhat. Our estimate of the cost of the bridge now is $750,000. The interest upon that amount, at 3 per cent, would be $22,500, and on one-half of it the interest would be $11,250. We have arranged with the island government, subject to the approval of parliament, to allow $1,500 off that, the island government undertaking, on their part, to pay all the expenses of watchmen upon the bridge, all of the guarding and protecting, to provide whatever lighting is required, and also to keep for all time the roadway, the highway and the foot and passenger way, excepting between the rails of the railway, which we have to replank and renew as may be required. In consideration of these conditions, we have felt that it would be proper and reasonable to make the allowance to them which I propose here, and I ask parliament to ratify this agreement, under which they will contribute $9,750 a year in the same manner as was proposed in the original contract.

Mr. G. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.) What guarantee can the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) give us that his estimate of $750,000 will finish the structure? We have samples every year of these estimates and of the large difference between the estimate and the actual cost of construction. The first estimate was between $800,000 and $900,000. The hon. gentleman, in order to reduce the amount to be paid by the province, places the estimate at $750,000. In regard to the $1,500, I think that is a fairly good arrangement, because the local government undertakes to take care of the roadway up to the approaches of the bridge, and the passenger roadway across the bridge, the Railway Department simply looking after its own track and the space between the tracks. But trouble will arise when the construction goes on and the hon. gentleman finds that it will take more than $750,000. It seems to me that the hon. gentleman must be very well convinced that he can finish the work within that estimate, or he ought to make a sliding-scale arrangement providing for interest on one-half of the amount, less $1,500 for the annual services to be performed by the local government.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman asks me what guarantee I can offer to him as to the correctness of this estimate. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would state what are the general guarantees which accompany the estimates of officers of the government. I know of no other guarantees to offer him. The original calculation of the engineers was based upon a somewhat different structure, and a somewhat more expensive structure than the one we now propose. They were in favour of a double span arrangement in place of the single span contemplated at present. The engineers say that $750,000 will be enough to enable us to complete this bridge, particularly as the maximum price in iron and steel has been reached, and there is some evidence of a downward tendency. I think the figures will not be found to be under the mark, as we know that engineers are not infallible.

Mr. FOSTER. Is that based on the cost of iron two or three months ago?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It is based on the cost three or four months ago.

Mr. FOSTER. That would be the maximum cost.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. There is a downward tendency in prices. There is no doubt that the arrangement to require the island government here to pay the interest on one-half the cost is an arrangement which, to say the least, is not unfavourable to the government of Canada. It was contended by those who represented the government of Prince Edward Island that we ought not to have insisted on so large a proportion. They said: You have to build the bridge anyway for the purposes of your railway, and it would be more reasonable if the Dominion government were only to exact what would be a proper proportion of the additional cost by reason of the highway. I argued that proposition with the representatives of the island government, and they ultimately acceded to our terms, and I think that our claims at all events are not unfavourable to the government of Canada, while, I am not prepared to say that it is an arrangement which is unduly favourable to Prince Edward Island. The estimates of the engineer have been made with care, and I think the best thing we can do is to accept them as we have been in the habit of doing heretofore.

Mr. BLAIR.

Mr. H. A. POWELL (Westmoreland). How long will the bridge be?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. With the approaches, it would be nearly three-quarters of a mile. It is not a very long bridge. It is not as long as the bridge at Fredericton, which is 2,700 feet.

Mr. POWELL. The water is very deep there.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The abutments are much more expensive and better.

Mr. A. MARTIN (East Queen's, P.E.I.) Would the minister tell the committee the difference between the bridge he proposes to erect now and the bridge which he proposed to erect last year: the difference in the length and in the width?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. There is no difference in the length. It was proposed in the original plans to put up double trusses, but now there is only a single truss, with the one opening, and the track is laid down a little to one side of the middle, and the main road is on the other side.

Mr. MARTIN. Do wagons pass over the same track as the railway, or is there a partition between.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. There is no partition. We do not propose to allow wagons upon the bridge when the locomotive is moving. We propose to have the gate shut and the general public excluded from the bridge while the trains are crossing. That is considered the safer plan to adopt.

Mr. MARTIN. We should have the plan of this bridge here, so that we may know something about it. The plan we had last year was a much more preferable plan than this one, because there will be great delay for wagons while the trains are crossing. Will the minister tell me when this change was made and the present plan adopted?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Last fall.

Mr. MARTIN. I may be wrong, but I understand that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) went through the southern section last autumn with a plan different from the plan which we now have before us.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Not much; a very slight difference.

Mr. MARTIN. In that plan there was a separate track for wagons, besides the railway track.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No.

Mr. MARTIN. I know the Minister (Sir Louis Davies) went there, and he said he spent three days' hard work in finishing the plans.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Can the hon. gentleman make that statement of his own knowledge? Was he present?

Mr. MARTIN. I heard it from gentlemen who were there.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Oh, yes.

Mr. MARTIN. I understand that this new plan was only completed last April, but the Minister of Marine, in some mysterious way, had it last fall and heralded it over the length and breadth of the district as the result principally of his own labour. I wish to point out that, under this Bill, the province of Prince Edward Island is paying a heavier proportion for this bridge than it would have paid for the bridge of last year. I do not think that any engineer would make an estimate that last year's bridge could be completed for anything like a million dollars. The bridge last year was nearly half as wide again as this one, and it would have cost $1,250,000. Prince Edward Island's share of the last year's bridge would be $12,000 a year, but its share for this bridge, which is to cost little more than one-half, will be $9,750. The minister told us that the estimates for the bridge last year was a million dollars.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. He did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. MARTIN. The hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies) had better be easy. I have got the answer here under my hand.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Read it.

Mr. MARTIN. Here it is:

Q. What is the estimated cost of the bridge now proposed? What was the estimated cost of the bridge proposed to be built under section 2 of chapter 4, Statutes of 1899?

A. The estimated cost of the bridge now is $750,000. The original estimate was something less than a million dollars.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Hear, hear.

Mr. MARTIN. That, I suppose, might mean $999,999—which would be only one dollar less. According to the estimates of the engineer submitted last year, the bridge could not be built for anything like a million dollars. The bridge now proposed to be built is a cheaper bridge, for which the province has to pay $9,750 a year, representing a capital of $300,000 or $400,000. I see it is provided in this Bill:

The provincial government shall use all necessary means for the protection and safety of all foot-passengers and persons using the highway portion of the said bridge.

The provincial government is not only to provide for the lighting of the bridge, but for the safety of foot-passengers, and when I tell you that the passage-way for wagons is the same as for trains, you will see that the danger is very great. I asked the minister the other day whether it was proposed that the Dominion government should provide the necessary means for the protection and safety of foot-passengers and others using the highway portion of the bridge, and he said he could not answer the question; but this very Bill says that the provincial government shall provide the protection. Why could not the Minister of Railways at once say that the Dominion government would not provide that? In this matter the government are driving a very hard bargain indeed with the province of Prince Edward Island. I think the Dominion government should afford the necessary protection for foot-passengers and other persons crossing that bridge. If the provincial government are to do that, it will be an additional burden put upon them while they are already paying a very large sum, although they should not be called on to pay more than the difference between $750,000 and $650,000.

Mr. JOHN HAGGART (South Lanark). I would suggest to the Minister of Railways and Canals that if my hon. friend has given a correct description of the proposed bridge, he had better go to a little more expense and build a proper bridge, on which the tracks can be separated from the highway for horses and foot-passengers. It may involve more expense, but it will be better by all means to have a bridge that would fully accommodate the public according to modern ideas; as he is trying to bring the Intercolonial Railway and the Prince Edward Island Railway up to that standard.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. So far as foot-passengers are concerned, they have a proper path at the side of the bridge, perfectly separate from the part for horses, unless they choose to go on it. As to its not being a first-class bridge, we have it from the engineers that it will be the best bridge that can be built. The question of having the tracks separate from the highway for ordinary traffic was considered, and plans were submitted on that basis; but the cost was so enormous that we could not accept them. I am satisfied, however, from the explanations which the chief engineer gave to me, and from a thorough examination of the plans, that the bridge will meet all the wants of the people.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. If there were a great deal of railway traffic over this bridge, so much as to impede the vehicular traffic, I would agree with the hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart). There may, perhaps, be two trains a day each way, and it would be scarcely reasonable to expend a large amount of money for the purpose of laying a separate and independent track under these circumstances. We have a number of instances under our eyes in which, perhaps not railway trains to a great extent, but cars use traffic bridges right within the limits of this city. We have cars passing and repassing every two or three minutes of the day, and they are not found to interfere, to any great degree, with the use of the bridges for other purposes. I am free to confess that there was an uncertainty in my mind as to what the cost of this bridge would be. The engineers made an estimate when the price of iron was a good deal lower than it subsequently became. When the question came up last year the price of iron was very much increased, and I feared that the cost of the structure would be appreciably augmented. Things are looking more favourable in that regard, however, and I feel confident that the engineers' estimate is not wide of the mark. The bridge will be first-class in every respect, and I am sure the people will be getting good value for the money they are contracting to pay under this agreement.

Mr. McDUGALL. It is proposed to have a draw in the bridge?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes.

Mr. McDUGALL. What depth of water is there where it is proposed to have the draw?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It is very deep water.

Mr. MARTIN. After all, there has been a deception practised on Prince Edward Island in connection with this bridge. I attended a series of meetings last fall at which this project was thoroughly discussed. The Attorney-General, who was running an election at the time, said that the first proposal to build a bridge, on which wagons and trains would have the same passage-way, was insufficient, and it had been decided to build a bridge with separate ways for wagons and trains. Now it is proposed to build a bridge which will be dangerous to the public, while the task of affording protection for foot-passengers and other passengers will be thrown on the provincial government at an annual cost of $9,750 for all time to come. The province could itself put up a bridge sufficient for the traffic for foot-passengers or wagons for a much less sum, involving a much less annual charge than what we will have to pay under this Bill.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Have you had any engineer's report to that effect?

Mr. MARTIN. Yes. I understand they can put up a bridge there for $250,000 or $300,000.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Who is the engineer?

Mr. MARTIN. I am not aware, but I think that calculations have been made.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. What engineer reported that?

Mr. MARTIN. I am not aware that I named the engineer.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Does the hon. gentleman pledge himself that any engineer ever made that statement?

Mr. MARTIN. Will the hon. gentleman tell me who was the engineer that drafted this plan? The Minister of Marine and Fisheries appears to have spent three of the hardest days' work he ever did in making it, if we believe what he said in Prince Edward Island.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. He was the chief engineer of the Intercolonial Railway, and the hon. member never made before to-day, any such statement as he has just made, either directly or indirectly, or anything at all like it.

Mr. MARTIN. Had the hon. Minister of Marine this plan down in the province of Prince Edward Island last year?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I had the plan on which the Bill was introduced last year, signed by Mr. McKenzie, the only plan which had been made up to that time.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. That bridge will not carry the hon. gentleman over.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. We will see.

Mr. MARTIN. I am going to put the Minister of Marine and Fisheries a question. He said he was three days at Moncton finishing that plan.

Sir LOUIS DAVIES.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I never made any such statement.

Mr. MARTIN. Had you the plan down in the province?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Certainly.

Mr. MARTIN. And it was finished last October. Now, the hon. minister has been there three days. I suppose he will not deny that he was there anyway, whether three days or two days, and they had time in that period to finish the plan. How long would it take a draughtsman to finish that plan?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I would not like to make any calculation. It would depend on the draughtsman.

Mr. MARTIN. At any rate the Minister of Marine and Fisheries could not have it last October in Prince Edward Island. I make this statement: The province is called upon to pay annually more than it should have to pay for the construction of a highway bridge. I think I would withdraw a good deal of my opposition were that clause struck out, throwing the responsibility on the provincial government of protecting foot-passengers crossing the bridge. If there should be any mishaps, the island would be saddled with the damages. I think that the Dominion government should assume the responsibility for accidents. Though I object entirely to the plan of the bridge, I think that if this clause were struck out, I would be more disposed to accept it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman forgets that there are proper trackways on each side of the bridge for foot-passengers. When trains are crossing, no foot-passengers or horses are allowed on the bridge. There is a track for foot-passengers outside the bridge, so that there is no danger to any foot-passengers at all, unless they choose to go on when the train is crossing, contrary to regulations.

Mr. MARTIN. Vehicles and wagons travel on this bridge on the railway track and every one does not know when a train is to pass. If the provincial government is to make provision for the safety of those people, that will entail much larger expense than the hon. minister imagines. There is another thing, I do not see the necessity of having two tracks for foot-passengers. In place of having two tracks for foot-passengers, if you had one sufficiently wide and a separate track for vehicles, that would be a great improvement. On some of the bridges in this city there is only one track for foot-passengers, and there is quite as much traffic on those bridges as on the one proposed. However, I cannot expect to carry my point, but all I can do is to call the attention of the committee to it.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I must express my surprise at one statement of the hon. gentleman, and that is that a highway bridge could be built across at this site for $250,000. I cannot think that that is possible. There is, after all, very little difference between the cost of the abutments of this bridge, and those of the highway bridge, and that is a portion of the cost of a highway bridge, which forms very much the larger share. The cost of the iron or steel trusses for highway purposes, is not much less than their cost for railway purposes. I venture to say, with confidence, that instead of a highway bridge costing only $250,000, it could not be built in that depth of water and in that place, having regard to the conditions existing, for less than half of a million dollars—that is a durable and permanent structure.

The hon. member did not persist in making the statement, but rather withdrew it, that there had been an engineer who had passed on this work and given such report. I do not think he could have seen the report of any engineer on the subject, bearing out the hon. gentleman's contention. He cannot name the engineer, does not know who he was, and is trusting altogether to hearsay. I venture to affirm that no engineer of experience or standing has ever made such an investigation or given any such report.

Mr. MARTIN. The argument of the Minister of Railways and Canals turns against himself. He says that a passenger bridge could not be built for less than half a million dollars. At that rate, the Minister of Railways and Canals could not build an ordinary railway bridge for less than half a million of money.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I think so.

Mr. MARTIN. If a passenger bridge would cost half a million, I suppose that a railway bridge could not be built for less than $650,000. In that case the cost to the province of Prince Edward Island would be $100,000. But the minister saddles the province with $9,750 a year, representing a capital of $350,000, or more than three times as much as they should pay.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin) has strayed away from the question I put to him. I asked him the name of the engineer who made that report. He evades that question. He has heard merely of such an engineer—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Or created him out of his own imagination—

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not like to say that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin) invented a statement or imagined what he asserted; but, at best he has been relying on some report which he has never verified. It is quite true it would cost half a million, as the hon. gentleman said, to build a highway bridge. It is possible it would cost $100,000 or $150,000 more to build a railway bridge. But does the hon. gentleman think it reasonable that the matter should be estimated on that basis as to the cost the island should pay? I do not think so. We might as well say to the government of the island: You want a highway bridge here and it will cost you half a million to build it; and there is no reason why we should pay more than the difference between the cost of the passenger and the railway bridge. The fact is, we have combined our interests. We wish a railway bridge, but not more probably than they desire a highway bridge. We say: We will come as nearly as we can to dividing the cost; we do not want to be unreasonable or exacting; as you are the smaller government we will give you the benefit of all doubts, and we will give you your highway bridge for much less than you could build it for yourselves. That is beneficial to both parties.

Mr. MARTIN. It is evident there is no use in discussing this farther. The hon. minister says that I run away from his question; he evidently runs away from mine; and it is very cleverly done too. He has not taken into consideration the fact that the province is not the prime mover in this matter. The Dominion government is building this railway, and has to connect with the capital of the province. He cannot alter that, he cannot reverse the facts by merely saying that the province wants a traffic bridge there. They are taking advantage of the fact that the province wants a passenger bridge to make them pay three times as much as the putting on of the traffic part of the bridge costs. But the minister has put down his foot, and has the approbation of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) who stands godfather to everything done by this government in the province. But I am afraid that it will not be very satisfactory to the people of Prince Edward Island.

Mr. A. C. MACDONALD (King's, P.E.I.) Even though this is late in the day, I am glad to see the Murray Harbour branch railway going on. I regret to see, however, that the government have not seen fit to carry out the policy of their predecessors with regard to the Murray Harbour branch railway as well as other railways in the island—

Mr. McLELLAN. That is not to build them at all—that was their policy.

Sir LOUIS DAVIES.

Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.) The policy of the late government was to build the Murray Harbour branch road, the East Point branch road, the New London branch road, the West Point branch road—all the branch railroads asked for in the island, and at less money than the government are going to spend now.

Mr. McMULLEN. That was an election policy.

Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.) It was a policy on which they are not ashamed to go back to the people. If the present government had carried out that policy, every one of those branch roads would have been built to-day. And, there is no doubt in my mind but that the Hillsborough bridge would have followed in due order. I am not opposed to the Murray Harbour branch road; I like to see every one of these roads built. There are other sections of the country that require a branch road as much, and perhaps more than those that will be served by the Murray Harbour branch. One of these is the eastern section of my own county, Elmira. If a few miles were built there, it would accommodate a more intelligent, a more industrious and a better-deserving people than almost any other portion of the island. It would benefit them particularly because they are cut off from railway communication, and, besides, they have no harbour communications to ship the great quantities of produce and fish that could be drawn from that section. I am glad that the branch roads are at least inaugurated, and I trust that every one that has been proposed will be carried to a successful issue.

Mr. N. CLARKE WALLACE (West York). We are told on good authority that all these branch lines could be built for the money that is to be expended on this bridge. The minister tells us that this bridge is being built to accommodate two trains a day each way, or it may have been only two trains a day—let us say two a day each way. It looks to me like an enormous expenditure for that purpose. Some estimates make it as high as a million and a quarter dollars, and the lowest estimate is three-quarters of a million dollars, and the latter estimate would leave the work lacking the necessary facilities for vehicular traffic and for passenger and railroad traffic. So that we may estimate an expenditure of a million and a quarter dollars. We have the statement of the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I., (Mr. Martin) that this bridge, as well as a number of branch lines could have been built within the estimate made for this bridge alone. If that be the case, and we have the statement of a responsible member of parliament for it, I think the government should revise their plans and come down to this House with a scheme that would carry out the building of branch lines and of a railroad bridge sufficient for the purposes, all for the same sum they are spending now for the construction of a bridge alone.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

CRIMINAL CODE (1892) ACT AMENDMENT.

House proceeded to take into consideration a message from the Senate amending the first amendment, and disagreeing to the third and fifth amendments made by this House to Bill (No. 137)—from the Senate—further to amend the Criminal Code, 1892.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The Senate has made certain amendments to the Criminal Code to which I now desire the attention of the House. It is not the intention of the government to accept these amendments, and I will state the reasons why we do not concur in them. The first amendment made by the Senate, to which I draw attention, relates to the time of the coming into force of this Bill. The Bill as it left this House had a provision that it should come into force on the 1st of January next instead of, as is usually the case with Bills, when it is sanctioned by the Governor General. In this respect we follow precedent established when the Criminal Code was introduced for the first time: it did not come into force on the day it was sanctioned but on a fixed date, a considerable time afterwards, if I remember right, several months, if not a year, in order to enable the public to become acquainted with its provisions. The Senate has amended the Bill in that particular, providing that the law shall come into force on the 1st of September, 1900. Well, we are within seven weeks of the 1st of September, and, obviously, the date is too short. So I move that this House disagree with the Senate in said amendment. I may say the reason given by the Senate for their amendment is that it is desirable that amendments made in the criminal law of this country shall go into operation on the earliest possible date consistent with the due publication of its provisions. I move that this House do disagree with the said amendments for the following reasons:

Because, though it is desirable that the amendments made in the criminal law of this country shall go into operation at the earliest possible moment, it is equally and still more imperatively desirable that the public should become familiar with the changes made in the criminal law before they become operative.

Mr. G. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.). Are there any very important new features in the Criminal Code Amendment Bill which would give force to the hon. gentleman's contention that a longer time should be allowed?

The PRIME MINISTER. I think so, one especially.

Mr. FOSTER. That with reference to the lottery business. If it could be disassociated from the other features, and if there were no other very startling improvements, my view would be that the very earliest date possible should be fixed in order to put an end to the pernicious system of lotteries in certain parts of the country. Could the hon. gentleman say whether at the outside there were any other revolutionary changes in the Bill?

Amendment rejected.

The PRIME MINISTER. There is one at least very important amendment to the criminal law, the next one to which I shall draw the attention of the House, and which is of the character suggested by my hon. friend a moment ago. The House passed this amendment to the Code, in section 359a:

Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to one year's imprisonment who, in incurring any debt or liability, has obtained credit by means of false pretenses or by means of any other fraud.

This is a new departure in the criminal law. A man who obtains credit by means of false pretenses is put on the same footing and treated in the same manner as a man who obtains money by false pretenses. This is a wide departure in the criminal law, and creates a new offence, and I think it would not be inconsistent with our duty that such an important departure in the criminal law should be suddenly sprung upon the public. The reasons given by the Senate for their amendment are these:

(a) The proposed section 359a would offer great injury to perjury on the part of vendors;

(b) It would give a creditor, who claimed or asserted that there had been a false pretense on the part of the purchaser, an opportunity to practically coerce such purchaser into giving such creditor an undue preference over his other creditors;

(c) It would injuriously interfere with the ordinary and long-established methods of conducting business between vendors and purchasers;

(d) No act should be declared a statutory crime where there is a substantial doubt as to the desirability of such declaration.

The House will see that the reasons given by the Senate are merely reasons of expediency, I do not believe that they go to the root of the matter at all. In the commercial world, and in the present stage of civilization, business is carried on very largely on credit and on the basis of mutual confidence, and it may be said with great truth, that the time has come when an offence committed by a man to obtain credit should be treated exactly in the same manner as an offence committed by a man to obtain money, obtained in both cases by means of false pretenses. I propose:

That this House doth insist on the said amendment for the following reasons: Because it would be in the public interest to punish, and if possible, to prevent a form of fraud which is becoming of frequent occurrence.

Motion agreed to.

The PRIME MINISTER. The fifth amendment made by the Senate, to which I desire to call the attention of the House, is this. We have made an exception in section 520 of the Criminal Code to prevent illegal combinations, in favour of workmen who may combine for the legitimate defence of their rights, which is as follows :

Nothing in this section shall be construed to apply to combinations of workmen or employees for their own reasonable protection as such workmen or employees.

That is to say that workmen acting under these circumstances for the legitimate protection of their rights are exempt from the operation of the clause. The Senate has omitted that clause.

The Senate has disagreed to the fifth amendment for the following reason : Because the Trades Unions Act, chap. 131 of the Revised Statutes, gives the necessary protection to combinations of workmen, and because there does not appear to be any substantial reason why any class of persons should be exempted from the operation of section 520 of the Criminal Code.

All this was familiar to us when we passed this Bill, but we thought it was due to workmen that we should introduce this further restriction against the operation of the law. I beg to move :

That this House doth insist on said amendment for the following reason : Because this amendment seems to be essential to combinations of workmen for the legitimate protection of their rights.

Motion agreed to.

The PRIME MINISTER. I beg to move :

That a Message be sent to the Senate acquainting their Honours with the reasons of the Commons for insisting on their first, third and fifth amendments to Bill K (No. 137)—from the Senate—entitled an Act to further amend the Criminal Code, 1892.

Motion agreed to.

COMPANIES CLAUSES ACT AMENDMENT.

Bill (No. 183) to amend the Companies Clauses Act, was read the second time, and House resolved itself into committee thereon.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. G. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.) Shortly, what is the purport of this Bill ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). It is to permit companies, other than insurance companies, to change their head offices when they shall see fit without coming for special legislation. I think it will be found that there are sufficient safeguards and checks thrown around it. It is provided that it is only to be done with the cordial assent of the shareholders of the company. The Bill contains several provisions which, I think, will be found sufficient for the purpose.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

Mr. BERGERON. Does this apply to every company ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. It does not apply to insurance companies, and in the case of any company which has, by its own legislation, dealt with the question, we do not disturb it, but where legislation is silent on the question, any company may change its head office provided it can get the general approval of its shareholders.

Mr. HAGGART. It does not apply to railway companies ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. No.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). This is a Bill which was originally introduced by the hon. member for East Middlesex (Mr. Gilmour) which came before the Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills, and which received a good deal of consideration there. I think it has now come down from the other Chamber.

Mr. HAGGART. It is harmless.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

It being One o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

The House resumed at Three o'clock.

PROHIBITION OF THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved :

That item 81 on the Public Bills and Orders be now made the Order of the Day and proceeded with.

Motion agreed to.

The House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Flint :

That this House has affirmed the principle that the prohibition of the liquor traffic is the right and most effectual legislative remedy for the evils of intemperance, and has also declared that as soon as public opinion would sufficiently sustain stringent measures, it was prepared to promote such legislation.

That the plebiscite of 1898, wherein a majority of the votes polled throughout the Dominion, including substantial majorities in all the provinces but one, were ascertained to be in favour of such legislation, as well as satisfactory evidence from other sources, shows that such measures will be thoroughly supported by the people of Canada.

That this House is now of the opinion, in view of the foregoing facts, that it is desirable and expedient that parliament should, without delay, enact such measures as will secure the prohibition of the liquor traffic for beverage purposes in at least those provinces and territories which have voted in favour of such prohibition; and the motion of Mr. McClure in amendment to the main motion, and the motion of Mr. Parmelee in amendment to the same.

Mr. T. B. FLINT (Yarmouth). Mr. Speaker, though I exhausted my right to speak on the original motion which I introduced, the introduction of the amendments has given me the right to again offer a few remarks. One can scarcely imagine that it is over two months since the short debate we had upon the resolution which I introduced early in the session. The time has passed very rapidly, a great deal has been done in the interim, and through the courtesy of the right hon. the leader of the government, I am again privileged to have this motion brought before the House for debate, and I trust a vote. On my own part and that of my friends, I desire to express our sincere acknowledgment to the leader of the House for thus giving us the opportunity we have desired. Had there been any disinclination on the part of the Prime Minister to have this question again up for discussion, it would easily have been within his power to have simply declined the request which I and others made to him. To the request made him by us, the right hon. gentleman gave the most willing sanction, and, consequently, we have before us to-day the original resolution and the two amendments which have been moved. I desire to repeat something that I said in the previous debate, because, notwithstanding my statement then, and notwithstanding that I stated the same thing in a previous session, I find that even so intelligent and fair a disputant as the hon. member for Durham (Mr. Craig), either purposely or for the sake of argument, has misunderstood my position and the position of those who are responsible with me for the motion upon which these amendments are based. No one who has at all followed the discussion of the prohibition question in the Dominion Alliance meetings and elsewhere, can pretend for one moment to intimate, that although the legislative committee of the Dominion Alliance, and myself as their humble representative here, take any lower position on the general question of prohibition than that it is desirable that it should be extended to the whole Dominion of Canada. That is the basis of the proposition, not only of that alliance, but also of the constituent bodies which it represents. And, although for the sake of securing additional support, and for the sake of meeting the views of men who are friendly to prohibition, but who doubt the advisability of the application of it to the whole Dominion, we have accepted a position somewhat short of that; yet, it is certainly unfair and not strictly according to the facts of the case for any assumption to be made, either for the sake of debate or otherwise, that we take any different position from that of favouring total prohibition for the whole of Canada. That is the fundamental platform of, I believe, nine-tenths of the prohibitionists throughout the Dominion. It is both reasonable and fair and entirely consistent with a belief in that doctrine, that a prohibitionist should advocate something short of total prohibition, if by that means he can secure a verdict in its favour and secure a measure that will meet the views of those friends of temperance who doubt the practicability of a full and sweeping measure of prohibition. That is the position we have taken. Consequently, not only in the first debate which we had upon a similar resolution last session, but in the previous debate this session, I stated that I would myself support the amendment which was moved by the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. McClure), because it expresses my own personal and political views upon this subject, and I propose, if that amendment is reached, to support it.

Mr. TAYLOR. Why did you not move it?

Mr. FLINT. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor) asks me why I did not move it, and I will give him the reasons. The reason I did not move that resolution is this. I have had the honour, in an early session of the late parliament, to second a resolution of similar purport moved by Mr. Jamieson. At a later session of that parliament I had the honour, as representative of the Dominion Alliance, of moving the same resolution myself. In both these cases the resolutions were defeated by the action of the hon. gentlemen opposite, and they were sidetracked by an amendment. At a later date, the representatives of prohibition in the Dominion Alliance, when the result of the plebiscite was announced, finding that many who were heartily with them on the main principle throughout the country, and even in this House, thought that the situation was somewhat changed owing to the fact that in the second largest province of the Dominion there was evidently a strong popular feeling against prohibition, then, in order to meet the views of these friends of prohibition, and in order to bring forward a resolution which would appear to the minds of those more practical than the resolution providing for total prohibition, we decided upon the introduction of the resolution which I have had the honour to move. A great deal has been said, both by the hon. member for Leeds and Grenville (Mr. Taylor) and the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) and others, because the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. McClure) and the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Parmelee) have availed of their parliamentary privilege of moving an amendment to the resolution.

Mr. WALLACE. I do not think that the member for West York (Mr. Wallace) has said anything about it this session.

Mr. FLINT. I mean the hon. member for York, N.B., (Mr. Foster). They seem to see in this fact some alarming appearance of conspiracy. That legislative committee of the Dominion Alliance, made up to a large degree of members of this House, had decided to bring forward a resolution providing for the enactment of legislation which would lead to prohibition in such provinces as would support, and have supported, prohibition principles, they seem to think that there was something which looked like a conspiracy because some others were not satisfied with that standpoint, and desired to move the straight-prohibition resolution which my hon. friend from Colchester (Mr. McClure) is responsible for. Then, again, they see great signs of some kind of a dark conspiracy against the freedom of parliament or the liberties of the people, or something else, in the fact that the hon. gentleman from Shefford (Mr. Parmalee) should move an amendment expressing his opinion that the plebiscite did not warrant immediate action on the part of the government. These three propositions represent, emphatically and clearly, three different phases of opinion upon this subject, and it is not merely the privilege but it is the duty of any hon. member who differs from the stand taken by his colleague, to move such an amendment as will better express the opinions which he and those who follow him will support. The fact that substantially the same amendments were moved last session as this session is also made a great deal of by hon. gentlemen opposite. These propositions represent three clearly defined strata of thought and desire upon the subject, and it gives the House abundant opportunity for dividing along these lines. As the amendment of the hon. gentleman for Shefford was last before the House, I desire to make a few remarks in connection with it. The basis of the amendment is this: That the plebiscite of September, 1898, does not warrant immediate action in favour of prohibition. In my resolution I refer to the plebiscite, not as a reason or as a basis for legislation for the provinces, but simply as one of the arguments, one of the evidences that such a resolution, if carried into effect by this House, would be supported in these portions of Canada at which it aims.

I have not, either in resolutions or in public speeches, taken the ground that the result of the plebiscite by itself afforded an argument for immediate action in the way of total prohibition throughout the Dominion of Canada; and I think those who take the ground that it does not, simply by itself, afford a conclusive reason for such action, take very strong ground indeed—ground which it is very difficult to argue against. But I contend that that evidence of popular sympathy with prohibition, taken in connection with the merits of the principle itself, in connection with our knowledge of the history of this question, and in connection with the feelings and wishes of the people of the country generally, amply proves that wise prohibitory legislation would be well supported by the people of this country, if enacted into law, and is a strong argument in favour of such action by this House. The evidence I would adduce in that direction, first, that afforded by the action of this House in itself, and the attitude of hon. members on both sides of this House. I have been here a great many years, and have taken part in all the discussions on this very interesting subject; and I have yet to hear the first argument brought forward in the House against the principle of legislative prohibition in Canada. And notwithstanding the enormous amount of agitation which has been going on in the country through the various organizations devoted to this subject, I ask hon. gentlemen candidly to state when and where they find any organized opposition, or any deliberate line of argument taken against the principles which these organizations, societies, and individuals have been endeavouring to carry forward. Is it not a strange fact that, although there is no doubt a large amount of objection to the practicability of legislative measures enacting prohibition, no public man of any eminence, no journal of any great standing, no social or religious or other organization, has taken direct ground against the principle of prohibition? And flowing out through all these channels into the parliament itself, we find, as I have recited in the resolution which I have placed on the Order paper, that parliament itself has emphatically on more than one occasion stated, without objection or opposition, that in its opinion, the most effectual legislative remedy for the evils of intemperance, would be a stringent measure of prohibition.

Consequently we find that either the outspoken or the secret objection to the principle of this resolution, is the question as to whether popular opinion or electoral opinion is sufficiently strong to sustain parliament in enacting and carrying forward such a measure. And this is a ground with which I do not find fault. It certainly is a large and debatable question; and those who have been brought up in the atmosphere of temperance and prohibition, and have mingled with the strong advocates of this measure, may, perhaps, be more carried away with the idea that public opinion is enthusiastically in favour of it, than those who mingle with that class of our citizens who look with distrust, not only on the principle itself, but on the supposed popular opinion that would support it. In all the discussions on the question in this House, it is assumed to be fundamental that there should be a strong popular support that would stand by any administration that would enact prohibition, and by any course of subsidiary legislation that would necessarily follow its enactment. Otherwise in a wave of enthusiasm, perhaps carried forward by a wave of popular applause, a measure might be adopted which, after that wave of feeling ebbed backward, might be left unsupported; and the subsidiary legislation necessary to sustain the law would be either not forthcoming or would be very weak in its character, and many of the evils which prohibitory legislation is designed to do away with, might return, in perhaps greater force than ever. We all admit the force of these objections; but a careful consideration of the history of this particular agitation would convince any fair-minded man that the elements and the influences and forces which would impel parliament to enact the law, would also support parliament in enacting such other legislation in regard to taxation and otherwise as would be necessary to make such a law effective.

A line of argument has been taken by hon. gentlemen opposite, largely to the effect that the government has all the responsibility of this matter and parliament none; and in connection with this phase of the subject I have been attacked to a certain degree, on the allegation that I have used my little connection with this matter, as a source of embarrassment to previous administrations. Now, I desire to eliminate as completely as possible from the discussion of this question, my own personality, and treat it entirely on an impersonal basis. But sometimes one is obliged to defend himself, and I call attention to the fact that on no occasion did I, as a member of the legislative committee on this question, take any action which was not the result of the careful consideration of that committee, and which had not the approval of the temperance bodies of the country, and was not calculated to embarrass the government of the day as little as possible. Even so well informed a member as the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor), the leading whip of the opposition, was so oblivious of the history of this question in the last parliament that he, no doubt thoughtlessly, at all events, without a basis of fact, said I had introduced this matter on going into supply, which a careful search of Hansard, will show to be incorrect. Why did I not move on going into supply, had I desired to make use of this important question, which attracts a large amount of support, whether a majority or otherwise, to embarrass the administration to which I was opposed? Simply because I held then, as I hold now, that it is a question too important and far-reaching, too high, if I may so speak, to be made use of for mere party purposes. And I may say, so far as hon. gentlemen opposite are concerned, that not only have they refrained from making use of the question in that way, but they have, I think, gone a great deal further in their utter abstention from taking an active part in promoting this question, than they should have gone. I refer, of course, to those who proclaim themselves, in season and out of season, to be strong prohibitionists. I looked in vain, this session, to find any hon. gentleman on the opposite side, to assist us in framing a resolution which would catch the ear and the support of parliament. They prefer, I presume, to stand in the background and criticise and find fault with those who bring forward these resolutions and amendments, in the hope that some advance vote may be taken by parliament, which will strengthen the prohibition sentiment in the country and lead ultimately to some wise legislation on the subject. They stand back and criticise and make use of their votes for the purpose of embarrassing the situation rather than defend the cause which they profess to hold so much at heart. This is not the attitude that prohibitionists should assume. I think that they should assist hon. members on this side to pass such a resolution as would meet with general acceptance and smooth the way for any government or party to carry the required legislation into effect.

We have these three divisions before us. In the first place, we have those who believe that the present situation is satisfactory, that the plebiscite and it alone is to be made the argument either for or against the enactment of a prohibitory law, and they may be disposed to support the last amendment moved. But I think that that is a very narrow and prejudiced view to take. There are many reasons why the plebiscite was unsatisfactory. It was unsatisfactory to every temperance man in the country. Many who are in their hearts favourable to prohibition are open to censure for not having risen to the opportunity furnished by this administration and come forward and declared their position. The hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Parmalee) takes the ground that the plebiscite was not a warrant for the enactment of a prohibitory liquor law. A great many of the most wise, experienced and devoted temperance advocates in the country have taken similar ground, but the bulk of those occupied with this question have maintained that if it was a warrant for not having a general prohibitory law affecting the Dominion, at any rate it was a sufficient ground for the enactment of prohibitory legislation which would give substantial prohibition in those provinces and territories which declared themselves in favour of such legislation. There is much merit, I believe, in that position, and if I could not secure a vote in favour of total prohibition throughout the Dominion, I would heartily welcome the support of hon. gentlemen on both sides to a lesser measure, which has much to commend it in the fact that by passing such legislation enabling each province to absolutely suppress the liquor traffic within its own bounds, we would not only have the traffic greatly decreased but the prohibition made effective within limits where popular opinion is manifestly on record in its favour.

Another argument is this. We know that a strong feeling against prohibition throughout the country is due to the fact that a large amount of our revenue is derived from the various taxes levied on spirituous and malt liquors, and if these taxes were cut off at one blow, many of the financial interests of the country would greatly suffer. But if prohibition could be adopted section by section, if each province rose to the emergency and declared its willingness to adopt prohibition within its own borders, it will be easily seen that the cutting down of the revenue would be gradual and no sudden revolution in our financial position could possibly take place.

But if the House should come to a conclusion that it is better to vote solidly in support of the amendment of the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. McClure), that course would meet with my hearty approval. I recommend those who are with me on this great question not to accept the amendment to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Parmalee), and I trust that the result of this debate may be such as to encourage the government to take some forward step on the question, which so deeply interests such a large number of the most intelligent, loyal and patriotic people in our whole Dominion.

Mr. N. CLARKE WALLACE (West York). For my part, I desire to give my reasons to the House and the country for the vote I am about to give. We know the history of this question. We know that the government, when they were in opposition, in solemn conclave in the city of Ottawa, in 1893, determined that a vote should be taken before any steps were taken towards enacting a prohibitory law. That motion was made by the present Minister of Agriculture, and I know that he made a speech pledging his party to abide by the decision of the people on that vote. The people have given their decision. We are told by the hon. gentleman who has taken his seat, that this is a most interesting question and he repeated that half a dozen times. Why, that was not the language he used a few years ago. He then said it was a question that was vital to the interests of the nation, that it was necessary for Canada's future. But to-day we have the milk-and-water member for Yarmouth saying that this is a very interesting question, and that is all he can say. Why, it is as important a problem to-day as in the years gone by. I am opposed to shilly-shallying with any question, and like the British practice of meeting questions as they come, fairly and squarely, and deciding upon them. My own opinion is, if we are to have prohibition, we should have it with compensation to those affected, and if I get the opportunity, I will move an amendment to that effect, but I am precluded from doing so now. I propose to move, if I get the opportunity, that the following words be added to the amendment:

That fair and reasonable compensation be made to hotel owners and keepers and other interests financially affected by prohibition.

That would be a reasonable proposition. We are told by temperance advocates that the hotel-keeper and the hotel-owner and those who are engaged directly in the liquor business have no right to compensation from the government. We are told that they have only a license for one year, that they got that license knowing that at the end of the year it can be taken from them. But I contend that that is not the bargain made with the hotel-keepers. A man is asked to put up a hotel and stables in order to provide accommodation for travellers. We will suppose that the hotel-keeper gets a license. He does not go to all this expense because he has been promised a license for one year, but under the implied bargain that, if he keeps his hotel according to the regulations, if he obeys the law, the license will be continued to him. He would not dream for a moment of going to that enormous expense for a year's license, running the risk of its being taken away from him without compensation at the end of the term. Now, in addition to that, let us consider this privilege that is given him a selling whisky. A gallon of proof whisky that has been kept two years so as to come within the regulations does not cost more than 20 cents. But the Dominion government puts a tax upon it of $2.25, more than ten times the price of it. Then, along comes the local government and imposes a license fee upon the man who is to sell the whisky—and a pretty large license fee too. Then comes the municipal council, and they impose another license fee upon him, besides putting onerous restrictions upon him—that he shall not sell within certain hours, and so on. I am not finding fault with these restrictions. The effect of all this is that these three governments, Dominion, provincial and municipal, say to the hotel-keeper: Put in your $12,000 or $15,000 of capital in providing a building with all accommodation of stables, and so on, to make it suitable for a hotel; we will put in no capital; and, if prohibition is adopted, all the loss will fall on you, and not a dollar on us. I say this would be most unjust to the man who has made such an investment—to practically confiscate his property. His property, which has cost, say, $15,000 and, with a license is worth $15,000; but, without a license it will be worth perhaps even less than $5,000. Therefore, I say, it is the duty of this parliament, if they pass prohibitory liquor law to give compensation to those interested and whose property is in effect confiscated by that law. But the prohibitionists will say:

Mr. FLINT.

They do all this at their own risk. But this is not a fair way to look at it. Justly considered, these governments are partners in this business, and one of the partners should not bear all the loss. If this traffic is an iniquity, then, the governments are partners in an iniquity. Even as it is, the governments have an advantage over the other partner. The Dominion government, for instance, demands its tax of $2.25 per gallon before the liquor leaves its control. The prohibitionists tell us that the cost to this country of the liquor traffic is, say $30,000,000 or $40,000,000 per annum. Some put it as high as $50,000,000. But, suppose we put it at $20,000,000, what would it cost to give compensation to these interests. A computation was made some years ago that all these interests could be bought out for $8,000,000 or $10,000,000 per annum. The interest on that would be about $300,000 a year. That is, at a cost of something over a quarter of a million dollars you could save this $20,000,000 which, we are told, is squandered in liquor. There never was such an investment in the world—for a quarter of a million you would save $20,000,000 each year. There is another feature to it. Suppose that under the conditions I would propose, there is a hotel premises worth $15,000. When a prohibitory liquor law is carried, that property is valued by competent and disinterested men, and they decide that without the license, it is worth just half the money—$7,500. Let the government then take a mortgage on the property for $7,500 with the condition that if liquor is sold on the premises they will foreclose the mortgage for $7,500. That mortgage will remain for five years, or whatever term may be decided upon, and, if liquor be sold on the premises during that term, the government will foreclose the mortgage for $7,500. What would be the effect? You would have every hotel-keeper in this country assisting you in enforcing the law, for he would be very sorry to risk the loss of $7,500 by selling a glass of whisky. Therefore, he comes to the assistance of the government to carry out a prohibitory liquor law. His neighbour might, perhaps, be tempted to sell liquor, having no such restrictions placed upon him. But the hotel-keeper will naturally say: If I am not allowed to sell liquor, with all the appliances I have, I will take mighty good care that my neighbour shall not sell it. So, you would have the hotel-keeper assisting the constituted authorities to carry out the law, instead of being in violent antagonism to it, as he would otherwise be, because he would have a grievance, and would not only feel that grievance, but would make his friends feel that he had it, and would enlist their sympathies against the law. Instead of assisting him in breaking the law, his neighbour and friends would do all they could to assist in maintaining it. So, as a mere matter of business, as a matter of investment and protection, as a matter of assistance to the government in carrying out the law, this method would be of a most invaluable adjunct to help in making prohibition a success.

Then there is another proposition moved, as I understand it, by the hon. member (Mr. Flint), who has just sat down—prohibition by provinces. A more insane proposition never was made to a deliberative assembly. They propose that the province which stands in the very middle of the most densely populated part of the Dominion shall be excepted from the prohibition law, the other provinces having given substantial majorities in favour of prohibition. This proposition means that the province of Quebec will be made the centre from which liquor will be taken to every province in the Dominion. The thing is utterly unworkable. Before you can make a prohibitory liquor law workable you have to have two great machineries of the government in active assistance, that is the Department of Customs and the Department of Inland Revenue. We have a cordon of customs officers all along the borders of the Dominion. We have under these a power, as the Minister of Customs says, which reaches every part of the Dominion. We prohibit the importation of liquor except under certain conditions, and the general importation is prohibited, the whole force of the Customs Department with all its admirable machinery is exerted to prevent the importation of liquor. In a case of provincial prohibition you could not use the Customs Department at all, this great force would be utterly worthless. Then you have the machinery of the Inland Revenue Department to watch against the manufacture of liquor in this country itself; we have the Customs Department to prevent importation, and the Inland Revenue Department to prevent the internal manufacture, we have the admirable machinery of both departments to carry out prohibition. Sir, without those two adjuncts prohibition cannot be made a success, and to attempt to apply prohibition to the provinces would be utterly ridiculous and absurd, and would bring the temperance cause into contempt and put it back in this country for twenty years. More than that, we have to consider this question on the broad principle that the Dominion is one country. We took a vote of the whole Dominion to ascertain whether the Dominion was in favour of prohibition or opposed to it, and the people declared in favour of prohibition. But we are told that the province of Quebec has declared against it, therefore we cannot have prohibition. The province of Quebec may declare against protection, any other province of the Dominion may declare against protection as some of them did, but it became the law of this country. Did we hear any one say: Oh, here is the province of Prince Edward Island which declared against protection, and therefore the protective policy of 1878 must not go into force in that province. Such an idea is so utterly absurd that it only has to be stated to secure its condemnation. We are one country, we are a Dominion, and the same law that prevails in one province should prevail in the others. If a prohibitory law is right it should apply to every province and every portion of this Dominion. More than that, the Dominion has declared in favour of prohibition. But the province of Quebec has declared against it, we are told. Well, we know the people there kept on voting day after day. I think the election was held on September 28, and two days after, the next day in fact, the result was known in every province of this Dominion except Quebec; we had pretty accurate figures to know how the other provinces had voted on prohibition. But we could not hear from the province of Quebec. I was living in Quebec myself at that time, and the next day we could not hear any definite news. We waited day after day, and without getting any definite figures we saw the majority against prohibition kept getting larger. I think that if they had waited a week or two more the province of Quebec would have piled up a majority against prohibition that would have defeated it throughout the whole Dominion. But they had apparently got to the length of their tether and had to come out with some kind of a statement.

Now, I am told, and I believe that it is absolutely true, that there is no more temperate province in this Dominion than the province of Quebec. The right hon. the First Minister can give us a general idea on that question, and I think he will affirm the proposition that the province of Quebec is perhaps the most temperate, practically the most prohibitory, of all the provinces in this Dominion to-day, the province where the people are less given to the excessive use of liquor than the people in any other province. Therefore they are not opposed to temperate habits. When I was in Quebec I was told of scores and scores of parishes and municipalities lying side by side where not a single liquor license was issued. So it could not have been opposition to the principle of abstinence that moved the people to vote against prohibition. Under their own local law hundreds of municipalities refuse licenses. So we must look for some other reasons to know why the people of that province gave such an enormous majority against prohibition. These other reasons I am not going to inquire into to-day, because it would perhaps be somewhat irrelevant to do so. But whatever they may have been in that province, if we are going to have an effective prohibitory liquor law we cannot get it by separate provincial action. You may do that up in Manitoba where the province is isolated, but you cannot do it in the province of Quebec, you cannot do it in the province of New Brunswick, nor in the province of Nova Scotia. You may make a provincial law prohibiting the sale, prohibiting the issue of licenses, or giving licenses and hedging them around with severe restrictions. But you cannot prevent a citizen of Ontario from buying a keg of whisky, or a jug of whisky, or a barrel of whisky and bringing it to his home. Therefore any Act of that kind would fail in its purpose.

I repeat that if you are going to have a successful prohibitory liquor law, you will need all the force of public sentiment to back it up, you will need all the force of the Customs Department to prevent its importation, and of the Inland Revenue Department to prevent its manufacture; and, as I contend in the way I have indicated, you will have the powerful hotel-keeping interest to back it up also. I realized this fact myself in years gone by when I had an interest in the hotel business, and when the advocacy of this scheme would have looked like the advocacy of my personal interest. I have not that interest to-day, and therefore I am free to argue in favour of what I think is a feasible business proposition, and one which if carried out will assist in making a prohibitory liquor law effective. It is a great undertaking, it is one which requires all the machinery of government to make it effective, as well as the force of public sentiment behind it. Everybody in this House will admit that a prohibitory law requires to be backed up by a strong public sentiment. Now, I have indicated a way by which one of the strongest sentiments could be enlisted in behalf of prohibition, that is the interest of those who are in the business themselves. I have indicated a plan which could be put into motion at an expenditure of only about a quarter of a million dollars per annum, as against the twenty millions, or thirty millions, or forty millions which we are told the liquor traffic is costing this country to-day. I hope that the amendment to the amendment will be voted down. I hope, if this House reaches the motion made by the hon. member for Yarmouth, they will quickly vote it down because it is only a humbug resolution. It would accomplish no good purpose and no one knows it better than the hon. member for Yarmouth. It comes up here year after year, and the same little scene is enacted; one proposes provincial prohibition, another Dominion prohibition, and another is opposed to prohibition. We had that same scene enacted last year, and by the same individuals too. They went through the same farce then and the people of this country are humbugged in this way. All interests have been humbugged. The liquor interest and the prohibition interest have been deceived by the government. They said, when asked to adopt a prohibitory measure : No, go and find out what the opinion of the people is. What for? For the purpose of befooling them or giving them honest legislation in conformity with the pledge made? Go to the province of Manitoba and you will find that a Conservative government there made a pledge that when they came into power they would give the people the measure of prohibition that a provincial government could give and they have carried out their promise, as Conservative governments always do.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, I do not care whether the promise is a good one or not, every pledge they have made to the people has been carried out, and the pledge they made on that occasion has been carried out. But, the record of the Liberal party is the very opposite of that and no more flagrant attempt to deceive the people could take place than in regard to this one question of prohibition. So, I say it will be one of the nails in the coffin of the present government when they go before an enraged and indignant people who have been befooled and hoodwinked. They promised that the will of the people would be carried out and they have failed in this matter as in many others matters to carry out the will of the people. I say for myself that I believe that the proposition I have made would be a wise one to adopt. I have not an opportunity of moving it now, but if the opportunity does occur for me to propose it I shall move it, because, although the temperance man may say: I am opposed to having anything to do with the liquor business at all, you cannot get away from it. You have to do with it now. You are a participator in it now either through the Dominion government or the local government or the municipal council. Every portion of our government is a partner with the hotel-keeper in the liquor business and it takes the greater part of the profits. I do not care how strong a prohibitionist or temperance man you may be you are in partnership with the liquor interest. This would disassociate from it, and this would be carrying out a prohibitory measure in a way that would be desirable and in a way that would be fair to everybody.

Mr. PETER MACDONALD (East Huron). Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to enter upon a general discussion of this subject now, but I wish, before the vote comes on, to place myself on record and to give my views on the question now before the House. None of the resolutions before the House contains fully my views upon this question, and therefore, I will have to express myself in a way in which my views can get upon record. Probably, it would be just as well for me here to give a short synopsis of the history of this question for a number of years, and I will give it in a very few sentences. I think that I am in a position, being a temperance man, myself and in favour of prohibition for the last forty years, and having had to do with the history and results of this agitation, to express an opinion upon it. You will remember that during the early years of the sixties a wave of temperance sentiment passed over the country which caused the temperance people to flood the parliament of that day with a large number of petitions praying for a prohibitory liquor law. Parliament, in its wisdom, did not deem that the temperance sentiment was sufficiently strong to give them a prohibitory law on that occasion, but it did not withhold everything from them. It gave them the Dunkin Act, which enabled the temperance men to use that as a stepping stone to some further progress, and the Dunkin Act in its day did a great deal of good in cultivating temperance sentiment throughout the country. During the early years of the seventies another wave of temperance swept over the country and petitions signed by hundreds of thousands of the electorate and others came before parliament for its consideration. They urged parliament to appoint a Royal Commission to investigate this whole question and to visit the United States and ascertain how the prohibitory liquor law worked in those states in which it had been enacted. The Royal Commission which was appointed did so and reported back to this parliament. After receiving and considering the report parliament was still of the opinion that public sentiment was not sufficiently strong to warrant parliament in deciding upon a prohibitory liquor law. But, it did not refuse the temperance people some help in their agitation to secure the ends they had in view and the result of the commission was the enactment of the Canada Temperance Act. The Canada Temperance Act was received again as a stepping stone, a point upon which the temperance people gathered all over the country, and although it was not what they had expected, still, it accomplished a considerable amount of good throughout the length and breadth of the different provinces. At one time it covered a large portion of the province of Ontario and also of the provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia and did a great deal of good. In the early years of the nineties another wave of temperance sentiment passed over the country, and every person here knows that during these years hundreds of petitions came from the different provinces and that petitions came from the legislatures of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick praying parliament to pass a prohibitory liquor law. It was contended in this House, that, notwithstanding these petitions, notwithstanding the large number of signatures they contained, the sentiment in the country was not sufficiently strong to warrant this parliament in giving to the people of the Dominion a prohibitory liquor law. Some contended that a plebiscite should be taken, and many eminent men in this House argued that a plebiscite should be taken to test the sentiment of the country. That was argued both inside and outside of the House. The Liberals, in convention assembled, in 1893, promised that if they came into power they would submit a plebiscite to the people of the country and give them an opportunity of testing the sentiment which many said was very strong in the country. In 1896 the Liberals came into power. In 1898, as you know, the promise that they had made in 1893, was fully redeemed. A plebiscite was taken, and taken in a way that no objection could be urged to the method of taking it by any person whatsoever. There was simply a 'no' or a 'yes,' against or in favour of prohibition. It was taken at a time when no other question was under consideration, leaving the elector free to decide in regard to this matter. We found, after the vote was counted that only 44 per cent of the electors on the voters' lists of the Dominion voted, that only 22½ per cent voted for prohibition, that 21½ per cent voted against prohibition and that, even excluding the province of Quebec, there were only 27 per cent who voted in favour of prohibition. Now, that vote proves to my mind, at least, that the temperance sentiment of this country is not sufficiently strong to maintain and carry into execution the provisions of a vigorous prohibitory liquor law and that therefore we would place that matter in the hands of the people in advance of the principle which must be exercised to make it a success in Canada.

I take that position, not because I argue this question from a political standpoint at all; I take that position in the interests of temperance itself, for unless we have a strong sentiment in favour of it; a sentiment that will prompt people not only to vote, but to action; prompt persons who will give the money to assist in carrying out the law; prompt men to risk something of their own individuality so that the law may be carried out; I am of the opinion that the enforcement of prohibition would be difficult if not impossible. I may be mistaken, but I believe that we have not yet arrived at a time in the history of this country, when that position is sufficiently strong to give the people a general prohibitory law. In view of this, I believe the government was perfectly justified—I say it advisedly after giving the matter thought—in not introducing a prohibitory liquor law, based on the vote given on September 28, 1898. Therefore, so far as the principle of the amendment to the amendment is concerned, I am in very great accord with it, but yet, I believe that although we cannot go as far as the temperance people would like us to go, and as far as I would like to see us able to go, yet the temperance people expect something at our hands. In 1860, they received the Dunkin Act, although parliament could not go the length of prohibition. In 1878, they received something which was a stepping-stone to further effort in the Canada Temperance Act, and now they look to parliament to receive something more, so that the temperance people may have a point around which they can rally and push on to greater efforts. I, therefore, believe that a resolution, similar to the one I shall read later, would meet, to a very large extent, the views of many of the temperance people, particularly those of the province of Ontario. The representatives of the temperance people of the province of Ontario, believe with me, that the government would not be justified in introducing a prohibitory liquor law at this present time. I can give you the names of two of the leading members of the Dominion Alliance in support of this. One is Mr. Spence of the city of Toronto, than whom there is no better temperance man in Canada. He told me that his opinion was that the government could not introduce a prohibitory liquor law, basing their expectation for support on that plebiscite vote of 1898. Dr. MacLaren, who, I believe, at one time was the president of the Dominion Alliance, acknowledged to me that he was disappointed, as I was, in the vote that was given in 1898, and that he believed that the temperance people of this country could not expect the Dominion parliament to give them total prohibition all over Canada, based on that vote. Therefore, when two men who have given consideration to this question for a lifetime, two men who were pointed to as the leaders of the great Dominion Alliance, which was supposed to represent the temperance people, at least, of Ontario; when they expressed themselves in that way, and in my opinion expressed themselves wisely and correctly; I believe that we would not be carrying out even the sentiment of the temperance people, if we introduced legislation that they believed not to be in the interests of temperance principles at large. Therefore, if I had an opportunity of moving another amendment, which I have not, at the present time, my amendment would be in the following words, which would contain my views upon the question. I shall read it now, and perhaps, later on in the discussion, I may succeed in getting a vote upon it:

Whereas, at the plebiscite of 1898 only 22½ per cent of the registered electors of the Dominion voted for prohibition; that in the provinces and territories, excluding Quebec, only 27 per cent of the registered electors voted for prohibition; that these results show that there is not an active prohibition sentiment sufficiently pronounced to justify the expectation that a Dominion prohibitory law could be successfully enforced, and therefore, in the opinion of this House, it would be unwise, in the interest of temperance, to pass a prohibitory law at present.

Now, Mr. Speaker, you will notice that that is very largely the amendment to the amendment, which is now before the House. I could not vote for that amendment of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Parmalee) alone, although it contains a part of my views. I am still under the impression that something further should be done, so as to curtail to some extent, at least, the influence of the drinking habit throughout the length and breadth of our country, and if I get an opportunity, I propose, if I am in order, and if the amendment to the amendment is carried, and becomes part of the original motion, I will take the opportunity of moving that the following clause be added thereto:

But inasmuch as it is desirable that legislation be enacted having in view the further restriction of the liquor traffic, it is therefore expedient in the opinion of this House, that the Canada Temperance Act be enlarged in its scope, and the provisions for its administration perfected.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the enlargement of the Canada Temperance Act would mean as I understand it, that we might include a group of counties in its scope: any number of counties, which the province may deem necessary, or indeed the whole of the province. Take, for instance, Prince Edward Island. Suppose the Canada Temperance Act was enlarged, they could include under it, the three counties of which the province is composed, and in reality have the principle of prohibition in all that island. So with the other provinces. In that way, I think we could accomplish the end which my hon. friend from Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) has in view. I believe it would meet the reasonable expectations of the temperance people at the present time and give them a foothold for further effort, in order to cultivate and develop the sentiment, so that in a few years the sentiment might be sufficiently strong to demand of the Canadian parliament, with power and influence, the passage of a general prohibitory law for the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. T. DIXON CRAIG (East Durham). The hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) stated that the resolutions moved by him in the last parliament, were defeated by the Conservative members, and were side-tracked by amendments proposed by us. I am not prepared to admit that, Mr. Speaker. I would point out that if any amendments were proposed from this side of the House, they were supported very largely by gentlemen in the Liberal party as well. In fact, the question was not a party one, and I am not surprised that the Conservative government was not prepared to grant prohibition before the plebiscite was taken, when I find that the Liberal government is not prepared to give prohibition after the plebiscite was taken. Let me ask the hon. member (Mr. Flint), this question. If the prohibition resolution was side-tracked by gentlemen in the Conservative party at that time, who is side-tracking the resolution to-day? No amendment has been moved to the resolution of the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) by any member on this side of the House; but we find two amendments moved to-day, one by the member for Colchester (Mr. McClure), and the other by the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Parmalee). I merely mention this to show that, after all the disclaimers of the hon. member for Yarmouth, there is a little politics left in him still, because he is trying to place the responsibility for this matter on the Conservative party. I am not at all disposed to accept that responsibility for the Conservative party, because I do not consider this a party question at all. It has been used politically, no doubt; it has been used, I admit, by men in both parties. I think, however, that it has been used more largely by members of the Liberal party, to injure members of the Conservative party, than otherwise.

The hon. member for Yarmouth went on to say that no gentleman in the Conservative party had assisted in framing a prohibition resolution; but that, in fact, the members of the Conservative party had always tried to embarrass the government on this question. I do not know anything about that; but I do not know what gentleman on this side of the House has been asked to assist in framing this resolution. I have not been asked myself, although I took a somewhat prominent part in the discussion of the question in the last parliament as the seconder of the resolution of the hon. member for Yarmouth. I presume this resolution has been placed in the hands of the hon. member for Yarmouth by the Dominion Alliance, to be moved in this House. I find no fault with that; but, the hon. gentleman has no reason to complain that members on this side have not assisted in framing the resolution.

The hon. gentleman went on to say that the position which I took, that the vote on the plebiscite was not sufficient to warrant the enactment of a prohibitory law, was supported by a great many prominent temperance men in the country. We know that is the case. They held, and hold to-day, that the vote was not large enough to warrant the government in introducing a prohibitory Bill. But, he went on to make a statement which I do not agree with; that is, that the bulk of the temperance workers in the country think it is sufficient to justify provincial prohibition. I do not agree with that at all. I think that the question of provincial prohibition is used just for the purpose hinted at by some speakers, of giving the temperance people something. They feel that the government are not warranted by the plebiscite vote in enacting prohibition for the whole Dominion; and they say, we must give the temperance people something; if not, they will be disappointed. I do not agree with that. The hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) wants to go a little further; so, he has suggested an amendment to enlarge the scope of the Canada Temperance Act. I do not think there is anything in that at all. I do not think the real temperance workers of the country who understand the question want anything of that kind at all. They want prohibition for the whole Dominion. I admit that there are some who do not want to let the temperance people of the country imagine that all their efforts in voting for the plebiscite have gone for nothing; and so they say, we must give them something just to satisfy them that that is not the case. If we do not give them something that will be effective, what is the use of giving them anything at all? We do not want anything but a genuine prohibitory law that will be carried out. After all, what would be the effect of provincial prohibition if it were enacted? The effect, I suppose, would be to give all the manufacture and most of the sale of liquor to the province of Quebec. I do not know that we want to make Quebec the centre for the manufacture of liquor, from which it could go to every other part of the country. As was pointed out by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), provincial prohibition could not prevent liquor going from one province to another; it could be sent to any one who ordered it. So, I hold that that would not be effective prohibition at all. It might have some little effect, but I doubt very much whether it would have any.

Now, in thinking over this matter of prohibition, I believe that what is wanted more than anything else is perfect honesty and sincerity on this question. While I am not going to say that the members of this House are not perfectly sincere and honest on the question, still I think we are sometimes a little open to suspicion in that direction. Members get up and talk in this House in order to please a certain portion of their constituents. There is no fault to be found with that, I suppose; but, after all, it would be a good thing if every member of this House would state, honestly and sincerely, whether he thinks the country is ripe for prohibition or not. We have found that it is pretty hard to get a straight, honest vote on this question. I have no fault to find with members who vote to please certain constituents of theirs who have strong views on the question. They are thinking about getting votes, which is quite natural; but, on a great question of this kind, I think politics should be eliminated altogether. I admit that that is pretty hard to do, when one side is contending so strongly against the other. I do not pretend to be more honest than other people, but sometimes I may appear to be more foolish for expressing my straight, honest convictions. I was thought foolish when I said that I thought there should be a majority of the voters on the list in favour of prohibition before the government should pass such a law. I may have been foolish in saying that; but it was my honest conviction, and I think the majority of the members of this House, if they expressed their honest convictions, would say the same thing. It may be said, you cannot get a vote of that kind. Well, if we can never get a vote of that kind, we shall never get prohibition. There are three things necessary for an effective prohibitory law. The first is to have the people strongly in favour of it. Another requisite is to have the parliament in favour of it. The people may be in favour of it, but the parliament may not have been elected on that question. The third requisite is, that you must have a government in favour of it, too. What are the conditions to-day? It is all very well for people to talk of the country being ripe for prohibition. First of all, take the government: Have we a prohibition government to-day? I do not need to go over the individual members of the government. The Premier does not pretend to be a prohibitionist. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) does not pretend to be a prohibitionist. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher), from the same province, does claim to be a prohibitionist. I do not know about some of the other members of the government; I am not going to take them all one by one. I think, perhaps, I might mention the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick), whom I notice looking at me; I do not think he pretends to be a prohibitionist either. I want the people of the country to look at this very fact, that to-day we have not a prohibitionist government; and even if we could manage to get a law passed, and if the people were in favour of it, if we have not a government strongly in favour of prohibition, the law would not be carried out, and would not be effective. I take that ground. I want those who favour prohibition to notice, first of all, that we have not a prohibitionist government in office. In the second place, I do not think we have a prohibitionist parliament. It would take rather long to go over all the members, but I am confident that you would not find a majority of them in favour of prohibition. You may, however, find out what they feel about prohibition at the present time. I will go a little further and say, judging by the plebiscite taken in 1898, the people are not in favour of prohibition. So I hold that we have none of the conditions which are necessary to secure effective prohibition. We have not a prohibitionist government or a prohibitionist parliament, or a prohibitionist people. Therefore, I do not see that there is any probability of getting prohibition just at present.

I hold that a prohibitory law, unless backed up by the people and strictly enforced by the government, would be an evil instead of a good. It would be a bad thing to have such a law placed on the statute, unless it were enforced strictly by the government, and backed up by the sentiment of the people. I know that there are strong temperance people who say: Give us a law. But what is the use of giving a law unless you can enforce it. It would be a perfect farce, and instead of doing good would put temperance sentiment back twenty-five years. Unless there is a strong sentiment in the country in favour of such a law, and unless we have a government that will enforce it, it would be utterly useless for parliament to pass it.

At present Canada is, after all, a temperance country. The hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) has said that the province of Quebec is a temperance province, but let him go all over the country, and he will find that the whole country is very temperate. This we owe in a great measure to temperance workers. The country owes a great deal to the men and women who have done temperance work, and done it for nothing. They have seen that laws were made by legislators, and that these laws were enforced, and have fought against any relaxation of such laws, and have cultivated and fostered, in every way, the temperance sentiment of the people.

I have received a circular from the Order of Good Templars, now meeting in Ottawa, asking me to vote against Mr. Parmalee's amendment, and for Mr. McClure's amendment. And in the event of Mr. McClure's amendment being defeated, to vote for Mr. Flint's resolution. I have very great respect for the Good Templars and all temperance workers. If I take a side, I take the one adopted by them, but at the same time, for the reasons I have given, I regret that I cannot vote as asked by that circular. I intend to vote for the resolution of the member for Shefford (Mr. Parmalee), because it expresses the sentiment which I hold, and that many temperance workers hold, namely, that the plebiscite, taken not long ago, did not show that the country is in favour of prohibition, and does not warrant a prohibitory law being introduced by the government. I am glad that the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) agrees with me in that view, and I suppose that if he cannot get his amendment adopted, he will vote, as I intend to do, for the amendment of the hon. member for Shefford.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). At this period of the session, when time is so precious, and we are all anxious to close the proceedings of parliament, I do not propose to speak at length, but it is perhaps advisable, since it happens that I am the leader of the House, that I should give the view which, in my opinion, ought to prevail on this occasion. Of course, I do not pretend to do more than give my own individual opinion. The question is not a ministerial one, though it is one on which the government took a certain course some few years ago.

While in opposition, we pledged ourselves to take a plebiscite and give the people an opportunity to pronounce on the question of prohibition. I think that we have fully carried out that pledge. We submitted a question to the people to be answered, exactly as the friends of temperance, who did us the honour to communicate with us, wanted it put. On that question the people pronounced. The result of the poll is well known to everybody, and I need not go over it again.

Since that result was obtained, I took the position that public opinion—although there was a slight majority in favour of prohibition—still had not spoken in so certain a voice as to make it advisable to enact a prohibitory liquor law at this stage.

That is not the ground, however, on which this question ought to be placed. I would be sorry to put the vote cast on one side against that cast on the other. It is preferable to look at the vote cast in favour of the idea which the advocates of prohibition had in their minds, and, in some respects, that vote might be claimed to be large, although it did not amount to 25 per cent of the whole electorate. But under the circumstances, I came to the conclusion that at this stage public opinion was not so far educated on the question of prohibition as to make it advisable to enact a prohibitory law.

After the discussion in the House this session, I can say that the position which the government then took is fully justified. We have, in the first place, not an unanimity of opinion among those who profess to be prohibitionists. We can see very distinctly three or four different opinions which prevail. In the first place, there is the view of the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) that the vote polled at the plebiscite does not justify the enactment of national prohibition, but would justify the enactment of provincial prohibition, or in other words, of a prohibitory law to apply to those provinces which pronounced by a majority in favour of prohibition.

Another view has been given to us by my hon. friend from Colchester (Mr. McClure), who on this question is a stalwart, who does not admit any compromise, and who is in favour of absolute prohibition throughout the Dominion.

Then we have the view of my hon. friend from East Durham (Mr. Craig), to whom I must give the credit, if he will take it from me, of having spoken on this question always consistently and honestly. He is in favour of a prohibitory liquor law, but he is also of the opinion that the time has not come for the enactment of such a law.

We have had the opinion also of my hon. friend from West York (Mr. Wallace), to the effect that a prohibitory law would be advisable if it were coupled with a new feature that has never been seriously discussed in this country, namely, of affording compensation to all interests that would be financially affected by it.

Mr. FOSTER. That has been often discussed.

The PRIME MINISTER. Yes, academically, but never seriously. It has never been put before the people as a concrete measure to be acted upon. But academically it has been discussed time and again.

Then we have the view of the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) to the effect that the time has not come for the enactment of a prohibitory liquor law, but that the cause would be best promoted by perfecting the Scott Act.

All the gentlemen who have spoken, and whose opinions I have given—my hon. friends from Yarmouth, Colchester, East York and West York, and East Durham. are all pronounced prohibitionists. They all believe in an effective measure of prohibition, but they entertain widely different views as to the conditions and the manner in which it could be brought about at present. Under the circumstances, I am more than justified in claiming that the government rightly interpreted the verdict of the people when they decided that the time had not come for the enactment of a prohibitory law.

To-day we have three propositions before us, but I may say that practically we have only one. So, I may say, we have only one proposition before us, practically, and that is the proposition of my hon. friend from Yarmouth (Mr. Flint). I think I may put aside the motion of my hon. friend from Colchester (Mr. McClure). I do not believe that at this time this parliament would be prepared to pronounce in favour of so radical a measure as the immediate enactment of a prohibitory liquor law. So, practically the only proposition placed before us is the proposition from my hon. friend from Yarmouth. And his proposition is to enact a prohibitory liquor law to affect the provinces that have pronounced in favour of prohibition—that is, all the provinces except the province of Quebec. Now, for my part. I have no hesitation in saying that, in my judgment, no more dangerous legislation could be placed upon the statute-book. We must look at it from a higher point of view than the mere point of view of prohibition. First of all, I may say, there is grave doubt, according to some of my hon. friends better versed in the law than I am, that such a measure would be unconstitutional, it would be against the very letter of that law which forms our charter as a Dominion. But let us set aside that view of the case, and suppose that we have the power to enact such a law. Would it be advisable, in the interest of the whole people of Canada, that the parliament of Canada should commence to legislate upon sectional lines? Could there be a more dangerous principle to introduce into legislation than that we should not legislate upon broad national lines applicable to all parts of Canada, but simply upon lines applicable to certain sections of the community. We are a divided community; we are divided in religion, we are divided in race, we are divided in education—we are divided in many ways. Should not legislation rather tend to promote unity than to increase the cleavage that already separates us? I think that if we are to make this a nation, our policy must be to go forward and never to go backward. Of course, I respect the sentiments of those of my fellow-countrymen who are in favour of prohibition. Many of them have made it the object of their lives, have devoted their best efforts and a great portion of their means to reform this unfortunate habit and to promote the cause of mankind at large. But it seems to me that this is not the paramount duty which weighs upon us as Canadians. The paramount duty which rests upon us as Canadians is to make one country of the existing diverse elements. But if we were to enact such a statute as that favoured by my hon. friend from Yarmouth, what would be the condition of things? You would intensify the lines of cleavage. For instance, you would have the manufactories of spirits and other liquors concentrated in the province of Quebec, and that province would be the great centre from which would radiate the liquor traffic. I do not know that my province would suffer much by that. I think that, if I wished to be sectional, I might say that, and if the people of Quebec were to have that condition of things—if the great distilleries and breweries of the country were to be transferred from where they are to the province of Quebec—I do believe sincerely that the province of Quebec might profit a good deal by that industry and trade. But, I lay aside that view, which is not one worthy to take into consideration or to be discussed. But, if we had the manufacture of liquor concentrated in one province and this to be done by law, I do not think it would be a healthy sentiment that would follow, or that it would promote the proper development of our country. So, it is of no use to resort to any questions of expediency in that matter. We must face the question fairly—either the country is ready for prohibition or it is not. If it is ready, the people will have it when they want it; if not, let us act accordingly. For my part, I have come to the conclusion that the country is not ready for prohibition, that there is no such strong and vigorous sentiment in the country in favour of prohibition as to make such a law effective. And, if you were to put on the statute-books a prohibitory law which was not effective, instead of conferring a benefit, you would impose a curse upon the people.

You must remember that the question of temperance is largely one of education. My hon. friend from West York (Mr. Wallace) paid a well-deserved tribute to my native province. I do not wish to make what may seem an invidious comparison between one section and another; I do not believe that the people of the province of Quebec are better than my fellow-countrymen of other provinces. But, I think I can fairly claim that the province of Quebec is at least as temperate as any other province, and, in some respects, I can claim that it is more temperate, because there is more actual prohibition to the acre in the province of Quebec than in any other part of the community. For, as the hon. member for West York said, you can go for miles and miles on the road along the St. Lawrence between Quebec and Montreal, and stop at any public house, and you cannot get a glass of liquor. You could not get it under the law or even against the law. But, while that is the case, the people are not in favour of restricting themselves by law against having liquor if they want it—it is a question of the education of the people. I think we can all be proud of the progress that has been made by the cause of temperance in every part of Canada. Compare what we see about us to-day in this year of grace 1900, with what we know to have been the condition forty years ago. There is no comparison—it is not the same country or the same people. If I may give my personal experience—perhaps the House will permit me to state what I have stated elsewhere—between 1893 and 1896, it was my privilege to address more than two hundred meetings in all parts of Canada, from one ocean to the other. And, in these two hundred meetings I never saw a man under the influence of liquor, except in three places. This is a condition of things which, I believe, could not be matched in any other part of the world—certainly not in any other part of America. All this is an evidence of what can be done by education, by causing better morals to prevail among the people and a better system also to prevail. But though this is all true, I do not pretend that we have reached the millennium. What can we do further to advance the cause of temperance? For my part, I am not a prohibitionist. My hon. friend from East Durham (Mr. Craig) alluded to that. I have nothing to hide about that; I do not want to sail under false colours. But, I claim, with all modesty, that I am a temperate man. I think I can claim also, that, though I do not pretend to be a prohibitionist. I am as much a temperance man as if I were a prohibitionist. I do not say that by way of argument, but as saying that the duty of promoting the cause of temperance rests upon all classes of men. Temperance is prohibition, but temperance may exist apart from prohibition. But, I say this only to remind the members of the House that, in the case of temperance, we have made great and steady and continuous progress, as you can see not only in the community at large, but in every part and section of the community. But, there is still something to be done in favour of temperance. My hon. friend (Mr. Craig) stated that this was not a prohibition government. I do not pretend that we are. But, I think we can pretend that we are a temperance government, and ready to help in the cause of temperance if we are called upon to do it.

Now, how can we help the cause of temperance? In 1878, Mr. Mackenzie put upon the statute-book, the Canada Temperance Act. I believe it is to the credit and to the memory of that thoroughly honest and good man that in so doing he rendered a great service to the cause of temperance. The Act which he put upon the statute-book is not perfect, it never was perfect, and, perhaps, as time went on some defects in it were shown to exist which could be remedied and the Act made more effective. If the friends of temperance think that by perfecting that system so as to make it more workable it would be more effective in promoting temperance, I think it would be the duty of the government to give effect to that wish. But, I am not sure, from the remarks which we heard a little while ago, that this would be the unanimous wish of the friends of temperance and of the friends of prohibition. But whether that be so or not, if the friends of temperance should signify their desire in that way, I can say for my part, and I think I can speak on behalf of my colleagues, that the government would be willing to respond. Looking at the question in all its aspects, I do not see that any better method can be devised at the present time to promote the cause which we all have at heart, whether we are prohibitionists or not. I think I can say for every man in this House that at heart he is willing to promote the cause of temperance, to support legislation that will make it more general and to advance it in every possible way. This can only be done, first of all, by education, by systematic education, and then by legislation following the advance of education. That is one method by which temperance can be promoted, but it is not by one section of the community trying by legislation to be wiser than the rest of the community, or to be better than the rest of the community. Legislation should only follow in the path of instruction, and that being a true principle, I do not see any other method we can adopt in order to promote the cause we have at heart. These are the sentiments which I entertain personally upon this question, and I venture, in all humility, to present them to the good judgment of the House.

Mr. G. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.) I do not propose to take up much time of the House at this late stage of the session in discussing this question. We would have been in a better position to give proper consideration to the question if the kindness of the Premier had been shown in giving us an opportunity at an earlier period in the session. This has been kept, with other important questions, to the very fag-end of the session, and with conditions under which it is impossible to give fair and full consideration to any measure. However, I do not think it was ever supposed, since the introduction of my hon. friend's motion, that anything else but a perfunctory consideration would be given to it.

Now, I propose in the first place to vote against the amendment to the amendment, and I will tell the House the reason why. I do not believe in its conclusion, because I do not believe in the premises upon which the conclusion is based and from which it is drawn. The conclusion is drawn from this basis :

That whereas only 23 per cent of the registered electors of the Dominion of Canada voted for prohibition, that in the provinces and territories, excluding Quebec, only 27 per cent of the registered electors voted for prohibition, that these results show that there is not an active prohibition sentiment sufficiently pronounced to justify the expectation that a prohibition law could be successfully enforced, and therefore, in the opinion of this House, such a prohibitory law should not be enacted at present.

Now, I take the ground, and I think I am perfectly justified in taking it, that the result of the plebiscite vote in 1898 was by no means, judged on the ground of the total vote that came out and having in view those who did not come out, an indication at all of the strength of the prohibition and temperance sentiment in this country, and I will tell this House why. In the first place, this country, in several of the provinces, had had enough of prohibition plebiscites. Plebiscites had been held in the different provinces and enormous majorities had been given for prohibition. In most of those provinces, after these enormous majorities had been given, the people had to sit back and contemplate this fact, that notwithstanding the large majorities given in favour of prohibition, no effective result came of it, there was no accordant government action. The people had grown tired of plebiscites, they had seen them result, not in any effective prohibition, but taken merely as an indication of the strength of the temperance or prohibition vote. Very well, you cannot repeat that thing over and over again and get the people to go into these mimic battles with any kind of vigour. After several provinces of this Dominion had been polled by plebiscite votes, the people came to the conclusion that they had gained a fair view of the state of prohibition or temperance sentiment, as shown in the votes that had taken place. So that when the plebiscite was promised by the Liberal party in their platform of 1893, and when effect was given to it in 1898, it was like warming up cold porridge, it was looked upon by a great many temperance people, as well as by others, as simply a repetition of the old method of taking a plebiscite from which nothing was to result. I think I know pretty well the force of temperance sentiment throughout this country, I think I know pretty well the fervour and the strength with which the real temperance and prohibition sentiment went into the work of the first plebiscites in the different provinces, and when I compared the feeling and the fervour then with the listlessness of the effort which was made in the Dominion plebiscite, I think I saw the lesson and read it, as every observing and intelligent man could. The plebiscite of 1898 was discounted by the previous prohibition plebiscites, and it was no fair test at all of the depth, or the strength, or the distribution of the temperance or prohibition sentiment of this country. Therefore, I say that the small number of persons, comparatively, who came to the vote in 1898 is not to be taken as an indication of the breadth and the strength of the prohibition sentiment in this country. So, any conclusion which rests upon that, as the amendment to the amendment rests upon it, rests upon false premises, and I am not going to accept that conclusion, because I do not believe in the premises which are laid down. Neither am I going to take my conclusion from the premise, which is unfair in this respect, that it is drawn from the small percentage of the temperance voters who came out under these adverse circumstances and polled their vote. So, I say that is no indication at all of the temperance and prohibition sentiment in this country.

But this resolution is based entirely upon that as the only and sole indication. I say that behind that 27 per cent, and behind that 23 per cent, which is made the basis for rejecting a prohibition resolution, or any further action in this matter by the hon. gentleman who moves the amendment to the amendment, there is the great body, not numbered, not counted, but which every independent observer in this country knows is sound in sentiment, and believes in prohibition, and in advanced legislative measures, but which did not, for one reason or another, come to the poll and vote. Among the reasons, and the chief reason why they did not vote, was that they believed that nothing was to come out of the plebiscite which was granted. But, any one listening to the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), who spoke so fully on the question which is before the House to-day, and I find no fault with the tone in which he treated it, could not help but wonder what would have been the effect on the electorate of Canada if, before the 1896 elections had come on, the right hon. gentleman had gone before the electorate and had spoken in the self-same tones as those employed by him to-day. Now, I have a quarrel with the government, and with the right hon. gentleman, because he did not act in an open, honourable and square way with the electors of this country, and I propose to show why I think he did not do that. The right hon. gentleman will not stand up here to-day and say that he did not know the sentiment of the province of Quebec in 1896 or in 1898, just as well as he knew it after September, 1898. The hon. gentleman has reasoned in a circle. He has declared that prohibition cannot be given in sections, which means, that so long as Quebec is unfavourable to prohibition, there can be no hope of prohibition in this country. I say that if he could read the public sentiment of his own province aright, as I have not the least doubt he could, when he promised the plebiscite, when he led the people of this country on by the promise he made, that, if, in the end, he could go around every portion of the circle and stand where he did to-day, and argue on the great national principle that you should not have piecemeal and sectional legislation, he knew that he was just as safe and sound in 1893, in 1896 and before the vote was taken in 1898, on that principle, as he was to-day. But, is there not a different tenor in his speech to-day from that which characterized the pledges given by him and by the hon. Minister of Agriculture in the campaign leading up to the election of 1896? Is there not a different flavour? Is there not a different tendency? Is there not a complete and perfect contradistinction between the speech that has been delivered by the right hon. gentleman to-day, and the answers he made and the speeches he delivered upon it when he was in the country in the election contest preceding June, 1896, as open and plain a contradistinction as it is possible to conceive of? What was the resolution of the party, and why was it put forward? If the resolution had in it any life, it was not simply a poll of sentiment. If the resolution had in it any life, it was not simply that an opportunity would be given for people to come up and say 'yes,' or 'no,' without there being any results to follow. The power of the utterance in 1893, as the power of other utterances which were made by the Prime Minister himself after 1893, was meant to have the effect, and it did have the effect in this country, of bringing to his side in force, that life and strength and power of sentiment which inclined towards prohibition as the ultimate aim and in the possible hope that such a state of things would be brought about in reference to temperance in the several provinces and in the Dominion at large. There is no doubt about that, and every sentence which the right hon. gentleman uttered and every answer which he made was so much food, so much sustenance to that hope and that desire amongst the temperance and prohibition people of this country. There can be no doubt about that. Why, we have only to read some of his answers. There is no need for me to read all his platform utterances. To say as some hon. gentlemen do, that all that was meant was to give the people a chance to poll their votes and to register the yeas and nays, is to read all the life and all the sense out of it. If it was simply a register of the people, and had been so stated, I would like to ask the temperance people and the prohibitionists of the country how many prohibition votes would have been counted at the different polls held in the Dominion? Whatever life and strength there was in the movement, was the strong hope, buoyed up by the utterances of the platform and buoyed up by the promises and speeches of the right hon. gentleman, that, if a majority voted in favour of prohibition, accordant action would be had, and the result would be the enactment of a prohibitory liquor law. If the right hon. gentleman had gone upon any one platform in the country then, and made use of the statement he has made here to-day before the facts which have since transpired were known, would not all hope and all strength have gone out from that movement? Nobody would have gone to the polls. And so, I say my complaint, and I think it is a fair complaint, for all temperance people, and all people in this country to make, is the lack of candour that was evinced by the government, and by the right hon. gentleman in the whole proceeding. When we tried over and over again to get the hon. gentleman to say whether or not he would apply any other constitutional rule to the question, than that which was applied to other questions that went before the electorate of this country, we never could get him to say that any other rule would be applied. In speech after speech, and in answer after answer, all that the right hon. gentleman would state, either by implication, or by open plain English, was that the will of the electorate in this respect, as in all other respects in this country must rule, and that the government must bow to it. There could be no other interpretation. Now, my complaint against the right hon. gentleman and against his government is this: Why did he not tell the people candidly where he stood, and where his government would stand, before asking them to enter upon the turmoil of a Dominion contest, and poll their names for or against the prohibition of the liquor traffic? Why did he not say to the people of this country whatever he had decided upon, namely, that they must get two-thirds of the votes of those who come up and vote; or they must get a majority in votes of all the eligible names on the lists? If you do that, then, I will consider that it is mandatory, but unless you do that, I must consider that my government, if we are put into power, will not be called upon to act. That would have been in accordance with the right hon. gentleman's position now. What is his position to-day? That the temperance cause is too sacred to be imperilled by putting a law, for its enforcement in this way, upon the statute-book, unless you have the strong, abiding, and overwhelming majority of the people behind it. Was that any less true in 1893, in 1896, or in 1898, than it is to-day? Had the right hon. gentleman any doubt of it at that time? Not in the least. When he brought that measure before this House of parliament, he was questioned as to whether he would apply any other rule of interpretation than the majority of the polled votes.

Why did he not give open and candid expression to his opinions then, and say to the electors: Previous to the contest my opinion is that before we can march forward in the line of legislation such as you propose, you must show by a two-third vote of the electors polling, or by a majority vote of the total on the list that the deep and abiding sentiment of this country is in favour of the measure which you ask us to enact. If the hon. gentleman believed then as he believes now—and who can doubt it—that it would not be for the national upbuilding of this country that we should enact prohibition so long as there was one single province which was strongly opposed to it, why did he not make the statement then as he does now? That would have been a guiding post to the electorate of Canada, and we would have known what of the future by an examination of the position that the right hon. gentleman and his party took. My complaint is that all of this was kept back, that none of this candid dealing was had with the electorate, but that on the other hand that every statement was so veiled, so couched, so admirably adapted to the purpose that it led the people on to the hope that the right hon. gentleman and his friends proposed to give the people a fair chance to make their voice known, and that if the will of the people as expressed at the polls was in favour of prohibition, then the government must abide by it. It is not necessary for me to read all the statements made by the right hon. gentleman in order to prove that. One or two will be sufficient for the purpose of clearness. The resolution which was moved by Mr. Fisher, the Minister of Agriculture, was heralded as a step forward in the vindication of the noble cause of temperance, and not a mere registering piece of machinery. That resolution went to the people. I remember sitting on a platform with the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) in Ottawa, after the campaign was opened. Speaking on the same platform with him, I in all my innocence led myself and the people of Canada into somewhat of a trap, because the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fisher), speaking at that initial meeting of the campaign, declared: Now, if you want prohibition vote for and carry this plebiscite. There was no reservation that I could hear as to its being necessary to have a clear majority of all the names on the list, and you will have prohibition. Nothing of that kind. There was nothing about voting so that there will be a majority in every province, and then you will have prohibition. There was no reservation of that kind. What he said was: Here is the opportunity; there is the Premier's measure; now, gentlemen, if you want prohibition, vote for and carry the plebiscite. And I, speaking afterwards, said: That settles it; here is a member of the government, the right hand man of the Premier himself, and he has told you openly and plainly that if you want prohibition what you have to do is to vote for and carry this plebiscite; that is capable of only one interpretation, namely, that if we get a majority of the vote polled then we shall have the consequent action of the government. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fisher) made no word of dissent before that audience, and no word of dissent was made by him to that statement of the case during the whole contest. That plebiscite resolution went out to the country and many earnest and honest men took it up, and were greatly exercised about it, and the Premier was often criticised, and I must say that nowhere does that—I will not call it shining talent, but that peculiar talent of my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier)—nowhere was it so admirably shown, if that is the proper word with which to characterize it, than in the manner in which he met these earnest and honest, and Christian inquiries. I shall only select one or two. In the city of Winnipeg he was met with the universal question as to what this meant, and as to what would be done, and his answer was:

He would pledge his honour that as soon as the Liberals came into power in Ottawa they would take a plebiscite of the Dominion, by which the party would stand, and the will of the people would be carried out, even were it to cost power for ever to the Liberal party.

What opinion would be formed by any auditor in that assembly listening to the Premier's fervent utterance and the utter abandon with which he placed his own political fortunes and that of his party in the scale, and was willing to abide by the result. The fine spirit with which he pledged his honour that as soon as the Liberals came into power they would take a plebiscite, and not only take a plebiscite of the Dominion, but they would take a plebiscite by which the party would stand and the will of the people would be carried out even if it were to cost power for ever to the Liberal party. I was not there, but any one who was there, and any one who can imagine what took place must have almost felt the thrill of the fervid spirit and sentiment which permeated that assembly when that unequivocal promise of the leader of a great party was given to the assembled auditors and to the electors of the Dominion. Could there be any but the one straight conclusion to be drawn from that answer? Suppose that the right hon. gentleman had been perfectly candid then with the people of Winnipeg, and had added to his statement by saying: Yes, I am going to grant you a plebiscite because I want you to be put in a position to be polled as to how many say 'yes' and how many say 'no,' but I am not going to follow it up by consequent action unless there is a majority polled of the total number of names on the electoral lists. Fancy the right hon. gentleman supplementing his promise by that statement. Why, it would have been as if half the ice from the Arctic Circle had suddenly been let in to that earnest and fervid assembly. The Prime Minister did not say that, but he meant it. In his own mind then, he had the agreement that he had made with the leaders of his party, which he did not disclose until the vote had been polled, the agreement to wit: that there was an arrangement, a mutual agreement between the leaders of the party and the leaders of the temperance people in the party, that unless there was a majority of the total number of names on the electors list polled, that he would not consider the people's voice mandatory, and that unless there was such majority that then there was to be no more heard of prohibition in the ranks of the party from that time forward. Suppose my right hon. friend had spoken in that way to the people of Winnipeg as a supplement to that promise; would the people have taken the same conclusion from the hon. gentleman's remarks that they did? No, it would have been the exact antithesis. The Rev. Mr. Huxtable, who did a giant's work for the Liberal party, though he is not a giant in stature, on the sole ground of his hope for the completion of what he held dear, the enactment of a prohibitory law in this country through the agency of my right hon. friend and the Liberal party, asked him the question as well; and what did my right hon. friend answer? He said:

The Liberal party has pledged itself in convention at Ottawa that whenever in power it would take a plebiscite on the liquor question as to whether the people want a prohibitory law or not. The answer is not in my hands; it is in the hands of the people; and according to their answer, such legislation they will have at the hands of the government.

Suppose that after Mr. Huxtable had sat down bubbling over with joy and hope at the hon. gentleman's answer, the hon. gentleman had said: 'Oh, Mr. Huxtable, wait a moment. I have to tell you that unless you get a majority of all the voters on the voters' list polled in favour of prohibition, there is a secret agreement by which we are not going to enact prohibition, the leaders of the Liberal party have entered into that agreement, and promised that in that case we shall hear no more of prohibition in the party from that time forward.' What a cold douche that would have been to the Rev. Mr. Huxtable, and how little work the reverend gentleman would have done for the right hon. gentleman and his party at the polls. To the deputation from the Methodist General Conference the right hon. gentleman said:

If the plebiscite meets with the support of the majority of the people, those who find themselves in the minority will have to concur in the verdict of the majority.

What does any listener understand by the majority and the minority when you are talking about elections—about something to be decided at the polls? Is it not the constitutional practice in British countries, always in this country, that when you speak of the majority in the face of an election, you speak of a majority of the voters who come out to poll their votes? No other possible idea could be taken from the right hon. gentleman's answer than the one which was meant to be taken, that if a majority of those who come out to the poll voted in favour of prohibition, then the will of the people should be carried out. I want to quote only one other statement, for fear it may have escaped the memories and might be contradicted by some gentlemen. Here is the language of the right hon. leader of the government as to that secret agreement:

Let me say this. When we put that plank in our platform there was an implied agreement between the members of the party who believed in prohibition and those who did not believe in prohibition. The implied agreement on the part of those who did not believe in prohibition was that if the voice of the people spoke unmistakably, if it could be shown that the great majority of the electorate were in favour of prohibition, then those who did not believe in it would square their views to those of their brothers, and would work honestly for the success of that policy. On the other hand, there was an engagement on the part of those who believed in prohibition that if the voice of the people on the subject should not be of sufficient strength to warrant the adoption by the party of the policy of prohibition, they also would square their views to those of their brothers, and we would hear no more of that question in the ranks of the party.

Now, that is a strange statement. There is nothing wrong in that agreement, provided it were made open to the people who were to be affected by it. If that agreement had been made open to the electorate before the vote, there could be no fault found with it; it would have been open and above-board. But this is not mooted to the people of this country until after the fight is fought, until after the poll is held and the opinion of the people as expressed at the polls is taken. That is not said until after all the effect which it should properly have on the electorate is rendered impossible by the fact that already the conclusion has been drawn at the polls. Being further pressed, the hon. gentleman said in this House:

Moreover, there was not a man living who expected at the time the plebiscite was taken that the duty would be imposed on the government of introducing a prohibitory measure unless at least one-half the electorate recorded their votes in favour of that policy.

That was the opinion of the hon. gentleman then. He would not give the country the benefit of that opinion. That opinion was an authoritative one, because if he were elected, he would be in a position to fashion the action of the government and of the dominant party in this country. It was not an opinion held by A, B or C, as to which it did not matter very much whether it were made public or not; but it was the opinion held solidly by the dominant factor in the party—the coming head, if he were successful, of a government which would have the determination of the question. It was the opinion of the leader of the party, and hence the opinion which dominated the party; and if the hon. gentleman had been willing to put his party squarely before the people, he would have said: ‘If we come into power, mind you, we must have at least one-half the total electorate in favour of prohibition before we can be expected to fulfil the wishes of the prohibitionists of this country.’ It is because of this complete concealment that I think the people of this country have something to complain of. What is the hon. gentleman’s last word to-day to the temperance people and prohibitionists, to whom he held out this promise for five long years, and many thousands of whom followed him because of that promise? To those people who believed that his utterances were candid and thoroughly true, that they were all that he meant and expressed his whole position on this question, he comes to-day and gives his last word, and what is it? ‘It is true, I led you on; it is true, I got your votes; it is true, I am in power largely because of that; and now, at the end I tell you that so far as I and my party are concerned, you may lay down all hopes of national prohibition from me or from my party, so long as I rule and govern with my party in this country.’ Why? He has stated here to-day the unalterable opinion, as he thinks, of the province of Quebec, as being opposed to putting the restriction of prohibition upon themselves. I will not quarrel with the opinion of the people of Quebec, if that is their opinion. Although I have my own beliefs and hold them strongly, I am not at all so illiberal as to deny to other people their beliefs on this or any other question; and I am not so illiberal either, as to say that I am totally and absolutely right, and that these people who think differently are totally and absolutely wrong.

I have learned enough in the short years that I have lived to know that we need to be very liberal and very charitable in our judgment of the opinions and beliefs of our fellow-men, but I do say this, that when the right hon. gentleman comes here to-day and states what he believes to be the unalterable opinion of his province and then takes his position on the principle that you must, if you have prohibition at all, have a complete national prohibition, and you cannot have it by sections, he speaks the last word to the prohibitionists of this country, and tells them plainly: Abandon all hope, ye who entered under my banners in 1896. What does the right hon. gentleman state? He states that prohibition is an impossibility in this country, so far as he reads the signs of the times. He stands up here in 1900 and says the most he can promise to do in aid of the cause is, if the people will all agree and say that they want it, to re-furbish the Scott Act. That is the position that he takes. If he had been candid, he would have taken that position in 1896, and the people would not have been deceived, and there would not have been that period of turmoil which has resulted in nothing—in worse than nothing. I say that the fact that a plebiscite was ordered without the wish, without the asking, without the willingness of the temperance people of this country,—the very fact that it was ordered and made imperative, and carried out under the existing conditions has had the effect of retarding the cause of prohibition and temperance in this country. I think there can be no doubt that harm has resulted from it rather than good. I might take time to amplify that statement, but I simply state what appears to be an incontrovertible proposition.

The hon. gentleman says to us: Temperance people do not agree. The hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) asks one thing, the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) asks another, the hon. member for Durham (Mr. Craig) asks another. I cannot find any two of you agreeing, and therefore there is nothing I can see that can be done even in the way of a step forward in legislation such as was taken in 1878 by the law then passed.

But just in passing, let me say that my hon. friend was altogether wrong when he declared that the question of compensation had not been argued in this House. It has, on the contrary, been argued in this House over and over again. Resolutions have been moved and defeated over and over again, and the right hon. gentleman’s own colleague, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher), I remember, as well as myself, at one time in the course of the debate on this question, took very strong grounds against the principle of compensation. Why, in 1887, on page 948 of the Hansard and subsequent pages, the right hon. gentleman will find one of those interesting debates on this question which he had better read in order to bring his memory back to the facts as they actually occurred.

I do not know that it is necessary for me to speak longer. Let me state my own position. Of course, I have the right to speak, as my hon. friend from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) admits, but I do not hope to argue with him with any idea of changing his views, because he is joined to his idols, and I suppose will not forsake them. I do not disagree from the proposition, but entirely agree with it, that in order to make any drastic legislation effective in this country, you must have an active sentiment in its favour. I have had, ever since I have been a temperance advocate, often to come face to face with that view of the question as to whether the temperance sentiment was strong enough and numerous enough, and really active enough to sustain the weight of a complete prohibitory law. I may have one opinion and another hon. gentleman may have another, but I have settled down upon this as the principle upon which you can go, and I think the only one. I have no faith in plebiscites, as an authority binding upon parliament, or indicative of the force that you can draw on for legislation afterwards. You may have a plebiscite and obtain a strong majority in the country binding nobody, and then you have a general election and elect 213 members, and you do not have one of them bound by that plebiscite. You do not have any accordant action except so far as there may be that influence which the general opinion may exert on the members elected. Plebiscites are good and effective machinery to a certain extent, but I think we have obtained all that was good of them in that respect in this country and I do not think we need any more of them. They are good as indications to a certain extent, but do not bind a party or a single individual. The people ought to have, as a free people governing themselves, just what they want, and the only way we can know what the people want is by the expression of their representatives elected and sent here by the people themselves. So far as my view of plebiscites is concerned, I do not think they will be useful in the future whatever they may have been in the past. If ever prohibition is enacted in this House, it will be enacted because at the polls the conviction will be so strongly enforced by the voters, that they will send a majority of members to this House to enact and carry out a prohibitory law. Unless that is done, no resolution, no general plebiscite will have practical effect. Whether that day is near at hand or not, I do not know. I have prophesied with reference to that so often that I dare not prophesy any more; but in this much I am glad to agree with my right hon. friend, that the advance in temperance and sobriety has been most marked in this country, and also, that the Dominion to-day occupies a very proud position as respects sobriety in comparison with any other country in the world. But we cannot go through this country and shut our eyes to the fact that there is an incalculable amount of misery yet in this country, which is caused by the evil that comes from the sale and use of intoxicating liquors, and I believe that, in so far as you can remove any of that misery, you are making a purer and a stronger and a better people and a better nationality as well. I believe that temperance legislation must follow the force and advance of temperance sentiment in the country, and that the only place we can look for that to be thoroughly registered is in parliament, by the representatives of the people, chosen to register the wishes of the electorate.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Upwards of a year ago, shortly after taking the vote in the form of a plebiscite, the government, through a letter addressed by the right hon. the Prime Minister to a prominent temperance advocate, declared its position in relation to the results of that vote. That letter declared that in the judgment of the government, the time for prohibition had not arrived, that the vote given in favour of prohibition was not large enough to show the existence of that overwhelming opinion, which in the judgment of the government was necessary for the passing and enforcing of a prohibitory law. I have had, since that time, ample opportunity, as other hon. gentlemen in the House have had, of observing the trend of public opinion. At the time, of course, I assented to that view, that the judgment of the government was wise and prudent; and all that I have heard since, and all that I have since observed, has led me to believe that that was a sound conclusion and that the government has reached a correct judgment. I have had the opportunity of discussing the question personally with many prominent temperance men. I have had the opportunity of discussing the question on the public platform in my own constituency, which is one of the strongest prohibitionist constituencies in the Dominion of Canada. And, in the light of all that observation, whatever it may be worth, I am confirmed in the opinion I then formed, that the public opinion of Canada does not now desire the passing and enforcing of a prohibitory law; that a large part, I might even say the greater part, of the temperance men of Canada—certainly of my own province, which I know best—do not desire the passing of such an Act, and do not believe that the passing of such a measure would advance the great cause they have at heart. Therefore, inasmuch as the resolution of my hon. friend from Shefford (Mr. Parmelee) is simply in line with the policy the government has previously supported, I am prepared to cast my vote in favour of that resolution and against the propositions of my hon. friend from Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) and my hon. friend from Colchester (Mr. McClure). The hon. member for Durham (Mr. Craig), who spoke so fairly—and I am sure we all felt that he spoke, as he always does, with thorough honesty on the question—said that this ought not to be a party question. I concur in that view. But, unhappily, many hon. gentlemen opposite have tried to make it a party question, and have tried to make political capital out of it; and, so far as they have tried to do that, I shall be justified in making reference to what they said and to the position of the government in relation to the question.

My hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster), in the speech which he has just addressed to the House, though in moderate terms, made what I would hardly be wrong in calling a party speech. He endeavoured to show four things—first, that the government, or the Liberal party, in its convention in 1893, had promised a prohibitory law; second, that the government at the time of the passing of the plebiscite Bill had promised to enact a prohibitory law if the majority of votes cast should be favourable to it; third, that the Liberal party is a particularly anti-temperance party; and fourth, that the Conservative party is more favourable to prohibition than the Liberal party.

Mr. FOSTER. I am sure the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) does not wish to put these propositions into my mouth. If he will allow me, I will say that the first is a proposition which I never even thought of stating, because what was promised by the Liberal convention in 1893 was not prohibition but a plebiscite. I could not have said anything else. With reference to the third and fourth proposition, I never uttered anything of the kind; and with reference to the second, I took it as an inference of course, that if the majority voted in favour of the plebiscite the government's promise extended to the proposing of legislation.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I think the tenor of my hon. friend's (Mr. Foster's) speech was in line with what I have stated; and I hope to be able to show from the public records, that on each and every one of these points he is absolutely wrong. My hon. friend says here to-day that what was promised in the convention was not prohibition but a plebiscite. But when hon. gentlemen behind him go through the country, that is not the statement they make; but the statement is constantly made that this government had pledged itself to the enactment of the prohibitory law. That statement has been made many times, as evidenced by the public press and the speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite. But my hon. friend rises in his place to-day and says that the government did not promise prohibitory law, but it did promise a plebiscite. I am glad to have his frank admission here; and we might as well have on record exactly what the words of the plebiscite were. I can speak with some knowledge of what the attitude of the Liberal party was in 1893. I was present as a delegate to the convention, though not then a member of this parliament. I had the honour to be chairman of the committee that formulated the platform. Members of the convention who had suggestions to offer as to what they desired to have the platform express were asked to send in their suggestions. Various suggestions were made, and among them one that the Liberal party's platform should contain a plank declaring in favour of prohibition. This the Liberal party, by its committee, declined to do, for reasons which it is not necessary to enlarge upon here. The general view was taken that public opinion was not ready for the enactment of prohibition. But temperance men were there who, if they could not obtain a declaration in the platform in favour of prohibition, desired that some steps should be taken in the direction of what they believed to be a righteous end; and, when they could not get a prohibition plank, they expressed a desire to have a plebiscite plank. I do not say that was all the temperance people wanted. I have said that many of them present wanted the insertion of a prohibition plank; but, failing that, they desired a plebiscite plank.

Mr. FOSTER. Was not this the expression made use of by Mr. Spence—that if they could not get a prohibition plank they had better have half a loaf than no bread?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. That is excellent philosophy, which the world at large accepts. Now, my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) has attempted to convey the impression that the temperance people did not want the plebiscite. I have said frankly that the temperance advocates favoured a plank in favour of prohibition. But it is a fact, as every one present at that convention knows, that they were pleased to have the plebiscite, regarding it as a forward movement. The words of the resolution are as follows:

That whereas public attention is at present much directed to the consideration of the admittedly great evils of intemperance, it is desirable that the mind of the people should be clearly ascertained on the question of prohibition by means of a Dominion plebiscite.

Let it, then, be distinctly understood—and it is of importance, in view of the fact that when we leave this House at the close of the session, we must go before the people from time to time, in various parts of the country, to discuss the issues of the day—let it be understood and no longer disputed that the Liberal party in convention, the only way by which it can lay down its platform, did declare that it was in favour of ascertaining the mind of the people, but it never declared that it was desirous of passing a prohibitive law; on the contrary, it declared, by refusing to pass a prohibition plank, that it was of opinion that public opinion had not then advanced sufficiently to justify such a measure. The Liberal party declared for the plebiscite to ascertain the mind of the people, but they did not consent to insert in the platform a plank in favour of prohibition; and, whenever it is said, either in this House, or out of it, that the Liberal party in 1893, promised the enactment of the prohibitory law, that is a pure fabrication.

Now, the next point was that the Liberal party, by the plebiscite, gave some promise to the people. The adoption of the plebiscite, after all, was not a new principle. It was new in the width to which it was applied; but the principle of settling the liquor question by direct vote of the people is not new. Under the legislation of most of our provinces, provision is made that licenses may be granted only as they are favoured by a certain proportion of the electors—that is that legislation on this subject by the province or by municipal councils should not be without limits, but that you should, to a certain extent, invoke the aid of public opinion before a license is granted. You say that a license should only be granted when such a proportion of the electors petition in favour of it. After all, the plebiscite was only an extension of that principle, a recognition of the right of the people to be consulted by a direct vote upon that question, which was regarded as separate and apart from the ordinary questions of government. So we come to the time when the Plebiscite Bill was brought into this House.

The hon. gentleman said this afternoon, again and again, that there was a great lack of candour on the part of the government with regard to the purpose of that Bill. He said that if the government had only told the people fairly and squarely that they did not intend to recognize a mere majority of voters as being entitled to rule in this matter, that would have been a fair and candid thing; but inasmuch as they did not do that, inasmuch as they were guilty of a complete concealment, inasmuch as they concealed in many ways the views which the government entertained, then the people of the country were misled, and they never knew until after the plebiscite was all over, that a majority of the votes cast at the poll was not to prevail. That is the substance of the hon. gentleman's argument. I said I hoped to establish that, in that as in other things, the hon. gentleman was mistaken. Now, it happens that if there is to be any dispute as to the views of the government on the question, we can turn to the public records, and show conclusively that every temperance man in Canada, when he was called upon to cast his vote at the time of the plebiscite, knew that there could be no prohibitory law, unless there was a strong public opinion manifested as a result of that vote. There was no concealment. The question was considered, and was dealt with in the Senate.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

AFTER RECESS.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). Mr. Speaker, the arrival of six o'clock interrupted an address which I intended to be quite short, for I can assure you that at this stage of the session, I have no desire to make any extended remarks. At the moment when you left the Chair I was dealing with the question of the passing of the Plebiscite Act in the session of 1898, and particularly with that part of the speech of the hon. member for York, N.B., (Mr. Foster) in which he somewhat severely arraigned the government for what he was pleased to call their complete concealment of the views expressed subsequently as to the effect of the vote that was to be taken. The hon. gentleman laboured to make it appear that at the time the Plebiscite Act was passed, the electors of Canada were led to believe that if, as a result of the vote, a majority of the votes cast should be in favour of prohibition, then, the government would proceed to enacting a prohibitory law. Does any one suppose, the hon. gentleman asks, that any temperance man in Canada would have gone to the poll and cast a vote in favour of prohibition if he had not been led to believe that a majority of the votes then cast would prevail. I suppose the hon. gentleman, who, I am sorry to see is not present, would admit, as we all admit, that the prohibitionists of Canada are among our most intelligent people, that they are, as a rule, men of education, men who take a keen interest in public affairs, men who watch the proceedings of parliament closely, and who certainly watched very closely the proceedings of parliament in relation to this question. In the light of what the hon. gentleman said this afternoon, he would be surprised to learn, although he must have known it before, but must have forgotten it, that the statement he made that the government had concealed their views as to the effect of the vote was entirely inaccurate. It happened that while that particular phase of the question was not much discussed in this House the question was pressed home to the ministers of the Crown in another branch of parliament, and I am permitted by the rules of parliament to refer to this matter for the purpose of quoting a declaration made by ministers of the Crown on the part of public policy. In the Senate this question of the effect of the vote that was to be taken under the Plebiscite Act was brought to the notice of ministers of the government and the views which prevailed then were elicited. I find, quoting from the Senate Hansard, 1898, page 1139, that an hon. member of the Senate (Mr. Perley), brought this question directly to the notice of the government. He said:

I should like to ask the government, now that this vote will be taken in the same manner that members are elected to the House of Commons, whether that implies a majority of the votes cast will, if in favour of prohibition, decide the matter. A member of the House of Commons is elected by a majority of votes. Now, I understand this election is to be on the same principle.

That is the question which was presented to the ministers in the other Chamber by Mr. Perley. Now, I shall quote the answer of Mr. Scott, Secretary of State :

No. The only resemblance that it bears to the House of Commons election is that the electoral districts are the same, but certainly the result does not carry with it the consequences that a bare majority in the House of Commons carries. A majority of one may carry in the House of Commons, but I do not think the government would be quite justified in passing a prohibition Bill if the majority was so narrow.

Clearly showing that the principle of the enactment of a prohibitory measure upon a majority of the votes to be cast at the plebiscite was not admitted by the government, as stated at that time. The hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Mills) also spoke on the subject, and I quote his statement of the policy of the government. He said :

My hon. friend will see this, that the object of taking a vote is not to shirk responsibility in the matter. It is to ascertain public sentiment, and whether that public sentiment is strong enough, in case the government should submit such a measure, to sustain the Bill. Now, the vote polled might be very small, so small as to be no indication, taken by itself as a simple majority vote, of what the public sentiment was. The public sentiment might be gathered from the indifference of the population rather than from their active approval of prohibition; and the action that is to be taken upon the vote will certainly depend in a large degree upon the interest the people take, and the extent to which the voting population come out and support a proposition in favour of prohibition.

Now, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) laboured this afternoon at some considerable length to make out that the government had concealed their views on the subject, and that the electors who favoured prohibition went to the polls with the full and complete understanding that if a majority of votes should be cast in favour of prohibition a prohibitory law would be enacted. The language I have quoted from two ministers of the Crown shows that that question was fully and fairly considered and that the statements made by these two members of the government were the very reverse of what the hon. member for York to-day assumes to be the ministerial position. Now, I shall quote what another hon. Senator (Mr. Ferguson) said, in dealing with this question :

There is to be no prohibition unless the majority is overwhelming.

That was the view taken by an opponent of the government at the time the Plebiscite Act was passed. It is, therefore, of the utmost importance that I should point out that the whole ground of the hon. gentleman's contention this afternoon, that the government led the public to believe that a prohibitory law would be passed if it should appear that a mere majority of votes were cast in favour of it, is cut away, and that the position of the government was the very reverse of that which he assumed it to be.

Now, although I do not need to dwell upon the plebiscite itself, or the result of the plebiscite, a passing reference must be made to it. There were cast in favour of prohibition 22½ per cent of the electors on the roll; there were cast against prohibition 21½ per cent and 56 per cent of the votes was silent. The hon. gentleman referred again and again to the statement of the Premier that the will of the people must prevail. That, Sir, is good Liberal doctrine; the will of the people must prevail, but not the will of 22½ per cent of the people of Canada upon any question, and surely, above all things, upon a question of this character, which requires a very strong public sentiment. We should have a very strong public opinion to enforce any such law. I put out of sight the question of Quebec, which has been frequently referred to. I do not for a moment go so far as some hon. gentlemen may be disposed to go as to the effect of one province having a strong view against the other provinces, on a particular question. I think in a country like ours, with so many diversities of interest, if one province should have, on any public question, strong views at variance with the views of the majority on that question, that grave consideration, that moderation, that conciliation, that due regard to the wishes and views and to the prejudices which may prevail in that province, no matter what province it may be, should be exercised by the majority; but if all these things have been considered, if due allowance has been made for all these conditions, which should have consideration, if the majority of the people of the Dominion, as a whole, should agree upon any public policy for the welfare of the Dominion, then, I say that the people of the province forming the minority ought to feel it their duty to accept and adopt the views of Canada, which must be carried out. But, for the purposes of the present argument I want to leave out the question of the Quebec vote, and I will leave out the question of the vote against prohibition. I rest my view of the question upon the vote cast in favour of prohibition, and that vote being only 22½ per cent of the electors on the roll, I think we may fairly say to the strongest temperance man in Canada that it does not represent the overwhelming public opinion which is necessary for the enforcement of a prohibitory law. I have said that in reference to a law of this kind it is particularly desirable that you should have a strong public opinion behind it, and in that I am merely echoing what has been said by a number of hon. gentlemen. The hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), this afternoon, used almost the same language when he said, that, in a case of this kind, it would be folly to attempt to pass a prohibitory law unless you had a very strong public opinion behind it. I might refer to the illustrations of that which are afforded in the counties which have adopted the Scott Act. In the lower provinces a very large proportion of the constituencies are under the Scott Act, but I am afraid that hon. gentlemen representing those constituencies will have to say that in some instances the Scott Act is not very rigidly enforced. It is one thing to vote for prohibition and it is another thing to enforce the law. In the operations of the Scott Act I am sure that every hon. gentleman who has any experience with that Act knows that there are many cases in which we have carried the Scott Act with an overwhelming vote, and where you find that there is no real public opinion for the purpose of enforcing the law. That is particularly true of all legislation dealing with the social habits of the people, such as this. I know that some respected temperance friends will be found saying that it is just as easy to enforce a prohibitory law as it is to enforce a law against robbery or murder. That is a very common saying, but I believe the experience of every hon. member who has thought over the matter will show him the difference. There are certain crimes in the eyes of the law which are also crimes in the eyes of society, and there are certain things which, although they are crimes in the eyes of the law, are not universally looked upon by society as crimes. I suppose that in any one of our towns, if a leading man, a deacon or an elder of the church, were going along the street and saw a thief robbing his neighbour's shop, he would at once alarm the police and would give evidence against that man and have him punished. But, if in the next block he should look into the window and see the license law violated almost openly he would pass by on the other side, and he would not go to the magistrate's office and give his evidence and prosecute the offender. In the one case there is a public opinion which supports the law; in the other case there is a weak sort of opinion in favour of the law, but there is really no zeal in the enforcement of it. The view held by a great many is that of the man who was asked if he were in favour of the Scott Act, and he replied: I am in favour of the law, but I am against the enforcement of it. There is a great deal of that feeling in the Dominion of Canada. There are a great many people who in an indifferent way are prepared to say they are in favour of prohibition, but it is another thing to get them to put their hands to the plough and to support the zealous temperance men who want to enforce the law. Therefore, I say that it is of particular importance that you do not attempt to pass a law of that character, unless you have the strong public opinion of the community behind you.

I have pointed out that there could not have been any misunderstanding as to the attitude of the government, such as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) referred to. The attitude of the government most distinctly was not that a prohibitory law would result from the approval of prohibition by a bare majority at the polls. The attitude of the government was that the vote was taken to test public opinion, and that the action to be taken would depend largely upon the volume of public opinion that might be manifested in favour of the Act. I say that this not only was a reasonable and a sensible view, but it was the view which the temperance men themselves took at the time. There was no deception; there was no misunderstanding. Turn back to the files of the temperance papers at the time of the plebiscite, and you will find frequent articles calling upon the electorate to come out in strength to vote, telling them distinctly that if they did not poll a strong vote they could not expect their cause to succeed. I have a distinct recollection of an article, it was not an editorial, written by a correspondent in the Wesleyan, published in Halifax, one of the strongest temperance papers in Canada. I refer to this because it is in my own province and came under my particular notice. That article was an urgent appeal to the electors of Canada who favoured prohibition to cast a strong vote, and it pointed out that if there was a weak vote in favour of prohibition the temperance people could not expect the government or parliament to pass a prohibitory law. That was the attitude of the temperance people generally. I am informed that a very prominent temperance advocate of the province of Ontario, Mr. Buchanan of Hamilton, editor of the Templar, made a tour of the maritime provinces during the plebiscite, and I am told that at every meeting he addressed in the lower provinces he warned the temperance men against the dangers of a small vote, and he pointed out distinctly that if the vote in favour of prohibition was small they could not expect that a prohibitory law would be enacted. That, I repeat, was the ground taken by the advocates of prohibition generally. There is, therefore, no foundation for the statement, that there was any misunderstanding or any concealment whatever as to the attitude of the government, and I say further, that there was no misunderstanding whatever amongst the temperance men as to the consequence of the vote. They understood that if there was a small vote there would be no prohibitory law. When the result of the plebiscite became known, I think I am correct in saying that the vote was a great disappointment to the active zealous temperance men of the Dominion who did think that the prohibition sentiment of the country was much stronger than it proved to be. After the result of that vote became known many of the leading temperance men throughout the Dominion recognized that in the presence of such a vote it would be unreasonable to look to the government to pass a prohibitory law. Every hon. gentleman who has followed the discussion can, I am sure, mention the names of distinguished temperance men who took that view. Among others, I remember the attitude taken by the Rev. Dr. Potts, a very distinguished Methodist divine, whose loyalty to the temperance cause is beyond question. He was reported in the press, right after the plebiscite vote, as having said:

The Rev. Dr. Potts said that in his opinion the vote polled for prohibition was not large enough to warrant a demand for the enactment of a prohibitory law.

No one will question the loyalty of Dr. Potts to the temperance cause. Men may differ from him, but no member in this House need be ashamed to stand on a temperance platform and to say that he decided in this matter in the same way as such a prominent temperance man as the Rev. Dr. Potts. My hon. friend from East Durham (Mr. Craig), was frank enough to say (and in that he but repeated a former statement), that he did not believe there was any justification for a prohibitory law in the light of the vote that was passed. My hon. friend (Mr. Craig) went further, and with perhaps a little severity—I will not say who was hit by it—he said that such was the general view of the hon. members of this House, though they were not all going to vote that way. I believe, however, that his is a fair and reasonable view, and my hon. friend (Mr. Craig) is a distinguished temperance man. Mr. J. S. Robertson, secretary of the Canadian Temperance League, is quoted as having said:

I do not think, in view of the smallness of the majority, that the government would be justified in legislating on the lines of prohibition. . . . Looking at the matter from a Dominion standpoint, and as a citizen, I certainly think that the government should not attempt a prohibitory law.

Only last week a very distinguished Baptist minister, the Rev. Dr. Goodspeed, of Toronto, formerly of New Brunswick, addressed the Baptists at a convention in the lower provinces. I read in the papers a very brief report of the discussion, and Dr. Goodspeed is credited with the remark that if he had stood in the place of Sir Wilfrid Laurier after the plebiscite vote he would not have felt justified in pressing the enactment of a prohibitory law.

We thus, Mr. Speaker, have the evidence, that the view which the government took of this matter, while it may not be the view of all temperance men—and I do not pretend it is—is the view of many of the best temperance men in Canada. I think it is a fair and reasonable view. I have said, Sir, that there has been an effort made by some hon. gentlemen to make this a political question. I regret it, but we cannot ignore the fact that such an attempt has been made. Now, it would probably be fair and reasonable to make this a party question if either the one party or the other in this country were in favour of prohibition, but I do not say that, inasmuch as neither political party is prepared to declare, as a part of its platform, that it will enact a prohibitory law, then the question should not be one of a party character, and it should form no part in the discussion of party issues.

I believe, Sir, that in my own constituency, in my province generally, and throughout Canada, there are many hundreds of good temperance men who will not view this matter just as we do. They are men who would place the cause of temperance above every other cause, and who would leave the Liberal party in a moment and join the Conservatives if the Conservatives would fairly and squarely and honestly adopt a prohibitory policy. But while that is true, while these men are quite prepared to abandon their affiliation with the Liberal party if they could join a party which would give them prohibition, I am here to say that they are much too intelligent to be led astray by anything which has come from hon. gentlemen opposite.

My hon. friend from East Durham (Mr. Craig) said very fairly that this was a matter in which people should be candid. I agree with him. We want candour and frankness. We know where the Liberal party stand. The leader of the Liberal party, in his public letter, has declared, and we his colleagues and nearly all his supporters accept it, that the policy of this government is not to enact a prohibitory law at present, believing that the condition of public opinion does not justify the enactment, and would not render possible the enforcement of such a law. That is the position of the Liberal party. Now, what is the position of hon. gentlemen opposite? If they insist that this is to be a party question, then we have a right to know where they stand upon it. My hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster) who is now present, in his speech this afternoon did not give us much information on that point. I must confess, after having listened to him somewhat attentively, that I really do not know at this moment whether he thinks we now ought to pass a prohibitory liquor law. If we are to have candour and frankness, I would be justified in asking him to say frankly, does he believe now that there should be passed in Canada a prohibitory liquor law? My hon. friend exercises his right of not answering. I am not complaining; my hon. friend has a right not to answer; but I am calling his attention to the fact that in his speech this afternoon he did not give us any information on that point.

My hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), who is now absent, has not given us any intimation during the present session of his view on this question. He has been discreetly silent. But he was not always silent. We have some information as to the view of that hon. gentleman. He was in the old country when the plebiscite took place. When the results were telegraphed over, the hon. gentleman was interviewed by a reporter of the London Daily News, and I have a newspaper clipping containing a portion of that interview. It was immediately after the taking of the vote in September, 1898:

'I suppose, Sir Charles, it may be taken for granted that the recent plebiscite has for the present put prohibition in Canada out of practical politics?'

'Quite so,' Sir Charles Tupper replied. 'The result of the plebiscite is a serious blow to the prohibitionist movement. The diminution of the prohibitionist vote, as compared with the provincial votes of a few years ago, will certainly be used as proof that the demand for the prohibition of the liquor traffic has declined.'

'Such experience as Canada has had of prohibition has not been very encouraging, has it?'

'There has been only one real general attempt at prohibition in a self-governing province, and that was in New Brunswick. There it utterly failed, and it resulted, not in the destruction of the liquor traffic, but in free trade in drink, with all legal restrictions removed. The people were glad enough to repeal the law and go back to license.'

That is the only utterance of the hon. leader of the opposition on the question of prohibition, and I do not imagine that any hon. gentleman will say that it indicates that he has any desire to see a prohibitory law enacted in Canada. Two other members of this House were recently called upon by a temperance organization down in my own province to define their position as to the enactment of a prohibitory law, and what was their answer? Unfortunately they did not see fit to say whether they wished to have a prohibitory law enacted at present or not. Both of those hon. gentlemen, the two hon. members for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper and Mr. Bell) declined to say whether the Conservative party favoured a prohibitory law or not; but they did say that they were prepared to punish the government which had violated its promises to the prohibitionists.

Well, I have shown the House, if it was necessary to show it, that there has been no promise made by this government or by the Liberal party on the question of prohibition which has not been fulfilled in its letter and its spirit. But I want to point out to hon. gentlemen opposite, who wish to make capital out of this question, that the people of Canada are too intelligent to allow the question to be monkeyed with.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. They are going to have that candour which my respected friend from East Durham thinks is so important. They have demanded of this government a declaration on the question: Are you prepared to support a prohibitory law, or are you not? They have had a full, frank and square declaration that this government is not prepared to enact a prohibitory law in the present state of public opinion. And if there is any man on the Conservative side who wants to get the votes of any Liberals on that issue, he must show those Liberals that the Conservative party have a platform on the question of prohibition and are prepared to do the thing which the Liberal party are not prepared to do. The gentleman who put the question to my hon. friends the members for Pictou was a Conservative, a clergyman, and a son of a much-respected member of the legislature of Nova Scotia who sat there in my day in opposition to me. This gentleman, Conservative though he was, refused to accept the answer of those gentlemen, but in a public statement has said that they must face the issue and state their position fairly and squarely; and I think that is a fair request. We on this side have stated our position; and, I repeat, if any Liberal elector of Canada is to be led off on that question, he is going to be intelligent enough to ask the opposition: What is your policy on the question, and where have you proclaimed that policy openly, publicly, in such a way that we can bind you to it?

Although prohibition cannot be enforced now, I am not going to say that it never can be attained. I was much impressed by what was said this afternoon by the right hon. leader of the government and by the hon. member for York as to the great progress which has been made in the temperance sentiment of the country. Unquestionably each one can testify that in his day there has been great progress in that direction. It is not long since drunkenness, if not fashionable, was tolerated in respectable society. Happily, that is no longer the case; but any man who drinks to excess in any social circle will be reminded of the fact. I remember a large public gathering in my native city some years ago—an old Scottish society, proud of its history. They were having a banquet, and the secretary brought up one of the volumes of its history and read from it an account of a banquet held a hundred years before. After reading the names of a number of prominent men who attended the banquet, he read a record of the number of bottles of wine that were consumed. By actual count there were three bottles to a man; and the secretary, after reading this item, said: 'Mr. President, in that day, it was three bottles to a man, but things have so changed now that we would consider it a very lavish allowance if we had three men to a bottle.'

Well, that incident, taken from the records of an ancient society in my province, fairly illustrates, in its own way, the great change that has come over the drinking habits of the people. No doubt to-day, while there is still much evil arising from the habit of drinking, while the evils of intemperance continue, there has been a vast improvement, and, I think, it would not be too much to say that the people of Canada, as a whole, are among the most temperate people on the earth. Therefore, the men who have laboured so long to bring about this good result have much reason to thank God and take new courage; and the only way in which they can continue doing successful work, is to go on in the old way of educating the people and thus bring nearer the time when a public opinion will have been created that will enable a prohibitory law to be enforced. Until that moment comes, I am speaking the views of many honest fair-minded men of Canada, when, I say, that the cause of temperance would not be advanced by the passing of a prohibitory law at the present day.

Mr. J. G. H. BERGERON (Beauharnois). I do not intend to speak in the name of the opposition, but as my hon. friend did a moment ago, I wish to say a few words to express to the House the ideas that have come to my mind when listening to the debate this afternoon. To-morrow, when the people interested in this discussion read in the papers all the philosophy or sophistry that we have had this afternoon, they may come to the conclusion that this is the last time we will hear of prohibition in this parliament. My experience does not go to show that that is the correct view. We heard of prohibition twenty years ago, we hear of it to-day, and we shall hear of it again.

Another thing that struck me, is that after all, the coming of this government into power, may not have been an unmixed evil, because under the Conservative administration there sprang up a number of fads. There was the Patron fad, which was a side issue, and there was the agitation for prohibition by people, some of whom were sincere and others who went into it for the political capital they could make out of it. What was the result? Session after session we had gentlemen getting up in parliament and speaking in favour of a prohibitory liquor law. Some of them, no doubt, were very sincere in their opinions, but others probably had only a political object in view. The result was that one day the late government—and I may say that hon. gentlemen opposite to-day are not a great deal worse than those who preceded them in this respect—the late government, not wishing to take the question by the horns made a diversion. They thought that after all, hearing this prohibition advocated session after session, there might be something in it, so they appointed a commission to go around the country, and find out whether the people wanted such a policy or not. This commission was composed of men who enjoyed the respect and esteem of both political parties. Their work cost the country about $80,000, and they made a report, and we might then have thought that surely that was the end of the matter. But no, hon. gentlemen opposite who were then preparing a platform on which to appeal to the country, put into that platform the question of a plebiscite. The prohibitionists, many of them, then said: Well, there is a party of honest men, there is a party which has been in opposition twenty years, and expects to come into power, and it is going to give us prohibition, because it has promised to have a plebiscite taken, and abide by the result. The prohibitionists said, we have a majority in every province, it is true, but we have not succeeded in getting prohibition, because the constitution was against it, but when the government calls for a plebiscite throughout the whole Dominion, if the result is in favour of prohibition, we shall have certainly a law prohibiting the liquor traffic. This gave renewed hope to the prohibitionists in the country, and there is no doubt that a great many voted for hon. gentlemen opposite, because they expected the plebiscite would give them what they desired.

The hon. the Minister of Finance, in a very clever way, explained, that in the Senate two or three men had asked the government whether it would require a simple majority of the votes, or, if not, what majority it would require in order to warrant the enactment of a prohibitory liquor law, and Mr. Scott replied to Mr. Perley in the Senate, that the same rule would not govern in the case of the plebiscite as in the case of an ordinary election. Although in an election, one vote of a majority would be sufficient, in the case of the plebiscite, a larger majority would be required. Let me tell the hon. Minister of Finance, that this is the first time I heard of this reply, and if that be the case, how many people in the country heard of it?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. That is hard on the Senate.

Mr. BERGERON. No, but I think that the opinion of my hon. friend to my left (Mr. Foster), is the proper one, namely, that the people of the country were under the impression that if the majority of the vote cast in the plebiscite, was in favour of prohibition, the government was pledged to give it to us, and the people went to the polls under that impression.

We have heard the speeches of my hon. friends opposite, and I may say, they are the very same speeches that their opponents gave expression to twenty years ago. It was agreeable to me this afternoon, to hear my right hon. friend, in his quiet, calm way, express the opinion he did; but if he had expressed that same opinion when he was in opposition, we would probably never have heard of prohibition again.

We have three propositions before us. I do not want to say anything against my hon. friend from Yarmouth (Mr. Flint), because I am convinced—and I say it in all sincerity—that he is honest in his views. Although it has been said that he might have brought on his motion at the commencement of the session, or proposed it as a vote of want of confidence in the administration, still I accept his reply, believing in his sincerity, but I want to ask him whether he did not know before, and whether he does not know now, that the proposition he makes, is purely and simply impracticable. It is impracticable for the reasons given by the right hon. the First Minister. How could we enact a law in the House of Commons of Canada for six provinces, and leave one province aside? We cannot do it. So that, while believing in his honesty, I say that he has submitted a proposition to the House which cannot be put into effect. The second proposition is that of my hon. friend from Colchester (Mr. McClure). The issue he submits is a straight one. I do not say that there was a conciliabule in advance among these three hon. gentlemen who have submitted proposals to settle the question, but it is unfortunate that we should not have an opportunity of voting on the straight question, but be called on to vote on a side issue. The motion of the member for Colchester is a straight one, and I would say to the Minister of Finance, that if he cannot make a party question of this matter, there is one thing he can do, and that is let us have a straight vote on the motion of the hon. member for Colchester; and if members of parliament will only have the manliness to explain their vote to the electorate, we will not be called on to vote again on this subject.

My hon. friend from Shefford (Mr. Parmelee), brings on a side issue, which will probably carry the majority, as such side issues always do on this question. We have never seen a vote taken purely and simply on this question, whether the people are in favour of prohibition or not—but have always had some side issue, such as that brought in by the hon. member for Shefford, which will carry the majority vote, and that will be the end of the matter, until in some other session, somebody else rises and proposes something else.

The hon. Minister of Finance spoke of a plebiscite being taken in some other places; but, at least, he will admit that it is not English. I do not think there is any example in England of a plebiscite being taken. The taking of a plebiscite is a party question, it is a party trick, if I may use the word, to gull the people into believing that the party proposing it are in favour of doing a thing, but affording an excuse for not doing it. When they called for the plebiscite in the different provinces, did they not know that whether the answer was yes or no, they could do nothing, that the constitution of Canada stood in the way? But what is being done in Manitoba? Hon. gentlemen opposite will admit that Hon. Hugh John Macdonald, whether he is Conservative or Liberal, is doing what might be done by any leader who wanted to be sincere. He has brought in a prohibition law for the province. Why? Because it had been talked of in the province and had been promised by both political parties. Though he does not believe in it as a moral force, though he does not think that prohibition will bring about temperance, still, as a way of settling the question, he is bringing down a prohibition law for the province of Manitoba. The second reading, I believe, was passed to-day. In this parliament we have been, purely and simply, playing football with this question, and the honest prohibitionists will know what they can depend upon from politicians sitting in this House. Speaking for myself, I say I do not believe in prohibition; I believe in temperance, and I believe in good licenses and good laws; but I do not believe you will obtain what you desire, the advancement of the cause of temperance, by the help of prohibition. We have some small examples in our own country. We have heard of the Scott Act being enacted in different counties, and sometimes carried by a majority of two thousand one year, and, three years afterwards, defeated by a majority of two thousand. In the county of Brome, represented here by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher), they had the Scott Act, but after all the work done by my hon. friend (Mr. Fisher), on the hustings and everywhere, in favour of prohibition, the county of Brome, if I am not mistaken, defeated the Scott Act by over six hundred votes. It only shows that you cannot maintain a cast-iron law of this kind. This parliament should leave matters in the hands of the local legislatures, which are called upon to enact the license laws; and the better laws they enact, the better it will be for them and for the Dominion. The Finance Minister tells us of a deacon seeing a thief stealing something at once informs the police and has him arrested, but if he sees men drinking out of hours or sees liquor served in contravention of the law, he does nothing. Why is that? It strikes me that that deacon, or whoever you may call him, acts as we are doing in this House—he is afraid of public opinion, instead of doing his duty like an honest man. In speaking, I speak for nobody but myself. But, I say the honest people of this country will be thoroughly disgusted with the House of Commons if we go on discussing this question as we have been doing. Let us face the question, discuss it and decide it in a manly way. We are not here to be subject to caprice, but to teach and to make public opinion. Let us take up the question proposed by the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. McClure), and vote on it according to our consciences and our best ideas. We shall be judged by the people; and whatever the judgment, it will bring here a House of Commons that will either enact prohibition or refuse to enact it, and thus settle the question.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I had not intended to say anything except to make a few remarks on the constitutional question. But the rather singular speech of my hon. friend the acting leader of the opposition (Mr. Foster) induces me to make a few remarks on the position that he and his party occupy. I regret that his speech assumed a party character. It was painfully evident to everybody who listened to him that the speech was an attempt to put his opponents in a false position on this question, without defining his own. I repeat what the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) said, that we stand in the awkward position that, with the exception of the stand taken by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), the opposition, through their leader, had not declared what their policy is. The acting leader of the opposition has condemned the government for not introducing an immediate measure of prohibition consequent on the plebiscite vote; but he has not stated whether, if he were in our place, he would introduce that measure; or, if the whirligig of time should bring its revenges, and he should come into the government again, whether he is prepared to adopt prohibition as a plank in his political platform. I have no right to assume that he has changed the opinions he so fairly and emphatically expressed in this House some years ago. I remember some years ago he moved a resolution in this House affirming the principle of prohibition to be the correct principle. The then hon. member for Cardwell, Hon. Thomas White, moved an amendment to that resolution to the effect that effect should be given to that principle as and when public opinion was ripe for it. The words were:

And the House is prepared, so soon as public opinion is sufficient to sustain stringent measures, to promote such legislation, so far as the same is within the competency of the parliament of Canada.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) approved of that rider being added to his resolution. Subsequently, another amendment was moved by the hon. member for Shelburne, Mr. Robertson, to the effect:

That this House is of opinion that the public sentiment of Canada calls for immediate legislation to that end.

And my hon. friend the acting leader of the opposition voted for that amendment and for the immediate application of the principles of prohibition. Time went on, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) gained by experience larger information, and his opinions became more formed. And when, some years afterwards, he stood in a more prominent and responsible position, in the year 1891, he made a public confession and recantation of his principles on that question. I am not going to make any charges against him for so doing. I hold it is a high moral act for a man, and one to be commended, if having honestly changed his opinion he has the courage to stand up and say so. If I quote what the hon. gentleman said, it is to show what his political principles on this question were, and I assume that, after having stated them there, they are the same as he announced in the year 1891. He said:

I propose to do what is honest and fair on this question, and I will make an honest confession before this House to-night. The only inconsistency which has been urged against me is that on one occasion I voted for immediate prohibition when Mr. Robertson, of Shelburne, brought that up as an amendment. I did it, and I did it in a moment of weakness. I did it, not because I was convinced that the country was then ready for immediate prohibition, but because I felt that the lash was raised outside of that criticism and that anathema which would be hurled against me if I did not vote for immediate prohibition, and I voted for it. There is my candid confession. Take it, and make what you please of it; but from this time forth I propose to do what I consider to be right and honest, and I will do nothing further and nothing less.

Therefore, the hon. gentleman, in 1891, proclaimed that he was recanting the vote which he had given in favour of immediate prohibition, and he went on to give the reasons why, reasons which I think did credit to himself and to the position which he was then taking. Now, assuming that the hon. gentleman stands in that position to-night, that he is not in favour of immediate prohibition, that he has seen reason to change his views, that he has recanted again, and is back again where he started from in 1884, then I will ask him to say so, because it will relieve my mind and the minds of a great many temperance men in this country. Is the hon. gentleman prepared, if he was in power to-morrow, to introduce a measure of prohibition of the liquor traffic throughout the Dominion of Canada?

Mr. BERGERON. That is an argument, he is not in power. You are in power, why do you not act?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The ex-Minister of Finance, the leader of the opposition, does not answer. He has a perfect right not to answer, but the public will take note of the fact that he has been challenged to answer. I do not wish to press the matter further than it ought to be pressed. I have read his recantation in 1891, in which he stated that he voted for immediate prohibition in a moment of weakness. I say if he has changed his mind upon prohibition again, and if he is now prepared to vote for it, having recanted again, I shall be very glad to hear it. All I have to say is that the people of this country who have been treated to so many moral lectures by the hon. gentleman, and the government who have been lectured for inconsistency upon the question, certainly have a right to know. The earnest people throughout this country do not want this question shilly-shalleyed with. Could anything be straighter or plainer than the government policy which has just been announced by the Minister of Finance? Could anything be plainer, or straighter, or more honest than the declaration made by the Prime Minister to the delegation that waited upon him after the plebiscite vote had been taken? Did not everybody in this country know exactly what the position of the government was? Could anything be plainer, or straighter, or clearer than the government policy announced by the Hon. Mr. Mills and the Hon. Mr. Scott when that Plebiscite Act was passing through the Senate? Could anything be plainer or straighter than the declaration made by the hon. member for Durham (Mr. Craig) when the Plebiscite Act was passing through this House, when he stated in presence of the government that nobody would venture to act upon the plebiscite unless at least 50 per cent of the electorate voted in favour of it? Nobody dissented from that. I will say that while the Liberal party called for that plebiscite—and I will show in a moment why they called for it—there was not a man in this House who believed that any government, I care not whether this government or their opponents, would venture to place a prohibition Act on the statute-book as the result of a plebiscite unless there was a majority of the whole electorate voting in favour of prohibition.

Mr. WALLACE. I would like to ask the minister how he has ascertained how many voters there are?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The lists show that plain enough.

Mr. WALLACE. Will he permit me to give an example from the west riding of York? At the last general election there were 6,713 votes polled out of a total number of names on the voters' list in West York of 18,911, or nearly three times as many as were polled at the Dominion election. That shows that you cannot get a majority at a Dominion election, although there were three candidates at that election, there was a hot canvass all round, and the largest vote ever polled was at that election in 1896.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman selected a case to suit himself, no doubt.

Mr. WALLACE. My own constituency.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It does not affect the argument I am making at all, an argument which must commend itself to his mind, and that is that in legislation of this kind, before you can act you must be satisfied that public opinion is right in favour of it, and you cannot be satisfied that public opinion is right in favour of it unless they express themselves at the poll, and you cannot have that expression of opinion at the polls if you take it at a general election mixed up with a great many other questions; but you must take it divorced from all other questions, so that you can have a yea and nay vote upon that particular question.

Now, I want to show hon. gentlemen opposite, who think that plebiscite plank was adopted in the convention of the Liberal party in 1893 as a political dodge, why that platform was adopted. I have read from the journals of the House in 1884 the resolution which was then adopted, when the House of Commons pledged itself that as soon as public opinion was ripe on the question of prohibition and so expressed itself, they would adopt prohibition. Then again in 1884 and in 1889—this question was cropping up always—the House of Commons again voted:

That in the opinion of this House it is expedient to prohibit the manufacture, importation and sale of intoxicating liquors except for sacramental, medicinal, scientific and mechanical purposes, when the public sentiment of the country is ripe for the reception and the enforcement of such a measure of prohibition.

That was the form of the resolution adopted in this House in 1884, and in 1889, and at several other times. Then the question came up from the temperance people everywhere: How are we to know when public opinion is ripe? Parliament keeps on saying: We will do this when public opinion is ripe. When is it to be ripe? And the Liberal party said: There is only one way of doing it. If you mix it up with other party questions, with the thousand and one questions on which political parties go to the elections, you will never ascertain whether public opinion is ripe or not. We are prepared to test whether it is ripe or not, we are not committing ourselves one way or the other, we simply proclaim as a plank in our platform that we will have a plebiscite on this one question divorced from all other political questions, and we will find out what public opinion is. Now, we found out what public opinion was. I have not heard yet one man from the other side of the House rise up and say that he believed that plebiscite vote showed that public opinion was ripe for the passing of a prohibition measure.

Mr. BERGERON. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question? If another plebiscite vote were taken, and if over 50 per cent of the votes were cast in favour of it, and the province of Quebec, as was the case in 1898, was against it, would he then bring in a prohibition law?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is a very fair question, and I will give the hon. gentleman an answer. In 1891, when I went through an election in my own county, I was waited upon by leading prohibitionists there and was asked to give a pledge, and I gave a pledge. Here is the pledge which I gave then, after this advanced resolution had been placed upon the books of the House of Commons, that when the country was ripe for prohibition they would get it. They said: When do you think it is ripe? Are you prepared to pledge yourself? This is what I then said, and what I hold to now, without wishing to bind any of my colleagues. It was signed by myself and my colleague then running in that election:

In our opinion, the true and only way of reaching a practical legislative conclusion upon the important subject of prohibition is (by submitting it to a vote of the people at an election to be specially called for the purpose.

Let the people vote yea or nay on the question of prohibition, pure and simple, disentangled from all party politics or other issues.

If the result of the vote shows a majority of the electorate to favour prohibition of the liquor traffic, then the government for the time being must introduce legislation to carry out the people's verdict, and if elected, such legislation, by whomsoever introduced, will have our hearty support.

Now, I think my hon. friend will do me the justice to say that nothing could be plainer than that declaration of my views that I gave then and that I give now. But unfortunately the plebiscite vote when it was taken showed that instead of a majority of the electorate being in favour of prohibition there was only 23 per cent of the electorate in favour of it. Therefore, it did not come anywhere near the point, in my humble judgment, that was necessary to justify me in acting.

Mr. BERGERON. I want to ask the hon. gentleman one more question. This time I will make the vote larger. Suppose that 75 per cent of the electors of the Dominion were in favour, and the province of Quebec would be opposed to it, would he then introduce a prohibitory law?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am not going to deal with academic questions. I am dealing with practical facts. No such a vote as that has been given. We have not got the vote. We have not got 50 per cent, nor 40 per cent, nor 30 per cent. I repeat what I said before, that I have failed to witness any hon. gentleman on the other side of the House who has declared in his honest judgment that the vote was sufficient to justify the government in bringing in a prohibitory measure. Now, I would like to call the hon. gentleman's attention to a very worthy speech which I remember to have been delivered in this House many years ago by an apostle of prohibition in this country. I have had the honour of a seat in this House from a time away back in the early 80's and in the session of 1884 this question of prohibition was discussed. I remember Sir Leonard Tilley, who was one of the oldest and most consistent temperance men in this House, delivering a speech on this question. He was then, I was going to say, gray with years. At all events, he was then a very elderly gentleman and with all the experience he had gained as a minister of the Crown in New Brunswick and as a minister of the Crown in the Dominion, with all his experience as a leading temperance man of fifty years' standing he gave these views to the House:

As early as 1855 I introduced into the legislature of my own province one of the most stringent prohibitory Bills that was ever proposed in any legislature or parliament in the world. Previous to the introduction of that Bill we had, as we thought, educated the people of New Brunswick to the point that such a law, if enacted, would be supported and sustained by the people. Reference was made by the hon. mover of this resolution to the number of petitions presented to the House of Commons in 1877; and if my memory serves me, in the province of New Brunswick, as far back as 1855, we had more signatures to petitions presented to the legislature of that province in favour of prohibition than were signed to the petitions presented to this House from the whole Dominion in 1877. They were brought into the House in the size of rolls of carpet by the hon. members who presented them. We thought that we had educated the people of that province up to such a point that if a prohibitory law was passed it would be enforced. We had three-fourths of the people of that province signing petitions in favour of prohibition. That law was passed by the Lower House by something like two-thirds majority, and it passed the Upper House by nearly the same majority; and it was passed because of the strong arguments and facts presented, and because of the statistics we had collected as to the effect of the traffic in New Brunswick from 1852 to 1855, and which were so convincing that men who differed from us in opinion gave us their support, and enabled us to carry the measure by the majority stated. That law went into force on the 1st of January, 1856.

Then the hon. gentleman described with very dramatic effect the consequences which ensued upon the coming into force of that Act. It remained in force for four months, and then such chaos was brought about in New Brunswick that the governor of the province insisted on having dissolution that the government might go back to the people and ascertain whether the people were in favour of the law or not:

We were thrown into an election, and very many of those who had signed the petition went back on us; they voted against this law, and a majority were returned to vote in favour of its repeal. Under these circumstances, and believing as I do now, that if public sentiment is not sufficiently educated to sustain a prohibition law, the passage would do harm instead of good, instead of abandoning anything by accepting the original resolution, even as amended, I hold that if this motion be carried the cause of prohibition will have made a great step in advance.

I again quote further on :

I am not quite sure but that some hon. gentlemen who voted against this proposition to-day did not then vote for the proposition moved by Mr. Ross. That, however, does not matter at present. I believe in prohibition; I believe it will yet come in Canada; but I believe it would be the greatest injury to the permanent success of prohibition were there such a law enacted to-day, because I know, from the experience of the past, that it could not be successfully carried out. I have the courage of my convictions, and am prepared to vote for the principle of prohibition, but I have also the courage of my convictions when I say that the country is not yet sufficiently educated to enable that principle to be successfully carried into operation.

Further on, he says :

I speak with the experience I had thirty years ago, and have had ever since 1856. When the convention was held in Montreal, I was written to by one of the leading friends of temperance asking my opinion. I was unable to be present, but I wrote a letter in reply, which letter Mr. Ross read at a convention held in Ottawa. What was the opinion I then expressed? I stated that if they decided to submit the proposal to the popular vote—

I ask particular attention to this :

—they should not suggest less than a three-fifths vote, because, if carried by a bare majority and without public sentiment behind it, the law would fail and the cause of temperance would be damaged instead of benefited.

Then again :

I say that I will be prepared to record my vote on any occasion in favour of prohibition, when we can say honestly that the public sentiment of Canada is so strong that we will be in a position to enforce it. But from my experience of what has taken place in the past, I cannot help being convinced that we are not to-day in that position. If a prohibitory law were enacted to-morrow, I am satisfied it could not be enforced, and nothing could do more damage to the cause of prohibition than the enactment of a law, followed by its non-enforcement and ultimate repeal.

Here, an apostle of temperance, in a speech to the House of Commons in 1884, after all the experience that he had acquired as Premier of New Brunswick, after he had introduced a law into the legislature, after the legislature had been petitioned to pass it by a larger number of petitioners than had ever presented petitions to the House of Commons from the whole Dominion of Canada, says that a law was passed when they thought they had public sentiment behind them, that four months afterwards it had to be repealed, that irremedial injury to the cause was done, that the cause was thrown back almost half a century, and he warns us that if we attempt to enact legislation of this kind unless there are three-fifths of the popular votes behind it, it will fail. These wise words fell from the lips of Sir Leonard Tilley, and when we find that instead of having three-fifths we have only 23 per cent of the votes of the electorate polled in favour of prohibition, how could any one say that we have such a strong public sentiment behind us as would justify the government in the passage of such a measure? I stand here and I repeat again, and if I am wrong I desire to be contradicted, that I have not heard any hon. gentleman in the opposition ranks take the responsibility of saying that he believed the vote was sufficiently large to justify the government in introducing a prohibitory law.

Now, I desire to pass from that phase of the question and to just say a word of two upon the constitutional aspect of it. We have three propositions before us to-night. One is the proposition of my hon. friend from Yarmouth (Mr. Flint). He asks the House to affirm what on the face of it appears to be a very fair proposition. He says that we have a large majority vote in all the provinces excepting the province of Quebec, and asks us to apply the principle of prohibition to Quebec because public sentiment is not ripe in that province for it, but asks to apply this principle to the other provinces which have voted largely in favour of it. Now, on the face of it there appears to be something pretty fair in that proposition. It has been shown by some hon. gentlemen that practically the proposition would not work out. But what I stand up to argue is not that it would not be practicable but that we cannot pass the law. Constitutionally, we are forbidden to pass any such law as this, for one, two, three, or four provinces of the Dominion, omitting any other province. The power of legislation on this matter is contained in the 91st section of the British North America Act. The 91st section gives us two different kinds of powers, one, the power to legislate for the peace, order and good government of Canada, always provided that in legislating under that power we legislate in relation to matters not coming within the class of subjects that are to be exclusively dealt with by the legislatures of the provinces. So that, while we might pass any law on a subject that the first part of section 91 gives power to legislate on; that is in regard to the peace, order and good government of Canada, we cannot do it if such legislation necessarily invades those subjects which have been assigned exclusively to the provinces to legislate upon. In another part of the section there are twenty-nine different classes of subjects upon which we have exclusive legislative authority, unlimited by any powers which the provincial legislatures have. In other words if we legislate upon any of the enumerated subjects referred to in section 91, we have plenary powers as a parliament, no one can call our legislation in question; the courts cannot say it is ultra vires. But the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council have determined in the liquor prohibition appeal of 1895, that we have no power to enact prohibition under any one of the twenty-nine classes of subjects assigned to us under the 91st section. It was argued that we had the power under the clause No. 2, for the regulation of trade and commerce, but the Privy Council determined positively that we had not that power, and that if we attempted to enact prohibition we would have to enact it under the general powers given under the first part of the section 'for the peace, order, and good government of Canada.' Then the question came up: Have the provincial legislatures the powers to enact prohibition? and hon. gentlemen will remember that there were a number of specific questions asked the Privy Council in that regard. They were asked:

Has the provincial legislature jurisdiction to prohibit the sale within the province of spirituous, fermented or other intoxicating liquors?

A substantial answer was given to that question and it was said: They had the power. The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council held that the provincial legislature of Ontario had power to re-enact the 18th section of 53 Vic. in that province, an Act to amend the Liquor License Law Act, which was tantamount to prohibition, giving the municipalities power to enact prohibition. The Privy Council has declared therefore that the provincial legislatures have power to enact prohibition within the bounds of their respective provinces. That being the case; and if the provinces have power to pass prohibition, it does seem to be perfectly plain that we had no power to pass any such legislation for part of Canada only, under the general power to legislate for the peace, order and good government of Canada, nor have we any such power under any of the enumerated class of subjects which the 91st section of the British North America Act refers to us, and under which we have plenary powers to pass legislation.

Now, with respect to the particular point which my hon. friend (Mr. Flint) has embodied in his resolution, I want to call his attention and the attention of the House to what the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council said with reference to our power to pass partial prohibition. On page 363 of the Liquor Prohibition Appeal case, I find the following:

It is not impossible that the vice of intemperance may prevail in particular localities within a province, to such an extent as to constitute its cure by restricting or prohibiting the sale of liquor, a matter of a merely local or private nature, and therefore falling prima facie within No. 16. In that state of matters, it is conceded that the parliament of Canada could not imperatively enact a prohibitory law adapted and confined to the requirements of localities within the province where prohibition was urgently needed.

Proposition No. 1, is therefore, that in the province of Ontario it does not lie in our power to pass prohibition for any one section of that province. That is a power which belongs exclusively to the province itself, and if you attempted to enact prohibition with regard to one county or one group of counties in the province of Ontario you would be distinctly legislating ultra vires and your legislation would be declared void.

Then as regards the whole province itself, they went on to lay down a similar proposition. They say:

The old Temperance Act of 1864 was passed for Upper Canada, or, in other words, for the province of Ontario; and its provisions, being confined to that province only, could not have been directly enacted by the parliament of Canada. In the present case, the parliament of Canada would have no power to pass a prohibitory law for the province of Ontario; and could, therefore, have no authority to repeal, in express terms, an Act which is limited in its operations to that province.

That is a judgment which comes from the highest judicial tribunal in this country, and if it be correct it would prevent this parliament from adopting the resolution of my hon. friend (Mr. Flint) or adopting legislation based upon it. The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council say: You cannot pass prohibitory legislation with respect to a portion of a province; that is a matter which belongs entirely to the province itself; nor can you pass prohibition with regard to one province alone. Of course, it follows as a consequence that you cannot pass prohibition with regard to two provinces or three provinces. You can only pass prohibition when you are assuming to act under the general power given you in section 91, of legislating for the peace, order and good government of Canada as a whole. When we are asked to adopt legislation by my hon. friend (Mr. Flint):

That this parliament should without delay enact such measures as will secure the prohibition of the liquor traffic for beverage purposes in at least those provinces and territories which have voted in favour of such prohibition, my hon. friend sees he is asking us to adopt legislation in direct opposition to the express law laid down by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in 1895. I am sure the hon. gentleman (Mr. Flint) does not want us to do that. That being so, we are referred back either to the amendment which is proposed by the hon. gentleman from Colchester (Mr. McClure) or the amendment to the amendment moved by the hon. member from Shefford (Mr. Parmalee).

Mr. F. D. MONK (Jacques Cartier). Would the hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies) allow me to ask him a question before he leaves that part of his argument. Do I understand him to say: That the Privy Council held in the liquor prohibition appeal that it would be beyond the powers of this parliament to pass a law prohibiting the sale of liquor in certain portions of the Dominion?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes.

Mr. MONK. For instance, to prohibit the sale of liquor in the Yukon or the North-west Territories or in two or more provinces.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I did not suppose that my hon. friend (Mr. Monk) would have raised a doubt about it. Our powers with respect to the North-west Territories are somewhat different. I will repeat what I have stated. The Privy Council determined that by no one of the twenty-nine sections under which we have exclusive and plenary powers to legislate, could we enact a prohibitory law. The regulation of trade and commerce did not give us the right to pass a prohibitory law. No other specific subject assigned to us gave us that right. It is only under these specific subjects that we have the plenary power to legislate. If we legislate at all on prohibition we must legislate under the section giving us power to legislate for the peace, order and good government of Canada. In that way we are restricted, because we have only power to legislate for the peace, order and good government of Canada in relation to matters not coming within the classes of subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces. Therefore, if we attempted to legislate under that clause and invaded provincial jurisdiction, our legislation would be void. It is laid down by the Privy Council in language which cannot be misunderstood that we have no power to enact a prohibitory law with regard to any particular portion of a province. We have no power, in the words of the Judicial Committee, to pass a prohibitory law for the province of Ontario, and therefore we have no power to pass it for the province of Ontario plus the maritime provinces.

Now, we come to the proposition of my hon. friend from Colchester (Mr. McClure). While he offered his proposal as a thorough, out-and-out prohibitionist under all circumstances, he admitted that he could not expect a man who is not a thorough prohibitionist to vote for it in the face of the plebiscite vote. He admitted that the plebiscite vote did not justify his proposal, but he introduced it, because he was a prohibition man under all circumstances. He did not care whether the plebiscite vote was 33 per cent, or 13 per cent. The hon. gentleman is honest in his convictions, but I do not suppose he expected that a majority of this House would follow him.

We are then brought down to the proposition of the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Parmalee) and that proposition is strictly in consonance with the policy which the government, through the Prime Minister, laid down after the plebiscite vote was taken, and it is one that commends itself to every honest right-thinking man in this House or out of it. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance read some remarks from such experienced, well-tryed temperance men as Rev. Dr. Potts and others, in which they scouted the idea of the plebiscite vote justifying the enactment of a prohibitory measure; and I am quite satisfied that all thinking temperance men are convinced that if an attempt were made to pass a prohibitory measure on that vote, the attempt would be a failure, and would throw back the temperance cause twenty years. I am satisfied myself with the proposition of my hon. friend from East Huron; and if the amendment now before the House is carried, and if, when it becomes the substantive motion, my hon. friend moves to add to it clauses, providing that the Scott Act shall be amended so as to make it more effective, he shall have my hearty support. I will vote in favour of all legislation calculated to promote the cause of temperance, and because I believe my hon. friend's suggestion to be in that direction, I will vote in favour of it.

Mr. A. C. BELL (Pictou). Mr. Speaker, I would not have taken part in this discussion, were it not that I understood the hon. Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding), to make a reference to myself. I would ask him to inform me, if I was the person to whom he made that reference?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I did make an allusion to the hon. gentleman and his colleague, as having had certain questions put to them by a gentleman interested in prohibition.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). I thought I was the person referred to, and I merely wished to be sure. My hon. friend rather misrepresented the position I took. I am entirely in favour of one of his propositions, that is, that this prohibition question should not be made a political question in the sense of the parties using it as a means of obtaining power. My hon. friend, if I am not mistaken, said that the members for Pictou had declined to answer definitely, as to their course on this question, while expressing themselves as perfectly willing to do everything to defeat the present government. If that was what the hon. gentleman said, he certainly misrepresented my statement. I was asked by an elector of my county, a very respectable man, and a personal friend, if I would pledge myself to vote in favour of prohibition, at any and at all times, entirely irrespective of party considerations. That is, to my mind, rather an extraordinary demand to make. A representative in this House has to consider a great many questions; and to ask him to pledge himself absolutely to a fixed line of conduct with reference to a particular public interest, is rather too much; and my reply to the gentleman, who asked that question, was the following telegram:

In my opinion, prohibition can be dealt with only by the government. Until proposed by the government of the day, all action in parliament is subject to suspicion of insincerity and uselessness. The advocates of prohibition outside parliament can best show their sincerity by active opposition to the government which has openly violated the promise made to them.

I suggested to this gentleman outside of parliament what I thought he should do, if he were sincere; but I do not say that I would attack the government for its action; neither will I, nor do I intend to do so. I regret to say, that this matter of prohibition, in fact, the whole temperance question, has been very largely used for the purpose of embarrassing the government of the day. I am inclined to justify that action, in so far as strenuous, earnest temperance men are concerned; but I do not think either party should contribute to that work at all. It is to my mind, perfectly proper and right that earnest, thorough-going advocates of temperance reform, who go the length of prohibition, should use every means in their power to carry their views into effect. They can only do that work through pressure brought to bear on the government of the day. The opposition is powerless. Absolute prohibition of the manufacture and trade in intoxicating liquors in Canada, is a measure of such enormous importance and extent, that it can only be dealt with by a government; and we can see that this government, powerful as it is, is unwilling to touch that question at this moment—is afraid to touch it, and I shall not say improperly afraid, because the interests involved are so immense and far-reaching. But in so far as an effort is being made in the parliament of Canada to use the temperance question as an issue in politics, I think the responsibility for that course rests very much more largely on the government side of the House than on the opposition side. So far as my recollection goes, before I had the honour of a seat here, this question, when introduced into the parliament of Canada, was generally introduced by a supporter of the Liberal party.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. That is not so. It was formerly introduced chiefly by Mr. Jamieson, a member of the Conservative party.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). He was, I suppose, acting as the representative of the Dominion Alliance. But I think I am not wrong in stating that in this parliament, as in the county of Pictou, this question has been more frequently used as a party instrument by the Liberal party than by the Conservative party. Take the experience of this parliament. A plebiscite Bill was introduced by the government. Twice since that plebiscite took place, and twice since the government decided not to take any action on that vote, this question has been revived in this House. In each case, it was revived by supporters of the government and not by supporters of the opposition. There has been no effort on the part of the opposition to introduce this question for the purpose of embarrassing the government or gaining any party advantage whatever. It is not and shall not be a party question. The issue to-day is between the government and the prohibitionist party. If the government have not kept faith with that party, that party has a perfect right to direct its strength to the purpose of defeating the government. If the prohibitionists are in earnest, if they hold strong convictions upon what they consider a great reform, they should exact from the government that it shall keep faith with them, or else use the weight of their influence and vote against the government. But if the prohibition party is satisfied with such excuses as are made by the supporters of the government and do not hold the government to account, that party must lie under the charge of having failed to prove its sincerity. It is not for us to press this issue in the House, and we have not attempted to press it, but it is for the party in favour of prohibition to condemn the government if they do not do what is right.

Mr. BELL (Pictou).

The Minister of Finance argued very ingeniously that the government gave ample notice to the country of its purpose. But, he did not make out a very substantial case. He cited two utterances made, not in the Commons, not by leading members of the administration in this House, but in the Senate. And these were not the only utterances made on behalf of the government. If they were, there might be some force in the contention that these gentlemen in the Senate expressed the views of the government; but we all recollect that when the plebiscite Bill was introduced, both at its first reading, and more particularly at its second reading, efforts were continually made by the opposition to draw an expression of opinion from the First Minister as to whether or not he intended to introduce legislation if the plebiscite showed a majority vote in favour of prohibition. But that question he evaded. He was pressed over and over again, and finally the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) interrogated the First Minister as follows:

For the sake of clearness, we want to know just where we stand. The hon. gentleman has said that whatever the will of the people is, he will carry it out. That is one version. I want to ask him if that means that if there is an affirmative vote for the principle, my hon. friend will straightway, at the next session of parliament, we will say, introduce a Bill to carry out the will of the people.

The Prime Minister replied:

It means nothing of the kind. It means that the government, when they have the will of the people before them, will take such steps as will give effect to the will of the people. There is a question of revenue to be considered;

there is also a question of compensation to be considered. There are different questions which will have to be considered.

That answer is certainly not clear and not satisfactory as a straight and definite reply to a definite question. I do not find any fault with the Prime Minister for making the statement in the way he did. But, when the Minister of Finance rests his case upon two utterances made by members of the government, having their seats, not in the Commons, but in the Senate, and when we have the declaration of the Prime Minister, which I have just read, standing on the records of parliament, made in reply to a question put by the hon. member for York, the Minister of Finance entirely fails to prove that the government gave sufficient notice to the country to make the people understand clearly that it was not the intention of the administration to introduce prohibitory legislation upon a mere majority vote.

After the vote had been taken and the question was brought up in parliament, then the views of the government were fully developed. After the First Minister had decided not to introduce prohibitory legislation, the views of the government were absolutely and clearly developed, and learned for the first time on any competent authority, that what the government considered necessary was a clear majority of the voters on the electoral lists. That is the course the government have decided upon, and it is not the duty of the opposition to interfere with that now. We are not responsible for the government of Canada or for prohibition or for anything else. We are here merely to do our part as a constitutional opposition. We are here to watch the legislation of the government, to oppose it where we think it is injurious, and to modify it when necessary, and improve it as far as we can. But this prohibition issue is one between the government and the prohibition party. So far as I am concerned, I have not the slightest desire to take any step whatever to injure or embarrass the government on this question. It is purely a question between the government and the prohibition party, and to that party the government must account for its policy. There is a great deal more that could be adduced to show that the government did not take the trouble to satisfy the people beforehand as to its views. Take, for instance, the speeches of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher), who took a prominent part, from 1893, when the convention at Ottawa was held, on this question, and we find a great many statements made by him which will not bear the construction that the government required a clear majority of the voters on the lists before it would introduce prohibitory legislation. In the Montreal Witness of February 25, 1897, I find the following :

Notable indeed was the address which the Minister of Agriculture delivered, and unmistakably did he arouse the enthusiasm of the temperance workers. The tone throughout was one of great hopefulness, and when he made the ringing declaration that if the temperance people all over the Dominion rose to the occasion and won the plebiscite, a prohibitory law would follow, and the drink traffic would be killed, the applause was loud and long-continued.

Later on, the Minister of Agriculture said :

Let this be well understood. In previous plebiscite campaigns the issue was local; this was Dominion; it was largely a dealing with theory and principle, it was well understood by temperance people, it was understood by the liquor trade that whatever the result of the plebiscite, legislation would not follow upon the vote.

Now, let this vital difference: if the temperance people won in this campaign a prohibitory law would follow, and the liquor traffic would be killed in this country.

And in the records of the same speech made by the Minister of Agriculture we find the same statements made in different form. There is in that speech nothing to indicate that the government had made up its mind to require more than the constitutional majority at the polls. We know now that that was not so. We know by the statement made by the Premier that the matter had been discussed with his colleagues and a conclusion reached. The point made by the hon. member for York, N.B., was that the government had not made that point clear to the people; that there was an understanding which he described, properly enough. I think, as a secret understanding, that the prohibition party in the government should abandon that work and join hands with the others if they failed to secure a large majority of the people. But I say that to a certain extent, the active temperance people of Canada may consider themselves aggrieved. And this is purely a matter for their own determination. It may be that they were not deceived; it may be that they understood the matter thoroughly, and that they went into the campaign and carried on the fight for prohibition in this plebiscite knowing that what they had to work for was a two-thirds majority. We do not need to determine that; the active temperance workers know, each for himself, whether that was his understanding of the case or not. He knows what he understood the government to be proposing; and if he feels that the government has done him wrong, the question is one not between this party and that but between the government and the temperance people of Canada. The temperance leaders are earnest and intelligent men, and the remedy is in their own hands. To my mind, there is a great deal of strength in the position taken by the government. They say, and who can deny the statement, that legislation designed to bring about social reform, a measure, which, for its enforcement, requires active police interference, could not be carried out unless it had the moral support of a clear majority of the people. In that respect, they enunciate sound views. And they are right when they go further and say that such legislation, if introduced and not carried out, is not only not good, but positively injurious. So far as I am concerned, I think my reply to the Minister of Finance leaves me in a proper position. I say that if the government will introduce prohibitory legislation in this House, it becomes a serious matter and one to be voted on seriously. But when resolutions are introduced in this House by private members, or any succession of them, there is every reason for the temperance men in Canada to fear that an effort is being made to humbug them, to deal with them unfairly. The subject is too great to be dealt with by a private member. As to the declaration that it seems singular that the opposition has not declared its policy, it is not often that an opposition feels it necessary to declare a policy, though sometimes it does. The whole issue in this case depends on what is the popular opinion in Canada. The Prime Minister has spoken of the province of Quebec. I am happy to say that in the county of Pictou the same is true. You may travel in that county, as the Prime Minister says you may in the province of Quebec, without finding an opportunity for the purchase of liquor either by open or secret sale. Temperance principles have extended so that it is a community, to a large extent, of total abstainers. Still, there are a large number of people in favour of prohibition, men who believe that the interest and welfare of Canada largely depends on the carrying of that measure. And, to such people, I think it will be evident that if they wish to carry their views into effect—to secure a prohibition policy for Canada, it will be necessary to succeed in selecting a body of representatives who are in favour of prohibition. The analysis of this question made by the hon. member for Durham (Mr. Craig) was exhaustive. That hon. gentleman said, that, in order to secure prohibition, we must have three things: First, a government in favour of prohibition; second, a parliament in favour of prohibition; and third, a people in favour of prohibition. But first we must have the people in favour of prohibition, and then a legislature in favour of prohibition will be elected, and when that is accomplished, you will soon have a government that will propose prohibitive legislation. And if the people who are in favour of prohibition to-day are anxious to introduce this reform which is a very great change in our system, I believe that they must continue to do that work that they have done so successfully for the last thirty or forty years—they must continue to advocate temperance principles, they must introduce the teaching of it in schools, they must bring up the young to believe in temperance, until finally we may see a majority of constituencies in Canada whose people are in favour of prohibition. When that day comes, you will have a legislature in favour of prohibition and a government will lead them that will uphold prohibition, and then the administration of such a law can be carried on with success. I regret that this should be made a party question. But I am glad to know that, so far as that is concerned, the opposition is more clear from blame than is the government. I think it will be found that the Conservative party has not attempted to utilize this question to defeat their opponents. The issue that will come, as I have said, is between the earnest temperance workers and the government. If the temperance men are dissatisfied with the treatment they have received, they will so express themselves, and it is not necessary that this political party should interfere in the matter. This is too important, too great a question to be dealt with on party grounds; and I hope that, so far as the party I am associated with is concerned, every effort will be made to avoid making a subject of this character, an instrument of political success.

Mr. J. H. BELL (East Prince, P.E.I.) I have already spoken on this question, and I do not intend to traverse the same ground a second time. I merely wish to refer to the constitutional point raised by the leader of the government. The hon. leader of the government has been very severe in his criticism of the motion moved by the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint). He opposed it on two grounds—first, that it was class legislation, and second, that it was unconstitutional. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) followed in the same line. I do not hesitate to say, that, from the standpoint from which these hon. gentlemen have viewed the question, they are perfectly right in their criticism. At the same time I say they have entirely misinterpreted and misunderstood the motion of my hon. friend from Yarmouth. If the proposition of my hon. friend from Yarmouth had declared that wherever the vote in any one province, at the last plebiscite, was largely in favour of prohibition, then this parliament should pass a prohibitory law for that province in accordance with that vote, I would say that such an act on the part of the federal parliament would be unconstitutional. And why? Simply upon the ground that this parliament can only deal with the traffic in intoxicating liquor by a statute whose provisions shall extend uniformly over the whole of Canada—over the province of Quebec as well as all the other provinces. If otherwise the criticism made by the leader of the government of class legislation would also be justified.

I did not have any hand in drafting the resolution of the hon. member for Yarmouth, but I had the honour of seconding it, and therefore I may be in as good a position as any one else to interpret it. Now, what does that resolution mean? Let me illustrate and explain. The Scott Act was passed for the whole of Canada, it was applicable to Quebec, to British Columbia, to Prince Edward Island. That was an Act which gave to the people in a particular city or county a right to vote upon this question, a right to have legislation brought into force and the traffic prohibited within a certain area. Now, that is exactly the principle sought to be applied by my hon. friend from Yarmouth. He proposes to extend the principle of the Scott Act to a province. The Dunkin Act applied to a small municipality, the Scott Act to a county, now the proposition is to extend the area of operation to a province. The proposition is not, as interpreted by the leader of the government, that this parliament shall pass a law for one province alone or for all the provinces excepting Quebec, but the proposition is to pass a law for the whole of Canada, one that may, if the people choose, become operative in Quebec just as in the other provinces. Just as the Scott Act is operative over the whole of Canada, so my hon. friend from Yarmouth proposes a law which shall be operative over the whole of Canada. That is not class or sectional legislation, nor is it unconstitutional—it is the very reverse. The proposition is that a province shall stand as a unit in the same position as a county, that a number of voters in a province, say one-fourth shall first sign a requisition, then the government will call an election, and a prohibitory law would come into force if a majority of the people voted in its favour. You can see, Mr. Speaker, that is an entirely different proposition from the one that was in the mind of the leader of the government and in the mind of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. In my opinion the proposition of my hon. friend from Yarmouth is a practical and reasonable step in advance—a step which if taken will bring us measurably nearer to the total prohibition of the liquor traffic throughout the Dominion of Canada. It is a proposition which I think all practical temperance reformers should have no hesitation in supporting.

Now let us look at the suggestion of the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald), a proposition to which two members of the government have already given their adhesion. What is that proposition? Why, Sir, if you examine it you will find that with slight variations, it is a proposition identical with that of my hon. friend from Yarmouth. There are two elements in the proposition. The first is to extend the principle of the Scott Act, to give it wider scope. That is the same proposition as the one put forth by my hon. friend from Yarmouth, only it is wider and goes further. It may include two or three or more counties within one area, it may include two or three or more provinces within one area.

At any rate, it is a proposition farther reaching than that of my hon. friend from Yarmouth. So the proposition to which the government have virtually declared their adhesion is substantially that which has been enunciated by my hon. friend from Yarmouth. Now, there is another element in the proposition of my hon. friend for Huron. He says that not only shall the scope and area of the Scott Act be extended, but that its provisions shall be made more stringent and efficient. That is exactly what my hon. friend for Yarmouth and myself have all along contended for, namely, that the provisions of the Scott Act, under the new condition of things should be made more stringent and efficient than they have been. It is because these two propositions of the member for Yarmouth and the member for Huron are in substantial accord that I am in favour of the proposition of the member for Huron and am prepared to vote for it. If the proposition of the member for Shefford (Mr. Parmalee) stood alone without any undertaking on the part of the government as to future legislation, I say distinctly that I should vote against it, because it would indicate that the government did not intend to take any action, that it simply intended to justify its past conduct and leave temperance legislation coldly alone. Since, therefore, the government, through the right hon. gentleman and through the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, have indicated that they are prepared to go the length of accepting the proposition of the hon. member for Huron, then I am prepared to extend my support to the government under these conditions.

Mr. H. J. LOGAN (Cumberland). I intend to make but one remark to the House on this occasion. During the plebiscite campaign I was called upon by my constituents to give a pledge as to what I would do in parliament on this question, and I gave a pledge to vote in favour of national prohibition. I propose to-night to vote for the amendment moved by my hon. friend from Colchester (Mr. McClure) in favour of such national prohibition, and thus carry out the pledge which I gave to my constituents. At this late hour I do not think I can add anything to what has been said, and will simply content myself with giving this reason for the vote I intend to cast.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). Before the question is put, I may say just a word or two. My position on this question has already been so clearly stated before the House and the country, that I need not waste any time this evening in restating it. There are one or two things which have arisen in this debate upon which I would like to say a word or two, and I shall be very short. In the first place, I must congratulate the House upon the tone of this debate. It has, I think, shown a clearer conception and given a more concise expression of the views of those who represent the people of the country at large, upon this question of prohibition, than we have had in any debate heretofore upon the subject. The chief point in the discussion raised by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, seems to be that the government have been derelict in their duty in not following the plebiscite by the introduction of prohibitory legislation. They take this ground, because they say that the government and the Liberal party pledged themselves to such a course. I take issue directly upon this. The pledges of the Liberal party have been clearly defined by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding). I will not go into that subject further than to say that in the first place, there was certainly no secret understanding of any kind whatever amongst the members of the Liberal party in regard to their position on the plebiscite vote, and it was put as clearly as we could before the public, that the result of that vote would be a guide to us in any step that might be taken in regard to prohibition. The result of the plebiscite vote was such that the government believed that they were not called upon to introduce prohibitory legislation. That is the position of the government and of the party. I fail yet to find what is the position of anybody else contrary to this position. My hon. friend from Prince Edward Island has challenged the hon. member for York, N.B., as to his view. He has not given it here to-night. No hon. gentleman on the floor of this House here, today, or on any other occasion since the plebiscite vote was taken, has undertaken to say that the result of the vote would justify the introduction of prohibitory legislation. No person in a responsible position in the country has said so. If you examine the resolutions of the Dominion Alliance, you will find that while they demand prohibition, they have not taken the ground that the plebiscite would be a justification for that demand. On the contrary, not only such leading representative men as have been quoted here to-night, but leading officers of the Dominion Alliance have acknowledged publicly and privately that they do not base their demand for prohibition on the plebiscite vote. What is the resolution of the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Parmalee)? It is clearly and distinctly a review of the results of the plebiscite vote and it states that these results show that there is not an active prohibition sentiment in the country sufficiently pronounced to justify the expectation that a prohibition law could be successfully enforced; therefore, in the opinion of this House, such a prohibitory law should not be introduced. So far, in this debate upon these various resolutions, nobody has undertaken to deny that fact. Nobody has stated that these results do show that there is an active sentiment in the country, sufficiently pronounced to justify the expectation that a prohibitory law could be enforced. How is it that anybody in this House can venture to vote against this resolution which is a statement of the condition of affairs, and a conclusion drawn from that condition of affairs which nobody in this House has attempted to question or deny? Under these circumstances I would have hoped that this resolution would have been accepted unanimously by the House. But, certain hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House have indicated that they are not going to vote for this resolution. I take it that their views and opinions can be voiced by the utterances of those hon. gentlemen who have spoken on the other side of the House. The hon. junior member for Pictou (Mr. Bell), has just spoken, and he has alluded to a question which was put to him in his own county, a question which was answered by himself and by his colleague in the representation of that county (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper). This is the question that was put to the hon. gentleman:

If elected to next parliament will you pledge yourself to vote for and advocate prohibition in every way practicable, irrespective of party considerations.

The hon. senior member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) replied as follows:

I will oppose the only government that has violated a promise to abide by the result of a prohibition plebiscite. I respectfully decline to consider the matter of further pledges until prohibitionists at next election resent the deception practiced upon them by the present administration.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Hon. members opposite endorse that.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I am glad to find them on record in that way. I am glad to find that they are treating this question not irrespective of party considerations, but solely to make by it, an attack on the present government, making of the prohibition question a catspaw and football to further their own party ends. The hon. junior member for Pictou (Mr. Bell) in reply to the question, said:

Prohibition can be dealt with only by the government. Until protected by the government all action in parliament is subject to suspension. The advocates of prohibition outside of parliament can best show their sincerity by active opposition to a government which has openly violated a promise made to them.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Again hon. gentlemen opposite endorse these sentiments. We have here expressed the programme and the platform of the Conservative party in this House, and I believe of the Conservative party in the country.

We have had these declarations and we have also had the declaration of the hon. gentleman who is now acting leader of the opposition in this House (Mr. Foster). Some few months ago that hon. gentleman attended a political meeting in Richmond. I have not, at the moment, the quotation from the report of the hon. gentleman's speech, but I remember very well the circumstances of it. He was asked by a gentleman in the audience: What is your position, Mr. Foster, on the temperance question? His reply was in this sense—I have not the exact words, but the reply was in this sense: When the temperance people have shown their sincerity, by punishing the present government, I will tell them what I will do.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Hon. gentlemen say 'hear, hear.' I am glad to have this declaration on record, and I am glad to see what is their view and their object in dealing with this whole prohibition question. I am glad to find that they are not in sympathy with the views of the hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Craig), but that they are prepared to make a football of this question, to treat it as a matter of party politics, and that they are prepared to make it a means of serving their own ends in the political fight. What does this mean? It means that they have no platform on this question, and that they are not prepared to do anything. Does it mean that? No, not quite, because we have one declaration made here to-night upon this question, not from the leader of the party, not from his first lieutenant who, to-night, is acting as leader of the party, but from his other lieutenant, who sits on his right in this House, who represents the Conservative party in the great province of Ontario, and is the leader of the Conservative party in the province of Ontario, I allude to the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace). What is the declaration of that hon. gentleman? He says that he is prepared to move in amendment to the amendment, that a fair and reasonable compensation be made to the hotel-owners and the hotel-keepers and other interests that are financially affected by prohibition. In other words, the hon. gentleman is committed to the principle of compensation.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Some hon. members say 'hear, hear.' I find that there are other hon. members on that side of the House who are committed to compensation in this country, and who are ready to commit their party to it. I am not going to enter into a discussion of the question, because, as was said, by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, some years ago, I discussed that question in full, I made a declaration upon it, I stand on record, and to-day I abide by that declaration. We have this extraordinary condition of affairs now, that the only leader of the Conservative party in the House who has made a declaration upon this question and who has done anything else except shrink behind an attack upon the present government, has declared that he is in favour of compensation to all who are financially affected by prohibition. This seems to me to be a very clear indication of the position as between the two parties. I will not go into other details of the matter. I am satisfied that the question to-day is just in this position. The temperance people of the country were given an opportunity of declaring at the polls their position upon this question. The temperance people of the country to the extent of 22½ per cent of the whole number of names upon the lists went to the polls and declared themselves in favour of prohibition. My hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster) has undertaken to say that this was not a true or full expression of the temperance vote. He referred to former plebiscites, and he undertook to show that in the plebiscite of 1898 the temperance people did not go to the polls as they did in former plebiscites, because they were disgusted with the idea of a plebiscite. I find that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) is very incorrect in that. I find that in Nova Scotia, just about the same number of people voted in 1898 as in 1894. In Ontario a much less proportion did vote, but we must remember that in the Ontario plebiscite of 1894 some 12,000 women voted, whereas, in 1898, the women were not on the voters' lists for that plebiscite. In Prince Edward Island there were actually more voted in favour of prohibition in 1898 than in 1895; and in Manitoba, there were nearly as many voted in 1898 as there did in 1892. Therefore, that comparison does not bear out the argument which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) made. Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) undertake to say that the temperance people, given this opportunity of voting, given this opportunity of declaring themselves at the polls, were either so indifferent or so lukewarm that they did not think it worth their while to declare their principles at the polls. I do not believe that that was the case. I am satisfied, in my own mind, that the honest and sincere temperance people; the people who were ready to make some sacrifice for the cause they were advocating, and the people who have their hearts sufficiently in this question to be willing to aid in the passage of the law, and who would probably be willing afterwards to aid in the enforcement of the law, went to the polls and declared themselves. When I find that the number of those who were willing to do this, and did do this, was only 22½ per cent of the whole vote—or, as I prefer to put it, and as I think is a fair way—about one-third of the whole vote which is usually polled. When I find, again, that about one-third of that vote which is usually polled went to the polls and declared themselves distinctly against prohibition, and when I find again that one-third of the vote which is usually polled were either so indifferent or were so doubtful as to the expediency of prohibition, that they deliberately declined to go to the polls and declare themselves at all, I say, as I said last year, that it was clearly shown that there was not, and that there is not in Canada to-day, a sufficient force of public opinion, a sufficient force of temperance sentiment and of temperance electorate behind the prohibition movement to justify the introduction or the passage of a prohibitory law. That is the policy which this government assumed; that is the position which this government has taken, and I feel, as a public man entrusted with certain interests of the public, that it is the only position which I could occupy. It is the only position which I could assume, and I am, therefore, perfectly satisfied, and I have it more thoroughly enforced upon me since I spoke in this sense before, that in taking this position we have at the back of us the great mass of the temperance people of this country who appreciate and understand that the position which we have taken is in the best interests of the country and is in the best interests of temperance and prohibition as well. I am, therefore, satisfied that the present attack on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite on this matter will fail of its object, and that the inspiring cause of that attack will be seen through and appreciated at its proper value by the electors of Canada, and that this government will be sustained upon this question, as it is certainly going to be sustained upon the other questions which are before the people of this country.

Mr. A. C. MACDONALD (King's, P.E.I.) Before the vote is taken, I want to say that I shall express the views of my constituents in opposing the amendment of the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Parmalee) and voting in favour of the amendment of the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. McClure), which goes straight for prohibition. I may say that, so far as I know of members on this side of the House, I do not believe that hardly one member here knows what the other member's opinion is about the matter. Every man is free on this side of the House to do what he thinks proper, and that is the position I am going to take. I hardly think that as much can be said with regard to the untrammelled action of the government supporters on this question.

Mr. A. McNEILL (North Bruce). I did not intend to say anything on this question, but in view of all that has been said in the debate, I do not think that I should give a silent vote upon it. I believe that my hon. friend from Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron) was about right when he said that both sides of the House were blamable, inasmuch as they were making political capital out of this matter. I remember very well that when the Liberals were on this side of the House, they did all they could to make political capital out of it as against the Conservative government. I remember especially the line taken by the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Mills), and I recollect very well how, more than once, he, in a way that seemed to be altogether improper, dragged in the party aspect of the question. I do not want to dwell upon that view of the question, but I wish to say that I feel some diffidence as to my course in reference to this question. I have been one of the strongest advocates for the plebiscite. I believe in that in legislation of this kind it is not possible for us to proceed wisely or safely, without obtaining some knowledge of the views of the people upon it. We have accepted the principle, both in the Dunkin Act and the Scott Act, that before such legislation should go into effect the people should be consulted. And if it was right to take the vote of the people before the enforcement of legislation of that character which is not nearly so far-reaching as total prohibition, how much more necessary was it to take a plebiscite with regard to the latter question. I have always advocated that course before my friends in my constituency, and that is why I desire to say a word at the present time. I have stated very openly to my friends that if a plebiscite were taken, and if the people pronounced themselves distinctly in favour of prohibition, I would be prepared to do all in my power to aid in carrying out the wishes of the people in that regard. Although I am not myself a believer in prohibition, still I think it is a question that the people should decide for themselves. I am now face to face with the fact that a plebiscite has been had, that the vote has been taken, and what am I to do? I ask myself this question: If, when I made that statement to my constituents I had been asked by any one: Will you support prohibitory legislation if the vote recorded in favour of prohibition be not more than 23 per cent of the total voters of the country?

I would distinctly have stated that I would not support such legislation; and I can do nothing else now. I venture to say that my hon. friend from Yarmouth, earnest prohibitionist though he is—and I am sure that he is perfectly sincere in his advocacy of prohibition—if he had been asked that question in the House before the plebiscite was taken, would not have ventured to say that on a 23 per cent vote of the electorate, the government of the country should have enacted prohibitory legislation. I do not think there is any prohibitionist in the House, unless he is more extreme than any one I have knowledge of, who would at that time, have taken that position. That being the case, I find myself obliged to vote for the amendment to the amendment. I would have preferred to see that amendment in a slightly different form. I would rather it had read: 'that these results do not show that there is an active prohibition sentiment sufficiently pronounced, in place of saying, 'that these results show that there is not an active prohibition sentiment.' But that is not a sufficiently grave variance from words which I think ought to be employed to justify me in opposing the resolution. I feel so strongly the position I have taken in reference to the plebiscite and the statements I have made in regard to it that I confess I had a feeling that I should have liked to support something in the nature of the proposal of my hon. friend from Yarmouth; but I would be precluded from doing so by the words of the resolution itself, even supposing the statement made by my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and the other statement made by the right hon. leader of the government had not been made, because the words of the resolution conflict altogether with my view, that the results do not show that there is an active prohibition sentiment sufficiently pronounced to justify the expectation that a prohibition law would be effectively enforced, whereas his resolution says that the results, as well as satisfactory evidence from other sources, show that such a measure would be thoroughly supported by the people of Canada. These are tremendously wide words, wide enough to include the province of Quebec. The hon. gentleman has no right to say that the people of the province of Quebec shall be excluded from the people of Canada, and no one can say that the people of Quebec would thoroughly support a prohibition law. Even on that ground I could not support the resolution of my hon. friend; but the argument presented to the House by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, to my mind at least, settles the question, that the Privy Council has laid down in the most express terms that this parliament cannot enact such legislation as the hon. member for Yarmouth suggests—that it would be ultra vires of this parliament. Therefore, under the circumstances, I shall support the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. FIRMAN McCLURE (Colchester). Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to say a word more on this question; but as an amendment has been moved to my amendment, I wish to say a word of explanation. I shall vote against the amendment to the amendment for perhaps different reasons from those which animate some other members of this House. I find that that amendment contains these words:

That these results show that there is not an active prohibition sentiment sufficiently pronounced to justify the expectation that a prohibition law could be successfully enforced.

I agree largely with the views expressed upon that point this afternoon by the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) when he said that the plebiscite vote did not thoroughly express the prohibition sentiment of this country. I do not know that I go with him as to the reasons for his opinion; but I certainly do feel, and my experience in that campaign confirmed me in that position, that that vote did not properly express and represent the temperance sentiment of this country. Therefore the prohibitionists today are free to advocate the measure upon its merits and the plebiscite is no answer to their claim upon this parliament for a prohibitory liquor law. I dissent entirely from the proposition of the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Bell) that this is a quarrel between the temperance people and the present government. This government is not and never was a prohibition government. I took a part in the plebiscite campaign in many counties in my own province, and I do not know how other prohibitionists may have viewed the question, but at all the meetings which I attended and where I spoke, the position I took was that this government was not a prohibition government; that I knew of no government and no party in Canada which was a prohibition government or party; but that if the people voted strongly enough in favour of prohibition, they could mighty soon make a prohibition government out of it. I do not believe the recorded vote was sufficiently strong to warrant this government in passing a prohibitory liquor law, if there was no other sentiment in the country than what was represented by that vote. If, therefore, this government rely wholly upon the results of the plebiscite vote, if they are prepared to take the position that that vote directly represents the prohibition sentiment of this country, then they are right in their conclusion, and there is no breach of any promise or pledge ever given by them. But if I am right, and if the hon. member for York is right, that that vote does not properly represent the prohibition sentiment of this country, then the question is still an open one. It is not a question between this government and the temperance people, nor between the opposition party and the temperance people. It is a question that has not become a party issue at all; and I regret that so much of the time of this House should be taken up in discussing the position of the different parties upon the question. Perhaps, I have sinned in that respect myself. I humbly apologize if I have. It is to be regretted that this question should be made a party issue at all, because neither party has any policy on the question, and the prohibitionists of this country are back where they were before the plebiscite was taken. They are face to face with the bald issue: is prohibition desirable in this country or not? If it is, then they can get it by electing prohibitionists to this parliament who are prohibitionists in principle, and not party prohibitionists. That they have not done yet, and until they do that, all they can do, and all that I can do, is to advocate the principle, and I move the adoption of the principle here. I stand by that principle; I believe in it. Despite all that is said to the contrary, I believe that the enacting of a prohibitory liquor law to-day would be a great benefit to this country. In that opinion I do not stand alone, nor is it the ignorant or the uncultured portion of the community who have awakened to the conviction that, in spite of the vast interests, in spite of the moneyed interests against it, in spite of the thousand and one considerations that enter into it, the enactment of a prohibitory liquor law, while it would not bring about a millenium, while it would not completely destroy the drinking habit, would be infinitely above and beyond the paltry compromises we have made with this thing which we declare to be an evil which we license by our laws, and which we allow to break through the law in every way it can. I believe that the dealing of the government and of both sides of this House with the liquor question is a cowardly dealing. It is the conduct of people who are not prepared to take a manly stand. I believe it is cowardly to go on passing year after year legislation we do not believe in and then do not enforce. The only way to settle the question is to force the issue. Either the liquor traffic is a thing that should be protected or prohibited by law. To-day it is neither. I accept no compromise on this question. I believe in absolute prohibition. I want to see the question decided by a majority, and therefore move this resolution and refuse to accept any amendment, because I do not consider that the plebiscite was any fair expression of the temperance sentiment of the country.

Mr. W. C. EDWARDS (Russell). The very statement of the hon. gentleman who has just addressed the House, Mr. Speaker, is proof that this country is not prepared for prohibition. He makes the statement that if the country is in favour of prohibition it will send members here who are prohibitionists. That the country has not done so up to the present is the best evidence that it is not in favour of any such policy. In so far as I am concerned, I may say at once that I am a teetotaler and have been all my life and always expect to be. I believe that prohibition would be the most valuable thing to Canada, if it could be carried out, that Canada could possibly have. I believe that, at a low estimate, it would be worth at least $100,000,000 annually to the people, and I am not one of those who believe that the revenue of the country would be impaired at all. On the contrary, it would be largely enhanced because the purchasing power of the people would be so very much greater than it is to-day. I am always prepared to vote for temperance. I am in favour of temperance, and free trader that I am, while prohibition is an attack upon that principle, the case is one in which perhaps that principle should be violated for the general good of the people. True it is an attack on the right of the individual to eat or drink what he pleases, and that sort of legislation is obnoxious to me on principle. But when I consider the evil that is done to innocent men in Canada by the drinking habit, when I consider the fact that our penitentiaries and jails are filled by convicts who owe their degradation to the liquor habit, when I consider the fact that this curse of liquor has imposed upon the people of Canada the burden of maintaining all these institutions, which largely owe their existence to the liquor habit, and when I consider, further, the fact that our asylums are largely filled by the victims of this same habit, then I must conclude that the principle so dear to me of free trade should be abandoned when dealing with this evil. But it is a moral question which requires a moral reform, and it would be most detrimental, in the interests of the prohibitionists themselves, to the cause they so ardently advocate, to pass a prohibitory law until the people of Canada are prepared to put it into effect. It is my firm conviction that the men who are advocating prohibition in Canada to-day are killing the very thing they desire to carry out. In so far as this question is concerned, there is a great deal of education yet to be given the people, and if those who are devoting themselves to this question, would confine their efforts to the advocacy of the cause of temperance, to educating the people to temperate habits, and prepare them for a prohibitory measure, they would do a great deal more good than they can possibly accomplish by the course they are now taking. The Dominion Alliance, it is my firm conviction, has done more to retard prohibition in Canada than to advance it. The matter of compensation I take no stock in whatever, but if I believed that Canada was prepared for prohibition, there is no man in Canada who would more heartily support prohibition than I would. I am a strong believer in prohibition, but I do not believe in passing a prohibitory Act until we have a far greater assurance than we have now that the people are prepared to put it into effect. This is a large country. We have various provinces, peopled by different nationalities holding different views, and we also border on a large country for a very great distance; and if we were to enact a prohibitory law, we would open wide the door to smuggling and other kindred abuses. Therefore, until we have the people educated up to the point of being strong supporters of such a measure, it would not be in the interests of the people to pass it. But there is no doubt, as the last speaker has said, that when the sentiment of Canada is prepared for such a measure, the electorate will return to this House members who will see that it is enacted and enforced. Let us have an election to-day or next year or the year after, and I think it is safe to say that the people will not return a majority of members to this House in favour of prohibition. It would therefore be perfectly idle and childish and foolish to enact any such measure until the people are prepared to have it enforced.

Mr. C. E. KAULBACH (Lunenburg). The subject of temperance has been so fully and ably discussed from the pulpit, at temperance gatherings, in social circles, in the press, and in such a variety of ways, that I feel it would ill become me to engage in a dissertation upon this subject now, when discussing the merits or demerits of the resolution, or motion submitted by the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint), or any amendment thereto. Suffice it to say that the deleterious effect of the use of alcoholic drinks—except as a medicine—no matter how used, whether in moderation or otherwise, has its devastating results, and will earlier or later cast its dreary shadows, and leave its sadening footprints on the sands of time, with bitter remorse and disquietude, to him or her who engaged in the first use of it, and continues the same as a part of their nature. I would not speak so feelingly on this subject, nor yet so certainly of the ill effects of alcoholic drinks as a beverage, had I not seen the deplorable condition it had brought persons to in every position of life, from the youth in his teens, who had fallen a victim, as well as the hoary haired of four score and upwards, to say nothing of the many families it has rendered homeless, and reduced to penury and abject want. But does it stop even here? No, in many cases it ends in crimes of the most heinous kind, and ultimately lands the party in a premature and untimely grave. The germ of all this evil is in social drinking, so common to many, which means the impairment of mind and body, whereby brilliant prospects have been, and still are daily blighted, and hopes blasted, all brought about from the want of a sober inquiry, as to what is the ultimate effect? Where is it going to land us? and what can be done to correct the evil and the use and abuse of the article? One thing is very certain that the evil can not be remedied by permitting Quebec, as is proposed, to remain outside of the operation of any prohibitory Act, and have her, geographically placed as she is, in the centre of this fair Dominion to be a rum shop for the supply of the objectionable article to the rest of Canada.

I say the proposition is unfair in principle, unconstitutional, and should not be entertained for a single moment. I am bold to state that the resolution submitted by my hon. friend, the member for Yarmouth, has in my opinion, but one object in view, and that is to side-track—so to speak, the national prohibition vote, and thereby let down the government, as its supporters consider in an honourable manner. But I am inclined to believe, they have made a leap in the dark, which will land them in disfavour with the temperance party, who are unwilling to accept this as an apology for the government's unfulfilled pledges, and broken promises to carry prohibition into effect if a majority at the polls pronounced in its favour.

I consider the worst kind of deception was practiced by the government, as they not only pledged the temperance party previous to the late election to carry out their wishes, if they received their support and were placed in power, but they extracted from the pockets of the people a sum in round numbers of about $200,000 to pay the expenses of the plebiscite vote, which had they explained and not deceived the people could have been saved, and appropriated to a better purpose. It is very truthfully said: 'The tree is known by its fruit,' and hon. gentlemen opposite, when the next appeal is made to the people at the polls, will have to be judged by their acts, and not by their promises or professions.

We should be as sensitive to crooked ways in politics, as in our every day private life, and should carefully see that honest principles should dominate the conduct of public men and their acts, and should unhesitatingly say alike to the canting hypocrite and the unscrupulous intriguer as politicians—'we have no place for you.'

The government certainly have treated the temperance people of this country in a most disgraceful manner. After hon. gentlemen opposite making prohibition one of the planks of their platform, and having promised that should they carry prohibition, they would advance legislation, I say to be true to their professions and promises, they were in duty bound to carry it out. But we find they are politicians first, and prohibitionists afterwards. No person objects to a prohibitionist being a politician, but I do object, and I am sure the country will object to having the leader of the government profess one thing, whereby to ride into power, and after reaching the goal of his ambition, to repudiate his pledges, and refuse to carry out the wishes of the people.

The temperance party would certainly expect better treatment at the leader of the government's hands, than to be fooled in this way. But the temperance party console themselves that they did not stand alone in this connection, as other pledges were broken by them, and other people disappointed, in fact this disappointment is widespread from ocean to ocean. They promised to remove every vestige of protection, instead of which on some articles they increased the tariff, and surrendered to the enemy, horse, foot and artillery.

They promised retrenchment, instead of which they have greatly exceeded the late government by leaps and bounds in increased expenditure.

They promised free trade, instead of which protection and taxes are greater now on some of the commodities used by the poor man than under the late government.

They promised civil service reform, instead of which they increased in some cases the salaries of civil servants, and the number of cabinet ministers, without any reform.

They promised purity at elections, as an answer as to whether their promises were carried out in this respect, all I need do is to remind them of the service the 'machine' did for them in the counties of West Elgin, West Huron, Brockville and others, in the stuffing of the ballot boxes. But I need not go away from my own home to discover chicanery, deception, trickery, and fraud, as it was found in my own county (Lunenburg) in the last local election, when a cabinet minister was defeated by seventeen, but on a recount and by a manipulation of ballots—the ballot boxes having been in the hands of the sheriff—the ballots were by some person so changed, as to give the cabinet minister the seat. This matter of deliberate robbery of the people's just rights I brought before the government three years ago, and several times since, and gave them an amusing episode on the subject, but no recognition was taken of it. Dearly would I like retributory justice to have its course in this case, but I suppose I must patiently await the time for that to come about.

The hon. Minister of Agriculture, it will be remembered, was the champion of the temperance cause, and the party who introduced the resolution for the plebiscite vote, observed this deception practiced in his own province of Quebec when the vote was taken on September 27, 1898. Take, for instance, the county of Megantic, in poll No. 5, we find seventy-seven votes on the list, and every vote polled, a most unusual occurrence. The same presented itself in several of the other counties, all having voted whose names appeared on the list, save, perhaps, one or two. But the most startling revelation presents itself in the district of Quebec Centre—vide page 201 of report of prohibition plebiscite—where it is found there were in poll No. 25, 101 voters on the list, and 105 actually voted, four more than were on the list. Take Quebec West, No. 1 poll, where there were 115 voters on the list, and 116 actually voted. Take Beauharnois, poll No. 17, where there were 118 voters on the list, and 119 actually voted. Now, with deception in practice such as I have just detailed, how was it possible to get an honest verdict, and, forsooth, this is the province hon. gentlemen opposite propose to have stand exempt from the operation of any prohibitory enactment, or, in other words, they propose to make it an exception, and become the rum shop for the rest of the other provinces of the Dominion, for the manufacture and sale of intoxicating drinks.

I have little hope that this movement on the part of my hon. friends opposite will meet with favour in the country, or with the advocates of the temperance cause, for the reason that I believe it will prove to be unworkable as well as unconstitutional, and I feel the government have a right to satisfy themselves on the subject, and give their opinion to this House, instead of showing their unwillingness to assume the responsibility themselves, preferring rather to have a supporter of theirs, a private member, take the risk and leave them—the government—open to act as they please.

We had a temperance plebiscite vote, it will be remembered, some few years ago, in the province of Nova Scotia, on the eve of an election, brought about under similar auspices, and with similar results, which was a dodge or an incentive to carry the Liberal party into power, and it worked in their interest and did carry them there, but nothing more was heard of prohibition from them after they got there, and I believe this is intended for the same purpose now, as we are told we are on the eve of a general election and the government want the temperance vote. If the government were sincere in the professions of temperance two years ago, the first step they made in the wrong direction, and for which they are held responsible, was not in sending troops into the Yukon district to preserve law and order, but in the granting of permits for the transport of liquor into that country, and the actual granting of saloon licenses for the sale of the article on its reaching the Yukon district, and pocketing the fee. A means, first, to craze the temperament and minds of the settlers, and thus create strife, as well as crime, and then, as a mockery, to have a paid force sent there under arms to quell disturbances that, peradventure, might arise. The Minister of the Interior, like the Minister of Agriculture, poses as an apostle of temperance, and as the chief of his department, is supposed to show his principles by his acts. Let us view his own report, and see as to how far evidence from this source will bear him out in support of his temperance proclivities. We find that permits for liquor were issued within a year for over 120,000 gallons, as verified by the following :

Whisky for the Yukon.

Permits Issued Within the Year for Over 120,000 Gallons.

Since July 1, 1899, liquor permits for the Yukon district have been granted by the Department of the Interior at Ottawa to the amount of 2,027 gallons and one barrel. During the same period, nine permits were issued by Commissioner Ogilvie under subsequent authority from the Minister of the Interior for a quantity of 46,950, a total of over 49,000 gallons, besides permits for 72,600 gallons issued by Mr. Ogilvie.

Had liquor been kept out of that country, I am possessed of the opinion that no armed force would have been needed, and the money so expended could have been applied to a better purpose.

Now, Mr. Speaker, to come back to the plebiscite vote. It is contended we have no right to coerce the province of Quebec, which is an absurdity, as in reality it is really attempting to coerce us, since the last general election by assuming the control of affairs in this Dominion. On any question where parties are called upon to vote, and where some decline to take any action, or to exercise that privilege, it has always been held that they consent to the decision of the voting majority.

We have 213 members constituting this House of Commons, and 81 members in the other Chamber—the Senate—but, by a rule, or the rules of parliament, twenty form a quorum in this Chamber, and fifteen in the other Chamber, but a majority in either House can conduct, vote and control business. Is not this, I would ask, a ruling precedent sufficient for hon. gentlemen opposite to follow?

Does not this rule, or principle, hold good in all elections, whether they be organized societies, civil, provincial, or federal? The rule or principle is precisely the same, and certainly should be upheld with regard to the temperance plebiscite.

In conclusion, I desire to say that I support the amendment as submitted by the hon. member for Colchester.

House divided on amendment to the amendment (Mr. Parmalee).

Mr. FLINT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call attention to the fact that the hon. member for Halifax (Mr Russell), has not voted.

Mr. RUSSELL. I am paired with the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden). If I had not been, I would have been bound by my pledge, to vote against this amendment.

Amendment to the amendment (Mr. Parmalee) agreed to.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question is now on the original motion as amended.

Mr. J. M. DOUGLAS (East Assinibola). Mr. Speaker, seeing that the rules of the House preclude my hon. friend from East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) moving this addition to that which is now the main motion, I beg to move, seconded by the hon. member for North Essex (Mr. McGregor) that the following clause be added to the main motion :

But inasmuch as it is desirable that legislation be enacted having in view the further restriction of the liquor traffic, it is therefore expedient, in the opinion of this House, that the Canada Temperance Act be enlarged in its scope and that the provisions for its administration be perfected.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Mr. FOSTER. What is exactly the purport of the motion that you have just put, Mr. Speaker ?

The PRIME MINISTER. The motion which has been affirmed by the House, is that, for the amendment of the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. McClure), the amendment of the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Parmalee), is substituted, which affirms that the vote on the plebiscite does not warrant the enactment of a prohibitory law. Now, it is proposed to add this amendment which has been handed to Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER. The motion is on the amendment of the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Parmalee), and on the question of the substitution of it for the original motion of the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint).

The PRIME MINISTER. The question before the House is on the amendment which has been proposed by the hon. member for Eastern Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas) in amendment to the amendment of the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Parmalee), which has just been carried by the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question is on the main motion, as amended, and this amendment proposed to be added thereto by the hon. member for Eastern Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas).

Mr. FOSTER. We should have an explanation from the hon. gentleman (Mr. Douglas), as to what he means by the word 'enlargement.' In what way is it to be enlarged ?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. Speaker, I did not offer any remarks in connection with the motion, for the simple reason that I thought the Canada Temperance Act was so well understood having been so long before the public, that it was scarcely desirable to enter into any explanation. Many of us know something of its defects, and we believe that it requires some changes made in it, so as to make it effective.

Some hon. MEMBERS. What is the enlargement ?

Mr. FOSTER. If we are not going to simply play, we want to understand for what we are voting, and we want to know as well, if the House adopts this amendment to the motion, what is meant by it ? We have already been discussing to-night a series of actions in the last three or four years, many of them undertaken without full understanding, or with a misunderstanding on the part of the people, as to what they meant, and we were asked to vote on generalities. The Canada Temperance Act is an Act which can be under certain conditions adopted by any county or city, and if it is adopted by a county or city under those conditions, it absolutely prohibits the sale of intoxicating liquors. It does not, however, affect the manufacture. Now, this motion is that there should be an enlargement of the scope of the Act. What does it mean ? Are we to vote on this without knowing anything at all as to what the mover means or what the right hon. leader of the government means, because if this means anything, it means responsibility, and it means that hon. gentlemen are to introduce a Bill to carry out what this House shall affirm, if this House carries this amendment. We would like to know what we are voting upon, and in what particulars the Scott Act is to be enlarged in its scope. Is it to take in a province ? What is it to do ? Surely we will not be asked to vote upon this amendment without any explanation. It is most indefinite.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). As I foreshadowed this amendment in the few remarks I made this afternoon, I may say a word in explanation of it. This afternoon, when I made a few remarks, I said that I intended to bring in an amendment at this juncture. What I mean by enlarging the Scott Act is this: At present it is confined to a single county, and by the enlargement of its provisions it might embrace two counties or five counties or any number of counties just as the temperance people thought they could control. In the province of Prince Edward Island all the counties could be united, and so far as that would take place it would be provincial prohibition there. That is what I mean by enlarging the scope of the Scott Act. Now as regards perfecting the Scott Act ; every one knows that the machinery for carrying it out has always been defective. The prohibitory provisions of the law are very nice to read, but there was no machinery to carry them out, and you will remember that if Sir Oliver Mowat had not used the machinery of the License Act to enforce the Scott Act, it would have been a total failure. The enlargement which I mean by the resolution is, that groups of counties of any number may be brought under the action of the Canadian Temperance Act, and as to the means of carrying it out, I propose that the machinery for that purpose shall be perfected and made better than it has been.

Mr. R. R. McLENNAN (Glengarry). I may say that the county of Glengarry is differently situated from the other counties in Ontario, inasmuch as it borders on the province of Quebec, and if Quebec is allowed to continue the sale of intoxicating liquors, we will have all the evils of illicit sales in the county. I voted against the amendment to the amendment, and I am now prepared to vote for the original amendment of the hon. gentleman (Mr. McClure) which is an honest, straightforward declaration for prohibition. As the government led the people to believe they were going to give them prohibition, the government should carry out that promise by voting for the amendment of the hon. gentleman (Mr. McClure). I intend to do all that I can, not to outrage the good faith of the people. I go further, and I say that if the Conservative party were in power, (a fact which will very soon come to pass), and if the Conservative party made a pledge to bring in a plebiscite as the Liberals did, and if the vote should be in favour of prohibition, then if I stood alone I would vote in favour of carrying out the pledges and promises made. However, I have no fear that when the Conservatives give a pledge on any matter of policy, they will refuse to carry it out. I am opposed to the Scott Act. My experience is that it has not been a success, and I have a few figures here which will show the opinion of the people of Ontario as to how it worked. In 1884, in the united counties of Stormont, Dundas and Glengarry, 61 per cent of the vote polled was in favour of the Scott Act, but four years afterwards when the vote was again taken 63 per cent of the vote went against it. In 1885, in the county of Kent, 68 per cent of the vote polled was in favour of the Scott Act, but four years afterwards 61 per cent of the vote was against it. In Elgin, in 1885, 69 per cent of the vote was polled in favour of this Act, and four years later 76 per cent of the vote polled was against it. In Lambton, in 1885, 74 per cent of the vote polled was in favour of the Scott Act, but in 1889, 62 per cent was against it. In Middlesex in 1885, 71 per cent of the vote polled was in favour of the Scott Act, but in 1889, 64 per cent was against it. In Westmoreland, N.B., in 1879, 84 per cent of the vote polled was in favour of the Scott Act, but in 1888, 60 per cent voted against it. Let me tell the hon. gentleman from Colchester (Mr. McClure) who moved this amendment in favour of prohibition, what was the record of the Scott Act in his county. In 1881, there voted in favour of the Scott Act 88½ per cent of the vote polled, but in 1889, 96 per cent went against it. That is the very best evidence in the world to show that the Scott Act was a failure and members in this House know it. There was no license under that Act, but there was more liquor disposed of than under license, young men and old carried bottles and flasks around in their pockets and got intoxicated upon the streets, and where there are five hotels now there were twenty or thirty places selling liquor illegally. Hon. gentlemen opposite have made pledges about prohibition to the people of the country, and if they refuse to carry them out they, and they alone, are responsible, and the people of the country will, I have no doubt, hold them strictly to account.

Mr. GEO. E. CASEY (West Elgin). The explanation given by the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) has not removed the objection that this amendment is utterly vague. It is out of the question to ask the House to vote for a vague declaration that the Canada Temperance Act ought to have its scope extended and ought to be perfected in various ways. If the government feel like amending or improving that Act they will introduce a Bill to that effect. If any member wishes to amend or improve it let him introduce a Bill; but to ask the House to vote for a vague statement such as that contained in the amendment is not very flattering to our intelligence. The explanation which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdonald) has given as to his own view as to what should be done, does not make the amendment less vague. It only amounts to a statement that if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdonald) were managing the matter, that is the way he would do it. I do not think the explanation improves the case at all. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdonald) would propose to group counties which temperance people, meaning the prohibitionists, think they could carry for the Scott Act. I absolutely oppose such a scheme as that. I believe it is a gerrymander of the worst kind. I do not propose to give the least countenance to the idea that the country should be gerrymandered by grouping counties to please the prohibitionists or any one else. As to the machinery of enforcement it will be for the House at some future time, when there is a distinct issue before it, to say whether they are willing to undertake the expense of maintaining a very large corps of officials with a view of enforcing the Canada Temperance Act. I do not think the House is at present in a mood to go in for any such thing. My hon friend from Glengarry (Mr. McLennan) has voiced the universal sentiment of the people of Ontario in saying that we have found the Canada Temperance Act as it stands to be useless and worse than useless. I do not think anybody is prepared to fall back on it as a relief, failing other means of prohibition. I do not wish to prolong the debate, but it was necessary that somebody, and just as well as not some old member, should put this view of the case briefly before the House.

The PRIME MINISTER. Mr. Speaker, the Canada Temperance Act, whatever may have been its defects, and we know it is not free from blemishes, has given a reasonable satisfaction to certain portions of the community. It was enacted for this purpose, it was accepted as such, and it has been maintained as such. At the same time, almost every session Bills have been introduced with a view of amending and improving that Act. For my part, holding the opinion I do, I do not know that I might not agree with my hon. friend, that it is perhaps not the most desirable legislation; but that is a question on which we can all afford to sink our minor differences. If the Canada Temperance Act is, as it is undoubtedly, satisfactory to a large section of our countrymen, I do not see why it should be derided. I think it should rather be supported and perfected, and made more workable in the counties which choose to adopt it. So far as the amendment of the hon. member for Eastern Assiniboia is concerned, if I had the drafting of it, I do not know that I would have put it in exactly the same language that he has used; I do not know that I would suggest the idea of grouping counties. But, for my part, I am prepared to accept the amendment with the idea of perfecting the Canada Temperance Act.

Mr. A. A. C. LaRIVIERE (Provencher). Mr. Speaker, I think we are losing sight of the fact that in two provinces already prohibitive laws have been adopted, and if we amend and perfect the Canada Temperance Act, it will have to be with the understanding that it does not apply to those provinces, because we shall be interfering with local legislation. I think perhaps it would be better for us to wait until we see the result of the legislation which has been adopted in those provinces; and, later on, if that legislation is found unworkable, then we may ourselves adopt any legislation which would cover the whole Dominion. We are legislating for the whole Dominion, and by re-enacting some provisions of the Canada Temperance Act we will perhaps interfere with local legislation.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. Speaker, as one who has introduced several Bills for the amendment of the Canada Temperance Act, some of which have been adopted and become law, and others of which have not been reached in the course of legislation and have been dropped, I desire to make one or two observations with regard to this amendment. Last session I placed a Bill on the Order paper for that purpose, which was not reached for final discussion. This session I have a Bill which the Premier kindly intimated I might have an opportunity before the close of the session of going on with and endeavouring to have adopted. Owing to my name having been connected with these measures, I have been, during every session in which I have had the honour of a seat in parliament, in receipt of a large number of communications containing drafts of Bills and suggestions of amendments to the Canada Temperance Act in those districts where it has been adopted. To a large bulk of these I have not had the time nor the opportunity to give the attention which they deserved; and knowing the hostility with which technical points and points open to discussion were received from a private member in most instances, I put off bringing them forward. In those districts where the Canada Temperance Act has been operative for the last ten or twelve years, it has been fairly successful, and those who are favourable to the Act in those districts are puzzled to know why this opposition and distrust towards the Act exists in other parts of the country. There is no doubt that it does exist, and it is to a large degree due to certain defects in the Act. We have seen recently the great ability with which the Department of Justice, as represented in the House by the Solicitor General, has carried through a large number of intricate amendments to the election law; and I think that unless we have the assistance of the government, particularly of the Department of Justice, in amending the Canada Temperance Act, so as to strengthen its provisions here and there, and to provide for that large number of cases in which the decisions of the courts have shown it to be to a certain degree unworkable, it will be difficult or impossible for us to get the Act perfected or improved. If the House would adopt this amendment—though it is not particularly germane to the resolution which I brought up—I think it would be a source of great encouragement to those counties and those districts where the Canada Temperance Act is in force.

Mr. McNEILL. Will my hon. friend permit me a moment? What is troubling me is the fact that this proposition is not to amend or perfect the Canada Temperance Act, but to enlarge its scope.

Mr. FLINT. I presume that the idea underlying the phraseology of the amendment is that the Canada Temperance Act might be enlarged to take in a whole province or certain groups of counties; but the point I have in mind is the perfecting of the machinery of the Act. For instance, one of the suggestions made to me from more quarters than one is that the officer who enforces the law should not be a local officer, but an officer under the control of the government of Canada, and that the expense of enforcing it should rest upon this government rather than upon the local authority. I trust that if I have an opportunity of bringing forward one or two slight amendments to the Canada Temperance Act at a later stage of the session, they will be fairly discussed. I approve, as far as it goes, of the suggestion made in this amendment, although it is not particularly germane to the great question of prohibition which I have endeavoured to bring before the House.

Mr. McNEILL. Mr. Speaker, if this were merely a proposal to amend the Canada Temperance Act, I think it would be a matter to which we ought to give the most serious consideration; but, to my mind, as it is now presented to the House, this vague, bodyless amendment may mean the application of the Scott Act to a province or to a county, we cannot tell what. I think it very little less than an insult to this House to ask us to adopt an amendment of that kind. I will not stultify myself by supporting any such proposition. I am asked to vote in the dark on something I know nothing about, and say that I approve of it. Such a vote I will never give.

Mr. CRAIG. I never heard of any such amendment being demanded by the temperance people in connection with the subject of prohibition. It is all very well for the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) to say that he has some amendments to make to the Canada Temperance Act. If he has, let us treat those amendment definitely and know what they are, but the idea of asking us, after we have declared that the vote on the plebiscite does not warrant prohibition, to vote for an amendment calling on us to enlarge the scope of the Canada Temperance Act is an absurd proposition. There is no connection between the two subjects. What effect will this amendment have if carried? I am down on all humbug in connection with this temperance question, and this is nothing but arrant humbug. It is a very small hole to crawl out of it and nothing else. I do not know anything about the hon. member's motives, who proposes this amendment, but he has voted for a motion declaring that the plebiscite vote was not large enough to warrant the government in introducing a prohibitory Bill. Why not stop there? But he is not satisfied with that, and wants now to do a little for the temperance people. If he wishes to enlarge the scope of the Canada Temperance Act, let him introduce a Bill for that purpose, and this House will consider it, and if the amendments he proposes are satisfactory, no doubt the Bill will pass. But to ask an intelligent body like the House of Commons to vote in the dark that they will enlarge the scope of the Canada Temperance Act, without knowing in what way it is to be enlarged or being given any details whatever, is a piece of absurdity. Suppose this case, here are three counties, two of which are in favour of prohibition, and one is opposed to it. We might enlarge the scope of the Canada Temperance Act so as to take the vote of the three counties together and compel the one opposed to prohibition to be subjected to that law, in order to oblige the other two. Can we imagine this House agreeing to anything of the kind? I do not think that the temperance people will support the hon. member in this.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I think they will.

Mr. CRAIG. The hon. gentleman evidently thinks that he knows what the temperance people want better than we do on this side. But I think differently. As a temperance man, I consider this amendment as nothing less than an insult to the temperance people. I am satisfied with the vote I gave and am not ashamed of it, and I do not want to minimize it in any possible way. I want the temperance people to know that I voted that the result of the plebiscite did not warrant the government bringing in a prohibitory law. The hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) has voted in like manner, but he is not satisfied because he does not want to stand on a square principle, but wants to bring in a little side wind which he thinks may bring to him some little political support.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not think my hon. friend has fairly considered the proposition before the House. Heretofore my recollection is that he has always spoken and voted in favour of every measure in which had for its object the perfecting of existing temperance legislation.

Mr. CRAIG. I am in favour of every such measure still.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Although the Scott Act has not been adopted in many counties of Ontario, or, if adopted, has been repealed, still that Act is the only temperance legislation in force in the maritime provinces. It is in force in many of the counties, and in some of them it has been in force almost from the time the Act was brought into operation. But there have been complaints from year to year that this Act was defective, and that it requires improvements in its working details.

Mr. CRAIG. Why have the government not introduced a Bill to make it effective?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. For many reasons. They are only learning what the demand of the temperance people is in that regard. The hon. member no doubt knows that my hon. friend from Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) has introduced a Bill to supplement the provisions of the Canada Temperance Act, but has not been able to reach it, as many Bills introduced by private members have not been reached. In many points the Scott Act requires amendment. The Bill of the hon. member for Yarmouth, I notice, enlarges some of its provisions and increases the penalty for breaches of the Act, which is in the direction the temperance people seek to have it amended. He seeks also to have a clause inserted enabling search warrants to be executed, the inability to do which was found a very grievous objection, and he makes other important amendments.

Mr. CRAIG. I do not see what this has to do with the question before the House.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It has everything to do with it. It shows that there are grave defects in the Act in the opinion of this House, and he wants an opportunity to bring these before the House. If this amendment carried, the government will be bound to give him such an opportunity.

Mr. FOSTER. Any man has that opportunity.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. As a private member he has no possible opportunity to bring a Bill before the House and carry it this session, because the government business monopolises all the time. If the House agrees in the proposition, that the circumstances of the case require amendments to be made to the Canada Temperance Act, that would be sufficient to induce the government to give a portion of the government's time to that purpose.

Mr. LARIVIERE. When you give the hon. gentleman an opportunity to bring in his motion, could you not give him the same opportunity to bring in his Bill?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am not objecting to his having the opportunity, but I am pointing out why there could not be any possible harm in affirming the proposition. The other day in New Brunswick or Nova Scotia, a very serious decision was given by one of the judges, affecting the working of the Act, as to the power of some magistrate to sit in cases under the Act at all. If this resolution should pass, that would have to be taken up and considered carefully. This Bill of the hon. member for Yarmouth is only one of a series of Bills, and if the motion is passed, it will be the duty of the government to give every opportunity for the discussion of these various amendments.

Mr. McMULLEN. I cannot see that I can consistently accept this amendment. Were I to vote for it, I would be voting that prohibition is abandoned altogether. If it is thought necessary to amend the Scott Act, that can be amended without passing this amendment at all, and therefore, I cannot consistently accept it.

Mr. FOSTER. I consider that it is little less than an insult and treating this House with contempt to ask it to pass a resolution that an Act now upon the statute ought to be improved and amended. You might as well take up our time in bringing up resolutions that the Criminal Code ought to be enlarged and improved, or that the Representation Act or any other Act should be enlarged and improved, and besides the resolution is so indefinite that it gives no direction at all. If any law ought to be enlarged and improved, in the opinion of any member, he has the right to bring in legislation to that effect, and the House will discuss his measure and vote upon it. That is one ground why I oppose the amendment—because I am not going to consume my time, and I do not think it is proper to consume the time of the House in voting on such meaningless, foolish and indefinite propositions. In the second place, the argument of the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), has more force than he gives it, owing to the conjuncture of the two propositions. In the first place, the House has voted that the country is not ready for a prohibitory law, and on the top of that comes this proposal that we should enlarge and improve the Scott Act. It means, to my mind, the seal set upon the deliverance that prohibition is dead and buried, and that this is to take its place and to hold that place for the future. On these grounds I propose to vote against this motion.

Mr. D. C. FRASER (Guysborough). If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) had considered, for a moment, I do not think he would say that prohibition is being displaced by this amendment. We have just voted that at present the country is not ready for prohibition. This amendment comes after that and declares that we have an Act already on the statute-books and we should improve it. Speaking as a lawyer, I believe that the Canada Temperance Act ought to be amended. But that amendment ought not to be in the hands of a private member alone. I think we should have the assistance of the government and of the opposition. I believe no Act was ever passed in which so many different decisions have been given; and one of the difficulties we have experienced in Nova Scotia in the enforcement of this law, was these diverse rulings of the court. I believe we should do all we can to amend that Act to make it workable, and this resolution is to affirm that.

Mr. DAVID HENDERSON (Halton). I desire to occupy the time of the House for only a few moments, to explain my position on this very peculiar amendment. I confess I am at a loss altogether to comprehend its meaning. We have within the last half-hour declared that a prohibitory law should not be enacted at present. What are we then going to amend the Scott Act for? What are we going to enlarge its scope for? Are we to be asked to enlarge the scope of the Scott Act, so as to make its terms more liberal to those who sell liquor? That must be the meaning of it. If prohibition is entirely wrong and should not be enacted at present, is it the intention of hon. gentlemen to relax the clauses of the Scott Act, and give more freedom to the manufacture and sale of liquor, than has been given heretofore. To be consistent, I fail to see how the scope of the Scott Act can be altered in any other way. Now, I feel very much as the hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Craig) does on this matter. It seems to me purely childish to introduce the amendment introduced by the hon. member for Eastern Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas). I doubt very much whether the hon. gentleman in his inmost conscience feels that he has squared himself for the vote he has given. I have not the slightest doubt that when he goes west, he hopes to square himself with the electors of Assiniboia. That is the intention of the hon. gentleman—it is simply a squaring measure, not to improve temperance legislation—that is far from his intention. His whole desire is to find a hole to crawl out of, and he has found a small one—and it takes only a small one for a man of his size to crawl out of. When he thinks over this to-morrow morning, he will be the most serious man in this House. I have no hesitation in saying I will vote against this resolution. The people in western Ontario, I think have had all the Scott Act they want. I believe that is the universal verdict. There is not a single county in which it was brought in force, that has not repealed it. You may joint two counties together, or even more but, what better off will you be. We have had sometimes four or five counties together with the Scott Act in force, and still it could not be made to work, so unsatisfactory was it; and the first opportunity the people had, they repealed it. I am bound to come to the conclusion that the only object of this amendment is not to help temperance legislation, not to help the temperance people in their efforts to secure prohibition, but simply to find a miserable little hole, that some hon. gentlemen can crawl out of.

Sir LOUIS DAVIES.

Mr. McCLURE. While I believe in the enlargement and improvement of the Scott Act, in order that those counties that have seen fit to adopt it, may have an effective law, I cannot vote for this amendment. There is no doubt that, as regards the maritime provinces, there is a demand among those counties that have the Scott Act, to have it improved. I would vote for the proposition if it stood alone; but if I vote for it as it stands now, I have to endorse the motion of my hon. friend from Shefford (Mr. Parmalee), and I cannot do that.

Mr. A. H. MOORE (Stanstead). I think the temperance people of Canada will be very much surprised to find their work of so many years culminating in this abortion of a resolution brought forward by the hon. member for Eastern Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas). I have also been surprised at the statement of the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), and the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint), that they considered the Scott Act has been satisfactory. How can it be considered satisfactory, when, in the province of Ontario, after having been adopted in twenty-five counties and two cities, in every one of them it has been repealed, and in the province of Quebec likewise, every county which adopted it after a practical trial has repealed it. The Scott Act is discredited all over these two provinces; and the only place where it is adopted and enforced, is in the lower provinces, where any Bill with the name of prohibition to it would be observed by the people there. The government is in the position of a shoemaker who went to a new locality and set up business. The first day they brought him a pair of shoes to be resoled; the next day they brought them back for new heels and a new vamp. The next day he advised them to get new strings and have a new pair made. The government had better let us have a new Bill which can be better enforced, if they want to satisfy the temperance people of this country.

Mr. WM. McCLEARY (Welland). If subterfuge, deceit and cunning were measured to their lowest depths, I think there could not be found such hypocrisy and shame as that which so thoroughly characterizes the attitude of the government, and of certain gentlemen behind them, on this temperance question. I had always understood that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) was taken into the cabinet as the advocate of the great temperance organizations in this country, notwithstanding the fact that when the Premier (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) came into Ontario he told us that he had taken him in because he was a farmer, that he had found him as David of old was found by the prophet in his father's sheepfold, so this gentleman was found in the furrows of a corn field, a hardy son of toil, to represent the farmers of Canada; but, he was generally supposed to represent the temperance element. The House has already been told to-night of the manner in which he broke faith with the temperance people in that convention of 1893, when he entered into an arrangement in consequence of which it was impossible to carry out the views of the temperance people. I will not pursue that point any further. I want to show the hypocrisy and the cunning underlying this whole question as they have been exhibited by this government. Now, the amendment proposed by the member for East Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas), fathered by the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. McDonald), and I presume, handed around from one member to another to see what support it could get on the other side of the House, is just another illustration of the hypocrisy with which this question has been treated by the government and their supporters, for the most part. The hon. member for East Huron told us that the Scott Act in Ontario had to be managed by the machinery of the Mowat administration. Why, Sir, every temperance man in the province of Ontario knows what took place when the Hon. Mr. Mowat and his government appointed a man to enforce that law. Everybody remembers the celebrated correspondence that was made public between a certain Mr. Lang, and the gentleman who was appointed chief inspector, Mr. Manning, under the Ontario government. When he was written to by Mr. Lang asking him to make a more rigid enforcement of the Scott Act, as otherwise the temperance people would go back on the Liberal party, what was Mr. Manning's reply? His reply was: It is impossible for me to suit the two ends of our party. While you are insisting on a severe enforcement of the law, I am advised, on the other hand, that a more stringent enforcement would be detrimental to the interests of the Mowat government. And still the hon. gentleman asks us to-night to commit ourselves to this miserable subterfuge for a temperance law, the Scott Act, to be enforced by political hacks, as it always has been in the province of Ontario. I have no hesitation in saying that I shall vote against this miserable subterfuge that has been put up in order to afford a pretext by which some gentleman can go back to their constituents and say that they were in favour of temperance to a certain extent, because they voted for this resolution to enlarge the Scott Act.

House divided on amendment (Mr. Douglas).

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the names be read. One hon. member was marked on both sides.

Mr. SPEAKER. His name was dropped off.

Mr. BERGERON. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) did not vote.

An hon. MEMBER. He is paired.

Mr. BERGERON. There is no pair for this.

Mr. RUSSELL. I am paired with the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden). If I had not been, I would have voted against this amendment.

Mr. BERGERON. There is no pair for this.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Tie.

Amendment (Mr. Douglas) agreed to.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question is now on the main motion as amended.

Mr. HENDERSON. Before this motion is put, I would like to ask the right hon. gentleman if he considers this majority will be sufficient to warrant him in taking action?

Motion (Mr. Flint), as amended, agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. FOSTER. I thought we were to have the railway resolutions to-day?

DEATH OF HON. ARTHUR DICKEY.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). My hon. friends, I am sure, will join with me in what I have to say before the House adjourns. We should not fail to take note of a very sad event which has occurred to-day in my own province of Nova Scotia, which has resulted in the loss of one of our most distinguished citizens, who, for many years occupied a seat in this House and who filled the important position of Minister of Justice. I refer to the Hon. Arthur Dickey, who was drowned to-day near Amherst, in the county of Cumberland. Many hon. gentlemen who sit here to-night had the pleasure of being associated with him when he was a member of this House, and I am sure that I but state their views when I say that he was a gentleman who invariably enjoyed the respect and esteem of hon. members on both sides of this House. My own personal recollections of association with that gentleman are of the most agreeable kind, although they include occasions when we met as opponents on the public platform. In his professional life, in his public life, in his life as an enterprising citizen, in every relation of life, the Hon. Arthur Dickey was universally esteemed, respected, and, I might say, loved. He was a cordial friend and a generous foe. I am sure that no man who has passed out of the public life of Canada for a long time will be more sincerely mourned or more deeply regretted. I am sure that every hon. member who knew him, either personally, or only by reputation, will join with me in expressing to his family our deepest sympathy on the occasion of his untimely death.

Mr. G. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.) I am sure I cannot but say, for myself, and for hon. members on this side of the House, that we feel very much the shock of the news of the untimely and sudden end of the gentleman whose name has been mentioned, and we feel very much as well the loss we have suffered. I re-echo every word that the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) has said in reference to the deceased gentleman. I made his acquaintance first in 1882, and from that time forward until the election of 1896, I was more or less intimately associated with him in public life, and I may say as well in the interchange of that friendship which springs up between persons, more especially those working in the same party, and with the same political aims. I may say that Mr. Dickey was a very high-minded man. His code of honour was high, and though he was a strong opponent, he was also a fair-minded opponent. I do not know any member of this House who dealt with public questions, or treated his opponents in the House, with greater fairness than did Mr. Dickey. To us, on this side of the House, who have been more intimately associated with him, his loss is one which it is hard to repair. Not only in the line of public work and in connected with the party to which he belonged do we mourn his loss, but we mourn his loss from a larger and higher point of view. Men endowed as Mr. Dickey was, with strong intellectual power, cultured, high-minded and of high motives; when they leave the scene of action, especially at such an early age, their departure is a great loss to the country as a whole; a great loss to the public life of Canada. I join with my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) in voicing the deep regret with which we have heard of the death of our friend, and I join him also in a tender of sympathy to those who are bereaved in the home and friendly circle, of a man who was a kind father, a most devoted friend, and who in the circle in which he moved, held the respect and had the love of all those who knew him well.

Mr. H. J. LOGAN (Cumberland). I am sure it will bring great solace to the family and friends of the late Mr. Dickey, when they learn of the words that have been spoken to-night in the parliament of Canada. I speak of the deceased as a friend, as one who was a political opponent of mine, but of whom I can say that no more honourable man ever lived than Arthur Dickey. I have known him since my boyhood days; I have known him as a fellow-member of the bar; I have known him as a very near neighbour; I have known him as a political opponent, as I have said, but I have ever known him as a dear, personal friend. I cannot do less than to express the great and profound sorrow I feel at the loss of one who for many years has been a close friend of mine, and who in the course of our political strife never permitted a single unkind word to escape his lips. I can think of nothing that he has ever done or said in political life, that did not stamp him as a man of the very highest character. My heart goes out to-night to the sorrowing widow and children, and to the aged father, who now at the age of four score and ten, mourns the loss of a son who was a bright star in the political and legal firmament of the province of Nova Scotia, and of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. FOSTER. I understood that the Premier promised that the railway subsidies would be brought down to-day?

The PRIME MINISTER. They will not be ready before to-morrow.

Mr. FOSTER. What business shall we have to-morrow?

The PRIME MINISTER. We will take up the Election Bill, the Conciliation Bill and the Railway Bill.

Mr. MONK. Would the right hon. gentleman fix a day for the discussion of the report of the Select Committee on the Emergency Rations?

The PRIME MINISTER. Agreeable to my hon. friend, we will be able to take that up on Thursday morning.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 1 a.m. (Wednesday.)

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, July 4, 1900.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Eleven o'clock.

PRAYERS.

YUKON—PRESERVATION OF GAME.

Mr. JAMES SUTHERLAND (North Oxford) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 190) entitled 'The Yukon Game Preservation Act.'

Mr. FOSTER. What is this?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. Ogilvie and the council report that it has been found that the Act that now applies, that is, the Territories Game Preservation Act, is not applicable to the condition of affairs in the Yukon Territory. It is intended, under this Bill, to give the council some power, by ordinance, to amend that Act and make it suitable for the condition of affairs.

Mr. PRIOR. I suppose this does not preclude miners and prospectors from shooting deer.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It might preclude some of the kickers my hon. friend (Mr. Prior) has heard about.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

ST. GEDEON MAIL CONTRACT.

Mr. CASGRAIN (by Mr. Taylor) asked:

1. Has the contract for carrying the mail between the railway station and the post office at St. Gédéon been renewed since July, 1899?

2. If so, were tenders called for; if not, why not, and on whose recommendation?

3. If not, what action did the Postmaster General take on the expiration of the contract?

4. What price is now paid for the said service; and is the said price higher, or lower, than that stated in the contract?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) has given me the answer, which is as follows:—The last contract for the mail service mentioned expired on the 31st March last. Since that date the service has been carried on under a temporary agreement by the former contractor on the same terms and conditions, pending inquiry as to the arrangements for the continuance of the service. The price is 19½ cents per trip, the same as was paid under the contract.

HILLSBORO' BRIDGE—PROTECTION OF FOOT-PASSENGERS.

Mr. MARTIN asked:

Does the Dominion government provide for the protection and safety of all foot-passengers and other persons using the highway portion of the Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

proposed Hillsborough bridge, in Prince Edward Island?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The agreement with the provincial government provides, I believe, for all necessary protection.

BRANCH RAILWAY LINES IN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

Mr. MARTIN asked:

1. Has the government received any petition for the construction of a line of railway in Prince Edward Island from a point between Royalty Junction and York station to Covehead and thence to Rustico? If so, how many?

2. Is the government aware that this line was included in a resolution proposed by the Minister of Railways on April 21, 1899, for the building of certain line of railways in Prince Edward Island therein mentioned?

3. Has the government received any other petitions praying for railway extension in Prince Edward Island? If so, how many; from what sections, together with the points each petition asks to be covered, and the number of names attached to those petitions?

4. Is it the intention of the government during this parliamentary term to take any action for the survey or construction of those proposed lines of railways?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). 1. The Department of Railways and Canals received two such petitions only. 2. Presuming that the hon. member means the resolution proposed on April 21, 1896, my answer is that the line mentioned is included in the resolution. 3. Yes, 14 petitions—(1) Charlottetown to Murray Harbour through Murray Harbour, District of King's County, and in Belfast and Fort Augustus, District of Queen's County, 583 names; (2) Charlottetown to Murray Harbour through Murray Harbour, District of King's County and in Belfast and Fort Augustus, District of Queen's County, 422 names; (3) Charlottetown to Murray Harbour through Murray Harbour, District of King's County and in Belfast and Fort Augustus, District of Queen's County, 142 names; (4) Charlottetown to Murray Harbour through Murray Harbour, District of King's County and in Belfast and Fort Augustus, District of Queen's County, 173 names; (5) Charlottetown to Murray Harbour through Murray Harbour, District of King's County and in Belfast and Fort Augustus, District of Queen's County, 107 names; (6) South Port to Murray Harbour, 5 names, senators and members; Harmony Station to Murray Harbour, 5 names, senators and members; Royalty Junction to Covehead, thence to Rustico, 5 names senators and members; Emerald Junction to Stanley Bridge, 5 names, senators and members; Summerside to Richmond Bay, 5 names, senators and members; O'Leary Station, Prince County, to some point on western coast between Brae and Cape Wolfe, North Wiltshire to Victoria, 5 names, senators and members; (7) Wiltshire to Victoria, 1 name for and on behalf of inhabitants of district; (8) Summerside to Richmond Bay, 1 name for and on behalf of inhabitants of district; (9) Emerald Junction to Stanley Bridge, 1 name for and on behalf of inhabitants of district; (10) South Port to Murray Harbour, 1 name for and on behalf of inhabitants of district; (11) Royalty Junction to Rustico, 1 name for and on behalf of inhabitants of district; (12) Murray Harbour Branch crossing the country at head of Vernon River, 194 names; (13) Murray Harbour Branch to pass close to Grand View and Murray Harbour Road, 100 names; (14) Murray Harbour Branch with terminus at Machan's Point, 60 names.

Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.). Do I understand the hon. minister to say 'Harmony to Murray Harbour'? If so, that must be a mistake.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It must be 'Harmony to Elmira.'

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It reads here 'Harmony Station to Murray Harbour.' This is the way the answer is furnished to me. If it is important I will have it verified.

GRAND MANAN AND MAINLAND STEAM SERVICE.

Mr. GANONG (by Mr. Taylor) asked :

How many tenders have been received for steam service between Grand Manan, New Brunswick, and the mainland? What are the names of those who tendered, and what was the amount of the several tenders? Has the contract been awarded? If so, to whom? What are the conditions of the contract?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). Tenders were advertised for in March last. There were but two tenders received—one from Messrs. Hugh Cann & Sons, for the sum of $6,500, the steamer to be the Malcolm Cann, or they would continue the service as at present performed with the steamer Latour for $4,000 per annum; the other tender was from Messrs. E. Gaskill, W. E. Tatton, and Frank Ingersoll, for the sum of $10,000, including $2,500 appropriated by the province of New Brunswick. Neither tender was accepted. Negotiations were entered into with a view to securing an improved service at a more reasonable figure, resulting in an offer from W. E. Tatton for a service four times per week in summer, and twice a week in winter, for the sum of $5,000, in addition to the amount appropriated by the province, which offer has been by telegraph accepted, conditioned that a satisfactory steamer be furnished. The contract has not yet been executed.

I.C.R.—SAND CASTINGS AT RICHMOND, N.S.

Mr. BELL (Pictou)—by Mr. Taylor—asked :

1. What were the names of the parties who tendered for green sand castings for Intercolonial Railway at Richmond, Nova Scotia, and what were amounts of the several tenders?
2. What proportion of cast iron scrap, and at what price, was to be taken in payment?
3. To whom was the tender awarded when last invited in current year?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). 1. The names of the parties who tendered for iron castings required on the Eastern Division of the Intercolonial Railway, and the amounts of the several tenders, with the proportion of cast iron scrap to be taken in payment are: Robert Brown & Sons, $2.30 per 100 lbs.; will take equal quantity of scrap and allow $16 per ton of 2,000 lbs. Oxford Foundry and Machine Company, $2 per 100 lbs.; will take half the value in scrap at $14 per ton. Fraser Bros., $1.62½; will take equal weight of scrap at $16 per ton. Jas. Hillis & Son, $2; will take cast scrap in payment at $15 per ton of 2,000 lbs. W. P. McNeil & Co., $1.60; will take equal quantity scrap at $15 per ton. The contract was awarded to Fraser Bros., the lowest tenderers, though Fraser Bros' price of the castings, it will be observed, was 2½ cents per 100 lbs. higher. They offer $16 per ton for an equal weight of scrap as against $15 offered by W. P. McNeil & Co., which makes Fraser Bros' offer more favourable.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN.

Mr. G. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to say to the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) that I have not received the returns with reference to the one delinquent department, that of the Minister of Railways and Canals.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). My hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) thinks he will be able to get it to-day.

THE CASE OF GEORGE HARRIS.

Mr. FREDERICK D. MONK (Jacques Cartier). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the government if the case of George Harris has been investigated. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) consented to look into this case some time ago. I had this case under consideration at the beginning of the session. George Harris is a Canadian by birth, who was living in Prince Edward Island—at present, residing in Montreal.

He was arrested by an officer of the Newfoundland government at Sydney, P.E.I. on a charge of smuggling. The arrest was effected without legal formality, he was actually taken by force over to Newfoundland and there, under an agreement, he pleaded guilty and suffered rather a long imprisonment. He brought his case to my notice and I wrote to the Minister of Justice about it at the beginning of the session. Rather than bring the case to the notice of this House I thought it better to confer with the Minister of Marine and Fisheries who was familiar with it, and knew the family of this Mr. Geo. Harris. He is a man of good standing, and I believe the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has looked into his case, and as we are approaching the end of the session I would like to know if he has come to any decision in regard to the request this man makes.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I may say that the government of Canada received a petition from Mr. Harris praying that this government would interfere in his behalf and claiming redress for wrongs done him by the Newfoundland government. That petition was accompanied by a voluminous mass of papers. We communicated with the Newfoundland government, of course we had to do so through the Colonial Office. All the papers were forwarded to the Colonial Office by despatch of the 26th of July last, and the matter was forwarded by the Imperial government to the government of Newfoundland. The government of Newfoundland through its Attorney General, sent a reply to the Colonial Office and the Colonial Office, on the 29th of August last, 1899, acknowledged receipt of our papers and forwarded on to the government here the reply of the Attorney General of Newfoundland. I may say to my hon. friend that in forwarding these papers they expressed the following opinion in a paragraph of the despatch :

While not desiring to express an opinion on the merits of the case, I may say that I think it would be well if your ministers could see their way to let the matter drop.

This was signed by the Right Hon. Mr. Chamberlain. Under these circumstances, and with that strong expression of opinion from the Right Hon. Mr. Chamberlain, no further action has been taken.

CORPORAL COURTNEY, 'A' BATTERY.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR (South Leeds). Before the Orders of the Day are called I would again ask the Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Borden), what he is going to do with reference to Corporal Courtney? I see by this morning's paper that the question was raised yesterday in the Imperial House of Commons in London.

Mr. MONK.

In the House of Commons to-day Samuel Woods, member for Walthamstow, questioned the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain in regard to Corporal Courtney, of 'A' Battery, Kingston, being reduced to the ranks because he refused to distribute beer to his men. The Colonial Secretary in reply stated that he had no information on the subject. The Imperial government has no right or desire to interfere in a question solely concerning one of the self-governing colonies.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). A very satisfactory answer, I think, indeed. I may say to my hon. friend that I expected the deputy minister here this morning with the papers. He has not come, but I will be ready to make a statement on the question within twenty-four hours, at any rate. The matter is of some importance, and I think it is only right that I should carefully consider it before making a statement to the House. There is some question as to whether the papers are such as should be laid on the Table of the House. Some of them are confidential, I do not say they are all so, but I think I should carefully look into the matter before making a statement.

TRADE RELATIONS WITH TRINIDAD.

Mr. W. H. MONTAGUE (Haldimand). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to call the attention of the government to a despatch which I see in the papers stating that the negotiations between the United States and Trinidad as regards reciprocity have practically failed. Does the government intend taking any steps to renew the negotiations between Canada and Trinidad.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). We received no formal notification. A certain time must elapse, I think, before the matter can be considered as final, although I believe the fact is as the hon. gentleman has stated.

ELECTION ACT—AMENDMENT AND CONSOLIDATION.

The House again resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 133) to consolidate and amend the law relating to the election of members of the House of Commons.—(Mr. Fitzpatrick.)

(In the Committee.)

On section 69,

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). In pursuance of an arrangement made at the last sitting of the committee I have drafted an amendment to the statute which will take the place of section 69, to provide for the votes of those who are now absent in South Africa. The amendment reads as follows:—

Notwithstanding anything contained in any Act of parliament or in any Act of a provincial legislature, no person otherwise qualified to vote at an election of a member to serve in the House of Commons should be disentitled to vote at such election by reason only of his having been absent from Canada or any province of Canada, or from the electoral district in which such election was held, while serving with or attached to any corps despatched from Canada for service in the present South African war, whether as an officer, non-commissioned officer, or private, or in any other capacity, or while serving Her Majesty in any military capacity or acting as a war correspondent in connection with said war.

2. From any oath which any such person tendering his vote at such an election may be required to take, there shall be omitted any statements as to residence which such person cannot by reason of such absence as aforesaid truthfully make, and there may be added to any such oath the following paragraph:—

‘That you were a member of the corps known as _____ and served Her Majesty as an (officer, non-commissioned officer or private, or otherwise, as the case may be) in connection with the South African war or,

That you served Her Majesty in connection with the South African war in a military capacity as _____

or,

That in connection with the South African war you acted as a war correspondent _____ and that you were in consequence absent from Canada from the _____ day of _____ to the _____ day of _____ 19 _____.

This is the form of oath they may take. Up to the present I have provided that those who are absent from the country, but whose names are on the list, should not be disqualified by reason of non-residence within the prescribed time previous to the election. I intend to go further than that and to add this clause which will provide for those who have become qualified and who would have been on the list if they had not been absent in South Africa. The following is to be added as subsection 3 to proposed section 69:—

3. If the name of any such person is not upon the list of voters, and it might have been put thereon had he not been so absent, such person shall nevertheless be entitled to vote upon his offering to take, and taking if so requested, before the deputy returning officer or other person in charge of the polling station, in addition to any oath he might otherwise have been required to take, omitting statements as to residence and as to his name being upon the list which he cannot by reason of such absence truthfully make, and the paragraph prescribed in subsection 2 being added thereto, as well as the following paragraph:—

‘That you were qualified to have your name upon the list of voters at the time such list was prepared, except for the fact of your absence from Canada as aforesaid.’

Mr. WOOD. Would that include those who are engaged in the postal service?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. In any service in South Africa connected with the contingent.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Would it include the Red Cross service, which is not a military service?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Yes; because it is in connection with the military service, ‘whether officer, non-commissioned officer, or private, or in any other capacity, or while serving Her Majesty in any military capacity.’ That would cover everything. As a result of this amendment all those whose names are on the list and who would be disqualified as a result of their absence in South Africa will be entitled to vote; further, those who were not on the list but who would have been qualified to be put on the list had they been in Canada at the time the list was made, will be qualified to vote by giving the affidavit.

Mr. A. A. C. LaRIVIERE (Provencher). What about their place of residence?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. They will have to make application within the district—

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Where they resided last?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. In the case of their being on the list they will, of course, have to go to the polling booth of the place where the list is, and in the other case they will be obliged to go to the booth of the polling place for the list of which they would have been entitled to be had they been in Canada.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Suppose they had arrived at Quebec, would they all have a vote in Quebec?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. No; I think not.

Mr. A. McNEILL (North Bruce). Would the hon. Solicitor General be inclined to extend the words a little and make them apply to soldiers serving Her Majesty outside of Canada at the front? I do not want to press the matter; I only suggest it.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. This is for a special case, and I think we had better limit it to that case.

Mr. McNEILL. I only thought of the offer that had been made to serve in China, but I do not desire to press the matter.

Mr. BERGERON. Is this clause 69?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. That will be substituted in lieu of clause 69 which is struck out. I am coming now to the question of the ballot paper.

Mr. BERGERON. Are all the other clauses passed?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Yes; I want to deal with the promises I made the other day to make certain changes.

The suggestions which I made the other day was that we should have a ballot paper with two counterfoils attached, on both of which would be placed the same number with the initials of the deputy returning officer so that when the deputy returning officer gave a ballot to the voter he would detach from the ballot one of the counterfoils bearing a certain number which he would place upon the table. Then, the elector would go into the secret chamber and bring back his ballot. The deputy returning officer would then ascertain if it bore a number corresponding with the number on the counterfoil that had been detached previously to the elector going into the secret chamber. That would have been an ideal ballot, but a ballot of this sort cannot be prepared, especially in country places. I sent to the Queen's Printer to ask if he could prepare such a ballot, and he said that he had not the machinery at the present time which was necessary to enable him to make it. It will be necessary for him, he says, to build a machine and to experiment with that machine so as to be absolutely certain that he would have an accurate ballot and that there would be in all cases the same number on both counterfoils. In view of that fact I intend to suggest—and it is a suggestion I got from the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding)—that we should keep the ballot we have now provided for in the schedule. We shall provide that these ballots before they leave the hands of the returning officer to be sent to the deputy returning officer shall be stamped by a stamp which shall be furnished to the returning officer, who shall stamp each ballot so that it will be absolutely certain that the ballot which will reach the deputy returning officer will be the ballot coming from the returning officer, in that way restricting the responsibility for the ballot in each electoral division to the returning officer himself and holding him liable for it. We provide that this special stamp shall be sent to him by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, and severe penalties are provided for any person who shall use that stamp or be found in possession of the stamp other than the returning officer. I will just read the section so that hon. gentlemen may see what it is:

Every ballot paper furnished by the returning officer to the deputy returning officer shall be stamped by the returning officer with a stamp to be furnished to him for that purpose by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, and the stamp shall be so placed that when the ballot paper is folded by the voter the stamp can be seen without opening it.

Of course, necessarily, provision has to be made for stamping the ballot in such a way that the deputy returning officer can identify the stamp as well as his initials without violating the secrecy of the ballot.

Mr. FITZPATRICK.

Mr. McNEILL. That is certainly an improvement, but it is not to my mind nearly so satisfactory—

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. As the other.

Mr. McNEILL. Not nearly, and it is not so satisfactory as allowing the scrutineers to initial the ballots.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I may be permitted to say something about that. Take the case of scrutineers initialling the ballots; we would not unnecessarily complicate the machinery so as to prevent the Act from being put into operation. You have the initials of the deputy returning officer, you have two candidates, you add the initials of two scrutineers so that there are three sets of initials on the back of the ballot papers, and it occurs to me, with the knowledge I have of the way that the ballots are initialled in country parts, it would be practically impossible to carry out the intention of the Act, because the intention must be that when the ballot paper comes back to the deputy returning officer he would be in a position to examine it and ascertain that it was the ballot handed out by him. He will be able to verify that fact by the initials. But, suppose there were three sets of initials on the back of the ballot paper; he has to examine them all and take such precautions as will enable him to examine all these without violating the secrecy of the ballot. If he is not going to be able to do that in the case of two candidates how would he be able to do it in the case of four candidates where you would have eight initials?

Mr. McNEILL. The proposal is that there should not be more than two who would initial, the scrutineers who would initial the ballot. That would be three initials altogether.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. If there are three sets of candidates, as there may be, it would be difficult to put into practical operation.

Mr. McNEILL. It is quite unnecessary that more than two of the scrutineers should initial the ballots. It is merely for the purpose of identification.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). Who would be entitled to do it?

Mr. McNEILL. Any two of the scrutineers.

Mr. SPROULE. They would quarrel over it. In regard to this proposition which has been made by the hon. Solicitor General, is it intended to have just one stamp in each electoral division which shall be sent to the returning officer?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Yes.

Mr. SPROULE. Then the returning officer stamps all the ballots beforehand?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Yes; the returning officer sends the ballots to each deputy returning officer, but before he sends them out to the deputy returning officer they must be stamped.

Mr. SPROULE. What provision is there for sending them to the returning officer?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. We have adopted the provision suggested by the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain), that they should be stitched together and numbered.

Mr. POWELL. They are still to be numbered?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. No; except they are numbered consecutively.

Mr. SPROULE. This is entirely in the hands of the returning officer, and if he is a bad man he might do as he likes.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). You cannot have any election law, or any other law, which will not depend, to some extent, upon the honesty of somebody. I ventured to give this suggestion to the Solicitor General from the experience of the province of Nova Scotia. There the returning officer is usually the sheriff, and the sheriff has an official stamp which he uses on the ballots before he issues them. It may be that we are innocent people down there and are not accustomed to the wiles of the wicked world, but in the province of Nova Scotia I never knew of a bogus ballot being found in a box. The deputy returning officer hands the voter a ballot marked with the sheriff's stamp and the ballot which he puts in the box must have that stamp on it. It is proposed that a stamp shall be furnished to each returning officer and that he shall stamp his ballots as in the case I refer to. The stamp will be an inexpensive affair and can be quickly got ready, and I presume the returning officer, being a temporary official, will have to return it to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery when the election is over. It will be a serious offence, punishable by heavy penalties, for any one except the returning officer to have this stamp in his possession.

Mr. E. COCHRANE (East Northumberland). Will a different stamp be given to each returning officer?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I presume a stamp will be given to each returning officer with probably the name of the constituency on it, but all that is a matter of detail.

Mr. COCHRANE. The people of Nova Scotia may be very honest, as the Finance Minister said, but I draw his attention to the statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce: 'That Nova Scotia was the wet and the dry nurse of boodlers.'

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. No. What he said was that it was the wet nurse of certain particular boodlers.

Mr. J. G. H. BERGERON (Beauharnois). In addition to the stamp will the returning officer put his initials on the back of the ballot as before.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Undoubtedly. This will be an additional precaution.

Mr. BERGERON. I do not think that is a bad suggestion at all. Of course when the election is over that stamp will be returned to the returning officer. What guarantee is there that the stamp will not go astray, or that the ballot will not be stamped when they are sent to the deputy returning officers. Of course, as the Finance Minister said, we have to trust some one, but we have been deceived before and we are doing this in order to take every precaution. What penalties has the Solicitor General provided with regard to this?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I have provided a penalty for any person who forges or uses any stamp furnished to the returning officer for any purpose other than the stamping of ballot papers pursuant to section 41, or who not being a returning officer, has in his possession any such stamp.

Mr. BERGERON. Suppose a person goes to a returning officer's house and finds the stamp lying around and stamps a number of ballots and takes them away?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. He would be punished for having them in his possession.

Mr. BERGERON. But the returning officer?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. You would not punish a returning officer if a person goes behind his back and uses the stamp.

Mr. BERGERON. The law should provide that the returning officer should take good care of the stamp.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. You could not punish him for that.

Mr. McNEILL. I want to make the admission to my hon. friend (Mr. Fitzpatrick) that I think he has been particularly fair and particularly anxious to get this measure framed as it ought to be. But I want to call his attention to this: that this is simply handing the electorate over body and bones to the returning officer. It is all very well for the Minister of Finance to say that we must trust some one.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. But you have all the present guarantees.

Mr. McNEILL. The reason why we are legislating now is that we are distrustful of these people and we are doing every possible thing to prevent fraud.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. At the present time you have no guarantee except the initials on the back of the ballot, but in this case you have the additional guarantee of the stamp.

Mr. McNEILL. I understand that, and I think it a decided improvement that has been suggested by the Minister of Finance. But I say that we have within our reach something that is very much better and which makes it absolutely impossible to substitute a ballot; that is allowing two of the scrutineers to put their initials upon the back of the ballot paper. The objection of my hon. friend (Mr. Fitzpatrick) is that it would not be possible for the deputy returning officer to identify the ballot without exposing it. Here is a ballot in my hand folded, and it may be written all over the back and I can see everything on the back without exposing it.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. If I were anxious for secrecy I would not fold my ballot paper in that way.

Mr. McNEILL. But it is often done, and you are going to supply a thick coloured paper.

Mr. W. H. MONTAGUE (Haldimand). I think there is very grave objection to the amendment suggested by the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) for this reason, that an agent could make a ballot easily recognizable by signing his name in a peculiar way.

Mr. A. B. INGRAM (East Elgin). The fact of the number in the poll-book opposite the name of the voter being placed on the counterfoil will give the deputy returning officer an opportunity of knowing how a man votes, whether he destroys the counterfoil or not. He can easily retain in his memory the man's number in the poll-book, and by holding up the ballot paper between himself and the light he can easily see how it is marked. Should he fail to destroy the counterfoil then there would be no doubt about it. Many times deputy returning officers fail to even initial the ballots, so they might neglect to destroy the counterfoil.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. If he can do that, you do not require the number.

Mr. MONTAGUE. As I understand it, the ballots as they come from the printer are to be numbered in sections. How is that to be done?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. They are to be numbered either by the aid of a printing machine or by hand.

Mr. MONTAGUE. If they are numbered by a pen or a pencil, what particular safeguard will there be?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The ballots will be stitched together, say in quantities of one hundred, and numbered consecutively from 1 to 100. The stub which the returning officer shall retain in his possession will account for each ballot used. In addition to that, the number on the counterfoil will correspond with the number opposite the name of the voter in the poll-book.

Mr. B. M. BRITTON (Kingston). As I follow the discussion, it seems to me that if you have to furnish a stamp for each returning officer, which I suppose, when returned, will be destroyed so that it can not be used again, the expense involved will come very near that of a perfectly working mechanical contrivance which will both register the vote and the count, and I fancy we shall come to that before very long. As I understand the ballot proposed, we shall have all the safeguards existing at present in voting, together with the additional one of having all the ballots stamped by the returning officer with the stamp provided for him. There is only one other suggestion which I would make at this stage, that is one which has received some discussion in the papers. It is that paper for the ballots be provided by the government, such as bank-note paper which cannot be counterfeited, and that each candidate's name be printed on a separate ballot paper, and the ballot papers for the different candidates be put in a wrapper and furnished to the voter. The ballot which the voter selects is put into the box, and the others in the wrapper are returned to the deputy returning officer and by him destroyed.

Mr. C. E. KAULBACH (Lunenburg). Would it not be an easy matter for the sheriff, as a returning officer, to issue those ballots indiscriminately unless there was a check against him on the counterfoil? Should not every counterfoil have a number when it goes into the hands of the sheriff, so that he can be followed, in case of dishonesty, and instead of destroying those counterfoils, would it not be right for him to retain them?

Mr. McNEILL. If we have an honest returning officer the proposal of the Solicitor General is a most admirable one and will guard against dishonesty on the part of others, after the ballots have left the returning officer. But if we are unfortunate enough to have a dishonest returning officer we are not safeguarded at all. My hon.

friend will agree that the placing of the initials on the back of a ballot paper will make it impossible to have a substitution of this kind.

I just wish to put the case to him again, and do not want to say anything more about it. But I want to ask with reference to this other matter. I think we are all agreed that the double counterfoil is a most admirable check. But the hon. gentleman has explained that it would take some time to provide and try the machine. I would suggest to him whether it might not be well to have such a machine provided; and, if there be time to use the machine before the election, to have that system adopted. We could make an alternative provision in the Bill.

Mr. J. V. ELLIS (St. John City). As I understand it, ballots are to come from the printer in pads numbered, is that right?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Yes.

Mr. ELLIS. And how are they to be stamped by the returning officer? How can he stamp them on the face?

Mr. FOSTER. They are only fastened at one end, like bank cheques in a book.

Mr. T. B. FLINT (Yarmouth). I was a returning officer myself once, and speaking from experience. If the returning officer has to stamp the ballots for a large constituency—say, 20,000 ballots—he must have some compensation for doing so. It will take a smart clerk two or three days to do the work. In that case I will move, that in addition to the compensation already provided for the returning officer, he be allowed for stamping the ballots on the back with the official stamp, actual time used, not exceeding $6. I suggest here $6, but that can be discussed. If this is not accepted, I shall move it as an amendment at the proper time.

Mr. E. F. CLARKE (West Toronto). The hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton) asked the Solicitor General if it was the intention to have the stamp issued to the returning officer afterwards destroyed. I suppose it is not intended to be used in one election after another. It would be better to have it destroyed and not leave such things lying about.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. It is intended to provide that the stamp shall be returned to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, with the poll-book and other things that the deputy returning officer has to send back. I have ascertained that these stamps will only cost 75 cents each.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think what is still more important than the stamping is the quality of the paper. Though there is legislation prescribing a certain quality of paper, that quality is not used. Those who examined the ballots that were shown in the Committee of Privileges and Elections will remember that the paper was not half the thickness of what the law required. The only way to get over that is for the government to supply the paper to the officer who is to have the ballots printed. It is not necessary to have a specially manufactured paper, but a quality of paper should be chosen and supplied by the government. If the printing is left to a newspaper office, they will put it on cheap paper, just as sure as we are sitting here, and if you have cheap paper, you have opportunities offered to those connected with the polling to see for whom the vote is cast.

Mr. BERGERON. That is a good suggestion, and I would just add a word. Though it may be true that in some constituencies lying at a distance from Ottawa it is not possible to supply the ballots within the time allowed, could we not name in the Bill the constituencies within reach from Ottawa which could be so served, leaving the ballots for the outside constituencies to be printed where it is found convenient?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I am not prepared to go as far as my hon. friend (Mr. Bergeron), but, after consulting with the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), I think we ought to accept the suggestion that the paper should be sent out.

Section 79 reconsidered.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I propose to add the following paragraphs to clause 79, between paragraphs e and f:

Forges or counterfeits any stamp for the stamping of ballot papers under section 41, paragraph (h).

Uses any stamp furnished to a returning officer under that paragraph for any purpose other than the stamping of ballot papers pursuant to the said paragraph.

Not being a returning officer, has in his possession any such stamp or any counterfeit or imitation thereof.

Mr. BERGERON. I suggest that you add: 'Is guilty of an indictable offence, if he is a returning officer, deputy returning officer, or any other officer engaged at an election, or' anybody else. Here you are only indicting some of them. A gentleman at large would not be touched at all. He might have his pockets full of those papers.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. If he is a gentleman at large he comes under the second part of the penalty. Now, to meet the suggestion of the hon. member for Haldimand, I propose to add as paragraph 4, the following subsection to section 48:

The paper required for the printing of ballot papers shall be furnished to the returning officer by the Queen's Printer when the writ for the election is transmitted to him.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The Solicitor General had better add to that 'and the returning officer shall have the ballots printed on said paper.'

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. 'The paper required for the printing of the ballot papers shall be furnished.' I think that covers the idea. The paper on which the ballot shall be printed shall be furnished by the Queen's Printer.

Mr. INGRAM. Is that all the amendments you propose to the ballot paper?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Yes.

Mr. INGRAM. I understood the Minister of Finance to say the other day that he had a proposition about the ballot paper.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I was so anxious to see progress made with this Bill that I did not intend to ask the House to reconsider the form of ballot. I have no doubt the form of the ballot, as it is in the present Bill, is good enough for persons whose intelligence can be relied upon, but we know that persons will sometimes put their marks in all sorts of places. The ideal ballot would be a black ground with white letters giving the name of the candidate, and a white square or white disc for the mark of the voter. If there were ample time so as to get the ballots printed at headquarters and distributed, that would be quite feasible; but I am assuming that you have to adapt your ballot papers to the facilities of a country printing office, so that you can scarcely hope to reach your high ideal. My idea was to come as near as possible to it, by reducing to the smallest possible limits available the white space, having as much dark ground as possible, and as limited a white space as possible within which the mark was to be made. With that in view I have prepared a form of ballot. I do not think it is important enough to spend much time over it. I will send three or four copies over to my hon. friends. If the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Ingram), had not called attention to it, I did not intend to mention it, because I wanted to get on with the Bill.

Mr. INGRAM. I think this is one of the best suggestions that we have had yet. The aim is that the voter cannot make his mark anywhere else than in the white space.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not approve of the suggestion. I undertake to say there will be five or six voters in every polling booth who will make their mark outside the space allotted. It seems to me after all is said and done, that you have got already as good a ballot there, with the broad line, as you could possibly have.

Mr. FITZPATRICK.

Mr. INGRAM. The door is wide open to fraud in that form. There is no way of marking the ballot there, and any man that is fool enough to mark his ballot in there, ought to lose his vote.

Mr. BERGERON. I do not think this is an improvement. The member for Elgin means that in this form proposed by the Minister of Finance, the voter is bound to make his cross in the white space.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Not that he is bound to do it, but that he would have an inducement to do it, he cannot possibly put it anywhere else.

Mr. BERGERON. My hon. friend means that he can hardly do otherwise, it is merely restricting the space where he will be bound to make his mark. I have figured it out here, and I find forty ways by which the voter, if he wants to tell somebody outside how he can do it, can do it on this ballot.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. If he can do it in forty ways on this, he will do it in sixty ways on the other.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I have another amendment to section 79:

(g) Who being a returning officer, fraudulently puts otherwise than as authorized by section 70 of the Act, his initials on the back of any paper purporting to be or capable of being used as a ballot paper at an election, or

(h) who, with fraudulent intent, prints any ballot paper or what purports to be or is capable of being used as a ballot paper at an election, or

(i) who being authorized by the returning officer to print the ballot papers for an election, with fraudulent intent prints more ballot papers than he is so authorized to print, or

Mr. SPROULE. Is there anything in the Act providing that the number of ballots printed shall be proportioned to the number of electors? Otherwise, the number might run short as in some cases in the west. We generally print a supernumerary batch, so that the supply will not run out.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. We print the number required for each subdivision, and the printer will be required to give an affidavit of the number he has supplied to each returning officer. I want to make another amendment in reference to printed matter which we spoke of the other day. I have recast the proposed amendment of the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain), 125*a*, so as to restrict the scurrilous matter that is printed during an election. It is for the purpose of meeting what I understood to be the sense of the committee when we last discussed the subject:

Any printed matter whatsoever placarded, posted up or distributed during an election and having connection therewith or reference thereto, and which contains matter of a defamatory or scurrilous character, shall visibly bear on the face thereof the name and address of the printer and publisher thereof, and every one who prints, posts, publishes or distributes any such printed matter is liable to a penalty of dollars, or imprisonment for months.

I think the object was to punish any man who prints scurrilous stuff. The amendment of the hon. member for Montmorency would have been suitable, but for a remark made by the hon. member for York, N.B., (Mr. Foster), to the effect that a great portion of the electoral matter to be used is already printed and distributed in the country.

Mr. T. CHASE CASGRAIN (Montmorency). That could be met by saying that any publications that had been distributed before the law came into force would not come under the operation of the law. If any member, during the session of parliament, chooses to send out to his constituents matter before the election comes on, it would not be matter under this law. By such a proviso in the law this inconvenience could be got over. But, the amendment, as drafted by the Solicitor General, defeats the object that I had in view completely, and defeats the object they had in view in England when they passed this law exactly as I have placed the amendment before the House.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Would my hon. friend point out the English law? I have not been able to find it.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Who is to judge of what is scurrilous or defamatory? Is it the man who publishes it or the court? Then, sometimes in the opinion of somebody matter might be defamatory, and still it is not defamatory in the mind of the man who publishes it. For instance, if I publish matter which I believe to be true, and it turns out not to be true, and to be of a defamatory character against my opponent, and if I do not put on the printer's name, when it comes before the court I will be liable to be fined $500 for not having put upon this matter the name of the printer, and I will also be liable to prosecution and fine because I have published something defamatory of my opponent. The object of the amendment is that nobody can, during an election contest, in the heat of the contest, distribute among the electors matter which he would not distribute if he had to put upon the matter his own name or the name of the printer. I would not like to take any example which would not be tasteful to hon. gentlemen opposite, but in the election of 1896, if anybody had had to put upon the pamphlet, or the printed matter, which went out against the Conservative party about the purchase of rifles and guns, his own name or the name of the printer, such stuff would never have been distributed throughout Quebec as was distributed. I only take this as an instance without wishing to bring anything controversial before the committee at this time. There were other such publications distributed, which, no man would put before the country if he were obliged to sign them or to put to them the name of a responsible printer. It is that which I am trying to have suppressed. I am trying to have matter put before the public upon which the electors can exercise their honest judgment, and not have them read a lot of rubbish that no man would think of placing before them at ordinary times. If you say that it is to have the printer's name upon it, and that it has to be defamatory matter, there is no one to judge of its character before it comes before the court, and the whole object is defeated. The provision which I have suggested is not more in our favour than in favour of hon. gentlemen opposite. It is simply asking that the electors shall be able to judge as to the merits of the two parties on statements which are worth something.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I drafted this amendment to meet the objection made by the hon. member for York, N.B., in which I thought there was considerable force, but I now see that the amendment as drafted is absolutely worthless. The objection of the hon. member for York, N.B., was that if we adopted the amendment of the hon. member for Montmorency, all the printed matter, placards and posters which had been distributed in a number of constituencies up to that time, and which did not bear the printer's name, would be rendered valueless. There is a great deal of printed matter already prepared by both parties, and sent out to be distributed upon which the name of the printer does not appear, so that, if we adopted the amendment in the form introduced by the hon. member for Montmorency, all that matter would be reached, and it would nullify, to a very large extent, the work that has been done in this direction. It is for the committee to say whether they want to adopt such an amendment or not, because this is not a matter upon which I have a fixed opinion. I admit that the amendment that I have suggested is not one of any value, and I therefore beg to withdraw it.

Amendment withdrawn.

Mr. INGRAM. Could there not be some section drafted to meet the case of roor-backs?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Let my hon. friend (Mr. Ingram) draw some amendment which he thinks will meet the case, and which we will consider on the third reading of the Bill. If there is any merit in it we will have the Bill referred back for the purpose of adopting it, but I prefer that we should get the Bill through the committee stage.

The DEPUTY SPEAKER. Shall I report the Bill?

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Mr. Chairman, before you report the Bill I would like to say that my hon. friend (Mr. Fitzpatrick) has promised to provide for adopting either standard or solar time, because, in our province half of the returning officers follow solar time and the other half follow standard time. In some cases it may lead to fraud, because, a poll is either opened before the time, or it is closed after the time. I think we should have some provision fixing the time.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I promised to draw an amendment to meet that difficulty. The amendment which I have prepared is:

Any reference to a particular hour in the day shall be taken to mean such hour according to standard time.

My hon. friend, however, will see what that will lead to. Take the constituency of Brandon, for instance, which will be divided in two. One polling booth in one constituency would have one hour and another polling booth in the same constituency would have a different hour. I cannot understand exactly the suggestion made by my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Ellis).

Mr. ELLIS. In St. John where standard time is used we do not really use the time of our standard. The railways carry a time along with them and we take the time of the eastern standard when we are really in the Atlantic standard. That is the difficulty. You would have to define the standard as a certain time.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. I believe that the Act should be definite, and it should state if it is the solar time that should be followed. By inference that is the law, but it is not practised and it leads to fraud in certain cases, because the polls are opened before the hour and are closed after the hour very frequently.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The true remedy would be to prepare a Bill carefully drawn which would be made applicable to all cases relating to matters under federal control. I have such a Bill as that partly drawn, but of course it has to be submitted to experts to give proper definitions. In the absence of that I presume we will have to take the ordinary time used for ordinary purposes in the district.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. In the city of Winnipeg, there is twenty-six minutes difference between the solar and the standard time, and if such a Bill as the Solicitor General suggests is passed it would settle the very important question as to the closing of banks. The banks follow the standard time and it is certainly unfair that certain parties should be shut out from a bank to pay their notes before the real hour has arrived. If a general Act were made applicable it would settle that very important question as well as others.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The ordinary expression 'Standard Time' will not settle the question. The expression 'Standard Time' is really misleading. There is a railway standard time and in my own province there is a standard time which is not railway time, and it is not solar time. There is a convenient time adopted by the whole province, and it is fixed by law. What I suppose we all desire is that the time should be the ordinary usual time for business purposes in the district.

Mr. McNEILL. I call the attention of the Solicitor General to section 72. When we were last speaking of the ballot with the two counterfoils, there was a provision introduced into the section declaring that the ballot should be subject to inspection by the scrutineers. Is that still to apply to the ballot?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. There is no change in section 72 at all.

Mr. McNEILL. I propose to amend the section so as to make it read:

And shall then, after removing the counterfoil, immediately in the presence of the electors and still keeping the ballot paper in full view of those present, place it in the box.

The Solicitor General seemed to approve of that amendment. It is intended to prevent what unfortunately has been so common lately, namely, the deputy returning officer stealing the true ballot and substituting a false ballot.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I mean to adopt with reference to section 72, the same provision we adopted on the suggestion of the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Ingram) with reference to section 80, namely, that we shall deal with the ballot going into the ballot box in exactly the same way as when it is taken out. Would it not do to say:

And in full view of those present, place the ballot paper in the box.

Mr. McNEILL. I could in full view put the ballot into the box, but I could conceal it for some minutes before putting it into the box. What you want to provide is that the ballot shall not be concealed for one moment but that it shall be kept in view of those present and placed in the ballot box in that way. Will the Solicitor General accept these words:

Still keeping the ballot paper in full view of those present.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I am willing to go very far to accommodate my hon. friend as he knows. How would it do to make it read this way :

And shall then, in full view of those present, remove the counterfoil immediately, and in the presence of the electors, place the ballot paper in the box.

Mr. BRITTON. If you are going to adopt that suggestion, would it not be better to keep the ballot where it may be seen by all ?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I think it would meet the idea to make it read : 'And shall then, in full view of those present, remove immediately the counterfoil and place the ballot paper in the ballot box.'

Mr. KAULBACH. I think it would be well to leave the words, 'and in the presence of the elector.'

Mr. McNEILL. These frauds in Ontario were committed exactly in accordance with the words suggested by the Solicitor General, in full view of those present. The words I suggested were : 'And still keeping the ballot paper in full view of those present.'

Mr. KAULBACH. The Solicitor General will see that he omits the most important and essential part.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. There is absolutely no difference between the suggestion of the hon. member for North Bruce and what I have done.

Mr. McNEILL. The words suggested by the Solicitor General were complied with by the deputy returning officers who committed the frauds ; but, if they had been obliged to keep the ballot paper itself in view of those present, they could not have committed the frauds.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I want to add after the word 'counterfoil' in line 20, the words, 'and the stamp placed thereon by the returning officer.' That is to say, after the voter comes back, the returning officer shall examine, not only the initials, but the stamp as well.

Mr. McNEILL. We have here no safeguard against such frauds as were committed in Ontario in the substituting of one ballot paper for another. This Bill, as it is now, permits those frauds to be committed exactly as before.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I will venture to say that there is not another hon. gentleman on the other side of the House who will read the Bill and make that statement.

Mr. McNEILL. I think there is. One hon. gentleman has already said that the essential part has been left out.

Mr. McINERNEY. I think it would be better to leave in the clause the words, 'and in the presence of the elector.' The elector may have gone out.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The elector is to remain there for that purpose. If there is any doubt about that, I can make it clear.

Mr. INGRAM. The trouble is that the elector does go out, and does not see the ballot put in the box.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. We will make it read : 'in full view of those present, including the elector.'

Amendment of the Solicitor General agreed to.

Mr. McNEILL. My hon. friend the other day asked me to suggest to him some means by which the ballot box could be securely sealed, and I promised to do so. I would suggest that there be provided a stout paper box, which could, if necessary, be lined with linen, somewhat in the form of the small model which I show, into which the ballot box could be dropped. The cover could then be closed, and any number of seals could be put on the fastening. Therefore, I would suggest that the fourth subsection of section 83 be amended to read as follows :

The ballot box shall then be locked and sealed with the seal of the deputy returning officer, and shall be placed in a stout paper cover of the form and description set out in the form— which cover shall be sealed by the deputy returning officer and any agent of any of the candidates desiring to do so.

Then, in the last line, the following should be added :

And such person or persons shall convey and carry the ballot boxes with the utmost care and in such manner as to preserve from injury the covers of the same and the seal or seals affixed to the covers.

Mr. SPROULE. I am afraid that the defect in that Bill will be found when the ballot boxes are taken, as they often are, in a sleigh or wagon, fifteen or twenty of the boxes being put together. The shaking and rubbing together of the boxes would affect the paper covers, and, in case of rain or snow, they would receive injury. Sometimes, in case of rain or snow, they are covered with horse blankets.

Mr. McNEILL. We can provide a paper-cover of a very strong description. We can form an idea of the kind we can provide by the envelopes furnished for registered letters, lined with canvas or light cotton material. The duty is imposed upon these men of seeing that the boxes are properly looked after. My hon. friend suggests the propriety of allowing the ballot boxes to be collected and carried by one person, and what these people have to do, who take charge of the ballot boxes, is to carry them safely and securely. Even if it takes them a little longer to carry them safely, they have to take the necessary time. Surely you are not going to allow all this fraud to go on simply for the want of taking proper precautions to prevent it. If these people are instructed to carry the boxes safely, they can do it. If they are in the habit of covering them with covers that are not waterproof, we ought to provide them with covers that are.

Bill reported.

It being One o'clock, the House took recess.

The House resumed at Three o'clock.

JUDGES OF PROVINCIAL COURTS.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 189) to amend the Act respecting the judges of the provincial courts.

Mr. T. CHASE CASGRAIN (Montmorancy). Mr. Speaker, I intend offering a few remarks before the motion is put to the House. One part of this Bill, and an important part of it, provides for an increase in the number of judges of the Superior Court of the province of Quebec. The argument that is put forward here is not that the increase is necessary, but more that the provincial legislature of Quebec having voted that the number of judges in the province of Quebec should be increased by three, this House is bound to vote the salaries of the increased number of judges. Now, I cannot accept that as an absolute proposition of law. It seems to me that it is not founded on the constitution which governs us; there is nothing in the Constitutional Act which says that if provincial legislature increases the number of judges, we here are bound to vote the salaries of the increased number of judges, whatever that number may be. I take it that an understanding should be come to between the two powers, the provincial and the Dominion, upon this very important subject. There should be an understanding, so that the administration of justice in the province should be carried on with efficiency and in such a manner as to satisfy the general needs of the public; but I cannot agree to the proposition that whatever number of judges it pleases the provincial legislature to make in a province, we here are constrained to vote the salaries of those judges, even though it may be patent to the House that the increase in the number is altogether abnormal, not required by the administration of justice in the province, or even almost ridiculous. I desire, for a very few moments, to call the attention of this House to the existing system of the province of Quebec. This system was inaugurated as far back as 1857, so hon. gentlemen will see immediately that, from its very antiquity, it cannot be up to the necessities of the present time. There are ten judges now appointed for the district of Montreal, plus a judge for the district of Terrebonne, who all reside in Montreal, and who administer justice in the judicial district of Montreal. There are four judges appointed to administer justice in the district of Quebec. Then, there are sixteen judges for the rural districts, that is, for those districts outside of the districts of Quebec and Montreal. This makes a total of thirty-one judges of the Superior Court for the province of Quebec. The judges in the city of Quebec and Montreal receive $5,000 a year each, except the chief justice, who receives $6,000 and the acting chief justice in Montreal, who also receives $6,000. In the rural districts, the judges receive $4,000 a year, except the judges for the district of Gaspé and the district of Saguenay and Chicoutimi, who receive $3,750 each, I believe. Now, more than half of the work of the whole province of Quebec is done in the district of Montreal. This can be easily proven by the statistics, and I believe that nobody will contradict the statement. But what do the statistics show as to the rural districts outside of the city of Montreal and Quebec? I call the attention of the House particularly to this point. The Superior Court has jurisdiction for the recovery of all sums over $100 in the cities of Montreal and Quebec, and over $200 in the rural districts. I refer to the official statistics taken from the Official Gazette of Quebec, and published every year, and furnished to the department of the Attorney General by the different prothonotaries and clerks throughout the province of Quebec. These statistics will show to the House that it is absolutely ridiculous to use an expression which it is not at all too strong—to increase the number of judges in the province of Quebec. These are the figures of last year, showing the number of contested cases and the number of judgments given in contested cases. I take the figures of last year, because they are very little different from any for the last ten years:

Name of District.	No. of con- tested cases.	No. of Judgments in con- tested cases.
Arthabaska .....	39	24
Beauharnois .....	20	25
Chicoutimi & Saguenay	47	33
Gaspé .....	19	10
Iberville .....	31	32
Kamouraska .....	45	42
Richelieu .....	18	28
Rimouski .....	15	17

Now, if hon. gentlemen will take these figures and analyse them, they will see that the judges who preside in these districts, have really not enough work to occupy their time for two months in the year; they have not enough to employ themselves usefully for the country. This system, as I said before, was established in 1857. At that time, in the province of Quebec, means of communication were very limited, and it was necessary to bring about what was called the decentralization of justice, to establish courts in the rural districts far from the great centres, so that judges might be brought nearer to the people and litigants should be able to obtain justice at as small a cost as possible. But, to-day, circumstances have changed enormously, and one of the best evidences that the system is behind the age and that it is not now required in the Province of Quebec. To show that the existing system is not thought essential to the good administration of justice is that of the sixteen rural judges, whose residences are fixed in the chief towns of rural districts, seven reside in the district of Montreal, or the district of Quebec. That is to say, more than half of the rural judges—without protest, so far as I can learn from the litigants in the districts in which they should reside—reside either in the city of Quebec or the city of Montreal. The judges who reside outside their districts, and their places of residence are as follows:

Delorimier, Joliette, Montreal.
 Ouimet, Richelieu, Montreal.
 Taschereau, Terrebonne, Montreal.
 Lemieux, St. Francis, Quebec.
 Choquette, Arthabaska, Quebec.
 Pelletier, Beauce, Quebec.
 Larue, Rimouski, Quebec.
 Lynch, Bedford, Knowlton.
 Lavergne, Ottawa and Pontiac, Ottawa.
 Langelier, Montreal, Quebec.

Now, the question is, what is the proper remedy for all this? How would it be possible to have a fairer distribution of the work among the judges, so that those judges in Montreal should not be overworked, and the gentlemen who administer justice in the rural districts should have more work to do? I am not complaining of the rural judges, because they themselves are the first to say that they have not enough work, and they hope that some system will be found by which they may be able to give more of their time to the administration of justice. On a previous occasion, I told the House that some years ago, while occupying the position of Attorney General of the province of Quebec, I brought in a Bill in the legislature, designed to effect a reform; but that Bill did not pass. Although this Bill did not meet with the approval of the electors of the province of Quebec or of the legislature, there must be some other means by which a more equitable system of work could be devised, by which the judges of the rural districts would have a sufficiency of work to occupy their time at least half the year. I do not for an instant advocate the centralization of the administration of justice in the city of Montreal, or the city of Quebec. In the first place, such a measure would never carry, and in the second place, I do not think that it would be for the general advantage of the province. But if it were possible to bring a certain number of the rural judges to live in Montreal and Quebec, and to administer justice in those two cities, and also to go on circuit in the rural districts, it seems to me that it would be one means of remedying the evil and the abuse which exists to-day. I have heard advocates, those who reside in the rural districts themselves say, that it is an inconvenience to them—to say no more—to have the same judge presiding always at the courts in the rural districts. They would like to have a change. Of course, judges are human, and they are but men; and they have their biases and their preferences. But, I believe that the rural barrister, even would like it if some system could be inaugurated by which the judges would sit in the rural districts by rotation, and thereby remedy the evil of the members of the rural bar having to go before the same judges all the time. In practice, I may say, this was done to some extent, till 1898, and it seemed to work well. Hon. gentlemen who are familiar with the system in the province of Quebec, know that there is an Appellate Court, which is called the court of review, consisting of three judges of the Superior Court.

This court sits at Montreal for the districts which are attached for that purpose to the district of Montreal, and it sits in the district of Quebec for those districts which are attached for that purpose to the district of Quebec. Until 1898, the judges from all parts of the province took part in the deliberations of the Court of Review. They came from different parts of the province to sit in review of the judgment which had been rendered by their confreres of the Superior Court, either in the city of Montreal or in the city of Quebec, and it seemed that this system worked very well. In 1898, the Attorney General, seeing that the system which exists now in the province of Quebec could not last much longer, seeing that it was defective, introduced and passed a law in the legislature of Quebec by which he specifically allowed the judges from the rural districts to sit in the Court of Review. This statute is 61 Vic., chap. 20, and the first section reads as follows:

Articles 20 and 21 of the Revised Statutes are amended by adding thereto the following:

The judges of the Court of Review are to be taken from among all the judges of the Superior Court of the province, at the discretion of the chief justice or of the acting chief justice, as the case may be.

The judges of the Court of Review are to be taken from among all the judges of the Superior Court of the province, at the discretion of the chief justice or of the acting chief justice, as the case may be. Then, as I say, judges from all parts of the province sat in the Court of Review. It had two good effects. First of all it gave the judges of the rural districts more work to do, and satisfied them, because they themselves complained that they had not enough to do, that they were becoming rusty, because they were called upon so rarely to sit and to judge cases coming before them. But unfortunately, I think, in the same year, by statute 61, Vic., chap. 52, section 8, the Solicitor General introduced a law here which rendered the law passed by the province of Quebec almost inoperative by requiring certain certificates to be delivered to the judges who now sit in the Court of Review, thereby almost preventing them from coming up. Since then the judges in Montreal especially have had not only to accomplish their duties as judges of the Superior Court sitting in the first instance, but have also had to sit in review. Now the cases in the Court of Review in Montreal are of an enormous number. The judges sit there on an average six and seven days in a month in the Court of Review, reviewing the judgments which have been rendered by the Superior Court. This takes up not only the time during which they have to sit as judges in the Court of Review, but the hon. gentleman will see that it also takes up much of the time which they would otherwise be able to devote to deliberating on cases which they have heard in the first instance. Now in the session of 1899, by the provincial Act, 62 Vic., chap. 19, section 1, the number of judges in the province of Quebec which had been up to that time thirty-one, which was thought to be too great a number, was increased to thirty-four. The Hon. Mr. Archambault, in proposing the law in the legislative council where he is leader of the government, made the remarks which I will read. The hon. gentleman will see that these remarks are of great interest to this House in showing that if a proper understanding had taken place between the government now in power and the government of Quebec, between whom I believe great sympathy exists, the provincial authorities would not have resolved to increase the number of judges. If a proper understanding had been come to by which the judges could have been brought to the cities of Montreal and Quebec to administer justice there, going into the other districts by rotation to sit in circuit, it would not have been necessary for this House to vote the salaries which we are now called upon to vote. Here is what Mr. Archambault said in the legislative council answering the leader of the opposition Mr. Chapais :

He (Mr. Chapais) may rest assured that I urged the federal authorities to apply the law of the last session;

Mr. CASGRAIN.

That is the law of which I have just spoken by which these rural district judges were authorized to sit in the Court of Review.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Would the hon. gentleman point out how we can affect that law in any way ?

Mr. CASGRAIN. I think the hon. gentleman has affected it by the law which he passed here in 1899, by which Mr. Archambault himself thought that the provincial law had been rendered inoperative, that is, by the federal statute, 61 Vic., chap. 52. I have not got the Act here, but I will proceed to read what Mr. Archambault said, and the hon. gentleman can take what consolation he may find in the remarks of the Attorney General :

He may rest assured that I urged the federal authorities to apply the law of the last session, but I have become aware that instead of applying it, they have done nothing but prevent its operation by the provisions of the statute they passed at the last session of the federal parliament. We have, in this matter, two powers face to face, but they must come to an understanding. The provincial legislature makes known its needs, to Ottawa belongs the task of applying a remedy. I have been unable to obtain the desired remedy, so I have taken another means. In presence of the statute which I propose to pass, the federal government will see that the remedy lies either in the law passed last year and in the provisions tending towards the same end, or in the law of this year; it will then decide as far as I am concerned, my responsibility will be covered.

Now, Mr. Archambault says: I proposed a law during the session of 1898, by which I empowered the judges of the rural districts to sit in review, thereby, as I thought, relieving the judges of Montreal and Quebec of the work which bears so heavily upon them, and at the same time giving the rural judges more work to do. But, he says, after I passed that law, the federal parliament passed another law which renders my law inoperative in that it imposes upon the judges that come to sit in review certain restrictions and certain conditions which they will not accept. Now the Solicitor General says: Is it because I asked the judges to send in honest accounts for their day's labour that they considered this such an evil that it rendered the law inoperative? Now, I do not think my hon. friend can say that the accounts which have been heretofore presented to the government were dishonest accounts. Some of the judges may have had a misconception of the law on the subject, but it seems to me that, excepting in one or two cases, such a law as this was not necessary to put a stop to what had been, I am free to admit, an abuse. However, the judges say it is impossible for them to comply with the conditions which that law of 1899 imposed upon them, that it is against their dignity, and they refuse to do it. They simply say: Well, we will sit at home, we will not perform the duties which we were called upon to perform by the law of the Attorney General. Be that as it may, there is something wrong here. On the one hand you have the Attorney General of Quebec who says: The remedy lies in the law which I passed in 1898; and he says also: But my law was rendered inoperative by the law which was passed in the Dominion parliament. I gave the Dominion authorities a remedy and they do not choose to accept it; now, the only thing I can do is to fall back on the increase in the number of judges. By the remarks of the Attorney General, which I have just read it will be clearly seen that he himself thinks that it is not necessary to increase the number of judges in the province of Quebec, and everybody in that province is of the same opinion. But nobody will tackle the question. Now, seeing the friendly relations which exist between the Dominion authorities and the provincial authorities, it seems to me that they could come to an understanding by which the number of judges instead of being increased could be decreased, and still the evil which exists, especially in the city of Montreal, would disappear.

Now, the increase in the number of judges, it seems to me, gives rise, firstly, to an unnecessary increase in the expenditure of the country by $15,000 a year, but that is not the worst evil. It virtually renders permanent a system which everybody in the province of Quebec says is behind the times, and which should be radically amended. Again, I say, I am not at all in favour of the centralization of justice, but there are means, and I am sure that the hon. Solicitor General will be able to devise means by which the judges who administer justice in the rural districts will have more to do, and the judges in cities less to do. Then, there would be a fair equilibrium established between the work of the judges in cities and the work of the judges in rural districts. Just let me read to the House an interview given to one of the papers some time ago by one of the rural judges in the province of Quebec, Mr. Justice Cimon, of the district of Kamouraska. Mr. Justice Cimon, as every hon. gentleman who has sat in this House, and as every one who has practiced before him, knows, is one of the most distinguished judges in Quebec. He sat in the district of Joliette, and also in the district of Montreal, and he gave the greatest satisfaction. He is a man who has administered justice in large cities and in his own district, but he is obliged under the law to remain in his own rural district, although he has only forty-five contested cases in the Superior Court in a year. That is work which a man could do in one or two months, and when I say two months, I am putting it at the utmost limit. I am sure he could do it in one or two months, which leaves ten or eleven months of the year during which he has nothing at all to do, and, as Mr. Justice Cimon says, he gets rusty. An interview was published in La Presse some time ago in which Mr. Justice Cimon discussed the question. I am reading this interview because it puts my own views before the House in a better shape than I could do it myself:

In order to force a judge to reside in his district there must be the fulfilment of this condition, that there shall be enough work in the district to give reasonable occupation to the judge. If he has nothing, or almost nothing to do in the district, why keep him there? The judge desires nothing so much as to be kept busy. He would like to have work all the time, but unfortunately the judge for the district of Kamouraska has not enough work to occupy his time for one month out of the twelve.

And he is one of the judges in the rural districts, who has most to do.

He is, therefore, idle for eleven months. Is he to be shut up in his chambers at the courthouse doing nothing but gazing at the blank walls for eleven months in the year?

Some say that the presence of the judge in the district is a guarantee for the morality of its inhabitants. . . . I would like to know what guarantee of public morality, or what counter-poison for socialism, the presence of the judge furnishes in the district when he has almost nothing to do, and has to keep promenading around like one who is lost so as to while away the time.

Some time since I heard a story about the late Judge Thomas J. J. Loranger, of Sorel, and I think it worth repeating.

You are aware that Judge Loranger was one of our most intellectual men, a worker and a 'savant.' He was judge for Sorel, where he had not enough work to occupy a reasonable part of his time. Notwithstanding his literary works, and although he wrote law books, months elapsed without his knowing what to do with himself. So that, to get some distraction, to make time pass more fastly, he would start in the morning, with a book under his arm, would walk along the Queen's highway, because there is no other distraction in the country—would go up towards the concessions, stopping where he got a fine view of the landscape or could rest under the shade of some trees, reading, then resuming his walk until the evening brought him home again.

Well, the people who saw him doing this said: 'Do look at our judge, he must be mad.'

It is essential, if the judge is to be expected to administer justice soundly, that he be kept reasonably busy; if he is not, his mind and his judgment are sure to suffer, and in the long run the litigants will be the losers.

It must not be forgotten that in most of the rural districts, the judge must abstain from taking any share in any commercial or other enterprise, or in any business or co-operative associations which are organized in the district, because he would be apt to be accused at any moment. He must, very often also, deprive himself of social relations. This all goes to show that if he has not in the district enough judicial business to occupy him, what can he do, and why shut him up in his district? Is this not an unreasonable state of things? Why not give him some other occupation?

This puts the views of the judges of Quebec before the House, and it also crystallizes the views that I have to offer to the House upon the subject. There is no doubt of it, as Judge Cimon says, when a judge is not kept reasonably busy, his mind and his judgment are sure to suffer, and in the long run litigants will be the losers. He is deprived of almost any intercourse or deliberation with his fellow judges. He is taken away from the large libraries which are to be found in the centres, and although he can, with the limited means at his disposal purchase books, he is still deprived of the advantage of consulting those great works which he would have if he lived in a centre. The increase in the number of judges from thirty-one to thirty-four in the province of Quebec will simply have the effect of keeping in existence a system which has long been antiquated, and which should disappear from the statutes of Quebec. I cannot blame the hon. Solicitor General very much for this state of things, because I know it is a very difficult subject to handle; but, it seems to me, that, with the ability that characterized my hon. friend, and with the friendly relations which exist between the governments of the Dominion and the province, the government could well come to some understanding with the provincial ministers by which this system would be changed and the evils that flow from it, both for judges and litigants, would be made to disappear. The matter of least importance to my mind is the increase of $15,000 a year that the passing of this law will entail upon the Dominion treasury. There is another evil, and it is this: Everybody knows that the salaries paid the judges in the province of Quebec and other provinces, and especially in the cities of Montreal and Quebec, are totally inadequate to the needs and wants of the judges and to the social standing which they occupy in these cities. I will leave it to anybody who resides in Quebec, or Montreal, to say whether these judges who occupy the high and distinguished positions which they do should be expected to live upon $5,000 a year. In the city of Montreal the first thing that a man has to do in the position of a judge is to pay $1,000 a year rental. The last time the salaries were readjusted was in 1872, when the salaries of judges in cities were fixed at $5,000 a year. Anybody living in these cities will tell hon. gentlemen who live elsewhere that it is absolutely impossible for a judge to sustain his rank and live up to the dignity that appertains to his position on a salary of $5,000 a year. If you compare the salaries which other men get, occupying situations which are not at all to be compared with the situations which judges occupy, you will see that they are getting $10,000, $15,000 and $20,000 a year. Take bank managers, take managers of railways, and not the largest railways either, take managers of insurance companies and large business houses; they all have salaries which are far beyond the paltry $5,000 which our judges are getting. If this law is passed and the number of judges is increased to thirty-four, I say that it will be impossible, for a number of years to come, to change the system, because, when a resolution is presented to this House increasing the salaries of judges, this House will say, as it has said before: You have too many judges of the Superior Court in Quebec. As long as you have thirty-four judges of the Superior Court in Quebec it is impossible to increase their salaries to any sum adequate to meet the necessities of the case. The legislature of Ontario passed an Act in 1868-9 adding an additional $1,000 a year to the salaries of judges in that province, and if I am not mistaken all the judges in the High Court of that province received $5,000 a year under the federal statute. The preamble of the Ontario Act reads as follows:

And whereas, under the altered circumstances of the country—

Remember, that was away back in 1868.

—and the increased expense of living, it has been found that the judges of the Superior Court are inadequately paid; it is therefore enacted that there shall be paid for the year 1869, and for every other year thereafter out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of this province annually, to the president or chief justice of the Court of Error and Appeal, and to each of the judges of the Superior Court of Law and Equity in this province the sum of $1,000.

The province of Ontario saw that the salaries of the judges were absolutely inadequate, and so the legislature passed this Act; although, in my opinion, they did so unconstitutionally. The province of Quebec has not seen fit, or has not been able, to follow the example, so that the judges in our province are on an unequal footing with the judges of Ontario as regards salaries, and I venture to say that the Quebec judges, especially those in Montreal, do more work than the Ontario judges. The last readjustment of salaries in the province of Quebec was made in the year 1873; a very long while ago. We have the evidence of men high up in the financial and social circles in Montreal and throughout the country that the cost of living, especially for those in the position of judges, has increased by 30 per cent since then, and yet the salaries of our judges have remained the same. I shall give to the House some figures which will show what the other colonies pay their judges, and by comparison hon. gentlemen will see how inadequately Canadian judges are paid. Of course, I base no argument on the handsome salaries paid to judges in England, because England is a richer country, and can better afford it. The following will show the salaries of the judges in the different countries :

Schedule of Salaries.

England.

Lord Chancellor .....	£10,000	say $50,000
Lord Chief Justice .....	8,000	40,000
3 Lords Ordinary in Appeal, each .....	6,000	30,000
28 Judges of first instance, each .....	5,000	25,000

Ireland.

Lord Chancellor .....	8,000	40,000
Chief Justice .....	5,000	25,000
Chief Baron .....	4,600	23,000
2 Bankruptcy Court Judges, each .....	2,000	10,000
Admiralty Judge .....	1,200	6,000
11 Judges, each .....	3,500	17,500

Scotland.

13 Judges receive £49,000 among them, or an average of .....	3,800	19,000
---	-------	--------

In England.

Fifty-seven County Court Judges, each £3,800, say $19,000, and travelling expenses.

Twenty-seven Metropolitan Police Magistrates : senior, £1,800, say $9,000 ; remainder, each, £1,500, say $7,500.

Colony.	Popu- lation.	Chief Justice.	Puisne Justice.
Victoria .....	1,104,288	$17,500	$15,000
New South Wales.....	1,042,919	17,500	13,000
Queensland .....	387,463	12,500	10,000
South Australia .....	318,308	10,000	8,500
New Zealand .....	649,349	8,500	7,500

In colonies not possessing the full powers of responsible government, but which have in most cases an elective assembly, the salaries are as follows :

Colony.	Popu- lation.	Chief Justice.	Puisne Justice.
Jamaica.....	580,804	$10,000	$6,000
Barbadoes .....	171,860	5,000	None.
Trinidad .....	189,566	9,000	"
Mauritius .....	369,302	8,750	$6,000
Hong Kong.....	215,800	12,000	8,160

It will be seen that even in the smaller colonies, with a population much less than ours, the chief justices and the judges receive much higher salaries than do our Canadian judges. This question has come before our public men already, and it has been discussed in this House. I shall read the remarks made by Sir John Macdonald in 1883. He said :

There is a feeling among the bench and bar in Ontario that the incomes of leading counsel have so much increased in consequence of the increased wealth of the country, that the salaries at present paid to the judges are insufficient to induce leading counsel to retire to the quiet and dignity of the bench. I believe, also, the same feeling prevailed in the city of Montreal among the professional and commercial classes there, that the judges are not sufficiently remunerated to secure the best talent for the bench.

The difficulty the government have in dealing with the question is, that the moment they deal with the salaries of the judges in any one province, there arises a corresponding demand, although the same necessity may not exist, from all the other provinces. This is the difficulty which the government felt, and this together with other circumstances of a temporary nature, with which I need not trouble the committee, prevented the government coming down with any measure during the present session.

In answer to the suggestions of my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), I will say that the government intend to address themselves during recess with a view of studying the pressure and the reason of the pressure that exists in the province of Ontario and in Montreal, and is brought to bear on the government in this relation, and will come down with some general scheme next session.

It will be seen that in the year 1883 the government was impressed with the necessity of increasing the salaries of our judges. In 1892, Sir John Thompson said in this House :

I was asked yesterday evening to state what would be done with item 9 respecting judges' salaries. I regret to say that we do not see our way to bring those resolutions forward this session. It is my expectation that the government will bring them forward and ask a vote upon them at an early period next session. In the meantime, it is intended that some representations shall be made by the government to the provincial governments of some of the provinces, with a view to improving the judicial system. If it meet the pleasure of the House next session, as I hope it may, the salaries of the judges will be made as the resolutions have indicated.

Therefore, in 1892, Sir John Thompson saw the pressing necessity for increasing the salaries of the judges, and he said, and rightly said, that he would interview the provincial authorities to see whether the existing system in the different provinces could not be ameliorated so that it would be less difficult for the federal government to bring down a measure dealing with the question as a whole. It is a fact that the late Sir John Thompson and myself had several interviews upon the subject. As a result of our discussions, I had the honour to introduce a Bill in the legislature of Quebec which had the hearty support of my hon. friend the Solicitor General.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. It never got beyond its second reading.

Mr. CASGRAIN. No. Such a change as that was undoubtedly an important one, and I could not expect that when I brought down the Bill for the first time, in 1894, that it should pass at that session. I could not even expect that it would pass in 1895, but all that time public opinion was becoming impressed with the idea that the system which prevailed in the province of Quebec was not up to the times. At a meeting of the members of the bar from all parts of the province that I convened in Quebec, there was only one dissentient voice amongst the members of the rural bar against the proposed law, because when it was explained that the Bill in question would not at all interfere with the decentralization of the judges, that the court-houses would exist just the same in the chef-lieu of the rural districts, that the prothonotaries, clerks and other officers would still retain office, and that the judges would go from Montreal and Quebec to administer justice, then they understood that the measure was not at all attacking the system of decentralization, and that it was simply a measure calculated to enable the judges of the rural districts to occupy their time, and by which the congestion of affairs in the city of Montreal would be relieved.

I am not going to say that that plan was the best plan; I am not going to say that it is the plan that should have been adopted; I am not going to press upon the House my views on that question. It was only put before the House in a tentative way so as to draw from the House and from the people of the province their views as to the best way of doing away with an abuse which everybody knew existed; and if the agitation had been kept up by my successors in office, and especially if this government had impressed upon them that they would not vote the salaries of an increased number of judges before the system had been changed and ameliorated, I am sure that the Attorney General of Quebec, who is a progressive and very intelligent man, would have been able to come to some understanding with the authorities here by which a measure of relief satisfactory to everybody would have been provided. Before leaving this subject, let me read to the House some other extracts from speeches made, not by members of parliament, but by disinterested parties, showing that those who come to this country are impressed with the idea that our judges are not sufficiently paid. As far back as 1878, Lord Dufferin, who was certainly an independent judge of such questions as these, and who, when he spoke, only spoke because he thought he was doing his duty, and was giving good advice to the people of Canada, at the opening of the Toronto exhibition, spoke as follows:

With regard to the independence of the judges, I will say nothing; notwithstanding what has been done elsewhere, I do not think that the Canadian people will ever be tempted to allow the judges of the land to be constituted by popular election. Still, on this continent there will always be present in the air, as it were, a certain tendency in that direction, and it is against this I would warn you. And now that I am on this topic, there is one further observation I am tempted to make in regard to the position of the judges. I should hope that as time goes on, as the importance and extent of their work increases, and as the wealth of the country expands, it may be found expedient to attach somewhat higher salaries to those who administer the law. Pure and righteous justice is the very foundation of human happiness, but remember it is as true of justice as of anything else, you cannot have a first-class article without paying for it. In order to secure an able bar, you must provide adequate prizes for those who are called to it. If this is done, the intellectual energy of the country will be attracted to the legal profession, and you will have what is the greatest ornament any country can possess, an efficient and learned judiciary.

Again, Lord Russell, when he visited this country in 1896, spoke at Montreal, on September 2 of that year, as follows:

I have sometimes thought that in the case of the judges charged with the great and responsible duty of the administration of the law, the state did not recognize sufficiently the position that these judges fill.

Even in England it is true to-day that in the cases of nine out of ten appointed to hold office in the Superior Courts, they have to make great sacrifices in taking a seat on the bench. I do not mean to say that the payment of judges should approach the very great incomes of the leading individual members of the bar, but I venture to say that, in England and here, where the independence of judges and the high respect in which they are held is undoubtedly high, the remuneration and position of the judges ought to be such as to attract the ambition and desire of the best men in the profession. It certainly does so in this land and in England, to a great extent; but there is a great discrepancy between the incomes of the leading members of the bar and those of the great body of the judges on the bench. I think, in the interests of the community, not merely in the narrow interests of the profession, that the position should be looked up to as an elevated one, worthy of the noblest and highest ambition.

Just before leaving this country, Lord Aberdeen, without being prompted by anybody, at a banquet given to him in Ottawa, repeated the same sentiments, saying in no uncertain terms that he considered that the judges of this country were insufficiently paid, and he tried to impress upon his hearers, among whom were several distinguished gentlemen, including, I believe, the right hon. leader of the House, the necessity of paying the judges salaries which would be adequate to the high positions they occupy and the great duties they have to perform. It will be said by some who generally look on the lawyers with disfavour, 'How is it that so many lawyers seek for a place on the judicial bench if the salary is inadequate to the position?' I think that is not at all a proper criterion by which to judge of the salaries which the judges deserve. It is well known that after a man has spent twenty-five or thirty years in the exercise of his profession as a lawyer, the most wearing profession a man can follow, having upon his shoulders, not only his own cares, but those of his clients, who bring to him their difficulties of every sort—I say, after a man has exercised that noble profession for twenty-five or thirty years, he is worn out, and it is not surprising that he should seek some repose. Men who follow other pursuits generally amass sufficient fortune to enable them to live in retirement in their later years. Not so with lawyers. It is well known that lawyers, though they make large fees, generally spend all they earn, and after they have followed their profession for twenty-five or thirty years, they have not the retiring allowance which every other man, be he farmer, merchant, or railway magnate, enjoys. To put my remarks in small compass, I say, first of all, that it is absolutely unnecessary to increase the number of judges in the province of Quebec. It is imposing upon the budget of the people of Canada a permanent increase of $15,000 a year, and it is perpetuating in the province of Quebec a system which everybody admits to be an antiquated system, and which everybody says ought to be radically changed; and it is preventing, for a great many years to come, a consummation which everybody desires—an increase in the salaries of the judges, to put them on an equal footing with those who occupy correspondingly high and important positions in the state.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I am entirely at one with my hon. friend (Mr. Casgrain) as to the necessity of increasing the salaries of the judges. I entirely agree that in this country the judges are very inadequately paid, and I am prepared to state at the present time the salaries of the judges are not at all proportionate to the fees earned by men occupying leading positions at the bar. However, we are not called upon at the present time to deal with that question. The only question we are called upon to deal with is whether or not there exists a necessity for the appointment of three additional judges in the district of Montreal. I notice that the hon. member for Montmorency was content to speak of the judges in the province of Quebec, saying that they were sufficient in number to perform all the duties assigned to them under our system. With that statement I have absolutely no quarrel. The great majority of our judges in the province of Quebec are, to say the least, not overworked. But, there is a condition of things existing in that province for which this government is not responsible, over which this government has no control, and for which this government can provide no remedy.

The organization of the courts in the province of Quebec, as in all the other provinces, is a matter exclusively within the jurisdiction of the provincial legislature, and we cannot interfere with them directly or indirectly. We cannot say, for instance, that in the province of Quebec, there shall be a judicial district which shall comprehend certain territory, or that two districts shall be combined into one, that all the judges shall sit in the cities of Quebec and Montreal, and then go from these cities out to the different portions of the province for the purpose of exercising their duties. We have no control over that. We have to take the system in existence in the province of Quebec, which we did not create, over which we have no control, and which we cannot remedy, and we have to apply our statutes to that system.

My hon. friend says that in the province of Quebec there are too many judges, but he did not say that there were too many in the district of Montreal, or that there were sufficient in that district, or that we were acting improvidently in appointing these three judges in addition to those already there. He did not say a word about that, but was content to travel over a subject not in dispute here at all. Dealing with the question of organization of the courts, he said that if the Dominion government had an understanding with the local government, we possibly might bring about a condition of things, which would make these additional appointments unnecessary. But my hon. friend tried his hand at that in 1894 in the legislature of that province, and he then had the co-operation of some of those who sat in opposition there at that time. He had myself, for instance, and I did all I could to help him to bring about a change in the condition of things existing in the province of Quebec. But the government, of which he was a member, would not back him up, and his Bill never got a second reading, notwithstanding the fact that he was Attorney General of one of the strongest governments in that province, speaking from the standpoint of numerical majority.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Quality too, I hope.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I leave that for my hon. friend to decide. He was one of those who knew most about it, and was glad to leave. He was on the inside, and I was not. But my hon. friend tried to remedy the conditions and introduced legislation with that purpose, and he failed. He never got his Bill beyond a second reading. The only one who stood up in the Quebec House to support my hon. friend was myself.

How can we remedy that condition? My hon. friend could not do it, and I say that there is no government that has been in existence in the province, in my time at all events, that ever could remedy the existing condition of things there, and I do not believe that in the near future we shall see any government in that province which will be able to change our judicial system because to that system our people are wedded—the system of decentralization, a system under which the judges are supposed to live in the districts in which they are assigned, and in which they are to perform their duties under the patents appointing them. If they violate the law and live elsewhere, they ought to be brought to book for it.

My hon. friend was good enough to read a criticism on our judicial system given by Judge Cimon, as to the propriety of which I have nothing to say. I leave it to the House to say whether a judge is the proper person to criticise a judicial system with which he is intimately connected. But Judge Cimon was not quite fair in his criticism. He said that he only performs one month's work in the year. That is his statement. But on looking at the Auditor General's Report, I find that he received $384 for travelling expenses and living allowance while he was supposed to be performing his duties in a district other than the one to which he was appointed.

Mr. BERGERON. Because he had not enough work at home.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I am not discussing the question whether he had or not, but whether or not he should say that he had simply one month's work in the year.

Mr. CASGRAIN. In his own district.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. A man who is appointed a judge, has, as a rule, or is presumed to have, sufficient moral sense to appreciate the fact that he has to give, in return for the salary he receives, a certain consideration to the state. When Judge Cimon accepted the position of judge in the district of Fraserville, he knew probably that he would not be called on to perform duties exceeding one month's work.

Mr. CASGRAIN. He was not appointed to the district of Kamouraska, but to the district of Joliette, and all the time he was in Joliette he sat in the district of Montreal.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. He went to Kamouraska of his own free will, and should not have gone there if he did not expect to have duties to perform while he was there.

My hon. friend says that we could bring about a remedy if we were to make the judges of the country parts come to Montreal and sit there.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Live there.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Or live there. But will my hon. friend say now how we can do that? What influence have we over the decision of any such question? How can we interfere directly or indirectly with that? He was content to say that we prevented the judges from going to Montreal because we passed legislation a year or two ago, providing that a judge who would go from the district to which he was appointed, should establish, to the satisfaction of the Department of Justice, that he went from his district at the request of the chief justice of the court to which he belonged, and also that when he left his district to go to any other place in the province for the purpose of exercising his judicial functions, he should charge so much per day for living allowance, and not do, as the judges had been doing previously, charge three days for one. That is to say, a judge under our system is entitled to receive $6 a day for living allowance, but they were in the habit of charging three days for one. We put an end to that, and why should we not? Why should we allow the condition of things to continue that did exist, under which a judge residing in Montreal, supposed to be performing his duties in Montreal, charged for more days than there was in the whole year at the rate of $6 per day for travelling allowance.

Mr. FITZPATRICK.

An hon. MEMBER. Why did you pay him?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. We did not pay him, he was paid before we came in, but we changed that condition, and it is to prevent such an abuse that we passed the law my hon. friend complains of. Why should such a condition be allowed to exist? It is not because we made a change of that sort that a judge is prevented from going from one part of the province to the other, if it is necessary, in the due performance of his duties, that he should.

I can say that, in so far as Montreal is concerned, you cannot have the duties that the judges ought to perform, performed with only eleven judges. There is more business done in the Superior Court of Montreal than in the whole High Court of the province of Ontario. There are more writs issued out of the Superior Court of Montreal than out of the High Court for the whole province of Ontario. Moreover, I want to draw your attention to this, that in the month of March last, the Superior Court of Montreal had to sit in six different divisions. There were 236 cases inscribed in that court in that month, and of these 236, notwithstanding the fact that we had in Montreal the assistance of three judges from the country parts, there were only 121 of these cases disposed of, leaving an accumulation of arrears in that one month of 115 cases. Are you going to allow that condition of things to continue? Is it not time that we should endeavour to bring about a change by increasing the bench in that particular district, so as to give litigants the speedy justice to which they are entitled, because speedy justice is just as essential to the proper administration of public affairs as sound justice. My hon. friend does not say that there is no necessity for the increase in Montreal—he has not ventured to say so. He knows that it is necessary to make a change, but the only remedy he suggests is the bringing in of the country judges. He says that the appointment of these three judges is going to be a burden upon the country. Does he know what it costs to bring in the country judges?

Mr. CASGRAIN. About $3,000 or $4,000.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. We have in the estimates this year no less than $16,000, to provide for the travelling expenses of country judges who go about from one district to another.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Not to Montreal.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Take it outside of Montreal. I venture to say, that outside of Montreal, with the exception of the members of the Queen's Bench, there is not $1,000 expended for travelling expenses.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Oh, yes there is.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. There cannot be. But let the proportion be what it may, we ought to endeavour to bring about such a condition of things as will enable us to have judges in the districts who will administer justice for the benefit of litigants, who will administer, as I have said, prompt justice; and give to an important centre like Montreal the attention from a judicial point of view that it deserves. In the province of Quebec, the Attorney General and the law officers have taken upon themselves, with the knowledge they must have of the necessities of the case from the standpoint of the judicial organization of the province, to secure the passing of this legislation, putting it upon us to provide the additional judges. But, not only have we that, but we have the bar of the province of Quebec represented by the general council passing a unanimous resolution drawing the attention of the government to the fact that these three judges ought to be appointed, and ought to be appointed at the earliest possible moment. Therefore, as I say, there has been no objection that I have heard to the appointment of the additional judges for Montreal; the only objection is that it would be better if we took judges from other portions of the province and assigned them to the district of Montreal, instead of allowing them to live, as they do now, in the country districts. But this is a matter, as I say, over which we have no control and for which we can provide no remedy. The remedy my hon. friend (Mr. Casgrain) tried some years ago to bring about, when he was Attorney General of the province of Quebec. But he could not succeed, and I know he would be honest enough to admit that it could not be done now by any government in the province of Quebec. I would like to say to my hon. friend from Montmorency also that this Bill that he introduced provided for the appointment of forty-seven judges, that is, twenty-six district court judges, fifteen Superior Court judges, and six judges of the Court of Queen's Bench as they are now. At present, there are thirty-seven.

Mr. CASGRAIN. But it was perfectly understood at the time that the district judges would receive only $2,000 a year each.

Mr. J. G. H. BERGERON (Beauharnois). I believe my hon. friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) gave up his whole case at the beginning of his remarks, when he declared that he was under the impression that there were enough judges in the province of Quebec, but that we here in this parliament could do nothing—that owing to the way in which the administration of justice is organized by the local legislature, it was a matter beyond our province. Now, we also contend that there are enough judges. We favour, as he has said he does, an administration of justice in the province of Quebec which shall be as perfect and as speedy as possible. But our contention is that it is useless to add $500,000 to the consolidated debt of Canada, which would be the practical effect of adding $15,000 a year to our annual expenditure. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fitzpatrick) says that the local legislature organizes the administration of justice, and that we are called upon to appoint the judges and pay them. But, if we are called upon to appoint the judges and pay them, surely we are entitled to see how our money is spent. He asks how we can increase the number of judges in the district of Montreal, as the local legislature has not done it and will not do it. But my hon. friend will remember that in 1892, the very same demand was made upon the government for the increase in the number of judges in the district of Montreal. At that time, as now, more judicial work was done in the district of Montreal than in all the rest of the provinces.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. And you appointed a judge—Judge Curran.

Mr. BERGERON. No, he replaced another judge. The answer of Sir John Thompson was: I will confer with the Attorney General of the province of Quebec. And so he did—he conferred with my hon. friend (Mr. Casgrain) who at that time filled that office. And my hon. friend (Mr. Casgrain) brought in a Bill in the local legislature. That was a good Bill, and my hon. friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) himself, who was then in the legislature, supported it. But he says that that Bill did not reach a second reading. But what did that mean? It meant that the local government was not strong enough to carry this measure—

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. It meant that public sentiment against it was too strong.

Mr. BERGERON. But if this matter had been kept before the public since 1892, the present provincial government, which is friendly to this administration, would have been stronger on that subject, and Mr. Archambault, the Attorney General of Quebec, would have been able to bring forward the Bill of my hon. friend (Mr. Casgrain) and carry it through the legislature, and we should not be called upon to increase the debt of Canada by $500,000 in this way. There are enough judges now in the province of Quebec, and my hon. friend the Solicitor General knows it. He says it costs $16,000, to bring the judges from the country to sit in the district of Montreal. That is denied by the hon. member for Montmorency, who says that it costs only about $7,000. But if you do pass this Bill and appoint the three new judges, saddling the country with this additional debt of $500,000, you will still bring in judges from the country.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I desire to say, and to say deliberately and after reflection, that if that occurs, the gentleman who is charged with the supervision and control of the judges in the district of Montreal will not be performing his duty. The chief justice ought to see to it, that it shall not be necessary.

Mr. BERGERON. But, I say it will be done; and I will tell my hon. friend the Solicitor General why. The moment you appoint three new judges, you will have two or three of the present judges starting on leave of absence for the benefit of their health or do something of that kind; you will have the same number of judges in Montreal as you have to-day, and you will have to bring in judges from the country. There was some difference of opinion between the Solicitor General and the hon. member for Montmorency as to the law the Solicitor General brought in in 1898. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fitzpatrick) asks what difference it made. He had forgotten that the legislature of Quebec had changed the law with respect to the courts and declared that three judges of the Court of Review are taken from the Superior Court at the discretion of the chief justice or acting chief justice. That is, the acting chief justice could, if he wished, bring three judges from the rural districts who, with all their learning and all their abilities have not work enough to do. What effect had my hon. friend's (Mr. Fitzpatrick's) Bill on this? Why, it purely and simply put a stop to this practice. Under clause 8, his Bill—an Act further to amend the Act respecting the judges of provincial courts—passed in 1898, it is provided that no travelling allowance shall be allowed to any judge requested to sit in review under section 1, of chapter 20, of the Statutes of 1898, of the local legislature of Quebec, unless it is certified by the chief justice or judge discharging the duties of chief justice in the district that the attendance of such judge was, in his opinion, necessary. It is the last part of clause 8:

But no travelling allowance shall be granted to any judge requested to sit in review under section 1 of chapter 20 of the Statutes of 1898 of the legislature of Quebec, unless it is certified by the chief justice or the judge discharging the duties of chief justice, in the district, that the attendance of said judge was, in his opinion, necessary.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Is there anything improper in that?

Mr. BERGERON. My hon. friend will admit it has this result: Every time the judges of the city of Montreal say that they are in a position to sit as a Court of Review, they would rather so sit than sit in the lower court the whole day. It has deprived the rural district judges of sitting on that bench, something which they look upon as an honour, because it broadens the field of their operations. Now, it takes three judges in Montreal to do this every month, and deprives the other courts of the district of Montreal of the work which these three men would do, while at the same time there are three other judges in the country who are probably doing nothing. So I think my hon. friend himself, by bringing in this amendment in 1898, has impaired the work which should be done by the judges of the district and the city of Montreal.

Now, before we embark in this expenditure, I think we might as well have the opinion of a man who knows something about the administration of justice in the province of Quebec, I mean Sir Melbourne Tait, Chief Justice of the Superior Court in Montreal. In 1897, at the opening of the court, addresses were presented to Sir Melbourne on the occasion of his receiving the knighthood, and in replying to those addresses, he thought it was his duty to give his opinion about the administration of justice, and if the House will bear with me, I will read it, because I think it is important that hon. gentlemen from the other provinces should know what he said:

You will perhaps allow me to say a few words regarding the administration of justice in this district. It will be generally admitted that, to be effective, it should be prompt. Of course, this does not mean that there must always be a judge ready to try a case, for that is not always possible, but it does mean that it must be so kept up that cases may be heard within a reasonable time after they are inscribed.

You are all aware also that the business before our Superior Court has enormously increased, owing, no doubt, to the great growth of the city, and its wonderful expansion as a commercial, railway and shipping centre. I have not verified the fact, but it has been authoritatively stated that more than half the legal business of the province is done here. Without going into details on this point, I might refer, for instance, to the great amount of work thrown upon the Court of Review by being created a court of final resort in city expropriation and municipal cases, and by the change in the law granting an appeal direct from that court to the Supreme Court of Canada, and to Her Majesty in her Privy Council. In fact, it is only necessary to glance over our legislation of late years to see that the intervention of a court or a judge is now required in a great many more cases than formerly. It is also to be remembered that in this province in 99 civil cases out of 100, the judge has to decide the facts as well as the law.

Apart from this district, there are ten others in what may be called the Montreal review division, presided over by nine judges, one of whom is authorized to reside in Montreal. I believe that, with the exception of the district of St. Francis, the judicial work of those districts does not nearly occupy the time of the resident judge, and in view of the great increase of it in Montreal, it appears to me that the time has fully arrived for a readjustment of judicial labour, so that it may be fairly and equally distributed.

While it is right and proper that justice, civil and criminal, should be administered in each district, I do not know of any paramount reason why a judge should be required to reside in any of these districts, with the exception of St. Francis, and perhaps of Ottawa.

A new judge has since been appointed in the district of St. Francis.

In the former the work is too heavy for one judge, who has seven circuit courts to attend, besides the one at the 'chef-lieu'; in the latter, the judge has under his charge the district of Pontiac. In every other district a judge can leave Montreal in the morning and reach the 'chef-lieu' in time to open a Superior Court. We have judges who render us assistance, who leave their districts in the morning and return to their homes the same afternoon. I think that all of them except those serving in the two districts which I named, might with great benefit to the administration of justice, reside in Montreal, and the work be done from the city under the direction of the chief justice. Nothing but good could result from the close association and conference between the judges such a state of things would bring about, and amongst other benefits, uniformity of practice would be established. deliberation in review cases would have the constant assistance of these judges in the work here, where it is much required, and the result would be a much fairer distribution of labour. Moreover, I believe that such a change instead of retarding the work in the country districts, would give it a fresh impetus. I should be glad, indeed, if, as an experiment, a few, at any rate, of these outside judges, who live nearest to Montreal, could be brought here to reside, and the work of their districts be attended to in the way I have suggested.

It is true that there are some thirty circuit courts apart from those at the 'chef-lieus.' I think, however, that it would be quite possible to have these satisfactorily attended to by the Superior Court judges from Montreal if necessary, but I am strongly of opinion they should be relieved from sitting in the circuit court in the country parts, as they have been relieved from doing in this city. In all other provinces except Manitoba, the judges of the Superior Courts are not called upon to administer justice in the inferior courts. As the law now stands, the circuit court at the 'chef-lieu' of each district has only jurisdiction in cases under $100, while in the counties it has jurisdiction up to $200. The proportion of cases between $100 and $200 cannot be very large, and I think that no injustice could result from reducing the jurisdiction of the county courts and increasing the jurisdiction of the district magistrates, so as to enable them to take all the work of the circuit court. If it is not desirable to alter the jurisdiction of the court, then the jurisdiction of the district magistrates might be enlarged so as to cover all cases therein, subject to the review that now exists.

I believe that the adoption of these suggestions would improve the administration of justice in this section of the province. Under whatever system we may work, we shall always require your hearty co-operation, and having had your valuable assistance in the past, we feel we may confidently rely upon it in the future.

This was addressed principally to the judges of the country districts who were present at this ceremony. Now, my hon. friend from Montmorency has said something which will strike the mind of anybody, whether a lawyer or not. You have in one district the very same judge, he has been there for years and years, he does not mingle with his colleagues, and he makes a kind of jurisprudence of his own. There have been cases, that I know very well, where the judge has established a jurisprudence. The lawyers who have kept records of his judgments for twenty years, go before him and cite his old judgments, and they generally, of course, win their case. The other parties take their case to review, and as the jurisprudence has been greatly changed during that period, his judgments are reversed. This makes cost and no end of litigation. By the system proposed by the hon. member for Montmorency—and which is not at all opposed by the Solicitor General, because he himself supported it at the time, in the local legislature of Quebec—judges would go around, and that would be better for the lawyers and better for the litigants.* Now, let me give an idea of how justice is administered in some parts of our province. We had a criminal court in Beauharnois this spring. I do not know whether the House is aware that lawyers acting for the Crown in the rural districts of the province, are paid $20 a day. Of course they try to get along as fast as possible, every one will understand that! There was a term at Beauharnois some years ago when my hon. friend (Mr. Casgrain) was Attorney General, and it amounted to such a figure that he decided that there would be no more terms, and there were no more for eight or ten years. But, there has been a change of administration in Quebec. A lawyer from Beauharnois of the same political colour as the Quebec government decided that it was necessary to have a criminal term, and such a term was commenced on the 8th of March and finished on the 27th of April. There were twelve grand jurors summoned and present. They proceeded three days and their work resulted as follows:

True Bills.

James N. Prior, for attempted murder.

John Black, for assaulting a peace officer in the execution of his duty.

Emanuel Provost, for escaping from prison.

That is not regarded as a crime in Beauharnois. There is a good story told about the Beauharnois jail, that I may repeat. It is told of the late Col. Prud'homme, of the 64th Battalion. He allowed the prisoners to go out every day to work, so that when they left the jail they would have a little money, but he required them to be back at 8 o'clock at night. He closed the door at 8 o'clock at night and if they were not there they could not get in. One night a poor fellow came back after 8 o'clock and after he had bruised his hands rapping at the iron door. Col. Prud'homme came and asked: 'Who is there?' 'It is I,' replied the man. 'Why didn't you get back at 8 o'clock?' 'I met a friend from home,' the man replied. 'We had a glass of beer together, and I could not get back in time.' 'Well,' the Colonel replied, 'You cannot get in; you will have to sleep outside. I will teach you to come back in time.' Since then Col. Prud'homme has been superceded by another man who proceeds in another way, still. When Shortis was arrested in Valleyfield the authorities did not leave him in jail there, but they took him to Montreal.

Joseph Hebert, for assault, causing actual bodily harm.

Alexandre Gagnier, for inflicting grievous bodily harm.

J. A. Brault dit Lachance, for obtaining possession of valuable security by false pretenses.

Joseph Gauvreau, for arson, two indictments.

Onésime Genereux, for arson.

Wilfrid Boissonnault, for arson, two indictments.

Emanuel Provost, for stealing from the person.

Alfred Johnston, for escaping from prison.

James Sharpe, same offence.

Achille Hebert, for aiding to commit rape.

Patrick McLaughlin, assault causing actual bodily harm.

Euclide Bougie, for rape.

Joseph Martin, for assaulting an officer.

Joseph Sand, for assault.

These are the cases which were brought before the grand jury.

The PRIME MINISTER. That is quite a number.

Mr. BERGERON. My right hon. friend had better wait a moment, and he will see how these cases resulted. It is easy to make out a case before a grand jury. There were no bills found in the following cases:

Louis Simpson, Adelard Lebœuf, Ulric Leduc, Ovila Lamarre.

There were two panels of petit jurors summoned, the first one of forty-nine, and the second of fifty. The petit jurors were discharged on the 27th of April. The costs of the term will amount to more than $7,300, besides $1,000 earned by the Crown prosecutor. The result of the term can be summed up in this way:

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. What has that got to do with the proposition before the House?

Mr. BERGERON.

Mr. BERGERON. This shows how justice is administered there, and until you confer with the Quebec government and get justice administered as it should be administered, you are not entitled to ask this parliament to increase the cost of the administration of justice in Quebec by $15,000 a year. James N. Prior, a young man seventeen or eighteen years of age, accused of having attempted to murder the station master at Huntingdon, pleaded guilty. He said: I was mad. I did shoot, I did not strike him. I am very glad, but I am guilty. That would have prevented him from being placed on trial, but the Crown prosecutor sent down to him his son, a lawyer, and another lawyer by the name of McAvoy, who went and said to him: You are an imbecile. Plead that you are a fool. Thereupon he changed his plea, pleading that he was insane. Doctors were brought from Montreal to examine him. The case lasted three days, and they found out that he was the most intelligent man in the court. But, the Crown prosecutor drew $20 a day. All this took place before a judge of the Superior Court who listened to it, and never said a word. Prior was condemned to four years in the Reformatory School at Sherbrooke.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Who was the judge?

Mr. BERGERON. Judge Belanger.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. When was he appointed?

Mr. BERGERON. In 1873. I am giving you the result of the term. Prior was sent to the Reformatory School at Sherbrooke. Hebert, for the shameful offence which all the district knows, got six months in the Beauharnois jail. There was a man with an accusation against him which was one of the very worst that could possibly be brought against any man. Joseph Herbert got one month, Patrick McLaughlin, ten days, and Onésime Genereux three months, and that is all. The late Mr. Loupret, who was the magistrate of Beauharnois and Iberville, could have disposed of all these cases in two days at a cost to the province of $50.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Will the hon. gentleman show where the responsibility is on the provincial government because these men did not have a summary trial?

Mr. BERGERON. I say the Quebec government is responsible for the whole thing.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. That is a nice thing for a lawyer to say.

Mr. BERGERON. I stand by my opinion.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. What about the Criminal Code?

Mr. BERGERON. I do not care about the Criminal Code. This is the administration of justice. Of course, I know this is not the place to discuss the question of the expenses which has to be borne by the local government, but I say, when we are called upon here, in this parliament, to vote money to increase the expenditure by $15,000 a year, it is well that these facts should be put before parliament, and I can only repeat what my hon. friend (Mr. Casgrain) has said, that it is a useless expenditure. I have heard some lawyers say: You are not going to oppose an increase in the number of judges in Quebec? It is for Quebec and we might as well have two or three more judges. We are here for the purpose of watching over the whole interests of the country. We know the reason for these increases. It is purely and simply to get rid of two or three politicians who are in the way. It is to make places for three politicians and nothing else. Before I sit down I wish to say one word in regard to a statement which was made by the hon. Solicitor General. When the hon. member spoke a few moments ago about the charges which were made by judges he referred to money which was paid to judges in the old times. When they charged for three days they did so under the law which was established in old times. Of course, owing to railways and other means of communication which we now have, journeys which judges have to make do not take so much time. But in the old times a judge would leave Montreal to go to Richelieu; it took one day to go, one day holding court and one day to come back. The law was not changed.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. How about St. Hyacinthe and Montreal?

Mr. BERGERON. That was under the same old law, and my hon. friend would not think that he should have discarded the law and charged less. Some of the right hon. gentleman's own friends are scandalized at the administration of Justice there, and I quote the following from the Huntingdon Gleaner of the 22nd of March:

The conducting of this court being thus made the subject of public discussion, we feel it our duty to express regret at seeing it dragging on in a way that we thought had become obsolete. It has been three weeks in session, yet only four cases have been disposed of. This is a serious matter to jurymen and witnesses, apart from the consideration of cost to the province. Farmers who work from dawn to dark are kept dancing attendance on a court that does not sit on an average of five hours a day.

That shows that the administration of justice in the province of Quebec has to be remodelled. The Attorney General of the province of Quebec and the government of Quebec have done nothing and are doing nothing—some one advertised the other day to know whether the government was alive or not—and why do they not remodel the administration of justice in that province? If they did they would find that there were enough judges in the province of Quebec and we would not be called upon to appoint three more. I move:

That this Bill be not now read a second time, but that it be read a second time this day six months.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). My hon. friend (Mr. Bergeron) has shown that there is room for improvement in the administration of justice in the district which he has the honour to represent. If it be true, as he said, that the most intelligent man in the court was the man in the dock, and that he showed his intelligence by asking to be sent to jail, then, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bergeron) is giving a very poor certificate to the intelligence of the people who sent him here.

Mr. BERGERON. The man in custody was not from my county.

The PRIME MINISTER. But, you said he was the most intelligent man in the court.

Mr. BERGERON. I do not want words put in my mouth that I did not use. The doctor who examined him said that he was the most intelligent man there.

The PRIME MINISTER. Very well, the doctor from Montreal who examined him declared that he was the most intelligent man in the court, and I can understand now why my hon. friend (Mr. Bergeron) has been returned to this parliament.

Mr. BERGERON. You were there, and you know differently.

The PRIME MINISTER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Bergeron) says that the administration of the law is lax, because a certain young man who was arranged for attempted murder pleaded guilty, and was induced by the Crown to withdraw his plea for a plea of not guilty. My hon. friend (Mr. Casgrain), who has been Attorney General, will not find fault with that. If the Crown prosecutor, with the permission of the court, would suggest to the prisoner to withdraw his plea of guilty and substitute one of not guilty, especially where there was a question as to whether the man was in possession of his faculties, that is a thing which happens every day in all courts of criminal jurisdiction.

Mr. BERGERON. Not at all. He was induced to withdraw his plea.

The PRIME MINISTER. That might be quite proper. There was a case the other day in Manitoba where the prisoner pleaded guilty to an indictment for murder, and there was the greatest difficulty in coming to a proper understanding of the case as to whether the sentence should be commuted or not commuted. Every one knows this practice prevails in courts of justice, and if that is the only point against the administration of justice in the district of Beauharnois, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bergeron) has not made much of a case. But, let us come to the merits of the question. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Bergeron), following the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain), says that the number of judges in the province of Quebec is already too large, and that opinion is shared, to some extent, by the Solicitor General. It is so many years since I practiced my profession that I cannot venture an opinion on the subject, but, I am surprised to hear the hon. gentleman from Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) make such a statement. I hold in my hand a Bill introduced by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Casgrain) which most certainly increased the number of judges in the province of Quebec. Apart from the Appellate Court, which is a court of six judges, there are thirty-one judges of the Superior Court and three judges of the circuit court of the province of Quebec. Some few years ago the hon. gentleman (Mr. Casgrain) introduced a Bill which proposed to displace the present system and replace it by a superior court and a district court. Those two courts were to discharge the work which is now done by the Superior Court and the circuit court.

Mr. CASGRAIN. And the district magistrates, and all criminal proceedings.

The PRIME MINISTER. Very well. Under this Bill there would have been in the Superior Court fifteen judges, and in the district court twenty-six judges, making forty-one in all. To-day there are only thirty-four judges, and I am not aware that there are more than four or five district magistrates, so that my hon. friend (Mr. Casgrain) proposed to increase the number of judges. I do not find fault with his proposal, and I think, perhaps, he was right. I would have supported the Bill of my hon. friend, not because it increased the number of judges, but because it provided a different judicial system from that now prevailing. Anyway, it shows there is not much in his point about there being too many judges. In the province of Quebec, all the duties which are assigned, both to the Superior Court and the circuit court, are discharged by Superior Court judges, with the exception of the district of Montreal, where there are circuit court judges. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Casgrain) provided in his Bill that the duties of the Superior Court should be discharged, not by thirty-one judges that we have at present, but by fifteen, and that the other duties which appertain to the circuit court and are of a non-contentious character, requiring speedy deliberation, should be discharged by the judges of the district courts. The object of the Bill was to have a residential judge in each district to discharge these minor duties, and that the judges of the Superior Court residing in Quebec and Montreal could travel from district to district to hold court, as is done in the province of Ontario. For my part, I would have been quite favourable to that system, because I think it is preferable to our own. But the hon. gentleman (Mr. Casgrain) knows that his views did not prevail, and the views entertained by the Solicitor General did not prevail, and the views which I now announce would not be acceptable either. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Casgrain) knows that the people of Quebec are extremely tenacious of their laws. Perhaps there is no population to-day in the world, certainly no population on the continent of America, which is more tenacious of its laws and its customs than are the people of the province of Quebec. That is a national characteristic, and, on the whole, it is a very wholesome characteristic. It is a characteristic of which, no doubt, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Casgrain) feels proud; at all events, I feel proud of it. There is, then, this tenacious disposition of the people of Quebec to maintain their laws without amendment, even though thinking men consider them obsolete, and a fit subject for reform. My hon. friend from Beauharnois asks, why is there not an agitation over this? Why does not the provincial government of Mr. Marchand introduce a law similar to the law which the hon. member for Montmorency introduced when he was Attorney General of the province of Quebec? Precisely for the same reason which compelled the hon. member for Montmorency to withdraw that law, that is to say, because public opinion was not behind it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

Mr. BERGERON. It is because you are too weak.

The PRIME MINISTER. My hon. friend is engaged in politics. Why does he not go to the province of Quebec and preach a crusade on this subject?

Mr. BERGERON. It is not my business.

The PRIME MINISTER. Then, why does he speak in the way he does here?

Mr. BERGERON. Because it is my business to speak here.

The PRIME MINISTER. We are powerless here to amend the law; it can only be amended in the province of Quebec; and my hon. friend will not amend it here, nor will his friends, for the simple reason that public opinion will not sanction its amendment. The people of the province of Quebec are wedded to their system, and they will not depart from it, whether it is for the best or not.

Mr. BERGERON. Why do you not lead public opinion?

The PRIME MINISTER. There is no doubt that the politicians and the government of the province of Quebec are made on the same pattern as all other men, and it is natural for them to try to follow and please public opinion. If public opinion had sanctioned the changes introduced in 1895 or in 1892, there is no doubt they would have prevailed; but public opinion would not countenance them. My hon. friend says that the present government should invite negotiations with the provincial authorities. I am not revealing a secret, when I say that my hon. friend has given a piece of advice which we have followed already. I have been in communication with Mr. Archambault, the present Attorney General of the province of Quebec, and I suggested to him the very same thing. Last year I stated, what I state to-day, that so far as my own personal opinion goes, I prefer the system which was introduced in the Bill of my hon. friend from Montmorency, to the system which exists to-day. I say so openly and without hesitation. But the present Attorney General of the province—I will not say what were his personal views—stated as his political opinion, that it would not be possible to induce the legislature of the province of Quebec to depart from the present system. The people of that province are so wedded to their system of judicial decentralization, that they will not have justice administered in their midst by any other judge than a Superior Court judge. So long as that is their preference, there is no use of fighting against it. For my part, I do not hesitate to say, speaking with the fullest sense of responsibility—and perhaps my words will be heard in the province of Quebec—that I am not in favour of the present system, that I think it ought to be reformed; but, even though I had the honour of occupying a seat in the legislature of Quebec, my voice would be just as powerless as the voice of anybody else, to induce the people of the province to change their principles. I am surprised at hon. gentlemen opposite refusing to recognize the principle which is inscribed in deep letters on every page of the history of the province of Quebec. It is well known that it is a motto of the French Canadian people to stand by nos institutions, nos lois. They have their laws and their customs, and there is no use of telling them: 'Your system is antiquated.' They will answer: 'It is good enough for us, and we want to keep it.' Under such circumstances I want to know what are we to do? My hon. friend comes here and preaches reform. Let him go to the provincial legislature and make his views prevail there, and then he can come here.

Mr. BERGERON. Why do you not refuse?

The PRIME MINISTER. The hon. gentleman says, why do we not refuse to carry out their views? This is the high politics of hon. gentlemen opposite. Refuse to carry out the laws of the province of Quebec; substitute your own judgment and your own will for the judgment, and the will of the people of the province of Quebec; tell them that they do not know their business, that they are all wrong, and that you will rule them with an iron hand, and force them to have a different system upon which they base their faith. If these are the views of the hon. gentleman, they are not my views, nor the views of this government, and I hope they are not the views of this country. Refuse to carry out their laws? Why, Sir, that would be a fine system to bring about anarchy in this country. If we were to engage in controversy with the provincial authorities on matters of this kind, what would take place?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Suppose they asked for three times the number of judges they are asking for?

The PRIME MINISTER. That is a question which it is very easy to answer. If you can satisfy the members of this parliament that a law passed by the local legislature is absurd, tyrannical, unjust, and a shock to common sense, then certainly we could not follow it. But I put it to my hon. friend from Haldimand (Mr. Montague): When the legislature of any province exercises its will and judgment on a question which is under its own jurisdiction, I am sure that my hon. friend would not say that we should ignore the legislature and refuse to carry out its will and intention. There is in our constitution a fatal defect, if I may say so, in this respect, in that it provides that the provincial legislature shall organize the courts and determine how many judges shall be appointed to administer the law in the province, but places upon this parliament the burden of fixing and paying the salaries of those judges. My hon. friend will admit that this is a very extraordinary provision. It is a failure in our constitution; but there it is, and we cannot help ourselves. When the constitution has placed the power in the local legislatures to organize the courts, we must follow their judgment, unless we are prepared to say that they have acted in bad faith, or from improper motives, or in a way so absurd that it cannot be defended. If any legislature could be shown to have acted in that way, I, for my part, would be prepared to take issue with it; but unless something of that kind is shown, I do not think that this parliament has any right or jurisdiction to substitute its will or wisdom for the will or wisdom of the local legislature. These principles, I am sure, will commend themselves to the judgment of every man in this House. What is the position to-day in the province of Quebec? The people of that province have their system, they cling to it, and what is the objection made to it? The only objection is that it provides for a greater number of judges than are really necessary—that there are to-day a sufficient number of judges to administer the law, but that they are so distributed, that some of them in the city of Montreal have too much to do, while others, in the rural parts of the country, have too little to do. I am free to say at once that everybody knows that. Everybody knows that in the district of Montreal the judges are overworked, and that is the very reason why we want to make the provision we are now doing. It has become an imperative necessity to have more judges in the district of Montreal. Then, it is stated that other judges have not sufficient work. That may be also. It may be that there are judges who could do more work than they do at the present time.

But, I do not know of any system you could devise which, considering our immense territory, will provide for a proper equalization of the work among the different judges. We cannot devise any system under which a certain number of judges will not have more work to do than others. That is inevitable, but my hon. friend from Montmorency (Mr. Cargrain) says that the evil could be remedied if he were to provide that the judges who now reside in the rural districts should reside in the cities of Montreal and Quebec. But that is a change which the province of Quebec is not prepared to accept. That province does not want to do away with the system of having residential justices in all the districts. That system they have a right to retain, and it is one in favour of which there is a good deal to say, though it may be attacked from different points of view. I said a moment ago that I had a conference with my hon. friend the present Attorney General of that province. The law to which we are giving our sanction was passed by the Quebec legislature in the session of 1899. I represented to the Attorney General the views which I hold. I said that in my opinion it would be preferable to have a different system, but the Attorney General told me it was impossible for his or any government to change it or to have a reform of the kind proposed carrying out, at present at all events. What took place in the Quebec legislature when this law providing for three additional judges was introduced? The party to which my hon. friends from Beauharnois and Montmorency belong is represented on the floor of that legislature; and if I am correctly informed, the law providing for three additional judges in the district of Montreal was passed without being challenged by the opposition at any of its stages.

Mr. CASGRAIN. There was a long debate.

The PRIME MINISTER. But there was no division. I have not the debate which took place in the legislative assembly, but I have that which took place in the legislative council where both parties are represented in about equal numbers. There the discussion was confined, on the part of the opposition, to one member and one alone, Mr. Chapin. He protested against the law but did nothing more, and the Bill was passed without division through all its stages.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

Under such circumstances, when the Conservative party on the floor of the Quebec legislature did not raise their voice against this law, but accepted it, does it lie in the mouth of any man in this House to say: I protest against it and want a reform adopted by the Quebec legislature. We must take the facts as they are. It will not be denied by my hon. friend from Montmorency or my hon. friend from Beauharnois, or any other member from the province of Quebec, that the condition of things in Montreal to-day is such that it is imperative—not only useful but absolutely imperative—that we should have three new judges in that district. I have here a resolution adopted on June 3, 1899, by the bar of the district of Montreal which was placed in my hands by the bâtonnier, and which reads as follows:

Minutes of the Council of the Bar of Montreal,
June 3, 1899.

It was proposed by Mr. N. Charbonneau, seconded by Mr. L. H. Archambault, Q.C., and resolved:

That the federal government be memorialized to immediately appoint three judges, authorized by the statute of last session of the Quebec legislature, the pressing condition of the legal business of this district demanding such appointment, and that the following gentlemen: the Bâtonnier, the Syndic and Mr. C. B. Carter, Q.C., be delegated to interview the federal government in connection with this matter.

This matter was further discussed at a meeting of the general council of the bar of the province of Quebec, on June 10, 1899, and a resolution unanimously adopted calling on this government to give effect at once to the provincial law increasing the number of judges. I do not know whether my hon. friend from Montmorency was present at that meeting or not.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I was in England at the time.

The PRIME MINISTER. Well, he has had many opportunities since of putting his views before the bar of the district where he practices, and I am not aware that he ever in Montreal offered any opposition to the appointment of these three judges. If I had my own way, I would have a different way of treating this matter; but after the conference I had with the Attorney General of the province, I came to the conclusion that there was nothing else to do but conclude that we should not refuse to adopt the views of the province of Quebec, speaking through its legislature.

The objections made are not made upon the merits of this law, but simply upon the condition of things which prevails in that province. Well, this is not the place to have those views regarding that condition prevail. The proper place is upon the soil of the province itself; but so long as the people of the province of Quebec continue in their present way of thinking, so long as they choose to adhere to the present system, there is nothing for us to do but comply with their wishes.

I have not a word to say in reply to the last kick, if I may so call it, administered by my hon. friend from Beauharnois, when he said this was simply intended to make room for politicians. If there had been nothing else in this but the question of patronage, why was not that position taken on the floor of the Quebec legislature by the party to which my hon. friend belongs. Why did they not bring up then and there the argument that this was simply a measure to provide for politicians? Such objection as that, I do not propose to discuss.

This government has nothing to do with this provincial law. It was not passed at our suggestion. We made all the representations we could in order to induce the provincial government to change its law, but that government is responsible as we are, it is a popular government as we are, and there, as here, the will of the people must prevail; and in view especially of the fact that this law is imperatively demanded by the condition of things prevailing in the city of Montreal, there is nothing to do, in my humble judgment, but pass this measure providing for the salaries of these judges.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). The reasons given for the appointment of three more judges by the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) do not commend themselves to my judgment. He admits that there is a sufficient number of judges in the province of Quebec to do the work, but unfortunately in one district the judges have too much work to do and in the other districts too little. Then, I would suggest that the First Minister should consult with his friends and get them to reduce the number in the districts where the judges have too little work and remove those judges to the districts where there is too much work. The right hon. gentleman says that might be a very good thing to do if we could control the situation, but we have nothing to do but obey practically the demand of the local government. In other words, if the local government chooses to map out districts, no matter how ridiculous may be these districts, or how little work there may be for a judge in any one of them, it is an order for us to appoint the judges and provide their salaries.

I do not think the hon. gentleman could claim that if this were carried to the point where it would be a burning scandal in the administration of justice, he would be justified in following out the principle he lays down. If I rightly understood the information given us to-day, it has nearly reached that point in Quebec. One judge, we are told, tried forty-five cases in a year, and forty-two were decided; another judge tried only eighteen cases, and another only fifteen cases in a year. Is the Premier of this Dominion powerless to join with his friends in Quebec to promote a healthier public sentiment. We are told that a Bill to change this state of affairs was introduced in the provincial legislature, but was not passed. But in how many cases in the history of legislation have Bills been introduced not only once or twice, but five and six times, and at last been accepted and made law, in many cases to the benefit of the people. We have surely not reached the condition of things in Canada under which the right-thinking representatives of the people in the Dominion, and in the province cannot join to educate public sentiment so as to bring about the change of an effete and expensive system. The First Minister says that this system is effete, but public sentiment does not favour a change. But if the public men representing these people will intelligently and assiduously devote themselves to the task, they can bring about a change in public sentiment; and public men are derelict in their duty if they do not try to educate public opinion so as to bring it into accord with wisdom and common sense. The Prime Minister said, that the question is whether the provincial government have passed a law mapping out more districts or making a demand for more judges, and if so, it is our business to obey, no matter how ridiculous it may be. But some are unkind enough to say that the action of the provincial legislature may be dictated by consideration of political exigencies. We know that in the province of Ontario, the legislature passed a law providing that no junior judge should be appointed in a county of less than 80,000 population. But as soon as the Conservative party left office in the Dominion, and the political friends of the majority in the Ontario legislature came into office here, they repealed that law, thus opening opportunities for the appointment of their friends to office. It may be that in this case the legislature of Quebec has been actuated by a similar motive. The hon. member for Montmorency said that the salaries of the judges were too small. I want to say one word with regard to that. I do not know whether I properly understood the situation or the work that the judges do, but the hon. member (Mr. Casgrain) said that some of these judges had not work enough to keep them busy for more than one or two months in the year. And yet they get $5,000 a year—

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. That is absolutely inaccurate. The judges in the districts of Quebec and Montreal work harder than any judges I know of.

Mr. SPROULE. A judge who has forty-five cases to try in the year must be very hard worked indeed, and so must the judge who has only eighteen cases in a year.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) is putting words into my mouth that I never used. I did not mean to say that the judges who now had only fifteen or eighteen cases to deal with should have an increase of salary. What I said was that the law should be so remodelled that the judges should have more work and be entitled to larger salaries.

Mr. SPROULE. I do not wish to attribute that to the hon. member for Montmorency, because I know he did not make such a proposition. His proposition was, to my mind, in the right direction. If you would more equitably distribute the work of the administration of justice, and if you work your men harder and then give them higher salaries, I would not object. But, if men have only one or two months' work in the year, surely it will not be said that the present salary is not sufficient. I look at the judges and ask myself what are they made of. They are made out of common lawyers, many of them out of lawyers who have sat in this House year after year with us; and I have seen these men one after another elevated to the high and responsible position of judge. In all the various affairs of life where I have seen them brought into contact with other men, they do not appear to possess any higher intelligence or greater judgment than the average of the professional classes of the country. But in almost every other line of life a man taken from those classes would regard $5,000 a year as a very fair salary; and yet this is said to be a paltry salary for a judge. If I were to mention the names of some hon. gentlemen who have been taken out of this House during the last twenty-one years and put upon the bench, and if I were to endeavour to show to the people where they are known that they are not well enough paid at $5,000 a year, I would be laughed at. They would put these men alongside of other men and compare their earning powers, compare their intelligence, and they would say that these men were not above the average intelligence, that they would not compare more than favourably with men in the higher walks of commerce or professional life. There are plenty of men to be found in the country who are working for salaries little more than one-half what judges are getting at the present time, and who are certainly their equal in ability and intelligence. Now, the minister admitted that the system is antiquated, but he said our people are wedded to it and we cannot change it. I want the people to understand that the proposal made by the Solicitor General means a permanent tax on the people of Canada of the interest on half a million dollars, because $15,000 a year would pay the interest on half a million dollars at the rate we are paying interest on our public debt at present. Therefore, it means a permanent increase to our public debt of half a million dollars. And for what purpose? Not for the purpose of providing judges to do work that cannot be done by judges already appointed, but for the purpose of pandering to what the Prime Minister calls an antiquated system, thereby acknowledging that we have not the moral courage to back up public sentiment in asking the local legislature to change the system. I say it shows the weakness of this administration, a weakness that no government should be willing to admit. But the right hon. gentleman frankly admits it, and I admire him for his candour, though I cannot admire him for his courage. I am prepared to vote for the six months' hoist, because I say it is becoming a burning scandal that this effete and antiquated system should be continued any longer, and all because we have not the moral courage to go to the province of Quebec and try to educate the people to send men to the local legislature sufficiently intelligent and wise to devise a system more in harmony with the spirit of the age, and more in harmony with the principle of economy which should guide all our administration of public affairs.

Mr. JAMES McMULLEN (North Wellington). The hon. gentleman says that the appointment of these three judges means an increase of half a million dollars to our public debt. Now, he would be right if the present judges did not get an extra allowance for sitting in Montreal. Judges that are appointed to districts outside of Montreal, when they sit as judges in Montreal, get $6 a day and they get their mileage.

Mr. BERGERON. No mileage.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am right. The hon. gentleman does not appear to know Quebec law at all. He said to-day that the Quebec government appointed the judges. He surely knows better than that, he is not so ignorant of the modus operandi of government as to say that the Quebec government appoints the judges.

Mr. BERGERON. I did not say that.

Mr. McMULLEN. Yes, you said so, I appeal to the House if you did not say so. The Quebec government makes the districts and this government appoints the judges. Now, the hon. member from Grey (Mr. Sproule) said this measure would increase the public debt by half a million dollars. He knows that the judges that are appointed to districts outside of Montreal, when they sit as judges in Montreal, get, besides their salary, $6 a day and an extra allowance for sitting as judges in Montreal. Now, the judges appointed under this Bill will simply get their salary, and no extra allowance, and no extra mileage.

Mr. BERGERON. No mileage at all.

Mr. McMULLEN. That is all right. The hon. gentleman supported a government for years and years that allowed a system to exist whereby the judges appointed to districts in Quebec were permitted to live in Montreal in violation of the understanding when they were appointed that they should live in their districts. But they lived in Montreal, and when they discharged the duty as judges in Montreal they actually drew mileage to Montreal from the district where they were appointed, and they charged three days instead of charging one.

Mr. BERGERON. You are all wrong.

Mr. McMULLEN. I tell the hon. gentleman that I am right. He does not know what he is talking about, and he talks about a great many other things of which he knows just as little as he does about this, and that is not very much. I have a perfect recollection of the discussion that took place in this House, and I say that judges were appointed in Quebec to outside districts who, in place of living in their district in accordance with the terms of their appointment, lived in Montreal. Because it is understood that judges should live in their district for the convenience of the administration of justice, so that if a man wants to get an order from a judge, or take certain proceedings, he may be able to find the judge in his district. But in place of doing that, the judges lived in Montreal, and when they were called upon to perform the duty of judges in Montreal, they actually charged mileage from the district to which they were appointed, and they charged a day travelling from that district into Montreal, and a day travelling back from Montreal to their district.

Mr. BERGERON. No.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. gentleman will persist in denying it.

Mr. BERGERON. Will you allow me one word?

Mr. McMULLEN. No, I will not give you a word because it is evident the hon. gentleman is so muddled over the whole thing that it is no use listening to him. I won't try to educate the hon. gentleman.

Mr. BERGERON. You cannot do it.

Mr. McMULLEN. I honestly admit it would be a very serious task to educate the hon. gentleman. But I say that he sat in this House as a supporter of a government that permitted that condition of things to exist year after year.

Mr. MONK. Will the hon. gentleman allow me one word? The case referred to by him, I think, he does not fully understand. Perhaps he alludes to the case of a judge who was allowed to reside in Montreal, that is to say, his residence there was tolerated by the government for reasons given by him, and thought to be sufficient by the government. But during vacation he was called upon regularly by the chief justice of the court to take the place of other judges in Montreal, and he charged for that.

Mr. BERGERON. No mileage.

Mr. MONK. No mileage. Here was a judge appointed for a rural district, and was receiving $4,000 a year. The judges, upon the arrival of summer, leave the city of Montreal for a well-deserved rest. This judge is called upon and he receives $4,000 a year to remain in Montreal to replace the judges there who are all gone, and who receive $5,000 a year. Under the circumstances, I leave it to my hon. friend to say whether he is entitled to the extra allowance.

Mr. McMULLEN. My hon. friend (Mr. Monk), did not happen to be in this House when this question was taken up some years ago. We had a full discussion of the whole question, and I must say that it was most humiliating to the bench to think that there were men sitting upon the bench who, for the purpose of putting money into their own pockets, were charging mileage that they were not entitled to. My hon. friend just like the rest of the lawyers in this House, undertakes to speak in behalf of the bench. I was amused at the address of my hon. friend from Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain), this afternoon. There is never a time that the question of the judges' salaries is up, but you find every lawyer from Quebec, getting up to defend the increase in the salaries of judges. I presume that those from Ontario would be willing to do the same thing. Lawyers evidently are willing to cultivate the higher regard and respect of the bench. I presume that is the reason, as I cannot explain their action in any other way. The hon. member for Montmorency this afternoon lauded the bench of Quebec, and compared the bench of this country with the bench of England in order to prove that the judges of this country should have their salaries increased. I agree with the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), that the judges of this country are well paid, and the best evidence of that fact, is that whenever a judgeship becomes vacant, you will find even the best talent in the country anxious and willing to take a position on the bench if they can get it. I have no axe to grind with the bench, nor do I desire to reflect upon it. There is no doubt that we have a most creditable bench, and that there is no country that can boast of a better or more independent bench than we have in Canada. Taking it as a whole, I believe we pay our judges ample salaries. The hon. member for East Grey, speaking in reference to a statement that had fallen from the right hon. Prime Minister, thought that the government should reduce the number of judges. I am positively certain that if the present government in their wisdom, decided to take a step in that direction, we would have a unanimous protest from the other side of the House: This is done for a political purpose. You have a political feeling of bitterness against those men who have been placed on the bench by the old government, and this is for venting political spleen on the men who have been put in these positions. I think the hon. member for East Grey would harp as loudly and as long upon that string as any other man in this House. Who is responsible for the condition of things in Quebec, if there are too many judges? We must surely accept the statement which the hon. Solicitor General made this afternoon. He has given the number of cases in Montreal that have been tried and that yet remain to be tried, which shows the necessity of more judges being appointed for that district. But, in Quebec, it is the provincial legislature that appoint the districts, just the same as the legislature in Ontario do. The government of Ontario create the districts and it is the duty of the government here to provide a judge for a district when a district is created. It is not the duty of this House to sit in judgment upon what a province may do. They are responsible before the people for what they have done, and I do not think it would be at all in keeping with our constitutional system that the government of the Dominion should say: No, we will give you no more judges; we consider you have enough. It is all very well to remonstrate with these people against increasing the expenditure, but I do not think that it is within the province of the government to say: You shall not have another judge. After all, when we come to consider the number of judges and the salaries that are paid, I do not think it costs this country as much per capita for officials of that kind in Quebec, as it does in Ontario. I notice that in Ontario we have seventy-four county court judges, and fifteen High Court judges, making eighty-nine altogether in Ontario. In Quebec they have only thirty-nine judges, or half as many as we have in Ontario. If you will add up the salaries which are paid the county court and Superior Court judges in Ontario, and divide them by the number of inhabitants in Ontario, and do the same with the thirty-nine judges they have in Quebec, I think you will find that it costs as much, per capita, in Ontario as it costs in Quebec, if not more. Quebec is not acting unreasonably, I think, in view of that condition of things. If Quebec has demanded of this government a larger number of judges proportionate to its population, than Ontario or Manitoba has, it is not asking anything out of the way, because the hon. Solicitor General has presented a very clear case. I think it is right and proper that these appointments should be made. I dare say that the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron), would prefer that this Bill should be left over. I dare say that he earnestly and anxiously hopes that his friends will come to power after the elections, and he would not have the slightest objection to passing this Bill then, because they would get three Tories appointed in place of three Reformers.

Mr. BERGERON. That is the whole case. You are giving the whole case away now.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would not be at all surprised if that is the reason for his opposition.

Mr. BERGERON. You judge other people by yourself.

Mr. McMULLEN. I dare say my hon. friend would not object to being made one of them.

Mr. BERGERON. I am not looking for a position.

Mr. McMULLEN. My hon. friend (Mr. Sproule), made a reference to the action of the Ontario government in first passing a law to prevent the appointment of judges and then rescinding that law. The object of the Ontario government in passing that law was to provide against increasing the expenditure by the appointment of judges, if there was not work for them to do. Perhaps my hon. friend is not aware, as I am, that the bar of the counties where there were no junior judges, remonstrated with the government on the very great inconvenience that was experienced. When the judge was away on division court work, they had to gallop all over the country to get certain orders signed, and the bar protested against that condition of things. As the result of these protests from the bar, the Act was changed by the Mowat government, and it was not done because the Reform party were in power or anything of the kind.

Mr. LEIGHTON McCARTHY (North Simcoe). This is a matter on which, perhaps, the lawyers in this House might be heard, and speaking for the province of Ontario, I agree with the hon. member for Montmorancy (Mr. Casgrain) that the judges in this country are not paid as they ought to be.

Mr. McMULLEN. Another lawyer.

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes, another lawyer; and because a man is a lawyer is, I suppose, no reason why he should not have an opinion on this question. My hon. friend (Mr. McMullen), in his business, has, probably, provided himself with a competence which will see him through the rest of his life, and he has, no doubt, frequently consulted a lawyer to advise him on certain points in making that competence which he now enjoys. I have represented to the government the claim of the judges of Ontario that they should receive some further allowance, and I am sorry it is not provided for in this Bill, because there are certain districts in the province of Ontario in which the judges are overworked, and where they are not, in my judgment, paid a sufficient salary. I am unable to see this matter in the same light as the Prime Minister, because I think that this parliament should use its own judgment in viewing this matter. The Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick), the member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain), the member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron), all say that there are sufficient judges in the province of Quebec to do all the work if the judges were only properly distributed. It does not seem to me to be germane to the issue, whether the per capita payment to the province of Ontario is greater than the per capita payment in the province of Quebec. If we have a judiciary necessary to carry on the administration of justice in the province of Ontario, that is what the country demands, and if, on the other hand, we have a judiciary sufficient for the administration of justice in Quebec, it does not matter whether the salaries of such judiciary exceeds the other or not. If the scandalous state of affairs exists in the province of Quebec as stated by the member for Beauharnois, this is not, in my judgment, the place or the time for ventilating it. If the administration of justice is so ludicrous in that county as was depicted by the hon. member (Mr. Bergeron), it is high time that in his own province and in his own legislature it should be inquired into. I am happy to state that I know of no such state of things in any county or judicial district in Ontario, and I venture to say, that if such a state of affairs existed there, it would not be twenty-four hours before it would be thoroughly investigated. In our province, the legislature does endeavour to distribute the work among the judges. By virtue of increasing the jurisdiction of the division courts and the county courts, they have lightened the labours of our Superior Court judges, so that the condition of things which existed some years ago does not now exist. Our Superior Court judges are not overworked as they were in days past. If the legislative assembly of the province of Quebec did likewise, if they increased the jurisdiction vested in the lower courts and thus lightened the labours of the judges of their superior courts, they might distribute the business in such a way that they would not have to increase the number of judges. If we agree to appoint as many judges as the legislative assembly of Quebec demands, we will never have that revision and reform in that province which it seems to be the opinion of both sides of the House is absolutely necessary. If, on the other hand, we say to the province of Quebec: We cannot accede to your request to increase the number of judges, because we understand from the lawyers of your province that you have sufficient judges if you distribute the work properly; then I think the matter would soon right itself. If the district of Montreal has not got a sufficient judicial staff, then, by reason of the agitation which would spring up of itself, it is likely that the legislative assembly of Quebec would be bound to take action. The legislative assembly of Ontario was bound to take action, and I, therefore, submit that we should not accede to the request to increase the judiciary of Quebec, in the face of the fact that it is conceded on the floor of this parliament that there are sufficient judges in that province to do the work if the legislative assembly will only properly distribute it. That is the position I take. I take it in no spirit of antipathy to the province of Quebec. When I heard the statements of the Solicitor General, and of the hon. members for Montmorency and Beauharnois, I came to the conclusion that it was my duty to support such an amendment as that now before the House.

Mr. A. MARTIN (East Queen's, P.E.I.) I have not very many criticisms to offer to this Bill, but I believe that when a change is made as regards the salaries of our judges, it should take a wider scope than to confine it to the North-west Territories. The discussion this afternoon shows that the salaries of judges in Canada are altogether inadequate. This Bill only provides for a portion of the difficulty, and that being the case, it is advisable that it should not be proceeded with until a measure covering the whole ground can be introduced. It was only last year that I heard the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) call attention to the very low salaries paid to the judges in Prince Edward Island, and when I mention to the House that two of the judges of the Supreme Court of Prince Edward Island only get $3,200 each, and the chief justice only $4,000, as compared with the $5,000, $6,000 and $8,000 paid in the other provinces, it will be seen that there is good reason for increasing the salaries of our judges in the province of Prince Edward Island. I did expect that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries would have backed up what he said in this House last year. He told us then that the salaries were so low in Prince Edward Island that some fees which properly belonged to the province had to go to subsidize the salaries of the judges, and he expressed a wish to have that remedied. I am astonished that his ardour has cooled, and that he has allowed this Bill to be introduced without one provision for Prince Edward Island. There is not a province in the Dominion where the judges are paid such low salaries as in Prince Edward Island. Men who have devoted the best years of their life to the study of the law, men of the highest ability, men who are the equals of the judges in any other part of the country, are obliged to serve their country in Prince Edward Island for $3,200 a year, when from $5,000 to $8,000 is paid to judges in other provinces. I think it is an anomaly, and I protest against it. I hope the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who brought up this subject a few years ago, is not going to humbly back down and submit to the dictation of the Solicitor General. The province of Prince Edward Island is also mulcted of fees which properly belong to that province in order to subsidize the salaries of the judges. That was a claim also set up by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. I did not intend to speak on this subject. I thought the Minister of Marine and Fisheries would have been sufficiently alive to the occasion, so that I would not have to stand up for the legal profession and the judges of Prince Edward Island. But the task has been imposed upon me, and I think I have done my duty in calling attention to the matter.

Mr. B. M. BRITTON (Kingston). It seems to me that this is a bigger question than some hon. members regard it, and it ought to receive the serious consideration of the hon. members who are now moving the six months' hoist. Under the constitution the provincial legislature has the right to constitute courts, to say how many judges shall preside over those courts, and to institute the procedure necessary for carrying on business in them. In this case the legislature of Quebec have in its wisdom established courts in that province. I do not profess to know much about the system there; I do not profess to be able to compare its merits or demerits with those of the Ontario system; but I learn from statements which have been made to-day that the people of that province are wedded to their system and are not prepared to change it at present; and if they were prepared, it would not be for us to force any change upon them. It has been said by the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) that this is a case in which there ought to be a conference. The First Minister has said that he has had a conference with the Premier of Quebec on this very subject, and that conference has not resulted in anything. It seems to me that this parliament has a right for a time to refrain from appointing judges or voting money for the salaries of judges appointed; but the question just now is whether in the legislation which is under consideration the legislature of Quebec have acted in good faith. If they have, I do not think this parliament has any right to take the legislature or the province of Quebec by the throat and say: Notwithstanding the fact that under the constitution you have the right to pass the Act you have passed, we are not going to give effect to that Act. Under these circumstances I submit that we ought to give effect to it, and it might be a very serious matter if we refused to do so on any such grounds as have been presented to the House to-day. I quite appreciate the argument which has been advanced by the hon. member for Montmorency as to the division of the work. I have no doubt that difficulty will adjust itself later on. These evils may continue year after year; but when attention is sufficiently called to them, they are righted sooner or later, and in a way that is satisfactory to the people. Attention has been called both last session and this session to the unequal distribution of work in the province of Quebec, and that very fact will force the provincial legislature to do something to bring about a proper adjustment of work. But in the meantime, as we are called upon to enact this legislation, it seems to me that we ought to respond to the call.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. BRITTON. I think it would be a very great pity if any line of cleavage should be adopted in a matter of this kind, and there should be the least collision between the parliament of Canada and any one of the provincial legislatures in reference to a matter such as this. The system, although it might seem objectionable at first, of having the appointing power vested in one body and the creating of the position vested in another, still the more one looks into it the more he can find to approve in it and to conclude that it is a very wise plan. The provinces are interested in not creating more courts than are actually necessary for the business to be done because they have to bear all the expenses of court-houses and officials and the maintenance of the courts, except in so far as the salaries of the judges are concerned. That gives them a direct interest in not doing anything merely for the sake of creating places for persons who have to be paid by the Dominion; and even if you could suppose the local legislatures capable of being influenced by any such motive, I think there are counterbalancing motives which would prevent any wrong being done.

My hon. friend from East Grey said that when the Conservative government was in power a law was passed preventing the appointment of junior judges in the different counties. That is quite true, but I do not think that there was any such motive underlying that legislation as that implied by the observations of my hon. friend. Then he said that as soon as the Liberals got into power in Ottawa, that law was repealed. That is not quite correct. It was repealed with reference to one county, perhaps two, but I do not recollect more than one, and the law is still in force in Ontario. I can point to counties where there used to be junior judges and where now junior judges cannot be appointed. In Leeds and Grenville they had two judges, Judge McDonald and Judge Reynolds. Judge Reynolds died, and the Ontario legislature has never attempted, so far as I know, to cause the appointment of a junior judge in these counties. So that my hon. friend is not correct in stating that the law was repealed, although in one instance, the county of Lambton, which is a very large county, a junior judge can be appointed.

So far as the administration of justice is concerned and the conduct of business in the courts, it seems to me, that while the work may not be properly distributed, it cannot be said, when we consider the amount of work done in the province of Quebec, that there is a very large expenditure compared with the work done. In Ontario we have fifteen High Court judges, including the judges of the Court of Appeal and those of the divisional courts and seventy-four county and district court judges, as in addition to the counties, there are two or three districts over which judges are appointed, and in some of these there are junior judges and district court judges. There are eighty-nine in all. Well, there are only thirty-nine judges all told—judges of the Court of Appeal, Queen's Bench and circuit court—in the province of Quebec. In the Montreal district alone, in 1898, there were 5,000 writs issued, whereas in the whole of Ontario there were only 3,028 issued from the High Court. Of course, the number of writs does not of itself indicate the amount of business that necessarily is done, but it is the only means we have of making a comparison, and when we make this comparison, we find that the expenses of Ontario are greater in the administration of justice, according to population, than in the province of Quebec. I think, therefore, that the Bill before the House is a very proper one.

The Quebec legislature have so legislated that it becomes necessary to appoint three Superior Court judges in order to properly maintain the courts. It is their business to provide the courts and it is ours to maintain these courts, and unless it can be shown that there is some collusion, some legislation for an improper purpose—and I cannot conceive of any such motive influencing an honourable body like a provincial legislature—it is our duty to pass the legislation necessary to give effect to what they have done. I shall therefore vote in favour of this Bill.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I desire to call the attention of my hon. friend from Montmorency to the form of the motion now before the House. This question has been discussed almost entirely as if the Bill had reference only to the appointment of additional judges in the province of Quebec. But that is not the case. The section which relates to the provision for salaries for the new judges in the province of Quebec is section No. 1, but the second and third sections provide for that which is absolutely necessary and about which there is no difference of opinion in this House. Those are the sections providing for the salaries of the chief justice in the North-west Territories and of an additional judge in the Yukon territory.

Mr. FOSTER. You are not increasing the judges in the North-west.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, we are providing simply for a chief justice and giving him the ordinary allowance of a $1,000 extra, which is given in all the provinces for his position as chief justice. In the Yukon we are providing for the salary of an additional judge.

Mr. FOSTER. Is one not enough?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Certainly not. They ask for three judges, and I understand their best legal authorities say there ought to be three. I am sure that if the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) were here, he would take the position that three is necessary. But the government have determined that two are absolutely essential, and section 3, provides for the salary of the second judge in the Yukon.

I only rise to ask my hon. friend from Montmorency whether this motion is not premature.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I did not make the motion.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I know, but my hon. friend is an ex-Attorney General of the province of Quebec, and may be supposed to have some influence with his hon. colleague in determining in the manner in which the motion should be brought before the House. The motion to give this Bill the six months' hoist is entirely indefensible, because the Bill itself does not deal with the feature alone to which exception is taken, but also with that which nobody disputes, and that is the desirability of making provision for the salary of an additional judge in the Yukon territory. If the six months' hoist were carried, we would be declaring that we would not grant the salary for an additional judge in the Yukon and the salary for the chief justice in the North-west Territories, and that I am sure no hon. gentleman on either side desires to do. I would therefore suggest whether it would not be better to withdraw the motion and take advantage of the rules to test in committee the particular question on which hon. gentlemen opposite differ from the government.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I did not move the motion and have no control over my hon. friend from Beauharnois who is not here. The remarks I made were specially addressed to that clause of the Bill which concerns the province of Quebec and none other. I did not propose to speak at all for the other provinces.

Mr. G. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.) The strong objection I have to the whole thing is the indefensible conduct of the government in bringing down legislation like this at this hour of the session. It is one of a piece with any measures, which we have had submitted to us, and the time has come when we must protest against it. We are in the sixth month of the session, we have nearly one-half of the estimates yet to go through with. In the supplementary estimates there are $7,300,000, and more than 800 items. And a large proportion of these, I judge from simply scanning them, make one feel that a member does not do his duty unless they are looked into, and looked into very carefully. And yet, in the face of all this, the government leave important legislation like this until the dying hours of the session, when the Chamber is denuded of three-quarters of its members, and asks us to come to conclusions on such questions as those here involved. That is one reason why I seconded the six months' hoist, and it is a reason why I believe that this course ought to be followed in the case of every measure which has been unduly delayed which the government brings down at such a period of the session.

But I am opposed to the addition of the three judges to the judiciary of Quebec for reasons that I stated in 1898. And now, in 1900, those reasons seem to me just as strong as they did then. We have the admission of the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick), we have the admission of the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) himself that there are enough judges in the province of Quebec at this moment to do all the judicial work of the province, and to do it thoroughly; and that the whole difficulty is a difficulty of distribution and of allotment of duties. Now, when the Prime Minister and the Solicitor General both admit that—and they admitted it plainly to-day, as they admitted it in 1898—they give away, it seems to me, the whole case, unless parliament must submit to the doctrine that we are simply here to vote the people's money to carry out any disposition that any provincial government may choose to make of its judicial work. So far as I am concerned, I am not going to refine about the constitution or anything of that kind; but I am going to say that it is not common sense to subscribe to that view; and as one member of this House I have never subscribed to it and do not propose to do so. The debate has been a fairly illustrative and instructive debate, in one direction at least. I do not know whether the House fairly took in the argument made by the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), who leads the government or not; but if they did, I think that even this House, in the fifth session under the right hon. gentleman's leadership must have been mildly surprised at the ground he took. What was the ground taken by the Prime Minister? It was that you must submit to the ill dispositions and poor distribution, the bad method of arrangements with reference to the judicial service in the province of Quebec. And why? Simply because it is old, and because, as the right hon. gentleman said, there was a sentiment amongst the people which would rather keep it as it is—not that it was right, but that it was popular. For these reasons, the right hon. gentleman did not think that this House had a right to interfere in the only way in which it can interfere—and I would not call it interference—it has no right even to interpose in any case, provided you have the two conditions, that the people are wedded sentimentally to decentralization in certain points, and that it is unpopular to take any position to thwart them. I think that is the worst ground that could possibly be taken. That would decide completely and in advance against every improvement and amelioration in the state of the country. But it is illustrative of the policy of the right hon. gentleman. In one breath, he admits that the judicial material is quite sufficient, if it were well distributed to do the work; and, in the next breath, he says: I would not interfere with it, because it would not be popular to do so. That throws a great light upon every move the right hon. gentleman has made since he began to lead this government. The protective principle is wrong; but the right hon. gentleman found before he had been in office three months that it was not popular to interfere with it. His convictions of right and wrong disappeared before his fear of what he thought would be an unpopular move on his part. I think there is a better ground to take than that—the ground taken by the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain); namely, that an effort should be made and should be continued until it is successful for the improvement of what the Solicitor General himself, as spokesman of the government in reference to these matters, readily admits to be a bad system, improved. The right hon. gentleman admits that it is bad, but he proceeds to cure it in what way? By putting up another bulwark to that system by the appointment of three more judges to an already overburdened judiciary. Would these additions strengthen or weaken the system? Would they make it more easy or more difficult in the future to remedy what is admitted to be an evil? Everybody sees that the moment the leader of the government admits the doctrine that you must not interfere with this because there is a sentiment in its favour, and then appoints three judges who, if the work were properly distributed would be entirely unnecessary, saddling the taxpayers with another burden—the moment that is done by the right hon. gentleman, he adds his whole power and that of his party to the maintenance of what he admits to be a bad distribution of the judiciary of the province of Quebec. Now, does he mean to teach in this House that we who are the guardians of the people's money, who are the trustees for the expenditure of the taxes of this Canadian people, are simply here at the beck and call of wrong sentiment or party interest in any province, and that when they please, for their own purposes, to make judgeships, no matter how unnecessary, we have nothing to do but to register their opinion in that respect, and provide the money? In stating that, you state what any one would admit to be an absurdity; you must reach a point in going in this direction where you must interfere or interpose by refusing to grant the salary. If you admit that you have the power and the right to do so, the only point to determine is whether this is a case in which that salutary interposition shall take place, and in which the influence of parliament shall be directed toward the improvement of conditions which are admittedly bad.

We are now paying about $820,000 or $830,000 a year for the administration of justice in the Dominion of Canada, over $50,000 more than was paid in 1896, when hon. gentlemen opposite came into power. And my contention in 1898 was, and my contention is now, that there is sufficient money voted, and more than sufficient, to raise the salaries of the judiciary of this country very appreciably, and do the judicial work of this country without increasing the expenditure, if only a proper distribution of the work were made.

I do not think we will ever come to a proper distribution until this House comes to the conclusion that the pressure of judicious interposition at least must be put on to the powers that be, as a weight towards remedying this thing. I say that in the province of Prince Edward Island, in New Brunswick, in Nova Scotia, in Quebec, and I believe in Ontario, you have judges falling over one another. Judges ought not to be overworked, but there is no danger of judges being overworked when you have such large numbers appointed to the judicial offices in these provinces that I have named. It may be true that some of the judges are overworked, it may be true that in the city of Montreal itself, the resident judges are overworked, but that ought not to be a valid argument. In the province itself there are judges that are not doing a month's work in the course of a whole year, and presumably competent judges. That ought not to be an argument for adding three more judges, it ought, rather, to be an argument for a proper distribution of the judicial work.

Now, what has happened? In the sixth month of the session, directly before a general election, a rush is made, without grappling with the difficulty of the judiciary of the whole country through, without attempting to grapple with it in the province of Quebec—a rush is made to vote the people's money and to make places for three of the partisans of hon. gentlemen opposite. The time is inopportune, the principle upon which the thing is put is a bad one, one which the Solicitor General and the Premier himself are compelled to acknowledge to be faulty, in so far as the basis is concerned upon which they are making the appropriation, that is the distribution of the judicial work in that province. Now, those are the grounds why I am opposed to this. We are sitting here now from eleven o'clock in the morning until twelve or one o'clock the next morning, with the idea that we ought to rush the work through. I am beginning to have great sympathy with the remark made the other day by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Ellis), that we might as well revise this hurried method of business, and make up our minds to sit here, if necessary, for another month or a month and a half, and do the work like men. I appeal to the right hon. gentleman, and to the Solicitor General, and to every member of this House, whether, in the Election Bill, which we have just hurried through in these last hours of the session, any kind of workmanlike deliberation was bestowed upon it? I sat here to-day and watched the progress of that Bill, and there was not a single condition of sound and sane legislation which remained to this House while that was going through. And yet there was a measure which these hon. gentlemen knew was to be brought in. It should have been ready at the very earliest moment of parliament. But laying that aside, it has been in its proper dress before this parliament for over two months and a half, and yet it is left to these exciting, restless, disturbed and meagre conditions, which surround the last week or ten days of a session, the rump of a parliament, so to speak, to bring that Bill down and to put it through its given stages. Every one knows that it was mere haphazard, uncertain, and altogether unsatisfactory work. So far as I am concerned, I am quite willing to vote for putting this measure over. The argument of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, that you should not move the motion because, along with one very objectionable feature, there are one or two that might be allowed to pass, does not appeal to the good sense of the House. Why did the hon. gentlemen opposite mix up the bad thing with good ones? If they would bring down a good measure, it would get through with ease, after proper discussion. But to mix up a very bad thing with one or two good ones, then ask us to pass the whole, is hardly sound doctrine.

Mr. W. H. MONTAGUE (Haldimand). I do not think there is any objection to the clauses with reference to the Yukon and the North-west Territories. But knowing nothing about judicial matters, I listened to the debate this afternoon, and did not see any reason why we should pass this Act, so far as Quebec is concerned. It is provided by the constitution, as has been pointed out to us, that the legislature shall say how many judgeships there shall be, and this parliament shall vote the pay, and the government appoint the officers. Now, that had a purpose in it, and I think the purpose was to hold the legislatures in check to a certain extent, in regard to the creation of too many of these offices. The hon. gentleman told us this afternoon, that he had had negotiations. I know how difficult it is to negotiate with one's political friend. The hon. gentleman's friends are now in power in Quebec, and he has had negotiations with them. But, of course, while I do not charge for a moment that party interests would prevail entirely with the hon. gentleman, still to a certain extent he would be influenced by the party interests of his friends in the province of Quebec. I think that the hon. gentleman has made it almost impossible for this parliament, without great objection, to pass the Act, when he has admitted what has just been said by the member for York, N.B., (Mr. Foster). We take the argument of the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton), it was all concentrated in the last two or three sentences which he gave to the House. He took great pains to show us that there were not more judges in the province of Quebec, proportionately, than there were in the province of Ontario. Now, that argument was unnecessary, because it was not a question of whether there were enough judges to do the work. That had been admitted by the Prime Minister and by the Solicitor General.

The PRIME MINISTER. No.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I thought the hon. gentleman tried to persuade the province of Quebec not to pass this legislation?

The PRIME MINISTER. I preferred the other system.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I understood him to say that there were sufficient judges, at least, the Solicitor General did say there were quite sufficient judges to do the work. Therefore, the whole argument of the hon. member for Kingston drops to the ground. It is only a question of the distribution of the work. Now, how are we going to get that effective system, which the right hon. gentleman says he desires to obtain? We will never get this ineffective system remedied until this parliament steps in and says: Your system is defective, you must change your system and you must distribute the work properly; these men who are already appointed are being paid, you must allow them to consume their time in doing this work before we appoint extra judges.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Do I understand my hon. friend to say that this parliament is to decide what is to be the judicial system in the province of Quebec?

Mr. MONTAGUE.

Mr. MONTAGUE. No, I say, with the Prime Minister, that the system of the distribution of work there is entirely defective, so defective that he tried to prevail upon the local authorities to have it changed. I say he was not in a position to prevail upon them, because of his party friends being in power, and party exigencies coming up. But what I say is that it is a defective system, and we ought to exercise our influence to have it remedied, and the only way to do so is to hesitate before we appoint new officers at the beck and call of the provincial legislature, and pay them by vote of this parliament, as we would have to do.

Now, coming from the province of Ontario, as I do, I know something of the work which the judges in that province do. While I do not think they are exceedingly busy, I do not think you would possibly find a judge of the High Court of Ontario who only tries from eighteen to forty-two cases in one year, and I say that a system under which a Superior Court judge receives the annual salary of a High Court judge and only tries eighteen cases in one year is a system that this parliament ought to make a very great effort to change and that I would hesitate before consenting to increase the number of judges.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. You would have to change the British North America Act.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman is sticking out for a constitutional point. I am not saying that we should introduce a Bill to change that system, but I think that the province of Quebec, if properly reasoned with by the government in power, will not persist in asking for new judges when judges are lying around idle, because, a man is idle who gets $4,000 a year for trying eighteen cases.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. $3,500 a year in some cases.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Only in one case, I am told.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. No.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Well, in two instances it was thirty-nine.

The PRIME MINISTER. You are all wrong there.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I am taking the figures of the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton); thirty-one cases, an hon. gentleman tells me. However, you have men getting $3,500 a year for trying eighteen cases.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. That is not correct. No one can say that there are only eighteen cases.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I am taking the figures stated here to-day. The figures were given by the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Gasgrain).

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. That is not correct.

Mr. MONTAGUE. How many were there? Some forty, some forty-two, some eighteen and some nineteen. We will say thirty cases tried by one judge; here is more than $100 paid to a judge for trying a case, which, on the average, does not last over half a day, I will venture to say. It is an extraordinary thing to me for the government to bring in a Bill of this kind. There can be no question whatever that there are sufficient judges if a proper distribution of the work had been made. What proper distribution may be brought about if the government of the day will only exercise their influence on the government of the province of Quebec. There is no need of taking them by the throat; there is no need to step outside of the constitution and say: We will pass a resolution as to the judicial system of Quebec. Not at all. We can exercise this power that the constitution intended we should exercise, namely, a supervising influence without the creation of these judgeships, and it is a mighty strong supervising influence when you say: You may create the judges, but the parliament of Canada has to vote the money by which the judge shall be paid. I do not understand how any one can go back to his constituency and say that we did right in voting these judgeships. The Solicitor General was compelled to admit that there were a lot of judges in Quebec. The Prime Minister said to the province of Quebec: You had better change your system, but they said: We must go on under our old system. It is an old, antiquated, out of date system.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. It is a system the province of Ontario wants to come to.

Mr. MONTAGUE. But, we must, under the constitution, vote this money and create these judgeships which the Solicitor General admits are not necessary. While I support the clauses in regard to the North-west Territories and Yukon most heartily, I will vote against the other.

Mr. N. A. BELCOURT (Ottawa). Mr. Speaker. I want to enter my protest against a portion of the remarks made this afternoon by the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron). I was considerably surprised at the description of the state of affairs relative to the administration of justice in the district from which he comes. One hon. member on this side of the House who spoke in reference to the subject, inferred from the remarks of the member for Beauharnois that the state of affairs so described was general throughout the province of Quebec. I did not think that any one in this House would, for a moment, have seriously concluded from the remarks of the hon. member for Beauharnois that the extraordinary state of affairs which he had described as existing in Beauharnois was general in Quebec. It is possible, even likely, that many people throughout the country will also draw the same inference from the remarks made by the hon. gentleman. As a member of the bar of the province of Quebec, and as one who has had considerable experience before the bench and with the bar of that province, I desire to enter my solemn and earnest protest against the insinuation, or the inference which might be drawn from the statements of the hon. gentleman. If the administration of justice is what he says it is in the district of Beauharnois, I think the hon. gentleman has been very derelict in the performance of his public duties in not bringing to the attention of the authorities the conduct of the judge who presides there. The administration of justice in the province of Quebec will compare favourably with the administration of justice in any other province in Canada, and I can speak with some knowledge in reference to the province of Ontario at least. Now, I cannot, for one moment, understand what motive could have impelled the hon. gentleman in speaking so disparagingly of the bar and bench of the province of Quebec. He is a member of that bar himself. He poses in this House and before the country as one of the leaders of the Conservative party in that province. I do not think that the electors of Quebec will feel very grateful to the hon. gentleman for the very unseemly remarks he has made concerning the bench and the bar of that province. Now, I propose to say a few words in reference to the Bill itself. The hon. gentleman for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) told us that the system in Quebec is old, antiquated, and he used some other adjectives.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I was quoting the language of the Prime Minister.

Mr. BELCOURT. I do not think the Prime Minister said the system was bad or antiquated.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes, obsolete. He said that it was bad and that he had tried to get it remedied.

Mr. BELCOURT. It was the hon. gentleman who said the system was bad and antiquated. To show that there is a wide difference of opinion in regard to this question, I would like to quote to to this question, I would like to quote to the hon. member for Haldimand from a very high authority in the Conservative party, Mr. Mousseau, who at one time was Attorney General of Quebec, who was successively in several ministries in Quebec, and was Secretary of State at Ottawa. As Attorney General of Quebec the administration of justice in that province must have come under his notice. Speaking in this House in 1881 on this subject, he said:

It had been suggested that judges should be brought in from the rural districts to sit in Montreal. The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) has thought him sufficiently wise to give advice, and to tell the Quebec bar, government and people what they should do. One government has, however, anticipated him, and have declared there is no effective remedy except that of appointing two additional judges, one to the Superior Court and the other to the Court of Appeal. The hon. leader of the opposition has sought to discuss the question from a Quebec standpoint; but he may claim his patriotic zeal with the reflection that other people more conversant with the object are already at work; that the judges are endeavouring to find a remedy, and the government of Quebec has already applied a remedy. With all these persons there is combined sufficient talent to bring about a proper remedy. Some other parties hold that the number of judges is sufficient, but that they should be compelled to reside in Montreal—that eighteen or twenty should reside in that city—and that they should be sent out every three or four months into the rural districts.

Later on, another member of this House, Mr. Cimon, in discussing the antiquated, the bad and the otherwise qualified system in the province of Quebec, had this to say:

What is the conduct of those judges who should remain in their districts? They take up their residence in the district of Montreal. With the system which they have adopted of preventing the transaction of business in the rural districts, there is nothing to be surprised at if that business should be so small, especially when one sees a judge who lives in the district of Montreal, and who should be residing 500 miles further off, in the district of Gaspé, on learning that proceedings have been instituted in his district, hastens to send money to the plaintiff in order to avoid going down to his district.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Will the hon. gentleman tell me who that judge was that Mr. Cimon referred to?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Judge Cimon?

Mr. CASGRAIN. Not at all. He was not a judge then.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. He was dealing with the iniquities that would result from the system you seek to introduce.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What year was that in?

Mr. BELCOURT. 1881. The answer to the hon. gentleman is, that I do not think the gentleman's name would change the nature of the offence, if offence it is.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Give us the name.

Mr. BELCOURT. I said it was Mr. Cimon.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Give us the name of the judge who did that. It was not Judge Cimon, anyway.

Mr. BELCOURT. I do not know what Cimon it was, or whether it was Simple Simon or not. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that a great deal of this discussion is outside the question. The province of Quebec, has, after all, the matter in its own hands, and must decide for itself what system is best. We have no jurisdiction in the matter, and I submit that we have no business even to express opinions about it. It is entirely within the jurisdiction of the local legislature. So long as the legislature of Quebec says that they require these judges for the administration of justice, and call upon the Dominion government to appoint them, it seems to me that it is wasting time to discuss in this House whether the judicial system in the province of Quebec is a good or a bad system. We have nothing to do but to carry out the wishes of the competent authority in this matter, just as we would carry out the wishes of the province of Ontario or any other province which would express its wishes in the same way as the province of Quebec has given expression to them.

The PRIME MINISTER. I wish to make a personal explanation. I stated this afternoon that the system in the province of Quebec was antiquated, but as to the system proposed some years ago by the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain), I wish to say to my hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster), and my hon. friend from Haldimand (Mr. Montague), that if the system of my hon. friend (Mr. Casgrain) had been adopted, it would not decrease the number of judges, but would increase the number.

Mr. CASGRAIN. No.

The PRIME MINISTER. Yes. There will be thirty-four judges in the province of Quebec doing Superior Court and circuit court business if this Bill is adopted. But, under the measure of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Casgrain) there would be fifteen Superior Court judges and twenty-six circuit court judges, making forty-one judges conducting the same business that now will be done by thirty-four judges.

Mr. CASGRAIN. You do not count the district magistrates.

The PRIME MINISTER. They are not paid by this government.

Mr. RAYMOND PREFONTAINE (Maison-neuve). This question is of the utmost importance to the province of Quebec, and especially to the district of Montreal, and it is my duty to offer a few remarks to the House. I hold the same view as my colleague from the city of Ottawa (Mr. Belcourt), in that I am much surprised that the amendment now before the House should be moved by a member of parliament from the province of Quebec, or from the district of Montreal, or any district contiguous to Montreal. I cannot explain the action of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bergeron) in any way, shape or form, because if the hon. gentleman were at all aware of the opinions of the bar of Montreal, he would know that it is the unanimous sentiment there that this law should be passed. I do not know how the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bergeron) could see his way to ignore that opinion in the district of Montreal, and to antagonize the wishes of those who are practising law there. It is admitted that the want of more judges in Montreal has been felt for a great number of years. It is so well admitted that the ex-Attorney General of the province of Quebec (Mr. Casgrain) sought to find a remedy for it. But, although the government of which he was a minister had an overwhelming majority in the legislature, he found that the chances were that his government would be in a minority if he pressed his Bill. I remember the facts very well. The hon. gentleman brought his voluminous Bill in at the end of one session, and after the second reading he left it over to be studied between that session and the succeeding one. At the second session the Bill did not go further than the second reading, and the hon. gentleman dropped it.

Mr. CASGRAIN. It went beyond the second reading.

Mr. PREFONTAINE. Anyway, it was never passed, although the hon. gentleman had a majority supporting him. If I am well informed, there was not a minister who spoke in favour of it among his own colleagues.

Mr. CASGRAIN. There were two.

Mr. PREFONTAINE. Be that as it may, the Bill did not pass, because the sentiment in the province of Quebec, of both Liberals and Conservatives, was against it. At the general elections which followed, the hon. gentleman's party was badly beaten at the polls and a new government came into power. The new government had the experience of what had taken place in the two sessions previously, and of the poor success that the Attorney General had in trying to pass his law to decentralize the judicial system of the province of Quebec. I do not say that the Bill was not one which should not pass, with certain amendments. But, what is the use of trying to convince the people in favour of a remedy which they will not accept. The present government of the province of Quebec faced the difficulty in a practical way, and they brought in a Bill saying, that in view of the statistics of the different judicial districts, they believed there was need for three more judges in the district of Montreal. That law, which was submitted to a legislature composed of a majority of Liberals, did not even go to a vote; that is to say, it was adopted unanimously.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I hold in my hand the Journals of the legislature of Quebec, and they contradict the statement made by my hon. friend (Mr. Prefontaine). The Journals say :

The Order of the Day being read for the second reading of the Bill from the legislative council, entitled an Act to amend the law respecting the constitution of the Superior Court, the Hon. Mr. Robidoux moved, seconded by the Hon. Mr. Marchand, and the question being put that the Bill be now read a second time, the House divided, and it was resolved in the affirmative.

Mr. PREFONTAINE. There was no division. Some one may have called 'carried on division,' as we do here sometimes, and that does not mean very much, if you have not the courage to ask for a vote. Anyway, there was a good remedy: The Bill could have been rejected by the legislative council—because, as you are aware, we have a legislative council in the province of Quebec in which there is a majority of Conservatives; but the Bill passed the legislative council. So that, we have good reason for saying that the universal sentiment of the province of Quebec, Conservative and Liberal, is in favour of the appointment of these three additional judges for the district of Montreal. Now, this law was passed in 1898.

Mr. CASGRAIN. 1899.

Mr. PREFONTAINE. 1898.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I suppose the hon. gentleman will not correct the Journals of the House. The Bill was passed on the 22nd of February, 1899, 62 Victoria.

Mr. PREFONTAINE. But that session was begun in 1898, and we therefore, call it the session of 1898. There is no use of playing upon words. The session began in November, and ended in the latter days of January. The Act was passed the session before last.

Mr. CASGRAIN. The session began on the 12th of January, and ended on the 10th of March.

Mr. PREFONTAINE. That does not make much difference; it was the session before the last session of this parliament. I stand corrected; but I mean that there was a session of this parliament before the law was taken into consideration at all, and it was during that time that the government of the Dominion tried to come to some understanding and made inquiries as to the necessity of passing the law. The result was that the provincial government issued the necessary proclamation, and this law came into force. Now, the law being in force, how are you going to get over the difficulty? Have we in the province of Quebec under the constitution the right to pass a law to regulate the administration of justice in our province? If this point is admitted, and the government have taken means to ascertain whether the law was necessary or not, on what ground can this parliament say to the province of Quebec,

You are in need of three more judges in the district of Montreal to administer properly the judicial business of the district, but you shall not have them.

Mr. MONTAGUE. This government had no right to inquire whether it was necessary or not.

Mr. PREFONTAINE. They did inquire in this case; they took extra precautions, and they ascertained that it was necessary. But that is not the question. I put the question fairly and squarely. Suppose the business of the province of Quebec should become so important that double the number of judges we have now would be necessary, and the people of the province should say, We want more judges; would any one on the other side of the House pretend that the parliament of Canada should say to the province of Quebec. You shall not have these judges; you shall not have the administration of justice as the people of the province want it. This is exactly the question as it stands now. The people of the province of Quebec in their local legislature have expressed their opinion in such a way that it cannot be misunderstood; this government, after full inquiry, have satisfied themselves that these additional judges are necessary, and I do not understand how some hon. members on the other side can assert that they are not necessary. It is always disagreeable to make comparisons; but it is admitted that in the province of Ontario there are seventy-four county judges and fifteen High Court judges, whereas in the province of Quebec we have thirty-one judges. I admit that we have in the district of Montreal three circuit court judges, who dispose of over 17,000 cases per year. They accomplish this work by sitting in rotation, two judges sitting in different divisions at the same time. It is admitted that these judges are overworked. There are always cases waiting to be inscribed and tried by these circuit court judges.

Mr. BRITTON. As the hon. gentleman is correcting me in regard to the number of judges, it is as well to have it right in making a comparison. I understand that in the province of Quebec there are six judges in the Court of Appeal, thirty-one Superior Court judges, and three circuit court judges. So that I was correct.

Mr. PREFONTAINE. I did not mention the judges of the Court of Appeal. The eleven judges of the Superior Court in the district of Montreal have had to try during the last three or four years, on the average, 5,000 cases a year, whereas, if I am well informed, the whole number of cases in the province of Ontario is below 3,500. It stands to reason that these eleven judges are overworked. I will mention only one fact, without going into other details, that during the month of March, 1900, 231 cases were inscribed in the Superior Court in the district of Montreal. During that month six judges sat to try those cases, and only 121 were disposed of, so that there remained over a hundred cases which were not tried and had to be left over to another term. And this has been going on for the last three or four years. Under these circumstances, I think that the people of the province of Quebec are the best judges of the situation; and when they enact a law which they have a right to do under the constitution, and come before this parliament and ask that this law should be put into effect, it certainly does not belong to any member from the province of Quebec to say that it should be delayed for six months more; and it is very unbecoming of members from other provinces to say to the province of Quebec. You do not know what you are about—because that is what it means. It is a very cavalier way to dispose of a Bill, to move the six months' hoist; and hon. gentlemen have lost sight of the fact that there are parts of this Bill which affect the Northwest Territories and the Yukon territory; but I have not to defend those parts of the Bill. I think it is perfectly clear to any fair-minded member of this House that the province of Quebec has expressed itself in favour of this resolution, and that the district of Montreal will suffer greatly if this legislation is deferred any longer.

While I do not want to belittle any other city in the Dominion, you must bear in mind that the great railway companies have their principal offices in the city of Montreal, that the principal banks of the Dominion have their head offices or largest branches there. that it is there that the largest amount of duties is collected from inland revenue and otherwise. It stands to reason therefore that there should be in that city a vast amount of business which ought to be disposed of as quickly as possible. Well, if you do not furnish the necessary judicial system, it will be not only the district of Montreal that will suffer, but the whole province of Quebec, and the whole Dominion, because in many of the cases before the courts in that city, interests are at stake from other provinces, connected with the large enterprises that have their principal offices there. Under the circumstances, why should the other provinces think that they are wiser than the province of Quebec in this matter? They should pause and consider the question purely and simply as a business proposition and nothing else, affecting the interests, not of a particular district or province, but of the country at large. If the judicial system of the province of Quebec is antiquated, if it is not perfect, well the people by degrees will come to understand that. They are generally intelligent enough to understand these things in that province. They have shown in the past that they can govern themselves. When a particular government does not please them they change it. When men are trying to impose themselves on public opinion in that province, they are called down, and the province has done that many times. This is not a political question.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to put him a question? What objection has he to a judge from the district of Iberville, or Beauharnois, or St. Hyacinthe, or Bedford, coming into Montreal to sit there and administer justice?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. None whatever. That is done every day, and it cost last year $16,000 to pay the travelling expenses of the judges from those rural districts who came and sat in Montreal.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Would you not remedy the evil?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. At present the chief justice has the power to call them. He cannot force them, but he can call them to come.

Mr. CASGRAIN. And they do come.

Mr. PREFONTAINE. Some do. Some are very anxious to come; they even stay in Montreal so as to have their three days at six dollars a day for travelling expenses, rather than live in their own districts. Others do not care to disturb themselves and leave their district. Some judges, who are supposed to live in outside districts, are actually living in the city of Montreal and drawing travelling expenses. Last year the amount was $16,000.

Mr. CASGRAIN. No.

Mr. PREFONTAINE. Anyway it has been established to the satisfaction of the people of Quebec that this system of calling in rural judges to the city of Montreal and making them sit on cases there does not work satisfactorily, and they want more judges. The statistics are there to show that more judges are absolutely necessary. There is no party question at issue. It has been whispered that this motion was made because we are on the eve of general elections, and the party opposite hope to steal a march on the party in power by preventing the passage of this law, which they would pass themselves willingly if they should come here in a majority at the next parliament. But surely these politicians ought to set themselves above such party considerations.

Mr. FOSTER. As my hon. friend did on behalf of the government, in the appointment of a harbour master in Montreal.

Mr. PREFONTAINE. I do not see the point. If there is a point, I would like to see it. Whether the judges are appointed by this government or the government that succeeds does not matter very much, when you consider the interests of such a large district as that of Montreal, which involve interests affecting the whole Dominion, and when also you consider the important question of principle involved. When our constitution gives each province the right to decide what justice it shall have, surely the parliament of Canada should provide the means for giving a province the proper men to administer justice to the satisfaction of the people of that province.

I do not wish to go any further and discuss what affects the North-west Territories as well as the Yukon. As regards the North-west Territories, the matter is one more of administration than anything else; but as regards the Yukon district, I may say that I have letters from high authorities there who say that there is not a sufficient number of judges in that district at present and that it is absolutely necessary to provide what is lacking. Anyway that is a matter which does not interest me very much, but I desired to state my views as regards the province of Quebec and the district of Montreal.

Mr. FOSTER. I think that there is something in the point made by the Minister of Marine, and although the mover of the motion is not here, I believe that if he were he would be willing to withdraw the motion and renew it on the clause to which it really applies. I would therefore ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Mr. SPEAKER. That cannot be done.

Amendment negatived on division.

Motion agree to; Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into committee thereon.

(In the Committee.)

On section 3.

Mr. FOSTER. I think the Solicitor General might make a statement as to why an additional judge is to be appointed in the Yukon.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The only information I can give is that representations have been made by the judge who is now in the Yukon, Judge Dugas, and also Commissioner Ogilvie, to the effect that one judge is not able to attend to the business accumulating in that territory.

Mr. FOSTER. Is there any report?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. There are these representations, but no other report, to my knowledge.

Mr. FOSTER. What are the representations?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. They are to the effect that the business has increased to such an extent that the one judge, who has to administer civil and criminal justice, and also to perform the duties of a High Court judge and magistrate, cannot undertake the work.

Mr. FOSTER. The Solicitor General will see that, while he may have information to base his action upon, by his own admission, that information is meagre, and the House has absolutely none. When you go to the extent of doubling the judiciary in a district, the House is at least entitled to a fair representation of the reasons for so doing.

The PRIME MINISTER. I was under the impression, and I think it will be found correct, that it was notorious that the people of the Yukon had asked for more than one new judge. But, if my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) has any doubt as to that, I will undertake, on the third reading, to have the correspondence on the subject.

Mr. SPROULE. I wish to say a word with reference to a statement made by me in the early part of this debate concerning the action of the Ontario legislature in connection with the appointment of judges. I made the statement that in 1896, they passed a law forbidding the appointment of a junior judge in any county where there was not a population of 80,000 or over, and afterwards, when their friends came into power here, they amended that law so as to make it possible to appoint a junior judge in such counties. That was, as I understood, practically contradicted by the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton). I think he admitted that they made one exception. I wish to read the clauses of the Acts to which I refer, so that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Britton) and this House may see that I was by no means so far astray as the hon. gentleman seemed to suppose.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I do not think that that is a question that can be raised under section 3, which we are now considering.

Mr. SPROULE. I am merely referring to a statement I made. I suppose that when the motion is made to report the Bill, I could make my statement. I was merely about to read the section I referred to. In the Statutes of Ontario, 1896, chap. 19, section 15, is the following :

In the case of any county or union of counties having a population not exceeding 80,000, for which there are at the time of the passing of this Act two judges, and hereafter one of them dies, resigns his office or is removed therefrom, there shall thereafter be but one judge of the said county or union of counties, and there shall be no appointment of another judge in the place of the judge so dying.

That made it impossible, as I said, to appoint a junior judge in any county having less than 80,000 inhabitants. In 1897, immediately after the present government came into power—for they came into power in 1896—that Act was amended by the following :

If any commission issued to a junior or second judge in and for any county or union of counties since the said County Courts Act, 1896, was passed, or if any such commission which may hereafter be issued, states or recites that the population of such county or union of counties exceeds 80,000, the fact so stated shall be conclusively assumed——whether it is so or not. It only requires that it shall be stated in the commission, and it is to be assumed to be correct, even though the statistics disprove it.

—and shall not be controverted; and the appointment, authority or jurisdiction of the judge appointed thereby shall not be open to question on the ground that such population did not at the time of such appointment or issue of such commission, or at any time thereafter, exceed 80,000.

That applies to the whole province, and, therefore, gives them the power, by merely stating in the commission that there is a population of 80,000 in the county, to make the appointment. It goes further and says :

This section shall not apply to any county in which is situate a city, and for which county a junior judge has been heretofore appointed, nor to the counties of Grey, Renfrew, Stormont, Dundas and Glengarry, Ontario, Bruce, Simcoe, Huron and Victoria and Haliburton.

I leave it to the House to say whether that does not include practically the whole province, just as I said.

Mr. FOSTER. Who is to have the honour of being the chief justice in the North-west ?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The present senior judge, Judge Richardson.

Bill reported.

COPYRIGHT ACT AMENDMENT.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher) moved that the House resolve itself into committee on Bill (No. 167) to amend the Copyright Act.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I thought the Minister of Agriculture was willing that that Bill should go to a special committee.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. It has been to a special committee, and the report of that committee was laid upon the Table yesterday and read. It is printed in the Votes and Proceedings, page 749.

Mr. FOSTER. Let us have a short statement as to what conclusion the committee came to.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I think the conclusion is as well expressed in the report of the committee as I could express it. As I explained when this Bill was introduced and referred to that committee, it is founded on a request from the Canadian Authors' Society, approved by the Canadian publishers, and endorsed and supported by a resolution of the Manufacturers' Association of Ontario and of the Printers' Union.

Mr. FITZPATRICK.

Motion agreed to, Bill considered in committee, reported; read the third time, and passed.

SUPPLY—ABROGATION OF COASTING LAWS.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT (East Simcoe). Before you leave the Chair I beg to move a resolution, which I will afterwards read, in reference to what is commonly known as the abrogation, in the fall of last year, of the coasting laws by the government. I have before me a return moved for by the hon. member for York, N.B., (Mr. Foster) dated September 7, and a careful perusal of that will show that very few reasons apparently were placed before the government for such action. I now transmit it to the House to show upon what grounds the government should and could have based such important action. In a memorandum dated the 16th of October, 1899, amongst other things it is stated:

The action of the government in permitting American vessels to coast in Canadian waters was taken with a view to assist the building up of Canadian shipping, and upon that point there has been great diversity of opinion.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it has always been a matter of regret that Canadian shipping has in the past number of years been greatly handicapped for many reasons. First, owing to the coasting laws which exist in the United States and some similar ones which existed in Canada, it was found there was a large percentage of American vessels doing a maritime trade. In the first place, during the summer months, American vessels have a large trade in carrying ore from points on Lake Superior to points on Lake Erie. Unfortunately for the Canadian vessels under the coasting law they were prevented from engaging in that trade, and as there was no ore trade from the northern Canadian lakes to any points below, Canadian craft were of necessity forced to tie up at the docks during the best part of the summer months, while American vessels were at that period of the year having most remunerative rates. However, despite the handicap upon Canadian shipping, some gentlemen in the province of Ontario from time to time saw fit to invest their money in that enterprise. It is to be regretted that so far there has been upon the great lakes so few Canadian vessels. I may refer to the case of Haggerty and Grasett, vessel owners of the city of Toronto, who owned two very fine vessels doing a Canadian trade, namely, the Algonquin and the Rosedale. Though they have been the owners of these vessels for ten or twelve years, they have not seen fit to invest in any other boats, owing to the fact that during the summer months so little trade was in sight for Canadian vessels. In addition to these gentlemen I have named, there is what is known as the Kingston Transportation Company, which own several very fine steamers, but these it is reported have been eking out a very precarious existence for many years past. Now with the output of grain from the North-west it was expected that Canadian vessels would find at least, a remunerative trade, and last fall, when freights were fairly high, to the consternation and dismay of Canadian vessel owners they found that on the 14th of October the government had issued this proclamation which permitted American vessels to come in and encroach upon their trade. I cannot just now recollect the rates which prevailed at that time, but my impression is that the rates from Port Arthur to Fort William and from Chicago to ports on the Georgian Bay, had been from 4 to 6 cents. Immediately upon the issue of this order that American vessels were permitted to engage in that trade, freights tumbled to 2 and 3 cents a bushel. Now, there is not in this return a single statement of fact which will prove that the government had before them any representations from American vessel owners or from those who might be interested in the ownership of grain which they wished to have delivered at points in Canada from Fort William. On the face of the report it would seem that it was the intention that the handling of grain should be confined to grain that was to be taken down to tide water. Not only did the government permit a number of American vessels to engage in the carrying of grain from Fort William to Canadian points for export to Great Britain or other countries, but they also permitted them to carry grain to Canadian points from Fort William, which was for domestic use in Ontario and in other parts of the Dominion. Now, what was the result? The result was that, at first, there was the tumbling in rates which I have referred to, but later on, as we know by an answer made by the hon. Minister of Customs in the House to an inquiry made by himself, only seven or eight American vessels availed themselves of the privilege afforded by this order in council. The damaging part of it, was that once it was announced that American vessels could come in and participate in this trade, the rates were broken, although it appeared that otherwise, very little advantage was taken of them. It is stated in the report, that this order was sent forth on October 20 to the different collectors of customs. A protest was made by the marine section of the Board of Trade of the city of Toronto, and they pointed out the detrimental effects that would ensue, and which have ensued to Canadian shipping interests, if this course was carried out. Despite this protest the government saw fit to carry on the regulation, the result of which was that great damage was done to Canadian shipping interests. In the whole report, as brought down, there is not a single word to show that there was a request made by any person for this order, except a request made by Mr. Conmee, for the purpose of permitting hay to be carried from Manitoulin Island to Michipicoten, where a line of railway was being constructed and afterwards it was stated in a despatch from the collector of customs at Sault Ste. Marie, that the privilege was not taken advantage of. So that, in the report, I submit, there is nothing before the House to show that any request was made by any Canadian vessel owners, or any American vessel owners, or by any owners of grain, whether American or Canadian. In view of the immense tonnage of the lakes, owned by Americans, and in view of the fact that throughout the summer season they have a large and remunerative trade, while Canadian vessels have been practically tied up, the government should not have put them in a position of coming into competition with Canadian vessels. No guarantee has been given to the trade, that the order in council of last season will not be repeated in future seasons, and it is fair to infer that this course will be followed in other seasons, so long as hon. gentlemen have control of the affairs of the country. That probability has been strengthened by the action of the government lately, in respect to permitting American tugs to tow logs in Canadian waters. An explanation has been given by the hon. Minister of Customs, in answer to a question put by myself, in regard to an order which had been given. The hon. gentleman then stated that Hall & Co., of Sarnia, had been constructing, at that point, a large saw-mill, and that they had been permitted to tow logs from some point in Canada to Sarnia. What is going to follow in respect to the towing of logs? To-day we have on the Georgian Bay, gentlemen of means and enterprise, who have invested their money in large and expensive tugs. They have put money into these tugs, with the expectation that there would be an observance of the coasting laws of this Dominion. They expected that they would have the same rights guaranteed to them, as have been guaranteed in the past, and that the trade would be their own. But, in the example that has been given us in the case of Hall & Co., of Sarnia, it is only fair to infer that they will not have that guarantee, because the hon. Minister of Customs, who gave a very guarded answer in reply to my question, said, that from time to time—I do not pretend to give his exact words—each case should be considered on its own merits. It is manifestly unfair to Canadians who have invested their money in large and expensive tugs, when they are prevented and when they have always been prevented, from going over to the American side to engage in wrecking, and the towing of logs from one American point to another American point, to allow American vessels to come over here and participate in the trade with Canadian vessels. If this is going to go on, we can only bid farewell to the hopes of Canadian vessel and shipping interests, of men who have put their money into tugs for the towing of logs, unless the ministry through one of its members, will give a positive assurance to the owners of Canadian tugs, that, for the future, there shall be no breaking in upon the coasting laws and that Canadian tug-owners shall have the rights that are theirs in Canada, and which are denied to them in the United States. What was the result of this order in council in reference to grain vessels? It is stated in the memorial of the marine section of the board of trade, and I know it was a fact, that during last season, Mr. Booth, for reasons best known to himself, declined to contract with or to charter Canadian vessels, although he had in his employ during the season of 1899, some five different American vessels, shutting out from the trade between American ports and Depot Harbour Canadian vessels which ought to have had a share of the trade. Everything that was prophesied by the marine section of the board of trade has transpired. They stated that this request was made by Mr. Booth for the reason that he had on certain vessels an option to purchase, that he wished to put these vessels into the Canadian coasting trade, and that he wished to avoid paying the customs duties, by turning them from American into Canadian bottoms. The George Orr and the Albert H. Orr, are the names of two of the vessels referred to, by the marine section of the board of trade, or, are the names of two vessels which, to my personal knowledge, were in this trade and, I believe, that Mr. Booth, guided by the action of the government last year, proposes that these vessels shall participate in, and control the coasting trade this year. They will likely come into a similar trade this year, and Mr. Booth will then have these vessels entered as Canadian vessels from which the customs duties, had they been payable, would have amounted to $160,000. I assume that this fall a proposal will also be made to the government by Mr. Booth, similar to that which was made by him to the government last fall. When the fall trade is looming up, when the Canadian vessel owners are going to have their harvest, because no harvest is theirs during the summer months, barred as they are from the ore trade in American waters, by the coasting regulations of the United States, an injury will be done to them if American vessels are to be permitted to come in and compete with them for this trade. During the summer months, Canadian vessels are not allowed to go into the ore trade or the large coasting trade that is being done from

Mr. BENNETT.

Buffalo to Chicago, and if Canadian vessels are to be debarred from the only trade which is left open to them, which is the trade that may ensue between Fort William and ports on the Georgian Bay and Port Colborne, their interests will suffer. Now, the experience of the Canadian shipping business, is that it has been very uncertain in the past. The trade has been limited, owing to the coasting laws of the United States, and if the government propose to allow American vessels to come in here this fall, as they did last fall, if they propose that there shall be a continuance of the precedent which has been set, of permitting American tug-owners to come in and employ their tugs in Canadian waters in direct violation of the coasting laws, then one thing is inevitable, and that is that Canadian owners of vessels will have but one alternative left.

For the future they must build no vessels, but on the contrary they must see that the Canadian bottoms are turned into American bottoms. Mr. Booth had this advantage last fall and if the government concede it again this fall then Canadian vessel owners will be brought into direct competition with the American fleet of large vessels carrying 250,000 or 275,000 bushels each, which, of course, can carry at cheaper rates of freight than the Canadian vessels which at present have only a capacity of 75,000 or 80,000 bushels. I know that the Conlon Bros., of Thorold, purchased an American schooner called the Danforth, changed her to a Canadian registry believing that the Canadian coasting laws would be observed by the Canadian government, but in their case they were sadly disappointed. I regret that the government saw fit to make this change last fall, and I trust that in future so long as they may remain in power, they will not repeat that mistaken policy, but will regard the Canadian coasting regulations as jealously as they have been regarded in the past. I therefore beg to move, seconded by Mr. Ingram:

That all the words after the word 'That' be left out, and the following added instead thereof: 'by section 2, chapter 83, Revised Statutes of Canada, it is enacted:

No goods or passengers shall be carried by water, from one port in Canada to another, except in British ships; and if any goods or passengers are so carried, as aforesaid, contrary to this Act, the master of the ship so carrying the same shall incur a penalty of $400; and any goods so carried shall be forfeited, as smuggled; and such ship or vessel may be detained by the collector of customs at any port or place to which such goods or passengers are brought, until such penalty is paid, or security for the payment thereof given to his satisfaction, and until such goods are given up to him, to be dealt with as goods forfeited under the provisions of the Customs Act.

That by order in council, dated October 16, 1899, the government authorized that vessels of the United States be permitted to carry cargoes between Fort William or Port Arthur, in the province of Ontario, and any other port in Canada, either way, during the remainder of the present year, 1899, on the same terms and conditions as are applicable to Canadian vessels, forbearing to institute suits for penalties or forfeitures on account of the nationality of such vessels while so employed.

That by the action of the Deputy Minister of Marine and Fisheries of November 20, 1899, this permission was interpreted to apply to the carriage of grain for domestic use.

That by departmental permission, given on the advice of the Hon. R. W. Scott, acting Minister of Customs, the order in council was further extended to include the carrying of hay between Manitoulin Island and Michipicoten Harbour, in the province of Ontario.

That these actions were illegal, and, so far as appears from the evidence submitted, were based on no information sufficient to warrant the suspension of the law in the public interest.

That the conduct of the government in the above recited particulars was unjustifiable from a constitutional point of view, prejudicial to the transport and shipping interests of Canada, and merits the condemnation of this House.'

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I suppose it will be generally admitted that, inasmuch as under the United States coasting laws our Canadian vessels are not permitted to engage in their trade, it would only be fair and reasonable that as a general rule, and as a matter of principle and practice and custom, we should preserve our Canadian coasting trade for our Canadian vessels. That is the principle which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bennett) in making his motion, laid down, and I certainly am not prepared to dissent from it. Nevertheless there may be exceptional cases which would justify a departure from the rule. In each of these cases, of course, the matter must be considered on its merits and if good and sufficient reasons be found, the government would be justified in refraining from enforcing the law. There are offences against the laws of Canada with reference to which any citizen may begin a prosecution, and there are other offences for which the prosecution can only be taken by the responsible officers of the Crown. It is necessary to bear the distinction between the two in mind, because it seems to be implied that the responsible officers of the government, being charged with the prosecution of these offences, may under exceptional circumstances exercise their discretion as to whether or not they shall prosecute. So, it sometimes happens that the very letter of the law may not be obeyed and yet the government of the day may refrain from prosecution. While we all acknowledge that the Canadian shipping interest is a very important one, yet the grain producers of the west, who are interested in cheap transportation, are entitled to some consideration. We are endeavouring by large outlays of public money to cheapen transportation between the wheat fields of the great west and the sea, and it is well to keep that in mind when discussing this question. Last autumn a gentleman from Winnipeg, Mr. Smith, came to

Ottawa representing the grain interests, and he made strong representations that owing to the then condition of the grain and shipping trade there was every probability that the Canadian vessels available would not be able to handle the trade for the remainder of the season, and that unless some exceptional step was taken to provide additional transportation, a large volume of the grain trade would be diverted from the Canadian route.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What was the date of the visit?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I cannot give the date of the visit, but it would be shortly before the passing of the order in council which is dated October 16. I did not meet the gentleman myself, but I understand that he met some of my colleagues and made those representations. The question was whether that trade should go to Buffalo, and Canadian interests not in any way profit by it, or whether under the exceptional circumstances it would be well to permit it to be carried in American bottoms in order that we might at least have the advantage of having it pass through Canadian channels, giving employment to the various interests connected with the shipping at our Canadian ports. That was the view presented to the government, and assuming the information to be well founded, it seemed to be a very sound view. It was represented to us that all the Canadian vessels that were available were receiving employment. Believing the view presented to us to be a sound one, the government passed the following order in council on October 16, 1899:

On a report dated October 14, 1899, from the Minister of Finance, stating that British and Canadian shipping on the lakes above Montreal appears to be insufficient at the present time for moving the grain cargoes to be transported from Fort William to Ontario lake ports and thence by rail through Canada to tide-water.

That under the coasting laws, United States vessels are not at present permitted to engage in this traffic between two Canadian ports.

That for want of available British and Canadian tonnage a large portion of this grain traffic is likely to be carried from Fort William to Buffalo, and thence by United States railways or vessels to the seaboard.

That it is desirable to promote the movement of the said traffic along Canadian routes to the seaboard, and to assist the building up of Canadian shipping on the lakes by encouraging the permanent movement of the grain traffic through Canadian channels.

The minister therefore recommends, pending an increase in the lake shipping now entitled to participate in the coasting trade, that vessels of the United States be permitted to carry cargoes between Fort William or Port Arthur, in the province of Ontario, and any other port in Canada, either way, during the remainder of the present year (1899) on the same terms and conditions as are applicable to Canadian vessels—forebearing to institute suits for penalties or forfeitures on account of the nationality of such vessels while so employed.

Mr. FIELDING.

The committee submit the foregoing recommendation for Your Excellency's approval.

The report in question was made by myself as Minister of Finance owing to the fact that my hon. friend the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson), to whose department the matter properly belonged, was at the time absent from the city. The reasons for the action taken are set forth in the order in council. It was the opinion of the government at that moment that unless we granted this concession to American bottoms the probability was that a large volume of the trade which might come through Canadian channels would pass our doors and be carried to Buffalo.

Mr. SPROULE. Will the hon. gentleman tell us how many bushels of grain were at that time in the Port Arthur and Fort William elevators?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I cannot tell my hon. friend. While this was the representation made on behalf of the grain interests in Winnipeg, which I understand were represented by this gentleman, it was in harmony with the representation made, if I remember correctly, by the Montreal Corn Exchange during the previous season, when it was represented to the government that there was a probability of the lake shipping under the Canadian or British flag proving insufficient to handle the great volume of trade likely to come down. My hon. friend says that the effect of this order in council was to break the freight rates. I did not understand him to say that the vessel owners did not still receive a fair and profitable freight rate; but what I did understand him to say was that they might have obtained a larger rate but for the passing of this order in council. So that, according to his own argument, the people, whoever they might be, who were interested in the handling of the freight from the west, were receiving the advantage of cheap transportation as the result of the government's action.

Mr. BENNETT. If the hon. gentleman will allow me, the point was this. During the summer months, American vessels are engaged in the ore-carrying trade, which is the most profitable trade. As there is no ore trade for Canadian vessels, they are practically tied up during the summer months. Therefore the American vessels are able to carry cheaper in the fall than Canadian vessels, and the object of Canadian shippers was to build ships so that they would have that trade to themselves. I believe that the rates between Fort William and other Canadian points have been practically higher than the rates between Chicago and Buffalo.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I was going on to point out that this order in council bears on its face the evidence of its exceptional character. It does not attempt to lay down any general rule for future guidance. It simply says that in view of the representations made, for the particular purpose in view, and for that particular season, or only a part of the season—because the season was far advanced at the time—this privilege was granted. As it turns out, only a very small quantity of grain was carried under it. I have not the figures, but I am informed that only two cargoes of grain were carried in American vessels under that order in council. We claim that the policy of the government in the matter was a good one; but even if we admit my hon. friend's argument that it was a mistaken policy, it could hardly have had very serious results to the Canadian shipping trade when that was the case, and that fact ought to go to show the House that the matter should be treated as exceptional. Shortly after the order in council was passed a deputation waited on the Prime Minister—who, not knowing that this matter was coming up to-night, is not present—and presented substantially the same arguments as the hon. member for East Simcoe has advanced to-night; and my recollection is, though I speak subject to correction, that the Prime Minister, while giving in general terms the reasons for the government's action as I have given them, stated that he regarded the case as a very exceptional one, and he did not think that the government ought to grant these privileges without bringing the matter before parliament and having the authority of legislation. If I am correct in my recollection of what the Prime Minister said to the deputation, then, no action is necessary on his part or on the part of the House to prevent the granting of these privileges. Now, I think that the reasons set forth in the order in council will go far to show that the circumstances presented to the government did justify the step that was taken. In any event the results were not material; and as there was no probability of the trade by American vessels being carried on very extensively, I think there is hardly any danger of Canadian shipping interests being affected in any degree by any step which the government took or are likely to take in this matter.

Mr. E. F. CLARKE (West Toronto). Might I ask if the government took any steps to ascertain whether the representations made by Mr. Smith as to the scarcity of American ships were well-founded or not?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The government believed them to be well-founded, and they were in harmony with similar representations made on the part of the shipping interests on the Corn Exchange of the city of Montreal, which, of course had no interest in the matter other than the general interest of promoting Canadian trade.

Mr. CLARKE. The reason I ask that question is that immediately after the order in council was passed, a large deputation representing the shipping interests of the upper lakes and the forwarding interests of Kingston waited on the government to protest against their action.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. That is the deputation to which I have referred; and, in view of the statement made by the Prime Minister, I do not think there is any probability of the precedent then established becoming a dangerous one. I do not go so far as to say that under no circumstance will the government agree to forbear from a prosecution for penalties under this Act. That would be too broad a statement. But, in general terms, it is not the desire of the government to deny Canadian tonnage the reasonable protection it is entitled to under our coasting laws. Only in rare exceptional cases will the government be justified in permitting any departure from them. So much for the question of privileges granted for the carrying of grain.

On the question of the tug to which my hon. friend referred, that also was an exceptional matter, and I may leave my hon. colleague the Minister of Customs to deal with it. But it was an exceptional matter, a case where the owner of a tug, doing business both in the United States and Canada, had taken steps to obtain a tug in Canada under Canadian laws, and while that tug was being completed, he asked for temporary permission to bring his own tug across and employ it for a short service in Canada. In granting that permission, I do not think there is anything that hon. gentlemen need excite themselves to any extent about. But that branch of the question I would prefer leaving the Minister of Customs to deal with, as he knows more about it than I do, and can give explanations to the House if necessary.

Mr. W. H. MONTAGUE (Haldimand). I am sure the House will be delighted with the mild and meek manner of the Minister of Finance in answering the resolution and speech of my hon. friend from East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett). We have been plainly told that there is no necessity for discussing the question, from the government standpoint, at any length, because all the reasons are in the minute on which the order in council was based. But, the fact is, that in that minute there are no reasons at all. There is not a single reason given why the government should have performed the illegal, the un-Canadian act, they did when they inflicted this injury on the Canadian shipping interests. The hon. minister deals with it in a very light manner, but I would tell him that this government, accustomed as the people are to seeing it do extraordinary things, never did an act which shocked the business interests of Canada more than when they passed this order in council. The hon. gentleman's speech—what is it? It is, if you come to boil it down, practically an admission that they did wrong. They did it under the advice of a certain gentleman, to whom I shall refer in a moment, and they promise that if we do not say much about it, they will not do it again. That is just about the explanation made by the Minister of Finance of the action taken by the government, absolutely illegal and un-Canadian, upon a most important matter. We have been told that this is a business government, yet here we have the great shipping interests of Canada in the balance, and we have one man coming down to the city of Winnipeg, no doubt for absolutely selfish interests, making certain representations to that government, and we have that government going off—

An hon. MEMBER. At half-cock.

Mr. MONTAGUE. No, not at half or quarter cock, but at one-eighth cock. We have them, without making a single inquiry of the great interests concerned, taking this illegal, un-Canadian course. Why did they do that? Simply because a certain Mr. Smith came down from Winnipeg and made these representations to the government. Who was Mr. Smith's conductor when in Ottawa? He was in close consultation with the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton). This is the work of the Minister of the Interior, and not of the Minister of Finance. The Minister of Finance makes the representation and the recommendation, but the work is the work of the Minister of the Interior. It was the Minister of the Interior who was in charge of Mr. Smith who made these representations to the government, absolutely un-Canadian in their character, absolutely against the best interests of Canada, and it was the Minister of the Interior who went west and boasted that he had succeeded in securing this great boon. What was the boon that he had secured? As he said, it was one that would reduce freight rates to the west. But that was not done. What does the Minister of Finance say? His further statement is absolute evidence of the fact that Mr. Smith was making misrepresentations to the government at the time. My hon. friend here interjected a question: When were these representations made? They were made in September. What were the representations? That too much grain was in the elevators to be carried by the Canadian vessels then on the route. But, how much gain was in the Canadian elevators in September? I venture to say scarcely a bushel.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I did not say September.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The order in council was passed early in October.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. It was reported on the 14th and passed on the 16th of October.

Mr. MONTAGUE. We can conclude that about the end of September or the first of

Mr. MONTAGUE.

October these representations were made. Probably they were made on the 13th.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. They might have been.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Indeed it might, because this government does things in a great hurry sometimes when it wants to. We have had tenders submitted in the morning and the contracts let in the afternoon, and no doubt it is quite probable that when the government heard the representations of Mr. Smith on October 13, they granted this enactment, this illegal concession, on the 14th. What is the argument of the Minister of Finance? He said: Well, it did not do much harm anyway, there was no grain carried except a couple of cargoes. Is that not the best possible answer to the representations of Mr. Smith? Mr. Smith was misstating the facts to the Canadian government. He was misstating the facts when he said that the Canadian vessels were not able to carry the grain. There were plenty of Canadian bottoms to carry the grain, and the government know it as well as we do, and the act of the Canadian government was an un-Canadian one, because it had the tendency to cut down the prices of freights and to cause the unfair competition that my hon. friend from East Simcoe pointed out. But what did the government do then? Will the Minister of Finance tell me that they had any right to do what they did? I wish the Solicitor General were here to get his opinion on the question. The government had no more right to pass that order in council than to pass an order in council abrogating any other statute on the statute-books. I have here the consolidated statutes of the Dominion, and in the particular statute dealing with this matter, there is a circumstance stated, the existence of which would justify the government in passing such an order in council. We have here in the Coasting Trade Act the declaration that when any other country shall give Canadian bottoms the right to do a portion of its coasting trade, this government has the right, by order in council, to open our coasting trade to the vessels of that country. Let me read the clause; it is clause 5:

The Governor in Council may from time to time declare that the foregoing provisions of this Act—

That is the provisions which are cited in the resolution now in the Speaker's hands.

—shall not apply to the ships or vessels of any foreign country, in which British ships are admitted to the coasting trade of such country and to carry goods or passengers from one part or place to another in such country.

If the United States had agreed to give us a portion of their coasting trade, the government had a perfect right to do as they did. They had a legal right to do it. I say to the Minister of Finance that not only was that an un-Canadian act, but it was an act for which there was not the slightest trace of authority in any of the statutes of Canada; that it was an absolutely illegal act on the part of this government—and the hon. gentleman knows it as well as I do. What did they do it for them? It seems that the government are willing to violate every law when the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) brings pressure upon them or the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) holds up his finger. They knew that there was no law for it, and yet they were willing to go back upon a Canadian policy, a policy upon which this parliament had expressed itself time and time again, and which this country had supported time and time again; they were willing to go back upon it illegally, to act at the instance of a friend of the Minister of the Interior who came here without any information, who came to make the bold statement that it would be better in the interest of the freight of the west, as there were not sufficient Canadian bottoms—

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. All that the government did was legal.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the hon. minister show me the clause of the statute authorizing it?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman has quoted the statute, I have no doubt correctly. But what the government did was to agree to forbear prosecuting for the penalties, and that is all that the order in council covers. That being so, the act of the government was perfectly legal, though the hon. gentleman is quite correct in quoting the statute. But it has no force or effect unless prosecution is undertaken by the government; and when the government agree to forbear prosecution, their act is not an illegal act.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Technically, the hon. minister may be right. He may have found a way to get around it. But there are very few statutes that the government could not get around in some such manner. But the hon. gentleman will not say that it was ever intended by parliament to give power to the government to allow United States vessels the right to participate in our coasting trade without getting something in return for it. I would ask the hon. gentleman if he thinks that the Act anticipates such a thing?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. It does not generally; but there are actions under our coasting laws and our fishing laws which are not legally permissible, but which are done and which could be prosecuted for if the government saw fit.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Let us take two phases of the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Fielding's) answer. The government, in the first place, distinctly gave permission to American bottoms to participate in our coasting trade—

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. By declaring that they would not prosecute.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Quite so. Therefore, under the clause of the statute, they did what was absolutely illegal.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I differ from the hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague).

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman is not a lawyer, and neither am I—

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. But we can read.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes, and we can discuss this matter with perfect freedom. But the hon. gentleman does not deny that they gave this permission and they had no right to give permission.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. What the government did was to declare that they would not prosecute for the penalties, and they had the right to do so.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think if the hon. gentleman reads the order in council, he will see that the government did more. Here is the wording of that order:

The minister therefore recommends, pending an increase in the lake shipping now entitled to participate in the coasting trade, that vessels of the United States be permitted to carry cargoes between Fort William or Port Arthur, in the province of Ontario, and any other port in Canada either way.

The law says distinctly that this shall not be allowed unless they get some reciprocal advantage from the United States.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman has forgotten to read the words of the order in council:

—forbearing to institute suits for penalties or forfeitures on account of the nationality of such vessels while so employed.

That is all that the government could do, and that is all that they did.

Mr. MONTAGUE. But the main fact is that the government of this country gave the American bottoms this permission, and in addition to giving them permission, they declare that they would not prosecute them under the Act. The wording does not make any difference. The grave question is not a technical violation of the law, the grave thing is a departure from the well-understood Canadian policy which should never have been departed from without the gravest reasons. Now, what does the Minister of Finance say? He says that it is quite true that the Americans should be excluded as a general rule, but that there are exceptional circumstances which call for exceptional treatment. Now, will the hon. Minister of Finance tell us the exceptional circumstances?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I thought it had done so. I think the order in council tells you.

Mr. MONTAGUE. And, pray, why was the order in council passed because of exceptional circumstances? Will the hon. minister tell us the exceptional circumstances which caused the government to pass the order in council.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I think they are set forth in the order in council itself.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The order in council sets forth that they have received information that the Canadian vessels are not capable of carrying the grain. Who gave them that information? Mr. Smith. Who is he? The Minister of Finance does not know. What inquiries were ever made by the government? The Minister of Finance does not think that any were made. What did Mr. Smith tell them? The hon. gentleman could not tell us. Were any statistics given by Mr. Smith as to the amount of grain in the elevators, and so on? Was the great shipping interest of Canada consulted? I wish to ask the Minister of Finance whether he thinks that by his bald statement that information was given to the government that it would be of advantage to the Canadian trade to pass this order in council distinctly doing away with the effect of this good Canadian law, he is giving sufficient information to the House to make it believe that a special case had been made out justifying the doing away with the effect of the law and justifying the giving of this advantage to American bottoms. Surely, the Minister of Finance does not pretend to say so—no member of the government would pretend to say so. The Minister of Finance would admit, I think he has already admitted, that only under special and most extraordinary circumstances should such an Act as that be abrogated by order in council, and let me add after the most careful inquiry has been made by the government of the day. And yet, we have the government acting upon information from one man, and a man who knew nothing, apparently, about the circumstances. They passed an order in council which might have materially interfered, which probably did materially interfere, with the shipping trade of Canada, without ever consulting the shipping trade. I submit to this House that when such representations were made to the government of the day, it was their bounden duty, before passing such an order in council as this to take cognizance of the fact that to inquire into all the circumstances, and, by means of getting the fullest information from all the shipping people of Canada, especially from the large interests involved. And the government should only have acted after, upon the very fullest information, they were decided that the policy which they adopted was a proper policy to pursue. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) tell me that they did take that pains? Will he tell me that they took any pains whatever to inquire whether they were going to injure the shipping of Canada seriously or not? They took no pains, they simply did the thing off-hand on the representations of Mr. Smith, whose representations according to the hon. gentleman's statement were shown to be wholly without foundation.

Now, what brought them to their senses? The Minister of Finance, in a very mild manner has told us that a protest came. I notice that my hon. friend from Hamilton (Mr. Wood) is not present. He was here when the discussion on this resolution began; he is not here now. If he were here, he would be able to tell the manner of the protest which was made by some of the shipping interests of Canada. And he would say that the protest which was made was not nearly so mild as the speech of the hon. Minister of Finance here to-night. The hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) very well said that Canadian shipping has recently taken heart by reason of the increased production of grain in the North-west Territories, and we have had men investing their money in the business. Among others was the hon. member for Hamilton, who is a very wealthy gentleman. He and other wealthy citizens of the province of Ontario had combined together, had formed their company, and had sent their agents to order their ships. Some of those ships were ordered; but these gentlemen awakened one morning to find that the government of Canada had turned the coasting trade of Canada over to United States bottoms. They came down here and interviewed the government, and what did they tell the government? The Minister of Finance probably knows. They told the government this: You keep that order in council in force and we will see that you do not remain very long to keep it there. That was the answer the government got from these people. They were investing their money as a Canadian company for the purpose of doing Canadian trade, and they protested most vigorously against the action of the government in this matter. Sir, I say that the government performed not only an illegal act, but a distinctly un-Canadian act, for which there was no possible reason and for which there was no possible justification under the sun. They did it under pressure of a gentleman who had special influence with a member of the cabinet, and they did it without making an inquiry as to its probable effect upon Canadian interests. It is on a par with some other work of the government, especially their work in connection with free corn, which was protested against by my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) whose speech is well remembered in this House. I say it is on a par with the un-Canadian work in several particulars; and I will add that they never performed an act which was more un-Canadian and which met with stronger condemnation from the people of Canada than this very act, which was absolutely illegal and un-Canadian at the same time.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). In my judgment there were only two reasons which could justify the government doing as they did. These were: If the freight rates were extraordinarily high for the handling of grain, or if there was a block which would likely result to the detriment of the grain trade of the west. We expected that the Minister of Finance would explain that phase of the question, and that he would have shown the House that the carriers of grain were asking too high freight rates, and that therefore there was a justification in opening the door to the Americans to come in, or that the elevators were filled at Fort William and Port Arthur, and therefore, unless some additional assistance was given to move the product of the Northwest, serious harm would result. But the minister did not vouchsafe to tell us that either of these conditions existed. It is true, he said that it did result in lowering the freight rates a little, but he did not say that the freight rates were unreasonably high before. I ventured the question: What amount of grain there was in the elevators at the time, and the hon. gentleman said he was not aware of how much grain there was. Therefore, it appears that they took no trouble to ascertain whether there was danger of a blockade or whether the freight rates were too high; but at the suggestion of some person, that order in council was passed on the 16th of October which allowed the Americans to participate in a trade that belonged to Canadians. Although it resulted in lowering the freight rates a little, it may be that at that time there was not much grain handled by American bottoms. But although the Minister of Finance did not tell us what the reasons were, the press of the country was loaded up to tell the people that it was owing to the danger of a blockade at Fort William and Port Arthur that this concession was given. That is the reason given to the press, and I noted particularly at the time, that the information was given out, I believe by the vessel owners of Canada, that there was only something like half a million or three-quarters of a million bushels of grain lying in these elevators. Now, any one who knows the capacity of these elevators will understand that there was no danger of a blockade with that small amount of grain. The hon. gentleman also stated in justification that the act was not illegal. But the statutory law says that this cannot be done unless we have a reciprocal concession from the United States. We did not have that reciprocal concession, yet the minister pretends to tell us that they have authority by order in council to override a statute law. Well, I think that contention will not be sanctioned by the best lawyers in the House. The minister says: Oh, we told them that we would not prosecute them, but the order in council told them as well that they would have the right. What kind of a right? What kind of a right was he giving them? Was it a legal right? It must be assumed that it was a legal right, because otherwise they had no right at all to come in and enjoy a portion of that trade. Therefore, they were giving an illegal right, and in addition they were assuring the people who would come in and violate the law, that they would not be prosecuted. I would like to ask the Minister of Finance what the position would have been, provided some private individual prosecuted?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I pointed out a distinction. In offences of this character a prosecution can only be instituted by the government, thereby implying that the government has some measure of discretion and must take the responsibility of acting.

Mr. SPROULE. If that be the case, so much the worse for the government, because while no other party had the power to stop them doing this illegal act, the government were willing to wink at the violation of the law to satisfy their own purposes for the time being. For these reasons, I think they acted very unwisely. They have deterred men who contemplated investing capital in the building of vessels for that trade, from doing so; they naturally say there is no security that the trade will be kept for them in the future, there is no guarantee that the same thing may not be repeated next year or the succeeding year, whenever some one may come up and represent that it is desirable that these concessions should be granted.

Mr. JOHN CHARLTON (North Norfolk). The question under discussion with regard to the permission of American vessels to participate in the Canadian coasting trade is one of great importance, and the position taken by my hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) is in the abstract a correct one. The Canadian navigation laws were, of course, passed for the protection of a great Canadian interest; and it is very true that exceptional circumstances only would justify the government, either in granting a permission to foreign vessels to engage in this coasting trade, or in stipulating that they would waive prosecution of a violation of the provisions of our coasting laws. I think, however, that in the case under discussion, reasons can be assigned which will fairly justify the government in the action that has been taken, if the circumstances were of the character which I suppose they were. My hon. friend from Simcoe, in referring to the permission given a tug to tow timber this spring, made that a grievance in connection with the issuing of the order in council permitting the transportation of grain from Fort William and Port Arthur to Parry Sound harbour. With reference to permitting a tug to perform this labour, I happen to know something about that matter, and I think the government were fully justified in the action taken in that affair, at least. The firm of Edmund Hall & Son, of Detroit, were constructing a mill at Sarnia, in the province of Ontario. To proceed with the construction of the mill, it was necessary to bring down a large quantity of piles from a point on the Georgian Bay to prepare the foundation of the mill, and work on the mill could not be proceeded with until these piles were brought down. It was not necessary for them to tow logs, as they were not ready for logs then. It was necessary to bring this timber down for the construction of the mill. This firm were converting one of their two tugs into a Canadian bottom, which they were unable to have ready for Canadian register for about a month. They had another tug, which was an American tug, and it is a matter of very great convenience to parties engaged in the timber business, and who have more than one vessel, to have one of Canadian and another of American register. This firm made an effort to secure the services of a Canadian tug, but they were unable to do so. It happens that at this season, all the Canadian tugs have been fully employed, and that there is more business for them than they can perform. Edmund Hall & Son found themselves unable to secure the services of a Canadian tug, and they found that if they had to wait until they had their tug ready for register as a Canadian vessel, it would involve the delay of more than a month. So, they made application to be permitted to use their own vessel in bringing timber belonging to themselves, for the purposes of the erection of their mill in Canada. The granting of this favour simply meant that the mill would have been in operation one or two months earlier than would otherwise have been the case, and as the mill would employ a large number of men, great advantage would be derived by the town of Sarnia. The member for the riding (Mr. Johnston), was exceedingly anxious that this favour should be granted to Edmund Hall & Son, and he came here with representations from this firm which were, in my opinion, sufficient justification for the government in taking the course they did take. I think if the government had refused, as they were at first disposed to refuse this request, they would not have been acting on business principles, and they would have inflicted a hardship on a firm that was investing a large sum of money in Canada. By granting the request, they were doing no injury to any Canadian shipping interest, because the firm were unable to obtain the services of a Canadian vessel, all being profitably employed. I fully justify the government in the course they took under these circumstances. There were good reasons for doing it, and there is no reason for criticism of their action in this respect.

In regard to the order in council of last October permitting the carrying of Canadian grain by American vessels, between Canadian ports, the case, of course, is perhaps, not quite as clear as the case to which I have referred. There can be no doubt whatever about the first case, while in this case there might be room for doubt as to the propriety of the course pursued by the government. I think the government were acting in the matter of granting the privilege of transporting Canadian grain from Fort William and Port Arthur to Parry Sound, in the interest of Canada, just as thoroughly in that case as in the one I have referred to. My hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule), says that there were two justifications possible for the course pursued; one, a congestion of grain in the elevators at Fort William and Port Arthur, and the other a scarcity of shipping for the transportation of grain. Now, the representations made to the government, I believe, were, that there was a congestion of grain and a scarcity of tonnage. The very facts of the case upon the surface, show that it was particularly a case of emergency. The order in council was issued on October 16. The season of the transportation of grain from Lake Superior ports had very nearly reached its close on October 16, and if there was any considerable quantity of grain awaiting shipment at Fort William and Port Arthur, and it was desired by the shippers that this should reach Montreal, or the seaboard, before the close of navigation, it was a case of emergency, because there were only three or four weeks of navigation left. If it could be shown that vessels could not be secured for that trade, that would have been sufficient justification for the government in the course they pursued. We have other interests besides the vessel interest to consider. We have spent an enormous sum of money in improving our means of communication for the purpose of securing a portion of this western grain trade. We have the interests, not only of the Canadian vessel owners, but the interests of the great Canadian railway line of Mr. Booth from Parry Sound harbour to Montreal. Mr. Booth very naturally wishes to secure the carriage of grain for his line, and if he found that he could not secure for his road the business that it was capable of performing, without securing the services of a greater tonnage than was available under Canadian register, the interests of his road required that this concession should be made. The keenest competition exists between this route and the route by way of Buffalo. A very large proportion of wheat from Manitoba and the Canadian North-west Territories had hitherto gone by way of Buffalo, and the question of facilities for the carrying of this grain, and the question of freight rates would govern, whether the Americans would monopolize this trade, or whether Canadian roads should get a portion of it. The question is a much broader one than as to whether two or three Canadian vessels were cut out of cargoes. It is a question affecting the Booth road, and it is a question affecting the farmers of the North-west. They are interested in lower freight rates, which they acquired by the operation of this order in council. The benefits which have resulted from this action of the government, have accrued to the road and accrued to the settlers, and no great damage has been inflicted on the owners of vessels whose vessels were furnished with all the business they could do.

Mr. BENNETT. Does my hon. friend (Mr. Charlton), assume that the grain was in the possession of the farmers or of the elevator owners or grain dealers. If so, there was no benefit to the farmer, because the grain was then in the hands of the grain-dealers as represented by Mr. Smith?

Mr. CHARLTON. The question of facilities for the transportation of grain to the seaboard is one affecting the interests of the grain producers of the North-west, and it has been asserted by the hon. member for East Grey, and by others, that there was no plethora of grain in the elevators. If he is correct, the grain was coming down for shipment from the west, and probably a good deal of it had not come down, if the elevators were not full. If it was desired to secure a portion of that trade which our transportation lines desired to secure, it was necessary to provide facilities for transporting that grain from Fort William to Parry Sound.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman said that the season was nearly over on Lake Superior at that time.

Mr. CHARLTON. I said it was. I say it was a case of necessity that we should be able to obtain the tonnage required to send that grain to the seaboard. Then, it was asserted by the hon. member for East Simcoe that Mr. Booth was really the owner of these vessels. That is the case, and Mr. Booth had these American bottoms for the reason that it was profitable to him to own vessels that could engage in the American coasting trade as well as in the Canadian trade. They were in point of fact for all practical purposes just as much Canadian property as if they had been on the Canadian register. It is and has been a common thing in the United States, for Americans to own vessels that are sailed under the British flag for the reason that you cannot make American bottoms out of these vessels unless by Act of Congress. There is so much difficulty about doing this, that Americans have held a large amount of tonnage for years past under the British flag and these vessels are to all intents and purposes American vessels. Their management is in American hands and they are American vessels truly and really, although nominally sailing under the British flag. This is probably the case reversed of the vessels under discussion. Mr. Booth is their owner; he has bought vessels suitable for the trade; he requires vessels of large and heavy tonnage to do the business, and such vessels are not numerous. This concession was therefore made to a Canadian, and the profits accruing, went to Canadians. This is a feature of the case which has not been dwelt upon, and perhaps has not been considered by our friends who are condemning the action of the government. It is possible the government made a mistake; I do not know as to that; but I am certain that the motives of the government were perfectly correct; and that they imagined that they were acting in Canadian interests. It was not an un-Canadian Act as the hon. gentleman from Haldimand (Mr. Montague) says, because I believe the government considered that they were doing something that was in the line of promoting the best interests of our country. They were making a concession that would enable the grain to be moved from Fort William and Port Arthur to Parry Sound Harbour, that otherwise could not be moved. They were making a concession that would secure for the Canada Atlantic road a large amount of business, and they were making a concession which ensured the laying down of that grain in Montreal, for shipment from that port instead of from Buffalo. The question as to what route the grain will take depends upon the facilities and the cost of transportation, and unless we can afford to give reasonably low rates and all necessary facilities by the Canadian route, we will lose that trade. A great many interests have to be considered besides the interests of a few vessel owners. Under all the circumstances I believe the government were justified in the course they took, and I am certain they thought they were acting in the best interests of Canada. I cannot imagine that any very great disaster would be inflicted upon Canadian interests by securing for the Canada Atlantic Railway a larger amount of business, by securing for the vessels which sailed from Montreal a larger amount of tonnage, and by securing for the settlers of the North-west a more prompt transmission of their grain to the markets and lower rates than they would otherwise be called upon to pay. While I hold that it is our duty to protect Canadian interests very closely, yet it is possible that we may take a narrow view of these things and make an error by neglecting to survey the whole field, and to take into consideration all the interests that are involved—not only the interests of the various vessel owners, but the interests of the railway, the interests of the transportation companies, and the interests of the farmers who furnish the freight. When we consider this whole question from a broad business-like statesmanlike standpoint, we perhaps will not feel so much like condemning the action of the government in this matter as we would if he viewed the case from the narrow standpoint which my hon. friend (Mr. Bennett), who moved the resolution evidently views it from.

Mr. T. O. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). While I sympathise with the shipping interests of Canada, yet I must point out that the interests of the farmers of Manitoba and the North-west are worthy of consideration. I presume that the majority of the members of this House are aware that every bushel of wheat placed in the elevators at Fort William and Port Arthur depreciates in value about six cents when stored there over the season. In other words, the farmers lose six cents a bushel on their wheat if it is not sent to the point of ocean shipment before the season closes. The change in the coasting laws was made in the interests of the farmers of the North-west. The hon. gentleman from Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) has devoted a good deal of his time to devising means for transferring the wheat of the west through Canadian channels to the sea-board, but I can tell him that the action of the government in this respect was well calculated to attain that object. I do not see the difference between allowing an American vessel to take a cargo of wheat from Port Arthur to Buffalo, and allowing the same vessel to carry it to Parry Sound where it will furnish work for Canadian labour. If there is any difference it is all in favour of Canada, because it lowers the freight to the farmers of the west, saves them the depreciation on their wheat which would result if stored in elevators, and at the same time remunerates Canadian labour for handling that wheat at our own ports. I agree with the hon. gentleman from Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) that a vessel carrying 250,000 bushels can carry it at a cheaper rate than a small vessel, and every cent that is saved in that way benefits the producer of the wheat. From our point of view in the North-west, the action of the government was most commendable, in suspending the coasting laws last fall and enabling the grain to be shipped to England.

Mr. R. R. DOBELL (Quebec West). I wish to say a word on this question because I think that both the members for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) and the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) treated it rather extravagantly. We need not discuss the general principle involved because we admit at once that while we gave the permission we regarded it as a special occasion under extreme circumstances, and we never intended to continue or extend that provision for any length of time. That liberty was granted for reasons that have been clearly set forth by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). We all know that on October 16, the season in Lake Superior is rapidly drawing to a close and we were told, and I believe it is true, that Canadian vessels could not be obtained at the time. I do not speak with certainty, but I have the recollection that nearly all the Canadian craft had been engaged up to a certain period which expired about the time we gave this permission.

Mr. CLANCY. Did the hon. gentleman (Mr. Dobell) try to verify that information?

Mr. DOBELL. We did not, but I believe it will be found that that statement was correct. I felt some sympathy myself in the matter, but I often think that these extreme rights when held too rigidly may be turned into wrong. I will give an instance of that. About three years ago we had a number of steamers chartered to load cargoes at Three Rivers, and unfortunately they all arrived at the same time. All the schooners and barges and bateaux that we could get around Three Rivers, and Batiscan and Louisville could not load these steamers within the time agreed on. I found a number of American barges, seventeen altogether, lying alongside the wharf. I at once gave orders to commence loading them, and send them to the steamers. The customs officer at once stepped in and said, 'Do you know what you are doing? You are breaking the law.' I did not know that I was breaking the law. I at once telegraphed to my colleague and asked for permission; but I was not fortunate enough to get permission, and I could not load the barges. They were lying idle alongside the wharf, the steamers were waiting for cargoes, and we had to pay demurrage on those steamers because of the navigation laws. After an experience of that kind, I think you will agree with me that it is not wise to hold too rigidly to one's rights. I do not think I need say more to show that this matter has been exaggerated. It is the only case in which permission of that kind was given, and I believe we had good reason for giving it. When you call it un-Canadian, you should remember that while it may have prejudiced the condition of Canadian lake craft, it was of great advantage to a large corporation, and helped to fill up the steamers at Montreal. It was not an unmixed evil.

Mr. FOSTER. Were there many cargoes sent?

Mr. DOBELL. No, I think sufficient for two lake steamers. The time was very short. I think it is quite evident that the government should always have power to grant a permission of that kind if we use it with discretion and care. If not, we are subject to criticism; but in this case I think there was good ground for extending the privilege.

Mr. JOHN McMILLAN (South Huron). Mr. Speaker, I cannot allow this question to pass without making a single remark, because the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) stated that the action of the government in this case was on a par with their action in taking the duty off Indian corn. What has been the effect of removing that duty? In the three years since that duty was taken off we consumed 15,000,000 bushels of Indian corn, which was equal to over 420,000 tons. That feed was worth $11.50 per ton. We have, in consequence, sold an equal quantity of oats, which is worth $17.98 per ton. So that we have a profit of $6.48 per ton as the result of using the corn and selling the oats, or a clear profit of $2,500,000. If the action of the government in allowing American coasting vessels to come into this country to carry part of the grain between Canadian ports resulted in as great a benefit to the people of this country, I hope many actions of that kind will be taken by the government; because I hold that the government never conferred a greater benefit on the farmers and the cattle and hog feeders of this country than by taking the duty off corn. The only argument used against it is that we should get barley admitted free into the United States; but the Americans refuse to grant that, and were our government on that account to withhold from the farmers of this country the enormous benefit of bringing corn into the country free of duty?

Mr. B. M. BRITTON (Kingston). I want to say a word or two before this matter is disposed of. I was one of the deputation that waited on the government after it was known that this order in council had been passed, as the Kingston Transportation Company own two of the largest and most expensive steamships carrying grain from Lake Superior to Kingston, and of course they were very much interested in anything that would interfere with their trade. When this order in council was known they felt very keenly about it, and they joined with other vessel owners in interviewing the government and protesting against its continuance. The deputation was very large, being composed of men from Hamilton, Toronto, Kingston and Montreal. The interest of Montreal might seem to be rather against the protest that was being made; but in this instance they thought they were more interested on the whole in the carrying trade as done by Canadian bottoms down the St. Lawrence, so they joined in this movement. From information we got as to why this order in council was made, we came to the conclusion beyond a doubt that misrepresentations had been made to the government, and that in the hurry of the moment the government had acted upon those misrepresentations. Because, as has been properly said, it was late in the season, and anything that was to be carried had to be carried at once, because it was within two or three weeks of the time when the last vessel would go out of Montreal. So they had to act promptly if they acted at all; but the investigation led us to ascertain that not very much harm had been done. But the deputation desired that the order in council should not continue, and we were promised that an inquiry would be held and that if misrepresentations were found to have been made, the matter would be set right. I do not know when the order was rescinded.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. It expired at the end of the season.

Mr. BRITTON. If a mistake was made, it happened that it was made at the very best time for Canadian vessel owners, because last year was exceptional for the carrying trade on the lakes. There were good rates prevailing until the fall, and perhaps that very fact made vessel men more anxious and excited about the matter than they otherwise would have been. They had been suffering for years from low rates, and now, when an opportunity offered in which more money could be made, they felt that the order in council was directly against their interests, and at the earliest moment protested against it.

The government acted with the very best intention, but I feel perfectly satisfied that there were misrepresentations made on two material matters. First, as to the quantity of grain in Port Arthur waiting for shipment, and, second, as to the insufficiency of Canadian tonnage to carry that grain. There were vessel owners on the deputation, who said that they could not get a cargo at Port Arthur, there was so little grain to be had, and they were obliged to go to Duluth. That showed that there was, at all events, no insufficiency of Canadian bottoms to carry the grain. Owing to these misrepresentations made by interested parties, very likely, as the hon. member for North Norfolk has said, by Canadians owning American vessels, this order in council was passed. In the interests of Canadian vessel-owners, it does not seem to me to make any difference whether they have to meet the competition of American bottoms owned by Canadians, or owned by Americans. Our Canadian vessels cannot carry between two American ports, and these American vessels can carry more grain than can Canadian vessels; and that being the case, it is very unfair that a Canadian, either in his own name or that of a company incorporated on the other side, or a friendly American, can own American vessels and put them in competition with Canadian vessels. They had had good reason, therefore, for protesting against the order in council, and while we acquit the government of any desire to prejudice Canadian vessel-owners in this instance, but acted under misrepresentations, they ought to guard in the future against allowing themselves to be deceived in this way to the prejudice of Canadians.

Mr. G. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.) If it had not been for one remark made by the Minister of Finance, I should consider that the government had been properly punished already in having had their conduct shown up in a very undesirable light in this parliament and the country as well. We have had the mild castigation which has just been administered to them, and rightfully too, by the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton), and the singularly weak excuses that were made for this action by the hon. member for Quebec, without portfolio, and the Minister of Finance himself. The Minister of Customs, of course, thinks discretion is the better part of valour, and when he is in a tight place and fighting has to be done, he would rather go and whisper to his hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), and get him to jump into the breach and take the load off his shoulders, of making an apology for the government, which had clearly committed, not only an illegal, but a wrong act. But what the Minister of Finance said was that he would do it again, and that is the grave part of the matter.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Will my hon. friend quote the words?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes. He said: I will not promise, not to suspend the law, but will only suspend it in exceptional instances.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Those are not the exact words.

Mr. FOSTER. I have not given the exact words, but the substance, and that is the grave part of this transaction, aside from the utterly illegal act which the government committed. The Minister of Finance tried to contend, in the first place, that the government did not break the law. But, let us hear what a colleague of his said, who is not a layman but a lawyer. I find that in the memorandum, signed by Mr. Drummond, the Governor General's secretary, the following:

The undersigned has the honour, by direction of His Excellency the Governor General, to draw the attention of the ministers to the Privy Council minute No. 2252, and that His Excellency, having consulted the hon. David Mills, Minister of Justice, as to the legality of the above mentioned minutes, was informed that the order is distinctly a nullity.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER (reading):

And that it assumes a power which it does not possess.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Hear, hear.

Mr. BRITTON.

Mr. FOSTER. Namely, to cancel an Act of parliament. That is exactly what the order in council has done. It has cancelled an Act of parliament.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. It could not cancel an Act of parliament, and, therefore, did not do it.

Mr. FOSTER. It assumes to cancel an Act of parliament; and so far as the Act contemplated was concerned, it did suspend and practically cancel that Act of parliament.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. He said it was a nullity and could not do anything.

Mr. FOSTER. So far as the action which the government meant to legalize or permit was concerned, it did. There is evidence, I think, quite as good as the evidence of the Minister of Finance. The exact wording of the law has been read. The law says that United States vessels shall not be allowed to carry between Canadian ports. The order in council says that they shall, and gives permission for them to carry between these ports. There is an exact contradiction. The statute says they shall not carry; the order in council says they shall be permitted to carry. There is no need of arguing that any further. That is a complete contradistinction, and it is as plain as can be. The order in council goes further. It promises these men that it will not only give them permission to carry between Canadian ports, but will abrogate the penalty. They are promised that if they take advantage of the permission, they will not be prosecuted. That is a thing no government has a right to do, but which this government has done, and the gravest point about it is this. The only security that we have in this country for life and property is the security given to us by the law. The legal enactments of the country are the charter for our actions and our liberties. Depending upon the law, the different industries and interests of this country make their plans and ply their business, and I think one of the gravest things, outside the attempt of the government to break and nullify the law and suspend an Act of parliament, is the sense of insecurity which is imported into the business of the country by the knowledge that there is a government in power which, of its own mere will, whenever it suits it, will abrogate the law and take away the charter and the security which these interests enjoy. What statement did we get from the Minister of Finance to-night? We got the statement that the government would not promise not to do it again, but we got a bolder statement even than that from another member of the government, but in another place. When brought to book about this action, he boldly announced, as a principle upon which the government would act, that it did break the law and would break it again when the government considered that necessary for the good of the people. Laws are inconvenient; but they are made for the general good, and if they pinch an individual, that is not argument why the law should be abrogated by an executive who have no more power to abrogate a law than they have power to enact a law. They did assume to do it. Now, the strange thing about it is the apologies we hear—for not a man has risen on the other side but has made an apology. The hon. member of the government without portfolio (Mr. Dobell) said he had no certainty in the matter of the information, but only a recollection. Information was acted upon, said the Minister of Finance; but the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dobell) said there was no attempt made to verify the information. What! A government will deliberately break a law on which the shipping interests of the lakes depends for their security, for their trade, and will do it on no basis of certainty, but only on ex parte information which they did not attempt to verify. The hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton) said there was reason for haste, and the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) said the same. But the hon. member for Kingston will see, if he goes through these papers, that on the 26th of May, when it was mooted that there might be some action of this kind on the part of the government, the board of trade of Toronto acting on behalf of the carrying interest sent down a memorandum of which the following is one clause:

The council considers their action—

That is the action of the corn exchange, favouring the admission of American vessels.

—to be a menace to our marine interests, and while they do not believe that the government of Canada would consent to the perpetration of such a confiscation of national rights, yet it has had a bad effect upon the present carrying trade and to the capital invested in shipping.

That was sent to the government on the 25th day of May, and on the 26th of May the Premier acknowledged it and said that the matter would receive due consideration. So that, from the opening of navigation, the government were asked to pause in any contemplated action of this kind, and they had that summer to look into the matter. But, in the end, they did not look into the matter; they simply took the representation made to them casually, assuming it to be true. But that is not the course a government should take, in cases of this kind especially. What they should have done was to verify their information. And, if they had made the first move toward the verification of it, they would have found that it was without foundation, a fact that was afterwards proved so absolutely to the government that the Prime Minister himself, in answer to the delegation, said that if they had had the information earlier which was given to them by the delegation, this action would not have been taken. But another point is that these Canadian carriers on the lakes have hard competition. It has been stated by the hon. member for Kingston that they have to compete with American vessels that have a varied trade, and whereas our shipping men have to take the lean without very much of the rich, the American shipping men have chances at a trade which has much richness in it, and the smallest proportion of the unprofitable. Under these circumstances the Canadian shipping interest should receive at least so much consideration at the hands of the government that the government would take the trouble of seeking to find out the facts before taking action against that interest. But without seeking to verify that information, the government passed this order in council which delivered a staggering blow at this interest. And every man who has anything to do with these interests knows that it not only has brought trouble at present, but it may continue that trouble for a long time. As I said before, they have to make preparations for this carrying trade. Contracts have to be made ahead for the building of vessels. The deputation that came down showed to the government by incontrovertible evidence that contracts were on the eve of being made for the building of lake vessels for this trade, which orders were immediately cancelled when this action was taken by the government. And, even up to this date there is still uncertainty. Shipping men have no pledge that the law will be observed; and they have the statement of Mr. Scott, a member of the government, that this government is prepared to break the law whenever they think it would be in the public interest, and they have the statement of the Minister of Finance that he will not promise not to break the law again. Without pushing this matter, I think that, on fair grounds, the case is a grave one; I think that the government did what no government ought to do, except in matters of grave national concern or overwhelming public interest. In such cases they may take the responsibility of going contrary to the law; but if they do they should come before parliament at the earliest opportunity after it meets, state their case and get indemnity from parliament. In no other way can we have confidence in this country that the laws will do what they are always supposed to do—guard the rights which they are made to protect. The government have done what they have no right to do; but I am obliged to say that their action is in line with much of what they have done in less grave matters but of a similar kind. This is not the first time they have made themselves superior to the law; this is not the first time they have undertaken to abrogate and suspend the operation of the law. They have done it over and over again; and I think it is a dangerous principle to be imported into an administration that the executive of a country can ever consider themselves superior to the laws of the country. They govern under the laws and are superior to none of them. If great peril arises or some great national question demands action which is not sanctioned by the law, some overwhelming public interest which must be provided for while parliament is not in session, the government may, after careful consideration, act without the law for the moment. They must take that responsibility. But they must come to parliament at the earliest opportunity as I said before, and get the sanction of parliament for what they have done.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). I wish only to make one remark, as the hon. gentleman has made an allusion to me. He says that I maintained a discreet silence in this discussion. The Minister of Finance candidly told the House why he spoke in reference to this matter, stating that it was because he was the one who prepared the report to council. I think I was not in the city myself at the time. I merely wish to point out the positions taken by several hon. gentlemen opposite to show how inconsistent they are with each other. In the first place, they tell us this action was wholly un-Canadian and totally illegal. Their next proposition is that the government are greatly to blame because they did not make inquiries to ascertain what quantity of grain was up there. Now, if it is wholly un-Canadian and wholly illegal, why should the government go to any trouble to ascertain whether grain is there or not? The very fact of the hon. gentlemen opposite saying that the government should have inquired into this, shows that they themselves believe it is not illegal, that it is not un-Canadian, and that it would have been justified if the circumstances had been different. Now as to its being illegal, the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has been upon the Treasury Board in past governments; did he not permit these coasting laws to be set aside under his regime? Will he say that permission never was given to violate them? Will he say that was not done more than once, more than twice? Why does he lecture us now? He talks about its being illegal, but he knows that under the Audit Act certain power is given to the Treasury Board to do this, though that power is not to be used in a careless manner. It is an extraordinary power which parliament has put in the hands of the government, but parliament has thoroughly recognized the fact that circumstances may arise in business when parliament is not in session, under which the government ought to be in possession of that power, giving them sufficient discretion, in the interest of the country, to do certain things and to waive certain penalties.

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman does not say that was a legal justification?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Will the hon. gentleman, who was a member of a government, say that he never waived penalties?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the hon. gentleman say—

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I do not want to be catechised by the hon. gentleman. He makes his speeches and then rushes from the House, runs away every time. He would have got his answer if he had been here, it has been discussed in the absence of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman asked me a question, will he allow me to answer him? First, I must know what the question is. He has been saying that under the powers given in the Audit Act certain things have been done by governments, and his question to me was whether we had ever acted under those powers.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Before he mentioned that, he asked if you had ever taken exceptional action in permitting violation of the coasting laws.

Mr. FOSTER. I can answer his question very frankly and absolutely. The government of which I was a member never undertook to abrogate the coasting laws, and never did.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Never allowed an American vessel to coast, to go from one port in Canada to another?

Mr. FOSTER. Never went outside of our powers such as are given under Act of parliament. But what the hon. gentleman did was to abrogate an Act of parliament, which he had no power to do.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The hon. gentleman has not answered. I ask him now again, because I feel persuaded it was done time and again—but I speak subject to correction—

Mr. FOSTER. Then you do not know anything about it.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Don't I. The hon. gentleman does not know anything about it. But would he say that he never did it.

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly we never did it, never attempted to abrogate the coasting laws.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Or did what was practically the same as abrogating the coasting laws, if an order in council was passed on the recommendation of the Treasury Board allowing an American vessel to trade from one port to another in Canada, as was done in this case? Did not he do that?

Mr. FOSTER. Cite an instance.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Does the hon. gentleman mean to deny that as a member of the Treasury Board he has not time and again, not only with the coasting laws, but with other laws carrying penalties, used his power to mitigate those penalties?

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, yes, often and often.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Ah, it comes out.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman better be fair.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I will be perfectly fair, but I will not allow the hon. gentleman to try his schoolmaster tricks and lecture me.

Mr. FOSTER. A little schoolmaster training on him will not do him any harm. The hon. gentleman has not been well trained.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. That is a matter of opinion.

Mr. FOSTER. But the hon. gentleman dare not let me answer his questions.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. When the hon. gentleman rises as a gentleman to address a question or a remark to me, I will be pleased to answer it, but I am not disposed, in the middle of my speech, to allow the hon. gentleman to get up and attempt to read me one of his little lectures about the length of the sessions, and about the length of the speeches. Now, if he will permit me to tell him so, he could say all he wants to say in one-tenth of the time that he takes up now in saying it, and if he wants to give me a rebuke he could do it in two or three words without standing up and taking five minutes and interrupting me in my speech. The hon. gentleman is fast losing the position he had in this House as a debater, he is becoming wearisome, tiresome to his own followers. Now, I am speaking in love and friendship for the hon. gentleman, because I recognize him as a man of ability, but he is deteriorating marvellously in that respect. A friend of the hon. gentleman remarked to me a little while ago on this very failing of the hon. gentleman, lamenting how he has deteriorated in that direction, using so many words to express a thought. I know that he holds any views that I may express to be of very little value, I know that he holds that I do not understand public questions, and therefore, the time that I use in pointing that out to him is wasted. However, I am sensible that other people do not care what his opinions are in reference to me at all, so we could save all that time. But the hon. gentleman now admits that as a member of the Treasury Board time and again he has waived penalties and forfeitures that the laws have imposed.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to answer him now?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Yes, now you are a gentleman.

Mr. FOSTER. I am always a gentleman. But we will not discuss that question. As a member of the Treasury Board I have done, with the other members of the Treasury Board, what the law expressly allows the Treasury Board to do, and nothing more, and when the law allows it that is legal.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Certainly, so we are entirely at one. The hon. gentleman has spoken about these coasting laws without any reference to the Audit Act at all. Now, he is admitting here, as I understand him, that acting under the Audit Act as a member of the Treasury Board, he has time and again waived penalties and forfeitures which the law allows him to do.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, that is legal.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Then this is legal. The coasting laws do not allow any one to do it, but he did it time and again under the Audit Act, and thus the hon. gentlemen would exercise their powers under the Audit Act in forbearing to collect the penalties that the law prescribes. So we have the hon. gentleman doing precisely time and again what this government has done; and while I have not the circumstances before me, as I would have had if I had known that this matter was coming up to-day, I think I could find from the records of the department more than one instance where these gentlemen, in the very case of these coasting laws, have given permission to an American vessel to act in contravention of our coasting laws. I have not got the circumstances, and I will not say so positively, but I am confident I could find such cases if I had time to look them up. But my firm belief is that I could find instances where that was done. The Audit Act was passed for that very purpose. Take the case that the hon. member brought up of the tug that these people in Sarnia employed. That is the reason why this power is given to a government. Here is an American firm coming over to invest hundreds of thousands of dollars in a Canadian town, to build up a great Canadian industry in the town of Sarnia.

They came to me and they said: We are going to erect a large mill at Sarnia, we are going to become residents of Canada, we are going to establish a large plant in Canada, it is necessary for us to get a quantity of pine in order to construct the wharfs for our mills, we have searched, and it is impossible to get a Canadian tug, we have tugs of our own, we are going to bring one of our tugs over here, we are going to rebuild her and bring her under Canadian register, but it will take a month before we can get it done, we cannot get a Canadian tug, there is only one tug on the upper lakes available, and she belongs to the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), he will not let us have this tug for a month. I asked him, and he said no. 'No, I cannot let you have it for a month.' He said, 'I do not think you can get a Canadian tug.' Under these circumstances permission was given to this American company to tow these piles to Sarnia to enable them to proceed with the work of constructing their mill. There was no Canadian tug available and no Canadian interests was injured. No Canadian tug could be got anywhere. Under circumstances like that, permission was given, and under circumstances like that I have no doubt that there are many instances in which hon. gentlemen opposite did the same thing. But, I wish to point out to hon. gentlemen opposite that they have taken a very illogical position. They say that the action of the government is utterly un-Canadian and illegal, and that before the government made such an order as this it should have ascertained that there was really the quantity of grain in the elevators at Fort William that there was represented to be. If our action was utterly un-Canadian and illegal, would the inquiry which these hon. gentlemen say we ought to have made have affected the question in any way? I think the position of hon. gentlemen opposite is utterly illogical.

Mr. JAMES CLANCY (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) has endeavoured to make an argument on what he says is an illogical position on the part of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, in that they have said that the action of the government was illegal and un-Canadian, and that the hon. gentleman had not taken the trouble to make an inquiry. Does the hon. gentleman think that is a good argument?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I think it is a bad argument on your part.

Mr. CLANCY. I am talking about the hon. gentleman's argument. If the hon. gentleman could have shown any justification for being illegal and un-Canadian, it would have been the justification of necessity, but he never inquired as to the necessity.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. What was the use of inquiring about the necessity if it was illegal?

Mr. CLANCY. It might have furnished some justification. The hon. gentleman was not only in an illegal and un-Canadian but in an unjustifiable position. I am only showing that the hon. Minister of Customs cannot hope to make a case out of that.

Mr. BENNETT. The hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson), referred to the case of Hall & Son, which I cited.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has no right to reply.

Mr. BENNETT. I did not mention that case on its merits, but I mentioned the case of towing on the lakes owing to the fact that owners of Americans now decline to enter into contracts with Canadian tug owners for towing on the upper lakes because there is an expressed intimation that they are to be permitted to tow in Canadian waters as it is fair to assume that the government propose to permit these American tug owners to tow on the upper lakes and they will receive the statement that this is to be done for the balance of the season.

House divided on amendment (Mr. Bennett).

Cornwall Canal—

To pay Gilbert Dredging Co., interest. $ 22,388
 Enlargement ..... 141,400

$163,788

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The item of interest is on an amount of $48,000 which was found to be due to the contractors for work done on their contract on the Cornwall Canal, and which was held in abeyance. The original claim amounted to $59,918, and it was finally adjusted at $48,000. The amount was due on October 1, 1891, and this sum is the interest up to July 1, 1900.

Mr. J. G. H. BERGERON (Beauharnois). Was the claim settled as the result of a lawsuit?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. They did not come to a settlement until last year.

Mr. BERGERON. Who decided the settlement?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The amount was practically settled by the engineers of the department. The capital amount will be paid out of the current vote, as we had not funds available at the time the settlement was arrived at.

Mr. W. H. MONTAGUE (Haldimand). There must have been some arbitration about it.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. There was no arbitration about it. Under the contract, the chief engineer has the final settlement of these matters.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Has the minister the engineer's report?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes, the department has.

Mr. MONTAGUE. We must have that report. The minister cannot expect us to pass an item of $58,000 without the engineer's report.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am not now asking you to pass $58,000, but $22,000. The claim that was presented by the dredging company was in the first place $9,550 for plant, which remained idle for a long period in consequence of the stoppage of work upon two full sections and two part sections of the Cornwall Canal. This work was suspended during the consideration of the question, whether or not the Sheik's Island dam would be taken up. The dredging company were kept for two years waiting until it should be finally decided whether or not they should go on with their contract. They undertook to remove their plant, away back in 1890, but they were not allowed to do so by the department, which has the plant under its control.

Mr. MONTAGUE. When did they present that claim?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Just as soon as the department decided that the work would not go on. In 1891 the question first arose as to whether they would be permitted to continue their contract, and they were kept in suspense for two years.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Payment was refused, was it?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Is the hon. gentleman sure?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. There was no settlement in the matter.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I am informed that the department refused to pay it.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. There was no decision on it at all.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Is the minister sure about that?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am sure there was no final determination upon it. The impression of the officers of the department was against the claim, for the reason that they thought that this with other items had been covered by the settlement that had been arrived at previously, but which was found not to include any of the items in this claim at all.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Have you the report on that?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Mr. Rubidge made a report upon it which, if the hon. gentleman desires, will be brought down. There was another item of $11,377 for reinforcing the banks. That was gone into by the superintending engineer and by the chief engineer.

Mr. G. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.) When?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That was not really gone into until last year.

Mr. FOSTER. Was it never gone into before?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. None of the items, the chief engineer says, were really gone into until last year.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Were they not practically refused by the department?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. They were not paid, but they were not refused payment on the ground that the items themselves were incorrect or improper. The delay in non-payment was due to the opinion that was entertained by the officers of the department that a large portion of these items had been covered by the payment made and the settlement arrived at some time previously.

Mr. MONTAGUE. When was that payment made?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The payment was made with respect to that, on April 19, 1894.

Mr. MONTAGUE. There were vouchers, of course?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes, certainly. I will read the vouchers when I come to deal with the Gilbert Dredging Company amount. I will now give the items of the claim. For plant, $9,550 was claimed, and $7,900 was allowed. The item for reinforced banks was allowed at $11,250. An item for old stone from culverts, $10,500 was allowed.

Mr. BLAIR.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What does that mean?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Under their contract they were to take out the old stone from the culverts, and they were to be allowed so much for taking out the stone, and they were to own the stone and were to be entitled to use it on the works after it was taken out. The canal was not unwatered, and therefore they did not get the stone out, and were not paid for taking it out; but they had to get other stone, and they were allowed what would be a fair price for the new stone, $3.50 a yard.

Mr. MONTAGUE. How many yards?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. About 2,000. The next item is for loss on account of the canal not being unwatered, for which $13,111 was claimed, and $11,958 was allowed.

Mr. FOSTER. What was their loss on that account?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The contract authorized the contractors to have the canal unwatered in order that they might do the work which could only be done advantageously, when the canal was unwatered. The department refused to allow the unwatering, so that the contractors had not the opportunity of doing the work at the time or under the advantageous conditions which they would otherwise have had. There were reasons in the public interest which I presume led the department to decline to have the canal unwatered according to the right of the contractor, and of course the department necessarily had to make good to the contractor any loss he sustained by reason of that refusal.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What work was retarded or made more difficult by the non-unwatering of the canal?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. They had to dredge what they would have otherwise have done dry.

Mr. JAMES CLANCY (Bothwell). Was there any season of the year fixed in the contract when the canal was to be unwatered?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes. The contractors applied for permission to unwater the canal, and the department refused.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Where was the extra cost of the work on account of the non-unwatering of the canal?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. They made up a statement very carefully, and satisfied the engineer. They had masonry work to do.

Mr. MONTAGUE. How much masonry?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I cannot tell the hon. gentleman. If he wants to know that—

Mr. MONTAGUE. We want to see the contract. The hon. gentleman has no particulars at all. He has simply a statement that the contractors filed a claim.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. If the hon. gentleman wants that, I think it would be as well that we should postpone the further consideration of this item until I can get it.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman has not explained what the item of $22,388 is.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It is for the interest from October 1, 1891, to July 1, 1900.

Mr. BERGERON. How did the interest run from 1891 to now?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The claim, if it was a proper claim, was due on October 1, 1891. It continued from that date until the present unsettled. It has now been settled. The contractors have been allowed $48,146, and the interest from October 1, 1891, to July 1, 1900, amounts to $22,388, and in my opinion there could not be a more equitable settlement of a just claim. It would be just as well that I should get all the papers and give a plain history of the whole transaction.

Mr. BERGERON. What we want to know is how the Gilbert Dredging Company were not settled with in 1891—whether they asked for so much and their demand was refused, and how afterwards it came to be granted and we have to pay this interest.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have said already that the reason the claim stood over so long was because it was the opinion in the department that most of these items, if not all, were covered by the adjustment which took place on the date I stated a while ago, on April 19, 1894.

Mr. MONTAGUE. How did that opinion come to be reversed?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Because it came to be looked into. The engineer of the department went into the claim, and they came to a conclusion as to what they thought was a proper amount to be paid if the claim had not been settled by the adjustment of October 19, 1894. That was practically the question which came before me and upon which I had to decide. I took a decision and am quite prepared to furnish the committee with the evidence on which my decision was reached. If the hon. gentleman wants all the details, I am prepared to stay here for a week in order to go into the matter.

Mr. MONTAGUE. We are just as willing as the hon. gentleman.

Mr. FOSTER. This is really a very peculiar matter. These contractors have been contracting with the government a good many years, but in 1891, and in 1892, delays took place and they made a claim against the government. It does not stand to reason that these men could have had a claim against the government for $40,000 $50,000 or $60,000 without pressing it upon the department. Then comes the information that in 1894, their claims were decided upon.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That is an assumption on the part of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. FOSTER. The officers of the department were of that opinion, and their opinion ought to be allowed a good deal of weight. From 1894 to 1896, the late government was in power, and it is not reasonable to suppose that these men did not press their claims during that time. We come to 1900, and then the hon. gentleman makes a settlement by which $70,000 was paid these contractors. That gives us ground for saying we must have all the information with reference to that settlement. It is not the first of these old claims that comes up.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. And it will not be the last.

Mr. FOSTER. No doubt; but we must be careful to have a proper explanation.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman is entirely within his right in asking for an explanation, and if a satisfactory explanation cannot be given the item ought not to pass, all I ask, however, is that the hon. gentleman will not jump to conclusions and draw inferences until he is put in possession of the facts. I have started out with the intention of furnishing all the information and furnishing it in a way in which it will be intelligible, if I am permitted to do so. When I mention what the items of these claims are, the hon. gentleman wants me to go into the minutes and details, which will confuse everybody unless the essential, important facts are first presented.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The essential and important facts are two. First, what is contained in the contract; and second, what settlement was made in 1894.

Mr. H. A. POWELL (Westmoreland). What are the items of the principal, the $48,000.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Here are the items:

	Claimed.	Allowed.
Plant idle .....	$ 9,550	$ 7,900
Reinforcing banks .....	11,377	11,250
Old stone in culverts.....	10,500	10,500
Lost by failure of government to unwater canal .....	13,111	11,958
Stone torn .....	2,464	1,766
Flooding .....	250	250
Preparing to start abandoned work .....	54	*
Balance due on unwatering.....	1,000	1,000
Filling behind retaining walls.	420	420
Wages to yearly employees.....	3,600	1,500
Backing to dimension stone used in repairs .....	5,470	*
Moving dredges .....	1,020	1,020
Working on the road.....	700	588
	$58,918	$48,146

*Not allowed.

The contract entitled the contractors, according to their contention, to be paid for the loss of profits which resulted to them from the abandonment of the work which had not been done. That subject was taken up by the department, and a basis upon which that claim should be adjusted was agreed upon, and that claim was settled by awarding the contractors $29,350. That was on April 19, 1894, and they gave the following receipt:

Received from Her Majesty the Queen the sum of $29,350, in full of all claims in respect of the abandonment of parts of sections 5 and 8 and the whole of sections 6 and 7, and of the abandonment of the aforesaid sections on the Cornwall Canal of the Gilbert Blasting and Dredge Company against Her Majesty the Queen, as per letter of March 12, 1894, of A. Ferguson, Esq., their solicitor, as per order in council of March 28, 1894.

(Sgd) GILBERT BLASTING AND DREDGING CO.

(Per P. H. Gilbert),

Then Secretary and Treasurer.

Witness, A. Ferguson.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Does not the hon. minister think that that meant an abandonment of claims of all kinds?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No, it meant only the claim arising out of the abandonment of the work. I say unhesitatingly that, in my judgment, and I have no doubt of it at all, it did not mean the abandonment of all claims.

Mr. MONTAGUE. From 1894 to 1896, was any claims made by these people?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. They were being preferred—yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. They will be brought down to—they must have submitted a claim.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Undoubtedly, their claim was $59,000. This is the letter of Mr. Ferguson, of March 12, 1894:

Mr. BLAIR.

March 12, 1894.

To the Minister Railways and Canals.

Sir,—With reference to the several interviews I have had on behalf of the Gilbert Blasting and Dredging Company with you and your deputy minister, on the subject of the claim of the company for loss of anticipated profits on the works of section 6 and 7 and parts of the works on sections 5 and 8 of the Cornwall Canal, the carrying out of which has been dispensed with by your department, as appears by letters dated February 24 and March 6, 1893, I am instructed by the company to say that they will accept the offer made to them by your department of 15 per cent of the value of the estimated work remaining to be done on said sections and so dispensed with, calculated at the prices for such work as shown in the contract between Her Majesty and the company. The value of said work at said prices upon which said percentage is to be calculated being $190,000 or thereabouts, as stated by the officers of your department to the company. The claims, if any, of the company in respect of or arising out of works actually done will, of course, remain to be dealt with apart from this settlement.

I have the honour to be, sir,

Your obedient servant,

(Sgd.) A. FERGUSON.

And on the basis of that letter, the government paid and took a receipt from the company for $29,350. It must be apparent that the claim that arises for the loss of prospective profits would not, on the face of it and in the absence of the most conclusive evidence, cover claims for work done. And I have learned since coming into the department that 15 per cent is the rate which is universally recognized as the value put upon loss of anticipated profits. The value of that work was made up by the officers at $196,000—that is where you get your $29,000. You cannot find in that anything to cover the re-enforcing of the bank, for the loss resulting from their being prevented from taking out the old stone in the culvert and using it in the new work, for the loss resulting from the failure to allow the canal to be unwatered for the filling, for the balance due on unwatering, for the filling behind the retaining wall, for the removal of the dredges—all of which had accrued due, and not one of which could possibly be identified with the expected profits for the abandoned work.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Other sums were paid to them in connection with this work?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. They did very considerable work and money was provided for them in the estimates from time to time. These were not things that would come into the estimates, and, at all events, were not paid. There is no pretense that the company paid for these things. And if they are reasonable claims they must be paid.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Under these circumstances, can the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) explain how the department came to think that nothing was due?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not know that the engineer looked into the matter very carefully, but his opinion was that the $29,000 covered everything. I confess I did not look into it at as early a period as they had a right to expect I would do, for it stood between three and four years. I, perhaps, had a little prejudice against the claim, because it had been standing, and because of the opinion of the chief engineer. But, they asked me to give them an opportunity to present their case, and when they presented it they impressed me. I think, if a man has a claim against the government and he satisfies me that it is a fair, correct and honest claim, it is my duty to say so.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Against the report of the engineer ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The engineer, when he came to look into the papers and consider them and heard the view which struck me with regard to the matter, came to the conclusion that he was wrong.

Mr. CLANCY. Did the chief engineer recommend the payment of $29,000 ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Undoubtedly.

Mr. CLANCY. Then, he had in his mind that that covered everything ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The engineer settled and agreed upon 15 per cent, and there was not so much settlement about it, because 15 per cent is the customary rate. The engineer of the department determined the amount of work which would have been done under the contract if it had gone on, at $196,000. When I spoke to him about the claim of the Gilbert Company, he was of opinion that it had been covered by the previous settlement of $29,000.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Did everybody in the department think so ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I did not ask all the clerks in the department.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. minister need not get angry about it. I wanted to know the opinion of those who had anything to do with this claim.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The matter was one for the chief engineer. Of course, there was the outside engineer, Mr. Rubidge. I do not know what his opinion was on the question, I have never known that he expressed one.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The first settlement was made on the report of the chief engineer ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I presume so.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Then, we ought to have that report.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. If there is a report of the chief engineer, we will certainly bring it.

Mr. POWELL. Where is provision made for the payment of the $48,000 ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That is to be covered by the vote here. The $141,000 would include that with the final estimates.

Mr. POWELL. The $141,000 really ought to be divided, it is misleading.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No, the payment is to be made for the work under contract on the canal, a general vote is always taken for all this.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What work is that ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The work of building the canal. If we had had the money a year ago it would have been paid before this. The $141,000 is divided as follows : To pay Wm. Davis & Sons, final estimate, sections 1 and 2, $16,000, new work to build regulating weir and protection to north bank, $15,000 ; to pay Wm. Davis & Sons, final estimate, section 3, $20,000 ; Wm. Davis & Sons, final estimate, section 4 and guard lock, $18,000 ; Wm. Davis & Sons, final estimate, Shieks Island dam, $5,300 ; Gilbert Dredging Company, final estimate, section 5, $1,600 ; Gilbert Dredging Company, section 6, $1,600 ; to pay claims, Gilbert Dredging Company, sections 5, 6, 7 and 8, $49,000 ; to pay for guard pier for guard lock, $6,000.

Mr. FOSTER. I think the member for Westmoreland is right in saying that in a case of that kind it is only fair to state definitely what is paid to Gilbert & Co. for a back claim. The idea you get when you ask a vote for the enlargement of a canal is that it is for work that is going on this year. But this is for a claim that was going on in 1891 and subsequently.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman must understand that these items do not represent work that was done this year. When you are closing up, it takes years to get your final estimates finally settled, to have them made up. We have had quite a staff employed in preparing final estimates for the Cornwall work. You will see from the items I have read that all the contractors upon the Cornwall Canal are only getting their final estimates paid this year. There are items that stand over in every contract.

Mr. FOSTER. This claim is largely for prospective profits, is it not ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. How can the hon. gentleman ask me that question seriously after what I have stated? I have repeated over and over again that the $29,000 paid in 1894 settled the question of prospective profits. It must be three or four years since the Davis's struck a blow on the Cornwall Canal, yet the final estimates have only been made up this year for the work on that canal, and they are not all finished yet.

Mr. CLANCY. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that when a settlement was made for the $29,000 the claims were before the chief engineer?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes, and the superintending engineer.

Mr. CLANCY. That the settlement made for the $29,000, to the mind of the chief engineer, covered all that.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. He was of the opinion that the payment of that amount covered everything.

Mr. CLANCY. And these claims were before him at that time?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No.

Mr. CLANCY. I understood the hon. gentleman to say they were.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. member misunderstood me because as a matter of fact they were not before the department at the time. The statement which I have of the matter is to the effect that after the settlement of the $29,000 the contractors advanced their claim for the $58,918. So it could not have been before him then.

Mr. POWELL. They were really before the department, but the settlement of the claim was in abeyance.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. You will see from the letter of Mr. Ferguson that they had not presented any claim, reserving their right to present a claim arising out of work actually done.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Is the hon. gentleman sure these claims were not before the department at the time of the $29,000?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am so informed. I have a statement now in my hand from my deputy to that effect.

Mr. MONTAGUE. How could the deputy have thought that these claims were included in that statement?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. He supposed in a general way that the whole business was closed up. I must confess that I could not see sufficient ground upon which to base that conclusion, but he told me the reason why he had not looked more favourably upon the matter, and having the view which he had that the claim was already disposed of, when these gentlemen came from time to time, as they did to me, I felt it would be a waste of time probably for me to go into the matter. I put it off from time to time until this very last year. They asked to be allowed to state their case, which I did.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Does not the minister think it peculiar that the chief engineer would still remain under that conviction that the whole matter was settled. According to the minister's statements this company were pressing this claim all the time, and yet the deputy minister still held to the view that it was all settled in the old settlement.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I cannot say that I regarded it as so exceedingly strange because these people were still doing other work for the department. They had large transactions continuously with the department, and they naturally expected that the matters would be settled ultimately, and they did not press it as they would have done if they had closed up their business with the department and did not expect to get any more work from it. They were urgent enough with me since I came into the department, and I presume they were pretty urgent before.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I see the chief engineer nodding that they were quite urgent before the hon. minister came into the department.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Does the chief engineer mean to say that the whole thing was settled, although these urgent representations were being made constantly? I have too much faith in the chief engineer for that.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have stated the facts as I know them.

Mr. FOSTER. In the adjustment the minister made of these claims were they referred to the engineers and officers of his department for analysis and report?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes, the superintending engineer in my presence discussed these items with me.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Had there ever been reports before from these officers?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No. The superintending engineer made no report until I came in.

Mr. FOSTER. I mean after the report upon which the 1894 settlement was made. If you bring that report, and then bring the report upon which this settlement was made we will have the information before us.

Mr. POWELL. Were the remaining items of the $41,000 disputed items?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No, I do not think they were. These came in under the final estimate in the ordinary way.

The DEPUTY SPEAKER. The item will stand.

Carrying out the regulations concerning the health of employees under the Public Works (Health) Act, 1899 ..... $5,000

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think that this item ought to be dropped.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). This is an item for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the Act passed by parliament last session, for the preservation of health on public works. In accordance with the provisions of that Act, regulations were passed in January last to provide for the preservation of the health of employees on these public works. It is absolutely necessary that these regulations should be carried out. Without a small sum of money at the disposal of the government, it is impossible to carry out these regulations, or to provide for the performance of the necessary work under the provisions of the law. It is necessary that there should be a superintendent of the health of the employees on public works, and that certain provisions should be made in regard to the kind of accommodation to be provided by the contractor for employees. Under these regulations, contractors are obliged to provide necessary hospital accommodation, medical attendance, isolation accommodation in cases of contagious diseases, and it is necessary to have a superintendent to see that these provisions are carried out. It has been found on public works, particularly in the case of the Crow's Nest Pass Railway, that some employees have come to an untimely end, owing to the prevalence of contagious disease, and that they have not been properly looked after by the contractors. It is to provide against occurrences of that kind that these regulations have been passed and it is necessary to provide for the proper enforcement of the regulations which I have mentioned.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think the hon. gentleman had better let the item stand, as there will be a good deal of discussion upon it. It is simply a question of appointing an officer. So far as preventing disease on public works, with an inspection costing $5,000 is concerned, it is simply nonsense. If the hon. gentleman is going into the protection of public health on public works, he will require a vote of $10,000 at the least.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I think my hon. friend has not thought the matter out at all.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the hon. gentleman tell me whom he proposes to appoint?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I have not the slightest idea.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What officers does he propose to appoint?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The regulations require that there shall be a superintendent.

Mr. MONTAGUE. How much does the hon. gentleman think he should be paid?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I am not quite sure. He will have to be paid a salary which will be sufficient to enable us to secure the services of a proper officer.

Mr. MONTAGUE. $3,000?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I think about that.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Then you have $2,000 left.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Yes, and then the superintendent has to pay his travelling expenses, as he will have to go to different works throughout the country. It may be that under certain circumstances, he will have to have an assistant to remain on particular works for a length of time.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman sees that he will require a great deal more money than this. The only object of this is to put another government employee on the road.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The amount of money that is asked, I think, will be sufficient for the purpose of carrying out these regulations. The actual expense in regard to provisions, hospitals and sanitation has to be provided by the contractors. But at the same time for the purpose of seeing that this work is properly done, a certain amount must be at the disposal of the department. Suppose that the hon. gentleman's statement is correct, and that we will pay an official $2,000, $2,500 or $3,000, I think the amount would be sufficient. The general superintendence of the medical part of this work will be in the hands of the Director General of Public Health, whose expenses will be paid out of this vote, in visiting public works where his presence may be necessary. With this vote there will be a proper supervision to see that the arrangements are enforced. I think this sum is sufficient for that, and by no means too large.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I can tell the minister that in the province of Ontario we do not want his Act. We have the very best system of public health so far as the boards are concerned, both local and provincial. The greatest care is exercised by the boards of health, and they have the fullest authority. So far as Ontario is concerned this is absolute nonsense. The minister does not need to appoint any officer at all. He has Dr. Montizambert, and this is simply in order to create an office for some henchman of the government.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Nothing of the kind.

Mr. MONTAGUE. No protection of the public health in this Dominion can be undertaken for $5,000.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The object is not to look after the public health of the Dominion, but only the health of employees on public works. The object of the government is absolutely for the protection of the workmen and not for the purpose of creating appointments. As a matter of fact so little is that considered, that I have not the faintest idea to-day who the employee or employees may be. His duty will be to see that the provisions under these regulations are carried out on public works in the wilder portions of the Dominion.

Mr. FOSTER. Would you send him to the Yukon?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. We might if the Dominion were carrying on a public work there.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Where in the wilds of Canada are these public works now being carried on?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. There are public works being carried on in the North-west Territories.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Does the minister mean that in the North-west Territories civilization has not sufficiently advanced to take care of the health of men there just as well as in Ontario?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. What about the poor fellows on the Crow's Nest Pass Railway?

Mr. MONTAGUE. That was not a government work, and this Act would not apply to it.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. It would. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague) has not followed the terms of the regulations.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Well, let us have these regulations.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. They were published in the Canada Gazette on the 31st January last, and they have been within the reach of every hon. gentleman who chooses to look at them. The law was passed last session, and is on the statute-books of the country. There has been nothing sprung upon the House or upon the hon. gentleman. He has had abundant opportunity of finding out everything in connection with the vote.

Mr. MONTAGUE.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I am decidedly opposed to this vote, because I think it is absolutely useless. The minister had better let it stand until we look into the matter more fully.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague) is rather unreasonable, considering the time this resolution has been before the House.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman will not lose anything by letting it stand.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I have no objection, but at the same time it is the last item in my main estimates, and I have twice asked that it be taken up. It was deferred before at the request of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague).

Mr. MONTAGUE. I want to look up the regulations.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. You have been away so much that you do not know what has happened.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I have not been away. Some hon. MEMBERS. Carried.

Mr. MONTAGUE. No, it is not carried; and we will stay here and see about it now. Was the Canada Gazette distributed to the members?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. We are not in the habit of distributing the Canada Gazette to any one.

Mr. POWELL. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fisher) is just a little too cute. That is altogether too small for the parliament of Canada. Regulations like these on which you ask a vote from this parliament should be on the Table of this House for members to see.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. They have never been asked for until this eleventh hour of the session. If the hon. gentleman had asked for a copy of the Canada Gazette he would have had it at any time. The regulations are now before the House.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The minister will save time by letting the item stand.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I have no objection to letting it stand if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague) wants to make an investigation regarding it, because I am quite satisfied that when he inquires into it he will be quite satisfied with it.

Committee rose, and reported progress.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 1.25 a.m. (Thursday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, July 5, 1900.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Eleven o'clock.

PRAYERS.

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—THE EMERGENCY RATION.

Mr. N. A. BELCOURT (Ottawa), in moving that the report of the select committee appointed by this House to inquire into the purchase of emergency rations for the use of Canadian troops in South Africa, be adopted, said: Before dealing with the report itself I want to deal with several matters, some of which are personal to myself, and some of which refer more particularly to the Liberal members of the committee appointed to investigate this matter. During the course of the investigation I was singled out for considerable abuse by certain members of the committee, and by the press throughout the country which supports those gentlemen. I was charged with sundry crimes and offences, amongst others with endeavouring to curtail the investigation, with endeavouring to block it, and to prevent the truth from seeing the light of day. I was charged with being an unruly, ignorant and despotic chairman, and I was also charged with being ignorant, young and incapable, unsophisticated, and so on. As to the latter charges, of course, they have not prevented me from sleeping; nor did the other charges worry me much. I noticed that the charges became louder and more frequent according as it became more and more apparent from the evidence taken before the committee that the hon. member who made these charges (Mr. Monk) had signally failed in proving them. The charge to which I refer was levelled not only against myself, but against the Liberal members of the committee. I want to say here that all charges of that kind were absolutely without foundation, the insinuations were groundless, and there was no reason whatever to find fault with either the chairman or any Liberal member of the committee. Every facility was given to the hon. gentlemen to bring all the witnesses they chose, to hear all the evidence they desired to bring out, and to produce all the documents they could think of. The committee sat every day from half-past ten in the morning until eleven or twelve at night, and it did its labour with a great deal of celerity. Any one who will read the voluminous report of the evidence printed will see that it did its work well, that it did it thoroughly, and that it afforded every facility to every member to have a complete and thorough investigation.

There were one or two points upon which I did not agree with the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) as to the conduct of the proceedings. I did, as I claim I had a right to do, both as a member of the committee and as its chairman, express my views on the subject, and I did so with firmness, and I think I may say with moderation. I did not, and do not now agree that the position of chairman of this committee should be reduced to the narrow and ridiculous limits which at one time the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, if he will pardon me for saying so, in rather an offensive manner, tried to assign to it. I did not agree that this committee was called upon to hear evidence concerning and to pronounce judgment upon rations in general, and to say what constitutes a bad or a good ration, and what a good or a bad ration should or should not contain. When it was attempted to prove what is the emergency ration in use in the British, in the French, in the German, or in any other army, when it was attempted to make this select committee an advertising medium for Hatch's Protose, for Bovril, for the 'Kleberbrod biscuits,' and for other various concoctions, I objected, as I conceived it my duty to do, and tried to keep the inquiry within the limits assigned to it by this House. When it was attempted to make witnesses give their opinion concerning the alleged negligence of the minister in reference to the matter under consideration, I claimed, as I do now, that that was the province of the committee alone, and that witnesses should not take the place of the committee in pronouncing such judgment, that the committee alone were competent and required to give their opinion and render a judgment upon the matters involved in the charge. These are, I think, the only two points upon which I then differed with any members of the committee. Upon all other points I endeavoured, as far as lay in my power as chairman, to afford every latitude, and to the best of my humble ability to assist the committee in every way in conducting this investigation. A great deal of irrelevant and immaterial evidence was introduced, as any member who has read the evidence will readily conclude. It was my right to prevent, or try to prevent, this immaterial or unnecessary evidence from being introduced, but I did not do so, I allowed the hon. gentlemen who went all over creation, every latitude and every facility. For instance, we had evidence to show what percentage of proteids is contained in all kinds of food, we had interminable evidence on that point. I could, if I had chosen, have prevented, or tried to prevent, evidence of that kind, because it was absolutely foreign to the charge, it was absolutely outside the limits of the inquiry.

Now, with reference to the charges, I was much surprised to hear the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, who is a lawyer, who is a professor of one of the universities of this country—I am reminded that the hon. gentleman is a professor of constitutional law and that makes the matter all the worse that he should have come before the committee and enunciated the most astounding proposition of law which I ever heard. I leave every member of this House, be he lawyer or layman, to judge for himself of the utter ridicule of the proposition of the hon. gentleman. When the relevancy of certain evidence was discussed, and I reminded the hon. gentleman that the committee was confined to certain limits, and was bound by the order of reference, the hon. gentleman boldly, not once, but half a dozen times, asserted that as a member of the committee he had a right to ask any witness any question on any subject that he chose. That is the proposition which the hon. gentleman started out with in this investigation, that is the proposition upon which he acted, and to which he pinned his faith and his conduct all through.

At the risk of being a little tedious I want to remind the hon. gentleman of some of the principles which govern matters of this sort. I want to quote to my hon. friend what Bourinot says at page 510, as to the right to depart from the order of reference in matters of this sort :

It is a clear and indisputable principle of parliamentary law that a committee is bound by, and is not at liberty to depart from, the order of reference. This principle is essential to the regular despatch of business ; for if it were admitted that what the House entertained, in one instance, and referred to a committee, was so far controllable by that committee, that it was at liberty to disobey the order of reference, all business would be at an end ; and, as often as circumstances would afford a pretense, the proceedings of the House would be involved in endless confusion and contests with itself.

Again, at page 378, May lays down the rule in very few words, but in very clear language :

Like committees of the whole House, select committees are restrained from considering matters not specially referred to them by the House.

Now, that is in reference to the position taken by the hon. gentleman. Then, we had another astounding proposition from my hon. friend, and that was concerning the duties of the chairman of a select committee of this sort. My hon. friend pretended that as chairman of that committee I had nothing else to do with the committee but to sit there, listen to the evidence, and if he, or some other gentleman, got, perhaps, a little bit too noisy, I was to be allowed to say, in a very meek and mild manner, 'order.' or use some such expression. That was about the role that the hon. gentleman wanted to assign to the chairman of the committee. Now, I want to remind the hon. gentleman of some of the elementary principles that should govern the duties of the chairman of a select committee of this House. If he will permit me, I will cite to him what Bourinot says on the subject, at page 503 :

It is the duty of the chairman to preserve order and enforce the rules. Committees are regarded as portions of the House, limited in their inquiries by the extent of the authority given them ; but governed for the most part in their proceedings by the same rules which prevail in the House, and which continue in full operation in every select committee. Every question is determined in a select committee in the same manner as in the House to which it belongs. . . . The rules that govern the conduct of members in the House, should govern them when in the committee. . . . Members of the committee, however, should observe the rules of the House itself when they address the Chair.

Then, again, at page 251, in reference to the deciding of objections concerning the evidence, there is the following :

Mr. FOSTER. If my hon. friend (Mr. Belcourt) will allow me, it seems to me that the hon. gentleman's remarks would be quite in order if we were moving for a committee, or if we were discussing what its powers should be, but to go into this long discussion as to the rights of the committee—

Mr. BELCOURT. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) will have the right to reply. I have a perfect right to say what I wish to say. I am perfectly in order.

Mr. FOSTER. I think my hon. friend—

Mr. BELCOURT. If the hon. gentleman wants to ask a question, I am prepared to answer.

Mr. FOSTER. I will ask the hon. gentleman a question, if he will take his seat.

Mr. BELCOURT. What is the question ?

Mr. FOSTER. The question is this ; as to whether he thinks it is in order or whether it is productive of speed and celerity, that, instead of making his motion for the adoption of the report and discussing the report, he should take up a long time in discussing the powers and duties of the committee ? That is the question I would like to put to him in the interest of the despatch of business.

Mr. BELCOURT. I am one of the few men in this House to whom the reproach cannot be addressed of taking up the time of the House unnecessarily, and it comes with very bad grace with the hon. gentleman who has interrupted me.

Mr. FOSTER. We will know exactly how to go on.

Mr. BELCOURT. Referring to the duties of the chairman of a committee of this sort, Bourinot, at page 251, said :

In case a member objects to a question on any ground, he must state his objections, and the Speaker will decide.

If the rules concerning this subject are applicable to select committees, then it is clear by this authority, that the chairman of the committee had the right and the duty to decide objections to the evidence when they were taken by any member of the committee. The hon. gentleman might have allowed me to finish without interrupting me, because this was all I had to say on these points. I want now to deal with the report itself. I think the first thing that ought to be done is to ascertain what was the matter which this committee was requested to investigate and report upon. The whole question was whether the food which had been tested at Kingston was the food which had been supplied to troops in South Africa. That is the whole question, the whole point, the whole case, and there is nothing else involved in the charge. It is true that the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) has thought fit to write about three pages of printed matter; he has padded and added to his charge ad libitum, but the whole gist of the case was whether the food supplied to the troops in South Africa was the food which had been tested at Kingston. In order that there may be no dispute about this, or any further question, I am going to leave it to the hon. member for Jacques Cartier and the hon. ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) to say whether that was the charge, whether there is anything else in the whole matter. When the subject was under discussion in this House on June 6 last, Hansard shows that the following took place :

The PRIME MINISTER. No, but the name of the purchaser who made the charge.

That was in answer to an interruption.

But now, I go one step further. Mr. Devlin sold a certain quantity of food for which he received $4,600. He gave the Department of Militia a sample of the food which he sold. The Department of Militia analysed it—

That is evidently an error; the Prime Minister evidently meant the Department of Inland Revenue.

It was found to be accurate, it was found to be proper, and if that same food has gone to South Africa there is no complaint to be made.

These are the words made use of by the Prime Minister. The hon. member for York, N.B. (Mr. Foster) interrupted him and said :

That is the whole point.

Whether the food tested at Kingston has gone to South Africa, and if so, there is no complaint to be made.

Mr. FOSTER. That is the whole point.

But now, let us see what the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) himself said in the House as to the charge :

If I must now declare positively what my charge is, I will do so. I am satisfied from the statements that have been made from the other side of the House this afternoon, that the food supplied to our troops in South Africa was not the food tested at Kingston—that is my charge. Who are the guilty parties I do not know. I will refer to that presently. But I do charge that the food tested so carefully at Kingston, under the direction of the military authorities, was not the food, not one ounce of it, that was given to our troops in South Africa. That is the charge I now make, and I make it with the full sense of my responsibility as a member of this House—

That is what the hon. gentleman said himself. He defined the issue, he clearly stated his charge, he definitely took his stand, and declared positively, in clear and unmistakable language, that that was the charge and the whole charge. As I have shown, the hon. ex-Finance Minister agreed with him, and declared positively that that was the charge. That is what the committee was called to investigate and to report upon. What are the facts shown by the evidence before the committee? I will refer to them briefly.

Dr. Devlin and Mr. Hatch, who were partners, in the winter of 1899 applied to the Minister of Militia to sell him some of this food for his department. They offered to carry on a test at Kingston on some of the men of the Royal Canadian Artillery, and the test was carried on and was declared to be highly satisfactory. I want hon. members to remember that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Monk), in making the charge, distinctly lays it down as indisputable, that the food which was tested at Kingston was of a highly satisfactory character and that it fully answered the purposes for which it was intended. That is the basis upon which my hon. friend (Mr. Monk) started, and that is the basis upon which this matter must be considered. Later on, I think in October, 1899, when the first Canadian contingent was being sent out, Mr. Hatch asked the minister to give him an order to supply the troops going to South Africa with some of this food. The minister did not think well of the proposition, and he refused to entertain it. Hatch, therefore, made an offer in October, which was not accepted. In December or January following, the offer was again renewed, this time, I think, by Dr. Devlin. Several visits were paid to Ottawa in order to induce the minister to give an order for the second Canadian contingent, which was about to leave. The minister at that time, as is shown by the evidence, had received reports from South Africa that the troops were being put to long and forced marches, that their rations had been cut down, and that there was considerable suffering on the part of the soldiers. The minister, with a laudable desire of helping our men in the field, with the desire of giving these men some additional food to rely on in case of emergency, considered the proposition which was made to him and which he had up to that time refused to entertain, namely, to supply the Canadian troops with some of this food. The Minister of Militia at that time, as every one knows, was an extremely busy man, and he had, perforce and in the usual way, to leave the matter to one of his officers, and so he called in the general director of medical affairs, who, it will be admitted, was the best man in his department to have charge of a matter of this sort. The minister acquainted Dr. Neilson with the proposition which was made, and left the whole matter in his hands. Dr. Neilson was one of the gentlemen under whose supervision the test at Kingston had previously been made in March, 1899. Dr. Neilson knew from his own knowledge the quality of this food and whether it was susceptible of rendering assistance to our men in the field. The only recommendation, and the minister made that a distinct condition—an imperative stipulation—which the minister made to Dr. Neilson was that the food to be supplied to the troops was to be of the same character as the food which had been tested at Kingston and found so satisfactory. Dr. Neilson, to whom the matter was referred and who was fully aware of the nature of this food, then carried on the negotiations with Dr. Devlin. Dr. Devlin produced two samples, which were left with Dr. Neilson, accompanying the tender made by him. Dr. Devlin offered to supply a certain quantity of rations at a certain price. The negotiations were carried on between him and Dr. Neilson, and the contract was made. A great deal has been said before the committee to the effect that the contract was entered into with undue haste, that proper consideration was not given to the subject, and that in that respect the minister or some officer of the department was guilty of negligence. The House must remember that this was on the 4th January, and that the troops of the second contingent were to leave Halifax on the 20th of the same month. If the food were to be supplied, the contract had to be entered into at once, because from the time that Dr. Devlin was notified of its acceptance to the time the food had to be put on board the transport at Halifax, it left only eleven days remaining. One condition of the contract which I want to lay particular stress upon was, that Dr. Devlin undertook that if he failed to deliver the whole of the rations at Halifax on the day fixed, the contract was to be null and void, and he was to lose every cent which he had expended for the purpose of carrying out the contract. That is an important element in deciding whether the price that was paid by the government for the food was too high a price, considering the quality of the food. The food had to be put up in tins, it had to be packed in a certain way, it had to be shipped to Halifax and put on board the steamer before January 20. The evidence shows that Dr. Devlin delivered the goods in Halifax on the day appointed by the contract. On January 25—and I imagine hon. gentlemen opposite who were on the committee will lay some stress on that part of the evidence—on January 25, 1900, Mr. Hatch wrote a letter to the minister, claiming that the food in question was not the food which had been tested at Kingston, was of inferior quality, and was practically worthless. These gentlemen opposite have tried to make a great deal out of the fact that the minister did not acknowledge this letter, and it has been stated—untruthfully, I claim—that the minister took no action by reason of the receipt of this letter. I submit that the minister did take action, and the evidence discloses that at the very moment he and his officers were taking the necessary steps to ascertain if Dr. Devlin had performed his contract. The analysis which was made subsequently by Mr. Macfarlane, the government analyst at Ottawa, was one of the results of the receipt of this letter by the Minister of Militia. It was partly because he had this protest on the part of Mr. Hatch that the food was not what it was represented to be, that the minister afterwards ordered or sanctioned the analysis of the food by the officers of the Inland Revenue Department.

Mr. MONTAGUE. How long after the protest was received?

Mr. BELCOURT. The letter was written on January 25; I suppose it was received on the 26th or 27th, and the analysis was ordered on February 2, four or five days after the receipt of the letter.

Mr. CASGRAIN. By whom??

Mr. BELCOURT. The analysis was made by Mr. Macfarlane.

Mr. CASGRAIN. By whom was it ordered?

Mr. BELCOURT. It does not appear by whom it was ordered, but the letter asking for the analysis was from the Militia Department, and from Mr. Benoit, who was in charge of the samples, which he had taken from the consignment at Halifax. But, Sir, the best answer to Mr. Hatch's letter is the answer that Mr. Hatch's letter was not true. The food which was supplied to the Canadian troops was the food, or rather food of a similar kind and quality, as the food which was tested at Kingston. I submit that by the analysis which has been produced, it is proven clearly and conclusively that the food which was supplied to the Canadian troops was absolutely identical in character and quality with which the food was tested at Kingston.

The analysis of the Department of Inland Revenue showed that the sample upon which the contract was made contained 16 per cent of proteids, and that one of the samples taken from the consignment at Halifax and brought to Ottawa by Mr. Benoit, the secretary of the department, showed 16.18 per cent of proteids. This analysis is confirmed in every particular by the analysis of Dr. Ruttan. Dr. Ruttan was given three samples to analyse and he analysed three samples—I, N and E, sample I being a sample of the food which was tested at Kingston, N a sample of the food which was delivered at Halifax, and E a sample of the food which accompanied the tender of Dr. Devlin. Now, what was the result of the analysis of Dr.

Ruttan? That the food which was tested at Kingston, sample I, contained 13·17 per cent of proteids. That sample was sent to the Department of Militia previous to the test being made at Kingston, either by Dr. Devlin or Mr. Hatch, it does not appear which. It was contained in an envelope bearing the handwriting of Mr. Hatch, and was preserved by Mr. Benoit and kept in his drawer in the department until the time of this investigation. We have the uncontradicted evidence of Dr. Neilson that that sample was sent to the department by the very one who proposed to have the test made at Kingston, and before it was made.

Mr. ELLIS. Is that clearly established beyond peradventure?

Mr. BELCOURT. Yes, clearly established beyond any doubt whatever.

Mr. ELLIS. No.

Mr. BELCOURT. My hon. friend cannot say that unless he would say that the evidence of Dr. Neilson is unworthy of all belief. If he says that he must brand Dr. Neilson as a perjurer.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. MONK. Dr. Neilson says the absolute contrary.

Mr. BELCOURT. Dr. Neilson produced the envelope containing the food which was presented to him previous to the test, and on which it was proposed to have the food tested at Kingston.

Some hon. MEMBERS. What page?

Mr. BELCOURT. I have not the page. I assert, and I am willing to leave the case to stand on that, that Dr. Neilson stated positively that that envelope contained a sample of the food which was received previous to the test at Kingston, and which contained some of the food upon which the test was to be carried on. Now, what did the analysis of Dr. Ruttan show? That one of the two samples taken from the consignment delivered at Halifax contained 15·37 per cent of proteids, and that sample E, a small tin can which was left at the department accompanying the tender of Dr. Devlin, contained 18·01 per cent of proteids. So we have the food tested at Kingston containing 13·70 per cent, the food delivered at Halifax containing 15·37 per cent, and the sample furnished by Dr. Devlin at the time the contract was made containing 18·01 per cent. This proves conclusively that the food given to the troops going to South Africa was of a quality equal if not superior to that tested at Kingston and that contracted for; because the whole case is whether the food which Dr. Devlin delivered to the department was the food which was contracted for. If he delivered the food which he contracted for, there is not a tittle of foundation to the charges brought by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier.

and his whole case completely fails, and tumbles to the ground. As a further corroboration of the evidence of Dr. Ruttan, we have the analysis of Mr. Hersey of Montreal. Mr. Hersey, through Mr. Hatch, analysed a sample of the same food, taken out of the consignment to the soldiers and which was bought from Dr. Devlin or from Mr. Lyons, of Montreal by an agent of Mr. Hatch. Mr. Hatch wrote the letter of the 25th of January, and caused somebody to go to the store of Mr. Lyons, a druggist, where this food was put up, to purchase a can of it. A can similar in all respects to the cans sent to South Africa was purchased, and 75 cents was paid for four ounces. Hon. members will see at once that the retail price of this food in Montreal, as sold by Dr. Devlin, was $3 a pound. This can was sent to Mr. Hersey, he analysed it, and it was found to contain 17·55 per cent of proteids. That was a sample of the same food as that delivered at Halifax. As against this clear and conclusive evidence, what have we got? We have nothing but a statement made by Mr. Hatch as to what the food tested at Kingston contained. Under oath Mr. Hatch stated that the food which had gone to Kingston to be tested on the soldiers there contained 50 or 60 per cent of proteids. We have nothing but his bald statement to that effect. He admits that that food was never analysed, and he admits that it is impossible to state the exact quantity of proteids in any food except by chemical analysis. Now, I submit that Mr. Hatch's statement cannot for one moment be accepted by this House, because it was flatly and most clearly contradicted by the witness Muir, who, as it appears by the evidence, is a political friend of hon. gentlemen opposite, a member of the Sir John A. Macdonald Club of Montreal. He testified that at the time the test was being carried on at Kingston, he had several conversations with Mr. Hatch concerning this food, and that in one of those conversations Mr. Hatch told him that the food sent to Kingston contained, not 50 or 60 per cent, but only 15 per cent of proteids. Mr. Hatch did not think proper to come and deny that statement; so that whatever propositions, whatever arguments hon. gentlemen opposite may choose to lay before the House, they are confronted with this uncontradicted evidence of Mr. Muir. And that evidence corroborates Dr. Ruttan's analysis with a very slight difference. It was shown in evidence that it was almost impossible to have two analyses of the same food exactly agree, because the percentage of proteids in a small portion of the food may be different from the percentage in another portion taken from the same can. The proteids do not mix with the other constituents of the food in exactly the same proportions in every component part. So that we have the evidence of Mr. Muir and that of Dr. Ruttan corroborating each other, and establishing beyond peradventure that the food supplied to the troops was the same food of a quality not only equal but actually superior in quality to that which was tested at Kingston.

With reference to the price paid, I repeat that it is shown in the evidence that the retail price of this food in Montreal is $3 per pound, and it was sold to the department for $2. Hon. gentlemen opposite will tell the House that the price paid was too high because Dr. Devlin had made a customs entry at Montreal valuing the stuff he brought in at 30 cents per pound. But it is equally true that the foods which Mr. Hatch imported for the purpose of the Kingston test were also entered at the customs in Montreal. At what prices were these foods imported by Mr. Hatch entered?

Mr. CRAIG. Is that in the evidence?

Mr. BELCOURT. Certainly.

Mr. CASGRAIN. No.

Mr. BELCOURT. Yes; it is in one of the exhibits printed in the appendix. It will be found in a statement produced by Mr. White, collector of customs in Montreal, and if my hon. friend wishes it, I will read it to him.

Mr. McNEILL. It would be a great advantage to those who were not members of the committee, and enable us to follow the discussion very much better if the hon. gentleman would refer us to the page of the evidence.

Mr. BELCOURT. Page 276. This is the statement produced by the collector of customs at Montreal, in reply to an order of the committee asking him to furnish a statement containing all the entries of emergency rations, and so on, entered for customs duty at Montreal during the years 1899 and 1900.

Statement of the importations of emergency rations by Hatch & Co., at Montreal, during 1899-1900. Entry 19262, country of produce, Germany; description, other bread stuffs; net weight of goods, eighty pounds; price per pound, 2½ cents; value, $2; amount of duty paid, 40 cents.

May 26, 1899, entry No. 97259, imported from Germany, bread stuffs, 275 pounds, 21·46 cents.

June 9, 1899, No. 11242, imported from Germany, other bread stuffs, 25 pounds, 28 cents per pound.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Will my hon. friend allow me a question? Is it not a fact that Mr. Hatch swore that these matters were what he called dilutants, that is stuff in which he put the protein, but not the protein matter at all?

Mr. BELCOURT. The hon. gentleman is quite mistaken. Mr. Hatch said that the dilutants were got from Fraser & Viger, Montreal, and were not imported. But that does not make much difference. I am answering the argument which I knew is going to be advanced, that because Dr. Devlin entered this food in the customs at 30 cents per pound, that shows conclusively that the price was too high. But that argument will not stand because Mr. Hatch imported himself these same foods and entered them in the customs at 2½ cents, 21 cents and 28 cents per pound. Mr. Hatch does not say that his food is only worth $2 per pound. On the contrary, he is selling it in Montreal at $5 per pound, and later on, as the evidence shows he offered, after this contract was entered into, to supply the Minister of Militia with his food, and Mr. Hatch's price was $2, with a discount of 10 per cent, provided a large quantity was taken. The customs' entry made by Dr. Devlin, in the light of Mr. Hatch's evidence, and of the entries made by him as shown above, will not in any way prove that the price paid is exorbitant.

I have dealt with the principal points of the evidence as briefly as I could, and I want now to refer to a portion of the minority report. That report bears on its face the stamp of unfairness and injustice to the Minister of Militia.

Mr. McNEILL. Would the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question? He said that the director of the stores had stated that this powder was inclosed in an envelope addressed by Mr. Hatch.

Mr. BELCOURT. I did not say that.

Mr. McNEILL. Then my hon. friend does not say so?

Mr. BRITTON. Dr. Neilson said that the writing on the back of the envelope was, in his opinion, Mr. Hatch's handwriting.

Mr. McNEILL. What I find here is this statement—

Mr. BELCOURT. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to go on? He has no right to interrupt. I say that the report of the minority cannot possibly be accepted, and before leaving that point, I wish to protest against the conduct—I will not say of which member of the committee, as I do not know who committed the indiscretions and the breach of faith. The report of the minority was handed over to the press against the agreement entered into among themselves by the members of the committee. The morning after that report was submitted to the committee, it appeared in the Conservative press, contrary to the agreement I have referred to. But aside from that agreement altogether, to have handed that report over to the press, was a distinct breach of the privileges of this House.

The report of the minority cannot be accepted, if for only two reasons. It is stated in that report that the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk), was prevented from proving how the money borrowed by the contractor was paid or chequed out. That is absolutely without foundation, it is a gratuitous assertion which is not only unfounded, but actually and clearly disproven by the printed evidence. There is absolutely nothing in the evidence to warrant such a finding. On the contrary, the evidence shows clearly that such a finding is not only untrue, but deliberately malicious. Let me refer to the evidence, and I will not trouble the House with many quotations. On page 154, in the examination of Mr. Ramsay, the manager of the Merchants Bank of Canada, in Montreal, he gave the following evidence. He had previously sworn that some $1,600 had been borrowed by Mr. Lyons, in order to enable Dr. Devlin to carry out his contract :

By Mr. Monk :

Q. Do you know how it is chequed out, this sum of $1,600 ?—A. I don't.

Q. Do the books of the bank show how it is chequed out ?—A. They don't. They would show that certain—the books of the bank would show that a certain sum of money, the proceeds of these notes, went to the credit of Mr. John F. Lyons. They would show that certain cheques of $100, $500, $50 or whatever they may have been were paid. They would not show to whom payable or to whom paid. The vouchers would be returned to Lyons in the ordinary course of business, that is to say, the cheques. I could not give you the information.

Does it follow from that, that the hon. member for Jacques Cartier was prevented from finding how the money was chequed out? Mr. Ramsay himself says: 'I could not give you the information.'

Mr. MONK. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Belcourt)—

Mr. BELCOURT. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Monk) will have an opportunity to answer me.

Mr. MONK. I will ask the hon. gentleman to read—

Mr. BELCOURT. I will read what he wishes if the hon. gentleman will sit down.

Mr. MONK. Will the hon. member for Ottawa allow me to ask him a question? Will he read from page 153, where we endeavoured to enter into that question?

Mr. BELCOURT. I will finish what I have, and then I will read page 153, if the hon. gentleman wants it.

Q. But we would know conclusively how the money went out. The money from melting these notes, we would know what amounts went out, would we not ?—A. Yes, if you could identify the amounts with this matter under investigation.

Q. I mean, Mr. Ramsay, at the time of melting or discounting these notes he had no money to his credit in the bank, that note would have been put to his credit, and the payments out of that amount of $1,200 would show in what proportions that was paid out, although it would not show to whom it was paid ?—A. It would only so far be right, inasmuch as other transactions were taking place and other moneys were doubtless standing to the credit of the account and some was standing to the credit of the account before these notes were discounted.

Q. But you do not know ?—A. I think my impression is correct in that respect.

By Mr. Clarke :

Q. When these notes were discounted they were passed through Lyons' account ?—A. Yes.

Q. And he chequed them out ?—A. Just so.

By Mr. Russell :

Q. But you cannot appropriate any cheques to this discount or to any other credit or deposit he had ?—A. Certainly not.

That is the manner in which the hon. member for Jacques Cartier was prevented from learning how the money borrowed by the contractor was paid or chequed out, which the report presented to this House by the minority deliberately says he was so prevented. That statement is based on a falsehood—it is based on no evidence; it is a statement which is absolutely contradicted by the evidence. Now the hon. gentleman asked me to read at page 153. It is true I did take objection that it was not possible for the manager of the bank to see how this $1,600 had been appropriated, and I did not consider the questions asked were relevant to the inquiry, and one having the slightest knowledge of the manner of recording banking transactions in all our banks would know that the manager of the bank could not possibly tell from the books if these moneys were appropriated to this contract of Dr. Devlin—or how it was expended by Devlin or by Lyons. At page 153 is the following :

Mr. Monk.—Well, I must state to the committee that I desire to ask this witness to file and produce before the committee an extract from the bank books showing how this sum of $1,200, and the further sum of $400 was expended. I brought up this witness for this purpose. I want to prove that the bank advanced $1,200 and afterwards $400 to Dr. Devlin, and how these two sums amounting to $1,600 went out of the bank, how that was chequed out, and to whom it was paid as far as the witness knows. That is the danger and I think it is germane to this inquiry.

The Chairman.—I suggest you ask the witness whether he can or not.—

'Whether he can or not.' That is the kind of objection that these gentlemen take so much offence at. Was that the act of an unruly and despotic chairman? Does that justify the gratuitous and malicious assertion of this minority report that the members of the committee were prevented from proving how this sum was expended? I simply asked that the hon. gentleman should first ask the witness whether he could or could not state how this money was paid out.

Question objected to by Messrs. Campbell, Russell and Britton.

The Chairman.—I rule, I do not think it is material; I do not think it is necessary; I do not think it is pertinent to the inquiry.

But these gentlemen had held a club over my head too often, claiming that I was ruling out evidence unfairly. I was not willing to allow them the slightest pretext for attack, which I knew they would be slow in taking, and I took it upon myself to put the question to Mr. Ramsay and got his answer, as follows :

By the Chairman :

Q. Do you know how that money was expended?—A. I don't.

What more conclusive evidence does the House want of the unfairness, maliciousness and injustice of the report of the minority?

Now, in another particular, the report of the minority shows itself absolutely unfair, unreliable and worthless; and that in suppressing, deliberately suppressing, all reference to the analysis made by Dr. Ruttan of the food tested at Kingston. In the minority report, these gentlemen took the greatest care to eliminate every particle of evidence which established that the food tested in Kingston contained only a fraction over 13 per cent protein. On the other hand, the attempt is made to lead the reader of the report to infer that the food tested at Kingston contained a much larger percentage of protein than than shown by the analysis of Dr. Ruttan. For these two reasons, the report of the minority stamps itself as unfair, unjust and altogether unworthy of serious consideration.

Now, I wish to remind the House that it was never contemplated by the minister or any officer of the Department of Militia, that this food was to be relied upon exclusively by the troops in South Africa. It was distinctly stated that, because of the forced marches which the troops were engaged in, and because the rations were being cut down by the British authority, the Minister of Militia wishing to furnish something that would be of additional assistance in the case of need in the field, recommended the purchase of this food as an addition to the rations to be supplied by the imperial authorities. There is nothing in the evidence to show whether the food sent to South Africa has been found satisfactory in the field or not—there was no evidence submitted to the committee on that point. The only evidence we have—and I give it for what it is worth—is the evidence that has appeared in the newspapers in the form of letters received from South Africa. In those letters it appears distinctly that the soldiers who have used the food found it a wholesome food and one on which they could, on occasion, rely with confidence.

Mr. DAVIN. May I ask the hon. gentleman if there is any evidence that the soldiers in South Africa used this food?

Mr. BENNETT. No, they are all alive.

Mr. BELCOURT. Only the evidence which can be got from letters received from men in the field. I mention that for what it is worth—there was no evidence before the committee. There is no complaint of the food, and what evidence we have from men in the field shows that it was found satisfactory.

Mr. BELCOURT.

Mr. McNEILL. Do the letters received refer to the emergency ration?

Mr. BELCOURT. So I understand. If you read Dr. Neilson's evidence, you will see that he states so distinctly.

I do not wish to take up more time than is necessary, but I must refer to paragraphs 17 and 18 of the charges made by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk). He states distinctly that the food supplied by Dr. Devlin was entered in Montreal free of duty under the direction of the government. Now, the evidence is absolutely to the contrary. The officers of the Department of Militia were applied to for a permit or certificate to allow these goods to be passed without duty, but the department refused to give it.

The collector of customs at Montreal, on his sole responsibility, allowed these goods to come in without paying duty. Now, I cannot for a moment conceive how the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, knowing the gravity of that charge, knowing the consequences of making an accusation of that sort against a colleague in this House and a minister of the Crown, could possibly have made that charge, how he could have deliberately sat down and wrote the statement contained in paragraph 17. A simple examination of the books of the customs-house in Montreal, or two minutes' conversation with the collector of customs there, would have satisfied him that the charge was absolutely without foundation, that no dues were collected by the collector at Montreal, not on an order of an officer of the department, but simply on his own responsibility. With reference to the next paragraph, paragraph 18, the hon. gentleman alleges that the price of the goods, $4,600, was paid before the goods were delivered. There again, the simplest inquiry from the officers of the Department of Militia would have satisfied the hon. gentleman that that charge was without the slightest foundation. The goods were contracted for on January 4; an application for payment was made some time towards the end of the month, after the goods were delivered. The department refused to pay for the goods until an analysis was made by the Inland Revenue Department, and until it was shown that the food supplied was of the same quality as the food tested at Kingston and the food contracted for by Dr. Devlin. The analysis was ordered on February 2, and it was only twelve days afterwards, and when these samples had been analysed by the official analyst on February 14, that the goods were paid for. The hon. gentleman could have discovered that by merely going into the office of the minister and asking him or any of the officers of the department on what date these goods had been paid for, but he did not take that precaution, and, in order to make political capital, in order to injure an opponent, a minister of the Crown, he deliberately puts it down in writing, when the slightest inquiry on his part, even an examination of the papers brought down to this House would have shown how foundationless the charge was.

Now, I was taunted before the committee with being a self-elected chairman. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier, on one or two occasions, in language which was any thing but friendly and parliamentary, called me a self-elected chairman, referred to me as 'this man,' this self-elected chairman.

Mr. MONK. I beg to contradict the hon. gentleman, I never used any such expression.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Nor did I.

Mr. BELCOURT. With reference to that, Mr. Speaker, the position was this: I was the last member of the committee to arrive at the meeting on the morning we organized. I understood from my colleagues then that it was their desire I should act as chairman, and when the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) proposed me as chairman, I did not vote one way or the other, I simply allowed the motion to go without voting. Now, I say that to be taunted with being a self-elected chairman, with taking that position with the intention of blocking the inquiry, was a most unfair charge, and it came with extreme bad grace and bad task from the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, who, in this matter, was prosecutor of this charge, counsel for the prosecutor and now poses as an impartial judge.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have done with dealing with this report. I think the report of the committee is one which will commend itself to the good judgment of this House and of the country, and I have no doubt that it will be adopted by the House. In my opinion all the evidence shows a laudable desire on the part of the Minister of Militia and Defence to give our troops in South Africa an additional food; and in this connection I want to remind hon. gentlemen that Dr. Ruttan himself stated before the committee that this was a good and wholesome food, and likely to be useful.

Mr. CASGRAIN. He did not say it was likely to be useful.

Mr. BELCOURT. He said it was a good, wholesome food. The Minister of Militia and Defence, with a laudable desire to give our soldiers in South Africa something upon which they could rely in case their ordinary rations gave out, made this contract with Dr. Devlin. I am not very much concerned whether the price was twenty-five cents or fifty cents more than it should have been, though I do not think the price was very exorbitant when we consider the circumstances under which the contract was made, and the short time which the contractor had to procure and deliver the goods. But, supposing the price was high, I say that the Minister of Militia and Defence will have rendered a good service to our brave boys in South Africa if that food proves effectual in saving them from suffering, if it will in the slightest relieve them of the many hardships which they are now undergoing, whilst they are covering themselves with glory; if it is effectual in saving only one life, even two dollars a pound would make it a cheap food. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier has wholly failed in proving his charges against the Minister of Militia and Defence. He has brought them without reflection, he has brought them lightly, without a proper sense of the duties that one member of this House owes to another, that one citizen of this country owes to another, or to a representative of the Crown. He has done so without seeking any information, but with only a morbid desire—a desire which is shared by a number of hon. gentlemen opposite—of finding some mud which he can throw at gentlemen on this side of the House. The general elections are approaching, and those gentlemen are in need of a scandal, and they think if they can discover some kind of a scandal, no matter how baseless, no matter how small, it is going to help them. Well, Mr. Speaker, I want to tell the hon. member for Jacques Cartier and his friends opposite that they will have to try again. They have not got in this matter of the emergency food rations anything like a scandal, they have not got any cry upon which they can get any votes, because I believe the electors of Canada have made up their minds as to the value of the charges made by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier against the Minister of Militia and Defence. They have seen how baseless, how unjust, how unfair and how malicious these charges are in so far as they concern or in any way relate to the Honourable the Minister of Militia. I therefore beg leave to move the adoption of the following report of the select committee:

The committee beg leave to present the following as the result of its inquiry and as its second and final report:—

1. That the gist of the charges against the Minister of Militia is, that having had experiments made at Kingston with a certain article of food, the basic element of which consisted of proteids in certain proportions, which experiments demonstrated the utility of the food as an emergency ration, the Minister of Militia negligently allowed a different and inferior article to be supplied to the troops in South Africa.

2. The official analysis of the food supplied to the troops shows that it contains 16.8 per cent of proteids. The sample forwarded to the Director General of Medical Affairs, as and being a sample of the food on which the test at Kingston was to be made, is found on analysis by Dr. Ruttan to contain only 13.7 per cent of proteids, and Mr. Hatch, by whom the food for the tests at Kingston was supplied, is proved by evidence which he has not contradicted to have admitted to Mr. Muir, of the firm of Torrance & Muir, of Montreal, that it contained only 15 per cent. There is no other evidence as to the actual constituents of the food supplied at Kingston excepting the direct statement of Mr. Hatch, which the committee feel justified in wholly rejecting, first, because it is in conflict with the evidence afforded by Dr. Ruttan's analysis; secondly, because it is in conflict with his own admission, proved by uncontradicted evidence and made to Mr. Muir at a time when he had no motive to misrepresent the facts; and thirdly, because on cross-examination he admitted that the food used at Kingston had never been analysed.

3. The committee, therefore, find that the food tested at Kingston and that sent to South Africa were substantially the same article, the slight difference between them, established by the analysis, being in favour of the food sent to South Africa. This was in accordance with the directions of the Minister of Militia, who had expressly stipulated that the food to be furnished to the troops should be the same as that tested at Kingston. The execution of this order was necessarily and properly left with the officials of the department. The medical director became absolutely responsible for the adoption of the standard sample supplied by Dr. Devlin as being equal in every respect to the food that had been used by him at the test in Kingston, and the goods furnished were not paid for until it had been ascertained by actual analysis that they were equal to the sample by which they were sold. The statement made in the charge that they were paid for before they were delivered is wholly without foundation, as the delivery was made at Halifax on the 19th and 26th of January, while the payment was not made until the 14th day of February.

4. The charge of negligence, founded on the alleged omission of the Minister of Militia to take any action on the letter from Mr. Hatch of January 25, alleging that the food sent to South Africa was not the same as that used in the Kingston test, is equally without foundation.

The minister had understood that the standard sample in the office was a portion of the actual supply used at Kingston and when, in response to his inquiries, made after the receipt of the letter, he learned that steps were being taken to compare the sample with the food actually supplied, he had done all that was called for by a similar letter, as he has sworn to numerous other complaints from disappointed applicants for contracts.

5. As to the price paid for the food, it is to be considered that it was a proprietary article, involving in its production a trade secret and supplied under circumstances of great urgency, which exposed the contractor to all the risk of having the whole product thrown on his hands without a market for his goods, if any one of a number of contingencies should prevent him from delivering them within the eleven days at his disposal.

The ingredients of the food supplied, so far as they consisted of materials imported from abroad, were entered for duty at thirty cents a pound; the imported materials that entered into the food prepared by Mr. Hatch, as shown by the return of the collector of customs, submitted under order of the committee, were entered by him all the way from two and a half cents per pound, to twenty-eight cents per pound, which is the highest price shown for the ingredients by any of the evidence before the committee. Yet, Mr. Hatch's selling price, according to his offer to the Minister of Militia, was substantially the same as that of Dr. Devlin, and it is in evidence that the retail selling price of Dr. Devlin's food was three dollars a pound.

6. The committee find that the food supplied at Kingston was not used as an exclusive ration, and that the medical director did not approve of that food or recommend the purchasing of similar food by the government with a view that it should be depended upon as an exclusive ration. It was meant to be supplementary to other rations to be supplied, and the labels on the goods actually furnished contained distinct notice that it was not to be exclusively depended upon but requires to be supplemented by other food constituents.

7. As to the statement that the substance brought in from the United States was, under the direction of the government, allowed to pass without payment of customs dues, the committee find the same to be wholly without foundation. The collector of customs at Montreal allowed the first lot to go out of his control without payment of duty, upon the undertaking of the importer to produce a certificate from the Militia Department. No such certificate was produced and yet several days afterwards a second lot was allowed to go out, also without payment of any duty. The committee considers that the action of the collector, in allowing the first lot to pass without payment of duty was excusable under the circumstances and on the representations made to him by the importer. In allowing a second lot to pass without the production of any certificate for the first lot, and in wholly failing and neglecting for nearly six months either to collect the duty or to report the facts to the Minister of Customs the committee considers his conduct wholly indefensible.

8. The committee finds that the Minister of Militia in supplying our soldiers with the food in question, acted with a laudable desire to lessen the hardships they should have to endure on account of forced marches and scarcity of rations, by giving them a supply of valuable food put up in small and convenient packages, easily carried and which as indicated in the instructions issued to the medical officers of the transports, was not to be regarded as a substitute for other food, but to be available as 'a light and compact ration' 'of great value' 'on occasions when extraordinary exertion is called for.'

The committee for the reasons set out is of the opinion that the said Frederick D. Monk has failed entirely to prove his charges against the Honourable the Minister of Militia, and that the said charges were based on a misconception of the facts and upon authority which slight investigation would have shown to be wholly unreliable.

All which is respectfully submitted, together with the minutes of the proceedings of the committee, the minutes of the evidence and all the exhibits.

N. A. BELCOURT,
Chairman.

Mr. F. D. MONK (Jacques Cartier). Mr. Speaker, I beg to move that all the words after 'That' in the main motion be omitted and the following substituted therefor:

After due consideration of the report of the proceedings had by the select committee appointed to inquire into the purchase of emergency rations for the use of the Canadian troops in South Africa, of the evidence adduced and of the exhibits filed before said committee, this House is of the opinion that there can be no doubt from the evidence adduced that long before January, 1900, the products of Henri Hatch were well known to the department and to the Minister of Militia himself and that these were the only foods which up to the beginning of January, 1900, were ever mentioned to the department or the minister in connection with emergency rations.

As far back as the summer or fall of 1898, Henri Hatch forwarded to Dr. Neilson, director general of medical service at Ottawa, samples of protein vegetal, which at that time was already called and known by the name of 'Hatch's Protose,' although this name was only registered at a later date.

In October or November, 1898, according to Dr. Borden's statement, Dr. Devlin, at the Windsor Hotel, in Montreal, introduced Henri Hatch to him as a food specialist (Dr. Borden's evidence, p. 34), and Hatch swears that at the said interview, the minister thanked him for having sent samples of his food to the department and promised to test it at Kingston or St. John on living soldiers (Hatch's evidence, p. 50). Subsequently in December, 1898, or January, 1899, Henri Hatch had a long interview with Dr. Borden in the cars on the train from New York to Montreal, when again the subject of conversation was exclusively Hatch's product and the test which was to be made of it at Kingston.

As will be seen by the record, Henri Hatch on October 16, 1899, wrote a letter (Exhibit 10) to the Hon. Dr. Borden, and on the 25th of the same month, another to Dr. Neilson (Exhibit 31) in relation to his food; these letters are written on paper bearing the heading 'The Hatch Protose Company,' were received by the persons to whom they were addressed, were official communications and as such filed in the Department of Militia.

On October 24, 1899, the Minister of Militia signed and caused to be sent to 'The Hatch Protose Company, 10 Richmond Square, Montreal,' a letter thanking the latter for their offer of emergency rations, and declining it.

Dr. Neilson swears that as far back as February 15, 1899, he was in correspondence with Henri Hatch and that on that day the minister sent me a letter and some other matter which he received from Mr. Hatch. This referred to protein vegetal and there was an analysis of this substance and testimonials concerning this substance. . . . It was an analysis made at McGill by Prof. Ruttan.

(Neilson's evidence, p. 112.)

The copies of the affidavits sworn to by the five soldiers who tested the food in Kingston, which are of record and which are reprinted in a pamphlet entitled 'Protose,' manufactured by the 'Hatch Protose Company,' all refer to the food tested under the names 'Hatch Protose Powder,' 'Hatch's Protose Bread' and 'Hatch's Protose Biscuits'; these copies and the said pamphlet were filed in the department shortly after the test at Kingston and were seen by the minister (Borden's evidence, p. 38, and exhibits 15, 40, 47, 48, 49 and 50).

The pamphlet in question (Exhibit 15), is an advertisement of 'Protose,' describes and praises its principal qualities, contains divers certificates from persons who used a food described as 'Hatch's Protose' and also a report addressed to Henri Hatch of an analysis dated June 3, 1898, of Henri Hatch's Protein Vegetal by Dr. Ruttan, of McGill University, Montreal, which showed the excellent qualities of the composition both as to strength in proteids and digestibility.

From the several interviews between Dr. Borden and Henri Hatch, the letters received by the former from the latter and written by the Minister of Militia, the documents produced and the whole circumstances established in evidence, it fully appears that the Minister of Militia was perfectly right when he stated in the House on June 5th instant that 'the name of the food was 'Protose' ('Hansard,' p. 6988); it is also evident from the foregoing that it was well known that Henri Hatch was the sole manufacturer thereof.

Secondly. Before the first contingent sailed, the agent of Bovril, Limited, offered to supply emergency rations to the Department of Militia, but was told the government were not purchasing any. The price of the Bovril emergency ration is $4.10 a dozen cartridges, each cartridge containing 8 ounces, which makes 6 pounds to the dozen or 70 cents a pound. On two other occasions, the manager of Bovril, Limited, interviewed the Minister of Militia, before the sailing of the first contingent and Dr. Neilson, before the sailing of the second contingent and offered to supply emergency rations, but was informed that the government were not purchasing any.

Thirdly. The evidence shows that on January 3, 1900, one Dr. Devlin, of Montreal, caused to be printed at the 'Herald' Job Printing Office, in the said city (see evidence of Sharp, p. 154, and exhibits No. 17 and 18), a certain label of which the label on exhibit 5 is a reproduction and which reads as follows:—

'Vitallin Vegetable Proteid food. Three days rations for a soldier. One-half ounce to an ounce every four hours, four times a day, mixed in water at temperature not lower than 70° Fahrenheit. Beef tea, milk, light broths or soups. Take three or four biscuits to a meal or half a pound of bread per day. On this diet, with tea or coffee, Canadian soldiers have lived in perfect health 21 to 30 days.

'Vitallin Co., Montreal, Canada.'

The sample tin containing the powder and which is marked exhibit 5, was shown by Dr. Devlin to Dr. Neilson and upon the assurance by Dr. Devlin that 'Vitallin' and the protein vegetal tested at Kingston were identical, Dr. Neilson recommended it to the Minister of Militia to be used as an emergency ration. On the same day, without any further inquiry or investigation, and without any analysis to show the identity of the food on the sole assurances and representations of the contractor, the Minister of Militia approved Dr. Neilson's recommendation and the department thereupon gave an order to the said Dr. Devlin for 2,333 pounds of the substance to be divided into 7,000 tins, representing 5 days' rations for each man of the second Canadian contingent. The reason assigned by the minister for supplying the said contingent with the said rations, was in his own words as follows:—'Later on experience showed, by the telegrams received in this country, I think in December, that hardship had been experienced by troops, some of our own, on long marches, because they ran out of food, of the regular rations supplied by the Imperial government, the army authorities, and it was then suggested that it might be advisable to supply a small quantity of extra rations. It was to be understood that these rations were not to displace any supplies of the Imperial government, as a matter of fact, they did not displace any supplies of the Imperial government, that is to say our troops who were provided with these rations would go into the field with everything that the Imperial government would supply under any circumstances and which they supplied to our own troops, and in addition carried this emergency ration in case the ordinary supplies gave out, so that they would have something to rely on.'

(Borden's evidence, p. 32.)

The substance furnished to the Department of Militia was subsequently put into 7,000 tins by the said Dr. Devlin at the drug store of one John T. Lyons, situated at the corner of Bleury and Craig Streets, Montreal, which tins were labelled as follows:—

'Emergency rations, Vegetable Proteid Powder.

'One ounce or two tablespoonfuls four times a day in beef tea, milk, broths or light soups or water at a temperature not lower than 70° Fahrenheit. Take with powder three slices of bread or four or five biscuits, tea or coffee. 'Vitallin Co., cor. Craig and Bleury Streets, Montreal, Canada.'

(Exhibit No. 4.)

Fourthly. The said tins were put into large wooden boxes labelled 'Vitallin' (see Capt. Benoit's evidence, p. 217) shipped to Halifax, the said John T. Lyons going to Halifax with the boxes. It is not clear whether the rations in question were sent to South Africa in two batches or three, but from the evidence and documents your committee infer that they were shipped on January 20 and 27 by the ss. 'Pomeranian' and 'Laurentian.' Captain Benoit, secretary of the Department of Militia, who was at Halifax at the time, secured two tins from the boxes for his own satisfaction and without any instructions to that effect (see his evidence, p. 216) and filed them in the department on February 2 with a recommendation to have the contents analysed to see whether the food was similar to sample. The said rations could not have reached South Africa before February 20.

The sample brought back from Halifax by Capt. Benoit, and the sample furnished to the department with the tender, were subsequently analysed by Thomas Macfarlane, chief analyst of the Inland Revenue Department, and found to contain, the former 16.88 per cent of protein or nutritive substance and the latter 16 per cent. The report of the said analyst states that 'since the average percentage of proteids in wheat is 12, it does not appear that this proteid powder is a very concentrated food or is entitled to its name, or has a food value equivalent to $2 per pound.'

This report was filed in the Department of Militia on February 12, 1900, and the department thereupon, on the 14th of the same month, paid the said Dr. Devlin the sum of $4,666, being at the rate of $2 per pound, upon the powder supplied to the troops.

Your committee was deprived of the evidence of the said Thomas Macfarlane, because, as was stated, he was then on the high seas on a voyage to Europe.

Fifthly. On January 25, 1900, Henri Hatch sent to the Minister of Militia a registered letter, which the latter admits he duly received; the terms of this letter are as follows:

The Hatch Protose Co.,
10 Richmond Street,
Montreal, Jan. 25, 1900.

Your Excellency.—I just happen to hear of a large purchase of 'protose' food from Messrs. Devlin & Lyons, of this city, for the Canadian contingent. If such is the case, I consider it to be my right and duty to inform you that such a supply can only rest upon a poor and fraudulent adulteration of my 'Protose,' as it was done without my knowledge and has nothing in common with the product tested in Kingston last spring. This will be easily detected by analysis of the food supplied, to which end I intend to take the necessary steps in order to protect my interests. A sample of mine could, of course, have been easily obtained from any druggist, but the articles, if already supplied, are not mine, and cannot be identical with those used at the military test. This I thought advisable to bring to Your Excellency's knowledge, for any emergency.

Your humble servant,
HENRI HATCH.

Mr. MONK.

To His Excellency Dr. Borden,
Ottawa.

Your committee are of the opinion that this letter, bearing upon a contract made with the Department of Militia and concerning a purchase of emergency food to be supplied to the troops, was of its nature a public document. It does not seem to have been filed in the department by the minister, nor does he seem to have mentioned its contents to any one except to Dr. Devlin, the contractor, on or about the date of its reception, and to the deputy minister on or about the date of June 17 inst. (See Col. Pinault's evidence, p. 10; Dr. Borden's evidence, p. 40.)

Your committee desire to call the attention of the House to the following facts: The sample filed with the tender was called 'Vitallin,' it was labelled 'Vitallin,' and stated to be manufactured by the Vitallin Company, corner of Craig and Bleury Streets, a company which has no legal existence; it was accepted on the sole assurance and false representation of the contractor that it was identical with the food tested at Kingston, which was known under the name of 'Hatch's Protose,' manufactured by the Hatch Protose Company; it was to serve as an emergency ration, so that failing all other food, it was something for the soldiers to rely on; it was never examined, tested or analysed before shipment; it was denounced by the manufacturer of Hatch's protose on January 25 as poor and fraudulent adulterative, it was shown by analysis by the official analyst on February 12 to contain but 16.18 per cent of proteids, and not entitled to the name of concentrated food; it was nevertheless paid for and shipped for use by the troops, and no intimation had been given up to June 6 instant that it was worthless as an emergency ration.

Sixthly. A quantity of the same food, or 'Vitallin,' which was thus shipped to South Africa, was purchased from the said John T. Lyons in February last and analysed by Milton Hersey, analytical chemist of Montreal, and found to contain but 17 per cent proteids (see report of Mr. Hersey, exhibit No. 25). On June 18 inst., Dr. Ruttan, professor of chemistry at McGill University, analysed two samples of the food sent to South Africa, and handed to him by Dr. Neilson; he states in his evidence he found in one 15 and a fraction and in the other 18 and a fraction per cent of proteids. That material containing 16 per cent of proteids does not contain the proper proportion of proteids such as one should find in an ordinary full diet (Ruttan's evidence, p. 167), that soldiers doing fairly active work would require about a pound and three-quarters, between a pound and a half and a pound and three-quarters, in order to get sufficient proteids. The usual amount, as based upon experiments which have been carried on for a good many years, is 20 grammes of nitrogen, which would correspond to about four and a half ounces of protein for a day's ration, for a day's food.

'Q. Four and a half ounces of proteids?—A. 4½ ounces of proteids.

'Q. Pure proteids?—A. Pure proteids.

'Q. Well, that being the case, how many ounces of pure proteids necessary for sustenance did you find in one day's emergency ration of this stuff?—A. Well, 16 per cent of 4 ounces. If a man takes 4 ounces it would be 16 per cent of four ounces.

'Q. Well, then, on this four ounces it would be impossible for soldiers to subsist to do efficient work?—A. Not on that alone.

'Q. Well, what is your opinion of an army emergency ration of 4 ounces containing 16 per cent proteids?—A. I consider it would not be sufficient.

'Q. It is an insufficient ration?—A. An insufficient ration.'

(Ruttan's evidence, pp. 166 and 167.)

That the 'Vitallin' supplied by Dr. Devlin was absolutely worthless as an emergency ration is thus absolutely established by Dr. Ruttan and his evidence upon this point is corroborated by the report of the chief analyst of the Dominion government and by the testimony of Mr. McGill, assistant Dominion analyst, and of Mr. Milton Hersey, whose reputation as an analytical chemist is widespread.

Your committee beg to point out the following facts which are conclusively established by the evidence and which although not all material and essential to the subject-matter, yet throw light upon the whole transaction.

The food furnished by Dr. Devlin was imported by him from the United States in large Saratoga trunks, each containing two bags of substance resembling broken biscuit. Where the substance was purchased, what was really paid for it, what were its component parts it is impossible to say with any degree of certainty, for the following reason:—During the morning session of Tuesday, June 26, at about 11.30, Dr. Devlin, who has followed all the proceedings of the committee with the greatest interest, suddenly absented himself; at the session beginning at three o'clock of the same day, the chairman read to your committee a letter addressed to him by Dr. Devlin stating that he wished to be heard. Your committee waited for him till four o'clock, then adjourned until eight when the chairman read to your committee another letter from Dr. Devlin stating that since writing the first he had received a telegram from New York requiring his presence there to obtain information regarding the subject-matter of the investigation and asking the committee to adjourn until Friday, June 29 instant; this your committee, taking into consideration the fact that Dr. Devlin had had every opportunity of making a statement from the very beginning and also the fact that it was necessary to report to your honourable House at this session of Parliament, unanimously rejected Dr. Devlin's proposition. Your committee is of opinion that Dr. Devlin never intended making any statement, and that he used the means above recited for the sole purpose of inventing an excuse for his non-appearance on the witness stand.

As appears by a report filed by the collector of customs six of the trunks above mentioned and one package or bag were brought in as ordinary checked baggage by Dr. Devlin, stopped at the customs and subsequently released by the collector at Montreal on the representations made by Dr. Devlin and the said Lyons that the contents were imported for the militia of Canada and that they would procure from the proper authorities a certificate to that effect, which they failed to do; the duty was paid on June 20 instant, the day the collector appeared before your committee, by two unaccepted cheques, one for $80—signed by a certain Mr. Egan and the other for $60—by the contractor and drawn upon the Merchants Bank of Canada, where the local manager, Mr. Ramsay swears he never had any account. Twelve trunks were subsequently taken to the grinding establishment of N. G. Edson & Co., no account or explanation was given or offered of how the other six trunks had passed the customs nor do they seem to have been regularly or legally entered; the substance was ground at a cost of $23, it was then taken to the drug store of the said John T. Lyons where it was packed in 7,000 tins and labelled as aforesaid and shipped to Halifax, in charge of the said Lyons.

All the witnesses who were questioned on this subject, Messrs. McGill, Hersey, Ruttan and Hatch, swear that emergency rations must be packed in air-tight receptacles; the samples of the British army rations submitted are packed; the food in question was packed in non-air tight and non-water tight tins such as are used every day for holding ordinary paint and white lead (see evidence of Ruttan, p. 170).

As to the cost of production of the substance, assuming Dr. Devlin's estimate of the value, 30c. per pound, as sworn by him on the entry of 900 rounds left in warehouse, to be correct, although there is much doubt on this point, as Dr. Devlin repeatedly refused to give Collector White an invoice or bill from the producer (White's evidence, pp. 82 and 85), your committee find the following:—

2,333 lbs. at 30c. per lb.....	$ 699 90
Cost of grinding.....	23 00
Cost of tin cans, 7,000, $25 a thousand..	175 00
Labelling.....	12 00
Customs dues for which unaccepted cheques were given .....	140 00
Labels (not paid)....	.....
Total.....	$1,049 90

If to this sum are added $300 for travelling expenses, carriage, &c., in connection with the contract, the result would be that after expending $1,349.90 the contractor realized a profit of $3,316.10 on an emergency ration which the evidence establishes beyond controversy to be worthless as such.

Your committee are unable to say what disposition Dr. Devlin made of the money so received by him from the government for the reason that when the local manager of the Merchants Bank of Canada, Mr. Ramsay, was under examination and after he had established that part of the moneys had been advanced by the said bank on a promissory note signed by Dr. Devlin and endorsed by Lyons, he was prevented by objection taken and sustained, to proceed to state to the committee to whom the said money had been chequed out.

In connection with the exclusion of certain evidence your committee beg to draw the attention of your honourable House to the fact that Henri Hatch left with the committee certain bread, biscuits and powder which he swore had been made for the Kingston test and which he offered for analysis; on three different instances it was suggested and strongly pressed that the said samples should be analysed, but such analysis was nevertheless not made. On the other hand, Dr. Neilson swore that before the Kingston test, he received from Dr. Devlin two samples, one containing powder marked half strength and another powder marked full strength; he also swears that up to a late date he had in his office samples of the proteid bread and biscuits used at Kingston; he got Dr. Ruttan to analyse the powder marked half strength, the said powder he says had laid inclosed in an ordinary paper envelope in a drawer of his desk for a period of a year and a half, but he states also that the powder marked full strength and the samples of bread and biscuits brought from Kingston had disappeared, he cannot state how, and could not be submitted for analysis.

Your committee beg leave to report and make the following recommendations:

1. That under the circumstances disclosed by the evidence the contract of January 4 last for the supply of emergency rations to the Canadian contingents, was entered into with undue and unnecessary haste by the Minister of Militia and Defence.

Tenders were excluded, sufficient inquiry was not made and the sample offered by the contractor was not properly examined.

The committee recommend that in the matter of purchase of concentrated foods for troops on active service, samples be secured and analysed before contract and full security required.

2. The emergency food supplied by the contractor was totally unfit for the purposes intended and an imposition was practised upon the department. The contractor is certainly civilly liable to the government. He seems furthermore to have committed an infraction of section 14 of the Adulteration Act, chap. 107, R.S.C., as amended by 53 Victoria, chap. 26, section 1. He violated section 448 of the Criminal Code, 1892, by offering for sale an article bearing a false trade description as defined by subsection 'c' of article 443 of said code.

3. After the warning contained in the letter of the 25th January last, quoted in the reference, and the report of the 12th February, 1900, by Chief Analyst Macfarlane, the Department of Militia should have disallowed payment of the $4,666 which was made on the 14th February. The minister should have immediately communicated with the Canadian contingent

On the whole your committee find that the Minister of Militia and Defence and the Department of Militia were guilty of culpable negligence in purchasing and providing the Canadian soldiers with an article totally unfit for the purposes for which it was intended.

In this connection the committee recommend that the military authorities in South Africa be given immediately, by cable, the benefit of the report of the chief analyst.

Mr. Speaker, this committee, as hon. members are aware, has attracted widespread attention throughout the country, far more attention, I venture to say, than any of us dreamt of when these proceedings were entered upon. It is a healthy sign. It is an indication, in the first place, that public opinion in this country is in a healthy state, in a proper state for the appreciation of public questions; it is an indication that throughout the country there is a heartfelt feeling for the troops which we have sent to South Africa. There is also another reason for the great interest which has been manifested in the proceedings of the committee, and it is that the facts brought out by the investigation are so simple and so easily understood. No amount of sophistry will alter these facts. Most of them are admitted. The facts that are not admitted are amply proven, and no difference of opinion can possibly exist as to the appreciation of these facts. I will endeavour very briefly to go over these facts, in a tone, I venture to expect, slightly more judicial than the tone adopted by my hon. friend (Mr. Belcourt). At this advanced stage of the session, public opinion being absolutely formed in regard to these facts, I would not enter into a discussion of the facts were it not that I entertain the hope that at least a majority of this House will not concur in the report which has been submitted. Whatever may be our opinion as to the responsibility of the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence

Mr. MONK.

(Mr. Borden), I trust that we will find a majority in this House not prepared to whitewash the contractor as to whose conduct I will have a few words to say. Let me say one word in regard to the emergency ration. An emergency ration—it is always a dangerous thing to attempt to define—it is, as I understand it, a highly concentrated food, light in weight, containing a large amount of nourishment, packed in such a manner as to be preserved indefinitely, which the soldier can carry with him when he is away from the base of supplies or when the supplies utterly fail him. There is no question that this is the character of the emergency ration. It is not an ordinary food. It is what the troops carry with them when they enter upon the campaign, but the emergency ration is utterly different, as we have it in evidence before the committee. The troops that went from England to South Africa had the ordinary supplies of soldiers, but they had in addition over $1,000,000 worth of emergency ration. There is a sample of this ration before the House at the present time. It is a highly concentrated food, packed in air-tight, convenient cans and entirely different from the ordinary ration. I need scarcely tell the House that every nation in the world has an emergency ration of some kind. They have it in France, they have it in England, they have it in Germany, in Italy, and in the United States, each bearing the characteristics that it is highly nutritious, easily carried, and susceptible of being preserved indefinitely. We have no manufacture in Canada of such a ration. We have not been called upon to carry on wars on any extensive scale. Now, let me refer to some facts about which there is no doubt whatever. My hon. friend (Mr. Belcourt) found fault with some of the propositions which I ventured to sustain before the committee. I think he is wrong. My hon. friend took up the position as chairman of the investigating committee, that he was not there merely for the purpose of preserving order, but when I, or some other members of the committee, charged with this investigation by the House, equal in every respect to himself, save that we were not acting as chairman, judged fit in the pursuit of that investigation to ask a question of a witness, he assumed the position which he subsequently maintained that he had the right to rule the question out, that he had the right to say: You will not ask that question.

Mr. BELCOURT. I never said anything so silly as that.

Mr. MONK. I differed from him on that point, and I laid it down as a proposition that so far as the question was pertinent to the reference every member of the committee had the right to ask any question he chose. I went further, and I think

I was right ; I said that I thought we were not bound by the ordinary rules of evidence. I submitted to the committee this consideration, which I intend to submit to the House, that the committee might have been composed, not of lawyers, but of laymen, men who were not professional men, and one or two professional men only, and I asked : How could it be pretended that the members of this committee were bound by the rules of evidence which they knew nothing of ? However, what I now submit to the House is this consideration upon the facts, to which I am about to refer that where a witness, entirely credible, against whose character not one word has been uttered, presents himself before the committee and swears to a fact, that fact is proven unless he is contradicted. Taking that as a basis, and I think it is a reasonable basis, what do we find ? We find that Mr. Hatch is a food chemist, that he has invented and manufactures a food which is rich in sustaining substance, which has great sustaining strength, and that he manufactures that food in three different degrees. His food is all over the country. It is to be found in Montreal and here, in Ottawa, in many of the drug stores. Let any hon. gentleman step down to St. Luke's Hospital, take some of this food and have it analysed in its three different strengths. The first strength is 85 per cent of sustaining substance ; the second, or medium strength, is 45 per cent ; and the third, or lowest strength, is 30 per cent. These foods are used as prescribed by the doctors. If my hon. friend, or anybody else, is anxious to prove that this food was merely a fake what had he to do ? He had merely to step down, secure some of this food and have it analysed. None of them dared to do that, because it is well known that this food is used everywhere, that it is used in all the hospitals throughout the country, and that it is a highly sustaining food.

Now, Sir, a few words of information : One pound of the first strength of proteids is equivalent to five and three-quarter pounds of meat ; is equivalent to fourteen and a half quarts of milk, and contains the same amount of sustaining substance as one hundred and two eggs. I deem it necessary in the discussion of a question such as this to give to the House the benefit of this information, which we ourselves lacked when we began to investigate, and which is not generally known.

Mr. FLINT. Is that in the evidence ?

Mr. MONK. It is in the evidence, because Mr. Hatch produced a label which he placed upon all the packages which he offers for sale, and this information is given on the label.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). Is that proof ?

Mr. MONK. I will deal later with the question as to whether that statement on the label is well founded or not, but I am giving it to the House as information at the present time. I have stated that the ordinary diet of man contains anywhere between 2 per cent and 18 per cent of nutritive substance. This will be new to many members of this House, as it was to me when I entered on the investigation. That is what you generally find in what you eat every day, and the moment you go beyond that limit, the moment you take up an article of food which contains 30 per cent or over of proteids or nutritive substance, you are touching something out of the ordinary run of food. This food which is given out to the public, used in all the hospitals, for sale in the principal drug stores in Montreal and elsewhere, how is it known ? It bears a registered name. It is known as Protein Vegetal or Protose. It was never known under any other name. This food is manufactured by one man only in the world, and that is Hatch himself, who makes it in Montreal at a known address, where he has his laboratory. That is important ; it is in the evidence of Hatch, and it is uncontradicted. It is important that the House should know—because I will refer presently to the conduct of other witnesses—that Mr. Hatch came up as soon as summoned by a telegram from the chairman, that he gave his evidence in a straightforward and honest manner, that he is a man who does not speak English fluently, his being a foreign tongue, and I will have occasion presently to refer to that. It is important that the House should know that the contractor, Devlin, whose name has been so often mentioned in connection with this investigation, knew of these facts, and none knew better than he. He knew that the composition of this food was the secret of this chemist ; he did not know the formula of the chemist ; he knew he was the only manufacturer of the food, and he knew that apart from Hatch himself, the chemist and the inventor of the food, no man could give the contractor that article. If any hon. gentleman has doubts upon that point, which I deem important, they have only to refer to page 259 of the report, and what will they find ? They will find there an agreement entered into by Mr. Hatch and a capitalist of New York whom Dr. Devlin had introduced to Mr. Hatch, and by that agreement it was intended to form a company with a capital of $50,000, and it is specifically stated that Hatch, who is a poor man, was to furnish to the company his formula—and he was to be given a valuable consideration for it—but the agreement states that until the company is in operation the inventor of the food was to keep secret his formula, and only when the company was formed—which it never was—was he to reveal the secret of the manufacture of this food. The secret formula, therefore, was practically Hatch's share in the company. Now, Sir, it is also proven, and it is uncontradicted, that Hatch was introduced to the Minister of Militia by Dr. Devlin, and he was introduced as a food specialist having the secret of the manufacture of this food. He had three interviews with the Minister of Militia; interviews of a purely business character, having reference to this food, and having a two-fold object, namely, the test of the food at Kingston, which he asked the minister to make, and the supply of this food to the government of Canada. Hatch states that he sent three samples of the food—and his statement is uncontradicted—to the Minister of Militia or to Dr. Neilson, for the department.

Mr. RUSSELL. Will the hon. gentleman give us the evidence for that?

Mr. MONK. The hon. gentleman will find it in the evidence of Hatch.

Mr. RUSSELL. I cannot.

Mr. MONK. It is proven by Hatch that he sent these three samples, one of 85 per cent, one of 45 per cent, and one of 30 per cent.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Will the hon. gentleman give the page where that is stated?

Mr. MONK. I will look it up and give it to my hon. friend at the recess. He sent these three samples, and these three samples have disappeared. It is an extraordinary, and it is a singular thing, that in this matter, everything that Hatch furnished has disappeared.

Mr. BELCOURT. Oh.

Mr. MONK. Everything he furnished has disappeared. The samples he sent, the food he sent to Kingston, all have disappeared. I really think there was no great object to be obtained by that, because it was quite easy to go into any store and get a sample of this food, if, as gentlemen opposite contend, it was of no value at all and contained only 13 or 16 or 17 per cent of proteids. But, it was deemed that a very strong argument could be built up on the fact that the samples have disappeared. I wish the House to follow me when I state that it is proven, and not contradicted, that this man Hatch furnished all the food that was eaten by the soldiers at Kingston. There is no question on that point whatever. Hatch took four pounds of the food every day from his laboratory to the train at Montreal, and he either expressed it to Kingston or else he gave it to the pullman car porter.

There is no question that the four pounds of food brought up to Kingston, were consumed the next day by the soldiers. There is another point which makes it important for the members of the House to carefully scrutinize the conduct of this contractor. This man Hatch, the manufacturer of the food and the sole possessor of the secret of its preparation, employed Dr. Devlin as his
