Mr. WALLACE. Well, he had the compliment returned last night. I was asked a moment ago why I thought the people were not in favour of the passage of this Bill. I was anxious to know the opinion of my constituents, and I receievd an invitation from the citizens of a portion of my riding to attend a meeting, which I did last night. It was held at a small place called Humber Bay. There are not many houses in it, but there was a large attendance of people, perhaps five or six hundred, and I explained the course I had taken, and the course the Government had taken on this question. There was a very enthusiastic gathering. The "Mail-Empire" calls it a rousing meeting, and a resolution was passed there endorsing the course that I had taken, and the "Mail-Empire" says that resolution was carried amid much enthusiasm, and carried unanimously. I will have to ask hon. gentlemen to give me a little more attention. I am not in a hurry myself.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is quite obvious.

Mr. WALLACE. The resolution says :

> That whereas certain gentlemen of the riding of West York have arrogated unto themselves the right to dictate to our representative, Mr. N. Clarke Wallace, we, in meeting assembled, at Humber Bay, take this opportunity of most emphatically denying their right to represent the electors of West York in attempting to coerce Mr. Wallace ; be it resolved, that this meeting of electors of West York, assembled do most heartily endorse our representative in all his past actions in the House in connection with the Remedial Bill, and that we have the utmost confidence that, in the future, as in the past, he will do all he can to prevent the enactment of so odious a piece of legislation.

That is the resolution which the "Mail and Empire" says was carried with great enthusiasm and unanimously by a general meeting of the whole community, at which five or six hundred people were assembled. I think I may fairly conclude that that opinion is representative of the riding of West York, and if so, why not of other ridings throughout Ontario ? I conclude that that meeting is representative of the feeling that prevails all over the province of Ontario. Therefore, I would ask the Government to pause and not force legislation on the people of Ontario and the other provinces until they ascertain whether the people approve of that legislation. As has been pointed out this evening, and with great force, if the Estimates for 1896-97, are not passed this session, and I presume that they will not be passed at this late stage of the session, it will be necessary for Parliament to meet within a few months of the general election, and then what shall we find ? We shall find this question discussed in every constituency in this Dominion, and members sent here with the direct and expressed opinions of their constituents on the question. That is the legitimate and proper course to take, and the Government should not attempt to force this measure upon the people of this country, and the people of Manitoba especially, without knowing whether they are acting in accordance with the will of the people of Canada or not. In enacting this legislation, I say that the members of this House are not in my opinion carrying out the wishes of their constituents. I know that in many cases they are not doing so, and the members themselves know as well as I know, and better. The Controller of Inland Revenue (Mr. Prior) knows that he got a majority in 1891 of about 600, but that when he went back in 1896, with all the prestige of a Minister of the Crown, he was only able to get a majority of about 100, or one-sixth of his former majority. In this connection I might call attention to the statement made by that hon. gentleman the other night when I was not present, with reference to myself. He said :

> In that competition I might say that it seemed extraordinary to find that an hon. gentleman who sits in this House, and still calls himself a Conservative, who still says he belongs to the Conservative party, although he is not in accord with the Government on this question, saw fit to telegraph to the Orange lodges in Victoria, stating that on no consideration could they vote for me, but they must vote for the Opposition candidate, who was a free trader and a supporter of the leader of the Opposition.

That is the statement of the Controller of Inland Revenue, and so far as I am concerned I say it is incorrect, and he has no proof which he can produce to his House of the correctness of that statement. Therefore I would ask him to produce his proof or withdraw the statement.

Mr. PRIOR. Mr. Chairman, a member of one of the Orange lodges in Victoria had a letter or a telegram, I am not sure which, printed in the press,—and every Orangeman in town admitted it—from Mr. Clarke Wallace, stating in answer to a letter from Mr. Hugh Macdonald, a member of the Orange lodge, asking whether the Conservative Orangemen could vote for myself or not. Mr. Clarke Wallace's answer to that was that they could not.

Mr. WALLACE. I have just two remarks to make as to the kind of explanation the hon. gentleman has made. The first is that he dare not repeat the statement that I wrote to the Orange lodges.

Mr. PRIOR. I did not say Orange lodges.

Mr. WALLACE. This is a copy of the statement taken from "Hansard," and the hon. gentleman is a little too late in denying it.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. What has that to do with the Manitoba school question.

Mr. WALLACE. The Controller of Inland Revenue thought it had a good deal to do with it when his majority was reduced from 600 to 100. I say I did not see fit to telegraph or write to the Orange lodges in Victoria.

Mr. PRIOR. I said wrote to the Orangemen.

Mr. WALLACE. I take the statement the hon. gentleman made.

Mr. PRIOR. That is quibbling.

Mr. WALLACE. The statement is untrue, and the hon. gentleman cannot prove it. The next statement he makes is that I said that on no consideration could they vote for him, but they must vote for the Opposition candidate. I challenge him to produce the proof of that.

Mr. PRIOR. I cannot do it to-night.

Mr. WALLACE. Nor any other night, because it is untrue. I received a telegram from a gentleman in Victoria whom I did not know, and I sent a telegram back in reply. I did not impose my own opinion upon them. I have the telegram here, and it does not bear out either of the statements the hon. gentleman has made. I was asked by telegraph if somebody had wired me, and if I had sent a reply. I wired back, yes, I had sent a reply. and I sent a copy of the same reply ; that is all. The telegram I received was :

> What do you think is the duty of an Orangeman and a Conservative in this contest, Prior, a protectionist and a coercionist, or Templeman, a free trader and opposed to coercion ?

My reply was :

> No true Conservative or Orangeman should in my opinion vote for any man pledged to support remedial legislation by the coercion of Manitoba. My resignation is my protest.

I say, therefore, that the hon. gentleman, when he made these two statements, made statements of which he had no proof, and could not have proof, because they were not true.

Mr. PRIOR. The hon. gentleman is quibbling.

Mr. WALLACE. It does not bear out what the hon. Controller of Inland Revenue (Mr. Prior) has said. Prior or Templeton were not the only two in Victoria qualified to be members of Parliament.

Mr. PRIOR. They were the only ones who were nominated.

Mr. WALLACE. There was nobody nominated, when I sent those telegrams. I sent them long before the nomination.

Mr. PRIOR. No, you did not. What was the date ?

Mr. WALLACE. I sent it before Christmas. When was the nomination ?

Mr. DEVLIN. You sent it as a Christmas box.

Mr. WALLACE. I sent it on the 23rd December, or thereabouts. The hon. gentleman was not nominated then, and I suppose it was open for anybody to nominate whom they pleased.

Mr. PRIOR. Everybody knew who were the candidates.

Mr. WALLACE. I stated what my opinion was then, as I state what my opinion is to-day. I do not hold two opinions on any such question. I am consistent with the course I take. I maintain the same position to-day and shall maintain it a little longer, too. I was going to refer to another matter. It has been stated in this House and in the newspapers a great many times that the Government of Canada had approached the province of Manitoba in the most conciliatory way, that on the 26th July, 1894, this Government sent a message to the Manitoba government to be considered by them and laid before the legislature, and that the Manitoba government totally ignored the letter. I think our hon. friend the Minister of Finance made that statement very explicitly in this House.

Mr. FOSTER. No.

Mr. WALLACE. What the Minister of Finance did say was this :

> Politically, what was the action of the Government ? It invited Manitoba to redress the grievances complained of—and here I have to complain of one thing, that hon. gentlemen opposite, and the leader of the Opposition, especially, have distinctly and constantly ignored, namely, the first communication which was sent by this Government to the Manitoba government and legislature on the 24th July, 1894, inviting them to the consideration of the grievances complained of, and expressing the strongest hope that they would take these matters into consideration and remedy these grievances. This was done, Sir, in 1894, before the decision of the Privy Council. This Government asked the Manitoba government, moreover, that they should lay that request before the legislature of Manitoba. But the government of Manitoba refused the invitation to consider the grievances.

That is a pretty explicit statement. Now, I am sure that the hon. Finance Minister will be delighted and surprised to find that the government of Manitoba did not refuse but did consider the grievances, that they examined into them carefully, and wrote a courteous letter, after full examination of the subject. The hon. Minister of Finance did not tell the House that, and I know he could not have seen the answer of the Manitoba government, for he would be the last man to attempt to mislead the House.

Mr. DALY. I quoted that in January.

Mr. WALLACE. I not only have not heard it quoted, but I am sure the Minister of Finance did not, or he would not have said that the government of Manitoba refused to consider the grievance.

Mr. FOSTER. I have not only heard it quoted, but read it dozens of times and know all about it, and my words, I think, perfectly carry out the meaning. It was well known by every one, because it has been stated over and over again, that the invitation of the 24th July was not only sent to the Manitoba government but the legislature as well, and that the government of Manitoba replied that there was no grievance for them to redress and that they did not present the invitation to the legislature. I used the word "consider" and it may be that if I were writing out my remarks cautiously and carefully, I would have used some better word than "consider," but every one knows that the Manitoba government did not attempt at all to redress the grievance but refused to redress it, and in fact said there was none.

Mr. WALLACE. There is no man in this House or country who can make a smoother or slicker explanation, and I never heard the hon. gentleman fail before.

Mr. FOSTER. There is no failure about that, it is plain on the face of it.

Mr. WALLACE. There is no man in this House who is a more perfect master of language and who has a better choice of words to explain exactly what he means than the Minister of Finance, and it is not an isolated sentence, but a whole paragraph leading to the same conclusion, that the government of Manitoba refused the invitation to consider the grievance. That is a plain, straight statement, without any quibbling or twisting, and when he says he did not mean that but means something else, and that if he were considering the question anew he would use some different words, I must come to the conclusion that he could not have seen the reply, because I know that if he had seen the statement made by the government of Manitoba, he would not have used the language, he did. The whole paragraph carries out the same meaning. What does he say ?

> I have to complain of one thing, that hon. gentlemen opposite, and the leader of the Government especially, have distinctly and constantly ignored,——

Now, what explanation would he make of that ?

> —the first communication which was sent by this Government to the Manitoba government and legislature on the 24th July, 1894.

He says they have distinctly and constantly ignored it. That is plain, in my opinion, as it is possible for any statement to be. Did they ignore it ? Not at all. The first point to which I would call the attention of the House is this, that it was not this Government at all but another government which sent that invitation on the 24th July, 1894, couched in such conciliatory and courteous language. Who was it that made out that invitation ? It was written, I presume, by Sir John Thompson, the then leader of the Government. The bludgeon that was presented to Manitoba, the remedial order, which was sent to them in March, 1895, was sent by another Minister of Justice, under a different policy and plan altogether, and by another Government and another Premier. They were two different governments and two different policies. The one was the plan and policy of the Government led by Sir John Thompson, and I cannot draw attention too strongly to that point. The Government of Sir John Thompson had a distinctly different policy. That Government had the policy of conciliation, but hon. gentlemen now have the policy of forcing this legislation upon the province of Manitoba, willing or unwilling. What does this letter of Sir John Thompson say ? He asks that it be transmitted to the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba with the request that he lay the same before his advisers and before the legislature of that province. He laid it before his advisers. If it were not laid before the legislature—and that is one of the excuses of the Finance Minister—it must have been the fault of the Lieutenant-Governor, who was the servant and agent of this Government.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. WALLACE. He says that the committee, having taken the matter into consideration have the honour to recommend that a copy of the memorial above referred to, and a copy of this letter, if approved, be referred to the Lieutenant-Governor, with the request that he would lay the same before his advisers and before the legislature of that province. That is, that the Lieutenant-Governor would lay it before the legislature of that province. If that were not done, it was the fault of their servant, the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend is not serious in that contention.

Mr. WALLACE. I take the language as I find it here. If the Lieutenant-Governor says: I want this presented to the House, they would present it to the House or he would have the power to dismiss his Ministers if they refused his request. But I was speaking with regard to this difference between the policy of Sir John Thompson's Government and the policy of this Government, and I was showing the conciliatory and courteous way in which negotiations were carried on under Sir John Thompson, as distinguished from the mandatory character of the orders given in 1895. What is the language used? It is as follows. After reciting the statements made in the petition of the archbishops and bishops presented to the Government for disallowance, it goes on:—

> The committee therefore humbly advise that Your Excellency may join with them in expressing the most earnest hope that the legislatures of Manitoba and of the North-west Territories respectively, may take into consideration at the earliest possible moment the complaints which are set forth in this petition, and which are said to create dissatisfaction among Roman Catholics, not only in Manitoba and the North-west Territories, but likewise throughout Canada, and may take speedy measures to give redress in all the matters in relation to which any well founded complaint or grievance be ascertained to exist.

That is the courteous and proper language of the Government of that day to the government of Manitoba in regard to this question. The Minister of Finance has distinctly, in two places, given this House to understand in the plainest terms that the request of Sir John Thompson was met with refusal to give any consideration. He said they refused to entertain or consider the grievances.

Mr. FOSTER. Did they consider the grievances?

Mr. WALLACE. I think they did. Here is the report of the committee of the executive council of the province of Manitoba, dated 20th October, 1894. They start out with saying:

> The Honourable the Attorney General submits to Council the following report:—
> "That he has had under consideration the report of the committee of the Honourable the Privy Council of Canada, approved by His Excellency on the 26th of July, 1894.

That is the communication of Sir John Thompson. Then they recite the statement made in that communication, copied from the memorial of the archbishops and bishops and proceed:

> The true facts may be briefly stated as follows:—Previously to the year 1890 there had been two sets of schools, Protestant and Catholic, and provision was made by law for their maintenance and government. The maintenance was effected by a special school rate, levied upon each district for its own purposes, a general municipal rate, levied by the municipality and divided among the school districts in the municipality, and a grant from the government, which came out of the provincial treasury. In 1890 the above system was entirely changed, and a single set of schools was established. These schools are maintained by rates and grants as above set forth. They are non-sectarian public schools. The laws make no distinction between Catholics and Protestants, or between denominations of any kind.
> It is true that Catholic people complain that they are not treated as they should be, but the ground of complaint has not been properly stated. It is said that an unfair distinction is made against Roman Catholics. As a matter of fact, no distinction has been made against any one. The Roman Catholics demand that they shall be singled out from the rest of the community, and that special class legislation shall be afforded to them, as against all others. Our law is attacked because the legislature has refused to thus favour and distinguish them, as against other citizens. The ground of complaint, therefore, is not that an unfair distinction is made against Roman Catholics, but that the legislature declines to make an unfair distinction against others in favour of Roman Catholics.
> No citizen of the province has any justification in fact for claiming that he has not the same rights and the same privileges respecting education that any other citizen possesses.
> In addition to establishing the above principle in the public school legislation, of and subsequent to the year 1890, it has been made the duty of every ratepayer to contribute to the support of the public schools.
> The statement that the Catholic people are compelled to pay for the education of Protestant children is not ingenuous. Such a statement creates a false impression.

I think that is an important statement, because it gives a concise view of the ground upon which the legislation of Manitoba is based.

> The correct statement of the fact is that all taxpayers contribute to the education of all children whose parents send them to the public schools. All taxable property is assessed for public school purposes, and all citizens have the same right to make use of public schools. The Catholic people have the same power to avail themselves of the advantages of the schools as the Protestant people. The religious exercises are non-sectarian, and are not used, except with the sanction and with the direction of the trustees, elected by all ratepayers without distinction of creed. If a Catholic refuses to take advantage of the public school, and decides voluntarily to maintain another school, he is exercising his own judgment in the same way as any person who prefers to send his children to a private school, to the support of which he contributes. Neither of such persons, however, by so doing, gains any immunity from the payment of school rates.

As to the question of confiscation of school property, it is to be observed that the same question was the subject of argument before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the case of Barrett versus Winnipeg, and that tribunal expressed the opinion that the Roman Catholics were somewhat better treated than the Protestant people in regard to the disposition of school property under the Act of 1890. In so far as the Act of 1894 is concerned, there is no ground for the statement attributed to the memorial, that it decrees the confiscation of school property in the districts which had not submitted their schools to the new law. The Act of 1894 has reference to the distribution of grants of money raised by taxation upon all taxable property. It deals with the public school system and in no way affects the ownership of any property of a school district which does not submit to the Public School Act, and which is therefore not a public school.

They say, further :

It is further to be observed that, inasmuch as the Public Schools Act of 1890 has been held to be within the jurisdiction of the provincial legislature, and the Act of 1894 is but the amendment of the Act of 1890, made for the purpose of more fully carrying out the plain intention and policy of the first Act, it is sufficiently clear that the Act of 1894 is within the jurisdiction of the legislature, and deals with a subject which the provincial authority has power to regulate. Disallowance of the Act of 1894, as suggested by the memorialists would be a most unjustifiable attempt to prevent the legislature from performing that duty which has been judicially declared to appertain to it, and it may be assumed that such disallowance would call forth an emphatic protest.

The government and legislative assembly would unitedly resist by every constitutional means any such attempt to interfere with their provincial autonomy.

Mr. DALY. Why don't the hon. gentleman read the paragraph before that ?

Mr. WALLACE. I omitted that, because I thought it might weary the House. But I will read that paragraph if the hon. gentleman wishes :

The questions which are raised by the report now under consideration have been the subject of most voluminous discussion in the legislature of Manitoba during the past four years. All of the statements made in the memorial addressed to His Excellency the Governor General, and many others, have been repeatedly made to and considered by the legislature. That body has advisedly enacted educational legislation which gives to every citizen equal rights and equal privileges, and makes no distinction respecting nationality and religion. After a harassing legal contest the highest court in the British dominions has decided that the legislature, in enacting the law of 1890, was within its constitutional powers, and that the subject of education is one committed to the charge of the provincial legislature. Under these circumstances, the executive of the province see no reason for recommending the legislature to alter the principles of the legislation complained of. It has been made clear that there is no grievance, except it be a grievance that the legislature refuses to subsidize particular creeds out of the public funds, and the legislature can hardly be held to be responsible for the fact that their refusal to violate what seems to be a sound and just principle of government creates, in the words of the report, dissatisfaction amongst Roman Catholics, not only in Manitoba and the North-west Territories, but likewise throughout Canada.

I think that is a strong presentation by the government and legislature of Manitoba of the reasons why they have refused to subsidize a particular creed out of the public funds. Now, that is the substance of their report, and that report does not ignore the report of 1894, but deals exhaustively with every question brought up in it. The statements made by the Archbishop and bishops in their petition, were given by Sir John Thompson in this communication, and the government of Manitoba were asked to consider those statements. They have done so, and therefore it cannot be said that they ignored this communication in any way. Now, Sir, in view of the fact that the government of Manitoba examined this question, I say, they have acted as patriotic citizens of this country in their school legislation. Surely they are as patriotic as the citizens of any other province, and they are as anxious to promote the well-being of the community. Perhaps they have a still greater desire than other provinces to promote immigration into that country. The older provinces have been settled for many years, and are pretty well filled up to-day with cities, towns and villages. The province of Manitoba is most anxious to have people go there and settle, and they are even less likely than other provinces to put any obstruction to the course of immigration. They are holding out their arms and inviting men from all parts of this Dominion to go there and settle. Of all the provinces of the Dominion, Manitoba is the least likely to have legislation that will be inimical to settlement, that will be injurious to the country in any way. They are anxious as we all are to promote their prosperity, and their educational laws are as fair as those of any province. Attention has been called repeatedly to the case of Nova Scotia, and we are told how fairly they have dealt with the minority. But are the people of Nova Scotia more intelligent than the people of Manitoba ? Are they more anxious to do right than the people of Manitoba ? Is there any reason why Manitoba should not act as fairly to the minority in every respect as the people of Nova Scotia, or any other province of the Dominion ? I think there is no reason why they should not. Therefore in considering this question in 1890, they were anxious to promote immigration, they were desirous of attracting settlers to go there and occupy their lands. They have had six years experience of this system of public schools, and nearly twenty years experience of the separate school system. After a trial of both systems, after comparing one with the other, after considering all the consequences to immigration and to the future prosperity of their province, they have come to the conclusion that the public school system was the best, and they have come to that conclusion with remarkable unanimity. It is not a snatch verdict, it was not a decision taken when the public mind was obscured by other issues. At the last election this was the most important, almost the sole issue before the electors. It was not only the well settled policy of the Liberal party, but the Conservative party adopted the same policy, and declared that if they were in power, they would uphold the public system. That being the case, I think we can fairly assume that the people of Manitoba are almost unanimously of opinion that the public school system is the best one for that province. Now, that being the case, why should the Dominion of Canada attempt to force an obnoxious school system upon an unwilling province ? We know that the old cry of provincial rights is a strong cry, and no where so strong as when it is applied to the educational system of a province. In no respect is the cry of provincial rights more justifiable than when an attempt is made to interfere with the educational system of a province. Every province must certainly be held capable to determine its school legislation better than the Dominion could do it for them. The Government should give further attention to the consideration of this Bill, and not force it on the people at the present time. While we knew in July last that the Government were committed to the principle, we were told that there was little probability that Parliament would be called together to pass a Bill. The people have not had a full opportunity of considering the question. Parliament will meet again in a short time, and hon. members, fresh from the people, can give the measure close attention, and any decision at which they arrive would represent public opinion. Parliament should represent the people, but, in my opinion, the Government are proposing to legislate in opposition to the wishes of the majority. Members have no mandate from the people, for this was not an issue of any moment at the last general elections. At recent elections where this question was discussed, no member elected was instructed to advocate the establishment of separate schools in Manitoba, but they were returned in favour of an opposite policy. In Manitoba and Ontario the majority of the people are decidedly opposed to separate schools being established in the prairie province. The opinion of the people of Manitoba was distinctly expressed at the recent provincial elections, when the Government was almost unanimously sustained. In view of these facts, we can fairly ask the Government not to force this legislation through Parliament at the present time. I have already indicated popular opinion in Manitoba, as expressed at the recent local elections. Ontario is opposed to this Bill, and I believe British Columbia is of the same opinion as Manitoba. So far as the eastern provinces are concerned, the province of Quebec has given a majority against passing this remedial legislation.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. WALLACE. I do not make that statement on my own authority, but I saw it published.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). There were twenty-nine votes against the Bill, and thirty-two for it.

Mr. WALLACE. The figures just given by the hon. member for Huron show that the opinion of the members from the province of Quebec is pretty evenly divided. They have, therefore, not expressd any positive opinion on the question, and I am very glad of it. Ontario, by a majority of seventeen, declared at the late division, against the proposed legislation, and at the next elections the majority will even be larger. Let the Bill, therefore, stand over and be considered by the next Parliament, which will come with a mandate from the people, and with further information in regard to it. So far as I can gather information, and I have large facilities for doing so, the people are strongly opposed to this proposed measure, and it is one which we have no right to impose on the people of Manitoba. The Government may say that they are pledged to pass this Bill to a conclusion. To whom are they pledged ? If they mean they are pledged to this Parliament, no doubt this Parliament will willingly absolve them from their pledge. Are they pledged to any one else ? They have no right to give a pledge to any one else. They may say that they gave a pledge in July last. But, in view of the circumstances of the country and present conditions, I am prepared, as the representative from West York, to absolve them from any such pledge, so far as that constituency is concerned. When I speak of West York, I speak for the majority of the electors there. Let the Government, then, take this matter into consideration, and decide that this measure is not one that should be pressed through during the present session. There are other matters for the House to consider, among which may be named the supplementary Estimates for 1895-96. There should be time for their consideration, and there are other matters with regard to legislation which deserve the attention of this House. The Government has now announced that they are determined to carry this measure through this session. It looks to-day as if it would not be carried through, notwithstanding that statement. They have not denied the statement of the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Joncas) that they are going to sit day and night until they force members, through physical force, to submit to this measure, whether they are willing or not. For my part, I feel a great reluctance to submit to this measure, and if the Government attempt to force me, it will not have a very conciliating or soothing affect upon the member for West York. I hope they will pause in their mad career.

Mr. IVES. Do you want any soothing ?

Mr. WALLACE. I do not. I never asked for anything but fair-play, and my temper will not be soothed by an attempt to force me to sit here day and night to submit to this measure.

Mr. McDOUGALL (Cape Breton). We will give you permission to go home.

Mr. WALLACE. I am not authorized to delegate my duties as a member of Parliament to somebody else, not even to the member for Cape Breton.

Mr. IVES. You might be authorized on the first of the month.

Mr. WALLACE. It is not long before a good many in this House will be authorized to hand over their authority to somebody else. It looks at present as if some of the gentlemen who voted for the school question will be more likely to do so than I.

Mr. INGRAM. They will take their chance.

Mr. WALLACE. Their chance is not good. I have occupied the time of the House now for a few minutes, and I hope I have not wearied hon. gentlemen.

Mr. BELLEY. Not at all.

Mr. WALLACE. I am glad to have the approval of the hon. member.

Mr. BELLEY. Not at all.

Mr. WALLACE. I thought I had the approval of the hon. member for curtailing my remarks, but if he wishes I will go on. I have some very interesting statements to make which I postponed the other evening in deference to the wish of the leader of the House. I do not think it is fair that I should be asked to postpone them again, but as I do not wish to weary the House I suppose I may do so for the present, at all events.

Mr. DEVLIN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to make one correction. I understand my hon. friend (Mr. Wallace) to say that Mr. Coffey was opposed to separate schools. Now, when I offered an objection to that statement, I did not wish to be anything but courteous to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace), because the House knows that I have only the most kindly feelings for him. I simply wished to put Mr. Coffey right in regard to that statement. I know Mr. Coffey. I know that he is the registrar, residing in the city of Ottawa, a very prominent Catholic in this city, one who is highly respected and looked up to, and this is the first intimation I have received, or that I think any one acquainted with him has received, about opposition, on his part, to separate schools.

Mr. WALLACE. I did not say he was the registrar, because I do not know. I know he is a citizen of Ottawa, and that he opposed separate schools. That was the statement I made, and the only statement I am authorized to make.

Mr. DEVLIN. I do not think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) was authorized by Mr. Coffey to make the statement on the floor of this House, that Mr. Coffey was opposed to separate schools, and I think it was manifestly unfair——

Mr. WALLACE. In what way ?

Mr. DEVLIN. In what way ? To come here and reveal a conversation that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) has heard outside of this House. Was he authorized by Mr. Coffey to make use of his name here ? Was he authorized by that gentleman to come to the floor of this Parliament, and to state that Mr. Coffey was opposed to separate schools. Was the hon. gentleman aware of the fact that he may have been doing considerable damage to that gentleman? Sir, it is a most shocking thing for the member for West York (Mr. Wallace) to do.

Mr. WALLACE. I wish to say, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. DEVLIN. Let the hon. member keep his seat. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) was not courteous to me, when, in defence of a citizen of Ottawa, I asked a fair question. Now, I will treat him in the same manner. I wish the hon. gentleman to understand that if he thinks he can bully any gentleman in this House he is greatly mistaken. We are not trying to force any one here. We are asking for fair-play; that and nothing else. That is what we ask, and that is what we seek. It is that for which we contend, and in order to obtain it, we are prepared to put up with a great many insults, and to endure a great deal of fatigue. I wish to say, that I believe that Mr. Coffey was misrepresented by the hon. member from West York (Mr. Wallace), because if he is the Mr. Coffey that I know, and who is so well known in the city of Ottawa, he is the gentleman who, in 1886, fought hard and earnestly for separate schools.

Mr. FAIRBAIRN. I did not intend to say a word in this debate, were it not for the remarks made by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), a man for whom I had the highest esteem all my life, a man whom I went a long way to oblige, and a man to whom I have given a good many votes, to keep him in the position he now occupies of Grand Sovereign of the Orange Order. When that hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) said here to-night, that I was coerced to vote as I did on the second reading of the Bill, I have a right to rise in this House and to rebuke that remark of the hon. gentleman. I want to tell the hon. member for West York that I think I represent as many Orangemen in this House as any man, taking the population according to the square mile, outside of the cities. I say that the Orangemen of Canada are a body of men that I am proud of ; a body of men that are a credit to this country. I want to tell that hon. gentleman here to-night, in good faith and in good feeling, that there was not one man in South Victoria who asked me how I was going to vote on this question. I want also to tell the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace), that there was not one member of this Government, or not one member of this Parliament, who asked me how I was going to vote. I want to tell the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) that my Protestant ideas and principles are just as strong as his, but I am a lover of fair-play, and the minority in Manitoba have a grievance, and I, as an Orangeman, am willing to relieve them from that grievance. I tell the hon. gentleman that I speak for conscience sake in this matter. I have a feeling for the men who went to that country as pioneers, and who had the heavens for a blanket and only the sod of the prairie for a pillow ; and when the descendants of those people come and ask for fair-play from the people of this country, I think it would be a pity if we could not give it to them. The hon. gentleman knows as well as I do that the Protestants of that country asked that they might enjoy the same privileges as the Protestant minority of Quebec enjoyed, and their request was granted, by the Canadian Government. But when the descendants of the old pioneer missionaries of that country are reduced to a small minority, and a Grit government gets into power and takes away the rights and privileges which they had enjoyed under the government of this country, I say—and I will not take back on any platform in Canada anything I say here to-night—that these men have my sympathy, and therefore I voted that this Government should give that minority their rights. The minority in Manitoba might have been Protestant, just as they are Catholic, and I wonder how the hon. gentleman would like it if a Protestant minority were subject to Catholic schools. For my part I would not wish it. I believe in fair-play ; and when the hon. gentleman accuses me, after thirty-five years of public life, of being coerced to vote as I have done, I draw the lines on that hon. gentleman.

Mr. WALLACE. Did I refer to the hon. gentleman ?

Mr. FAIRBAIRN. You referred to every member on this side of the House.

Mr. WALLACE. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I did not refer to every member from Ontario. I said there were members.

Mr. FAIRBAIRN. You alluded to me, when you looked at this side of the House.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman says I looked at him. Perhaps I did.

Mr. FAIRBAIRN. I wish to tell the hon. gentleman that it comes with bad grace from him, with reference to me, at least. There was no more anxious man in this House than myself when he was on trial a few years ago, and when Sir Adolphe Caron assembled his whole forces for the relief and saving of the hon. gentleman, in the absence of our leader, Sir John Thompson, who was absent on that most important mission in connection with the Behring Sea question ; and it comes with bad grace from him to speak in the way he does to-day of men who take their political lives in their hands on behalf of justice. I offer my regrets and rebukes for that kind of remark, when it comes near home. I have given a vote, and I have given it conscientiously without being asked by anybody. After the argument made by the hon. Secretary of State upon the second reading of this Bill, it seems to me that those people in Manitoba should have settled this difficulty in three hours. As a juror of this country, I fail to see that the argument laid down by the hon. Secretary of State has been answered or confuted yet. I, as a juryman, if sworn as before a court, could not help giving the verdict I did, according to the evidence presented to this House. Every fair-minded man would have to admit the same thing, if he was a sworn juror. Now, I want to say to the hon. leader of the Opposition that I regret exceedingly that I, as an Orangeman since the year 1855, have to stand on the floor of this House and vindicate the rights of the Catholic minority in Manitoba when the leader of the Opposition will not stand up for the rights of the minority of his own religion, for the sake of political clap-trap. I say as an honest man and having the courage of my convictions that it is greatly to be regretted that a man would sacrifice the rights of his own church and his own people for the sake of a little political capital. I pity the hon. gentleman. I remember very well a day or two after the opening of this debate, when I was standing up in defence of the hon. gentleman, and saying that I was pleased to see him in good health and good form and good voice, and that he had made a good fight in such a bad cause, always having a sympathy for the "under dog" in a fight, a nice little curly-headed French Canadian remarked : "Mr. Laurier speak well, speak long, but, my God, he say nothing." I agree with that bright, black-eyed young French Canadian that Mr. Lauirer spoke well, and spoke long, but he said nothing. He never pretended to answer the arguments of the leader of the House. I say it is an outrage upon the stability of this country that these people in Manitoba cannot enjoy the same educational privileges as the Protestant minority enjoy in Quebec. I would go a long way to allow them to have the same privileges, and I think the least we can do is to give them the privilege of putting their hands in their pockets to provide for the education of their own children. The religious teaching of our children is a sacred right that all Canadians have a right to enjoy. The hon. leader of the Opposition made a remark in his first speech which I think was in bad taste. He pitched into his clergyman. If my clergyman interfered with anything pertaining to my farm, I would cross swords with him very quick ; but I think any clergyman has a right to look after the religious interests of his own flock. I had not looked at that letter until after I had heard the hon. gentleman's remarks. Then I went and hunted it up, and I really thought it was very fair, and gave good advice to the hon. gentleman, and he might be proud to follow a shepherd like that. Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to prolong the debate. I did not intend to say a word until I heard the remark of the hon. member for West York which I thought it was my duty to rise in my place and contradict. I pity the leader of the Opposition for the fact that he will sacrifice his religious principles for a little political capital, nothing more nor less. As I have spoken impromptu and without notes, I regret that I have been unable to do justice to this important subject.

Mr. INGRAM. Mr. Chairman, I do not feel that I am called upon to offer any excuse to this House for taking up its time in saying a few words on this question. I have listened with a great deal of attention to this debate all through up to this time. I did not intend to take any part in it, but simply to give a silent vote ; but having listened to the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), a gentleman for whom up to the present I have always entertained the highest regard and respect, having listened to his arguments on this question on two different occasions, I have concluded that his arguments are very inconsistent. He is now complaining because the Government is pressing this Bill to become law. Why ? Because he says that the Government are endeavouring to bulldoze hon. gentlemen in this House in order to bring that about. Then, in the next breath, he finds fault with the Government because they called this session together for the 2nd January, and because, after calling it together on the 2nd January, they did not present a Remedial Bill on that day. Again, my hon. friend is inconsistent, because he says no matter what kind of a Bill this Government presents to relieve the grievance of the minority of Manitoba, he will oppose it at every stage. Then my hon. friend says that the gentlemen who see fit to support this Bill are bulldozed by the Government. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman whether he is responsible to his constituents for the vote he gives on this occasion. If he is, every hon. gentleman in this House also is, and I say, as one who has taken no part in any discussion on this question up to the present, that I have for years back honestly and conscientiously believed that the minority in Manitoba had a grievance and that grievance should be redressed. I would much prefer the government of Manitoba would settle this question, but I am afraid, judging from their conduct, that they do not intend to settle it themselves at all. Then again I remember that a couple of years ago, the late Sir John S. Thompson, while addressnig an audience in the city of Toronto, said, notwithstanding the strong feeling in that city against remedial legislation for Manitoba, that that question was left to the highest court in the land, and that if the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council decided that this Parliament of Canada had no right to remedy the grievance, Parliament would not remedy it, but if, on the other hand, this Parliament had a right to remedy it, the Parliament of Canada would be equal to its duty and would remedy it. There was a solemn pledge given at that time. What do we find the leader of the Opposition stating in Toronto, and I ask hon. gentlemen, not on this side of the House, but on both sides, has the hon. leader of the Opposition acted consistently since he made that statement ? He said, speaking on this question of remedial legislation, that he did not wish to make political capital out of it. I ask the hon. gentleman if he has been consistent ? He certainly has not, for if I understand the English language properly, I have heard, week in and week out, month in and month out, that the hon. gentleman was in favour of a commission of inquiry into the grievances of the minority of Manitoba. If he wished to be consistent in that view of the case, instead of adopting the resolution, which, I have heard it stated in this House, and I have not heard the statement contradicted, was placed in his hands by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy)—if that statement be not true, if the hon. member for North Simcoe had nothing to do with that motion, I would be very glad to hear the hon. gentleman rise in his place and say so.

Mr. LAURIER. What motion ?

Mr. INGRAM. For the six months' hoist.

Mr. LAURIER. I would be sorry to suppose that the hon. gentleman believed that I cannot frame a motion myself. I have nothing to do with the hon. member for North Simcoe, either directly or indirectly.

Mr. INGRAM. I am very glad to hear it. I am always willing to give credit where credit is due. I have heard the statement made and am glad to hear it contradicted. With respect to the grievances of the minority in Manitoba, some twenty years ago or more, I had the privilege of living in that province, and know something of its early history, and I do firmly believe that there was a compact entered into whereby the rights of the minority were guaranteed for all time to come. I remember that when they were talking of abolishing the Senate there, the Senators did not wish to vote themselves out of existence simply because they thought the rights of the minority might be interfered with. That was in 1874, and I understand that the Senate was abolished in 1876, after the guarantee was given that the rights of the minority would be protected. From everything I can learn on this question, I conscientiously believe we are in duty bound to try and remove the grievances of the minority there. In my opinion the minority had rights there which were guaranteed to them and which were taken from them ; and that being the case I feel it my duty, as a representative in this House, to support the legislation which has been introduced here and which will remove that grievance. Some hon. gentlemen find fault with the Government because they do not withdraw this Bill. I say that would be a dangerous thing indeed. What would it mean ? It would mean that Mr. Greenway would not settle the question. On the other hand, if the Bill is pressed through, and Mr. Greenway should see that it is likely to become law, that would be an excuse for his representing to those who are opposed to remedy the grievances of the minority, the electors there, that this Bill being likely to become law, it was preferable that Manitoba should retain control of her educational system, and therefore it would be advisable for Manitoba to remedy the grievances herself, rather than lose this control. There is another matter which the hon. gentleman for York (Mr. Wallace) talks about promoting, and that is immigration into Manitoba. He is very desirous of promoting immigration. But according to the programme he lays down, he would placard the border lines of Manitoba with the words "No Irish or French need apply." Is that the way to promote immigration into any province in this country ? Every Canadian must recognize that in every province of the Dominion there are more or less conflicting interests, and that every province should be willing to give to others what it would wish others should give to it. If you want to encourage immigration to Manitoba, you are not doing your duty by this Dominion and by this province if you debar any class of the citizens of this country or any other country from going into that province simply on account of their religion. My hon. friend wanted to know where there was a constituency in Ontario which had expressed itself in favour of remedial legislation or anything like it. Why, when this Government issued its remedial order, the county of Haldimand was open, and the hon. gentleman from North Simcoe went out there. What did he do ? He foisted a candidate on the people of Haldimand against their wishes. He had a caucus held in the hotel—a hole and corner meeting attended by three or four of them—and they foisted a candidate on the people of Haldimand whether they wanted it or not. What was the question discussed at that election ? It was the question of remedial legislation for Manitoba. The then Secretary of State (Mr. Montague) appealed to the people of Haldimand on that question. The people by an overwhelming majority elected him, and that question was the issue fought out in that county.

Now, we have the hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Fraser) who is a lawyer and who takes credit to himself for being a very brilliant lawyer. He says this is a very difficult question to solve. This Bill was introduced into this House on the 15th February. Since then, hon. members have had the opportunity of reading it day by day. The second reading was moved on the 3rd March, and in the course of the debate we heard it often said that this was a difficult question to solve. Now, I ask any honest man in this House—of course, they are all honest men—any hon. member, this plain, practical question : If hon. members of this House who have had every opportunity of perusing the official documents, men who are broad-minded and liberal spirited—but who, for all that, I am free to admit, become a little heated in the discussion of this question—if these men, after considering the question and reading carefully all the documents and hearing it discussed again and again, find this a difficult question to solve, if they cannot give an honest, candid decision as to the rights of the minority—how, in the name of common sense do you expect the bulk of the people of this country, who know nothing of the merits, to pronounce upon this question ? I ask all men who have the best interests of this country at heart : Is it well to have a discussion of this question take place in the country ? As one who believes in Canada, and wishes her well, I believe that that should be avoided. I think this question should be settled now, and by this Parliament. While I would like to see it settled in Manitoba, yet, if they decline to do it, it is the duty of the representatives of the people in this House to enact this Bill into law. There are certain sections in the Bill that I, for one, do not agree with, and, at the proper time, I shall raise my voice against them. But in doing so I am not acting against the minority, I am simply doing my duty to the people, as a whole. If hon. gentlemen, instead of talking against—I won't say time, though that is hinted—but against every phase of this Bill, will devote some time to perfecting it, I think the results will be much better for all. It is said that the Conservatives in Ontario associated themselves with the P.P.A. and acted against the Catholics, and, therefore, they are inconsistent in coming to this House and supporting remedial legislation. I am one who believed in Mr. Meredith's platform, and I did all in my power to secure the election of supporters of that gentleman.

An hon. MEMBER. What did the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) do ?

Mr. INGRAM. I will tell you later on what the hon. member for North Simcoe did to attest his Protestant principles. I always believed that the Separate School Acts that were passed, one in Quebec, giving certain privileges to the Protestant minority, and in Ontario giving certain privileges to the Roman Catholic minority, were final. I believe that when John Sandfield Macdonald was asked to make certain amendments in the Separate School Act, he declined to do it, and I believe that was the reason given. A number of amendments carried out by the present leader of the Ontario Government have been strongly opposed. I am not in favour of separate schools, and I have no hesitation in saying so. I was brought up in a public school, attended by Protestants and Catholics alike. But, though I am opposed to separate schools on principle, if there has been a solemn compact with the minority in Manitoba, whether Protestant or Catholic, that certain rights shall be conceded, I believe in standing by that compact, even though it means the continuance of separate schools. I was opposed to additional amendments in the separate school law of Ontario, and I do not think there is anything inconsistent between that and a willingness to maintain the compact made with Manitoba. But I cannot understand how hon. gentlemen, supporting the position of Sir Oliver Mowat on the school question in Ontario, granting amendments to the separate school law, can decline to give fair-play to the minority in Manitoba. Now, this question has been before the courts for five or six years. And it has been before the people about the same length of time. I would like to know if it is not about time it should be settled. Who are the men who are trying to stir up strife ? I find that my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) whose stock in trade is Protestant principles, and if this question should happen to be settled before this House rises, I am afraid that that hon. gentleman, and some others, will lose their occupation in politics. I think it is for that reason that some of these hon. gentlemen prefer to have it an open question.

Mr. HUGHES. Did he help Mr. Meredith?

Mr. INGRAM. No, but he took good care in the city of Toronto, to speak some words in favour of Sir Oliver Mowat. It is said that some hon. gentlemen on this side have voted for the second reading for a consideration. I am glad to say I am not one of those who voted for a consideration. I have voted as I believe to be right, and, notwithstanding that I represent probably as Protestant a constituency as there is in Ontario, I am prepared to take my stand on this question although my hon. friend from West York (Mr. Wallace) has intimated that he intends to take part in the contest in that county. I assure the hon. gentleman that he will be quite welcome, and if he fares as the hon. member for North Simcoe did. I shall not be surprised. That hon. gentleman had about eighty per cent of the Conservative party before he came there, and after that he dropped 60 per cent, and he has not turned up since. He had a McCarthy club started there, and they dropped out of existence. I fancy they will be still worse before they are through with the campaign. As this discussion has taken a wide range, perhaps I may be allowed to refer to another little matter. My hon. friend from West Elgin (Mr. Casey) has exercised a fatherly care over me, and on several occasions he has thought proper to write letters over his own signature to the press in my city about the feeble old leader that the Conservative party are troubled with now. I find also that his fervour on this subject seems to have led him to make some statements that are not borne out by the facts. I have heard that hon. gentleman in this House say that if he ever did an opponent any injury, he would be only too happy to rectify it. I hold in my hand a letter, a copy of which was written to the hon. gentleman, who, I am sorry to see, is not in his place in the House to-night, but I think it bears out my statement, and shows his feeling towards the leader of this House. It reads something like this :

George E. Casey, Esq., M.P.,
House of Commons, Ottawa.

Dear Sir,

Some days ago I noticed by the newspaper reports that you had made a reference to me in the course of your speech during the Budget debate. Preferring not to trust to the necessarily imperfect, because condensed, reports in the newspapers, I have waited until I could have an opportunity to read in your remarks in "Hansard." You are reported as follows :—

"He was given 90 days to complete his investigation. That term was up on 29th January ; but for ten days or more before his engagement was up, he was one of the most prominent speakers for the Secretary of State in Cape Breton. While he was in receipt of public pay he was taken away from the duty he was sent to perform, and sent down at the public expense to canvass for a member of the Government in Cape Breton."

I do not doubt that you based this statement on what you believed to be reliable information, but you have been altogether misinformed. My investigation was concluded on 28th January, as my report shows, and I did not speak in Cape Breton till 30th January. I was not in receipt of public pay during any part of the time I was in the riding, nor did I travel at the public expense, as the latter part of your statement suggests. I have said that your statement was based on what you supposed to be reliable information—I would be sorry indeed to think otherwise—yet I remember meeting and speaking to you in Ottawa on 21st January, and I hardly see how you could have succeeded in persuading yourself that I was at that very moment in Cape Breton, and had been there for some days. I write you not so much to defend myself (although had your statement been accurate, it would not be very creditable to me), but because (putting myself in your place) I would feel that if I had unwittingly done an injury to another, I should like to be put right at the earliest possible moment.

Yours respectfully,
A. W. WRIGHT.

That letter was written to my hon. friend on 9th March, 1896, and up to the present time my hon. friend from West Elgin has not seen fit to rectify the wrong he has done this gentleman ; but he happens to be a Tory and that seems to be a great fault in the eyes of some hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. WALLACE. I wish to refer for a moment to a statement made by the member for East Elgin (Mr. Ingram) that I was inconsistent when I found fault with the Government for not bringing down their Remedial Bill earlier, and then I complained that they were forcing it through the House in an unwarrantable manner. I cannot see any inconsistency in the matter. I did blame the Government that they did not introduce their Bill at the beginning of the session in order that we might have an opportunity of discussing it in reasonable and proper hours. I thought that if it had been introduced in the earlier days of the session, we might have considered it much more fully than we can do now when we are told that we must sit twenty-four hours straight ahead. Now, with reference to the statement made by the hon. member for Ottawa county (Mr. Devlin) he says that I have unwarrantably used a certain person's name as being a supporter of separate schools. I have simply to tell the hon. gentleman that he does not know what he is talking about. He does not know whether I have used the name unwarrantably or not. I say that I have not unwarrantably used any person's name.

Mr. DEVLIN. Then the hon. gentleman had authority to use his name.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman need not be quite so fast. The statement was made publicly, and there was no secrecy and no privacy. It was made in my presence, and in the presence of a number of other people, in a public place.

Mr. DEVLIN. Not at a public meeting. It was a private conversation, and the hon. gentleman revealed it here, something he is in the habit of doing.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman says it was a private conversation. The hon. gentleman not being there, does not know anything about it.

Mr. DEVLIN. I know perfectly well what the hon. gentleman stated here.

Mr. WALLACE. Now with regard to the statement made by the hon. member for East Elgin that in the county of Haldimand separate schools were in issue, I think the hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Separate schools are not an issue here.

Mr. WALLACE. I think they are quite in issue here. The hon. member for North Simcoe and his friends no doubt made it an issue so far as they could in that election. But I also make the statement that the Government and their supporters did not make it an issue, and did not want to make it an issue. They said that a mandatory order had been issued, that that was simply an order, that it meant nothing, and was only issued to obey the demands of the Privy Council. I know there were men advocating the election of the present member for Haldimand on that occasion, who were opposed to separate schools, and are opposed to the Government in passing this present legislation. But I acknowledge that the member for North Simcoe made it an issue so far as he possibly could in that contest, but I say that the other side did not.

Mr. GILLIES. Was not Mr. Sifton down there ?

Mr. WALLACE. That is what I say, that the hon. member for North Simcoe and his friends did make it an issue so far as they could do so. But it takes two men to make a fight, and although Mr. McCarthy and Mr. Sifton endeavoured to make that an issue, the opposite side desired that it should not be made an issue. I am quite sure that there were many men there working for the election of the present member, who were directly opposed to separate schools.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). We have come into committee for the purpose of discussing these clauses, and I ask the attention of the committee, for a few moments, to the clause now under consideration. If the Bill is to go through in the form in which it is, it will be quite out of place to undertake to discuss its provisions. I have stated before to the House, and I am quite sure the opinion I have expressed has been generally acquiesced in by the lawyers, that the rights and privileges which the minority have under the constitution are rights and privileges relating to education. In the first place, the legislature of the province of Manitoba has the exclusive right to legislate in respect to education, subject to certain conditions. That gives them the general power to deal with the subject of secular education. That power applies to every public school, and separate schools being a public school system are, so far as that education which the state thinks necessary, in its own interests, as much under the supervision and jurisdiction of the state as are any other schools that may be established, and as much as those schools which are non-sectarian in their character. So the education which is subject to the rights and provisions of the constitution is as to religious education. which the parents are entitled, if they see fit, to have given to their children in those schools. That being so, the subject of the management of the schools, the manner in which the board shall be constituted, is a matter wholly within the exclusive jurisdiction, and does not come within the provision of rights and privileges. It was open to the legislature of Manitoba, if they thought proper, to establish a Roman Catholic and a Protestant board. They may have existed for a number of years, but the continuance of those boards can never become a matter of right or privilege to anybody. The legislature, under their responsibility to the whole province, may object to that mode of administration. They may appoint a superintendent of schools, who has no responsibility as a Minister, as we had in Ontario for a number of years ; or they may have a Minister for the purpose of administering the law. So far as administration is concerned, there can be no denominational rights in it whatever ; it is a matter of government, it pertains to the administration of the affairs of government, and not to the subject of education, which may come up in the schools. That being so, it seems to me—assuming this question is properly before the House, and I pass over that point altogether—the Government here ought not to undertake to interfere. in the first instance, and primarily with the question of administering it. That should be left to the local legislature. If the Government were in doubt that the local legislature will not take charge or control those institutions as public institutions, they might, as a matter of necessity, in case the government failed to discharge its duty in this regard, and is incident to the discharge of those functions which the law attaches to them, say that in case the government fail, a certain method of administration will be adopted. But that, the government will see, is not what is proposed here. The section says :

> 1. The Lieutenant-Governor in Council of the province of Manitoba shall appoint, to form and constitute the Separate School Board of Education for the province of Manitoba, a certain number of persons not exceeding nine, all of whom shall be Roman Catholics.

I say that the Government have no right to propose anything of that kind whatever. They might say that in case the local government fails to make proper provisions for the administration of those schools, then certain duties shall be discharged here; and those would arise, if they can arise legally, as incident to the proper administration of the system established ; but the Government cannot impose on the local government, a duty, and cannot take from a local government the power of administering those schools if they think proper. I wish to press that matter on the attention of the Government, because, in all these administrative clauses the Government are simply providing a series of lawsuits which must inevitably be decided against the validity of these provisions of the Act.

Mr. WELDON. It is very important that this question should be correctly dealt with. It seems to me a fair request has been made by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills). That hon. gentleman has stated his argument briefly, but perfectly clearly. Whatever the hour may be, the hon. gentleman was justified in asking consideration for this clause. We may be wrong, but the laymen will have to judge between us, and they have a right to have an answer given to the argument addressed to the committee by the hon. member for Bothwell. At present, I am not able to see any answer that can be effectively given. The hon. gentleman may be wrong, and all of us may be wrong, but before the clause is declared carried, we must ask for some statement from the Government, and I undertake to keep my mind as open as possible and to approach the question in a judicial spirit.

Mr. DALY. The hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) rose when I was about to reply to the argument of the hon. member for Bothwell. I understand the position which the hon. gentleman takes, is that this clause is one which relates to the administration of the school law, and is not one that goes to the rights and privileges relating to education. What were the rights and privileges that the minority in Manitoba enjoyed prior to 1890, and what were the grievances of which they complained ? They enjoyed certain rights, and amongst others representation upon the Board of Education that was formed in Manitoba at the time. According to the School Act of 1881, the Lieutenant-

Governor of Manitoba had power to appoint a board of education composed of not more than twenty-one members, twelve of whom were to be Protestants and nine Roman Catholics. That board was subsequently divided into two sections, the Roman Catholic and the Protestant sections, each of which had its duties assigned. Among the duties of the Roman Catholic section, were the management of the schools, the making of regulations, and the general government and discipline, the examination, grading and granting of licenses to their teachers, the power to select books, maps and globes to be used in the schools under their control, and all matters pertaining to the administration of the laws, so far as they related to the separate school branch of the Board of Education. By the Act of 1890, all the powers that were exercised by the Roman Catholic section of the board were swept away. Now, that right having been removed, it is one of the grievances that the Roman Catholic minority complain of, and in the petition they presented to the Government they complain, that they were deprived of certain rights which are set out as "a," "b" and "c" in the remedial order, and "a" says:

> The right to build, maintain, equip, manage and support Roman Catholic schools in the manner provided for by the said statutes which were repealed by the two Acts of 1890 as aforesaid.

The rights that they enjoyed to maintain, equip, manage, conduct and support Roman Catholic schools, were the rights given to them, under the sections of the Act I have quoted, relating to the Board of Education. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) shakes his head. I heard the member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) say this afternoon, that the trustees were invested with that authority. That is not so. That authority was given to the Roman Catholic section of the Board of Education and not to the trustees. By the passing of the Act of 1890, the Manitoba minority were deprived of the rigths and powers that were given to the Roman Catholic section of the Board of Education, under the Act of 1891. They were deprived of the rights they enjoyed under that law, and that is one of the grievances they ask to have remedied. The court has said the complaint is well founded, and that the right of appeal was given to the Privy Council in Canada. That appeal was heard, and we have made our order, and by that order we have asked the local government, by supplementary legislation, to restore those rights. Among the rights the Roman Catholics have asked to be restored to them is, the privilege to control the management of their schools, and all the rights that were given to their section of the Board of Education. The local government did not comply with our request, and I contend that by that refusal we are vested with authority. By the section under discussion we are seeking to restore the position that the Roman Catholic minority enjoyed in Manitoba as to the Board of Education. The wording of section 2 is almost a transcript of section 1 of the Act of 1881. That Act provided that the Lieutenant-Governor in Council of the province of Manitoba was bound to form and constitute a board of education, composed of a certain number of members not exceeding twenty-one, twelve of whom should be Protestant and nine Roman Catholics. What we seek to do in the clause under discussion is to provide that a separate school board shall be formed of a number of persons not exceeding nine. Now, if under the power that is vested in us, we have not the power to restore the rights of the minority "a," "b" and "c" mentioned in the remedial order, then of course this Bill goes by the wall. Amongst the rights they ask we should restore to them, is the provision that the late law contains, namely, that they should have a separate board. We must provide some machinery for administration, and as the local government have failed to comply with our order, we have got to restore to the Roman Catholic minority the law as it existed, or as nearly as it existed, prior to 1890. We are not at all going beyond the terms in the remedial order in the clause as framed here, but we are going fully within the terms of that order. In the short time I had to consider the point raised by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills), I can only conclude that if his argument goes so far as he seeks to make it go to this clause of the Bill, then it will apply to a great number of other clauses. I think, under the circumstances that we can only come to the one conclusion, and that is, that we must rely upon the authority that is invested in us by virtue of the proceedings that have been taken, the remedial order, and the refusal of Manitoba to comply with this order; to go as far as we possibly can to restore to these people all their rights. We cannot create a board of education exactly as it existed prior to 1890, but we can, and I think we have the power to, create a board of education that will give the Roman Catholic section of that board, the same rights and privileges that they had prior to 1890.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Daly) misapprehended the argument that I addressed to the committee.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Not at all.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The leader of the House says not at all.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Not at all, he answered it completely.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Then I apprehend that he has made a very bad defence on behalf of the Government in regard to this clause of the Bill. The hon. gentleman's argument is, that everything that was put into the School Act in favour of a particular class of the community, was a right and privilege. Now, these are not the words of the statute at all. The words of the statute are "a right or privilege in respect to education." What is the meaning of those words? The local legislature have the power to legislate on the subject of education generally, and that power is declared to be exclusive. So far, then, as the non-sectarian or secular education of the whole community is concerned, it is absolutely under the local government, and it cannot become a right or privilege to be considered here at all. The right or privilege is a matter that pertains to the Roman Catholics or the Protestant minority. How the law shall be administered is wholly distinct from the right to be given. In the province of Ontario we had a superintendent of schools, who was outside of Parliament altogether, and was supported by a council of public instruction, who assisted him in the choice of school books and in the regulation of the course of study. Upon that board I believe every religious body in the province was represented. That system lasted for thirty years. If the hon. gentleman's contention were correct, it would have been out of the power of the province of Ontario to abolish that council of public instruction and the office of superintendent, and to appoint a responsible minister in their place. But the government of Ontario went on the assumption that the administration of the law was a part of the machinery of a government and not a right or privilege which could attach to any citizen in respect to education. Now, a government establishes a certain number of schools as public schools and mark out a course of study in those schools. No church has a right to interfere. No body of the community has a right, except through the legislature, to determine what that course of study shall be. In order to see that the moneys are not misapplied, and that that system of education is being efficiently carried out, the government appoints inspectors. It provides the necessary machinery for its own protection, in order to see that the work of the state is proporly done. Now, the fact that a government, instead of appointing a responsible minister, may have established two boards, one Protestant and the other Roman Catholic, cannot be a right or privilege under the statute. It is not a right or privilege in respect to education, but in respect to administration, if it is a right or privilege at all. It is not a part of the institution of learning: it is a part of the machinery of government, by which supervision over that institution of learning is exercised, and therefore cannot be a right or privilege. The hon. gentleman says that these people complained, but their complaint does not create a right or privilege.

Mr. DALY. The hon. gentleman will agree with me that the board of education was the creative power of the schools formed under it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Suppose the board of education had been abolished and Manitoba had appointed a minister of education, and had allowed the religious instruction to remain as it was before, would they have any standing before this House or the country? Would they have any ground for coming here at all? There would have been no right or privilege that the law touches. The hon. gentleman says that we may need a board for the purpose of administering the law which you pass here. I am not disputing that; but I say that if the local legislature choose to administer the matter, you must leave it in their hands to be done in the way they determine it shall be done. If they undertook to provide an unfair machinery for administering those schools, that would be a ground for disallowing a statute—for protecting the minority by the royal prerogative. But it is only in case they fail to discharge their duty that you are entitled to make provision, it must be a provision for the creation of a board by yourselves, and not a mandatory duty imposed on the Lieutenant-Governor or his council. You can impose no duty on them; you have no authority to do so. Anything to be done by the Lieutenant-Governor is to be done on the advice of his responsible Ministers in the province, and you can neither dictate to the Lieutenant-Governor nor to the advisers of the Lieutenant-Governor as to how those duties shall be discharged. That would not be parliamentary or administering the affairs of the province in accordance with the wishes of the majority of the province. That would be treating the local government as a subordinate and non-sovereign body subject to the authority and dictation of Parliament, upon whom mandatory duties might be imposed. That is not the law, and I earnestly press upon the attention of the Government, that they cannot make it law by enacting it here. Every provision of that sort would be ultra vires of the authority we possess. What you are entitled to do, assuming that the matter is properly before this House, is to look after the religious education that was given, and to see that the right to bestow that is restored. That is a right or privilege, given not to a church, but to the parents who are of the Roman Catholic faith and who are a minority of the Queen's subjects in the province. It is solely for that religious education that this right or privilege it to be applied. Now, what is a subject of common jurisdiction and of general application, indistinguishable in the various classes of the population, is not a right or privilege belonging to a minority; it is a right or privilege belonging to the entire population. The right or privilege belonging to the minority is the right to see that their children receive a religious education in the schools, in conformity with the doctrines or teachings of the church to which those parents belong; and the machinery you choose to provide must be dependent upon the failure of the local government to provide the machiery, and it must be for the purpose of protecting that right or privilege, and cannot relate to anything else.

Mr. IVES. Mr. Chairman, prior to the Act of 1890, there existed in the province of Manitoba, under legislation, a board of education composed of twenty-one members, of whom nine were Roman Catholics and twelve Protestants. That board was divided into two sections—the Roman Catholic board having charge of the Roman Catholic schools, and the Protestant board having charge of the Protestant schools. It was a right or privilege of the Roman Catholics to have their schools managed by their co-religionists forming the Roman Catholic board, and it was a right or privilege of the Protestants to have their schools managed by the Protestant members of the board. The greater included the less. The hon. gentleman says that the right or privilege was the right or privilege of the whole population. It was the right or privilege of Protestants and Catholics to have their own schools managed and governed by their own co-religionists, and the hon. gentleman entirely misapprehended the provisions of the law which existed prior to 1890, if he does not understand that both Catholics and Protestants in Manitoba enjoyed the special right and privilege of having their schools managed and governed by their own co-religionists.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Does the hon. gentleman argue that if the local government had allowed the law with regard to giving religious instruction to remain, and had abolished those boards, and appointed a Minister of Education, that it would have been beyond its power, because it would have taken away a privilege?

Mr. IVES. If the Minister of Education had been equally acceptable, if he had filled the bill, so to speak, so far as either population was concerned, then there would have been no grievance.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Does the hon. gentleman mean that the Minister of Education would have had to belong to the two churches at the same time.

Mr. IVES. No, I do not. I mean to say that if his management of the schools was not satisfactory either to the Protestants or Catholics, either one, if a minority, could have appealed, under this section, to the Parliament of Canada for redress. This question has been decided by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. If that committee decided anything, it decided that the Roman Catholic minority enjoyed the right and privilege of having their own schools, managed by their own co-religionists.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Will the hon. gentleman point that out?

Mr. IVES. The hon. gentleman has read this judgment over and over again, and surely he does not require me to point out to him the very words. No one can be ignorant of the fact that the Privy Council decided that the management of the Catholic schools of Manitoba by a Catholic board was the chief right and privilege of which the Roman Catholics of Manitoba have been deprived. Here is the quotation from the judgment:

> Before these passed into law there existed denominational schools, of which the control and management were in the hands of Roman Catholics, who could select the books to be used and determine the character of the religious teaching. These schools received their proportionate share of the money contributed for school purposes out of the general taxation of the province, and the money raised for these purposes by local assessment was, so far as it fell upon Catholics, applied only toward the support of the Catholic schools. What is the position of the Roman Catholic minority under the Acts of 1890? Schools of their own denomination, conducted according to their views, will receive no aid from the state. They must depend entirely for their support upon the contribution of the Roman Catholic community, while the taxes out of which state aid is granted to the schools provided for by the statute fall alike on Catholics and Protestants. Moreover, while the Catholic inhabitants remain liable to local assessment for school purposes, the proceeds of that assessment are no longer destined to any extent for the support of Catholic schools, but afford the means of maintaining schools which they regard as no more suitable for the education of Catholic children than if they were distinctively Protestant in their character.

These are the rights and privileges which, according to the judgment of the Privy Council, were enjoyed by the Roman Catholic minority prior to the enactments complained of. Now, the hon. gentleman says that we have no jurisdiction because it was not a right or privilege of the Roman Catholic minority of Manitoba that their schools should be managed by their co-religionists.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I did not say that.

Mr. IVES. Then I fail entirely to apprehend the hon. gentleman's arguments.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I did not say they would not have the right to elect their own trustees. What I am calling the attention of the hon. gentleman to is that a function of government, the appointment and constitution of the board, is no part of the rights or privilege of the minority. That is part of the machinery of government, and the government may discharge that duty in whatever way they may think best.

Mr. IVES. Does the hon. gentleman not think that, inasmuch as that board was composed of Protestants and Catholics, who were divided by law into distinct committees——

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That is not a question of public policy.

Mr. IVES. One of which controlled the Catholic, and the other the Protestant schools—does he not think that the Parliament of Canada may re-enact the Catholic board, they might even re-enact the Protestant board.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not think so.

Mr. IVES. The authority is in Parliament to-day to deprive the legislature of Manitoba of the control of Protestant as well as Catholic schools, in the sense that we might restore the old board.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No.

Mr. IVES. One section of which would control the Protestant and the other the Catholic schools.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman will see that the provisions of the statute with respect to these schools relates to minorities only. The majority takes care of itself.

Mr. IVES. I say that if we have any jurisdiction at all, we may restore the law, as it existed, before it was repealed.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). As to the rights and privileges only of the minority.

Mr. IVES. Yes, but you complain that we cannot restore the Catholic section of the board because we do not restore the Protestant section.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No; what I contend is that the creation of that board is not a right or privilege. That is outside your jurisdiction altogether.

Mr. IVES. If there is anything in the world which we have jurisdiction to do, it is to create a body similar to the one which existed before to control the schools, for which we are providing, and to restore the privileges taken away.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No.

Mr. IVES. If we have not that authority, then these clauses mean nothing; the judgment of the Privy Council means nothing, and we have no jurisdiction in any direction.

An hon. MEMBER. Which?

Mr. WELDON. We propose to destroy one and establish one, instead of two, or rather, a better expression would be, to fuse the two and have but one system.

An hon. MEMBER. Destroy one and keep one.

Mr. WELDON. If the hon. member will listen with more patience, he will learn more. They decided to fuse the two into one. That is probably the truest expression. That is what the legislature undertook to do, and if they had done this with greater care to avoid irritation, with more patience, with more sympathy, there would have been none of these matters that have irritated the Catholic people, and I have no doubt the fusion should have been carried out as well as it was in Nova Scotia. It seems to me their lordships had in view the position which has been taken by the hon. member for Bothwell, that the legislature was within its right in doing away with these two systems and replacing them with one, but that the rights of conscience must be respected. And I submit that the long quotation made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce is no answer to the point raised by the hon. member for Bothwell. The hon. member shows that this administrative machinery is permissive; the minority have the right to have their rights of conscience restored, but it is not necessary, in order to respect the rights of conscience, to provide in the law any such clause as clause 1 of this Bill. I still submit, Mr. Chairman, that unless some better answer can be given than has been given by the two Ministers, we are still in the state of uncertainty that we were, or rather some of us are in unhappy certainty, with a strong feeling that this law which this Parliament is giving to these people is of no value, it is merely giving cause for litigation, merely sowing dragon's teeth in that prairie country.

Mr. OUIMET. I wish to call the attention of the committee to the fact that what existed before the Act of 1890 was a system of separate schools. The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council has decided that the abolition of that system was an injustice against which the minority could apply for remedy by way of appeal to this Parliament. What they are entitled to is a system of separate schools. We are now trying to pass a law which ensures to the minority a system of separate schools—nothing else. That system of separate schools cannot exist without the machinery which is provided in this Bill. The necessary machinery is provided to enable the Catholic minority to manage their schools in the same way they managed them before. Is there any other way by which this can be done than the way enacted in this Bill? If there is no other way, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council having decided that we can restore to the Catholic minority their schools, it must follow that this machinery is necessary, and that therefore we have the power to create it. Now, one other point raised by the hon. gentleman. He says that we have not the power to impose upon the Lieutenant-Governor the obligation or the duty to appoint a separate school board.

I say that we are not imposing upon the executive of the province any duty, but only giving them the power possessed by him before.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman has not read the Bill.

and so on.

Mr. OUIMET. That was a privilege. It was a power they possessed before, and a power we cannot take away from them.

Mr. WELDON. Oh, oh.

Mr. OUIMET. The hon. member for Albert knows better how to laugh at other people than to reason for himself. I think he has greater power in laughing at people than in answering them. We have to deplore the fact that we have not had here the benefit of the advice of the hon. gentleman. Has he ever stated on his responsibility as a lawyer any proceeding that this committee should take ? No ; he has never risked his reputation as a lawyer by laying down a principle according to which we should act. He has only raised difficulties and then laughed at the embarrassment created by his own specious argument. He has not given to this House the benefit of his great legal attainments by showing what are our powers, in which direction we should go, and where we should stop. I do not think it is right for the hon. gentleman only to raise difficulties and then laugh at those people who conscientiously desire a solution of this question that will enable this House to do justice to the minority. To resume my argument—we only confer upon the Lieutenant-Governor of the province a power, that he had before and that the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council has determined that we could not take away. We can legislate within the powers and rights and privileges that the minority had before, but we cannot go beyond, except when it becomes necessary in order to set the machinery at work if they refuse to lend their assistance. And it is provided that if they will not use the privileges that they had before, if they will not fulfil the duty that they had to perform under the old law, then the Governor General will step in and perform that duty, which must be performed, as a matter of necessity, if we mean that the Roman Catholics shall enjoy the rights we now pretend to restore to them.

Mr. WELDON. Just a few words to set myself right with the hon. Minister. If I was laughing is was because I was good natured and not irritable, and certainly not with the idea of showing disrespect to the hon. gentleman. I was looking at the clock and thinking how unwise it was to be sitting here at so late an hour, that an hon. member of the admitted intellectual force of the Minister of Public Works would listen to the hon. member for Bothwell read the words that the executive "shall" appoint, and say that they only conferred a power upon them—a privilege. If I laughed, my mirth must be excused, because it is hard to see how a Minister, unless we allow for the fact that it is three o'clock, could make such a statement. The hon. gentleman does me an injustice in what he says concerning myself. He could not have heard me when I spoke on the second reading of the Bill or to-night when I had the debate with my hon. friend from Inverness (Mr. Cameron). I did take the responsibility of making several substantial suggestions and indicating a method which would exactly carry out the advice of the Privy Council, and that would give substantive relief to the grievance of the minoirty in Manitoba. So that so far from a desire to sneer at all attempts to enact a remedial law, I have myself taken the responsibility of indicating in what way I would move forward to enact a remedial law which, of course, would involve the withdrawal of this Bill, and the institution of a new appeal, addressing to the local authorities a new order, and founding upon that a new statute, which I apprehend will be the course that will have to be followed by any government that will undertake to settle this question finally. The hon. Minister has unwittingly done me an injustice, for I am very far from sneering at any suggestions for redressing the grievance.

Mr. MLLIS (Bothwell). I wish to call the attention of the Government to this clause once more. I admit that my contention has been that the work of administration primarily belongs to, and ought to be discharged by the local legislature, through the instrumentalities they create. You omit that, and you undertake to say what the machinery shall be. You undertake to substitute yourselves in place of the local government and legislature, and say that the Lieutenant-Governor in Council shall appoint, and so on. I say that the creation of the machinery should be left to the local legislature, but you frame a clause that in case the local legislature fails to discharge its duty as a matter of necessity incident to the work of education, you will provide an alternative. But you do not provide an alternative, you primarily substitute your authority for that of the local legislature.

Mr. IVES. Supposing the Lieutenant-Governor complied, then everything we ask for will have been done. Supposing they do not comply, what happens then ? Then the Lieutenant-Governor in Council names the board, and what have the Manitoba government to complain of in that case ?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). They have much to complain of. I pointed out the other day, if my argument had any value at all in maintaining the constitutional duty resting upon this House, that mandatory words are never applied to a sovereign body, or to the Crown. You have put those words in this statute, and more than that, you have declared that the Lieutenant-Governor in Council shall perform a certain duty. I say the Lieutenant-Governor in Council represents the sovereign, and you have no power to command them.

Mr. IVES. You argued that if we said "shall" it meant "may."

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No, I argued that if you said "may" it meant "shall." But you use the words here which Sir George Bowyer says should never be used towards the Crown, because they are disrespectful. It is a denial of sovereignty to maintain that you have the right to command the Crown. The Lieutenant-Governor in Council cannot be ordered by you to do a single thing, and what is more, they have a right to decide for themselves. Let me impress upon the Government that in regard to administration, the local government and legislature have a right to decide for themselves what machinery they will create for the purpose of discharging their duties, and you cannot create that machinery for them. In case they fail to discharge their duties, then you may create the machinery for yourselves.

On section 3,

Mr. OUIMET. I suggest to add "The Department of Education of the province of Manitoba."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) I believe, Sir, that subsection 2 of section 3 should be struck out, and that the Separate School Board should be empowered to make regulations for the schools under its control. In that way we would avoid conflicts apt to arise between the Department of Public Instruction of the province of Manitoba and the Board of Education, which may be appointed by the Manitoba government, or, in their default, by the Federal Government. I wish to call the attention of the Minister of Public Works to the fact that there is an apparent anomaly between sections 3 and 4, and whether he considers, as I do, that those two clauses clash with each other. As the hon. gentleman knows, I gave notice that I would move certain amendments, and the object of one of those amendments was to have section 3 struck off. I gave notice of those amendments, having been invited to do so by the hon. Secretary of State, and by the hon. Minister of Justice, when those gentlemen addressed the House upon the second reading of this Bill. Upon that occasion, Sir, we were invited to move any desirable amendment as we might wish to move to the Bill now before the House. I believe that it would be far more conducive to the interests of the minority to take away from the Manitoba government the right to make regulations which might perhaps completely nullify the rights which we confer, under section 4, upon the Separate School Board of Education. I, therefore, simply move: That subsection 2 of section 3 be struck out.

Mr. OUIMET. There is an apparent clashing between this clause and the next one. One clause gives special privileges to the Bureau of Education, whilst the other confers general powers to the Department of Education. The old joint board has disappeared, no doubt, but it has been replaced by the Department of Agriculture, in whom there are vested the same powers that existed in the general Board of Education, while we confer on this separate Board of Education all the powers that the Catholic section, sitting as a distinct section, held. I may tell the hon. gentleman, in order to calm his apprehension, that this very question has been discussed with very great care and attention with the counsel representing the minority, Mr. Ewart, and he has insisted that this clause should be in the Bill in order, as he contends, to avoid any doubt that may arise as to the constitutionality of the measure we have now before us. The judgment of the Privy Council provides that we should take away none of the rights and powers that exclusively were vested in the general Board of Education. All we can do is to restore to the minority the rights they formerly possessed and exercised through the Catholic section of the defunct board.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) If the hon. Minister of Public Works will allow me, I may remind him that the general Board of Education he speaks of was done away with under the law of 1890, and, therefore, that it no longer exists. As to those powers, you confer them on a new organization.

Mr. BRODEUR. (Translation.) I entirely share in the opinion given expression to by the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Dupont), and I admit that there is not only an apparent but a serious anomaly between part of section 3 and part of section 4. Under section 3, we confer upon the Department of Public Instruction the right of making regulations in relation to the general organization of separate schools, and under part of section 4 we confer upon the Separate School Board of Instruction the right to make regulations of the same character, or which are apt to lead to the same results. Under these circumstances, conflicts are likely to arise as to the enforcement of that section of the law, and it would only be wise on our part to do away with any cause of controversy of that kind. The hon. Minister of Public Works argues that the Privy Council judgment confers on this Parliament the right to legislate, but that it does not give us the power to modify in any way whatsoever the law now in force in Manitoba. I think he is labouring under a profound error. Under the Privy Council judgment we have a right to restore the position and the rights which the Roman Catholic minority enjoyed in Manitoba previous to 1890. Now, my contention is that we must restore to the Catholic minority the very same privileges they enjoyed previous to 1890. Under subsection 2 of section 3, are the Catholic minority restored to the position which they enjoyed formerly ? I say no. Under the old law the Board of Education in Manitoba was composed of Catholic and Protestant members. The board, I think, was composed of twenty-one members, nine of whom were to be Catholics and twelve Protestants. The Protesants and Catholics, whose representation upon the Board of Education was in such a proportion as I have said. had a right to vote on all questions brought up before the board, whilst now the Department of Public Instruction is composed only of Protestant members, and the Catholics have no voice in the matter, are no longer members of the Board, and, therefore, they are no longer enjoying the position they were in previously. On those grounds, I am ready to support the motion of my hon. friend from Bagot (Mr. Dupont).

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) I wish also, like my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Brodeur) to call the attention of the House to the fact that the Department of Education in the province of Manitoba is now exclusively composed of Protestants. The hon. Minister of Public Works ought, I think, to make allowance for that difference.

Mr. OUIMET. (Translation.) If my hon. friend will allow me, I may tell him, by way of explanation, that a similar debate arose previously in another place. I may tell him that I did myself support the proposition which he now brings up before the committee. I have debated that point with Mr. Ewart, the counsel for the Manitoba minority. Subsection 2 of section 3 had even been struck out, but Mr. Ewart insisted upon that provision being reinserted in the Bill. He is of opinion that, through the omission of such a provision, the validity of the Bill might be jeopardized. It is, therefore, at the formal request of the counsel for the Manitoba Catholics that this clause was inserted in this Bill. If the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Dupont) wishes to assume the responsibility for having this clause struck out, I do not see much harm in that, except the danger anticipated by Mr. Ewart, that of the law being ultra vires. The Bill would thereby incur a serious risk. I think my hon. friend would do well to drop his amendment.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) I am quite willing to pay all due deference to Mr. Ewart's opinion. I do not want to substitute myself to him as counsel for the Manitoba minority, but it seems to me that his opinion is at least open to discussion, respectful as I am of that opinion. I fail to see why, while framing a Bill with a view to restoring to Catholics the rights they enjoyed previous to 1890, we should be bound to confer rights relating to separate schools upon the present Department of Public Instruction, a body different from that which was in existence at the time public instruction was under the control of a council composed of Catholics and Protestants, and which is altogether dependent on the Manitoba government. In my opinion, the Manitoba government by their refusal to modify their law so as to meet the wishes of the minority and do them justice, have forfeited all their rights in educational matters as far as the Catholic minority are concerned.

Mr. OUIMET. (Translation.) My hon. friend will observe that under subsection 2 of section 3, general powers are conferred upon the Department of Public Instruction in the province of Manitoba, whilst under section 4, specific powers are vested in the Separate School Board of Instruction ; now, it is perfectly agreed upon that whenever general and specific powers are conferred, and there arises a conflict between them, it is the specific powers which prevail. Whenever regulations made by the Department of Public Instruction of Manitoba come into conflict with the particular regulations passed under section 4, it is the latter which must prevail.

Mr. BRODEUR. (Translation.) I do not think that Mr. Ewart's objection should prevail. I believe that we should restore the position which the Catholic minority formerly enjoyed. The Council of Public Instruction, previous to 1890, was composed of Catholic and Protestant members, and had the right to make regulations for the administration and general government of their schools. While under the present Bill, instead of both Catholics and Protestants being put on the same footing, the general government of the schools is wholly conferred on the Protestant board.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. (Translation.) Not at all.

Mr. BRODEUR. (Translation.) Certainly. Section 3 says :

> 3. The Department of Education may, for the observance of the separate schools, make regulations for the registering and reporting of daily attendance at all the separate schools in the province, subject to the approval of the Lieutenant-Governor in Council.
> 2. The Department of Education may also make from time to time such regulations as they may think fit for the general organization of the separate schools.

Now, the Catholics and Protestants who formerly composed the Board of Education, had the right to make the regulations mentioned in section 3 of this Bill, whilst, under the Bill now before the House, you confer on the Department of Education, which is wholly composed of Protestants, the right to make such regulations. If I understood aright the objection urged by the Minister of Public Works, he told us that, through the omission of such a provision, the validity of the Bill now under discussion might be jeopardized. But, I ask, why not put on the same footing the Board of Education and the Separate School Board of Instruction ?

Mr. OUIMET. (Translation.) No, on the ground that if the Manitoba government were to refuse compliance with this Bill, you would be putting in the law a clause which might hamper the working of the whole machinery.

Mr. BRODEUR. (Translation.) Not at all. If, however, the Department of Education failed to discharge their duty, you could do as you did on the second reading of the Bill, namely, confer on the Federal Government, or on the separate school board, the power to make the regulations under discussion. But what I look upon as unfair is this : That, formerly, both sections of the board, Protestants and Catholics, had conjointly the right to make those regulations, whilst now that power is vested in a Protestant board. The hon. Minister of Public Works shakes his head and seems to deny the correctness of my statement. He is well aware that the Board of Education is exclusively composed of Protestants.

Mr. OUIMET. (Translation.) Not necessarily so. It may be so in fact, but it is not so by law.

Mr. BRODEUR. (Translation.) Well, if that department were so harmless, what is the use of establishing a separate school board ? The reason is that the Government feel no confidence in the Board of Education, and that is the reason why they seek to establish a separate school board composed of Catholics. What I ask is only fair ; we are merely seeking to restore the position which the Roman Catholics enjoyed in Manitoba as to the Board of Education.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) In my opinion, it would be very imprudent on our part, after the counsel for the minority, Mr. Ewart, and the Government and the law officers have given the Bill under discussion a very close study, to have subsection 2 struck out ; because, by so doing, the whole economy of this Bill might be jeopardized. Now, is there actually such a material difference between section 3 of this Bill and the old law ? To my mind, there is no difference worth mentioning. Under the old law, the Board of Education was composed of a certain number of Catholics, but they were in a minority ; they were nine against twelve. The majority was always to be Protestant, and never, at any sitting of the board, were the Catholics to be in a majority. Therefore, the latter always found themselves, as far as the regulations for the general organization of schools were concerned, under the control of a Protestant majority.

Mr. BRODEUR. (Translation.) They had a right to be heard, at any rate.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) Undoubtedly, but the difference is quite immaterial. If you strike out that part of section 3, you imperil the whole Bill. I understand that we have no power to restore to Catholics more rights than they enjoyed previous to 1890 ; and, if we strike out subsection 2 from section 3, if we take away that power from the Department of Public Instruction, we will have to give it to somebody else.

> The Department of Education may also make from time to time, such regulations as they may think fit for the general organization of the separate schools.

That power would, therefore, have to be vested in the separate school board ; now, I contend that we cannot confer on them such a power, because that would be conferring on the Catholics a power which they did not enjoy under the old law. To whom, then shall we give it ? We have no other alternative left but to confer it either on the separate school board created under this Bill or else to leave it in the hands of the Department of Education, as provided for by the Bill under discussion. There is a wide difference between the regulations set out in section 3 and those of section 4. Subsection 2 of section 3 merely mentions the general organization of schools, whilst section 4 involves the management and discipline of schools. To my mind, there is no conflict between these two sections. I believe that both sections ought to be preserved, if we wish to make the Bill constitutional ; for, the provisions of section 3 must come in somewhere, and, if not in this section, they will have to be inserted in section 4.

Mr. McISAAC. I agree with the hon. members for Bagot and Rouville, but do not desire to detain the committee, and I therefore move :

> That subsection 2 of section 3 be struck out.

Mr. DALY. The result of the action taken is to make the law uniform, and as it existed prior to 1890. The Board of Education, under the old law, consisted of the Protestant and Roman Catholic sections, and the powers that were vested in the whole of the old board were given to the Department of Education, under the Act of 1890. If we were to vest in the board, under this Act the powers vested in the Board of Education, we would be giving that board greater power than the Catholic section of the board possessed previous to the Act of 1890. We desire not to go outside the powers vested in the old section of the board.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. I disagree with some of my hon. friends on this question. I see power is given to the Department of Education and the Board of Education to organize school districts, and therefore there might be a conflict of power and authority. On the other hand while it is contended that we cannot enlarge the power we confer on those respective bodies there is no objection to some of those powers being reduced, and therefore if subsection 2 is struck out, I do not see we interfere at all with the constitutionality of the Bill, because we only remove a power that is reinstated and does not exist under the local law. I am perhaps interested more than any one, but I am willing to assume the responsibility of striking out subsection 2.

Amendment (Mr. McIsaac) negatived.

Section, as amended, agreed to.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Although we have not made very substantial progress, still we have made some progress, and I therefore move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Committee rose and reported progress.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved :

That after Monday next, for the remainder of this session, the House shall sit on Saturdays, beginning at 10 a.m., with a recess from 1 to 2 p.m., and that Government measures shall have precedence on such days.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That cannot be moved now. That motion is before the Orders of the day, and it is passed.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is a Government notice of motion.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But it is passed. We have got into the Orders of the day. You cannot go back.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman may interpose this difficulty, but it does not prevent it being moved to-morrow.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. On Thursday.

Mr. SPEAKER. The objection having been taken by any single member, it is fatal to the motion.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I did not suppose that after I had met the hon. gentleman's religious scruples with reference to sitting on Good Friday, that he would object. I think it is a very ungracious return, but as he has done it, I propose when the House meets at three o'clock to make the motion.

Mr. MULOCK. You cannot do it to-day.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 3.40 a.m. (Wednesday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 1st April, 1896.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

EXPROPRIATION OF LANDS BY RAILWAYS.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 91) respecting railways.

Mr. RIDER. Explain.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. The object of this Bill is to provide that railway companies shall not have power hereafter to appropriate lands for railway purposes without paying for them. As matters now stand, railways, in many instances, have expropriated lands for which they have never paid. This Bill provides for the payment of the land, or for a lien upon the land until paid.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

BINDING TWINE MANUFACTURED IN THE CENTRAL PRISON.

Mr. McMULLEN asked :

Whether any sum or sums of money are due or unpaid for binding twine sold, as set out on page I—43 of the Auditor General's Report ? If due, by whom, and what security is held for payment ? If paid, when was payment made, and in what way ? Has payment, for twine sold, been made in anything else but cash ? Has security been deposited for twine sold ? If so, what does the security consist of ?

Mr. DALY. I am not yet in a position to answer the question, as we have not received the information from Kingston. I thought the hon. gentleman had got all the information we could give him in the committee this morning.

Mr. McMULLEN. But the House is not in possession of that information.

Mr. DALY. As soon as it comes, I will give it to the hon. gentleman.

HAULAGE OF PRIVATE CARS.

Mr. CHARLTON asked :

Has the Government a reciprocal arrangement with Canadian railway corporations, and with any railway corporations in the United States, under which the private cars of officials of such railway corporations are hauled free of charge over Canadian Government railways in consideration of the free haulage over such railway lines of the private or official cars of Canadian Cabinet Ministers and Government railway officials ? If such an arrangement exists, is any check or account kept by which the respective amount of services thus performed by the various railway corporations which are parties to such understanding or agreement, can be ascertained ?

Mr. HAGGART. The answer to the first part of the question is, no. As to the second part, I may say that no check or account is kept.

MAILS FROM ROACH'S POINT TO KESWICK.

Mr. CHARLTON asked :

1. Who is the contractor for carrying the mails between Roach's Point and Keswick ?
2. When does such contract expire ?
3. What is paid for such service ?
4. Has said contract been renewed, or has any arrangement been made for its renewal ? If so, at what price and with whom ?
5. Were tenders invited before arranging for such renewal ?
6. Were any offers made for performance of such service after expiry of the existing contract ? If so, at what sum ?
7. If said contract was renewed at a higher sum than that for which any other person offered to perform such service, what is the reason for passing over a lower offer ?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The answers to the hon. gentleman's questions are as follows :—1. James Cake. 2. 30th June, 1896. 3. $130 per annum. 4. The contract has been renewed for $130 with James Cake. 5. No. 6. No offers were received at the department. 7. No offers were received at the department.

POSTMASTER AT CARMUNNOCK.

Mr. GIBSON (for Mr. Grieve) asked :

1. Has a postmaster, in place of the late Thomas Moffatt, been appointed at Carmunnock, in the county of Perth ? If so, who has received the appointment ?
2. Has a change been made in regard to the location of the post office ? If so, to what point has it been removed ?
3. Have any petitions been received by the Government requesting the appointment of the son of the late postmaster, also protesting against the removal of the post office from its former location ?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. 1. Yes. Mr. David Harrison was appointed to succeed Mr. Moffatt, 4th January, 1896. 2. The appointment of Mr. Harrison is stated to have involved the removal of the post office from the 16th concession, township Elma, (its former site) to the 14th concession of the same township. 3. A petition has been received since the appointment of Mr. Harrison requesting the appointment of the son of the late postmaster to the office, and objecting to its removal from its former site.

DUTY ON PULP WOOD.

Mr. RIDER asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to impose an export duty on pulp wood exported from Canada, viz. :—

(a) Pulp wood in the rough ?

(b) Pulp wood finished ready for grinding ?

If so, on what kinds, how much per cord, and when will it take effect ?

Is the Governor in Council authorized to impose such export duty by an Order in Council ?

Will the advice of Parliament be asked by the Ministry before imposing an export duty upon any kind of pulp wood ?

Mr. IVES. The Government have no intention at present to impose an export duty on pulp wood of any description. The Governor in Council is authorized to impose such export duty by an Order in Council in the case provided for by section 13 of the Customs Tariff Act, but not otherwise. The advice of Parliament, of course, would be asked before imposing an export duty, did the case not fall under the exception provided for by the 13th section of the Tariff Act of 1894.

EXPORT OF BUTTER AND CHEESE.

Mr. DUGAS asked :

Whether the Government is aware that Americans export their butter and cheese under the name of Canadian butter and cheese ? If so, is it their intention to adopt means to prevent a state of things injurious to Canadian production?

Mr. FOSTER. The Government is not aware that butter and cheese from the United States are exported under the name of Canadian. The Dairy Products Act, 1893, says :

> No person shall apply any brand, stamp or mark of the word "Canadian" or "Canada" as a descriptive term, mark or brand upon any cheese, or upon any box or package which contains cheese or butter, unless such cheese or butter have been produced in Canada, and no person shall knowingly sell, offer, expose, or have in his possession for sale, any cheese or butter so branded falsely. Any person violating this section is liable to a fine not exceeding $20, and not less than $5, for every such cheese, or box, or package.

It is the intention of the Government to continue to enforce this law.

THE SWEATING SYSTEM.

Mr. LEPINE (for Mr. Ingram) asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to take any action in the direction suggested by Mr. A. W. Wright, in his report upon the "Sweating System," and will any of the legislation recommended in that report be introduced during this session ?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. In reply to the hon. gentleman, I have to say that there are many important and valuable recommendations in the report, all apparently well calculated to accomplish the end aimed at, namely, to prevent the introduction and extension of the "sweating system," so-called, into the Dominion, and also to improve the condition of the working people in other directions. The commissioner has not attempted, when making his recommendations, to distinguish between the legislative remedies that might be within the jurisdiction of this Parliament, and legislation which would have to be enacted, if at all, by the several provincial legislatures. While the Government is desirous to do all that may be within its power to prevent the introduction or spread of the evils of the "sweating system," and in other ways to improve the condition of life and labour among the working people, care will have to be taken not to go beyond what Parliament may constitutionally do. Owing to the pressure of other business, it is doubtful if it would be possible, during this session, to give the legislative measures recommended by the commissioner due consideration.

ASSETS OF THE DOMINION.

Mr. CHARLTON asked :

Are the following assets, the par amounts of which are deducted from the gross amount of the public debt, considered by the Finance Department to be sound and convertible assets, good for the amounts at which they are entered upon asset statement of the Dominion, viz. :—

1. Albert Railway Company, loan account .... $	14,725.56
2. Fredericton and St. Mary's Ry. Bridge Company	300,000.00
3. Grand Trunk preference stock	121,739.65
4. Hamilton coupons	16,781.35
5. Quebec Harbour 4 per cent ..	3,748,519.62
6. St. John Bridge and Railway Extension Co. 4 per cent ..	433,900.00
7. Three Rivers Harbour debentures 4 per cent	81,760.97

8. How long a time has elapsed in the case of each of the above-named assets, deducted at their par value from the gross public debt, since interest was paid to the Government upon the same, mentioning each separately ?

9. If any of the above-named assets are worthless or of doubtful value, what reason does the Government give as a justification for treating them as sound assets convertible at par, thereby leaving the impression that the net public debt is smaller than is actually the case ?

Mr. FOSTER. On the Albert Railway loan account the last interest was paid on the 31st December, 1887. On the Fredericton and St. Mary's Bridge Company the interest was paid on 30th June, 1889. On Grand Trunk Railway preference stock, $608.70 was paid in 1881. The Hamilton coupons do not bear interest. On the Quebec Harbour debentures the last interest was paid on 30th June, 1890. On the St. John Bridge and Railway Extension Railway Company there are no arrears. On the Three Rivers Harbour debentures, $15,000 of interest arrears were paid in 1895. As to whether the assets are considered good and the like of that, that is a question of opinion which, I suppose, might elicit different views.

Mr. CHARLTON. What is their market value ? I beg leave to say the question is not answered. Have they a market value ?

Mr. FOSTER. The question is answered.

LOBSTER REGULATIONS.

Mr. FRASER asked :

Do the Government propose changing the lobster regulations at present in force in Nova Scotia during the present year ? If so, when will such change be made ? If such changes are contemplated, what will the extent of such changes be and will they be uniform ? What change, if any, as to the close season do the Government propose making ?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Numerously signed petitions have been received from the counties of Guysboro' and Halifax asking that the close season for lobsters be lengthened, while petitions have been received from other sections asking that the close season be shortened. The matter is under the consideration of the Government.

PHILADELPHIA CENTENNIAL EXHIBITION.

Mr. GIROUARD asked :

What was the expenditure incurred by the representatives of the Government at the Centennial Exhibition at Philadelphia, in 1876 ?

Mr. FOSTER. The total expenditure on account of the Canadian Commission at the Philadelphia Exhibition, for salary, expenses for living, travelling and otherwise, was $39,670.04. The total expenditure in connection with the Philadelphia Exhibition was $93,549.

LOCKS AT FORT FRANCIS.

Mr. GIROUARD asked :

What was the amount expended by the Government of Canada, from 1874 to 1878, in constructing the locks at Fort St. Francis ; what use has been since made of the said locks, and what revenue has the Government derived therefrom ?

Mr. HAGGART. The amount expended by the Government, from 1874 to 1878, in constructing the locks at Fort St. Francis, was $253,622.29. The only use made since of those locks is for dumping saw-dust. No revenue is derived.

THE NEEBING HOTEL.

Mr. GIROUARD asked :

When did the Government of Canada purchase the Neebing Hotel at Fort William ? What was the amount paid for the said hotel and the ground on which it stands ?

Mr. HAGGART. The Government purchased the Neebing Hotel in 1875 for $5,029.76 The amount paid for ground on which it stands was $600 per acre.

CANADIAN SEALERS.

Mr. McDOUGALL (Cape Breton) asked :

Is the Government aware that Canadian sealing vessels calling at ports in the colony of Newfoundland, and taking or shipping men, have to pay a duty on all supplies and ammunition on board such vessels ; notwithstanding that the same is not landed in such ports ? Will the Government make inquiries with a view, if possible, to removing this unreasonable tax upon Canadian sealers, and the refunding of the paid duties under such law or practice ?

Mr. COSTIGAN. In reply to the hon. gentleman, I beg to say that one complaint has been received by the Department of Marine and Fisheries, that the authorities at St. Johns, Newfoundland, exacted duties on the stores of a sealing vessel. Inquiries are being made into the matter, and steps will be taken to forward representations to the Newfoundland government. The Government has already dealt with a similar practice pursued by the Newfoundland government, in regard to exacting duties on casks and salt taken to Newfoundland in fishing vessels, but not landed there. In this latter case, the Colonial Secretary of Newfoundland, acquainted the Canadian Government, for the information of parties frequenting Newfoundland and Newfoundland Labrador, that instructions had been issued to the Customs Department, directing that in future such articles shall be reported as intended for export, or the duty paid and refunded upon the production of certificate of such export having been entered in Canadian ports.

PREFERENTIAL DUTY ON BUTTER.

Mr. DUGAS asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to continue their policy with the British Government, in view of obtaining preferential duty in favour of Canadian butter and cheese ?

Mr. FOSTER. It is the intention of the Government to continue its policy of endeavouring to obtain preferential duties in favour of all Canadian products in the British markets.

ARTHABASKAVILLE AND ST. PAUL DE CHESTER MAIL CONTRACT.

Mr. LAVERGNE (translation) asked :

1. Whether the Postmaster General has received a complaint, dated 7th March, 1896, against the mail carrier between Arthabaskaville and St. Paul de Chester ?

2. Has the Postmaster General noticed that, according to the said complaint, the mail was not delivered at St. Paul de Chester on the 29th February last, and on the 2nd, 4th and 6th March instant, notwithstanding that, under the contract between the Government and the said mail carrier, the mail is to be carried every day, and notwithstanding that the temperature on the said days was such that many persons were enabled to travel without difficulty between Victoriaville and Arthabaskaville and St. Paul de Chester ?

3. If the Postmaster General received the said complaint, what action has he taken in the matter ? Has an inquiry been held ? Has the inspector been instructed to proceed to the locality and ascertain the truth or falsehood of the facts stated in the complaint ? Do the Government purpose providing a remedy for the grievances mentioned in the complaint ?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. (Translation.) In reply to the first part of the question put by the hon. member I say. Yes ; and to the second part, No. As to the third, I have to inform him that an inquiry was held by the inspector, who proceeded to the locality and found out that, notwithstanding that the contractor was to a certain extent guilty of remissness in fulfilling his duties, still, under the circumstances, the road was so bad that he had found it almost impossible to carry the mail. The contractor was severely reprimanded and warned as to the future, in order that such dereliction of duty may not occur again.

ST. PAUL DE CHESTER AND ARTHABASKAVILLE MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. LAVERGNE (translation) asked :

1. Has the Postmaster General received a complaint, dated 3rd March instant, against the mail carrier for the route between Arthabaskaville and St. Paul de Chester ?

2. If so, what action has been taken in the matter ? Has the inspector been instructed to proceed to the locality, in order to verify the facts mentioned in the said complaint ?

3. Is it the intention of the Government to provide a remedy for the grievances set out in the complaint ?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. (Translation.) To the first part of the question, Yes. As to the second, I may say that the inspector has been directed to hold an inquiry into the matter mentioned by the hon. gentleman. As to the third part of the question, the contractor has been warned not to be guilty in the future of the least dereliction of duty in carrying out the terms of his contract.

MAIL CONTRACT—ARTHABASKAVILLE AND ST. PAUL DE CHESTER.

Mr. LAVERGNE (translation) asked :

1. Whether the Postmaster General has received a complaint, dated 2nd January, 1896, against the postmaster of St Paul de Chester, and the mail carrier who carries the mail between Arthabaskaville and St. Paul de Chester ?

2. If so, what action has been taken in the matter of the said complaint ? Has an inquiry been held ? Has the inspector been instructed to proceed to the locality, in order to inquire into the truth of the facts mentioned in the complaint ?

3. Is it the intention of the Government to provide some remedy for the grievances set out in the said complaint ?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. (Translation.) In reply to the first part of the question put by the hon gentleman I say, No. In reply to the second part, I beg to inform him that the inspector was directed to proceed forthwith to the locality and to hold an inquiry as to the accurateness of the facts mentioned in the complaint. As to the third part of the question, the Government cannot answer it before the inspector has reported on the matter.

HALF-BREED ALLOTMENT.

Mr. CHARLTON asked :

1. Has the Government, at the request of Father Lacombe, endorsed by the bishops of St. Boniface, St. Albert and Prince Albert, or upon any other solicitation or request, granted, or decided to grant, a tract of land in the North-west Territories for the colonization of the North-west half-breeds ?

2. If such grant has been made, or if it has been decided to make it, what is, or will be the area of the grant, and the location of the same ?

3. Will the grant thus made, or to be made, be entirely under the direction and control of the bishops and missionaries of the Roman Catholic Church in perpetuity, to distribute and turn it to use at their own will, for the purposes of the proposed colony, and upon such terms and conditions of occupancy, and eviction, as such bishops and missionaries may provide and determine ?

Mr. DALY. In reply to the hon. gentleman, I beg to say : 1. There has been no actual grant of land, either given or promised, but a lease of a tract of land has been promised on certain conditions, the object being to place half-breed settlers thereon. 2. The tract which may be used for this purpose is not to exceed four townships, being townships 57 and 58 in ranges 9 and 10, west of 4th meridian—that is, between Edmonton and Battleford, north of what is called Frog Lake. 3. The Order in Council making provision for this matter has been before Parliament now for a considerable length of time, and any one who reads it will see that the lease will not be entirely under the direction and control of the bishops and missionaries of the Roman Catholic Church in perpetuity, but will be subject to the control and direction of the Government of Canada through the Minister of the Interior.

PRINCESS LOUISE DRAGOONS OF NEW BRUNSWICK.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I would like to ask the hon. Postmaster General (Sir Adolphe Caron) if he would kindly make the statement now respecting the matter which I brought to his notice the other day. I asked him whether an offer had been received from the Princess Louise Dragoon Guards of New Brunswick, tendering their services for the Soudan expedition, and the hon. gentleman brought down some papers which he kindly laid upon the Table, and which I had the opportunity of reading. My main question was as to whether the offer received had been forwarded to the British Government, either by wire or despatch, and I may say that since then I have received a number of telegrams from interested parties urging me to press the question and obtain an answer at an early date, because offers were coming in from all parts of Canada to Lieutenant-Colonel Domville from parties who desired to join the expedition, and it was important he should be able to answer at an early date these volunteers who had offered their services. I understood privately that the Postmaster General would be able to make a public statement to-day in regard to the matter.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. In regard to the question which the hon. gentleman has asked with respect to the tender of services by Lieutenant-Coloned Domville and the Eighth Princess Louise Regiment, I replied to it at the time, but I informed the hon. member that I was not in a position to state whether the offer made by Colonel Domville had been transmitted to the Imperial Government, and I think that is really what the hon. gentleman is more anxious to know than the fact of the tender of services having been made, because it was known that these services had been offered. Acting on behalf of the Minister of Militia during his absence, I ascertained on the following day, when I went to the department that the tender of services had been received, as disclosed by the papers which I placed on the Table of the House. Major-General Gascoigne, in command, considered that he could not recommend that the tender for these services should be accepted. I considered, however, as my attention had been called to the matter by the hon. gentleman, that an offer such as had been made by Colonel Domville, should be transmitted to the Imperial Government, and I gave instructions to that effect. In consequence of those instructions, the tender of services of Colonel Domville and the Eighth Princess Louise Dragoon Regiment was transmitted to the Imperial Government, through the ordinary channel, the Military Secretary of His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Was it sent by cable ?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I should imagine so, but I do not know whether it was cabled or not ; if it has not been cabled, I will see that it is cabled. I can also say to the hon.

gentleman that, if it has been cabled, no answer has been received from the Imperial Government.

THE YAMASKA BRIDGE.

Mr. BRUNEAU. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday last, I was obliged, at six o'clock, to leave off reading the correspondence in connection with the motion which is now in your hands. I may therefore, be allowed to read another letter which I wrote to the Government in the same connection :

Sorel, 29th September, 1892.

To the Hon. J. J. C. Abbott, Prime Minister of Canada :

Honourable Sir,—On the 14th of June last I had the honour of writing to you, asking you on behalf of the Commercial Board and of the Corporation of Sorel, as well as in the name of the county of Richelieu, which I represent, in the House of Commons, to kindly co-operate with us and use your influence with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, in order to induce the latter to reconstruct the bridge on the Yamaska River.

On the 16th of the same month, in acknowledging receipt of my letter, you stated that it had been referrred to the Minister of Railways. On the 22nd August last, the Department of Railways sent me the reply that the Minister could not see his way to interfere in the matter, as there was nothing in the Railway Act which empowered him to compel a railway company to reconstruct a bridge ; but there was a complaint was made of a railway bridge being unsafe for traffic to pass over it, instructions were given for an inspection to be made by an engineer in the employ of the department. A few days later, on the 24th August last, I wrote another letter to the Minister of Railways, calling his particular attention to an editorial in the newspaper "Le Monde," suggesting to the Government to grant a subsidy which would enable the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to reconstruct without delay the bridge in question. The suggestion offered by that paper seemed to me so well grounded, that I thought it my duty to strongly endorse it and to ask the Government to take action upon it without delay. There was actually urgency, for, as I wrote :

"If the Canadian Pacific Railway Company were to decline rebuilding the Yamaska bridge, we would find ourselves at Sorel, this fall, completely cut off from all railway communication. As you are aware, the Montreal and Sorel Railway is closed to traffic and no longer operated, and in order to communicate with Montreal, the commercial metropolis, we will be constrained to go and take the cars, either north or south, at some place several leagues distant from Sorel. I cannot be brought to believe that the Government will decline acting upon our demand, in view of the grounds alleged."

At the time of writing, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company has officially notified its employees that the trains will stop running between St. Guillaume and Sorel, on the 1st October next.

It is a matter of surprise to me that I have not yet received any reply from the Government, and not even an acknowledgment of receipt of my letter of the 24th August last ; and, as I anticipated, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company has stopped running its trains. As I already said, I cannot be brought to believe that the Government will decline doing anything in our favour. The traders, not only at Sorel, but from Sorel to St. Guillaume, as also the whole population of that part of the country, are disquieted and that on good ground, and clamour for the interference of the Federal Government.

I previously gave the reasons warranting such a demand. I refrain from urging the same, but I am bound to inform the Government of the decision come to by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, which is so prejudicial to the commercial interests of all the parishes situated on the line of that railway. I have not yet lost all hope of obtaining justice and a favourable decision from the Government, leaving to them the credit or responsibility as to future developments.

Yours truly,

A. A. BRUNEAU.

Such is, Sir, the correspondence which I wished to bring before the House, in order to point out the responsibility which partly rests on the Government, as to the sum of $50,000 referred to in my motion, and which has not yet been made use of. With these few prefatory remarks, I move that the papers mentioned in the following notice of motion be laid on the Table :—

Copies of all documents, memorials, petitions and correspondence between the Government and the Board of Trade and Corporation of the town of Sorel and other persons, in relation to the granting of a subsidy for renewing, repairing and rebuilding the railway bridge on the South Eastern Railway, across the River Yamaska, at the village of St. Michel de Yamaska ; copies of all documents, petitions and correspondence between the Government, the persons aforesaid, the Pacific Railway Company, the South Shore Railway Company and the United Counties Railway Company in relation to the application and use of the subsidy of $50,000 granted under the Act 57-58 Vic., ch. 4, for the repairing and rebuilding of the said bridge.

Mr. LAVERGNE. (Translation.) I wish, Mr. Speaker, to add a few words to the remarks fallen from the hon. member for Richelieu in support of his motion. The counties situate on the line of the old Southeastern Railway, which is now part of the Canadian Pacific Railway system, are highly interested in having the information moved for by the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Bruneau). The counties of Drummond and Yamaska would hail with delight the news that this road is again going to be operated. I dare not say, for my part, that any blame should be cast upon the Government ; but, of course, my hon. friend from Richelieu is better informed on the matter than I am. I know, on the contrary, that the first time I came up here with a deputation of my friends in order to interview the Government, we met with a hearty welcome. It is a matter of regret that no railway company is yet prepared to gain the subsidy which has been offered by the Government. I have not got into the habit of paying compliments to the Government of the day ; yet, I may say that when we interviewed some of the Cabinet Ministers, we met with a kind reception, and the answer given was undoubtedly of a most encouraging nature. Previous to pledging themselves to grant a new subsidy, in addition to that subsidy offered for the rebuilding of the bridge on the river Yamaska, the Government wish to satisfy themselves that the company will operate the road and give security to that effect. I say, therefore, for my part, that I have not to complain of the way in which the interested parties have been treated at the hands of the Government. I am bound to second the motion of my hon. friend from Richelieu (Mr. Bruneau), for it will be most welcome news for the citizens of the counties of Drummond and Arthabaska, and, I may also add, those of the county of Bagot, when they hear that there is some hope that the subsidy which they have been promised will be turned to good use, so that this road may be operated again, after remaining idle for several years. The papers moved for by my hon. friend from Richelieu (Mr. Bruneau) may throw some light upon the matter, and may also be calculated to afford new information to the interested parties who, I doubt not, will receive them with pleasure. Such information may also be calculated to encourage and induce companies to take this affair in hand. I have no hesitation in saying that the closing of this road proved almost a disaster for the population of the counties of Drummond and Yamaska, who were accustomed to enjoy railway facilities with Sorel, which was their great distributing centre, and also with the city of Montreal during the summer season. It is almost a calamity for them to be thus deprived of the railway facilities which that road afforded them. It is not my intention, Sir, to enter into any lengthy remarks on the matter. As I just said, I do not complain of the way in which the interested parties have been treated at the hands of the Government. By taking the necessary action to have this road operated again, the Government would confer a great benefit on the population of that region situated on the line of this railway.

Motion agreed to.

DUNCAN AND LARDO MINING DISTRICTS.

Mr. MARA moved for:

Return of a copy of the report of Mr. F. C. Gamble, resident engineer of the province of British Columbia, relating to the examination of the Duncan and Lardo Rivers, in the district of Kootenay?

He said: My object in moving for this return is to call the attention of the Government to that portion of the Kootenay district known as the Lardo section, a section that is believed to be as rich in minerals as the famous mining camps of Slocan, of Trail Creek and of Toad Mountain; but its progress has been retarded, owing to the dangers and difficulties of navigating the Duncan River and the cost of transporting supplies, mining tools and machinery, as well as the almost impossibility of moving ore out of the camp. The Slocan Camp, which is almost contiguous to Lardo, has passed the prospecting stage, and has now mines turning out thousands of tons of ore a year. Last year, ore of the value of over $1,000,000 was shipped from the Slocan, and it is believed that that amount will be more than trebled during the present year. The camp has many well-developed ledges, ledges that have been proved, either by sinking or by tapping at low levels, and are now considered to contain the largest bodies of high-grade argentiferous galena on this continent. Considerable work has been done in the Lardo district, and the following assays, furnished to me by reliable parties, will show that the prospects of this section are as good as were those of the Slocan three years ago:—

On 2-Mile Creek there are four prospects of low grade galena giving assays of 38 oz. silver, 60 per cent lead.

On Glacier Creek, three claims give assays from 125 to 400 oz. silver.

The Gallopp group of mines assay from 90 to 400 oz. silver.

On Houzer Creek there are large bodies of low grade galena averaging 50 oz. silver, 60 per cent lead.

On East River there are three claims of antimonial silver assaying from 200 to 600 oz. of silver.

On Bear Creek there are three prospects giving assays from 100 to 200 oz. silver.

Tributary to Hail's Creek, a number of prospects show galena, gray copper and gold, and also carrying stringers of high grade silver.

These are all tributary to Duncan River, and would be accessible, if the river were improved. The obstructions to navigation on that river consist of snags, log-jams and overhanging trees, which I am assured, can be removed at a comparatively small cost, and give 30 miles of navigation for powerful light-draft steamers, and will reduce the cost of freight from $50 to $5 per ton. The Kootenay district contributes more per head to the general revenue than any other part of Canada, and is thereby entitled to assistance in making its rivers navigable, so as to give easy access to miners and prospectors. I know no part of Canada where money can be more advantageously spent than in that part of Kootenay, because, for every dollar expended, the Government will for years to come reap a benefit of at least 100 per cent. I, therefore, wish to press the importance of this motion upon the hon. the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words, entirely in corroboration of the statement made by the hon. member (Mr. Mara). From my own personal observation in that section of the country, I am quite safe in saying that a small expenditure such as is recommended by the mover of this resolution (Mr. Mara), would be a proper and a profitable investment for the Dominion of Canada. I am told by gentlemen who are living there, that a very small expenditure indeed by the Dominion Government will open up the navigation, and that the cost of transport will be reduced from $50 as at present, to $5 a ton, or even less than that. I think this Government can be fairly asked to contribute something to open up this mining country, because I believe that to-day, mining is one of the great industries and interests which the Government of Canada should pay considerable attention to. There is no part of Canada—not on the surface either, but by actual tests—which has proven to be richer and more valuable in ores than the Kootenay district. In the Slocan and other districts they have already got past the experimental stage. They have explored and they have developed to some extent, and in many places they have actually begun the work of operating and producing the ore. I am safe in saying, that during the present season four or five million dollars worth of ore will be exported from the Kootenay district alone. In addition to that, there is an enormous revenue accruing to the Government, because those engaged in mining there consume the highest priced articles on which the highest duties are paid. They are thus contributing very largely to the revenues of the country. They are also opening up a portion of the country that is developing enormous mineral wealth, and while other portions of the world are receiving the attention of wealthy capitalists who are investing their money in mining enterprises, I think the Dominion of Canada would be justified in paying some attention to our own mineral resources, by inviting investment on the part of capitalists in Great Britain, and the United States, who are only awaiting the opportunity to make presumably profitable investments in these mining enterprises. There is no place in the world to-day where money can be more advantageously placed in mining than in the province of British Columbia, and more especially in the Kootenay district, to which reference has been made by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mara). I hope that not only will the report be brought down, but that the Government will see their way in this instance, to open up the navigation of the Duncan and Lardo Rivers, so that the valuable mines which have been prospected there and partly worked may be further developed. They cannot be properly worked under present circumstances, because as the hon. member states, the cost of freight alone is $50 or $60 a ton, and it would need to be a very profitable mine indeed that would stand this very heavy cost of transportation. I therefore think this portion of our Dominion should receive the generous assistance of the Government.

Mr. OUIMET. I am sure the House will agree with the hon. gentleman who moved this resolution (Mr. Mara), as regards the very great importance of that country where these improvements are asked for. Every day, that portion of the Dominion is developing in importance and in wealth, and I am sure that the House will not grudge the little expenditure that will be recommended in order to improve the facilities of transport in that region, so as to facilitate the working of those mines and the settlement of that part of the country. The Department of Public Works is fully alive to the importance of this matter, and they have already taken measures to ascertain what works in that direction are needed. They will certainly undertake these improvements if the cost is not altogether too great. The report will be brought down in a very few days.

Mr. MARTIN. I quite agree with all the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) has said in regard to the great capabilities of the Kootenay district of British Columbia. I had not the pleasure of hearing the remarks of the hon. member (Mr. Mara), so that I do not know what he said. So far as the improvement of the Duncan and Lardo Rivers is concerned, I would draw the attention of the member for Yale (Mr. Mara) to the character of the reply made by the Minister of Public Works. It might be called the stereotyped reply. It has been heard in this House for years and years and years, and it is heard more especially in this House on the eve of an election. I do not think the residents of the Kootenay district would be justified in placing any great amount of reliance upon the very general words which the Minister of Public Works used in regard to this matter. I have no doubt that the hon. gentleman who introduced the motion (Mr. Mara), will expect to use that statement as an evidence that the Government are pledged to improve these rivers. However, if the statement of the Minister of Public Works is examined, it pledges the Government to nothing whatever. His reservations leave plenty of loopholes, out of which the Government will very easily escape if they desire to do so. The treatment by the Government of the Kootenay district up to the present time, has been very unsatisfactory, and the people living there feel that the Government do not appreciate at all the great resources which that portion of British Columbia possesses. I hope that what has been said to-day by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) will bring strongly to the attention of the Government the great resources of that region, and will induce them, not only in this respect, but in many other respects, to deal, with more knowledge and more efficiency, with the interests of that portion of British Columbia. The Government do not seem to have been aware at all of the great developments that are taking place there, or the large increase of population that has taken place in the last year at certain parts, notably at the town of Rossland. I can say that, so far as the mail communications are concerned, the Government have been very much at fault, and the people are complaining. It is said that, when some important matters occurred not very far from the Kootenay district, it was two or three weeks before the newspapers reached them. The mail communications are very bad, and the Government do not appear to pay any attention to the just complaints of the settlers. They do not seem to appreciate the difficulties of the people there, and do not make any effort to open up new mail communications in order to give the people their mail matter in any kind of reasonable time. I am very glad that the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Mara) has at last waked up to the necessity of saying something in this House about his constituency. I do not know whether that arises at all from the fact that he has as an opponent a gentleman who is making a very active canvass and interesting himself very much in the hon. gentleman's constituency. Heretofore, the hon. gentleman has had the advantage of being elected by acclamation, and I am afraid that his safe position has, perhaps, inclined him to feel that it is not necessary to pay any very great attention to the needs of his constituents. However, I am very glad to see that he has improved in that respect, and that he is pressing upon the Government, not quietly or in the dark, but openly here on the floor of Parliament, as I claim a member should do, the necessity of their paying a good deal more attention than they have heretofore paid to the interests of that constituency.

Mr. MARA. Mr. Speaker, I am very much obliged to the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) for his kind assistance, as, indeed, I always am for any assistance that may be offered to me by any hon. member on the opposite side of the House. But it is quite evident that his assistance to-day is what might be called left-handed assistance—not that he wants to help me, nor to help Kootenay, but that he thinks that by dealing in generalities, and introducing matters that have no connection with the motion, he may do me a little harm, or help my opponent. If the hon. gentleman had been in his seat during the time he has been in Parliament as faithfully as I have been, or, if he would take the trouble to read the pages of "Hansard," he would know that not a single session has passed over in which I have not called the attention of the Government and the House to the importance of Kootenay, and the rich discoveries of that district, the advancement it has made in a short time, and to its wants and requirements. If he has not been here to listen to the remarks that I have made from time to time, and has not taken the trouble to read the pages of "Hansard," perhaps he will do so now. As he has referred to my silence, I will say this, that I have no hesitation in allowing his record in this House and mine to stand side by side. Whenever I do address the House, and it is not often, I am listened to carefully and attentively, and I have, perhaps, the satisfaction of knowing that what little I have had to say has received some attention at the hands of the Government. I hope I shall never be placed in the position in which we know one hon. member has been placed in, of being called to order ten or a dozen times in one day.

Mr. MARTIN. Does the hon. gentleman refer to the Secretary of State ?

Mr. MARA. I hope I shall never occupy the unenviable position of being threatened to be named by the Speaker, something which I do not know to have ever occurred before in the House of Commons. I hope that neither I nor any other member on this side of the House will place himself in such a position as to threaten to appeal from your decision, Mr. Speaker, or to require his leader, with shame and indignation, to interpose to prevent such an unseemly spectacle. Now, with regard to what is called the stereotyped reply of the Minister of Public Works to-day, I do not look upon it in that light. I may say that my attention was only called to this particular work last September, when I visited Kaslo in company with the hon. member for West York, who was at that time Controller of Customs. A deputation, headed by the mayor, waited upon me, and asked me, if I would bring to the attention of the Government the importance of improving this river, and they also asked the assistance of the hon. member for West York, who attended the meeting. I lost no time in bringing the matter to the attention of the Government ; and, although this interview took place in September, Mr. Gamble, the engineer, has already examined the river ; his report is in the Department of Public Works, and, I believe, he has recommended a small expenditure. I have also reason to believe that his recommendation and mine will be acted upon, and that this work will be done. Referring to mail communication, I know that there have been complaints, and serious complaints, by the people of Kootenay regarding the slow delivery of the mails during the winter. I have brought these complaints to the attention of the Postmaster General, and I believe that in nearly every case the grievances have been remedied. That papers were some two weeks on the road about two months ago, arose from the fact that, during a cold spell, a portion of the Columbia Lakes was closed by ice, and the inspector of post offices, fearing that that might occur again, the mails were, during that time, sent by the American system of railways around by Spokane, and took several days longer to reach their destination. One serious grievance the people of Kootenay have is, that they are unable to send registered letters direct from Trail, Rossland and Kaslo of Spokane. But this is a matter over which our Government have no control. Representations have, from time to time, been made by the Postmaster General to the Post Office Department and the American authorities, but they will only grant one registered pouch between Nelson and Spokane. Our Government have implored them to allow a registered mail to be sent from the different points I have named, but so far this privilege has been refused by the American government, and the blame naturally falls upon the shoulders of the Postmaster General and his department. However, I may say this with regard to mail matters, that the Postmaster General has always listened attentively to every complaint I have made. He has sent instructions to the post office inspector, and I believe that at present the mails are being carried as expeditiously as possible, and that every mail service which has been asked for in Kootenay has been granted.

Motion agreed to.

MR. F. C. GAMBLE'S REPORT ON THE COLUMBIA RIVER, B.C.

Mr. MARA moved for:

Return of a copy of Mr. F. C. Gamble's report relating to the examination and proposed improvement of the navigation of the Columbia River from Revelstoke to Beaver.

He said: The arguments I advanced in favour of the last motion are applicable to this one, so that I need not repeat them. There is a large stretch of the Columbia River, from the railway bridge at Revelstoke, which is navigable, and the Revelstoke Board of Trade have petitioned the Government to have some of the obstacles removed which, if done, it is believed, will induce parties to place a steamboat on that route. There is at present considerable traffic between Revelstoke and the mines to the north. Last year several American companies having purchased extensive gravel benches, are now about putting in hydraulic machinery. In a paper which has just come to hand, I observe the following item:—

> The first carload of machinery for the Columbia River Hydraulic Mining Company, who are operating on the Columbia just above the mouth of Smith Creek, arrived to-day from Chicago, and another carload has been despatched. This is pretty good evidence that this company means business and are preparing to conduct operations on a large scale. The owners are evidently satisfied with the report of their expert, Professor Mason, who spent the whole of last summer prospecting the ground, and who will return here Monday to superintend the erection of the plant. Tom Horne has the contract for boating the machinery up the river.

This hydraulic machinery and other large machinery has to be transported a distance of some thirty miles up the Columbia River in boats that will carry from eight to ten tons. The rates of freight are high, about $100 a ton. With a steamboat, the rate would possibly be reduced to about $10 a ton. This also is one of those improvements which, I think, the Kootenay district is entitled to, and I hope not only to get what is called a stereotyped reply, but to have that reply followed up by actions which speak louder than words.

Mr. OUIMET. I do not give what has been termed a stereotyped reply, but I have no objection to that qualification being given my answer in such cases, but the hon. gentleman should also admit that these answers are not only stereotyped in their terms, but in their sincerity as expressing the readiness of the department to inquire into every application and do everything they can in the way of effecting any useful improvement in any part of this country, by spending, to the best of their ability, and for the greatest good of the country, the very little money that is placed at their disposal. That I may claim credit for. Our department is fully alive to everyhing that is going on in the whole country without giving any undue preference to any particular section. To every need to which it is within our jurisdiction to attend, the department gives its greatest attention. To that extent, I have no objection to the hon. gentleman saying that to every application he has made upon the department and myself, our course has been stereotyped in this sense, that we are always ready to do all that can be done, as we shall do in the present instance.

Mr. MARTIN. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman I did not intend to say anything except this, that his answer to this, as to the other question with reference to the Duncan and Largo Rivers is the stereotyped answer of the Government, and it is very far from meaning that the Government have any intention whatever at present of giving assistance at all to the improvement of the Revelstoke River. I wish to point out that, in order that the hon. member for Yale may not do, as I anticipate he may possibly attempt to do, namely, show by the hon. gentleman's answer that the Government have decided to make these improvements. His answer, looked at in one light, might be susceptible of such a construction, but I desire to point out that he has not committed the Government in any way to do anything in this matter any more than he or his predecessors have done in years past with regard to a great many improvements concerning which the department have never done anything. The hon. gentleman, of course, says that he will consider the matter and give due weight to everything that he has heard, and do what he can, but what I wish to point out, for the information of the people of Yale, is that the hon. gentleman has not undertaken to do anything. As he says himself, he has simply given the stereotyped answer which is proper for all requests of this kind, that the Government will take them into their consideration. I reiterate what I said before, that in other parts of British Columbia, more especially in the newly-developed mining parts, the Government have been away behind the times. They have not given their aid, as they should have, to attracting to Canada the investments of large amounts of foreign capital. The only capital of any account that has been invested in the Kootenay district up to date is that invested by Americans. They have gone there because of their own knowledge of the country, having been engaged in mining in similar districts south of the line. The Americans have been large investors there and some of them have made fortunes in silver mining and gold mining. But the experience of South Africa has shown what large amounts of capital there are in the old country that can be made available for investment in mining enterprises. The amount of money that has gone from London to South Africa for investment in the mines there is simply fabulous. And I hold it to be the duty of this Government, having the administration of the affairs of a country so rich as the Kootenay country, to do everything in their power to bring capitalists to the district. It is certainly their duty to see that the settlers and miners who go in there shall have as fair treatment as the people of any other part of Canada in mail facilities and everything of that kind. And I charge—and in this I know I voice the feeling of the people in that country, for I read it in their newspapers from week to week—that they are being neglected especially in the matter of mail facilities by this Government. I am glad the hon. member for Yale has brought this matter openly before the House, in order that we may have an opportunity of drawing the attention through this debate to that part of his constituency. I shall not follow him in making personal attacks with regard to anything outside of his duty to his constituents. He is quite at liberty to attack me ; I fancy I can stand all the insinuations the hon. gentleman made against me. I do not know that calling me names and pointing out my delinquencies helps the hon. gentleman in regard to his delinquencies to his constituents. I fancy that when the hon. gentleman goes before his constituents for re-election and his failure to attend to the wants of his constituency are discussed, he will not be able to answer as he has attempted to answer in this House to-day by pointing to the fact that I am a very bad man and have done very bad things. His constituents will hardly accept an answer of that kind. They will hold him to a very strict account, especially as I see he is not going to be elected by acclamation. Not wishing him any harm, I hope he is not going to be elected at all. He will have to fight for his seat in any case and will have an opportunity to convince his constituents, if he can, that he has been attending to their interests in this House.

Mr. DALY. The hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) says it makes little difference to him what the hon. member for Yale says about him personally. I have no doubt of it, and it makes little difference to this House how the hon. member for Winnipeg chooses to conduct himself. He made an attack upon the hon. member for Yale and Cariboo (Mr. Mara) and insinuated that he had neglected his duties in that he did not bring to the attention of this House the requirements of his district. The hon. member for Yale and Cariboo was in this House for some years prior to the hon. member for Winnipeg, and I venture to say that there has been no more hard-working representative from any constituency in the Dominion that the hon. member has proved himself to be. It may be true that he does not take up the time of the House in useless discussions as the hon. member for Winnipeg does, but when he does address the House he speaks upon subjects which he can talk about with knowledge and he discusses every question fairly. Now it is within my knowledge, if not within the knowledge of the hon. member for Winnipeg, that through the efforts of the hon. member for Yale and Cariboo, subsidies of $3,200 per mile have been secured for over 100 miles of railway in the territory which he represents. There is the Columbia and Kootenay line from Robson to Nelson which was built with the aid of a grant of $3,200 per mile from this Government, secured through the efforts of the hon. member for Yale and Cariboo. There is the Nakusp and Slocan Railway, another railway that was built for the purpose of enabling the miners to get out their ores and get in their goods, a subsidy for which was secured in the same way. Then there is the Revelstoke and Arrow Lake Railway. The hon. member for Winnipeg will find that that railway was subsidized at the instance of the hon. member for Yale and Cariboo. Any one who has been through that country knows that these railways had to be constructed under great difficulties through heavy rock cuttings. The hon. member for Yale and Cariboo will receive the thanks of his constituents for having made the efforts he did and for having succeeded in getting the Government aid for these enterprises. Why, Sir, there is no other part of Canada that has a larger railway mileage for the number of its population than has this very Kootenay district, and that railway mileage has been secured largely through the efforts of the hon. member for Yale and Cariboo in getting subsidies for the railways I have mentioned. Another attack the hon. member for Winnipeg makes is based upon the statement that mails do not reach these points as regularly as could be desired. The hon. member for Yale explained that this was due to the unprecedented freezing of the Arrow Lakes—or rather not unprecedented, but unusual as to the length of time they remained frozen. The mail service was interrupted and the mails had to be sent around by Spokane. That is not the fault of the Government or the hon. member who represents that district. Facilities have been provided which are ample for ordinary seasons and by means of which mails, as a rule, run with the utmost regularity, I think the people in the Kootenay district will accept the statements of the hon. member for Winnipeg at their true value and will rather believe the hon. member for Yale and Cariboo, whom they have known as having large enterprises there and whom they have trusted for years. I say without fear of contradiction, as the Minister representing that province, that there is no more indefatigable member who has had business to do with my department than the hon. member for Yale and Cariboo. He has persistently endeavoured and has succeeded in getting at the hands of the Government everything he could for his constituency.

Mr. CASEY. It seems we have fallen upon an afternoon of stereotypes. First we had the stereotyped answer of the Minister of Public Works to the stereotyped pre-election question, and now we have the stereotyped statement of the Minister of the Interior.

Mr. DALY. We get your stereotyped voice.

Mr. OUIMET. You will never have the honour of being stereotyped.

Mr. CASEY. I hope not. The stereotype business belongs to the fossil side of this House, not the progressive side. The usual answer which the Minister of Public Works has given, is, he says, stereotyped sincerity also. Indeed his statement might have been drawn out with blanks in this way : My hon. friend the member for blank has asked about improvements at blank blank. I wish to say in answer to his question that, as this constituency has been often brought to the notice of the Government by my hon. friend from blank, we will give our attention to the question, and if it does not cost too much, we will do something for that constituency of blank. Then the member for blank, when he goes home, of course will use the stereotyped answer in the stereotyped way.

But my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior travelled a little out of the record so far as official answers on the floor of the House are concerned. He made, as I said, a stump speech, for it is only on the stump, and not usually across the floor of this House, that we hear it stated in an open and straightforward manner that justice was done to a certain part of the country, or that mail facilities were afforded, as a special favour to the member for that riding. Why, the Minister of the Interior says it was because the member for Yale asked the Government for this subsidy for 100 miles of one railway, and others whose length he did not give, at the rate of $3,200 per mile. That aid was given, not because the Government knew anything about the matter themselves, not in order to do justice to that district, not out of any desire to advance the interests of British Columbia, but because the member for Yale kept at the Government about it. Well, that is certainly a big advertisement for the member for Yale. It is just the sort of thing that is usually talked on the stump, but I have never heard a responsible Minister, if the hon. Minister be responsible, make such a statement across the floor of the House before. Sir, it is a most serious thing for the rest of the country to take into consideration. We are told here by a member of the Cabinet that these things were done just because the member for that riding kept at the Government about it. One hundred miles in one railway at $3,200 a mile——

Mr. DALY. The three railways together are 100 miles.

Mr. CASEY. Well, the country is called upon to pay that much for railways in the district of Yale, not because the Government know themselves that the district needs it, but because the member for Yale kept at them until he got them to do it. That is not my statement, but the statement of the Minister of the Interior. I am sure the Government is sorry that he exposed the proceeding so fully as he has done. It was far better to leave it in the stereotyped form as given by the Minister of Public Works, and to say that the Government would do all, and had done all, that the interests of the district called for from their own sense of justice.

Mr. LISTER. We have had to-day another of those amusing instances where the Minister of the Interior thinks that it is necessary to follow the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin).

Mr. DALY. To keep him straight.

Mr. LISTER. I have been in the House a good many years, the member for Winnipeg has been here for a couple of years, and I cannot recall a single instance of the member for Winnipeg getting up to address this House without being followed by the Minister of the Interior.

Mr. DALY. Lots of them.

Mr. LISTER. It is always necessary that the Minister of the Interior should follow the member for Winnipeg. When the Minister of the Interior thinks it necessary, in view of what has taken place here to-day, that he should give the member for Yale a certificate of character, he has certainly given him a very excellent certificate, but in giving that certificate to those who have read it and heard it, the question naturally suggests itself what is the motive for the hon. gentleman speaking so highly of the member for Yale. When we remember that the Minister of the Interior is a Minister of the Crown, with all the emoluments and honour that that position involves, and that he is anxious to retain the honourable position which he occupies, that in order to do that it is necessary that the member for Yale, as one of the members of this House, who has always given the Government a most slavish support, should be recollected, one cannot withstand and fully appreciate thoroughly the reason why the Minister of the Interior should have given that certificate of character to-day. Now, the Minister of the Interior complains that the member for Winnipg has taken up some of the time of this House. I have no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that if the Minister had his own way, nobody on this side would be allowed to oppose any measure introduced or agitated by the Government of the day. But fortunately, under the system of government which we have, every member is entitled to express his views, and to express them as fully as he pleases, notwithstanding the fact that the Government may not be pleased with what he says. The hon. member for Winnipeg would be recreant to his constituents and to the country at large if he did not make his voice heard here. Sir, it must be consoling to the people of Manitoba, of the North-west and of British Columbia that there is some man in this House willing and able to represent their interests, to lay them before the House and the country, and who does so whenever an opportunity presents itself. It was a most astounding statement for the Minister of the Interior to make that this Government should have aided a railway in British Columbia, not because the Government knew that the railway was necessary in the interest of the country, not because it was necessary for the development of the enormously rich mines which have been discovered in the Kootenay district; none of these reasons appear to have actuated the Government in granting the aid; but we are told now, on the eve of dissolution, when an election must take place within a few weeks at the furthest, that it was because the member for Yale asked the Government to vote $320,000 for that purpose. Therefore, what the Government did was not for the country, it was not for the purpose of developing the interests of that section of Canada, but simply because we are now told on the eve of an election in British Columbia, that the hon. member for Yale asks the Government to do what the Government says it has done. I suppose this railway is in the interest of that country, it is not for me to suggest even, Mr. Speaker, that while it may be in the interest of the country, and no doubt it is, it is greatly in the interest of many of the political friends of the hon. member for Yale, greatly in the interest, perhaps, of the hon. member himself, but greatly in the interest of many of his political friends in that section of the country. Sir, will the people of the country accept the statement of the Minister of Public Works? Will he accept the certificate of character by the Minister of the Interior at this particular juncture for just what these statements are worth? The Government are going to the country and they want to be returned, they are doing all they can do in that direction, and both these statements are made for the purpose of influencing the votes in that section of the country.

Motion agreed to.

IMMIGRATION OF BOYS INTO CANADA.

Mr. CASEY moved for:

Copies of all correspondence between the Department of the Interior and D. J. O'Donoghue, Secretary Legislative Committee, Trades and Labour Council, Toronto, concerning the alleged misquotation in the report of the Committee on Immigration, 1895, of a certain letter relating to the success of Dr. Barnardo's boys as settlers in Canada.

He said: In making this motion, I may explain briefly my reasons for doing so. In the report of the Agriculture Department last year, the question of the importation of boys and girls from Great Britain, through the Barnardo Home, was dealt with, and figures were given in the body of the report to show the success that attended that importation. These figures were said to be based on a letter produced before the committee by Mr. Burgess, Deputy Minister of the Department of the Interior, and received from Dr. Barnardo, or his agent, at Toronto. The statement made, by the report of the committee, was that at least 85 per cent of those boys who had come to Canada and arrived at adult age—the Barnardo boys—are now permanently established on farms managed or owned by themselves.

That clause of the report naturally attracted a great deal of notice throughout the country. It excited the notice of the different organizations of workingmen, who were startled to find a statement which they believed to be so incorrect, put forward on the authority of a parliamentary committee, and scattered broadcast over the world as such. The Trades and Labour Council of Toronto, in particular, through its secretary, Mr. D. J. O'Donoghue, at once began correspondence with the Department of the Interior in reference to this report. They got very little satisfaction. Sometimes it was reported to them that the deputy was not at home; at other times it was reported that the deputy did not know anything about the matter. So the correspondence went on, the representations of this important body being treated in a very slighting manner throughout. The Trades and Labour Council of Toronto is a most important body, and its representations deserve, and should have received the attention of the department. Every citizen has a right to make inquiries from a department, on business that comes within its purview ; still more so is that true with regard to an important organization which is instituting special inquiries, and such an organization should be treated with respect and its inquiries answered in the fullest possible way.

During this correspondence which I will not trouble the House to read—I have the end of it that comes from the Trades and Labour Council—continuing from August, last year, to January of the present year, the Department of the Interior never even took the trouble to send to Mr. O'Donoghue a copy of the full report and evidence of the Committee on Agriculture. It was not until Mr. O'Donoghue had called the attention of the chairman of that committee to the matter, and until I had reminded him of the matter in the House, that Mr. O'Donoghue received a copy of the report, which should have been furnished him at first by the Department of the Interior. I am not blaming the chairman of the committee, but I hold that it should have been furnished by the department, which should have placed him in possession of information in regard to the matter. When the correspondence is produced it will be found that the statement made in that letter was, not that 85 per cent of the Barnardo boys had settled on lands of their own, but that 85 per cent of the Barnardo children were living in Canada in houses of their own or as tenants, or with farmers, and were doing fairly well. That was the statement made in the letter : but the statement in the report of the committee was a misleading one, that 85 per cent of the boys had become landowners and permanent settlers in Canada. I have brought the matter up in order to call attention to the mistake in the report, and to obtain equal publicity for the correction of that mistake as was given to its publication ; to allow the Minister to speak for the Department of the Interior and to defend, if possible, the discourtesy of that department in dealing with an important organization ; and to allow the chairman of the Agriculture Committee to explain how it was that a statement at variance with the evidence laid before the committee got into the committee's report, to which he attached his name.

Mr. DALY. I have no objection to the correspondence being brought down. I think when it is laid on the Table the papers will not bear out the statement made by the hon. gentleman, that there was any neglect on the part of the department regarding the correspondence with, or the letters written by Mr. O'Donoghue on behalf of the Trades and Labour Council of Toronto. On the contrary, it will be established that on receipt of the first letter from Mr. O'Donoghue, Mr. Burgess, deputy of the department, whose evidence was in question, was not at home. A copy of Mr. O'Donoghue's letter was, however, sent to Mr. Owen, agent of Dr. Barnardo, and as soon as his reply was received, it was communicated to Mr. O'Donoghue. It appears that the fault lies entirely with the stenographer, or whoever it was who took down the evidence which Mr. Burgess gave before the Committee on Agriculture. With that report, Mr. Burgess and the Department of the Interior have nothing to do. Just so soon as the attention of the department was called to the matter, and the department was able to communicate the fact to Mr. O'Donoghue, the officials did so. There was no intention whatever to slight, in any way, the Trades and Labour Council of Toronto, which is an important labour organization. I never heard of the matter until the notice was placed on the Order paper. It appears that a letter had been received by the department from Mr. Alfred B. Owen, who wrote as follows :—

> Not a few boys, now grown to manhood, are well established on farms of their own, upon which they were originally set up by the farmers with whom they were placed on their first arrival in the country.

Later on, in speaking of the large percentage of the Barnardo boys, compared with other immigrants, who remained upon the land engaged in agriculture, Mr. Owen mentions 85 per cent of the whole number as a fair estimate, but nowhere does he state that at least 85 per cent of the children brought to Canada by these institutions, and arrived at adult age, are now permanently established on farms managed or owned by themselves. A copy of Mr. Owen's letter in the department bears this out. Mr. Burgess states that he never said that 85 per cent of the Barnardo boys are now permanently established on farms ; in fact, he made no such statement before the committee. The correspondence of Mr. Owen does not carry out the idea that such statement is made. I am very glad the hon. gentleman (Mr. Casey) has brought this matter to the attention of the House in order that the explanatory statement may be publicly made.

Mr. SPROULE. As the chairman of that committee last year, I may say that I do not think there was any intention to show any discourtesy to Mr. O'Donoghue, in not answering his letters, and I am quite sure that the accidental mistake that occurred was not intentional. The object of the committee in putting this letter in as part of the report was, that any one who read the report, could see just exactly what it contained, because it was from Mr. Owen, who was the representative of the Barnardo Home. In summarizing that letter, it was accidentally said that 85 per cent of those boys were settled on land of their own, instead of stating that they were established on the land, which was, I believe, the exact wording of the letter. The report was drawn up very hurriedly at the end of the session, because we had only one day to present it to the House. It was read over before the committee, and no member recognized the mistake, so that it inadvertently passed. However, it was not regarded as of very much importance one way or another, what the summary was, so long as the letter was there in full to be examined by any one who took sufficient interest in the report to read it. I can well understand the difficulty Mr. Burgess had in getting this information at the time Mr. O'Donoghue wrote first, because the report of the committee was then being printed, and Mr. Burgess did not have it at hand, so as to recognize the mistake. At the time the first letter came, it so happened that he was out of the country, attending to his official duties, but when it was brought to his attention, an answer was sent to Mr. O'Donoghue. I do not know that Mr. Burgess was able to ascertain, just then, where the mistake was, and, therefore, he could not give a satisfactory explanation to Mr. O'Donoghue as to it. At the beginning of the session, Mr. O'Donoghue wrote to me, as chairman of the committee, but, as I was not then chairman, I did not feel at liberty to answer in that capacity. After the committee was organized and I was appointed chairman, I sent Mr. O'Donoghue a copy of the report, and I drew his attention to the difference between the actual wording of the letter and the summary published. Since then, I have heard nothing more about it, and I presumed it was satisfactory to Mr. O'Donoghue. I repeat, again, that the mistake was quite accidental. There was no intentional disrespect intended to Mr. O'Donoghue, or to the class of men whom he represents. It was an accidental occurrence, and was not intended either to mislead the public, or to do anything that should not be done towards those gentlemen on whose behalf Mr. O'Donoghue was writing.

Motion agreed to.

MR. JOSEPH BELIVEAU.

Mr. BRUNEAU (translation) moved for :

Copies of all petitions, letters and correspondence in favour of an indemnity for Joseph Béliveau, for injuries incurred by him while working under the Public Works Department at Sorel.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to say but a few words in support of this motion. The hon. Minister of Public Works is well acquainted with the facts alluded to in my motion, and I believe that in the interest of that employee of the Public Works Department, it would only be fair for the Government to have an investigation made to ascertain the cause of that accident, and the circumstances under which Mr. Joseph Beliveau came to injure himself. I gather from the statute of 1893, that the Government paid a sum of $1,000 and a further sum of $500 to a workingman who had injured himself while in the Government service. I believe that it would be bare justice in a case like this, for the Government to have an investigation made as to the circumstances of the accident referred to in this motion, and to take such action as might be suggested by those charged to investigate the matter.

Motion agreed to.

INTERPROVINCIAL BRIDGE—NEPEAN POINT.

Mr. DEVLIN moved for :

Copies of all correspondence, papers, and documents, relating to the construction of a bridge at Nepean Point, in the city of Ottawa, and joining the provinces of Quebec and Ontario.

He said : Mr. Speaker, the motion has reference to the construction of what is known as the Nepean Point bridge, a bridge interprovincial in its character, and connecting the city of Ottawa with the city of Hull. On two or three previous occasions, when I had the honour of bringing this matter before the House, I put questions to the Government in regard to any aid they intended giving this bridge, and the answer made to me was, that the matter was receiving the consideration of the Government. I believe the Government have been approached by large deputations from the city of Ottawa and from the county of Ottawa, asking for aid towards this public enterprise, and, more than that, a circular of importance has, I believe, been addressed to the members of this House, laying the matter before them and setting forth the reasons why public aid should be given towards this bridge. It is an important work, and, when constructed, will be of great benefit to the city of Ottawa, to the city of Hull, and to the Ottawa and Gatineau valleys. There are many railway companies that are most anxious that this work should be proceeded with. I may mention, in particular, the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway, which has already received large aid from the Dominion of Canada and from the provincial government of Quebec, but it, nevertheless, cannot reach its point of destination in the city of Ottawa, owing to the fact that this bridge has not been constructed, and at the present time all trains belonging to that company have to use the bridge known as the Canadian Pacific Railway bridge. The delay in the construction of this bridge has also impeded greatly the progress of the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway. There is also the Ottawa and Gatineau Valley Railway, another important railway running through the county of Ottawa, which cannot reach the city except by means of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and which will not be able to reach the city independently until this bridge is constructed. I am led to understand that the Canada Atlantic, as well as various electric railway companies, have also an interest in the construction of the bridge. I said a moment ago that it is a work of interprovincial character. It will be of special benefit to two very important points in the two great provinces of Canada, Ontario and Quebec. Every member of this House knows that during recent years that portion of the city of Ottawa known as Lower Town has suffered in many ways. In a commercial sense it has certainly gone down, and this is attributed largely to the fact that the important railway depot which was there formerly has been removed to Upper Town, and that a great deal of the traffic which then found its way to that portion of the city has been lost to it. This bridge will be of great benefit to that portion of the city of Ottawa ; but I do not wish to deal with that aspect of the matter, because I know that anything in regard to it may be brought out with greater effectiveness and force by the representatives of the city of Ottawa in this House. I see one of those gentlemen in his seat, and he can, I know, ably set forth the claims of the city of Ottawa to the immediate construction of this bridge. It will be of vast benefit to the county of Ottawa, the county of Pontiac, and I may add the county of Argenteuil, because it will put these sections into communication with the city of Ottawa, the province of Ontario, and the great American markets to the east. There is perhaps no part of Canada richer in resources than that known as the Gatineau Valley. It is the seat of great mines, and the seat of unrevealed resources which will one day constitute a large portion of the wealth of this Dominion ; and the people of that valley look most anxiously to the construction of this bridge as a means of bringing their products to the best available markets. I have brought this matter to the attention of the Government in the hope that very substantial aid will be given for the construction of this bridge. The city of Ottawa some two years ago voted a large bonus to the enterprise ; but I believe conditions were attached which have rendered it impossible for the company to touch that bonus up to date. The Ontario government has likewise voted aid, and it is stated that the government of Quebec is only awaiting action on the part of the Government of the Dominion in order likewise to vote a certain sum. I hope that when the Estimates are brought down, in them will be found such a sum as will enable the company to proceed with this great work, which is one of interprovincial importance and of general advantage to Canada, and calculated especially to prove of immense benefit to the two provinces of Ontario and Quebec.

Mr. HAGGART. Mr. Speaker, I fully agree with the hon. member for Ottawa County (Mr. Devlin) in the remarks he has made with reference to the importance of the undertaking called the Nepean Point Bridge. I know the advantage it will be to the city of Ottawa, and to the different lines of railway which the hon. gentleman has mentioned—the Pontiac road, the Gatineau road, and the Canada Atlantic. I know that the people of the city of Ottawa, the county of Ottawa and the city of Hull have set their minds on this undertaking, and that it would be of immense advantage to this section of the country. Several deputations have waited on the Government to ask for aid to this undertaking, and the Government, I may say, are inclined to favour it. As the hon. gentleman says, the Ontario government and the Quebec government have shown their interest in the enterprise by contributing to it, and the city of Ottawa has done the same. I have not the slightest doubt that I shall be able to persuade my colleagues to put a sum in the Estimates for the assistance of the undertaking. I have no objection at all to bringing down the papers. The plans and estimates are in my office. The bridge is intended to be not only a railroad bridge, but a means of communication for vehicles and passengers. I will take the earliest opportunity of bringing down and laying on the Table the plans and all the correspondence in my possession.

Mr. LAURIER. I am afraid this is somewhat the kind of stereotyped answer of which we have heard this afternoon, though I am bound to say that the Minister of Railways is a little more explicit in his promise than his colleague the Minister of Public Works. I concur in every word that has been uttered by the hon. member for Ottawa County as to this work being one that deserves encouragement from this Parliament, if the resources of the country can stand it, as I believe they can. The work has been subsidized by the government of Ontario, and also, I believe, by the city of Ottawa, or is about to be ; and I understand that the government of Quebec is favourably disposed towards it. But, as the Government is aware, the subsidies lapse after a certain number of years ; so that if action is to be taken, it ought to be taken at once. As to the advisability of assisting the enterprise, I suppose both sides of the House are agreed. The question remains, of course, whether the condition of the public finances at this time would admit of aid being granted. If so, I am sure there would be no objection on the part of the House to according the grant which the Government propose.

Motion agreed to.

THE POSTMASTER AT PETERBOROUGH.

Mr. BURNHAM moved for :

Copies of all departmental orders reducing the salary of the postmaster at Peterborough, and all correspondence relating to the same.

He said : Mr. Speaker, in making this motion, I desire to ascertain the Government's reason for making the reduction in the salary of the postmaster. The present postmaster of Peterborough has occupied that position for some twenty-seven or thirty years. An inquiry was made by the Post Office Inspector at Toronto as to the revenues of the post office in the summer of 1894. The postmaster at Peterboro' heard nothing directly about it until about a month or two afterwards, when he ascertained that his salary had been reduced from $3.800 to $2,000 a year, and everybody acquainted with the facts, is of the opinion that he was very unfairly treated. A communication was sent him by the Postmaster General, giving the reasons for the reduction of his salary. It appears that during that year some irregularities were committed by a clerk in the registered letter office, and the clerk was tried by the police magistrate. He pleaded guilty, and was sent to penitentiary for a number of years. One of the reasons given by the Postmaster General why the salary of Colonel Rogers was reduced, was that it was part and parcel of the policy of the Government to reduce the salaries of these officials, who received very large salaries, amounting to $4,000 or $5,000 a year, and that he came within that category. That reduction was made in August, 1894, and from that time to this no official occupying a similar position has had his salary reduced. The hon. Postmaster General says that he made a reduction in the case of the postmasters at Brockville and St. Thomas, but in those cases the postmasters had died, and their successors reappointed at reduced salaries. I am not finding fault with the policy of the Government in reducing the salaries of postmasters to $2,000, which is a fair salary, but I contend, at all events, that the policy should be carried out on fair principles. I have shown the House that not one of those gentlemen holding similar positions has had his salary interfered with since. At a time when the revenue from the Peterboro' office was $17,000, the salary of the postmaster there was reduced from $3,800 to $2,000. For the purpose of comparison, I draw the attention of the Postmaster General and the House to the salaries paid other postmasters, which salaries have not at all been interfered with, and to the revenues from these offices, to show that most unjust discrimination has been exercised against the official at Peterboro' :

Post Office.	Revenue.	Salary.
Peterborough	$17,200 19	$3,800 00
Brantford	22,430 64	4,540 96
Chatham	14,506 76	3,360 00
Guelph	19,161 06	4,600 00
St. Catharines	14,689 79	3,500 00
Woodstock	15,202 00	3,600 00
Stratford	11,813 60	3,000 00
Lindsay	9,252 57	2,250 00
Port Hope	7,642 81	2,240 00

I do not object to the principle of reducing the salaries of these postmasters, where they get a higher salary than $2,000 a year, and where there is a Government building, but, in the case of Peterboro', the postmaster was an old and tried servant with a large salary, having children at college whom he was obliged to take from college, because of this reduction without notice. Another reason given for the reduction was, that certain irregularities had occurred in his office. Well, the irregularities complained of consisted of the abstraction of letters by this clerk, who confessed his guilt and was sentenced, and the postmaster was called upon to refund the moneys abstracted, which he did, although not legally bound to do so, so that he stands in the position of having been twice punished. The following is the statement made by the department :—

> Shortly after I became Postmaster General my attention was called to the very large salaries paid to some of the postmasters in the large towns in Ontario, varying from $3,500 to $4,500 a year, and I decided after considering the matter to reduce them all to a maximum of $2,000 a year, which it seems to me is quite sufficient. In pursuance of this decision I took advantage of the vacancy in the post office at St. Thomas and at Brockville to reduce the salaries of the postmasters at those places to $2,000 a year, and I have done the same at Vancouver.
> Towards the close of last session several letters were stolen from the Peterborough post office and the clerk to whom Colonel Rogers, the postmaster, had entrusted the management of the post office was convicted of the theft and sent to the penitentiary. During the investigation it transpired that Colonel Rogers had paid little or no attention to the work of the office, leaving it entirely to his assistant and other clerks. My attention was called to this state of affairs by several members of the House of Commons and I promised that I would at once carry out with regard to the Peterborough post office the decision I had previously come to—to reduce the salary of the postmaster to $2,000, and I do not see how I can reverse the action I took after a full discussion of the matter with these members who had brought it under my notice.

Now, there was no investigation held at the police court, because the clerk on trial pleaded guilty, so that the facts were not all brought out. It seems unfair to punish a man twice. It seems unfair, after calling on him to refund these moneys, which had been abstracted by this clerk, and after he had done so, to then reduce his salary. It has been stated also that the salaries paid by him to the clerks were so small as to subject them to temptation. But, when the department reduced Mr. Rogers' salary, they took over the same clerks, who had until then been paid by him, and have since paid them the same salaries ; so that there is nothing against Mr. Rogers in that argument. I bring this matter before the House because it is a case of unfair and unjust treatment to an old and respected officer, who has given faithful service, and who, according to the testimony laid before members of the Government by the leading business men of the place, has always given every attention to the duties of his office, so that there was nothing to warrant his being treated in this exceptional manner. If it be part of the policy of the Government to reduce these salaries, it is all right, but there is no fairness in their having singled out this particular man and interfering with nobody else.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. A question such as the one which the hon. gentleman has brought to the notice of the House could be much more conveniently discussed when the papers are brought down, because there are details and data in the official report which may not perfectly agree with those stated by the hon. gentleman. It had, therefore, been my intention, when the papers came down, to discuss the matter. I wish simply to-day to assure the hon. gentleman that there could be no possible reason why we should act unjustly towards the postmaster of Peterboro' (Mr. Rogers). There is no feeling of hostility on our part towards him. I never had the pleasure of meeting him until he came to Ottawa to discuss this question. I must also say that it is the policy of the Government, and, I think, one that is in the interests of the public at large, to reduce the salaries of postmasters in places like Peterboro'. In the case of Colonel Rogers, he was receiving very large pay over and above the salary stated, namely, some $1,100 for the rental of the boxes, and I thought that, comparing what he received with the salaries of officers in large centres, it was in the interests of the public to bring all these post offices under one common system as regards salary, which would be more in keeping with the work done and the revenue obtained from them. That is the reason why this change was made. We have been gradually operating the same system in various other post offices. The hon. gentleman states, as is quite possible, and I am quite prepared to accept his statement, that the circumstances which led to the change in other places were different from those which led to the change in this case. Some changes have been made in the case of postmasters who died and who were replaced by new nominees of the Government, who accepted the position at a reduced salary. That is quite true, but, as I have already stated, I do not wish to go into the question until the papers are laid on the Table of the House. When the papers are before us, I think I shall be able to show that there was no possible feeling of hostility, and no idea of perpetrating an injustice in the case of Col. Rogers. I think I may say that the salary which Col. Rogers is receiving now, though no doubt a large reduction from what he was receiving, is adequate to remunerate him for the work involved in his position and in proportion to the revenue of the post office. I am sorry that my hon. friend who has brought the matter up should have said that there could be the least feeling against Col. Rogers. As the hon. gentleman said, and as the papers will show, there were complaints made, but they were cleared away, and it was not because of those complaints that the reduction was made, but in accordance with the policy adopted by the department and applied to other post offices in a similar position to that of Peterboro'.

Mr. BURNHAM. As to what the Postmaster General has said, I desire to remind the House that I have not found fault with the principle, for I think that was quite proper, but I am complaining of the manner in which it was done. It was done without notice, and therefore there was an element of unfairness in it. As to the statement of the Postmaster General that Col. Rogers was getting a large salary through box rents, his net salary, as I have stated, was $3,800. Out of the box rents he had to pay the rent and other expenses.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. It was a large salary.

Mr. BURNHAM. It was $3,800—too large.

Motion agreed to.

DREDGING AT THE MOUTH OF THE THAMES.

Mr. CAMPBELL moved for :

Return showing how much money has been expended by the Government in dredging at the mouth of the River Thames, Ont., since the year 1887. To whom the said amounts were paid, and the nature of the work done. Also, copies of all documents, letters, telegrams and petitions asking for further sums to be expended at that point or bearing on the subject.

He said : During the few years I have had the honour of occupying a seat in this House I have on many occasions called the attention of the Minister of Public Works to the importance of the work mentioned in this motion. The point where dredging should be done is at the mouth of the River Thames in the county of Kent. This is a navigable stream for twenty-five miles from its mouth. For the whole of that distance it runs through a fine section of country past the city of Chatham. The river is navigable for vessels drawing twenty feet of water, but, unfortunately, at the mouth of the river a bar has formed which prevents the entrance of vessels drawing more than about seven or seven and a half feet. This impediment to navigation is a very serious hindrance to trade in that part of the country, as large vessels coming in have to have their cargoes transferred or lightened before they can cross that bar. I have not been altogether unsuccessful in my efforts to call the attention of the Minister of Public Works to this important subject. About three years ago the Minister placed in the Estimates a sum sufficient to dredge a channel through the bar. This, of course, was only a temporary work, and we hope that a permanent work will be constructed there at an early day. The temporary work then done has since been obliterated, the channel that was dredged through the bar having filled up. Great pressure has been brought to bear upon the Government during the last two years to have the channel cut anew. The boards of trade and the city council of Chatham have presented petitions and memorials, and deputations have waited upon the Minister of Public Works asking that this work should be done. Last year the Minister promised me faithfully that the work should be done. At the close of the session he said that as soon as the session was over he would have the dredge go up there and cut a channel through the bar. I fully expected that he would carry out his promise ; but unfortunately he did not do so. An officer of the department went up there and made certain inquiries, but that was the end of it, no more being done.

Now, the work can be very easily done. There are two dredging companies in the city of Chatham ; they have large and powerful dredges, and would be glad to undertake this work, provided the Government did not send one of their own dredges. But it could be easily done by one of the dredging companies there, who would undertake it at a very reasonable expense, and would do the work in a very short time. Now, the people would like, of course, to have a permanent work done to obviate the necessity of asking the channel to be dredged out every year. But, failing to get that, they would be satisfied if a certain amount of money were appropriated for dredging yearly, and a certain amount of dredging was done, so that vessels could go across the bar and get into deep water. I think, Mr. Speaker, that the attention of the department having been called so often and so persistently to this matter, and they having promised over and over again that they would attend to it, it is now their duty to see that this work is done without any further delay. It is, I need scarcely say, of the utmost importance to the people of that part of the county. I would like to hear from the Minister of Public Works what he proposes to do in reference to this matter.

Mr. McGREGOR. I endorse every word that has fallen from the lips of my hon. friend from Kent (Mr. Campbell) with reference to the necessity for that work. The River Thames is quite an important river, and we all know that the city of Chatham, in whose interest we ask that this work be done, is a nice little city of about 10,000 inhabitants, who are very industrious and enterprising. There is deep water on this side of that particular obstruction, the member for Kent speaks about, and deep water on the other side. Now, there are two good dredging companies at Chatham, and this Government has a dredge lying at Amherstburg, called the "Ontario" that could remove that obstruction in less than three weeks. The amount of shipping passing through that channel is quite large. The larger portion of the lumber required in that district is taken in through that channel, and the necessity of changing from larger vessels to those of a smaller size by reason of this obstruction, makes the cost of transport much greater. Then the coal going to the western districts is increased in price for the same reason. I may also mention that the clay in the neighbourhood of Chatham is of a good quality for the purpose of making brick. That brick has to go down in small boats rather than large ones, which increases the cost of the bricks, so that the cost of transportation is increased both for the coal and lumber coming in, and for the brick going out. Moreover, there is a large agricultural district in the vicinity which ships large quantities of wheat, beans, and other products of that kind, and the boats have to be much smaller than they would need to be if that obstruction was removed. If a permanent structure was made there, I think it would not cost more than $10,000 or $12,000 to keep the water in a small space so that the sand would not spread where it does. I hope that the Minister of Public Works will see his way clear to allow a sum to be placed in the Estimates for the purpose of clearing out that obstruction, and assisting the people in that district.

Mr. OUIMET. All the papers will be brought down and laid before the House. It was the intention of the department to have some dredging done last summer, but they could not secure the services of a dredge. The matter will be attended to at the opening of navigation.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). This is a very important work, and if I remember rightly, there is a considerable portion of a former work done here that has never been paid for. There are claims standing against the department on the part of Mr. McKay, who says that he did work there for more than three times the amount for which the Government have ever given him compensation, and that he has been unable to get compensation for the balance. I hope that when the hon. gentleman takes into consideration the propriety of dredging the Thames and making provision for it—because, as regards the propriety, there can be no doubt—he will also consider the other matter which I have mentioned, and the papers concerning which, I think, were in his department before he actually became a Minister. Then I would remind the hon. gentleman that there is another matter which requires his attention. There is another river in the immediate vicinity in which he and one of his colleagues, on two successive sessions in the House, have promised to remove obstructions and to secure proper dredging. I may tell the hon. gentleman that vessels, during the whole of the period of navigation last summer, were obliged to lighten and to put off a considerable portion of their cargo in coming up to Sydenham. I trust these matters will receive the immediate attention of the hon. gentleman and his colleague, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

Motion agreed to.

After Recess.

MANITOBA AND NELSON VALLEY RAILWAY.

House resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 65) to incorporate the Manitoba and Nelson Valley Railway Company.—(Mr. Davis.)

(In the Committee.)

On section 3,

Mr. DAVIS moved :

That the word Gladstone be substituted for Arden.

Mr. LISTER. What is the distance between the two points ?

Mr. DAVIS. Sixteen miles. Arden is west of Gladstone.

Mr. MULOCK. I observe that a reference is provided to the Minister of Railways. It is not usual to leave an agreement at the discretion of an individual member of the Government. This discretion should be left to the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, although practically the discretion will be in the hands of the Minister.

Mr. MASSON. In the case of the Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo Bill, discretion was left to the Minister of Railways. Action can be taken more quickly in that way.

Mr. MULOCK. I am not in favour of too rapid action being taken in regard to the assent of the Government to railway amalgamations and agreements affecting public rights. A little more deliberation will be in the interest of the enterprise.

Mr. HAGGART. I have no objection to the suggested change.

Mr. LISTER. The company seeking incorporation under this Bill is taking a very wide range for their operations. The Bill provides that the line shall commence at or near Winnipeg or between Winnipeg and Portage la Prairie and run west. What is to be the length of the line ?

Mr. HAGGART. For some distance it will parallel the Manitoba and Northwestern. If that company objects to this new company paralleling the route, there is the opportunity afforded of entering into an amalgamation. This road will practically parallel lines running up to Edmonton.

Mr. LISTER. The capital, $1,000,000, seems to be very insignificant in view of the magnitude of the undertaking.

Mr. SCRIVER. It was increased in committee from $500,000.

Mr. LISTER. It seems to me that this is not the kind of charter that should be given to any body of men. Under this charter they have power to construct a road of 1,500 miles, with a capital stock of $1,000,000, upon which it is only necessary to pay 10 per cent, or $100,000. I do not think the time of this Parliament should be taken up in granting charters for visionary companies, which are only intended to prevent genuine companies from going on with the work. It is important, in the interests of the province, that the charters granted by this Parliament should be for bona fide undertakings. On the face of it, this charter is for the purpose of speculation, or the intention is, to have the road built by subventions of public money. There can be no municipalities there to grant aid. I move that the capital stock of this company be $5,000,000 with 10 per cent paid up.

Mr. CASEY. My opinion is that we should throw out this charter altogether, as well as all such wild-cat schemes. It is a wild-cat scheme to propose to build a road of such length as this with even $5,000,000 capital. The late Hon. Thomas White once spoke of the North-west as going to be permeated, before long, with a gridiron of railways. Well, Sir, it is permeated with such a gridiron now, but the railways are all on paper. It is a distinct drawback to the progress of that prairie country, which is suffering for the want of real railways, to be putting through this House such a great number of paper railways every year. The responsibility for this largely rests with the Government. I do not know whether the promoters of this Bill are friends of theirs or not, but the Government have been too willing to support the passage of imaginary railway schemes through this House. The promoters of this Bill may happen to induce some speculator to purchase this charter, and to make it valuable to some extent, by frightening off intending competitors. That is the only good that can come of it. I repeat that these schemes injure Manitoba, and I shall support the amendment of my hon. friend (Mr. Lister). I do not suppose that this company can even put up the $100,000 required under the Bill, as at present, not to speak of the $500,000 which would be necessary, if the amendment is passed.

Mr. HAGGART. The Government were not at all interested in the Bill. It was considered very fully in the Railway Committee, and there was no objection taken to the amount of capital. The promoters stated their case before that committee, and I am not aware that I even spoke a word on the subject.

Mr. CASEY. I do not say that the Government is interested in this Bill, but the Minister knows quite well that no Bill is likely to go through the Railway Committee without the consent of the Government. I repeat that the Government is too willing to give their endorsation to schemes of this kind. It was supposed by most of those present at the Railway Committee, that an amendment was carried there to increase the capital stock. I complain that the Government did not perform their duty, as guardians of public legislation, when they do not oppose such schemes as this.

Mr. LISTER. I have not in any way reflected upon the Minister of Railways in the matter.

Mr. HAGGART. I referred to the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Casey).

Mr. LISTER. I do not say that the Government are interested in any way in this Bill. It is a matter that concerns the House alone. Without any intention of being careless in the Railway Committee, it nevertheless happens that Bills often pass there which are not criticised as carefully as they might be. The rule of the committee has always been to make the capital stock of the company in some way commensurate with the magnitude of the work they undertake. If I had been present at the Railway Committee, I certainly would have moved to increase the capital stock. It is ridiculous to say that a road 2,000 miles long should only have a capital of $100,000 paid up.

Mr. DALY. Taking the main line and its branches, it cannot be over 1,300 miles.

Mr. DALY. No.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman thinks it is not absurd to charter a company to build 1,300 miles of railway with a capital of $1,000,000, and $100,000 paid up. I do not think the hon. gentleman is as gullible as he pretends to be. I have no doubt that he knows it is absurd, and he supports this absurdity.

Mr. MULOCK. I do not know that it makes much difference what amount of capital stock is required in these companies, because the stock in railway companies has come to be regarded simply as a means of controlling the company and not as a means of building the road. I think our Railway Act provides that such stock may be given in payment, for certain classes of services, or that it may be sold at a discount. I suppose it may be given away. On the face of it, to any one not familiar with our practice and law, it does suggest rather a sham institution. For instance, in a railway company to build 650 miles of railway with a capital stock of $1,000,000, even if it were all paid up in solid cash, the proprietors would not be putting in $1,500 a mile, which would go a very short distance towards the building of the road. The railway would have no very substantial pecuniary foundation so far as the promoters were concerned, and it would only become successful according as the promoters were able to put it upon the public, either by selling bonds or by obtaining Government aid. I think this Bill, on the fact of it, is a Bill to create a charter to enable a certain set of men to use their best energies to float a scheme with other people's money. If they succeed, I suppose they may make something ; if they fail, they will practically lose nothing. I have myself frequently argued against the laxity of the Railway Committee in allowing too much capital stock to be issued. I have never up to this moment heard a complaint made that too little was issued, as the stock is only to enable the promoters to control the franchise, and they can do that just as well with a million as with any other amount, no matter what it is. It might all be given away to promoters and engineers, or in payment for right of way or for materials, or to contractors as an addition to the contract price, which practically means that the stock by which companies are controlled is not expected to pay a dividend. It is never quoted in the market ; it has no market value at all ; and the contractor, when he enters into a contract to build the road, stipulates that he shall have the bonds and the stock so that he shall be able to operate it and in that way make the bonds good and get his pay. I attach no importance whatever to the point taken as to the amount of the stock.

Mr. EDGAR. I understand that the bonding power of this company is $20,000 a mile. I do not entirely agree with my hon. friend from North York (Mr. Mulock) that the question of the amount of capital stock is of no consequence. In the committee we have always tried to have some reasonable amount of capital stock provided for, in proportion to the length of road. Now, if this company have power to bond the road to the amount of $20,000 a mile, I am sure it would be very reasonable to suggest that $5,000 a mile should be the limit of the capital stock. If there are 1,300 miles of railway, $5,000 a mile would make a capital stock of $6,500,000. That is certainly a very small amount, considering the average usually required in railway charters, as the hon. Minister of Railways knows. When the attention of the Committee of the whole House is drawn to the fact that the capital stock here provide for amounts to less than $1,000 a mile I really think that makes the thing ridiculous. You might as well have no capital stock at all. Of course, in fixing the amount of the capital stock, we do not bind the company to raise it all. They can go on and do it gradually. I think an amendment of that kind should be made, and if the objection is taken that no notice has been given, I think that the committee ought to rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again, so that notice may be given for that purpose.

Mr. McMULLEN. It appears to me, considering the number of charters granted this year for railways in the North-west, that we are making a mistake in granting railway charters in this unlimited way, to almost everybody and anybody who applies for them, without having any information as to the means of the promoters to go on and build the road or to sell the charter. My own impression is, and has been for some time, that we grant railway charters altogether too easily. So many charters have been granted for railways in the North-west that they are paralleling each other and crossing each other in all directions. Why, Sir, we have granted enough railway charters in this House in the last seven or eight years to practically gridiron the whole North-west with railways. What has become of them? We know that in many cases the people controlling these charters come back to this House to get their charters renewed. We have renewed several this session. How is that? Simply because there is no financial bottom to the schemes when they are started. A number of men come and ask Parliament to grant them a charter for the building of a railway. After they have held the charter for a number of years, and the time has expired, they come back with a short, simple-looking little Bill to revive the charter and extend the time for another five years. We have been extending charters for railways on which no money has been spent. Now, I think it is time the Government should outline a policy with regard to railways, which every company seeking incorporation should comply with. In the first place, they should be required to present as directors the names of a number of men who have financial standing, and who would command the confidence of the public in carrying through the construction of the line; and in the next place, the capital stock of every company should be proportionate to the number of miles of railway for which the charter is asked. For instance, take this line which we are now considering. The length of the line proposed, as the hon. Minister of the Interior has said, is about 1,300 miles, and the proposed capital of the company is $1,000,000, of which 10 per cent is to be paid up, or $100,000. That amount of $100,000, scattered over the 1,300 miles, would just make $76 per mile, or not as much as would pay for putting in one culvert on each mile of road. Now, it is perfectly absurd to ask this House to sanction the bringing into life of a scheme for the construction of a road, for which only $76 per mile of capital stock is paid up. I do think that the proposition of the hon. member for Lambton is a reasonable one, and that we should refer the Bill back to the Committee on Railways, in order that the capital stock of the company may be increased. As regards the reading of the several clauses of the Bill, it is well known that in the Railway Committee, every clause is read; and certainly the committee of this House, which should be considered as important as the Railway Committee, should insist on having this Bill read clause by clause so that we may know what we are doing. We have, in the past, been altogether too lax in criticising Bills of this kind; and although it may be late in the day to adopt a different policy with regard to railway legislation, still, I submit that, even at this late hour, the Government should prepare an outline of the conditions to be complied with by every company seeking a charter for the construction of a railway, particularly in the North-west, and let those charters that have been brought into existence by past legislation die out as they mature, without anything being done. Do not renew a single one of those charters, and compel companies wanting new charters to comply with the terms stipulated, so that there will be some reasonable expectation that when a charter is given, the road will be built. Take the case of the Great North-west Central, which was a company that had as bright a future before it as any that was ever chartered. The capital stock of that company was very small, and it is well known that the parties who got the charter were doing everything they could to sell it. They succeeded, also, in getting a large grant of land, with the result that there was such a bonanza in the scheme the promoters commenced quarrelling amongst themselves. One section of them claimed to be chartered members, and the other section made an equal claim, and they fought it out in the courts among themselves for a long time. Now, if there was any part of the North-west that required a railway, it was that section through which the Great North-west Central was located; but owing to the charter having fallen into the wrong hands, the undertaking was put off from month to month, and from year to year, and although the people in that section were petitioning in the strongest terms, month after month and year after year, for the railway accommodation of which they were in absolute want, they could not succeed in obtaining it. We ought not to grant a charter unless we have the most positive assurance that there is strong financial backing behind its promoters. Now, in this case, we have two men from England, supposed to be chartered members and three Canadians, seeking a charter. I do not know that there was any evidence before the committee that these men in England asked that their names should be associated with the enterprise, and it is quite possible that their names have been used to give an air of strength to this scheme. These two men from England and three Canadians are the chartered members of this company for the construction of 1,300 miles of road, and we have no evidence whatever that they have any financial backing, or that there is any likelihood of the road being built. They want to get this charter, with a capital stock of a million dollars, of which $100,000 are to be paid up, or about $76 per mile. In order to test the feeling in the committee, I move that it rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again. I make this motion in order that the Bill may be referred back to the Railway Committee and have the capital stock increased. The financial ability of any of these parties seeking incorporation is absolutely unknown, and the probability is that we will have them before us again asking for a large land grant. We have already given away an enormous amount of land in the North-west to railway companies—over 44,000,000 acres. When the Canadian Pacific Railway was built, according to the hon. Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper), we were to be recouped by the year 1890 for every dollar of money that we put into the construction of that road out of the lands which its construction would render valuable. But in place of getting money out of the public lands, we have been giving them away to every new company that has been chartered, and the result is we have possibly given away over 44,000,000 acres of the best land in the North-west to railway companies; and in many cases the parties who got the charters and these grants of land are peddling round their charters in the hope of selling them and making something out of them. It is time we should put a stop to this business and try to get down to something like a sensible basis. I, therefore, move that the committee do now rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. HAGGART. I suppose that we cannot alter in the committee the amount of capital that is fixed in the Bill from a million dollars to a larger amount, but I am a good deal of the opinion of the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) that it does not make much difference what the amount of capital is.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Why?

Mr. HAGGART. Because only 10 per cent is paid up, and as a rule not one cent of that goes into the construction of the road. I do not know what the rules of the committee are, but I would have no objection to make the capital two and a half million dollars, if the House will consent.

Mr. McMULLEN. If the capital be made two and a half million dollars, I am willing to withdraw my motion.

Mr. CASEY. When the motion was made to increase the capital to five million dollars, the chairman ruled it out of order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Such a motion is out of order, but, with the unanimous consent of the House, any rule can be dispensed with.

Mr. CASEY. I am not objecting to the motion, but I wish to refer to the statement that it does not make any difference what the capital of the company is. The Minister has already admitted that the capital is distributed for various reasons, and does not go into construction at all. But the men who put up the capital called for in the Bill, control the fortunes of the railway and control all the other capital put into it. The effect of such a charter is to give men of straw control of a franchise affecting an important part of the country, and, possibly, to prevent railway construction even where it is needed in the interest of the settlers. This method of granting charters, I believe, is doing more to keep back Manitoba than even the vicious trade policy of this Government, and that is saying a great deal. When you ask English capitalists to invest in a scheme with real merit, their answer is: What is the use? There are half a dozen charters over that road already. Why is it that English capital is going to every part of the world except to Canada? It is largely because of this system of paste-board companies that we are chartering here. This railway practically does cover ground covered by a company previously chartered.

Mr. MULOCK. But it has not built any railway.

Mr. CASEY. If I am not mistaken, it covers the same ground as the Winnipeg and Great Northern, better known, perhaps, as the Hudson's Bay road. I am not saying that that has made progress, but that is largely because the Lake Dauphin and other roads have been chartered over the same ground. If you charter a new road over the same ground every year, you diminish the chances of any one road getting the Government subsidies, and for this and other reasons you diminish the chances of the construction of the road. Under these circumstances, I would have supported the resolution of my hon. friend from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen)——

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. He has taken it back.

Mr. CASEY. If he takes it back, very well. But, if the Bill is not amended to look a little less farcical before it goes through committee, I shall move such a resolution myself.

Mr. MACDOWALL. I would like to say a few words with respect to the motion of the hon. member for North Wellington.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. It is withdrawn.

Mr. FRASER. I do not think there is much in the contention about the amount of capital. No person will engage in an enterprise of this kind simply because they see five million dollars mentioned in the charter. They will inquire very carefully how much money has been paid up on the stock, before they go into the enterprise. They will not go merely by the words of the charter. There are many ways of paying up 10 per cent without paying anything, to use an Irishism. The solvency of the company may sometimes be better assured by naming a capital of one or two hundred thousand dollars than by naming twenty millions. The real objection that I see to this Bill is that which was raised before. I suppose more companies with large capital are incorporated by this Parliament and other parliaments that are never heard of again, than is the case with the smaller ones. When you go to an ordinary man with a scheme calling for half a million, you are more likely to get a subscriber than if you have ten or twenty millions as the nominal capital. In the latter case, men are apt to say : This is an immense enterprise, and there must be some extraordinary attractions about it. I believe that a Bill like this, granting important franchises over a large area, is not in the interest of the people of this country. Believing, as I do, that that which the Creator has provided for all, should be kept for the benefit of all, I think that such charters should not be given to the few. A company like this spreads over an immense area. You give them large land grants, power to control the navigation of rivers, power to impose tolls. That is, you give to the few that which enables them to benefit at the expense of the many, and it is the many whose benefit we seek, or ought to seek. As to the other objection, I do not see much in it. I am sure that, if the hon. member who has spoken, were asked to invest in the scheme, he would look at it very carefully, and I do not think he would be more ready to put in his money because the nominal capital was given at five millions, rather than half a million. With his well-known shrewdness, he would consider what expenditure would have to be made upon the works, and he would calculate very carefully the trade that might be had. If any member of this House thinks that capitalists are going to be secured by the difference between five millions and half a million of nominal capital, he is mistaken. He will never get capital in this way, and if this Parliament passes an Act mentioning twenty, twenty-five, fifty or a hundred million dollars, it would not bring a dollar of capital into Canada, but rather prevent capital from coming in, by showing that this Parliament was granting to a company franchises that, when they were fully inquired into, would be found to be altogether out of any proportion to the amount of capital mentioned in the Bill.

Mr. CASEY. That is just what they are doing.

Mr. FRASER. But that is not the question. The question raised was whether there was large enough capital mentioned in the Bill. I say that makes no difference. It is the enterprise, and the return that is to be got from the enterprise, that will be considered. It is all these things that make the Bill when it goes before the money-lending world. I enter my protest, believing that this is not in the best interest of the people of Canada, which alone ought to be considered. I fear that when we pass Bills like this, we have only an eye single to the men who ask for incorporation, instead of looking at the way they will affect the interests of the people of this country.

Mr. MULOCK. I would be sorry to see any gentleman, at this stage, take grounds against granting charters to railways simply because there are others on paper. In the United States they have free trade in railways, and the only thing that prevents any railway being built is because some other company has actually constructed a railway : and when money is invested or liabilities created on the faith of a charter, we must take care not to destroy capital. But if there is no existing company, if there be no investment of capital, we are doing a foolish thing not to encourage the promoters. I would grant a dozen charters for this work, and let the first one who can occupy the territory within a reasonable time. I think we should pass this Bill and be done with it without any more delay.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I do not agree with the remarks of the hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Fraser) that the capital is out of proportion. I think we have over and over again increased the capital stock of companies. The Minister of Railways has been very careful on that point. All Bills that have been before the Railway Committee have been scrutinized by him very carefully. I can recollect instances in which he has increased the capital stock of a company over and over again. Now, it does seem to me that he cannot surely have paid any attention to this Bill, or else the Minister of Railways, with the great attention that he gives to all Bills, would not have allowed a Bill like this to pass through the Railway Committee. What are the facts ? Here is a railway that is admitted to be 1,300 miles long, that I suppose cannot be built for less than $10,000 or $20,- 000 a mile. At the least computation, that would make thirteen million dollars required to build that road. Now, this company asks for extraordinary powers. They ask for power to build steamships, they ask for power to build canals, to complete navigation, to put steam tugs and barges on these canals ; and they also ask for power to erect grain elevators, and to erect docks and wharfs. Then they want power to erect a telegraph and telephone line along the whole line of their railway for the accommodation of the public. Here we are actually chartering a new telegraph company for 1,300 miles. Now, this company comes forward, and we propose to give them a charter, with all these franchises, with a capital stock of only a million dollars, about one-twentieth of what it will cost, and with a capital paid up of only 10 per cent, or $100,000. And with all these enormous privileges and franchises we are giving them, we propose to send them afloat with the mere pittance of a capital of $100,000. Not only are we giving them these immense franchises, but I see we are giving them power to bond the road to the extent of $20,000 a mile, and yet they want us to put through this Bill with the terms here mentioned. I think the Minister of Railways must have overlooked the provisions of this Bill, else he would not have allowed it to pass. I think more capital should be paid up. We should not charter a company like this with a capital of only $100,000. If they want to construct the road, let them put in some substantial sum that will ensure the completion of the work, and show the good faith of the men interested in this concern. I would rather that the member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister) had moved that a larger sum should be paid up, as well as increasing the capital. I am certainly opposed to the Bill in the way it stands now.

Mr. MARTIN. I entirely agree with those members of the committee who are averse to so many schemes being before the public at the back of which there is no money. I may say that when this Bill was before the Railway Committee I asked the promoter if he had the money ready or if there was any prospect of getting the money to build the railway, and he gave me a very unsatisfactory answer. Practically at the time, I understood that they had no money, that it was a mere paper charter. That being the case, I cannot agree with the views of the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) and the hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Fraser). It seems to me that the capital stock is of considerable importance, because it is a question of bona fides. That provision of this Bill which provides for the paying up of 10 per cent of the capital, what is that put in for ? It is put in for the purpose of making something substantial in some way. Now, if the capital stock don't make any difference, why not make it $100 ? Suppose we put in here a capital stock of $100, and say that it may be called up by the directors from time to time, 50 cents or 75 cents at a time.

Mr. FRASER. All right, they would not go on. That would be a good feature.

Mr. MARTIN. It shows that the capital stock is a matter of some importance ; and, as has been said by other members, it has always been considered in the Railway Committee of importance to insist that there should be some reasonable approximation to the cost of the enterprise in connection with the capital stock. I am in favour of introducing into these charters the most stringent provisions to prevent them from being used as subjects of speculation. I believe, as other members of the committee have said, that there has been a great deal of harm done in the different parts of Canada and I can substantiate everything that has been said by the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) as to the Great North-west Central Railway Company, which has been before this House on many occasions. There is no question at all that the chartering of that road, and the giving of the land grant has actually prevented the building of railways in that part of Manitoba through which it runs. It was chartered to run on the lines of the old Mackenzie survey of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and on the faith of the Canadian Pacific Railway being surveyed along that route, away back in 1879 and 1880 a large number of settlers went in and settled along the line of that railway. The Great North-western Railway obtained a land grant with which to build a road. The result of the whole matter, however, was that a road was not built through a section of Manitoba where a railway is specially required. A certain section of the road was constructed under such adverse circumstances that the company have never been able to operate it properly. A few days ago, the Supreme Court gave a final judgment, as the result of a course of litigation between different parties in connection with the road, but, no doubt, the case will go to the Privy Council. The whole trouble arose from the loose way in which this Parliament considers the question of granting railway charters. Here is a Bill, which is, on its face, a most important one, and is for the purpose of enabling a company to build a railway from the province of Manitoba or the North-west Territories to Hudson's Bay. As I have already shown to the House, the question of railway connection with Hudson's Bay is a very important one in regard to the North-west. Here is a proposition to start up another company, and, while it may be said that the chartering of the company does not give the company any bonus, still, it is apparent, from the provisions of this Bill, especially those portions dealing with a contemplated land grant, that a bonus is expected.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Time.

The time for private bills having expired, the committee rose.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

House resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 16) respecting the House of Commons.—(Mr. McCarthy.)

(In the Committee.)

On section 3,

Mr. MACDOWALL. Would the hon. gentleman explain ?

Mr. McCARTHY. At present, owing to a misunderstanding ; in 1874, when the election law was changed and elections were all held on the same day at a general election, it became necessary that the Governor in Council should fix a day for the nomination. That clause was thoughtlessly made general, and the result is that where there is a by-election the Governor in Council also fixes a day for nomination. That was unnecessary, because as the law then stood, the writ of election went to the returning officer, and the returning officer was required within so many days after its receipt to appoint a day for nomination and polling. That of course was amply sufficient for the purpose. Now the law is, that the Governor in Council has to fix the day, and in practice it has worked out in this way. A vacancy occurs, the Speaker issues his warrant and it goes to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, but, there it remains until the Governor in Council has fixed the day of nomination and appointed a returning officer. I do not desire to interfere any more with the power that Parliament has hitherto given to the Governor in Council, than is necessary. This law gives the Governor in Council power within three days to name the returning officer and to fix the day for election. But, if the Governor in Council fails to do so within three days, then it becomes the duty of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to issue the writ to one of the sheriffs of the districts where the election is to be held. The next thing is to give authority to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to fix the date for the nomination, which must not be more than so many days from the receipt of the writ ; say fifteen days.

Mr. MACDOWALL. Is not three days rather a short time in which to allow the Governor in Council to act ? It might occur when Parliament is not sitting, and when Ministers are absent and could not meet. Would it not be better to make the period a little longer ?

Mr. MASSON. Three days would not be sufficient to give the Governor in Council time to correspond with a person to know whether he would accept the office or not, and it also might occur that the man whom they desire to appoint was absent.

Mr. DALY. The whole thing is such a radical piece of legislation that it seems to me to require more consideration from the House than has evidently been given to it. So far as I am personally concerned I have not had the opportunity to consider the Bill. The space of three days is not sufficient. Suppose a vacancy occurs in any outlying constituency, three days will not be sufficient time in which to communicate with the friends of the Government with regard to the appointment of a returning officer—that is usual, no matter what Government is in power. I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. McCarthy) has gone too far in his attempt to reform the law.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). This is one of the matters in which the Government, it seems to me, have no right to have any other power than that of a single administrative power. We impose ministerial duties upon them, but they should not stand in a different position from any other parties in regard to this matter. In England no such power is possessed by the government. I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact, that the power of the Government to fix the time for the issue of the writ, and for the election, and to name a returning officer, was a provision in the old constitutional Act of 1791. But it was provided also, that that condition of things should only continue for a limited time, until the legislative assembly in each province should meet and make other provisions. The intention was that the power which was given to the Government in the first instance by the Act of 1791, should be superseded by a general provision made by the legislative assembly of each province. We have returned to some extent to what was intended to be a temporary condition of things. Three days as mentioned in the Bill may be too short, but there ought to be a fixed period and it ought not to be in the discretion of anybody to alter the period named in the statute.

Mr. McCARTHY. I have no objection at all to make that ten days, or anything that is reasonable.

An hon. MEMBER. Thirty days.

Mr. McCARTHY. Oh, no. This ought not to be looked upon in a party spirit, for while it may be in the interest of one party to-day it may be against the interests of that party before very long. We ought to have absolute control over our own proceedings. There ought to be no possibility of outside interference with the writ which under the law this Parliament directs to be issued. When Parliament is sitting the writ is directed to go to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, but although we may order that, the writ cannot be executed until an outside committee, called the Government, choose to fix a day and to appoint a returning officer. That is absolutely wrong. It degrades Parliament. It lowers the dignity of this body that its warrant is in any way to be interfered with, by what may be termed a party committee. I think it would have been better perhaps, if we had taken from the Government in by-elections all control over the writ, and directed that in that case the writ should go to the ordinary officer, who is the sheriff, and that the sheriff should execute the writ after so many days, according to the provision for the particular constituency. I was not desirous of interfering more than was absolutely necessary with the law as it stands, and I am only anxious that the warrants of this Parliament should be executed in accordance with the direction of Parliament. I have no objection to substitute ten days for three days.

Mr. MASSON. This is an attempt to change materially the principle of the law as it now stands.

Mr. McCARTHY. Undoubtedly.

Mr. MASSON. At present the Governor in Council fixes the day and names the returning officer. The Governor in Council under this Bill would have to communicate with the person whom they thought proper to appoint, to nominate that person, and get his acceptance. Three days is certainly too short for that, and even ten days is too short, in the western and eastern provinces.

Mr. McCARTHY. It is all done by telegraph.

Mr. MASSON. I do not think it is proper to ask that this should be done by telegraph. There are three or four periods. For instance, in the case of Winnipeg it would require double ten days to make these two returns, without any delay in the correspondence. If it is the desire to make the matter compulsory, and to fix a definite time within which the writs should issue to some officer named in this Act, the time fixed should be reasonable for all parts of the Dominion: and instead of ten days, I would suggest thirty days, as nearer the time required. It must be remembered that the officers named in this section, and perhaps the most suitable officers available, are not officers of this House or this Government.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That does not matter.

Mr. MASSON. It does not matter, but it is one of the arguments in favour of the Government of the day having the appointment. Why should the Government of the day be forced to place their writs in the hands of an officer over whom they have no control, and who has no interest in them, but who may be very much opposed to them?

Mr. O'BRIEN. The argument of the hon. gentleman just shows the difficulties which arise out of our present system. If it is necessary to spend twenty days to find a returning officer, this is ample evidence that our system of appointing returning officers is a bad one. If the writ necessarily went to some official, it does not matter much who that official might be, there could be no necessity of keeping a constituency unrepresented for twenty days in addition to the time that must necessarily elapse between the issue of the writ and its return. It is not necessary in this House to call attention to the many instances in which the power of the Government has been abused in by-elections. I believe that there are three constituencies unrepresented in this House at present. Any one who pays any attention to the doings of the English Parliament, and who reads the English newspapers, will be astonished to find that it is announced one week that such a constituency has become vacant, and the next week, almost, that a new member has been returned. The re-election follows the vacancy with wonderful rapidity. There is no reason why we should not have the same practice here, with regard to members of this House. Even if you extend the time twenty days, as proposed, that would be better than to allow by-elections to be made use of for party purposes as they have been. For my part, I would rather see the old system re-established than to have the great abuse of partisan returning officers. Undoubtedly abuses did arise, and there were grounds of complaint against returning officers under the old system. There were reasons perhaps, for believing that there were partisan returning officers, who were officers of the provincial governments, and who belonged, perhaps, to the party opposed to the party in power, by whom the writ was issued. But I think that any partisanship or abuse that arose under that system has been exceeded in a great many instances under the present system. Under the old system, you might have a partisan returning officer opposed to you; but you were just as likely to have one who was not a partisan, or one who was a friend of your own; whereas, under the present system, the returning officers are all partisans. It does not follow that the sheriffs are all to be of one party stripe, unless we are to suppose that the provincial government is for all time to be controlled by one party. I have had to do with a few elections, and in a part of the country where the partisanship of the Ontario officials was perhaps more pronounced than in any other part of the province: and I will say that in all elections conducted under officials of the Ontario government, there was far less trouble, even to myself, than there has been in elections in which the returning officer was a gentleman recommended as a friend of the Government. I would very much rather have an officer of the Ontario government, ex-officio a returning officer, even if an opponent of myself, than a gentleman recommended as a friend of the government, will all the annoyance which every one knows must attach to one in having a partisan returning officer, to say nothing of the onus which the candidate must bear of having a returning officer nominated by himself. For my part, I would rather see the system changed. At all events, let us have a fixed time within which the writ must be issued.

Mr. WHITE (Shelburne). I agree with the hon. member for North Simcoe that a definite time should be fixed in this act; but it strikes me that this clause, in the way it is drawn, will not have that effect. I think it would be impossible, in most portions of this large Dominion, to appoint and obtain an acceptance from any returning officer within three days. If that is not done, then, under this clause, the sheriff of the district is to be appointed. You would have to communicate with him. He might be disqualified or he might refuse to act; and if so, you would have to hunt for another sheriff or registrar, and a very long time might elapse before you found a suitable person to act as returning officer; and therefore you would not have a definite time. I think it would be very much better to have a fixed time mentioned in this clause, and instead of making it three days, I think it should be made thirty days, which would give the Government ample time to communicate with the party and ascertain whether he will act or not. I venture to say that in many cases, under the clause as it is framed, thirty days or more would elapse before you could select the individual who would accept the appointment.

Mr. DALY. I am afraid the hon. member for North Simcoe has not considered the law fully in framing this measure, because we find in chapter 8 of the Revised Statutes, the Act respecting Elections of Members of the House of Commons, it is provided in section 3 that:

> Every writ for the election of a member of the House of Commons shall be dated and be returnable on such days as the Governor General determines, and shall be addressed to such person as the Governor General appoints.

There is nothing in this Bill that repeals that section.

Mr. McCARTHY. A subsequent Act always repeals a former one.

Mr. DALY. The Bill refers to the Act respecting the House of Commons, but my hon. friend, in framing the Bill, has overlooked this provision of the Elections Act. Now, even if this Bill is passed exactly as it was framed by the hon. member for North Simcoe, it would be inconsistent with the law as it now stands, and would not repeal it or override it. I would, therefore, move that the committee rise and report progress, in order that the hon. member may have an opportunity of amending it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not exactly understand the hon. gentleman's point, but it may be that I did not catch his reasoning. I understand that at present the discretion is left entirely with the Governor General in Council, and that the object of the Bill is to do away with that discretion, and that the general feeling on both sides is that it should be done away with.

Mr. DALY. Not at all.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I heard the hon. member for Shelburne express his opinion, with which I am in accord. The only thing he did not approve of was the number of days, but the principle he advocated was in accord with that laid down in the Bill. That section reads:

> If within three days after the receipt by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery of the Speaker's warrant, issued under the authority of the Act respecting the House of Commons or any other Act of the Parliament of Canada, or by the order of the House of Commons, or the receipt of the warrant of two members of the House, for the issue of a new writ for the election of a member to fill a vacancy in the membership of the House, the Governor in Council has not appointed the returning officer to hold the said election, or fixed the day for the nomination of candidates thereat, the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery shall, notwithstanding anything to the contrary contained in the Dominion Elections Act or in any other Act of the Parliament of Canada, direct or address the said writ to the sheriff or one of the sheriffs (if there are more than one) of the county or district in which is situate the said electoral district or part of the electoral district for which a new election is required: and such sheriff shall be the returning officer at the election to which such writ relates: Provided always, that if the sheriff to whom the writ is addressed, refuses or is disqualified or unable to act, the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery shall appoint one of the other sheriffs (if there are more sheriffs than one who might have been originally appointed), or the registrar of deeds, or one of the registrars of deeds (if there are more than one), of the county or district in which the electoral district or part of the electoral district is situate, as such returning officer.

That would certainly override any provision in any statute that conflicts with it. It would be as much a repeal of any such statute as if you were to expressly repeal it. Any Act inconsistent with the later Act is necessarily repealed by it. It may be, that three days are too short, but I do not see any principle involved in fixing the number of days. Let it be ten days, or, if desirable, fifteen days.

The discretion which has heretofore been invested in the Governor General in Council, has not been exercised as it should have been, and this is to provide a fixed time within which that discretion must be exercised, in default of which, the writ shall be issued by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery.

Mr. SPEAKER. There is a point which, I think, the hon. member for Simcoe has overlooked in the framing of this clause. He has restricted the issue of the writ to the sheriffs and registrars of counties, but these officers in the different provinces, except in the North-west Territories, are not officers of this Parliament, and we have no power to compel them to act.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Yes, we have. We can designate whom we please, and designate them by their offices as well as in any other way. It is not because they are sheriffs or registrars, but because they are appointed officers of this House, under statute passed by this Parliament, that they become our officers. Take the election court, when the question as to the constitutionality of the election court was submitted to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, they held that it was a new and distinct court, that the judges were not acting in their capacity as judges of existing courts, but that it was a new court, which had been constituted by the Act for the trial of election petitions. And the judges were not consulted whether they would serve as judges of that court or not. They were designated by the statute, the duty was imposed upon them, and they had that duty to discharge. Surely, if we can appoint a judge a member of the election court, without consulting him, and impose the duty upon him of trying election petitions, we can appoint a sheriff as returning officer and impose the duty of returning officer upon the person so named or designated. That Act was in operation several years. It was repealed in 1879, and there is no reason why it should not be revived under a provision of this Bill; and, that being so, I cannot see any object in making the time much longer than that mentioned in the Bill, namely, three days. Why should the Government delay the writ? What right have they to exercise jurisdiction over the thing at all ? When we look at the English statute, which has been in force since the time of William III., we find that the Crown possesses no such power there. There are certain ministerial duties imposed upon a public officer at the head of a particular department, and the writs are issued, as a matter of course, from that department, by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, who is the ministerial officer in that department. I see no reason why that course should not be followed here.

Mr. McCARTHY. I do not understand why my hon. friend the acting Minister of Justice (Mr. Daly), should have criticised the clause by saying that provision is not made for the Dominion Elections Act. That Act is actually named in the clause, and the purport of the section is not to take away absolutely from the Governor in Council the power to name the returning officer.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It ought to be.

Mr. McCARTHY. I dare say, but the clause, as framed, does not purport to do that. It simply provides that, if he does not act within a certain time, which is suggested as three days—but there is no magic in three days, any more than in five, or six, or ten days—the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery shall, in that event, and not until that event, issue the writ to one of the sheriffs, or, in case the sheriff is disqualified, to one of the registrars. The principle we have to discuss on this clause is, whether or not we will have our rights tampered with, because that is what it comes to, after the warrant from our officer, the Speaker, reaches the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. Just let me give some instances of the way this power has been abused. In the West Quebec case, the warrant was directed and reached the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery on the 14th July, 1894 ; but the Order in Council, fixing the day of nomination and appointing a returning officer, was not made until the 28th March following, so that from the 14th July to 28th March, the warrant lay lifeless in the hands of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. In the recent elections we have had, for instance in Cardwell, the warrant was dated the 29th October. No fault is to be found with the Speaker, because he has acted promptly in every case, according to the statute, but no writ was issued until nearly a month afterwards, when all the party arrangements were made suitable for the event. Will any member of the committee say that a returning officer could not have been appointed within three days in that particular constituency ? In North Ontario, the 2nd November was the date of the warrant. It was more convenient for the Government to issue the warrant earlier in that constituency than in Cardwell ; and consequently, although the warrant in the one case was dated the 29th October and in the other 2nd November, the writ was issued on the 18th November for the county of North Ontario. And so on in West Huron and Charlevoix. If we are really to preserve our own self-respect and the dignity of this House, we ought to provide some means by which the warrant issued by the order of the House, or by the Speaker, in pursuance of the statute giving authority to the Speaker, should not be interfered with by the Government. And I see no reason why the committee should rise, unless it is the intention of the Government to take that means of preventing the Bill becoming law.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do hope we are not going to dispose summarily this Bill in this way. There has been no suggestion of any reason why the Bill should not pass. I do not care what the Government is, whether Liberal or Conservative, this discretion which has been exercised improperly since 1879 should not be allowed to continue. The House should take this matter in hand and determine once for all that its own writs shall be issued in the proper time and to the proper officer who will execute them. I do not think we should carry party so far that in these important matters party allegiance should induce us to vote down a Bill of this kind without any argument being advanced against it. The proposal is one that cannot but commend itself to the good sense of the House, and, though there has been a difference of opinion about dates, these could easily be overcome through consultation. The principle of the Bill has been accepted and it should not be killed in this roundabout way in committee.

Mr. OUIMET. I have not heard any argument in favour of making the cast-iron rule that an election should take place immediately after a vacancy occurs. As it is now the appointment of a returning officer and the fixing of the day of an election has been left to the discretion and responsibility of the executive. This responsibility is exercised just as every other responsible duty is that devolves upon the Governor General in Council. I should not need to go far to cite cases in which elections have been delayed to the great convenience of the public at large, and in particular to the constituency in which these elections were to take place. Why should we limit the responsibility of the executive ? I know that the answer of hon. gentlemen opposite will be that we have not responsible government because there is a Conservative Government at the head of affairs.

Mr. McCARTHY. No, no.

Mr. OUIMET. The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) said that since 1879 this power had been abused. Well, Mr. Chairman, the law as it exists to-day existed before, and if we were to consult the records of elections from 1874 to 1879 we should find some cases in which the same argument could be used. But if there is an evil it is one of those evils that correct themselves. It is one to which the attention of the House may be directly called, and I am sure that if there is a real abuse, no Government, not even the corrupt Conservative Government, can bear the odium of maintaining such an abuse, but they will be driven by considerations of good policy to change their course. I have stated distinctly, and it cannot be contradicted that there are some cases in which these elections must be delayed, and, that being so, this cast-iron rule, instead of being an advantage, would be a disadvantage, and would result in inconvenience to the public, if not greater harm in many cases. I could cite cases that are very recent in which it would be most inconvenient to submit to the rule which it is proposed to enact in this Bill. Under these circumstances, I do not see why we should deviate from the existing rule, to limit the responsibility of the executive in these matters, in order to do what ?—to confer upon a subordinate officer of the Government a duty which he himself might abuse, in which the same immediate remedy would not apply as in the case of abuse by the Government, that of bringing the offenders under the direct censure of the House.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman has very strange ideas of responsible government when he undertakes to extend the responsibility of the Government over the constitution of this House. He might as well propose to do away with the election court and have the election petitions referred to the Administration on the same ground.

Mr. OUIMET. That would be for Parliament to decide. For a long time it was the law that election petitions were tried before a committee of this House.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). But it was before a committee of this House and not before the Administration. The hon. gentleman asks that in every election when the Government is upon its trial before the electors all these important matters concerning the election shall be left to the control of the executive. That is what the hon. gentleman proposes, but it is a doctrine which has had no place in English law for more than a hundred and fifty years. That doctrine was put forward during the time of Charles I., but it was repudiated and has never since been recognized. Let me call attention to the statute of 7 William III., which is the law in England that governs the election of members of Parliament. In that statute it is provided :

> That when any new Parliament shall at any Time hereafter be summoned or called, there shall be Forty Days between the Teste and Returns of the Writs of Summons ; and that the Lord Chancellor, Lord Keeper, or Lords Commissioners of the Great Seal for the Time being, shall issue out the Writs for the Election of Members.

The hon. gentleman will see that it is not the Crown that issues the writ, but the officer of Parliament. The duty is imposed upon him and it is declared that he shall see to the issue of the writ for the election of members to serve in the same Parliament "with as much expedition as the same may be done, and that as well upon the calling or summoning of any new Parliament, as also in case of any vacancy during this present or any future Parliament." That provides not merely for the election of members to Parliament when there is a general election, but it provides for the filling of vacancies, and there is no standing for the Government in regard to such a matter. There is a duty imposed upon the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Keeper, or the Lord Commissioners, as the case may be, and that duty is to be discharged immediately. Let me call the attention of the House to the introduction of that law into this country. It is section 18 of the statute of 1791 :

> And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that writs for the election of members to serve in the said assemblies respectively, shall be issued by the Governor, Lieutenant-Governor, or person administering His Majesty's Government within the said provinces respectively, within fourteen days after the sealing of such instrument as aforesaid, for summoning and calling together such assembly, and that such writs shall be directed to the respective returning officers of the said districts, or counties, or circles, or towns, or townships.

And then it is further provided that this provision is to remain in force until the legislative assembly shall otherwise determine. and then it was intended that the legislature should exercise the power. and supersede the special power that had been conferred upon the Governor or Lieutenant-Governor as the case might be. The power was so exercised, and the sheriffs of the various counties were appointed. and a provision was made that they should be returning officers. It is not a matter with which the Government have any right to interfere at all. It is outside their business, it relates to the constitution of this House, that should be independent of the Crown and independent of the advisers of the Crown. Any interference with that power is a most improper interference, it is a usurpation ; and it is an extraordinary thing that amongst a free people this usurpation should have been submitted to for so long. I trust that the committee will not rise, but that the hon. gentleman's Bill will be proceeded with, and that something like a show of means should be adopted to provide for the constitution of a free Parliament, independent of executive interference, and one in which the public sentiment of the country may be fairly expressed.

Mr. DALY. The quotation made by the hon. gentleman from the Act of 1791 relates to general elections.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). And for special elections, too.

Mr. DALY. We are endeavouring here to provide for cases of vacancy that may happen by death or otherwise during the intervals between the sessions of Parliament. By clause 3 of the hon. gentleman's Bill he would ask that the writs be issued within three days. Now, Sir, there are portions of this country where it is morally impossible to hold elections in the winter season. Take, for instance, the new constituency of Yale in British Columbia, in which the city of Vancouver is situated, and which runs away up to the Alaskan coast ; it would be impossible for an election to be held there at, for instance, this season of the year. Take Chicoutimi and the other constituencies in the eastern portion of the province of Quebec ; it would be impossible to hold elections there at certain seasons of the year. Yet, notwithstanding the long distance that these constituencies are removed from the seat of Government, and that there is no possible communication with them except at certain seasons of the year, by the provisions of this Act the writ would have to be issued, and an election would have to be held in spite of these conditions. Now, Sir, wisely or unwisely, this House invested the Governor in Council with authority years ago to control the issue of the writs, and also to appoint the returning officers, and I see no good reason, no good reasons have been adduced to-night, why the Governor in Council should abdicate those functions, and divest themselves of that discretion, that provision that was carefully framed to meet the conditions as they arose. For instance, take the constituencies I have named, Cariboo, Chicoutimi and others, we make special provisions in the Election Act in relation to them. Well, if this Bill comes into force, special provisions would have to be made in relation to those constituencies. Now, another objection to the clause is that it provides that these writs shall be directed to the sheriff, and in the event of there being no sheriff, to the registrar. Take the province of Manitoba from which I come, we have only three sheriffs in that province. Those sheriffs do not reside in any particular constituency, but some of them may reside where there is a part of one constituency and a part of another. We have no registrars there now in the sense in which the wording of the Bill directs them to act ; so that there are numerous changes that would have to be made in the phraseology of this clause. I do not intend, in asking that the committee should rise and report progress, to exhibit any desire to choke off this Bill, or to prevent its becoming law ; but it occurs to me from the reading of it that it requires certain amendments and careful consideration. I have not been able to give it that consideration. I never read the Bill until to-night, and was not aware of its provisions. I think I have pointed out sufficient reasons why we should go slow, and why we should have an opportunity of framing these clauses so as to meet the conditions I have pointed out.

Mr. FRASER. While I think there is something in what the Minister of the Interior has said relating to the exceptional cases, they are very easily dealt with. Let the Act not apply to those cases. While there may be something in the question as to whom the returning officer may be, there might be exceptions made in those cases.

Mr. McCARTHY. The Bill can be easily amended in those respects.

Mr. FRASER. Precisely. The principle of this Act is that the elections shall be held within a given time when a vacancy occurs, and let us adopt that principle. I am not myself very anxious that the Government shall not appoint the returning officers, although I think it would be better to adopt uniformity. The Minister of Public Works said that the Government did not want to subtract themselves from that. I think they are adding themselves to it, not subtracting. They are adding, multiplying and dividing themselves.

Mr. OUIMET. The hon. gentleman is very witty. If he were speaking French, perhaps he would make some mistakes at which we might laugh at his expense.

Mr. FRASER. Well, I did not intend to be witty. I regret very much that the hon. gentleman should think I was trying to be. I had no idea when I said that, that the hon. Minister would be offended. I had no reference to the time when they were divided, and when he went out. I did not mean to be personal in a matter of that kind. Then he said that it might be an advantage to delay the elections. Where is there any public advantage in a county being unrepresented, except indeed where it is impossible to hold the elections within a given time in the counties he has named ? Is it an advantage to any constituency to be unrepresented in Parliament during the intervals between sessions ? There are many things that a constituency may want when Parliament is not in session. Is it the idea of the hon. gentleman that there is no advantage in having a member except he is here to vote for them ? Why, between the meetings of Parliament there are matters demanding the attention of representatives some times of as great importance as anything that comes before Parliament. The fundamental idea is that the constituency should always be represented. Parliament may be called at any moment ; exigencies of state may arise necessitating the calling of Parliament, and unless the Government issues the writ, there would be no election at all except to suit the convenience of the Government for the time being. Representative government is the representation of the people, and it means that elections shall be held as soon as the vacancies occur, either by resignation or death. The people of a free country should always be represented in Parliament ; there should not be a moment of time when a constituency was unprecedented. The Minister of the Interior said it might be inconvenient to submit to the rule proposed. Where will be the inconvenience ? Is it an inconvenience for the electors to say who should represent them ? Surely not. It may be inconvenient for the Government of the time being. I am not arguing this matter against the present Government, but I am insisting on the adoption of the wholesome rule prevailing in England. A newspaper makes the announcement that an hon. member has died. Within a few days the announcement of the return of another member is made. I can see how a government might desire to postpone or change the date of an election to give the party an opportunity to straighten matters, to arrange some little difficulty, to make a few promises in order to fix the constituency, not for the representation of the electors, but to suit the purposes of the party in power. This should not be a party question, for it is one in which every hon. member should see that the rights of the people are guarded, and that the voters are given an opportunity, not subject to the dictation of an executive, but acting under the law, to return representatives to Parliament. In this country we are getting entirely too much into the idea of executive power. Parliament is not the executive, and the country is much larger than an executive, and an executive that would enact such laws as to give the people an opportunity to be always represented in Parliament, would enjoy more confidence at the hands of the people than a Government claiming everything for the executive. Let the committee amend this Bill in the direction indicated by the Minister of the Interior. I am willing to amend it so as to give the executive the power to name the returning officers, and in other directions, but we should seek to establish the fundamental principle of the Bill whereby the constituencies will always be represented in Parliament.

Mr. MACDOWALL. I desire to offer a few remarks with respect to the probable effect of this Bill as regards elections in the west. Three days would be obviously altogether out of the question, especially in the case of Saskatchewan and Alberta. If we take the case of Saskatchewan, five days would be required to get a letter to Saskatchewan to ascertain whether the sheriff was there or not : that is supposing the trains were running, for there are only two trains per week. If a vacancy occurred and a writ was issued, a further delay of two days would be required if this proper mail-day were missed. The sheriff might be away, and a delay of two weeks might occur before a reply could be obtained. Supposing a reply were obtained within a reasonable time, there are certain seasons when the river must be used as means of communication, either by boat or by travelling over it on ice. About the end of October and the beginning of November, the river is impassable with running ice, and during the end of April and the beginning of May, the same condition occurs. It would be most inadvisable for any election to be held in that country between the beginning of October and the middle of November, and also betweent 1st of April and 28th May. I do not believe it would be possible at other periods of the year to issue writs, appoint returning officers, and have all the arrangements made within thirty days at the very least.

Mr. CASEY. The Minister of the Interior objects to this Bill being proceeded with in committee because he has never read it, for the hon. gentleman has told the committee that he has only made his motion for the purpose of getting an opportunity to consider amendments, and that he never saw the Bill until to-night. We did not expect the hon. gentleman to be thoroughly posted on this Bill, but it is a little too much to ask the committee to throw aside at this stage of the session, which is virtually killing it, a Bill of this importance, because he has not seen fit to look at it before. To show the vagueness of the hon. gentleman's objection, I would call attention to two objections made by him. He said there were two counties where elections could not be held in winter; one was a county in British Columbia, whose name he did not remember, though he said it reached up to the north pole; the other was Chicoutimi and Saguenay. We had an election this winter in Chicoutimi and Saguenay, and very successful we consider the result to have been.

An hon. MEMBER. It was in Charlevoix.

Mr. CASEY. That is the neighbouring county, with the same climate. These facts show the puerile objections taken by the Minister to the Bill. The animus of the motion made by the hon. gentleman is clearly evident—it is to kill the Bill. I am thoroughly in accord with the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) that the Government should have no power whatever in their hands to enable them to influence an election. We all know, from long experience, how hard it is to resist the power placed by custom in the hands of the Government in this country for the purpose of keeping themselves in power. It is open to any government, under the present custom, to select the best time for holding general elections and also for holding individual elections; to change the venue and pack the jury to suit their own convenience.

It must not be forgotten that there are always two parties on trial before the electors, the party in power and the party out of power. If you leave all arrangements as to holding the trial between these two bodies in the hands of the party in power, the party out of power will naturally have very little chance of success. The Government have, under the Franchise Act and Distribution Act, tremendous powers. They have great power, by usage, with regard to the time at which they can bring on an election, a power which the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) wishes to take from them. If I were looking at the matter from a party point of view, I would oppose the proposition of the hon. member for North Simcoe, because all the signs point to the strong probability that the Liberal party will be in power within a very few months, and if the present custom remains, that party will have the advantage which is now enjoyed by the present Administration. Regardless, however, of the advantage in the future to the party to which I belong, I am bound to support the Bill of the hon. member for North Simcoe.

I quite agree with the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) that it is astonishing that any free people should submit to the one-sided arrangement now in force. It has been clearly demonstrated that such power does not inhere in the Government in England and in the prerogative of the Crown, and therefore does not belong to the prerogative of the Crown here. The statute of William III. does not apply only to general elections, as the Minister of the Interior supposes, but, as has been pointed out by the hon. member for Bothwell, it applies to vacancies occurring at any period.

Mr. DALY. I did not refer to the statute of William III., but to the statute of 1791.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It would apply to both.

Mr. CASEY. The existing law in England under whatever statute applies to casual vacancies, as well as to the general elections, and properly so. The attempt to induce the committee to rise without passing this Bill, is an attempt to retain in the hands of the Government that power which they have so successfully used for their own purposes from time to time. I am only sorry that this Bill does not go further, and make certain arrangements about the length of time that should elapse after the coming dissolution of this House before the holding of the elections, and also, the calling of the session of the House thereafter. I am bound to support the Bill as a measure of justice to the electors of the country.

Mr. MASSON. The argument of my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) is, I think, entirely opposed to the principle of this Bill. He told us that it was a strange thing that any free people should submit so long to the present law, but it is, perhaps, more strange that any Liberal Government should enact such a law, for it was during the Liberal regime that this Act was put on the statute-book. The Bill of my hon. friend (Mr. McCarthy) does not at all attempt to interfere with the principle of the present law, except by a side wind, by making the time so short that the Government cannot possibly act. The principle of the present law is acknowledged on the face of the Bill, whereas the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) argues that this principle is vicious.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). In the first instance, somebody has to be appointed, and it is provided that the appointment shall be with the representative of the Crown until the legisature otherwise provides. That is a necessity.

Mr. MASSON. But this Bill distinctly upholds the principle of the Act of 1874, that the appointment shall be with the Governor General in Council, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) has argued against that principle. The discussion shows that there are many imperfections in this Bill. Not only would three days be insufficient, but in the winter time, in some of the constituencies, the thirty days that I have suggested, would be too short. If this Bill were adopted, half the electors in the district of Algoma would be disfranchised, and the constituencies in the North-west Territories would practically be in a similar position.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The writ issues, as a matter of course, to the sheriff, in England.

Mr. MASSON. But in England you have no constituencies as we have in the North-west Territories, and in British Columbia, or in the province of Quebec.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Even admitting that our constituencies are larger, and that a longer time would be required, what in the world has that to do with the period at which the writ issues ?

Mr. MASSON. There is the difficulty of communicating with the constituencies. If you admit that the Government is to appoint, as is admitted in this Bill, then you have got to give them time to act. It has been pointed out that in the province of Manitoba there would not be in every constituency the officers named under this Bill. It has also been pointed out that the sheriffs and registrars, being officers of the provincial governments, we could not compel them to act. I do not know that that objection would very often arise, because, as a rule, people are glad to get little jobs of that kind. I believe that, in view of the numerous amendments which are absolutely necessary to this Bill, that it is advisable that further time for consideration should be given.

Mr. McCARTHY. Before the motion is put, I desire to say a word or two with reference to the arguments of the Minister of Public Works. The hon. gentleman commenced by stating that nothing had been said to show the necessity for this change, or the necessity for any interference with the power of the Governor in Council. It is very true, up to that time nothing had been said, because no member had risen in his place to defend the system which has prevailed under the existing law. For my part, I quite accept every word that has fallen from my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills). The House is one of the legislative bodies of this country, and the Crown has no right to interfere with it. When we handed over to the Crown a certain control of our writs, we did so because convenience made it advisable in that particular case. But why should that be extended into a rule ? Why should the Governor in Council—in other words, the Crown, because the hon. member who is a member of the Administration is an adviser of the Crown—interfere with an election of a member of this House ? for it is this House that directs the issue of the writs. It not only requires to be stated to show how preposterous the position of the hon. gentleman is. With regard to the other matters, I am quite free to say for myself that I would prefer a return to the old system. It is necessary, of course, that some officer—and perhaps the Governor in Council is as fit as any other—should name the day when the general elections shall be held because it is convenient and in the public interest that all the elections should be held on one day. That is the reason the change was made. Up to 1874 the Governor in Council had no control over our writs. The writs were issued by the returning officers who were named in the law. The law required the returning officer, on the receipt of the writs, within a certain time, to appoint a day for nomination and a day for polling. The change was made in order to have the elections on one day. There is no abuse that I have heard of with reference to the general elections ; but we know that the by-elections have been abused. The orders of the House, made by the House when sitting, or by the officer of the House, in other words, our Speaker, when the House is not sitting have been, in point of fact, intercepted and nullified by the Crown on the advice of his Ministers. That is an abuse which I desire to do away with. While I admit that it would be more logical and better practice to return to the old system, so far as by-elections are concerned, and to direct that the writ shall be issued by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to the returning officer to be named in the statute, and that the returning officer shall, within a certain number of days, fix the date of the election, still it does not follow that the amendments I propose are not in the right direction. What I propose is allowing the present system to exist, to control it as far as we can, by limiting the time within which the Crown may act, and by providing that if the Crown fails to act within that time, the Speaker shall name the returning officer and issue the writ. Now, I appeal to the committee. I hope this will not be treated as a party question. Surely we can rise on some occasions above party considerations. Surely this House ought to be regarded as the great power of the state. We look to Westminster, where we find that the greatest Parliament that ever existed, the Parliament from which we take our practice and our laws, up to a certain time would not even allow the Speaker to interfere with the issue of a writ. Originally the House itself was the only body which could order the issue of a writ; but for the sake of convenience a law was passed allowing the Speaker, during the recess, to issue his warrant; but you will find that that provision is so carefully guarded that if a vacancy occurs within a certain number of days before the meeting of Parliament, the Speaker has not power to issue his warrant, but the matter is to remain until the House meets. The House of Commons is careful to guard its interests and protect its rights and privileges. No doubt, in some cases that is attended with inconvenience. There is no system that is not attended with inconvenience. I remember last summer, when the new Government came in, and everybody expected a dissolution, the elections of the new Ministers in their constituencies took place, and they came back to the House to sit for one day before it was dissolved, when they had to go back for re-election. That is the practice that prevails there, and there is no exception to it. Parliament ought always to be full, to represent the people; and that can only be accomplished by writs being issued when vacancies occur, though in some cases here and there that may be attended with some inconvenience. If the hon. gentleman who is acting as Minister of Justice wishes to have time to further consider this measure—for I am aware that he is taking the place of the Minister of Justice, who is absent—I have no objection that the committee should rise, provided that the hon. gentleman will see that an opportunity shall be afforded before this House is prorogued of considering the question and dealing with the subject. I think that is only reasonable, and I hope the hon. gentleman will accept the proposition in the spirit in which it is made.

Mr. DALY. While I might individually be willing to meet the proposal of the hon. gentleman, I am not in a position to answer for the Government, and I could not agree to such a proposal. The hon. gentleman, as I take it, seeks not to affect the practice that obtains at the present time with reference to the appointment of returning officers or the issue of writs for elections; but he seeks to control the appointment of returning officers and the issuing of writs. As at present framed, the Bill cannot affect the holding of elections, I take it. If, for instance, the Governor General in Council should name a returning officer and issue a writ, fixing the day of nomination three or four or five months ahead, this Bill would not affect that condition at all. I think the more consideration one gives to the Bill the greater the necessity appears for our giving more attention to it. The fact is, there are four or five separate clauses in the Elections Act containing special provisions pertaining to outlying portions of the country; and we should have time to consider how clauses could be framed to meet those cases. We cannot do that in committee to-night, because it would take us an hour to frame the clauses. Therefore, I thinking I am not asking anything out of the way when I ask that the committee should rise in order that we may further consider the Bill.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman says it would take an hour to draft clauses. You could provide in a single clause that certain exceptions and certain clauses in the Elections Act should apply to those constituencies. I wish to say a word or two with regard to the larger question involved. It is of the first consequence, in my opinion, that the Government should extend the principle of naming certain officers as permanent returning officers for the elections that are at hand. And that will be a matter of far more consequence to this Parliament than any Bill in their hands at present. That was the law until 1882, when it was repealed, and the Government took into their own hands the naming of the returning officers. There is nothing connected with the elections of this country, with which there are associated so many abuses as this power. In my own constituency, in 1882, a man without any responsibility was made returning officer, and he returned the candidate who had the minority of votes, necessitating an election appeal, so that the candidate elected by the majoirty should be counted in. In the very next election, a man without anything was also named returning officer. Who suggests those returning officers to the Government? Why does the Government want time to communicate with the constituencies? Why, in order that the candidate who is running in their interests may name the man who is to hold the election between him and his opponent. Is any such rule recognized in any other department of the Government? Why, in the three elections in my constituency since then, the Government named a returning officer at the instance of my opponent, and this man kept back the return for days in each case in order to extend the time within which an election petition might be filed. Is that sort of thing in the interests of fair elections? And that is carried on everywhere. I would have prosecuted the party but he had nothing. I could have got judgment against him, but had not the slightest chance of recovering the damages which the law would grant me. The hon. gentleman has said that if we succeed the next election, we may amend the law. Well, when we held office we did amend the law. We provided that certain parties, who held certain offices in the country, and could thereby be held responsible for the proper discharge of their duties, should be the returning officers, but when hon. gentlemen opposite came in, they repealed that law. Does the hon. gentleman think that if we were sitting on the Treasury benches we would impose a law on ourselves that they would not continue?

Mr. DALY. Hear, hear.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No, so far as I am concerned, if the hon. gentleman, while he is Minister and responsible, does not make the law what it should be, I would never be a party to restraining a government constituted by my friends, when I knew that the very moment the hon. gentleman succeeded they would repeal that statute. The law, in a matter of this sort, should be a part of the constitution of the country and binding on both sides. It should have the character of permanency, it if is to have any value. The hon. gentleman wishes to retain the power in the Government to continue those abuses which I have mentioned, and which exist in constituencies all over this country. I say it is a monstrous condition of things, and it is a matter of astonishment to me that hon. gentlemen sitting on that side, who are fair-minded men and who would like to see a fair election, and who, I have no doubt, would not want to come here unless they were fairly elected, should be disposed to continue the abuses that exist now and which have existed since 1882.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The practical carrying out of the present system, as it has been pursued the last three or four elections, has resulted in a great many things that have not been to the credit of the Government. Since the Government took upon themselves the appointment of returning officers, the elections have not been conducted or the returns made as they were under the old system, when the sheriffs and registrars were the returning officers. I can instance my own elections to show how the Government have winked at what was done by their own returning officer, appointed, no doubt, at the instigation of their own candidate. In 1872, an election was held, and in two days after the declaration was made. In 1874 the same promptness was shown. In 1878 there was the same result, and also in 1882. But after that the system was changed, and in 1887 it was twelve days after the election before the declaration was made. I have no doubt that the returning officer delayed making his return at the instance of the Government candidate, from day to day, until twelve days elapsed. In 1891, it was eighteen days before the declaration was made. This is nothing less than scandalous. What was the result. Why, in the interim, the very great zeal of some of the opposite party was manifested by their going in and obtaining access to the ballot boxes. They opened the ballot boxes and stuffed them in order to deprive the majority of the seat. That is one of the results of the delay in making the return, and as the Government generally appoint irresponsible men as returning officers, there can be no satisfaction obtained by taking legal proceedings against them. The Government ought to see that this system is not left as it is, because it is fraught with scandals and abuse of the most flagrant character. I could instance in the last elections a great many cases in which the same scandals and outrages were perpetrated as in the riding I have the honour to represent: and so long as those abuses are winked at by the Government, they are bound to continue. The whole system is a scandal against representative institutions in this country, and I am quite in sympathy with the change asked for. I believe it is time the Government and the House should see that fair-play is to be the guiding star in the elections held in this country. There should be a strong desire manifested by members in this House that no party is given an undue advantage over another in the management of elections: but so long as the Government continue the present system, so long will the abuses creep in which crept in at the last two general elections. It is notorious that these elections were not fairly conducted, and the Government should at once take steps to have the law amended so as to prevent the continuance of these abuses. I have endeavoured to impress the importance of this upon the Government for many years. I urged, when the election law was before the House: and I had the satisfaction of seeing an amendment providing that the declarations are not to be put off as long as they formerly were. Until the Bill introduced by Sir John Thompson, the declarations might be delayed and enlarged from day to day until about a month after the election. Just imagine the ferment that arises in a constituency under these circumstances; imagine the ill-feeling that is created; imagine the temptation that is held out to certain classes to trifle with the ballots of the people. Sir John Thompson's Bill made it compulsory that the declarations should be made, I think, within a week. If you continue this system, abuses continue. It should be the duty of the Government, as it is the interests of this House, to see that every opportunity should be taken away from those who would seek unfair advantage for either side. Let the parties stand upon their merits before the people. I think the Government would do wisely in their own interest to yield to the wishes of the hon. member for North Simcoe, and grant what is provided for in this Bill.

Mr. McMULLEN. This seems to me a most important Bill, and I earnestly hope that the Government will accept the suggestion which has been made, and give the Minister of Justice, who is absent just now, an opportunity of reviewing the law, with a view to meeting in some way the suggestions made by this Bill. We all know very well what irregularities have taken place in the past. For my own part, I have nothing to complain of. I am glad to say that the returning officers appointed in the riding I have the honour to represent, have discharged their duties fairly and faithfully. And I may say this, that, were any returning officer to act so scandalously in the riding I represent as did the returning officer in South Grey, it would be at very great risk to himself personally.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. McMULLEN. Well, Mr. Chairman, when people are excited, when indignation is aroused, it is hard to tell what they will do, when they are exasperated by high-handed conduct such as that in South Grey. You can restrain the people under ordinary circumstances, but, when such extraordinary things take place, as stuffing ballot-boxes and returning men who have a minority of the votes, I would not wish to be the returning officer to risk my life by doing that, as has been done before now. We have the case of the hon. member for Queen's, N.B., (Mr. Baird). In a previous election his opponent received a clear majority of 60. But the returning officer, no doubt at the bidding of hon. gentlemen opposite, declared the minority candidate elected. A more scandalous act was never perpetrated in a free country. The case referred to by the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) is also a disgrace and a scandal in a free country. It is a very great risk for any man to run, and, if the Government should leave the law as it is now, and if bloodshed should attend any such outrages upon the people's liberties, the Government will be responsible.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. McMULLEN. Yes, I tell them so. When men are exasperated by improper acts of this kind, it is very hard to restrain them, and you may find that it will be necessary to alter the law, when it may be too late, and after very serious results have followed. I know that there is, personally, no very kindly feeling for the hon. member for Simcoe on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite. But we must recognize that that hon. gentleman has had great experience in the election courts. I do not care where a Bill comes from, if it is a good Bill, I am ready to support it. I believe that this is a good Bill, and I trust that it will be enacted into law. I do not say now that hon. gentlemen opposite are more guilty in these matters than their predecessors were. But we must remember that two wrongs do not make a right. The electorate should have an untrammelled opportunity to return whatever man they see fit, without any interference with their verdict through the unlawful acts of any returning officer, who may be only a tool in the hands of one of the candidates. Suppose that the Government should be returned at the next election with a majority of about half a dozen. And suppose the election courts were appealed to to unseat half a dozen of the men elected. The Government, being in power, might hold office for a month, or even three months, by a bare majority of one or two, while six or eight constituencies were unrepresented. Do the Government want to control elections for this purpose ? They should give the electors every opportunity for the independent action of their franchise, and the men the people chose should be returned to this House. I think it is not proper for the Minister of the Interior to seek, by the motion he has presented to the committee, to throw out this Bill. The proposition made by the hon. member for North Simcoe is a very fair one. Let the Minister of Justice have an opportunity of passing upon this Bill. I must say, although he is absent, that I believe he makes an honest effort to conduct the affairs of the Department of Justice respectably and in a spirit of fairness. When he comes, he, no doubt, will be able to make suggestions that will meet the case, and so amend the law that there may be no temptation thrown in the way of unscrupulous returning officers, such as now exists.

Committee rose and reported progress.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11.25 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 2nd April, 1896.

PRAYERS.

SALES OF BINDING TWINE.

Mr. McMULLEN asked :

1. Whether any sum or sums of money are due or unpaid for binding twine sold, as set out on page I—43 of the Auditor General's Report ?
2. If due, by whom, and what security is held for payment ?
3. If paid, when was payment made, and in what way ?
4. Has payment, for twine sold, been made in anything else but cash ?
5. Has security been deposited for twine sold ?
6. If so, what does the security consist of ?

Mr. DALY. I may say that we have not yet received from Kingston all the information ; but I will give the hon. gentleman the information we have. The answers to his questions are as follows :—1. Yes ; about $5,500. 2. By sundry purchasers, to whom the twine was sold by John Connor, who has deposited securities to an estimated value of $100,000. 3. The sums paid were paid at sundry times during the current fiscal year in cash and warehouse receipts. 4. The unsold twine, to the value of about $7,000, has been accepted by the department, and credited to the late selling agent. 5. Yes. 6. Railway bonds, real estate, stock certificates, notes and other securities.

REFUND OF DUTIES ON SPIRITS.

Mr. RIDER asked :

1. Whether the spirits upon which there was a refund of $28,576.48, as set forth on page T—95 of Auditor General's Report, 1894-95, said to have been used in the manufacture of crude fulminate, was of American or Canadian manufacture ?

2. If American, who were the manufacturers ? How many gallons were imported, and how much duty was paid per gallon ? By whom and through what ports was it imported ?

3. How much has been imported for the same purpose since 30th June, 1895 ? By whom and through what ports imported ? How much duty was paid thereon, and what amount has been refunded ?

4. If Canadian, by whom manufactured and to whom was refund made ?

5. By what authority was said refund made ?

Mr. PRIOR. The refunds of spirit duty were made upon foreign spirits imported by John Heney and A. L. Howard, and used in the manufacture of crude fulminates, which fulminates were exported from the country. The spirits were used under special supervision of an officer of Excise, and were entirely destroyed by the process. The department is unable to state who were the manufacturers of the spirits in question. The quantity imported by Mr. Heney was about 60,981 gallons, on which he was called to pay the difference between the import and the excise duty, as required by the Inland Revenue Act (section 234). The quantity imported by Mr. Howard was 34,273 gallons, which was dealt with in the same manner. The ports through which imported cannot be given, at the moment, inasmuch as they do not appear on the Inland Revenue returns, and can only be had by reference to the books of the local Customs. None of the spirits referred to were of Canadian origin. The refunds were made to Messrs. Heney and Howard respectively. The authority was an Order in Council of 15th May, 1894, under which the use of spirits in bond for this purpose, and solely "for export," was authorized.

EMPLOYMENT OF BARRISTERS BY THE GOVERNMENT.

Mr. DEVLIN (for Mr. McShane) asked :

Has the Government received any protests from members of the bar of the province of Quebec against the practice of employing Ontario barristers as Government counsel in cases originating in the province of Quebec and governed by its laws and practice ? If so, does the Government intend, in future, to confide such cases to the Quebec advocates ?

Mr. DALY. So far as the Department of Justice is aware, no such protests have been made.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved :

That for the remainder of this session, the House shall sit on Saturdays, beginning at 10 a.m., with a recess from 1 to 2 p.m., and that Government measures shall have precedence on such days.

He said : I am quite satisfied, Sir, that at this period of the session and in the present condition of public business, I shall have the support of hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House in this absolutely necessary step of taking such time as is necessary to give us some prospect of completing the necessary work of the session within the very brief time at our disposal.

Mr. LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, if this motion were so amended that the Saturday sittings should commence next week, I think the proposal would meet with the general concurrence of the House. I am not sure, however, that the wishes of hon. members would be consulted unless next Saturday is excepted from the proposed rule. To-morrow is a legal holiday, on which, it has been decided, the House is not to sit. Monday is a legal holiday also, but I presume we shall sit on that day, and to that I can see no serious objection. But to sit next Saturday would prevent members of the House, who would otherwise do so, from spending Easter Sunday with their families. So far as I am concerned, I have no serious objection to the proposal, but I think it would be well to consult, as we have done in similar cases, the wishes of the House, whether or not it would be expedient that this rule should not apply to next Saturday, but should begin the following Saturday.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I can only say that, while I should be extremely glad to be able to consult the convenience of hon. members under other circumstances, I think it would be absolutely impossible to hope to complete the business of the session, unless we take next Saturday.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I would like to say to the hon. leader of the House that this proposal is contrary to the wishes of hon. members on both sides of the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Well, there are some yeas. All I wish to say is that twenty or thirty members on the Government side have, last night and during this morning, very urgently asked me to find pairs for them, giving as a reason that they had made arrangements to go home. If some of these hon. gentlemen sitting in their seats say no now then they were not in earnest when they asked me to try and find pairs for them. Personally I have no particular objection to the motion, but I have only to say that a large number of members on both sides of the House have told me that they did not wish this sitting to take place on Saturday for the reason that, expecting an Easter holiday, they had made arrangements for family reunions, and that they wished to go home for that purpose. That applies to quite as large a number of gentlemen on the other side of the House as on this. In my opinion it is doubtful whether the disappointment that will result to many of the members, will tend in any way to facilitate business for the balance of the session. We have had a long sitting hitherto, and we shall have to have very long and late sittings beginning from the first of next week; and I do not believe that it will facilitate business for the House to sit on Saturday. Possibly it might be arranged to sit on part of that day only.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The suggestion that has been made by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat might, to a certain extent meets the case of those who find it absolutely necessary to go home. The House will know what business is going to be taken up on Saturday, it is intended to proceed with the Remedial Bill, and hon. gentlemen who may not be anxious to be present on that day, can make pairs and absent themselves.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is just the difficulty, that on some of the motions coming up, members belonging to the Conservative party as well as members of the Liberal party both wish to vote on the same side.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think I am not overrating the ability of the hon. member who fills the important position of whip on the other side of the House, when I say I am quite certain that he and the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) can arrange that matter in a way that will be quite satisfactory, and preserve the balance of parties.

Mr. CHARLTON. I desire to call your attention to the fact, Mr. Speaker, that the motion placed in your hands is not in accordance with the motion on the Order paper. The words "on and after Monday next" are omitted in the motion. The motion as read by the leader of the House is, "That for the remainder of this session this House shall sit on Saturdays, beginning at 10 a.m., with a recess from 1 to 2 p.m., and that Government measures shall have precedence on such days." I would ask by what authority the leader of the House dropped a portion of this motion? The words "on and after Monday next" are dropped. The motion, in my opinion, as it stands on the Order paper, renders it impossible to hold a session on Saturday. There must be some purpose for dropping these words by the leader of the House. I do not think it has been accidental.

Mr. OUIMET. This notice has been on the paper since 25th March.

Mr. CHARLTON. This House, if it passes this motion, as it stands on the paper, affirms that on and after Monday next we shall sit on Saturday. I hold that it is impossible for this House, under the terms of this motion, to make an arrangement to sit the day after to-morrow; it cannot be done. I say in addition that it seems to me a monstrous proposition that the Government should take Good Friday. After finding that there were conscientious scruples to sitting on that day, the Government backed down, and they now propose to take the day that intervenes between Good Friday and Easter Sunday. Such a thing has never been done in the Parliament of Canada since confederation. If the Government take this course, they do violence to the conscientious scruples of a large number of the members of this House. The leader of the House tells us that this matter can be arranged by effecting pairs. Why, the whole House might pair down in this way, and have no quorum left. That is no remedy for the difficulty. The members of this House who wish to remain here and attend to their duties, do not wish to go away when important measures are under discussion. The members of this House desire to have their conscientious scruples respected, and if the Government insist upon sitting upon the day that intervenes between Good Friday and Easter Sunday, they are violating those conscientious scruples. I hold, in the first place, that we cannot sit on Saturday under the terms of this motion; and I hold, in the second place, that if it were possible to do so, it is not advisable to do so, and I hope the hon. gentleman who leads this House, and the members who sit behind him, will not be guilty of forcing upon the members of the House who have scruples in this regard, the necessity of failing to go home to spend Easter Sunday with their families, and obliging them to remain here over Good Friday, and over the Saturday that intervenes between Good Friday and Easter Sunday, and over Easter Sunday. It would be a monstrous thing to do, almost as monstrous as to press this measure through in the way the Government are trying to do.

Mr. SPEAKER. The point raised by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) is that the words "after Monday next" have been omitted from the motion as put to the House. That is quite true, but the motion may, with the consent of the House, be amended in that sense.

An hon. MEMBER. The consent of the House is not asked.

Mr. SPEAKER. The consent of the House would require to be obtained.

Mr. OUIMET. I move in amendment that the words "after Monday next" be struck out.

Mr. LAURIER. I see that we are having a repetition of what has been going on ever since this question has been on the tapis. The Government gave notice on the 25th March that they would make this motion last Monday, but they did not proceed with the motion. Again, there was a divided House; one side wanted to go on, and the other would not. At last they come to a conclusion, but when the leader of the House moves his motion, the Minister of Public Works moves an amendment. So here again we have a divided House. Sir, we have high authority for saying that a House divided against itself cannot stand.

Mr. IVES. It seems to me this is simply a question of whether the House desires, during the few remaining days of the session that remain, to proceed with the business for which Parliament has been called together. That is the main question. It is very surprising to me that hon. gentlemen opposite should have insisted, in the first place, upon going on with this measure, and afterwards resisted every proposition that has been made to provide additional time, and to facilitate the completion of the business for which Parliament has been called together. Now, the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) says that it is a monstrous thing to propose that Parliament should sit on Saturday, the day that intervenes between Good Friday and Easter Sunday. I would like to know, according to the tenets of what church there is any particular sanctity to that Saturday that intervenes between Good Friday and Easter Monday. Certainly not in the hon. gentleman's church. The hon. gentleman's church does not make any point of Good Friday at all. For it Good Friday is no more than any other day, and the succeeding Saturday as well. I think the only body in Canada that gives any special prominence to Good Friday, is the body to which I belong, the Church of England, and I am certain that I know quite as much about the prejudices of that church as the hon. member from North Norfolk. I never heard in my life of any special sanctity attached to the Saturday which intervenes between Good Friday and Easter Sunday, except among the Jews, who think all Saturdays should be observed.

Mr. EDGAR. I desire to refer to the question of order as regards your ruling, Mr. Speaker. A motion was placed in your hands, of which no notice had been given. An amendment has been moved, and the motion being out of order, I submit that the amendment is out of order, and cannot be proceeded with. Nothing can be proceeded with by way of amendment except on a motion that is in order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not think the objection of the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) is well taken. The notice of motion placed on the paper was that the Government would take all Saturdays after Monday next, and the words "after Monday next" were struck out, and the motion was so read to the House. I assumed that the House had given its consent to the change made. I have since put it as it originally stood on the Order paper, "that after Monday next, for the remainder of this session, the House shall sit on Saturdays." I have also put the amendment moved by the Minister of Public Works to strike out the words "after Monday next" in said motion." It is that amendment which is now before the House.

Mr. CASEY. I rise to a point of order, which is that the amendment itself is not in order. The notice given was to take all the Saturdays after Monday next. I submit that it is not in order for another member of the Government, or any hon. member, to move an amendment modifying a motion of this nature.

Mr. OUIMET. The ruling of the Speaker has been given.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is not in order in discussing that a motion is out of order when it has been decided by the Chair to be in order.

Mr. CASEY. I beg pardon.

Mr. SPEAKER. The point was raised that this motion was out of order. I have already ruled that the motion is in order, and also that the amendment is in order.

Mr. CASEY. I understood you, Mr. Speaker, merely to rule against the reasons and arguments adduced by the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar).

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have ruled that the motion is in order, it having been put as it stands on the Order paper, and also that the amendment is in order.

Mr. CASEY. You ruled on the reasons given by my hon. friend.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order; chair.

Mr. CASEY. I submit I have a right to be heard on the point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I assume that hon. gentlemen will understand that before coming to the conclusion I did come to, I had considered all the reasons that could be urged, against the motion being in order. Having decided that the motion is in order, then the only course for the hon. gentleman to take is to appeal from my ruling.

Mr. CASEY. I beg to submit that I am misunderstood, or that I have misunderstood you, Mr. Speaker. I do not understand you to rule that there can be no other reasons adduced for calling upon you to rule the amendment out of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order ; chair.

Mr. CASEY. I simply understood you to rule, Mr. Speaker, that the reasons given by the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) were not sufficient.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order ; sit down.

Mr. SPEAKER. The House has already heard my opinion, and that the amendment is in order.

Mr. CASEY. I am not disputing your ruling, Mr. Speaker. I submit you are too suspicious of my intentions. I am not disputing your ruling in the slightest degree, but trying to state a new point of order against this amendment. If you rule, Sir, that I cannot raise that fresh point of order, I must submit, and there is an end of it. In regard to the amendment which you, Sir, have ruled to be in order, the question is whether we could sit on this particular Saturday. It is not a question of conscientious scruples as regards that Saturday. No one pretended it was.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) did not contend that the objection was based on conscientious scruples.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Yes.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman said that those who had conscientious scruples about sitting on Good Friday, and had obtained a declaration that the House would not sit on that day, objected to the proposition now made to keep members here over Saturday, who otherwise would have sufficient time to go home and give, perhaps, a day to their private business or other important matters, and compel them to stay here Friday, Saturday and Monday, although the House would only sit one day, Saturday, out of the three. I am sure the objection is a perfectly reasonable one. The desire expressed to sit on Saturday is only a bit of bluff to show the apparently intense anxiety of the Government to proceed with the Bill now before the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. CASEY. I claim we should adjourn over Saturday, if only for the important reasons urged the last day we discussed this matter, namely, that we have not yet received any official report of the proceedings of the Winnipeg conference. We see many reports in the newspapers to the effect that the negotiations have failed, that they have been successful, that proposals have been made, and that counter proposals have been made and refused. I declare that we have a right to know, officially, what was done, before we take another step with respect to considering this Bill. The country, I am confident, will insist on it. If the Government persist in going on blindly with this Bill, not knowing what has been done in Winnipeg, they are not true to their trust, their duty to the people, and their responsibility to this House. They are insulting this House and the people of this country by asking hon. members to go ahead, while they do not know what has been the conclusion of this important conference at Winnipeg. Without talking about conscientious scruples, as regards sitting on Saturday, which point was only raised by the other side of the House, we have a proper constitutional reason for not sitting on this Saturday approaching, unless the Government choose to give the House that official information before Saturday comes around. On this ground I strongly oppose the alteration of the motion of which notice has been given. Although it may be in order, technically in order, yet in spirit the intention of the rule of the House is broken by this alteration of the original. notice. The intention of the rule was that the meaning of such a motion should be known two days before hon. members had to vote upon it, and now by the motion and the amendment, the obvious intention of the rule is violated, although you, Mr. Speaker, have ruled that it is technically observed.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) There is a definite rule that the House rises every Friday night and stands adjourned until Monday. This rule can only be altered by giving two days' notice. Notice was given that the Government would take Saturday after next Monday. The question is whether an amendment to take a day before that time is germane to the motion. Under the rules of the House, notice has been given in which it was proposed to take Saturdays after Monday, and an hon. gentleman has proposed to amend it by taking an anterior day to that mentioned in the notice, and that I hold is not germane to the notice of motion, because it violates the first rule that the House shall adjourn from Friday to Monday unless two days' notice has been given. No notice was given to take the first Saturday.

Mr. SPEAKER. I may respectfully point out to the House this fact, that the notice standing on the paper is dated 25th March, and it was given at that time. The rule is, as hon. members are well aware, that two days' notice is to be given of any such motion, and that is a rule provided for the purpose of preventing surprises. Now, this notice is dated on the 25th of March, and I think every hon. member must have come to the conclusion, that it was the intention to take all the Saturdays after last Monday ; so that I do not think that any hon. member could have been surprised by the amendment which is now submitted to the House, and which, in my opinion, is entirely in order.

Mr. CHARLTON. Mr. Speaker, I beg to call your attention to the fact that the motion, notice of which was given on the 25th of March, was not put to the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. CHARLTON. It may have been put afterwards, but it was not put then, and I failed to hear any one put that motion at all. The Government moved a motion which was not upon the Order paper, and I submit that all subsequent transactions under that motion are irregular.

Mr. McCARTHY. I intended to take the point of order which the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) has now taken, and which appears to me to be fatal to this proceeding. The motion that was put in your hands was not in order, as you have ruled, Mr. Speaker. No other motion is made. What I understood you to do was to take up the paper and read what was on the paper, but that has not been moved. How you, Mr. Speaker, could take up the Order paper, and say that you put to the House what a Minister or an hon. member has given notice that he will move, and which the hon. gentleman does not move, I do not quite understand. The hon. gentleman who leads the House moved this motion. That motion was not as it is on the Order paper, and, upon objection being taken to it, was ruled out of order. That hon. gentleman cannot have moved again, and if he cannot move again, the motion has not been made. I submit, Sir, that that point is well taken.

Mr. OUIMET. The motion originally put, without the words "after Monday next," was out of order because it was not exactly in the terms specified in the notice. Now, if that motion is out of order it did not exist at all, and what has been done was afterwards to move the motion as it was on the Order paper.

Mr. EDGAR. Who moved the motion as it is on the Order paper ?

Mr. OUIMET. The leader of the House did.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. OUIMET. The decision of the Speaker was that the motion should be moved in the very words of the notice, and that has been done. I moved an amendemnt, that the words "after Monday next" be struck out, so as to make the motion as it was intended it should be. It was the right of the leader of the House to move the motion in the very words of the Order paper, and it was also the right of any one to move an amendment. The procedure is complete and absolutely regular, and I submit, Mr. Speaker, that your decision is quite correct.

Mr. SPEAKER.

Mr. McNEILL. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that an hon. member of this House can move one motion, and have an alternative motion which he can substitute for it if the first motion is out of order ?

Mr. OUIMET. Certainly.

Mr. McNEILL. Then it is a most extraordinary proceeding.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not think the point of order is well taken. It is quite true, it was my duty to compare the motion with the notice of motion on the paper, but I assumed that the House would agree to the change that had been made, in view of the circumstances I have already referred to, namely, that this notice was given on the 25th of March, and that so far as I was concerned, at all events, I understood that the intention of the Government was to ask the House for all the Saturdays after last Monday. I assumed, therefore—improperly perhaps—that the House would consent to the alteration which was proposed to be made in the motion as it appeared on the Order paper. But the House having refused to assent to that, it was my duty to rule that the motion must be in strict accordance with the notice on the Order paper, and I did so put the motion after the point was raised.

Mr. McCARTHY. Who moved the motion ?

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. leader of the House. I am also of the opinion that the amendment moved by the Minister of Public Works is entirely in order.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not know, Mr. Speaker, that there is much use in suggesting a compromise to the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper). But I was going to say this : I have no objection to the Government taking Saturdays if it is required, although as a rule I am bound to say that in my experience but little progress is generally made on Saturdays. I would say this to the leader of the House. I know as a matter of fact that a large number of members desire to have next Saturday at home. Now, we have Wednesday of next week, which is not a Government day, and I would suggest to the hon. gentleman that he might have Wednesday and let the Saturday go.

Mr. MULOCK. I rise to record my protest against the proposition that the House shall sit on Saturday to deal with this important measure. We have been told by the Secretary of State that this is the most important measure that has ever been submitted to the Canadian Parliament. We have received assurances of that kind from all members of the Government, except perhaps the Finance Minister, and we know that under the circumstances there would scarcely be a corporal's guard in this House on Saturday next to deal with this, the most important measure that can engage the attention of Parliament. Does the Secretary of State wish to have this measure dealt with by one-tenth of the members of this House ? If it is as important as he says it is, I submit that he should not seek to place an Act like this upon the statute-book, with the sanction of only one-tenth of the people's representatives. I wish, Sir, to take issue with the Minister of Trade and Commerce in the remarks that he made. He stated that the Opposition had on all occasions resisted the efforts of the Government to advance this measure.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MULOCK. I hear the statement echoed now.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MULOCK. I give a most emphatic denial to that, and the House and the country know the incorrectness of that statement.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. MULOCK. Did the Opposition, or any individual member of the Opposition, put any obstacle in the way of the arrangements for the second reading of this Bill ? Not until two months after the meeting of Parliament did the Government ask the House to give an opinion upon the measure, and then the leader of the Opposition, without pressure and almost unsolicited, concurred with the Government in the proposition that the discussion on this measure should go de die in diem—indeed I might say day and night, until the second reading was reached. So anxious was the leader of the Opposition to facilitate the discussion of this measure, that he assented to this House sitting day and night, and we had a continuous discussion for two days and two nights. It was a measure upon which each member desired to express an opinion, and yet, important as it was to each individual member of the House, as well as the country at large, the leader of the Opposition facilitated the vote upon it at a very early date. In the face of that action, I should like to know what reliance can be placed on the assertion of the Minister of Trade and Commerce that on all occasions we have endeavoured to retard the progress of this measure. If it is a measure of the importance which the Secretary of State describes it to be, it is entitled to the fullest discussion. Every word of it may contain a law-suit ; every line of it may contain a quarrel. Every feature of the measure demands caution at every step. Here we have the Secretary of State doing violence to the consciences of the people and to our system of representation, by declaring that by force, by exhausting the physical endurance of the members, and by taking advantage of a scant House, he will endeavour to fasten this measure upon the statute-book.

Mr. CAMERON. Let them stay here.

Mr. MULOCK. I intend to stay here, but where are the gentlemen who are shouting "go on" ? Where will they be on Saturday morning ?

Some hon. MEMBERS. We will be here.

Mr. MULOCK. There will not be a corporal's guard of them. They will just leave enough members here to dominate the Opposition. The rest will be scattered to the four winds of heaven. They are only temporarily taking their leave ; but it is an illustration of what will happen to them in the cyclone of the general election.

Mr. COCHRANE. We will be here.

Mr. MULOCK. We shall see : but, without any undue prophecy, I venture to say that the majority of those who are pressing this measure on will not be here after the general election. But that is not the question. The question now is what we shall do next Saturday—whether we shall sit and go through the empty form of pretending to deliberate in the name of the people, when there will not be here one-tenth of the people's representatives. The country knows full well that even in a full House it is not properly represented here to-day ; much less is it properly represented if nine-tenths of the people's representatives are absent ; and it is indecent, I submit—it is characteristic of the course of the leader of the House ever since he has taken his place here—by brute force to try to impose his arbitrary and imperious will on the people by forcing this Bill through the House. Never since I have been a member of Parliament, have I witnessed such an attempt as that of the leader of the House to-day to interfere with parliamentary institutions. He boasts of his desire to maintain the dignity of Parliament. He says that, if we do not vote as he wills, we are destroying parliamentary institutions. His action and the action of this Government the country will repudiate, as a discredit to parliamentary institutions in Canada. The very attempt to force through Parliament a measure which has not received the sanction of the people, which has not been submitted to the people and received their imprimatur and endorsement, is one of the greatest blows that could be struck at representative institutions. I protest against this attempt, and I venture to prophesy that, like many others of his attempts, it will neither redound to his credit nor be in the public interest.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think it is generally recognized that, as the session draws to a close, the Government must ask more or less time from the House. That is a reasonable proposition, and is generally recognized as such. I do not think there is any disposition to refuse the Government all reasonable time; and, if they think that another day is absolutely essential to carry on the business of the country, of course they must have it. The question is, when a great deal of inconvenience would be caused by taking this particular day, and the same results might be attained by adopting an alternative proposition, whether it would not be better to adopt the alternative proposition. My hon. friend at my left (Sir Richard Cartwright) has suggested a mode by which the Government could obtain the additional time they want without inconveniencing the House. I think the whole House recognizes that 90 per cent of the members desire to go away on Saturday, if they can.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I say 90 per cent desire to go, if they can, and my hon. friend suggests that the Government should take Wednesday next, which belongs to private members, instead of taking Saturday, which would give them the same time. If they do that, no time will be lost. I press that suggestion upon hon. gentlemen opopsite.

Mr. WALLACE. I was about to rise to say what the hon. member for Queen's has said, and I would ask the leader of the House to accept the proposal made by the hon. member for South Oxford. So far as the Government are concerned, that would give them precisely the same time as they would have by taking Saturday, and it certainly would be a very great convenience to a large majority of the members of the House——

Mr. COCHRANE. How do you know ?

Mr. WALLACE—who desire to go to their homes for Easter. Besides, Saturday is not a good day for doing business. It has always been recognized in this Parliament that business has not gone off on Saturday with the same facility as on other days of the week. That is another reason why the Government should accede to the proposition of the hon. member for South Oxford.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not think the Government would be acting against their own interest by accepting the proposition of the hon. member for South Oxford. They would get the additional day that they would get if they took Saturday. Now, a great many members who are within moderate distance from Ottawa, of course, want to spend Good Friday at home. They cannot do that, if the House sits on Saturday. They are obliged to remain here, and it does seem to me a rather selfish proposition for a large number of gentlemen on the opposite side of the House to ask for pairs to escape from their duties here, in order to spend the day as a holiday at home, and to impose upon others the duties from which they are themselves trying to escape. The proposition made by the hon. member for South Oxford is certainly a very reasonable one, and the Government ought to accept it. By doing so they will enable many members to leave here, some this evening and others to-morrow morning, and to be back here on Monday in time for public business at three o'clock.

Mr. FRASER. I find that a large number of members have made arrangements to spend the Sabbath and Good Friday at home. If the leader of the Government insists on our sitting on Saturday, the House will have to adjourn at midnight, whereas if he accepts the proposition to take Wednesday, the Government will gain the whole of the day.

An hon. MEMBER. Why not take both ?

Mr. FRASER. If the intention is to take both, I submit that there is no reason for us to take Saturday. If we take Saturday, a large number of the members, who go home for Good Friday will have to come back on the Saturday, and will have to be away from their homes on Easter Sunday; and I do not think that those who have no religious scruples in this matter and to whom one day is not more than any other should force their views upon those who have such religious scruples. When we adjourn on Friday, why not remain adjourned until Monday and then take Wednesday; and in that case no time will be lost and both ends will be gained. The Government will lose no time, and those members who wish to go home will have the satisfaction of spending Easter with their families, and after coming back, under the influence of their religious observances, will be much more willing to promote business than if they were compelled to remain over on Saturday.

Mr. McCARTHY. I desire to add my voice to the request made by the hon. member for South Oxford. I had supposed that the intention to take Saturday had been abandoned, because although this notice has been standing on the paper for some days, when it was reached the leader of the House took no notice of it and allowed it to stand, and arrangements were made by those who can go home and return by Monday to do so. It is certainly rather inconvenient for them to be told now that although we are not to sit on Good Friday, still the House must sit upon Saturday. If of course the majority must rule, the minority in this House apparently have no rights and are treated with very little consideration by the majority, but I may say this, that if the business of the House is to be carried on in any reasonable way, some regard must be paid to the feelings, if not to the rights, of the minority; and I venture to say to the hon. leader of the House and the majority behind him that they will gain very little by forcing the motion through in this way against the expression of opinion to which the House has listened from the minority.

Mr. CAMERON. Retaliation.

Mr. McCARTHY. It is not retaliation, it is self-defence. The matter before the House is the most important—I am endeavouring to use the adjectives without the superlatives to which we have listened in this debate,—with which this House has ever been concerned. The proceeding in committee is probably the most important stage of the Bill. We have assented by a majority to the principle of the Bill, but we have to consider a very long measure, we have to contrast and compare it with the law in Manitoba which it is to supersede ; and to do that requires not merely the consideration and time given the measure in this House but some study outside the House. Now, if the passage of this Bill is to be forced through the committee, as far as the Government is concerned, if the sections are to be pressed through without discussion and without argument, without anything being said in their defence, why of course the country will understand it. For my part, I propose to stay here if the House sits on Saturday, and I propose to have something to say on every clause of the measure and on every line of each clause as it is moved.

Mr. GILLIES. That does not often happen.

Mr. McCARTHY. I thought therefore it would be all the more agreeable to the hon. gentleman. Under the circumstances, is it not time that we should carry on the business of the House and of the country with some degree of courtesy from the one side to the other ? It has been proposed that the members' private day, Wednesday, which the Government have not proposed to take, should be given up instead of Saturday. In that way, we should have the whole of Wednesday instead of only half a day on Saturday. Surely it is wiser and better that a reasonable proposition of that kind should be listened to instead of compelling to spend Easter in Ottawa instead of with their families, those members who can leave here and be able to return in time for the sitting of the House on Monday.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I am sure that the hon. leader of the Government, will, if he takes time to consider the proposition made him, grant the request made by those who have spoken. He very generously, the other day, gave way to the desire of those who wished to commemorate Good Friday. Now, a good many of us have not time to go home for Good Friday, that is those who live any distance west of Toronto, if they have to return for Saturday ; but by yielding to their request, they would be able to spend Good Friday and Easter Sunday with their families, and are prepared to give up Wednesday, which will more than compensate for any time thus lost.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would be very sorry to leave myself open, under any circumstances, to a charge of want of courtesy towards hon. gentlemen opposite, but I must not forget that the opposition to sit on Saturday has come entirely from hon. gentlemen who have shown no disposition to forward the progress of this Bill. I cannot lose sight of the fact that the hon. member for North Simcoe gave notice long ago to the Government and to the House that he intended that this Bill should never go through the committee, and I therefore distrust the dulcet tones in which he now endeavours to prevent this motion from passing. I will tell the hon. gentleman why I did not make this motion at the time for which it was set down. I did not do so because I wanted to make progress with the Bill, and because I believed that if I did make the motion then, advantage would be taken by the hon. gentleman and those who are disposed to abet him in obstructing this measure——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am perfectly in order.

Mr. CASEY. I rise to a point of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Sit down.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. leader of the Government has charged members with obstruction.

Mr. SPEAKER. I am not aware that there is anything unparliamentary in applying that word——

Mr. CASEY. It was so ruled by the Chairman in committee the other night.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The Speaker has ruled.

Mr. MULOCK. I raise another point of order.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The Speaker has ruled, and the hon. gentleman cannot be allowed——

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member is raising another point of order, I understand.

Mr. MULOCK. The Secretary of State spoke of those who were aiding and abetting the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) in obstructing this measure, thereby implying that the hon. member for North Simcoe was obstructing that measure. I submit that the hon. gentleman has no right to make such a charge, directly or indirectly, against any hon. member.

Mr. SPEAKER. That is not an unparliamentary term to apply to an hon. member. The best authority I can give is that of Mr. Speaker Peel, who says :

> There is nothing unparliamentary in attributing obstruction to any hon. member.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I trust I may now be allowed, without further interruption, to make the few remarks I rose to make. I avoided making the motion on that day, because I was anxious to make progress with the Bill, and I wished to avoid waste of time through occupying the attention of the House with anything but the progress of this Bill. Under these circumstance, I felt compelled, as a matter of public duty, that I owe to this House and to the country to steadily advance this measure as far as it is possible to be advanced. I do not say that the hon. member for North Simcoe, and those who may be disposed to join him in saying that this Bill will never pass through the committee may not succeed. But I say that the country will understand that this measure which this session was called to deal with has been met by constant, persistent obstruction in every possible way, and the people will know the reason it does not become law, if it does not.

Mr. LAURIER. After the offer made by my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), the hon. gentleman has no right to make such an insinuation. When the proposition is made that, in order to avoid sitting on Saturday, the private members should give Wednesday to the business of the Government, the hon. gentleman has no foundation whatever for saying that there is shown any disposition to obstruct the Bill. Why, Sir, if there has been a disposition to obstruct the Bill is it likely my hon. friend beside me would offer to give to the Government one of the days we have the right to apply to the business of private members ?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. And spend it as to-day is spent.

Mr. LAURIER. And spend it as every day is spent, in dealing with the business before the House. And the hon. gentleman is the last man who should make such an insinuation. He has stated that this session was called for the purpose of carrying this Bill. How was it that for two long months this House was prevented from going on with the Bill ? If this Bill was not pressed sooner, what was the cause ? On the very day of opening this session that was called to dispose of this Bill, we found that the Government was being plotted against by some of its own members, and perhaps the leader of the House was himself a party to that conspiracy. And when the hon. gentleman has disposed of these charges that he was of those who took part in that conspiracy, then, and no sooner will he be allowed to state that others are offering obstruction to this Bill. If there is obstruction, where does it come from ? Not from Liberal members of the House, but from those who sit on the other side. Has the hon. gentleman forgotten that when the remedial order was passed, a session was called at which it should have been taken into consideration ? But that whole session was allowed to pass and no Bill was brought down. Who was responsible for that delay ? Was it the Liberal members, or was it the Conservative members ? And when this special and final session of Parliament was called, was any disposition shown to go on with the Bill ? There were plots in the Cabinet, as I have said. Then, when peace was made between the members of the Cabinet, after two weeks, was the Bill pressed forward then ? No ; it was not. But peace having been made among members of the Government, and when it suits their own convenience, they bring forward this Bill and wish to force it, and nothing else, upon the attention of Parliament, regardless of consideration that is due to the members of the House. Under such circumstances, I am ready to go to the country with the hon. gentleman and let the people decide whence has come the obstruction to this Bill.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend——

Mr. LANDERKIN. This is one of the obstructors.

Mr. FOSTER—has displayed a good deal of heat in debating the simple question whether or not——

Mr. LANDERKIN. One of the seven.

Mr. FOSTER. Now, when my hon. friend gets through. I heard an appeal a little while ago that it would be well if this Parliament were carried on with some respect for parliamentary rules. I will try to keep within the rules, and I trust other hon. gentlemen will do the same. I was going on to remark in a very cool and calm way that the hon. gentleman seemed to have unnecessarily excited himself. The only question before the House is as to whether there is a disposition amongst its members to avail themselves of every possible hour during the three short weeks which remain to pass on the important business before the House; and which, I think, the country is somewhat interested in having carried out. There is a good deal to be said with reference to consulting the individual and private convenience of members of this House, but I think that argument may be very easily pressed too far. And I think that when you come to within three weeks of the end of a session in which so little real business has been done and in which so much remains to be done, it is not an extravagant request to ask that members on both sides of the House shall give some of their private pleasure and their private convenience to carry out the object for which they were sent to this House. Hon. gentlemen, whether they are in favour of this measure or opposed to it, say that this is a most important measure. The majority have definitely declared that the measure is one which ought to be legislated upon this session. Then, if there is anything in the unanimous consent that it is an important measure, and if there is anything in the fact that a majority have affirmed this principle and wish to have it put upon the statute-book, there is an argument that ought to have great weight in inducing hon. members to give up their own pleasure in a trip to Toronto or to Montreal, or elsewhere, to spend Sunday with their friends, and to give attention to this measure which is allowed to be important. I wish to speak of another thing. It has been stated over and over again, and the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat is one of the worst sinners in that respect, that all the waste of time is due to one or two things, mainly to the fact that there was some trouble in the Cabinet. The hon. gentleman is quite welcome to make all he can out of that. But let us come down to the facts of the case. To hear the hon. gentleman speak, you would think that a great deal of time had been wasted, weeks and weeks had been lost owing to this cause. The House met on the 2nd of January. The adjournments that took place covered four working days, and no more. The Address was moved on Thursday, the 16th of January. The unusual course was followed of discussing the Address from the 16th of January to the 23rd of January, and in that discussion the Manitoba school question was the main question that was threshed out, although it was well known that a measure would come down and that this same discussion would have to be gone over again. The debate on the Address generally occupies two days, or three at the farthest. This session it occupied from the 16th of January to the 23rd of January. Then, the Estimates were placed before the House on the 27th of January, and on Tuesday (28th) the House went into Supply. Did they show any disposition to give Supply? No, Sir. Every man on the Opposition side who stood up declared, by all that was parliamentary and constitutional, that this House was called together at this session for the purpose of passing a Remedial Bill; and they demanded that the Bill should be laid before the House and should be discussed; and nothing but the Bill would satisfy them. So, Sir, all day Tuesday was spent, and in the hours of the next morning we got one small item passed, and the House adjourned. The Budget was brought down on Friday, 31st of January. It is usual in the House, when the Budget is introduced, to carry on the discussion de die in diem. Why was that not done this year? Because the Bill was demanded, and nothing but the Bill; that is what the House came here to legislate upon; and, instead of giving the time that is usual in discussing the Budget de die in diem, they refused to give that time, and the Budget debate lasted from 31st of January until the 28th February, or just about a month. During that time was the Remedial Bill not before the House? Yes, it was. The Remedial Bill was brought down to this House on the 11th of February; it was printed on the 12th of February, and the only thing that kept the Government from moving the second reading of that Bill was the fact that the Budget debate was on, that, in fact, a declaration of want of confidence in the Administration was under discussion, and hon. gentlemen opposite would not intermit that until a whole month had passed, and yet they accuse the Government of delaying the introduction of the Bill! Hon. gentlemen, and my hon. friend opposite, cannot crawl out of so small a hole as that. The Budget debate was kept on for over a month, and for one purpose only, and that was to prevent this House from going into a discussion of the Remedial Bill. Well, Sir, on two or three occasions this House was asked for further time to be taken for Government measures. What has never been done in any previous session was done during this session; on every occasion further time was refused, and was not granted until a long debate had taken place upon it; and, once or twice, we had to come to some arrangement in the matter in order to get on with the business at all. The Budget debate closed on Friday, 28th February, and the second reading of the Remedial Bill was moved on the first Government day after, that is, on 3rd March, and the debate lasted from 3rd day of March to 20th March, or seventeen days altogether, including the days that the House did not sit.

An hon. MEMBER. By whom?

Mr. FOSTER. By hon. members on both sides of the House, as it was proper and right.

An hon. MEMBER. More on your side.

Mr. FOSTER. If the hon. gentleman means to assert that it was more largely a discussion on this side of the House than on that, I am not free to admit that what he says is true; but, even if it be true, I am right in making this statement, that the House knows, and the country knows, that whoever discussed the Bill on this side of the House went into the merits of the Bill; whilst, on the other side of the House, a large part of the discussion did not touch the merits of the Bill at all, but was devoted to everything else than the merits of the Bill, and for the purpose, as it would seem to an onlooker and to a spectator, of killing time. What was that long four-and-a-half hours speech by the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Bruneau) for, when he travelled over all the ground from the Cape of Good Hope to Greenland, over every question discussed in this country for the last twenty-five years? What was the necessity for a four or five-hours speech from the hon. member for Addington (Mr. Dawson) on this matter? And so I might go on.

An hon. MEMBER. He did not speak on it at all.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. member for Addington spoke.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

Mr. FOSTER. There is no point of order.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The point of order I make is this : The hon. gentleman states that a certain member of this House spoke for several hours, who did not speak at all.

Mr. FOSTER. That is no point of order ; that is a point of fact.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Everybody knows that his statements cannot be relied upon. I am not surprised at that statement at all.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think that anything could surprise the hon. member.

Mr. LANDERKIN. No statement that you make.

Mr. FOSTER. I was going on to state that the hon. member for Addington spoke four or five hours.

An hon. MEMBER. Six hours.

Mr. FOSTER. I am told that it was not upon the Remedial Bill that he spoke, but, to my mind, it makes no difference. I stated at first, and I think that my statement is true, that the long debate upon the Budget was for the sake of keeping off the Remedial Bill, and, when the hon. member for Addington speaks for six hours upon a Budget, it must be that there are more than financial and trade matters in his mind at the time. So again, when we asked to take Monday and Thursday, there was the same obstruction and the same desire to prevent the Government from getting an additional day, the same desire that is shown to-day. Now, Sir, the committee stage of the Bill was moved on Friday, 20th March, and although there had been a full discussion on the second reading it was not until 28th February that we were allowed to go into committee. from that time up to 2nd day of April we have passed exactly three clauses of that Bill. My hon. friend said that it was necessary that these clauses should be discussed ; but my hon. friend is doing everything he can to-day to prevent us from taking Saturdays and giving him a chance to discuss the clauses of the Bill upon their merits. The Government does not object to a fair discussion of the Bill upon the different clauses : what is objected to is that, when the Government wants to get the Bill where it can be discussed, there is this persistent attempt to prevent the Bill getting where it is possible to discuss it in this House. Sir, it is impossible for us to avoid the conclusion, it is impossible for the country to avoid the conclusion—because the country keenly watches the proceedings of this House—and the conclusion the country will come to is that all this abnormal energy has been wasted for the purpose of preventing the discussion of this Bill, first on the second reading, and afterwards in committee ; and the country will take due cognizance of the fact. Now, we ask simply that members shall forego their private business, not go home on Saturday, and that, three weeks before the session ends, when we have this Bill in committee, when there is not an item of the Estimates, speaking broadly, passed, when there are large services to be provided for, and must be considered by this House, services necessary for this country—we are asked, forsooth, not to take Saturday, because some members wish to go home. Now, we are told it is unfair that a large number of the members in this House who want to go home and spend their Saturday, or spend their Sunday, should have to remain here. Many of them have not been home since the session commenced ; but for those who live near their homes and who have often been there, it is not too much to ask them to forego this one day for the sake of public business.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The hon. Minister of Finance says this is simply a resolution on the paper. But the debate has taken a turn that does not leave it simply a question of a resolution on the paper, and I, for one, wish to take this opportunity to resent the remark made by the leader of the House that every member who speaks against the House sitting on Saturday, is obstructing the Bill.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, opposed to the Bill. If I said that, I certainly did not intend to say it. What I said was that all those who were opposed to taking Saturday, were opposed to the Bill; but I did not intend to say for a single moment that every person who had spoken, was engaged in obstructing the Bill.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Of course, I accept the hon. gentleman's explanation, because, when I gave the advice I did to the House, I meant, exactly, what I said——

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No doubt of it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND—that a number of members on both sides had expressed to me a desire, owing principally to social arrangements that they had made, that the House should not sit on Saturday, and it would be very inconvenient for them to remain on Saturday. What is taking place now proves the truth of what I said, that it would rather facilitate the business of the House, if the wishes of so many members were consulted. The hon. gentleman knows well that, when hon. members had every reason to believe that there would be an Easter holiday, and had made arrangements to be absent from the city over Friday and Saturday, they must feel somewhat aggrieved and disappointed, when their wishes are disregarded. Now, Mr. Speaker, the Finance Minister has undertaken to read us a lecture about taking up time. Who has taken up the time this afternoon ? Hon.

gentlemen opposite by departing from the subject of the resolution before the House, and undertaking to make very small political capital against the Opposition by making a series of statements that are not borne out by the facts. The hon. Minister of Finance practically admitted that in the course of his speech. Some of the statements made by him he was compelled to withdraw, and he did not withdraw them gracefully and manfully, and especially was this true in regard to statements regarding the hon. member for Addington (Mr. Dawson). The statement made with respect to that hon. member had no object except that of injuring him in his constituency ; and the Finance Minister, finding that that statement was not correct, should have withdrawn it and admitted that he was under an error, and that the hon. gentleman did not take up unnecessary time. The hon. gentleman knows well whether hon. members make their speeches longer than he thinks they should make them; they have a perfect right to do so if they are discussing the question under consideration, and the hon. gentleman is not fair in saying that speeches delivered on this side of the House are much longer than were those on the other side of the House in that debate. If so, I repeat, hon. members were quite within their rights. In my judgment, and I know the facts in connection with the debate on the second reading of the Remedial Bill, the statement made by the Finance Minister is not correct, and I wish to take this opportunity, in view of the position he has taken, to state this : A proposition was made by him, with a desire to shorten the debate, and I, in the absence of my leader, tried to meet his wishes to the fullest extent. We prepared a list of hon. members who desired to speak on that question, and upon that basis we decided, if possible, to come to a vote within a short time, on a certain day. The Minister of Finance, whether he approved of it or not I do not know, but for some reason or other, prominent members of his party, after that arrangement was made, rose in the House and spoke hour after hour, when the special basis of that arrangement was that certain members whose names had been handed in should be the speakers on that question. I should like to ask the House and the country whether that was a fair way of carrying out in good faith the understanding arrived at, with the names we had before us as the basis of the arrangements. I wish to add that in bringing that debate to a conclusion I personally appealed to my friends on this side of the House to give way, and the result was that many of my friends who had intended to deliver speeches on that subject gave way. Some four or five old members of the House, members prominent in the party and in the country, who desired to discuss the question gave way at my request. Under these circumstances, it was most unfair for the hon. gentleman—he may think it is proper political warfare, but I do not think so—to make the statements he made ; and I take the opportunity of saying here that there are hon. members who are anxious that the Bill referred to should pass this House as soon as possible. There are other hon. members on both sides who believe that the Bill should not pass, and those hon. members have a right to oppose the Bill so long as they keep within the rules, and within their rights ; and the Government do not facilitate progress by misrepresenting and bulldozing hon. members, as they appear to be attempting to do at this time. I make this statement, and I think it frankly and honestly represents the present state of affairs. The Minister of Finance undertakes to place under the authority, as it were, or in connection with the Liberal party, and under the leader of the Opposition, every hon. member who has spoken against and voted against this Bill. That is not fair. Many of those hon. gentlemen who have spoken have declared themselves to be members of the Conservative party, even hon. members whom the leader of the House has read out of the party ; have stated that they are not members of the Liberal party, and the leader of the Opposition has no control over them. It is most unfair and unjust to say that for every member of the Conservative party who has taken up time in discussing this question my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition is to be held accountable. I take this opportunity of laying the matter before the House and the country, as so much is being said and written about it. As regards hon. gentlemen opposite who are members of the Conservative party, who declare they are still members of that party and intend to work for the return of the present Government or the Conservative party, it is unfair and unjust to say that the leader of the Opposition or the Liberal party are in any way responsible for their actions on this Bill or any of their acts in this House. So far as I am personally concerned, I wish to repeat to the leader of the House that I have spoken what I believe to be the sentiments of a large number of members on both sides of the House, that, as is already apparent from what has taken place, business is not furthered when hon. members feel they are being coerced or pressed unjustly, unfairly and unreasonably, and that is not the way to secure their assistance in furthering the business of the House.

Mr. SPROULE. I personally regret that the leader of the House has seen fit to adopt the course he has adopted in relation to the very reasonable suggestion made by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), because his aim is, so far as we can gather it from his speeches and the speech of the Minister of Finance, to obtain all possible time to pass the Remedial Bill, before the House. If he were gaining any more time by the course adopted than by the course suggested by the hon. member for Oxford, then I could understand his action, and there might be some reason for insisting on carrying out his views. But he is not going to gain one hour additional: it is only the difference between taking seven hours on Saturday and taking the following Wednesday. If hon. members are willing to give up their private day, and exchange it with the Government in lieu of a portion of a Government day, whereby they would be enabled to go home and attend to their duties for the time being, I do not see why the Government should not be willing to accept the proposition.

Some hon. MEMBERS. They are not willing.

Mr. SPROULE. So far as I know the offer has been made by very many hon. members. In addition, there is the fact that we have members supporting the Government going around here in dozens applying for pairs. I have had eight applications since yesterday. Hon. members want to go home to attend to their private affairs, and no doubt many of them, in following their religious convictions, will attend church. I thought it was a very graceful action on the part of the leader of the Government when, in deference to the expressed views of some hon. members as regards their religious convictions with respect to sitting on Good Friday, he announced that the House would not sit on that day, and hon. members would have the opportunity of going home. I thought that was perfectly proper. We hear a great deal here about respecting the religious and conscientious convictions, but it would come with a great deal better force if those who say so much about it would put it into practice, and extend to other members of the House the same privileges which they desire. There is one religious denomination largely represented in this House who regard Good Friday very much the same as Sunday.

An hon. MEMBER. Who are they ?

Mr. SPROULE. The English Church people do.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). No.

Mr. SPROULE. As a class they do.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). No.

Mr. SPROULE. I know it because I am associated with them for years.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). I am associated with them longer than you are.

Mr. SPROULE. I did not refer to my hon. friend who is reputed to have no religion at all, because I suppose he would work on Sunday the same as any other day. I do not apply my remarks to any hon. gentleman who has no religious conviction regarding that day, but I do apply it to those who regard Good Friday practically the same as Sunday. The rights of this class should not be infringed upon here. It was praiseworthy for the leader of the House to give way with reference to sitting on Good Friday, but he now wishes to sit on Saturday which renders it practically impossible to allow many members to go home and to attend to their religious duties on Saturday.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). Are you a Jew, that you cannot sit on Saturday ?

Mr. SPROULE. If this motion is carried, many members will either have to neglect their religious duties on Good Friday and Easter Sunday, or to neglect their parliamentary duties by not being here on Saturday. The offer made to give the Government Wednesday instead of Saturday is in my opinion a very fair one. It is to be regretted that the Government have not seen fit to accept that suggestion, because if they had done so, they would allow men according to their conscientious convictions to attend to their religious duties on Good Friday and Easter Sunday, and perhaps to attend a little to their private affairs in the meantime. It may turn out to be in the end, that the urgency of this measure before the House may induce the Government to propose even to sit on Sunday. If they propose to interfere with the conscientious convictions of hon. gentlemen as they did with reference to Good Friday, which to many members of the House is a religious day equivalent to Sunday, they might still go further and try to compel hon. gentlemen to sit on the Sabbath. They might say, that the necessities of the situation and the importance of passing this Bill, might require them to do even that.

Mr. LAVERGNE. We would not be doing justice to ourselves if we allowed the statement of the Finance Minister to go without contradiction. That hon. gentleman said that the Opposition had been instrumental in delaying the second reading of this Bill, by a long discussion on the Budget. I can prove from the records of this House that no such thing has been done by the Opposition. We had nothing to do with the introduction of this Bill, and we did not cause the delay in its introduction until the 11th of February. This Bill was distributed in French either on the 21st or the 22nd of February, and on the 21st of February the Minister of Finance made this motion :

> Mr. FOSTER moved that Bill (No. 58) the Remedial Act (Manitoba) be made the first order of Tuesday, the 3rd of March next and the following days until the debate thereon be completed.

This is the answer of the leader of the Opposition to that motion :

Mr. LAURIER. I am quite ready to agree to that motion.

Now, Sir, I ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster), was he justified in saying that we have delayed the second reading of this Bill by prolonging that debate on the Budget? The hon. gentleman himself moved that the debate on the second reading should not take place until the 3rd of March, and there was no obstruction whatever to that motion. The Bill was introduced on the 11th February, it was not distributed in French until the 22nd of the same month, and the Minister of Finance moved that the second reading be moved on the 3rd of March, and the leader of the Opposition at once said: I consent to that. I believe that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) should withdraw the statement that we have obstructed the progress of this Bill. The hon. gentleman says that we spent from the 16th to the 23rd of the month debating the address, but he forgot to mention that two or three days in the interim were legal holidays, on which the House did not sit. The Budget debate did not, as I have shown, in any way interfere with the progress of this measure. I say, Sir, that the imputation made by the Finance Minister on members of this side of the House, is not only most unfair, but it is not according to the facts.

Mr. GIBSON. It is quite amusing to me to hear the House lectured by the Finance Minister, and the advice tendered by him to the members to refrain from going home. Perhaps it did not occur to hon. gentlemen on his own side, that the Finance Minister generally takes that advice himself and goes home every night. Of course he has not very far to go, but he should remember that there are some hon. gentlemen in this House who cannot go home and return, if they have only one day to do so. Many members, of all religious denominations, have a general desire to be home with their families on Easter Sunday. It ill becomes the Finance Minister to tell the members of this House that they have to forego their duties to their families, because, forsooth, the Government has a measure of importance to bring before this House. This measure was admirably described by the Secretary of State as being of the greatest importance, which statement was as admirably denied by the Minister of Finance, who said it was a matter of no importance at all. We all know very well that the bringing down of this measure was delayed for two months because of internal dissensions in the Cabinet. Was that the fault of the members of the House? During the first week of the session, we met every day for an hour to hear from the lips of the Postmaster General how the Cabinet difficulties were being adjusted day after day, and hour after hour. Was there any desire then on the part of the Postmaster General to bring down this Remedial Bill? No, Mr. Speaker, they were trying to adjust the little differences amongst the traitors of the camp, as they were described by the First Minister in the other House. We had to wait until the Secretary of State came over here and joined the conspirators. Then, this Bill, which is of such importance, had to lie until the return of the Secretary of State from Cape Breton, after his election. When all these things are considered, very little should be said by the members of the Government about the time taken up by members on this side, either in the Budget debate, or in discussing the Remedial Bill. I think that as much time was taken up by members on their own side. Perhaps as long a speech as was made by anybody in the House was that of the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes). If the Minister of Finance will act on the advice he gives to other members of the House, and stay in his place and look after the business of the House, hour by hour, day in and day out, I am sure he will find that members on this side will be prepared to stay here hour by hour and day after day with him. Of course, the Secretary of State is ready to force this Bill through the House even if he dies for it; but I have noticed that he always takes an ample supply of sleep, even when sitting in his chair. So, until he gets sufficient sleep, he is not ready to sacrifice himself on the altar of his country. But I wish to tell the Secretary of State that I am prepared to stay with him in this House day in and day out, hour by hour, so long as he stays here, and does not retire to his room. So far as physical endurance is concerned, I do not think it behooves the Secretary of State to force any member on this side of the House to stay here at his call whether it is convenient or not. Religious considerations have nothing to do with the business of the House; and, outside of religious considerations altogether, I appeal to the Secretary of State whether members on this side of the House should not be enabled to enjoy their Easter holidays at home as well as those living in the city of Ottawa. The Minister of Finance has spoken of the time taken up by members in discussing the various matters that have come before the House. Who has taken up more time on questions not before the House this afternoon than the Minister of Finance himself? He has given us an epitome of all that has transpired from the opening of the House on the 2nd of January up to the present moment. If these men had been desirous of promoting the Remedial Bill, and had been united upon it, we would not have had the spectacle of members of the Cabinet going out on the second day of the session, and remaining out a week; and it does not lie in the mouth of the Minister of Finance, who has taken up more time on every conceivable subject than any other member of the House, to lecture anybody in that respect. I noticed this afternoon that he did not like to be interrupted; but there is no man who interrupts more than he does, when he hears anything that is unpleasant to himself. I hope the Secretary of State will take this proposition into consideration, because he is gaining nothing by refusing to meet the wishes of members on both sides of the House. I can substantiate what was said this afternoon by the Liberal whip. I myself have received several applications, both personal and in writing, from hon. members, asking me to pair with them for the Easter holidays; but I am not going to pair with anybody. If the Secretary of State, however, wishes to meet the convenience of his followers, he will find that a majority of them are anxious, more anxious, perhaps, than I am, to go home for Easter. It is a mistake for him to suppose that only those who are opposed to the Bill are anxious that the House should not sit on Saturday. Many members who are in favour of the Bill are anxious to join their families at Easter, and I hope the hon. gentleman will not consider the matter from a political point of view. Though he might carry the motion by a party vote, yet if he put it to the good-will of the members, I am sure he would find that a majority are opposed to the House sitting on Saturday, in view of the fact that private members on both sides are willing to forego Wednesday.

Mr. GILLIES. Mr. Speaker, the opposition that is offered to the motion now before the House for taking Saturday for Government business, is clearly based upon private reasons entirely. It is most remarkable, also, that the opposition to this motion comes from the obstructionists to the Remedial Bill. It is not at all alleged, nor can it be held, that the members generally would spend Saturday at home, even if it were taken as a holiday. No religious objection is alleged, because there is no Christian body, within my knowledge at least, that observes Saturday as a holiday. The Minister of Trade and Commerce, one of the best authorities in the House so far as the Anglican denomination is concerned, has stated most positively that that body does not observe that day as a holiday. The hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) is the only gentleman in the House who, for religious reasons, objects to the House sitting on that day; but I venture to say that he never observes it as a holy day nor does a single member of the House agree with him. Let the gentlemen who propose to take Saturday as a holiday, have some consideration for members who cannot go to their homes for Easter. What about the six members from British Columbia, the four members from the Territories, the five members from Manitoba? What about the six members from Prince Edward Island, not one of whom can visit his home? What about the twenty-one members from Nova Scotia? Is their convenience not to be considered? Are we to dance attendance here for the convenience of those gentlemen east of Toronto and west of Montreal who choose to go home for Easter Sunday? What about the sixteen members from New Brunswick; are their feelings and their convenience not to be considered at all? What about all those gentlemen from the western provinces and from the eastern provinces who cannot take advantage of this adjournment; is their convenience to be subordinated entirely to the desires and enjoyment of members east of Toronto and west of Montreal? What about the forty members from the province of Quebec who cannot go to their homes during this debate, and the fifty-five members from Ontario who are in the same position? The number of those who cannot take advantage of this proposed adjournment amounts to 153, that is two-thirds of the House—must they dance attendance and give way for the convenience and the luxurious desires of these gentlemen who desire to rush to their homes and spend their Sunday there? The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) has told us, this afternoon, that he is prepared to sit here on Saturday and every other day, and discuss every line of and every section of this Bill. Is that a threat or not? From whom does the obstruction to this measure come? It comes from the hon. leader of the Opposition and his newly-found allies. If he has found new allies in my hon. friend the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), and the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), and the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), and the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), and the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), I wish him joy of them, and I hope his friends behind him will have reason to congratulate him upon these new acquisitions.

Mr. TARTE. If there are any two men in this House who have delayed this Bill, it is the hon. gentleman who leads this House (Sir Charles Tupper), and the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster). What is the record? Parliament was called last year, and we were told that its chief business was to pass a Remedial Bill; but a ministerial crisis took place, and the House was prorogued on the 23rd July without any such Bill having been presented to it. But on the 10th July, the declaration was made to the Parliament then in session, that, if the Manitoba government and legislature would not do justice to the minority during the recess, Parliament would be called again to meet not later than the 2nd January, and that then a Remedial Bill would, without fail, be introduced. In the ministerial press we were told at the time and during the recess that the Bill was ready, that everything was ready, and that the measure would be put through, if the Manitoba government in the meantime refused to act. Well, Mr. Speaker, Parliament met on the 2nd January; and now I ask the hon. leader of the House why the Remedial Bill was not then introduced, as promised. We were told by the ministerial press, we were led to believe in this House, at our last session, that the Bill was ready, and would be brought down on the 2nd January last. Well, I say it again, for the information of the hon. leader of the House, who seems to have forgotten the circumstance, that Parliament was called for the 2nd January, that Parliament met on the 2nd January, and that the Bill was not then brought down. Why was it not then introduced, as promised? The hon. gentleman knows better than any one else the reason. Let me remind him that he invited himself to this side of the ocean. The papers brought down show that he invited himself to come over here and discuss important matters; and I venture to say that the country knows to-day that, if the Remedial Bill was not brought down when this House met, the chief cause of the delay was the hon. gentleman himself who leads this House. Sir, the Remedial Bill was announced in the Speech from the Throne. The Government was then presided over, as it is to-day, by Sir Mackenzie Bowell; this session had been called for the special purpose of passing this Bill; the Ministers and their press all over the country had declared that the Bill was ready and that everything was ready to go on with it; but it seems that, despite all this, there was more important business than the rights of the Manitoba minority, so dear to the hon. gentleman, which had first to be settled. The Ministers met to settle this important business. What was it? It was that the Prime Minister (Sir Mackenzie Bowell) was not capable of leading the Government and the Conservative party. He was not the right man in the right place. The right man was on hand, but he did not get the right place. We are accused of having delayed this Bill. I, for one, voted against it, but I and a great many others who did so, and the whips can bear me out, refrained from speaking, although ready to speak, in order not to delay the vote any longer. And I know that I express the sentiments of a great many of our friends on this side, when I say that we have no desire to obstruct this measure.

Mr. GIROUARD. You do not want it to pass.

Mr. TARTE. My hon. friend may have his own sentiments. Let him keep them for himself. I voted against this Bill. but I have not the right to give the reasons now why I did so, because we are not discussing the merits of the Bill. I am responsible for the vote I have given, but I charge my hon. friends from the province of Quebec who are supporting the Government, with being responsible, to a large extent, for the delays that have taken place, because they support the man who has been the chief cause of that delay. Is there any reason which they can give why the Bill was not brought down at the opening of this session? Has the reason been given yet? Nobody can give it publicly; but my hon. friend knows quite well that the Ministers were quarrelling among themselves. He knows that they could not agree. Although on every hustings in the province of Quebec they declared that the Bill was quite ready, it appears it was not. My hon. friend knows right well that the ex-Minister of Agriculture (Senator Angers) was quite right, when he said last session to his colleagues: You do not want to proceed this session, you will not be able to proceed next year. They had other very important business to settle. They were quarrelling among themselves. They had the anonymous letter question to settle, and yet to-day they have the effrontery to accuse us of obstruction. The Government delayed introducing this Bill, with the intention, I cannot help saying, of coming to the pass we have reached to-day. They know right well that there are members in this House, on both sides, who are opposed to the very principle of separate schools, and who would certainly, if they stood alone, prevent the passage of this measure. But, as one who has voted against it, I have no hesitation in saying that our friends on this side have no desire to obstruct the measure. I believe that the measure is bad, that the measure is unworkable. But, Sir, the very moment that this Parliament, by a majority, adopted the principle of the Bill, we felt bound to give the measure due consideration. I am not reconciled to the idea that the Bill is good, for I think it is bad and unworkable. And, more than that, I say that a great many of my hon. friends from the province of Quebec who have voted for it know right well that the Bill is bad. I know quite well their motives. They have been promising all over Canada to have the restoration of separate schools, to have a broad policy; and they are today face to face with a worthless Bill. Many of those who have declared the approval of the Bill know that it is unworkable. But promises have been made to them. One of these is that the Schools Act shall be amended during the next session of Parliament. The hon. leader of the House has been asked on many occasions if he was prepared to say that such a policy would be adopted. He declined to answer. For all these reasons, I regard the Bill as bad, but at the same time, I say we have no desire to obstruct it. But, Sir, we cannot close our eyes to the fact that this is a most important measure, nor can any one say, with its 112 clauses, that it is not a long one. We should not be surprised if scores of members desire to discuss the Bill thoroughly. I hope, at the same time, that there will be no obstruction, and in saying so I am sure I express the feelings of every hon. member on this side of the House.

Mr. TAYLOR. I think the hon. leader of the Opposition and his first lieutenant, the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte), will have a hard job on their hands to convince the people of this country that they did not propose obstructing not only this Bill, but also the other business which the House should deal with before it rises. The hon. leader of the House, knowing that we had but twenty days before Parliament must close, proposed to sit on Friday of this week. Who objected to the House sitting on Friday to get through the business of the country requiring to be transacted before the expiration of this Parliament? Why, the hon. leader of the Opposition and his friends. Every member on this side of the House was quite willing that the House should sit in order to get the Estimates passed and transact the business that is now pressing for attention. But when the objection was raised, the hon. leader of the House gave way. Notice was on the paper that the Government would move to take Saturday. If it had not been intended to obstruct this motion, I want the hon. leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for L'Islet to inform me how it was that the information came to me from a gentleman who is in the confidence of gentlemen opposite that this obstruction would take place to-day, that as soon as the leader of the House rose to move that motion——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Name, name.

Mr. TAYLOR. I give the statement in my place in Parliament that I was informed——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Name, name.

Mr. TAYLOR. I am not obliged to give the name.

An hon. MEMBER. There is no truth in the statement.

Mr. TAYLOR. I make the statement, I give the information. I have, I think, the facts as we know them——

Mr. LAURIER. I call upon the hon. gentleman to give the name. I give the flattest denial to such a statement.

Mr. TAYLOR. The facts warrant the statement.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Name. Withdraw.

Mr. TAYLOR. I do not withdraw.

Mr. EDGAR. I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman who is addressing the House made a statement relating to the leader of the Opposition, and the hon. leader of the Opposition rose and gave it a flat denial. And now the hon. gentleman, instead of withdrawing his statement, proceeds to say that the facts warrant it.

Mr. TAYLOR. If the hon. leader of the Opposition says that he knows nothing about it, I will accept his statement. At the same time, I say I received the information.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Name.

Mr. TAYLOR. I am not bound to give the name.

Mr. FRASER. There is no name.

Mr. LAURIER. Let us have the name, so that we may know who speaks of us in that manner.

Mr. TAYLOR. I make this statement——

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I rise to a point of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order. Sit down.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. member wishes to rise to a point of order.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). The hon. gentleman has made a reflection upon some member on this side of the House by saying that he was told that the Opposition this afternoon would obstruct this motion. Now, that reflection covers us all, and I do not wish to stand under that reflection.

An hon. MEMBER. Then sit down.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). In making that general charge I think he is bound to mention the name.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I rise to say that the point of order raised by the hon. gentleman—and he has no right to interrupt except on a point of order—is no point of order at all. The hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) is giving information he received, which has nothing to do with the order of the House. I may say that as I entered this House to-day it was intimated to me that this afternoon was to be wasted in a discussion of this question.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think the hon. gentleman has no right to make such a statement unless he is prepared to give proof. As to the point of order, the hon. member for Leeds asserted that a gentleman on this side of the House had given him certain information.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is certainly what the hon. gentleman said.

Mr. TAYLOR. I do not think the hon. gentleman wishes to misrepresent me. I said that a gentleman in the confidence of the party on that side of the House informed me.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If that is all, very likely it may be one of the hon. gentleman's own particular friends.

Mr. TAYLOR. That is the statement I made.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Name, name.

Mr. TAYLOR. I received the information that when the hon. leader of the House moved this motion——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Name. Order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. There is no point of order in the fact of an hon. gentleman not giving the name. I cannot force him to do it. Every hon. member is free to draw his own conclusions, but I cannot force the hon. gentleman to give the name, consequently no point of order can be raised.

Mr. TAYLOR. When the hon. leader of the House moved the motion of which he had given notice and wished to have it changed so as to take the first Saturday, where did the opposition come from ? From the hon. leader of the Opposition. Then when the amendment was moved by the hon. Minister of Public Works, so as to bring it within the rules of the House, where did the opposition come from ? Then when you, Mr. Speaker, decided the motion and amendment were in accordance with the rules of the House, where did the opposition come from ? Not an hon. gentleman on this side of the House raised a word of objection. Every hon. member behind the leader of the Opposition has raised objection. And yet the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte), speaking as he says for the entire party, says they do not wish to obstruct the Bill.

Mr. TARTE. Who is speaking now, and who is taking up the time of the House ?

Mr. TAYLOR. My hon. friend from L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) is speaking for those who sit on the left of the Speaker.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. Are you for the Bill ?

Mr. TAYLOR. Well, I am not an obstructionist. I think the information which was given me this morning is borne out by the facts, and the leader of the Opposition, and the hon. member for L'Islet, and the rest of the party, are responsible for the obstruction that is being carried on.

Mr. EDGAR. Early in the present sitting a most reasonable proposition of compromise was made across the House to the leader of the Government, that instead of taking Saturdays he should take another private member's day, next Wednesday. Ever since then I have not heard any reasons given from the other side of the House why they should not take Wednesday instead of Saturday. It is true, the leader of the House and the Finance Minister both made statements, but they never touched that question. As usual, they made charges across the House of obstruction ; and I must say, Mr. Speaker, that since it has been decided by your ruling that the term " obstruction " is perfectly parliamentary, there is no word that seems to roll so readily from the hon. gentleman's tongue the last few days as the word " obstruction." Now, instead of answering the reasonable and polite suggestion for taking another day, he attacks a whole party, and charges them with obstruction. But, Sir, I am more particularly anxious to say a word about what the Minister of Finance told us. He said that there had been a great deal of obstruction already against this Bill by this side of the House. Now, we must consider that after the 3rd March, the day which was fixed by the Government themselves for the discussion of this Bill, the obstruction was all on the side of those who had charge of the Bill. Let us see for a moment where the obstruction has been since the 3rd March. How many speeches were made by Conservatives on the second reading of the Bill, and how many were made by Liberals on the second reading of the Bill ? I have a list of them here, and I find that speeches were made by forty-seven Conservatives. And how many were made by Liberals ? Only twenty-eight, Mr. Speaker ; and that is called obstruction. Now, if we consider the length of the speeches, the same result is apparent. There are 761 columns of " Hansard " filled by speeches of Conservatives on the second reading of this Bill, and there were only 506 columns filled by speeches of Liberals. Why, Sir, the Finance Minister, who complains of the long-winded speeches of the Opposition, himself took up, in a very able speech, over 40 columns of the " Hansard." Now, Sir, when these facts are known, how idle it is for hon. gentlemen opposite to charge us with obstruction on this Bill. I may say, Sir, I can not help feeling that the leader of the House is fishing for obstruction ; I cannot help thinking that the leader of the House, by charging everybody with obstruction before the House was two hours in committee on the Bill, was fishing for obstruction, was setting up men of straw on purpose to knock down. Why, Sir, the course of the hon. Minister of Finance forces members of Parliament, who have self-respect as representatives of a free people, to show that they will not be gagged, and that they will have a full discussion of this Bill. I do not care what the Bill might be about, if the leader of the House, before it had been two hours in committee, used that language to this House, I would insist, so far as I could, upon the fullest discussion in order to resent the browbeating of the hon. Secretary of State and his followers. Why, Sir, I do not think that the leader of the House ever knew the history of this Manitoba school question until he came into this House a few weeks ago. If he wanted to know where the obstruction of this remedial legislation came from, he should ask the hon. Minister of Public Works, who could tell him a good deal about the strike during the last session, on this very question. He should ask his colleague, the Postmaster General, also, who could tell him a good deal about the obstruction and delay in bringing this measure forward. Then he should ask the Finance Minister and the Minister of Railways to tell him the other side of that interesting question ; because I suppose that, as a member of the Privy Council now, the hon. gentleman is entitled to know what happened inside the Privy Council concerning the measures that are now before Parliament, and if he has been told that, he will know where the obstruction was, he will know where the delay was. The country can well understand that at this eleventh hour, before the Bill has been only two hours in committee, the charge of obstruction made right and left is only a way of seeking for it, and inviting it, in order to justify the delays and breaches of solemn promises which his party has made to this country. Then there is another reason why I think it would have been much better for this House to take next Wednesday than sit on Saturday. By next Wednesday surely this House will be in possession of the report of the ambassadors to Winnipeg, and we do not expect to have that here by Saturday. Surely if there is any material information that the House and the country are looking for to assist us in the consideration of this Remedial Bill, it is a report of the proceedings of that solemn conference that has been held the last week in Winnipeg. Sir, I think it is altogether proper that we should not consider this question until we have the report of that conference ; and at any rate, if we are going on to consider it at the will of the Government, we should not consider it on Saturday when we can consider it on Wednesday. For these reasons I hope that before this discussion is over the leader of the House will find that he acted without good judgment in refusing the fair proposal that was made across this House. The hon. gentleman I do not think ever led this House, or a party in this House, before. We must make allowances for his want of experience, we must make allowances for his want of understanding how to manage this House, we must make very large allowances for his unfortunate mistake in transgressing the rules and practices of this House, because we know that he has never been in a leading position in this House before, and never had the responsibility of a leader of this House. Sir, I would venture to say to him that he is out of touch with the feelings of this Parliament if he thinks that his attempt to dragoon us will add to the time which he can give to this Bill. His old leader, Sir John A. Macdonald, never ran against the feeling of the House. He tried to coax them along, and convince them. He appealed simply to their intelligence, he never threatened physical force across the floor of this House. I venture to suggest that the leader of the House should treat hon. members with more consideration than he has hitherto extended to them.

Mr. BORDEN. I think it must be evident to every hon. gentleman who has watched the discussion that has taken place to-day that it is only part of the policy which has been deliberately adopted by the Government for the purpose of humbugging the people. Hon. gentlemen opposite profess that the leader of the Opposition, and his supporters, are resorting to a policy of obstruction, but it is very clear that the obstruction is coming from members on the Treasury benches, and their supporters.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. McNEILL. Is it in order to make such a noise that representatives of the public press cannot know what is going on in this House ? Publicity is what some hon. gentlemen fear.

Mr. SPEAKER. I hope hon. members will abstain from making noises.

Mr. BORDEN. We are discussing obstruction, and I have said that the principal part of the obstruction has come from the Treasury benches, and hon. members behind them. The unseemly noises to which we have just listened are part of the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. It is obvious that hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches have discovered that the remedial legislation proposed pleases no one, and that those hon. members who might be supposed to favour it are opposed to it, and are opposed to any interference by this House with the legislation of Manitoba. The obstruction entered upon by the Government is evidently being carried out to cover up, to a certain extent, the unpopularity of their own policy. But we have had from the hon. gentleman who leads the House, a most extraordinary and startling statement. In answer to the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Sutherland), he stated that hon. members might be paired and the House reduced to very small numbers, but they would go on with legislation during Saturday. The hon. gentleman, therefore, proposed that with the House reduced to one-third its total number, it should proceed with a measure which he himself declared, in introducing it, was the most important measure brought into the Canadian Parliament since confederation. But I ask if that is the way in which Parliament should be called upon to consider a question of such magnitude. I ask whether the people have sent hon. members here to approve a policy by which such an important measure should be passed through the House in the absence of two-thirds or three-quarters of its members.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Why do you not stay here ?

Mr. BORDEN. The Finance Minister has declared that members on the Opposition side of the House, are responsible for the fact that this Bill is not further advanced, and he stated that the debate on the Address was commenced on January 16th and continued to 23rd, which, he said, was a very unusual proceeding. But what was being done from 2nd January, when the House met, until 16th, the date on which the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne was considered ? It is well known that hon. gentlemen opposite are responsible for the delay that occurred, and that no one is more responsible than the Minister of Finance. For the fact that the Remedial Bill is in its present position, hon. gentlemen opposite are responsible. It should have been brought down the last session of Parliament, when there would have been ample time to consider it. Why did hon. gentlemen opposite wait until the end of the Parliament, until such time that it was exceedingly doubtful an important measure could be passed through the House. But hon. gentlemen opposite charge the Opposition with obstruction, they even charge the leader of the Opposition with being the leader of the obstruction. I want to know whether the member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) is a member of the Opposition, or the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill). If I remember rightly, those hon. gentlemen informed the leader of the House that they were as good Conservatives as he was. Has the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) been read out of the Conservative party ? I think hon. gentlemen opposite will be very careful about reading him out. Is the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) a member of the Liberal party ? He has occupied a considerable portion of the time of the House this session, and to very good advantage, too. Has the member for West Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) been read out of the Conservative party ? He has occupied a considerable portion of the time of the House. The hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Craig) delivered a lengthy speech on this question. Has he been read out of the Conservative party? Then there is the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. Stubbs), and the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes), who made a long speech on the second reading of the Bill. Has he been read out of the Conservative party ? He occupied considerable time with making nice distinctions by which he was able to vote against the amendment and, at the same time, against the second reading of the Bill. Then there is the hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. McGillivray). Is that hon. gentleman no longer a member of the Conservative party ? He occupied a good deal of the time of the House endeavouring to explain some nice points by which he was able to vote against the six months' hoist, and, at the same time, to vote against the second reading of the Bill. Yet the Liberal party is charged by hon. gentlemen opposite with deliberately obstructing the Remedial Bill. Now, what is the point of the discussion in which we are now engaged ? It has been proposed by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) that the Government should take Wednesday next, which is private members' day, and give up Saturday. How can the leader of the House prove that in that proposition there is obstruction ?

Mr. McNEILL. Perhaps he proposes to take Wednesdays as well.

Mr. BORDEN. Wednesday is a better day than Saturday, because the sitting on Saturday will come to an end at 12 o'clock, while the sitting on Wednesday may be carried on indefinitely. So instead of hon. members on this side of the House being charged with obstruction, the charge should be laid against hon. gentlemen opposite, who have wasted the whole afternoon in discussing and refusing a proposition which would really give them more time than the proposition they have offered to the House.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a few words in contradiction to what the Minister of Finance chose to say in reference to myself. He stated to the House that I spoke in the Budget debate with a view of obstructing this Bill. The utter absurdity of that statement will be apparent to the hon. gentleman himself, if he considers that at the time I spoke on the Budget an agreement had been entered into between the leader of the Government and the leader of the Opposition, fixing a day as to when this Bill was to be taken into consideration. I had no desire whatever to obstruct this Bill then, and I have no desire now. I believe that the Government, in dealing with this question, from the very start has made blunder after blunder. I believe that, had the Government taken the advice of the leader of the Opposition, there would be no such Bill now to obstruct. I do not think there is any desire now by any member on this side of the House to obstruct this Bill—certainly not so far as I am concerned. There is a desire, though, to assist the Government in avoiding those pitfalls into which they seem so ready to fall in dealing with this question. That is all I have to say I desire emphatically to state that I was actuated by no desire to obstruct this Bill, or any other measure before the House. I felt called upon to speak at some length upon the Budget, because of the statement reiterated by member after member on the Government side, that the Opposition have no policy on which to go to the country. I thought it necessary, and so I exercised my privilege, as a member of the House, to drive into the heads of hon. gentlemen opposite the facts that we have a policy on which we are all united, and upon which we stand, man to man, differing in that respect from hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. McNEILL. I desire to say one word before the House proceeds with the question. I regret very much, Mr. Speaker, the acrimonious turn which has been given to this discussion. I am quite sure that the proposal that was made by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), that an exchange of one day should be made for another day, was a very innocent proposal, and I am sure it was made in the very best spirit by the other side of the House

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). He had no right to make that proposition.

Mr. McNEILL. My hon. friend says he had no right to make that proposition.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). He does not represent all the private members of this House.

Mr. McNEILL. Are we to be allowed in this House to open our lips at all ? It seems that a member of this House has no rights here, unless he is prepared to support this measure. We are all to be coerced, and we are not to be allowed to open our lips to offer a friendly suggestion to the Government with regard to the conduct of the business of the House.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). I would like to ask my hon. friend (Mr. McNeill), if the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has a right to speak for all the private members of this House ?

Mr. McNEILL. I was not discussing the right of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) to speak for the private members of this House, and, as there was no suggestion with regard to that question, it seems to me that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cameron) is simply obstructing the business of the House by asking irrelevant questions.

Mr CAMERON (Inverness). That remark applies to yourself.

Mr. McNEILL. I do not say that that hon. gentleman does it intentionally, but, at all events, that is the result of what he is doing.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). You mean to say that you are obstructing intentionally?

Mr. McNEILL. There is no doubt the hon. gentleman has a right to ask me a question, and, if he would ask a relevant question, I would be glad to answer. I did not suggest for a moment that the hon. member for South Oxford had a right to speak for the whole House ; but he had the right to make a reasonable suggestion, whether the House agreed to it or not, and it is probable that, if the leader of the Government had agreed with the member for South Oxford in reference to that matter, there would have been a decision arrived at by the House. It is, perhaps, almost something that I should feel reluctant to do something as if it were a matter of danger for me, or for any other —especially an hon. member who is a member of the Conservative party—to venture to speak in any way, however humbly, in connection with this measure. It may be dangerous, because at once we are dragooned, if not by one member of the party to which we belong, then by another, and the desire seems to be, in some way or other, by right or by wrong, on the right hand or on the left hand, to endeavour to drive us out of the party to which we belong. But I wish to say to my hon. friend (Mr. Cameron) that that is a thing that cannot be done: and, furthermore, I wish to say to my hon. friend that we represent the Conservative party and the views and wishes of the Conservative party in this country, just as much as the hon. gentleman does. And I wish to say, further, to the hon. gentleman that it is just because he dare not submit the question to the people of Canada that he is so anxious to force it through this Parliament. It is because he knows, and those who are behind him know, that, if this question were left to the people of Canada at the general election, that there would be very little chance indeed of their inducing the people of this country to coerce the province of Manitoba

Some hon. MEMBERS No, no.

Mr. McNEILL. It is because he knows that, he is so anxious to force this measure through, and to endeavour to stifle in every possible way the discussion in this House in reference to this measure. If an hon. gentleman gets up, as I have ventured to do, in my humble way, I am to be hounded by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House ; I am not to be allowed to make a few remarks within a minute or two of six o'clock, but I am to be interrupted by irrelevant questions, just as the hon. gentleman interrupted me on the last occasion when I endeavoured to address this House. I do not think the hon. gentleman is going to make a great deal of political capital for himself or for his party. I deny that he represents this party in this matter. I say that the Conservative party in this country are utterly opposed to this policy of protection

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh. Take it back.

Mr. McNEILL. I am exceedingly glad, Mr. Speaker, that hon. gentlemen have got something to rely upon, and that because a mere 'lapsus linguæ' occurred, and because I made use of the word "protection," in place of the word "coercion," they have something to crow about. Well, they have a very poor case, if they cannot make anything better than that out of it. I give them all the satisfaction and the capital that they can make out of that slip of the tongue. I say, Mr. Speaker, that so far as this matter which is before the House is concerned, it is a very unhappy state of things that, when an hon. gentleman from the opposite side of the House, or from this side of the House, makes a suggestion of a most reasonable description, or ventures to say one word in support of that reasonable suggestion, he is to be accused of obstruction. It is a very unhappy state of things, that, when an hon. gentleman attempts to get up in a quiet way to deal with this matter, he should be coerced in this House.

Amendment agreed to.

After Recess.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question is on the main motion as amended.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Speaker, from the action of the Government this evening, I suppose we may reasonably presume that it is their intention——

Mr. SPEAKER. Has the hon. member spoken on the amendment ?

Mr. O'BRIEN. I have not. I say, Sir, that it is quite evident from what has taken place here this evening, from the refusal of the Government to accept the very reasonable proposal of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), that they intend not only to take next Saturday, but also to take Wednesdays from this time out——

Mr. GIROUARD. All the days.

Mr. O'BRIEN. So that the whole time of the House, or, as the hon. gentleman says, all the days, will be devoted to Government business. How far that is a reasonable proposition this House is now in a very good position to judge ; because, if we take the statement of the Finance Minister himself, as to the manner in which the time of this House has been disposed of since it met on the 2nd of January, I think we have no difficulty in coming to the conclusion that, so far as there has been any waste of time on the part of members of this House, it does not lie in the mouths of the gentlemen on the Treasury benches to charge either the regular Opposition or those on this side who are opposed to their measure, with having wasted its time. Now, Sir, during this debate, and on several occasions during the latter part of this session, we have heard some very extraordinary statements made. We have had threats of physical force, no less. Hon. gentlemen have said that they are not only willing to lose their health, but are also willing to die. Well, Sir, the hon. Secretary of State, who made that very alarming threat, I think has not done so badly out of his life since he first entered politics, that it is worth his while just now to die. He had better live a little longer ; he had better enjoy those privileges and advantages of which he has hitherto had the full benefit so many years, until political necessity or that gradual creeping on of old age compels him to retire from political life. He had better spend whatever days may be available to him in the service of the country, and put off for a few years longer that event which he is so ready to encounter for the sake of this precious Bill of his ; and let the country have the benefit of his services so long as it is possible for him to give them. Now, Sir, the Finance Minister took a good deal of trouble to tell this House exactly how its time had been spent : but he did not attempt to get over the fact, the indisuptable fact, that this House had been in session for forty days before this Bill was introduced. And when the Secretary of State, forsooth, undertook to lecture the members of this House for indulging in debates and making speeches irrelevant to the question at issue, I suppose he forgot that he spent a good part of one evening in justifying his conduct in forcing the province of Nova Scotia into confederation. I should like to know what that had to do with the Bill which is now under discussion. So that, of all men in the House, he is about the last who has any justification for charging members of this House with needlessly or uselessly taking up its time with irrelevant or impertinent speeches. Sir, we have had some very extraordinary specimens of the manner in which this House is now being led. Language has been used by the hon. gentleman who has assumed that position which makes us rather wonder and inquire what sort of society that hon. gentleman has been keeping since he was last in this Parliament. I do not think he could have been studying English parliamentary models, or he would have hardly taken the tone he has taken in this House during the short time he has undertaken to control its deliberations. And if he has erred in this respect, I am afraid he has taught a bad lesson to the Finance Minister ; for if that gentleman was not always noted for extreme courtesy in his dealing with members of this House, he certainly, in the speech he made to-night, surpassed himself, not only in—I will not say misstatements, but in such misrepresentations of what has occurred during this session as are not altogether in accordance with what hon. gentlemen think, wrongly, perhaps, to have been the real facts of the case. Now, Sir, when we find those who undertake to control the affairs of this country indulging in language such as we have heard on several occasions from the hon. gentleman who now leads the House, and from the hon. gentleman who preceded him in that position, I think it is time that this House took some measures to assert its independence. Especially hon. members on this side who have been supporters of the Government in times past, and who still declare themselves to be members of the Conservative party, should, at least, be treated with that consideration which their position deserves. The hon. gentleman who leads the House has made blunders without end, and the results of his blunders are becoming apparent every day. The manner in which he has conducted himself as leader of this House certainly has brought about a state of feeling on the part of hon. gentlemen who are not prepared to accept his dictum, not often found in this Parliament. Hon. members can remember very well how this House was led in the days of that hon. gentleman's great predecessor. Scenes and language such as we have had lately, and terms such as have been applied to hon. gentlemen on either side of the House, were never thought of, or heard in those days. The hon. gentleman had better study the methods of his predecessors before he undertakes to lecture this House and teach us how we should conduct the affairs of this country. Sir, the object of pressing on this measure is apparent. It is to force through this House, without discussion, a measure to which the majority of the people are opposed. Hon. gentlemen supporting the Government dispute that statement. Well, if they are satisfied that the country is with them, why do they not give the country an opportunity of pronouncing upon this Bill. What possible object can there be in forcing this Bill now through a House, a number of the members of which have no intention of returning and are therefore no longer responsible to the people ? How extremely unreasonable and illogical and contrary to every principle of constitutional government is it not that the Government should force this measure through against the wish, as they will shortly find out, of the majority of the people, and that at a time and under circumstances when it can be no possible advantage even to those in whose behalf they pretend to legislate. The hon. Secretary of State talked at considerable length, the other day, on the waste of $500,000, which would occur if the legislation of this session proved to be abortive. But who is responsible for that ? The Government last session could just as well have passed the Bill instead of delaying it until this session : and let me remind the House that they are forcing on this discussion and attempting to pass this measure through, without informing us of the result of the conference which is being held at the city of Winnipeg. All the information we have is from newspaper report, and I take it that this House is not going to obtain its information on so important a question from that source. We are entitled to have and should have, at the very earliest moment, before we proceed any further with this Bill, a declaration from the Government, not only as to what the result of the conference is, but as to what the conference was about. We have the right to know from the Government what proposals were made by their commissioners and also what answers were made to those proposals. We have a right to the details of that conference in every particular and of all the steps that have been taken, from the first to the last; and until we get that information, the Government have no right to ask this House to proceed with this measure. The Government never attempted to make any reply to our objections to proceeding with the Bill while negotiations were pending, and we were treated to the unseemly spectacle of these gentlemen holding out a flag of truce while at the same time they were exercising acts of hostility. What would have been the difference had the Government acceded to that proposal? We are told that the conference is at an end; and all the Government have gained by their unseemly proceeding is the passing of three clauses of the Bill. The country will understand the circumstances under which these clauses were passed. The country will understand that they were passed while the Government were going through the farce of attempting to negotiate with Manitoba. Had they acceded to the request to delay proceedings until the result of the conference was known, we could have gone on next week with the measure, knowing that an attempt had been made to bring about a settlement, knowing also whether the attempt was honestly made and honestly carried out or whether it was simply a pretense such as there is every reason to believe it was. No better evidence of the lack of sincerity in this attempt to negotiate is wanted than the very fact that while the Government were carrying on a conference, they were at the same time forcing through this Bill. We made a most reasonable proposal to the Government which, if they had accepted it early this afternoon, would have expedited business, whereas the refusal to accept that proposal has resulted in nothing so far being done. Their refusal has lost them this whole day. They have made no progress, but have simply embittered feeling in this House. Their proceeding to-day is on a par with their whole legislation and conduct in this matter. From first to last they have embittered feeling and accomplished no good results, and have brought in a Bill which cannot possibly be productive of any good, even to the minority. Having refused to accept the reasonable proposition we made before recess, we are justified in resisting every attempt to take away from us the only day remaining at our disposal and thus subjecting a great many of us to great personal inconvenience without any possible benefit being obtainable. I again urge upon the House the desirability, the justice, and the propriety, of giving to those members who can take advantage of Saturday night train to go to their homes the opportunity of doing so, instead of forcing this House to sit until twelve o'clock on Saturday night. Under those circumstances, I propose the following amendment:—

> That the figure and words "2 p.m." be struck out, and the following inserted instead thereof: "2.30 p.m., and that at six o'clock the House stand adjourned until the next meeting of the House."

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not wish to take up much time of the House in replying not to the thrice-told tale, but to the thirty-times-told tale of the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien). The hon. gentleman asks what good have we done. I will tell the hon. gentleman what good we have done. I tell the hon. gentleman this—that on a motion, more favourable to them than any other they could possibly present, a motion appealing to the natural desire of hon. members on both sides of the House to have time to enjoy the pleasure of visiting their friends and their homes, we have on record this fact, a fact that will sink deep into the minds of the people of this country, that simply because the Government opposes it on the ground that it was absolutely necessary that we should forego that enjoyment for the purpose of carrying this Remedial Bill, we have got a majority of forty-six members of this House.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Is that all you have got.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Will not two to one satisfy the hon. gentleman? If not, he is hard to satisfy. But if he is not satisfied, we can give him even a larger majority. I say that on that motion we have put on record the fact that in this House there is a majority of two to one ready to sacrifice their own convenience and their personal enjoyment for the purpose of placing this Remedial Bill on the statute-book. And hon. gentlemen opposite, when they saw the position they were placed in felt as acutely as any party ever did, the undesirable nature of that position. We can no longer be taunted with a bare majority in this House prepared to sustain the Government in putting the Bill on the statute-book. We can no longer be taunted with having a weak and unwilling following in this House. The hon. gentleman has a good deal of courage, after such a defeat as he has just sustained, to put any proposition before this House calculated to carry out his policy of obstruction to this great and important measure. The hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) undertook to read me a lesson on party management and to tell me that I could not read him out of the party. I quite agree with him. No man can read an hon. member of this House out of a party. That is a thing that can only be done by the hon. gentleman himself, and he has proved to the House to-day that that hon. gentleman has read himself out of the party. I take the hon. gentleman's own statement, and I put it to the House and to the people of this country, what position does he occupy? He says I do not represent the Conservative party. Then who does? Is it the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), who directed his act, and who told the hon. gentleman in the hearing of hon. members around him to prevent this House getting into committee before six o'clock. I say, when the hon. member for North Bruce becomes the agent of an hon. member who for years has been the avowed enemy of the Conservative party, and who has gone to and fro throughout the country everywhere devoting his time and his talents to breaking down the confidence of the Liberal-Conservative party in its Government—I say when the hon. gentleman becomes the agent, for the purpose of obstructing this Bill, of the hon. member for North Simcoe, I think he pretty well reads himself out of the party. The hon. gentleman stated that the reason that I and this Government, and the gentlemen who stand behind us in this House were so anxious and so urgent in pressing forward this Bill was that we feared to go before the people with this Bill, because we knew that if we went before the people of this country we should be destroyed. And that is the ground the hon gentleman takes for becoming the agent of obstruction in this House, doing all that man can do to prevent this Bill from becoming law, because he says : If we can prevent this Bill from passing we can rout the Conservative party, horse, foot and artillery. I do not admit that. I say that going to the country with the Bill or going to the country without it, if the country knows that honestly and earnestly and above-board we have done all that men could do to carry this measure, we shall come back with an overwhelming majority. The people of this country do not want race and religious questions raised. They do not approve the lines the hon. gentleman for North Simcoe has taken, and upon which he has gained a follower—upon that I congratulate him. I have not read the hon. member for North Bruce out of the party, but he himself has succeeded in accomplishing that, and to my entire satisfaction. I am willing to meet an open foe in a fair field and fight a manly fight. But I do not want traitors in my camp to interfere with our work of carrying a measure for the benefit of the country. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman what is the motive that has led him to this violent obstruction, that could induce him, as he himself has asserted, to sacrifice the Government he supported so long and endeavour to bring down a great party of which he was an honoured member ? Is it devotion to his constituents ? Why, Sir, I am told that the " Globe " newspaper published a letter showing that the hon. gentleman had been willing to desert his constituents and take a soft seat in the Senate and let the Remedial Bill take care of itself. That is not an evidence, to my mind, of an hon. gentleman being animated by high-minded patriotism and devotion to his country or to his constituents. Now, Sir, I will not say any more about that, but I will say this, that I would a thousand times rather change my position and sit on the other side of this House, than to sit on the Treasury benches by favour of such support as that of the hon. member for North Bruce. Now, Sir, the hon. member for North Bruce professes to be more English than the English. He is British to the core. British principle, British precedent and British practice is what he wants. Well, Sir, if he will look across the water, he will find it. He will find the great Conservative party of England bringing down and laying on the Table of the House of Commons just such a Bill as this Remedial Bill, a Bill to give just such rights to the people of England, Catholics and Protestants, as this Bill proposes to give to the Catholics of Manitoba I say, if English precedents and English practice is what the hon. gentleman wants, he can find it in the great exemplar of all Parliaments, the grandest Parliament that exists on the face of the globe, which has before it to-day a Bill which provides that those who sustain voluntary schools, shall be exempt from taxation for public schools, and that those who sustain voluntary schools, whether Catholic or Protestant, shall have a right to the same division of public money as the supporters of public schools. He will find that the Bill now on the Table of the English House of Commons provides, in addition, that they shall have an opportunity, whether Catholics or Protestants, of giving that religious instruction to their children which the hon. member for North Bruce is endeavouring to deprive forever the Roman Catholic minority of Manitoba from enjoying. Sir, I trust the House will meet this further attempt at wasting the day, as the day has so far been wasted, in the same spirit they have already shown, and that they will vote down this further factious attempt to interfere with the progress of this great and important measure, and will stand by the Government, and stand by the principles embodied in that Bill, until it is placed on the statute-book, let it take a longer or a shorter time, let it be done at whatever personal sacrifice, at whatever personal discomfort. I trust, Sir, that no man will shrink from doing that now, in face of this unwonted and unwarranted obstruction, which is again offered after the solemn decision of this House by a substantial majority, declaring that it was the will of this Parliament to put this Bill on the statute-book. Who is contravening the will of Parliament ? Who are the men ? Sir, these are the men, one section of them, a small and comparatively insignificant section, who have been devoting days and years and all their talents to stir up religious strife in this country ; and they are allied and associated with men who, for the purpose of wresting power from this Government, have shown that they are prepared to forget all that is due to their race and their religion. Sir, I call upon the House to sustain the Government in carrying the motion which I have placed in your hands, giving the Government Saturday to enable us to proceed with the prosecution of this important measure.

Mr. McNEILL. I suppose it would be right that I should say a word or two in reply to the kindly and wise remarks which have fallen from the leader of this House. I may say, in the first place, in reference to his allegation that I spoke on this subject simply at the instance of my hon. friend from North Simcoe, that I have here in my hand the notes that I took of the remarks made by the Finance Minister, and of the remarks made by my hon friend from Richmond (Mr. Gillies), in answer to which I had intended to speak before six o'clock. So much for this rather ingenious suggestion that because my hon. friend had suggested my speaking before six o'clock, and because I did speak before six o'clock, I had therefore read myself out of the Conservative party. Now, Sir, as I said before, so I say again, that I do not intend to read myself out of the Conservative party, neither do I intend that any one else shall read me out of the Conservative party. Sir, when the hon. gentleman says, as he did say, that I have been endeavouring to break up the Conservative party, I give the statement a flat contradiction, and I say that the course the hon. gentleman has pursued since he unhappily became the leader of this House, has had a direct tendency to break up the Conservative party. I say that the course he has pursued since he came here, in my humble judgment, goes to show that he is utterly unfit to be the leader of any party in a constitutionally-governed country—I say, utterly unfit to be the leader of any party which has any respect for itself, or the leader of any House that has any respect for itself. Any hon. gentleman who has no more consideration for the conscientious differences of members of his own party than the hon. gentleman has shown, is, I say, unfit to be the leader of a party. If ever there was a time when it was necessary for a man to show something of the gifts of statesmanship in the leading of a party, this is the time. If ever there was an occasion when a leader of a party utterly failed to show those necessary gifts, the time is now, and the leader is the hon. gentleman who has just addressed this House. So far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is necessary for me, surely in this House, or before this country, to repudiate the insinuations that the hon. gentleman has made with regard to my desire for a seat in the Senate. That matter has been before this House already. The hon. gentleman's leader has written a letter with regard to that matter, in which he has stated the very opposite of what the hon. gentleman has endeavoured to insinuate here to-night. Whether that was so or not, whatever the character of the hon. gentleman may happen to be here in Canada, whatever views the people of Canada may happen to hold of the hon. gentleman's record as a public man, I venture humbly to believe that they hold a view of my public record rather different than that which the hon. gentleman has endeavoured to instill into the minds of the people to-night Since I have had the honour of a seat in this House, I do not think any hon. member on either side will say that I have done anything derogatory, either to my position as a member of this House, or as a member of the Conservative party in this House. I wish I could say as much of the hon. gentleman. He has not been here very long, but he has been here long enough to do what I believe is disgraceful to the party of which he is leader ; he has been here long enough, Sir, to give a solemn pledge in writing that a certain resolution, which was amended to suit himself, would receive his cordial support in this House ; he has been here long enough, after having given that statement in writing, to speak over and over again to the gentleman to whom he gave that written pledge over his own signature, promising him his support to the resolution when it came up in the House, and he has been here long enough to get up in this House and falsify the pledge he gave, by deliberately opposing the resolution he promised to support. I hope, Sir, that so long as I have the honour of a seat in this House, no such disgraceful record can ever be urged against me. I should be ashamed, Sir, I should hide my head, I should wish to leave this House and to retire into private life, if such a statement could be truthfully made against me. The hon. gentleman knows what the facts are. The hon. gentleman is here, and he can contradict what I say, if he pleases ; and I will sit down and give him an opportunity to do so, if he can do so. I have his letter, and his letter has been read in this House ; and, if the hon. gentleman can give any explanation of the course he has taken in that regard, any explanation which will persuade hon gentlemen that he has pursued an honourable and straightforward course in that regard, I shall be very happy for the sake of the party that he unfortunately leads.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I shall be very happy to give the hon. gentleman an explanation which, I think, he will be obliged to accept. I stated that I would support his resolution, and I did so ; and, had that resolution come to a vote, I should have voted with the hon. gentleman. I stated that he had been kind enough to amend the resolution by striking out the word " naval " at my request, but I had not been consulted—I think I said I could not have entered the House when he put the notice on the paper—that, at all events, he had not consulted me upon the resolution, for I would have considered preferable a straight resolution for preferential trade, unconnected with the Hoffmeyer system of having a small tax levied against the products of all foreign countries. I stated, at the same time, that for the sake of getting rid of the Belgian and German treaties, I would be prepared even to support that view. I then said that the hon. gentleman in his speech went aside altogether of that resolution, and made a very able speech in favour of preferential trade; and while I said that while I differed with him and would have favoured a different resolution, yet I endorsed the speech from the beginning to the end; and I stated to my friends in Council that I intended to support the resolution, and I would have done so if it had come to a vote.

Mr. McNEILL. I am not at all referring to what the hon. gentleman's views on preferential trade may happen to be. I am referring to what he said he would do with respect to a certain resolution which he knew perfectly well was not one confined to preferential trade at all. The hon. gentleman is too intelligent not to understand that the resolution was Hoffmeyer's scheme. The hon. gentleman knew what the resolution was, the hon. gentleman discussed the resolution with me, he discussed the special phase of the resolution in regard to defence, which was the peculiarity of the resolution. The resolution was amended in order to suit the hon. gentleman's views, and, after the resolution was amended, the hon. gentleman did not write to say that he would be glad to support a resolution in favour of preferential trade, but he wrote to say:

> I am greatly obliged to you for sending me a copy of your amended resolution respecting the imposition of a small duty on foreign products, and which I shall have much pleasure in supporting.

The hon. gentleman said he would have voted for the resolution. Well, the hon. gentleman says so, and I suppose I must accept the hon. gentleman's statement; but I do not attach very great importance to the promise to vote for a resolution which it had been arranged by him beforehand should not come to a vote when the hon. gentleman, in his speech, opposed the resolution, which he said he would support, and opposed the essential part of the resolution, which was that there should be a fund raised for defence through the medium of preferential trade. If the hon. gentleman has no better explanation to give, I am afraid I shall be obliged to allow the statements I have made in regard to his conduct in this matter to remain on the record. He has given no explanation whatever, and it is absolutely impossible that he could give any explanation in regard to the extraordinary course he saw fit to adopt. So far as the hon. gentleman's attack upon myself personally is concerned, neither the hon. gentleman's insinuations as to my motives, nor his statements as to what I have done myself, or what he may propose to do, can in the slightest degree alter my position with respect to the principles which I have supported ever since I came to Parliament, and which I shall continue to support. I am not here to support men, I am here to support principles; and just so soon as the men who happen to be leaders of the party to which I belong, to which I have the great honour to belong, advocate principles of which I disapprove, I shall oppose those men. It matters not to me from what side of the House a proposal comes, if it be one that, in principle, commends itself to my approval, that proposal will have my support; and if the hon. gentleman leading the House supposes he is going to advance the interests of the Conservative party by endeavouring to insult, browbeat and bully every member of the party who ventures to differ from his particular views, he will find he has made a very great mistake. I do not think he will thus, in any degree, advance his position in this country, or in any degree commend himself as the leader of a party. The great mass of those who are proud to belong to the Conservative party, will utterly repudiate the policy which the hon. gentleman is endeavouring to force upon this House. The hon. gentleman is taking advantage of his position as leader of the party to endeavour to do what he knows in his heart is unconstitutional.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. McNEILL. I say it is unconstitutional. If Mr. Speaker says that the expression I have made use of is unparliamentary, I will bow to his decision.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has made the accusation that the leader of the House is pressing upon the House a resolution which he himself knows is unconstitutional.

Mr. McNEILL. If the hon. gentleman does not know it, I will withdraw the expression. It is something, at all events, that I think the hon. gentleman ought to know is unconstitutional. I had fancied that the hon. gentleman did know it—I do not wish to suggest that he does, but my excuse for supposing that he did was because he himself had stated that there had been a great deal of discussion on this question, and we know considerable time of the House has been occupied by hon. gentlemen in discussing this question, and other matters, such as confederation, and kindred subjects which he thought relevant to the question now in controversy—I supposed that if he had thought that the course he was pursuing was a constitutional course, he would have endeavoured to produce some argument in support of his position. But although he has heard, over and over again, the assertion made that it was absolutely unconstitutional to endeavour to deprive the people of this country of their right to pronounce upon this question, neither he nor any one of the able colleagues who sit on the Treasury benches with him has dared to grapple with that contention, and therefore I made the unfortunate assumption, which I wish to withdraw, with all humility, and I now say that I am sure the hon. gentleman does not know that it is unconstitutional. An hon. gentleman behind me says that the leader of the House ought to know it. I really cannot go into the question as to all the hon. gentleman ought to know. If I were to do so, I am afraid it would be a very wide subject, and a long discussion would be entered upon, and I do not wish unnecessarily to take up the time of the House. We would be all sorry to do so, although I myself would not be so sorry as no doubt some hon. gentlemen would be, if I were to go so far as deliberately to seek to prevent the passage of the Bill. If ever there was an occasion when a deliberate attempt to prevent the passage of a measure through this House would be justifiable, it is the present case, because this is an attempt to force through the House a measure, which, I have said, is unconstitutional, and it is reasonable when we know an unconstitutional attempt is being made, that we should endeavour to prevent an unconstitutional act being done. For my part, I would be willing to go a long way in that direction.

Mr. McCARTHY. Would you give up your life ?

Mr. McNEILL. I do not know about giving up my life. That is a very strong expression. My hon. friend beside me suggests that, but I do not think any of us will be called upon to lay down our lives on the present occasion. The House will adjourn, I suppose, on the 24th of April, and between this and then, we can manage to do our part in the struggle that is before us, without sacrificing our lives which no doubt are very dear to our friends, if not to ourselves. Mr. Speaker, I did unfortunately make use of an expression just before dinner which I saw that some of my friends around me misapprehended. I said that I was opposed to protection. I do not wish to do anything, Sir, which would be contrary to the rules of this House, and if you think that what I am about to suggest to you would be going too far outside the line of discussion on this Bill, I will of course not proceed. I should be very sorry to be misunderstood so far as my views on protection are concerned, and if you, Sir, thought it was germane to the subject that I should give some reasons why I still adhere to my views in regard to the policy of protection, I would be very glad to do so.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Question.

Mr. McNEILL. If you think, Mr. Speaker, that would be going too far, as I fear you do by your facial expression, I will not trespass upon forbidden ground. I would like to say a word with regard to some of the remarks that were made by my hon. friend from Richmond (Mr. Gillies). That hon. gentleman spoke about religious objections.

Mr. GILLIES. To sit on Saturday.

Mr. McNEILL. The hon. gentleman said something which I did not quite catch.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Question—address the Chair.

Mr. McNEILL. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Gillies) made a remark which I have not quite caught the force of. I was about to refer to his saying something about religious objections. I really think that the religious objections of the minority in this House are worthy of some consideration. I know for my part that I should be most desirous to give great consideration to the religious scruples of any member of society, of any member of any religious body. I hope that my hon. friend does not suppose for a moment that I would not be prepared to go a long way to, as far as possible, relieve the minority in the province of Manitoba from any interference with religious scruples that they may have at the present time, so far as their attendance at public schools are concerned. I would go a long way in that regard, and I am inclined to think, so far as I have been able to gather from what appears in the evening papers to-night, that the government of Manitoba have been prepared to go a long way in that direction.

Mr. GILLIES. My learned friend (Mr. McNeill) entirely misunderstood me. I made no reference whatever to religious prejudices or religious objections. I simply said that no hon. gentleman sitting within this chamber could have any religious objection to sit on Saturday.

Mr. McNEILL. The hon. gentleman will understand that if hon. members in this House are desirous of being with their families on Easter Sunday——

Mr. GILLIES. That is another thing altogether.

Mr. McNEILL. If hon. gentlemen are desirous of being with their families on Easter Sunday, which is a day that is held in very great respect by many members of this House, it would be impossible for them to do so unless the House does not sit on Saturday.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Question.

Mr. McNEILL. Mr. Speaker, I am replying to an interruption of the hon. gentleman and then the hon. gentleman's friends cry out "question." I think that is a very unfair way of conducting discussion in this House. I think we ought to be allowed to discuss this question in a reasonable way, and I do not think my friend from Richmond (Mr. Gillies) will say it is fair that I am not to be allowed to answer his question. That seems to be what is intended, because when I try to answer his question I am queried about something else. I shall be obliged to ask the protection of the Chair if

I am to be treated in this way. We have all got the right to be heard in this House, and we should not be trampled upon, even if we are in the minority. When the Friday has been granted, and when the Sunday must be granted, it is a most reasonable thing that members should be allowed to go home on Sunday. There was nothing suggested by the hon. gentleman from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) except that there should be a change between Wednesday and Saturday, and I do not know why in the world all this discussion has been promoted, because such a reasonable proposal was made. For my part I think it would have expedited the business of the House if the proposal had been accepted. I regret so much heat has been shown in regard to this matter, and I deeply regret that the hon. the leader of the House has induced me to make remarks which certainly it was very far from my wish to make. I suppose that even a worm will turn if it is trampled upon. and even the most humble members of the Conservative party may be allowed sometime to turn also, when they are trampled upon a little too hard. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) must be the best judge as to how far he intends to trample upon hon. members of this House. If he does so, he must expect a little retaliation. At least, so far as he attempts to trample upon me, he will find that he will have retaliation. The hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Gillies) made an argument which I was surprised to hear from one who is of such a kind disposition. He held that because he himself could not get home, and because some other hon. gentlemen could not get home, there was no reason why gentlemen who could get home should be allowed to go. I do not think that was a very kind spirit in which to approach this discussion.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Question.

Mr. McNEILL. Surely I may be allowed to reply to the arguments of the hon. gentleman. It is impossible for us to discuss this question here to-night with any degree of fair-play. for whatever he may say, no matter how germane it may be to the subject, question is called. It is insinuated that we are wasting the time of the House, which is an insinuation that I repudiate. But, I should like that the time of the House were expended as it ought to be expended. I should like that this measure which cannot become law, which if it were law would be a most improper law, a most mischievous law, a law fraught with the greatest peril to this Dominion ; I should like to see that measure laid aside and the real business gone on with. If the Government could not make up their minds to lay this measure aside altogether, I should at least like to see them lay it aside so far as to take those extra days for the consideration of measures of great moment to the country. Why could they not take up Estimates on those days of which they are depriving the private members of the House ? Why could they not occupy the extra hours which they are obtaining in this way in the discussion of measures which perhaps might go a long way to prevent the necessity of our having another session of Parliament—a contingency which I am sure all members of Parliament look forward to with very great regret. I know that for one I do. I did not believe that there would be any necessity for another session of Parliament this year. I repudiated that idea before I left my constituency. I did not think a second session this year would have been at all necessary; neither would it be necessary if the hon. gentlemen who lead the Conservative party in this House had dealt with the House as they ought to have dealt with it, and had dealt with this measure as they ought to have dealt with it. If they had brought it down and had it discussed in due time, there would have been no necessity for a second session. But they have not done that ; and in order to screen themselves from the indignation of th epeople, they endeavour to throw upon the members who are discharging a duty here in exposing the iniquity of this measure, and the impropriety of the manner in which it is being forced through the House—I say they are endeavouring to throw upon those members the onus of this second session of Parliament, which is really attributable to their own course. I think that is an exceedingly unfair line of conduct for these gentlemen to take. Now, I have no desire whatever to take up longer the time of the House. I think it would be only reasonable that the amendment which my hon. friend has moved should be accepted by the Government if they are determined to take the Saturday. It is a much more reasonable proposal than the one which was before the House a short time ago, and a more reasonable one than the main proposition of the hon. gentleman. I hope that the Goverment will see fit to pursue a course not quite so drastic as one would be inclined to imagine they were likely to pursue if one may judge from the tenor of the remarks that recently fell from the hon. gentleman who leads this House. I would suggest that some members of the Cabinet who are perhaps not quite so violent in their methods as the hon. gentleman is, should get round him and endeavour, if possible, to instill wiser counsels into his mind. It is quite evident, if the hon. gentleman is left to himself, and to the promptings of his own inclinations, that very little business can be transacted in this House this session. The House of Commons of Canada is not a body to be coerced or bulldozed, and the sooner the hon. gentleman comes to know that the better. While I admire the courage of the hon. gentleman. and no one admires his courage more than I do—and while I admire his energy, and no man admires his energy more than I do—I should like to see that courage and that energy directed into different channels; because I am quite sure that the channel into which they are now directed is one that will lead—not to what he wishes it to lead—not to success, but to disaster.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). Loud applause from Tarte and McCarthy.

Mr. BAIN. Mr. Speaker, whatever may have been the attitude of the leader of the House on this question to-night, so far as I am personally concerned, I can fairly repudiate the charge he has so freely flung at the heads of our friends, of obstructing legislation in any way. I throw back the accusation which the hon. gentleman has so freely indulged in against hon. members on this side of the House, and I claim for myself as an individual representative, the right to express myself on this or on any other question at any period I choose, and as long as I please; and if the day ever comes when we are required to sit down and keep quiet, simply because the Secretary of State says so, we had better go home and leave him and his friends to administer the affairs of this country. But, Sir, I ask you if the situation as presented by that hon. gentleman to-night is not a fair indication of the policy they have pursued for the last twelve months. To-day we find him haggling and cheese-paring with the members of this House for the saving of a few hours between Good Friday and Easter Monday—for what purpose? Because he says it is essential now that this legislation should be pressed to a conclusion. What have they been doing for the last twelve months, Mr. Speaker, towards getting this matter brought to a conclusion, that we are now struggling, in the dying hours of the session, for four or five hours of legislation? Why, Sir, we have an example of a political party who cannot make up their minds and let them stay made up long enough to do anything. We have had these hon. gentlemen making an exhibition of themselves. A year ago they got ready to have a dissolution of the House, and then they suddenly made up their minds that they would not have it, and the House was called together. Then we had the hon. Minister of Justice sulking in his tent for two or three days. There was trouble in the family, and he did not appear at the regular concerts of the family. Then, that trouble was got over, and the family came together again. At midsummer we had another example of how not to do it given by these gentlemen, and then came the arrangement that not later than the 2nd January remedial legislation should be introduced and pressed to a conclusion. When the 2nd of January came what did we see? We saw these gentlemen call together the members of the House of Commons to proceed with their legislative duties. We saw them present their bill of fare; and then what did we see? We saw the unprecedented exhibition of seven members of the Cabinet going out on strike; and to-night we had the pleasure of listening to one of those seven bolters lecturing this House because we did exactly what we said we should do. And yet they tell us that the time of this House is being wasted in obstruction. Sir, if you can find a loop-hole so small that the hon. Minister of Finance cannot crawl through it, you will see at once that no one on this side of the House can exceed that hon. gentleman in that kind of gymnastics. Then, Sir, I venture to say that the hon. Secretary of State will find that the address he made this evening to the people's independent representatives in this House will turn out to be one of the sorriest efforts he ever made in his life. Sir, does he mean to tell this House that we have reached this stage, that a man occupying the position that the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) occupies in the ranks of his party, cannot be allowed to follow the dictates of his own conscience, and differ from the dogmatic dictum laid down for his guidance by the hon. Secretary of State. If that is the position that party leadership is going to take in this House, the sooner the people of Canada know it the better. For my part, I thank the hon. Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper) for that bitter speech which he has made to his own political friend and supporter (Mr. McNeill). Sir, if I was in his place and wanted a friend to aid me in the hour of need, that is the speech that I would like to take out to the electorate and present to them. Has it come to this, that a member of a political party is not to be allowed to express his honest convictions in this House without being told that he had better get out and go somewhere else, when those convictions do not agree with the opinions expressed by an hon. gentleman who has known very little of Canadian politics for the last ten years, and who was resurrected for this occasion to guide the political destinies of his party? Sir, I respected the political leaders of that party in the past, and, if I desired to see that party go to wreck and ruin before the people of Canada, I would ask that it be guided by no better political leadership than we have had presented to us to-night. In telling the people of Canada that their representatives are simply to get up and sit down, just as he dictates to them, the hon. Secretary of State has made a declaration which the people of this country will resent, or else I know very little of their sentiments. My hon. friend has boasted to-night of the large majority that stood at his back on this division. Sir, I ask him, if he believes that that is any evidence of the sentiment of this House in support of the course he is pursuing with respect to remedial legislation. If he does, he will be bitterly disappointed before he gets through this discussion. The party whip may be cracked on this occasion, and these gentlemen may vote under its lash, but I venture to say that on Saturday the hon. gentleman will not be able to muster the same division, when a vote is taken on this Bill. I venture to say that many of those gentlemen will then be found missing, and those of us who desire to spend Good Friday and Easter Monday at home but gave it up in the public interest, will be left here to conduct legislation as best we can. The Cabinet Ministers who have wasted the first two months of this session in the idle attempt to patch up the differences among themselves regarding this very legislation, are the last men who should come down and refuse the people's representatives the opportunity of quietly enjoying the Easter holidays at their homes, under the pretext that they desire to put through legislation by five or six hours work in the interim, which legislation they might, but for the internal dissensions among themselves, have submitted to the House long ago, and thus afforded opportunity and reasonable time for full discussion of the measure within reasonable hours. I admire the patriotism that animated the hon. leader of the House, when he told us the other night that he was willing to sacrifice his health and life and everything else, in order to do justice to the Catholic minority in Manitoba, and then, after that passionate outburst, calmly glide off to his couch and leave others to bear the burden of the fray. I do not believe that kind of patriotism will go down, either with this House or with the people; and, while I am willing to give up any reasonable time to the discharge of my political duties, I am not prepared to be bulldozed into doing anything which is unfair and unjust to the people's representatives.

Mr. MACDOWALL. I have not hitherto taken any part in this discussion, and do not propose to occupy the time of the House at any length, but I should like to refer to one or two matters of interest to myself, as well as other members of the House. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken, made rather a pathetic appeal to be allowed to go home for the Easter holidays during two days. But he should remember that this House represents the whole country. It is not only those parts of Ontario and a very small portion of Quebec, which are near Ottawa, that are represented here. We have representatives here from the maritime provinces, the North-west and British Columbia, and other sections too far distant from the capital to allow of their representatives taking advantage of the Easter recess. When the hon. gentleman speaks of the great affliction under which he is suffering in not being allowed to go home for Easter, in the very peculiar circumstances that exist, it strikes me that he has struck rather an unfortunate key, because for the last ten years that I have represented a constituency in the North-west, I, and others similarly situated, have often desired, when an adjournment was made for four or five days, that it should be extended for fifteen or twenty days, so that we could equally enjoy the pleasure of going home; but hon. gentlemen in the position of my hon. friend who has just spoken, have never showed the slightest desire to meet us in that respect, and, therefore, we have always urged upon the Government never to have an adjournment, when it could possibly be avoided. Although we were willing to sacrifice ourselves in a small degree for the sake of these hon. gentlemen, we have always felt that we ought to be called on to make the sacrifice as seldom as possible and as short as possible. It appears to me that the request of the Secretary of State is a very moderate one, indeed, that the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Bain) and others should sacrifice themselves for twenty-four hours, for the sake of their country, in the extraordinary position in which we are placed to-day. I think that, when the hon. gentleman spoke of the great amount of patriotism he was called upon to exhibit, and compared the sacrifice he would have to make with that which the hon. Secretary of State professed his readiness to make, when he said that, in order to carry out this great measure, which he believed was one of the greatest measures that Parliament has ever had to deal with, he was willing to sacrifice health and even life—I say that, when the hon. gentleman compared the inconvenience he was about to suffer, with that sacrifice, he was making a comparison utterly unworthy of him or of any hon. member of this House. And I may say that, when the hon. member for Wentworth, whom I have always respected very much, made that comparison, I was greatly surprised and very sorry to hear it. The hon. gentleman attacked the Secretary of State—and it seems to be the cue of every hon. gentleman opposite to take that course—for dictating to the House, and he asked: Are we to submit to this dictatorship? If so, he said, we might as well not be here, and let the hon. Secretary of State run the Parliament of Canada himself. The hon. gentleman ought to apply this question to his own side. Did the Liberal party ask themselves that question, when they agreed to support the amendment of the hon. leader of the Opposition to the second reading of the Bill. Did the hon. gentlemen from the province of Quebec, on the Liberal side, ask themselves that question? And, if they did, how did they answer it? Well, I put this question, which, I think, is a very apposite one, and one that the hon. member for Wentworth and his colleagues might well take to heart. We know that the hon. leader of the Opposition did not declare himself against remedial legislation. He made a most ambiguous speech, but no one can possibly say that he declared against remedial legislation, and yet he moved the six months' hoist. And the hon. member for York (Mr. Mulock) said he supported the six months' hoist because it was the best way of killing the Remedial Bill. These hon. gentlemen seem to have got things rather mixed up. What is the position of the hon. gentleman's followers from Quebec who voted for the six months' hoist? Did they mean to kill the Remedial Bill and destroy all chance of the minority of Manitoba obtaining separate schools? If they did not, then they obeyed the dictatorship of their own leader, against their own convictions? What right have these hon. gentlemen opposite, then, to cast any taunt at the Conservative party? While we were discussing this question, the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) asked why we should take away all the days that belong to private members for bringing up their legislation, and said that if the Government would leave these days for private members, the members on that side of the House would give every assistance and then we could proceed with remedial legislation on government days. But, Sir, what example did we have on the last two days on which private legislation was introduced in this House. We know very well that during this very week, when the Hudson Bay canal scheme was brought before the House by a North-west member, the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) disgraced this House by occupying time with the reading of circulars for at least six hours, and when the leader of the Opposition was called upon—he has been nominated by his party as their candidate for a territorial district—to try to protect from his own followers the interests of that great North-west and to try to promote the desire of the people inhabiting that country, the desire of having an outlet to the north, what did the hon. leader of the Opposition do? He went out of the House, and left it in charge of the hon. member for Winnipeg and the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister). And what was their course? It was a course directly contrary to that that the hon. member for Brant said his party pursued. They obstructed this legislation; they occupied the whole afternoon, the whole evening and two hours of the morning to prevent the passage of a Bill of interest to the North-west.

Mr. MULOCK. Do you think it was a proper Bill?

Mr. MACDOWALL. I beg pardon.

Mr. MULOCK. Does the hon. gentleman represent a part of the country through which the Saskatchewan flows, think it a wise proposition that Parliament should hand over the right, practically, to establish toll gates and control navigation on the Red River, the Saskatchewan for a distance of about 2,000 miles?

Mr. SPEAKER. I am afraid the discussion is digressing.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. gentleman is objecting to the course taken with regard to a certain Bill.

Mr. MACDOWALL. As you have called the hon. gentleman to order, Mr. Speaker, I shall not answer his question.

Mr. SPEAKER. I hope the hon. gentleman will confine himself to the question.

Mr. MACDOWALL. I bow to your ruling, Mr. Speaker. But the following day, when the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Davis) had a Bill before the House, what was the course pursued? Instead of their course being that stated by the hon. member for Brant as the course of the Liberal party, it was the very opposite.

An hon. MEMBER. What scheme was that?

Mr. MACDOWALL. North-west Railway Bill.

Mr. MULOCK. Does the hon. gentleman approve of that Bill?

Mr. MACDOWALL. I was astonished at the generosity of the hon. gentleman from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) and the hon. gentleman from East Grey (Mr. Sproule), when they, having no Private Bills before the House, voluntarily proposed to concede a private members' day to the Government on condition that the House should not sit on Saturday. With the promise of the hon. member from South Brant that the Liberal party would assist private legislation, we have the direct obstruction of the hon. members for Winnipeg and West Lambton against private legislation; and so, when we have the proposal of the hon. member for South Oxford and the hon. member for East Grey to yield a day set apart for private members what are we to expect but obstruction from the beginning to the end? The hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) gave us a lecture just now and said that no one would submit to the hon. Secretary of State bulldozing the House. I have been, up to the present time, a listener to and observer of what has been going on. I think the Secretary of State has desired, and that, by his actions, he has shown that desire, to lead the House in quiet pastures, and by softly running brooks. But, Sir, when you speak of bulldozing, where does it come from? I think that hon. gentlemen opposite can hardly lay the soft unction to their hearts that they have been wholly guiltless of bulldozing. And I think that the hon. member for North Bruce, if he will forgive me for saying so, has spoken occasionally with great strength and warmth, and has tried to impress his ideas upon the House with great warmth of manner, and that he himself is not wholly guiltless of bulldozing. And, Sir, I remember that the member for East Grey rose in his place in this House and with what appeared on the surface to be righteous indignation, repudiated the bulldozing as he called it, of the Secretary of State, as applied to himself, and then turned around and used what I am sure the Chairman, if the question had been raised, would have ruled as unparliamentary language, and accused the Manitoba and North-west members of not representing but misrepresenting their constituents.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. member is referring to something that took place in Committee of the whole House.

Mr. MACDOWALL. Mr. Speaker, I bow to your ruling. I have said all I think necessary, in the meantime. But I desire to say that I sympathize with the leader of the House and wish to assist him in every way in carrying out this legislation, which he believes is necessary in the interests of the country.

Mr. FRASER. I must object to this obstruction: it has gone entirely too far. Where was the righteous indignation of the Secretary of State while one of his followers was speaking for half an hour, obstructing the passing of this Bill for which the country is calling? Why were not the vials of his wrath poured out upon the hon. gentleman?

Mr. McCARTHY. They will be; he will be read out.

Mr. FRASER. No doubt the hon. gentleman meandered back like the great Saskatchewan by which he lives, with a fall here and there, so that he had to be called to order two or three times while he was discussing the Remedial Bill. Here we are in the face of a great question that we should be considering, and an hon. member from the North-west gets up and obstructs the progress of business. For shame. Has it come to this? Are the ranks of those who have been read out of the party being silently augmented by the addition of this hon. member. Is he quietly giving the Government a hint that he will obstruct unless he gets what he wants? While listening to the hon. Secretary of State, I could not but be struck with the fact that we are having an hon. member read out of the party every day. How long is this going to continue.

> Birds in their little nests agree,
> And 'tis a shameful sight
> When children of one family
> Fall out, and chide, and fight.

First the hon. member for East Grey was tumbled over the precipice, and now our good friend, the model, as I said before, of hon. gentlemen on the other side is read out of the party. Who is to be the next victim? Tremble ye souls over there, tremble ye who have one instinct, and one conscientious conviction. Express them not: be silent: bow to the ruling. I trust that none of you will ever be found during the time this House is sitting, giving expression to one independent thought. There are a number of you of whom there is no danger of doing that thing, no danger in the world of doing it. But I warn any of you who have sufficient independence——

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman must address the Chair.

Mr. FRASER. I beg your pardon, Mr. Speaker, I did not mean you. But I warn hon. gentlemen opposite, I warn them in time, that this is obstruction. Now, I think the proposition is a fair one that we should not sit on Saturday at all. For myself I should have been willing to sit on Saturday, and I should have been willing to give up any business on Wednesday that might pertain to the province from which I come. I regret that the advice which was given with the best motives, was not accepted. We are discussing this question now, as we have a right to do, as to whether we shall be kept over Saturday at work, when we ought to be at home. But it has had one good effect, it has indicated to us just exactly how this House is led. There was a time when a gentleman who might see fit to differ from the leader of the Government in this House, was permitted to do so, and by those gentle wiles for which the great statesman who led this House on the Government side, was noted, they were wooed back. Of the present incumbent we cannot say so much. The man that went before him:

> For he knew when he liked he could whistle them back.

There is no such power at present. The hon. gentleman tried to draw a comparison between the leader of the Opposition and the Secretary of State because certain gentlemen supporting the leader of the Opposition left him upon that vote. What of the eighteen or twenty gentlemen who left the Secretary of State? There is this difference, a difference so patent as only needs to be mentioned. Who saw the leader of the Opposition turning with frowning face upon the gentlemen who were following their convictions and voting against the amendment that he made, and reading them out of the party at once? After all, it comes to light that the principle of the Conservative party is that men must not think for themselves. The Liberal party permit men to think for themselves, and think none the less of them. And why? Because, in thinking for themselves, they are the best supporters of Liberal principles, and they will come to the assistance of the leader when the leader is going in the right direction, although like men, they may differ upon other points. I venture to say that the eighteen or twenty gentlemen who voted with the leader of the Opposition, are as good Conservatives as any on that side of the House. And are they to be treated in that way? I would not like to be treated in that way by my leader. If it came to a question like this, I should frankly have to say that I would not vote in the same direction as my leader; and what would I think if I were told that because I voted against my leader I read myself out of the party ? Why, go to England, go to any country in the world where they have representative government, and do we find that every man follows his leader on every question ? No, we do not. Do we find that the leader of the party alone decides what the opinions of the party shall be ? Must the Conservative party, or the Liberal party, accept the word of whoever happens to lead them for the time being, as the only exponent of their principles ? Let us have a little room to differ at times, and let us not be called unworthy of a position in the party because we do so. Now, I believe firmly, and the proceedings this evening have confirmed my conviction, that every leader who is wise must learn that giving in sometimes is the best method of gaining a victory. There are times when the very conduct that we have seen here to-day, is that which will of itself defeat the object in view. May I say that I believe the whole purpose is to defeat the object in view ? I believe that no method could be taken better calculated to defeat the pretended object, than to charge a whole party with obstruction. We can come to a discussion on this question without flinging at each other the charge that they are obstructionists. I might as fairly say that the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat was actually put up by the Government to speak for half an hour, as for the Secretary of State to say that there was obstruction on this side. I could say that. Let not the hon. gentleman fear that. I am not going to say it. I am not going to judge that without the facts ; but I say there is just as much evidence of that as there is to say that because gentlemen on this side and on the other side are desirous of discussing this question fully, that therefore, they are obstructionists. Now, I shall give my vote for the motion of the hon. member, and I trust it will be accepted. For myself, I should not care if Wednesday were taken by the Government. But let us have full and free discussion, night and day, and always. Let us understand that we are giving our views and expressing our sentiments in the interest, as we believe, of our country, and let us give each other credit for approaching that subject with a desire to satisfy our conscience and to serve our country.

Mr. WALLACE. I wish to say a word with reference to the motion now before the Chair. I say here and now that I am wholly opposed to that motion. I think if we are to sit here on Saturday we had better do a good day's work. We will have a rest to-morrow and on Sunday ; so that if we have to work on Saturday I see no reason why we should not work the whole day. I notice that a number of those gentlemen whom I saw this afternoon so exceedingly anxious that we should sit on Saturday, have gone off to the train, so they will not be here on Saturday at all. Some of those gentlemen who voted this afternoon to sit on Saturday, to compel us who have a proper sense of our duty as members of Parliament, to remain here and assist in legislation—a number of these gentlemen have gone off home. I do not think they have treated us fairly, or treated the House fairly. But while I think we should sit on Saturday and do a good day's work, I would ask the leader of the House if it would not be more judicious to devote that day to something else than the Remedial Bill. Now, we have many important matters on the Order paper. We have a motion made by the hon. Controller of Customs to increase the salary of the Commissioner of Customs to $4,000 a year. I hope that will be brought up on Saturday, that we will have an opportunity of discussing it, and I may say that I shall give it my very cordial support, because I believe there is no position under the Government, no commissionership——

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member cannot discuss that motion now.

Mr. WALLACE. I will speak in general terms in regard to the subjects that should be considered on Saturday, instead of the whole of the time being devoted to the consideration of the Remedial Bill. There are many subjects which could properly be discussed. There is one on the Order paper, for example, a motion in respect to the most important question brought before the House this session, or for several sessions, if we except the Remedial Bill, and that is with regard to the defence of this country. Hon. members on both sides of the House have assented to the general proposition that we should improve our defences, equip our volunteers with the best weapons available, improve our defences and build forts, if required, for the protection of the country. I ask the leader of the House to consider this matter and have the subject discussed. We are promised the cordial support of members on both sides of the House, and the discussion will therefore not be obstructed in any way, but will be discussed freely and fully, and before Parliament closes we may thus be able to adopt measures required for the protection of the Dominion. There is another important question on the Order paper which deserves consideration, and it is a proposed resolution granting subsidies to an ocean steamship line between Canada and ports in France and Belgium. We have done very little during the present session to promote either interprovincial trade or foreign trade. Hon. members are aware that we are doing very little trade with France, and still less with Belgium.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is not discussing the question under consideration.

Mr. WALLACE. I will confine myself strictly to the question before the House.

Mr. MULOCK. I submit it is in order for an hon. gentleman to argue in support of a motion to take Saturday, that there are some very important public matters on the paper.

Mr. SPEAKER. Yes, it is perfectly competent for an hon. gentleman to say that there are certain important questions to come before the House, which should be discussed, but I think he cannot go into the discussion of the questions until they are before the House.

Mr. WALLACE. I will endeavour to keep myself within the lines of your ruling, Mr. Speaker. I was going on to say that we have been neglecting our commercial interests, not only with regard to internal, but with regard to external trade. We have been devoting our time largely to religious subjects, which are very good, but which should not occupy the whole time of the House. In my opinion, we should devote some attention to promoting trade with other countries. There is no other country in the world to-day that affords such possibilities for trade as Belgium. That country has low customs duties, not more than from 8 to 10 per cent.

Mr. SPEAKER. I am afraid the hon. gentleman is again violating the rules of the House.

Mr. WALLACE. I think I will be quite in order—though I am not, of course, opposing your ruling, Mr. Speaker—when I say that we should sit on Saturday and perform a good day's work, and I am now simply outlining a programme which will no doubt meet with the approval of the country, for thereby we shall be promoting the commercial interests of the country.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. We could pay attention to the Bill.

Mr. WALLACE. We have already paid considerable attention to the Bill, and I am prepared to pay a good deal more, but I do not think the whole time of the House should be thus occupied. The Government should have had the Bill prepared and ready at the opening of Parliament, and after they had introduced it the responsibility for delay would have rested with the House. But they did not adopt that course. Why was not the Bill ready on 2nd January, or on the 10th or on the 20th ? It was introduced on 11th February, and nearly two weeks elapsed before I was able to get a copy of the Bill. There is another very important Bill on the Order paper, and that is with respect to the voters' lists. Suppose Parliament does not pass this Bill, what will be the result ? A large expenditure is involved in revising these lists, I do not know the expense, but hon. gentlemen opposite will no doubt be able to enlighten the House as to the exact cost.

An hon. MEMBER. About half a million.

Mr. WALLACE. Outside of that half million dollars that it cost the country, how much does it cost each individual member ? How much did it cost you, Mr. Speaker ?

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is discussing a question set down for consideration at a future time. It is quite proper for the hon. member to refer to these as very important measures, and measures that should occupy the attention of the House and of the Government ; but it is not competent for him to go into details of these measures.

Mr. WALLACE. With all due respect to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, I contend that I was only speaking of these voters' lists in the general way. I did not even pretend to give the cost to the country, because I did not know. There is another proposition which might be viewed as one of great importance.

Mr. SPEAKER. I must ask the hon. gentleman to avoid discussing these questions in detail, and to pay regard to the ruling of the Chair.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Would the hon. member allow me to suggest that we are within two hours of Friday morning, and, unless it is intended to prevent anything being done to-day, the House should go into committee on this Bill. I think, considering that the Government in deferring to the feeling of gentlemen in this House, agreed to adjourn over Friday, it is most unreasonable that the hon. gentleman should treat us to this verbiage, and travel all over the whole of Great Britain, in order to support a motion which he says he wants to defeat.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Read him out.

Mr. WALLACE. The leader of the House is very unkind.

Mr. McCARTHY. Be very careful, now.

Mr. WALLACE. I am totally opposed to the proposal that we only sit until six o'clock on Saturday, because, if we have to remain in Ottawa, it is only fair that we should do a good day's work. I am quite in order to indicate the valuable work this House should do on that day. When the leader of the House tells us it is within two hours of twelve o'clock, why, I know that perfectly well.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Within two hours of Friday morning.

Mr. WALLACE. I am well aware of that, but I am pointing out what work we should undertake on Saturday.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Anything to prevent any progress being made to-day.

Mr. WALLACE. This is the first time, except, perhaps, for a minute, that I addressed the House to-day before. The hon. the leader of the Opposition has addressed the House several times.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. WALLACE. I mean, the leader of the House.

Mr. LANDERKIN. You are quite right; he is in opposition to you now.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Let us get a vote.

Mr. WALLACE. I am anxious to have a vote. I just wish to say that I am sorry the leader of the Government made these remarks this afternoon with reference to the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill). My experience in the House is that there is no more high-minded, honourable gentleman, or a man more punctilious than the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), and I do not think that any of these strictures made upon him are true. If we are told that any member of the Conservative party who does not support this Bill, which was forced upon the Conservative party, and never adopted as the policy of the party before the country; if we are to be told that these gentlemen who do not feel that they can conscientiously, or as representing their constituents, or for any other reason, support this Bill—if we are told that they must be read out of the Conservative party——

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No person said anything of the kind.

Mr. WALLACE. I do not see what other crime the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) committed. If you are opposed to this Bill, you are to oppose it consistently.

Mr. McCARTHY. And persistently.

Mr. WALLACE. And intelligently and continuously. I repeat now that I shall oppose this Bill at every stage in a legitimate and a proper way. My views and my course will not be changed, so far as I know. There is nobody going to tell me that, because I do not support that Bill, that I am to be read out of the Conservative party. I interviewed my constituents this week, and at a very large Conservative meeting they unanimously endorsed my course. The hon. member behind me laughs.

Mr. PRIOR. I admit that I did laugh.

Mr. WALLACE. He laughs because he don't know anything about it. The large hall was filled, and there were 150 standing who could not get seats. This gentleman who haw-haws, had better get some information. He dare not go to my constituency and advocate the policy he is supporting here. If he wishes, I will invite him, and have a public meeting called, and he and I will discuss this question.

Mr. PRIOR. Thank you.

Mr. WALLACE. That is all we get—Thank you; but we do not get any acceptance of the invitation. So far as I can learn, the constituents I represent—or whom I should represent, or I should feel it my duty to resign—are opposed to this Bill, and they are good Conservatives, too. But the hon. the leader of the Opposition says——

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). You are anticipating—you mean he will be in opposition.

Mr. WALLACE. I do not know about that. I have watched the proceedings all over Ontario. In the city of Toronto, where there are half a dozen daily papers, there are some four or five in opposition to the Remedial Bill. There is one that is giving it a kind of half-hearted support; or rather it is abusing the Opposition instead of openly and avowedly supporting the Bill. Then, at the meetings that have been held, what kind of resolutions have been passed? Where has there been a Conservative meeting held either before or since this House met on the 2nd of January, at which resolutions were adopted, saying that the country demands this remedial legislation, and must have it? I have not seen the record of a single Conservative meeting at which such a resolution was passed; but I have had plenty of indications that hundreds and scores of hundreds of members of the Conservative party have most actively and strongly protested against the passage of this Bill. And, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe, from all the evidence I can obtain everywhere, that this Bill will meet with the approval of the electors of Ontario. On the contrary, I am satisfied that a large majority of the electors of Ontario will refuse to support it in any form whatever. For these reasons, Sir, if we sit on Saturday, I think we should take up these very important questions which deserve the most serious consideration of the Parliament of Canada. We should consider them, and do a good day's work on Saturday. On the great question of improving the defences of Canada, which has the active support of both sides of the House, we should show the motherland and the people of this country, that, while we are discussing other matters, we have not lost sight of our duty to help ourselves and the British Empire in putting this country in a complete state of defence, so as to be in a position to resist the attacks of any foe.

Mr. SEMPLE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a few remarks, and I do not intend to touch on the Remedial Bill for that is not the question before the House. We have been charged with obstruction by means of this discussion in order to prevent the Remedial Bill coming up. I deny this most emphatically. Although there is no law giving members of Parliament a certain number of holidays, I consider that there is an unwritten law. Members have always been accustomed to look forward to the Easter holidays, and they only ask one day, Saturday, in order that they may visit their friends. This request was made to the Secretary of State in a pleasant manner, but it was of no avail. Now, has the leader of this House a right to take away the holidays which have always been accorded to the members ? I have been in this House during ten sessions ; I have been here when the most distinguished statesmen of the Conservative party were at the head of the Government—Sir John Macdonald, Sir John Abbott, and Sir John Thompson ; and not one of those distinguished men attempted to take away this holiday from the members. That is the reason this discussion has taken place. There have been five hours consumed in discussing this question, and I think it has been time well spent ; for the Secretary of State must understand that if the minority in Manitoba have rights, the members of this House have rights as well, and the whole of this discussion is a protest against his taking away from the members of this House the rights we have always enjoyed. There are a number of holidays in the year in which the members from Ontario take no interest ; yet during those days we have remained here without repining. We had a number of holidays which we did not want, at the beginning of this session ; but the hon. Secretary of State is now trying to coerce and tyrannize over this Parliament in order to keep us here on the one day that we wish for a holiday. Another statement he made was that the Opposition were stirring up race and creed animosities, and setting one creed and one race against the other. That statement has no foundation in fact. The hon. gentleman is very ingenious. He has started a fire of that kind, and he is fanning the flames, while accusing others of having done so, and what has recently occurred in Manitoba shows that that is the case. The people of that province are willing to settle this question peaceably, but they refuse to be coerced. We want this question to be settled peaceably and satisfactorily all around, but not to be settled by force. To-night two things have occurred : The right of members to visit their friends has been taken away, and the Secretary of State has coerced his own followers and has sought to read them out of the party because they would not vote as he wished. I have no doubt that such conduct will not be appreciated in the country. More independence is much needed and more independent men in this House, and there will be more independent men in this House after the general elections.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make an explanation as the seconder of the resolution before the House. I want it clearly understood that my object in seconding this resolution was that every clause of the Bill should be fully discussed, and I am under the impression that the discussion on Saturday cannot be a full discussion of the clauses of the Bill, for the simple reason that a very large number of the members, even those who vote to give the Government Saturday, will have left the House and gone to their homes. I believe it is of the utmost necessity that we should have almost every member in the House during the time the discussion goes on, and for that reason I have seconded the resolution of the hon. member for Muskoka. Sir, I have been astonished at the manner in which the Secretary of State has attempted to bulldoze this House. He has, time and again, got up and told us that we have been obstructing. Why, Sir, what was the manner in which this Bill was introduced by the hon. gentleman himself ? He gave us a discussion of confederation from its inception down to the present time, a great amount of which had no relation whatever to the question under discussion. It was that hon. gentleman who first began to obstruct. If he was so very anxious to proceed with this Bill, why did he not confine his discussion to matters pertaining directly to it ? I am perfectly convinced that there has been no obstruction on this side of the House. This is the first time that I have spoken on this question. As for raising strong race and creed animosities, no man in this House has as much to answer for as the Secretary of State. While denouncing the stirring up of race and creed feelings, no other man has stirred them up to the extent that he has himself. And yet, Sir, he turns round and charges individuals on this side with obstruction. Let me say that I believe we have been deprived of a valuable privilege. I for one have not been home but once this session, and had made arrangements to be home on Friday and Saturday. I am not of the opinion that this Bill should be discussed in the manner the hon. Secretary of State has hinted at, namely, that we should make arrangement with the whips for a number of us to go home. I believe that the desire of the hon. gentleman, in making that suggestion was that he might have his own way with the measure. But we are sent here to perform a duty, and that duty we will perform, whether the hon. Secretary of State takes from us those rights and privileges we have always enjoyed or not. I came into this House in 1882, and have never seen it led in the manner in which it has been led these past three weeks. I respected the Conservative leaders down to the present ; but on account of the manner in which the hon. Secretary of State is attempting to lead this House, what little respect I have had for him has been taken away, and in saying that I am expressing the sentiments of hon. members on the other side as well as on this. When the hon. gentleman says that the Conservative party in the country will take note of what has taken place in this House today, I tell him that both Conservatives and Reformers are taking note of it; and when the general elections take place, he will find out to his cost whether or not he has been leading the House in the interests of his party. Respectable men of his party, all through the country, express the opinion that the leader of this House is not representing the true feelings of the respectable Conservatives of the Dominion, especially of the province of Ontario. A gentleman who walked down from the House with me, the other night, told me that he had never cast a Reform vote in his life, but that after sitting in these galleries three or four days and witnessing the manner in which this House was led, he had come to the conclusion never to cast another Conservative vote as long as the present Government held the reins of power. If the hon. Secretary of State wishes to conduct the affairs of the House in an amicable manner from this time out, he will not try to deprive members of the privileges they consider they are entitled to.

Mr. McCARTHY. I do not propose to take up much of the time of the House, but I do not think that I ought to allow the charges that have been hurled against me tonight to pass without some observation. I am pretty case-hardened with regard to accusations of this kind, and the mock heroics—for they appear to me to be nothing more—of the hon. Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper) have no terror for me. But on behalf of the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), who has been assailed in terms and in tones which certainly reflected no credit on the Secretary of State and no credit on this House, I have this to say, that the hon. member for North Bruce, although personally a friend of mine, is not in agreement with me on political questions, that on the contrary he and I differ upon the trade question, and we differ to such an extent that there is at present in his riding a candidate nominated at my instance to oppose him. Now, it would be almost incredible to any one not present this evening, that the hon. member for North Bruce, who, notwithstanding his opinions and his feelings about the course of the Government respecting Manitoba, notwithstanding his belief that the course of the Government from its inception was erroneous, has expressed himself as a staunch adherent of his party, should have been spoken to as he was this evening, simply because some gentleman was good enough to carry a tale to the leader of the House of what he overheard between my hon. friend and myself, and that was my asking whether he proposed to speak before six and being told that he would. For that it was, I understand, by which the hon. member for North Bruce read himself out from the Conservative party; that it was which entitled the hon. Secretary of State to speak of him as a traitor. Sir, it is an old aphorism that they whom the gods would destroy they first make mad. Is that the position the Conservative party and its leader has got into? Are we to listen, day after day, to men being read out of the party, who have done more, with less advantage to themselves, for that party than the hon. Secretary of State can boast. What he has done was done in order to his own personal advancement, while these gentlemen who have sacrificed themselves and remained in the Conservative party and who have done it without fee or reward, are to be spoken to in language such as we have listened to this last night or two from the hon. Secretary of State. For myself I care not. I would feel indeed that I had fallen low if anything that could fall from the Secretary of State would be treated by me even as an insult. I remember where it comes from, I know his history perhaps too well, and I am glad to feel that I am not a follower of his and not a supporter of his in this House. Now, as to the matter we have before us this evening, the policy and the course of the hon. gentleman who leads the House is quite apparent. He cannot deny, nor has there been an attempet here to deny, that owing to his own conspiracy with his colleagues, his own attempt to oust the Premier,—because every person must know it was his attempt, every one must know that he was the instigator of the conspiracy to oust the Premier under whom he serves and to take his place—the early days of this session were lost, and that the Bill to pass which this session was convened, was not introduced until six or seven weeks had been lost. And now, having lost the early days of the session, now having ascertained, late in the day, that they could not sit beyond the 24th of this month, and that their Bill cannot, in the time now at our disposal, become law, now that they have ascertained that this Bill of theirs, owing to their own default, cannot become law——

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes, the hon. gentleman may say "hear, hear," and I am glad that he accepts the statement, that the first seven weeks were lost through his fault.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The wish is father to the thought.

Mr. McCARTHY. What was the course of Mr. Gladstone, when a session was called in England for the purpose of passing a Bill respecting the government of Ireland? Did he wait seven weeks before introducing the Bill? Did he allow the cream of the session to pass before bringing it down? What was the reason for the delay in bringing down this Remedial Bill? Minister after Minister has spoken, but not one has dared to give an explanation, not one has dared to give the reason. No candid or honest explanation has been or can be given ; and yet, forsooth, they come here at the end of the session, having wasted its best days, and they make a great pretense of taking Saturday and putting a number of gentlemen to inconvenience, in order to make believe that they hope to carry the Bill ; and that if they do not, it is because we will not permit them to do so. We can see through that quite well. I would like to know where the obstruction has been in connection with this matter.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes, I would like to know it. The Bill was brought to a second reading on the 3rd March. Were too many days taken up in the discussion of the second reading, and if so, who are responsible ? Consult "Hansard." More gentlemen spoke in favour of the Bill than against it. And amongst the hon. gentlemen who spoke against the Bill were five or six supporters of the Government, whose day has not yet come, but whose day is fast approaching when they will be read out of the party as well as the rest.

Mr. HAGGART. Hear, hear.

Mr. McCARTHY. "Hear, hear," says the hon. Minister of Railways. The only record of the Minister of Railways is that on one occasion he obstructed one Saturday afternoon during the whole sitting. That is his whole record before he became a Minister, and the only public act he ever performed to entitle him to credit and honour, even from his own party. Now, Sir, if there was no obstruction on the second reading—and if there was, it was certainly as much on the side of the Government as on the part of those who are opposed to the Bill—what is to be said about the committee stage ? Why, as an hon. member has already pointed out, we had not been in committee two hours before this hectoring, bullying style was adopted. We were told we were obstructing. I fancy it was intended that we should take the Bill clause by clause, allow the Chairman to read it and say "Carried." Was that the idea of the hon. member ?

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member is referring to what took place in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. McCARTHY. At the moment, Mr. Speaker, if you will allow me, I was past that. I was called to order a little too late. I say was it to be expected that we were to carry the Bill clause by clause without discussion ? If so, the hon. member will find himself mistaken before the day comes when he will have to announce that, owing to his own default and his own delay, the Bill cannot be carried this session. He will find that the Bill is of sufficient importance—we have been told that it is the most important measure that was ever submitted to Parliament—to require at our hands great deliberation and investigation and discussion, which cannot but occupy some considerable time. And when I look at the only case that occurs to me at the moment as being analogous, what do I find ? I find that the Government for Ireland Bill was introduced in the House of Commons on the 3rd of February, 1893, and the second reading was on the 6th of April. Twelve days were occupied on the discussion of the second reading—I think our discussion on the second reading of this Bill was eight or nine days. The committee stage was reached on the 8th May. The House was in committee on the Bill for forty-seven sittings, ending the 27th of July. And the Bill was not finally passed in the House until the 1st of September. And yet, after the discussion that has been given to this Bill we are accused of obstruction. There is no ground for such a charge. Sir, if it came to that, I should not hesitate to use every parliamentary means to prevent the passage of the Bill. I tell the hon. members so ; I am not ashamed of it. I say this House has no moral sentiment behind it ; it has no mandate from the people with regard to this measure, but, on the contrary, everything we know and everything we see tells us that the majority who are pressing this Bill through the House are misrepresenting the country. Have public meetings been held all over this country with reference to this question ? The answer is : Yes ; and every public meeting has been against the Bill. Have members in the last by-elections been able to gain their seats by promising to support the Bill ? Look at the election in Cardwell, look at the election in North Ontario, where the hon. member had to conceal that he was opposed to the Bill :—had to conceal from his constituents his views and go upon his past record, which his constituents knew entitled them to believe that when the measure was brought forward he would oppose it. But for that he knows, and he will admit, he would have been defeated. Within three weeks of the expiry of Parliament, with these indications of public sentiment on every hand, we are told that we are obstructing a measure that has never received the mandate of the people and to which, every sign tells us, the people are opposed. We are told that we must put this Bill through for the sake of peace and tranquility. We are not to raise questions of race and religion. The Secretary of State is bidding for support on the ground of race and religion. The whole of his politics —and they are as transparent as it is possible to be—are an appeal to the race in whose interest the measure is supposed to be pressed, and an appeal to the Roman Catholics of this country, who are no doubt to a very large extent in favour of separate schools ; and the abuse that he heaps upon my humble self and others is for what ?—because we venture to think that the province of Manitoba can manage her own school affairs, that the province of Manitoba is competent to judge whether separate schools or public schools shall be the rule, and that it is not for this Parliament to interfere. His effort is merely to raise on behalf of himself and the party he leads that vote which he thinks may be most solid on the day of polling. But I warn the hon. Secretary of State—and I think he knows it, or he would not be trying to pass this Bill through the House—that the people will yet pronounce upon it ; and when the hon. member comes back here, he will not find a corporal's guard behind him from the province of Ontario. I think I know of what I speak, and I think the hon. member will find that the people of Ontario, at all events, and the people of the other provinces, I believe, are determined to allow the province to manage its own affairs, fully conscious that they are as capable of doing so as the Dominion is of doing it for them. So I repudiate, in the first place, the statement that there has been any obstruction. I appeal to any hon. member to say whether I personally ever obstructed or delayed the proceedings of the House in a manner which was not quite consistent with parliamentary rule and parliamentary practice. But I venture to say that I have rights here as a representative, and I propose to exercise those rights ; and I propose to discuss this Bill at every stage and, if I can, to improve it, although I have no belief that it will become law. It is my duty to try and improve the Bill in its passage through the House, and I will endeavour to perform that duty to the best of my ability. I heard the lecture that the Minister of Finance gave us this afternoon. His argument is that because the Bill has been read a second time, therefore the House has pronounced upon it, and those who are opposed to it are to bow their heads and to assist its passage through the House. Was that the course of the great parliamentarians, such as Mr. Balfour, Mr. Chamberlain, Sir Henry James and others who were opposed to the Irish Bill ? Did they, after the second reading, fold their arms, and allow the Bill to be advanced through all its stages unopposed ? No, they opposed it step by step, clause by clause, improving and amending it. And I happened to be sitting in the gallery of the House of Commons when I heard the same argument used against Mr. Chamberlain, and his answer was that it was his duty, though opposed to the Bill, to endeavour to improve it as it passed through the committee stage. That is my view as to my own duty, and, thinking so, I shall not hesitate to do everything I can to improve the measure, and to take all the time that is necessary for that purpose. I have no expectation, under these circumstances and with the little time before us, that it is possible for this Bill to become law. My statement has been quoted once or twice. I made no statement that the Bill would not go through committee. I did say in my speech on the second reading that I did not think it would not get into committee, but I explained what I meant by that. Every one of us knew, or supposed, that the Government, who had announced negotiations with Manitoba, intended, after the second reading of the Bill, to allow those negotiations to proceed and the Bill to lie. That is what I said. I had no hesitation in making that statement, and I have no hesitation in saying that, so far as the committee is concerned, whatever I thought then, I think now that this Bill will never get through the committee stage. Now, one word more and I am done. The leader of the House has told us in triumphant tones to look at the vote that was given in favour of his motion this afternoon. Two to one of the members of this House have declared in favour of the speedy passage of the Bill. I wonder what the hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Craig) has to say about that. I wonder what my hon. friend from East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett), who voted against the Bill, has to say to that, and my hon. friend from North Ontario (Mr. McGillivray), and my hon. friend from Halton (Mr. Henderson) ? Did they mean by their votes to show that they were in favour of placing this Bill speedily upon the statute-book ?

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. In order that the Bill should be disposed of.

Mr. McCARTHY. That is not the language of your leader. Be careful ; no difference of opinion is tolerated on this subject. Be careful, or else you will be read out of the party. No, Sir, the vote was given by these hon. gentlemen because they desired, so far as they possibly can, to stand by their party; but they will find, as my hon. friends here have found—I venture to say that I think they must have found that, in adhering, as they did, too long to the policy of the Government with respect to this Manitoba school question, they have received no gratitude from their party leaders. There is the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), the former Controller of Customs, a gentleman who remained in the Government, doing all he could to uphold his party and his friends, and when at last, in obedience to the dictates of his conscience, he was compelled to retire from the Government, he found no gratitude for his past sacrifices in their favour. He stood in the breach here, last July, defending his course in Parliament, defending his course, although he was opposed to the policy of the Government, on the ground that he was not a Cabinet Minister ; he remained with them, doing what he could to get them out of the trouble in which they were involving themselves, until it was impossible any longer, with decency, to remain a member of the Administration: and, when he leaves them, he is to be taunted, he is to be told that by the very fact that he remained in the Government up to that time, he has disqualified himself from taking the position that, as an honest man, he takes upon the floor of the House to-day. Sir, I believe we have now to recognize that the majority here are determined that we shall sit on Saturday, and we are to go through the farce of sitting on that day, and endeavouring to proceed with this important Remedial Bill. But I ask the hon. Secretary of State to recall the words I said to him, this afternoon. It is now nearly eleven o'clock. A little courtesy to the members of this House on a matter in which no principle was involved, a little consideration for the feelings of this House, would have enabled us to go to work at four o'clock this afternoon, and to have spent the time up till now in consideration of this Remedial Bill in committee. But we have got an autocrat amongst us, a czar, whose unalterable will is to be the law of this Parliament. We are to obey, we are not even to differ with him; and, if we venture to do so, we are to be trounced in a way which at one time was a terror, but which has ceased to be a terror to the members of this honourable House.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. With the permission of the House, I desire, not to reply to the hon. gentleman——

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member has spoken.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have spoken, but, with the indulgence of the House, I was going to confine myself to a single question.

Mr. MULOCK. Your colleague has moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have only a single question.

Mr. McCARTHY. I think the adjournment has been moved.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman has taken advantage——

Mr. McCARTHY. Order, order.

Mr. HAGGART. I have but a few words to say, in reply to the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. The hon. gentleman makes very grave and serious charges against my hon. friend the leader of the Government. He first charges him with conniving with parties who had left the Government some time ago, against the Premier of the Government, for the purpose of making himself the Premier. I say to the hon. member for North Simcoe that there is not a word of truth in his statement. That hon. gentleman had never communication with us on the subject, and, if we left at the time we did, it was with no intention on our part of making him leader, and he was not a party to it at all. Every hon. gentleman who was a colleague of mine at the same time, and left at the same time, will bear me out in my statement. The hon. gentleman threatens the members of this House. Who is this god who strides over the whole of this Parliament, that we are to stand at his beck and call, and to crawl under his feet? Who is he that tells us that the members of this House are to be dictated to, that, if we do not vote in the particular direction the hon. gentleman tells us to vote, we shall not be returned as members of this House? The language is unparliamentary; any threats of that kind are against the rules of the House. Such language is very seldom used in the House. No hon. gentleman ever used such language who is acquainted with parliamentary practice—threatening hon. gentlemen that, if they do not obey their conscientious convictions, they will not be returned again at the next election. I might retort upon the hon. gentleman, and tell him that he will have hard work to get back to this House. When he says that the country is aflame upon this question, where are the public meetings throughout the country? Where is the flame that he strives to stir up in reference to this measure? His agitation has fallen as flat as possible in the country. The whole object of the hon. gentleman is to prevent this question being settled by the present Parliament, in order that he may prevent the honest opinion of the country being obtained upon the administration of the Government and upon its trade policy, in order to gratify his little vanity in being able to present a religious question upon which to divide the parties and the country. Is not that the sole object? Does not the hon. gentleman know that this question was before the House for the last five or six years, and that the Government promised this House last session that this session would be called for the purpose of passing this measure? Was not sufficient notice given to the country? Did not the country know that a Remedial Bill would be introduced, and that it would be pressed to a conclusion at this meeting of Parliament? And yet the hon. gentleman says that the country has not given us a mandate to consider this Bill. The country is unanimous in the desire that the question should be settled. The hon. gentleman will find, when he goes to the country, how little bigotry there is, how little of this kind of stuff there is among the electorate of Canada. The hon. gentleman pitches into my hon. friend the Secretary of State, and uses similar language to that he used towards me some time ago, and says that he has not fallen low enough to pay attention to the opinions of the leader of this House? Well, Sir, he has fallen low enough to alter his opinions about the leader of this House. Let me quote from a speech which the hon. gentleman delivered in December, 1894, when Sir John Thompson was Premier. Speaking about the Secretary of State, the hon. gentleman said:

> No man felt ashamed to acknowledge Sir John Macdonald and Sir Charles Tupper as their leaders.

The hon. gentleman, it appears, has changed his opinion since then. What is the reason of his change of opinion within this short period? He has been acquainted with the hon. Secretary of State for twenty years, and only a short time ago he was proud to acknowledge the leadership of Sir Charles Tupper. But now the hon. gentleman says he has not sunk low enough to care anything about the opinion of the leader of the House at the present moment.

Mr. McCARTHY. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Read his remarks; they only occupy a dozen lines.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman said:

> No man felt ashamed to acknowledge Sir John Macdonald and Sir Charles Tupper as their leaders; no man need feel ashamed to look back at the leadership of Mr. Alexander Mackenzie,—at all events we were never ashamed of them. But look at these men now in power and you will hang your head in shame.

Mr. McCARTHY. Who were they?

Mr. HAGGART. At this late hour of the night, and as I shall have many opportunities of speaking on the Bill in committee, I do not wish to act contrary to the rules of the House by taking up time in discussing a subject foreign to the motion before the House. I have only spoken these few words in reply to the hon. gentleman who made an attack on the leader of the House. The hon. gentleman says I am not afraid of the threats of the leader of the Government on this question. We do not threaten the hon. gentleman. And let me tell him that we are not afraid of his threats. We do not care one cent about them, we are prepared to meet him at every time the hon. gentleman thinks proper, and I may say to him in reply, using similar language to that used by himself, that the result will be known, and it will not be to his advantage, after the elections have been held.

PAIRS:

Messieurs

Smith (Sir Donald),	Geoffrion,
Joncas,	Macdonald (Huron),
Cleveland,	Lavergne,
Chesley,	Forbes.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) and the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Cleveland) have not voted.

Mr. DAVIN. I am paired with the hon. member for Argenteuil (Mr. Christie), but I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. CLEVELAND. I am paired with the hon. member for Drummond and Arthabaska (Mr. Lavergne); otherwise, I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Those were pairs not made to apply to these amendments.

Mr. DAVIN. Then I vote against the amendment.

Mr. CLEVELAND. I vote against the amendment.

Amendment negatived.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I desire to move, with the consent of the House:

> That when the House adjourns this day it stands adjourned until Saturday next at 10 o'clock a.m.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I take the opportunity of reminding the leader of the House that the Supplementary Estimates, which were promised, have not been brought down to-day.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will mention to the Finance Minister that the hon. member for South Oxford has called attention to the fact, and I presume he will have them promptly brought down.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I call attention to the fact that the hon. gentleman positively promised to bring them down to-day. He made a distinct promise some time ago to bring them down last Monday, and he positively promised to lay them on the Table to-day. I do not think, unless there is some grave reason to the contrary, and of that the Secretary of State ought to be aware, that the House has been fairly or properly treated with respect to these Supplementary Estimates. Over and over again, I have called the attention of the Government to them, and over and over again pledges have been made—a positive pledge was made for Monday, and it was renewed for to-day. These Supplementary Estimates ought to have been laid on the Table, and the Minister should be prepared to give some satisfactory explanation as to the reason why they have not been produced.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may mention for the information of the hon. gentleman, that the Finance Minister is not well, and if he had been able to be in his place, no doubt he would be able to give a satisfactory explanation.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF DEBATES.

Mr. BRODEUR. I desire to call attention to a mistake which appears in the official report of the debate of 31st March last. The Remedial Bill was being discussed, and on section 3 an amendment was moved by the hon. member for Antigonish (Mr. McIsaac), and, so far as I remember, the amendment was declared lost. I see, however, in the official report that the amendment was declared carried. That statement in the unrevised edition of the debates is clearly a mistake, and it is proper that attention should be called to the fact.

Mr. BERGERON. My attention having been called to the fact I notified the chief of the official reporting staff, Mr. Bradley, that the amendment of Mr. McIsaac has been lost, and he has already corrected it. That will be corrected in the revised edition. The clause was carried as amended, but it was another amendment which was not understood by the reporter.

THE COMMISSION TO WINNIPEG.

Mr. McCARTHY. I think it would be convenient if we knew what the fate of the commission to Winnipeg had been. We see in the press that the commissioners are on their way back. Perhaps the Secretary of State could give the House some information as to what has been the result of the negotiations.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am not in a position to make any communication to the House on this subject at this sitting.

THE REMEDIAL ACT (MANITOBA).

House again resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 58) the Remedial Act (Manitoba).

(In the Committee.)

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that it would be for the convenience of the House if you take each of these subsections separately. It is obvious that it would be rather inconvenient to discuss eight or nine distinct subsections together, and it would not facilitate business.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

On section 4, subsection (a).

> (a.) To have under its control and management the separate schools and to make from time to time such regulations as may be deemed fit for their general government and discipline and the carrying out of the provisions of this Act.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would like to ask the leader of the House, how he reconciles this provision with the section which goes before it. The previous section puts the regulations in the Department of Education, and that is a distinct body from this. This seems to be a copy to some extent of the old provision in the Manitoba Act, where the Department of Education was composed of two boards, the Protestant and the Catholic. Those two boards together constituted the Department of Education. Each of these had specific functions, and there were certain functions discharged by the two bodies as a board of education. Under this provision, it would seem that the Department of Education might make from time to time certain regulations, which is, under the law as it now stands, a wholly distinct body. I do not see how you are to reconcile the provisions of one section with those of the other.

Mr. OUIMET. There is the same apparent clashing, if there is a clashing, existing in the law before 1890. Section 3 of the old Act read :

> It shall be the duty of the board——

That is the joint board.

> It shall be the duty of the board from time to time to make such regulations as they see fit for the general organization of the schools.

And then the following section went on to say :

> The board shall resolve itself into two sections, the one consisting of the Protestant and the other of the Roman Catholic members thereof, and it shall be the duty of each section to have under its control and management the common schools and to make from time to time such regulations as they may deem fit for their general government and discipline and the carrying on of the provisions of this Act.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). These were two sections of the same body and could regulate matters between them, but here the Department of Education is a distinct body.

Mr. OUIMET. The present separate school board represents the Catholic section of the late joint board, and the Department of Education now represents the joint board, and that is the reason why the law has been made to fit with the old law in order that no objection could be raised that we have given to the separate school board any more power than the Catholic section of the joint board had in virtue of the old law.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Suppose this were to pass into law just as it stands, what functions fall to the Department of Education, and what functions fall to the Board of Education ?

Mr. OUIMET. They are enumerated in section 4.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Not at all.

Mr. EDGAR. As far as I can make out, this Bill is a slavish copy of Mr. Ewart's draft Bill which he submitted to the Privy Council of Canada, and there has been a most extraordinary error committed which the Minister of Public Works does not seem to have apprehended. The Department of Education mentioned in section 3, was not in existence under the Consolidated School Act of 1881. There was no Department of Education at all, but there was an advisory board which was not a department of education, or a separate school board as we have here. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Ouimet) is altogether wrong in the explanation he gave to the committee. This has been copied from the draft of Mr. Ewart, and they fell into the error in that way.

Mr. OUIMET. I have not read from Mr. Ewart's draft Bill, but from the law which was in existence before 1890.

Mr. EDGAR. The hon. gentleman does not find in section 3 the "Department of Education" in that law.

Mr. OUIMET. No, but I find the joint board mentioned.

Mr. EDGAR. That was another thing altogether. That was an advisory board, but here we have recognized the Department of Education which was only created in 1890. The extraordinary provisions of this Bill are, that in section 3 which has already passed, you have recognized the Department of Education of the Government, and you say that that Department of Education shall make such regulations as they from time to time see fit for the general organization of the separate schools. That was supposed, by this House, to be a very proper arrangement to make, but in section 4, which we are now considering you refer to the duties of the Board of Education, which by the way is not properly described in that section, for I think that the "Separate School Board of Education" is the proper name of that board. That Board of Education is created here, and is given concurrent jurisdiction with the Department of Education in the province of Manitoba. That department has power, from time to time, to make such regulations as it may think fit for the general organization of the separate schools. If that is so, of what worth is subsection "a" for giving the Board of Education, a mere creature of this Act, the power to make, from time to time, such regulations as they may deem fit for the general government and discipline of the separate schools, and the carrying out of the provisions of this Act ? That was put into this Bill by mistake. That was the provision when there was an advisory board, and no Department of Education. You have first given the Department of Education, created in 1890, the power to make regulation ; and now you are proposing, in this section to give the Board of Education the same power, simply because it is copied from an Act which gave certain duties to the old Advisory Board when the Department of Education was not in existence, and when the Advisory Board was in existence, and was the only authority on school questions. So I say this Bill has been shovelled together without any intelligent understanding of what has been arranged, and it should be reconsidered.

Mr. DALY. I think I can set the hon. gentleman right. Prior to 1890 there was no such thing as an advisory board, but there was a general Board of Education, consisting of Protestant representatives and Roman Catholic representatives. The general board had certain duties, prescribed by the Act of 1881, amongst which was the duty referred to in subsection 2 of section 3 of this Bill, namely, to make, from time to time, such regulations as they may think fit for the general organization of the separate schools. In addition to that, certain duties were cast upon the Roman Catholic section, and certain duties upon the Protestant section of the board. Among those duties were those we create by section 4 of this Bill. It may seem anomalous to the hon. gentleman, but under the old Act the general board had the power we give under section 3, that is, the organization of the whole system. After 1890, the Department of Education had imposed upon it the duties of the old Board of Education, and we vest in the Department of Education the same powers that the general board formerly had. we could not give to the Board of Education which we create by this Act, the powers which the Board of Education enjoyed prior to 1890, that is, the general organization of the separate schools; so we give it to the Department of Education.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think the hon. gentleman has misunderstood the law altogether. I will show him how. The statement has been made, and I accept it, that you have no desire or intention to give to the separate school board in Manitoba greater powers than they enjoyed before 1890. If you will look at the law before 1890 you will find that the general organization of common schools was vested in the Board of Education. The general organization embraced everything except the specific powers granted to the separate board. What were those separate powers? If we ascertain what they were, and if we do not intend to go beyond them, we shall see whether they included the powers you propose to give here. Their power was simply to determine the discipline in the schools.

Mr. DALY. No.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Will the hon. gentleman allow me to read from the judgment of Mr. Justice Dubuc in the celebrated Barrett case? He says:

> The duties of the board were described as follows:—1st. To make from time to time such regulations as they may think fit for the general organization of the common schools. 2nd. To select books, maps and globes to be used in the common schools, due regard being had in such selection to the choice of English books, maps and globes for the English schools, and French for the French schools, but the authority hereby given is not to extend to the selection of books having reference to religion or morals, the selection of such being regulated by a subsequent clause of this Act. 3rd. To alter and subdivide, with the sanction of the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, any school district established by this Act.

The hon. gentleman sees that the general board had the general organization of the schools, the power to select all the books, except the books relating to religion and morals, and the power to subdivide the districts. When they came to give powers to the separate board, what did they do? This is the wording of the Act:

> The general board was divided into two sections, and among the duties of each section we find the following:—Each section shall have under its control and management the discipline of the schools of the section; it shall make rules and regulations for the examination, grading and licensing of teachers, and for the withdrawal of licenses on sufficient cause; it shall prescribe such of the books to be used in the schools of the section as have reference to religion or morals.

Now, I think we understand distinctly what the powers of the separate school board were—simply to control discipline, the licensing of teachers and the withdrawal of licenses, and the selection of those books which pertained to religion and morals. They had not more. Now, you are giving them not only more, but the entire powers which, up to 1890, were vested in the general board. Can you do that?

Mr. DALY. Yes. I will tell the hon. gentleman that he is entirely wrong.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I have read from the statute.

Mr. DALY. He has not read from the statute, but from a summary of the statute made by Mr. Justice Dubuc. I will now read what the statute says:

> The board shall resolve itself into two sections, the one consisting of the Protestant and the other of the Roman Catholic members thereof; and it shall be the duty of each section:
> To have under its control and management the schools of the section, and to make from time to time such regulations as may be deemed fit for their general government and discipline, and for the carrying out of the provisions of this Act.
> To arrange for the proper examination, grading and licensing of its teachers, the recognition of certificates obtained elsewhere, and for the withdrawing of the license upon sufficient cause.
> To select all the books, maps and globes to be used in the schools under its control, and to approve of the plans for the construction of school-houses; provided, however, that in the case of books having reference to religion and morals, such selection by the Catholic section of the board shall be subject to the approval of the competent religious authority.

> To make regulations regarding the selection of school sites, the size of school grounds, and the formation and alteration of all school districts under its authority.

These sections correspond with the subsections of section 4 of this Bill, with slight alterations to make them fit into the conditions we seek to create by this Act.

Mr. EDGAR. There is one thing which I think we should hesitate about very much. A Department of Education has been created in Manitoba by the Act of 1890, as a department of government. That is recognized in section 3, which we have already adopted, and it is authorized to make, from time to time, such regulations as it may think fit for the general organization of the separate schools. That is the chief educational body in the province of Manitoba, and it is fully recognized in section 3, which we have passed. How are the schools managed now, in addition to the Department of Education? They are managed by an advisory board, which is created by the same Act of 1890 that creates the Department of Education; and I do not think that this board of education which we are creating here to take charge of the schools of the minority, should have greater powers given it than are given to the advisory board under the Act of 1890. Now that we have recognized the Department of Education, as we do in section 3, it would be most unreasonable to give to the small board created here for the regulation of separate schools, powers inconsistent with those given the larger department.

Mr. DALY. By subsection 2 of section 3, we give the Department of Education the powers that the whole Board of Education enjoyed prior to 1890. By section 4 we give to the Board of Education, which we create by this Act, the powers that the Roman Catholic section of the board enjoyed previous to 1890.

Mr. WALLACE. The point made by the hon. member for West Ontario is this. There is an advisory board now to carry out the Public School Act of 1890. This board is given certain powers, which are considered ample; but the complaint with regard to this Bill is that the Board of Education created by it, and which will represent not more than 10 per cent of the interests, the school-houses and the number of scholars, represented by the advisory board, is given greater powers than that board. It is given powers which, by the Act of 1890, are not considered necessary in the case of the advisory board, governing nine-tenths of the schools, and which, therefore, ought not to be necessary in the case of this board, governing only one-tenth of the schools.

Mr. DALY. I cannot incorporate in this law any of the powers that the advisory board have at this time, but we have to give to the board we create the same powers which the Roman Catholic section of the Board of Education enjoyed prior to 1890.

Mr. WALLACE. The Privy Council of England said that was not at all necessary.

Mr. DALY. Certainly not, if it had been done by the legislature of Manitoba. It was not essential that the law should be restored in its entirety, if the legislature of Manitoba provided the remedy; but we, in this Parliament, have to legislate exactly on the lines of the law, as it stood prior to 1890.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No.

Mr. DALY. That is my opinion, and we are not giving them any greater powers than they had prior to 1890.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) You do not propose to restrict or limit?

Mr. DALY. Only in accord with the way they were restricted previous to 1890.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) You do not make any new restriction or limitation?

Mr. DALY. I daresay we have the power to limit them; but not to increase them. We simply give by section 4 the powers which the Catholic section of the Board of Education had in 1890, and are not giving it any greater powers. It is to restore to them the rights they enjoyed under the legislation prior to 1890.

Mr. EDGAR. Why do you give the Department of Education the power you do under section 3?

Mr. DALY. We are giving to the Department of Education the power held by the Board of Education prior to 1890, because the Department of Education takes the place of the Board of Education. And under section 4 we are giving the power enjoyed by the Roman Catholic section of the board.

Mr. McNEILL. I just wish to call my hon. friend's attention for a moment to an error into which he has unintentionally fallen in regard to this matter. He says that the Lord Chancellor, in stating the opinion of the court—judgment as it is called here—was referring to what the Government of Manitoba was to do in regard to this——

Mr. DALY. The legislature of Manitoba.

Mr. McNEILL. The legislature—the government—of Manitoba. The words referred to by my hon. friend were these:

> It is certainly not essential that the statutes repealed by the Act of 1890 should be re-enacted, or that the precise provisions of these statutes should again be made law.

When that is pointed out the hon. gentleman says that this remark was not made with regard to this House, but with regard to the legislature of Manitoba. Now, if the hon. gentleman will look back only a few lines he will find the following:—

> The further question is submitted whether the Governor General in Council has power to make the declarations or remedial orders asked for in the memorials or petitions, or has any other jurisdiction in the premises. Their lordships have decided that the Governor General in

Council has jurisdiction, and that the appeal is well founded, but the particular course to be pursued must be determined by the authorities to whom it has been committed by the statute. It is not for this tribunal to intimate the precise steps to be taken. Their general character is sufficiently defined by the 3rd subsection of section 22 of the Manitoba Act.

It then goes on, "It is certainly not essential that the statutes," &c., as I have quoted. When the hon. gentleman reads these words and looks at the judgment again, I think he will admit that he has fallen into an error, because I do not think it is possible to have anything much clearer than these words as to what is to be done here, and as to what is to be done in Manitoba. The truth is that the Government are going altogether beyond what even the widest interpretation can be covered by the words of the judgment, beyond what is in their power to do. For my own part, I have always held, and still hold, that these words were not intended as an instruction as to what should be done here; they were merely words expressing the opinion of the court on the question of law.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If the hon. gentleman will allow me, I would like to move that the committee rise and report progress, and ask leave to sit again. It is just on the hour of twelve.

Motion agreed to, and committee rose and reported progress.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I understand that the hon. gentleman intends to proceed with the Bill at once on the opening of the House on Saturday.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes; and to meet the views of the hon. gentlemen opposite, and especially of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), I hope we shall meet at ten o'clock, ready to do a substantial day's work.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I should like to ask the Minister who is acting for the Minister of Justice, whether he could let some of the members who take an interest in the details of the Bill, have copies of the statutes of Manitoba, which, I understand, have been printed in pamphlet form.

Mr. McCARTHY. They have not only printed the revised statutes, but the new law which will form a considerable item of discussion, and copies can be obtained. I happen to have a copy, and it is very convenient. The law my hon. friend from West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) referred to was the law of 1890. That has been revised and amended.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) They would greatly facilitate discussion.

Mr. DALY. I fancy the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) and the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) are referring to different things. The hon. member for Queen's, I understand, spoke of the Acts prior to 1890. If there are copies to be had I will get them and give them to the members especially interested, particularly the legal gentlemen of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 12 o'clock (midnight).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

SATURDAY, 4th April, 1896.

Morning Sitting.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Ten o'clock, a.m.

PRAYERS.

OMISSION FROM VOTES AND PROCEEDINGS.

Mr. EDGAR. Before the Government notices of motions are taken up, I wish to bring up a subject which is a matter of privilege, in connection with the Votes and Proceedings of the last sitting of the House, and to which I would like to draw your attention for a few minutes. I do not think the Votes and Proceedings, as they are in our hands to-day, correctly show the proceedings of the House on Thursday last. A motion was made by the leader of the House, as appears in full in "Hansard." There is no dispute whatever about the fact that that motion was made by the leader of the House, it was placed in your hands, and put to the House; and that motion was dealt with in some way, of course. After it became a question, having been put from the Chair and debated, I contend that that motion should appear on the Votes and Proceedings of that day in some way or other, that it should not be ignored. What is very clear on that point, I find in Bourinot, on page 216. The clerk is to make true entries, remembrances, and journals of the things done and passed in the House of Commons. These are to be looked over and approved and signed by Mr. Speaker, as has been done in this case. I find, also, at page 369 of Bourinot, that:

> No motion is regularly before the House until it has been read, or in Parliamentary language, proposed from the Chair, when it becomes a question. When the House is in this way formally seized of the question, it may be debated——

As this one was, Mr. Speaker.

> ——amended, superseded, resolved in the affirmative, or passed in the negative, as the House may decide.

Now, Sir, I would like the Votes and Proceedings to show what the nature of that motion was. Bourinot goes on

> If a motion be out of order, the Speaker will call attention to the irregularity, and refuse to put it to the House under the 37th Rule.

That rule is this :

> Whenever the Speaker is of the opinion that a motion offered to the House is contrary to the rules and privileges of Parliament, he shall apprise the House thereof immediately, before putting the question thereon, and quote the rule or authority applicable to the case.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt whatever that you put the motion to the House before your attention was called to the irregularity of that motion ; therefore, it was a motion before this House. Well, how could that be withdrawn or disposed of ? Turning to page 370 of Bourinot, we find that :

> Motions are frequently proposed and then withdrawn, but this can be done under the 31st Rule of the Commons only by leave of the House, such leave being granted without any negative voice.

Now, Sir, that was not done in this case ; that motion was not withdrawn by leave of the House, leave was not granted, if it were asked :

> The motion, when proposed from the Chair, must appear in the Journals as withdrawn with the leave of the House.

Mr. DAVIN. The Journals ?

Mr. EDGAR. The Votes and Proceedings are the duplicates of the Journals. The Journals are not yet ready, but the Journals, by the rules of Parliament, are duplicates of the Votes and Proceedings.

Mr. DAVIN. No, they are not.

Mr. EDGAR. I am raising a question of the Votes and Proceedings that we have before us ; I cannot raise that question as to the Journals before we have the Journals. What I contend, Mr. Speaker, is that our Journals should set forth the facts directly, and that we should know whether it is possible to have a motion such as Sir Charles Tupper moved, ignored altogether on our Votes and Proceedings. This is the motion he moved :

> Sir Charles Tupper moved that for the remainder of this session the House shall sit on Saturday.

The Votes and Proceedings say that :

> Sir Charles Tupper moved that after Monday next, for the remainder of the session, the House shall sit on Saturday.

We know that notice had been given of the one that appears on the Votes and Proceedings, but notice had not been given of the other. However, that is not the point. I do not want to go back on these questions, only I would like to have the Votes and Proceedings a correct transcript of the business of the House ; also, to have it understood whether a resolution which has been moved by a member of the House, and put from the Chair, can disappear from the Votes and Proceedings, and no record made thereof.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question that has been raised by the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) is to whether a motion which I declared out of order, and one that could not be put as not being in accordance with the notice that had been given, should appear upon our Journals. I have not examined this question very carefully, but my recollection is that questions of that kind do not appear upon the Journals. The motion, it will be understood was not withdrawn, it was ruled out of order. Properly speaking, as I stated the other day, I should have declared the motion out of order when it was placed in my hands, but I had improperly, perhaps, assumed that the House would agree to have the motion put in the amended form. The moment the question was raised, I ruled the motion out of order ; and, consequently, it seems to me that under our procedure, that motion should not appear upon the Votes and Proceedings. It was not a motion that was withdrawn by leave of the House, but a motion that the Speaker declared out of order, and not in accordance with the notice that has been placed upon the Order paper.

Mr. CHARLTON. The facts of the case, as I remember them, are as follows :—The leader of the House put this motion in a garbled form, not in the form in which it appeared upon the Order paper. The motion made by the leader of the House in this garbled form, omitting the words, "after Monday next," was placed in your hands, and by you was put to the House. It being put to the House by Mr. Speaker, I rose in my place and called the attention of the House to the fact that you had put a motion to the House, moved by the leader of the House, that did not appear upon the Order paper, and I challenged the propriety of the motion. Now, I think if a motion is made by the leader of the House, if that motion passes to the hands of the Speaker, and by the Speaker is put to the House, and then the motion is challenged on the ground that it is not in accordance with the motion upon the Order paper, certainly some record of that proceeding should appear. There was evidently some intention on the part of the leader of the House in dropping those words, it could not have been done unintentionally. The leader of the House, no doubt, was aware of the fact that this motion, as it stood upon the Order paper, if put would preclude this House from sitting upon the day upon which we are sitting now, the following Saturday ; and for that reason, the motion was so garbled, and came very near slipping through. Now, the proceeding was in the highest degree irregular ; it betrayed a disposition, at least it would lead to the suspicion, that there might have been a disposition on the part of the Government to steal an advantage, which should not have been stolen in this way.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. CHARLTON. Well, he would have obtained an advantage. I withdraw the word "stolen," and substitute the word, "obtained." He would have obtained an advantage in having the motion put this way that he would not have been entitled to obtain if the motion had been put as it appeared on the paper. The whole proceeding was irregular, and somewhat of the character of the proceeding when a telegram was read in this House, and the essential part of it left out. I think we should have some record of this proceeding.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order. I submit that the hon. gentleman is entirely out of order. This question has been raised, you have given your decision upon it, and it is disposed of. The hon. gentleman can appeal from the decisions of the Chair, if he chooses: but it is entirely out of order to proceed with the discussion of a question against Mr. Speaker's ruling.

Mr. McCARTHY. It is not a question of order, as I understand it. An hon. gentleman has drawn attention to what he considers to be an omission in our minutes. I do not understand that that was brought up as a question of order, but as a question of privilege, and that what you, Mr. Speaker, have stated was your own personal impression with respect to the question of practice, as to what would or should not appeal in our minutes. I did not, and do not, understand that this is to be treated as a question of order. Certainly, I desire to say a word with respect to it: I do not want to interrupt my hon. friend, but simply to point out that it is not a question of order.

Mr. SPEAKER. Government orders.

Mr. McCARTHY. I do not understand, Mr. Speaker, whether you have ruled that this is a question of order. I desire to express my opinion on that point. I have already pointed out that, in my opinion, it is not a question of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Chair.

Mr. McCARTHY. I can put myself in order.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. gentleman raises a question of privilege, he must make a motion of some kind.

Mr. CHARLTON. As regards the hon. member for Simcoe and myself, I simply kept my seat to allow my hon. friend to proceed.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MULOCK. Coercion.

Mr. FOSTER. Obstruction.

Mr. SPEAKER. There is nothing before the Chair at the present moment. If any question of privilege is to be raised, a motion must be made. If it is a question of order and procedure, I have already expressed my opinion on it.

Mr. CHARLTON. I will move that it is an infringement of the privileges of this House that the Votes and Proceedings should be garbled in order to conceal from the public the character of a motion moved by the leader of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. Let the hon. member put his motion in writing.

Mr. FOSTER. Hon. gentlemen are starting out well. This is the result of Good Friday's devotions.

Mr. CHARLTON. I now move:

> That the Votes and Proceedings should correctly show the proceedings and transactions of the House.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. The hon. gentleman has spoken already on the question, and so he is precluded from moving the motion. I raise that point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The point of order is not well taken.

Mr. McCARTHY. What I desired to say was this, that while I am not competent to quarrel with you, Mr. Speaker, or attempt to differ with you on a point of practice, still, as you have merely given your recollection of it, I venture to think it cannot be in accordance with practice that when a motion or amendment is moved and that motion is put in the hands of the Speaker, the fact with respect to it should not appear on the minutes. We might have been debating that motion all Wednesday, and might have thrown it over only during the last few moments before the House rose, and if the opinion expressed by the Chair is correct, then it would follow that the minutes should show that we met at such an hour, three o'clock, in the afternoon, and adjourned at such an hour in the evening, and that no proceedings at all had taken place, that nothing had been done. It is a fact that these minutes are not correct. It is a fact that the leader of the House did, on Thursday last, make a motion, which was put from the Chair, which was discussed, and as to which a point of order was taken. You, Mr. Speaker, ruled in favour of the point of order, and the motion was therefore declared to be out of order. That circumstance, in my humble opinion, should appear upon the minutes, and it is well that we should know exactly what the practice is, and therefore, I think, it is important that attention should be called to this matter.

Mr. SPEAKER. Allow me to read the motion again. Mr. Charlton moves, seconded by Mr. Mulock:

That the Votes and Proceedings should correctly show the proceedings and transactions of the House.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I rise for the purpose of moving, in amendment :

That all the words after the word "That" in the main motion be struck out, and the following words added instead thereof :—" the House do now proceed to the Orders of the Day."

Mr. EDGAR. I think it is rather extraordinary that the leader of the House should oppose such a thoroughly correct resolution as that moved by the hon. member for North Norfolk. Does the leader of the House mean to say that the Votes and Proceedings should not correctly show the proceedings that have taken place ?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to answer that question ?

Mr. EDGAR. Certainly.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Then I say that if an hon. member moves, for the purpose of preventing the business of the House, that the sun rises in the east, it is perfectly proper for the leader of the House to move that the House proceed to consider the Orders of the Day.

Mr. EDGAR. I think the leader of the House has moved a motion which affords an exceedingly large field for discussion. If hon. members desire to discuss it, and he has moved a motion which affords just as large a field for discussion as a motion to adjourn the House. I think facilities for discussion, or for delaying important business, as the leader of the House chooses to put it, have been afforded to by the motion which the hon. gentleman has moved.

Mr. FOSTER. Which you deplore.

Mr. EDGAR. I cannot help thinking that the Votes and Proceedings of Thursday do not correctly state what was done in this House. I should like to know whether the First Minister himself will say that he did not move a different motion from that which appears in the Votes and Proceedings ? I should like to know from the First Minister himself whether he will say that the motion was ruled out of order before it was put to the House, and that the practice, as laid down, is not that when a motion is put before the House it becomes the question before the House. If the Votes and Proceedings are not correct, we have no certainty at all of the business of the House being properly recorded. I admit, Sir, that you did not rule this out of order before you put it to the House. Then, Sir, I think you will find that the practice of this House has been, that when it has not been ruled out of order it becomes a question which is to be disposed of and recorded. If you rule it out of order afterwards, it is a question which, the moment it is put from the Chair, should appear on the Journals.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think on the whole it would be better for the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) to withdraw his amendment, and I will ask my hon. friend (Mr. Charlton) to withdraw his motion. I am sure my hon. friend (Mr. Charlton) did not make the motion for the purpose of obstruction, but for the purpose he stated. At the same time, I agree with the leader of the House that it would be an unfortunate thing if we were dragged at this hour of the morning into a debate which might last several hours.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. My only object is to be able to proceed with the business of the House, and I would be most happy to withdraw the amendment if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) withdraws his motion.

Mr. CHARLTON. Of course I have no desire to obstruct the business of this House, and I beg at this moment to assert that the hon. leader of the House in making that assertion in regard to me was quite mistaken. The purport of my motion is that the proceedings of this House should be faithfully recorded, and any member who thinks the record of the proceedings should be garbled will vote against my motion. When this matter was brought under discussion on Thursday, I felt called upon to criticise the leader of the House for moving a motion that was not on the Order paper. I am within my rights as a member of Parliament, and I was discharging my duties to the country, in moving that the proceedings of this House should be faithfully recorded. There should be no shadow of an opportunity to charge that there has been a manipulation of the records of the House, and in that sense I offer this motion. I repudiate the assertion made by the leader of the House that my motion was made for the purpose of delaying the proceedings of the House. My motion is one which would receive the assent of the House, but nevertheless as I have been requested to withdraw the motion by my hon. friend (Sir Richard Cartwright) I am quite willing to do so.

Mr. SPROULE. Let the motion be disposed of.

Mr. SPEAKER. Is it the pleasure of the House that the Secretary of State shall have leave to withdraw the amendment ?

Mr. McCARTHY. Would it not be better to make the practice right ? I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that we pass some rule, that on your investigation of the subject the Minutes may be corrected. It does appear to me that our Votes and Proceedings should record what has taken place, and it is perfectly proper that the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) should call attention to the matter. I would submit that the proper thing to do would be to pass a resolution something to this effect :

That the Votes and Proceedings of Thursday last be corrected by inserting, that Sir Charles Tupper moved that on and after Monday next, and for the remainder of the session, etc., which, on objection of order being made, was ruled out of order, and if on investigation of Mr. Speaker, the practice requires the insertion thereof.

Mr. SPEAKER. That amendment cannot be put.

Mr. McCARTHY. It is germane to the original motion.

Mr. SPEAKER. No amendment can be made to a motion for proceeding to the Orders of the Day.

Mr. McCARTHY. Then I think it better to let the motion of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) be put.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) My hon. friend who is leading the House in the absence of Mr. Laurier, advises a certain course to be taken, and I think it should be adopted. I do not see any good that is going to be obtained by pressing the motion.

Mr. MULOCK. I seconded the motion of my hon. friend (Mr. Charlton). The way the matter presents itself to my mind is this: The Secretary of State on Thursday last made a motion which you, Mr. Speaker, ruled out of order, and then, as very frequently happens, you took up the original motion and assumed it as being moved. I have frequently noticed in this House that the Chair assumes that motions are made which are not formally made, but which by common consent are supposed to be made. In this case, I think Mr. Speaker was simply endeavouring to facilitate the business of the House. It is a mere question of fact as to what occurred, and unless we import into the Votes and Proceedings some statement of fact, there is nothing to show that the records are incorrect.

Mr. SPEAKER. Is it the pleasure of the House that the Secretary of State have leave to withdraw his amendment?

Mr. McCARTHY. I do not assent, Mr. Speaker.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

Amendment agreed to.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentlemen had better now claim that the House is unanimously in favour of the Remedial Bill.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. We claim, if the hon. gentleman will allow me to say so, that the House is determined to put an end to unwarrantable obstruction.

Mr. CHARLTON. Mr. Speaker.——

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. The order is to proceed with the Order of the Day.

THE REMEDIAL ACT (MANITOBA).

House again resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 58) the Remedial Act (Manitoba).

(In the Committee.)

On section 4, subsection "a,"

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. As representing the non-legal element of this House, I may, perhaps, be pardoned, for asking for a little information. I would like to understand, from the hon. gentleman who is supplying the place of the Minister of Justice, how we are going to reconcile this clause with subsection 2 of section 3, which provides that the Department of Education may make, from time to time, such regulations as they may think fit for the general organization of the separate schools. Then you proceed, by this clause, so far as I can judge, to hand everything pretty much over to the Board of Education. It appears to me that you are creating two distinct authorities, and providing the opportunity for any imaginable quantity of contradiction and litigation. Prima facie, it appears to me that a distinct conflict of authority is likely to be caused here. I do not understand how you can give the Department of Education power to make regulations for the general organization, and, at the same time, withdraw all these powers. Or, what power do you leave to the Department of Education ?

Mr. DALY. As I explained previously to the House, under the law as it stood prior to 1890, there was a Board of Education composed of a certain number of Protestants and a certain number of Roman Catholics. That general board was vested with authority to make regulations for the general organization of separate schools. The board was divided into two sections, the Roman Catholic and the Protestant, and each of these sections was vested with certain powers for carrying out the details of the organization under the respective sections. The powers given here to the Department of Education are identical with the powers given to the general Board of Education prior in 1890. The words " general organization " means the organization of all the schools, and the specific powers given to the Board of Education created by this Act are powers that were given to the Roman Catholic section of the board prior to 1890. The words " general organization " include general supervision of all matters pertaining to the schools, outside of the specific matters which are given to the Board of Education, formed by this Act. The wording of subsection 2 of section 3 is identical with the wording in the Act of 1888, which provided that " the board shall, from time to time, make such regulations as they may think fit for the general organization of common schools." By the Act of 1890, the Department of Education was vested with the general powers which were formerly held by the general Board of Education, and our desire is to vest in the present Board of Education the same powers held by the old board, as a whole.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I asked the hon. member, on Thursday night, if he would be able to give me the statutes of Manitoba in an accesible and useful form. I think he said he would try.

Mr. DALY. I have given instructions to have them printed, and hope to have them

Mr. O'BRIEN. The whole gist of this matter seems to rest in two words, found in subsection 2 of section 3, and the clause now under discussion. The Department of Education, that is, I presume, the supreme authority in Manitoba in matters of education, is entitled to make regulations for the general organization of schools. By adopting subsection 2 of section 3, we have invested that department with the general organization of the separate schools. Now, we propose to give to another board, a totally different authority, the right to make regulations for the general government of the separate schools. This is a very fine distinction when you come to the practical working out of any institution ; and I would like to call the attention of those hon. members who wish to see this measure made a workable one, to the sort of management we make exception to exist in these circumstances. We at once set up a means for a conflict of authority which must necessarily tend to the absolute failure of the system—at any rate, to such conflicts of authority, and such internal disagreements as must prevent the separate schools from ever being efficiently working. I would like to call the attention of the committee to another feature. This Department of Education is a department of the government of Manitoba, which is opposed to the establishment of these separate schools, and the Board of Education is a body of a total different character. The sole qualification for members of that board is that they are to be members of the Roman Catholic Church. Now, I presume that hon. gentlemen who are supporting this Bill desire to have a system of schools superior to that which existed prior to 1890 ; I presume they desire to have an efficient system. I cannot imagine that hon. members of this House, especially those who have joined with gentlemen in the province of Quebec, such as the Hon. Mr. Masson and others, who have stated publicly and openly that the system of education in that province was not satisfactory—I cannot imagine that those hon. gentlemen desire to have any other than an efficient system of education adopted for Manitoba. How can they expect any satisfactory results from a system which is placed under the control of such a board of education, especially when that board is to be under the control of a department of a totally different character? We have these extraordinary proposals. In the first place, we have the Department of Education, which is a department of a government opposed to any system of separate schools, on principle, and on the ground of experience, alleging that that system which was in force prior to 1890, and which we are practically now asked to re-establish, was a failure—that it did not answer the purpose of giving such a practical secular education as would fit those who attended those schools to take their part with Her Majesty's other subjects in Manitoba. The Board of Education is a government, and under its control. Of the advisory board, four members are appointed by the government, so that practically the government control that board of education whether you allude to the functions of the advisory board or the Department of Education as a whole. You then propose that the Lieutenant-Governor, by the advice of his executive, shall appoint the Board of Education provided for in this Bill, the sole qualification for the membership of which being the profession of the Roman Catholic faith.

Mr. FREMONT. What is the qualification to be a member of the advisory board?

Mr. O'BRIEN. Three members of that board are elected by persons entirely independent of the Government.

Mr. FREMONT. The hon. member insisted on the fact that the sole qualification of a member of the Board of Education is that he should be a Roman Catholic. There is no qualification at all required to be a member of the advisory board. A part of them are appointed by the Government, and the other portion are elected, but there is no qualification at all required for either.

Mr. O'BRIEN. That is perfectly true, but there is this important distinction, that the government of Manitoba will only appoint to the advisory board such men as they are quite satisfied will carry out the system of education to which the Government is pledged.

Mr. FREMONT. Will they not do the same when they appoint members of the Board of Education?

Mr. O'BRIEN. In appointing members of that board, they are appointing persons to control a system which they do not wish to succeed, whereas in the other case they are appointing men to carry out a system devised by themselves, and which they are anxious to succeed.

Mr. POWELL. Does the hon. gentleman not see that section 3 is essentially connected with section 74. First, it is to provide the information necessary for giving provincial aid to the schools, and that if the Manitoba government do not provide the funds to carry out the Act, it is immaterial whether the regulations are made or not. Second, it is to determine the number of schools or departments in schools, so that the government can have some guarantee that the schools will not be overcrowded, and the provincial moneys wasted.

Mr. O'BRIEN. As far as the money is concerned, that is a totally different question, to which I shall call the attention of the committee at another branch of the subject. I am calling attention to the character of the body which is to administer that system of separate schools. If the Manitoba government choose, and we have heard so much charged against that government that we can almost admit them to be actuated by any kind of motive, they can prevent the system of separate schools being successful by appointing to their control persons who are ignorant or unwilling to see them properly carried out, and you will have an inefficient system of schools, or a system handed over to the control of the ecclesiastical authorities, which will be a mere repetition of what happened prior to 1890. I would like to call the attention of the committee to a system of separate schools which has been productive of satisfactory results, but that was under a system of management entirely different from what is proposed in Manitoba. We do not find in Ontario that the control of separate schools is handed over to a board, the membership of which is based simply on the qualification of their being Roman Catholics, but we find that the Ontario government make themselves in every sense responsible for the efficiency of these schools. All that they permit is that there shall be separate school trustees in the different localities, but the control and management of the schools is entirely in the hands of the Department of Education, which is just as much responsible for the efficiency of the separate schools as of the public schools. Then in the advisory board, which regulates matters connected with the public schools of Manitoba, the teachers have a voice, but in this Board of Education, provided by this Bill, they have none. In Ontario, the teachers of separate schools are subjected to the same examination and qualification as those of the public schools, and those schools, so far as secular education is concerned, are practically in the hands of men who are educationists by profession, whose whole position in life is dependent on the efficient carrying out of the schools, and who therefore have every qualification and incentive for making these schools efficient. When we contrast that with the system in Manitoba is it possible to expect that the same results can be arrived at in the one case as in the other? The hon. gentleman said something about expense. Now, in this very first clause, subsection (a), here is a Board of Education which is——

> To have under its control and management the separate schools and to make from time to time such regulations as they may be deemed fit for their general government and discipline and the carrying out of the provisions of this Act.

How is it possible for any board to carry out the provisions of an Act such as this when there is not a single cent provided to meet the expenses of such a proposition? Here we are asked to establish a board of education, but at the same time we make their work ineffective by failing to provide for even the first steps of their work. When we began to discuss this Bill the opinion of a very eminent authority upon education was quoted, not less a person than Sir William Dawson. Well, Sir, we have the authority of one who may even be more appropriately quoted on the subject of education in Manitoba, a gentleman whose name is known to everybody in this country, Principal Grant. In the beginning of his investigation of separate schools Principal Grant showed that he was not opposed to such a system as would bring about practical results. But he has taken this Bill into consideration, and has given his opinion upon its various features. And the very first subject that he calls attention to in reference to this Bill that we are called upon to force through at a time when, as has been said, we have no constitutional authority to discuss it at all, is that there is no provision for carrying it into effect. You establish a board, but where are they to meet—for there is no provision for renting an office. Are they to meet on a street corner ? Fancy these nine gentlemen, charged with public duties, meeting on a street corner, or in some private room or office. At the very outset they will require stationery, but there is no money to buy it. They will want somebody to record their proceedings, but there is no money to pay him. Subsequently, they are to appoint a superintendent. Is he to give his services for nothing ? I ask hon. gentlemen who wish an efficient system of separate schools, what is the use of spending time establishing a board when they are deprived of the means to take the very first step in carrying out their duties ? Of course, I make no secret of my hostility to the measure in every sense ; but I am perfectly justified, now that we are in committee on the Bill, in asking those gentlemen who do favour the Bill, how they propose to make it effective. Could a greater objection be shown in the case of any Bill than to prove that no means are provided for carrying it out ? It seems to me to cast a shade of suspicion over the bona fides of the Government in introducing such a measure. Surely the hon. gentleman who has charge of the Bill cannot overlook such a patent objection, which meets us at the very outset. We cannot take up a single clause or even subsection of the Bill in which this objection does not face us. So I say it is the duty of those who wish to make the Bill effective to ascertain from the Minister what means are to be taken to make it effective. What is the use of our passing a Bill when it cannot be carried out ? There can be only one object on the part of the Administration, and that is to carry out a pledge in return for which they look for political support at the next elections, irrespective of the benefits that may accrue to those in whose interest the measure is supposed to be passed. This is keeping the promise in the letter but breaking it in the spirit. It shows that the Government are not sincere in their pretended effort to give those people what they ask for. And so far as those who have accepted this Bill as something which afford satisfactory results, as I must assume they do, when we find that the only possible advantage they will get for it is the relief of ratepayers from the payment of taxes, we must come to the conclusion that, as some of them already said, I believe, they accepted it as a stepping stone to further advantages in procuring, either from this Parliament or from the government of Manitoba, something more commensurate with what they have in view. If that is the case, so far from this Bill settling this question in Manitoba or the Dominion, it is simply a ground work for further agitation, and shows how futile is the attempt of the Government. It justifies even those who want a really effective measure in opposing the present Bill as something false and hollow, which confers no advantage and will only cause further agitation. When we have two conflicting authorities, one representing the government of Manitoba opposed to the Bill, and the other representing an authority which we must assume will make the best of it, how long will it be before conflict arises ? How long will it be before questions will arise between the Department of Education and this Separate School Board, which this Bill, so far from settling, will give rise to ? So that at the very outset you are not only met with the difficulty about the finances, but with the certainty of litigation. The Minister of the Interior endeavours to point out how carefully he is following previous legislation. Well, that does not relieve him from the difficulty. But no argument of his based upon what has gone before, can get rid of the difficulties which this Bill brings before us. He has not attempted to meet the difficulty which arises from the conflict of authority. The courts will be called upon to say how far the power of organization, which is given to the Department of Education, goes ; and they will also be called upon to say how far its powers of regulation go, which are given in this subsection. A more complete system for the production of trouble, of litigation, of agitation, of dissatisfaction to everybody concerned, can hardly be conceived, than is to be established by this Bill. It does seem to me that under these circumstances the Government are acting, not only with haste, not only without consideration, but they are guilty of something worse than carelessness, something worse than ignorance, something worse than indifference to future results ; because, they must know, however they may talk in big language about the desirability of peace, that instead of bringing peace, they are bringing a sword. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I would ask the earnest consideration of the committee to this point in particular, the conflict of authority between the sections which we have passed, and that which we are now asked to pass. Some change in the words, at any rate, some alteration in the clause, is necessary, if we are to have any possibility of agreement between these conflicting bodies.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The Minister of the Interior, perhaps, did not quite understand the question I asked him; and I must say that his explanations do not appear to me to meet the point. Here you give the Department of Education power to make such regulations as they think fit for the general organization of separate schools. Well, in the succeeding section you give the Board of Education power to have under its control and management the separate schools, and to make such regulations as may be deemed fit for their general government and discipline. Now, I do not pretend to understand the minute technical distinctions of law, but I do pretend to understand, as everybody in this House ought to understand, the English language quite as well as the gentlemen who drew this Bill. I think the committee ought to require a much more distinct explanation of what power the Department of Education has, under this power to make regulations for general organization. I cannot see, if you give the Board of Education power to control and manage separate schools, and power to make regulations for their general government and discipline, how you can avoid a conflict with the Department of Education.

Mr. POWELL. The first is to constitute the school, and the second is to run it after it is constituted.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not think these words bear that signification. We must look to these words as they stand. They give a broad power to the Department of Education. Let the hon. gentleman, if he likes, state what power the Department of Education has left to them under the clause that they may make such regulations as they may think fit for the general organization. After the Board of Education is given the control and management of the separate schools, and power to make regulations for their government and discipline, what power is then left? I should like to have a statement from the hon. gentleman what power remains with the Department of Education.

Mr. POWELL. My answer is this: As to what number of pupils constitute a school, as to the number of departments there shall be in the school, these are matters of organization and constitution of the school. Then, after you have your school constituted, the general control and management of that school so constituted, and the regulations that shall govern that school that has been constituted by the general board—these are matters for the local board, and fall under the fourth section.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Supposing that the general direction and organization are not complied with by the local management, what is the jurisdiction?

Mr. POWELL. Then that raises another point as to whether they are being complied with or not. I think that these two subsections 1 and 2 of section 3, look entirely to, and contemplate, section 74. It does not make any difference whether these are complied with or not. As to the disposition of the provincial grants that go to the teachers, that is a matter for the government of Manitoba, if they are going to give the money, if not, then it is a matter entirely immaterial whether the directions of section 3 are complied with or not.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Will the hon. gentleman state again, because I did not quite follow him, what he holds to be the powers of the Board of Education for the general organization? He said that he thought the Department of Education could fix the number of scholars. I do not think it can; I think that is attended to elsewhere.

Mr. FOSTER. That is the division of scholars into rooms, into departments. If they have a teacher for each department, that teacher gets a share of the government money. That is something under the control of the provincial authority.

Mr. BRODEUR. If the hon. member is correct, I think it would put the separate schools in a very bad position. He maintains that the powers, given in section 3, provide for the organization of separate schools. Well, if the organization of the separate schools is put in the hands of the provincial government, suppose the provincial government does not act, and does not organize them, then there would be no separate schools.

Mr. POWELL. It does not make any difference whether they do or not. If they do not, then the trustees are to make the best arrangement they can.

Mr. BRODEUR. I understand the position of the hon. gentleman to be that the powers given in section 3 are for the organization of the schools, and the powers given in section 4 are for the administration of those separate schools after they have been formed. Then, suppose the provincial government does not organize the schools, in what position would they be? There would be no organization, there would be no separate schools. This clause should be struck out, because there would be a conflict between the two powers. The Department of Education might make some organization, and the separate school board might also make some by-laws which would conflict with the organization made by the department. I think it would be much better to strike off that clause of section 3. The definition just given by the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) furnishes a reason for our contention that it would be very dangerous to put in that clause.

Mr. McCARTHY. I think it would be satisfactory if we got some more definite explanation from the gentleman who has charge of the Bill than we have already had from the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell), who is the only member of the committee that has attempted to define the distinction between the general regulations, or regulations for the general organization, and the regulations for the general management. The hon. member's statement was that the Department of Education would have, under subsection 2 of section 3, which we have already passed, power to say how many pupils should constitute a school. I think he afterwards rather receded from that, but that is what he first stated.

Mr. POWELL. I did not intend to say that.

Mr. McCARTHY. The subsequent part of the Act regulates what the number of pupils may be.

Mr. POWELL. As the minimum.

Mr. McCARTHY. I do not think there is any danger of the maximum ever being reached. The next thing my hon. friend said—because I desire to treat this matter as my hon. friend has treated it, as an argument, and not merely in a dogmatic way—was that it applies to the number of days in the schools.

Mr. POWELL. Among other things.

Mr. McCARTHY. That is all the hon. gentleman stated. I have endeavoured to conceive what is could mean, if we are giving effect to clause 4, which we are now dealing with. Well, suppose we say the regulation of the number of days. Now, Mr. Chairman, what is the Department of Education? It is well that we should grasp that fact clearly, first. The Department of Education is a department of government, a department of the government of the province, as is the Department of Crown Lands and the Department of Public Works. Are we merely going to give this department of state the power to say how many departments there shall be in the schools. What is a department in a school? That is not a term of universal meaning. What we have avoided here is the possibility of having two contradictory clauses passed. We have already passed clause 3. We are not at liberty to revise it, or, without unanimous consent, to go back and reconsider it. We have already, by clause 3, said that this department of state shall have power to make regulations, such regulations as they may think fit for the general organization of separate schools. We have to reconcile clause 3 with the subsequent clauses of the Bill, and by subsequent clauses, power to constitute schools is given to the ratepayers, and a certain number of ratepayers can form themselves into a school section. The trustees are to be given very wide powers under section 37, almost unlimited powers, as regards the management of the schools. That being so, subsection 2 of section 3 is to be read with respect to the powers conferred on the ratepayers, on the school trustees, and what has been specially and particularly delegated to those different functionaries is, as it were, withdrawn from the general term, general organization of schools. We are now dealing with subsection "a," which provides that it shall be the duty of the Board of Education having under its control and management the separate schools, to make, from time to time, regulations for their general government. What is the difference between general organization and general government. Surely general organization covers everything. If we pass subsection "a," we are passing contradictory sections. The Minister of the Interior, who has charge of the Bill, in the absence of the Minister of Justice, justifies this section by declaring that it appears in the original statute. That is not always a good reason, because we find, in other parts of the same clause, that words are introduced, I do not know that any are omitted, in the statute of Manitoba. What we are doing now is to pass a law which is to be put in force in a province in regard to the question on which there is great difference of opinion, and in regard to which Act very strict construction will be given. So long as everything worked along harmoniously, no difficulties arose. I am not able to see what the whole board had to do, or ever did. I should like to hear from the hon. Minister what the general board, which is now superseded by the Department of Education, did and performed, because that would enable hon. members to see what practical distinction there is between the powers conferred by section 3 and section 4. In the original statute, as amended up to 1884, the board had power to make, from time to time, such regulations as they might think proper for the general organization of the common schools. Section 5 provided that the board should resolve itself into two sections, one consisting of Protestant and the other of Roman Catholic members thereof, and it should be the duty of each section to have schools under their control and management. If we knew what, in practice, the Board of Education did, as distinguished from what the Protestant and Catholic sections did, as by section 5 constituted, we could better understand what was the meaning of section 3. Before we go further, because it is our duty to try and make this a workable Act, the committee had better hear what the Minister of the Interior has to say on this point.

Mr. DALY. So far as my inquiries go, I cannot find that they ever did anything.

Mr. McCARTHY. That is what I thought.

Mr. DALY. This power was vested in the whole board as a check and safeguard in the event of any dispute arising between the two sections, when the general board could take up the question and decide it. I think it was a nullity. I cannot find a record of any action taken by the general board under the provisions of this section, and the sole reason for the section being here is, that Mr. Ewart, representing the minority, said it should remain here for legal reasons, and that, at all events, no harm could come from it. If, in the conduct of the schools, an attempt was made to go beyond what was provided, this section would give the Department of Education the opportunity of taking part in the conduct of the schools, and carrying out the provisions of the Act. I have no further explanation to give. I cannot find that the whole board acted under the old law.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I asked the hon. gentleman a question on Thursday evening, and in doing so I read from Mr. Dubuc's construction of the old Act. The hon. Minister said that the statement I read was not strictly accurate.

Mr. DALY. I said it was a summarization.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I understood the hon. gentleman to indicate that it was not correct. The hon. gentleman read from the old Act, which gave the Board of Education the same power as section 3. I do not find that in "Hansard." I find that part of the hon. gentleman's statement in which he referred to giving the Roman Catholic section of the board the powers conferred under section 4. However, I understood the hon. gentleman also to point out that the old Act of 1881 gave the general board the powers that by section 2, are vested in the Department of Education.

Mr. DALY. Yes, I read that section. It says :—

> It shall be the duty of the board to make from time to time such regulations as they may think fit for the general organization of the Common schools.

You will find that in the Act of 1881, and the words are identical with that Act.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I just wished to know the fact.

Mr. McCARTHY. We are indebted to the hon. member for his statement, that this paragraph, so far as the old system is concerned, was not deemed to be operative. But we must remember that we are clothing, not a board of education, not a body constituted by Government, which was to be divided into two sections ; but we have undertaken to clothe the government of Manitoba itself with the power of the organization of the separate school system of Manitoba. That being so, it is quite clear, with regard being had to the different position occupied, between the Government and the board—which, in fact, at once divided itself into two sections—that whatever power is conferred by subsection 2, will be exercised by the Government. And those general words authorizing the Government to do all that is to be done, and which is not provided for by the Act, render it possible that we will be only stultifying ourselves and creating difficulties in Manitoba, if we go on to confer somewhat similar powers upon another body. The Government may say : we propose to organize those schools ; we propose to pass regulations for the control and management of them, and the Board of Education constituted may say, we propose to do so ; and the trustees and the teachers will be put in the unfortunate position of not knowing which particular regulation they are to obey. It seems to me, that we had better pass over clause 4. We have given to the Government the power to make these rules and we had better leave it there. I am the more persuaded that that is the proper course to take, because there is no reason whatever, as my hon. friend from Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) has clearly demonstrated, why the Government should not have this general control, and yet the schools be separate. We are not called upon slavishly to follow the language of the old statutes, unless, indeed, we are compelled to do so by the terms of the remedial order. Certainly, the lords of the Privy Council did not think so. They said, as was read by my hon. friend from Bruce (Mr. McNeill) to the committee on Thursday night, and which I will trouble the committee to listen to again. They thought that the Government, who are called upon to pass the remedial order, upon which rests our jurisdiction, are not called upon to re-enact, or to direct the re-enactment of the old law and the legislation of the old system ; but rather, it would be their duty to recognize what had been done by the province, and to graft upon the system of the province whatever was necessary to constitute the separate schools for which the minority were praying. We know as a matter of fact, that in practice that can be done, because in the province from which I came, where a separate school system has been in existence for longer than thirty years—but in efficient existence for thirty years—there is no dual system. There is no separate school board and public school board. There is but the one controlling body over both systems, and the divergence takes place in the districts and in the localities, and not in the creation of two systems. That is evidently what Lord Herschell thought when he used this language :

> The further question is submitted whether the Governor General in Council has power to make the declarations or remedial orders asked for in the memorials or petitions, or has any other jurisdiction in the premises.

What do their lordships say to that ?

> Their lordships have decided that the Governor General in Council has jurisdiction, and that the appeal is well founded.

They do not pretend to dictate to the Governor in Council. They had no jurisdiction to do so, much less to dictate to this Parliament. But what their lordships said was :

> The particular course to be pursued must be determined by the authorities to whom it has been committed by the statutes.

Namely, the Governor General in Council. He was to determine the particular course, but he added the valuable words, for the information, and for what they are worth, but they did not bind the Governor General and do not bind us :

> Their general character is sufficiently defined by the 3rd subsection of section 22 of the Manitoba Act.

When we go to that section we find their general character ; and what are the words of that section. I do not remember the exact language, but the purport of the words is : That the Governor General in Council, upon an appeal, may consider the appeal and may make such order upon that, and with reference to the alleged grievance, that the Governor General in Council thinks fit. Lord Herschell added this, and it is important :

> It is certainly not essential that the statutes repealed by the Act of 1890 should be re-enacted.

Now, I put it to my hon. friend, why should he slavishly copy the precise provisions, for no other reason than that they are the precise provisions, when we are told by the highest authority that it is not necessary to do so. Surely that is plain. We are not only doing that, but we are incurring the grave risk which no other person whether in favour of the Bill or opposed to the Bill can desire, of sowing the seeds of discord and deliberately passing a section which none of us know the meaning of, which none of us are able to explain in its difference from the preceding one we have adopted, and which certainly can only be determined by an appeal to the courts. My hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) said he did not pretend to address the committee on the legal interpretation of this clause, but he merely ventured to say that he understood the English language, and I think no hon. member can say that with more justice. After all, what the courts have to do in interpreting a statute is, to interpret it according to the English language, and if the section is made plain, it does not require to go to the courts to get that done. It is when we carelessly pass conflicting sections that no two minds will agree about, that then there must be some tribunal to settle authoritatively what the proper meaning of the words are. The judges of a court of law, are, after all, only trying to put a meaning upon the section which is so ill-worded and so badly drawn—and which we in this House are responsible for when we pass it—that the lay mind is not able to say what it means. The Lord Chancellor goes on :

> The system of education embodied in the Acts of 1890 no doubt commends itself to and adequately supplies the wants of the great majority of the inhabitants of the province. All legitimate grounds of complaint would be removed if that system were supplemented——

Now, look at the careful words that were used ; leave the Act of 1890 as you find ; but supplement that, as is done in the Ontario statutes, by such provisions as will give the separate schools—modify the general Act. He adds these words :

> -supplemented by provisions which would remove the grievance upon which the appeal is founded, and were modified so far as might be necessary to give effect to these provisions.

So that if the Government were really anxious to give to the minority a redress of what they complain of as a grievance, what they ought to have done was by the remedial order to define what was necessary to supplement the general school law, and to what extent that general school law should be modified in order to give effect to these supplementary provisions. On the contrary, what has been done ? We have here a statute of forty pages, creating an absolute duality of system, instead of grafting upon the one system all that was requisite and necessary to redress what were termed the grievances of the minority. It appears to me that the Government would be well advised if they would pass over clause 4, dropping it altogether, because we have provided for it by subsection 2 of section 3. If they did, I think I could suggest some substitution which would make the Bill more workable than it is, which ought to be not only the desire but the duty of every member. If I were anxious merely to destroy what is attempted to be given here, I would say nothing about this. If I were anxious to leave this Bill in such a chaotic condition that it would be impossible to derive any benefit from it, my tongue would be silent ; but as I desire, if the Bill is to become law, to make it a workable measure as far as I can, I draw attention to the fact that we are now passing a clause which is contradictory to the one we adopted as subsection 2 of section 3.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It seems to me that the Bill has been framed on a mistaken view of the law ; and until we get a clear apprehension of the law, as it has been interpreted by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and in accordance with the legal inferences in harmony with that interpretation, we shall certainly not succeed in making a satisfactory Bill. I called the attention of the House some days ago to the fact that matters of procedure or matters of administration were not within the rights and privileges of the minority, although they might become necessary parts of a Bill to give effect to the rights and privileges of a minority. This Bill, however, starts out upon the theory that everything that formed a part of the statutes that were formely in force in Manitoba, whether relating to matters of procedure or administration, or to education, was within the rights and privileges of the minority. That is not the case; and, if I can, I desire to make clear to hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches especially, my view with regard to this matter. When we look at the British North America Act—and I refer to that because it aids us in the interpretation of the Manitoba Act—we find a subsection in the educational clause, which is not in the Manitoba Act, but which may assist us in determining what rights and privileges are created by the Manitoba Act. Subsection 2 says:

> All the powers, privileges and duties at the Union by law conferred and imposed in Upper Canada on the separate schools and school trustees of the Queen's Roman Catholic subjects, shall be and the same are hereby extended to the dissenting schools of the Queen's Protestant and Roman Catholic subjects in Quebec.

Now, hon. gentlemen will see that the intention was to create rights in respect to separate schools and school trustees. It is true, at the time that clause was enacted there was in the province of Ontario a Council of Public Instruction and a Chief Superintendent of schools. That clause did not impose on the government and legislature of the province of Quebec the duty of copying those features of the Ontario system. The minority, in the province of Quebec, whether Protestant of Roman Catholic, if the legislature gave them the same rights under the statute subsequently enacted, could not complain, because it did not create a Council of Public Instruction, and did not appoint a superintendent of schools. Subsequently, in the province of Ontario, the mode of administration was changed. A responsible Minister of Education was appointed in their place. But no one in the province of Ontario has ever contended that any right or privilege of the minority in that province has been attacked because the mode of administration is something different from what it was before. The clause that says the rights of the minority in Ontario shall be extended to Quebec, refers to school trustees and to the schools. The rights and privileges are rights and privileges in respect to education. They are rights and privileges embracing, not the whole subject of education, but those features which distinguish the separate school as a public school from the ordinary common school. Now, when you create a separate school, you do not withdraw it from public jurisdiction and public supervision. That is an important point to bear in mind. You intend that it shall receive public aid, and therefore the public have the right to see that the institution is competent to discharge those duties which the state thinks necessary it should discharge in the public interests. The state, for its own purposes, and not as a right and privilege at all, creates a board of examiners, determines what its qualifications shall be, and also appoints inspectors, not for the protection of any right or privilege of the minority, but in the interests of the state itself. This is part of constitutional government, with which the minority have nothing to do, as a right or privilege, and this is the first thing which it is important to bear in mind. Now, you have here declared by section 3 and by subsection 2 that the Department of Education may also make, from time to time, such regulations as they may think fit for the general organization of separate schools. I am not objecting to that. They possess that power and you cannot take it from them; but if they refuse to exercise it, if they refuse to take any notice of separate schools, you may create, in case that that should happen, a board to supervise and provide for the examination of teachers who could not obtain certificates from the provincial institution. Your power is simply a necessary incident, and the necessity must arise before you can exercise it at all. If the necessity does not arise, you cannot create a board and give it any jurisdiction whatever. Now, you propose here to create a board, not as an alternative to the Board of Education, but as supplementary to the Board of Education. I say you cannot create any such supplementary board. You undertake to say that it shall have the general government and discipline of the schools and carry out the provisions of this Act in that regard. Suppose the local legislature were to declare that there should be a Superintendent of Education, and that all these powers should be vested in him or a council to aid him, upon what ground or theory could you make this law operative? Can you legislate at all with a view to making your law operative? So far as I can see, you have no such authority. It is true that ordinarily, where power is given specifically to legislate upon the subject, there is power to make your legislation effective; but this power, which is given us in this matter, is a power to redress or repair the mischief done by the local legislature, and which cannot be exercised a hair's-breadth beyond the necessity that exists for that purpose. You are going beyond that necessity. It seems to me that the first thing to be borne in mind is that the administrative functions belong altogether to the local legislature. How they are going to discharge those functions, through what machinery, is a matter over which you have no jurisdiction at all. You must leave that to the discretion where it belongs; but in case the Manitoba government refuse to exercise that power, you may insert in your Bill an alternative, which is only to go into operation upon condition that the local government fails to recognize your institution altogether. It seems to me that we are going on the assumption that every power which was possessed by any board or body connected with the administration of the separate school law prior to 1890 is a right or privilege. That is not the case. You cannot exercise such administrative powers unless there is an absolute refusal to exercise them by the province itself in its own way and in accord with its own sovereign discretion.

Mr. DALY. I had not the opportunity of replying to the hon. member for North Simcoe until the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) rose, and I shall endeavour to meet the position he has taken. I understand him to reiterate the argument he made the other day, that we are endeavouring by this Bill to legislate in matters of administration, which are exclusively in the powers of the local legislature, and that these are not a right or privilege which were taken from the minority by the Act of 1890. If the hon. gentleman admits that we have the right to pass laws in relation to education, under the present circumstances, he must admit that we have the right to legislate effectively, and in legislating effectively, if we encroach upon the powers of the local legislature, we have a perfect right to do so. We have the right to legislate upon matters of insolvency and banking and commerce, and have passed Acts in this House relating to insolvency which have encroached upon the powers and rights of the local legislatures.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No.

Mr. DALY. Yes.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). In that insolvency case, the Privy Council held that procedure was a necessary part of the law and therefore we had jurisdiction.

Mr. DALY. Is not this a matter of procedure ?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Not at all.

Mr. DALY. It is a matter of procedure entirely. Under the law as it existed prior to 1890, the Roman Catholic minority enjoyed the rights which this Bill gives them, as a section of the Board of Education. Of those rights and privileges they have been deprived. Now, we have to legislate in such a way as to enable them to conduct the schools in the same way they did prior to 1890. It seems to me, under the ruling of the court in Cushing and Dupuis and that other case of Tennant and the Union Bank, there is no question that if we have the authority to legislate here in matters of education, we must legislate effectively, even if we do encroach on the rights of the local government. I answered the other position of the hon. gentleman effectively, I thought, the other day. I showed clearly that we are simply restoring, in giving power to the local government to appoint a board of education, the rights and privileges that the minority had been deprived of, namely, the equipping, management and regulating of the schools. With reference to the position taken by the hon. member for North Simcoe as to what was intended by their lordships by their judgment, let me quote from the judgment :

> The further question is submitted, whether the Governor General in Council has power to make the declaration or remedial orders asked for in the memorials or petitions, or has any other jurisdiction in the premises. Their lordships have decided that the Governor General has jurisdiction, and that the appeal is well founded, but that the particular course to be pursued must be determined by the authorities to whom it has been committed by the statute.

Now, " the authority," namely, the Governor General in Council, determined that, after hearing the appeal. They made the remedial order which was transmitted to the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba and by him to the government and legislature. We have the answer of the Manitoba government, we have their refusal to comply with the terms of the remedial order. We have their refusal to comply with what we have laid down as the proper course. Now, the judgment of the Privy Council goes on to declare :

> It is not for this tribunal to indicate the precise steps to be taken. Their general character is sufficiently defined by the third subsection of section 22 of the Manitoba Act.

Under the provisions of that third section, we have proceeded and have taken what we deem to be the proper procedure. Then comes the strong feature of the hon. gentleman's argument. He quotes from the judgment that it is certainly not essential that the statutes repealed by the Act of 1890 should be re-enacted, or the precise provisions of those statutes should again be made law. I agree with the hon. gentleman that it would not be essential that the statutes repealed should be re-enacted or their precise provisions again be made law if the local government of Manitoba were legislating upon this matter. But the local legislature has refused to legislate upon this matter, and I think that what their lordships contemplated was that as soon as this judgment was given, the local legislature would legislate in such a way as to restore the rights of the minority. They could do that very easily, I think they could legislate effectively in four or five clauses, thus removing the grievances of the minority. The meaning I take from the judge's language is that their lordships contemplated that if it was not essential that the statutes repealed but the Act of 1890 should be re-enacted, it would not be necessary to repeal the Act of 1890. We do not seek here to repeal the Act of 1890, but, in order to legislate effectively, we must legislate upon the lines of this Bill, because we have to provide all the machinery necessary for a system of separate schools for the Roman Catholic minority. The local government at present has its machinery. If they would incorporate with its present law, clauses restoring the rights of which the Roman Catholics have been deprived, they could do it effectively. But we must begin from the beginning and create a Board of Education, and, having created it, we must give it certain powers for the management and conduct of these schools. It seems to me that what their lordships meant was that it was not essential that the local government should re-enact the law that existed prior to 1890, or that it would be necessary for the precise provisions of the statutes again to be made law by them. But I take it that as this Parliament is to legislate in this matter, it is necessary not only in order to carry out what their lordships said in their judgment, but to carry out the remedial order of the Government, we must legislate on the lines of this Bill. Now, the remedial order at its close says :

> And His Excellency the Governor General in Council was further pleased to declare and decide, and it is hereby declared that it seems requisite that the system of education embodied in the two Acts of 1890, aforesaid, shall be supplemented by a provincial Act or Acts which will restore to the Roman Catholic minority the said rights and privileges of which such minority has been so deprived as aforesaid, and which will modify the Acts of 1890 so far and so far only as may be necessary to give effect to the provisions restoring the rights and privileges in paragraphs (a), (b), (c) hereinbefore mentioned.

Now, in the minute covering the remedial order, the Government have drawn the attention of the legislature to the very words quoted by my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), and it was hoped and expected that, in accordance with what is laid down by the Lord Chancellor in his judgment, the local legislature would remove the grievance ; and if they had legislated, it would not have been necessary for them to re-enact the statutes previous to 1890. But they have refused to do that. As they have refused to do so, we hold that this House is vested with authority to legislate. Now, what have we to do ? We have to restore the rights that the minority have been deprived of. What were these rights?

We are endeavouring, by the clause under discussion, to restore the rights which they say they were deprived of, and which the Privy Council say they were deprived of. And in order to do that, we enact as closely as we can in the language of the Acts that were repealed. Now, I grant that there does seem to be an anomaly between subsection 2 of section 3, and section 4. The matter is of such serious importance that it seems to me that the Government will have to consider whether they will press subsection 2 of section 3 as a part of the Bill. This is a matter that I should like some time to consider ; and if you will leave the discussion of that over, I will undertake that opportunity will be given for discussion before the third reading. I would like the committee to go on with the consideration of section 4. The hon. gentleman says that he hopes the Government will agree to strike out section 4. On no consideration can we agree to that, because by doing so we should strike at the very fundamental principle of the Bill. By clause one already passed, we have created a board, and now we propose to give them the same powers that the Roman Catholic section of the school board had prior to 1890.

Mr. McNEILL. I am astonished to hear the remarks of the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat. The most surprising of all the surprising things he said was to the effect that we are not to proceed in accordance with the views of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, but in accordance with the provisions of some order which has been made by this Government, and which, if it is not in accordance with the opinion of the Judicial Committee is certainly something to which we ought not to pay very much respect. I am astonished at my hon. friend still endeavouring to maintain that the terms made use of by Lord Herschell have reference to the local government and not to our powers at all.

Mr. DALY. What I said was that it was clearly the intention or hope of the Lord Chancellor that the local government would legislate on the lines indicated, and that it was not essential that the old Acts should be restored. But the local government having refused to act, it is for us to legislate, and I contend that we cannot legislate effectively except on the lines laid down in the Bill.

Mr. McNEILL. On the contrary, I think the Lord Chancellor went on the assumption solely that the local government were not going to act, and that the whole question was what we here could do in that case. My hon. friend, in my judgment, takes a wholly wrong view of the opinion given by the court, and I think it would be well to read him some of the passages in the judgment in order that he may be able to see more clearly what the intention of their lordships was ; and if that is not sufficient, I could read some passages from the argument which would also give him further insight into the subject. Now, the judgment was delivered on the 29th January, 1895. The lords of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council on that occasion were the Lord Chancellor, Lord Watson, Lord Macnaghten, and Lord Shand. What I propose to read is the text of the opinion given by their lordships on that occasion.

Mr. OUIMET. Read the whole of it.

Mr. McNEILL. The hon. gentleman wants it all read, and I shall be glad to comply as far as I can in the little time at my disposal. I am glad to do anything I can to enlighten my hon. friend as to the true import of that judgment. Well, the Chancellor says :—

Mr. McCARTHY. The Minister of Public Works wants it read, too.

Mr. OUIMET. Yes. I have never read it myself.

Mr. McNEILL. The hon. gentleman says he has never read it himself. Well, that is a most interesting admission, and one that I hope the country will take note of. It is natural that the hon. gentleman should ask to have it read now. It may, perhaps, be considered a little late in the day, but, at all events, it is well that his desire should be granted. I do not know that I can read it all, but I will read a part of it for him, at all events.

(The hon. gentleman proceeded to read from the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.)

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Does not the hon. gentleman think that he might come closer to paragraph A, that is now under discussion, than by reading the judgment of the Privy Council ?

Mr. McNEILL. I think this is in strict line with the argument used by the Minister to which I am replying. He has been dealing with a paragraph in this very judgment, which I think he has entirely misapprehended.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I do not say that it is altogether out of order, but it is going pretty far from the section.

Mr. McNEILL. I think nothing could be more germane to the subject before the House than the judgment of which the hon. gentleman quoted a portion, and which, in my opinion, he entirely misapprehended. I may point out further that I am complying with the request of one of the gentlemen who was engaged in the framing of this Bill.

Mr. OUIMET. I suppose the hon. gentleman is not stupid enough to think I have never read the judgment.

Mr. McNEILL. I am sure I must thank my hon. friend for his courteous expression, but at the same time——

Mr. OUIMET. You seem to need it.

Mr. McNEILL. At the same time, when the hon. gentleman makes a statement in the House that he had not read the judgment—at least, I understood him to say so, and it is only now that he is calling attention to the fact that he has read the judgment—at least, I presume, he says now that he did. Does my hon. friend say that he did read the judgment ?

Mr. OUIMET. I read the judgment, and I understand it much better than the hon. gentleman will understand it after he has read it a hundred times.

Mr. McNEILL. I would not for a moment venture to pit my poor intelligence against the exalted intellect of my hon. friend, but when my hon. friend stated deliberately in the House that he had not read the judgment, I imagined that the hon. gentleman was stating a fact ; but now it would appear that it was not so. One of the two statements must be correct, the hon. gentleman can select whichever he likes.

(The hon. gentleman resumed reading.)

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I do not think the hon. gentleman should continue that. He may discuss what there is in that book, but I do not think it is in order that he should read the whole book.

Mr. McCARTHY. I understood you ruled a moment ago that it was in order. Now, when the hon. gentleman is reading that, I do not understand how you can come to the conclusion that he is not in order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I said if it was germane to the question, he could read some extracts, but I do not think it is in order to read the whole book.

Mr. McCARTHY. Surely if it is in order to read any portion of the judgment—not necessarily the whole judgment——

Mr. BELLEY. Order, order.

Mr. McCARTHY. The hon. gentleman can gain nothing by interruptions. Surely, Mr. Chairman, you laid down the rule that the whole of that judgment can be read, if necessary. If, in order to a proper understanding of the judgment, it is necessary to read it, how can a rule be laid down that one paragraph here and another paragraph there only can be read ?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman understands probably better than any one else, that while we can discuss this measure all through, it is not in order to read entire books. I am willing to put myself in the judgment of the committee in saying that.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Here is a Bill based upon the judgment, and if that judgment had never been read, there could be no appeal.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. It has been read to this House a hundred times already.

Mr. O'BRIEN. No matter if it has been read a thousand times ; when one of the gentlemen who is acting as a judge upon this matter, tells us that he has not read the judgment, it becomes necessary that the hon. gentleman should hear it read. But how can it be said, when we are discussing a clause which goes to the root of this business, that the judgment is not essential ? Why, Mr. Chairman, you cannot rule that.

Mr. McNEILL. If you rule, Mr. Chairman, that I can only read extracts from it, in order not to cause unnecessary delay, I will bow to your ruling.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I rely upon the hon. gentleman's common sense and good-will to read those portions which address themselves to the common sense of members, but not the whole book.

Mr. McNEILL. I will go on for a little while, and, perhaps, I can omit some portions that it may not be necessary to read.

(The hon. gentleman resumed reading.)

Mr. DEVLIN. Speak louder.

Mr. McNEILL. I am sorry that my hon. friend cannot hear me. Perhaps he can come down a little nearer.

Mr. DEVLIN. No, I am in my seat.

Mr. McNEILL. I am very sorry that the acoustic properties in this chamber are not all that could be desired. We have often had complaints of this matter before, and it is one that might very well engage the attention of the Government. And if as a result of this unfortunate measure, it should happen that we obtained an improvement in the acoustic qualities of the chamber it would be most fortunate: we should thus have good out of evil. We have heard a great deal in this House in regard to privileges being interfered with, and that the interference with the rights or privileges constituted a grievance. It has been alleged that the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council decided that the enactments of the existing statute constitute a grievance. At page 39 of the argument, Lord Watson makes use of the word grievance in a double sense. He says: "After full consideration it may turn out that a grievance may be no real grievance." It is evident that too much has been made out of the word grievance used by the Judicial Committee when we find that a member of the Committee made use of the term in a sense that could not convey the popular idea of grievance. Much has also been said in regard to the constitution, but very little importance or value is evidently attached to the constitution by the Government, who are now forcing this Bill through the House. The hon. gentleman read the questions submitted to the Privy Council. These were the questions that were submitted to the Supreme Court, and in the face of these questions how was it possible for my friend (Mr. Daly) to contend that the opinion delivered with regard to these questions was an opinion delivered as to what the Government of Manitoba were going to do. The whole argument proceeded upon the assumption that the government of Manitoba were not going to do this thing. The suggestion of my hon. friend, that the members of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council had in contemplation the doing of this thing by the government of Manitoba, is, I submit, absolutely untenable. It is an argument which only those who are driven to the last ditch, so to speak, could have ventured to adduce in support of this measure: a measure which can do no good to any human being, and which is only calculated to do an immense deal of mischief: a measure which has been shown by members of both sides of the House is unconstitutional, and which even if it were constitutional is not capable of having any good result. I hope that Lord Herschell's views will carry some weight with my hon. friend, I would hope that my hon. friend would at all events admit, that the views of the Lord Chancellor of England expressing the opinion of the highest court of the Empire are worthy of some little consideration. The Lord Chancellor says:

> The learned judges of the Supreme Court were divided in opinion upon each of the questions submitted. They were all, however, by a majority of three judges out of five, answered in the negative.
> The appeal to the Governor General in Council was founded upon the 22nd section of the Manitoba Act, 1870, and the 93rd section of the British North America Act, 1867. By the former of these statutes (which was confirmed and declared to be valid and effectual by an Imperial satute) Manitoba was created a province of the Dominion.
> The 2nd section of the Manitoba Act enacts that after the prescribed day the British North America Act shall "except those parts thereof which are in the terms made or by reasonable intendment may be held to be specially applicable to or only to affect one or more but not the whole of the provinces now composing the Dominion, and except so far as the same may be varied by this Act, be applicable to the several provinces of Canada, and as if the province of Manitoba had been one of the provinces originally united by the said Act." It cannot be questioned therefore that section 93 of the British North America Act (save such parts of it as are specially applicable to some only of the provinces of which the Dominion was in 1870 composed) is made applicable to the province of Manitoba, except in so far as it is varied by the Manitoba Act. The 22nd section of that statute deals with the same subject-matter as section 93 of the British North America Act. The 2nd subsection of this latter section may be discarded from consideration, as it is manifestly applicable only to the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. The remaining provisions closely correspond with those of section 22 of the Manitoba Act. The only difference between the introductory part and the 1st subsection of the two sections, is that in the Manitoba Act the words "or practice" are added after the word "law" in the 1st subsection.
> The 3rd subsection of section 22 of the Manitoba Act is identical with the 4th subsection of section 93 of the British North America Act. The 2nd and 3rd subsections respectively are the same, except that in the 2nd subsection of the Manitoba Act the words "of the legislature of the province or" are inserted before the words "any provincial authority," and that the 3rd subsection of the British North America Act commences with the words: "Where in any province a system of separate or dissentient schools exist by law at the union or is thereafter established by the legislature of the province." In view of this comparison, it appears to their lordships impossible to come to any other conclusion than that the 22nd section of the Manitoba Act was intended to be a substitute for the 93rd section of the British North America Act. Obviously all that was intended to be identical has been repeated, and in so far as the provisions of the Manitoba Act differ from those of the earlier statute, they must be regarded as indicating the variations from those provisions intended to be introduced in the province of Manitoba.

In their lordships' opinion, therefore, it is the 22nd section of the Manitoba Act which has to be construed in the present case, though it is of course legitimate to consider the terms of the earlier Act, and to take advantage of any assistance they may afford in the construction of enactments with which they so closely correspond and which have been substituted for them.

Before entering upon a critical examination of the important section of the Manitoba Act, it will be convenient to state the circumstances under which that Act was passed, and also the exact scope of the decision of this Board in the case of Barrett vs. the City of Winnipeg, which seems to have given rise to some misapprehension. In 1867, the union of the provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick took place. Among the obstacles which had to be overcome in order to bring about that union, none perhaps presented greater difficulty than the differences of opinion which existed with regard to the question of education. It had been the subject of much controversy in Upper and Lower Canada. In Upper Canada, a general system of undenominational education had been established, but with provision for separate schools to supply the wants of the Catholic inhabitants of that province. The 2nd subsection of section 93 of the British North America Act extended all the powers, privileges and duties which were then by law conferred and imposed in Upper Canada on the separate schools and school trustees of the Roman Catholic inhabitants of that province, to the dissentient schools of the Protestant and Roman Catholic inhabitants of Quebec.

That is a statement I made in this House some time ago, but I was sharply pulled up and informed that I was mistaken. If I was, the Lord Chancellor is also mistaken. He goes on :

There can be no doubt that the views of the Roman Catholic inhabitants of Quebec and Ontario, with regard to education, were shared by the members of the same communion in the territory, which afterwards became the province of Manitoba. They regard it as essential that the education of their children should be in accordance with the teachings of their church.

This particular sentence is worthy of remark : The Roman Catholic minority regarded it as essential that the education of their children should be in accordance with the teachings of their church. Now, I am glad to know, from the statements made in the public press, that the province of Manitoba have made such an offer, as an outcome of the negotiations which have recently been held.

Afternoon Sitting.

House again resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. McNEILL. I wish simply to say, Mr. Chairman, that the observations I was making and the extracts I was reading from the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council before we took recess, were for the special benefit and information of my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Daly), and, as that hon. gentleman is not present, I shall postpone my remarks until he is in his seat.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Before my hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) began his observations, there were three legal points before the House. The first was that of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), that two clauses of the Bill, subsection "a" of section 4, and subsection 2 of section 3, conflicted with each other. That I need not enlarge upon, because the Minister is considering the propriety of withdrawing subsection 2 of section 3. Then, there was the point of my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills), which I submit the Minister has not yet seemed to appreciate. The hon. Minister agreed to-day that if we have the power to legislate, we must necessarily have the power to legislate effectively. Nobody disputes that ; but in legislating effectively, you must not go beyond your power. The point raised by my hon. friend is that we have no pleuary power ; we have merely a limited conditional power ; and you may legislate effectively within the terms of your limited conditional power, but you cannot go beyond your power in order to do what you may think is effective. You must keep within your power. Now, what is your power ? I think we all admit that your power is described in general terms fairly well in the remedial order in paragraphs "a," "b" and "c." Now, supposing that after the remedial order was passed, the legislature of Manitoba had enacted legislation carrying out in two or three sections the terms of the remedial order, prescribing that the trustees in certain districts should have the right to build and equip schools, to levy taxation, and to direct the religious teaching in those schools. What my hon. friend from Bothwell argued was that it would be beyond the power of this Parliament to supplement that legislation by legislation providing for a separate board to administer the provisions of the Manitoba Act. Clearly that would be void.

Mr. DALY. If Manitoba did that, we would not be here.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What I say is that you would not contend for a moment that you had power to superadd to that legislation of the province of Manitoba, legislation providing for a separate administration of the law. Manitoba might say : We administer the schools by a single Board of Education, which, for many reasons, with which the Parliament of Canada has nothing to do, we prefer to the old system. If they had done that, you would not have power to interfere by establishing a separate board—why ? Because that is a part of the administration of the schools, which is not under your jurisdiction at all, and is not necessary to the carrying out of your law. The power you have is to give back to the minority the privileges which were withdrawn from them by the Acts of 1890. This is not a privilege which was withdrawn from them.

Mr. HAGGART. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question ? If the board was half Catholic and half Protestant, and the Manitoba government appointed a board wholly Protestant, would not that be interfering with a right or privilege ?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) No, that is not a right or privilege with regard to education ; that is a right or privilege with regard to the administration of the educational system ; there is a great distinction between the two. If that is a right or privilege, then every single provision of the law as it existed from 1870 to 1890 must be restored. But the Privy Council have told you that that is not necessary. The Privy Council have told you, in words that cannot be misunderstood, that all that is necessary is to supplement the provisions of the present law with certain provisions which will restore certain educational rights which have been taken away. To whom is that addressed ? We know it is not a decision. It is a kindly advice given by the Lord Chancellor, in which those who are with him, I assume, concurred. It is addressed to whatever legislature chose to legislate. It is not addressed to the Manitoba legislature, but to whatever legislature is going to legislate ; and when we are legislating, it is our duty to give very great consideration to the advice coming from such a high court. They say that it is not essential that the statutes repealed by the Act of 1890 should be re-enacted or their precise provisions restored. It is only necessary to supplement it by provisions which will remove the grievance upon which the appeal is founded. I submit that that grievance is not the constitution of one board in lieu of two, not the appointment of one superintendent in lieu of two, but the withdrawal from the minority of the right to give religious instruction in the schools and to apply their taxes for that purpose. It may well be that the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) is right in what he says. He says that we have no power to direct the Manitoba legislature in these mandatory terms.

Mr. HAGGART. He goes further than that. He says we have the power if they refuse to act.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) He says, in the first place, that we have not the power ; but it may well be, he further says, that if we restore by supplemental legislation the privileges which have been withdrawn from the minority, and if the Manitoba legislature take steps to prevent that legislation becoming effective or if they refuse to carry it out, it may be that we have the power to make alternate provisions. But I submit that we have no right to assume that when we have made a law, which is strictly within our power, that law will not be carried out by the Manitoba government ; and if we have the alternative right, we should put that legislation in terms altogether different from those used here.

Mr. McLEOD. Have we not the right to pass a law now in such a way as it will be effective ?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I admit that, but you have only the right to legislate up to a certain point. You have no right to legislate primarily on the matter of administration at all. You can only touch the matter of administration as incidental to the other chief point on which you have the right to legislate.

Mr. HAGGART. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If you start out primarily by directing the local government to do so and so, and then constitute a separate board to carry out the provisions you are afterwards going to make, you are clearly legislating beyond your powers. It may be —and on that I express no opinion—as the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) says, that you have the right to declare that if the Manitoba government refuse to execute the provisions you make, you have the power to make an alternate provision. But that is different from what we have here. If you leave this clause you are inviting a crop of lawsuits, which must necessarily meet you right at the threshold of your law. You are reaching out your hand for lawsuits. The very first thing done will to be to attack the validity of that clause, and it will be attacked with every prospect of success. There was one more point I desire to make, and that is the point with which I started, but which does not seem to meet with approval on either side to any very great extent. Assuming you have the power and have laid the groundwork in your remedial order, it does not seem to me that you have laid any foundation for the appointment of a school board in your remedial order at all. The hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Ouimet) argued that that is necessarily implied in the words : "the right to build, maintain, equip, manage, conduct and support Roman Catholic schools." I do not think so. You do not want a separate school board to build, because that is within the jurisdiction of the trustees. Nor do you want a separate school board to maintain, because that also will be done by the trustee. And the right to equip, who does the equipping ? It is the trustees. Who does the managing ?

Mr. DALY. The Board of Education.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) With every respect to the hon. gentleman, it does not seem to me that it is the separate school board which will manage. I submit that the management there means internal management, and relates to the equipment and discipline of the schools, which belongs to the trustees. All those words seem to me to point to action being taken by the trustees; and if you have not laid the foundation in your remedial order, you have not any power to legislate here, because it seems to me you cannot go beyond the scope of the remedial order. I submit that point with some diffidence, because it does not seem to meet with the general approval of lawyers on both sides, but it is my opinion.

Mr. McCARTHY. I do not think that the discussion here can be at all without service to us in the further consideration of this measure, because the principle on which the committee has to deal must be first determined definitely before we can very logically, at all events, lay down rules or regulations in the form of subsequent enactments for the carrying into effect the earlier part of the Bill. For my part, I have no fault at all to find with the tone and manner of the speech of my hon. friend the Minister of Interior (Mr. Daly). I think nothing could be fairer than the way he has presented his case to the committee and the candid statements he has made with reference to the law. But I would like to draw his attention to what it appears to me he has overlooked. His view of the judgment of the Privy Council is that it was intended for the provincial legislature and that the language was not what the Governor General in Council was called upon to adhere to or even give respect to. I have always thought, and still think, that all that is said in the judgment and the reasons given in that judgment were not binding upon any person, upon the Governor General in Council, the local legislature or upon this Parliament. It is plain that there was no jurisdiction in their lordships who sat in appeal upon the judgment of the Supreme Court to do more than the Supreme Court was called upon to do, and that was to give their opinion in answer to the question which the Government had, under the authority of the Blake Act, submitted to them. But, nevertheless, their suggestions are suggestions coming from distinguished law lords, and are therefore worthy of all attention. We are told in these suggestions that it is not essential that the statutes repealed by the Act of 1890 should be re-enacted. Now, if my hon. friend will bear with me, let us see how that appears in the formal judgment, or the more formal. We must not confound the reasons which are published here in our blue-book in the first 12 pages with the order of the Privy Council. The order of the Privy Council is a formal thing, a definite thing. But the reasons which induced their lordships to come to the conclusion they arrived at do not constitute part of the order itself. It will be within the recollection of the committee that we added these words to the Blake Act because in the other reference, in the liquor license case, they gave no reasons; they simply handed out an opinion that the Act was unconstitutional and beyond the powers of the Parliament, without telling us their reasons. And so we lost the benefit of their reasons for our guidance. It was for that reason that we added to the Blake Act that besides their opinion the court should give their reasons for that opinion. And the Privy Council did, in accordance with that, not in obedience to it, of course, give their reasons for their opinion, as the Supreme Court judges did for their judgment. In this particular case the question is :

> (5.) Has His Excellency the Governor General in Council power to make the declarations or remedial orders which are asked for in the said memorials and petitions assuming the material facts to be as stated therein, or has His Excellency the Governor General in Council any other jurisdiction in the premises ?

The answer is : that the Governor in Council has jurisdiction and the appeal is well founded. But we find in the reasons given that the particular course to be taken must be decided by the authorities to whom it is left. When we come to this further 'obiter,' this further suggestion, which, of course, is no part of the opinion, but which is important, that it is certainly not essential that the precise provisions of the Acts which were repealed should be re-enacted. That, as I pointed out this afternoon, is exactly what we are doing. We are doing the very thing which Lord Herschell speaking for himself and other law lords, said that it was unnecessary for us to do. He says :

> The system of education embodied in the Acts of 1890 no doubt commends itself to, and adequately supplies the wants of the great majority of the inhabitants of the province. All legitimate grounds of complaint would be removed if that system were supplemented by provisions which would remove the grievances upon which the appeal is founded, and were modified so far as might be necessary to give effect to these provisions.

Now, it is plain to me, Sir, that that opinion, though not binding upon any person, as I am free to admit, is a very valuable contribution to our knowledge on the subject, and is entitled to the very greatest respect. I agree with another argument advanced by my hon. friend, and it is this. He says we are limited by the order made by the Governor General in Council. I agree that we cannot go beyond that order. I accept that, and I am glad to find my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior, speaking for the Government, has at length adopted that view. Perhaps I am doing him injustice in saying "at length," but on behalf of his party friends the opposite view has been openly, frequently and flagrantly stated, in violence, as it appears to me, of common sense and of the statutes and enactments. But while it is not binding upon the Governor General in Council to require the local government to re-enact the provisions which are referred to in (a), (b) and (c), as I think my hon. friend will in candour admit, neither is it binding on this Parliament to go the full length that the Governor General in Council did unless the argument of my hon. friend from Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), advanced early in the discussion, and which the Government have repudiated, is accepted. That hon. gentleman contended that we have to go to the full length of the remedial order, neither more nor less, that we cannot legislate until Manitoba has refused to legislate, and, although Manitoba refused to re-enact (a), (b) and (c), it might have been willing to re-enact (b) and (c). I need not labour that point, because it is not the accepted view under which we are proceeding. The Bill does in some sections enact more and in some sections enact less than the remedial order. It re-enacts less in the matter to which, no doubt, we shall have our attention directed when we come to a later stage of the Bill. For instance, it limits the jurisdiction of the old Board of Education with respect to the qualification required for teachers.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That is in the next section.

Mr. McCARTHY. Well, the remedial order says :

> And His Excellency the Governor General in Council was further pleased to declare and decide, and it is hereby declared that it seems requisite that the system of education embodied in the two Acts of 1890, aforesaid, shall be supplemented by provincial Act or Acts which will restore to the Roman Catholic minority the said rights and privileges of which such majority has been so deprived as aforesaid, and which will modify the Acts of 1890, so far and so far cnly as may be necessary to give effect to the provisions restoring the rights and privileges in paragraphs (a), (b), (c), hereinbefore mentioned.

Now, the paragraphs covered the rights to manage Roman Catholic schools in the manner provided for by the Acts repealed. The management of the Roman Catholic schools under the Acts repealed gave to the Roman Catholic section of the Board of Education absolute control as to the qualification of their teachers. But we do not do that. Therefore, the Bill is not going as far as the remedial order. It cannot, therefore, be argued with any consistency on the part of the Government or of those who are supporting the Bill that we are required to pass this section because the remedial order says so. We have clearly a discretion in this matter. That discretion, it seems to me, we are bound here to exercise. Now, I do not quite understand, and I would like to to do so before I needlessly take up time, what my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior means by withdrawing subsection 2. I notice that my hon. friend who last addressed the committee says that it is useless to discuss this matter until the Government make up their minds what they are going to do with subsection 2 of section 3. But we are in this position, so far as this committee is concerned, that we have already passed subsection 2, and we have no jurisdiction over it as a committee. I suppose by universal consent we could back and reconsider it, but not otherwise. We had better recognize that now, because if we do not go on and discuss the provisions of section 4 now, when are we to do it ? We have passed section 3, and we are now dealing with section 4, and we have got to consider with reference to what we have already done, the propriety of now adopting subsection (a) of subsection 4.

Mr. DALY. I did not say that the Government were going to withdraw this, but I said I thought it well under the circumstances that we should have time to consider it ; and I said why it was there. Now, the reason I presume it is there, is this : If that clause of section 3 is not in the Bill, then we are virtually giving greater powers to the Board of Education we create than the Roman Catholic section had prior to 1890. This appears to have been inserted in the old law for the purpose of having a check upon both the Protestant and Roman Catholic sections, and if we grant to the board we create under this Act all the powers that are given to them under section 4 and subsections, this feature of control in the Bill which existed prior to 1890, it is a question whether we do not affect the legality of such board. It is proposed by Mr. Ewart, as I candidly stated to the House, and as I expect him here on Monday or Tuesday, I simply asked that the clauses should be left over for further consideration, and let us proceed to the discussion of section 4. In answer to what my hon. friend from North Simcoe has said as to those words of the Lord Chancellor in the judgment, I can only express my own opinion that their lordships expected that the local legislature would primarily enact such legislation as would remedy the grievance, and if they did so, it would not be necessary to re-enact the old law. Now, we are not re-enacting the old law, we are not re-enacting the Acts as they existed prior to 1890 at all. What we are seeking to do is to restore the rights that were taken away by the Acts of 1890 from the Roman Catholic section of the community. All we are seeking to do by this Act is to give that Roman Catholic minority the same privileges and rights they had prior to 1890. We are not re-enacting the old law at all, we are not repealing the Acts of 1890. I would like to ask my hon. friends who have taken part in this discussion, if they could suggest any other legislation than this Bill by which we could meet the conditions with which we are face to face ?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Yes. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman this question: The local legislature have a board for the supervision of education in the province. Supposing we altered, or amended, that board and embraced these schools within the jurisdiction, does the Minister argue that it would be possible for this Parliament to supersede them, and to prevent them undertaking that work in their own way ?

Mr. DALY. I presume not. But we have got to meet the conditions exactly as we find them.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Is not there a provision in the local law as it now stands that would embrace these institutions and give jurisdiction over them ?

Mr. DALY. Yes, the advisory board would have the power, I presume. But we cannot incorporate in our law here any powers that the advisory board has. What we are dealing with is the law as it existed prior to 1890. The advisory board is a creation of the Act of 1890, which is complained of.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Upon the theory that this is a right or privilege that you are bound to restore ?

Mr. DALY. Exactly.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Well, I think it is perfectly clear that this is a matter of procedure or administration.

Mr. DALY. I confess that I have given the best answer I can to the hon. gentleman, in reply to his argument the other day, and reiterated this morning. It is at least conclusive to my mind that this is a right or privilege which these people enjoyed prior to 1890. Under section (a) of the remedial order, they had the right to manage, maintain and equip their schools ; they enjoyed those rights under the Acts as they existed prior to 1890, and which we incorporate in clause 4, almost word for word. Having enjoyed those rights and privileges prior to 1890, under the terms of the order, we are bound to restore them. What are their grievances ? Their grievances are set forth in the petitions, and their petitions say that they have been deprived of certain rights, namely, the right to build, maintain, equip and so on. Now, under the law that existed prior to 1890, they had the right to build, maintain and equip their schools——

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). As trustees ?

Mr. DALY. As trustees, governed and guided by the Roman Catholic section of the board. The trustees had limited powers. They could not manage, maintain, equip and so on, their schools without doing it under the direction of the board ; they were simply governed by the authority that the board had prior to 1890, and we seek to restrain the trustees, or any other person dealing with these separate schools which we seek to create here, exactly in the same manner as was done prior to 1890.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Supposing the local government had restored the right to give religious instruction, or supposing they had never taken it away, but that they had substituted a Minister of Education or a superintendent instead of a board ? Would the minority have been entitled to come here and complain that certain rights and privileges had been taken from them, and would this Parliament under the conditions that now exist, have been entitled to legislate upon that subject ? Because the hon. gentleman must go that far in order to maintain the proposition he is now putting forward.

Mr. DALY. I am not required to answer that question. We are here to consider the position of things as we find them, namely, that these people complain of certain grievances, they have appealed to the Privy Council, the Privy Council have acted, and we are now here to consider a law, which we propose and suggest will restore the rights and privileges as they existed prior to 1890. We are not here to discuss abstract questions, we are here to discuss questions exactly as we find them.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman sees that the suggestion was made as a test of the accuracy of his legal proposition, and it is a test which he is bound to meet. Supposing the local government had simply amalgamated the two boards into one, and left the right or privilege of giving religious teaching in the schools, and to appropriate their own taxes as before ; could they then appeal, and could we then legislate ?

Mr. DALY. If they had done that, there would be no necessity for this legislation at all. It is one of the grievances they complain of.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Then the amalgamation of the school boards is not a grievance ?

Mr. DALY. Why, of course.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am putting that point to the hon. gentleman. Supposing the two boards had not amalgamated ?

Mr. DALY. The amalgamation of the boards, and omitting the powers that one section enjoyed under the board, is certainly a grievance.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Supposing the boards had been amalgamated, or supposing both boards had been abolished and a superintendent appointed in lieu, and if nothing else had been touched, would that have constituted a grievance which they could have appealed against, and which we should order to be restored? Is it not perfectly plain that you could not do it, and if that test shows that you could not do it, how can you do it here? Now, I understand my hon. friend to say two or three times that we are bound to do something. I do not merely understand him to ask that because a right or privilege has been taken away, we are bound to restore it. The discretion is absolute in this House to restore it or not. If a right or privilege has been taken away, there is no constitutional duty upon us to restore it, unless we are of opinion that, under the circumstances of the case, it is a material grievance which ought to be restored, not that we are bound to do it.

Mr. DALY. We are acting within the terms of the remedial order. We can give them less, but we cannot go beyond the terms of the order. All I had reference to was, that we were legislating within the remedial order; not that we are bound to give them all they demand, but we are bound to restore the rights and privileges of which they were deprived and to remedy the grievances of which they complain.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman has not answered my legal contention and shown that the position I have taken is untenable. The administration of the law is an administration in the interest of the state, and is not in the interest of the parent simply. It is for the purpose of enabling the state to ascertain whether the work which it requires in its own interest and for the protection of its own rights is being properly discharged. With respect to the functions of the trustees, the creation and management of the schools, these are necessary incidents to the right of having religious instruction. But the other matter the hon. gentleman will see is altogether different, and if the minority had not the right to come here and make complaint and insist on the restoration of the board and the abolition of the office of administrator or superintendent of education, then they could not have the right to come here on this ground, because that is connected with something else which is a substantial right. The hon. gentleman admits that the work of administration rightly belongs to the local government. If that be so, is it not clear that the furthest the House could go would be to make alternative legislation, providing for the administration of the law in case the local government and legislature refused to administer the law. This legislation must be provisional. When the hon. gentleman undertakes to direct what the Governor in Council shall do and how it shall be done, he is going far beyond the power we possess. We may say that in case the Manitoba legislature fail to make the necessary provision for discharging certain duties, we may provide for the constitution of a board and the definite of its functions and the manner in which the duties shall be discharged; but these provisions cannot be called into existence except on the failure of the local government to discharge the duties devolving on it. But this House cannot tell the local government: You shall constitute a board containing so many members, and they shall be appointed in a certain way and they shall discharge certain duties. This House in doing so would be taking away the duty of administration out of the hands of the local government, which we have no authority to do; and this in no sense constitutes a right or privilege which we are called upon here to redress, for it is something entirely different, and until the Government start right on this matter we can hardly make satisfactory progress with the Bill.

Mr. DALY. May I ask with whom did administration rest before? Did it rest in the Board of Education? Who appointed it? Was it not appointed by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Certainly, but it was under a local law, and the local legislature had the power to change it. I have pointed out that radical changes were made in the educational law administered in Ontario, and no one ever thought of coming to this Parliament and declaring that the local authorities had interfered with any rights or privilege. Yet they did the very act which the legislature of Manitoba did, and which the hon. gentleman seems to think warrants the Government in introducing the present legislation here. I say that the furthest this Parliament can go is to pass alternate legislation, and not to undertake to direct the local government in what manner its duty shall be discharged under the statute.

Mr. DALY. The hon. gentleman says the authority was given under a local law, and he holds it to be within the jurisdiction of the local legislature. He says it had the ight to pass the law and create a board under it. Where has that statute gone? It has been repealed. Is there not involved in that fact the whole subject under discussion, the repealing of the Act that gave power to the Board of Education. The courts have expressed the opinion that those rights should be restored. The Privy Council is of the opinion that they should be restored. We have passed our remedial order, and now we propose legislation within the lines of that order, namely, to restore to the minority the rights they enjoyed under the legislation of the province of Manitoba prior to 1890, which had been swept away. If the hon. gentleman grants that they enjoyed those rights under the local legislation, and that they have been wiped away by the local legislature, he admits the whole case, because the legislation now under discussion proposes to restore the rights swept away, and we desire it to be done effectually and to go to the very root of the matter.

One of the privileges enjoyed by the minority prior to 1890 was that they controlled one section of the Board of Education. That body has been swept away.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It was not the right of a minority.

Mr. DALY. Yes, it was the right of a minority given by law. What was that power ? It was to make rules and regulations regarding examining, licensing and grading the teachers, and the withdrawing of licenses. With what power could we invest to-day the authority to license, examine and grade teachers if we did not give power under this Bill ? and we are giving it to a body identical with that which existed prior to 1890. By sweeping away the Board of Education as it existed the rights of the Roman Catholic minority were at the time swept away.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not doubt the sincerity of the hon. gentleman, and he evidently believes the conclusion at which he has arrived as the result of his argument. Instead, however, of arguing the question, he assumed the very point in dispute. He said that by the Act of 1890 you have withdrawn a right or privilege which the minority possessed with respect to having a separate school board. Was that a right or privilege within the meaning of the Act ?

Mr. DALY. I say it was. I argued that it was among other privileges they enjoyed.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The best plan is to bring this matter to a test. The hon. gentleman says that the minority possessed the right or privilege of making rules and regulations for the examination, licensing and grading of teachers, and for the withdrawal of licenses. Suppose that power had been transferred by the local Act to a superintendent, would that of itself have constituted a grievance on which the minority had a right to appeal to Parliament ?

Mr. DALY. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) When it was as regards the administration of a detail.

Mr. DALY. That is not a detail.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am putting the question in regard to the examination of teachers. Suppose the legislature changed the law in this respect, and provided that a teacher should not receive a license unless he attended six months at the normal school. Surely that matter is within the power of the local government. Does the hon. gentleman say that would constitute a grievance on which the minority would have a right to appeal ?

Mr. DALY. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is that not reducing the whole matter to an absurdity ?

Mr. DALY. Not at all.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Then the hon. gentleman comes down to this : that the law in all its details as it existed before 1890 must be restored, even down to the smallest point. The hon. gentleman is landed either there, or his argument is misleading. Being there I respectfully ask if the hon. gentleman is not directly at variance with the spirit and words themselves of the decision of the Privy Council. The Privy Council say it is not necessary to restore these things.

Mr. OUIMET. It says that it is not necessary, but it does not say that we cannot do it.

Mr. McCARTHY. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. DALY. The judgment of the Privy Council says it is not essential, but will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies) tell the House how he can legislate to restore the schools which have been taken away, except on the lines of this Bill.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not see any difficulty in legislating.

Mr. DALY. Try it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The scheme of the Bill seems to be wrong. These people have the right of being exempted from taxation for public schools, of selecting books on religious subjects and the right to teach religion in the schools.

Mr. OUIMET. And to manage their schools.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) No. These are rights and privileges, but to say that when the legislature of Manitoba once makes a law creating two superintendents, that for all time to come that cannot be altered, is to me such an absurd proposition that I cannot conceive how it is maintained by gentlemen whose legal opinion I highly value. Does the member for St. John (Mr. McLeod) think that the constitution of a system which has two superintendents vests a right in the minority, which if altered afterwards gives them a right to appeal and vests in us the power to legislate ?

Mr. McLEOD. I submit that we have the right to give back to the minority the privileges and rights which were taken away from them, and which they enjoyed prior to 1890.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It is a right or a privilege limited with respect to education.

Mr. McLEOD. I understand that. Prior to the Act of 1890 there was a general Board of Education, which was divided into Protestant and Catholic sections, and there were two superintendents, one appointed by the Protestant board and one by the Catholic board. Practically the Protestant board managed the Protestant schools, and the Catholic board managed the Catholic schools.

Under the Act of 1890 this right or privilege is taken away. The Lord Chancellor says in reference to that:

> The Manitoba School Acts of 1871 provided for a Board of Education of not less than ten nor more than fourteen members, of whom one-half were to be Protestants and the other half Catholics. The two sections of the board might meet at any time separately. Each section was to choose a chairman, and to have under its control and management the discipline of the schools of the section. One of the Protestant members was to be appointed superintendent of the Protestant schools, and one of the Catholic members superintendent of the Catholic schools, and these two were to be the joint secretaries of the board, which was to select the books to be used in the schools, except those having reference to religion or morals, which were to be prescribed by the sections respectively.
> The sole question to be determined is whether a right or privilege which the Roman Catholic minority previously enjoyed has been affected by the legislation of 1890. Their lordships are unable to see how this question can receive any but an affirmative answer. Contrast the position of the Roman Catholics prior and subsequent to the Acts from which they appeal. Before these passed into law, there existed denominational schools, of which the control and management were in the hands of Roman Catholics, who could select the books to be used and determine the character of the religious teaching. These schools received their proportionate share of the money contributed for school purposes out of the general taxation of the province, and the money raised for these purposes by local assessment was, so far as it fell upon Catholics, applied only toward the support of the Catholic schools.

The right of appeal has been allowed, and the remedial order states what the Catholics have been deprived of.

> (a.) The right to build, maintain, equip, manage, conduct and support Roman Catholic schools, in the manner provided for by the said statutes which were repealed by the two Acts of 1890, aforesaid.

That is one right. They were entitled prior to the Act of 1890, to build, maintain, equip, manage, conduct and support Roman Catholic schools. That right was taken away, and they also had—

> (b.) The right to share proportionately in any grant made out of the public funds for the purposes of education.
> (c.) The right of exemption of such Roman Catholics as contribute to Roman Catholic schools from all payment or contribution to the support of any other schools.

We have the right to legislate to give back those rights or privileges. It is true that the Lord Chancellor said that it may not be necessary to re-enact these provisions, but he does not say that it is not necessary. We may if we please legislate up to the full extent of the rights taken away, and it is for us to determine how far we will legislate in order to remedy the grievances that exist. If we think it is necessary we may give back every single thing that is taken away from the Catholics, or we may not go to the extent if we do not wish to. I will admit that there does seem to be a conflict between subsection 3 and section 4. I leave out subsection 3 because there has been some question about it. But what do we say in subsection "a" of section 4? We say that this separate Board of Education is "to have under its control and management the separate schools, and to make from time to time such regulations as may be deemed fit for their general government and discipline and the carrying out of the provisions of this Act." That is what the Catholic section of the school board had prior to 1890. That is a privilege of which the Catholics have been deprived, and we are seeking to give it back. It seems to me that if we have the right to legislate at all, we have the right to legislate in such a way as shall be effective. It seems to me that the hon. member for Bothwell yields the case when he says that we have the right at some time to do it. If we have the right at some time to do it, we have the right today. It is not true that we have to wait until the Manitoba government and legislature refuse to do it. They have already refused to act under the remedial order, and it is not necessary that we should again go to them and ask them if they will do this before we legislate. The fact that they declined to carry out the terms of the remedial order vested power in this Parliament to give back the rights and privileges that had been taken away, and in doing that we have the right to pass such provisions incidental to our legislation as will make it effective.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman reads from the Lord Chancellor's judgment what was intended to be a historical review of the old educational laws and of the new law of 1890, in order that he might compare the one with the other. The Lord Chancellor never intended to say that all the provisions of the old law which he read conferred rights or privileges; he did not intimate in the least degree that the administration of the law was a right or privilege. The hon. gentleman seems to have misunderstood the argument of the hon. member for Bothwell. The hon. member for Bothwell did not say that you needed to wait for another session. He said, if you have power to restore rights that have been taken away, you may do it now; and if you fear that the local government will not carry out your legislation, you have the right to make the alternative provision that in that event, then such-and-such may take place. My hon. friend says that you undertake, as if you had plenary powers, to direct the local legislature to do so-and-so in regard to a matter which is purely administrative, and which the hon. gentleman in charge of the Bill admits is only incidental to the remedying of a substantial grievance.

Mr. McLEOD. Does the hon. gentleman say that in restoring the rights which have been taken away it is not necessary to make some administrative provisions ?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Personally, I do not see that any administrative provisions are necessary at all. Personally, I say that you might exempt the minority from taxation, and give them the right to build schoolhouses, select books, and have certain standards for teachers. All that could be done without administrative powers, and it might be administered by the existing board as effectively as by the new board you constitute.

Mr. McLEOD. If they will do it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) In point of fact you have to make some very violent assumptions in order to make a prima facie case at all. You have to assume that after the law is passed the local legislature will thwart its exeecution, that you will have to usurp powers of administration which you say are primarily vested in the local government, and, thirdly, that this is a matter of legislation over which you have power. I deny in toto the last proposition. I am prepared tentatively to yield to the proposition of my hon. friend from Bothwell—I have not thought it out—that if you have that power, you may make an alternative provision, that if the local government should attempt to thwart this legislation, certain things may be done to carry it out.

Mr. McLEOD. In doing that you admit that the power is in this Parliament to make such a law.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Not at all.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No. There is a vast difference. Under this Bill you propose to direct the local government what they shall do, and the manner in which they shall do it. That is dealing with a power that is vested in them. But it is quite within your power to put in this Bill a provision that in case they fail to act, such and such a provision shall be made. That is your own Act, and it is not an interference with the local government if they choose to go forward and discharge their legitimate functions.

Mr. DALY. It seems to me that we have got beyond that stage. We gave them that opportunity when the remedial order was issued, and they refused to legislate in the terms of it. Now we are vested with the power to legislate, and we must legislate effectively ; and in order to legislate effectively we must restore any right or privilege that was affected by the legislation of 1890.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. I cannot understand why so much opposition should be raised on this point.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Will the hon. gentleman pardon me if I make one remark ? The motive which prompted the Opposition was this : the belief on the part of the hon. member for Bothwell and myself that these provisions are beyond our powers, and will be declared to be illegal. If we are right, they will affect the whole framework of your Bill. If we are right, your whole Bill goes.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. We are legislating to re-establish the system of separate schools which existed in Manitoba prior to 1890, and we are making certain provisions which are necessary to properly establish that system ; and what is the objection of our hon. friends of the Opposition ? The objection is that we have no right to re-enact the provisions of the old Act with regard to the Board of Education. What is the Board of Education ? It is the very body that creates the school districts, that organizes the whole system, that supervises the working of the Act, that sees to the proper qualification of teachers ; in fact, it is the body that puts into motion the law. We are told that there is already an institution in Manitoba, called the Department of Education, which is vested by the local legislature with all those powers. But it is true also that that institution is inimical to the present system which we are establishing. It was established by a special act of the legislature, with the specific object of carrying out the provisions of the School Act of 1890, and substituted exactly in lieu of that system for which we are asking to-day and is composed, as we know,—not by law, even not by accident—of gentlemen who are entirely non-Catholic, who are Protestant, belonging to the several denominations not Catholic. And these gentlemen of the Opposition—and I believe that is the principal object they have in view—wish in reorganizing the Catholic schools that we put them under the control of that body. Well, my pretension is that if we have the right to re-establish separate schools, we have the right to re-establish all the necessary organization to put our law into operation ; and even if the Board of Education had not existed before, my contention is—the opinion of these hon. gentlemen to the contrary notwithstanding—that we have perfect power to do so, if in order to put the law into operation, it be necessary to create such a board. I believe the objection taken had no basis, and that we are only carrying out the judgment of the Privy Council.

Mr. McCARTHY. It is very plain that there is in this committee a wide difference of opinion as to power. What the hon. gentleman has said would perhaps be a very natural and proper conclusion to come to if we had plenary powers, but he seems to lose sight of this fact, that our power is strictly limited to restoring the rights and privileges of the minority. Let me point out to the hon. gentleman an illustration of what has happened. In Ontario the separate school system is administered by the Department of Education, which is a department of the government. That department gives perfect satisfaction, not merely for the public schools but the separate schools. In point of fact, the complaint is that the department is rather administered in favour of the separate school system and against the public school system. Now, the hon. gentleman will see that, as a matter of fact, the separate school system can be administered without all this machinery. The hon. gentleman properly says that we are not to pass an Act without adequate machinery to make it effective. But if that machinery exists already in the province, the moment we create a separate school system, it comes, ipso facto, under the jurisdiction of the Department of Education. We have to do no more than restore what is complained of. The complaint is that the Roman Catholic minority have been deprived of the right to have schools separate from the non-Catholics and to devote their own taxes to their own schools, and to regulate the qualification of teachers and the curriculum and text-books in those schools, more especially the books relating to religion and morals. If we create separate schools and pass suitable enactments with reference to the teaching and the text-books, and hand these separate schools over to the Department of Education, we remove every ground of complaint, and the machinery is there ready which will make the system effective.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to put him a question ? Is it not a fact that the present Department of Education was specially appointed to put into operation the general school law of the province, and which school law was established in order to do away with the one we now propose to re-enact? And is it not a fact that the proper men have been selected—men sharing the views of the Manitoba government—to put that system against which we are protesting into operation ? We are now about to re-establish the system of separate schools. Is it not proper then that we should re-establish a board having the same views, the same ideas, sympathies and opinions as those who desire to put that system into operation ? Reference has been made to the normal schools——

Mr. McCARTHY. Is not that rather a long question.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I do not want to be an obstructionist.

Mr. McCARTHY. You are obstructing me. The hon. gentleman is confounding power with expediency. He is speaking of what we might do if we had the power. Is it not natural, he asks, that we should hand over the administration to Catholics of the Catholic schools we are going to establish. He is confounding, as a layman, our power, under the circumstances, with our power if we had plenary authority, and the lawyers are seeking to make clear the distinction.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. I suppose I may differ from the hon. gentleman, because lawyers among themselves always do.

Mr. McCARTHY. I am not claiming infallibility for myself any more than for the lawyers, and after all it is only a question of interpreting the English language, which any one is competent to do just as well as the lawyers. At the same time, we are more familiar with the discussion of these questions that the laymen of the House.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Unfortunately.

Mr. McCARTHY. Well, it is the fact. It is one thing to say it would be advisable to make a new board and appoint Catholics to that board if we are going to establish a separate school system, but it is quite another thing to discuss, and that is what we are discussing, whether we have the power or authority to do it. I have pointed out that in the province of Ontario the separate school system is administered by a Department of Education, which is a political body and on which I think there is not one Roman Catholic. I am not speaking of the advisory board, but of the Department of Education, which, I understand, consists of the executive council or a committee thereof. My hon. friend's suggestion means, therefore, that this Parliament should enact that there must be a Roman Catholic in the executive government.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. gentleman has stated, more as a matter of fact than as a matter of law, that there is no Roman Catholic member of the Department of Education of Ontario.

Mr. McCARTHY. I was speaking of the Department of Education which is the executive council or a committee thereof. There is no Roman Catholic——

An hon. MEMBER. There is one.

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes ; there is Mr. Harty. I had forgotten.

Mr. MULOCK. The Department of Education is composed of the government of Ontario or a committee of that government, and there has been, since it was established, one Roman Catholic at least member of that department.

Mr. McCARTHY. Exactly. I had forgotten for the moment that Mr. Harty was a Roman Catholic. But it is not essential that there should be a Roman Catholic on that board. If the suggestion of my hon. friend from Provencher (Mr. LaRivière) were adopted we should go far as to provide that the executive of Manitoba should always have one Roman Catholic member.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. I would not object.

Mr. McCARTHY. I dare say the hon. gentleman would not object, but that law would not be worth the paper it was written on. Now we come back to the question whether we have power to do more than restore the privileges—and privileges they were—which the Roman Catholics were deprived of or which they were denied by a virtue of this legislation. Those privileges have been stated more than once and I need hardly repeat them. They were simply with reference to the withdrawal of their taxes from the support of public schools, and the devotion of them to the maintenance of separate schools, and the religious exercises of denominational teaching in those schools. My hon. friend from St. John (Mr. McLeod) relies for support for his argument on the language of the reasons of the judgment. But he has misread the judgment, if I may be permitted to say so. It is true that the Lord Chancellor first sets forth the old system and contrasts it with the new system. But when he comes to speak of the privileges his language seems singularly restricted and quite in accordance with the view we press upon the committee. At the top of page 10, after giving a historical review showing the state of affairs, and having stated the legal questions, he goes on :

> The sole question to be determined is whether a right or privilege which the Roman Catholic minority previously enjoyed has been affected by the legislation of 1890. Their lordships are unable to see how this question can receive any but an affirmative answer. Contrast the position of the Roman Catholics prior and subsequent to the acts from which they appeal. Before these passed into law there existed denominational schools, of which the control and management were in the hands of Roman Catholics, who could select the books to be used, and determine the character of the religious teaching.

Exactly what we say :

> These schools received their proportionate share of the money contributed for school purposes out of the general taxation of the province, and the money raised for these purposes by local assessment was, so far as it fell upon Catholics, applied only towards the support of Catholic schools.

Now, what possible difficulty is there in this Parliament declaring that there shall be separate schools and that these shall be public schools if necessary under the provision of the Manitoba legislation. I do not think it would be necessary to go so far. But the moment you do that you cast upon the department in the first place, and upon the advisory board in the second place all the duties with reference to education. It is not a question of legislation, it is not a question whether the legislature shall obey us or not, because ours will be law just as theirs is law. The moment our Act receives the assent of the Governor General, that moment the law is as effective, so far as it is within our power, as if it had been passed by the legislature of the province. You read the two laws together.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It would be read into the Education Act of Manitoba.

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes, and you get the whole scheme of administration. If not you are treading upon dangerous ground and rendering it more than probable—no lawyer likes to commit himself—that our Act will not be worth the paper it is written on. I do not know how my hon. friends on the other side look at this difficulty which suggests itself to my mind. The Minister of the Interior, of course, does not pledge himself to do more than consider whether subsection 2 of section 3 shall be withdrawn. But suppose we go on and pass section 4, when are we to deal with section 2 ? Surely, this is our time to deal with section 4, if we are to deal with it at all.

Mr. DALY. Go on and discuss it.

Mr. McCARTHY. We have to do so now. Having passed subsection 2 of section 3, we have to go upon the basis that we have handed over to the Department of Education what perhaps was not necessary, the organization of these schools. And so the argument which was adduced and which has never yet been answered and which the Minister of the Interior says certainly is formidable, that there is a conflict between the two sections, still remains unsolved. I would pass now to another consideration that is involved. It should be in the recollection of the Minister of the Interior,—who set me right upon that subject, I may say—that the original view of the government of the province was not to do away with separate schools. The hon. gentleman has always given me credit for the policy of doing away with the separate schools. I am very proud if that be the case, yet I am inclined to think I am not entitled to so much credit. But it is undoubtedly the fact, as I learned subsequently, that their first policy was to do away with the dual system. The original view of the Manitoba government was to leave the separate schools and do away with the double system of administering the schools, in other words to constitute a Department of Education, such as that in Ontario, and allow the Department of Education and the advisory board to administer public and separate schools. Why were they induced to change that view ? Mainly on account of the inefficiency of the separate schools, which is acknowledged by this Bill. The Government here have not dared to propose to restore to the Board of Education all the powers which the Roman Catholic section of the board possessed. The Government has not dared to say that they shall have full control of the qualifications of teachers ; and it is not ventured to endow that board with full authority with regard to books. It is tacitly, if not openly, admitted that the Roman Catholic system of education in the province was inefficient, and did not give value for the money that was expended. That was one reason. Besides, there was this other and still more important reason, in one sense. We all know what an enormous heavy tax it is, even in the old provinces, to support our schools. There is no tax, perhaps, we pay more willingly, but there is no tax that bears more heavily upon us. I was reading the other day that in the province of Ontario the total sum spent on public schools annually is about four million dollars. Now, the bulk of that comes by direct taxation, and it is a tax which the legislature has given to the trustees without limitation. A municipal body is limited to two cents on the dollar of assessment; but the school trustees have practically unlimited control in the matter of taxation, and it is a very large and necessarily heavy taxation. It must fall more heavily in a new country like Manitoba, where the population is not only sparse, but scattered; and Manitoba deserves great credit, I think, in that, out of her scanty revenue, she expends $120,000 a year for the purpose of education. I looked the other day at the Education Act that passed in Nova Scotia in 1864, at a time when she was much more populous than Manitoba is to-day. At that time the grant for education, if my memory serves me right, was only $50,000 a year.

An hon. MEMBER. $180,000.

Mr. McCARTHY. I am speaking of the original Act of 1864. I remember it was one of the accusations made against the measure that it did not adequately provide for education. It was pointed out that the revenue had been very good and the people were very prosperous, and although the census had shown that there was a great deal of ignorance prevailing, the grant was very small; and it occurred to me at that time that Manitoba deserved great credit for having granted $120,000 annually. Now, of that sum, according to the statements which have been furnished to us, a very considerable portion was spent in administration. The object in doing away with the dual system was to get rid of the inefficiency, in the first place, and to save the cost of administration, in the second place. Now, I suppose it won't be denied that either this Act is to be a dead letter, or some pecuniary provision must be made for its administration. I think we are entitled to know, before we go much further, what the intentions of the Government are with respect to that. We know that two or three times during the debate on the second reading and on the motion to go into committee, the Government were challenged to say whether they proposed or intended to make any further provision than is embraced in this statute. At present there is no provision for this Board of Education, for the inspectors to be appointed by it, with a treasurer and secretary. Under the old system, I see they aggregated $5,680 a year. Now, are we going to say to Manitoba, for it comes to that: Although you desire to economize your money and to see that it is wisely and prudently expended, we will impose on you a system which must, unless you supplement it with a grant, involve, so far as you are concerned, a double expenditure in the administration of your schools? I appeal now to every hon. gentleman who is desirous of seeing this an effective measure. We all know, of course, that a school board cannot be made effective without money: we know that it cannot be administered without money. I can understand that this Act does not provide any means, but as practical men we must realize that the intention is in some way or other to supplement that. If that is to be supplemented, we are compelling the province of Manitoba to waste its money on two systems of education, and on two machineries for education, when one is ample for the purpose. I think we ought to know why the Government insist on our involving the province in that expenditure. I will not say more until I hear what the Government have to say on that point.

Mr. DALY. If the hon. gentleman means in reference to money, it is time enough to bid his Satanic Majesty good day when you meet him. That question is provided for in clause 74, and when we reach it, we will discuss that question. In the meantime, I hardly think the position of separate schools in Ontario is at all analogous to the position the separate schools occupied in Manitoba prior to the Act of 1890. As stated by the hon. gentleman, it is perfectly true that the Department of Education in Ontario does regulate and control separate schools; and before the Department of Education was created, the Council of Public Instruction regulated the schools. But the hon. gentleman forgot to say that a system of separate schools exists there by law, and that the trustees, for instance, are vested with certain powers by virtue of the Separate School Act, and the Department of Education only administers and regulates the separate schools within the meaning of the Separate School Act. The hon. gentleman then went on to say what the original intention of the Manitoba government was. I do not know what their original intention was, but I presume that it was to wipe out the Board of Education, and to have a Department of Education the same as they have at present. Now, if they had stopped there, with a Department of Education, and left the Roman Catholic minority the rights they enjoyed under the law prior to 1890, there would have been no trouble, I presume, because, even if the law was to be administered by a department instead of a board, they would have left there the same rights and privileges that the minority enjoyed prior to 1890, namely, the right to control and manage their own schools, subject to the general management by a Board of Education. Now, what the minority complain of, amongst other things, is that they have been deprived of the sole control of their schools, which they had prior to 1890. Amongst other things they had the right to select all the books, maps and globes to be used in the schools under their control.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). There are no schools to control, they are abolished.

Mr. DALY. But they had schools, and they had power to select all the books, maps and globes to be used in those schools. Now, the hon. gentleman says, why can't we propose certain legislation here restoring them the rights, and let the advisory board administer. Well, under the Act of 1890 the advisory board prescribed, for instance, religious instruction. That would not be acceptable to the minority, because, under the law as it existed prior to 1890, they regulated religious instruction themselves; so that would have to be amended. We have no right to amend the Act of 1890 in this Parliament.

Mr. McCARTHY. That is what we are doing.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Certainly, that is what we are doing.

Mr. DALY. We are not repealing the Act of 1890.

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes, pro tanto.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). We are repealing the Act of 1890 so far as it is inconsistent with this Act.

Mr. DALY. Just so far as it is inconsistent. You cannot specifically take away from the board's powers.

Mr. McCARTHY. But you can say with respect to the separate schools that the powers of the advisory board shall not apply. Here are some of the powers of the advisory board: To make regulations regarding ventilation and furnishing of school-houses. I think the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. LaRivière) would be willing to say that even an individual like myself could do that. I do not think it requires a Roman Catholic to decide questions of ventilation, equipment and furnishing of school-houses.

Mr. McLEOD. What are you reading from?

Mr. McCARTHY. I am reading the powers of the advisory board under the Act of 1890. The powers of the advisory board are thus stated in subsection "a":

> To make regulations for the dimensions, equipment, style, plan, furnishing, decoration and ventilation of school-houses, and for the arrangement and requisites of school premises.

Then the next subsection is:

> To examine and authorize text books and books of reference for the use of pupils and school libraries.

You add to that, that in the separate schools the books on religion and morals shall be subject to the approval of the Board of Education, of the Archbishop, or a competent authority, in any way you think fit; but you leave the secular books subject to the control of the advisory board. That is not very wrong, and I feel more satisfied with regard to it when I find that the commissioners of this Government included that in their suggestions. They actually proposed that the books on educational subjects, as they term them, shall be left to the advisory board, and that the books on religion and morals or religion shall be subject to the approval of some Roman Catholic authority. The suggestion made by Sir Donald Smith and the Minister of Justice and his colleagues who went to Manitoba was this: "That the text books permitted in the Catholic schools shall be such as shall not offend the religious views of the minority, and which from an educational standpoint shall be satisfactory to the advisory board." So the Dominion commissioners absolutely suggested the advisory board as the proper board to decide the educational standard of those books, the only provision being that the books should not be offensive to the minority. So there is no difficulty in adopting subsection "b." Then we come to subsection "c" of the law of Manitoba:

> To determine the qualifications of teachers and inspectors for high and public schools.

What do we find in this Bill? We find the teachers are to be certificated, and that the certificates issued by or under authority shall be recognized by the Board of Education. There is no objection to that. The Manitoba Act provides further:

> To determine the standard to be obtained by pupils for admission to high schools.

There is no objection to that.

> To decide or make suggestions concerning such matters as may from time to time be referred to them by the Department of Education.

Will hon. members say that is not right?

> To appoint examiners for the purpose of preparing examination papers for teachers' certificates and for entrance examination papers for teachers' certificates and for entrance admission of pupils to high schools, who shall report to the Department of Education.

What do the minority want? They want Roman Catholics on the advisory board. I object to that. What is the answer of the Government? We offered Archbishop Taché a place on the advisory board, which he declined to accept. Then I admit that the clause prescribing the form of religious exercises should not be made applicable, but we should get some other body.

To prescribe the exercises and prayers to be used in the separate schools.

Again :

To make regulations for the classification, organization, discipline or government of normal, model, high and public schools.

To determine to whom such certificate shall issue.

To decide upon all disputes and complaints made before them, the settlement of which is not otherwise provided by law.

Is it not plain to every hon. member of the committee that this advisory board is just as competent, whether Protestant or heathen, infidel or Turk, to determine these matters as members of the board brought up in the most sacred religious institution that was ever endowed for the promotion of the Roman Catholic faith ? Yet we are proposing to pass a law which may possibly be unalterable, stating that there shall be for all time a double system as regards the administration of schools in Manitoba, with all it involves in the way of expense and inconvenience. The hon. Minister said it will be time enough to discuss the pecuniary sections when section 74 is reached. Is that so ? Surely every clause of this Bill, if it ever should become law, will have to be interpreted with respect to what goes before and what follows it. Now we see that the Government propose to enact with respect to the legislative grant as follows :—

74. The right to share proportionately in any grant made out of public funds for the purpose of education having been decided to be and being now one of the rights and privileges of the said Roman Catholic minority of Her Majesty's subjects in the province of Manitoba, any sum granted by the legislature of Manitoba and appropriated for the separate schools shall be placed to the credit of the Board of Education in accounts to be opened in the books of the Treasury Department and in the Audit Office.

Is it not perfectly plain that the Government do not intend to tie their hands ? The whole monetary grant is dependent upon the Manitoba legislature, and this is merely an empty declaration. Here we are face to face with the initial difficulty at this stage of the measure, with the fact that it is proposed to constitute a board that is unnecessary ; that it is proposed to provide no money for paying the board when it is constituted, and it is proposed to hand over the administration of the schools to a board which can never go into effective operation. I think, with all deference to the Minister of Interior, the committee ought to know at least this month, and it is not asking too much,—do the Government propose to make any further provision than that in section 74 ? Is the beginning and the end of the pecuniary provision which the Government propose to submit ? I do not think the hon. gentleman will object to answer that question.

Mr. DALY. I do not object to answer it, because I am not in a position to say what the Government will do in regard to that matter. One thing we may take cognizance of, and it is this : according to the terms of the Bill, if the Government do not make provision, the minority are prepared to assume the burthen of further responsibility in taking care of those schools. As to a remark made by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) as to interfering with the Manitoba Act of 1890, the hon. gentleman cannot find in any provision of the Bill anything to affect or interfere with the present school legislation of Manitoba. This Bill is simply supplementary to the legislation as it stands to-day.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman said just now that the minority were willing to assume the further burden in connection with the support of the separate school system. In what way does he come by that knowledge ; whom does he assume to represent in making that statement ?

Mr. DALY. I should have said presumably. If the Government does not provide further in the Bill for money for carrying out its provisions, then the people will be willing to assume the burden themselves.

Mr. WALLACE. It seems to me that the first section of clause 4 will conflict with subsection 2 of clause 3. They both cover the same powers, they being both intended to make regulations for a general organization of separate schools. It is inevitable that there will be a conflict between the different powers. The Department of Education is already organized by the representatives of the poeple up there, and when we are appointing a Board of Education with specific powers, it occurs to me, that should a conflict occur, that the rules of the Board of Education should prevail. The Department of Education might appoint a superintendent and the Board of Education might appoint another superintendent over the separate schools. Which of those two is to rule ? The next difficulty will be as to the selection of the books, &c. The Department of Education prescribes one set of books and the Board of Education another. In my opinion it will destroy the usefulness of the schools in the start, and at any rate it is entirely unnecessary. In the province of Ontario the one central authority regulates all matters with respect to the public schools and the separate schools. Why cannot the same thing be done here ? It was stated by the member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) that the Department of Education was to organize the schools and that the Board of Education was to run the schools after they were organized. The utter absurdity of that statement was pointed out, and we have not heard it repeated. The entire powers of discipline and of the carrying out of this Act, which is a very elaborate Act, are given to this Board of Education. The Minister of the Interior said that presumably this Board of Education would not be a burden upon the community in general. Does he mean to tell us that the superintendent who would perform the onerous duties of his office was to receive no remuneration whatever. If he is to receive remuneration the people who are taxed for the support of the maintenance of the schools, especially in rural districts, will find it an exceedingly heavy burden to maintain these schools. If it is carried out as suggested by the Minister of the Interior, the organiation and the running of the department would become a dead letter, because no one would perform such duties for nothing. It was stated by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. McLeod) that we should make ample provisions to carry out the desires of those who wish for separate schools; but that is directly contrary to the express wish of the Privy Council. The Privy Council has simply stated that this Parliament is to supplement the local legislation if necessary. It says:

> It is certainly not essential to the statutes repealed by the Act of 1890 should be re-enacted, or that the precise provisions of these statutes should again be made law. The system of education embodied in the Acts of 1890 no doubt commends itself to, and adequately supplies the wants of the great majority of the inhabitants of the province. All legitimate grounds of complaint would be removed if that system were supplemented by the provisions which would remove the grievance upon which the appeal is founded, and were modified so far as might be necessary to give effect to these provisions.

It simply means to supplement that legislation by legislation which will give relief where relief is found to be desirable. The intention of the Privy Council was not to have a new and elaborate law enacted or the old school system of schools re-established, which in almost every particular appears to be done by this Act. It was not compulsory on us to legislate; and that, I believe, is now conceded by everybody. We were first told that this was a judgment of the Privy Council, and that that judgment had to be obeyed, and separate schools had to be established in Manitoba. But now all these contentions are dropped, and it is acknowledged that this is a matter on which we are free to legislate or not as we see fit; and if we do think it desirable to legislate, the decision of the Privy Council says it is not necessary to establish a complete system of separate schools. In view of that, I think the first subsection of section 4 should be dropped, and the Department of Education should be left to make such regulations as they may think fit for the general organization of separate schools. If you do not do that, but if you go on and give all these unnecessary powers to a Board of Education, then you will start the same agitation in other provinces of the Dominion. In the North-west there is a system of separate schools which is worked without the elaborate machinery provided in this Bill. That system works satisfactorily; at least they are complying with the law, they are giving a good education to the people, and there is no injustice done to any one. But we were told by Archbishop Langevin in a speech he made some months ago at Edmonton, that the North-west Territories would claim the same rights as the province of Manitoba. What rights? The rights embodied in this Act. They have a separate schools system there now, but they have not two separate boards. The North-west Council do not think that they are necessary. The province of Ontario do not think they are necessary. They have not been found necessary in the province of Quebec. There is no Protestant Board of Education in the province of Quebec. The whole department is managed and controlled by the Roman Catholics, and I do not hear of any grievous complants from the minority in that province, though I admit there are some grounds of complaint in that regard. The province of Manitoba is the first part of the Dominion for which such a thing has yet been proposed. In the province of Quebec they have not two boards.

Mr. FREMONT. In the province of Quebec they have two sections which sit separately, a Catholic and a Protestant section. It is very seldom that the whole board sits together.

Mr. WALLACE. I am told that the whole board sits together.

Mr. FREMONT. Sometimes, but very seldom.

Mr. WALLACE. There is but one board, and more than that, there is but one superintendent, so I am informed. Is that correct?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes.

Mr. WALLACE. The superintendent is a Roman Catholic.

Mr. FREMONT. Not necessarily.

Mr. WALLACE. He has not a vote on the board, but he carries out the instructions of the board. He takes his instructions, I assume, from the whole board.

Mr. FREMONT. From the different sections.

Mr. WALLACE. They have only one superintendent in the province of Quebec, and why should they require two in the province of Manitoba? Why should they require the machinery duplicated in Manitoba when it is not duplicated in the province of Ontario?

Mr. FOSTER. There is no question of difference there. They all agree to it.

Mr. WALLACE. Then is there any reason why they should not all agree to it in the province of Manitoba ?

Mr. FOSTER. None.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Then it is only a pure question of policy whether each member of the House thinks this dual system ought to be established.

Mr. WALLACE. If it is not necessary in the province of Quebec, I do not see why it should be necessary in the province of Manitoba, more particularly as the minority in the province of Quebec is more numerous perhaps than the whole population of Manitoba, and ten times as numerous as the minority in that province. I was referring to the fact that the Archbishop of St. Boniface had made the statement that they will have the same rights, as he calls them, in the Territories, where he is dissatisfied with the administration of the law, as in the province of Manitoba ; that is, if we establish two systems of machinery for the schools in the province of Manitoba, he will demand the same thing for the Territories. I have here a report of a speech he made at Edmonton in December last, in which he said :

> They claimed that the minority in the Territories have the same constitutional rights as in Ontario. As long as you in the Territories have not your school-books, your teachers, your inspectors, your training for teachers, you have no separate schools in fact.

But the Protestant minority in the province of Quebec have not these things, nor have the Roman Catholic minority in the province of Ontario to the same extent as he demands them :

> Are your interests protected on the Council of Public Instruction by a representative without a vote ? The council meets and may listen to your representative, but does as it pleases afterwards. Such a system could not be accepted. He had a direct interest in the school question in the North-west, as a part of the district of Assiniboia was included within his diocese. The Catholics of the Territories were bound in conscience to fight to obtain here what they in Manitoba wanted, and were bound to have.

That is the view of Archbishop Langevin, and if the Parliament of Canada passes this Bill, he will immediately come to the doors of Parliament and make a demand—he has given notice of it—for the same rights in the Territories as they have in the province of Manitoba ; and for myself I do not well see how he could be refused. We should not by legislation in this Parliament inflict on a sparsely-settled country, where there are many public works to be undertaken, where there are many school-houses to be built, the additional burden of this unnecessary Board of Education, more especially against the wish of the people. There is a Department of Education existing in that province, to which we have given large general powers, and every step taken by this school board will bring them into conflict with that department. In the appointment of superintendents, in the selection of text-books, the selection of sites, and the school regulations, you will have two conflicting powers, each looking at those matters from a different point of view. I have heard two hon. members declare that they were ready to suggest other legislation to take the place of this, which would be more effective and satisfactory all around. I think that opportunity should be given these hon. members to remove the difficulties which are so apparent in this measure. Then we have commissioners to Manitoba. Proposals have been made by the government of Manitoba for the settlement of this question, proposals have been also made by our own commissioners,—would it not be better that we should have these two sets of proposals before us before undertaking to push through this legislation ? Our commissioners to the Manitoba government and all those who are interested in having a peaceable, amicable and honourable settlement have, at any rate, made some progress. They have no doubt come together to some extent, and the extent to which they have come together and agreed might be embodied in the legislation now before the House with most satisfactory results : or, at any rate, by considering the proposals made on either side, we might succeed in making more easy the settlement of this question and the legislatinon before the House. For these reasons, I think this clause might be dropped until we have before us the results of the conference and the reports of the views expressed on either side.

Mr. MULOCK. The only difficulty in the way of the Government acting upon the suggestions that have been made as regards delegating the administration of this law largely to the local legislature arises from the construction placed by the Government upon the order of the Privy Council. If the Government will concede what individual members supporting this Bill on either side admit, that we are not obliged to go the full length of the repealed law, they will have no difficulty in granting what is suggested. The judgment of the Privy Council has cast no duty upon the Canadian Parliament but is simply declaratory of the law, and makes it quite clear that we may legislate to the extent to which Manitoba may have taken away the rights or privileges of the Catholic minority. That being the case, I doubt whether any lawyer in this House will deny that we still enjoy discretionary power either to withhold all or any legislation or to legislate to the full extent of restoring all the rights or privileges taken away. I understand that the Government practically take the view, that we have that discretion, since they say that their remedial order falls far short of what they are entitled to do under the judgment of the Privy Council. We therefore are now confronted with this proposition. The legislature of Manitoba took away the right of the Roman Catholics in Manitoba to maintain their separate schools, and this Government has determined to restore these schools. Now, can the Government not do so without providing unnecessary and new machinery, expensive and cumbersome, calculated to impair the efficiency of that separate system. If Parliament restores the separate schools, we are bound to restore such a system as will give efficiency to those schools. It is fair to assume that the Roman Catholic minority of Manitoba, in asking for the restoration of separate schools, desire to have a system that will be at least equal to the other system working side by side with it. And they and those who are pressing this legislation, I trust, would be the last who would seek to have an inferior system of education for the Roman Catholic minority which would handicap the Catholics in the race of life with those of other denominations in the province. It is now proposed to provide machinery, instead of following such precedents as we have in other parts of the Dominion. In the province of Ontario, for instance, we have the dual system, and the separate schools are conducted efficiently. The education given in these separate schools compares favourably with that in the public schools. I do not pretend to speak with full knowledge, but I have heard with pleasure that where Roman Catholic children educated in separate schools have appeared in competition with children educated in the public schools, as in the competitive examination for entrance into the high schools and collegiate institutes, they have acquitted themselves most creditably. I believe that, while the religious training in these schools is under the control of the church, yet the secular work of administration is under the control of the responsible government of the day. And this system works well. I am not aware of any objection to the system by the Roman Catholic authorities. I have no authority to speak in their behalf, but, as an observer of passing events, I must say, if negative testimony is of any service, that I have never heard of any objections taken by the authorities of the Roman Catholic Church in Ontario against the administration of the separate school system. And I venture to believe that the injection into this Bill of this clause creating a dual system of administration is not from the necessity in the abstract, but because the church in Manitoba apprehends that the government of that province will not administer the school law loyally in obedience to any Act of this Parliament. If such be the motive for hesitation on the part of the Roman Catholic hierarchy of Manitoba and the reason why this Government have sought to provide machinery as well as to declare rights, then I submit that it is premature for this Parliament to provide for a default. It would be ample, I submit, for us to provide machinery to enforce such a law if the province which primarily ought to administer it, makes default. Now, if we look at our own province we find that the school law has been administered by the present Premier of Ontario during his long term of office with entire satisfaction, as I believe, to the Roman Catholic people of our province. And it is to be borne in mind that the Premier of Ontario was opposed to the establishment of the separate school system. He was a member of the old legislature of Canada prior to confederation, and also a member of Parliament when the Confederation Act was evolved. And I understand that throughout his connection with that Parliament he, on the floor of the House, by voice and vote, opposed the establishment of a separate school system. Nevertheless, the Parliament of that day created the system, and the Confederation Act confirmed it, and thus were rights vested in the Catholics of Ontario, the exercise of which depended upon the provincial government loyally working out the system. It has happened that for nearly a quarter of a century the working of that separate school system has depended largely on the Premier of Ontario, himself an opponent of the system. I would ask the Government if it is not safe to assume from that that if we restore the rights that have been taken away by the Manitoba Act of 1890 to maintain a separate school system, history will repeat itself, and that this and succeeding governments in Manitoba will do as the governments in Ontario have done—loyally and efficiently administer the law ? The Minister of the Interior says the conditions are different. I submit that a right, whether it accrues to the people under an Imperial Act or under a local Act, or under two Acts, an Act of the province supplemented by a Dominion Act, is a right, no matter from what source it comes. So if once this Parliament, by supplementary legislation, creates rights for the benefit of the minority in Manitoba, we must assume that the authorities in Manitoba will work out these rights just as the authorities in Ontario have worked out the rights of the minority there. Now, Sir, it is proposed by this system to create an unnecessary board of management. What are some of the objections ? There will be a conflict of authority. I will not anticipate the subsections of clause 4 further than to intimate that there are provisions there which I think are controversial and therefore ought not to receive the sanction of this committee. The maintenance of one board facilitates the maintenance of one uniform system of secular education.

Where the two systems of education differentiate; that section which passes under the control of the Roman Catholic Church at once has grafted upon it, under our Act, the provision for religious training, and to that extent I am free to admit, assuming that we restore separate schools instead of allowing Manitoba to do so, that whatever machinery is necessary in order to give full effect to that feature must be provided here or somewhere. But as to the machinery which is necessary in order to deal with the secular side, I see no good to accrue to the minority or to the majority from a duplicate system of administration. For example, can anybody give a good reason for there being a separate board of examiners in order to qualify teachers for separate schools ?

Mr. MASSON. It is not made necessary under the Act.

Mr. MULOCK. It will be their duty. It is proposed under this clause that the Roman Catholic Board of Education are to prescribe subjects for examination and rules for examination, to appoint examiners and to issue certificates. Now, although you may say that these examiners shall have a certain ideal standard before them, any one who is at all familiar with the system of education knows full well that in order that candidates for examination may come up to the same standard, they must be examined under the same conditions, they must have the same subjects for examination, and be examined almost concurrently. They must have the same questions presented to them, and the same examiners to read and value their answers. It is wholly impossible to have a uniform standard of secular education in the province if you have two distinct boards of examiners, one conducted under the responsible government of the day, and another under the control of a denomination. Sir, I can conceive of nothing more antagonistic to the interests of the Catholic minority than to place the standard of education for the Catholic minority under the control of a church that is not wholly, or even to a large extent, connected with the affairs of the world. Now, I speak in the fullest sincerity. I speak full of sympathy for the Catholic minority. I have been connected with educational matters myself, as a labour of love, for nearly a quarter of a century ; and I speak now, not as a party man, not as a politician, but I speak as a citizen seeking the best interests of the minority in Ontario, Manitoba and every other part of this Dominion ; and I say again that it will be impossible to maintain a high standard of secular education for the benefit of the Catholic minority of Manitoba if the control of that education as regards the selection of text books, the appointment of examiners, the qualification of examiners, the inspection of schools, and all the other features necessary to ascertain results and to produce the best results so long as your whole machinery is not under the control of responsible persons such as the government of the day, or others representing the general public. So that I anticipate subsection "c" of this section, and point out in advance one of the injuries that the friends of the minority in this House are going to bring upon them by creating a separate board such as this. Now, let me show how the law is in Ontario. In Ontario we have the Department of Education, referred to by a former speaker. This department is composed of members of the Ontario government, or of a committee of them, as may be determined by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council. Now, what are their duties ? I will just read briefly, not to take up too much time, what duties are vested in this board in Ontario, for I am sure this Act must have escaped the attention of the friends of those who are supporting this clause. Let me read just a few clauses :

> The Educational Department of the province of Ontario has the following powers :
> To make regulations for the classification, organization, discipline and government of normal, model, high, public and separate schools ; for the equipment and ventilation of school houses ; for the arrangement and requisites of school premises ; for the authorization of text books for the use of pupils, and for teachers, and the qualifications and duties of inspectors, examiners and teachers and assistants in high schools.

I may be told that that clause does not provide for the examination of separate school teachers ; but on that point I would say, referring to the Separate School Act itself, that the provision is therein contained that the teachers in separate schools must pass the ordinary examination. The Separate School Act, section 61, provides as follows :—

> The teachers of separate schools under this Act shall be subject to the same examinations and receive their certificates of qualification in the same manner, as public school teachers generally.

Mr. MASSON. There is a proviso to that.

Mr. MULOCK. That proviso has only to do with certain persons qualified. The proviso goes on to say :

> But the persons qualified by law as teachers, either in the province of Ontario, or at the time of the passing of the British North America Act, in the province of Quebec, shall be considered qualified teachers for the purpose of this Act.

That proviso has only to do with certain persons at that time qualified. But to-day, if any person desires to become a separate school teacher in the province of Ontario, he would have to undergo the ordinary examination required of all public school teachers.

Mr. MASSON. Oh, no.

Mr. MULOCK. Yes, that is the interpretation they have put upon it. I think you will find that they have to get their qualification in that way.

Mr. MASSON. That proviso was added long after confederation.

Mr. MULOCK. But it only dealt with the vested rights of individuals at the time.

Mr. MASSON. The vested rights of a class.

Mr. MULOCK. A man who was a teacher at that time.

Mr. MASSON. No, long after.

Mr. MULOCK. Well, at the time this section was framed. It does not apply to the future at all.

Mr. MASSON. It has been amended since.

Mr. MULOCK. Does the hon. gentleman say that to-day a teacher for the separate schools is examined and receives qualification from the separate school authorities ?

Mr. MASSON. I meant to say that has been amended since. It is in the consolidation.

Mr. MULOCK. That proviso has nothing to do with the qualification of teachers to-day.

Mr. MASSON. I only called attention to the proviso, as you were drawing a parallel from that section.

Mr. MULOCK. As I understand the law in the province of Ontario—it is possible I may have omitted some section, but I shall be very much surprised if I have—the separate school teachers in the separate schools to-day are required to undergo the same examination as candidates for public school certificates.

Mr. HUGHES. As to the qualification of Roman Catholic teachers in Ontario, is it not a fact that the certificates of Roman Catholic teachers for the province of Quebec are also acceptable for separate schools in the province of Ontario ? Do not the Christian Brothers, who teach in Ottawa and Toronto, do so under the qualification obtained in the province of Quebec ?

Mr. MULOCK. There may be a provision for the acceptance of certificates from other bodies, but I am not aware of it. Is the hon. gentleman aware that such is the case ?

Mr. HUGHES. If the hon. gentleman will read the separate school law of Ontario he will find what I have said is the case.

Mr. McCARTHY. To what clause does the hon. gentleman refer ?

Mr. HUGHES. I refer to the fact that the Christian Brothers, who teach in separate schools in Ontario and draw public money, are teaching under qualifications obtained in Quebec, and are not required to pass the examinations laid down for public school teachers in Ontario.

Mr. McCARTHY. To what clause of the Separate School Act does the hon. gentleman refer ?

Mr. MULOCK. I have the Act here, and perhaps the hon. gentleman will point out the clause.

Mr. HUGHES. I state it as a fact.

Mr. MULOCK. I do not wish to contradict the hon. gentleman, but I have the Act here, and he has not the Act at hand, and I ask him to point out the section. I was seeking to show the powers which the law of Ontario has vested in the Educational Department of the province in regard to public and separate schools, and I am anxious for some hon. member to point out wherein those provisions have disappointed the friends of the minority, what valid objections have been taken by the Roman Catholic Church in Ontario to the powers to which I am alluding, which have for years been exercised by the Education Department ? If there has been no serious objection taken, am I not correct in suggesting that these provisions should form a basis as regards any rights we are about to create. I quoted subsection 1 of section 4 to make good the statement I made, that separate school teachers were required to undergo the examination as public school teachers. I now proceed to subsection 2, which provides that the Ontario government is to appoint inspectors for high and separate schools and for teachers' institutes. These are powers vested in the Government in order to ascertain that the separate schools are living up to the standard. Has any abuse come from that provision ? Is it a wholesome provision ? What is the weight of evidence as to the wisdom of it ? I ask the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes), as he appears to be interested in this branch of the subject, does he favour the delegation of the right of inspecting separate schools to the board of trustees of the separate schools, or would he prefer such duty to be performed by the Government of the day ?

Mr. HUGHES. For a number of years I have insisted that the inspection of these schools in Ontario shall be under the control of county inspectors, and I have been opposed by hon. gentlemen opposite. I am in favour of that rule being applied to Ontario and also to Manitoba. The hon. member for North York is in favour of there being one law for Manitoba and another law for Ontario.

Mr. MULOCK. I do not understand the hon. gentleman's logic. The hon. gentleman appears to be in favour of some system of county inspection, which is indirectly the same principle, that the inspection should be under the control of the people as a whole and not under a section of it.

Mr. HUGHES. The hon. gentleman certainly knows that in Ontario, Roman Catholic separate schools are not under the inspection of the county school inspectors, but under the inspection of Roman Catholics, recommended by the authorities of the Roman Catholic Church to the Ontario government, and by them appointed on such recommendation. He will not deny that.

Mr. MULOCK. The question is one of responsibility. The hon. gentleman complains that the Ontario government do not properly discharge their duties. That is a matter quite different from the adoption of an unsound scheme. What we are discussing now is, what would be a proper scheme if it were properly worked out. I presume we will always find in this mundane sphere defects in everything carried out by man, and there will always be shortcomings. All we can do is to legislate so as to place in the hands of the people the best instrument and enable them to use it to the best advantage. I am not aware that I have ever interchanged opinions with the hon. gentleman in public or in private on educational matters, so that this tremendous conflict he has been waging for some years, and in which he has said he has been opposed by the Opposition, including myself, is, so far as I know about this alleged battle, entirely a myth.

Mr. HUGHES. I would ask the hon. gentleman if he has not taken the platform in Ontario in opposition to Mr. Meredith, and defended the appointment of Roman Catholic school inspectors, paid out of the provincial funds, and who are recommended for their positions by the Roman Catholic Church ? I ask him also if he has not endorsed the position of allowing Roman Catholic schools in Ontario to use whatever school-books they choose ? Again, I ask, if he has not in Ontario publicly endorsed the policy of the Ontario government in making members of the Roman Catholic Church, ipso facto separate school inspectors, instead of the public school supporters ? Has the hon. gentleman not defended these acts of the Ontario government time and again ?

Mr. MULOCK. You would no doubt rule me out of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker, if I were to enter into my political autobiography. In reply to the hon. gentleman, I will simply say that while no doubt he has taken a very prominent part in the discussion of these public matters, this is the first time I have known that he had any opinion upon them. I was proceeding to show what other powers have been exercised under the law by the Ontario government in regard to public and separate schools. The next clause is in regard to the appointment of a central committee of examination, which shall consist of not more than seven persons, whose duty it shall be, under the direction of the Minister, to prepare papers for the examination of teachers and the admission of pupils into the high schools and collegiate institutes, and to report to the Minister the result of such examinations. That provision applies to the public and separate schools. The appointment of the central committee rests with the Educational Department of the Government of the day. It is the duty of these examiners to prepare examination papers, to see that the examination is properly conducted, and to make their reports to the Government as to the success or failure of the candidates for public school teacher's certificates, or for separate school teacher's certificates. I am not aware that the provisions of that section have ever yet been adversely criticised by any class of the people. I am free to admit that criticisms have been from time to time directed towards the manner in which examinations have been conducted, but that species of criticism is inseparable from every examination because unsuccessful candidates always believe that their failure is attributable to another cause than their lack of qualification. I am satisfied that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Daly) could not secure a recommendation now, from the representatives of the Roman Catholic Church in the province of Ontario, to take these powers away from the Education Department. There is a very laudable ambition—and it is a gratifying thing to me—on the part of the hierarchy of the Roman Catholic Church of the province of Ontario, to equip their Catholic children to the highest degree of education. Section 9 provides that the Education Department of Ontario should at its discretion authorize text books for the use of pupils and teachers, or for the use of school libraries. Under that Act the Ontario government has to give its consent to the secular books in the separate schools. In clause 4 of the Bill we are considering, you ask that the separate school board for Manitoba shall select the school books, and so on. Why should that be ? Can any reason be assigned for saying that any Roman Catholic boy or girl is not as much in need of the secular education provided by the state, as are the Protestant children ? I know of none. I think we are making a great mistake in providing for separation, except at the proper point. The object of this legislation is to recognize the conscientious scruples of the Roman Catholic Church, which is of opinion that religious training should accompany secular training. But I am not aware, that the Roman Catholic Church takes any exception whatever to the character of the secular training that is offered to the Roman Catholic children, as well as to the Protestant children of the province of Manitoba. Their whole objection is to the system which ignores religious training, and which also, as they allege, imposes upon the Roman Catholic children the injustice of being obliged to attend schools where religion not wholly in harmony with their views is taught. So far as is necessary to respect the conscientious views of these people, is the extent to which the Government under the Order in Council should go, and we should pause before we embark in an untried experiment, instead of taking such a precedent as we have furnished of forty years' experience in the old province of Ontario, and which I think deservedly enjoys the confidence of the people in that province, both Protestants and Catholics. I am speaking now as one engaged in trying to formulate provisions that will make this Act as efficient as possible ; I am not speaking as a politician, and I would ask the Minister of the Interior, why it would not entirely meet the case, if we proceeded to build up this Act on the lines such as I have referred to of the education law in the province of Ontario, instead of having a dual system of administration such as is proposed here. What valid reason is there against our adopting the course I suggest ?

Mr. DALY. Does the hon. gentleman mean that we should adopt the Separate Schools Act of Ontario ?

Mr. MULOCK. I am speaking of these provisions—some or all of them.

Mr. DALY. Because it would be ultra vires of this Parliament. We would be giving the minority greater privileges than they enjoyed prior to 1890.

Mr. MULOCK. No. Instead of creating a separate board, what objection is there to allowing these matters of administration to be dealt with by the Education Department of the province of Manitoba ?

Mr. LaRIVIERE. The hon. gentleman says, instead of creating a separate board. We are not creating a board ; we are merely reinstating the board that existed before.

Mr. MULOCK. I do not understand that it is contended by any one that we are obliged to restore things as they existed before.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. We are not obliged, but we are not prevented either.

Mr. MULOCK. I understand that by the Order in Council of July, 1895, this Government told the Manitoba government that they were not asked to restore the old status quo. They themselves have taken the position that it is our duty to bring our discretion to bear that we are not simply the registrars of some supposed mandamus issued by a higher power, but legislators clothed with full responsibility to give or to withhold. It is our duty therefore to do what is best under the circumstances. The whole subject is at large ; and I ask, what objection is there to vesting these secular matters which are necessary for the administration of the law, in the responsible Education Department of the province, instead of in a board under the control of a religious denomination ?

Mr. LaRIVIERE. The objection is this. If the Manitoba legislature had restored the autonomy of the Roman Catholic schools, then they could have adapted their organization to the system in operation. Since the province has declined not only to restore the autonomy of the Roman Catholic schools, but to have anything to do with them, it is our duty not only to restore the schools, but to provide for the whole organization of the system.

Mr. MULOCK. I should have been glad to have had the Minister in charge of the Bill give his reasons too. I think we are entitled to a statement from him whether he has compared the relative values of the two systems, and has come to any conclusion on that point. The mere fact that there has been friction in the past ought not to weigh with us so conclusively as to make us assume that it will for all time continue if we pass such a measure as this. My hon. friend, I hope, will give me credit for perfect sincerity. I am not seeking to rob this measure of anything necessary to make it good. If the majority insist on such a law being on the statute-book, it is the duty of all, whether in favour of it or against it, to make the measure as perfect and effective as possible. In that spirit alone I make these criticisms. I think it would be time enough for us to create a separate board when the local authorities refused to give effect to the provisions of this Act. Would it not be sufficient for us, for the purposes of the present, to declare the law, and leave out of this Act everything relating to the administration of the law—leaving that to the local government ? If they make default, it will be for us then to consider what course is incumbent upon Parliament.

Mr. DALY. My answer to the hon. gentleman is that we have no power to invest the Department of Education with power to deal with separate schools ; nor have we the power to give to the minority the privilege to have their separate schools managed by the Department of Education. We have only power to deal with this matter as it comes to us by virtue of the remedial order.

Mr. MULOCK. I am unable to follow the reasoning of the Minister of the Interior.

Mr. COSTIGAN. We all expect that.

Mr. MULOCK. All the same, I have my opinion, whether it commends itself to hon. gentlemen opposite or not. The Minister of the Interior says we have no power to delegate this authority to the Department of Education in Manitoba. I would like to know if he can point out anything, in any law or statute, which says that this Parliament may create any tribunal to carry out this law. You cannot find anything anywhere. The board you create is a creature of the statute we pass. Our title to create it does not depend on any power given to us except the Manitoba Act as interpreted by the Privy Council. There is nothing in any statute stating in what form this Parliament shall restore the rights and privileges which have been taken away, or stating that this Parliament shall create this or that tribunal. It is for us, in restoring those rights or privileges, to provide such machinery as we in our wisdom see fit. I am sure there is not a lawyer in this House who will venture the opinion that we have not the power to provide, that the working out of this Act shall be by this or by that tribunal. The very fact that we purport to create a separate school board shows that we assume to ourselves the right to provide for the carrying out of the provision ; and if so, where do you find anything saying that we cannot trust these powers to the Department of Education of Manitoba as well as to a board composed of certain other persons in Manitoba ? I submit that the Minister's answer is wholly insufficient. It is so manifestly not the reason for this proposition, that I am sure he does not expect any person in this House to accept it as the real reason. I fear, rather, that the Government have been impressed with the view that if we pass a law and do not provide also the machinery for carrying it out in its minutest detail, its administration may encounter difficulties elsewhere.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Hear, hear.

Mr. MULOCK. I think my hon. friend from Provencher acquiesces in that view.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. I do.

Mr. MULOCK. I thought so. That bears out what I said, that the only reason for the establishment of the separate school board is the apprehension that the Act might not be honestly worked out by the Manitoba Department of Education. That apprehension does not commend itself to me as a valid reason, and I ask the Minister of the Interior to say frankly whether or not he shares that apprehension. This is not the first time that what is pretended to be the law has been thrust in as an obstacle against doing what we ought to do. The hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) spent many months in Ontario trying to prove that some overwhelming power had ordered this legislature to do something and that we have no power, except as registrars, bound to carry out the will of the superior body. He spent his energies, time and eloquence in trying to mislead the people.

Some hon, MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MULOCK. Well, I will say educating the people in his own way ; but a short time afterwards, he had to admit in this House that his whole campaign had practically been a campaign of misrepresentation.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. What has that to do with paragraph "a" ?

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. Minister of Interior interjects, as an obstacle, that the law will not allow us to adopt the suggestion which I have made. I ask him to point out any provision in the law which says you cannot select the best of two or more alternative propositions for the carrying out of the law. What is there in the law which says you must select this particular tribunal in some other tribunal.

Mr. DALY. The remedial order—read it.

Mr. MULOCK. But we are told that we are not obliged to follow literally that order.

Mr. DALY. We cannot go beyond the powers given in it.

Mr. MULOCK. If the hon. gentleman says that the remedial order was made without due consideration——

Mr. DALY. It was made with full consideration.

Mr. MULOCK. It was, then fully considered. It would be strange if it were not, for the Government had time enough to consider it. But the fact that the remedial order does not allow such a suggestion to be adopted, is not, in my opinion, a valid reason. The question is, what is the best system ? If the remedial order does not give the best system, then we should select it. I submit, therefore, that no case has been made out for our adopting this machinery.

Mr. CASEY. I do not think the hon. Minister of Interior has said anything to remove the objection to this clause. I understand him to say that we could not give to the Department of Education the powers conferred by this clause upon the separate school board, because we had not the authority to do so. I would refer him to the last subsection of the previous clause which we have just passed. That subsection provides that the Department of Education may also make, from time to time, such regulations as they may think fit for the general organization of separate schools. The clause now under discussion gives power to the Catholic separate school board to make regulations for the general government and discipline of the schools. These two powers seem to me to be identical : and as we have passed subsection 2 of section 3 giving these powers to the Department of Education, we cannot now dispute our power to do so ; and it remains indisputable that we could give every power to the Department of Education which we are, by this section, giving to the separate school board.

For my part, I believe that this section is ultra vires. There is nothing in the remedial order calling upon the government of Manitoba to appoint a separate school board. It is quite certain, under the terms of the Manitboa Act, and under the section of that Act on which the judgment of the Privy Council is based, that we can do nothing more than enact here what we have asked Manitoba to do and what she has refused to do. The measure of our power is the extent of the refusal of Manitoba to do what she was asked to do by the Order in Council of this Government ; and if the remedial order did not call upon her to appoint this separate school board, it is quite certain that we have not the constitutional authority to do so. The judgment of the British Privy Council and the remedial order are both alike in this respect. That judgment and order did not call, in so many words, for the re-establishment of separate schools at all, and that fact of itself creates great doubt as to the constitutionality of everything we are asked to do by this Bill and this clause in particular. The Privy Council judgment pointed out distinctly that "all legitimate grounds of complaint would be removed if the existing schools system be supplemented by provision which would remove the grievance upon which the appeal is founded," and does not necessarily order the re-establishment of separate schools as they used to be. The argument of the hon. member for Provencher, and hon. gentlemen opposite, seems to be founded on the idea that we are bound to establish separate schools as they used to be in Manitoba ; but that argument falls to the ground on the reading of the judgment of the Privy Council.

As stated by the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Ouimet) on the 24th of last month, this Bill seems to be based on the idea that we are compelled to re-enact every clause in the old Manitoba law, as far as possible ; but that whole theory is wrong. The Government themselves, by their Order in Council of July last, declared their willingness to be satisfied with something else than the establishment of separate schools. The hon. Minister of Public Works also declared his own personal opinion, as a member of the Government, and the special representative in the Government of Catholic interests, that their interests would be served, if something very much less than the establishment of separate schools were agreed to by the Manitoba government. We, of course, are not in a position to say what instructions were given to the commissioners. I think it highly probable that, when they make their official report, it will be found that something less than the establishment of separate schools was set forth as the basis of negotiations. However, the hon. Minister of Public Works said in the House—putting it in my own words, which I think will cover the ground he took—that if permission was given to have religious instruction for the Roman Catholic children in the public schools, and if the Catholic children were not compelled to be present while Protestant religious exercises were carried on in those schools, it would satisfy the minority in Manitoba and would satisfy the government. He urged at the same time that this Bill should be proceeded with to hold as a guarantee for the carrying out of these promises. But when the Government, by Order in Council, and by the voice of one of the Ministers, says that something less than the re-establishment of separate schools will satisfy them, there is no ground for the provision regarding these schools which we are now considering.

Under these circumstances, why should this Parliament do more than is declared sufficient to remove the grievance, and in doing so go beyond the power shown to belong to it, under the proceedings which have taken place, by attempting to establish a separate school board in the province ? It has been pointed out before, though the argument does not seem to have taken root in the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite, that the kind of rights and privileges that we are entitled to restore are not those involving administrative action and organization of this kind. A reference to the British North America Act will show that, so far as the separate schools of Ontario and Quebec are concerned, the only rights reserved by the constitution are rights inherent in the trustees of each individual separate school, under the law that existed previous to confederation. If there is any defect in the administration of the law regarding these schools, an appeal is provided to the Governor General in Council. But there is no mention of any rights other than those referred to, the rights of the trustees of each separate school.

Why would not the safeguard be sufficient in Manitoba ? If we must provide separate schools at all, why would it not do to provide for the creation of boards of trustees and fix their duties and rights, while leaving the general administration of the schools to the Department of Education, as is done in Ontario and Quebec ? In the case of Ontario there is only one department, although the organization of separate schools in that province is much more perfect than that proposed under this Remedial Act, and these schools get along in perfect accord under the Educational Department of the province. There has never been friction between the Department of Education and the separate schools. If there had been friction caused by injustice, no doubt an appeal would have been made to the Governor General in Council against that administrative malfeasance. But after many years' experience the separate schools are doing good work that satisfies the Catholics and leaves objection in the minds of only a portion of the Protestants. There is no friction in the operation of the separate school law of Ontario, and there would be none in Manitoba if the schools were given over to control of the Department of Education of that province.

The points I make, then, are two. In the first place the authority which we now propose, by subsection (a) of this clause to give to the separate school board, has already been given, by the preceding clause to the Department of Education, and I do not see how the same powers can be delegated to two different bodies. To delegate them to the provincial Board of Education is the proper way of settling the matter, as experience has shown. The constitutional safeguards already allowed would be safeguards for the minority of Manitoba, as they are for the minorities in the other provinces. I do not profess to be able, any more than my hon. friend from North York (Mr. Mulock) to see how the argument of the Minister of the Interior applies to this case. But, as the Minister of Marine (Mr. Costigan) does not expect us to be able to solve that intricate problem——

Mr. OUIMET. If the hon. gentleman will allow me I would like to ask a question. I would like to know whether, in the opinion of the hon. gentleman, the Bill goes too far in the way of satisfying the claim of the minority or whether it does not provide enough ?

Mr. CASEY. We are not discussing the Bill as a whole, and I think it rather an obstructive interruption for the hon. Minister to ask me to give my opinion on the Bill as a whole. If the House wishes me to give an answer to that irregular question, I will do so. But it will take some time.

Mr. OUIMET. Say " Yes " or " No."

Mr. CASEY. I am speaking on this particular clause. My opinion is that it goes beyond the powers of legislation which this Parliament has acquired, under the decision of the Privy Council and the remedial order. Whether it goes further than I want it to or not, I say it goes further than we have any power to go. It would not be law, even if we passed it. I am seriously inclined to doubt whether hon. gentlemen on the other side do not wish this clause to be found unconstitutional by the courts

Mr. OUIMET. We will take the risk.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. Minister says they are willing to take the risk. They are certainly increasing the risk by putting in the clause under discussion, which exceeds the powers acquired under the proceedings that have taken place, and is contradictory of the other clause we have adopted. If they wish to have this law declared unconstitutional, they are following exactly the course to secure that end. They are making this Bill, on the face of it, look as unconstitutional as any law possibly could look. They are positively inviting and calling upon every clever lawyer in the country to get up suits under this Bill. But the Minister of Public Works seems to be quite content to take the risk of anything so long as the Bill gets through this House. He does not care what happens to it afterwards, he says they are willing to take the risk. Well, that is the impression I have already derived from the language and course of the Government and their supporters. They do not care what becomes of the Bill after it gets on the statute-book ; all they want is to have the Bill pass the House, to have the credit of getting it through ; and to claim support on that ground.

Mr. INGRAM. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman a question. Are we to understand that the hon. gentleman is opposed to any remedial legislation, that he is opposed to remedying the grievance of the minority in Manitoba ? That is a plain question, and I would like a plain answer.

Mr. CASEY. I do not consider that that question is before the House at the present time. I have declared already that I am opposed to this Bill by voting against the second reading, and I have declared that I am against this clause for the reasons I have given ; and before the discussion is through, my hon. friend from East Elgin will certainly find out exactly where I stand on the whole case. If he wishes to put me on record before the electors of our joint county, he will have plenty of opportunity for doing so in the regular way, without interrupting me with questions entirely foreign to the subject. His question is entirely outside the subject we are now discussing.

Mr. INGRAM. Well, I understand the friends of hon. gentlemen opposite to say that should their leader get into power, he will offer a still stronger Bill on this question, and if that is true, I would like to know whether the hon. gentleman would support a stronger Bill. That is a plain question.

Mr. CASEY. I do not think, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. gentleman ever understood any hon. gentleman on this side of the House to say that.

Mr. INGRAM. I do not want the gentlemen who are canvassing the hon. gentleman's constituency to come before the Catholic people and tell them that when their leader gets into power they will offer still stronger legislation on this point ; and then, when they are canvassing the Orangemen and Protestants, tell them that the Bill is going entirely too far. I want them to pursue a straightforward course, and then we will fight a square battle on that line.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman need not be uneasy as to what is stated to my constituents. I think he has more cause for uneasiness as to what he will say to his own constituents. As far as my constituents are concerned, I have every reason to believe that they are satisfied with my course in this matter. But I judge that the hon. gentleman's course has created some dissatisfaction in his own constituency, which has prompted him to put questions to me which have no bearing upon the subject before the House, I am quite sure that nobody can accuse me of telling double stories to the electors in regard to this question. If he will take care that such double dealing does not take place in his end of the county, I will answer for mine.

Mr. McCARTHY. We have discussed at great length the legal questions involved in this measure. We who are opposed to this clause have endeavoured to point out that we have no power here to pass clause 4 or any of its subsections. Now, I do not propose to go over that ground again. All I have to say on that subject has been said by myself and others, and my hon. friend here who is speaking for the Government has given his reasons why he is unable to adopt our view. I was disappointed, I may say, with one of the observations which fell from my hon. friend, in answer to the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Mulock), who appealed to my hon. friend to know whether, as a matter of policy, and aside altogether from the legal right, the Government had deliberately adopted the plan of re-creating the board of education, instead of delegating to the authorities in Manitoba already constituted under the Manitoba Act, the administration of the separate school system as well as the public school system. Now, the hon. gentleman said in answer that it was ultra vires, because to do so would be to go beyond the remedial order. Sir, my hon. friend had not considered that answer. The Bill already delegates to the Department of Education the power to make regulations as they may think fit for the general organization of separate schools. Well, all the remedial order does is to enact that the system existing before shall be restored to the minority. That is all the remedial order does; it does not say how this right to build, maintain, equip and manage the schools, is to be restored to the minority. But whether it is to be restored by the re-creation of the board of education, or whether it is to be restored by handing over the advisory board of the Department of Education, is no where either provided for or referred to in the remedial order. So that we have got power in the remedial order to hand these administrative duties, the legal question apart, either to the board which is proposed here, or to the advisory board which is already in existence under the Manitoba School Act, and the question is one of policy as to which would be the better and more proper course to take. Now, I have already pointed out, and I want to get an answer to that, that the creation of a double board will entail a waste of public money, which, if this law ever becomes effective, is to come out of the province of Manitoba. I have already drawn attention to the fact that there is no necessity for there being two boards. That is proved by the experience in the province of Ontario, and is still further demonstrated by the existence of things in the North-west. In the North-west there is one system, one administration, one set of text books, one inspector, one system. If the hon. gentleman will look at the blue-book which was brought down to us in 1892, dealing with this question, he will find a memorandum from the late Archbishop Taché, in which he points out that the Roman Catholics have been deprived, by the legislative ordinance of the North-west, of all those various powers, so that the school system now there is a school system administered under one board, and not a double board, by one system, by one set of officers, and exactly on the one basis.

Mr. DALY. There always was one board.

Mr. McCARTHY. One board, yet divided. Now, he points out on page 29 that the ordinance of 1888 granted the Catholics as such the following rights:—

> The legislative council may appoint and constitute a board of education composed of eight members of which three shall be Roman Catholics.

And the three Catholic members were to have a right to vote. He points out that the new law of 1892 provided that the members of the executive committee, two Protestants and two Roman Catholics, should constitute the council of public instruction, but the members should have no seats; whereas under the law of 1888, they had a right to vote.

Mr. DALY. The board of education in the North-west was not divided into two sections the same as the old board of education in Manitoba.

Mr. McCARTHY. That is true, but my point is this, that one system of administration answers for public schools and separate schools, as is proved by the experience in Ontario. I am now showing that it answers in the North-west, and I am proving it by the memorandum prepared by the late Archbishop Taché wherein he points out that all these different powers and privileges which they had by the statutes of 1888, have been taken from them by the statute of 1892.

The ordinance of 1888 granted to the Catholics, as such, the following rights:	The ordinance of 1892 gives as follows, to Catholics:
1.—The Lieutenant Governor in Council may appoint and constitute a board of education composed of eight members, and three shall be Roman Catholic (4).	1.—The members of the executive committee and two Protestant and two Roman Catholics shall constitute a council of public instruction. The appointed members shall have no vote (5).
2.—Any question on which there is an equality of votes shall be declared to be negatived (9).	2.—No vote against hostile regulations.
3.—To determine all appeals from the decisions of inspectors of schools and to make such orders thereon as may be required.	3.—Nothing.
4.—To provide for a uniform system of inspection of all schools and to make such regulations as may be deemed necessary with respect to the duties of the inspectors.	4.—No power.

5.—To arrange for the proper examination, and the granting of certificates.	5.—No vote nor action.
6.—To make regulations for the general government and discipline.	6.—Nothing.
7.—To appoint inspectors.	7.—No power.
8.—To select and prescribe text books.	8.—No power.
9.—To cancel the certificates of a teacher, (for such schools as are not designated Protestant or Roman Catholic.)	9.—No power.

The Archbishop deals with the issue as a whole as follows :—

> The minority of the North-west have petitioned for the disallowance of the ordinance of 1892, because it deprives them of most of the rights they enjoyed by the ordinance of 1888, and because as they say : " The said ordinance, inasmuch as it places in the hands of non-catholics the control and management of Catholic separate schools to such an extent that such persons are enabled, as they have actually done, to obliterate almost wholly the distinction between Catholic and other schools."

That petition was presented, and those particulars were given in order to verify the remarks which the Archbishop made. But this Government did not interfere. By a long memorandum prepared, no doubt, by Sir John Thompson and adopted by Council, the Government showed that everything done had been done with the approval of the North-west Territories Assembly, and that it was not a matter with which the Government could interfere. We have, therefore, in the North-west a double system of schools administered by one body. If that be so, and if we have the power—I do not think any one will seriously contend that we have not the power—to interfere or delegate to the authorities in the province of Manitoba powers which we are now proposing to give to the board, which cannot be executed without the expenditure of considerable public money, which under these circumstances would be absolutely wasted, surely that course is feasible. Let me point out the scheme which exists in Manitoba at present. There is a Department of Education. It is a department of the government, or a committee thereof. But there is another body there called the advisory board, and it is constituted in a manner much more preferable than that of the Board of Education. All the members of the Board of Education are nominated by the Governor in Council. The advisory board consists of seven members, four of whom are appointed by the Governor in Council, two by the school teachers and one by the University Council, by ballot. The advisory board has very large administrative powers, and apart from the financial consideration, it would be wiser and better—I am speaking now not in the interest of the whole, but in the interest of the minority—if we delegated to that board the duties connected with administering the separate school system. The advisory board is recognized in the negotiations which have taken place, and all the Catholics demand is that a Roman Catholic shall be appointed on that board. That appears to be a very reasonable suggestion. Manitoba answered that objection by saying that the provincial government had offered a place on the board to Archbishop Taché, who had declined it. That board has practically all the powers of administering the schools. They are authorized to make regulations respecting the equipment of school buildings and the furnishing of them. What is the use of appointing another board to perform those functions. The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. LaRivière) puts forward as his only ground for objecting his opinion that he does not think the Advisory Board would fairly administer the law. I do not think we have a right to presume so.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. I said that the Department of Education was nominated and appointed in order to put into force the present system of schools in Manitoba, and therefore it would be unwise to call upon that board to put into force another system, which might, to some extent, be antagonistic to the present system.

Mr. McCARTHY. All the hon. gentleman will have to do is to put his own friends in power in Manitoba, and then the Advisory Board will be composed of members friendly to him.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Will the hon. gentleman help me to do that ?

Mr. McCARTHY. I have not got a vote there.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. I am glad to know it.

Mr. McCARTHY. We cannot pass a law or organize a system dependent on any particular body of men being in power at a particular time. The Government will change, and such change must not prove disastrous to the law. If the Department of Education does not give effect to the law, there is the right of complaint and of an appeal for redress. So we need not deal with the Department of Education, which happens to be in the hands of the hon. gentleman's political opponents. My hon. friend (Mr. LaRivière) made no objection to subsection 2 of clause 3, and he delegated to the Department of Education the power to make regulations for the general organization of separate schools.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I moved that that be struck out.

Mr. McCARTHY. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I was not in the House at the time, and I did not know that he objected, and he is therefore consistent in that. What we have to come to now is the advisory board. I want any hon. gentleman here, no matter what his view may be on other clauses, to tell me, why the advisory board, constituted as I have mentioned, cannot perform, and would not perform these duties fairly, and honestly, and legitimately. I have read subsection "a" which means to make regulations for the equipment of schools and school premises. Now, I come to subsection "a" which says that they shall have power to examine and authorize text books for use in schools and libraries, subject to the exception of religious books. As was pointed out by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), what do you want to have two sets of text books for ? Then we come to determine the standard to be attained by pupils for admission to separate schools. Surely my hon. friend does not object to that. In order to bring this to a point I move :

That section 4 of the said Bill is hereby amended, by striking out the first line thereof, and substituting in lieu the following : It shall be the duty of the advisory board constituted under the provisions of the Education Department Act of the province of Manitoba.

The effect will be to give to the advisory board, instead of to the Board of Education, the duties which are afterwards conferred in subsections "a," "b" and "c," and so on. The most important matter to deal with, is whether we are to confer upon the Board of Education created under that Act, or upon the advisory board, the administration of the separate school system. I see here some hon. gentlemen who were not present during the legal discussion, and I want them to understand how the matter is. There is a Department of Education in the province of Manitoba similar to the Education Department of the province of Ontario. Then there is an advisory board whose duties are to be found in clause 16 of the Education Act of Manitoba, and its subsections ; and lastly, there is the Board of Education which we propose to create. The question now upon the amendment I have made is : Are we to transfer the administrative part of this law to the Board of Education, or are we to transfer it to the advisory board.

After Recess.

House again resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which I have put in your hands is, as I have stated, simply for the purpose of delegating to the advisory board instead of to the Board of Education the machinery for the carrying out of the purposes of this Bill. I think I explained the matter as fully as was necessary to the members who were present before recess—not a very large number, it is true, because I observe that the House is not more than half full to-day—and they will no doubt understand the purport and object of the amendment. I put it on the ground of propriety—to interfere as little as possible with the legislature of Manitoba on the ground of economy, as it seems an absolutely unnecessary waste of public money to appoint a second board to do the work for which there is a sufficient board already in existence. To that I added, what has been urged at great length to-day, the legal difficulties and objections which stand in the way of our interfering with the administration of the school law in the province. Under these circumstances I hope the committee wil adopt the amendment, which I suppose can only be done by the hon. gentleman in charge ot the Bill accepting it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Who comprise the advisory board, and how are they appointed ?

Mr. McCARTHY. The advisory board is composed of seven individuals at present, though I suppose there would be no difficulty in our appointing an eighth, if we pleased. They are appointed as follows :—Four nominated by the Lieutenant-Governor, two elected by the school teachers of the province, and the seventh appointed by the Council of the University of Manitoba by ballot. So that it is a representative body, and when first constituted the late Archbishop Taché was offered a seat on it.

Mr. DALY. If I remember aright, when the hon. mover of this amendment commenced his argument this afternoon, he said that one reason why he thought this Parliament had power to amend section 4 in the terms his amendment calls for, was that the Government had already admitted his position by the insertion of subsection 2 of section 3. I stated to the committee very early in the day that there were doubts as to whether or not subsection 2 of section 3 should remain part of the Bill. The clause has been carried by the committee, and we cannot go back to it at this stage. I do not know whether or not I stated the reason why there is a doubt as to the necessity of our passing that clause ; but the fact is that there is a grave legal and constitutional doubt as to whether or not we have the power to give to the Department of Education the powers we give to them by subsection 2 of section 3.

Mr. McCARTHY. What is the grave legal doubt ?

Mr. DALY. Simply because we are dealing with a body that did not exist prior to 1890 ; and it is not for the reasons that were given by hon. gentlemen in objecting to this clause, namely, that it conflicts with provisions of section 4, that I ask the committee to defer consideration of that part of the Bill. I do not seek to take the responsibility upon myself of saying that the Government will not insist on this clause being left in the Bill ; but I ask that further discussion of it should be postponed until the Minister of Justice, on whom the responsibility will rest, returns. Now, Sir, let us begin at the beginning of this matter, and I will endeavour to elaborate some of the arguments I have made to-day ; because I endeavoured to be concise as possible, to avoid taking up time, because time is pressing. I have endeavoured to answer the objections offered by hon. gentlemen ; but I think it would perhaps be well for me to go a little further than I did this afternoon. What was the foundation for the proceeding that brings us here ? We had several petitions from the minority in Manitoba. Those petitions were all considered by the Governor General in Council, to whom they were addressed. Take the petition of November, 1892. It concludes as follows :—

> Your petitioners therefore pray :
> 1. That Your Excellency the Governor General in Council may entertain the said appeal and may consider the same, and may make such provisions and give such directions for the hearing and consideration of the said appeal as may be thought proper.
> 2. That it may be declared that the said Acts (53 Vic., chaps. 37 and 38) do prejudicially affect the rights and privileges with regard to denominational schools which Roman Catholics had by law or practice in the province at the union.
> 3. That it may be declared that the said last mentioned Acts do effect the rights and privileges of the Roman Catholic minority of the Queen's subjects in relation to education.
> 4. That it may be declared that to Your Excellency the Governor General in Council, it seems requisite that the provisions of the statutes in force in the province of Manitoba prior to the passage of the said Act, should be re-enacted in so far at least as may be necessary to secure to the Roman Catholics in the said province the right to build, maintain, equip, manage, conduct and support these schools in the same manner provided for by the said statutes, to secure to them their proportionate share of any grant made out of the public funds for the purposes of education, and to relieve such members of the Roman Catholic Church as contribute to such Roman Catholic schools from all payment or contribution to the support of any other schools ; or that the said Acts of 1890 should be so modified or amended as to effect such purposes.

And so on. In section 4 of that prayer, the petitioners ask that the statutes in force in the province of Manitoba prior to the passage of the Act of 1890 should be re-enacted in so far at least as they may be necessary to secure to the Roman Catholics the rights, and so on. The Privy Council, to whom that petition was directed, heard the appeal, the minority being represented. The Governor General in Council then referred certain questions to the Supreme Court for answer. I will deal with questions 5 and 6, which are as follows :—

> (5) Has His Excellency the Governor General in Council power to make the declarations or remedial orders which are asked for in the said memorials and petitions, assuming the material facts to be as stated therein, or has His Excellency the Governor General in Council any other jurisdiction in the premises ?

> (6.) Did the Acts of Manitoba relating to education, passed prior to 1890, confer on or continue to the minority a right or privilege in relation to education within the meaning of subsection 2 of section 22 of the Manitoba Act, or establish a system of dissentient schools within the meaning of subsection 3 of section 93 of the British North America Act, 1867, if said section 93 be found to be applicable to Manitoba ; and if so, did the two Acts of 1890 complained of, or either of them, affect any right or privilege of the minority in such a manner that an appeal will lie thereunder to the Governor General in Council ?

These questions were referred to the Supreme Court, the Supreme Court answered them, and the appeal was taken to the Privy Council ; and how were those questions dealt with by that tribunal ? In the concluding paragraph of the judgment of the Privy Council their Lordships say :

> The Manitoba School Acts of 1871 provided for a Board of Education of not less than ten nor more than fourteen members, of whom one-half were to be Protestants and the other half Catholics. The two sections of the board might meet at any time separately, Each section was to choose a chairman, and to have under its control and management the discipline of the schools of the section. One of the Protestant members was to be appointed superintendent of the Protestant schools, and one of the Catholic members superintendent of the Catholic schools, and these two were to be the joint secretaries of the board, which was to select the books to be used in the schools, except those having reference to religion or morals, which were to be prescribed by the sections respectively. * * * * * * * * *
> Acts amending the education law in some respects were passed in subsequent years, but it is not necessary to refer to them, as in 1881 the Act of 1871 and these amending Acts were repealed. The Manitoba School Act, 1881, followed the same general lines as that of 1871. The number of the Board of Education was fixed at not more than twenty-one, of whom 12 were to be Protestants and nine Catholics. If a less number were appointed the same relative proportion was to be observed. The board, as before, was to resolve itself into two sections, Protestant and Catholic, each of which was to have the control of the schools of its section, and all the books to be used in the schools under its control were now to be selected by each section. There were to be, as before, a Protestant and a Catholic superintendent. * * * * * * *
> Their lordships pass now to the Department of Education and Public Schools Act, 1890, which certainly brought a great change. Under the former the Roman Catholics were not entitled as such to any representation on the Board of Education or on the advisory board, which was to authorize text-books for the use of pupils and to prescribe the forms of religious exercises to be used in schools. All Protestant and Catholic school districts were to be subject to the provisions of the Public Schools Act. The public schools were all to be free, and to be entirely non-sectarian. No religious exercises were to be allowed unless conducted according to the regulations of the advisory board, and with the authority of the school trustees of the district. It was made the duty of the trustees to take possession of all public school property which had > been acquired or given for public school purposes in the district. The municipal council of every city, town or village, was directed to levy and collect upon all taxable property within the municipality such sums as might be required by the public school trustees for school purposes. * * * * * * * *

> The sole question to be determined is whether a right or privilege which the Roman Catholic minority previously enjoyed has been affected by the legislation of 1890. Their Lordships are unable to see how this question can receive any but an affirmative answer. Contrast the position of the Roman Catholics prior and subsequent to the Acts from which they appeal. Before these passed into law there existed denominational schools, of which the control and management were in the hands of Roman Catholics, who could select the books to be used and determine the character of the religious teaching.

Now the portions of the judgment that I have read are summarized in the answers made by the Imperial Privy Council to the questions five and six. Section 5 was answered as follows :—

> (5.) In answer to the fifth question :—That the Governor General in Council has jurisdiction, and the appeal is well founded, but that the particular course to be pursued must be determined by the authorities to whom it has been committed by the statute ; that the general character of the steps to be taken is sufficiently defined by subsection 3 of section 22 of the Manitoba Act, 1870.

Question 6 is answered as follows .—

> (6.) In answer to the sixth question :—That the Acts of Manitoba relating to education passed prior to the session of 1890 did confer on the minority a right or privilege in relation to education within the meaning of subsection 2 of section 22 of the Manitoba Act, which alone applies ; that the two Acts of 1890 complained of did affect a right or privilege of the minority in such a manner that an appeal will lie thereunder to the Governor General in Council.

Upon that the appeal was made, and the finding of the Privy Council is found in the remedial order. That remedial order recites the petition that I have read and declares that the rights and privileges of the Roman Catholic minority of the said province, in relation to education, prior to the 1st May, 1890, have been affected by depriving the Roman Catholic minority of the following rights and privileges which they had hitherto enjoyed :—

> The right to build, maintain, equip, manage, conduct and support Roman Catholic schools in the manner provided for by the said statutes, which were repealed by the two Acts of 1890 aforesaid.

Now the hon. gentleman in reading that clause (a), seemed to have slurred over the last line, that is "in the manner provided for by the said statutes, which were repealed by the two Acts of 1890 aforesaid." That simply means that what we have to do here and what the remedial order, which is in accord with the decision of the Privy Council, has directed, is to restore the rights which the minority had to "build, maintain, equip, manage, conduct and support Roman Catholic schools in the manner provided for by the said statutes, which were repealed by the two Acts of 1890, aforesaid," not by any subsequent Act that was passed. The hon. gentleman now, by his amendment, seeks to engraft on the Bill a provision delegating to the advisory board, created by the Act of 1890, these powers which were enjoyed by the minority prior to 1890. That is a matter we have not to deal with at all, because all we have to do is to restore the rights the Roman Catholic minority enjoyed in the manner provided by the statutes that were repealed by the Acts of 1890. It is clear, so far as the powers of this House are concerned, that they are confined within the terms of the remedial order and that we cannot legislate beyond that order. We can legislate within it, we can give to the Roman Catholic minority less rights than they enjoyed previously, but not more. We cannot give to them the right of having their school regulated by an advisory board, which did not exist prior to 1890. That board is a creature of the Department of Education, which did not exist prior to 1890, so that we cannot give to the advisory board under the remedial order, powers that the board does not enjoy at present. In other words, we cannot give to that advisory board the privilege of dealing with separate schools.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Look at section 3 and at what you have done with the Department of Education by that section.

Mr. DALY. I met that position in the first part of my argument. I say there is a grave doubt whether that is law or not, whether we have a legal or constitutional right to engraft that clause on the Bill, on the ground that it is ultra vires of this House to do so under the circumstances, and I say that we should defer consideration of that until later. But the hon. gentleman, after having argued all along, not that clause 3 was ultra vires of this legislature, but that it conflicted with clause 4, and therefore should not be passed, now, when we are dealing with clause 4, proposes by his amendment to give to the advisory board, the creature of the Education Department, powers which that board has not at present. I submit, with due deference to the opinion of the hon. gentleman, that we cannot do anything of the kind for the reasons I have given. I submit that the Privy Council of England have held that the various rights which the Roman Catholic minority complained they were deprived of, they were entitled to have restored to them, and those rights are the rights they enjoyed prior to 1890.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). And the school board is a right.

Mr. DALY. It certainly is. It is the machinery that is provided for carrying out the law, without which the creation of separate schools can have no effect. We must invest somebody with the right to deal with the matters of education, as they affect the Roman Catholic minority. We cannot create any new body, we cannot give those rights to an advisory board, but must give them to the body that existed prior to 1890, and that body is the Roman Catholic section of the Board of Education.

Mr. McCARTHY. It is well that, at last, we should have a candid statement of the position of the Government. Up to the beginning of this session and, I think, up to this very moment, the contention on behalf of the Government has been that the remedial order was passed in obedience to the mandate of the Privy Council. Now, the judgment of the Privy Council stated in express terms :

> It is certainly not essential that the statutes repealed by the Act of 1890 should be re-enacted, or that the precise provisions of the statutes should again be made law.

But though this is stated distinctly and in terms, the argument of the Minister is that the Government advisedly and distinctly went beyond what their Lordships said was necessary and did order that the precise provision of the statutes of Manitoba which had been repealed should be re-enacted and the old system literally introduced. In the various public addresses made by the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Railways, the statement was put forward that they were acting in strict obedience to the mandate of their lordships of the Privy Council. And now it is finally admitted that that was not the position that the Government took, and that their lordships stated that it was not necessary to re-enact these statutes, but that all grounds of complaint would be removed if the system of 1890 were supplemented by provisions which would remove the grievances upon which the appeal was founded. Well, Sir, it is well to know that that is what the Government were aiming at, but I have yet to see that that is what the order enjoined. No doubt that is what was intended. But when we look at the terms of the order, I think my hon. friend will find that he is in this dilemma. If he desires to put the very literal construction of the words of the order he has done, that :

> The right to build, maintain, equip, manage, conduct and support the Roman Catholic schools in the manner provided for by the said statutes which were repealed by the two Acts of 1890 aforesaid.

If my hon. friend says we must restore that in the exact manner provided for in the old law, we find that that is impossible. The old law provided for a board of education which was divided into two sections. The draughtsman of this Bill has provided a board of education not to be divided into two sections but a single board. What is the advisory board but a board of education ? Surely, my hon. friend does not wish us to believe that because one is called an advisory board and the other a board of education, that that makes any difference. You cannot reconstitute the old system. The circumstances under which it was created and under which it existed have passed away. If you desire to replace it, you must have somebody or some board which will perform the functions which that board under the law in force before 1890 was authorized to perform. But it is rather straining words to suppose that one being called an advisory board and the other a board of edution would make any real distinction. Suppose we called the advisory board a board of education. Suppose we were to say that the board constituted by the province of Manitoba and called the advisory board but which for the purpose of this Act shall be called a board of education, that will stifle the scruples of my hon. friend. So that leaves the matter to be decided upon its merits and without regard to the technicalities which my hon. friend has raised and by which he desired to dispose of it.

Mr. EDGAR. It seems to me that in order to defend section 4 the Government is driven to the extraordinary course of destroying and wishing to repeal section 3, which they have already passed, and they refused to allow this to be amended in committee. They actually suggested striking out subsection 2 of section 3, which was proposed to be done by the hon. member for Antigonish (Mr. McIsaac), his proposal being voted down by the Government. That shows in the first place that there was not sufficient time given for the consideration of the sections up to the one we are now dealing with. The House has not had sufficient opportunity to discuss them. This side of the House understood those sections, apparently, better than hon. gentlemen opposite. The Government side clearly did not understand section 3, because they voted down an amendment which now they say they think they will have to accept. I would like very much indeed to hear the views of the leader of the House upon this subject. We have heard the views of the Minister of Interior, but we have not heard a single expression of opinion upon one line of this Bill from the leader of the House who introduced the Bill. The question whether we are to treat this as though section 3 is a subsisting section in the Act is a most important one. We cannot proceed intelligently with the discussion of this Bill until we know something about that. We have heard only from the Minister of Interior and he tells us that there are doubts now in his mind and in the minds of the members of the Government about that. I think this committee is entitled most emphatically to have the opinion of the leader of the House who has charge of this Bill, and in order to give the hon. gentleman an opportunity to speak, I will take my seat.

Mr. DEPUTY CHAIRMAN. The question is on subsection "a" of section 4. Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. EDGAR. Well, if the leader of the House has no opinion on the subject, we shall have to go on and treat this as existent and valid law, because it has passed this committee. What then becomes of the argument of the Minister of Interior? He objects to amending section 4 as proposed by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) on the ground that if we do not create a board of education, we shall not be carrying out the provisions of the remedial order, which it seeks to maintain:

> The right to build, maintain, equip, manage, conduct and support the Roman Catholic schools in the manner provided for by the said statutes which were repealed by the two Acts of 1890 aforesaid.

And he claims that Parliament cannot carry out that provision to give them these privileges in the manner provided before 1890 unless we establish an education board. Well, Sir, what was there in the statutes before 1890 which authorized section 3, I should like to know. Why, the hon. gentleman's argument falls to the ground. He has proposed to give most extensive powers to the Department of Education which did not exist in 1890. Therefore, he is not carrying out in any shape or way what he assumes to be necessary to carry out the remedial order. But how very unnecessary it is to undertake in that strict way to carry out the remedial order, if that order is to be interpreted by the judgment of the Privy Council. As has been pointed out before, that judgment does not say that everything shall be done in the same manner that it was before 1890. It says the very reverse. It says:

> It is certainly not essential that the statutes repealed by the Act of 1890 should be re-enacted or that the precise provisions of these statutes should again be made law. The system of education embodied in the Act of 1890 no doubt commends itself to and adequately supplies the wants of the great majority of the inhabitants of the province. All legitimate ground of complaint would be removed if that system were supplemented by provisions which would remove the grievance upon which the appeal is founded.

Why, Mr. Speaker, that is, as the hon. member for North Simcoe pointed out, utterly inconsistent with the interpretation which is now being put for the first time by the Government upon the terms of their remedial order. In fact, it implies, against the decision of the Chancellor, that the old Acts before 1890 must be substantially re-enacted, which has never been understood before, and has never been announced until to-day. Now, I come to the amendment that is before the Chair, suggesting that the advisory board of Manitoba could now be made use of profitably and properly to carry out the provisions of a law like this. What is the advisory board? It was created in 1890 to advise the Department of Education of Manitoba, which was also created in 1890, to take the place of the old Board of Education, which is supposed to be a model for this portion of the Bill. Now, the Department of Education is a department of the civil service, and consists of the Executive Council, or a committee thereof, appointed by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council. It is, in fact, the executive of the province of Manitoba. Now, what special power has been given to that Department of Education? Remember that the Department of Education has power to appoint inspectors of high and public schools, teachers in provincial, model and normal schools, and directors of teachers' institutes. It has also power to fix the salaries of all the inspectors and examiners of normal and model school teachers and other officials of the department; also to prescribe forms for school registers and for reports to the department; also to provide for provincial, model and normal schools and intermediate and collegiate departments of schools; also to arrange for the examination of teachers and for the issue of teachers' certificates; also to prescribe the length of vacations and the number of teaching days in the year. Those are the functions of the Department of Education, which has been recognized, as I say, by section 3 of the Act, and very wisely and properly recognized. Now, what is the constitution of this advisory board which is suggested to take the place of the Board of Education as to clause 4? The Act provides that there shall be a board constituted as thereafter provided, to be known as the advisory board. It shall consist of seven members; three members will constitute a quorum for business; four of the members of the advisory board to be appointed by the Department of Education for a term of two years; two of the members of the advisory board shall be elected by the public and high school teachers actually engaged in teaching in the province. The Department of Education shall from time to time divide the province into two districts so that the set of teachers in each district shall elect one member of said board. Then provisions are made for the election of this advisory board by voting papers, which shall be furnished to the high and public school teachers actually engaged in teaching, and shall be sent to each one of the appointed members of the board. Two members of the board representing the public and high school teachers are elected in that way. The seventh member of the board shall be appointed by the university council by ballot from time to time, for the term of two years. Now, it will be observed that there is nothing whatever in this provision to show that a single member of the advisory board shall be a Protestant or shall be a Catholic. We will assume that they will be the best men for the purpose, and if there were a system of separate schools introduced to be operated by the advisory board, who can suppose for an instant that the Roman Catholics of the province would not have their fair share of representation on that board? We must not go and assume unfairly things of that kind against the provincial government, a provincial government which is trusted so much by this very Bill before us. Now, what are the powers of the advisory board? I have shown you how they are constituted, and I think their powers should be adopted largely in the rest of this section as a model for the Board of Education, if it is to continue under that name, or, if the advisory board continues, if the name is to be changed. Now, what are their powers:

(a.) To make regulations for the dimensions, equipment, style, plan, furnishing, decoration and ventilation of school-houses, and for the arrangement and requisites of school premises;
(b.) To examine and authorize text-books of reference, for the use of pupils and school libraries;
(c.) To determine the qualifications of teachers and inspectors for high and public schools;
(d.) To determine the standard to be obtained by pupils for admission to high schools;
(e.) To decide or make suggestions concerning such matters as may, from time to time, be referred to them by the Department of Education.
(f.) To appoint examiners for the purpose of preparing examination papers for teachers' certificates and for entrance admission of pupils to high schools, who shall report to the Department of Education;
(g.) To prescribe the forms of religious exercises to be used in schools;
(h.) To make regulations for the classification, organization, discipline and government of normal, model, high and public schools;
(i.) To determine to whom certificates shall issue;
(j.) To decide upon all disputes and complaints laid before them, the settlement of which is not otherwise provided for by law.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it seems perfectly clear that this advisory board, even supposing this Remedial Bill were to become law, would have the control of a very large proportion of the education of the children of Roman Catholics in Manitoba, because the high schools would be all under their control. I do not see any provision made in this Bill for high school education. In Ontario, where there are separate schools, the children of all denomiations, Catholics and Protestants, go to the high schools together, and under this Bill these children should be under the control of the advisory board. It is not going much further to suggest that the advisory board is a very proper body to control these schools. It is proposed to ask the House to trust the government of Manitoba, the Department of Education, the Lieutenant-Governor in Council in fifty important ways. Under section 1 the Lieutenant-Governor in Council is given the power, in the first instance at all events, to appoint the Board of Education. By section 3 the Department of Education is given very large powers indeed, so large that the Minister of the Interior is frightened at them already. By section 7 the Lieutenant-Governor in Council is given power to appoint one of the members of the board to be superintendent of these separate schools, and the superintendent shall be secretary of the board. By section 9, in the temporary absence of the superintendent, he may, with the sanction of the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, appoint a member of the board to act for him. By section 69 the board of education shall have power to appoint inspectors, subject to the approval of the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, who may within one month after being notified of the appointment disapprove it. By section 70 members of the Department of Education are made visitors of the schools. By section 74, the whole power to bring this Act into force, or of nullifying or destroying, is left in the hands of the Manitoba legislature, which the government represent. It is left to the Manitoba government to vote out of the public money an amount for the purpose of supporting the schools created by this Bill. When it is proposed to trust the legislature of Manitoba with such important questions, why should they not be trusted with minor matters covered by section 4? Section 78 provides that all payments for purposes of education shall be made by the provincial treasurer. By section 76 a school shall be deemed to be efficient if an inspector appointed or authorized by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council so reports. By section 84, when the trustees desire to borrow money, they are called upon to go to the Lieutenant-Governor in Council for the purpose of securing sanction for the loan. By section 111 it is provided that the Lieutenant-Governor in Council may direct a sum not exceeding one-tenth of the amount of the grant for education to be allowed for the maintenance of the Normal School Department hereby established. What is the use of bringing legislation before the Federal Parliament which gives from beginning to end so many important and absolutely essential powers into the hands of the legislature, the Manitoba government, the Department of Education, but minor matters are dealt with under section 4? The argument has been cut under the feet of the Government by the rest of the proposals. I am not raising these difficulties for the purpose of showing how absolutely the working and carrying out of the Remedial Bill will be at the mercy of the Manitoba legislature and government, although such is the fact, and this Bill places absolutely the control of separate schools squarely from beginning to end in the hands of the Manitoba legislature and government. Why then strain at a gnat and swallow a camel! I wonder whether the hon. gentlemen who are so enthusiastic about this Bill have carefully considered it from beginning to end, as I have endeavoured to do, and whether their enthusiasm will continue to be as great as it has been hitherto in this House. They will find they have been following a will-o'-the-wisp, a piece of waste paper; that they have been spending their time on an ill considered draft Bill, that is unworkable in its present form, and which every time it is considered in committee appears to be more and more unworkable. until now we find the announcement made from the Treasury benches that the clause passed at a recent sitting is a very doubtful one, and the Government think of withdrawing it. They want, however, to wait and consider. They had better hang up the whole Bill for further consideration. It is wasting the time of the House and of the country to give an intelligent consideration to a Bill of this kind. Does the Minister of Public Works champion this Bill, which he talked so much about on the hustings? We do not hear him opening his mouth to-day. Where is the Postmaster General expounding this Bill to us?

Mr. OUIMET. The only reason I did not speak was that I did not want to help on obstruction.

Mr. EDGAR. Will the hon. gentleman tell us what is his opinion about section 3? Does he agree with the Minister of the Interior who says that after all this deliberation of months and months over the Bill, and after all the delays that have taken place over bringing it down, and after all the discussion in this House which he calls obstruction, he has told us; that they only discovered to-day that section 3 is of very doubtful constitutionality.

Mr. DALY. Not at all, we discovered it months ago.

Mr. OUIMET. When this clause was before the committee I expressed my opinion for what it was worth, and I am still of the same opinion; that this clause is better there than out.

Mr. EDGAR. I am glad to find that the Cabinet have got this matter under consideration. The Minister of the Interior expresses one view and the Minister of Public Works expresses another view.

Mr. DALY. Not at all.

Mr. EDGAR. The Minister of the Interior thinks it would be better out.

Mr. DALY. I did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. EDGAR. That is the way the Cabinet is divided on most questions. Does the Minister of the Interior think the clause is all right?

Mr. DALY. I said it was a matter that was open to very grave doubt. Some legal gentlemen have their opinions upon it, and others have theirs too. We have listened to-day to hon. gentlemen like the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) repeating themselves over and over again and trying to prevent us making a little progress with the Bill.

Mr. EDGAR. I can hardly be accused of repeating over an over again. I have not spoken over twenty minutes, but I have been successful in eliciting two different opinions from two Cabinet Ministers. Will the Minister of Railways tell us his opinion on this clause, or will the Controller of Customs give us his opinion about it. Sir, there is one hon. gentleman in this House who has given this Bill a great deal of consideration and has made a very powerful legal argument in its favour. as far as any one can argue for a bad case. I refer to the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Masson) and I hope he will give us his opinion on this clause. This is altogether the most important clause in this Bill, and great principles are founded upon it, and I would like to hear whether or not the member for North Grey (Mr. Masson) has changed his mind on the subject too. Now, Mr. Chairman, there is a good deal to be said in favour of the view of my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills), that we should only pass legislation here for the purpose of providing for the administration of the law, subject, and conditionally upon the province not doing so. Probably that is the correct view to take, but still, as there is no amendment before the House in that direction, I hold that in my judgment it would be better to try and simplify the provisions of the Bill, and place these duties in the hands of the advisory board.

Mr. ANGERS. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, speaking of the validity of subsection "a" of section 4, it seems to me that the question may be easily summed up. All are agreed on this point: that grievances result for Catholics from the laws of 1890; and that such grievances may be remedied by this Parliament. What is the limit of the jurisdiction of Parliament? In my opinion, that limit may be determined by the extent of the grievances to be removed, and I believe that the jurisdiction of Parliament may go to the length of restoring the old status quo, if necessary, in order to remove the wrong complained of. In my opinion, Parliament is evidently vested with jurisdiction to determine to what extent such remedy may be applied. As the Law Lords of the Privy Council have stated in the judgment:

> Their lordships have decided that the Governor General in Council has jurisdiction, and that the appeal is well founded, but the particular course to be pursued must be determined by the authorities to whom it has been committed by the statute.

There remains now to be determined whether it be necessary to revert to the old order of things, or, in other words, to create a Catholic Board of Education in order to restore to the Catholic minority the rights and privileges which have been taken away from them. In my opinion, that is absolutely necessary. Previous to the passage of the laws of 1890, there existed a board composed of two sections, and the Catholic section exclusively had jurisdiction over the following points :

> 1. To have under its control and management the separate schools and to make from time to time such regulations as may be deemed fit for their general government and discipline and the carrying out of the provisions of this Act.

I notice that the section of the Bill under discussion does not go any further than the section I have just quoted, and it seems to me that in order to be practical, we ought necessarily to restore the old status quo, so that the remedy may operate efficaciously. By the proposed amendment, the hon. member for North Simcoe suggests that the words "separate school board" be replaced by "the advisory board under the Department of Education in Manitoba." If that amendment were carried, it would result in sweeping away all the guarantees given to the Catholic minority. That amendment actually confers on the Manitoba government which are inimical to the enforcement of the law now under discussion the right to control the whole management of Catholic schools ; the right, for instance, to make regulations for the government and discipline of schools and to proscribe religious teaching, the right to enforce the use of text-books which might prove unacceptable to Catholics. The difficulties which I point out clearly show that in order to provide an efficient remedy for the existing grievances, a board of education must necessarily be created, instead of the Catholic section of the Board of Education which existed prior to 1890 ; such board being vested with the power of enforcing the law under discussion. The hon. Minister of the Interior just stated that in his opinion the remedial law need not necessarily be a transcript of the remedial order, or, in other words, that it need not necessarily go as far as the remedial order. It seems to me, Sir, that such an opinion may successfully be impugned on very good grounds, and I may be allowed in that connection to quote the following subsection of section 22 of the Manitoba Act :—

> In case any such provincial law as from time to time seems to the Governor General in Council requisite for the due execution of the provisions of this section is not made, or in case any decision of the Governor General in Council on any appeal under this section is not duly executed by the proper provincial authority in that behalf, then and in every such case, as far only as the circumstances of each case require, the Parliament of Canada may make remedial laws for the due execution of the provisions of this section and of any decision of the Governor General in Council under this section.

I call your attention, Sir, to the last words of that subsection which apparently point out that it is for the Governor General in Council to determine the exact extent of the remedy to be applied. And it is enacted that the Parliament of Canada may make remedial laws for the due execution of any decision of the Governor General in Council on any appeal under this section. The Parliament of Canada, when passing a remedial law, does but enforce the decision given by the tribunal. All are agreed that the powers of this House in passing a remedial law, are confined within the terms of the remedial order, and I fail to see on what grounds Parliament could legislate beyond that order, especially in view of the fact that such remedial order was passed on to the Manitoba government, that the extent of the powers of Parliament is the extent of the refusal of Manitoba to do what she was asked to do by the Order in Council, and that, if we legislated within that order and gave the minority less rights than they enjoyed previously, we would incur the risk of being upbraided with having divested the local legislature of its jurisdiction under false pretenses. Therefore, besides the argument drawn from the practical side of the question, I am warranted in drawing another argument from the fact that the Remedial Bill, in order to be intra vires of the legislature, should be a transcript of the remedial order which promises to restore to the minority all the rights and privileges which have been taken away from them. Hon. gentlemen have endeavoured to make a point in favour of the amendment from the fact that in Ontario both public and separate schools are under the control of one board of education. I think the point of comparison is not well taken. In Ontario, with the consent of both Protestants and Catholics, a school system was set up, and is now administered without friction. In the case of the Manitoba separate schools, it is quite different. Parliament is now called upon to legislate for that province against the wishes of the provincial legislature. It is therefore to be assumed that the Manitoba government, far from co-operating to the carrying out of this law, will, on the contrary, be disposed to thwart it. On that ground, Parliament ought to leave the provincial government the least chance possible to obstruct the working out of this Act. Before resuming my seat, Mr. Chairman, I would like to know whether it is actually the intention of the Government to strike out section 2. If the Government were willing to strike it out, I would hardly object. But if they were not to strike it out, I would like to have section 4 amended so as to determine more exactly the jurisdiction conferred under that section upon the separate school Board of Education. Otherwise, the separate school board would likely incur the risk of coming in conflict with the Board of Education of the province of Manitoba. Undoubtedly conflicts as to jurisdiction will arise between the separate school board and the Education Board. For my part, Mr. Chairman, I would not object to having subsection 2 of section 3 struck out.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. (Translation.) The question is settled.

Mr. ANGERS. (Translation.) It is so far from being settled, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. Minister of the Interior has just stated that it would likely be struck out. I am aware that section 3 is not now under discussion, but as the hon. Minister of the Interior has thought fit to mention it, I believed it my duty to say a word about it. If section 3 were not struck out, section 4 ought to be so amended as to determine more exactly the powers and duties of the separate school board, and so as to remove all chance of the Board of Education interfering with the jurisdiction of the separate school board.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. (Translation.) I am afraid the hon. gentleman has not well taken the meaning of the amendment placed in my hands. Under that amendment it is proposed to transfer the administrative part of this law from the separate school board to the "advisory board."

Mr. ANGERS. (Translation.) I am aware that the amendment actually proposes to substitue the "advisory board" to the separate school board ; but as several hon. gentlemen having some experience in this House, have wandered from the question, I thought I could use the same privilege. I wish further to invite attention to the fact that it would serve no purpose for Parliament to determine the jurisdiction of the board of public schools ; in my opinion, it would be sufficient for the purposes of this Act, to determine the jurisdiction and the powers of the board which we are creating under this Bill. Why should we introduce into this Bill cumbersome and unnecessary enactments, which might prove an impediment to the working out of this Bill ? We enact that the board which we are about to create shall have such jurisdiction as existed under the statutes wiped out by the Acts of 1890. Is not that quite sufficient to our purpose ? Outside of the powers which we grant under this Bill to the separate school board of instruction, if there remained any points to be settled, they might be attended to by the Board of Education of Manitoba, under the existing law or under the laws which the local legislature might later on pass.

Mr. CHARBONNEAU. (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, I know that in rising to say a few words on the amendment now under debate, I incur the risk of being called an obstructionist by the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Ouimet) or of being excommunicated by the hon. Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper), but at all hazards, I think it my duty to speak to the motion. Some hon. gentlemen may be astonished that, after having voted aganist the second reading of the Bill and therefore against the principle of the Bill, I should rise to participate in the debate now going on in committee in connection with the different sections of the Bill. However, prior to the second reading of the Bill, we were warned that we were only called upon to legislate upon a matter of principle ; and that it was only a question of laying down a principle ; in fact, that this was only a piece of speculative legislation. Now, Mr. Chairman, I think it my duty and my right to take part in the debate, and I venture to say that the course pursued by the Government followers, in opposing the amendment moved by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) is not consistent. I shall vote against the amendment moved by the hon. member, because I want to be consistent with myself. as I wish to uphold the principle of the Bill. It is understood, from the vote given upon the second reading of the Bill, that a system of separate schools is to be set up in Manitoba. Shall such a system be practically enforced ? I do not think so, and I never believed that it could be carried out. I was always of opinion and I still believe that we have no jurisdiction in the matter. However, if we wish to enact a law creating a system of separate schools, undoubtedly we should lay down as the ground work of the whole system a separate school board of instruction. That has been provided for by sections 1 and 2 of this Bill ; but under section 3, the Board of Education of Manitoba is to have the full control and management of the separate schools. That comes to say that this clause is conflicting with the preceding clauses. That right of interference of the Department of Education with the separate schools has been admitted by all the hon. gentlemen opposite. I say then, that, if they wish to be consistent with the principle they have laid down, in voting for subsection 2 of section 3. the hon. gentlemen opposite ought to vote for the amendment moved by the hon. member for North Simcoe. That is the only logical conclusion. On the one hand, they actually confer on the Department of Education the powers of making all the regulations which it may deem fit for the separate schools : while, on the other hand, they pretend to invest the same authority in another body which is antagonistic to the Department of Education. It is the most patent contradiction, the most inconsistent enactment which could be embodied in any law. Now, as I voted in favour of the amendment of the hon. member for Antigonish (Mr. McIsaac), the object of which was to strike out subsection 2 from section 3, I believe that, in order to be consistent, and to uphold the main principle of the Bill, I am bound to vote against the amendment moved by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). An hon. Minister of the Crown is making merry at my position. The hon. Minister may be sure that I will be consistent with myself to the very end, and I hope he will do the same. I shall then vote in favour of the separate school board having full control over its own schools. We have adopted that principle, and if the hon. Minister wishes to be consistent he will have to vote against the amendment and in favour of the separate school board having the choice of its own text-books. The hon. gentlemen opposite have been howling out, of late, about obstruction——

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) We are still crying out against obstruction.

Mr. CHARBONNEAU. (Translation.) Yes, and that is about all the hon. gentleman can do, howling about obstruction.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) What about the rags you spoke of ?

Mr. CHARBONNEAU. (Translation.) What about rags ? I never used that word. The hon. member knows it very well, and if I were less courteous, I could use a vulgar expression, and tell the hon. member that he is a blackguard for using that expression.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. CHARBONNEAU. (Translation.) The hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Belley) is the hon. member to whom I applied the word.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. (Translation.) The hon. member has no right to call an hon. member of the House a blackguard, and he will have to take back that word.

Mr. CHARBONNEAU. (Translation.) I understand that I have used an unparliamentary expression, and I take it back ; but I think it is also unparliamentary for the hon. gentleman to make imputations and to insinuate that I have used a word which I have never made use of in this House. I was then about to say that hon. gentlemen opposite were constantly crying out against obstruction and making long speeches to fool the people of this country into believing that we, on this side of the House, are opposing free and full discussion of this Bill, while, as a matter of fact they want to hurry on the passage of important clauses which affect the whole economy of the Bill. Then when we want to go a little deeper into the discussion of such clauses, they tell us that the Minister of Justice is away, and it is better to put off the discussion of such matters. Well, if, instead of making all this fuss, about obstruction, the hon. gentlemen opposite had listened to the wise counsels offered by some hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, and waited till the hon. Minister of Justice was back in his seat in Parliament, as he understands, perhaps, his Bill better than those who have charge of it now, possibly we might have adopted but one clause of the Bill, but it would have been final, and the hon. Ministers would have been spared the trouble to come and tell us that another clause of the Bill which was adopted is likely enough to be struck out.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) The hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Charbonneau) has told us of his parliamentary experience. I believe that he has made it patent how far that experience goes, by the way in which he has reflected upon the conduct of the hon. gentlemen in this House who have voted in favour of the second reading of the Bill. The hon. member contends that, in order to be consistent with ourselves, we should vote in favour of the amendment moved by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy).

Mr. CHARBONNEAU. (Translation.) I did not mean the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Dupont) for he has voted to have the last subsection of section 3 struck out.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) The hon. member stated that the hon. gentlemen who voted for the second reading of the Bill and therefore for the principle of the measure, ought to vote for the amendment moved by the member for North Simcoe. I understood him to say so and I am glad the hon. gentleman corrected himself.

Mr. CHARBONNEAU. (Translation.) I never stated that hon. gentlemen who voted in favour of the second reading of the Bill should accept the amendment moved by the hon. member for North Simcoe. What I said was that the Government supporters who had voted for section B of this Bill and against the amendment moved by the hon. member for Antigonish (Mr. McIsaac) to the effect of having the second subsection of said clause struck out, should, if they wished to be consistent with themselves, vote for the amendment moved by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). My words did not apply to the hon. member for Bagot, as he voted in favour of the amendment of the member for Antigonish.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) I understood the words of the hon. member applied to all the members who voted for the second reading.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) There was no vote taken on the amendment spoken of by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Charbonneau).

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) At all events, I believe that the amendment moved by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) would result in making ultra vires the Bill now under consideration, and I contend that this Parliament has no authority whatsoever to confer any powers on the Department of Education of the province of Manitoba. We can confer no power either on the Manitoba government or on the Department of Education of that province. The powers which the Manitoba legislature is vested with as to education in the province have been conferred on it by the constitution which enacts that each province has control over educational matters, and therefore I contend that we can confer no such powers as are involved in the motion of the hon. member for North Simcoe. We can add no further powers to those conferred on the Department of Education of the province of Manitoba under the law passed by the legislature of that province; therefore, I hold that the amendment moved by the hon. member for North Simcoe, were it carried, would result in making altogether ultra vires the Bill now under discussion. It would be equivalent to robbing the jurisdiction vested in the province of Manitoba and transferring it to the Department of Education of the same province. That the hon. member for North Simcoe, who has constituted himself the champion of the legislature of Manitoba and of its rights, should have adopted such a course, is a matter of no small surprise to me. It is an infringement of the principle of provincial autonomy, of which he has constituted himself the advocate. By his amendment, the hon. gentleman invites the Dominion Government to invade to a considerable extent the powers of the Manitoba legislature, and thereby to infringe upon the autonomy of that province. It is in defence of that principle of autonomy, of which he has constituted himself the champion, it is, I say, in behalf of that principle that he makes such a strenuous opposition to the measure now before the House. On that ground, I think the committee ought to reject the proposed amendment.

Mr. BAIN. The longer this Bill is under discussion the more clearly we see how unlikely it is to bring peace or satisfaction to the minority in Manitoba if crystallized into law. Not being a lawyer, and having to look at it from the standpoint of an ordinary citizen, it seems to me our difficulty is this: Whatever Act we crystallize into law this session, it is not open for us to change it or amend it, if experience shows it is unsatisfactory. We are legislating once for all on this question, and we have not the power, even if we have the will, on a later day to engraft additional amendments on this Act. And, Sir, I think when we look at the difficulties that have occurred to-day in the explanation of the details of this clause under consideration, it becomes apparent more and more, that for us to attempt to lay down a principle of legislation that must regulate the management of education in the province of Manitoba, is a hopeless matter. Why, Sir, we are in the position of being forced to compare our act to similar acts in various other provinces, and then discount the probabilities of our action, showing clearly that we are entering into the details of a measure that never should have been brought here, and that strictly belongs to the province where they have the best opportunities of judging of the advantages and disadvantages of the legislation. Then, Sir, we all agree that it is extremely desirable that peace should be restored between the minority in Manitoba and the majority in Manitoba, not only in the interest of that province and of the people of the minority of that province alone, but in the interest of this whole Dominion. The future of this Dominion and the development of our resources, depends on the terms that we can offer to our people to go there and take up the land, and develop the natural resources of that country. We should pause and consider, what the effect of our legislation to-day will be on the future of that province. Sir, if ever there was a time in the history of this confederation, when instead of appealing to the passions and prejudices of race and religion, we should calmly lay these things aside and discuss this question on its merits, now is the occasion. Why, Sir, when we begin to proceed with the details of this measure, the first thing that crops up is a feeling of distrust and antagonism towards the executive of the province of Manitoba. We confessedly, in the clause immediately preceding the one under consideration, place extensive powers in the hands of the Lieutenant-Governor and his advisers in that province.

Then, in case they do not carry out those powers according to our ideas, we proceed to add to them certain other powers, leaving it problematical what the practical results of this clause will be when it is crystallized into law and attempted to be put into effective operation. If we continue to antagonize the executive of the province of Manitoba, so long as that executive represents the great mass of the population of that province, as it seems to do to-day, it will be futile to hope that we shall restore peace, and give to the minority the benefits we all feel it desirable that they should have—an opportunity of availing themselves of an effective system of education, and, combined with that in a greater or less degree, the blessings they ask for in respect to religious training. But when we look at the machinery we propose to institute, is it not common sense to study it in the light of what has happened not only in Manitoba and the North-west, but in the older provinces of the Dominion? If I understand the clause under consideration, we propose to create a double-headed system again, and impose it on the people of Manitoba, with all its attendant expenses and disadvantages, which became oppressive to that province in years gone by that at last they were set aside, and the machinery was condensed into one effective administration. If we duplicate that administration again, what will be the practical result from a common sense standpoint? This machinery cannot be operated without entailing serious expense. You may constitute a Board of Education; you may call it by any name you please; but you know from experience that unless the funds are provided to run the machine, it will be run inefficiently and we shall drift back to an inferior administration, with a crippled and hampered executive, simply because we shall over-burden the resources of the people of Manitoba in operating the machinery which we are creating, or else the machinery will be imperfectly operated for want of the necessary funds. I have no hesitation in saying that one strong reason why the system was modified in the first place was the expensiveness of operating it; and if we return to that system, have we not the right to ask ourselves if it will not result in a lower standard of inefficiency. Without saying an unkind word of the operation of the system in the past, I apprehend that we should drift back to the difficulty we all wish to avoid, the difficulty of an expensive and inefficient system, thus defeating the very end we have in view. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) to-night drew our attention to the condition of affairs in the North-west Territories, and I ask the attention of the committee to it for another reason—that the schools there are operated under similar conditions to those that obtain in the province of Manitoba to-day. We find that up to 1888 the North-west Territories had in active operation a system of separate schools, with a large amount of machinery in detail for the management and conduct of those schools, which were instituted in the interests of the respective minorities. But after several years of trial, experience demonstrated that it was a wasteful and unsatisfactory system—that it dissipated their energies without giving them such satisfactory returns as might be expected in the educational affairs of a country where settlement is sparse and the people are located wide apart. What was the practical remedy applied by the North-west legislature? They remodelled their system and did away with this double-barrelled authority; but they left their respective minorities, whether Catholic or Protestant, in possession of their separate schools. They consolidated the control and the administration of the system into the hands of one board, as being more effective and more workable, and a great deal less costly. The first item we have to consider, for an effective system of education in a new country with a scattered population, is how to lay out the resources at their disposal, which are necessarily scanty. In the North-west they consolidated their system in 1892. It did not appear to meet the approval of a section of the minority, because we find that appeals were made by the clergy and other parties in the North-west to this Government to use its power to re-instate the old condition of things. They appealed to the Government here by petition, as they had a right to do, and as it is the right of every citizen under British institutions to come to the fountain of authority and submit the grounds on which he may object to the existing condition of things. Those petitions came to Ottawa, and they were considered by the authorities here, who had given the North-west Territories their constitution. At that time the late Premier, Sir John Thompson, was the Minister of Justice, and had the practical guidance of the council in its decision on the questions submitted to it by those petitioners.

However much I may differ from the late Sir John Thompson in his political administration, I yield to no man in respect for his judgment as a lawyer and the capacity he had for weighing and measuring legal questions; yet although all his sympathies must have been inclined in favour of the petitioners, he declined to recommend the authorities here to interfere with or disallow that legislation of 1892, and it remains to-day the statute law of the North-west Territories. I appeal to this committee to-day, before they proceed to enact this double-headed authority in the province of Manitoba, to pause and consider first the position that led the legislature and authorities of the Territories to make these changes, and secondly, the influence that led the Government of that day, under the wise and legal and humane direction of the late Premier, not to change the legislation which the Territories had enacted in 1892. Sir, we all agree that the least burdensome mode in which education can be conducted in a sparsely and widely distributed population such as is scattered over Manitoba and the North-west, must, even in the very best condition of things, be an expensive process for the population. I had occasion, the other day, to look at the expenditure which it cost the province of Manitoba to administer their school system, even as at present consolidated, and without going into details, I want to draw the attention of this committee to one or two points that I think will enable them to realize the sacrifices which the people of Manitoba are making to-day to secure to their children the blessing of an efficient education. I yield to no man in my anxiety, first, that they should secure an efficient system of education for the expenditure of money that they are so freely laying out, and next that, as far as possible, every citizen of that country should, while securing the education of his children, secure for them also the advantages of what religious training he may prefer to have. Just let me draw your attention to the actual expense that the province has incurred in the administration of its school system, and I quote from the Dominion Year-Book of September, 1895, its last issue, which gives the operation of the schools for the year 1894. I find that there are 884 schools in that province all told, with nearly 1,050 teachers. I find that the grant from the government treasury of that small province is over $101,000. Let me emphasize what that expenditure amounts to per head of each pupil in that province. In Ontario, we pride ourselves upon the efficiency and completeness of our school system, yet this same return from which I am quoting gives the expenditure per pupil of the province of Ontario for the previous year as only $1.87 per head of the public funds contributed from the treasury of the province, and the average of the whole Dominion is given by the same authority as $1.90 per head ; while in the province of Manitoba, their expenditure per head is no less than $4.87. And this mind you is the grant from the provincial treasury, aside from the municipal tax of over $350,000. And when you recall how that population is scattered, when you note that the whole of those schools, including those in the cities and towns, only average a fraction of 18 pupils per school, and that there are 196 schools which average from 10 pupils downwards, and that 34 average only six pupils each ; and when you consider that whether you provide for the education of six pupils or for the education of 18 pupils, it means expense of teachers, the erection and maintenance of school-houses, and all the other machinery required to provide, in the majority of these cases, for the education of twice the number of those children, you must see the unwisdom of our legislating in any way to add to the expense. Now, if we load down this system that is already expensive enough, by adding to it a double-headed arrangement, such as this proposed by section 4 of this Act, we will destroy the very scheme that we are endeavouring to crystallize into law, by making it too burdensome for the community to bear. The hon. member for Simcoe, by his amendment, proposes that whereas Manitoba has already an advisory board, constituted of seven members, which has very wide powers over the existing school system in the province of Manitoba, and the mode of their selection and appointment is the best guarantee that the board will be constituted of men of high character and social position, and experts on the subject of education, and who will take pride and interest in the successful working out of the details of the school system under their control, you could have no better board in which to place the control and administration of these separate schools than the advisory board already constituted. You tell me that this board is not in harmony with this legislation. Well, if you are going to open a pitched battle with the executive of Manitoba, then you had better not pass this legislation at all. If you cannot manage to make this law effective so as to work harmoniously with that province, I tell you it is idle to-day to enter into a contest with that province. And while I do not want to turn up unpleasant reminiscences, I cannot help saying here to-day, if I were asked my decided conviction, that when this remedial order was passed last year, the Cabinet never expected to be called upon to follow it by legislation, but intended it for use in the general elections then imminent. But, be that surmise correct or otherwise, we are to-day face to face with this Bill and are dealing with the details of the measure. Let me glance for a moment at the duties of this Board of Education. I do not propose to read the clauses defining their duties but I want to draw your attention both to the powers conferred on this Board of Education and to their limits as well. Subsection (a), which we have had under consideration this afternoon, gives the board power to pass regulations for the general government and discipline of separate schools under this Act. Clause (b) gives them power as to the examining, grading and licensing of its teachers. But it is accompanied with this proviso for which I ask the attention of the committee :

> Provided that the standard of qualification for teachers shall be in secular matters the same as that at any time prescribed for teachers of other schools of a public character established under the statutes of the province of Manitoba.

Which means in plain English that the board that fixes the curriculum and methods of examination of teachers of the province, would regulate the examination and qualifications of the teachers of the separate schools. Then under section (c), they have the power to select all books, maps and globes to be used in the school under its control.

> Provided, however——

And I would call your attention to the terms of this proviso also——

> Provided, however, that no book, map or globe shall be selected unless such book, map or globe has been authorized for use either in the public schools of the province of Manitoba or in the separate schools of the province of Ontario.

Then there are general provisions with respect to the planning and construction of school-houses. Sir, I think it will not be doubted that, without regard to what a man's religious complexion may be, if he is a man worthy to be placed on the school board of the province, he can be safely trusted to provide for the school accommodation for the separate schools and to select school grounds and organize school districts. Far in the future the population under the control of this board and the funds at their disposal may enable them to establish the special training schools for higher branches in the separate school system. And I have no hesitation in saying this, and I think I voice the sentiment of every educationist who looks for the future prosperity of this Dominion, that while in the earlier years of their school life, children may be trained in separate schools, yet, when they get to the period when they are drafted into what may be called the higher educational systems of the province, we want to see them all mingle and take their education from the same teachers in the same school in competition with one another. And, while I respect the strong feelings of many educationists, and especially of my Roman Catholic friends in their desire to impart religious instruction to the children, yet, if it is effectually done in the earlier years of the child's education, he can be safely trusted when he goes to the high school. Now, Sir, these are some of the reasons why I feel that the separate Board of Education under this clause will defeat the end that is in view and will simply add a grievous burden to the people of Manitoba that they are not able to bear, and will tend to lower the grade of the schools under the control of these parties by dissipating the finances that otherwise would be available for their effective operation. We are told that all this depends on section 74. That depends on the good will and friendly feeling of the executive of the province of Manitoba. Now, Sir, I am sure there is no friend of the minority of Manitoba but would regret if these schools were established and deprived of the full share of the funds now felt necessary to make them effective, so that they would simply drag out a starving existence, their teachers receiving insufficient salaries. You know the old adage that when it comes to poor pay it is both poor preach and poor teach. The result would be what has been experienced in England, where there has been a strong agitation, where the competition between the denominational and public board school have become so keen that either the private schools must have their resources supplemented from the public funds or they must go under. Why ? Simply because the public schools were more effectively equipped. They gave their teachers better and more uniform salaries, and what is the result ? The clever, efficient teacher is drawn away from the limited field where his remuneration is small and is transferred to the board school, the public school in the adjoining parish or district, because these schools are better able to remunerate him for his efficient service. Now, Sir, we do not want to re-constitute that condition of things again in the province of Manitoba. We do not want, for the sake of carrying out a position that the Government have taken, to mutilate the school system of Maintoba, and engraft upon it a bundle of idle machinery that will simply load it to death, and destroy the object we have in view. It has been charged against that province that they were harsh with the minority. Sir, I cannot speak from personal observation, but I recollect last session when this matter was under discussion in the Senate, that a Senator who was inspector of schools formerly, and who was intimate with the whole machinery while it was in operation, quoted in his speech in the Senate, and you will find it in the debates of the Senate for last year, from the report of Inspector Young the previous year, with respect to the treatment that had been meted out to the schools of the minority in the sections that came under his observation. Without quoting it in detail, the substance of it was simply this : That so far from that inspector arbitrarily enforcing to the utmost the details of the new school Act of 1890, he made every possible concession to those Roman Catholic schools that came under the operation of the School Act, even allowing them, in contravention of the law, to have their own religious exercises at the beginning and end of the day's school teaching. Not only that, but he practically gave them the power to shorten, as they could do under the old statute, the days of school teaching by half an hour, that they might give religious instruction during that half hour before the school closed. Now, Sir, talk about a harsh enforcement of an Act, when it was operated under those principles ! There was a concession to the religious sentiments of those people when they were deprived of their separate schools, that it seems to me went a long way in inducing that population to accept the situation, and take the full advantage of the benefit that accrued to them by the public funds they received, and by the effective supervision that was given to those schools, and the effective supervision that was given to the qualifications of the teachers of those schools, to bring them up to the standard of the province. Sir, I do not want to say an unkind word as to the standard of the separate school teachers of the past, but I observe that all the way through this Act there is one current which is very noticeable, and that is that wherever it is possible, the standard provided for the teachers and pupils of the common schools is made the standard for the separate schools. Is not that strong evidence that the Government of the day here feel that the best guarantee for success of even the separate schools they propose to establish, is to bring them up to the same plain in these respects as the public school system for the province demands. When we reflect that the advisory board is constituted for the purpose of keeping the old standard abreast of the times, it seems to me that they might be trusted with the control of the separate schools as well. Sir, the Secretary of State the other day, in discussing this question, told us that the minority of Manitoba was suffering, suffering for six long years under the operation of this school system, and that they were crying to Heaven for justice, to repeat the picturesque language which is characteristic of that hon. gentleman. I ask this committee to pause before they take the final step in passing this Act, and to ask themselves whether, if they encumber the school system of Manitoba with this cumberous machinery which section 4 proposes to create, they will not prolong that agony that the hon. Minister is so anxious now to relieve. Perhaps it is not fair, until we get the official returns of the propositions made by the deputation that went to Manitoba the other day, to discuss an amicable settlement of this kind, but if the details that are published in the press are to be trusted, they made a proposition that looks to the accommodation of the Catholic population in cities, towns and villages, and left the conscientious scruples of the rural Catholics to be tramped underfoot, or left those pepole to do the best they could in the ordinary common schools, where, after all, as in the province of Ontario, I am satisfied a large section of those children will receive their education. Sir, should we not pause before we impose this legislation upon them ? If I understand the opinion expressed by lawyers here, it is that once we have enacted this law and it becomes a part of the school law of Manitoba, we cannot change it, however anxious we may be to do so. Should we graft upon Manitoba a system of this kind when, even by the admission of two members of the Cabinet to-day, they are not satisfied that it is within their power to pass it, or that it is the best kind of legislation, if they had power to pass it ! Sir, we have an extraordinary spectacle of the Minister of the Interior saying that he has grave doubts whether, after all, it won't be necessary to take that out as beyond our legal authority ; and we have another equally competent legal authority, the Minister of Public Works, saying that he thinks it is better there than out. If that is not very qualified praise for a clause of the statute that they have carefully considered and presented to this House, I do not understand the Queen's English. It reminds me very much of the old Scotchman that we never could get to say, when he was sick, that he was getting better, but we all considered that he was on the highroad to improvement when he declared he was no worse. That is about all the praise the hon. Minister of Public Works is able to give to this clause, that upon the whole it is better there than out. But the Minister of the Interior does not hesitate to say that he has grave doubts whether, upon the whole, it would not be better out. Under these circumstances I think, as a layman, that the whole thing would be better out, not only in the interest of the people of Canada, but in the interest of the minority in Manitoba they are so anxious to protect. I have a feeling, that if it were not for the dread of the electorate of some parts of Canada, hon. gentlemen would display a great deal less zeal for the down-trodden minority in Manitoba. However, we are face to face with the Bill. These are the reasons why we should pause before enacting section 4, and they are very strong reasons why we should not create an extra Board of Education, and why we should take into consideration the amendment suggested by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), and carefully consider whether instead of creating more machinery, we should depend on the good judgment and patriotism of the advisory board, consisting of the best educationists in Manitoba, and leave the matter in their hands. Hon. gentlemen say that the province is narrow in its views, and yet we have been told that the Government offered the Archbishop a seat on the advisory board for the purpose of using his influence along with others in perfecting the system of education. We in Ontario, found it was possible in operating our high schools to have a Catholic representative on the board, and I speak advisedly when I say it has operated satisfactorily ; and notwithstanding the bitter things said the action of Manitoba in offering the Archbishop a seat at the board entitle the government to a fair degree of consideration. But hon. gentlemen will say that we propose to go into the arena and do as the Ministry here appear to have done the other day, when, if the public prints are correct, they offered to suspend the operation of the Remedial Bill and its passage through the House till the discussion was through, but they so far forgot what was due to Manitoba that at the very moment the Dominion commissioners were to meet the representatives of the province to discuss terms of settlement, the leader of the House was trying to make progress with the Remedial Bill. If we approached Manitoba or any other independent province with a club behind our backs, while professing to hold out the olive branch, what can be expected but a strong feeling of distrust ? I desire to remind the committee that once before we tried conclusions with the province of Manitoba. When the Canadian Pacific Railway had a monopoly of the connections to the south, the province of Manitoba, year after year, passed charters for railway lines to connect the provincial system with the railway systems to the south, and the Dominion Government just as systematically disallowed those Acts. What was the result ? I give it as an illustration of our position to-day, and I think it is a fair illustration.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman can proceed if he does not go too far.

Mr. BAIN. I do not propose to make the reference too long. What was the result ? The net result was that Mr. Norquay lost the confidence of the people of Manitoba and his government was turned out root and branch ; and but for that action I am safe in saying that the Conservative party would to-day control the destinies of that province. The late Premier who controlled the destinies of the political affairs of this country successfully for many years, I refer to Sir John Macdonald, did not act as this Government is acting, trying to browbeat and bully Manitoba, approaching her with a club behind his back. No, when he saw that the difficulty had become serious, he met the Premier of the province, the same gentlemen who is there to-day, and they reached a settlement, and all parties to-day are satisfied. We have to admire the capacity of the man who in those days led the great Conservative party, and his death was a loss not only to his political party, but to Canada. These are the reasons why I think we should pause before adopting the section now under consideration.

Mr. SEMPLE. In offering a few remarks on this section, I recognize the fact that the Government have had a very difficult task to perform in framing a Bill on the decision of the Privy Council. It is true this Bill has been discussed for a long time, but I think the time has been well spent. It does not require much consideration to know why this is a difficult question. It is well known that it has been five times before the courts, and each court has given a different decision from the court whose judgment preceded it. When that fact is considered there is no wonder that considerable difficulty has been experienced. When we read the section now before the committee, and compare it with the concluding portion of the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, we must conclude that the Government are seeking a great deal more than is contained in the judgment of the Privy Council. By section 4 it is evidently contemplated to have two school systems with all the costly machinery and difficulties as regards management. Now, the concluding portion of the judgment of the Privy Council sets forth as follows :—

> It is certainly not essential that the statutes repealed by the Act of 1890 should be re-enacted, or that the precise provisions of these statutes should again be made law. The system of education embodied in the Acts of 1890 no doubt commends itself to, and adequately supplies the wants of the great majority of the inhabitants of the province. All legitimate grounds of complaint would be removed if that system were supplemented by provisions which would remove the grievance upon which the appeal is founded, and were modified so far as might be necessary to give effect to these provisions.

If the Government were to allow religious teaching in the schools they would be carrying out all that could be expected under the present circumstances. I have here a copy of an interview with the trusted counsel of the Catholic minority in Manitoba, and I will read it to the committee. I will read this for the information of hon. gentlemen opposite :

> In an interview Mr. Ewart pointed out, with reference to the Dominion offer, that the point upon which the negotiations must have failed was the refusal of the local government to permit Catholics to have schools in the cities and towns. So far as the schools are concerned in districts where there are none but Catholics, there does not seem to have been much difficulty ; but the point of separation seems to have been with reference to the schools in the cities and towns. The Dominion commissioners suggest, for instance, with reference to Winnipeg that the present Catholic schools be allowed to continue, subject, of course, to the Public School Act. They will be public schools in every sense of the word ; they will be controlled by trustees elected by the people of Winnipeg, and the only advantage that the Catholics would have by being permitted to segregate themselves would be that there would be less difficulty in permitting them to have their own religious exercises and such text-books as the advisory board should think to be satisfactory for them. Mr. Ewart pointed out specially the fact that under the Dominion commissioners' proposition there was to be no such thing as Catholic control, that the whole power was to remain in the Department of Education and the advisory board, with this limitation only, that there should be some Catholics upon the advisory board. Mr. Ewart had no hesitation in saying that had it not been for the strong election statements made by the government there could be no difficulty in their accepting this proposition, which is in effect the system which is in force in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick with the unanimous consent of almost every man in these provinces.

The gentleman who made these observations knows whereof he speaks, and I commend his remarks to the attention of the House. I say, Sir, that it was a good thing that a commission was appointed even at the eleventh hour, and the appointment of that commission reflects very great credit on the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte). When he first brought up the proposition in the House, the idea was scouted by the very men who afterwards adopted his suggestion and sent the commissioners to Winnipeg. The commission was a good idea, because it pointed out clearly to the Dominion and to the provinces what were the differences. I have no doubt that had that commission been appointed in the first place, when Manitoba was asked to appear before the Privy Council, I believe the whole difficulty would be settled amicably. Everyone who understands human nature knows that if there is a disposition to force a province or an individual to do something, that they will resent any such treatment. The idea of this Government must have been changed to a considerable extent in reference to a commission since the Minister of Marine and Fisheries used certain language during this session. He usually speaks guardedly, but on that occasion he spoke his mind quite freely, and showed very plainly that the Government wished to coerce Manitoba. It has been asked in this House : Why is it that Ontario Liberals are opposed to granting justice to Manitoba, as it is said, and at the same time are in favour of separate schools in Ontario. Well, at confederation it was laid down in black and white that there should be separate schools in Ontario for the benefit of the Catholic minority there.

It was so plain in the statute-book that it did not require a lawyer to understand the meaning, or an Act of interpretation to explain the words. The government of Ontario has tried to carry out that law faithfully. That grand old man, Sir Oliver Mowat, who has led the Liberal party so long in that province, considered it his duty to carry out the law in its entirety, and to enable the Catholics to have separate schools. At every election in the province of Ontario we Liberals have had to fight the Conservative party, because they said : Oh, you are giving the Catholics too much ; you are giving them too much money for schools, nunneries and hospitals. The Liberal leader of the province of Ontario does not want any step-children in that province. He wants to put his people on a footing of equality. As has been mentioned by the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Bain), there is a provision in the High School Act with regard to high schools enacting that there should be a Catholic representative on each school board. The Catholics attend the normal schools and they are well treated, and some of them teach in Protestant schools, and are just as well received as if they belonged to the Protestant denomination. I am glad of that, because there should be an equality in all these matters. It is different with regard to Manitoba. As I said before, the question of the rights of the minority has been five times before the courts. Different judges have given different decisions ; and when learned judges and lawyers differ in their interpretation, what are laymen to do ? They cannot understand it, and this is where the difficulty has arisen. If the rights of the Catholics in Manitoba had been defined in the statute-book as plainly as the rights of the Catholics in Ontario are, they would never have been denied by the Government of Manitoba ; and if the people of Manitoba considered that they had a legal right to the privileges they demand, I believe they would give them those privileges. Another fact of this case is that Sir John Macdonald, when asked to disallow the Act of 1890, refused to do so. The Dominion Government had disallowed many less important Acts of the legislature of Ontario, such as the Streams Bill, the License Act, and the Escheats Act ; but Sir John Macdonald refused to disallow this Act, because he believed that Manitoba was within its rights. If it had been decided by the first decision of the Privy Council that the province of Manitoba had exceeded her rights in abolishing the School Act of 1871 it would certainly have been restored and the matter would then be ended. But the question was dragged from court to court, and the difficulty always became greater. If anything is done, it must be done by conciliation and by appealing to the generosity of the people ; the difficulty will never be settled in any other way.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Mills, Annapolis). The hon. member must keep to the amendment.

Mr. SEMPLE. I am endeavouring to keep to the amendment by showing that this law would be of no benefit to the people of Manitoba. The province of Manitoba were endeavouring to do something to meet the views of the people long ago. In the pamphlet published by Senator Power, we have this statement quoted from the remarks of Senator Bernier, late superintendent of Catholic schools in Manitoba :

> Inducements were offered to them by the local government through their officers to attend the schools without entirely sacrificing their views ; and they thought they might try the new system. It is not on account of any preference for the public schools, but because of their poverty and of the peculiar inducements offered to them. The local government were anxious to have some of our schools brought under the law in order to be able to base an argument upon the change. An inspector was sent to them, who told them that if they wanted to keep up their schools the government would not be too exacting about compliance with the regulations. He told them that they might quietly give any religious instruction in the school after school hours. He told them they could not begin and close school work by saying the ordinary Catholic prayers, and even suggested how it should be done. Instead of opening the school at a certain hour, they might open some few minutes before, and at the closing they might close a few minutes after the regular hour, so that they might be able to say that there had been no prayer during the school hours.

The CHAIRMAN. I think the hon. gentleman is out of order in going into this general discussion.

Mr. SEMPLE. I was endeavouring to show——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order. Chair.

Mr. McNEILL. I do not understand that you have ruled that the hon. member is out of order. You said you thought he was out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. I say the hon. gentleman is out of order in going into a general discussion. He must keep to the motion before the House.

Mr. MULOCK. Excuse me. He is entitled to speak both to the main motion and to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. It is my opinion that he should speak to the clause or to the amendment.

Mr. SEMPLE. I was endeavouring to speak to the motion, and to show the difficulties that are in the way. I was endeavouring to show that there was an endeavour on the part of Manitoba to comply with the wishes of the minority ; and if that was done to the full extent, there certainly would be no need of a Remedial Bill. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries on a certain occasion, said :

> If the leader of the Opposition had a guarantee in his pocket and could produce it before this House, from the government of Manitoba, stating that in twenty-four hours from this time they would amend their law and re-establish separate schools, not acquiescing in the remedial order, I say that would be no remedy, that it would be no settlement of the case, that they would kick it aside three months afterwards, if they thought it had not worked well.

This shows the spirit in which the Government wanted to get the Manitoba government to do a certain thing, with the Remedial Bill hanging over their heads. It is certainly not fair to the province, and that province is one that has certainly shown a great deal of public spirit in days gone by. We all remember that at the time of the North-west rebellion, which cost this country $8,000,000, and a considerable sacrifice of life, the people of Manitoba went to the front like men; and some of them are threatening that if their rights are taken away, they will shoulder their musket again. I have heard that the gentleman who made that remark was a Conservative, and no doubt he expressed the feeling of the people. The feeling is that there might have been a compromise effected some time ago; but in the local elections the people decided almost to a man that they wanted no interference with their School Act, and this makes it more difficult to have a compromise now.

Mr. McLEOD. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. SEMPLE. I will now take my seat, because I have said all I intended to say.

Mr. SPROULE. Even at this late hour of the night I propose to trespass on the patience of the House for some time in dealing with this clause, because I regard it as one of the most important clauses of the Bill. At the outset, I may say to the hon. gentlemen that no amount of noise will divert me from my purpose of saying what I intend to say. I have not yet spoken on any clause of the Bill. The amendment proposed by the hon. member for North Simcoe I regard as a very important one. It is:

> That the first subsection of the fourth section be hereby amended by striking out the first line and substituting the following:—"It shall be the duty of the advisory board constituted under the provisions of the Education Department Act of the province of Manitoba."

It is substituting the advisory board for the Board of Education.

Mr. McNEILL. I rise to a point of order. If these noises do not cease, it will be impossible to go on with the discussion, and I shall be very reluctantly compelled to move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I would ask the hon. gentlemen to keep quiet. Is the House ready for the question.

Mr. McNEILL. By no means.

Mr. SPROULE. It is hardly necessary to say that such an important measure as this cannot be expected to pass without discussion.

An hon. MEMBER. Obstruction.

Mr. SPROULE. It is all very well for hon. gentlemen to say "obstruction," but the Bill contains 112 clauses, upon which I have not opened my mouth since we went into Committee of the Whole; and if these hon. gentlemen who are making these noises regard it as the duty of hon. members to hold their peace on this important measure, I for one do not share their view, and intend to exercise my right in this House, as the representative of the people, by advancing what arguments I see fit against the passage of any of its clauses. This clause is certainly a very important one. It adds another body to the two already provided by the Education Act of Manitoba. Now, it is always a step in the right direction to reduce the number of departments that are employed to do anything, and which are productive of expense, when you can diminish the number without at all impairing the efficiency of the law or its administration. Now, there can be no question that the advisory board of the Education Department, appointed under the Manitoba Act, is quite competent to discharge the duties which we are now seeking to impose upon the separate school board. If you compare the duties which the advisory board has to perform with the duties which are given to the separate school board in this Bill, you will find that they are exactly the same. The amendment of my hon. friend from North Simcoe proposes that we should do away with this separate school board and substitute for it the advisory board which is already in existence, and which we can utilize without incurring any additional expense. It seems to me that, from every point of view, this amendment must commend itself to the House. The only point in which the present advisory board would not be competent to act would be in the prescribing of the religious exercises in the Catholic schools, but that might be left out in this clause and be provided for by a simple change in one section of the Bill.

Mr. McNEILL. Mr. Chairman, I must really ask you to be good enough to keep order.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentlemen would assist me in keeping order—I am sure I cannot.

Mr. McNEILL. If you cannot keep order, Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again. If the House will not allow discussion it is absurd to go on attempting discussion.

The CHAIRMAN. The hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) has the floor.

Mr. McNEILL. Well, I move that motion, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it seconded ?

Mr. McNEILL. The hon. member for East Grey seconds it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the committee ready for the question.

Mr. McNEILL. I am ready to discuss the question, but I do not intend to speak while this noise is going on.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. McNEILL. We will go on, when order is restored. There is no need for hon. members to excite themselves and there is no need for my hon. friend (Mr. Sproule) to exert his voice to overcome the disorder of the House. He will have a good deal of talking to do before this measure gets through committee as there are a great many clauses to discuss. My hon. friend is making a strong and cogent speech in the midst of interruptions. Hard pieces of paper are thrown at my hon. friend to the great danger of his eyesight.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. McNEILL. Yes, my hon. friend is a medical man, and I am sure he will agree with me that the impact of such a piece of paper upon the eye might produce serious consequence. We know coercion is rampant, but we ought not to be obliged to speak here under danger of injury to our persons as well to our health. I think it is well the country should understand the treatment that is meted out to us by these people who are so anxious to protect the rights of minorities. The noise made by these gentlemen furnishes me with all the argument I could require in favour of my motion that the committee should rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

The CHAIRMAN. It is suggested that the Chairman should keep order.

Mr. McNEILL. I do not blame the Chairman, by any means. The Chairman cannot keep order unless hon. gentlemen are willing to obey his ruling. And he has ruled over and over again. This is a ridiculous exhibition, a disgraceful exhibition. The House of Commons is bringing itself into contempt before the people. This is a most important measure which we have under discussion, and the clause immediately before us is one of the most important in the whole Bill. My hon. friend (Mr. Sproule) makes a logical and cogent argument with regard to the clause and hon. gentlemen will not listen to him.

An hon. MEMBER. Discuss the clause.

Mr. McNEILL. The actions of hon. members belie their words. They have prevented discussion by the disturbances they have made. But if hon. gentlemen are willing to allow the discussion to proceed, I shall be very glad with the consent of the House, to withdraw my motion. But if hon. gentlemen will not allow discussion, I will press my motion.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. If the hon. gentleman would allow the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule) to speak, instead of giving us the very instructive lecture we have been receiving from him, I think it would save time.

Mr. McNEILL. I have said several times that I would be only too glad to withdraw the motion, so that my hon. friend from Grey might address the House, if the Postmaster General will only guarantee him a fair hearing, but he will not do that. Now, then, is there any use in continuing this discussion between 11 and 12 o'clock at night, when the House will not hear him ? I think it is an absurdity. The only argument that the friends of the Bill are able to advance to meet our objections, is the argument they make with their heels. I do not think it is a very intellectual way of meeting the objections to the Bill, but it is the one they seem to think the most effectual.

Motion that committee rise, withdrawn.

Mr. SPROULE. After this little diversion, I hope we will be able to get on more amicably. I would not like to have it to go to the county that the hon. gentlemen who are pressing this Bill, were not prepared to allow a fair discussion on it, nor would I wish it to go to the country that every member who rose in this House to express his opinions regarding it, was immediately met by obstruction in the shape of noise and interruptions. I have only spoken once upon the general principle of this Bill, and not at very great length. We were told by the Secretary of State that this Bill was one of the most important that ever came before a Canadian Parliament, therefore I think its importance justifies me or any other member in discussing its clauses as fully as he may think it his duty to discuss them. Now, I was discussing the duties of the advisory board under the old Manitoba Act, and the duties of the Board of Education under this Act, and endeavouring to show that as they were so similar, they might as well be discharged by the one as by the other, and therefore the expense of an additional board might be saved. Now we find that among the duties of the advisory board are to provide for the qualification for teachers in secular matters and to provide for the issuing of teachers' certificates. If the advisory board can do these things, could they not be as well done as by the Board of Education, because they are suitable to the Board of Education they would be suitable to the advisory board, and if suitable to the advisory board, they would be equally suitable to the Board of Education. The next duty of this board is to select all the books, maps and globes to be used in the schools, but they are to select none but what shall have been authorized for the public schools and for the high schools. Authorized by whom ? By the advisory board. Then if authorized by the advisory board, surely it is as easy for the advisory board to do it, as it is for the Board of Education proposed to be established under this Act. Therefore the duties are practically the same, and it is as easy for the one to perform them as the other, and they, the advisory board, as likely to perform them fairly. Another duty is to make and enforce regulations for the establishment and operation of schools, to make an annual examination of teachers for matriculation at the university in Manitoba, and to give special aid to such school from the funds at their disposal. Could not these funds be as well placed at the disposal of the advisory board as with the board to be constituted ? It is only a matter after all of book-keeping. If the accounts are kept separate the advisory board can as easily pay out the funds as the board to be established. The clause further provided that an amount could be given not exceeding one-twentieth of the general appropriation. I have given the duties of the advisory board and the duties as laid down in the new Act to be discharged by the Board of Education, and they are so near alike that they could be discharged just as easily, readily and freely by one as by the other. So the points of difference are reduced in reality to one point, and that is with reference to the terms of religious instruction. That can be arranged, however, by amending a single clause and by not allowing this matter to be dealt with by the advisory board, but provided for outside the board. If so, this amendment is specially applicable, for it simplifies the work, reduces the number of boards, is more easily understood and is equally fair to separate school supporters and public school supporters. The judgment of the Privy Council distinctly says that is is not ncessary to re-enact the law as it existed prior to 1890, and points out that the present legislation could be supplemented by provisions that would reremedy the grievances on which the appeal was founded. What are the grievances ? They simply amount to the right to give religious instruction. They are willing to have the same kind of schools, the same kind of education, the same arrangement of classes and of teachers, but there is the difference with respect to religious instruction. If that difference is provided for, the requirements will be met. I always regarded it as essential in adjusting points of difference to reduce them to the smallest possible number and to simplify them as much as possible, because by doing so it is easier to bring the contending parties together and arrive at a satisfactory settlement or compromise. The appeal was based on subsection 3 of clause 22 of the Manitoba Act, and the Remedial Act was framed to apply only so far as the circumstances of each case required. When we go an iota beyond that, we are going beyond what the judgment of the Privy Council said we could do. It does not say it is necessary to establish the board mentioned in this Bill because the advisory board is already in existence and could do the work just as efficiently as the board now proposed. What are the points of difference ? What would be satisfactory to the minority to remedy the grievance ? We have had a debate, and we have obtained information from representative Catholics, and their statements should be sufficient to indicate what would be satisfactory to the minority. The Minister of Public Works has given the House to understand that if the people secured the provisions contained in the Nova Scotia system, they would be satisfied. There are rights given by law and conceded by courtesy. There is a Jesuit College that has not been guaranteed rights by law but by courtesy during fifty years, and the Jesuits are satisfied. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) also said the Nova Scotia Act would be satisfactory, and that he believed the minority in Manitoba would be satisfied with it. It has often been stated that the people of Canada would be willing to grant all the rights conceded by that Act to the minority in Manitoba without any dissent. We know that Manitoba would be quite willing to grant that, because we have the assurance in the offer made to the commission the other day. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) has said that would be satisfactory, and so has the Archbishop of Halifax, who is a high dignitary of the church, and ought to be regarded as a competent authority on what would suit the minority in Manitoba. The hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. Cameron), in answer to the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon), said that it would be satisfactory, but he wanted it by law and not by grace or by courtesy.

Mr. McLEOD. I rise to a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I want to see how far this thing can go. We are now discussing subsection (a) of section 4 of this Bill, together with the amendment moved by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). I submit that the discussion should be confined to those two things, instead of to a discussion of the whole Bill, and as to whether it is advisable to pass a Remedial Bill or not.

Mr. McNEILL. I must say that I think my hon. friend (Mr. McLeod) is endeavouring to draw the line very strictly indeed. The remarks of my hon. friend (Mr. Sproule) are perfectly germane to the particular part of the clause, and to the amendment that has been moved. I have been in this House a good many years, and I never heard an attempt made to draw the line closer than it was drawn by you, Sir, to-day. Surely my hon. friend (Mr. McLeod) does not want to stifle discussion on this question. It is scarcely fair that he should wish to introduce legal subtleties into this matter. It would be scarcely possible to imagine anything more unhappy and disastrous than that you, Sir, should endeavour to draw the line too closely in reference to a discussion of this kind.

Mr. CASEY. Speaking to the point of order, I think it is desirable to have it clearly established at once and for all what is in order on occasions of this kind. It is clearly in order to urge any considerations that may tend to show that this particular clause of the Bill is unnecessary. I have been listening to the remarks of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule), and I am satisfied that the considerations he urges do tend to show that this particular clause is unnecessary because of the offers which he declares to have been made by the government of Manitoba.

Mr. SPROULE. I regret exceedingly that the hon. gentleman (Mr. McLeod) has seen fit to raise this point of order, because it seems to be trifling with the rights of members of this House, and coming from an old parliamentarian like the hon. gentleman it is all the more out of place. The duties of this board are assigned all through the Act, and this amendment proposes to substitute the advisory board. I am endeavouring to show that the clause could be simplified by ascertaining the points of difference, and then that the advisory board could discharge the duties as well as the board mentioned here. It is well understood that when you have the whole clause before you, and an amendment to that clause, you have a perfect right to speak to any portion of that clause or to the amendment.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I have been following the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule), and I cannot say that he was out of order. Knowing as I do that he wishes to carry on this matter as quickly as possible, I would ask him not to go too far from the paragraph under discussion.

Mr. SPROULE. I certainly do not wish to go too far from it. I shall endeavour to show how easily it would be, under this amendment, to provide what the minority wanted. I cited as my authority for this the hon. member for Halifax, the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Cameron), Archbishop O'Brien and the Minister of Public Works. I wish to show that what they consider acceptable to the minority has been already offered by the province of Manitoba, and that therefore there is no need for passing this lengthy Bill. The hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Cameron) was the only one who objected to have these rights by courtesy, and he wanted them by law, but Manitoba has said that they are willing to give it by law.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). Manitoba did not say so.

Mr. SPROULE. The offer of the government of Manitoba, which I have here, they consented to give that right by law. The Nova Scotia system provides that they would give them a common fund out of which they could support their schools. This is the Nova Scotia system. That they would give them common inspection. This they have distinctly offered. That they would give them common text books. They have made an offer of this. That they would have the certification of their teachers, like the public school teachers, and common rights and privileges so far as the management of their schools is concerned. In the Halifax schools religious teaching is allowed after school hours only; but the government of Manitoba offered to allow religious teaching before school hours were closed, and they expressed their willingness to embody that in law. It strikes me, therefore, that there is not much difference between what the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Cameron) said the minority were willing to take, provided it were embodied in law, and what the Manitoba government are willing to give. There is so little difference that it is scarcely worth while taking up the time of this House in trying to go through a long Bill like this, seeing that the Manitoba government refuse nothing of what it has been declared over and over again would be acceptable to the people if it were only embodied in law. Another very strong objection in my mind to having this Board of Education is that it would be heaping up expense. In Manitoba the education of children is very expensive to-day, and the number of people who support the educational system is very small.

Mr. DALY. Mr. Chairman, as I presume the House must adjourn before Sunday morning, I think it would be well for the committee to rise and report progress, and I move to that effect.

Motion agreed to, and committee rose and reported progress.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is the hon. gentleman in a position to state that the Supplementary Estimates will be produced on Monday. They were promised for Monday of this week.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I am authorized by the Minister of Finance to say that he hopes to bring down the Estimates. I will draw his attention to the matter. I am not in a position to say whether his hope will be realized or not.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 12 o'clock (midnight).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 6th April, 1896.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 93) respecting Debenture and Loan Companies (from the Senate).—(Mr. Foster.)

LAND GRANTS FOR SERVICE IN NORTH-WEST.

Mr. DALY moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 94) to make further provision respecting grants of land to members of the militia force on active service in the North-west.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Explain.

Mr. DALY. This is a Bill similar to one that was passed two years ago, and it has been before the House several times. Its object is to extend the time for applications from members of the militia who served in the North-west, and it is in accordance with the terms of the Act passed two years ago, and a similar Act passed four years ago.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before the Minister of Finance leaves the Chamber, I should like to know, as it is exactly a week since he promised the Supplementary Estimates, whether reasonable progress is being made towards printing the same.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes. I am happy to inform my hon. friend that the final revise of the Supplementary Estimates is being printed, and I hope by six o'clock to be able to bring down the Supplementary Estimates. They will be brought down to-day, at all events.

THE COMMISSION TO MANITOBA.

Mr. LAURIER. As I observe the hon. Minister of Justice has returned to the House, I should like to know from the Government if it is intended to have the report of the Commission laid upon the Table at once ?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I had hoped to have the Message of His Excellency here by this time, in order to have laid it on the Table of the House immediately.

NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES REPRESENTATION BILL.

Mr. MARTIN. When are we to expect the Bill with respect to the North-west Territories Representation Act ?

Mr. DALY. I hope to be able to present it to-morrow.

HUDSON BAY CANAL AND NAVIGATION COMPANY.

House resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 52) to incorporate the Hudson Bay Canal and Navigation Company.—(Mr. Boyd.)

(In the Committee.)

Mr. DALY. I move that the committee rise and report progress.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Carried.

Mr. MULOCK. What is the reason of that action, Mr. Chairman ? I object to your deciding at once that the motion is carried. There has been no discussion on the question.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I have declared it carried.

Mr. MULOCK. I submit that you had no right to declare it carried.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MULOCK. I am perfectly in order. I object to the Chairman acting in this manner. I rose, on the motion being made, and I intended to ask the reason for the motion being made ; and, if the Chairman declares the motion carried, he is doing what has not been decided by the committee. For the Chairman to declare the motion carried in this way is to interfere with the rights of members, and it is an arbitrary exercise of power. It is a violation of the sworn duty of his office.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MULOCK. We have rights here, and I, for one, intend to exercise my rights.

Mr. OUIMET. Rights of obstruction.

Mr. MULOCK. We have the rights of members, and when a motion is made that the committee rise, we have a right to claim that the motion be the subject of discussion. No Chairman can gag the House or the committee by any arbitrary exercise of power. I again ask why the committee does not proceed with the measure, what is the argument in favour of the committee rising ?

Mr. DALY. The reason I made the motion was that the hon. gentleman in charge of the Bill is not here.

Mr. MULOCK. It would have been in better taste, Mr. Chairman, if the motion had been allowed to be put in the proper way, and, if hon. members had had a fair opportunity of exercising their full rights before you assumed to act as you did in this case. There is no objection, in view of the explanation of the Minister of the Interior, to the motion being carried, so far as I know.

Mr. MARTIN. I object to this Bill being delayed so long.

Committee rose and reported progress.

RESIGNATION OF LIEUTENANT-COLONEL HAMILTON.

Mr. EDGAR asked :

1. Has Lt.-Col. Hamilton, of the Queen's Own, Toronto, been officially asked to resign ?

(a.) If so, upon what grounds has his resignation been demanded ?

2. Have any, and what charges been formulated against Lt.-Col. Hamilton, and by whom ?

(a.) If so, has he been given any opportunity to meet them ?

3. Has Lt.-Col. Hamilton made any charges against officers of his regiment ?

(a.) If so, has an inquiry been ordered thereon?

Mr. DICKEY. The following answer has been handed to me :—No. 1. He has. (a) On the grounds that, as Lieutenant-Colonel Hamilton had, unfortunately, lost the confidence of the officers and of the regiment, and their good-will, a dead-lock had occurred, highly injurious to the regiment, and it therefore became necessary to effect a change in the command. No. 2. No charges whatever have been formulated against Lieutenant-Colonel Hamilton. No. 3. Lieutenant-Colonel Hamilton has made a charge against an officer, for not handing over to him, when ordered, certain moneys received by this officer from other officers ; but the officer in question, who was acting as treasurer for the whole, had received from the other officers a notice that he was not to part with the money, which had been handed over to him for safe-keeping, and he was, therefore, perfectly justified in his refusal. The charge, therefore, made by Lieutenant-Colonel Hamilton for disobedience of order, was no charge at all, and, therefore, no inquiry was needed.

IMPORTATION OF RAW SUGAR EX-SS. "CYNTHANIA."

Mr. McMULLEN asked :

1. Has a suit been commenced in the Exchequer Court, or in any other court, to recover the duties payable on a cargo of sugar ex-SS. "Cynthania," landed about the date of the imposition of the duty on raw sugar ? If not, why has not such suit been commenced ? If commenced, what date was the suit entered ? What attorneys are acting for the Crown ? Against whom has the suit been brought ? What stage is the suit now in, and when will it probably be tried and where ?

2. When the sugar was handed over to the importer, what security was taken to secure payment of the duties ?

Mr. WOOD. Answer to first question : A suit has been commenced in the Exchequer Court to recover duties on 30,064 bags or mats of raw sugar imported on the steamship "Cynthania" into Canada at the port of Montreal and landed after the 3rd day of May, 1895. The suit was commenced on the 10th January, 1896. Messrs. O'Connor & Hogg, of Ottawa, are the solicitors acting for the Crown. The suit has been brought against the Canada Sugar Refining Company (Limited). The suit has been set down for trial on the 10th day of April instant, and will be tried on that day at the Supreme and Exchequer Court room, Ottawa. 2. Only 10,578 bags of the 30,064 bags went into the possession of the importers; the remaining 19,486 bags were placed in warehouse, and are there now. As security for the 10,578 bags taken, the importers placed a like quantity of raw sugar under the control of the customs authorities in Montreal, to abide the decision as to whether the sugar imported was dutiable or not.

TAY CANAL.

Mr. CHARLTON asked :

1. What amount of tolls were collected upon the Tay Canal in the year 1895 ?

2. What was the cost of management of the Tay Canal in the year 1895 ?

3. What amount of money was expended in repairs upon the Tay Canal in the year 1895 ?

Mr. HAGGART. I gave an answer about a week ago to the same question.

Mr. CHARLTON. I have not seen it. I have been here every time my questions were asked.

Mr. HAGGART. It was given about a week ago. I have not it here with me now.

JOINT FISHERY COMMISSION—CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. GILLIES asked :

Have the Commissioners of the Joint Convention of the Government of Canada and the United States completed their investigation into the subjects submitted to them for examination and to report upon ? If so, does their report suggest that an arrangement be entered into between both Governments for the purpose and with the object of preventing and prohibiting purse-seining and trawling beyond the three-mile limit upon the Atlantic coast ? If the report has been completed, has it been submitted to Her Majesty's Government of Great Britain and that of the United States, and what action is likely to be taken thereon ? If the work of the commission has not yet been concluded, when is their report expected by the Government of Canada ?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The commissioners appointed by Her Majesty's Government and that of the United States, under international agreement, have, it is understood, completed their investigations and are at present engaged in the preparation of their report for submission to their respective governments. The action to be taken on the report or reports, is provided for in the agreement, as follows :—

> The two governments agree that so soon as the reports of the commissioners shall be laid before them, as aforesaid, they will consider the same, and exchange views thereon, to the end of reaching, if expedient and practicable, such conventional or other understanding as may suffice to carry out the recommendation of the commissioners, by treaty or concurrent legislation on the part of the respective governments or the legislatures of the several states and provinces, or both, as may be found most advisable ; but nothing herein contained shall be found to commit either government to the results of the investigation hereby instituted.

It is impossible to say when the report might be communicated to the Government of Canada, or what suggestions may be contained : but it is understood that it will be communicated to Her Majesty's Government, and that of the United States, in June next. The scope of the inquiry includes the whole question affecting the fisheries in contiguous waters, and in waters of the open sea, commonly resorted to by fishermen of the United States and of Canada.

HARRIS PROPERTY—ST. JOHN, N.B.

Mr. LANDERKIN (for Mr. McMullen) asked :

> When did the Government purchase the so-called Harris property at St. John, N.B. ? What was the amount paid for the said property, and what would be the rate per acre ?

Mr. HAGGART. I gave the answer to that question a couple of weeks ago. I think there was $200,000 paid for the property. I do not know what the acreage is.

BRANCH POST OFFICE—QUEBEC.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked :

> Is the building in Crown Street, Quebec, and used as a branch post office, the property of the Government, and, if not, from whom leased ?
> When was it first leased ? What is the amount of rent annually paid, and to whom ? How much has been expended by the Government in repairs, improvements, &c., up to date since the building was first leased by the Government ?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I shall give the hon. gentleman the information I have been able to get so far, but it is incomplete. The building in Crown Street, Quebec, used by the Government as a branch post office is not the property of the Government. It is leased. It will take two or three days to obtain the other information. The present lease was made in 1893.

Mr. LAURIER. You cannot say from whom it was leased ?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The hon. gentleman will get all the information later on.

Mr. COSTIGAN.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Allow the question to stand.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question stands at the request of the Government.

THE CURRAN BRIDGE.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked :

> What was the original estimate of cost of construction of the Curran Bridge ? What has been paid upon it up to date, and what is still claimed ?

Mr. HAGGART. I have not got the answer from the department yet, but I think the information has been brought down to the House, time and time again.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Better bring it down again. We must have line upon line and precept upon precept.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked :

> Did the Government seek to recover, in court, from Mr. St. Louis for alleged losses on the Curran Bridge ? If so, for what amount ? Did they succeed ? If not, what did the action cost ?

Mr. DICKEY. 1. Yes. 2. $143,881, and interest. 3. The case is still before the Exchequer Court.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked :

> Did Mr. St. Louis bring action against the Government for claims, or did he set up a counter claim against the action brought by the Government ? If so, did he succeed, and for what amount ? What was the total cost of suit ?

Mr. DICKEY. Mr. St. Louis brought an action against the Crown by petition of right. He failed in the Exchequer Court. In the Supreme Court he got a judgment for $61,842.29. The total amount of his claim being $63,642.29. The total cost of the suit cannot yet be arrived at.

ST. CHARLES BRANCH RAILWAY.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked :

> What was the estimated cost of the St. Charles Branch Railway ? What has been expended upon it ? What is still claimed ? What land damages have been paid ?

Mr. HAGGART. The whole of the information that the hon. gentleman asks was brought down this session.

THE TAY CANAL.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked :

> What was the original estimate of the cost of the Tay Canal ? What was the total cost of construction ? How much was expended upon it last year for repairs and maintenance ? What was the revenue last year ?

Mr. HAGGART. The whole of that information was brought down to the House about three weeks ago.

Mr. LANDERKIN. On what date ?

Mr. HAGGART. I think about the 29th of February last.

FISHWAYS ON THE NORTH RIVER.

Mr. JEANNOTTE (for Mr. Girouard) asked:

1. Whether the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has considered the petition of the inhabitants of the counties of Terrebonne and Two Mountains, asking for the establishment of migratory fishways in the dams across the North River between St. Andrews and St. Jérôme ?
2. Whether the department has sent an inspector to the locality in order to ascertain whether fishways can be constructed on the said river ?
3. Whether such inspector, if sent, has made a report ?
4. What are the results of the said report ?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I gave the hon. member for Two Mountains (Mr. Girouard) that information about ten days ago.

THE REMEDIAL ACT (MANITOBA).

House again resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 58) the Remedial Act (Manitoba).

(In the Committee.)

Mr. McCARTHY. The committee will remember that when this question was under discussion on Saturday last a difficulty arose with reference to the second subsection of section 3, which we had passed, and the power which we now propose to confer upon the Board of Education ; and, as the Minister of Justice (Mr. Dickey), whose name is endorsed on the Bill, but who I believe is not now in charge of it, is now in his place, I think the committee would be glad to hear from him what the explanation of the matter is. The difficulty which troubled us, I would explain for the benefit of my hon. friend the Minister of Justice, was at to whether it was necessary or proper for us now to pass the 4th section, regard being had to what we had already done in regard to the 3rd section. In the 3rd section this committee has distinctly recognized the Department of Education, empowering it "to make regulations for the registering and reporting of daily attendance at all the separate schools in the province, subject to the approval of the Lieutenant-Governor in Council" ; and also "to make from time to time such regulations as they may think fit for the general organization of the separate schools." We know that the Department of Education is a Government department of the province of Manitoba—a department that was not in existence at the time the former school system prevailed. It is a department that was constituted and created under the Act of 1890, which repealed the double system of schools that was in existence up to that time. Now, we propose by the 4th clause to empower the Board of Education "to have under its control and management the separate schools and to make from time to time such regulations as may be deemed fit for their general government and discipline, and the carrying out of the provisions of this Act." What we could not quite understand was what duties the Government proposed to assign to the Department of Education, and what duties to the Board of Education, because it was not very easy to distinguish between the authority which the Department of Education has to make regulations for the general organization of the separate schools, and for registering and reporting the daily attendance at the separate schools, and the authority which it is proposed to give to the Board of Education, to have the control and management of the separate schools. In the course of the discussion it appeared that my hon. friend (Mr. Daly), who had charge of the Bill in the absence of the Minister of Justice, seemed to think that the difficulty was so great that the Government would have to reconsider the question, and to see whether it would not be necessary to withdraw section 3, or subsection 2 of section 3. That, of course, this committee cannot do. Whatever may be done at a future stage, the committee are not competent to go back and revise the work they have already done; and we have to go on and consider section 4 in the light of what we have already done in section 3, unless indeed the Government propose to say that they intend, at a future stage, to omit section 3 from the Bill. I wish also to draw attention to the fact that when section 3 was under the consideration of the committee, it was objected to by gentlemen who are in other respects in favour of the Bill ; but its insertion was approved of by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Ouimet), in the following language, which will be found at page 5124 of "Hansard" :

> I may tell the hon. gentleman, in order to calm his apprehension, that this very question has been discussed with very great care and attention with the counsel representing the minority, Mr. Ewart, and he has insisted that this clause should be in the Bill in order, as he contends, to avoid any doubt that may arise as to the constitutionality of the measure we have now before us. After having given to this clause a very close study we have come to the conclusion that the judgment of the Privy Council provides that we should take away none of the rights and powers that exclusively were vested in the general Board of Education. All we can do is to restore to the minority the rights they formerly possessed.

So that this clause, according to that statement of the Minister of Public Works, was not inadvertently inserted. My hon. friend the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Daly)—I am reading now from page 5128 of the report—said this :

> The result of the action taken is to make the law uniform, and as it existed prior to 1890. The Board of Education, under the old law, consisted > of the Protestant and Roman Catholic sections, and the powers that were vested in the whole of the old board were given to the Department of Education, under the Act of 1890. If we were to vest in the board, under this Act the powers vested in the Board of Education, we would be giving that board greater power than the Catholic section of the board possessed previous to the Act of 1890. We desire not to go outside the powers vested in the old section of the board.

So that the reason appears to have been, so far as I can gather from these two statements, that the Government desire to make this Act a rescript or reflection of the law as it stood prior to 1890. Now, I will draw the attention of the hon. Minister of Justice to this fact. These two sections are certainly apparently inconsistent, and the passage of them is undoubtedly calculated to create difficulties and litigation, more especially when we remember that this law, if passed, will be passed against the will of the province. I am not able, nor was the Minister of the Interior able to state what the duties were which it was proposed to give by section 3, and what other duties it was proposed to give by section 4. The hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) said that the Department of Education would be charged with the duty, in the first place, of defining the number of pupils who would attend the schools. That, he held, came within the meaning of the term organization ; but it was pointed out that the second subsection sufficiently dealt with that subject, and, therefore, that could not have been the object.

Mr. DICKEY. The hon. gentleman knows that before 1890 there was a joint Board of Education, composed of Protestants and Catholics, which performed certain functions together, as a whole board. He knows also that each section, the Catholic section and the Protestant section of this Board, had also certain powers. In drafting this Bill, it was found that there were certain powers given under the old law to the joint board. It was obvious impossible to constitute the joint board again. But there was in the province a Department of Education, which had large powers under the Act of 1890, and it was thought desirable that the general powers exercised previously by the joint board with regard to all schools, irrespective of their religious complexion, should be allotted to the Department of Education. The first subsection of section 3 shows the object of that, namely, to make regulations for the registering and reporting of daily attendance at all the separate schools of the province, which is obviously a very important matter for statistical and other purposes. The hon. gentleman has pointed out the inconsistency which he finds between subsection 2 of section 3 and the first subsection of section 4. The wording of the sections is not exactly the same. The one deals with the general organization ; the other with the control and management and general government and discipline. I am not at all prepared to say, at this moment, that the general powers given for the purpose of general organization, to the Board of Education, which shall apply to all schools, necessarily clash with the powers given to the Board of Education for the general government, discipline, control and management of the separate schools. It seems to me that the difficulty which the hon. gentleman raises must be largely theoretical, because these sections have stood side by side, in the province of Manitoba, for nineteen years, and the old school system was actually worked under them. While it is very difficult for me, not knowing the actual details of the workings on the ground of a section like this, to draw a distinction, it seems to me that the fact must be remembered by the committee that for nineteen years these sections have worked alongside one another without clashing. At the same time, I do not regard subsection 2 of section 3 as at all important in the Bill, and I believe, as a matter of practice, the power given by it was not much used previous to 1890 ; and I am quite willing to consider whether it will be desirable, at another stage, to drop that, but that is not altogether relevant to the motion of the hon. member for North Simcoe at this moment.

Mr. McCARTHY. I admit that.

Mr. DICKEY. Therefore, I would strongly urge the committee to pass section 4, and if, on inquiry, I come to the conclusion that there is any radical inconsistency, subsection 2 of section 3, which is certainly much the less important of the two, can be dropped.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). As neither the Minister of Justice (Mr. Dickey) nor his predecessor (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) was in the House on Saturday when I raised the question as to the jurisdiction of this House to deal with the subject of procedure, and as both of those hon. gentlemen are present to-day, I am sure the committee will bear with me while I bring to the attention of the Minister and of the hon. gentleman, who, no doubt, had a good deal to do with the preparation of the Bill. I am sure the hon. gentlemen will remember that when I addressed the House on the second reading of this Bill, I called the attention of the House to the facts that rights and privileges, as I understood the law, did not extend to matter of procedure, that a right or privilege was a right or privilege with respect to education, and had relation to the religious instruction that was given in the schools ; and, so far as it was necessary to the actual existence of the schools. If we look at subsection 2 of section 93 of the British North America Act, we shall get some light upon this subject. Now, the hon. Minister will see, on looking at that subsection that "all the powers, privileges and duties at the union, by law conferred and imposed in Upper Canada on the separate schools and school trustees of the Queen's Roman Catholic subjects, shall be, and the same are hereby extended to the dissentient schools of the Queen's Protestant and Roman Catholic subjects in Quebec." So that the hon. gentleman will see that what was essential to the existence of the protection of the rights or privileges was regarded as being vested under the constitution in the schools and in the trustees who had jurisdiction over them. Now, let me say, as I did on Saturday, that as far as the Bill proceeded and in the clause under consideration, we are dealing with the subject of procedure. But that is part of the administrative government of the province, under the exclusive jurisdiction of the local legislature. It is essential to the existence of the government, management and care of the public schools. I pointed out before, and I repeat now that separate schools are public schools ; they are intended to be such, and the power of legislation given to the local legislature in so large a degree was intended to keep them in touch with the requirements of the times in precisely the same way as the other public schools. So, in the construction of the law, we look at the surrounding circumstances and reasons for the provisions which exist. Now, the hon. gentleman will see—and I am sure the committee will allow me to refer to the three sections we have already considerd—that he is undertaking to impose duties upon the local legislature.

Mr. McCARTHY. Will the hon. gentleman excuse me. He says "upon the local legislature." But is that quite accurate ? I understand they are imposed upon the Lieutenant-Governor, and not upon the local legislature.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The mere administrative duties—yes. But I mean to say the local legislature has jurisdiction over the subject, to alter or amend the law, from time to time. In the very first subsection, we have imposed a mandatory duty upon the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, and we have undertaken to state the number of members constituting this board. Now, to-morrow the local legislature might undertake to constitute a board for the management of these schools in a wholly different way from that here provided. It might appoint a smaller number, it might even appoint a single person to control and operate these schools. Now, I maintain that you cannot divest the local government of the power it possesses, that power inheres in the local legislature and government. But if they refuse to discharge their duties in this regard, if they refuse to take cognizance of your schools, you have the power not to impose a duty upon them, but to make an alternative provision, to the effect that if they do not act, the board shall be constituted in this, that, or the other manner. But it is a provision of law to be discharged by you ; it is not a provision to impose a duty on some other government, or some other party. That, in my opinion, you cannot do at all, and you ought not to undertake it. But in the event of no action being taken, and the local government refusing, then, not as a matter of necessity, but as incidental to the protection of the right and privilege, you may undertake to deal with the subject. The hon. gentleman will see that he undertakes to constitute a board and he undertakes to constitute it as supplementary to the Department of Education in the province. What right have you to do that ? Let me take as strong a case as I can, one that was put to me by an hon. gentleman after our debate on Saturday afternoon. Suppose the local government were to appoint as Minister of Education in the province of Manitoba, the moderator of the Presbyterian assembly, and to impose the whole duty upon him, would not these people have the right to complain ? I say, certainly not. If the Minister of Education failed in the discharge of his duty, in respect of those matters in which the law contemplates an appeal to this Government and Parliament, then the appeal may be made, and if the local government refuse to rectify the wrong, you would have the right to rectify it, not because there is any right or privilege in the administration, but because, in the administration, some right or privilege has been invaded which ought to be protected. You have no right to impose a duty on the local legislature or to create a board to discharge these duties, but you have the right to provide that in case the local legislature do not make the necessary provision, then the board shall be constituted in a particular way. But in that case the appointment is not to be made by somebody else, but upon the responsible authority of the Government here. If that were done, it would be a dormant provision and could not come into operation except in the event of the local government refusing in any way to recognize or take charge of the affairs connected with these schools. But it does seem to me that all these provisions of the Bill relating to the matter of procedure are founded upon a radical error with regard to the rights and privileges of the minority, and with regard to the proper authority to administer the law. That administration is wholly independent of the rights and privileges, it is part of the machinery of the government. It can be discharged by the local government under local legislation which can be altered or amended from time to time, as the parties think proper, but it cannot be undertaken here at all in the event of the local legislature altogether failing in their duty.

Mr. DICKEY. How are we to ascertain that ?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I say you can frame a clause that, in the event of a local legislature failing to provide for the administration of these schools, then such and such shall be the law.

Mr. DICKEY. But how would you ascertain when they had failed? Who is to judge of that?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman can know that just as he can know how any law is being administered. How does the hon. gentleman ascertain, for instance, that justice is being administered, that the criminal law of this country is being properly enforced. The hon. gentleman cannot pretend to say that that fact could not be known. The two governments are supplementary to each other. They constitute, together with the legislatures, the executive and legislative authority of the entire Dominion, and this House must assume that the hon. gentleman can know, and does know, whether these duties that ultimately might fall upon him to provide for or that might be conditionally provided for now, are or are not properly discharged. I do not think there is any difficulty in the matter at all, but I see serious difficulties and serious lawsuits that may spring out of the attempt to assert a jurisdiction that I do not think belongs to us primarily at all.

Mr. DICKEY. I am sorry to trouble the committee so often, but perhaps it is better I should state my views now. Under my reading of the Manitoba Act, the refusal or neglect of the local authorities to perform any of the duties in relation to education, is not a relevant fact at all, except in one case, and that is a case of appeal. In order to found our jurisdiction, it is necessary that there should be shown a default or neglect, in the opinion of the Privy Council here, on the part of the local authorities. What is the result of that neglect? It is to vest this Parliament of Canada with certain jurisdiction, large or small. Now, for the purpose of this argument, we will assume that that event has happened, and waiving the question raised by the hon. member for Simcoe for the present, we will assume that this Parliament has obtained jurisdiction to reinstate the Catholic minority with certain rights under this section of the Manitoba Act. My understanding of the power of Parliament in that case is that this Parliament does not lose in any sense its high position and its great prerogatives in the way of legislation, that it has the plenary power conferred upon the local legislature with reference to education.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No, a remedial power only.

Mr. DICKEY. The plenary power conferred upon the local legislature with reference to education. Now, supposing that the Act says that if the local legislature, after so many years, did not pass laws with reference to education, this Parliament should; then our power certainly would be plenary, and we would have all the power necessary in order to fully pass such laws. We are now seized with power to pass remedial laws. For what purpose? The hon. gentleman will agree with me, it is for the purpose of reinstating the minority in its rights. The hon. gentleman will go with me that far. Under the decisions of the Privy Council, and under the ordinary powers in section 92 or 93, there cannot be a shadow of a doubt that the vesting of jurisdiction in this Parliament over a particular subject gives all the powers that are necessary in order properly to carry out that purpose. The cases, of course, are familiar, and I need not refer to them. Now, we are vested with power to pass remedial laws to reinstate the minority in its rights. In my opinion the principles I have alluded to, govern. We have all the plenary powers that are necessary for that end. Our jurisdiction is bounded by the declaration as to rights; but in order to effectuate our wishes in that regard, we may use any machinery that we think is necessary. Who is to be the judge of the necessity? Is this Parliament the enacting body, or is it some other body? Now, the hon. gentleman suggests that we should at first throw the duty upon the local authorities, and in the event of their failure, that we should take power to appoint a board. Now, I would ask the hon. gentleman where he gets a shadow of authority for that position. If the hon. gentleman is arguing that there must be a defect, a failure to perform its duty on the part of the local authorities before we can do anything, he is referring to the question of appeals, he is referring to the question of the passing of a provincial law, for example, under the section. But there is nothing that I can see in that section of the Manitoba Act to give any colour whatever to the idea that we must first throw the duty upon the local authorities.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). You propose to do it here.

Mr. DICKEY. The hon. gentleman admits that we have ultimately the power to do what we do here, but he suggests that there is an intermediate step that we must take in order fully to vest ourselves with that power. Now, I submit that there is nothing in the Act that I can see to justify his argument that an intermediate step is necessary. Assuming that we may do what the hon. gentleman says, I see no constitutional difficulty in our doing it if we desired to do it as a matter of policy.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Let me put the question to the hon. gentleman that I put to the Minister of the Interior the other day. Supposing the local government had not taken away any right or privilege with regard to religious instruction, but had substituted a Minister of Education instead of these two boards; does the hon. gentleman pretend to argue that that would have been a ground for appeal here, and a reason for undertaking to amend the law ? The hon. gentleman will see, I think, that we have not an inherent power to deal with the subject of procedure as a right or privilege, then if we have not a right in that case, I do not see how the hon. gentleman can get a right here unless he is prepared to argue that the local government could not make provision for the administration of these schools.

Mr. DICKEY. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman how he thinks that our jurisdiction in that matter is mended by taking another step, as he suggests. We have at the present time all the jurisdiction that this Parliament can possibly be seized of with reference to this question, and waiting further for action on the part of the legislature or the local authorities, would not add to our jurisdiction ; so that taking that view of it I really am not able to follow the hon. gentleman in his statement that we should throw the duty first upon the local authorities. I believe we have jurisdiction to provide all the machinery that is necessary in order to restore those rights. Now, that does not prove that it is necessary, because the hon. gentleman can suggest some other method that would meet some other view——

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No, that is not my position at all.

Mr. DICKEY. The hon. gentleman has suggested a method which I think we would have power to adopt and which we might use, but it is a matter of policy, and I should not advise this committee to adopt it. As to the method we have adopted, it is a method under which, I think, we have jurisdiction to enact, because some such method is necessary in order effectually to reinstate the minority in its rights.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Supposing the local government first undertook themselves to constitute a board for administering this law ; supposing they should make it consist of three members instead of nine, as in section 1 you command them to do : supposing they do that, and provided for the administration of the law, does the hon. gentleman argue that this would have any operation at all ? If not, why does he not make it subordinate to what the local legislature should undertake.

Mr. DICKEY. I could not say what the effect of any future legislation of the local legislature would be. It is impossible to say whether it would constitute a grievance or render it nugatory. But that does not affect the question here.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It does.

Mr. DICKEY. I cannot follow the hon. gentleman. Our jurisdiction when we are seized with remedial legislation to rectify the wrongs of the minority, is unquestionably based on the principles laid down by the Privy Council in other matters, and so this and all ancillary matters are matters that are reasonably necessary in the judgment of this House to carry out this purpose.

Mr. McCARTHY. What was the case before the Privy Council conferring this right? On what case does the hon. gentleman rely as authorizing this course ?

Mr. DICKEY. I do not refer to any cases on this point, but to the general class of cases, for instance, with respect to bankruptcy. There was a case argued by the hon. gentleman (Mr. McCarthy) along the lines on which the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) is now proceeding, but the Privy Council did not adopt that view.

Mr. McCARTHY. Does the hon. gentleman refer to Tennant vs. the Union Bank ?

Mr. DICKEY. In that case the Privy Council held that this Parliament in the exercise of its jurisdiction in regard to bankruptcy had power over warehouse receipts, although it interfered with civil rights. Then there is the case of Cushing vs. Dupuy, and a large class of such cases. I do not think there is any dispute about the point.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think the Minister of Justice is right in asking the committee to discuss this important point on the assumption that we have jurisdiction in the matter. That is a very fair demand to make in commencing his argument. If you grant the premises assumed by the hon. gentleman, there is some difficulty in avoiding the conclusion reached by him. On one point, however, the hon. gentleman has arrived at a very faulty conclusion. He starts out with a wrong premise, in my judgment. Some lay members of the House asked me why the lawyers are making so much contention over this section. It did not take me a moment to answer them. Its importance lies in the fact that if this section is unconstitutional, the whole framework is destroyed. Laymen should, therefore, understand that this is the key to the whole situation, and if those who take the position that this section is unconstitutional are correct, the Government are only legislating foolishly, and the whole framework will fall if this substructure is knocked from under it. The point in dispute lies here. The hon. gentleman says we have jurisdiction to restore certain rights with respect to education, which rights the local legislature have withdrawn. In order to start fairly, we have to decide what are the rights which have been withdrawn from the minority with respect to education. The position of my hon. friend (Mr. Mills), and which I thoroughly endorse, is this, that there is a broad, cardinal distinction to be drawn and kept distinct between the rights themselves and the administration of the law with regard to those rights, and if you do not keep that distinction in view from the beginning to the end, you are sure to go astray. We admit, for the purpose of argument, and this we must do, that the right to exempt from taxation, the right to appropriate their own taxes to their own schools, the right to teach religious education and determine the books on morals and religion are three rights secured to the Roman Catholic minority in Manitoba, and you have the right to restore those, if you choose to do so. Supposing the remedial order, which you passed calling upon Manitoba to restore those three rights was acted upon by the local legislature ; supposing they had passed a law a month ago giving those rights to the Catholic minority, and determining in the exercise of the plenary and exclusive jurisdiction that the administration of those rights should remain in the general board which the province had established, is there a lawyer in this House who would question their power ? Or would any lawyer say that the omission to constitute a new board in itself created a right of appeal or gave us the power to pass supplementary legislation to that of the Manitoba legislature ? I say, clearly not. The machinery to administer the law is there at your hands already, provided for the minority by the local legislature of the province, in which alone is vested that power, which is indeed part of the machinery of government. So soon as we have restored the substantial rights of the Roman Catholic minority which were legislated away, the power of this Parliament ceases. It is not a question of policy, it is not a question as to whether there should be two boards or one board. This Parliament has no power to put another Board of Education there, or a dozen boards, or to divide the province into ten districts and have ten superintendents. To put the argument in a nutshell, the administration of the law will continue to rest with the local government, as it has been vested in that local government from the first.

Mr. HAGGART. Does the hon. gentleman mean to argue that administration and procedure may not affect a right or privilege ?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If the local government, in administering the law in regard to these three points, administer it so as to create a grievance, whether it is now or ten years hence, such action will create a right on the part of the minority to appeal to have that grievance rectified ; but you cannot possibly provide against that now, and you are not justified in assuming beforehand that the proper authorities in whose hands the constitution has vested the administration of the law will violate the power reposed in them. You cannot make that violent assumption. Suppose the local administration administered the law fairly for two or three years, and a new administration came into office and declined to apply the law any longer, that, of course, would give a right of appeal under this section.

Mr. McCARTHY. The right would still exist. The fact that parties did not administer the law would not affect the right.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) My view of the law is this, that when you pass this law you make it part of the educational code of Manitoba. It is no use talking to me about the plenary powers of this Parliament to legislate in regard to education. We have a limited power, and no other, and when we enact legislation with respect to education in Manitoba it becomes part and parcel of the educational code of the province, to be administered by the province ; and if, in the administration of the law, a grievance arises as against the rights of the minority, it will give the right of appeal. This is not a right which once exercised never can be exercised again. This right of appeal may arise every year or every ten years. It may arise from time to time, and it may be in a very serious matter or a very slight one. The Privy Council may allow an appeal or they may say, It is so trifling a matter, we will not take any notice of it. Supposing it to be a serious matter, there will be a grievance. But the point we have to determine and settle right on the threshold in this Bill is this, have we got the legal power to administer the law passed by the local legislature, that is, the right to ignore the Board of Education which is constituted for the administrating of the educational law of Manitoba, and the right to constitute another board. The hon. gentleman says that by the decision of the Privy Council you have incidentally the necessary powers to carry your law out. Supposing you have, that does not advance you one step. I start with the proposition that the machinery to carry your law out exists there now. If the Manitoba legislature refused to make such machinery, you might incidentally have the power to constitute it.

Mr. DICKEY. There is no machinery to deal with separate schools in Manitoba.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Yes, these separate schools become part of the public schools, and you call them separate schools merely as a matter of convenience. There can be no reasonable doubt that, if you constitute them, they become part of the public schools of the province, and they are to be administered by the machinery which the province has provided. To set up a dual system of administration is, in my opinion, beyond our power, and will render the whole of the legislation nugatory.

Mr. DICKEY. I realize fully the position taken by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies), but I cannot altogether fall in with him. I wish to draw his attention to this. He says that we should pass this Act and leave it for the province to administer. But, supposing the province did not administer it; supposing the advisory board said—as it very probably would say—we have neither authority, nor jurisdiction to administer it, and we will not administer it. What then?

Mr. McCARTHY. What are the courts for?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) advanced the proposition that you might add an alternative proposition, and that, if you go so far as to assume that the local power will not administer the law, you might say, in the event of their not doing so, another power would have the right to do it.

Mr. DICKEY. It is quite clear that this is a difficult matter, because we have three different views concerning it. The hon. gentleman from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) says that we should take power in the alternative to appoint ourselves, if the local government does not. The hon. gentleman from Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) says the courts would carry out our law; and the hon. gentleman from Queen's (Mr. Davies) says that neither of these views is correct, and that we should put the duty on the local authorities, and let the minority appeal again, if there was any trouble about it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I did not say, let the minority appeal again. I thoroughly concur in the view that we can say in this Bill, that the existing board shall carry this law out. If the existing board does not carry the law out, there might be an appeal, if necessary. I say that it is a violent and improper assumption to make, that local officials won't carry the law out. If you start with that assumption in all legislation, you will never get on at all.

Mr. DICKEY. If it is a question of doing violence to the local authorities, it comes down to a question of policy, and is a question for this House to consider, whether it is desirable to put the duty upon the advisory board, and so have difficulty, and have an appeal, and have more trouble, and more agitation, or to deal frankly with the question and reinstate the Catholics in the right which they had—a board of nine. I think myself that, both practically and constitutionally, the course proposed by the Bill is the better one, and I shall ask the committee to adopt it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. As the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) has referred to me, I would like to say one word. I do not think it is possible that I can add much to what has been said in regard to the powers of this House, but I want to place myself with those who take the widest view of our powers under the circumstances in dealing with the subject of education, so far as it is embraced within the terms of the remedial order of March, 1895. I think that we come within the classifications to which the Minister of Justice referred in regard to the British North America Act, as to our plenary powers, and as to the right to exercise all the authority incidentally necessary for the complete exercise of the jurisdiction over this subject of legislation. That is to say, my view is: that on these questions within the limits of the remedial order, our authority here is as complete as though that subject were ranked under the same heads as insolvency and bankruptcy, for instance. And, in the exercise of our jurisdiction over these matters, we often deal with the civil rights of the provinces, and also with procedure. The cases show that we have the clear right to do so, incidentally. I would like to say that this is the view of the counsel of the Manitoba government, and, in the argument addressed to the Privy Council of Canada, hon. gentlemen will see that, on page 63 of the report, the counsel for Manitoba said:

> So that on this power and authority, which I understand you may, under certain circumstances, exercise, is a power and authority which, under the events which have happened, may arise, and if it does arise, it is a legislative authority to be exercised like any of the other legislative authorities conferred by section 91 of the British North America Act.

That is my view, and, in the case to which reference has been made to-day, I think we can do that. While no man would say it would prevent litigation, or that we can adopt a Bill here that can go through that gauntlet safely, still I think we can deal with this subject as we would with any of these subjects referred to in the British North America Act, within the limits I have mentioned.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The words of the British North America Act are:

> In case any decision of the Governor General on any appeal under this section is not duly executed by the proper provincial authority in that behalf, then, and in every such case, and as far only as the circumstances of each case requires, the Parliament of Canada may make remedial laws.

There is an assumption that the right shall be given to the parties to execute the laws, before even remedial legislation is passed. In this case, as I have already pointed out, the separate schools are a part of the public school system. They cannot complain if it is required that there should be qualified teachers. The separate school supporters, in case persons who are not qualified, were allowed to teach, could not complain if the legislature afterwards amended the law and imposed a qualification the same as for public school teachers. They would not, under the law, be at liberty to come here and say: We had, as a right or privilege, the right to employ whom we pleased, whether such party possessed a certificate or not. The right or privilege relates to the constitution of the school and to the religious instruction given in the school. Now, the right of administering the law, of providing for the proper efficiency of the schools, is a matter of administration, vested in the Government, and can never become a right or privilege, because it is a part of the right which belongs to the whole public as much in the separate schools as in the ordinary public schools. Now, take, for instance, under that law, you propose to provide for improved plans for the construction of school-houses. Is there any difference between the plan of a school-house in which simple secular education is given, and the plan of a school-house in which religious instruction is given? The planning of the school-house is no right or privilege. It is a common right to the whole community, exercised through the representative assembly, so far as the law is concerned, and through the responsible Ministers of the Crown, or any subordinate officers whom they may appoint for the purpose of seeing that the law is properly administered. In the province of Ontario we had a Board of Public Instruction, as they have an advisory board in the province of Manitoba; but that was all wiped away in the province of Ontario. Nobody came forward and said that this was a right or privilege which belonged to the minority. If the hon. gentleman's contention were correct, the province of Ontario would have been doomed to the day of judgment to have a superintendent who was not a responsible Minister, aided and supported by a council of public instruction. The hon. gentleman will see that the constitution of a board, the manner in which the law is administered, is not a right or privilege: but if the right or privilege is violated by a public officer, then you may make provision for redressing the wrong done by such violation. Let the hon. gentleman look at what he has done in this Bill. At the very start he says "the Lieutenant-Governor in Council of Manitoba shall appoint, to form and constitute the separate school Board of Education, a certain number of persons." Where does he get his authority for saying that the Lieutenant-Governor in Council shall appont a certain number? Suppose they were to appoint a smaller number. How can the hon. gentleman order them how they are to constitute the board? Then, in the next section the hon. gentleman says the Department of Education may make regulations. I am not complaining of that; you are doing what you have a right to do, in conformity with the law. Then you propose in this section to re-establish the board which the legislature of Manitoba has abolished. It is your duty to assume that proper regulations will be made by the province for the administration of the law; and you may go on and provide that in case no such regulations are made, you may constitute a board and prescribe its duties. But that board remains in abeyance; it has no active functions, and it cannot have any active functions, until the local government fail to make proper provision for the administration of the law.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The right to manage the schools was a right that was taken away from the Roman Catholic minority. The remedial order distinctly requested that that right should be restored; and it is by means of this board and this machinery that that right, as it seems to me, can alone be restored. The legislature having refused to restore that right, or to appoint the board by which that right can be exercised, it seems to me that we have now authority to do so.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The internal management of the schools is one thing. The general management of all the schools is another thing. The one is a matter of education, and falls within the right or privilege; the other is a political right and falls within the administration of the schools, which belongs to the province. If the hon. gentleman extends that provision as far as he suggests, I have no doubt that it would be ultra vires in a large degree. You do not want to give the people a series of lawsuits. You want to restore the rights and privileges which they had in reference to giving religious instruction. The others are rights and privileges belonging to the province in its political capacity, as much so as the administration of justice or the administration of public works, or anything else relating to the affairs of government. The difference between what the hon. gentleman proposes and my suggestion is this. I say that the local government have this right of administration, and you cannot take it away or supercede it if they wish to exercise it; but you may make an alternative provision that in case the province discards that right of administration, you can bring it into operation. That is as far, in my opinion, as it is possible for you to go.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I argued the other day, as a subsidiary proposition, that the word "manage" as you used it in the remedial order, must be construed with reference to the collocation of the words in which that occurs. If you go over the remedial order, you will find that the word there has not that larger meaning which the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) gives it. It is used with reference to the duties appertaining to trustees—with reference to the internal economy and management of the schools.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It is described as a right.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Building a school-house and equipping a school-house are not rights.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. They are most important and material rights.

There is the right not merely to build, but the right to build in the manner provided for in the statutes which were repealed, and to take advantage of public aid.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) There is where the mistake is made. What you call rights are not rights in the meaning of the British North America Act or the Manitoba Act at all. The rights there referred to relate to religious instruction, and to the taxation of the minority to further that object; and my argument the other day, and I repeat it now, was this. I said, assuming my first point to be wrong altogether, that your remedial order was not broad enough to enable you to legislate in the direction you are seeking to do, because you are providing, not only for the constitution of a separate Board of Education, but for the internal economy and management of the schools, which are necessary incidents, but which do not in any sense relate to the management of the school system throughout the province. The word "manage" in the remedial order has the limited meaning I speak of, and not the larger meaning the hon. gentleman gives it. There is all the difference in the world. One is a right which belongs to the parents, and the other is a matter of state policy. The one relates to education, and the other to the machinery or administration. Supposing Manitoba, which is now a small province of 150,000 or 200,000 people, is satisfied with a very primitive and crude system of education, and supposing, ten years hence, that young giant should reach the size of a million people, and require an altogether different system of administration. Would it not have the power to change the administration or system without affecting any rights secured to the minority by the British North America Act?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The Bill would not be worth much if your view were sound.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The only privileges which the minority seek are the right of exemption from general taxation for school purposes; the right to appropriate their own taxes to their own schools; the right to share in the general grant to the schools; and the right to teach in those schools their religious views. These will all be secured, and they do not ask any more.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. You could not move a foot without the action of the government which has refused to act.

Mr. McCARTHY. It is necessary to go behind the remedial order which the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) seems to rely upon it, naturally enough, as the authority the most important—perhaps more important than the Manitoba Act. We have to go back to the power to pass that order. The words, "right or privilege," used in the second section of the Manitoba Act are the same words as are used in the first section of the British North America Act. In the Barrett case what was determined, was this, and it settles the point. That what everybody could do without any law was not a right or privilege within the meaning of this section. It was not a right or privilege to send your children to a school for which you are paying; but a right or privilege is something which is not common to all Her Majesty's subjects. It was a right or privilege that the Roman Catholics enjoyed from 1871 to 1890, of appropriating their own taxes to the support of their own schools, and it was one which no other section enjoyed. Therefore, the right or privilege which we have to restore is that of which they were deprived, namely, the right to educate their children in the particular way in which they were being educated before 1890, and the right to appropriate their own share of taxation to that purpose. When you go beyond that, you are legislating without authority. It matters not what the remedial order told us or told the Manitoba legislature to do. That does not confer jurisdiction beyond what the remedial order ought to have gone. All that order ought simply to have directed was the restoration of the rights and privileges, in the sense of the terms as expounded by the Judicial Committee in the Barrett case, and that is the extent of our jurisdiction. If we were confronted with the difficulty that there was no machinery in Manitoba to carry into effect the law, we might, perhaps, under the reasoning of the cases the Minister of Justice has referred to, such as Cushing and Dupuis, legislate for the purpose of making our substantive enactment effective. That is all that is said in Cushing and Dupuis. The question there was whether the jurisdiction was vested in the local legislatures and not in the Federal Parliament. The local legislatures are clothed with absolute authority in civil matters and rights, and Mr. Davidson, for the appellants, argued that when we undertook to prescribe a procedure to the court, we were necessarily interfering with civil rights and that, therefore, the Insolvent Acts were ultra vires of the Dominion Parliament. What was said in regard to them:

> It is a necessary implication that the Imperial statute, in assigning to the Dominion Parliament the subjects of bankruptcy and insolvency, intended to confer on it legislative power to interfere with property, civil rights and procedure within the provinces, so far as the general law relating to those subjects might affect them.

As the only authority to deal with bankruptcy was in this Federal Parliament, and as to make that law effective it was necessary to interfere with civil rights and property, to that extent could this Parliament interfere with these subjects. But what is the position of the present matter? We are asked to restore a separate school system to Manitoba. Well, we find ready to our hands, constituted by the province of Manitoba, a system of which we can at once avail ourselves. Now, I venture to say that if we did not do more than pass a law restoring the rights and privileges, that the two laws meeting together would accomplish all that was necessary and required. Under the Manitoba Act, the Department of Education has the power to appoint inspectors of high and public school teachers of provincial, model and normal schools, directors' or teachers' institutes, &c. Well, will not the system we are now establishing be a system of public schools ? Nobody will pretend they are private schools, and being public schools, they come at once under the jurisdiction of the Department of Education. The Minister of Justice seems to anticipate difficulties. What difficulties ? Is it to be supposed that the Department of Education which, in point of fact, is the department of state—or, in other words, the Lieutenant-Governor of that province—will not execute constitutional law ? Where are you to start and to end if you go upon that principle ? We pass a statute here, conferring jurisdiction in bankruptcy upon the courts of the province. Are we to go on and say that, if the judges will not do their duty, certain other officers are to execute the bankruptcy Act ? We are bound to assume —or else this province is in a state of rebellion—that the Crown, represented in the province, will execute its duties. And the late cases have shown that the Crown is represented in the provinces to the extent of their jurisdiction, their executive power, just as much as the Crown is represented in the Dominion, and we are bound to assume that the duties of the Crown in the province will be executed without our saying " shall," which is impertinent and improper. But, when we go further and deal, not with the Crown, but with the advisory board, we can then use the word " shall," and at once we give the courts jurisdiction to enforce the authority of this Parliament. So that the scheme of legislation is perfect, by adapting the local law, so far as it is workable with the law which we pass here, and going beyond that, where there is anything dealing specially with the religious section of the separate schools, dealing, to that extent, necessarily with them. So it seems to me that the point made by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills)—I have to confess that on Saturday, though I had not formed an opinion about it, one way—does strike me as being a very formidable argument, and I think the Minister of the Interior will say that he was impressed with the force of the argument. Is there any answer to the illustration that, if this Act of 1890 had simply swept away the Board of Education and had substituted for it—I forget what Dr. Ryerson was called under our old system in Ontario—

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Chief superintendent.

Mr. McCARTHY. If the law had simply said that from this time out the Act should be administered by the chief superintendent of education, instead of a Board of Education, and that all the terms in the Act referring to the board should be held to refer to the new official, will any lawyer in this committee argue that that would have given the right to appeal ? Now, I am borrowing the illustration of my hon. friend from Bothwell. It convinced me, I am bound to say, and I do not think any answer has been made, or even attempted to be made. In that case the schools would have gone on, there would have been Protestant schools and there would have been Catholic schools, and they would have been carried on just as under the advisory board.

Mr. DICKEY. I have marked a passage in the judgment of the Privy Council. Will the hon. gentleman tell me what he thinks of it ?

Mr. McCARTHY. I shall be glad to read the passage my hon. friend gives me, but I do not see that it has any bearing on the case :

> With the policy of these Acts their lordships are not concerned, nor with the reasons which led to their enactment. It may be that as the population of the province became in proportion more largely Protestant, it was found increasingly difficult, especially in sparsely-populated districts, to work the system inaugurated in 1871, even with the modifications introduced in later years. But whether this be so or not is immaterial. The sole question to be determined is whether a right or privilege which the Roman Catholic minority previously enjoyed has been effected by the legislation of 1890. Their lordships are unable to see how this question can receive any but an affirmative answer.

Mr. McCARTHY. That is plain enough.

Mr. DICKEY. Go on.

Mr. McCARTHY :

> Contrast the position of the Roman Catholics prior and subsequent to the Acts from which they appeal. Before these passed into law there existed denominational schools, of which the control and management——

Mr. DICKEY. Control and management.

Mr. McCARTHY. They are stating the fact.

Mr. DICKEY. As by right.

Mr. McCARTHY. My hon. friend surely does not mean to say that that is his reading of it. His lordship is merely stating a fact. It was undoubtedly a fact :

> —before these passed into law there existed denominational schools, of which the control and management were in the hands of Roman Catholics who could select the books to be used and determine the character of the religious teaching.

Mr. DICKEY. And in that respect the right was taken away.

Mr. McCARTHY.

Mr. McCARTHY. Suppose I grant what the hon. gentleman says. If the illustration which was given by the hon. member for Bothwell were to take place, would they not have still the right, for instance, to select the books ?

Mr. DICKEY. But there would not be "control and management."

Mr. McCARTHY. But his lordship says the "control and management" were in the hands of Roman Catholics, not in the control of a Roman Catholic board. The school trustees were Catholics, who could select the books and determine the character of the religious teaching. You do not, by changing one feature of the organization, deprive them of that right. My hon. friend has not dealt with my argument that what everybody can do is not a right or privilege.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman will see from the first part of the paragraph he has read, that administration is treated as a matter of public policy, and not as a matter of right.

Mr. McCARTHY. When the whole of it is read, it becomes evident that what the Lord Chancellor had in his mind was that it was a privilege—not to build a school 40 feet by 20 feet and 10 feet high, with such and such a method of ventilation. Nobody would call that a privilege, or to have other sanitary arrangement conformable to a certain system. The privilege was to devote their taxes, to divert, as it were, their taxes from the public schools to their own schools, and to have in their own schools a system of denominational teaching which did not exist in the other schools.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. In the Barrett case, did not the court draw a distinction between "rights" and "privileges," under that section ?

Mr. McCARTHY. No, not as I remember the case. But I have the argument I have mentioned clearly in my mind. I remember Sir Horace Davey putting it to the board that a privilege could only be something which a section of the community, or an individual in the community, had apart from the common right of all.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The board went that far.

Mr. McCARTHY. I do not remember that, but I remember that that was the argument put by Sir Horace Davey, and it seemed to carry conviction to the judges. Look at what we propose to do. We propose to give to this new board the power to make general regulations for the government and discipline and carrying on the schools. Look at what the advisory board is to do under the Manitoba law :

> To make regulations for the dimensions, equipment, planning, furnishing, decorating and ventilation of school-houses and for the arrangement of school premises.

Who in the world would call that a right or privilege ? And yet here is a paid lot of officials for the purpose of making these arrangements with regard to public schools. And we are proposing—but that is another matter, with which I shall deal a little later on—we are proposing to create another board to perform the very same duties for a very small minority of the population, doubling the expenditure without any necessity, as I venture to say. But still, as I have already intimated, that is beside the question whether we have or have not the jurisdiction. Now, we have undertaken here to recognize the Department of Education. In the third clause, we recognize that, and invest it with certain powers. Therefore, there is no objection on the part of the Government to deal with existing facts, and to treat this Department of Education as an existing fact ; and why, then, is it necessary to pass over the advisory board ? There was no Department of Education in 1890, there was no right in the Catholic minority to have their school affairs to any extent administered by the government of the country. My hon. friend is compelled to blow hot and cold. He is compelled to justify section 3, which the Minister of Public Works argued was essential to the constitutional validity of this Act, and, at the same time, he is compelled to ignore everything else that exists in the province of Manitoba. Now, I take it, of course, that it is the desire of every member of the Government, and I trust the desire of the members of this committee, to try and make this a workable Bill. When it leaves our hands, we hope it will be in such a condition that it will not cause friction, and litigation, and doubts, and differences ; and if the point of the hon. member for Bothwell is well taken, that we have no power to do this, that our power is limited simply to restoring those rights, and we find that there is a Department of Education representing, in point of fact, the Government, and we find there is an advisory board, and we can direct, if it is necessary to go that far, that these powers should be assigned to this different board, then we accomplish all that is necessary by assigning those powers. Now, the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) read in support of his argument, from page 63, something that I said in course of the argument before the Committee of the Privy Council. I do not see that it is necessary for me to qualify anything I said then in those general observations. This is what I said :

> They might repent and pass it the next session, if they pleased, or even the same session. They might not deal with the matter until this Parliament dealt with it. So that this power and authority, which I understand you may, under certain circumstances, exercise, is a power and authority which, under the events which have happened, may arise, and if it does arise, it is a legislative authority to be exercised like any other of the legislative authorities conferred by section 91 of the British North America Act.

I do not depart from one single word I said there. The authority that this Parliament has in the way of education only arises when all the events happen which, in this case, have happened; when there has been a separate school system, when that system has been abolished, when the minority appeal against that, when a remedial order has been made, and when a remedial order has been disobeyed, then we have a right to deal, just as the statute says we have, and to that extent only. So that order is limited to restoring the right or privilege which has been taken away, limited in law, if not in fact, and can have no wider signification. The power of this Parliament is to execute the order, and only to execute it, of course, to the extent that that order is effective. Now, I refer to the matter with which I was dealing when the discussion was diverted by the argument made by the hon. member for Bothwell. The Minister of Justice, in reply to my argument, says that he does not propose to guess at the construction of his own clause. Well, now, that is a very unfortunate position for us to be in. The hon. gentleman who introduces this Bill to Parliament has prevailed upon the committee to pass clause 3. We reach clause 4, and our powers are so limited that we cannot go back to clause 3. We find that clause 4 and clause 3 are in conflict, and my hon. friend says that he won't guess at its meaning, he won't interpret it for us, and he won't assist us to know what was in the mind of the draughtsman of this clause when these two sections, apparently contradictory, were incorporated. Now, I put this to my hon. friend the Minister of Justice. Does he mean to argue that we have to pass clause 3 under the terms of the remedial order, or under the terms of the 22nd section of the Manitoba Act? Does he contend that we must repeat, where the exact facts do not exist to enable us to reenact it, the legislation as it existed in 1890? I would like to know if that is the view which my hon. friend puts forward?

Mr. DICKEY. No.

Mr. McCARTHY. Then, this clause 4 and this clause 3 do not gain any strength from the fact that they were equivalent clauses prior to 1890?

Mr. DICKEY. Oh, yes, they gain a great deal of strength.

Mr. McCARTHY. I am not now dealing with the question of politics. We are dealing now with these two conflicting sections. If it is not compulsory on us to pass two contradictory sections, why should we do so? It is not necessary, my hon. friend admits, to say to show they were in existence in 1890. We are passing them now, and propose to enforce this law, and the first thing we do is to put in two contradictory sections, in which we confer one set of authority as to certain matters upon the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, for the Department of Education is practically such, and the same matters again upon this Board of Education.

Mr. DICKEY. It existed for nineteen years without friction.

Mr. McCARTHY. My hon. friend forgets that though there was no friction during all that time, now there is friction. Surely we should not pass contradictory enactments because, at a time when all was peace and harmony, nobody called them in question. Surely it is our business here to make this section harmonize with the preceding section. And yet we are not in any sense trying to do that, and it is no answer to say that for nineteen years there was no friction. My hon. friend beside me (Mr. Daly) told us candidly on Saturday that so far as he could ascertain, nothing had been done by the late Board of Education during those nineteen years, that the whole administration had been exercised by the section, and not by the board itself. But now you give to the department—I want to press that point upon my hon. friend—you give to the department itself, the complete power over the school system, and by the next section you hand it over again to the Board of Education. What will be the inevitable result? It will be, it seems to me, that while the Government may be persuaded to pass regulations respecting these schools as coming within the purview of section 3, and subsection 2 of that section, the Board of Education may equally go on to act under the subsection of section 4, and at once create a conflict of jurisdiction. Who are the trustees to obey? Who is the inspector to obey? Whose rules and regulations are to be in force? Can that be settled in any way except by an appeal to the courts? And is it desirable, when we have now the power, when we are in committee on this very clause, to enact, for the first time, clauses literally in conflict, one with the other, and which must inevitably cause that confusion and trouble which it ought to be the business of this committee to endeavour to prevent.

Mr. MARTIN. This discussion has been very interesting to me, for the reason that I do not exactly understand the position taken by the Government in regard to this matter. I understood the Minister of Justice to say that it was necessary to have a Board of Education on the principle that we are entitled to provide such machinery as is necessary to carry out the principles of the law. But I understood the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) to go further, and to contend that, by the terms of the remedial order, the government of Manitoba was called upon to restore, not only separate schools, but the Board of Education, so far as the Catholics were concerned. These matters are really two separate matters, and they were put in two separate Acts, when the legislature of Manitoba came to deal with this question. There was a very general dissatisfaction with the old system—I am speaking altogether apart of the question of separate schools—when, in 1890, this legislation was introduced. There was dissatisfaction with the system, not only as regards the Catholic, but the Protestant section of the board, and it was decided by the government to abolish that system, wholly and apart from the question of separate schools. The question was one peculiar to Manitoba. It could not have been contemplated at the time of confederation. We determined on two changes in 1890: first, that we would abolish separate schools. We did so by chapter 38, An Act respecting Public Schools, which completely took away from the Roman Catholics the right of separate schools, as provided under the statute of 1891. Second, we determined to change the mode of administering education in the province. The question put by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) is therefore pertinent. He asked, supposing Manitoba determined to appoint a Minister of Education and to abolish the Catholic and Protestant sections of the board, would it be an interference with the rights and privileges of the minority under section 22 of the Manitoba Act? The government came to the conclusion that the system of education in Manitoba was entirely unsatisfactory, not alone as regards the Catholic section, but also as regards the Protestant section, and the government came to that conclusion before they considered the question of separate schools. They first determined to abolish separate schools, and the other question came up in connection with the consideration of it. Mr. Smart, who was then Minister of Public Works, and who was specially active in this matter, made a speech long before the speech I made, about which so much has been said, when the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) was present at Portage la Prairie, in which he dealt with the manner in which the Catholic section of the Board of Education had done its work.

Mr. McCARTHY. Was that Clearwater?

Mr. MARTIN. I think it was at Wawanesa. The complaints were against the system, and were not confined to the Catholic section of the board. The complaint I made, and it was shared by other members of the government and by the people, was that educational matters in Manitoba were entirely in the hands of the churches. I do not mean the Catholic Church alone, but the Protestant churches. We took the ground that it was the duty of the government to manage education, so far as the public schools were concerned. So far as regards the Catholic section, it was clear that it was entirely managed by the Roman Catholic Church. That section of the board was composed largely of Roman Catholic priests, coupled with a minority of Roman Catholic laymen.

Mr. McCARTHY. Was there any layman on it?

Mr. MARTIN. The inspectors of the schools were all Roman Catholic priests, and so all the way through the Roman Catholic section. In the Protestant section it was pretty nearly the same, but, instead of the power being in the hands of one church, it was divided among three or four churches. The Protestant section of the board was appointed by the government, as was the Roman Catholic section, but distinctly on the lines of churches. The Episcopal Church considered itself entitled to many members on the board, the Presbyterian Church claimed so many members, and the Methodist Church so many members.

Prior to the time when the people began to consider this thing, and when the Episcopalian, Presbyterian and Methodist churches had representation on the Protestant board, the leading clergy of these denominations had always a place on that board. The archbishop, then the Bishop of Rupert's Land, represented the English Church; Professor Hart represented the Presbyterian Church, and the Rev. Dr. Sparling, head of the Wesley College, represented the Methodist Church. There were, in addition, always one or two others of each denomination on the board. A few lay members were appointed on account of their position in one of these churches, just as Roman Catholic laymen were appointed because they were Roman Catholics. Years before 1890, this matter was in the mind of the legislature. From 1893 to 1890 and some years afterwards, I was in the legislature, and I am familiar with all the discussions that took place there with regard to education. Prior to 1890 there was considerable dissatisfaction among Protestants as to the composition of the Protestant board. There was also the objection to the board, that the western portion of the province was not represented, and that there was too much power centred in the city of Winnipeg. In the year 1884 or 1885, the Conservative government of Mr. Norquay, adopted the principle of appointing two men from the west on the Protestant board; one from Birtle, one from Brandon, and later on, one from Portage la Prairie. The question of the standing of those gentlemen in the churches was not the sole consideration, but they were appointed to represent western districts. It has been said, time and again, that from 1871 to 1890 we lived in peace and harmony in the province of Manitoba, so far as education was concerned. Mr. Chairman, I dispute that statement. I deny the truth of that statement. I say there was no peace and no harmony except on the surface. During all those years, at any rate from the time that immigrants came from Canada—as they were called there "Canadians,"—began to be strong enough to make their influence felt in the province, there was a very serious dissatisfaction—though perhaps not on the surface—not only with the question of separate schools, but also with the question of the manner in which Manitoba managed her educational affairs. I beg leave to say that the Government represented fully the opinion of the province in making these changes with regard to administration and management, just as much as they did in regard to the question of separate schools. There was a serious objection to the old law, arising from our system of responsible government. The government grant for education which then amounted to $60,000 or $70,000, was divided between the two boards according to a census of the children. The superintendent of the Protestant board, and the superintendent of the Catholic board made separate reports of the number of children attending the schools under the control of each, and a committee of the government was appointed to settle the proportion in which this grant was to be divided each year.

Mr. WALLACE. Was that a census of the children of school age, or of those who attended school ?

Mr. MARTIN. I am not quite positive as to that, but I think it was a census of those who attended school.

Mr. DALY. It would be the daily attendance at school, I think.

Mr. MARTIN. Yes, that was it.

Mr. McCARTHY. It was according to the residence. I have the Act here up to 1884, and it says, if not amended, that the proportion shall be in accordance with the number of children residing in the various parts of the school districts.

Mr. MARTIN. At all events, the point is not very important. When the committee of council decided the proportion of the grant, the provincial treasurer issued one cheque to the Protestant superintendent, and one cheque to the Catholic superintendent, for their respective shares, and that is the last we saw of the money. That system struck us as being radically wrong, and as against the spirit of our institutions.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Was not that changed by law before the schools were abolished in 1890 ?

Mr. MARTIN. Yes ; I am just coming to that. The Government of Mr. Harrison lasted only a few months, and in 1888 it was succeeded by the Greenway government. I dwell upon these matters to show that our objections were not influenced at all by the question of religion. So far as this matter of administration is concerned, there was no question of difference between Catholics and Protestants. That question did not arise at all. There was dissatisfaction with the system on account of it being administered by the churches, Protestant and Catholic, the responsibility being removed entirely from the government and placed on the shoulders of men who were, after all, only creatures of the government, appointed by them. There was no responsibility at all to the people. That was what we objected to. Under that system the government disclaimed all responsibility, and properly so, for the administration of education, either Catholic or Protestant. They said, you must blame the Board of Education ; for Catholic matters you must look to the Catholic board ; for Protestant matters you must look to the Protestant board. The money was handed over in lump to the two boards. In 1888, we came into power, and it was our feeling with regard to that matter which led to the discussion in the council, and finally to the abolition of the whole system. We altered the law so that the money was not handed over to the two boards ; but payments for education were made in the same way as payments for public works or for the expenses of the other departments of the government. That is to say, vouchers were made out and passed through a department in the regular way. After all, that was only a trifling change. I mention it to show that from the very first this question of education engaged the attention of the new government—the Greenway government—not at all with regard to the question of separate schools, but independently of the question of separate schools, and it might well have happened that we might have determined not to interfere with separate schools, but only with the old system of administration. The two subjects were kept quite distinct in our minds. As it turned out we did interfere with both : we abolished separate schools and completely changed the system of administration. But I emphasize the fact that the change in the system of administration had nothing whatever to do with the abolition of separate schools ; because we abolished the system for the Protestant section as well as for the Catholic section, and we made a new system under which the government was directly responsible for the administration of every dollar of the people's money that was voted to education. We did that because we thought that was the proper policy under our system of responsible government. If we had never abolished separate schools, we still would have abolished the old system of administration, because it was a most defective system. How did it work out in the case of the Protestant board ? It worked out in this way, that that board was simply a clique, which administered matters within the smallest and narrowest compass. I am told—and I have every reason to believe it to be true—that the Protestant board had an understanding, which practically remained unchanged for many years, by which they mapped out the province, recognizing a certain portion of the province as belonging to the Episcopalians, a certain other portion to the Presbyterians, and the remainder to the Methodists. That was a practice which had the force of law in that section of the board. If a situation became vacant in the Methodist portion of the province, it was considered a breach of this understanding to appoint any person to that situation who was not a Methodist; and the same with regard to the Episcopalians and the Presbyterians. That certainly was unsatisfactory to the people at large. It was very unsatisfactory to a certain element connected with education in the province. In all those years, from the first time I knew anything of Manitoba institutions, there was a strong element among the teachers, backed up by persons interested in education who were not actually engaged in teaching, who were very hostile to the bureaucratic manner in which the Protestant board was managed. The dissatisfaction went so far that an educational weekly, known as the "Educational Times" was published for the express purpose of giving voice to those complaints, which were beginning to loom up larger and larger in the public mind. That paper was published for a number of years right up to 1890, when all those abuses against which it was directed were cured. I do not know whether or not that publication is on file in our library: but if hon. gentlemen will refer to it, they will find in it article after article directed against these very abuses. Its arguments impressed the government, and the government came to the conclusion that they would change the system and adopt the system of Ontario. It is true, they did not adopt the Ontario system exactly, but very nearly. They did not arrange to have a Minister of Education, but they put the control of educational matters under a board. It was not called a board, but a Department of Education, nominated by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, and under the charge of one member of the executive council. During the time I remained in the government after the passing of the 1890 Act, a little over a year, I was the member of the government who administered the educational affairs of the province. After I left, Mr. Sifton took the management of the department, and to-day, I think Mr. Cameron, the provincial secretary, occupies that position. We modified the Ontario system so far as to adopt the principle of an advisory board. That was done at the suggestion of Professor Goldwin Smith, a very distinguished educational authority. At that time he used to visit Manitoba almost every year, and the government took advantage of his presence to consult him with reference to the changes they proposed making; and I notice that the commission appointed by the Ontario government with regard to the University of Toronto have also called upon him as a distinguished specialist in educational matters, for advice regarding the proposed reorganization of Toronto University. We discussed the matter with Prof. Goldwin Smith, and it was his suggestion that there should be an advisory board to deal with purely educational matters, such as the selection of text-books and the examination of teachers, in order that these should be taken entirely out of the domain of politics. We desired to assume the fullest responsibility for educational expenditure and the administration of the law, but Prof. Smith suggested that we should have a small board, on which should be represented the teachers. Of the seven members, two are elected by the teachers of the province. The province is divided into two districts, eastern and western, and these two districts elect by ballot two members of the board. Another member is appointed by the University of Manitoba, and the other four are appointed by the local government. These matters were discussed, entirely apart from the question of continuing the separate school system or not; and I thought it desirable to make this explanation in view of the interesting discussion before the committee, as to whether it was necessary, in restoring to the Catholic minority the rights and privileges of which they were deprived by chapter 38, to interfere with chapter 37. The House will notice that these two matters were separate in fact, because they were dealt with by separate statutes. The Department of Education Act is the one which makes the particular change we are now discussing; and the other School Act is the one which abolished separate schools, and which was passed later on in the same session. It seems to me quite clear that we have no right to interfere with this change in the system of administration, which was adopted by the province entirely apart from the question of abolishing separate schools, and under which the separate schools proposed by this Bill could very well be worked.

Mr. O'BRIEN. The hon. Minister of Justice intimates the possibility of the Government withdrawing the second subsection of clause 3. It seems to me that the hon. gentleman is beginning at the wrong end. If any change be made, it ought to be in the direction suggested by the amendment. Instead of placing the control of separate schools in the hands of the irresponsible body contemplated by the Bill, it would be better to place it in the hands of the advisory board, which is peculiarly qualified to deal with a subject of this kind. By doing this, you would at once get rid of the difficulty suggested by the hon. member for Bothwell, and which neither the Minister of Justice nor the Minister of the Interior has attempted to meet. We would also get rid of the other great difficulty, which has not been touched upon, but which is of the first importance, and that is the difficulty that there are no funds to enable this board, which it is proposed to constitute, to carry its operations into effect. The advisory board of the Department of Education, on the contrary, has all the necessary means at its disposal to enable it properly to discharge these functions. And another difficulty we would get rid of would be the complicated and clashing authority in the second subsection of clause 3 and the first subsection of clause 4, to which this amendment is proposed. The conflict which must necessarily arise is obvious. The second subsection of clause 3 speaks of the organization of the schools, and subsection (a) of clause 4 treats of the management of the schools. Who is to tell where organization ends and management begins? The Board of Education, which it is now proposed to establish, would be a body responsible, not to the government, because it would be administering a system to which the government of Manitoba is opposed.

It would be responsible to nobody, because it would be a body in the formation of which the country at large, the legislature, or any educational body would have nothing to say. It would come to be one or other of two things—either a body which cared little and had no experience, and so would be unable practically to carry on the affairs of the school, or it would hand over its functions practically to the ecclesiastical authorities, and in that case we should simply have a return to the system which prevailed previous to the legislation of 1890. But I am sure that those who are in favour of establishing separate schools cannot wish that the system in force before 1890 should be perpetuated, particularly if, as appears to be held, that, having passed this Bill, there is no possibility of our making a change. In that case we should be imposing upon the Roman Catholic minority of Manitoba a system which has been proven by experience to be utterly deficient. Under these circumstances, it does seem to me an extraordinary thing that the Government will not relieve themselves from the difficulty in which they stand by simply adopting the amendment in your hand. They would avoid this difficulty about jurisdiction, and they would not have a Bill in which the machinery was perfectly useless, they would get rid of the question of expense. Not a dollar is provided for the necessary expenses of this board.

After Recess.

House again resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. O'BRIEN. When you left the Chair, Mr. Chairman, I was pointing out the advantages that would accrue to the Government by accepting the amendment now in your hands. I referred particularly to the relief it would give them through the pecuniary difficulties caused by the Bill. Of course, machinery such as that established under this Bill cannot be run without some expense, and as no money is provided, the whole Bill would be practically inoperative. The other night I said something about the opinion of Principal Grant upon this subject. And as he is a gentleman of great authority, who has paid special attention to the subject, and who visited Manitoba for the express purpose of making himself acquainted with this question of Manitoba schools, there is no doubt that his opinion will be valuable, and will be accepted by the House in the same spirit as it was asked to accept the opinion of Sir William Dawson to a somewhat contrary effect. Principal Grant's objections to the Bill are pertinent to this clause, because he deals mainly with the difficulties which this amendment is intended to obviate. On the 2nd March, shortly after this Bill had been introduced, and just before the second reading, Principal Grant was asked to give his opinion with regard to it. He said:

> The proposed Remedial Bill, in my opinion, is well adapted to irritate every one without doing a particle of good.

That is the very objection I take to the Bill. The amendment proposed would have the effect of obviating a great deal of the friction, and therefore the opinion I am quoting is pertinent to this discussion.

> It combines the prospects of a long continued Donnybrook between the province and the Dominion——

Of course, hon. gentlemen will understand the allusion to Donnybrook, at least the hon. member for Ottawa County (Mr. Devlin) will understand it. Principal Grant desires it to be understood that if the Bill is passed in its present form, there will be a regular pitched battle, in which a number of parties will take part, not only the provincial authorities fighting with the Dominion authorities, but the advisory board with the Board of Education, and a general scrimmage between those in favour of separate schools and those opposed to them. Finally, the matter will be referred to the courts, and then the lawyers will have their Donnybrook, only it will be more profitable to them than to the rest of us.

> —with a barmicede feast for the Manitoba Roman Catholic minority.

That is as much as to say that the minority will get but little advantage from it.

> There must be dozens of men in Parliament who after a little reflection will see how it is sure to work.

I hope there are a great many dozens.

> The Bill puts all the powers of the provincial government into the hands of a Board of Education which is responsible to no one.

They are appointed by a Government that feels no responsibility in these schools and will not give facilities necessary for their prosperity and success.

> To entrust such powers to nine gentlemen of whom nothing is required but that they shall be nominally Roman Catholics——

That is all the qualification that is required of these gentlemen who are to have practically entire control of these schools.

> —is secondary to the whole spirit of our constitution that one is tempted to think that the measure must have been drawn up by the innocent Father Lacombe.

Father Lacombe is a rather prominent gentleman just now. He undertook to lecture the leader of the Opposition upon his duty. He thought that having spent thirty or forty years as a missionary among the half-breeds on the Saskatchewan, he was competent to lecture the hon. gentleman upon his constitutional duties as leader of the Opposition. The hon. leader of the Opposition must have been very much gratified to receive such advice from such a source.

> When, however, we look a little deeper, these extravagant powers are seen to be pure delusions.

That is exactly the view we have been trying to impress upon the House.

> The machinery looks wonderfully complete, it is spread over forty pages of type. But there is not one pound of steam to run it. Not a cent is provided, even to enable the board to hire a room to meet in or to defray its necessary expenses.

That view has been impressed upon the House, and it has been clearly shown that there is no steam. One of the reasons why we advocate the amendment is that it provides the steam. If the amendment were carried, the management of the schools would be in the hands of a body that has all the machinery necessary for carrying on the work efficiently.

> The executive officer of the board is the superintendent, and he must have a good salary.

I rather think the superintendent will expect a good salary. He might be a gentleman, perhaps, sufficiently qualified to have a seat in this House, and if so he would not like to give up the high position occupied by gentlemen in this House to take the superintendency of the schools in Manitoba. Of course, we have no idea who this superintendent may be, but at the same time, I think, he might be a person who has held a seat in this House, or who is qualified to hold a seat in this House.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. If the hon. gentleman says that as an insinuation against me, he is altogether mistaken.

Mr. O'BRIEN. There is a French proverb which says 'Qui s'excuse, s'accuse,' and I think it is admirably adapted to the hon. gentleman who has just spoken. If the cap fits him, he is welcome to wear it. I made no reference to any gentleman in this House; I simply said it might be a person who had held a seat in this House, or who was qualified to hold a seat in this House.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. The hon. gentleman will not be selected.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I do not think, if I was selected, I would be a suitable person. I am sure the duties would be incompatible with my taste. Whether they would be compatible with the taste and capacity of the hon. gentleman who puts the cap on his head so neatly, this House can judge as well as I can. But surely it is a very extraordinary thing that an hon. gentleman occupying the position in this House of the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. LaRivière) should jump up in such a hurry and take it to himself. We now know from the hon. gentleman's action who is the intended superintendent of separate schools in Manitoba, if this Bill is passed. This superintendent will have all the work to do, and a difficult country to travel over. I wonder whether the travelling is likely to suit the hon. gentleman, whether travelling on a pony, or on a buckboard, would be best suited to his capacity. It would appear from the duties he is about to undertake that he will have to do a good deal.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. At any rate, I have never travelled on an ass.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Well, perhaps the hon. gentleman is more likely to travel on a buckboard than on horseback.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Question.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Without the initiative of the superintendent nothing could be done. The hon. gentleman has to make a start in everything. Whether he travels upon an ass, or a pony, or a buckboard, he has to take the initiative. I have no doubt he is exceedingly qualified to do so :

> His salary, and the salaries of the local inspectors, the expenses of the normal schools, as well as more than half the salaries of the teachers, are all to be paid out of a fund to be voted by the legislature of Manitoba. It sounds like a huge joke.

I am afraid that the hon. member for Provencher will find it a huge joke before he gets the appointment, to which he is evidently aspiring.

> Of course Manitoba will not vote one dollar.

I think, if Manitoba knew that the hon. member for Provencher was a candidate for the position of superintendent, they would be much more willing to vote his salary than they would be if that superintendent were unknown to fame. Now, the Bill says that any sum granted by the legislature for these separate schools shall be placed to the credit of the board. No doubt, the 74th clause of the Bill says so, upon which some hon. gentlemen seem to place a great deal of reliance Clause 74 is the least effective of the whole Bill, because I do not think anybody will pretend to say that the Dominion Government have any power to compel the Manitoba legislature to vote money out of their own resources for the support of a system of schools to which they are opposed.

> The constitutional question is shirked. If the Roman Catholics are thankful for such a Bill, the fox must have been thankful for the dinner to which the stork invited him.

I wonder if the hon. member for Provencher, in the course of his reading, ever read the little fable about the fox and the stork. If not, I will tell him.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman might proceed to discuss the section before the Chair. That would be the best story we can hear just now.

Mr. O'BRIEN. We will leave the fable of the fox and the stork for a future occasion.

> However, let us suppose that the board does meet on the street or elsewhere, and finds a superintendent who will work for love, and put his shoulder to the wheel and set the machinery in motion.

Just fancy these nine gentlemen meeting at the corner of a street, and the hon. member for Provencher coming forward without salary and putting his shoulder to the wheel. No doubt, he would give it a very efficient push. But for all that, we still have not got the necessary funds.

> He organizes a few school districts and gets trustees appointed. These call on the municipal council to levy a separate school tax and the municipality obeys.

So, from whatever point of view we regard this Bill, we find it beset with difficulties, all which difficulties would be obviated, if the Government would be only wise enough to accept the proposal to place these powers in the hands of the executive authority, and not create a board to perfom them.

> The Bill, too, proposes that Roman Catholics assessed for the support of sectarian schools, are to be exempt from taxation for the public schools.

Of course, if they are exempt from taxation for public schools, they still have to pay their taxes in order to create a fund from which this Bill can be carried out.

> The British North America Act gives no power to the Dominion Government to make such exemptions. If it does, may it not also exempt the Mennonites, who came to Manitoba under promise of the most-favoured-race treatment, and the Anglicans who had more schools in 1870 than the Roman Catholics, and people who have no children, and corporations? Of course, if the taxes are not paid, the province must proceed against any man who refuses to pay the provincial tax. What a veritable Lucullus banquet to the lawyers is promised by all this litigation.

Then, there is another way by which the board might possibly raise money, and that is by way of loan. The Bill makes elaborate provisions in later clauses to enable the authorities to raise money by way of loans, if they cannot get it from any other source. Let us see how that will work:

> Suppose they require a loan and the Lieutenant-Governor in Council declines to sanction it, can the British North America Act by any stretch of meaning, be made to cover this transference of power? Besides, what means are provided for informing His Excellency's advisers as to whether there is sufficient security for such loans?

So you see the Bill provides no money in order to meet the expenses of the board. It does not give the board or the trustees the means of raising money from any other source. It is questionable whether they can levy a tax municipally, and it is a question even whether they can raise a loan. So there are blocks in every direction. All these difficulties would be obviated if the Government would accept the proposal of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) and place these powers in the hands of the advisory board. Principal Grant points out that the Government have found it necessary to resort to coercion. That is the opinion of very many. Our criticisms have not been met and have not been attempted to be answered. If it were not that the Government determined to force through this Bill in spite of every opposition, it would be unnecessary to offer further criticism, and if hon. gentlemen opposite were wise, they would withdraw the Bill; but if they are determined to press it, we shall be obliged to continue our criticism. I should like to give the final advice which this high educational authority gives. Principal Grant is not, by any means, opposed to separate schools, but he points out the difficulties standing in the way of the Government as regards the Bill under discussion. He says:

> Even at the last hour I would fain hope that the Government will frankly recognize that it is attempting the impossible. The longer it perseveres in the present course the worse for it and the country. If this Bill would settle the question I might be induced to give it a grudging support. But clearly it will not. I see that Archbishop Langevin is already saying that he hopes for more in the future.

Funds will be required almost immediately after the Act goes into force.

> He will need more, and need it soon. Why, then, should men be pressed to vote for it at the cost of their political life, or at the cost to the country of their political superannuation.

That is a very good word, superannuation. There are various people who could be superannuated, including members of Parliament. The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. LaRiviere) is one of those who is not going to profit by the Bill, so this remark is not applicable to him:

> Intelligent Roman Catholics must now see that, as the Hon. Mr. Fielding put it, "One point conceded by the government of Manitoba will be worth more to them than half a dozen promised by the Dominion."

These remarks go to bear out my assertion as to the impracticability, the impossibility, in fact, of making this a workable measure. And yet, as I have pointed out, those difficulties would be obviated were the Government to accept the proposal of the hon. member for North Simcoe and place the administration of the law in the hands of the authorities that now have power to carry it out. It is hardly necessary to point out that the Board of Education is an irresponsible body. It is appointed by a government that is hostile to this Bill, or, at all events, is exceedingly indifferent as to the success of this measure; whereas, were the powers placed in the hands of the advisory board, they would have to do one of two things, either accept the Act and endeavour to carry it out to the best of their ability, or make themselves amenable to actions in the courts, because the intent of the judgment of the Privy Council would be violated, a grievance created, and an action would lie against the board. The easiest way to settle this matter is to take the final clause of the judgment, which declares that all that is necessary is to pass supplementary legislation so as to secure the rights to the minority to teach religion, and to be exempt from taxation for pubilc schools, these being the two main objects they desire. By adopting the amendment, we would be doing exactly what the judgment of the Privy Council and the remedial order require, passing supplementary legislation to make the law effective in the directions indicated. It is necessary that this legislation should be passed in such shape that it shall not only be in accordance with the spirit of the constitution, but be made workable. What is the use of passing unworkable Acts, which cannot be made effective? Is it not perfectly obvious that the Government is insincere when, in addition to other evidence, we have the fact that this Bill, if passed through this House, will utterly fail to carry out the purposes of those for whose benefit it is intended. Under all these circumstances, if the Government really desire to make the Bill one of advantage to the minority, and if the whole action of the Government is not a wholly pretense, the committee must come to the conclusion that the amendment is one that should be adopted.

Mr. WALLACE. In speaking to the amendment of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), I desire to enter my protest against the unnecessary expense incurred by the proposals in the Bill. There is no necessity for incurring additional expenditure. Manitoba is not in a financial position to be able to undertake large expenditures necessary for a new Board of Education, and all the machinery already supplied. When the dual system of schools existed prior to 1890, the expenditure of the Protestant section of the board was about $24,000, and the cost of the Roman Catholic section about $6,000. Why incur unnecessary expense, particularly when there is no provision for meeting it. The Bill provides no means for meeting this expenditure, and, therefore, those who are trying to force this Bill through are creating difficulties which will have to be met by special legislation. Religious and racial strife has been unnecessarily created by the Government in forcing this Bill upon the House, and if we take power to introduce supplementary legislation next session, the measure is still more objectionable and still more calculated to cause strife. I contend that the advisory board could very well discharge the duties which are relegated to a distinct board under this Act. I am sorry the Government are not paying more attention to this Bill, and I observe a great deal of apathy on their part. That is more particularly to be complained of, because we were told by the leader of the House that this is the most important legislation that has ever been brought before the House of Commons. We are for the first time taking advantage of a clause in the Manitoba Act which wrests from the province powers which up to this date were under its exclusive control. When the attention of the country and the House is being very largely directed to this question, the indifference on the part of the Government is to me unaccountable. We find some members of the Government who are unable to answer the legal points brought up in this committee, and who tell us in this House: Wait until Mr. Ewart comes down. I am told that Mr. Ewart is here now. We know that Mr. Ewart is the agent of the hierarchy in Manitoba, that he is looking after their interests, and when questions on the construction of the law come up for consideration, we are told that the whole matter is to be referred to the legal adviser of the Manitoba minority. Sir, that is very humiliating, considering that we have so many lawyers of high standing in the Government, and so many members of the Conservative party behind them who are also learned in the law, whose eloquence during the last few days has been more demonstrated in their votes than in their heads. We must call upon the Government to elucidate these questions, and not to sit in their seats careless and silently. An hon. member behind me says: "Help you to obstruct." When the weakness of the Bill and its incongruities are pointed out, and we ask for explanation, their only answer is: If we attempt to reply we would be charged with obstruction. The only obstruction I have seen in this House on this question so far is by hon. gentlemen behind me. But, if it is necessary to obstruct this legislation, I do not think there are many who are opposed to it but who will be willing to say that they will take every legitimate and constitutional means of expressing their dissent to its passage. I am certain that I shall not be deterred from expressing my opinion both as to the Bill in general and as to every clause of it which does not meet with my approval. The whole Bill, I consider, is one that is not called for in the interests of the province of Manitoba, nor in the interests of the constitution either, and I shall do my duty as a member of the House of Commons in opposing what I think is wrong. I wish to call attention, moreover, to this fact. We have been told by the member for Inverness (Mr. Cameron), and by other members from the province of Nova Scotia, that the school law of that province, and its administration, provides all that they require, and that the minority there have no grievance. I have not studied the Nova Scotia school law and the Manitoba School Act to compare the two as thoroughly as I would like to, but so far as I can find out, the school laws of Nova Scotia are not any more liberal towards the minority than are the present school laws of Manitoba towards the minority there. Then, if the School Act of Nova Scotia is unobjectionable to the minority, what strong objection can be urged against the school law of Manitoba. There is none that I can see. We have had assurances from the government of Manitoba, assurances which were repeated the other day to the commissioners in Winnipeg, that if there are any difficulties, they would be only too glad, when they are pointed out, to remove them, where the principle of their law is not concerned. The province of Ontario with 300,000 Roman Catholics and 1,800,000 Protestants, does not require to go to the expense of two sets of machinery, although it has a separate school system; but both that system and the public school system are managed by one Department of Education, and there is no grievance on the part of the minority there. If the province of Ontario can get along without this double machinery, I think the province of Manitoba can do the same. Again, if the principle be established of having not only separate schools, but duplicated machinery, in the province of Manitoba, then to be consistent and logical you will have to apply the same principle to all the provinces to be established in the future in the North-west Territories. These inconsistencies in the Bill having been pointed out by eminent legal men in this House—and they can be clearly seen by every one, whether a legal man or not—the Government should either explain them or withdraw this clause of the Bill. The Government of Canada sent commissioners to the province of Manitoba a week or two ago to see if some settlement of this question could not be made. I think every member of this House must regret that some such step had not been taken long ago. If it had been, I think a settlement would have been very much easier than it was when undertaken by the commissioners. That is the opinion of at least one of the commissioners themselves.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is not speaking to the clause.

Mr. WALLACE. I think I am discussing the clause in this way: if these commissioners had made some adjustment of the question, it might not have been necessary for us to be considering this clause at all. What did these commissioners go to Manitoba for? To see if the legislature of Manitoba would not enact legislation to carry out the provisions of this clause.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. That is not the question before the committee. We are on the amendment of the hon. member for North Simcoe.

Mr. WALLACE. When we are discussing the amendment, I think we have also the right to discuss the motion to which it is an amendment. Is that correct? Silence gives consent.

I have not heard any reason given by the Government or its supporters why this amendment should not be agreed to. It appeals to the common sense and good judgment of the House. Suppose the amendment be rejected, and the clause carried in its present shape, we have two conflicting Boards of Education, and you will have them making all sorts of contradictory regulations. Each one will decide on different text-books, and the poor school teacher will not know which to obey, because by the Bill he is subject to each. Then each board could provide for separate qualifications of the teachers. The one might say unless a teacher has a certificate from us, we will not allow him to teach; and the other board might insist on the teacher getting his certificate from it. What is the poor teacher to do under the circumstances? Must he get certificates from both, or run the case of being bounced by either? The Government are in duty bound to enlighten the House upon this matter, and if they should do so, we shall not bring any charge of obstruction against them. On Saturday they could not give us the information because Mr. Ewart had not arrived, but Mr. Ewart is here now, and I call upon them now to tell us why they put in these contradictory clauses.

Mr. McCARTHY. The hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) has certainly made a most reasonable appeal.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The legal advisers are not in.

Mr. McCARTHY. I observe that the Minister of Justice and the Minister of the Interior are not in their places, and therefore perhaps it would be unreasonable to press from the Government that they should discuss the legal aspect of the case. But the hon. gentleman who assumed charge of the Bill (Sir Charles Tupper) is in, and we are glad to see him, because the hon. gentleman who has charge of the Bill surely ought to have the courtesy to remain in the committee when it is under discussion. So far, we have not heard one solitary word from him in its defence or explanation, although he is not only in charge of it, but was deemed the only person competent to take charge of it since he took it out of the hands of the Minister of Justice, who introduced it. I do submit that if we are to make any progress at all, the Government ought not to treat us with absolute disrespect. There was some excuse on Saturday, because the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Daly), who then took charge of the matter, was only filling the position temporarily for the Minister of Justice (Mr. Dickey), and it was not unreasonable that he was not able to give some reason for the course the Government has taken. But surely there can be no excuse to-day. Leaving aside the legal difficulties so earnestly pressed by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), and which have not been satisfactorily disposed of, I want to know why the Government are going to create a Board of Education and waste the public money of Manitoba—because the board will sooner or later have to be paid, and it will have to be paid out of the funds of Manitoba—when there is no necessity for it? Why should this be done when everybody admits, and everybody must admit that the rights and privileges that are restored to the Roman Catholic minority can be enjoyed and can be protected without the creation of the Board of Education. At all events, by limiting its duties to the matters that are of a strictly denominational character. For my part, I think we could get on if we once knew why that course is adopted. It has been pointed out that it is not the course followed in Quebec. I pointed out on Saturday that it is not the course pursued in the North-west. The hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) who knows more about this matter than probably any other member of the committee, explained to us that long before the Government proposed the policy of separate schools they had determined, at the instigation of all classes, Protestants and Catholics alike, to do away with the system of administration, partly on account of the expense, and partly on account of its inefficiency, and he explained that that applied as well to the Protestant section of the board as to the Roman Catholic section. Here we have an advisory board duly constituted. We have a Department of Education filling the place of the Board of Education. And the policy of the Bill in connection with this 4th clause—because upon this 4th clause, and upon this very term the questions rests—is that although there are these two bodies, the Government proposes to create and hand over the administration of this Act to a new board. Let me draw attention to the manner in which this board was paid under the old law. Section 10 of the Act of 1881 provided :

> From the sum so appropriated to each section——

That was the legislative grant.

> —they shall first pay the incidental expenses of that section and such sum as the superintendent of education and the Lieutenant-Governor in Council deem just.

Now, it rather appears that the proposed superintendent of education is sitting in this House. The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. LaRivière) at once acknowledges the corn, though he disclaimed that he wants it to be understood that he was the member. No person supposed that he was to be the new superintendent of education, and for whom this money was to be expended, until he spoke.

Mr. FOSTER. By denying it, he maintains it.

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes ; I think, under the circumstances, we may say so. No person suggested that he was to be superintendent before he himself spoke. I am glad to see the Minister of Finance taking an interest in this matter. He has been deserted by his new leader, and perhaps he can tell us why this new board is to be created.

Mr. FOSTER. I would be glad to do so, if the committee had not been told about 500 times already.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It appears to me that the request is reasonable to this extent : We had the Minister of the Interior, acting for the Government, admitting that there is an apparent conflict between subsection 2 of section 3 and this subsection that we are discussing. It would not be unreasonable that the Government should take a day or more to consider that matter. But I think we are entitled to be told, before we proceed with the discussion, whether the Government have made up their minds to abandon clause 2 of the third section, or whether they propose to proceed with it. It does appear to me, even if we had not been practically assured of it by the hon. Minister of the Interior, that the Government, in introducing this Bill introduced a measure of which they knew exceedingly little. I doubt very much—we have not the advantage of the presence of the ex-Minister of Justice (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper)—whether the Government, or any member of it really drew this Bill. It does appear to me that whoever drew it drew it clumsily and carelessly, and without any adequate knowledge of the constitutional provisions upon which this federal compact of ours depends. That much is tolerably evident to hon. members of this House, whether they be lay or whether they be legal. Now, there is one thing pretty certain, pretty clear, and that is that we are being called upon for the first time in our history, to consider an entirely new question. Such a measure as this has never before been proposed to our Federal Parliament. It requires to be carefully considered. If the Government were not able to adopt the suggestion of my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) and refer certain disputed questions, which will undoubtedly be ventilated in the courts, to the decision of the Supreme Court, then bearing in mind the inevitable difficulties that attend any attempt to interpolate the jurisdiction of this Parliament into an Act passed by the provincial legislature of Manitoba, the Government ought to have their legal advisers here, and they ought to be prepared with a very much clearer explanation. With regard to an important section at the very opening of this Bill, we were told by the hon. gentleman who, for the time being, represented the Government, that he did not know the sense of it. It was put there, he supposed, for some good purpose, but what that purpose was he did not know. He understood that a certain legal gentleman who had been retained in the legal cases arising out of this dispute, had recommended that it should be inserted. I submit that that is no sort of explanation to offer to this Parliament; it is no sort of explanation on the part of the Government or its legal advisers, to offer to the country. These points ought to have been well weighed and thoroughly understood by the Government as a whole, and more particularly by the men who act here as their legal advisers. Now, all this difficulty, I fancy, might have been avoided and a day might have been saved to the Government if they had known enough about the measure they propose to put through to tell us whether they intend to drop this subsection or not. Can the Minister of Finance tell us? It is not in his department, I know, and perhaps he does not take a burning interest in it. But I think that before we go further we have a right to know whether the Government are going to drop this subsection or not. If they are, then, I presume, to a large extent, the force of the amendment will be broken: but if they had not determined, then, they should softly notify us to that effect. I put that, at any rate, as a reasonable request.

Mr. FOSTER. If I thought my hon. friend was burning for information, I should be glad to give it to him. He seems lax in attending to what is going on in this House, or he would have known that somewhere between 10 a.m. and 12 p.m., on Saturday, this question was asked over and over again——

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But not answered.

Mr. FOSTER. Answered over and over again. If I were to answer, the answer to-night would be the same as that given on Saturday. If the hon. gentlemen wish to go over these questions again and so obstruct a measure which the majority of this House is anxious to have put upon the statute-book, I am sorry to see my hon. friend taking his place amongst the ranks of the obstructionists.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think nobody contributed more to the obstruction than did the Minister of Finance by the firebrand which he mischievously flung into the House on Thursday afternoon; and I would not be much surprised if it was done with the intent of creating discussion. However, I am bound to say that he did not obstruct so much as his leader, whose conduct on that occasion was pre-eminently calculated to obstruct this Bill, as it did obstruct it for many hours. But the hon. gentleman is not correct in saying that any satisfactory answer was given to him. What we want to know is, do the hon. gentlemen intend to proceed? Are they willing to eliminate subsection 2, or are they not? They have had time to consult Mr. Ewart, and to find out why Mr. Ewart wanted it put in, if they did not know before. They might at least tell us why Mr. Ewart wanted subsection 2 put into clause 3. If they cannot give us that information, why do they want to keep a clause which they are unable to explain?

Mr. HENDERSON. I would like to say a few words on the amendment proposed to section 4. To my mind the control and management of separate schools in Manitoba as proposed under the Bill, is placed in the hands of a new board created under that Bill. The amendment proposes instead to place the control and management of the schools under the advisory board which already exists in Manitoba. Now, I think if remedial legislation is to be adopted at all, if we are to interfere in any way with the school system of Manitoba, that interference should be of as slight a character as possible, and I for one object in any way to encumber the existing school system by any new clause in this Bill, if the object can be reached in any other way. As hon. gentlemen are aware, I voted against the principle of the Bill. I preferred that some settlement of this question should be arranged in another way than by passing this Bill, possibly by a secularization of all the schools in Manitoba. I did not vote against the Bill for the reasons given by many hon. gentlemen in this House. For instance, the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) said it was no use to the Roman Catholics. The leader of the Opposition said it was a faint-hearted measure. The member for Verchères (Mr. Geoffrion) said it was only a half measure; the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Carroll) said it was simply a shadow of what they wanted; and the hon.

member for Richelieu (Mr. Bruneau) declared it was no remedial law at all. I did not vote against the Bill for any of these reasons, but for the reason I have stated, that I was not in favour of the principle of separate schools in any form. Now, it appears to me that I cannot consistently support the amendment of the hon. member for North Simcoe, who proposes even a stronger measure of separate schools than the Remedial Bill before us. He proposes a system of separate schools which shall be tacked on to the existing public school system of Manitoba. Well, although I voted, as he did, against the principle of the Bill on the second reading, I do not propose to stultify myself now and go back on my former record, and declare that I am now in favour of separate schools in any form. I trust, therefore, that the amendment of the hon. member for Simcoe will not carry. If we are to interfere at all with the school system of Manitoba, I think it should be done in as slight a manner as possible ; and that it would be better to retain the clause in the Remedial Bill than adopt the drastic amendment proposed by the member for Simcoe.

Mr. McCARTHY. I had felt a moment ago like congratulating the hon. member from Halton. I remembered that a night or two ago he voted to give up Saturday for the purpose of railroading through this measure. I remembered that this Saturday was between Good Friday and Easter Sunday, which had never before since confederation been taken up in the sittings of this House ; and I was very much surprised that an hon. gentleman who had voted for the six months' hoist and voted against the second reading, should have been so anxious to place this measure upon the statute-book that he voted to take that Saturday for the purpose. But I now see that this opposition of his to the second reading was somewhat of a sham character.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. McCARTHY. Well, it is perfectly clear now that the hon. gentleman does desire, not merely to have separate schools, but to have them in the most vicious way possible, and a way that will do the most injury to Manitoba. Now, the proposition of the Bill is that all these powers contained in subsection "a" to "f," exclusive, shall be vested in a Board of Education to be created under this Act, to be paid for, if this clause is to go through, or if this Bill is to go through, it should be done with as little friction, as little injury, as little damage, to the existing institutions in the province, as possible ; and that for that purpose we should transfer to the existing advisory board all the matters in connection with the separate schools to be created under this Act. The hon. gentleman says he cannot vote for that because he is opposed to the principle of separate schools. Remember, the House has already passed the second reading of the Bill, and we are bound to make it as good a measure as we can, reserving our right to oppose it on the third reading, if, taken as a whole, it is not such a measure as we can support. But it is clearly the duty of all of us, no matter whether we are opposed to it or not, to make this Bill as little hurtful to the province upon whom it is to be imposed, and as effective for the purpose for which it purports to be designed, as we possibly can. Why, is it not important that the Roman Catholic children in Manitoba should be properly educated ? We are now saying to the people of Manitoba : We propose to take the education of the Roman Catholic children out of your hands into our own hands ; and will the hon. member say that we ought not to make that measure in the interests of Roman Catholics as favourable as possible ? Let the hon. gentleman look at the sections which follow this one. The standard for the qualification of teachers is nominally to be the same as the standard of qualification in the public schools, but the candidates are to be subjected to examination by the Board of Education, a board of nine gentlemen, whose only qualification is that they are to be Roman Catholics, and who, if they carry out the system that prevailed before 1890, would take very good care, no matter what the standard might be, that the passage of that standard should not be very difficult. I do not care what its standard may be, if I had the marking of the papers I would not have any difficulty in passing any person whom I chose. We further find that the books and maps and globes to be used are to be in the discretion of this board, and it is limited to such as are in use in the public schools and separate schools of Ontario. Why should that be so ? The hon. gentleman may reply that these matters can be considered when we come to the clauses, but all these matters can be more efficiently attended to in the interest of the education of Roman Catholic children by the advisory board than by the Board of Education. So the hon. member for Halton must have misunderstood the object of my amendment, or he must be willing to place on the statute-book a system which is much less likely to prove successful than the one I propose. I desire to state to the Minister of Finance this, and if I am wrong he can correct me, that we have never heard any hon. member on the Treasury benches explain why the Government prefer to create a Board of Education rather than transfer these powers to the advisory board. No one doubts that legally it can be done, but as a matter of policy, why are the Government creating a Board of Education and transferring to it powers and duties which the advisory board in existence is appointed to discharge, when no such system exists in Ontario or the Nort-west, and the result is to organize a double system of machinery, with its attendant expense and inefficiency.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I should like to see a little progress made with the business before the committee, and if this clause cannot be passed, I suggest that it be allowed to stand and other clauses be proceeded with. I have sat here all Saturday and I have been in my seat during to-day and have heard questions asked and no one present who is prepared to answer them for the Government. There is no one at the present time in charge of the Bill, which has been declared to be the most important one ever brought before Parliament. The most eminent lawyers in the House have declared that the whole framework of the measure depends on the constitutionality of this section. Ministers have been asked to explain and state the position of the Government in regard to it. The Minister of Finance has risen and stated in reply to the hon. member for Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), that the answer given yesterday is the answer to be given to-day. The committee cannot, however, be satisfied with the answer given yesterday, because one Minister stated that the section was correct and should remain, and another Minister said a doubt existed with respect to its constitutionality, and it was questionable whether it should be allowed to remain in the Bill. Speaking as an independent listener to the debate, it seems to me to be almost impossible to proceed with business at the present time. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries has not seen fit to defend the Bill. He must think the Bill is not one worthy of his approval. The Minister of Public Works ventured that one opinion to which I have referred, but it seems to have exhausted him. He is not now in his place. The Postmaster General, who has recently arrived, seems to have nothing to say. The Controller of Customs is the only lawyer present representing the Government, except the Postmaster General, and he has not ventured an opinion upon it. The Secretary of State, who is in charge of the Bill, is not present. That is the position in which this committee is placed when the members are endeavouring to do business. The section last passed is one in regard to which a doubt was cast by hon. Ministers, and it may be struck out at a later stage. The section following, which is just now under discussion, is contradictory to the preceding one. In the face of the strong objections offered the committee is asked to go on with the section, whether it is contradictory or non-contradictory, whether it involves the minority in a series of lawsuits, or whether it is part of a Bill which will be of no benefit whatever. An amendment has been submitted by the member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) to obviate the difficulty, and that is by substituting the advisory board for the Board of Education. That suggestion seems to possess great weight. A strong reason for favouring it is found in the fact that the Bill provides no funds by which this board to be created can carry on its affairs, while the advisory board is part of the provincial educational system and is provided with funds to carry out its operations. The objections taken have not been made in a carping spirit, and nothing in the way of obstruction has been offered, and accordingly the charge of obstruction made by the Minister of Finance is wholly unwarranted. If obstruction has occurred, it has been due to the course taken by the leader of the House who has forced divisions for no purpose, except to force some hon. gentlemen who voted against the second reading to vote for a more drastic measure, and at the same time the taking of such divisions occupied the time of the committee. There is no one here in charge of the Bill, there is no Minister to explain a Bill of the first importance, and the fact that we have present only two or three Ministers, and they as dumb as oysters, is a condition of affairs not creditable to this Parliament. I repeat my suggestion that if the Government require further time to consider this section, it should be allowed to stand, and the committee should proceed to the consideration of subsequent sections.

Mr. SPROULE. I wish to say something on this clause, Mr. Chairman, before it is carride. It seems to me somewhat strange that the members of the Government have either collapsed or become silent, so that they are not able to give explanations of this law, or not willing to accept reasonable suggestions for its amendment. It would appear as if this Bill were drawn by some one outside of this House who has not thoroughly coached the Ministers, or else, that the Ministers have drawn it in a hurry and not being sure of what it means, they think that silence is golden. If Mr. Ewart drew the Bill, as I think the Minister of the Interior intimated he did, then I would suggest that Mr. Ewart be brought here and placed in such close proximity to the Minister of Justice, or to the Minister of the Interior, that he could coach them from time to time, and enable them to give intelligent information to the House.

Mr. McCARTHY. And we will agree not to see a stranger on the floor.

Mr. SPROULE. Yes, I would be inclined to permit that violation of the rules of the House, if we attained the object of getting some information in regard to the Bill. I was surprised at the member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) objecting to support this amendment on the ground that he opposed the Bill. I, together with him, opposed the second reading, believing, with such an authority as Dr. Bourinot, that the six months' hoist was the proper way to kill the Bill. I thought it was better to vote for that than to vote against the second reading, because if the Bill was only defeated on the second reading a motion might be made to reinstate it on the Order paper, two days afterwards. I regarded the six months' hoist as the only legitimate way of killing the Bill, and I voted for that amendment, as the hon. member for Halton did. If we put a Bill on the statute-book at all, I am bound to believe that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Henderson) should be desirous of having a measure that is workable, and economical, and useful for the needs for which it is intended. If we can economize the funds of the minority in Manitoba, who, judging from their numerical strength, cannot be very strong financially, we should avail ourselves of the services of the advisory board in Manitoba, which is already constituted and paid for by the Manitoba government, and not take extra funds from the minority to pay for this board, which is to be created under this Bill. Now, that is one intention of the amendment, and I do not see why the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) would not vote for it. It is pertinent for us to ask: Would not the advisory board, just as well as this proposed board in this Bill, carry out the provisions of this Bill without infringing on the conscientious scruples of the minority? I believe it would. If that is the case, then every intelligent man must see that the amendment of the hon. gentleman (Mr. McCarthy) would improve the measure in that respect. I confess that I can see no just ground for claiming that the duties assigned to this board cannot be done equally as well by the present advisory board, connected with the Education Department in Manitoba. After all, the duties of the board provided for here, are such as might be discharged by one body as well as the other. The board in this Bill have power to make regulations for discipline. It does not require a Roman Catholic or a Protestant to do that. It only requires ordinary intelligence and common sense. Then the board in this Bill are to be appointed to carry out the provisions of this Act. This Act contains 112 clauses, and it would be pertinent to this question if I were to examine the entire of these clauses, but, if I did that, it might be said that I was trying to obstruct this Bill, and for one, I do not desire to have that imputation hurled at me to-night. There are many provisions which I must refer to, because it is important to ascertain whether these provisions could be carried out equally well by the board now in existence in Manitoba and paid by the government of Manitoba, as by the board which is to be created under this Act, and which must be paid out of somebody's funds. Then again, this board is to arrange for the proper examination of teachers. Well, that is done by the present advisory board. Any educated person can do that, and it is not necessary that he should be either a Presbyterian, a Methodist, a Church of England member, or a Roman Catholic. One could do equally as well as the other, so long as he set himself about doing it with a proper intention. Then, this board is to provide for grading of teachers.

Now, teachers must be graded after they are examined; and, from the number of correct or incorrect answers which they give, I assume that they would be assigned to one grade or another. This only involves the necessity of ascertaining whether their answers have shown that intelligence which indicates them to be possessed of the qualifications to enable them to be good teachers or otherwise. It is not work of a technical character, and it can be as easily done by the advisory board as by the Board of Education. This board may also withdraw the license to teach for sufficient cause. It is the duty of the advisory board to do that in the case of common school teachers, and if the same standard is to be applied to all the teachers in all subjects except religion and morals, then that duty could be performed as well by the advisory board as by the Board of Education. This board is to fix the standard of qualifications for teachers, which is to be the same in secular matters for teachers of the separate schools as for teachers of the common schools. If so, that work can be as well done by the advisory board as by the Board of Education. Then, the certificates issued by the Department of Education are to be acceptable for teachers of separate schools, except in the matters of morals and religion, in which they may be specially examined. This is a work which the advisory board would probably not be suitable for doing, and an extra examination by some competent authority might be provided for that purpose. That is something that might fairly be done by the church, and I do not think any one would object to that being assigned to an independent board appointed under this Act. Then it is provided that the Department of Education shall be recognized by the Board of Education. As the Department of Education controls the advisory board, surely the Board of Education would be doing practically the same work. Then, this board is to select the books, maps, and globes. Now, the selection of books seems to be confined to two sources. The books may be the same as those authorized for use in the high and public schools of the province of Manitoba. The advisory board selects these books, and it is equally capable of selecting the same class of books for the separate schools. If the separate schools refuse to accept those books, they may as an alternative accept the books used in the separate schools of the province of Ontario. Now, I have here a series of the books used in those schools, and from a cursory examination, I regard them as very suitable for children. I take Sadlier's First Reader. If I would be in order in going through these books, I would gladly do it, because they contain some very valuable information, which I presume this House would like to hear. This book commences by giving the alphabet—the A, B, C, which is the same as we have in the common schools, because as a boy I remember going over these same letters. Then, we have some beautiful pictures. The first is that of an axe, and below is the spelling, "A-x-e," commencing with a capital "A," because the compiler thinks it well to teach spelling with the aid of pictures. It might be assumed that this axe was for the purpose of splitting wood, which would bring up the question of cooking; for the compiler evidently had in view the imparting of knowledge to the budding intellects of the juveniles who used this book. Then we have a picture of a bell. That bell might be for calling you to dinner.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I do not think the hon. gentleman should go through all that.

Mr. SPROULE. I do not propose to go through it all, because if I did I would have a job that would be too much for my strength. But I am merely referring to them to show the kind of work which the advisory board have to perform. For that purpose, I shall only refer cursorily to a few of them in order to show that the advisory board of the Department of Education, under the Manitoba Act, can do the work equally as well, if not better, than the board created by this Bill. I take up the second reader.

Mr. FOSTER. Order.

Mr. SPROULE. I simply wish to show what the board can do.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman should confine himself to the amendment, and not give us a dissertation on these books.

Mr. SPROULE. I am not proposing to do so, because that would take up too much time. I am only referring to the educational series of the elementary schools of Ontario to show how easy it would be for the advisory board to select the books required, and thus save the expense of the additional board. Then, there is the selection of the maps and the globes. Could not the advisory board do that as well as the board contemplated to be brought into existence by this Bill? Then this Board of Education has to approve of the plans for the construction of school-houses. If the Bill provided that there must be an architect on that board, I could understand that there might be some necessity for it, but there is no such provision regarding this board any more than there is regarding the advisory board, so that one is equally as competent as the other to approve of the plans. Then this board has to make regulations regarding the selection of school sites. Any one could select a school site. I venture to say that you yourself, Mr. Chairman, could select a school site, if you walked over the section and saw the number of the inhabitants. You would first take into consideration the healthfulness of the place, and then whether it was convenient of access for most of the children. You would choose a cheerful locality on some public road. If there were public buildings, such as post offices or churches, you would probably place it as near one of these as you could. This is work that might be done by any one of commonplace intelligence. The board also has control of the size of school grounds. Of course if there were a hundred pupils, the grounds would be larger than if there were only twelve pupils. Then, a rich section might afford to buy larger grounds, while a poorer section would be content with smaller. "The formation and alteration of school districts under its care." I notice that further on in the Bill you provide that municipal councils shall make the school districts, with an appeal to this Board of Education. You might as well leave it to the advisory board in the first place. "To make and enforce regulations for the establishment and operation of the departments." I suppose that means departments in the schools. If the children were all of one age, there would naturally be one department, but four or five departments might be necessary where the children differed considerably in age and attainments. But that is work of simple nature that any intelligent person could do; it might be left to the trustees. But, if it is competent for the Board of Education to do under this Act, it is equally competent for the advisory board to do it. Therefore, the amendment should be adopted. "In such of its schools as it may deem suitable for the preparation of candidates for the annual examination of teachers and for matriculating at the University of Manitoba." That is only commonplace work and can be done by any one. They have nothing to do with the examination itself. They must provide a building and the means for carrying on the examination. The advisory board could do it as well as any other body. "And for the doing of general literary work." Here is something that may require literary ability, but I assume that the advisory board would be men of as high ability as the men of the Board of Education. "And to give special aid to such schools from the funds at its disposal." This is work that could be done as well by one as by another. You do not restrict the board in its place of meeting. It is provided that Winnipeg shall be the usual place of meeting, but they may meet anywhere in the province. It might be that they would have to meet outside of Winnipeg to decide some question of school site or school regulation. But there is nothing to show that the advisory board could not do as well. It is provided that:

> Any member of the board absenting himself from the meetings of the board for six months, unless sickness or absence from the province, shall be considered to have, ipso facto, resigned his position.

That has nothing to do with it, one way or the other. The same provision could be made with regard to the advisory board. The Lieutenant-Governor in Council is to appoint one of the members of the board superintendent of the schools, and the superintendent shall be the secretary of the board. If no appointment shall be so made, the board shall appoint one of its own members to be the superintendent. Here is a divergence from the usual course provided in this Act. The usual course, where the Lieutenant-Governor in Council does not act, this Government acts, but here it is provided that the board shall act, if the Lieutenant-Governor in Council fails to do so. The board is to appoint one of its own members as superintendent. But the advisory board could do that as well as the Board of Education. I find that, under this Bill, the municipal council is to establish a school district within its own bounds, with an appeal to this board. But this is ordinary work, and might be done by the school trustees. It is provided :

> It shall be lawful for the board to form or subdivide any city or town or any school district which includes or is included in a city or town, into wards for the election of school trustees.

But this might be done by the municipal council, and, if it were handed over to the municipal council, I believe it would be accepted without complaint. And they are to :

> Determine the number of trustees, not exceeding two, to represent each ward.

That is only a choice or selection of one or two. That is neither a very important nor a very difficult work. The Bill says also :

> Provided, further, that the board shall have power to maintain its district as it existed before the incorporation of said city or town, or so to extend its district as to include Roman Catholics residing in the vicinity where no separate school is in operation.

It does not require special capacity to do that, it requires a commonplace intelligence. Then it is the duty of this Board of Education to grant them this permission if they see fit. But why could not the advisory board do it as well ? Why could not the trustees do it quite as well ? Then, in portions of the province not organized into municipalities, the Board of Education shall have authority to form and alter school districts under its authority, and in portions of the country not organized, they shall have authority to form and organize school districts under its authority. Well, all school districts are under its authority. There are many other things in this Act that are assigned as duties to this board, and it would be quite relevant to the subject for me to go over the whole of them and ascertain what those duties are, and to show that they could as well be done by the Advisory Board, but I forbear, in order not to take up the time of this committee. On the whole, I have come to the conclusion that if we want to make this Bill as efficient as possible, then the hon. gentleman who has charge of it should accept the amendment proposed by the member for North Simcoe, and substitute the advisory board for the Board of Education. It may be said that the advisory board won't do this, but we might say the same with regard to the Department of Education. We have no right to assume that they will not do what this Act commands them to do, we have no right to assume that they will not obey the law. If we place upon their shoulders the responsibility of administering this law, and they refuse to do it, then the courts can compel them to do it. I think we have no right to assume that they would not obey the law ; we have no reason to assume that the advisory board will not do this work equally as well and as efficiently as the board contemplated by this Act.

Mr. CRAIG. I wish to say a word or two before the committee votes upon this clause of the Bill. Unfortunately, I was not able to be present on Saturday and listen to the discussion on this Bill. Like some other members, I had to be away, and I was very much gratified that my absence from the House on Saturday was mentioned in to-day's "Globe," along with the absence of some other gentlemen. It was stated that my absence was equivalent to voting for the Bill. I think that was hardly a fair reflection on my absence, because I was compelled to be absent ; and I may say also that my hon. friend sitting behind me, the hon. member for Lennox (Mr. Wilson), had to be absent on Saturday owing to serious illness in his family. I notice that the criticism was rather one-sided, because all the members mentioned as being absent belonged to this side of the House. But the hon. leader of the Opposition was also absent on Saturday, as I see in the paper that he was in Toronto on important business. I think, therefore, it is only right that his name should be coupled with ours. It is hardly fair to give the benefit of this free advertisement to Conservative members only, and deprive hon. gentlemen opposite of the same advantage. Now, I only rise to say a word on this question, because it happens that I am paired with an hon. gentleman who will not be here until to-morrow ; I rise to state how I would vote. I may say that after listening to the discussion to-night, and after reading up the "Hansard" of the previous discussion, I would vote for the amendment of the member for Simcoe. I think if that amendment were passed, it would improve the Bill and would simplify it.

Amendment (Mr. McCarthy) negatived.

On section 4, subsection (b),

Mr. McCARTHY. This is a clause which requires to be discussed, as it differs in many respects from the principle of the clause we have just been dealing with. I do not know how we are to proceed here, unless there is some member of the Government having charge of the Bill who can set us right upon a matter of detail. If I understand this clause, it is to some extent a new one. It is not one which has been ordered by the Remedial Bill. The clause as it originally stood, so far as my information goes, was as follows :—

> To arrange the proper examination, grading and licensing of its teachers, the recognition of certificates obtained elsewhere, and for withdrawing licenses upon sufficient cause.

Now, the committee will observe that the first three lines of this paragraph are the same as the old law, and all after that is new, namely :

> Provided that the standard of qualification for teachers shall be in secular matters the same as that at any time prescribed for teachers of other schools of a public character established under the statutes of the province of Manitoba. Provided further, that all teachers' certificates issued by or under the authority of the Department of Education shall be recognized by the Board of Education.

These words are all new. On what principle are we asked to pass this clause ? We have been told so far that there is no power resting with the Government to go beyond the remedial order ; but we are now going far away from the remedial order, and far beyond its terms.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) We have here two different points raised which should be answered. One is a question of policy simply, shall we prescribe that the separate school board shall carry out the examination and grading of teachers ; shall there be, in point of fact, a dual system established in Manitoba in that regard ? I hope something will be said from the Government benches on that point. Next we have a legal point, on which we want an explanation. I have heard from the hon. Minister in charge of the Bill that he does not defend the policy of some of the clauses, except on the ground that they were in the old Act, and the hon. gentleman thinks they should be restored by the new Act. If the ground is taken that the Government are not asking the passage of clauses for their intrinsic merit, but only as part of the old school law, then they must drop the latter part of the section, because thereby they are setting up a different standard from the old school law, and are importing conditions and limitations which were not embodied in the old law. Therefore, this change must be recommended on the ground of policy, or the Government must abandon the position taken before, that they adopted some sections only becaue they followed the lines of the old school law. Whatever line the Government may take, they should make some explanations to the committee.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think the hon. member for Queen's has hardly fairly stated the position taken by the Minister of Justice this afternoon. The hon. Minister's argument seemed to cover the principle suggested as well as the point immediately under consideration, because he did not say that we were following the old Act, but he distinctly stated to the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), that he was not using that argument, but that it was an additional point to whatever else might be said for the Bill when the language happened to follow the provisions that obtained under the law previous to 1890. As an argument, I agreed fully with it, and I endeavoured briefly to say so, that we are not confined by any means to the exact language of those statutes, but that in carrying out the main principles of remedial legislation and in enacting the principles outlined in the remedial order, we must be considered to have plenary power and jurisdiction here to make such reasonable provision as would effectually carry out the object of the legislation. I think it is a fair matter for discussion as to whether we are adopting unreasonable provisions for making the legislation efficient. Sub-section "b" of clause 4, so far as it departs from the language of the old statute bears on its face its vindication. The object of the words that are not found in the old section is to meet much of the criticism that has been directed against the old law; and the position of the Government long ago was that when we came to pass remedial legislation, the object of the Government would be not to impose on Manitoba an inefficient system, but a system equally efficient with the public school system. We cannot adopt all the arrangements or machinery, but this additional legislation, whether it accomplishes its purpose or not, is intended to safeguard and protect those who are to have the benefit of the schools intended to be established under the provisions of this Bill. I am safe in saying that that was the explanation made by the Minister of Justice this afternoon.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). But you provide that teachers already having certificates from the provincial authorities shall not require to be examined.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Then you recognize the provincial board of examiners.

Mr. McCARTHY. I was endeavouring to elicit the policy of hon. gentlemen with respect to the constitutional rules of the House. I certainly gathered from what has been argued by the Government that we were to implement the remedial order. It was pressed on us on Saturday that the policy was to restore not merely their rights, but to give back to the minority the management and every detail, and it was very strongly argued by the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) as well as by an hon. Minister, that the right to manage is one of those rights. It is perfectly plain if that is so, that this board is not to have unlimited control in the management of the schools so far as granting certificates is concerned. Before 1890, the board arranged for the examination, grading and licensing of teachers. It was absolutely uncontrolled so far as its authority in that respect was concerned. Here is a proviso which limits the whole authority of the board. It stipulates what the standard shall be, and it goes on to provide that teachers certificated by provincial authorities are to be recognized by the board. How can the Government reconcile that position with the one they have formerly taken ? If it is right to establish this board, against which we have so earnestly protested, why does the Government throw a slur on the board, and say that the board must accept a standard and recognize a body as regards granting certificates, although not thought fit to be entrusted with the general administration of the law. How can the Government reconcile those contradictory provisions. In section 3 we recognize the Department of Education, in section 4, sub-section "a," we ignore the advisory board, but in sub-section "b," we again recognize the advisory board because it grants teachers' certificates which are imperatively to be recognized by the new board. Now, a word as to the policy of the matter. The hon. member for Pictou says the object was to attain efficiency. Of course, that is predicated upon the assumption that prior to that there was inefficiency, and that has never been denied in this House or out of it. I say so in the hearing of the hon. member who intimated that he was not going to be the new inspector.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. For the information of the hon. member, I deny that the schools were inefficient.

Mr. McCARTHY. That is the first time I have heard that statement made. I defy the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) to say that the object can be attained by this clause. Will the hon. gentleman point out, how it is proposed, that by a board which admittedly would not do its duty in that regard unless we imposed it upon them ; who will therefore seek to evade the duty of having qualified teachers ; how it is proposed by this section to enforce the qualification of a teacher, which after all is most essential. I would be glad if the hon. member would answer me.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I shall be glad to answer it so far as I can at the moment. The hon. member (Mr. McCarthy), of course, approaches this question from a different standpoint from my own. First of all, we have to deal with the facts as we find them. Every effort has been made, to put under the Department of Education with fair conditions, the regulations and administration of a system that will do justice to the minority. All efforts in that direction have failed. We have no reason to believe that the Department of Education, a government body, are in the slightest degree friendly to this system. On the contrary, we have positive evidence from the government of Manitoba that they are hostile to the principle of this Bill, and to every feature of it. The hon. gentleman speaks slightingly of this Board of Education which is to be, and whether his idea will be borne out in the future remains to be seen. But, it seems to me, that we in this Parliament, dealing with this measure, are perforce driven to the conclusion that that board will do its duty as effectively in regard to the subjects within this Bill, as the Department of Education does its duty in connection with the subjects that fall under it. We have not been able to obtain their co-operation, but we now attempt to clothe the board with all these powers, and it is due to them to suppose that they will administer this law in a proper spirit. And, having the duty to see that the standerd of qualification is of a certain character, they will take the means, which they have ample opportunity of doing under the provisions of the Bill, to see that these qualifications are possessed by the teachers.

Mr. McCARTHY. Would the hon. gentleman say to what he refers ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER :

> Provided that the standard of qualification for teachers shall be in secular matters the same as at any time prescribed for teachers of other schools of a public character.

The hon. gentleman's argument is, that the board may not do its duty, and he in effect says that there may be fraud in all this. Speaking at the moment, I consider that we are largely at the mercy of that board in reference to the administration of this Act. There are some checks, but in regard to this question, everything depends on that board showing good faith ; just as the public of Manitoba are at the mercy of the Department of Education in regard to their taking the proper steps to see that properly qualified persons have certificates.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell) :

> Provided that the standard of qualification for teachers shall be in secular matters the same as that prescribed for teachers of other schools of a public character established under the statutes of the province of Manitoba.

Which no doubt contemplates examination on religious as well as on secular subjects.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman probably understands as well as I do why that word is there.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Yes, but the hon. gentleman will see that it says again :

> Provided further, that all teachers' certificates issued by the Department of Education shall be recognized by the Board of Education.

So that all those teachers who receive certificates from the Board of Education would not be required to be examined in religious subjects to qualify for teaching in the separate schools ; whereas, those who appear before the separate school board may be so required. I could understand the clause if it were to confine the examination by this board to religious subjects, and to accept the certificate in the others.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think the hon. gentleman is pressing the point rather unnecessarily.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. While these certificates will be accepted so far as they go, the board are not obliged to employ every gentleman who presents a certificate from the Department of Education.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). You do not recognize them.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Certainly to the extent to which they go. As I said before, the certificate of the Department of Education will be sufficient so far as the educational qualifications of the person is concerned, but, reading the whole section together, the board are in no sense obliged to appoint every gentleman producing that certificate. If other qualifications are required by them for religious instruction, that is a matter for them to settle in regard to the candidate.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I simply want to know what is in the mind of the Government.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I do not know what is in their mind, but I speak my own.

Mr. McCARTHY. Surely there ought to be some one here to represent the Government.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The school trustees, and not the board employ the teachers, and the trustees are forced to employ parties having provincial certificates. Why should there be a board to qualify persons with regard to secular matters at all, and yet this board's duties are not limited to further examination of those who are qualified. There must be some reason for this provision standing in this form. I am anxious to discover what it is.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Of course, I am not speaking for the Government, but, reading that clause and recognizing what has been said in public discussion and the history of the operation of the old Acts, I think the reason for the distinction there is that, in connection with some of the religious bodies in Manitoba, to whom the minority must appeal for assistance, and even charitable assistance, it would be impossible for a teacher to obtain a certificate under the rules of the general School Act. To submit themselves to a public examination would be impossible—not that they are in any sense deficient, but owing to the rules of some of those religious denominations ; whereas, by the machinery provided by this Bill, the board could be satisfied of those qualifications existing.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). By an examination only.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Certainly, by an examination, but not a public examination outside of the orders that exist there. That is my idea of this provision.

Mr. LAURIER. I do no question the motive ; it may be all good ; but it is evident that, in the terms of the section, there is an anomaly which, to a large extent, defeats the object of the Bill. The first portion of the section contemplates that the teaching in the schools shall be conducted by men who in secular matters shall be equally competent with the teachers of the public schools, and at the same time competent to teach the tenets of the Roman Catholic Church. It says :

> To arrange for the proper examination, grading and licensing of its teachers, and for the withdrawing of licenses upon sufficient cause ; provided that the standard of qualification for teachers shall be in secular matters the same as that at any time prescribed for teachers of other schools of a public character established under the statutes of the province of Manitoba.

There is no statement here that the teacher who is to qualify for teaching in the separate schools shall be examined in religious subjects ; but that is implied, because in secular matters it is provided that he shall have the same competence as teachers of public schools. Therefore, in other matters he must have an examination. What are those other matters ? Religious matters—the doctrines of the Roman Catholic Church. So that I understand that a teacher to be qualified must have passed an examination in both religious and secular matters. It is further provided :

> That all teachers certificates issued by or under the authority of the Department of Education shall be recognized by the Board of Education.

What does this mean ? It means that a teacher who has a certificate to teach in the common schools, must be accepted by the Board of Education, without further examination, as qualified to teach in the separate schools. In other words, a man who is perfectly competent to teach in secular matters, but not competent to teach in religious matters, may be engaged to teach in the separate schools. Surely this is not contemplated. Immediately before you have provided that a teacher, to teach in separate schools, must be competent both in secular and in religious matters. Surely, the latter provision defeats the first part of the clause. There is an anomaly here which cannot have been the intention of the draftsman of the Bill, whoever he was.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Supposing a teacher is licensed by the Department of Education, is it intended that this board shall have the power to withdraw his license from him ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Clearly not, so far as the license is to teach in the public schools. But they could withdraw his right to teach in their schools. Clearly, under the first three lines of this clause, the Board of Education may make regulations in regard to the holders of departmental licenses ; and may also, for proper cause, and under circumstances which existed when this power was exercised before, withdraw the liberty to teach in the schools constituted under this Bill.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). If teachers licensed by the Department of Education were required to have a further examination on the subject of religion and dogma of the Catholic Church, before being qualified as separate school teachers, the withdrawal of the special license in respect to religion would disqualify them from teaching in those schools ; but they do not require any such license to qualify them to teach. I do not see how they are to be touched by this provision for the withdrawing of the license upon sufficient cause. Suppose a man were to be turned out for intoxication, and the Department of Education did not choose to withdraw his license, it seems to me that, under this clause, he would nevertheless be qualified to teach in any school.

Mr. CRAIG. While there may be some point in the objection raised by the hon. member for North Simcoe that the standard set up by the examiners appointed by the separate school board and those appointed by the public school board might not be the same, I do not know that that objection would have a great deal of force, after all, because the board itself is to be appointed by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council or by the Governor in Council. We must assume that they will appoint a proper board; we have no right, on the face of it, to assume anything else. We might raise the same objection to the examiners appointed under the Public School Board. I do not suppose the examiners are the same every year. I know that some examiners are a great deal easier to pass than other examiners, because some have not so high a standard as others. Therefore, I do not attach much importance to that objection. With respect to the other matters, a great deal of stress is laid on the last clause : “Provided further, that all teachers' certificates issued by or under the authority of the Department of Education, shall be recognized by the Board of Education.” Now, it has been said that if this proviso remains here, the trustees who have the formal engagement of the teachers would have the power to engage teachers not properly qualified. I deny that. I hold that the trustees of these separate schools would not have the power to engage any teachers except those who were licensed by the separate school board. The Bill says : Provided further, that all teachers' certificates issued by or under the authority of the Department of Education, shall be recognized by the Board of Education.” What are these certificates for ? We notice, first of all, that the standard of qualification for teachers shall be, in secular matters, the same as that at any time prescribed for teachers of other schools of a public character, established under the statutes of the province of Manitoba. I take it, these certificates only relate to secular matters, and not to religious matters, which are part of the qualification of these teachers in separate schools.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No, the Act is not as you state it.

Mr. CRAIG. It says : All teachers' certificates issued by or under the authority of the Department of Education, shall be recognized by the Board of Education. What do those certificates certify to ? To a certain amount of secular knowledge.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). They certify that he is entitled to teach, and the Board of Education is bound to accept them.

Mr. CRAIG. I hold that this certificate only certifies that he is entitled to teach in a public school. If a teacher has a certificate from this Department of Education, then he need not pass the examination of the separate school board.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). He need not pass it.

Mr. CRAIG. I go further. While the separate school board has to recognize that he has passed this examination, and need not pass its examination in secular matters, it is not obliged to give him a license until he has passed an examination in religious matters.

Mr. O'BRIEN. The further we go with this Bill, the more incongruities and inconsistencies we discover, and I am not so much surprised that the hon. Minister of Justice should have taken an opportunity to absent himself and leave this House utterly in the dark. It seems to me that the real object of this last portion of the clause is simply a blind. It is intended to make the public believe that the separate school teachers are to have a certain qualification which they need not have. What is the use of telling us that the Board of Education must recognize the certificates of the Department of Education, when it is not compelled to employ the teachers having those certificates, and when it will not employ them. The teachers who practically will be employed will not have that qualification, and the clause will be just as effective without these words.

Mr. McCARTHY. I think my hon. friend from East Durham (Mr. Craig) has been rather hasty in coming to the conclusion that he would vote for this clause. No doubt, he desires that the teachers should be efficient. If he does, he ought to take some practical means of accomplishing that end. Will he tell us why it is we did not leave the matter as it was in the old Act ? The Manitoba Act stopped there, at the end of the second line and half of the third. All the rest is new. The Manitoba Act reads : "To arrange for the proper examination, grading and licensing of its teachers, and for the withdrawal of licenses upon sufficient cause." That is exactly the same as the first part of this section. Why were these words added ? They were added unquestionably because, as has been proved conclusively, the teachers employed in the separate schools were absolutely inefficient and uneducated, and this is an effort made to show that, under the separate schools to be established, they shall be efficient. That is all.

Mr. FOSTER. If your premise is granted, will you object ?

Mr. McCARTHY. I do not object. I want to make it efficient, and if the hon. gentleman is sincere, I hope he will vote for making it efficient. There is no use in putting in a sham. What do you do ? You place confidence in the advisory board because you direct that the standard of qualification shall be that adopted by it. If you are going to have confidence in your new board, why not leave that to it. You have not confidence in it, you know it will not do better now than it did before 1890. You say the Lieutenant-Governor will appoint better members of the board. Look at those he appointed before, from the Archbishop at the head and the distinguished members of the church. Can you improve on those ? And what is the result ? It is that you recognize the advisory board as, at all events, laying down a proper standard, and you are not willing to trust the board you are creating. If you are willing to trust the advisory board in regulating that standard, why not trust it the whole way ? Why do you say you will recognize their teachers' certificates, but you will not allow them to do the whole of the secular work ? Will any one say there is any consistency in that ? Surely, if we want to attain efficiency, a reasonable proposition would be to let the secular examination be made by the advisory board, the religious examination to be made by this board. You will have a uniform system and the secular examination will be as efficient for the separate schools as for the others. Teachers must have passed the secular examination, but it would not be according to law to employ them until they had got a license from this board after satisfying them as to their religious qualifications. I ask the hon. Minister if that does not secure efficiency. He has asked me a moment ago if I objected to it. I do not object to it. I want to secure efficiency, but in some reasonable way. If the hon. Minister will look at the examinations in Mr. Wade's book, which no doubt he has seen, he will find the case illustrated. In appendix (a), is an examination for the Catholic schools and for the others. And you will at once recognize that, although both sections have equal authority and an equal share in proportion to numbers of the public funds, in the one case there was efficiency and in the other there was no attempt to provide for the education of the teachers, or to see to the education of the children. We are not accomplishing what we are attempting to do. The hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) candidly stated that we could not do more than we were trying to do, that is to say in the clumsy way we have been trying to secure efficiency. But there is a simple, easy way to secure it which I trust the Government will even yet adopt.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do submit to the leader of the House whether it is quite seemly that the House should be asked to pass these important paragraphs in the Bill without some explanations from the legal advisers of the Government. The hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) has given his opinion, but he does not pretend to speak for the Government. The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Daly) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Dickey), are not here, and some very grave points arise as to our powers and whether we are exercising them properly. In the first place we all agree that we can only legislate within the lines of the remedial order. I would like to ask the Minister of Justice, if he were here, upon what part of the remedial order he relies as clothing us with the authority to legislate according to this section at all. I have read the remedial order and I cannot find it.

Mr. McCARTHY. Nor can anybody else.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) How are we to know——

Mr. HUGHES. Common sense.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Perhaps the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes) will bring his common sense to bear.

Mr. HUGHES. I do not wish to obstruct.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Rumour credits the hon. gentleman with a strong desire to obstruct. It is said he voted against the Bill being read a second time.

Mr. HUGHES. The House has decided that, so let us get on and get some other business done.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman professed not to want it passed and now he favours the passing of it. Surely he does not wish to pose as Mr. Facing-both-ways. But I wish to call the attention of the committee seriously to this point. It is all nonsense our passing this unless we are satisfied we have the power to do so. We do not want to play at legislating here, I suppose. We are establishing a new board with certain powers, among them that of examination, grading and licensing of its teachers. Where do we get that authority within the lines of the remedial order. I find that it claims for the minority:

I do not find that the licensing of teachers can, by any kind of construction, be covered by any of these words.

Mr. WOOD. "Manage."

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does the hon. gentleman think it would come under that?

Mr. WOOD. You could put a wide interpretation upon it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not think with the widest interpretation the hon. gentleman can force it so far as that. There may be an answer to that point, and I do not want to labour it. But coming down to the other point we were discussing. Passing from the question of our power to act and dealing with the question of policy whether we should act in the way proposed, we are declaring that licensed teachers shall be accepted by this new board. You do not examine them in secular or religious matters; you simply endorse their certificates. But you take other people who cannot pass and who have not passed or obtained teachers' licenses under the advisory board's regulations, you take these and examine them, in secular and, I presume, in religious matters, although it does not say so explicitly. Why is it that you examine some men in religious matters and do not examine others? It seems to me that the only solution of the problem, if you determine that your powers go so far, is to adopt the suggestion made that this board shall examine duly qualified teachers on religious subjects, and, if found qualified, give them certificates.

Mr. WOOD. The hon. gentleman questions first the legal right of Parliament to pass legislation outside of what he terms the limits of the remedial order, and in the second place, he touches upon the matter of policy brought up by my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). Now, as to the first question, whether our authority is wide enough to cover the examination, licensing and grading of teachers, I refer to the argument used ever since the beginning of the debate on this Bill, and that is, that once the government of Manitoba has declined to interfere, plenary power devolves upon this Parliament. There is very much to be argued from a position of that kind, such as my hon. friend from Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) has taken.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) has not taken that.

Mr. WOOD. If he has not, others upon this side have.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does the hon. gentleman take it?

Mr. WOOD. I do say that very much can be argued from that. While we must all admit that plenary jurisdiction does rest with the provincial parliament, once they refuse to act, then we, having become seized with power to legislate and to remedy admitted grievances, have plenary jurisdiction to supply those defects.

Mr. McCARTHY. Where do you get the plenary jurisdiction?

Mr. WOOD. We get it once the government of Manitoba refuses to regard the remedial order. I say we get the jurisdiction here when there is a refusal on the part of Manitoba to legislate, having been requested to do so. I do not think any hon. member upon either side of the House will question that statement. I say we have plenary jurisdiction, and, once having been seized with the subject-matter of legislation here, we have power to make it effective. Now, with regard to the question of policy, I am unable to understand why the member for North Simcoe would find fault with the proviso here, because it certainly does tend to make the schools more efficient.

Mr. McCARTHY. I suggest an alternative which is more efficient.

Mr. WOOD. And that alternative is that we should do away with the Board of Education we create.

Mr. McCARTHY. No.

Mr. WOOD. Well, if you trust entirely to the certificates——

Mr. McCARTHY. In secular matters.

Mr. WOOD. We have nothing to do with the certificates of our own board, in other words we drop them.

Mr. McCARTHY. What I propose is that they should pass an examination before the advisory board, and get certificates as the teachers in the other public schools do; and pass an additional examination in religious subjects before this board.

Mr. WOOD. You would exclude this board from all power of examining in secular subjects ?

Mr. McCARTHY. Exactly.

Mr. WOOD. My opinion as to the true meaning of that proviso is that once this Bill becomes law, if it ever does become law this session.——

Mr McCARTHY. It is very questionable.

Mr. WOOD. But it is quite possible it will become law during this session of Parliament, and once it becomes law and comes into operation in the province of Manitoba, then I could understand there would not be at first competent teachers. Teachers with certificates would not be obtainable at once for the purpose of teaching in these schools. Now, the proviso says :

> Provided, further, that all teachers' certificates issued by or under the authority of the Department of Education, shall be recognized by the Board of Education.

These men, if you like, might waive the examination on religious subjects. Now, I submit to the understanding of every reasonable man in this House, that it would be quite competent for the separate school board of any section, under the authority of this section, to say : We must recognize this as being a perfectly legal certificate, therefore we will engage this teacher ; and although he may not, perhaps, be fully competent to undergo the test of a religious examination, that is our matter so far as it goes. But at all events, by means of this proviso, we may be able to obtain a teacher who holds a certificate on a standard of examination equal to that which prevails in Manitoba in other respects.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think the hon. gentleman's views, even though they may have been carefully thought out, are of less authority than the opinions expressed during the argument by Lord Watson on this very subject. He said with regard to our powers :

> The power of Parliament is simply to correct something that has been wrongly done ; not to legislate themselves upon the subject one hair's-breadth further than to set right what has been wrongly done.

The hon. gentleman will see that he proposes to go a good deal further than that. What are the rights of the local legislature ? They have exclusive jurisdiction over all these matters that are of common concern. There is no difference between separate schools and the other public schools. What are these people petitioning for ? What have they appealed to the Governor in Council for ? What are we called upon to legislate for ? To put them in the position of the public schools again, to restore them to the position as provincial institutions entitled to public aid, that they occupied before. Now, in order that they may get that aid, they will require to have provincial certificates. The advisory board are the authorities, under the provincial statute, to examine persons so far as their secular attainments are concerned, and to license them. They do not license them for any particular section, but they give them a license to teach. Well, under that, they may be employed in separate schools as well as in any others. They possess the necessary qualifications. The local government cannot say : We will not give you public aid because you are not a properly qualified teacher. But the local government could legally say : Even though you had the authority to compel them to contribute their proportional taxation to these schools, they could say : These persons are not qualified in accordance with the provincial law ; we do not know their qualifications, we do not know the institutions from which they derive their certificates. Then why do you create difficulties and provide for law suits in this matter when it is altogether unnecessary. All you need to do is to provide for a board to examine these parties, if the minority require them to be examined, as to their qualifications to give the necessary religious instruction that they would be entitled to give if they saw proper, and to give it by persons efficient in that as they are efficient in secular matters. But with regard to those secular matters, surely it is the business of the local legislature to decide what the qualification will be, and by whom that qualification shall be ascertained. Now, you propose to create another body. You do not alter the qualification, you admit that it is a proper standard, you admit their superiority over your own opportunity for forming a judgment, by saying that the qualifications they fix shall be the qualification. Having done that, why undertake to create a second board to do that which the one board can certainly discharge ? It seems to me that the Government are simply putting it in the power of the local legislature and Government to say : These people have not the qualification that our law requires, and you have no right to call upon us to contribute anything from the public revenue to aid these institutions. They are not taught by persons properly qualified. That, I say, is unnecessary, it is creating a ground for litigation, it is creating a ground for antagonism where an excuse ought not to be given, and where you are going beyond that which you are called upon to do.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) One or two words with reference to the argument advanced by the Controller. I did not believe there was any one in the House who entertained the view of the constitution that he has advanced to-night. Perhaps I misunderstood him, but I gathered that his idea was that the moment Manitoba withdrew from the minority a right or privilege which they possessed under any post-union legislation, that moment the jurisdiction and the plenary power to legislate in the matter transferred to us.

Mr. WOOD. I did not say anything of the kind. I said that after Manitoba had refused to legislate upon the subject at all, it opened up a door for legislation to be introduced into this Parliament. This Parliament having become seized of the subject itself, I said, then, that we did have, if not plenary power, at all events, sufficient power to enable us to enforce the subject-matter we were dealing with.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I understand the hon. gentleman to mean, not that any power is transferred to us from the mere fact of their withdrawing it in the first instance, but after an appeal has been taken, a remedial order made, and after they have refused to obey the remedial order, then, I understand the hon. gentleman to say that the jurisdiction attaches to us. The hon. gentleman said also that plenary power attaches to us.

Mr. WOOD. In as much and in so far as would enable us to make effectual, within reasonable limits, the legislation on the subject-matter we have on hand. I might add, on the lines of the remedial order. They both go together.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I understood the hon. gentleman to concede that our power to act is limited by the terms of the remedial order.

Mr. WOOD. They are limited by the terms of the remedial order generally, but I still maintain we have some plenary power to make effective the legislation we have here. What would be the use of our simply saying so and so shall be the case, when we know that Manitoba will not put forth a single effort to enforce it ?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It is not a point as to whether it is policy for us to go thus far or not. The point I am canvassing is a legal one. The hon. Controller, for whose legal opinion I have the very highest respect, acknowledges that until a remedial order is passed, we have no power, and it is not until the remedial order has been passed and there has been a refusal on the part of Manitoba to obey it, that we obtain power. The hon. gentleman acknowledges that, if Manitoba obeys the remedial order in terms, we have no jurisdiction. There must be a remedial order passed, a refusal on the part of Manitoba to obey, in whole or in part, before any jurisdiction attaches to us, and just to the extent of the refusal to obey does the jurisdiction attach to us. But this proposed legislation goes beyond the terms of the remedial order. It is no use to say that in some way this Parliament has plenary jurisdiction beyond that. It is only playing like children for the committee to go one step beyond what we know is the limitation of our power. The limitation of our power is contained in the remedial order. If hon. gentlemen opposite can show me one word, or one line, in that order giving this Parliament power to enact subsection "b," section 4, I should like them to show it. If not, let the hon. gentlemen opposite withdraw it, and do not go to the farce of adopting the subsection. We have not present the Minister of Justice or the hon. gentleman in charge of the Bill. This committee, composed, as it is, of respectable lawyers and men of commercial standing and common sense, are entitled to be advised on matters of this kind, where the legal talent present come to a conclusion adverse to the constitutionality of the clause. Surely, we have the right to be advised by some legal authority on the part of the Government. An hon. gentleman laughs, but there is the greatest possible doubt on this point, and even such distinguished lawyer as the Controller of Customs will not commit himself to the position that there is a line in the remedial order which justifies this position. If that is the case, what are we doing ? The hon. gentleman insinuates that there may be some plenary power, but he knows there is nothing in that point. The committee ought to be instructed and advised by legal authorities.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think the hon. gentleman is quite right in his conclusion, if his premises are correct, if the Controller, speaking for the Government, is in grave doubt as to whether we have jurisdiction to pass this part of the proposed legislation. But I certainly did not understand the Controller to throw the slightest doubt upon it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I asked the Controller to give the line or any part of the remedial order which he thought gave Parliament the right to pass this subsection, and he could not do it. He spoke of some plenary powers we possessed.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I was going to move an amendment which would put the matter on a better footing, but when we find the ex-Minister of Justice and the Controller of Customs expressing different legal opinions on a matter of so much importance, I think a proper motion would be that the committee rise.

Mr. MULOCK. Let us go on with the Bill.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Then I move :

That subsection "b" of section 4 be struck out, and the following be substituted :—

"b." The provisions in the Education Department Act of Manitoba as to the qualification and examination of teachers and the granting and cancellation of their certificates in force, or which may hereafter be in force, in the province of Manitoba shall apply to the teachers in the > separate schools established or authorized by this Act; provided always that the teachers who obtain certificates thereunder shall before being eligible to teach in separate schools be required to pass an examination in such religious subjects as the Separate School Board of Education may prescribe.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. What part of the remedial order authorizes the hon. gentleman to propose that amendment?

Mr. O'BRIEN. We are dealing with the Bill brought in by the Government, which is clearly not within the scope of the remedial order, and we are justified in endeavouring to improve it and make it a practical measure. We are not as much anxious in regard to the remedial order as are the hon. gentlemen who are bringing in this legislation.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman should have adopted that reasoning a moment ago. Members of the Government were satisfied, and therefore the committee should have been satisfied.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) One was a question of legality, and the other was one of policy.

Mr. O'BRIEN. We admit that the Bill is illegal, but we are endeavouring to improve it. We wish to ensure that the teachers in the separate schools shall be properly qualified for their duties, and shall possess the same qualifications as teachers in the common schools, but also that the teachers of separate schools shall be granted certificates in regard to religious knowledge. When a man comes before them with a proper certificate as to his secular knowledge, let him pass an examination with regard to his power to give the necessary religious instruction. Undoubtedly the state should get some benefit for the grant which this presumes it is to make. That is the amendment, and it should be accepted, and it will relieve the Government from the responsibility for the ambiguity of these clauses.

Mr. FREMONT. I believe that paragraph (b), which we are now discussing is quite within the scope of the remedial order. That part of the remedial order which the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) has cited, reads as follows:—

> The right to build, maintain, equip, manage, conduct and support Roman Catholic schools, in the manner provided for by the said statutes which were repealed by the two Acts of 1890, aforesaid.

When the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) cited this paragraph, he omitted the last words, which are very important, namely:

> In the manner provided for by the said statutes which were repealed by the two Acts of 1890, aforesaid.

Therefore, the remedial order instructs the government of Manitoba to enact provisions similar to these which were in force previous to 1890. If we refer to the Act which existed previous to 1890, 44 Vic., chap. 4, Manitoba statutes, we read, in section 5:

> The board shall resolve itself into two sections, the one consisting of the Protestant and the other of the Roman Catholic members thereof, and it shall be the duty of each section:
> (b.) To arrange for the proper examination, grading and licensing of its teachers; the recognition of all certificates obtained elsewhere, and for the withdrawing of the licenses upon sufficient cause.

This clause (b), which I have read, corresponds exactly with paragraph (b) which is now under consideration.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) No.

Mr. FREMONT. It is exactly the same thing. Paragraph (b) of the Bill under consideration provides for the proper examination of the teachers, and for the recognition of certificates obtained elsewhere, that is to say, the certificates obtained from the Department of Education. It also provides for the withdrawal of licenses upon sufficient cause. For these reasons, I think that the clause is altogether within the scope of the remedial order, and I do not see very much force in the argument of the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies).

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman from Quebec (Mr. Fremont) will see that the words do not extend the meaning of the controlling words of the section. The controlling words of the section give you power to build, maintain, &c., the schools.

Mr. FREMONT. Not only "build and maintain," but "conduct."

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The addition of the words does not extend their meaning beyond their normal meaning. The hon. gentleman will see that omission of the words by me in reading the clause does not affect my argument in the slightest. If there are limitations to the old Act, you incorporate them by the use of these words here, and by the use of the words "in manner provided by the said statutes," you do not enlarge the meaning of the words "build or maintain."

Mr. FREMONT. "Conduct and support."

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not intend to detain the committee, but I can hardly understand a motion of this kind coming from the source which it does. The hon. gentleman from Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) seems to be anxious to be more Catholic than the Pope. This clause provides further: That all teachers' certificates issued by or under the authority of the Department of Education shall be recognized by the Board of Education. It enables a Protestant who has a certificate granted by the Department of Education to be employed as a separate school teacher, if the parties who have the right to employ the teachers so wished, and the amendment moved by the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) absolutely prevents any Protestant—however desirous the authorities in a separate school might be to have a Protestant teacher for any reason—it prevents the trustees from employing him, and compels them to confine themselves to Roman Catholic teachers. I could understand such a motion coming from some person who says: You are giving too great latitude here; you are making it possible to have a Protestant employed. But I cannot understand it coming from the source which it does, except for this reason, sir, that hon. gentlemen in this House who have taken the ground from the first that they will prevent this Bill from becoming law, will make any motion, and will urge any point that they think is calculated to mar and destroy and disfigure this Bill. It is the source from which these propositions come that induces me to look upon them with a great deal of suspicion. There are two objects. One is the wasting of the time of the House.

Mr. WALLACE. Order——

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am perfectly in order: because we have had the intention boldly avowed from the source from which these amendments come, and the House has had ample opportunity to learn that a small, comparatively insignificant section of this House has undertaken to prevent this Bill from becoming law. If there were no other reason to look with suspicion upon these amendments, we must remember that they come from parties who are not anxious to make this Bill a workable Bill, but who are anxious to prevent it from becoming law at all.

Mr. MULOCK. It is extremely unfortunate that the leader of the House should address himself to the committee in this manner. We have been proceeding to-day in a way that cannot be taken exception to by any person who is a fair judge of the motives of the various members. I believe that the discussion up to this moment has been perfectly relevant. There is no clause in the whole Bill so important as this section 4. Some of the clauses are mere matters of form, and will only take as much time to pass as is involved in their reading. But this clause involves a careful examination of the provisions of the remedial order, to see whether we are framing a workable and legal Bill; and I am sure that if the Secretary of State had been in attendance during the hours that this committee has been considering this measure, and had really informed himself of the drift of the arguments, he would not have expressed himself in the way he has done. I would be sorry to misjudge his object; but it occurred to me that he rather feared that we were likely to make progress to-night, and therefore he threw in an apple of discord to disturb the harmony of the committee, lest we should do so. If he were replied to in the way his declamation invited, it would certainly have the effect of interrupting the pleasant course of the debate. I hope he will avoid such disturbing expressions, and allow the committee to proceed with the work it has in hand. He must be aware that we have but a few days in which to legislate.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. MULOCK. I speak, Sir, in all seriousness. There is no time to be wasted; and, while some members of this House may perhaps not feel as responsible as the Government, and may therefore not be so blamable if they do go into irrelevant discussion, I submit that the Secretary of State is the last one who is justified in diverting the attention of the House from the subject-matter that is now engaging its attention; and unless he can bring a more peaceable disposition, to bear, I hope he will continue, as heretofore, to confine his attention to that room where he obtains so much personal comfort and relaxation from the duties devolving upon the members of this committee. If he will have the goodness not to import acrimonious matter into this debate, but will allow the committee to proceed, I venture to say that more substantial progress will be made. Now, there are two lights in which this clause is to be considered. One is the legal, and the other is that which appeals to our discretion. First, it must be made clear that the provisions of the clause are within the scope of the remedial order. Our power is limited by that order. This Parliament has no jurisdiction until Manitoba has made default in complying with the demand of this Government. Now, what part of the remedial order calls upon Manitoba to establish a Board of Education, to examine teachers, and to issue certificates of qualification to teachers for the separate schools? Is it the clause which says to build, to maintain, equip, manage, conduct and support those schools? I am unable to think that any of these words have to do with the qualifications of teachers. I think the Controller of Customs depends on the words "to manage.' But that means to carry on a school after it is in full working order, having buildings and teachers. You cannot manage a school until it is a going concern. So that the remedial order did not ask the legislature of Manitoba to provide for the qualification of teachers, and, therefore, no jurisdiction on that subject accrues to us. But passing that point, the question now is, what is wise for us to do? This section provides that the standard of qualification required of separate school teachers shall be the same as that required of public school teachers. Merely to set up an abstract standard accomplishes nothing; it is the living up to the standard that is the real point. If the standard is to be the same for both classes of teachers, why have two systems of examinations? It is an unnecessary piece of expense to provide a duplicate system for doing the same work.

Mr. FREMONT. There were two separate examinations formerly.

Mr. MULOCK. I am aware that there were formerly two examinations. Under that system the board was a creature of the statutes. It disappeared with the statute, and hon. gentlemen are now making the fatal mistake of assuming that a piece of the old board can be treated as still in existence for the purpose of this Act. They are justifying that section of this Bill which creates a new board for separate school education, on the ground that it corresponds literally to that section of the old board. Now, I do not think you can under this Bill create a board at all, as you did not call upon the local legislature to create a board. But even if we had jurisdiction, I would ask the Controller of Customs (Mr. Wood) if he would be good enough to answer me, because he has not exausted himself on this measure. If, under this Bill, the same standard of examination in secular matters is to be maintained for separate school teachers as for public school teachers, why should there be two examining boards instead of one?

Mr. WOOD. If the normal school should have regulations by which certificates would only be granted conditional on those obtaining them teaching only in the public schools, that would prevent their being employed by the separate schools, and thus defeat the purposes of the Act.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Are the separate schools not public schools, under this Act?

Mr. WOOD. That is not decided.

Mr. MULOCK. That does not commend itself to me as a reason at all.

Mr. WOOD. I do not think anything I could say would commend itself to you.

Mr. MULOCK. I am really anxious to see what necessity there is for two boards to do exactly the same kind of work. You are simply imposing on the Roman Catholic minority of Manitoba an unnecessary expense by the creation of this new board to do work which is now done by the advisory board. Has there been any desire expressed for this? The petitions do not point to any such desire on the part of the minority. Have the minority, when pressing their views before the Government, in the conference that took place, when Manitoba was summoned to appear, or at any other time, except in the general words of the petition, positively asked for this authority to create a board of examiners? Do they attach any importance to this feature of the Bill, or is it just thrown in by the Government, following the language of the old Act of 1881.

TUESDAY, 7th April, 1896.

Mr. LAURIER. My hon. friend is altogether too inquisitive. He has asked for fair information, but this Bill is to be voted blindly, and the Government are determined not to give any information. Nothing can be fairer than the question put by my hon. friend; and I trust that if the Government desire to make progress, they are not adopting the proper course by refusing to answer questions of this kind. I do not rise to ask a question, for that would be useless, but I want to draw attention to the statement made a moment ago by the hon. Secretary of State, and which, in my opinion, has great bearing, not only on the question before the committee, but on the whole subject. When we began discussing this section, I ventured the opinion that it presented this anomaly, that the teachers of the separate schools have to pass examinations or qualification both in secular and religious matters. They have to satisfy the board of examiners that they are competent to teach secular matters and also competent to give religious tuition. There is another proviso. It is stated that the teachers who are qualified to teach in the public schools shall also be accepted by the Board of Education. That would mean qualified to teach in secular matters, but, as a matter of course it would not follow that they were competent to teach in religious matters. I thought this was the construction. But my hon. friend from East Durham (Mr. Craig) thought I was wrong. I thought it simply meant that, when the teacher has a certificate from the advisory board, he would be competent to be accepted as a secular teacher by the Board of Education, but would have to pass an examination as to his qualification to teach in religious matters.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman says, "hear, hear," approving of that construction. But such was not the construction given a moment ago by the Secretary of State. His construction was that it should be competent—the clause had been specially designed for that—for the trustees of separate schools to engage the services of a Protestant teacher if they saw fit. I want to know if that is the object of the Bill.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, oh.

Mr. LAURIER. Yes; I want to know it. Here is the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. LaRivière) who represents the minority more than the Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster). I would like to know if he is satisfied with that interpretation. If the minority are satisfied, well and good; I have nothing more to say. But what is the object of separate schools under this Bill?

The object is that in every school there should be given, not only secular education, but religious education as well, from the Roman Catholic point of view. If this is the object of the Bill, and this is the principal thing for which the Government pretend to have been fighting all along, why have we this declaration of the Secretary of State who has charge of this Bill, that it is the object of the Bill that a system of schools shall be established in which Roman Catholic teaching shall be given, yet it will be competent for the trustees of such a school where religious teaching is obligatory to appoint a Protestant teacher who will not be competent to give this education.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. He did not say that.

Mr. LAURIER. He said it in so many words, and appealed to the generosity of the committee upon it. He tried to browbeat my hon. friend from Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) for not understanding the liberality of the Government in providing that the trustees might employ Protestant teachers. If it is to be left to the option of trustees of separate schools to employ Protestant teachers, why should they have separate schools at all. This is an anomaly. If it be not an anomoly in the interpretation of the principle of the Bill, I would like to know from the hon. member from Provencher what he thinks of it ?

Mr. LaRIVIERE. If the hon. gentleman had consulted me from the beginning, I would have told him not to move the six months' hoist.

Mr. LAURIER. Perhaps the best argument for moving the six months' hoist has just been given by the hon. gentleman. He will not answer that question, and unless we have another explanation, I must assume that the explanation given by the leader of the House was the right one, that the trustees of separate schools where religious teaching from the Roman Catholic point of view is obligatory may employ a Protestant teacher who is not competent to give that education.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend, if he had any argument in the remarks he addressed to the committee is driven inevitably to one position. Does he take it ? Will he take the position that a clause should be put into this Bill which will render it impossible for Catholic school trustees to employ a Protestant teacher if they wish to do so ?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Most assuredly it should be so.

Mr. FOSTER. That is the point of his argument, and there is no alternative. Is he honest in that or not ? If he is, will he say to this House that he would put a clause of that kind into the Bill. Let me remind the hon. gentleman that Catholic trustees having schools in cities will have schools of more than one department. As very often happens, they may wish to get an expert teacher for some special branch—say mathematics—and they find they can get a Protestant teacher who makes that a specialty. That is not a detriment to the religious teaching which goes on in a school. But my hon. friend takes the illiberal position of prohibiting the Catholic trustees from employing such a teacher.

Mr. LAURIER. I have only this to say,—that if there are to be separate schools in Manitoba in which religious education is to be obligatory, that education must be given by persons who are competent to give it.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. I understand the occasion of this clause is that there are actually a number of Catholic school teachers in Manitoba who have had to qualify under the present existing law, and the object of this clause is to allow these teachers, having certificates from the provincial authorities to come in under the new law and to teach without passing a new examination.

Mr. LAURIER. That is not the interpretation given.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. If you will read it I think that you will find that that is the interpretation. I quite agree in the impropriety of employing a Protestant teacher to teach a Roman Catholic school. At the same time I must say it has never been an absolute rule in our Roman Catholic institutions to refuse the admission of Protestant teachers in their teaching body. For instance, take Laval University of Quebec—you have had some teachers of that important institution who were Protestants.

Mr. SPROULE. On first reading this clause, I felt inclined to support it. I thought this Board of Education was intended for some specific purpose that could not be carried out by the advisory board. My examination of the Bill led me to the conclusion that if there was one duty more than another that could and should be performed by this board, it was the examination of teachers with regard to their religious efficiency. But the Secretary of State having told us that teachers who have passed the examination of the advisory board are equally eligible and efficient, and it is proper to have them teaching separate schools, I do not see any object in having a Board of Education for that purpose. It is only another admission from hon. gentlemen themselves that it was not necessary to have this Board of Education, and that the advisory board could do the work as well. But if it is satisfactory to the Roman Catholics to have Protestant teachers or teachers that have not passed an examination with regard to their moral and religious fitness for their duties, I would vote against this clause, because I do not see any object in giving a specific duty to the Board of Education to examine these teachers in religion and morals if these are not required. For that reason, I shall vote against the amendment of the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien). I hope the Government will do away with the Board of Education, or at least that duty of the Board of Education and accept teachers examined under the advisory board. I differ from the hon. member for North York (Mr. Wallace) in his criticism of the speech of the Secretary of State. At length we have heard from the gentleman who is supposed to be in charge of this Bill. It is really humiliating to think that, when we were sitting here and deliberating on the provisions of a Bill which had been deserted by the Minister of Justice and by the Minister of the Interior, the hon. gentleman who is supposed to have been brought over especially to put the Bill through, has never taken the trouble to open his lips since we have been in committee. I am inclined to think the hon. gentleman does not know anything about the Bill, and is afraid to trust himself to speak on the subject. But we have heard a word from him. He really thought he was going to make another sectarian point. He had been endeavouring all along to arouse the Catholics against my hon. friend who leads the Opposition, and appealed to them because my hon. friend moved the six months' hoist. Now he thinks he can make a point on the other side, and he accuses my hon. friend from Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) of being more Catholic than the Pope himself. That is the hon. gentleman's idea of politics, apparently. It is not whether this is a wise position, it is not to see whether the Bill can be improved or amended in any way, but his object is to make a little point by which the sectarian bitterness which the hon. member pretends he is here to allay, can be further aroused to his advantage. Sir, there has been no single argument, since we met here, advanced in favour of the sections we have been considering. My hon. friend the Controller of Customs, taking pity upon the forlorn condition of the Treasury benches, stepped forward in an endeavour to defend them, but he soon found out he was travelling unknown paths, and was stepping in where angels feared to tread, and he very wisely withdrew. Now, we have had these provisions interpreted in various ways. Do they mean what the leader of the Opposition pointed out, or do they mean what the member for East Durham (Mr. Craig) pointed out? The contention of the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) is that this proviso sheds light on the whole section, and that, although a man may obtain a certificate from the advisory board, nevertheless, he is not qualified to teach unless he obtains a certificate from the Board of Education. If that is the right interpretation, what is the point of the observation of the Secretary of State? If there is to be an examination, if there is to be a certificate obtained from the Catholic board, what is the point of his observation with regard to my hon. friend's motion in amendment? Now, if that is not the object, it is hard to see what is the proper meaning of the section. One cannot comprehend that one class of men are to be eligible without passing the board, and another class of men are to be eligible only on passing the board. The point is this: Is it desirable that, so far as secular education is concerned, there should be but one examination and one board of examiners? Now, it is important to see what the delegates from this Government proposed in reference to the question of teaching, and to see whether they are not insisting in the Bill on something very different. The hon. hember for Provencher (Mr. LaRivière), who, I suppose, has had a good deal to do with the framing of this Bill, tells us that the object under this latter clause is to allow Catholic teachers who have obtained certificates from the board, to be eligible to teach in separate schools without re-examination. One can understand that, but there is no reason why Catholics who have been examined by the board for the last five or six years, should not be examined by the board in the next five or six years. Is there anything against religion and morals in a Catholic submitting to be examined by the advisory board? Now, what was asked by the commissioners who went from this Government, on the subject of teaching:

> Catholics to have representation on the advisory board; Catholics to have representation on the Board of Examiners appointed to examine teachers for certificates.
> It is also claimed that Catholics should have assistance in the maintenance of a normal school for the education of their teachers.
> The existing system of permits to non-qualified teachers in Catholic schools to be continued for, say two years, to enable them to qualify, and then to be entirely discontinued.
> In all other respects the schools at which Catholics attend, to be public schools and subject to every provision of the education Acts for the time being in force in Manitoba.

Remember, this commission went up, not as an independent commission, but as a commission authorized merely to do what the minority in Manitoba permitted them to do, to accept what that minority allowed them to accept, and really were the representatives, not of this Government, but of that minority, and all they wanted was that they should have representation upon the board of examiners and upon the advisory board.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. I would like to correct the hon. gentleman. The proposals made by the Government delegates were not the proposals of the minority, and they were not made in the name of the minority. In fact, the minority was never consulted in the matter.

Mr. McCARTHY. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will tell us his grounds for saying so. I think he was not in Manitoba at the time.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. What are your grounds for saying they were made in the name of the minority ?

Mr. McCARTHY. Because it is so stated in all the papers.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. We will see when we get the official papers brought down.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The commissioners did not press the normal school matter.

Mr. McCARTHY. I am reading from the suggestions made by the commissioners.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Would it not be better for the hon. gentleman to wait until the official papers are brought down ?

Mr. McCARTHY. I shall have to use my own judgment. I am perfectly in order in defending my course here by reference to the proposals made by the commissioners of this Government. Now, if they were willing to accept a Catholic on the board, and a Catholic on the board of examiners, why should we be constituting another board ? Now, with regard to the second part of the clause, it may be that it goes too far. If it be, as my hon. friend says, that in these schools they employ experts, then I think that clause is too stringent. There is no use in creating difficulties. I do not think the Secretary of State is desirous of making this an efficient measure. Although under no circumstances will I support the third reading, I am desirous of making it a good Bill if it is possible, a measure under which the Roman Catholic children of Manitoba will obtain efficient education. That is the object I have in view, and that is the object which the hon. members as a whole should have in view—not a mere matter of party triumph, but the enactment of a Bill under which Roman Catholic children in Manitoba will obtain efficient education. I move in amendment that all the words after "provided always" be omitted.

Mr. LAURIER. That will never do, because I understand from the great liberal speech delivered by the leader of the House it would be put into effect if this were accepted.

Mr. McCARTHY. But I am desirous of meeting the views of the leader of the House. He wishes to let Protestant teachers instruct in the separate schools, and I do not wish to deny him that privilege.

Mr. LAURIER. I cannot agree to that.

Mr. SPROULE. I wish to support the amendment to the amendment, because I never could see any reason——

Mr. HUGHES. I saw the hon. gentleman's name on the paper as seconder of the amendment.

Mr. SPROULE. I did not see it, and I am not aware of it.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Both hon. gentlemen are right ; the name of the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) has been written as seconder, and has been struck out.

Mr. SPROULE. I thought the hon. gentleman was a little too sharp, and that is nearly as bad as not being sharp enough. It occurred to me that when the board was to be composed of Roman Catholics it was to do work which Protestants could not do, to examine in religion and morals, and that therefore the teachers were to be examined in religion and morals. But when the committee was told by the Secretary of State that if teachers passed examinations before the advisory board they would be equally eligible with those who passed before the Board of Education, then it was apparent that there was no necessity for having the board composed of Catholics. If it be admitted that the teachers are equally eligible if passed by the advisory board, there is no need for the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), and I support the amendment to the amendment. But I might even go further, and say that there is no reason why the teachers should go before the Board of Education, if the advisory board can examine them in everything that is necessary to enable them to teach in the separate schools.

Mr. WALLACE. There is an evident desire for undue haste on the part of the committee in pushing through this clause. From the statement made by the Secretary of State it is obvious that the intention of the Government is to have Protestant teachers for Roman Catholic separate schools. I should like to know a single separate school in Canada that has a Protestant school teacher. The essence of separate schools is instruction in the doctrines of the Roman Catholic Church. You might as well engage Protestant ministers to preach to Roman Catholics on Sunday as to have Protestant teachers to give instruction in the doctrines of the Roman Catholic Church. If the Christian religion is to be taught, it can be taught in the public schools, but not the doctrines of a particular sect. But we are asked to give separate schools in order that the doctrines of the church may be taught by Roman Catholic teachers. They must have teachers who are experts. In the whole city of Toronto the separate schools and public schools are all graded. If they require a Roman Catholic teacher to take the second book, they would equally require one to teach the fourth book class, and so with all the other classes in the school. Therefore, the whole argument as to the necessity for this clause falls to the ground. I think it was the Minister of Finance who said it was obligatory. Well, there is no obligation about it.

Mr. FOSTER. I think the hon. gentleman has got the wrong man this time. Would my hon. friend (Mr. Wallace) tell me which of these amendments he is in favour of.

Mr. WALLACE. I am going to have a look at them. I am not going to go it blind like the supporters of the Bill, and I will exercise my judgment, and my judgment is that there is no necessity for this clause at all. Now, this Bill says that they shall arrange for the proper examination and grading and licensing of teachers. Now, that is all well provided for under the Act of 1890 to be done by the advisory board.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Is the hon. gentleman speaking to the amendment or sub-amendment?

Mr. WALLACE. It is immaterial, and I will use my own discretion. As the Act of 1890 provides for all these regulations being thoroughly and well carried out, there is, I say, no necessity for providing another board of examiners to examine teachers on the very same subjects. The new board of examiners must necessarily be inefficient, because there would only be about 4,000 children of school age and great expense would have to be gone to in order to examine a few teachers every year. If the standard is to be the same, then it furnishes another argument why you should not attempt to have another board of examiners. You may appoint a new board of examiners and you may say that the standard of examination is to be the same, but if the new board of examiners intend to make the examination light they can easily do so. No matter what the examination papers may contain, if the board of examiners want to let a crowd through they can do so. What has been the experience in the city of Ottawa? I have here the report of the commission relating to the Ottawa separate schools, and it shows a most deplorable state of things, and shows that the separate school teachers in this capital city were most incompetent for their duties. This is the report of friendly commissioners, appointed not by hostile influence, but at the request of the separate school board of Ottawa itself, who were thoroughly dissatisfied with the non-success of the teachers and the poor progress made by the pupils. Every obstacle had been placed in the way of those commissioners. There were first appointed one Catholic and two Protestants. But the two members of the commission who were Roman Catholics were virtually ordered by the Archbishop of Ottawa not to act, and, obeying his order, they threw up the job. The Minister of Education then appointed two other gentlemen to assist the third commissioner, Professor Scott, who had not retired. These gentlemen made an investigation into the schools, and their report is sufficient to condemn the system of examining teachers that prevails here. The report states that these teachers were incompetent for the duties they were appointed to perform. I think the House should read this report. (The hon. member here read extracts from the report.) Now, the language of subsection "b" clearly indicates, contrary to the contention of the Secretary of State, that there must be an examination in religious matters as well as in secular matters. If that is not the case, strike out the word "secular;" then the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) will not be required, and it might be withdrawn. What is the meaning of the phrase "shall be recognized" in the last portion of the clause? Does it refer to secular qualifications only, or does it also include religious qualifications? If all teachers' certificates issued by the Department of Education are to be recognized by the Board of Education, we would like to know it. Is that recognition to be compulsory or permissive? I would like to have this point clearly explained by the Government, as it would influence members when we come to vote on the amendment of the hon. member for Muskoka.

Mr. Deputy Speaker having left the Chair, it was taken by Mr. Mills (Annapolis).

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I would like to ask who is chairman of the committee. If the House is going to adjourn, I would not wish to refuse to the hon. gentleman the privilege of going out of the chamber; but I want our proceedings to be conducted regularly, and if the hon. gentleman is going to retire from the House, I submit that no other hon. member can take the Chair. He is the permanent chairman of committees.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). This is a courtesy which has never been refused to the Chairman of committees in this House since he was appointed.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am not objecting to his going out as a matter of courtesy for a little while, if he wishes to do so. The sitting can be suspended in the meantime, and I have no objection to suspending it. But the committee cannot legally proceed in the absence of the permanent Chairman, appointed to preside over the committees of the House.

Mr. WALLACE. I think the same rule ought to apply to the Deputy Speaker that applies to the Speaker in the Chair. The Speaker cannot call the Deputy Speaker to the Chair, and take a seat in the House; at least, he has not done that. Moreover the Deputy Speaker, being the permanent Chairman of committees, cannot retire from the House and call another to take his place.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). I would ask the hon. member for Queen's, who is a lawyer and well versed in procedure, whether the permanent appointment of a Chairman deprives him of the right to call another member to the Chair ?

Mr. McCARTHY. The hon. gentleman supposes that it is the House that appoints the Chairman of the committee. It is the Speaker who appoints him.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). I think that is not the usual procedure.

Mr. McCARTHY. It is the usual procedure. The Speaker leaves the Chair, and calls a member to take the chair of the committee. But the question is, when we have a permanent Chairman, whether he has any authority to do that.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The standing order which was adopted by this House in 1885, is perfectly plain. The hon. gentleman has been called to the Chair by the Speaker. He is in the House, and has taken the Chair, and he cannot leave it and appoint some one else in his place. If we are to be kept here all night, I suppose he is to be kept here all night also.

Mr. OUIMET. I think it has been the rule in this House that the permanent Chairman is not required of necessity to preside. The rule does not imply that he can never leave the House after he has taken the Chair. On the contrary, it has been the invariable practice, since we have had a permanent Chairman, for him to leave the Chair and be replaced by another member. I can say, from authority that will not be disputed, that that has also been the rule in England ever since they have had a permanent Chairman there.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) My point is a very simple one, and we will have to take the opinion of the Speaker upon it if it is not agreed to by both sides. It is that the gentleman chosen by the Speaker to fill the position of Chairman of committees cannot delegate his appointment to another member.

Mr. OUIMET. I presume that the hon. gentleman does not deny that that has been the invariable rule ?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) As a matter of courtesy it has always been allowed. I only raise the point if there is a determination to compel us to stay here all night.

Mr. OUIMET. I think you ought to rule, Mr. Chairman, that you are rightly in the Chair.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Question.

Mr. O'BRIEN. It is very agreeable to the House to find hon. gentlemen a little more cheerful than they were a short time ago when they found themselves unable to answer any objection raised on constitutional grounds to the clause under discussion. The hon. Secretary of State was only fulfilling his proper function when he spoke in that dictatorial tone in which he is such a proficient. He is here not leading the House, but endeavouring to insult and brow-beat or read out of the party, members who do not feel disposed to act according to his dictation. With regard to the amendment, if it is not desirable that it should be imperative upon this Board of Education to require this religious qualification, why not change the word "shall" into the word "may" in the amendment, and we would then have a proposal which would commend itself to the common sense of the House. The certificates as regards secular education would be granted by the advisory board, so that there should be a uniform standard throughout the province, and then if the Board of Education representing the minority desired religious qualification, they might give it. No doubt, in the ordinary management of the separate schools, Roman Catholic teachers would be engaged ; but if the trustees wished to engage anybody else, they would be at liberty to do so.

Mr. MULOCK. Now that I see the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Dickey) here, I would ask him the question which I put some time ago, whether the minority have ever asked for this provision ?

Mr. DICKEY. As I understand the matter, this is one of the powers which the Catholic section of the board had before 1890 and was part of the organization of the schools. It is a very important part. The clause is not as wide as it was before 1890, an effort having been made to limit it in the direction that would secure the recognition of a certificate granted under the Public School Act. It is part of the rights which Catholics had before, and therefore one to which they are entitled.

Mr. MULOCK. Has it been asked for by the minority ?

Mr. DICKEY. I understand this to be one of the powers asked for by the petition and adjudicated upon.

Mr. MULOCK. I do not find any reference to it in the petition.

Mr. DICKEY. You will not find a number of other things in the petition, but it surely is included.

Mr. MULOCK. I do not find it in the petition or the record. The point was taken that we had not the power to confer upon the advisory board the duty of examining candidates for the separate schools. I argued that there is nothing in the remedial order saying what body shall examine, but the proviso makes it imperative on the separate school board to recognize the certificate of the advisory board. You are assuming that you have the power to compel the Board of Education to recognize the certificate granted by the advisory board. If that proviso is valid, then a clause to that effect generally applicable would be equally valid, and it is simply a question of policy as to whether or not we should pass this clause. It is certainly advisable to have a uniform standard of examination, so that the teachers in the public and separate schools shall be all equally qualified. The presumption must be that the separate school board will not attach as much importance to qualifications in secular matters as will the other board; and yet in the battle of life, it is of great importance that the secular side of education should not be neglected. If we have an inferior class of teachers in charge of the minority, the minority will suffer. Now, this Bill acknowledges the importance of a high standard of education in the separate schools, by declaring that the standard of qualification of the teachers shall be the same as that of public schools. But a declaratory clause like that must be backed by effective machinery. I should like to know how you can have equally good results from two separate boards, each pursuing a policy of its own, each adopting its own standard. Who is to be the judge as to whether the standard of separate school examinations is equal to the standard of the public school examinations? And if the separate school board adopt an inferior standard, how are you going to compel them to raise it? By this subsection, you are going to do injury to the Catholic minority.

Mr. FAIRBAIRN. Are they complaining?

Mr. MULOCK. This is being forced upon them. They have never asked for it.

Mr. FAIRBAIRN. Have they petitioned against it?

Mr. MULOCK. We supposed they were quite able to point out wherein they are wrong. They have had able counsel to put on paper their grievances.

Mr. FAIRBAIRN. Has not their counsel agreed to this?

Mr. MULOCK. We have been told that subsection 2 of section 3 was put in at his request, but what were his reasons we do not know. At any rate, the petitioners did not ask for this in their petition, as the Minister of Justice has admitted. He does not pretend to say that the minority asked for it in the petition except in very general terms.

He certainly attached no importance to this, as shown by the fact that he proposed a system of joint examination. The system in Ontario, to which I have referred, has worked well, and I fail to see why it should not work well in any other province. The duplicate system of examination of teachers is one of the most unfortunate features of this Bill, in respect to the machinery provided for carrying this out. Why should we not lighten the burden of taxation as much as possible, and refrain from imposing new burdens? Not one argument has yet been advanced in support of this clause. I mention that in the presence of the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. LaRivière), who takes a deep interest in this Bill, and, I think, tries to be reasonable.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Yes, I try to.

Mr. MULOCK. I believe so, and I believe that, if this Bill were submitted under more favourable conditions, this clause would never be pressed. As one who has had something to do with this very feature in connection with educational matters, I submit there is no necessity whatever for a duplicate board to conduct examinations for denominational institutions. I am sure the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) will corroborate me, speaking from his experience in connection with educational affairs in the province of Ontario. I do not wish to allow that unfortunate feature of the Bill to become law without placing my views upon record. The Government have their majority, and, if they are determined to use it, not wisely, but obstinately, they will pass this into law. They are professing to give bread to the minority in this respect, but they are giving merely a stone.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). I was about rising to say almost the very words used by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock). I know something of the condition of education in Ontario, and I know that the separate school system of that province has been improved, and has done better service to the minority every time they have adopted a part of the common school system. There was a time when they had teachers' examinations of their own, but they adopted the public school examinations, and, as a result, there has been a distinct improvement in the separate schools of Ontario. I cannot see why this duplicate system of examination should be foisted on the province of Manitoba. Why cannot we adopt the certificates of the provincial examinations, and thus save energy and save money. The great objection to our system of education in the past has been the waste of energy. Our universities in Ontario have been improved, just as they have come to see that they should not waste their energy in duplicate teaching. The result of duplicate teaching in the three or four universities in Toronto had been divided energy and poor work. Gradually they are coming to see that the best way to advance education is to conserve energy on all possible occasions. I am glad to see that the Methodist body is one of the first to find the futility of wasting energy in duplicate teaching. I hope the day will come, too, when Trinity University will join with the Provincial University, and in that way really promote the cause of education. This undue and unnecessary duplication of the examining power in Manitoba does not exist in any other province, and no reason has been given for introducing it into Manitoba.

Amendment to the amendment (Mr. McCarthy) negatived : yeas, 10 ; nays, 33.

Amendment (Mr. O'Brien) negatived.

On section 4, subsection (b).

Mr. O'BRIEN. To meet the views of the Secretary of State, I would like to change the word "shall" to "may," in the last amendment, so as to leave it optional with the Board of Education. As an amendment to the clause, I move the former amendment, with the word "shall" changed to "may."

Amendment (Mr. O'Brien) negatived.

Mr. SPROULE. I wish to ask the Minister who has charge of the Bill, what interpretation he puts upon the 29th and 30th lines of the clause. Does he consider that as making them competent to teach in these schools under the circumstances ?

Mr. DALY. Yes.

Subsection (b) agreed to.

On subsection (c).

> (c.) To select all the books, maps and globes to be used in the schools under its control ; provided, however, that no book, map or globe shall be selected unless such book, map or globe has been authorized for use either in the high or public schools of the province of Manitoba or in the separate schools of the province of Ontario.

Mr. FREMONT. I beg to move :

> That all the words after "under its control" in the second line of subsection (c), clause 4, be struck out, and replaced by the following :—
> Provided, further, that in the case of books having reference to religion and morals, such selection shall be subject to the approval of the competent religious authority.

Mr. FREMONT. (Translation.) This clause is one of very considerable importance, as regards the proper administration of separate schools so as to give satisfaction to the Catholic minority. Under the old law, prior to 1890, the separate school board had the choice of the school books which they thought fit to adopt for the education of the children attending the separate schools. That law will be found in statute 44 Vict., chap. 5. The terms of the statute are identical with those of the amendments I have just submitted to the committee. Now, the right of the minority to select their own school books was recognized by the British Privy Council judgment, as will be seen from the following extract I am going to read to the House, in which it is pointed out that it is one of the privileges specially recognized by the Privy Council :

> The sole question to be determined is whether a right or privilege which the Roman Catholic minority previously enjoyed has been affected by the legislation of 1890. Their Lordships are unable to see how this question can receive any but an affirmative answer. Contrast the position of the Roman Catholics prior and subsequent to the Acts from which they appeal. Before these passed into law there existed denominational schools, of which the control and management were in the hands of Roman Catholics, who could select the books to be used and determine the character of religious teaching.

So, it is explicity set forth here that one of the privileges previously enjoyed by the Roman Catholics was that of selecting their own school books. Further, this privilege has also been formally recognized by the remedial order, and I believe that we should give the minority the very same privileges which they enjoyed prior to 1890. This clause as it stands in the Bill now under consideration does not give full satisfaction to the Catholic minority. If you read attentively that paragraph, you will find that the privilege granted is not such as to satisfy the minority. It reads as follows :—

> (c.) To select all the books, maps and globes to be used in the schools under its control ;

But, Sir, let us weigh carefully the limitation which is made to the law as it stood prior to 1890, as follows :—

> Provided, however, that no book, map or globe shall be selected unless such book, map or globe has been authorized for use either in the high or public schools of the province of Manitoba or in the separate schools of the province of Ontario.

I believe that such a limitation takes away any credit the clause might otherwise claim, and under this paragraph no privilege is granted to the Catholic minority, as it is enacted that they have the right to select the text-books, but only so far as those books have been authorized for use by the Department of Education of the province of Manitoba. It seems, therefore, that the privilege as to the selection of text-books is not enacted under this clause as it should be, in favour of the Catholic minority.

It is further urged that they may select text-books authorized for use in the separate schools of the province of Ontario. I think, Mr. Chairman, it is, to say the least, very strange and at variance with the elementary notions of any good Administration to force a Board of Education to apply to an outside power for the choice of its books. It seems most remarkable that the Board of Education of Manitoba should be forced to apply to another province for text-books to be used in the schools under its control, for it is the Department of Education of the province of Ontario which is here constituted judge under this clause, as no books can be selected unless such books are authorized for use in the separate schools of Ontario. It seems to me that this point will give rise to difficulties in practice. To my mind, it would be far better to restore to the separate school board the privilege which the minority enjoyed under the old law, that is, of selecting their school books as they think fit. Evidently they will use, as far as possible, the books already in use in the Manitoba public schools, but as to books having reference to religion and morals, the separate school board should be vested with the authority of selecting books relating to morals and religion, subject to the approbation of the competent religious authority.

Mr. MARTIN. I want to know from the hon. member why he does not propose that the Quebec system, by which the books selected by the priest, shall be applied to the province of Manitoba.

Mr. FREMONT. In the province of Quebec the priest does not choose the books.

Mr. MARTIN. In Manitoba the school books on morals and religion were chosen by the head of the Roman Catholic Church, the archbishop, and I ask the hon. gentleman why he adopts that system rather than the system in the province of Quebec under which the curé selects the books.

Mr. FREMONT. The hon. gentleman is mistaken. In the province of Quebec the curé has nothing at all to do with the choice of books. It is the Catholic section of the Council of Public Instruction that chooses the books. That has been the law over twenty years.

Mr. MARTIN. That is different from your proposition.

Mr. FREMONT. My proposition is exactly the law as it stood in the province of Manitoba, that is, that this Board of Education, which replaces the Catholic section of the old council, shall choose the books, but that those books, when they relate to religion or morality, shall be subject to the approbation of the competent religious authority, that is, I suppose, the Archbishop of Manitoba.

Mr. MARTIN. In the province of Quebec, under the old law, which the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Dupont) says was changed about twenty years ago, the books were chosen by the curé. At present, are those books chosen by the Catholic section of the Council of Public Instruction, subject to the approval of a competent religious authority ?

Mr. FREMONT. No.

Mr. MARTIN. Then why does the hon. gentleman propose a different method for Manitoba ? Because that was the old law, or because it is the better way ?

Mr. FREMONT. Because that was the old law, and, I think it should be adopted as it was before 1890. The reason I propose the amendment is that the Bill, as it stands does not give any privilege to the minority. It gives them the privilege to choose from among the books that have been adopted in the public schools. That is not a privilege. As an alternative, it gives them the privilege to select those in use in the separate schools of Ontario. Well, I think there is a great deal of inconvenience in obliging the Department of Education of one province to make application to the Department of Education of another province to choose books for use in their schools. I think each province should be left to administer its own affairs without reference to another province in matters of this kind. For these reasons, I have the honour to move this amendment, seconded by the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Dupont).

Mr. OUIMET. This amendment, if accepted, would imply that the separate school board provided by this Bill, composed, as it is to be, of Catholics, could come into conflict with the religious authorities. I protest against the assumption that there might be a conflict or division between the Catholics and their clergy. The reason for this clause, as drafted, is that uniformity in the teaching and in the books of the separate and public schools is of great advantage. A Catholic may live in a community where there are very few of his own creed; he may have to send his children to the public school ; and, if so, his children will have the use of the same books that they have been accustomed to in the separate schools, except books on religious subjects. This is a great advantage. I must admit that a good many of these clauses have been arranged to meet that general charge of inefficiency that has been brought against the Catholic schools as they existed before. This charge has never been admitted by the Catholics of Manitoba; but the opponents of this Bill have made so much of it that it is important that the country should know that the separate schools we are creating will be, in every detail, certainly the equals of, if not superior to, the public schools, and this will go far to dispel any idea in the public mind that we are going to establish inferior schools for the Catholics of Manitoba. The charge that the Catholics are disposed to accept for their children an education inferior to that given to the Protestant children, is utterly without foundation ; and everything that could give colour to that charge has been excluded from the Bill. Again, the Catholic Church is composed of laymen and clergymen, and they are one. It would certainly be a libel on the Catholics, as a body, to assume that the laymen supporting the Catholic schools could be divided with their clergy on matters relating to morals or religion. This clause should be accepted as it is, with the few verbal amendments that have been asked by the representatives of the minority, to make it more perfect.

Mr. DUPONT. Give us the words of the amendment you intend to propose.

Mr. OUIMET. The clause, as amended, will read as follows :—

> Provided, however, that no book, map or globe shall be selected, unless such book, map or globe is now in use either in the high or public schools of the province of Manitoba or in the separate schools of the province of Ontario.

Mr. BRODEUR. What is the effect of the amendment ?

Mr. OUIMET. The section, as it stands, provides that only such books, maps or globes as have been authorized for use shall be selected. We are informed that there is no such authorization existing. There is another reason for the amendment, that the books now in use are known, especially those in use in the province of Ontario, and against these no objection can be raised.

Mr. WALLACE. I think objection can be raised against the books in use in the province of Ontario.

Mr. OUIMET. Not by the Catholics.

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, by the Catholics. I have a report in my hand, and I am sure that it will be news, and welcome news, to the hon. Minister that the Roman Catholics of the city of Ottawa have objected to the books used in the separate schools of that city. I will take the liberty of reading some of the objections made by Mr. J. F. White, the superintendent of the separate schools in the city of Ottawa. Here is the report of the commission appointed by the Ottawa school board to examine into the school books used in the separate schools. You will see by this report that the books are condemned wholesale. Beginning with the primary books of the De la Salle series, they are pronounced utterly unsuitable. In the preliminary reader, the lessons are pronounced not well graded, and the selection of subjects poor. The report goes on to say:

> Such subjects as providence, obedience, the theatre, are unsuitable for pupils beginning to read. The sentences, as a rule, are without connection and logical sequence, and would prevent any kind of naturalness in reading.

Yet these are the books which the hon. Minister of Public Works would foist upon the province of Manitoba. If there is one thing that the separate schools have steadily neglected, it is the art of reading, which is one of the most important accomplishments. The report says that it is impossible to teach the children to read out of these books. The clause provides that no book, map or globe should be selected unless it has been authorized for use either in the high or public schools of the province of Manitoba or in the separate schools of Ontario. Now, we may take it for granted that the public schools will not be selected. If they would, that would be an additional reason for having no separate schools, but continuing the plan of public schools. One of the principal reasons why the minority want separate schools is because of these different school books. If the books in use in the separate schools of Ontario be selected, I have shown what kind of books these are. Mr. Leblanc, himself a Roman Catholic, and superintendent of the schools, endorses this report, which is made by the Roman Catholic separate school trustees of the city of Ottawa, and that report contains this sweeping condemnation :

> On the whole, we consider that the primary readers of the De la Salle series have no redeeming features.

The readers are utterly condemned by the school trustees of Ottawa endorsed by J. F. Leblanc the superintendent who is a good authority. This is a very valuable report, and I would not be doing my duty to the country if I failed to call attention in the strongest possible manner to the condemnation of these separate school books, before we adopt them for the province of Manitoba. The report says that the primary book has not a single redeeming feature, and that although the elementary book is a little better it is still utterly bad. Now, as regards the report of the superintendent himself, with regard to these books which the members of the House of Commons are asked to force upon the people of Manitoba. He says that most of the geography should be done away with altogether, and that it should be revised up to date. I presume that the member for Victoria and myself have learned from Morse's Geography of forty years ago, in which the United States is given as one-fourth of the whole world, and Canada is represented as a little strip of land with Esquimaux dogs to drag the inhabitants around. I presume that is the kind of geography they have in the separate schools of Ontario. All the discoveries, and changes of recent years are not referred to at all.

Mr. EARLE. If those text books are used in the province of Ontario why did you not take some steps to remedy it ?

Mr. WALLACE. In the year 1894, I left Ottawa and spent three weeks going through the province of Ontario to try to induce the people of Ontario to remedy this. I tried to drive out of power the government that forced these books on the province.

Mr. EARLE. You were not successful ?

Mr. WALLACE. No, but it was not my fault.

Mr. McLEOD. Did the members on the other side of the House assist you ?

Mr. WALLACE. No, and mighty few on this side of the House although they were Conservatives. I know of but two or three Conservatives who left the House to assist me.

Mr. HUGHES. Did the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) assist you in that campaign ?

Mr. WALLACE. I do not think he did, nor I do not think the member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes) did either.

Mr. HUGHES. The member for North Victoria did a good deal.

Mr. WALLACE. Excuse me, I am just expressing my opinions.

Mr. HUGHES. I beg to correct the hon. gentleman. I say that the member for North Victoria did a great deal more than the member for West York.

Mr. WALLACE. We redeemed our constituency in West York and that is more than the member for North Victoria can say.

Mr. HUGHES. That is because Toronto was added on to it.

Mr. WALLACE. No, it was not.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Mills, Annapolis). The question is on the amendment.

Mr. WALLACE. I am not going to be deterred from discussing it by the question being on the amendment. We know that. If you have any other information to give we will be glad to receive it. Another objection to this precious separate school geography which the House is asked to force upon the province of Manitoba, is, that it does not give much information about the country we live in. What is more required among our youth than to give them a knowledge of our country, and to teach them the immense capabilities of our great Dominion. Yet the inspector says that this geography is lamentably deficient in this. Mr. White the superintendent then condemns the arithmetic in use in the public schools, and this is the arithmetic which the Parliament of Canada is asked to compel the schools in Manitoba to use. I think the House should pay great attention to the strong language which these books are condemned by the trustees and by a superintendent of the separate schools of the province of Ontario. I will use every argument to appeal to the reason of hon. gentlemen, not to press this Bill. My experience is that when you appeal to the reason of this intelligent assembly, you never appeal in vain. I have no doubt that I have converted the Minister of Public Works to my idea. I know that when he sleeps over it he will say that I am right, and that I am endeavouring to aid him in his desire to have the separate school children as well educated as the common school children. I am not expressing my own opinion upon these books, but I am expressing the opinion of Mr. White, the superintendent of the separate schools of Ottawa, whom you all know well and whom you believe to be a competent authority. The inspector states that the history of Canada used in the schools, though good in several respects, contains too little material, that one of the text-books on English history could be dropped, and that in composition, a book is not necessary, the teaching of it being more dependent upon the teacher than on the text-book. You are proposing to force these objectionable or unnecessary books on the province of Manitoba. The inspector also points out that there is not a uniform price charged for the books used in the schools. I have called attention to the unnecessarily high price of the text-books used in all the schools of Ontario. Experts in the business have told me that the men who handle these books could sell them at one-half their present price, and make a good profit.

Mr. INGRAM. How do you account for them being so dear ?

Mr. WALLACE. By the monopoly established by the Ontario government.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). Is the gentleman who is building the sanitarium for consumptives one of that monopoly ?

Mr. WALLACE. I believe he is.

Mr. MARTIN. And yet you are going to force that on Manitoba ?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, and these gentlemen who know that, are supporting this measure. The price of these books are an enormous burden on the people who send their children to the public schools, and a greater burden on those whose children attend the separate schools, because they are smaller in numbers, and they, necessarily, have to pay a higher price.

Mr. HUGHES. Has Mr. W. J. Gage, or any of the publishers referred to, anything to do with the publication of the separate school books ?

Mr. MARTIN. It easily might occur. The objection is that the people of Manitoba are subjected to what is done in Ontario by the Ontario government, without being in a position to hold that government responsible. They would be quite helpless.

Mr. WALLACE. Does the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes) deny that there is a monopoly of the public school books in Ontario ?

Mr. INGRAM. Nobody denies it.

Mr. WALLACE. More than that, I know a book used in the separate schools of Ottawa which is a subject of monopoly in Ontario.

Mr. MARTIN. The case is very much worse, because in Manitoba the people would be absolutely at the mercy of the publishers of separate school books for Ontario. These publishers might be restrained by some fear of the people of Ontario, but in Manitoba they could double or quadruple their prices.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). The hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes) said that the public school books of Ontario could not be adopted by the separate schools of Manitoba.

Mr. HUGHES. I never said anything of the kind.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). The clause provides that they may use any book authorized for use in the high or public schools of Manitoba, and they have adopted some of the Ontario school books. In that way Ontario public school books do go into Manitoba, and the Ontario monopoly presses upon the public schools of Manitoba.

Mr. WALLACE. Manitoba, being a small province, may not feel able to afford the large initial expense of starting an independent series of school books. While that is only a small thing for the population of Ontario, it would be an enormous undertaking for a small province like Manitoba. Therefore, the Ontario school books are used in that province and under this Bill the school works, which are under this monopoly, and which are open to the very serious objections I have pointed out, will be thrust upon Manitoba. In every clause of this Bill the expense is piled up. It is the old story that men can be very liberal with other people's money. We are saddling the enormous expense of this dual system of boards of education upon Manitoba ; but what do we care ? Manitoba will have to pay. In the last clause of the Bill power is reserved for further legislation by the Parliament of Canada at any future session. The result will be that we will have these same gentlemen, who are petitioning for this Bill, coming back to us in order to get rid of some of its incongruities and inconsistencies. They will also complain that, while we have provided the machinery we have not provided the funds to meet the expenditure. It is not likely that Manitoba will contribute anything, and in that case we will be called upon to pay the cost. All the provinces of the Dominion, all the people in those provinces, Protestants as well as Roman Catholics will be called on to provide funds to enable this proposed law to be operative.

Mr. HUGHES. If I remember right, a few days ago, the hon. gentleman urged, as one reason why this Bill should not be passed, the fact that, if it became law, it would become irrevocable. If that be the case, I would like to know how it would be possible for this House at some future date to vote any money ?

Mr. WALLACE. I was not expressing my own opinion only when I made that statement, but I quoted the opinion of the Privy Council of Canada, and I assumed that the Canadian Government were competent judges. I do not know that the hon. gentleman who has interrupted me is a bright light in the legal profession himself. I am told he has practiced at the Bar, but I do not know with what success. I do not know that he stands as high in the legal profession as the Minister of the Interior or the Minister of Justice or the late Minister of Justice, who formed part of the Privy Council, and who came to this conclusion. Now, with regard to the point that if this legislation be irrevocable, there can be no further legislation, I would tell the hon. gentleman that irrevocability means that the legislation you do pass you cannot change.

The inherent right of every legislature is to repeal its own law, except in this special case, in which the Privy Council has declared that that right does not belong. Clause 112 of this Bill is irrevocable, and it opens the door for further legislation. We cannot repeal what we have passed, but we may enact further legislation, and as no money provision is made for expenses here, we can under new clauses vote sums of money belonging to the people of all Canada, and vote them not for all the people of Manitoba, but for a section of the people of that province. That principle is all wrong. If you vote money for a section of the people of Manitoba, why could you not vote it for a section of the people in other provinces ? For all these reasons, this clause should be simply dropped out. The whole thing should be left to the province of Manitoba, as it is in the province of Ontario. There are no complaints in Ontario that they interfere with any rights that may have been acquired in regard to separate schools. Why should we suppose that the people of Manitoba, with the same desire to promote the best interests of their province, and the same anxiety to have their children educated for their fight in the world, would act in a different manner from the people of Ontario. The people of Ontario have a separate school system granted by law, but they have never asked that this machinery you propose to force on Manitoba should be given to them. You deprive the people of Manitoba of that right of self-government which every province should possess, and which in our experience of the Dominion every province has exercised wisely. We have found that if a province should make a mistake, the people of the province were ready to remedy that under their own constitution. The more you examine into it, the more inexcusable it appears that the Dominion Parliament should have the assurance to say to the people of Manitoba : We will tell you what kind of school-books you have the right to supply to your children. There is no sense or reason in trying to force these miserable school-books on the people of Manitoba. The people of Canada are too intelligent and fair-minded to give their assent to any such proposition. Bear in mind, that in a very short time we will have to go before our constituents, and when we tell them, or rather when some hon. gentlemen tell them : We forced such school-books down the throats of the people of Manitoba, our constituents will asks us why ? "Oh," these gents will say, "because it was in the Bill," and when we are asked who made that Bill, our answer will have to be : The Lord only knows. The Government cannot explain anything about it. The Minister of the Interior says : We will wait until Dickey comes, and when Dickey comes, he says : Hold on till Ewart comes down, and when Ewart comes down he don't understand it any more than the others. The massive intellect of the Minister of Railways, sleeping on his desk, cannot give any information about it. He simply says : Vote it through, boys. That kind of logic may do for the House of Commons, but it ain't worth a cent in the country. Here we are discussing the most important legislation Canada has ever seen at 4 o'clock in the morning, and only two members of the Government here. We have been three or four days discussing this important Bill, and we have only been able to pass about one clause a day.

Mr. FRECHETTE. Whose fault is that ?

Mr. WALLACE. It is the fault of the Government, because we cannot get any information about it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Question.

Mr. WALLACE. Am I not discussing the question, Mr. Chairman ?

The CHAIRMAN. Well, not too closely.

Mr. WALLACE. But just close enough to strike the happy medium which is very desirable in all things. I have now made some preliminary observations on this Bill, but I have a large amount of information to give with regard to the school-books used under the old system in Manitoba. They tell us that they enact this legislation because it is in the old law. Well, that is the worst possible argument for me. Is that an argument to use in the most intelligent Parliament that Canada has ever seen, and especially is that an argumenet to be used in presence of the pick and choice of that Parliament, who now sit around me, listening attentively to my few remarks ? Was there ever a poorer, weaker, more fallacious or unreasonable argument submitted to any assembly of men ? Now, the Chairman tells me that the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) has arrived. I do not know what he means by that. Does he mean that I am to repeat all the arguments that I have used ?

Mr. CASEY. I would like to hear them.

Mr. WALLACE. If the hon. member wanted to hear all those valuable arguments, why was he not here ? But I have so much new matter, that I ask him to pay attention to what is yet to come—if, indeed, it is necessary to make any more observations after the few remarks that I have made. I am sorry that the Minister of the Interior has not been here through the whole of my remarks.

Mr. DALY. I have been here all the time.

Mr. WALLACE. Then I am sure the Minister of the Interior is now of the same opinion as myself. He comes from the province of Manitoba, and I have no doubt he was acquainted with all these facts before ; but I have refreshed his memory, and I am sure that the arguments I have offered will impress his mind, because no man is more susceptible to sound, solid argument than the Minister of the Interior. I regret, Mr. Chairman, that you have not been in your place during all of my remarks, because I am sure that the information I have given would have been received by you with delight. I know your desire to obtain accurate knowledge, and I regret your absence, not merely for your own sake, but for mine, because I like to have an appreciative audience.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment of Mr. Fremont.

Mr. WALLACE. I regret to say that I cannot support that amendment, or the clause, either ; I am against both. There is no reason why this House should adopt that clause. You are proposing to re-establish in Manitoba the old system that was discarded by the people there, because it was an utterly bad system. Is there any attempt to show that it was a useful or efficient system ? The only argument of the Government is that the Bill re-enacts the old law. That is no argument at all to appeal to intelligent men. Here is a most important statement which was made by the Manitoba commissioners at the conference held a few days ago :

> At present in every city, town and village in the province, outside of Winnipeg and St. Boniface, the Roman Catholic children attend the public schools. Not a word of complaint is heard. Absolute contentment and satisfaction prevail. The children have the advantage of efficient instruction, and numbers of them are qualifying themselves to become teachers in the public schools. We do not hesitate to say that not only is there no desire to separate, but, if left to themselves, the Roman Catholic people in the cities, towns and villages, outside of Winnipeg and St. Boniface, would not consent to a change in the direction indicated.

In the face of that statement, can we not fairly ask the Government to drop this Bill? Now, I have a lot of valuable information here, but though I think it is of the greatest importance that I should give it to this House, yet I realize that I have imposed on your patience although I have received your careful and undivided attention, for which

I feel grateful at this late hour. My eloquence has sent the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) to his slumbers and the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes) pretty far in that direction. I shall not trespass on your time, Sir, any further. At a later stage, I shall have further observations to make, because I know the House is anxious to have this question decided. I have just made an introduction to the question, as it were, and you have listened with such attention, and the hour is so late that no doubt the Government will be glad they moved the adjournment of the debate and permit the members to go to their homes. For myself, I feel so much pleasure to be here that I would not like to leave, anyway. I know there are members sitting here, studying up their arithmetics and geographies and other such works, but for myself, the pleasure of being in such company is so strong that I would not like to leave, in any case. I have shown that those books which we are attempting to impose on the people of Manitoba are not only expensive, but have been pronounced by most competent authorities as utterly worthless, some of them, and as only fairly good the rest of them. It is proposed to force these worthless and high-priced monopoly books on an unwilling people. I have too much faith in the patriotism, good sense, and honest desire to act fairly, on the part of this Parliament, to believe that this attempt will succeed. We shall soon have to go back to the people, and with what grace can hon. gentlemen tell their constituents in Ontario that they have been sitting up here all night and all day trying to force these inferior and high-priced school books on an unwilling people. But there are men here who are bound, at any cost, to defeat this attempt, and when the Government supporters tell the people that in spite of all they could do, they could not make these men bend—when they say to the people: Although we remained in session night and day to force this Act through Parliament, we could not succeed against the stand taken by these men, who stood up for the rights of Manitoba—when those gentleman go back to their constituents and make them that declaration, I predict that they will not get very good reception. The people of the province of Manitoba are not in favour of this law.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Question.

Mr. WALLACE. I am speaking right to the question. I am saying that the clause is not one that should be enacted, and when the people are appealed to they will pronounce their condemnation of the legislation now sought to be forced through this House.

Mr. MARTIN. It does seem to me, after the remarks of the hon. member for Quebec (Mr. Fremont) and the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), that this subsection 3 is one of very considerable importance. I must say that I desire to make some remarks of a half an hour or so upon that question, but it is most unreasonable for the Government to ask me or any other member of the House to do that at this hour. That section was not before the committee until about two o'clock this morning. I admit that the Government are entitled to fight obstruction, but how can there be said to be obstruction in the desire of the committee to reasonably discuss a clause of that importance before it becomes law. The hon. member for Quebec desires to have the old law re-enacted. The Government have departed from the old law for certain reasons which were explained very briefly by the Minister of Public Works. Surely that is a matter which requires some consideration. The most ardent friend of the re-establishment of separate schools will not contend that this clause does not require considerable discussion. I move, therefore, that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. CASEY. I rise to speak to the motion of my hon. friend from Winnipeg (Mr. Martin). I do really think that those who insist upon the House sitting at such hours of the day as these are the real obstructionists. It is perfectly absurd to expect calm, considerate and reasonable discussion at this time of the morning, and the inevitable result of the Government's persistence in continuing the sitting will be to lead to disgraceful talk instead of debate, to wordy squabbles across the floor, and raising points of order. Sitting at these hours, puts members of the House out of physical and mental condition for properly considering this Bill. I maintain that such a course is obstructive, and that the Government, by so doing, are injuring the chances of this Bill passing through the House. I am willing to admit that at this late period of the session, two o'clock, or even three o'clock in the morning, would be a reasonable hour for adjournment, but to insist upon sitting later necessarily arouses a spirit of opposition on the part of those who are not anxious to see the Bill pass, as well as upon the part of those who are anxious to see the Bill pass, but who wish to maturely consider its provisions.

The whole conduct of the Government in this matter is, what would be called outside of this House, a game of bluff. They feel it necessary to create the impression among certain classes that they are anxious to have the Bill pass, and that the Opposition are causelessly discussing it, but they will find themselves mistaken in that, for every man of common sense knows that this is not the way to get a Bill through the House. In 1885 the Government adopted the same tactics as now, with regard to the obnoxious Franchise Act. They tried to bulldoze and terrorize the House, but we sat for nearly three months on that Bill, and that experience ought to teach them that they will not be successful now. The people of Quebec are deeply concerned in seeing this Bill perfected, and placed upon the statute-book, but the course of the Government is extremely likely to prevent its passage. The particular amendment now under consideration is a case in point. Two friends of the Bill have an idea about this clause, which differs from that of the Minister of Public Works, to some extent, but yet, the Minister wants to have their amendment voted down without any explanation. Before this Bill went into committee, the Minister of Public Works told the House that when it got to committee it would be fully discussed, but he is not now carrying out that promise. Even when a supporter of his own seconded the amendment, he declines to discuss it except to the very slightest extent.

All along, the Government have said : Never mind whether the Bill is constitutional or not, or whether it is the best for the minority of Manitoba or not, let us get it through in some shape or other, so that we may not be discredited before our friends in Quebec, to whom we have promised great things. I think that when the Minister of Public Works was in Verchères, he called upon the Almighty to witness, that if we did not have this legislation during the session of 1895, he would leave the Government. He carried out that pledge literally, though scarcely in spirit, for he did leave the Government, but he stayed out only a few days until he came back to the cream, and he has been in the Government ever since. Even after the Minister of Public Works found that the Government were not ready with this legislation, as they promised to be at the opening of the session, he still remained in the Government. He knows very well now, that if this Bill does not go through the House, the blame will be justly laid upon the Government by the people of Quebec. He feels that the people of Quebec know that the Government were not sincere, or otherwise they would not delay the bringing down of this measure for two months after the House met. We have been told that the dissensions in the Cabinet were not because of the Remedial Bill, but it is quite certain that some members on the other side of the House will not believe that, and the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes) certainly does not believe it, for in a recent letter to the "Mail," he wrote :

> When seven Protestant Ministers resigned, leaving Sir Mackenzie Bowell and other ultra-remedial legislationists in the Cabinet, several wild anti-remedial legislationists in the House were suddenly seized with a desire to drop their convictions against such a measure. They offered to assist Sir Mackenzie Bowell in electing his new Ministers favourable to remedial legislation, and some of them were even scrambling after positions. I was opposed to remedial legislation before, during and since the crisis, and promptly declined to be approached, even by most influential friends, during the crisis, to influence me towards supporting the remedial legislationist wing of the Cabinet, or to accept any prominence therewith. Therefore, I opposed Mr. Laurier's motion because those easy-conscienced persons were wildly upholding him.

In the Lindsay "Warder" recently—and I suppose the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes) is responsible for what appears in that paper—it was stated :

> During the crisis, though very strong influences were brought to bear on Mr. Hughes to induce him to give up his principles on the school question for personal preferment, he promptly refused to listen to any such proposals.

The hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes) says he opposed Mr. Laurier's motion, because my hon. friend from West York (Mr. Wallace), and my hon. friend from Grey (Mr. Sproule) and several other wild anti-remedialists were opposing it. He will have a nice time trying to explain that statement when he comes before his electors.

There is a distinct statement, at any rate, that the rupture in the Cabinet was caused by the objection of the revolting Ministers to remedial legislation. I believe this is the fact, though it has been officially denied on the floor of the House. The hon. member for North Victoria seems to have got at the bottom of the matter, and here is a beautiful chance for him to explain how he got at this Cabinet secret. Yet the Minister of Public Works sits in the Cabinet with these ultra-Protestant Ministers, and their object is to be partially accomplished by the deformation of this Bill. I say, because it does not secure the rights of the minority of Manitoba, that this Bill has been deformed intentionally, so that it will not be of any use to the Catholics of Manitoba if it does pass. All the Government want of this Bill is to have it for an election cry. As the Minister of Public Works said in the House, after it passes, they will take the risk of it. These few words, uttered by him in a moment of sincerity, throw a glare of light on the motives of the Government in proposing this legislation. There are other things which the Minister of Public Works will have to explain. Last spring he called God to witness that he would have nothing less than the remedial order. Now, he is asking us to enact a law which re-establishes separate schools in Manitoba ; yet within the last few days he has declared that he is willing to accept something very much less than that, and do away with this Remedial Bill altogether. I will give you his words, uttered in this House on March 24th :

> Suppose this Bill were passed it would be a recognition of the rights of the minority and upon it they could always fall back if they were not satisfied with the few concessions that I have thought would be sufficient. These concessions could be made by regulation enabling Catholics where they are in sufficient number to control their schools, to use their books and give their religious teaching. If these few concessions were given to them, this Bill would become perfectly unnecesssary.

Now, Sir, if we are to believe in the correctness of documents quoted in the newspapers of late, the correctness of which has been practically admitted by the Government, the concessions offered by Manitoba were practically those which the Minister said were sufficient to make this Bill unnecessary; and yet he insists on our going on with the Bill. His position is illogical and self-contradictory, and he will have considerable difficulty in explaining it when he goes before his constituents. He went on further to point out what the Catholics of Manitoba wished. He spoke of:

> A few concessions so as to give the Catholics what they claim, the control of the religious teaching of their children in their schools, and bring this whole trouble to an end. This would enable the Catholics to pay their taxes to the public schools, and they could be managed according to their own ideas, leaving always in secular matters the obligation on the Catholics to give to their children a teaching up to the same standard and in the same subjects that is maintained in the public schools. I say this would be an end to all the trouble.

This is exactly in line with what has been urged by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), and other speakers tonight—that the best arrangement that could be made would be to enable Catholic children to attend the public schools and get the same education as other children in secular subjects, leaving religion to be taught by their religious teachers. The Minister of Public Works is the special representative of Catholic rights in the Government, or appears to arrogate that position to himself. It was he, and not any Protestant Minister, who made that statement, and he said that little would satisfy the minority.

Mr. OUIMET. I said that if the Bill was passed, a compromise would be very easy, by which everything would become smooth. Don't forget that.

Mr. CASEY. I do not forget that.

Mr. OUIMET. Pass the Bill, and you will see that my prediction was right.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman said even if those concessions were granted, we should go on and pass the Bill. That is what I complain of as being inconsistent. He said that if these concessions were made, the Bill would be wholly unnecessary. If so, why, in the name of all that is logical, should we go on and pass the Bill. The hon. gentleman has some experience in eating crow, and he will have to do some more of it before he is through. He first promised separate schools as they were before 1890. The Bill, of which he is one of the godfathers, does not go nearly that far, and the language he used in the House the other day does not go even so far as the Bill. He will have some difficulty in harmonizing the salad that he will make out of these materials. But there is another Minister who is officially responsible for this Bill—the hon. Secretary of State. Why he took the job of putting the Bill through the Committee, out of the hands of the Minister of Justice, who introduced it, I do not know. It may have been for the purpose of exhibiting the statescraft which he was supposed to possess; but he only showed the possession of what Mark Twain calls a broad and comprehensive ignorance of the principles of the Bill, what led up to it, and everything connected with it. He gave us the history of confederation, but he never showed any comprehension of the Bill itself. His role has been, not to discuss or explain the Bill, but to bulldoze and rampage—to play the old war-horse. I believe there would have been a very good chance of the Government pulling through the present crisis, and probably saving themselves at the polls, if it had not been for the mutiny in the ranks of the Cabinet in the first place and the importation of the Secretary of State in the second place. There can be no doubt now of the result, because at the rate at which he is reading out the members of the party, there will be a very small role call at the end of the session.

Mr. MARTIN. There will be a baker's dozen.

Mr. CASEY. Yes; there will be more than that; there will be fourteen because every member of the Cabinet will remain. Now, the Secretary of State, who has been the chief agent in forcing on this unnecessary Bill, has made speeches on general subjects, but he has made no speech on the Bill itself, nor said anything to facilitate its passage. The Minister of Public Works and the other Ministers have apparently resigned the matter into his hands. Whether the Premier has done so or not I do not know. The Secretary of State has claimed to be the leader of his party. When he was reading some of the members out of the party he said: "Who has a right to speak for the party if not I?" It remains to be seen who will go to the polls as leader of the party. For my part, from a party point of view, I had rather see the party led by the Secretary of State, because he would lead it to greater danger than the Premier. But for the sake of the party it would be deeply to be regretted, it would be almost a scandal in the political history of Canada, should a man, pampered and highly paid, a perfectly useless public servant.

Mr. DALY. This has been going on long enough. I think we have stood enough of this thing. The hon. gentleman started out by complaining there was not opportunity for discussion, and he has not said one word in connection with the clause under consideration.

Mr. MARTIN. The motion is to rise and report progress.

Mr. DALY. I do not think that what the hon. gentleman has stated is germane to the discussion.

Mr. CASEY. Whether the hon. Minister of the Interior thinks this thing has gone on long enough, I shall go on with it as long as it seems convenient to me, and as long as I keep within the rules of debate. I am giving reasons why the motion to adjourn should be adopted, and one of the strongest is that this measure has been put before the House by a half-hearted, dishonest Government.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. CASEY. I withdraw the word "dishonest," and I shall say by a Government that is not actually united in wishing this Bill to succeed. We have to use parliamentary language whatever be the nature of the thing we have to describe, and if it cannot be described in parliamentary language, so much the worse is the thing to be described. I will not say that the Government is not honest, but that it is not united, that there are two heads to it, and that it is impossible to say whether it is Sir Mackenzie Bowell, who has been honest all along in favour of remedial legislation, or the hon. Secretary of State who is shaping the course of the Government in this matter. The hon. Secretary of State may be a war-horse, but he is certainly an elderly war-horse, and nobody can expect him to be here at this hour watching the progress of the Bill of which he is in charge.

Mr. INGRAM. Our leader is not old enough to compel us to keep a water can at his feet and screens around to keep the draughts off.

Mr. CASEY. I did not say that he required to be treated in that way. I did not say that he was decrepid, or unfit to attend to his duties in this House, but I do say that he is unfit to be here at two or three o'clock in the morning.

Mr. OUIMET. Question.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. Minister of Public Works will get plenty of the question before I am through. The question is whether we should stay here at this hour of the morning, when the Secretary of State, who has charge of the Bill, cannot be here to explain it. While the Government are going through the farce of pretending to wish to pass the Bill, when they are making it impossible to have it discussed, the friends of the measure are getting their eyes open to the intentions of the Government, and I can assure those gentlemen that the friends of the Bill in Quebec or elsewhere will not forget this at the polls.

Mr. TYRWHITT. I have not taken part in the debate on this very interesting subject, but I have become so intensely interested, owing to the flood of light which has been thrown on the subject by the hon. member for East Elgin (Mr. Casey) and the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), that I feel almost compelled, even at this late hour, to give my views upon it. I am one of those who are honestly opposed to the Bill. From the earliest period that I have been interested in politics, when separate schools in Ontario were the issue, I was opposed to separate schools in Ontario, and were that question in issue to-morrow, I should be in favour of abolishing those schools.. I feel that the Government, in undertaking to impose this legislation upon the young province of Manitoba, whose people are unanimously opposed to it, have undertaken a difficult task. The hon. Secretary of State has described those opposed to it as an insignificant minority. Possibly, owing to his long absence from the country, he is not aware of the feelings of a large section of the Conservative party in Ontario; but later on he will find that though possibly for various reasons, they appear an insignificant minority in this House, a very large majority of the people of Ontario, who will express their opinion later on, not only as opposed to separate schools in Manitoba, but in favour of the repeal of the separate school system in Ontario, and the establishment of the national school system for the entire Dominion, will endorse the course of that minority. It appears to me that I am treating this subject at this early hour with a greater degree of sincerity than possibly the small audience I have before me would warrant. I have listened very attentively to the arguments during this debate, and in the earlier part of the debate, and must confess that I was occasionally convinced one way or the other; but latterly, I am inclined to look on the whole subject as a joke, and have returned to my original conviction. I voted against the second reading, and propose to record my vote against the third reading, should we be unfortunate enough to reach that stage. For the information of the House, as it is a common practice to read from the reports of the journals of the day, giving their opinion on the question at issue, I might quote, from the Montreal papers, their opinion of what is taking place in this House. Though opposed to the dual language, I feel compelled to read you an extract from "La Presse":

> La séance d'hier, qui a duré de 10 heures du matin à minuit, fera époque dans nos annales parlementaires, en ce qu'il n'a été absolument rien fait de sérieux : toujours des discours pour tuer le temps, de la part des obstructionnistes. L'hon. M. Laurier, et presque tous ses partisans français de la province de Québec, étant absent, la loyale opposition était virtuellement conduite par M. McCarthy, qui donnait le signal des discours.

I may tell the House that, in my earlier years, I attended, during four years, schools that were altogether Catholic, and I have never discovered that they had any injurious effect upon me at the time, nor should I be afraid to-morrow to trust sons of mine or the youth of the country in whom I am interested, to schools of that character. But one of my reasons for being opposed to separate schools —not a new one, by any means —is the fact that with our separate schools we divide the children of the country into hostile camps. We know that the friendships contracted in youth are carried on later in life, and I think that if the youth of our country, of different creeds and nationalities, were brought together in their early days, they would become more friendly in after life, and that reason alone should be sufficient to induce any of us to favour the national school system.

Mr. LACHAPELLE. In the province of Quebec we have separate schools, Protestant and Catholic, and we are all friends. I do not see, therefore, how the hon. gentleman can conclude that we can be friends only where there are no separate schools.

Mr. TYRWHITT. I do not suppose that anything I may say would influence the hon. gentleman. I am not asking him to believe what I say, but am simply giving my own honest convictions, and they are the convictions of a vast number of other people, brought up in the same political school in which I was brought up in the province of Ontario. When the hon. Secretary of State talked about reading men out of the party, it appeared to me it would be necessary for him to read out the entire Conservative party in Ontario, because that has been a part of our policy for years past. I have been a pretty steady follower of the Conservative party, and I was going to say that, possibly, if they change their policy, I might change my views. As an old Conservative. I find it impossible to take such a rapid curve as has been described as our duty by the hon. leader of the House. The hon. leader of the Opposition has described his objection to the schools in Manitoba on the ground that they are possibly Protestant schools. I have a work here by Mr. Wade, which has been quoted often in this House as an authority, and he gives the regulations of the advisory board regarding the religious exercises in those schools. The reading exercises comprise selections from the English version of the Bible, and the Douay Roman Catholic version. Certain forms of prayer are also provided. It would be highly improper for me to read any of these portions of scripture to my audience in their present frame of mind, and I would refer them to page 44 of Mr. Wade's book. I know that you, Mr. Chairman, take a very great interest in this Bill, and I hope that during the debate which I am told is to last day and night for the remainder of the session, that I may again have an opportunity of addressing you when you have received a little well-earned rest and refreshment, and when you will no doubt be in a better frame of mind to receive impressions from my remarks, which will no doubt convince you, as they must convince the majority of members in this House, that this Bill is altogether opposed to the good sense of the people of Canada.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I have not taken up much of the time of the House in discussing this question, but I have patiently listened to the arguments during the last two or three days, and I agree with the leader of the House, that it is one of the most important Bills which has ever come before Parliament during the twenty-eight years we have been a confederation. No matter how well the Bill could have been drawn, or no matter how consistent one clause of it might be with the other, it must naturally be expected that a great deal of discussion will take place upon it. This is one of the most important clauses of the Bill which we are now considering, and I agree with the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) that it has not received proper attention. Although the Ministers are paid $8,000 a year each, not a single one of them, but the Minister of the Interior has been here to explain this Bill to us. The Government have no right to ask hon. members to sit at this unreasonable hour in the morning, and I do not believe that the country will sustain the Government in forcing legislation such as this through the House, in such a manner. Out of 215 members, there are only about thirty here, and two-thirds of those are asleep. The Minister of Justice has probably some reason to give to the House why these contradictory clauses were put in the Bill, and it is an outrage upon the House to cause us to sit here until six in the morning, without being able to get explanations. The hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) is the only person who has really discussed the matter, and he has presented several strong reasons why this clause should not pass. I would like to hear some opinions from the members of the Government in rebuttal of his arguments before I form an opinion on this matter. It is not unreasonable to ask now that the committee should rise, and the House adjourn. There are several important committees, such as Agricultural and Railways, summoned for to-morrow morning, at an enormous expense, and unless the House adjourns, they cannot meet. Although the Government may think we have made no great progress with this measure, yet I think we have made sufficient progress to satisfy the mind of any reasonable persons. This Bill is irrevocable. After it has passed, this Parliament cannot change it, and I would press upon the House that such a measure as that should not be discussed at this hour. It cannot be reasonably expected that a Bill of such tremendous importance as this can pass through the House in a few days. Take the Criminal Code, which was introduced by the late Sir John Thompson. It was first discussed in the Senate ; but he considered it of so much importance that he did not press it the first session, but left it over in order that he might get the opinions of judges and prominent lawyers and others all over the country upon its various provisions, so that at the following session he was able to present to Parliament a carefully prepared measure. You see the care and attention with which he guarded the rights of the people in that instance. How long was that Bill discussed in the House? It was first referred to a special committee, composed of the leading members on both sides of the House, and was gone over carefully by them, and when it was brought into this House, several weeks were spent in discussing it. Yet what was that Bill in importance compared with this? As the Secretary of State has said, this measure transcends in importance the Criminal Code, or any other Bill that has ever been introduced into this House. We could amend or repeal the Criminal Code; but here is a Bill which, once it goes on the statute-book, we have no power to amend or repeal. And the idea of having all-night sessions, with 25 or 30 members in the House, and to pretend that we are legislating—it is a roaring farce, and a positive disgrace to the Government of the day. They are trying to pass this Bill through without discussing it or saying a word upon it. I object most decidedly to any such proceeding. The more I study the Bill, or read about it or hear it discussed, the more I think it is not a measure that ought to be passed in its present shape at all. We shall have to meet here again in two or three months, and why not let the Bill stand over until we come back here fresh from the country. Instead of taking up the Estimates and trying to pass them, so as to avoid having another session of Parliament, the Government are wasting the time of the House with this measure, and involving the country in an expense of over half a million dollars to get this Bill passed. The Government had six months to prepare the Bill before the House met; and yet, although the House was called together on the 2nd of January for the express purpose of passing this Bill, its second reading was not moved until two months afterwards. And what sort of a Bill is it? It is unworkable and unconstitutional. Nearly every clause in it requires to be put into proper shape. The Minister of the Interior declared that one section was going to be abandoned because it was unconstitutional.

Mr. DALY. I did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. CAMPBELL. You stated that you had grave doubts.

Mr. DALY. I said there were grave doubts. I did not say it was going to be abandoned.

Mr. CAMPBELL. You stated that there were grave doubts whether there was power to pass it, and you were going to reserve it for further consideration. That was only on the 4th clause. How many more will there be before we get through? At that rate you will have to reserve about 30 clauses out of the 112. This only shows the carelessness, the negligence and the ignorance of those who drew up this Bill, although having all this time to prepare it. If the Government were in earnest, why did they not move to take Mondays and Thursdays for the discussion of this Bill two months ago?

Mr. SMITH (Ontario). Would you have supported them?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I would have listened to their arguments, and there was every reason why they should have taken them. But it was only last week that they took the two days, showing that it was a farce. And now, in order to make the people believe that they are in dead earnest, they are making a pretense of rushing the Bill through in the last days of the session without any debate. Why, the thing is ridiculous; and they expect the people to believe them. The Secretary of State gets up and says he is going to die for this Bill, and then he goes off to sleep every night at nine or ten o'clock, and the next day comes back refreshed. The whole thing is a roaring farce from beginning to end. The Government only brought in the Bill as a pretense. If they wanted to remedy the grievances of the minority in Manitoba, they would give something besides this Bill, which does not provide for a dollar to carry it out.

Mr. DUPONT. We will amend it.

Mr. CAMPBELL. That is what we are trying to do. Several amendments have been proposed, but the Government have voted them down. The Manitoba government being opposed to the Bill, will certainly not contribute a dollar to carry it out; and if this Government were sincere, why did it not put a clause in the Bill providing that if the Manitoba government did not give any money, this Government would? They bring forward a Bill which they know is unworkable, which I believe is unconstitutional, and which they call a Remedial Bill. It is remedial in nothing but the name. The Government are playing with the people. They never had the slightest intention of making this Bill become law, from first to last, and delayed bringing it in until the session was through.

Mr. DUPONT. Make it law and that will be a good joke against them.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Of course they will have to face the music. The course of the Government has been one of obstruction. They have not tried to pass the Bill. Why, the hon. leader of the House, in the various bitter, insulting and tantalizing speeches which he has made, contributed, in no small degree, to preventing its passage, and evidently must have spoken purposely for the purpose of obstruction, because it is hardly credible that a man of his ability and long parliamentary experience would be such a fool as to make these bitter speeches, if he did not want the Bill to fail.

Mr. DUPONT. Then you are playing into his hands by obstructing.

Mr. CAMPBELL. No, I am just pointing out where he has been obstructing by making these speeches. I simply rose to make a remark or two, and have not taken up any of the time of the House. I am waiting to hear the argument of the hon. member for Bagot on the amendment he proposes to move, and I hope he will speak in English, so that I may be able to follow him. I always take great pleasure and interest in reading the translations of his speeches. I remember his speech last session on this same subject, which I thought was one of the ablest speeches ever delivered in this House. It seems to me that the Government ought to grant this motion to adjourn. Here we are, a deliberative assembly, discussing the most important measure ever brought forward in this House, according to the authority of the hon. leader of the House. After being here all night, we are naturally tired, and it is only fair that we should be given an opportunity to rest and come back refreshed. The hon. member for Bagot will then be able to put his motion to the House, and I myself will feel like supporting him. I, therefore, think that this motion now before the House should be adopted.

Mr. McMILLAN. I wish to say a few words before the question is put. It seems to me that the committee should rise and report progress, if only for this reason that the Minister of Justice has just come back from Manitoba and that we ought to have a statement from him at the earliest moment regarding the conference at Winnipeg. Then we require to make up our minds with regard to certain clauses of the Bill which, according to the Minister of Interior, are unconstitutional, and which, according to the Minister of Public Works, would be better left out. The hon. Minister of Justice was not prepared to give an opinion, and that being the case the House should adjourn to give him every opportunity to deliberate and form an opinion. According to the decision of the English Privy Council, it is not essential that the statutes repealed by the Act of 1890 should be re-enacted. What was the grievance of the people of Manitoba? It was that by the Bill of 1890 they had been deprived of the right of having religious exercises in the schools. My own opinion is that it was not necessary to enact this long measure in order to redress the grievances of the minority. We all admit that, according to the decision of the Privy Council, there was a grievance, and that that grievance should be redressed, but it was to be redressed in the most amicable manner possible. Let me say that it is not the eyes of our people alone that are on the Government, but of the people of the old country as well. I had a letter from a young friend of mine in Glasgow on Saturday. He had been observing very closely for the last four years that there had been trouble in school matters and that the province had passed a Bill which they thought was reasonable but that the Dominion had taken action ; and he asked if I thought that the School Act of Manitoba would be settled this season. The members of the Government said that it was the speeches delivered by members of the Opposition which was the cause of the North-west Territories not being filled as rapidly as we desired, but it is the course of the Government on this school question which has done more to keep the people from going to North-west Territories and Manitoba than any other question that ever came up. If this Government persists in enforcing this Bill upon Manitoba, by and by they will seek to impose a similar Bill on the North-west Territories, and immigration will be retarded to an indefinite extent. The hon. Minister of Public Works said it was of the utmost importance that uniformity should prevail among the schools in Manitoba. If that were so, the Government would not have appointed this school board, but should have allowed the advisory board that is in existence to perform the functions provided for in this clause. I find All these things which are required to be done, could have been performed by the advisory board which is in existence under the present school law in Manitoba, and it would save a great deal of money to the people. This question of economy is of the utmost importance in a young country, and I can say that, from the experience I have had in Ontario, where I have lived since before our present school system was inagurated. A very great hardship was imposed upon the people of the province of Ontario to find funds in the early settlement to enable us to have schools, even when the whole land was available for settlement. What must it be in the province of Manitoba and the North-west Territories, where a certain portion of the land has been set apart for railway companies, and where the settlement is very sparse. I might quote from page 24 of the Manitoba school case to show, that even according to the view of the Government, this law when once passed is irrevocable both by the Parliament of Canada and by the provincial legislature. That being the view of the Government, it certainly is a very unwise thing to impose upon a young country like Manitoba, two expensive school boards. That makes it all the more important why every clause of this Bill should receive the greatest discussion from this House. Indeed, Sir, if the Government were in earnest, they would have had this Bill ready when the session first opened.

Why shoud we pass any Bill, much less such an important Bill as this, without a single member of the Government being able to give a satisfactory explanation of it. I noticed that when the leader of the House introduced this Bill, he did not give any opinion about its provisions, and when asked the other day to do so, he still sat mute and dumb. I could quote the words of the Minister of Public Works to show that a very small amount of legislation was necessary to provide for the removal of the grievances of the minority of Manitoba. He admitted that all the Catholics of Manitoba had been deprived of was their religion in the schools, and that they would be satisfied if that were restored to them. Now, if he uttered the sentiments of the Government in that, why should they get up a Bill with so many intricate clauses, when a couple of simple clauses would have given the minority all that they require. The whole course of the Government in this matter places them in a most ridiculous position. They should have been ready and able to give thorough explanation of the provisions of this measure before they asked the House to pass upon it. The government of Manitoba have stated that they would be willing to grant redress of the grievances of the minority, and Mr. Ewart himself admits that, in the course of an interview which was published in the newspapers. My opinion is, that if this Government had sent a commission in the first place, when there was plenty of time to consider the matter and to talk the question over peaceably with the Manitoba government, we would have no difficulties staring us in the face at the present time. But hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches only sent that commission to Manitoba when they found that the sentiment of the country was very strongly in favour of it. When that commission was sent, there was no time to discuss the question, and no time for the government of Manitoba to pass the necessary legislation. Our Government have not shown a disposition to deal fairly with Manitoba. The feeling went through the country that this Government were determined to coerce Manitoba, but they will discover that they will fail in doing that. Mr. O'Donoghue, who went before the Government here, stated plainly that he had come in contact with a large number of people in Manitoba, that he had been closely connected with the schools there, that he found there was a disposition, even on the part of the Roman Catholics, to adopt the school system which had been brought into existence by the local government, and that it was only a question of time when the Roman Catholics would be in favour of it. He said he had two daughters who were teaching in the public schools, and they never could see any objection to the nature of the teaching given there. I hold it was the duty of this Government to have dealt in the most friendly manner with the province of Manitoba. Even if they failed in their negotiations, a Bill of a few clauses, giving to the minority the right to have religious teaching in the schools, would have been sufficient. If they had done that, it would have saved all this strife and wrangling. I have lived in Ontario for fifty years, and I know we have had a great many heartburnings in reference to our schools. If this Bill should become law, I am not certain whether it will not create a spirit among a certain class in the province of Ontario that will advocate for a change in our present school system. I hope that the Government will withdraw the Bill even at this late stage. I believe that even yet, if Manitoba were approached in the proper spirit, an amicable arrangement could be arrived at. Interference with the legislation of any province in the Dominion should be the last resort. In 1890, when the Manitoba Education Act was passed, there was a large majority in favour of it. In 1892, there was a general election, and the House met in 1893, when a resolution was brought in to repeal the school law. What was the result in that legislature, fresh from the polls, where the one question at issue was the Manitoba school law ? A full House contained 40 members, and there were 39 present, one occupying the Chair, and the vote stood 34 to maintain the law, and only 4 for its repeal. When we consider the feelings of the people of Manitoba on this question, we must come to the conclusion that they are wedded to the system of schools now in existence there. Then, when we consider that this question was before the people in the recent elections in the province, can we say that the people of Manitoba have given such a verdict as would warrant this Government in imposing a law upon them contrary to their wishes ? A large majority of the people of Manitoba are perfectly satisfied with the school system as it stands. In the rural districts especially, it would be impossible to have separate schools, owing to the sparseness of the population. It is only in Winnipeg, and in two or three other places, where any trouble would exist at all, and, I believe, that trouble could be overcome to the satisfaction of both the minority and the majority of the people of Manitoba. This Government has been spending large sums of money to bring settlers to the North-west, but they have utterly failed. A great many of those who came have been leaving the country, and if this Bill is imposed on the people of Manitoba contrary to the wishes of the majority, and contrary to the wishes of a very respectable number of the minority, it will put an end to immigration in this country for a number of years. People all over the world are becoming alive to the importance of education, to the prosperity and progress of a country ; and no system of education can be built on a solid foundation that will keep people apart in childhood, when the deepest impressions are made and the most lasting friendships are formed ; but it will cause a spirit of hostility to spring up between the children thus separated. Let us have in Manitoba such a system of education as they have in New Brunswick, which the Secretary of State admitted was giving the greatest satisfaction to the people of that province. I have never been able to understand how the Secretary of State, after boasting that he had introduced the Nova Scotia school law, which has given so much satisfaction to the people of that province, could try to force a Bill through this House to destroy the very same system in the province of Manitoba. Since the people of Nova Scotia have settled their school affairs in a peaceable and amicable manner, why could not the people of Manitoba do the same thing for themselves ? The people of Manitoba have not had an opportunity to settle this question for themselves. Before the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council reached them, the Dominion Government summoned them before them to discuss that question. This Government, before being certain what that judgment contained, except by telegram, took it out of the power of the Manitoba government to effect a settlement. A great many were under the impression—I believe the Government themselves were—that the decision would be favourable to the majority of Manitoba ; and when the decision was known, it was the bounden duty of the Government to have approached Manitoba peaceably, instead of sending up the remedial order. After sending that order to Manitoba, they caused the statement to be published over the length and breadth of the Dominion that they had no power to do anything more than they had done—to receive the judgment from the Privy Council, and to pass it on to Manitoba. That theory is now exploded. The Minister of Justice, in his place in this Chamber, said that the Government were not bound to grant the appeal ; they could have left it alone, or granted a smaller measure of relief. This country has been at times agitated by other questions, and they have been settled amicably, and why not this question ? We know that disputes between the Dominion and other provinces, the province of Nova Scotia with regard to confederation, the province of British Columbia with regard to the terms of union, and the province of Ontario with regard to the boundary and other questions—have been settled amicably. All these cases should have satisfied the Government that there was a better way to settle these grievances than to invoke the whole force of the constitution upon the heads of the people of Manitoba. I believe the government of Manitoba are to-day very anxious to have a settlement ; but it was most injudicious to send up a commission at the time it was done. They seemed to think they were going to terrorize the people of Manitoba to come to the terms of the Dominion Government. This is a question I am deeply interested in ; I have a number of friends in the North-west who are deeply interested in this question ; the welfare of that country and of the whole Dominion depends on this question being settled quietly and peaceably, without coercion in any form. I do not believe this Bill will become law. I was amused the other morning when a resolution was moved, on which the House was practically unanimous, and when the Secretary of State to impede the progress of the House, called for the yeas and nays. I never saw a clearer case of obstruction in this House. When I see such obstruction on his part, I do not believe the Bill will become law. There is a fair and reasonable desire on the part of this side of the House to have the Bill discussed, but the Government are not disposed to discuss it. They do not seem to know its different clauses or what is in it. I am under the impression that the Minister of Public Works could never have given utterance to the sentiments he expressed here, if he had truly understood the conditions of this Bill. In discussing the appointment of separate school inspectors in Ontario, the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes) said that they were all appointed on the recommendations of the Bishops of the Roman Catholic church. Now, I happen to konw something of the last appointment that was made. I have been acquainted with the gentleman for a great number of years, and I know that he was appointed on the recommendations of the school board and of prominent public and business men of the district. I was asked myself to give a recommendation to Mr. Prendergast, which I would not have been asked to do, if he had been appointed on the recommendation of the Roman Catholic Bishops. I am proud to think that Ontario manages her school affairs with one Department of Education. And if the school system of Ontario can do with the one department, why should not the school system in Manitoba be managed by the one board ? Why should we impose a number of officials upon that young, growing country where every precaution should be taken to make the schools as efficient as possible. There can be no uniformity between separate and common schools, if two distinct boards are to be established. This Government has made the greatest muddle of the Manitoba school case that could possibly be made. Had the late Sir John Macdonald lived to see this day, the question would have been peaceably settled, and it would never have been introduced into Dominion politics, but we have a class of gentlemen at present conducting the affairs of the country who do not seem to know their own mind. We are reminded every day by their conduct of the kick that six or seven of them made at the opening of the session. We cannot come to any other conclusion, from all we have witnessed, but that there is division in the Cabinet with respect to this Bill. They tell us that they have always been in perfect accord ; but if so, what was the cause of the kick that took place and lasted from the 2nd to the 7th of January ? And what was the cause of the crisis when the House adjourned from the 9th January to the 15th ? They have called each other traitors and all sort of names, and yet they have the assurance to tell us that all has been peace and harmony and good will on this school question Bill, which they are determined to impose on Manitoba. The Bill itself was introduced too late to give any guarantee that it would pass. It is perfectly ridiculous to suppose that a Bill of this kind, containing 112 clauses, could be discussed with any degree of care in the short time at our disposal. In order to discuss it properly, we should compare it, not only with the Manitoba Act of 1890, but with the various Acts before 1890 ; and these were only put into our hands last night. Taking all these things into consideration I hold it is the duty of the Government to accept the motion before the House for the committee to rise and report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. BAIN. I have a feeling of regard for the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Daly), and I propose to discuss the resolution of the motion to adjourn. It is preposterous to expect a Cabinet Minister to stay here all night and have to get his refreshments brought to his seat, and yet be in a position to intelligently discuss the question before the House. In fact, it will take considerable refreshments to enable the hon. gentleman—and I am not speaking slightingly of his ability—to discuss successfully the exhibit made by the hon. member for West York of the books he proposes to thrust upon the people of Manitoba in their separate schools. The idea of putting upon the province a series of books that has met with such severe condemnation from official sources in Ontario where used, should be sufficient to convince us that we ought not to go with this Bill, especially after this long night's sitting; and if the Government insist on continuing the sitting, I can only come to the conclusion that they do not want the Bill passed and are looking around for some excuse to drop it on the way. When the hon. Secretary of State introduced the Bill, he took particular care to discuss everything but the Bill itself, and if we were to follow his example we would talk about everything from confederation downwards and give the Bill a rest. Such being the condition of things, it is preposterous to expect that this House is going to enter into an intelligent discussion of this measure. It is simply beyond human capacity, and if the Government insist that the House shall sit, they either intend to force the Bill through, in the face of physical exhaustion of members, or else they are not able to sustain an intelligent discussion of the measure. I am strongly inclined to belive that there is a good deal of force in the view taken by the hon. member for North Victoria in that noted letter of his to the "Mail and Empire," in the early part of the session, in which he said that the Government have not got one opinion on the question, but were divided in their sentiments and were only anxious to tide over the present difficulty and let the future take care of itself. They are thrusting upon us legislation that does not properly belong to this House. If the great political leader of that party, the late Sir John Macdonald, were living to-day he would never have allowed things to drift on to this muddled condition. On the section before us, we find not only private members of the House but the Minister of Public Works appearing on the scene with amendments to the Bill, which they had declared so satisfactory. The idea of keeping us in session with a fragment of the Cabinet in the House, sometimes one or two Ministers apparently asleep and sometimes not, appears to be a kind of comedy that can only have one effect, and that is to bring legislation into contempt.

It seems preposterous to undertake after an all night session, to gravely tell us that they propose to proceed with the consideration of the clauses of this Bill. If they are physically strong enough, they may force through the legislation in the face of the opposition that has been presented. But what results will follow from legislation of that kind ? It can only have the result of disgusting the people at large, especially the people of Manitoba, and leading to a strong feeling of discontent. On the second reading of this Bill, the leader of the House autocratically decided that at a certain time the discussion should close. The result was, a feeling that the House was being forced into a false position, and when you undertake by brute force to compel men to do what in their nature they are unwilling to do, it simply provokes opposition. I venture to say that that experience seriously widened the breach between the leader of the House and many supporters of the Government, who until that time were at least disposed not to go into open rebellion against the men who had been their political leaders. We are met to-day with another attempt at just the same sort of thing. If I wanted to do the innocent Roman Catholic children in Manitoba a wrong, I should give every facility to rush the Bill through with this clause in it as proposed to be amended by the Minister of Public Works, and to force upon these children a series of school books, without any choice on the part of the authorities of an independent province who should control their own educational affairs. I would not force these school books on the children in the face of the severe condemnation of the character of these books presented by the member for West York (Mr. Wallace). Some person sneeringly called these children in Manitoba "French half-breeds," but whatever their origin may be, there is no text-book too good for them to learn from, and there is no education that can be got for the money, too good to secure for these children, who are to be the men and women of that province. Why should we seek to thrust upon them antedeluvian school books, that are repudiated by educationalists to-day as being unfit for the children of the city of Ottawa. The children here are no better entitled to first-class text-books than are the children on the banks of the Saskatchewan and the Red River ; nor is the cost of efficient school books greater. I repudiate the idea of being a party to any such legislation, and if it comes down to a question of legislating by physical force, I do not believe that the Government will accomplish anything. Any attempt of that sort can only have the effect of discrediting in the country the men who attempt it. The arbitrary mode in which the Secretary of State has undertaken to dictate to this House, and the fact that he is conspicuous by his absence, while the Bill is to be discussed, proves to my mind that the Government does not feel that they are on solid ground in this legislation. The very fact of calling this sixth session shows that the Government never grappled with the question on its merits, and that they never approached Manitoba fairly and equitably in the matter. The Premier was all through that country last summer, and he never attempted to reach a solution of the difficulty that exists. One of the members from Montreal (Sir Donald Smith), whose interest in Manitoba is undoubted, and whose interest in the welfare of the people of that province has been displayed on many occasions, took steps to move in the matter, and until he did that, it seems to me questionable whether the last friendly discussion that took place between the provincial authorities and the delegation from this Government would ever have occurred. It is true that the discussion for the present has proved abortive, but, taken in connection with the previous record of the Manitoba government with respect to the leniency with which they enforced the Public School Act, in the rural sections, I do not feel that there was a fair and equitable ground for reaching a settlement of that question, without our thrusting upon an independent province what must necessarily be unsatisfactory to any free people exercising the rights that the constitution places in their hands. And we cannot forget that the highest court of the Empire has decided that the Manitoba government were perfectly within their power in passing this legislation with regard to education.

If there had been no expression of opinion from the province of Manitoba on that question, we might have supposed that their views were not so fixed, but at least on three occasions this school question has been an issue before the electors in that province, and with the result that the political party that is allied with this Government on Dominion matters, is found to-day in the legislature of Manitoba as strongly opposing the action of this Government here as do the gentlemen who administer the executive of that province. That simply means, that after they had a prolonged experience of the old double-barrelled school system, it proved a burden too grievous to be borne, and that the people of the province have practically unanimously reached the conclusion that they would stand it no longer. To-day the Conservative party of Manitoba are as decided in their sentiments with respect to public schools in that province as are the government of that province themselves. It is pitiful to see the Government, with the splendid majority left to them by Sir John Macdonald, dissipating that majority. Every day or two the Secretary of State reads out of the party some members who have struggled for years in discharging their duties as the people's representatives, while he was occupying the position as High Commissioner in London. It is pitiful to hear an hon. gentleman at the head of a political party, which has been slowly built up by better men, tell those very men that they do not belong to that party with which they have been for so many years associated. By this Remedial Bill we are seeking to force on Manitoba legislation on the school question whether the people are willing to accept it or not. Until the Government are better able to convince the committee as to the necessities of this Bill, it will be better to carry the motion to adjourn. One of the principal results of passing the measure must be to have a magnificent crop of law suits. Much has been said, especially by the Secretary of State, in regard to the sufferings of the Manitoba minority. They are represented as crying to heaven for justice, and it has been pointed out that during six years the minority have been deprived of their just rights. If this legislation is enacted, and the lawyers get a fair show, they will occupy six years in ascertaining what the law is. In the meanwhile, the Catholic children will be growing up, and if the Catholics proceed to construct school buildings they will find themselves heavily burdened within a few years. This is an attempt to place on the statute-book legislation that will be a discredit to our civilization, and to our judgment and policy in administering public affairs. It would be a standing disgrace to impose on an independent province an Act which would lead to serious trouble, and which, in the opinion of the best authorities, would be exceedingly unlikely to accomplish the end in view, if that end is to furnish a good system of education to the minority. Another source of trouble is that there are other measures awaiting consideration. The employees of this House have a right to expect payment for their services when the proper time arrives, and to this end the House should consider at the earliest day possible the Estimates. There is other important legislation to which attention should be given. Among the Bills on the paper is one respecting a railway to Hudson Bay. This should be taken up and carefully considered.

Mr. TAYLOR. Where is your leader ?

Mr. BAIN. I am not hunting for him. I hope he has sense enough to take care of his life. He is an important citizen just now. I don't want him to sacrifice his health like the leader on the other side of the House, who says he is prepared to die before he will see this Bill defeated. But I observe that he is taking his rest at the present time. I do not think my hon. friend who interrupts me is extremely anxious to see this Bill pressed ; or if he is, he has seen new light recently. I do not believe that it is with his approval that we are asked to sit day and night for the purpose of pressing this legislation to a conclusion. I do not think this is the best way to succeed. You know there is a good deal of the old Adam left in humanity still, and although we are descended a good ways down the path since he started into life, when we are pressed and pushed in any direction against our will, there is a tendency to object. I think the Government are pursuing the most roundabout, the most circuitous and the most expensive way they can, to carry out the object they have in view, if indeed they have that object at heart. If they are only obstructing this legislation which they are apparently promoting it, but I think it is an admirable arrangement, because it is an attempt to throw the responsibility on those who feel responsible, while they stand by and insist that the thing shall go on. But, Sir, the people are the masters of Parliament, after all. And sooner or later, they will have to present themselves before their masters to receive their judgment. Were I to venture a guess, I would say that the Government are very much afraid that the people will not endorse their action. I think if they were strong in the belief that the sentiment of the people in this Dominion was in favour of this great big Bill, with 112 clauses, called the Remedial Bill, I am satisfied that if they believed that the people would endorse their action in promoting this legislation, instead of insisting that we should sit night and day and be expected intelligently to discuss this Bill at half-past eight o'clock the next morning, they would not be found trying any such legislative capers. Sir, it is because they dread the people, it is because they fear the popular verdict when the hour of their trial comes, that they are so exceedingly unwilling to face the electorate. But the time will come when they can no longer postpone an appeal to the people, and judging by the action of the Government, they are very much afraid that the people will take away from them the five loaves and the two fishes that have been their care for the last few years. It is evident that there can be no result to this legislation save to stir up feelings of antagonism among people of different race and creed, though it is essential to the welfare of the Dominion that harmony should prevail. Has it come to this that a political leader cannot hold his own without appealing to these sentiments that we all hope had long since been buried ? There are times in the history of every country when a powerful party after having been dominated by a capable leader finds itself without his guidance and assistance and then many members of it realize how far they have drifted away from the anchorage upon which they believed themselves to be resting. I can only hope that the men who are seeking to stir up these unfortunate feelings will be taught a salutary lesson by the electorate. The pressing forward of this Bill in this unreasonable way prevents the consideration of issues that are of the very greatest importance to the Dominion. The hon. Secretary of State, before he assumed the leadership of this House addressed the Board of Trade of Montreal upon the important subject of the trade relations between the colonies and the mother country. That is a question that is growing in importance in the public mind. I observe that the Right Hon. Secretary of State for the Colonies has announced a conference to discuss this matter. And although that issue presents itself for our consideration, we leave it aside to occupy all our time with the consideration of legislation such as this, which is distasteful to an energetic young province upon which in a large measure, the future of our country depends. It looks like nothing less than infatuation on the part of the Government thus to press a measure of a character never before attempted while broad issues such as I have spoken of are awaiting our attention. My hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) has just returned to this chamber. Here is another example of the effect of the course we are taking—we have to legislate in sections, if at all, in order that members of the House may get some rest.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). This is not the first time we have had to do it.

Mr. BAIN. No, it is the second time ; and it is in connection with forcing legislation upon the same unwilling province. Before my hon. friend from Inverness (Mr. Cameron) came in I was pointing out that important measures were neglected because of the unreasonable manner in which this Bill is pressed. I had spoken of the question of the trade relations between the colonies and the mother country. That is a question that must appeal to the patriotism of my hon. friend from Inverness. He is one of those who believe that it is almost a sin to sell anything to the Yankees if we can sell it in Great Britain. He must feel that it would be better both for Great Britain and for the colonies to develop trade within the Empire. The conference to which I have referred will probably take place. The boards of trade of Great Britain have taken an interest in the matter. They seek to increase trade on peaceful lines. They do not adopt the policy which the ex-Minister of Justice (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) about a year ago said was the policy of Britain—to use the army and navy to enforce trade upon unwilling savages. If this conference takes place, our Government will hardly be not so unpatriotic as not to send a delegation. That delegate should go armed with the instructions of Parliament after full discussion. And this is blocked, as are other important matters in order that we may deal with legislation of this kind which can lead to nothing except a long series of law suits and continued ill-feeling among the people. These are the reasons why the committee should rise and report progress, in order that at subsequent sittings members of the Cabinet may be able to answer the questions asked by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) with respect to text books and other questions of importance.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). I must join the protest entered against the prolongation of this discussion. It is high time that the House adjourned in order to give hon. members an opportunity of rest. The Government will not gain anything by conducting the debate in this way. Up to three o'clock this morning the question was debated on its merits; but when that time arrived hon. members thought it time to protect themselves, and if necessary to discuss other matters than the clause under consideration. Especially are they justified in adopting such a course when the Ministers are absent or are not ready to defend the Bill. Hon. members need rest for another reason. The House is to be placed in possession today of certain valuable information in connection with the recent mission to Manitoba. That mission was a most important one, and we all expect to obtain a full account as to what transpired between the Dominion commissioners and the government of Manitoba. Were the House now to adjourn, we would be able at the next sitting, perhaps, to obtain this information, and then be able to discuss the subject intelligently. Hon. members are being overtaxed, and yet the Government only the other day committed themselves to the eight hour system with regard to certain of their employees, and at the same time hon. members are called upon to sit not twenty-four hours, but one hundred and forty-four hours, or the entire week. That is not fair, and surely the Government should treat hon. members as well as they do their servants, and it must be remembered that the Ministers take long rest and absent themselves from the House.

Mr. DALY. The hon. gentleman is incorrect. I am here prepared to answer any question pertinent to the amendment under discussion. I have never been asked any.

Mr. WALLACE. I have repeatedly asked questions of the Government and no answer has been forthcoming. I asked the Minister of Public Works and other ministers questions time and again in regard to particular clauses. The statement is incorrect that Ministers have not refused to answer questions. They have refused time and again.

Mr. MULOCK. I will give an instance. I asked the Minister of Justice for some information, especially as to whether the minority had asked for certain things found in subsection "b." The Minister of Justice looked at the remedial order and gave me a very partial answer, and suddenly rose and left the Chamber. I thought he was called away suddenly, but the Minister of the Interior said he would be absent some time. He has not yet returned, and although the clause was carried, no answer has been given to my question. The Minister of the Interior was present at that time. Therefore in my opinion the statement of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) is fully sustained.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). I wish to say that the Government would make more substantial progress if the House sat only from three o'clock in the afternoon until three o'clock in the morning, especially if during that time the legal members of the Government were present prepared to answer questions. I am interested in the proceedings of the Railway Committee, which meets to-day, and I am going to attend its sittings. It is, however, not fair that the opportunity should not be afforded to attend the committees and the committee work go on. What is the particular urgency in regard to this Manitoba school question? It is really no more urgent than are other great issues before the people, yet it has occupied the whole attention of Parliament this session. There are other important questions. There is for example the question of improved Imperial trade relations. True, that this has been discussed to some extent, but it has not received full consideration. The most important question for this country is the material development of the Dominion. We have done nothing in that direction this session. We should be more concerned in regard to the settlement of the North-west, to immigration, establishing a mining and an iron policy rather than be taking up the time of the House in discussing this miserable school question, which will not be settled no matter what policy may be adopted. It must be remembered that this question is not going to be settled by a vote of the House this session. Hon. gentlemen will have to face the people and assume the responsibility of their actions. It is going to be one of the leading questions at the forthcoming elections. Those who now sit in this House and who go before the people for re-election will be held responsible by their constituents for their conduct here. By passing the Bill now they will not evade that responsibility. Hon. gentlemen talk about the constitution. It is not the constitution that governs this country—this Dominion is governed on principles of parliamentary responsibility. Every party is responsible for its programme, and every individual member is responsible for his vote. He cannot seek refuge behind the constitution or a decision of the highest court. It is true we have a written constitution, but we have parliamentary government in connection with it. Candidates at the forthcoming elections will be called upon to take their stand on one side or the other, and they will be asked to outline their position on this question as regards the formation of new provinces. It is true we have a dual system of education in Ontario, which it is not proposed to disturb, but the question is whether in new provinces we shall have such a system incorporated in the constitution. I am afraid the House and the Conservative party have been misled on this school question owing to the fact that there are too many lawyers in the Cabinet. They have a trick of taking refuge in the law. When it is a question as to whether this measure will be for the public good, they say that the law says so and so, and the question must be settled in that way. The Government would occupy a much stronger position if there were fewer lawyers and more statesmen in its composition, and if they had regard for our political welfare rather than for the constitution. I wish to give an illustration. If a departmental store had a lawyer at the head of each of its departments, it would not achieve much success. It is the man who studies public sentiment, the man of affairs who has intelligence and common sense who succeeds, and the Conservative party has been injured rather than benefited by the fact that there are so many lawyers in the Government, and that so much attention is paid to constitutional issues than to the true welfare of the country. I can give an example in the case of one leading man of the country, who is connected with the Liberal party. On being asked his opinion in regard to the introduction of a protective policy into Canada, he said : " My dear Sir, I am giving my whole attention to the study of the constitution ; I think my fort is in that direction, and I do not care about industrial progress." That too truly represents the position of many members not only in the Liberal party but in the Conservative party who have a legal turn of mind. In regard to the special clause under the consideration of the committee, much information is yet required, and in order that it may be furnished the committee should rise and report progress. If there are members who wish to discuss this particular clause, I am willing to vote for the amendment that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. MARTIN. I scarcely think the committee will be willing to accept that amendment, because it seems that some fresh members are now coming in who have not heard the arguments that have been adduced in favour of the motion which is now before you. Now, one strong argument which was alluded to by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) is the fact that at half past ten this morning the members of the Railway Committee have been notified to attend a meeting of that committee to consider five Bills. The first one is a Bill to secure the safety of railway employees and passengers, in which the hon. member for York is interested. Representatives of the great railway companies are coming here this morning at great inconvenience to themselves, to take part in this discussion, but the Government, by their course in insisting that the committee shall continue to sit upon this Remedial Bill, will prevent the Railway Committee from taking up that railway Bill. I admit that the clause of the Remedial Bill now before us is a most important one. The Minister of Interior has said that the Government were here prepared to answer questions, but I say they have not been prepared to answer questions. I say that this is one of the most important clauses in this Bill. It is so important that the hon. member for Quebec County (Mr. Frémont), a Liberal who supports the Bill, seconded by the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Dupont), have introduced an amendment which changes the whole meaning of the clause. That amendment was introduced at about half past two o'clock this morning. The Government propose that the separate schools of Manitoba should take the text books that are provided for the separate schools of Ontario, and the text books that are provided for the high and public schools in Manitoba. Strong reasons have been assigned why that would be an outrage upon the people of Manitoba, upon the separate school supporters of Manitoba. The Government themselves are prepared to recede from the proposal which is contained in the Bill, because they have told us that, without any discussion, they intend, when this particular amendment is voted down, to introduce an amendment to the section by providing that the school books which are now in use in the separate schools of Ontario and in the high schools of Manitoba, shall for all time to come be the text books for the separate schools of Manitoba. Now, that is a matter that we should not be compelled to swallow at one gulp. It would be a great mistake in the interest of separate schools in Manitoba that we should acknowledge the principle that no better book could be written in the future than now exists in connection with morals and religion from a Catholic standpoint. Now, surely, Mr. Chairman, that is a question that ought to be considered carefully, and the House at the present moment is not in a condition to consider anything. Of course those members like the Secretary of State, who is proceeding to die for this Bill and for the country by quietly going to bed at nine o'clock in the evening and after a good sleep and a good breakfast, coming on to see how the poor unfortunate members like myself, who have had to stay here, are getting along. They, perhaps, may be in a position to consider this matter. Then, Sir, there is the Bill of the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan), which was to be taken up in the Railway Committee to-day. Although that hon. member is a strong supporter of the Government, even upon this iniquitous Remedial Bill, yet they propose deliberately to insult that hon. gentleman by preventing a consideration of his measure. We have also in the Railway Committee, Bill (No. 61) to incorporate the Toronto, Hamilton and Niagara Falls Electric Railway Company. Gentlemen interested in this railway have put advertisements in the papers according to the rules of the committee, they have paid their fees, and the Bill has been introduced and is now before that committee. It seems to me that it is a great outrage upon the citizens of this country that they should be prevented from having this legislation taken up and considered in committee. Then there is another Bill to incorporate the Hudson's Bay and Pacific Railway from the Hudson's Bay to the Pacific Ocean running through Manitoba, North-west Territories and British Columbia. Yet the Government propose to prevent the distinguished capitalists whose names appear in this Bill, from expending the large amount of money they are prepared to expend in this country in constructing these railways. Now, there is a rule of this House that the Railway Committee cannot sit while the House is sitting, and I would suggest that the Government consent to this committee rising in order that the members of the Railway Committee may attend that committee and proceed with the consideration of these very important Bills. More than that, there is the Bill concerning the Chignecto Marine Transport Railway which stands for a second reading, but all other business before the House is blocked by the insistance of the Government in proceeding with this Remedial Bill. I know that the Government and their supporters are charging the opponents of that Bill with obstruction, but I appeal to the judgment of the hon. members of this committee if every speech which has been delivered until, say, half-past four o'clock this morning, was not a closely reasoned and pertinent discussion of the clauses of the Bill. The hon. member for North Simcoe made the clearest presentation of the law points upon that Bill which I have heard in this House. Now, it is nearly ten o'clock, and I think the Government would do well to adopt the suggestion I have made. If this committee were to rise, as proposed, it would advance the progress of the Bill, and the only theory upon which the conduct of the Government in forcing us to sit night and day can be accounted for, is that they do not want the Bill to pass. It has been openly stated in the Conservative press that the Government could not obtain the second reading of the Bill but upon the promise that it should not go through the committee of the whole. Their conduct in trying to bring the Bill into ridicule furnishes additional proof that they have no desire that the Bill should pass. There are many considerations involved in this question which have not received due attention from hon. members. I do not address myself to members like the hon. member from South Victoria (Mr. Fairbairn) who come here refreshed with sleep and breakfast——

Mr. FAIRBAIRN. We are all right.

Mr. MARTIN. Yes; the hon. gentlemen are all right, but there are other members who have had neither rest nor food.

Mr. FAIRBAIRN. You may go; we do not wish to keep you.

Mr. MARTIN. But I fear that if we, who have shown such an interest in the Bill by staying here all night, were to leave now, some accident might happen to this measure. It is much better that my motion should be carried than that some hon. gentleman hostile to the measure should move that the committee rise. If that were carried, the Bill would be killed, which many hon. gentlemen would regard as most unfortunate. I did wish to point out some features in the documents relating to this case, which, I think, have not received due consideration. But I fear that would be trespassing too much upon the patience of hon. members like the hon. gentleman from Two Mountains (Mr. Girouard), who have been here all night. It would be better that the Government should accept my motion, and then we could come at 3 o'clock and discuss the matter reasonably, and, no doubt, pass a number of clauses. But I do not wish to have these clauses so closely affecting my own province passed at a time when I cannot hear the arguments advanced with regard to them. Even so far as we have gone we have not had satisfactory explanations from the Government. The hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart), who has just come in may be able to do better, but we found the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Daly), and the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Ouimet), very unsatisfactory in this respect.

Mr. FAIRBAIRN. You do the talking, and we will do the voting.

Mr. MARTIN. I regret that that is the tone of the whole Government in this matter. They say in effect : Here is your dose ; ask no questions, but swallow it. But we can hardly blame the Government, for experience has shown that the course they are taking is the best one in their own interest. The Minister of the Interior was foolish enough to discuss one clause, and he found, after discussing it, that the Bill would be better without it. But, so far as the passing of the Bill is concerned, there is no reason for trying to tire out the House. I do not see why the Bill should not get through the committee. There is plenty of time between the 6th—or, this is the 7th, I believe—there is plenty of time between the 7th and the day for closing Parliament to get the Bill through. But it never can be got through under this plan of operations. The members of the House cannot do business when they are tired out, and so the Bill will be blocked. But that is the object the Government have in view, as has often been charged, and they have not dared to deny it. It cannot be said that, so far as the Opposition are concerned, there has been any obstruction. If any hon. gentleman goes through the speeches that have been made he will be unable to find any indication of a a desire to delay unduly the passage of this Bill. I admit that there has been obstruction on the part of the Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper). For instance, he took up time in the little operation of turning out of this House certain members of his party. But the speeches on this side have been made only with the object of perfecting the Bill. I find the Government guilty——

Mr. MILLER. I would hate to have you for a judge.

Mr. MARTIN. The country will judge them as I do. Is there a member on that side of the House who can show reasons why I am wrong ?

Mr. SMITH. We want to vote.

Mr. MARTIN. That is the usual course—no reason given, only the force of a brute majority. I regret that I have to go to breakfast, and cannot discuss this matter any longer.

Mr. MULOCK. I am glad to notice that the members who have been resting during the night are now returning to their labours. No doubt they would like to know what has been going on in their absence. We have been discussing a motion that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again. If that motion were carried, no doubt the committee would sit again very soon. We are a representative body, and, no doubt, the Government boast that they are the people. Well, the people were engaged, as some would say, in legislating last night. We have about 15 members of the Cabinet, some 13 of whom have seats in this House. This measure, which has been called the most important ever brought to the attention of Parliament, was considered last night by a small section of the House, led by two members of the Cabinet, sound asleep. The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Daly) occupied two chairs. The Controller of Inland Revenue (Mr. Prior) enjoyed blissful slumber during the whole night. Round them were sleepers in all attitudes. Gentlemen who had boasted that they were ready to stand by the constitution were, we may say, sleeping by the constitution. They were, many of them, men who will never occupy seats in this Parliament again, and who will not dare to face their constituents. Many of them, if rumour be true, will enter the peaceful quarters provided for the faithful supporters of the Government, and their names will be added to the civil list. This is called legislation, but is it legislation simply to press a measure through by exhausting the physical powers of members of the House ? Who drew the Bill ? We had it on the admission of the Minister of the Interior that portions of it, at least, were not drawn by the Government, that Mr. Ewart, the counsel for the minority, had demanded that certain clauses be put in. They have been put in, but why, no one can tell. The Secretary of State came into the Chamber last night and sought to disturb the harmony that was prevailing in the debate. I am glad to know that he is just now dying for his country in his own quiet bed. It is part of his methods to pose before the people as a martyr, but when they come to know that this self-created martyr, this self-canonized saint, has had his office in this building transformed into a bed-chamber and ample provision made for his comfort, they will come to the conclusion that he is really not such a martyr as he professes to be. I would ask hon. gentlemen who have any influence with their imperious master to seek to induce him to absent himself from the Chamber, and from brow-beating members and injecting offensive remarks into the debate, and then the committee can proceed satisfactorily with the discussion. I would almost be warranted in promising that if hon. gentlemen opposite would bring a judicial and conciliatory spirit to bear on the debate, and would occupy a fair portion of time, substantial progress would be made at the end of each sitting. I am not speaking for the party, but as a member of the party, and I would use any influence I possess to carry out such an understanding ; but if the Government have taken the bit in their teeth and are determined to sit from Monday afternoon till Saturday at midnight, to sit for a period unexampled in parliamentary institutions, the blame must rest on those who are endeavouring to coerce what should be a free parliament.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It may be as well that we should have a distinct understanding with the Government. This House has now been in session twenty-four hours.

An hon. MEMBER. Where were you ?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I was doing my duty to myself and to my constitution, and I am now perfectly prepared to do my duty to the constitution at large. I want to say a word or two to the members of the Government present. After being in session twenty hours, every one knows perfectly well that any proper discussion of the measure now before us is utterly impossible. That measure under any circumstances is one which would task our energies and require that every hon. member should address himself to it with his brain clear and mind fresh if any good is to come from the discussion. We have been kept here since three o'clock yesterday afternoon. This Chamber has neither been swept nor ventilated, and it looks like it ; the atmosphere has become fouler all the time, and is likely to become more so, and the health and constitution of yourself, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and of members, must be seriously affected. I wish particularly to say a word or two as to the matter of the rights of Parliament. I have not been obstructing this Bill. I have sat here many hours, and have discussed this Bill wholly and entirely as it should be discussed, and I challenge hon. members to say otherwise. But it is my right to point out that while the Government use all reasonable and fair means to carry on the discussion, they have no right whatever to insist on pressing the discussion at such hours as to render it perfectly impossible for hon. members to be here. That is the position which I take, and it is in conformity with the essential doctrine on which Parliament is based. I am not disputing the rights of the Government or the rights of the majority ; I am requiring that they should exercise with decency, patience and fairness those rights, which is not being done in the present instance. I do not object in a case of this kind to the Government taking every day of the week for the discussion. I do not object even to their taking a very long number of hours for the discussion. That I have done in their places, and that I would do again ; but I object to any attempt to bulldoze or terrorize the minority by physical force to carry on a discussion at a time when it is utterly impossible for individual members to be present. It is no answer to say that certain members have exercised their privilege in discussing the Bill in a way that is not acceptable to the leaders. For their actions they are responsible to their constituents, but that does not justify the Government in attempting to force the Bill through under the circumstances I have described. The Minister of Railways, to whom I chiefly address myself, is an old member of the House. He has been a prominent factor in similar exploits, and in holding the House under circumstances for which there was very little excuse. I remember how he and the Secretary of State, when I was Minister of Finance, held the House for forty-eight hours on a question for which there was no show of excuse, because their business was to prevent the House adjourning, and they prolonged the House by speeches abounding in every conceivable irrelevancy and nonsense. It ill lies in the mouths of these hon. gentlemen to read a lecture to hon. members on the question of obstruction. I well remember the Secretary of State, to the injury of many members—and to the great injury of the Chairman as it turned out—held the House eight hours in Committee of Supply, and no item was passed, because the Government had refused to adjourn on St. Patrick's Day, when he wished to deliver an address. I entirely refuse to submit to this tyranny. These rules under which we are carrying on this debate were framed especially for protecting the minority against any such attempts as is being made. I do not want to exhibit to this country the disgraceful spectacle which may occur if the House is very many hours more in session. We are all aware of the methods pursued by some hon. members opposite to strengthen their nerves and their hearts, and I give them warning that if the disgraceful orgies are repeated which occurred on previous occasions, and which I believe led to the death of one hon. member a few days ago, those members will be held up to public reprobation. I am afraid we ought to move to abolish the bar in this House. I can promise all parties concerned that if there be a repetition of those very disgraceful scenes, no regard for the feelings of members will prevent their names being given, and they will obtain all the publicity they desire. On this occasion it is our duty to avail ourselves of all the powers which the minority possess to prevent the Government tyrannizing over them. It is our determination to do so to the full ; but before we are called upon to meet this unpleasant situation, I wish to tell hon. members of the Government present that we are prepared to adopt a modus vivendi, to agree that this House should sit for a reasonable number of hours and adjourn at a reasonable hour, and in that way conduct the discussion, and, further, that we will allow a reasonable number of clauses to be passed from day to day ; but we are fully determined and prepared not to allow this attempt to pass a measure by sheer physical force to prevail. Hon. gentlemen opposite may make their selection and choice. That is our determination. We have done more than that in times past.

For three months and more we succeeded with a far inferior force to that at our disposal in holding up the Franchise Bill. If this question is in such a shape that this measure cannot be passed, who are to blame ? The men who are to blame are the Government. They have no business whatever to attempt to pass this measure during the last five or six weeks of the session, called under the circumstances under which this session was called. If they had been honest in their desire to pass a Remedial Bill, and this has been stated frequently, and will be stated on every husting in Canada, it would have been laid on the Table of the House on the 2nd January, and proceeded with the moment the Address was disposed of. Two whole months were allowed to elapse before the second reading, and the Government knew that the utmost time at their disposal was three months and a half. That shows the hypocrisy of the whole proceeding, that there was no honest desire on the part of the Government to pass this measure ; that shows clearly that there are two distinct factions, one who do not want the Bill, and the other who want to push it through. The Government are wholly to blame for the present position. What was to prevent a session being held in November ? Had a session been held then, this measure could have been passed. Instead of doing so, they waited until 2nd January, and the Government then allowed a whole month to elapse without any substantial progress being made. Then with the full knowledge that the House must dissolve on 24th April by efflux of time, they deliberately spent a whole month over the discussion on the Budget, which was neither necessary nor useful. That is their position. Now, I have no hesitation in saying, because although I cannot judge men's motives, I can judge their acts, that their conduct was utterly incompatible with any sort of real desire to pass this measure. What they want to do now is not to pass the measure. They do not intend to pass the measure, they have not intended, I believe, to pass it ; but they want to shift the responsibility from their own shoulders as far as they can, to the shoulders of the Opposition. They want to be able to say : We did our best to pass this Bill, we sat day and night to pass this Bill, but the Opposition would not let us. If there had been any honest desire on their part to pass the Bill, it is not on the 7th day of April that they would have begun these long sittings. What was to prevent them, if they were really in earnest, from commencing their long sittings on 1st February ? They might have been as far in the Bill as they are to-day, on the 1st February, had they any desire to pass the Bill. I repeat the offer I have made. If the hon. gentlemen chose to show a little common sense, if they desire to spare this Parliament from the disgrace which always attends these protracted sittings, if they desire to maintain parliamentary forms, then let them accept the offer I have made and agree to a reasonable modus vivendi ; let them sit a reasonable number of hours and discuss this measure in a rational manner, for it is utterly impossible to expect that it will be so discussed under the conditions we are now in.

Mr. McNEILL. I entirely concur in the remarks made by the hon. member who has just addressed the committee. What possible benefit can accrue by this extraordinary procedure on the part of the Government ? How can this measure be advanced, if that is really the wish of the Government ? Do the Government really suppose that they can force this measure through the House by the exertion of physical force ? I do not think they can really believe that. If they have the slightest expectation that by merely wearing the members out, by depriving them of sleep and thus breaking down their health, they can succeed in carrying the measure, I am sure they will find themselves entirely mistaken. I am quite sure the course they are adopting is neither calculated to raise this House in the estimation of the country, nor to raise in the estimation of the country, the gentlemen who are responsible for the exhibition which is being made at the present time. I think a reasonable course to pursue would be for the Government to take so many hours of the day for their measure, any reasonable, or almost unreasonable, number of hours for their measure, and that then they should proceed with the other business which is of such great importance to the country, and carry their estimates through the House and thus provide money for the running expenses of the country, so that we may, if possible, not be under the necessity of holding another session of Parliament this year. But the idea of endeavouring to coerce this Parliament by keeping us sitting here day in and day out, the idea that British people can be treated as if they were slaves, is an insane idea. Why, Sir, this is not the leading of a House, this is an attempt to drive Parliament, and this Parliament is not to be driven. This may be all very well if it were an attempt to drive slaves, but the representives of a free people are not to be treated as if they were slaves, and the people of this country do not expect their representatives to be so treated. Now, I will repeat my proposal to the Government, and that is that notwithstanding all the delay that has taken place, notwithstanding the fact that we are forced to discuss this matter at this untimely period of the session, even although this attempt to coerce the House of Commons has been made, still I say that for my part I am willing to let bygones be bygones. I am willing that we should go on with the discussion of this measure for a certain number of hours in a day, and then go on and endeavour to pass the estimates necessary to provide money for the running expenses of the country.

Mr. SMITH (Ontario). Will you do what you can to pass the Bill ?

Mr. McNEILL. Now, my hon. friend knows very well that I am not going to do what I can to pass the Bill, but I am going to do what I can to improve a very bad Bill. My hon. friend knows that I voted against the second reading of this Bill, and at one time I thought my hon. friend was going to vote against the second reading, but he did not do so. I am opposed to the Bill on principle, and I am still very much opposed to the passing of the Bill in its present form. I desire to have the Bill discussed and improved in every way possible, if it is to become law, because in the shape it is at present, it is a mass of absurdities, it is a mass of contradictions. It really would be advisable from the point of view I have been pressing that we should rise and report progress. What is to be gained by sitting here until this hour ?

Mr. JONCAS. We want to give you a chance to discuss the Bill.

Mr. McNEILL. This is not a reasonable time for discussion. Besides, though the Bill is an important matter, there are other important matters to occupy the attention of the House. By sitting at this time we prevent the sitting of the committees, which are most important. For instance, my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Sproule) is chairman of the committee on agriculture and colonization. We all know how important is one of the matters that has this session been occupying the attention of that committee—the question of shipment of meat to England in cold storage—particularly now that our cattle have been scheduled. The sitting of the committee is prevented by an attempt to coerce Parliament into passing this Bill. We are not here to discuss this Bill, it would appear, but we are here to be coerced into passing it. The attitude of mind which leads to coercion is the very reverse of that which leads to discussion. You cannot coerce and discuss at the same time.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Nor can you coerce and negotiate at the same time.

Mr. McNEILL. My hon. friend is quite right, and I have no doubt that more will be said about that later on. If the Government wish this matter discussed, they must withdraw the coercion. The Government virtually say that they do not intend to discuss the matter. It is as well that the country should understand that. I am not surprised that they do not wish discussion, considering the result to them of the discussion thus far. We know that the Minister of the Interior stated that the 3rd clause was essential to the constitutionality of the Bill, and after further discussion he said that, perhaps, it would be well to strike out that clause altogether. Then, in the discussion of the 4th clause, the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), and the hon. member for Queen's (P.E.I.) (Mr. Davies), declared that it was an unconstitutional attempt to interfere with the rights of the local legislature. The hon. gentleman who ought to have charge of the Bill, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Dickey), but out of whose hands it has been taken by the Secretary of State, always discusses a subject in a judicial manner. He is not here now to be questioned upon the subject. But, judging from his argument in this House, I venture to say that he would hesitate before he would say that his mind was free from doubt as to whether we had any power to legislate in the direction proposed in this 4th clause. And when we have three such high constitutional authorities as the gentlemen I have referred to declaring that the clause is unconstitutional, is it any wonder that the Government desire to avoid discussion of the measure ? The attempt has been made to coerce Manitoba, but it has failed, and now the attempt is being made to coerce this free Parliament, and it will fail. In the debate on the Address, I urged that the proper course to take was not that of coercion, but the British course of conciliation and compromise. The Government have admitted by their actions that the course I proposed was the right one. And though the results have not been all that was desired, still they have been such as all must have been glad to observe. A great deal of the acrimony that existed in Manitoba has been removed, and, on the other hand, it has been shown that the Manitoba government wish to deal with this Government, and with the people of Canada, in good faith. Much has been done to break down the barriers which were, unfortunately, raised very much, as I believe, by the injudicious course of the Government in the earlier stages of the controversy. But good cannot result from their attempt at coercion. One result only too likely to follow is the bringing of this House into contempt. If the Government are wise and patriotic they will drop coercion, and proceed with discussion in accordance with the well established usages of Parliament.

Mr. WELDON. I support very earnestly the motion now before us. I see before me the wearied face of the Postmaster General (Sir Adolphe Caron). Why should that faithful servant of the state be compelled to sit here until eleven o'clock in the morning, twenty hours after the Speaker took the Chair. And the Postmaster General is only one of a number equally faithful who are called upon to make sacrifices of health and comfort that should not be demanded of them. "A fair day's wage for a fair day's work" is a maxim among the men who work with their hands, and why should we be compelled to do three days' work in one day ? We must throw upon those who are responsible for rejecting this motion the odium and dishonour which will attach to the deliberations of this Parliament. This is the 7th of April, and we have still 15 days left, excluding Sundays, before, by operation of law, this Parliament is dissolved. The Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) thought ten days enough to fairly discuss this Bill. In that case we should still have five days more than are necesssary for the consideration of this measure. But, I call the attention of those who wish to force this measure through in this manner, that by compelling us to sit day and night they render us unfit to do good work in any hour of the 24. I do not agree with the Minister of Finance ; I do not believe that there is time enough left this session for this Parliament, unfamiliar as it is with school law, and called upon for the first time in its 30 years of existence to legislate upon the subject, to consider the details of such a Bill. The hon. member for South Oxford charged the Government with not being in earnest. If they are not in earnest, they are the most clever comedians who have ever played on a public stage.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What I pointed out was that there were two factions in the Government : one might be in earnest, the other certainly was not.

Mr. WELDON. I will speak as a member of one faction. If the leader of the House is not in earnest, then all recognized signs of earnestness are a delusion. I have been absent from the House for a few days.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You have escaped being read out.

Mr. WELDON. In reading the papers it occurred to me that there must be left in good standing on the front row of this side of the House no members except Ministers, and perhaps Sir Donald Smith and the whip of the party. My breath was almost taken away when I found that my old friend the member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) had been read out, or attempted to be read out, although the Secretary of State seems to have awakened the wrong passenger. I remember after the last elections that the whole front row was without a break, filled by men very much more able and capable than two-thirds of the members of the Cabinet, and I have never concealed that opinion. As a life-long Conservative, having been ten years in the House, my breath was almost taken away on finding that members of the "old guard," those who year after year had gradually forced their way to the front, were being forced out of the party. I do not know what is the standing of the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) ? I do not know whether he has been disciplined or not.

Mr. WALLACE. I am all right.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Harpooners never attack a certain species of whale, because he is too fierce.

Mr. WELDON. I congratulate, not only the member for West York but the leader of the House in not undertaking to drive him from the ranks of the party. These incidents show to one who has been absent for a day or two that these high pressure sittings are having a very bad effect on the Conservative party. The front row is frightfully broken. There may be a rupture among the members of the second row, among the men next in experience and party service. The member for Inverness (Mr. Cameron) is in danger. He will vote with me against the Bill on the third reading. The committee should rise and report progress, for you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, as well as the official reporters and pages are all worn out. Men cannot do business when they have been actively at work for twenty-four hours. No one believes that this Bill containing 112 clauses should be allowed to pass without full consideration. The hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) urged that an arrangement should be arrived at by which the Bill would be taken up at three o'clock in the afternoon and the discussion continued until a specified hour in the evening. If such arrangement were made, more progress would be made in one hour than in three at the present time when the House is under the threat of the lash. I think the Government is between the devil and deep sea, and I reach that conclusion largely by reading the public journals, more particularly the French papers. "La Presse," which has given great attention to this school question and discussed it very fairly, although it sometimes uses the words renegade and fanatic, accused the Government of insincerity when it adjourned some days ago at 3.40 a.m. It declared the Government had given away to the obstructionists. I know perfectly well that the Government had proceeded as far as they could go. The French papers were inspired by an unwarranted fear that the measure would fail. Their papers are forcing the Government forward, and the Cabinet are paying too much attention to those journals, and even to the English papers. I trust the Government will not hurry faster by any pressure brought to bear on them from any quarter outside this House. This question of a school law is a new one to members of this House. I am not thoroughly posted in regard to the Ontario school or in regard to the Catholic system in the province of Quebec. At the earliest opportunity I shall visit Hull or some other place in the province of Quebec and see how the religious exercises are conducted and how the schools are managed. But let us be fair to the administration. It is true that we are making war upon the administration, but we are doing it in order to save the party, we are trying to save the old party. But we say the Administration has led the party wrong. We say the Administration has made a wild bid for the vote of Quebec. We say that is bad party politics, that is deplorable statecraft in this country, or any other, but especially a country like ours made up for the most part of two races. I say it is bad statecraft for the national authority in any country to make an unscrupulous bid for the support of any particular class in that country. The result that might be expected has happened, and you are creating a resentment in the rest of the country, and making the difficulties deeper that we hoped were becoming less. I deplore the move made by the late Minister of Justice. I think much of the disaster that has fallen upon our party in the last year and a quarter, is due largely to the impulsive temperament of that hon. gentleman, and in part is owing to the fact that he was called to a portofolio for which his previous seven or eight years experience had not well fitted him. He had been studying Marine and Fisheries, and was called suddenly to deal with questions of the national importance of this Manitoba school question. I think he should have declined to take that portfolio. But the difficulty in which our party finds itself to-day can be traced to what happened immediately after the death of Sir John Thompson. I wish to make no invidious comparisons, but I say with great gravity, that if the selection had been made by the Prime Minister in January, 1895, that he made in January, 1896, of my hon. friend the member for Cumberland, who is now the Minister of Justice, with the incomparably better opportunities he had had for dealing with a question like this, owing to his long and active legal experience before he took this portfolio, I think the country would not have found itself in the position we are now in. Now, I am not disparaging the ability of the late Minister, I am speaking simply of his want of opportunity. I am sorry that hon. gentleman is not in the House at this moment, but he can read in the "Hansard" what I am saying. I say nothing could be more deplorable than the selection of a gentleman for the portfolio of Justice who had not had the previous necessary training and experience. That is a portfolio for which an expert was wanted, but a gentleman was selected whose best friends even could not claim for him that his previous employment had fitted him for it. On the other hand, the hon. gentleman who now holds that portfolio has been much more fortunate, as every member of this House knows. Not only had he already won a high standing at the Bar of his native province, but for five or six years in this House the member for Cumberland had taken an active part, and had become a very influential member, and his opinions upon all legal questions under discussion, both in this House and in the Committees of this House, were regarded with great respect. Therefore, I do charge that many of the disasters that have overtaken our party and country are due to the fact that an impulsive, an impetuous, and excitable young gentleman was put in charge of a portfolio where coolness, self-possession, learning, judgment and openness of mind, were needed. Now, Sir, I have spoken many times on this school question since 1890, and I have had the pleasure of saying many a time that the position taken by the late Sir John Thompson seemed to me well taken, that his course was skilful, that he was a wise pilot, that he handled this question sailing, as he himself said, by the pole star of the constitution. I do not know that one mistake was made by him in dealing with this question in a constitutional way up to the time of his death ; but since then there has been scarcely an important move made that has not been, from my point of view, a mistake. Let us be just to the Government. The Government has no department of education, it has no corps of experts, such as Mr. Mowat might have, or Mr. Blair in New Brunswick might have, or Mr. Fielding in Nova Scotia might have. There is no minister of education, there is no general superintendent. Therefore this Government must not be impatient when we tell them that their Bill is a bad Bill. You might expect to find it crude ; and I think it was not possible to have chosen any other fifteen gentlemen from this side of the House and put them into the Cabinet, who would have framed a Bill, perhaps, any less imperfect than the present Bill. Now, Sir, the supporters of the Government charge us with obstruction in opposing this Bill. For my part I do not fear that word. During the ten years that I have had the honour to sit in this House, although I have spoken often, I do not think any hon. gentleman can charge me with having intentionally spoken in an irrelevant manner, in a manner not pertinent to the subject under discussion. But I say that the Bill which is under discussion at present, will not be furthered by sitting all day and all night. For this non-important and irrelevant discussion, such it is, the responsibility must fall upon those who insist upon driving us, and keeping us in this unbroken continuous sitting. It has been pointed out that there are two committees who should have sat this morning, the Railway Committee and the Committee on Agriculture and Colonization, but neither of those committees can sit while this House is in committee. There is simply a collapse of business, a suspension of all other business of the House. This Bill can make no progress under these conditions. If you will agree to let the committee rise at some sort of an hour in the morning, and let the members go home and get some rest, and come back in the afternoon, you will get out of them all that it is possible to get out of them. If a man is going to obstruct, he will obstruct; but you are not only justifying obstruction, you are provoking obstruction. Therefore I submit that this motion, that the committee now rise at half past eleven in the forenoon, ought to carry.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I think the members of the committee can not fail to have perceived that the position taken by the hon. gentlemen on this side of the House is unassailable in demanding that the discussion on this Bill should be carried on at reasonable hours, and under circumstances that will permit the members to give it that calm consideration that its importance requires. The importance of this Bill can scarcely be overestimated. It is a Bill that will have to be discussed in various constituencies; the representatives will be asked to explain it, and to explain their votes upon it: and it is very desirable that the fullest discussion of the Bill should take place during hours at which every member of the House can be present. Now, the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) has pointed out that there has been a division on this question in the Government ranks. He has pointed out that many gentlemen on the Conservative side of the House who had greater capacity and ability for administering the affairs of the country than have the members who compose the Government, have now been read out of the party because they were unable to agree with the Government on the question. He has pointed out that there has been scarcely a break in their ranks except in the case of the chief whip of that party; and I venture to think that unless he has been terrorized by the denunciations of his leader, he must soon be read out of the party likewise, or else he must forfeit his word solemnly given to the House. I see that the speech he delivered in the House the other day has been printed. It is headed "Mr. George Taylor's speech in the House. He defines plainly his views on the Remedial Bill." The paper bears his likeness, so that the people may make no mistake. Now, the hon. gentleman said, if this is a correct report, and is said to have been taken from "Hansard":

> For myself, I think the requirements of the constitution and the decision of the Queen's Privy Council would be fully met, if, when the Bill gets into committee, it is amended in this way: That in the province of Manitoba there shall be one national school system, that there shall be one school, and that in that school no religion shall be taught that will be offensive to the consciences of the parents of any child. That would be my view; that, I believe, would settle the constitutional grievance, because it would place the whole of the community on the same footing. That is the view I shall take, when we get into committee on the Bill.

We are now in committee on the Bill and the clause we are considering provides not for a national school system but for a second school system, and of course now is the hon. gentleman's time to propose his amendment. He will be bound, if he is a man of honour, to rise and propose——

Mr. TAYLOR. When you over there give me a chance I will go on.

Mr. PATERSON. I will give the hon. gentleman a chance now. If he meant what he said, he will be bound to use his endeavours to have this clause struck out of the Bill, because it is absolutely contradictory to what he wishes. We cannot believe that a gentleman of his well known sincerity will remain silent under these circumstances. Even though he feels that he is in danger of the attentions of the Secretary of State and that he will no longer be the only Conservative on the front seat who has not been read out of the party, he will, no doubt, carry out his promise.

Mr. TAYLOR. How about the chairman.

Mr. PATERSON. He is not always on the front seat; he occupies the chair of this committee sometimes. If the hon. gentleman from Leeds (Mr. Taylor) looks on either side of him he will see men who have declared their opinions regardless of the thunders launched against them. It is alleged by the Secretary of State that the House having passed the second reading, that was sufficient reason for the House allowing the measure to pass in its crude condition and without due consideration. But as I have pointed out, one of the clauses of this Bill, it has been admitted, may be unconstitutional. If it is unconstitutional, the Bill will be no advantage to the minority but the very contrary; it will confer upon them only interminable law suits and heavy expenditure. But the position the hon. Secretary of State took seemed to me that because a majority supported a second reading, therefore the country sanctions the Bill. But there is this point to be considered. The hon. Secretary of State says that if this Bill does not pass, then in the general election which is immediately upon us, the people of this country will sweep the Opposition away and will send back the Government with an overwhelming majority pledged to this measure. If that is to take place, it will take place within two months. Then there cannot be so much danger for the minority. Will it not be better then that we should go on with the other business of the House. But, so far as this Parliament is concerned, it is a matter of doubt whether many of the gentlemen supporting the second reading represented the opinions of their constituents. It has been matter of congratulation on the part of those who favour the Bill that the members from Manitoba and the North-west with the exception of the member from Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) supported the second reading. That is a strong point, if these gentlemen represent the opinions of their constituents. But let us appeal to the organs of public opinion in that portion of the country. I take, for instance, the Regina "Leader," whose editor has been described by the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) as a prodigy of editorial ability.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). And brought up at the feet of Gamaliel.

Mr. GIBSON. One of his own disciples.

Mr. PATERSON. Does the Regina "Leader" speak for the hon. gentleman's constituents ? This is what is says :

> FOR OR AGAINST.
> To say that a majority of the people of Western Assiniboia felt amazement, chagrin and humiliation when the report came that Mr. Davin had voted with the Government on the second reading of the Remedial Bill is to express no more than the truth. To say that "The Leader" was humiliated, chagrined and amazed at the circumstance is to put the case mildly. We knew, it is true, that the Government were putting forth desperate means to win, cajole, purchase or intimidate the anti-Remedial Conservatives——

Sir, some of these words are rather gross, but I read it as it is in the paper :

> ——but that Mr. Davin could be fairly won, cajoled, purchased or intimidated to desert the conviction we knew him to possess on the question of re-establishing separate schools in Manitoba, we had not the faintest fear. Our confidence in him was the legitimate result of a study of his record of independence since he entered Parliament in 1887. As we reviewed that record we failed to perceive that Mr. Davin had ever been a servile Government follower ; on the contrary, he had ever placed the interest of his constituents and of the West in general above the interest of his party. Relying, therefore, upon the steadfastness of his conviction on priniciple and to his recognition of the best interest of the West, we had absolute confidence that Mr. Davin would vote against remedial legislation. As our confidence was absolute, so our humiliation is complete.
> To the causes which Mr. Davin asks West Assiniboia to attribute his conversion, we will refer in a moment. The cause to which West Assiniboia really does attribute his action is the strength of machine politics. It is now known that on the 14th March a meeting was held at Moose Jaw which assumed the functions of the Conservative Association. That meeting passed a resolution instructing Mr. Davin to vote with the Government, which resolution was wired to Ottawa. The meeting and resolution were, we believe, the direct suggestion of a member of the Government ; and it was undoubtedly put forth as a means of coercing the member. Whether they are judging rightly or wrongly, the impression that at present prevails with the people of West Assiniboia is that by foul means, of which the above was doubtless only a minor example, the member for this district was coerced into voting for the Remedial Bill. It is freely asserted in Moose Jaw that the meeting was not a meeting of the Conservative Association, and that the resolution was not an expression of the wish of that organization. We can well believe it. Last week we asserted that no representative meeting in this district could be gathered that would endorse the Government's course ; and the fact remains undisputed. That Mr. Davin could believe that any Conservative Association in West Assiniboia would endorse remedial legislation, would not tell well for his intelligence or for his appreciation of the character of his constituents. He knows perfectly well that nine out of ten of the Conservatives of Moose Jaw were two months ago opposed to interference with Manitoba. The Conservative Association meeting at Regina in December gave him no uncertain indication of the feeling of Regina Conservatism. Does he think these Conservatives can change their convictions and feelings as swiftly as Mr. Hughes, McGillivray, and Ross of Dundas? (One consolation is left to us, Mr. Davin, is that you escape the supremely idiotic ridiculousness of the position of those three gymnastic please-alls.) We say that Mr. Davin must have known when he voted for the Bill——

I call the attention of the Ministers to this :

> ——that he was flagrantly misrepresenting the opinion of the people to whom he owes his seat in Parliament. Regardless of political lines—Conservatives, Liberals and Patrons alike—the people of the West are practically unanimous against unnecessary interference. If Mr. Davin voted under coercion, we have no words to designate his conduct. If he voted honestly and honourably according to an altered conviction, we say he knowingly cast a vote which he had no warrant from his constituents to cast,—and he occupies a position of an usurper in casting it.

There are much more in the article, but——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Read it.

Mr. PATERSON. No, I will not take up the time now. I merely wished to make this point—that the Secretary of State may not be wholly correct when he argues that because the majority of this House voted for the second reading, therefore it was our bounden duty to allow the Bill to pass without proper consideration. I do not say that an hon. gentleman should not vote as he thinks right. But I do say that the vote in this House, in view of the expression we find in this and many other Conservative newspapers, does not necessarily reflect the opinion of the country. We may say that the organs of public opinion are all wrong, but if so, the country will make known its views to Parliament, and there can be no doubt that the will of the people will ultimately find expression in the statute-book. It seems to me that the motion before you is a most reasonable one. There is nothing to be gained by this kind of child's play over this Bill. The Bill is a most important one, the Secretary of State says the most important that has ever been before Parliament. Everything goes to show that we should have a thorough discussion of the measure in this House. I have not taken much part in these discussions myself, believing that they might be more profitably left to those members versed in constitutional law. As the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) said this is a new kind of legislation for us, and, having no Minister of Education, no official experts on the subject to guide us, it is incumbent upon us to pay all the attention and give all the more care to perfecting the details of the measure.

Mr. DAVIN. From the moment I cast the vote upon which the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) has commented, I have never had a doubt that I took the right course. Although at the eleventh hour I came tardily and unwillingly to the conclusion. I had no doubt at the time of casting the vote, and everything that has since occurred has confirmed me in the opinion that I acted rightly. I have taken a good deal of interest in educational matters, and in those connected with the North-west and with Manitoba, and if the Opposition had moved in their assault on this Bill on legitimate lines, and if the other opposition, which I may say has been the donkey-engine to the Opposition proper, had moved on legitimate lines, I would have spoken earlier in the committee. But with the limited time at our disposial, I had no desire to take up the time of the committee of the House in attempting what I felt certain under the circumstances would have been quite fruitless, to contribute something towards the discussion and towards the enlightenment of the committee on this matter. What has been the character of the opposition to this Bill ? In the first place, every means that could be taken outside the Bill has been taken to waste the time of the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no ; yes, yes.

Mr. DAVIN. Some hon. members say no. It is plain as a mountain, open, palpable ; it is notorious ; it is plain in the sight of the country.

Mr. GIBSON. Answer the leading article in your own paper.

Mr. DAVIN. I can answer that article. I can answer the hon. gentleman, and I can answer everything necessary for me to answer here or elsewhere. But I want to comment on the character of the opposition to this Bill. I say now, as I said in conversation with a leading opponent of the Bill, there is enough in the Bill surely to assault on legitimate grounds without adopting every extreme parliamentary device to prevent it being discussed, and if passed, passed in proper form. We have had discussions on little side issues, on motions to adjourn, on every possible question that could be raised in order to avoid coming to this Bill.

An hon. MEMBER. Come to the Bill.

Mr. DAVIN. I think I am as much in order in dealing with the Bill as hon. gentlemen opposite have been. They have commented on it, but they have dealt with the Bill very gingerly. With the exception of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), and one other member, they have wholly applied themselves to issues lying outside the Bill. They seem in their attacks to be rather afraid of the Bill, and we have seen from time to time a certain embarrassment on the Opposition side of the House.

Mr. GIBSON. You have not been here for a week.

Mr. DAVIN. That statement, if I could characterize it in parliamentary language, would, I am afraid, place the hon. gentleman outside the bounds of polite society.

Mr. DALY. He has not been here himself.

An hon. MEMBER. You have been in bed.

Mr. DAVIN. An hon. member said I was in bed all night. I was, and I am very glad I was. The tactics adopted by hon. gentlemen, with very few exceptions, have been tactics that were properly characterized as obstructionist tactics, and this Bill is one of too great importance in all its bearings and relations to have been treated in that way. With respect to the opinion of the writer of that article commenting on my vote, no one can expect a journalist to take the time to consider the complex issues presented to an hon. member, who belongs to the party dominant in the House of Commons, when he has to deal with a vote of want of confidence that takes the form of a motion for the six months' hoist to a Bill with which, on its merits, he does not agree. The member has to consider several points. One of the points I had to consider on the very threshold was, what advantage is to be gained by transferring power from the Government to another body of men who are led by the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Laurier), who is in favour of remedial legislation, and supported by the hon. member for Bothwell, who made a most elaborate argument in favour of remedial legislation, and supported by hon. members, many of whom declare that the only fault of the present measure is that it is not strong enough and does not go far enough ? That is a practical issue which members of Parliament had to decide. A journalist sitting down to write an article in an hour or an hour and a half does not weigh these points. It is easy to write an article after this fashion, and I have done it myself. I have sat in judgment on public men. But it is a very different thing in this House when an hon. member is supporting a party with which he agrees as regards nine-tenths of its policy and differs on one-tenth, to vote against the party, when, if the Government is thereby defeated, as would have been the case had I voted against them, he will assist in placing in power men who on that question hold the same opinions, or even more advanced opinions, than the men he turns out. The constituents of those hon. members who differed with them in regard to a vote given on the second reading will have to consider what they, as Conservatives, would have done themselves if asked to turn out a Conservative Government. That is the first issue which presents itself to a member voting in this House at present for the six months' hoist.

A question which might be asked of an extreme Orangeman is, what would you think of a man who, other things being equal, would not be influenced by party feeling ? But more than that. What would you think of a member of a party who, when his own friends are placed in a position of difficulty, and when its majority is reduced to a small number, will not take some personal risk and stand by his friends? I do not hold such an opinion of the Canadian people as to believe that they would think worse of a man who may have held even a strong opinion on this Bill, and yet felt when his friends were in difficulties that he should sustain them.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. DAVIN. Some hon. members laugh, and no wonder, because the minute their leader has failed to carry them into power they have chassèd him—a pack of disloyal deserters.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. member must be referring to the colleagues of Sir Mackenzie Bowell.

Mr. DAVIN. I should not like to lead such members.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Bright used to say, speaking of a certain class of politicians, that they were men with whom he would not like to go tiger hunting. If a man goes tiger hunting with a friend and the tiger leaps on him and this friend pulls his trigger and shoots the tiger through the head he may escape, but if his friend deserts him he is sure to lose his life. I should not like to go tiger hunting with some members of the present Opposition.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The fear is mutual.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. What about the speech ?

Mr DAVIN. I have the hon. gentleman on a spit and I will roast him, although he is the smallest barnacle on the Grit goose. He feels the heat, and I am going to give him a little more of it. I say the people of Canada will consider all these matters. The leader of the Opposition looked around with misery a little while ago at the vacant chairs, for he thought of the desertion there had been from his own ranks. I have great sympathy with him, and when the hon. member for Simcoe went over and spoke to two of his friends ; I saw his face ; it had in it the look of jealous fear ; he seemed to imagine that the member for Simcoe was seeking to take away a couple of his chickens. There is that spirit in myself and in the majority of the Conservative party that if we had differences with our leaders we felt we should on this occasion crush down everything that rose up of a centrifugal character and sustain them in their difficulties. All these points will have to be considered. From the time I heard the hon. member for Bothwell not a single politician or Minister had a word of conversation with me, not a letter did I receive from my constituents, and it was only after reflecting on the speech of the hon. member for Bothwell, and reading it, I decided on the course I would pursue. We remember that the hon. member for Montreal West made an appeal to the leader of the Opposition and said : Let us have a unanimous vote on the second reading, and then send a commission to Winnipeg. Is it not a remarkable thing that not a man has attempted to formulate the proposition which is the only rock-ground for those who are opposed to any interference whatever on the part of this Parliament with Manitoba ! What is that proposition ? It is this ; it is the proposition I hold myself : that so many are the difficulties in the way of interference and so many evils may attend it, that it is better to treat the 22nd clause of the Act as a dead letter. Neither the member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), nor the member for West York (Mr. Wallace), have ventured to bring forward this proposition. The amendment of each to the motion for the second reading implied that if the courts decided this Bill was constitutional they would support it. Mr. Sifton at once admitted, after the decision of the Privy Council was made known, that the constitution was different from what he had thought, and the proposal of Manitoba to the commissioners admits that there was a grievance, as well as the principle of remedial legislation. Why is it that the only logical proposition is not made ? Is it not because that, though in a corner a man may be ready to whisper "let us blow up the safe," he does not like, in open day, to drill a hole and put powder into it, and thus break open the constitution, commit burglary in broad day light. No one dares to say remedial legislation is not in the constitution. No one will openly formulate the proposition, there was no grievance. The vote on the second reading was merely a vote on the principle, and no man on either side has dared to rise and say that the principle of remedial legislation is not in the constitution.

Mr. WELDON. I most emphatically declare that the principle of any such Bill as lies on the Table, is in the constitution.

Mr. DAVIN. No ; the principle of a measure is simple, and voting for the principle does not pledge you either to a single clause or to the third reading. I have great respect for my hon. friend's opinion, but I differ with him. My hon. friend will not dare to deny that the principle of remedial legislation is in the constitution.

Mr. WELDON. The fallacy of my hon. friend lies in his assuming that remedial legislation means the kind of a law which is in that Bill.

Mr. DAVIN. You might just as well say that when Mr. Disraeli brought forward his 1867 Reform Bill, and its proposals did not meet with the approval of Bright, Gladstone and others, and when these men, after voting for its second reading, changed it completely in committee—you might just as well say those men actually voted for something else besides the principle of reform for which they contended. Now, let me say in reference to what I deem to be in the constitution, I will take the third section of the 22nd clause, and, if necessary, I will read it with the closing words of the Lord Chancellor, and that third subsection says that this Bill shall——

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). "May," not "shall."

Mr. DAVIN. I thank the hon. gentleman for the correction.

Mr. CHARLTON. It is a very important difference.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. member for Bothwell says that "shall" is never used to a sovereign body, so you sit at the feet of your Gamaliel just when it suits, or else your are forgetful of his teachings. Now, it is quite clear to my mind that when we are seized with this legislation, this Parliament has complete discretion.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Plenary, do you mean ?

Mr. DAVIN. No ; when my hon. friend uses the word "plenary" he means unlimited. No ; of course, it must be limited within the remedial order, but I hold that we are thus limited in giving a minimum or a maximum of remedial legislation. Therefore, the moment we get into committee we are in a position to amend these clauses and to minimize as much as we like what is proposed. I may say that when the remedial order was issued I took the view that its form was objectionable, and I expressed my opinion strongly at that time.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Why ?

Mr. DAVIN. It is enough for me at present to say that I would not have issued it precisely in that form. I stated at the time my opinion of the possibilities attending on remedial legislation, and I concluded with these words : No one can say for one minute that, constitutionally, the Government has not done right in issuing the remedial order ; but we hope, speaking as statesmen, that the government of Manitoba will be allowed to deal with the question. I thought that although remedial legislation was in the 22nd clause, the statesmen of Manitoba should still be allowed to deal with it, for the reason, chiefly, of the almost insuperable difficulty of this Parliament effecting anything, a difficulty which arose from the state of opinion in the country, and from the fact that neither in the 93rd clause of the British North America Act nor in the 22nd clause of the Manitoba Act, machinery was provided for carrying out these provisions, I reasoned that no machinery had been provided for carrying out the judgment in favour of the appellants. They came to this Parliament, and we have now the Bill before us ; and suppose we pass this Bill, where are you ? Unless Mr. Greenway's government co-operates with the Dominion Parliament, I cannot see how you are going to pass any legislation that can be effective. For that reason I thought at the time the remedial order was issued that everything should be done to leave it, if possible, with the government of Manitoba. As early as 1891 or 1892, I forget which, I went so far as to call upon the late Archbishop Taché, whom I had the honour of knowing, and I said to him : You are going to move under the appeal clause of the British North America Act ? He said, I am. I said to him: Has your Grace any idea of the difficulties you are going to meet ? And I led him through the appeal to the Privy Council, to the issue of a remedial order, and even up to he possible passing of a measure through the Dominion Parliament. I said to him : If you do pass it through, what good can it do ? when no power is given to tax for the schools ? I went pretty well into the details with him, and my right reverend friend said to me : Mr. Davin, I am tired of compromise, I will have no compromise. I said to him : Your Grace, you will get more by throwing yourself on the majority in your province, than you will ever get from the Dominion Parliament.

Mr. FRASER. This is a very important matter. May I ask the hon. gentleman if he took notes of the conversation ?

Mr. DAVIN. I do not know that a conversation between a great prelate and a humble politician like myself, is of any great consequence. If my hon. friend had gone there, I dare say he would have taken notes of all that took place : but when I have a private conversation with a gentleman I do not take notes.

Mr. FRASER. Of course, the hon. gentleman is not giving evidence that would be acceptable in any court, because the prelate is dead ; and the well-known rules prevail that you cannot give a conversation when no answer to it can be given.

Mr. DAVIN. Now, that just illustrates the difference between a statesman and a pettifogger.

Mr. FRASER. I make no objection ; I am very much obliged to the hon. gentleman for the expression.

Mr. DAVIN. I did not hear the hon. gentleman, but if he is a statesman, let it be said of him as Artemus Ward said when he was showing his panorama. There was a scene representing mounted Indians on the plains, and the lecturer said, pointing to the horses: "These air horses; the painter told me so." Let the name "statesman" be written under the figure of the hon. gentleman. Now if there had been statesmen in Manitoba who would have had the courage to take up the cause of the minority, this question might have been settled. But the minority by the Act of 1890 were treated in a burglarious and brutal manner. If an appeal had been made to the majority in the first instance, the people would have made a generous response and would have declared for justice to the minority. When we come to deal with this matter here in a practical way we find that this Chamber is not merely the great Consult of the nation but also the great battle ground between two parties, and you have to take into account the course that will be adopted and the use that will be made of the difference of opinion by unscrupulous partisans. If the Manitoba government will not work in with you, the difficulties of the situation are grave. Parliament is upon new ground in dealing with a measure of this kind. And there is always danger of provisions that will be unconstitutional. When the Bill was shown to me first, though a little rusty as a lawyer, I came to the conclusion that there were parts of it that were ultra vires, and other parts that it would be extremely difficult to implement in practice. But when it came saying "yea" and "nay" I did not think that because I took that view, I should therefore vote against the second reading, seeing that the six months' hoist was a want of confidence resolution. With regard to the clause under consideration, my opinion is that the Manitoba government have approched what might fairly be considered a solution of the difficulty, and if they would not stand on technicalities, the question might be settled. Probably hon. gentlemen are not aware that at the present moment there are forty-one Catholic separate schools in operation in Manitoba, most of the teachers, I am sorry to say, being uncertificated.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Are they organized under the Act, or are they private schools?

Mr. DAVIN. I believe they are working under the Act, but that they are practically separate schools.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Then they have certificated teachers.

Mr. DAVIN. I believe not. I have not looked into the matter so as to verify it, but I think my information is correct as I speak on the authority of a gentleman in Winnipeg who is in a position to know. Suppose that you had for both public and separate schools the same curriculum but that from 3.30 to 4 o'clock religious instruction, satisfactory to the trustees should be given, then you would have practically the same results as in Nova Scotia. It would be the same system as we have in the North-west Territories. We have public schools and separate schools. Some of the teachers in the latter are ladies who have taken the veil. The curriculum in both is the same, up to 3.30 p.m.; but after that the religion approved by the trustees is taught. And that system works well. What I would suggest to Mr. Greenway and his government is this: When they meet on the 16th, which is eight days before this Parliament expires, let them bring in a Bill that will remedy the grievances which they have already acknowledged, and provide for Catholic schools ostensibly as they have already done surreptitiously.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Do I understand that the hon. gentleman wishes the Manitoba government to carry out the offers made by Mr. Sifton and Mr. Cameron to the Dominion commissioners and legislate on those lines, and not that they should establish state-aided schools?

Mr. DAVIN. They practically have separate schools now, and they are standing on a technicality, if they will make one move, I am satisfied that the change will be acceptable to the minority.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That is, that the Government should——

Mr. DAVIN. I do not like to formulate a clause of an Act of Parliament off-hand, but what I wish is the adoption of the same system that we have in the North-west Territories.

Mr. WELDON. What is that?

Mr. DAVIN. We have a board of public instruction composed of the Territorial Executive of four members and four outside members, two of whom are Catholics and two Protestants, one being a clergyman and one a layman in each case. Under these is the general superintendent. Then we have a school ordinance, which I have not at hand at the moment, under which it is provided that after half-past three, if I remember, in the afternoon religious instruction satisfactory to the trustees shall be given. In a Catholic community religious instruction is given, and in a Protestant community Protestant instruction.

Mr. McMULLEN. Then in a community with a Catholic majority, no provision would be made for religious instruction for the children of the Protestant minority?

Mr. DAVIN. The children of the minority do not attend the religious instruction.

Mr. LANGELIER. It seems to me very unjust that the children of the minority should be excluded for religious instruction in that way.

Mr. DAVIN. It works very well. I have heard no complaint against it except on one or two occasions.

Mr. SPROULE. Was it not characterized by Archbishop Langevin as entirely unsatisfactory ?

Mr. DAVIN. That may be ; I am not in a position to speak as to that ; but I may say that it works pretty well. At any rate I am stating what I believe would be a solution of the difficulty, and I know I speak the views of people very deeply interested in this question.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I see that the ordinance the hon. gentleman refers to is in the words of the offer made by the Manitoba commissioners the other day, to the effect that no religious instruction, bible-reading, reciting of prayers or asking of questions from a catechism shall be permitted from the opening of the school at nine o'clock until half an hour before the time of closing, after which time such instructions will be given as is decided upon by the trustees. That I understand to be the offer made by the Manitoba government.

Mr. DAVIN. I told you that they were very near the proposition I wish to see adopted.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Then do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that this Government should have accepted the offer?

Mr. DAVIN. I say nothing about that. But our system is satisfactory——

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) And this would be also ?

Mr. DAVIN. Well, things that are equal to the same thing are equal to one another.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Then why does the hon. gentleman support a Bill to force a different system upon the people ?

Mr. DALY. We have not the power to pass such a law here.

Mr. McNEILL. I wish to call attention to the words to the hon. gentleman : "They have Catholic schools in Catholic districts in Manitoba practically now."

Mr. DAVIN. I am told that in some parts they have.

Mr. McNEILL. The hon. gentleman mentioned that point with great emphasis.

Mr. DAVIN. I am told they have such schools. As the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) made a reference to me, I rose to explain my position, as I think the House is entitled from an hon. gentleman to an explanation of his position, if he is placed in the postion which would seem to the House to be either inconsistent or unworthy, and the country is also entitled to an explanation of his position. I have ventured to explain my position on the Bill. I have voted for the remedial principle on the second reading of the Bill, but with the Bill itself I do not agree.

Mr. FRASER. Two facts have been brought out by the hon. gentleman in the course of his speech. The first is, that the Opposition will give as much to Manitoba as the Government, and consequently they can hardly be charged with obstructing the Bill. The second is, that the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) has no definite opinions on this matter whatever. I would have supposed that he was a leader in a fakers' circus crowd when the thimble is now here and now is not. His opinions are so diverse that they resembled those performances, and when attempting to speak about education in the North-west it appeared that he knew nothing about it. One would imagine that the hon. gentleman sometimes was really in earnest. His turns are very sudden ; they are so sudden that we do not know the next time he speaks what he is going to say. I am glad he has spoken of centrifugal force, for it has generally been centripetal. Like all perverts the hon. gentleman has given a reason for his conversion—indeed he has given two reasons. The first reason is that he was converted by the hon. member for Bothwell, and the other reason is that he could not leave his party. How does he reconcile them ? If his conversion was intellectual, what other influence led him to support the party rightly or wrongly. I will give another reason, and it is contained in a letter :

> I was down at Qu'Appelle a week ago to-morrow. While there a telegram came to Angus Mackay, the manager of the Dominion Government Experimental Farm and President of the Eastern Assiniboia Conservative Association, to wire Davin as it was expected that part of Eastern Assiniboia would be in his constituency after next election, and to wire him (Davin) that it was the desire of the Conservatives that he (Davin) should vote with the Government on the Remedial Bill.

Mr. McDONALD (Assiniboia). Angus McKay is not President of the Liberal-Conservative Association.

Mr. FRASER. That may be or may not be the case, but it does not alter the fact. The letter proceeds :

> This was done, and he came to Qu'Appelle along with Billy Boyd, another of the Conservatives, and asked the faithful to do the same there, but they refused to do so. The same thing was done at Regina but I am not sure whether it was successful or not here. It was successful at Moose Jaw.

The letter is dated 23rd March. So we have three reasons for the sudden conversion of the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). The real reason is this telegram from Angus McKay. All sinners give one good reason for their conversion, but here this chief sinner gives two reasons, but he does not give the real reason, even although he is standing in the penitent box. How are we to understand the statement made by the hon. gentleman as to the interview between himself and the dead Archbishop. Every statement he made to the prelate was against the Bill. He told the Archbishop that it could not be operated, that it was not within the power of the Dominion Parliament to levy taxes. Why did the hon. gentleman introduce that statement into his speech? Can there be any other reason than by his own motion he was obstructing the Bill? As a supporter of the Government he has occupied nearly two hours' time. And why has the hon. gentleman introduced the name of the venerable prelate who is now dead? Was it to show the distinguished society he moved in before the sudden conversion occurred, and to show that he could speak with that great and good man on a subject like this, sinner as he was? I can see no reason except possibly the other one, that the hon. gentleman does not want the Bill to pass, and is giving diverse reasons for his action. The hon. gentleman can fall back on any of these reasons he has advanced. His speech is suited to any audience in Canada. He can go before an audience in favour of the Government and say, I voted for the Government. He can go before an audience adverse to the Bill, and say I have expressed my opinion that the Bill cannot be worked; my manly brain solved the difficulty, and I told the Archbishop it could not be worked. He can further say that when I go back to my constituents I can change my opinions in a moment, and so soon as you present the occasion I am there; if it is a Bill, I will vote for it if there is good reason, or I will vote against it if I lose nothing, but in the meantime I will stand by the Government. The hon. gentleman practically says, I must have the support of the Government, and in these the dying hours of Parliament I will wipe out all the ugly past in connection with my action towards the Government, the men whom I have held up to scorn, to those whom I called fossils, rats with ribbons around their necks, who are called men. The hon. gentleman would blot out the past, and he would say, when the heavens were shaking and the earth was trembling I stood firm. True I got a little light from the hon. member for Bothwell, said the hon. gentleman, but that was not enough; I want it to be understood that the hon. member for Bothwell strengthened my opinion, and I want the Government to understand that they would have been defeated if a number of men like myself had not stood by them. The hon. gentleman was compelled to introduce the constitutional ground in his speech in order to show that he was loyal. What a fine violinist he would have made, for he would never have been at a loss for strings. Here are three or four, all required on a good violin. He has the hon. member for Bothwell's speech, standing by the Government, the dead Archbishop, and the law in the North-west, which he did not understand. But above and beyond all there was the fact that the hon. gentleman must support the Government. These, however, are all base strings, just as is his conduct. Of course I have not a single word to say in regard to the motives of the hon. gentleman; these we judge from his speech. The hon. member for Albert saw that the hon. gentleman was moving like a meteor, and suggested that he adopt a logical course. His speech had no ground-work, it was all excluded middle, there was no connection between the premises and the conclusions, because the excluded middle cut it all out. If a new work on logic is to be prepared for the North-west the task should be entrusted to the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), but the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) should revise it, and he might do with it, as has doubtless been with much of the hon. gentleman's manuscript, destroy it. Now, I wish to repeat that the government of Manitoba have made an offer which, in the mind of the hon. member for Assiniboia, would solve the whole difficulty, because it goes as far as that law which he says has worked well in the North-west Territories. The hon. member must know what he is talking about, and when he says that that law, if applied to Manitoba, would work well, I think the Government ought to pause and adopt the suggestion made by one of their own supporters.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. I differ with my hon. friend from Assiniboia, when he says that the actual law in the North-west Territories works well.

Mr. FRASER. Well, here is another difficulty. I supposed that the hon. member for Assiniboia was a perfect encyclopedia, and that he could not give information on this question that was not correct. For my part, I am bound to accept the statement of the hon. member for Assiniboia that the Act works well in the North-west Territories, because he comes from that place.

Mr. CHARLTON. The motion before the Chair that the committee do now rise, I consider a very proper motion indeed. We have before us the Minister of Justice, who was one of a deputation sent by this Government to Winnipeg. We have the report of the conference in the newspapers, which, although it lacks authenticity, I think we may assume to be fairly correct, and this report gives the outcome of the mission of the delegation to Winnipeg. This commission presented certain terms to the Manitoba government, and the reports show that the Manitoba government made certain counter-propositions. Now, I think that, if there were any propositions made by the government of Manitoba to the deputation, this House should be in possession of those propositions. We are not in possession of the information necessary to enable us to discuss this question properly, until we know what those proposals are. A few moments ago, we had the statement made by the member for West Assiniboia as to the character of the school law in the North-west. That statement is that religious instructions are given in those schools under certain terms, and that the law is satisfactory to all sects of people in that country. We have it reported that the Manitoba government has made an alternative proposition to that made by the deputation, which is substantially the same as the law now in operation and working satisfactorily in the North-west. Now, if that be true, these proposals should be placed before this House, and the discussion on this question should be suspended until we know what those propositions are. Sir, we know that this question arouses a good deal of feeling ; it is a question which promises to have far-reaching results, and, if it can be settled in an amicable manner, if the propositions of the Manitoba government will give substantial relief to the minority in that province, certainly we should know what those propositions are before proceeding further. This question in the North-west is liable, if the government persists in the course it is taking, to have unlooked-for consequences. The people who inhabit Manitoba are the select and choicest portion of the Anglo-Saxon population of the provinces of this Dominion, especially of the province of Ontario. These people have strong convictions. The school law of that territory has been passed in accordance with the convictions of these people. They desire to settle this matter, and their government have made a proposition which, in my opinion, is as far as the people of Manitoba will go, a proposition that goes to the utmost limit that the population of that province will ratify. Now, suppose that we refuse that proposition, and suppose that we proceed to force this Remedial Bill through the House, what may possibly be the ultimate consequences ? Manitoba may possibly secede from this confederation. We cannot measure the magnitude of the issues ; we cannot arrive at a conclusion as to what extent the indignation of that people will be aroused. We are unable to say whether this may not be a matter of the gravest import to all that relates to the life of this Dominion. Sir, we are trifling with great interests ; we are here madly and blindly—I refer to the Government—attempting to force through an ill-considered law, which will be inoperative, and will arouse the fiercest animosities, racial and religious, and which may shatter this Dominion. Therefore, I say that if the Government have any correspondence before them, any proposition which is fair and reasonable on the part of the Manitoba government, that proposition and that correspondence should be laid before us before we proceed further.

Now, Sir, I must protest most energetically against the course of the Government in forcing this measure through in the way they are attempting to do. The members of this House have rights, and among those rights is the right to demand that the Government shall adopt a policy that will not be calculated to kill them off. It is said that one of the members of this House—I do not know how true the report is—possibly owes his death to the conduct of the Government on the second reading of this Bill.

I know that the course the Government is pursuing now must be most detrimental to the health of the members ; it is cruelty, sheer cruelty, and disregard of the commonest rights of humanity, to compel the members of this House to sit here hour after hour, and day after day, in a continuous consideration of this measure.

Mr. JONCAS. Don't obstruct.

Mr. CHARLTON. Who is obstructing ?

Mr. JONCAS. You are.

Mr. CHARLTON. No, Sir. But the Government that proceeds to force a measure through without proper discussion and in violation of parliamentary usages is obstructing. This is a measure that should not be dealt with by a moribund Parliament, elected on a voters' list virtually eight years old, but it should be dealt with by a Parliament that has consulted the people, and that has received its mandate from the people how it shall deal witth this matter. There are rumours that many gentlemen on the other side do not expect again to face their constituents, but that they have received promises of senatorships or other appointments.

Mr. ROBILLARD. Name them.

Mr. CHARLTON. That could very easily be done—promises of senatorships, customs collectorships, judgeships, and so on. Do the people of the country doubt that this is one element in securing the Government's majority ?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I suppose the hon. gentleman knows that when an hon. member made that statement with the Speaker in the Chair he was called to order, and very properly so.

Mr. CHARLTON. I am aware that that was the case, and I do not know that I should dispute the propriety of that ruling. But I do not think it affects very much the truth of the assertion. Now, we have professions of great sympathy on the part of gentlemen on the Government benches for the minority, who, we are told, have been subjected to untold grievances. It would not be parliamentary to call in question the genuineness of these expressions. But I think the Government would have done well to investigate whether the majority felt they suffered under the alleged grievance. I doubt that they do. The pressure for redressing of these grievances does not come from Manitoba. It is said that a great majority of the separate schools have fallen into line and have come under the Act.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. That is not correct.

Mr. CHARLTON. I do not know; but I have the report of a gentleman, a Roman Catholic, which does not indicate that there is the dissatisfaction among the minority that some hon. gentlemen would have us believe. At any rate, I believe that the proposition which it is reported has been made by the government of Manitoba would be accepted by nineteen-twentieths of the Roman Catholic laity as a solution of the difficulty.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. It would not.

Mr. CHARLTON. We have the hon. gentleman's assertion——

Mr. LaRIVIERE. It is as good as yours.

Mr. CHARLTON. I am not making any assertion upon my own authority, but we have the report of this gentleman, who is a representative Catholic, Mr. O'Donohue. He is not a countryman of the hon. gentleman (Mr. LaRivière), but is evidently a man of influence, having received ninety per cent of the Catholic votes in a school election against the influence of the priesthood.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Is that the gentleman who proposed to inaugurate one of the public schools in Winnipeg with ceremonies of Freemasonry?

Mr. CHARLTON. I do not know, but I should doubt very much that a gentleman professing to be a Catholic would propose anything of that kind.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. It is a fact of public notoriety in Winnipeg.

Mr. CHARLTON. I doubt that very much. This is the report to which I refer. It reads:

> I am a resident of Winnipeg, a public school trustee for Ward 3, and a member of the Catholic Church and a regular communicant. I desire to appear before you to present my views on the public school question on behalf of myself and a large number of Catholics of the province of Manitoba whom I represent.
> When I first arrived in Manitoba, in 1882, my business for the first five or six years brought me into contact with the people all over the province, more particularly the French settlements. From the first I took considerable interest in the schools, and it was clear to me from the first that the French schools and the Catholic schools generally were not in the progressive state that the Protestant schools were. My reason for coming to this conclusion was on account of the class of teachers generally employed, and the wretched shape of the schools, both as to grounds, buildings and furniture, notwithstanding that in most of the school districts, the school taxes should be sufficient to maintain the schools in a much better shape as to comfort and efficiency. Seldom did I find a French teacher that could teach or even speak English. I called on his Grace the Archbishop, and asked him if there could not be some improvement. He said that he was looking forward to a better state of affairs, but at that time he was not prepared to make much change, as the class of teachers necessary was not easily procured, and if they were the accommodation they would require was not procurable. So matters went on as of old from year to year. In the year of, I think, 1886, I spoke to the Hon. John Norquay and asked him if he could not do something to improve the French and Catholic schools so as to put them on a level with the Protestant schools of Kildonan and St. Andrews, and other country Protestant schools. Mr. Norquay's answer was that the Catholic School Board had the matter entirely in their own hands, and he saw no reason why their schools should not be as efficient as the Protestant schools. I may here say that I don't think that 25 per cent of the French youths can write their names, while I think I am safe in saying that 75 per cent of the Protestant natives can read and write.
> When the present provincial government came into power, or soon after, I called on Mr. Martin and asked him if he would take up the school system of Manitoba and remodel it in some way that would improve them, and in particular the Catholic schools. He, Mr. Martin, said then that he did not think it was within the jurisdiction of the provincial government to do so, but it rested with the Federal House, but he promised me to give the matter his consideration. I afterwards spoke to Mr. Smart, Minister of Public Works, in that strain. He also said he would think the matter over. So when the present School Act of 1890 was spoken of, and after its adoption, I gave it my humble and strongest support, and have no reason to regret the course I took, but am more convinced than ever that it is the best for the country and for the Catholics in particular, that they would be the greatest gainers, and would accept the School Act if the French clergy would allow them to do so.
> Another grievance many Catholics complain of is that our school property, instead of being held by the Catholic trustees, for the people, is held in fee simple by the Superintendent General, or head of the Oblat Fathers in France, and although in Winnipeg, all the cash invested belongs to the people, the Oblat Fathers always charged a good rent for the Catholic schools. I may also state that about three years ago I canvassed some of the members of our City School Board to find out if there might not be a compromise effected as regards our city schools. My idea was to try and introduce something known as the Faribault system, then and now in force in Minnesota, that is, our Catholic friends would engage Catholic teachers qualified as the law requires, if our City School Board would provide funds for their payment. I received reasonable encouragement from the City School Board, and then waited on our clergy and made the suggestion as above. The idea was heartily received by Father McCarthy for himself, and on behalf of the parish priest, then Father Fox. The former asked me to wait on the Bishop and lay the matter before him, and said he had no doubt but his Grace would think favourably of the scheme. I said I would not go alone, but if the priests would nominate two other parishioners to go with me, I would see what could be done on the lines mentioned above. The two gentlemen named by the priest and myself visited his Grace, and to my surprise were told that it was useless to suggest any compromise, and the interview was cut short, his Grace adding that he was advised by his eastern friends to accept nothing short of the 1890 School Act, as he honestly considered the constitution and bill of rights entitled him on behalf of his people.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Would the hon. gentleman tell me what standing in society Mr.

O'Donohue has, what was his occupation, what was his calling in life ?

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon. gentleman will have to tell us.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Well, he is a cattle dealer. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will think that that makes him a judge of school matters.

Mr. CHARLTON. I hope that the fact of a man dealing in cattle does not imply that he has not brains enough to know something about school laws. It seems from this report that this Catholic, Mr. O'Donohue, was trying to make a settlement of this difficulty by the adoption of the Faribault system, which was acceptable to the Catholics in Minnesota, and it received the support of their priests there, including Archbishop Ireland. But this was rejected by the Archbishop of St. Boniface on the ground that he was advised by his eastern friends to accept nothing but what had been demanded. So that the pressure in this case comes not from the minority in Manitoba, but from the east. We know where the pressure comes from, and where the Government expect to make political capital. It is not for the votes of Manitoba that they are posing but for the Catholic votes in another province, and it is the pressure from the east that has raised the barriers in the way of a settlement. I believe the Catholic minority are ready to accept the proposition which, it is reported, has been made by the Manitoba government. I believe that the question can be practically settled on a friendly basis and that we are worse than wasting our time here in discussing an unworkable Bill that the Government seeks to force upon us, while we have a proposition which would afford substantial redress of grievance and settle this question which may otherwise end in dissension and civil war

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. CHARLTON. You may sneer at that, but I assure you that we are treading upon dangerous ground, and we require forbearance in order to have a settlement of this question. To do this we must retreat from the indefensible position we now occupy.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. You spoke for Quebec a little while ago. Suppose you speak now for Ontario.

Mr. CHARLTON. I speak from a Dominion standpoint and with a desire to see this question settled fairly to all concerned. Now with regard to the course of the Government, no man who has watched the progress of affairs can believe that at the time the petition of the minority was heard and the Government refused to give the necessary delay to allow the Attorney General of Manitoba to attend the hearing, he being engaged in his duties in the legislature, and when the Government issued the remedial order, that there was anything but a political motive behind it all. They expected immediately to go to the country, but something occurred to change their plans. But the order had been issued from which all this trouble has arisen, and it was issued for political reasons. The leader of the House desires to carry out this legislation in order to satisfy the hierarchy, and at the ensuing elections he expects to carry the province of Quebec, and to retain a sufficient number of constituencies in other parts of the Dominion to enable him to retain power. Hon. gentlemen opposite are taking an unpatriotic course.

Mr. JONCAS. What is the purpose of your leader ?

Mr. CHARLTON. The leader of the Liberal party, if he had been dealing with Manitoba, would have exercised a friendly and conciliatory spirit ; he would have heard what the Manitoba government had to say with respect to the school laws, he would have endeavoured to ascertain if it was not possible to arrive at some agreement with the parties, and in this way he would have avoided the difficulties and dangers which now threaten this Dominion. In this way he would have sought to arrive at a solution of the difficulty, which at present threatens to set religion against religion and race against race.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Who is doing it ?

Mr. CHARLTON. Hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. It is the Greenway government.

Mr. CHARLTON. Hon. gentlemen opposite have treated the Greenway government with the utmost hostility, and only at the last hour have they sent a delegation there, which should have been sent at first, to seek to effect the settlement of a question which threatens the disruption of the confederation. The committee should rise and report, and at a subsequent sitting of the House obtain an authoritative statement from the Government as to what transpired between the Dominion commissioners and the government of Manitoba, as to what offers were made by the commissioners and as to what counter proposals were made, and the present position of the case. If we obtain knowledge of the status of the case we shall not be moving in the dark. We are told that the Manitoba government felt insulted by the fact that this Government proceeded with the Remedial Bill while the commissioners were in Winnipeg to negotiate. It certainly was an indelicate and improper course to pursue, and it defeated the ends that hon. gentlemen opposite had in view. An attempt is now being made to force this Bill through the House. An effort should be made to ascertain not only what the people of Manitoba are willing to grant, but what the minority would be willing to accept.

Mr. SPROULE. We are ready for the question, if the Government are prepared to accept an adjournment.

Mr. FOSTER. We are not prepared.

Mr. SPROULE. It is evident that the Deputy Speaker and the officials of the House are worn out by these constant sittings, and that the health of hon. members is being injured. Hon. members will remember that in 1885 the House was decimated on account of the long sittings. The Government have announced that they intend to apply the eight hour rule to employees of the Printing Bureau, and surely a similar rule should obtain in this House. We know that there are two very important committees of this House who are called to meet this morning; but there is a rule by which they cannot sit during a sitting of this House, and as there has been no intermission of this sitting since it began on Monday afternoon at three o'clock, these two important committees of the House are precluded from doing any business whatever. Now, there are several very important Bills which were to have been taken up in one of these committees affecting the interests of many people of this country, but all those interests must suffer because of the determination of the Government to monopolize the whole time of the House, day and night, on this Remedial Bill. Besides, I see that on the Order paper there are a number of Bills standing in the name of several hon. gentlemen, dealing with questions affecting the interests of this country, but we are precluded from considering them at all. There is a Bill authorizing the Governor in Council to raise, by way of loan, $3,000,000 to provide for the defences of this country, but even a measure of the supreme importance of that measure, has to give way to this Remedial Bill. We can only devote our attention to these important measures by this committee rising, and I sincerely hope that the Government will yield to the very general demand of the members of this House, and consent to that proposition. In a short time, money will be required for the purpose of carrying on the public business of this country, the Estimates of last year will soon be exhausted, and until those Estimates are passed, the public business of this country must stand still, and the interests of the whole people will suffer in consequence. Sir, the country is watching this House most intently to see what it is going to do, and the country will view with great dissatisfaction the course of this Government in subordinating all other public business to this Remedial Bill. We have been told by one hon. gentleman that the minority in Manitoba are not suffering so much, after all. Then, if they are not suffering so much under the system that obtains at present, why should the Government take up all the time of the House in applying a remedy which they do not need? The hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) gave us a long defence of his course on this question, and of the reasons which induced him to change his mind, and vote for the second reading of the Bill. I would like to ask that hon. gentleman, if he were here, when the doubts that he formerly had, were removed. It seems he was some time ago strong in the belief that this Bill was not calculated to meet the wants of the minority in Manitoba, but, at the last moment, his doubts were removed. I would like to ask him when the scales fell from his eyes. What influence was used to make him change his mind? What means were brought to bear upon him that were successful in destroying the faith which he had held for four years, and finally induced him to support the Government? He says that one motive was to prevent the Government from being defeated. That may be a justifiable reason, and, to my mind, it would be a strong one, but I doubt if it will be sufficient to satisfy his constituents. Hon. members know that for many years I have been a strong supporter of this Government; some say I have been imbued with as much party loyalty as most men. Well, I have always endeavoured to stand by my party; but I have always said, during my whole career, that I conceived it possible that a time might come when a party man, in order to obey his conscientious convictions, might have to oppose the Government. I recognize the fact that the interests of the country are of much more importance than the permanency of a Government, or even the permanency of a party. I believe the Conservative party are right to-day, but the Government are very largely in the wrong. I know that a large number of Conservatives do not approve of the course of the Government in forcing this Bill through Parliament, but as they desire to stand by the Government as loyal supporters, they have consented to waive their convictions, and to support the Government in the course they are taking.

Mr. McMULLEN. I have been glad to notice in the press an outline of the proceedings that recently took place in Winnipeg between a commission from this Government and the Manitoba government upon the position of the Catholic minority in that province. I see that considerable concessions were made on both sides, and I think if the delegates had remained a longer time, they might have been able to come to some final arrangements. Therefore, I regretted that the efforts of the Dominion delegation were obstructed by the decision of the Government to push this Bill through the committee stage while the negotiations were in progress. I should like very much to hear some explanations from the Government to justify them in thus pressing the Bill in committee, when it was so necessary to adopt a conciliatory course. I must say, Mr. Chairman, that I think the Government are making a great blunder in trying to push this Bill through committee with such desperate haste, regardless not only of the convenience of members, but regardless of their health, and regardless of all the other public business that is waiting for consideration. I think it would be better for the Government, better for Manitoba, and better for this country if the whole question was dropped, and if a further effort was made by this Government with the government of Manitoba in order to arrive at some amicable settlement.

I listened to the hon. member for West Assiniboia, and followed closely the suggestions he made as to the means of settling this difficulty. Listening to his arguments, I am forced to agree with him that any settlement that is attempted without the consent and hearty co-operation of the province, will breed discord and result in disaster to the minority. I recognize the peculiar nature of the reserve power in the constitution for the relief of the minority in such a case as this. But it is unfortunate that well-defined methods of proceeding were not also set forth, so that we might know exactly how this reserve power is to be brought into effect. No doubt, the legislation of Manitoba has been harsh to the minority. I do not favour anything that will trample upon the rights of any minority, and I do not believe that there is any desire, except, possibly, in the case of one or two members, to do injustice in that way. But, though the power of this Parliament to act is undoubted, it must not be forgotten that, unless that power is exercised judiciously and with consideration for the province, you may so exasperate and antagonize a powerful majority so that they will resent the use of your power, and the practical result will be to make the state of things for all, including the minority, worse than before. The remedial order, recognizing a grievance on the part of the minority, called upon the government of Manitoba to re-establish, as I understand it, the old condition of affairs. That, in my opinion, was a mistake. I am not a constitutional lawyer, and, though I have listened with attention to the opinions expressed here on these constitutional aspect of the whole matter, I do not know that I see very much more clearly with regard to them than I did before. I respect lawyers as much as any man does, but I think, perhaps, it would be better if we had not so many in this House, differing upon technical points; but, if we had more sober-minded, sensible men of municipal experience and experience in dealing with affairs of practical interest to the welfare of the communities. I should prefer if we could take a plainer and more homely way of dealing with the whole question. In my opinion, a great mistake has been made from the start. If Manitoba had been approached in the spirit of an honest desire to settle the whole question, instead of in the mandatory spirit that has been shown, a settlement might have been reached. My hon. leader, some time ago, suggested a modus vivendi that met with great favour among men of all political parties—that a commission should be appointed and a thorough investigation made into the condition of things in Manitoba. But, instead of seeking a settlement in that reasonable fashion, the Government, led in this respect, apparently, by the ex-Minister of Justice (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), took a very high-handed course with the government and people of Manitoba. Instead of being treated as an independent and responsible portion of the general governmental system of this Dominion, they were treated like culprits. And that false step has led us to the present condition of affairs. I believe that some members of the Government are honestly anxious to have a settlement. Others want the Bill to be discussed and not carried. I do not think there is any more agreement among them now than there was during the time of the Cabinet difficulty. I do not find fault with the minority for feeling that there has been a serious interference with their rights and with what they regard as an established principle. But, notwithstanding that, courtesy and fairness will do more than anything else to bring about a settlement. But I hope the minority will, before many years, be able to express the same sentiment as that uttered by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny), a few days ago, when he stated that in his province the Roman Catholic minority were treated with consideration and courtesy by the Protestant majority. I was glad to hear that, for the sake of the class to which I belong. I have not the slightest doubt that in Manitoba the same condition will prevail, and that the majority will concede to the minority the relief they are entitled to. Now, as regards the Government keeping the House sitting. There was an understanding last session that, when some reasonable progress had been made, even though it might be limited, when one or two o'clock was reached, members were allowed to retire and prepare for the duties of the coming day. That is a good rule. You cannot wonder at hon. members resenting such treatment as we have received. I say frankly that I have no desire to obstruct the progress of this Bill. I claim the right which belongs to every hon. member, to discuss the provisions of the Bill, as they come up. But I cannot but believe that, if the Bill becomes law in its present form, it would be an actual injury to the minority. My sympathies are with the minority.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. McMULLEN. Some hon. gentlemen may challenge that. But I am sure that in the section where I have lived for forty years, there is not a man who will challenge the sincerity of that statement on my part. I hope a settlement will be secured, and that the rights admitted will be given to the minority, and they will be relieved of what they conceive to be an injustice under the present legislation of Manitoba. We cannot but feel the loss at this time of some of the old members of this House, who occupied positions in the Cabinet. If Sir John Macdonald had been here as Minister of Justice, the Remedial Bill would never have been introduced. He would have secured a settlement of the difficulty with the provincial government, instead of bringing us face to face with a serious condition of affairs. Mistake after mistake has been committed. We may hope, however, that as the results of the Government's action eventually the rights of the minority and the relief to which they are entitled will be granted. It has been said that the public schools in Manitoba are Protestant schools, but I have read over the curriculum and I find nothing in it that could offend any Catholic ; at the same time, if there is anything offensive I should like to see it removed. We on this side of the House are anxious to get before the people on the trade policy, and I regret that this educational question has come in. If this Bill is not passed, there will be great confusion in the public mind. I am glad the Manitoba legislature will meet on the 16th inst., for there may possibly be introduced an amendment to the school law or some other proposal made. We should proceed with this remedial legislation very gently until that date, and every one would be glad if the Manitoba legislature amended the Act so as to give a measure of redress to the minority with which they would be satisfied. This will be a session long to be remembered owing to the introduction of this Bill, and the peculiar manner in which it is being pressed through the House. The Secretary of State has endeavoured, to some extent at least, to tyrannize over the House by dictating the course that should be adopted, and endeavouring to force this measure through the House in a very ill-considered and tyrannical manner. If the Secretary of State had shown a little more courtesy towards hon. members and treated them with a little more regard, he would have been more successful in passing this measure through the House.

Mr. LAURIER. The Government by this time, no doubt, are satisfied that the methods adopted by them are not conducive to promote the good results they desired to secure. Nothing has taken place which can justify the Government in their extraordinary proceedings at the present time. I remained in the House from 3 o'clock yesterday until 1.30 this morning, and listened to the discussion, and it was perfectly legitimate in order, and in accordance with the practice of this House. I admit that the discussion was perhaps a little more protracted than it might have been : but if it was protracted, it rested not with any hon. member but with the Government. The business was left in charge of two hon. gentlemen, the Secretary of State and the Minister of Finance, and whether they were not posted on the Bill, or whether they would not afford information, it is notorious that they did not give the information legitimately asked by hon. members. If those hon. gentlemen had chosen to give fair and legitimate information asked for, more progress would have been made with the Bill. It is fair to assume, and I may affirm also that when the Government came here yesterday at three o'clock, they were determined to have one continuous sitting from Monday at three until Saturday at midnight, and no hon. member will contradict that statement. Hon. gentlemen opposite must understand by this time that this is not the way to carry on the business of the House. They have chosen their own time to bring forward this Bill—they brought it forward on 3rd March—but they have not consulted the convenience of the House in carrying forward the Bill. I am anxious and willing that we should have a legitimate discussion on the Bill from three o'clock in the afternoon until say two o'clock in the morning. I remember very well that at the opening of the House last session, the leader of the House, the Finance Minister, agreed that eleven o'clock was a proper hour to adjourn. Every one considered that a most reasonable understanding. I am willing, under the peculiar circumstances in which we are now placed, to postpone the adjournment three or four hours, and not adjourn until two or even three o'clock in the morning : but to sit beyond that hour is an outrage upon the rules of the House and upon what is due from an hon. member to another. The course, however, has been adopted of compelling hon. members to sit here, and the result has been that very little progress has been made. We have now arrived at the business hour this afternoon, and for my part, I would invite the House to give attention to a discussion of this Bill until two or even three o'clock to-morrow morning. It is certainly fair that hon. members should not be asked to work more than ten or twelve hours in the day. I quite agree with the hon. member for Albert that there is only a certain amount of work in a man. We have now, I say, come to the business hours, and I therefore suggest that we apply ourselves to the discussion of the Bill in a business-like way. This course was pursued up to two o'clock this morning, and if a different course was pursued subsequently it was perfectly justified, and the country will justify it. No one can expect that hon. members who are here to discharge important duties can sit here twenty-four hours. I therefore suggest that we dispose of the amendment and proceed with the consideration of the Bill before the committee.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Is it possible that the leader of the House is so absolutely lacking in courtesy as to refuse to give an answer to the very reasonable proposition made by the leader of the Opposition ? Is it possible that the hon. gentleman is so deaf to an appeal made in such temperate language that he will not offer a reply ? Is that the temper in which the business is to be conducted ? Intemperance and petulance have been displayed by the leader of the House. If the hon. gentleman is determined to force on the business and pursue the course which he appears determined to follow, we are quite ready to accept the issue ; it is just as easy to keep up the debate until twelve o'clock on Saturday night as twelve o'clock to-night. The hon. gentleman need not have any doubt upon that point. The hon. gentleman apparently can find no better method of pursuing his course than by resorting to physical force, and I am prepared, and other hon. members are prepared, to accept the issue. I am surprised that an appeal made in such temperate language, and based on such exceedingly reasonable grounds as that presented by the leader of the Opposition should not have met with a reply. I venture to say that the leader of the House, in his position of High Commissioner in London, does not treat those with whom he comes in contact with the same discourtesy. I venture to say that the hon. gentleman, in dealing with those great people he is so fond of speaking of, is as obsequious as he is the opposite here. There are many reasons why the committee should now rise. The hon. member for East Grey has stated many reasons, based on physical grounds, and these should be borne in mind, especially by the Finance Minister. I would strongly urge upon the Government the advisability of this committee now rising and reporting progress. It is to be remembered that this House is in no parliamentary sense, qualified to deal with this question. We are now entering upon the last two or three weeks of a Parliament which is practically responsible to nobody, and there are many hon. gentlemen who do not intend to seek re-election. That fact is notorious. There are many hon. gentlemen in this House who will have the best reasons for not seeking re-election, hon. gentlemen who have supported the Government on this measure, but who feel convinced that their constituents will not sanction their action. I hold that this committee ought to rise, because the Government have wholly failed to give any answer to the constitutional objections that have already been raised against the three or four clauses of this Bill that we have so far considered.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I was unfortunately absent from the House when the leader of the Opposition rose to address the committee. I can assure the hon. gentleman that no discourtesy was intended to him in failing to make any observations when the hon. gentleman sat down. I understood the hon. gentleman to propose that, so much time having been wasted in the most palpable obstruction that it was possible to conceive, by hon. gentlemen, for whose conduct I do not held him responsible, that we should not dispose of this question and take up the Bill and go on with it. In that proposition, I heartily concur. But I rise to point out to the hon. gentleman that we stand, as every person must recognize, in a very peculiar position. The hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) made a somewhat forcible address to the committee, pointing out the wild opposition of the people of this country to this measure. I do not understand that to be the case at all. I understand that many people in this country have been deluded into supposing that the question under consideration was as to whether separate schools should be established in Manitoba, and many people are opposed to that. But I would remind the hon. gentleman that notice was given nine months ago that this Parliament would be called on the 2nd day of January to deal with this measure. Now, surely nine months has given this country ample time to express any very wild indignation in relation to this measure. Where have there been any monster public meetings ? Where has there been any demonstration of public feeling throughout this country against this measure ? On the contrary, all the efforts that have been made to excite and delude the people into a false impression that this was a question of whether separate schools should be established in Manitoba or not, have fallen flat. The country has not been roused, petitions have not poured in upon this House since the 2nd January. Hon. gentlemen know very well that the life of this Parliament is limited. We know that an inordinate time was taken up in passing the Address, and an inordinate time was then taken up in passing the Budget But, immediately these two subjects were disposed of, this Bill was laid upon the Table. Now, I call attention to the fact that the Government obtained a substantial majority on the second reading, a majority composed, not only of members of its own party, but of several hon. gentlemen supporting the leader of the Opposition. Now, what happened ? Why, a comparatively small section of this House, who declared from the outset that they intended to prevent this measure ever becoming law, have, from that hour down to the present moment, confronted the Government with the most palpable, open, and determined obstruction that it is possible to conceive. These hon. gentlemen declared that they intended to kill this Bill. Well, when the House went into committee, the solemn farce was played by hon. gentlemen who had declared their determined hostility to this measure, getting up and pretending to assist the Government in perfecting this measure. Why, Sir, I do not believe that in the history of parliamentary government so monstrous a farce was ever before played in the presence of an intelligent assembly. Well, that question was dealt with effectively by this House. The leader of the Opposition knows the danger of our going out of committee if we want to do anything with this Bill. He knows that when we have gone out of committee, one subject after another was brought before this House to prevent our getting back into committee. Now, if the hon. member for Brant is correct, he should desire this Bill to pass, because he says that it will be the death of this Government, that if this measure is passed, the Government will be swept out of power.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I did not say anything like that.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Then it must have been some other hon. gentleman. But I assume that hon. gentlemen opposite do not believe that this Bill will be fatal to this Government, and that if we wish to come back here, as I claim we shall, and if it be true that this Bill is as obnoxious to the country as the hon. member for Brant stated, when he said there was a widespread feeling of hostility to this measure throughout the country——

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). No, I did not say that.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Well, did the hon. gentleman speak at all to-day ?

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The hon. gentleman has been losing so much rest that he has not been able to follow me. What I did was to read an extract from a journal in the North-west, in which it represented the feeling of that country as opposed to the Bill. I did not express my own opinion at all.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I must have been mistaken. I had thought the hon. gentleman had made a speech of half an hour's length apart from the interesting newspaper extract that he read. To return to the subject: If this measure is so obnoxious as hon. gentlemen pretend, if it is so opposed to the sentiment of the country, why do not they allow it to pass ? They tell us that it is a worthless measure, that it will have no effect. Why not, then, allow it to go upon the statute-book, and not meet the Government with obstruction that could not be used under ordinary circumstances. Ordinarily we should be protected by the fact that we might sit here till the autumn to pass this measure. But I call the attention of the leader of the Opposition to the fact that we are in a different position with regard to taxing the powers of hon. members. I think there is complete justification for what is being done. If the Bill is of the character ascribed to it by hon. gentlemen, it can do no harm even though it passed. Let them pass this measure and then pass the Estimates, and thus avoid wasting half a million dollars of the public money by another session, and then we will give them an early opportunity of appealing to the people to decide between us. It is trifling with the intelligence of the House and of the country for hon. gentlemen to proceed as they are doing in the face of the most overwhelming evidence that the House does not desire obstruction. Situated as we are, it is possible for an insignificant minority to offer obstruction which, under ordinary circumstances, they could not offer. We hear it said that this Parliament is not qualified to deal with this question. I challenge hon. gentleman to quote a single instance in British parliamentary history in which the principle has been laid down by prominent Liberals that Parliament, from the hour of its birth to the hour of its death, is not clothed with all the powers necessary to carry on the public business. The system of plebiscite is not known in Great Britain. I could quote the very highest authority denouncing the idea that parliamentary government involved anything but the principle that members, from the term of their election, were clothed with power to discharge what they believed to be their duties to the country.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Does the hon. gentleman remember going to Washington and having an election before going ?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I remember going to Washington and I remember stating on many platforms the grounds on which we appealed to the country—perfectly constitutional grounds. I said that the Government of Canada proposed to send delegates to Washington to negotiate an important trade arrangement ; and the Government found themselves in this position—that if they went at the close of the Parliament, the United States press might represent that in a short time there would be an election, and the party then in power would be in Opposition, and therefore their negotiations would be of no use. But they desired to do so with the mandate of the the people, and with time enough before them to bring the negotiations to a successful issue. Every person knows that this session was called for the purpose of dealing with this measure, and the announcement that that would be done was received with no protest worthy of the name. A substantial majority of the House has declared that it was desirable that this Bill should become law. And from that hour, as the hon. leader of the Opposition knows, we have been met with the most persistent, unjustifiable opposition that any Government in this House or in the world has encountered. How do I prove the position that this House has taken in this matter ? I moved a resolution, after the suggestion of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), of whom I do not and have not complained. I say that the hon. gentleman said that if the Government arrived at the conclusion that this House must rise on the 24th of April at the latest, it would form a strong ground for taking more time for Government business. That opinion commended itself to the House. We stated that we had come deliberately to the conclusion that this Parliament's existence would terminate on the 24th April, and I moved a resolution that, after Monday next, for the remainder of the session, the House should sit on Saturdays, commencing at 10 a.m. How was that met ? By wasting a day.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. True, but a necessary amendment, caused by hon. gentlemen taking advantage of the fact that the resolution had not been moved at the date originally intended. This House by a majority of 45—46 votes to 91—declared that they wished to sit on Saturday, anxious as they were to enjoy a rest on that day, for the purpose of passing this Bill. That was followed by a motion by the hon. gentleman who bandies words in this House, who ventures to taunt me with obsequiousness. Was I ever so obsequious as to allow a typewritten resolution to be thrust into my hand, and to be put up to move it, and then have the gentleman who prepared it pull me down and cut off half the resolution. When the hon. gentleman found that all his support had deserted him, and that he and the framer of the resolution would have stood alone, that was the course pursued. That hon. gentleman followed up that obstruction. I am not surprised, because these hon. gentlemen gave us notice from the outset that a body of gentlemen in this House—a very small body, I am glad to say—would prevent this Bill becoming law. And when they found we had got into committee, they got up and blandly expressed their desire to take charge of the Bill. The hon. gentleman moved in opposition to the motion which had just been decided. When I spoke of the majority of 46, the hon. gentleman asked, tauntingly, what that mattered. I venture to tell him that if that was not enough for him the House would give him a larger one. The resolution of the hon. member for Muskoka was voted down by a majority of 66. Could this House show more plainly its determination that this obstruction should cease, and that consideration of the Bill should proceed ? This hon. gentleman who is never obsequious, when he finds that the Bill cannot be obstructed in the ordinary sense of the term, turns one of the most complete somersaults ever witnessed in this House, and comes out as a protector of the Roman Catholics of this country, by moving a resolution that nobody should be permitted to teach in these separate schools until he had passed an examination in the Roman Catholic faith. So that, for the purpose of obstruction, he was willing to pose as the advocate and protector of the Roman Catholic religion. His mentor and tutor having discovered the blunder into which he had fallen, he taunted me with knowing nothing about the Bill. I do not think I put myself in such a ridiculous position before the House and the country as the hon. gentleman, who had been burning the midnight oil preparing this trap for his obsequious friend from Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien). No doubt, hon. gentlemen have seen a hen who had hatched a duckling running along after the duckling as it made for the water. My hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), with all his feathers on end rushed in the same manner after his duckling from Muskoka. The hon. member for North Simcoe seemed to think that nobody is a legal authority in this House except himself. I do not profess to any legal knowledge, but I have common sense, and that teaches me never to take my law on any question from the counsel retained on the other side. I have, therefore, resisted the two attempts of the hon. member for Simcoe to take charge of this Bill, to take over this unhappy bantling to be reared under his tender nursing. If anything could show hon. gentlemen that not the Government, but the House, is opposed to this obstruction, it would be the fate of the hon. gentleman's motion. He found a majority of 92 in this House telling him that the House did not want any teaching from the hon. member for North Simcoe, as filtered through the hon. member for Muskoka. I have detained the House for a few minutes, but with this important object in view, and that is to draw the attention of the leader of the House——

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that he is a little previous.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I suppose it is a case of coming events casting their shadows before. I can only say that I trust that when the hon. gentleman does reach this position he will be happier than he is in the place he now occupies. I desire to call the attention of the leader of the Opposition to the fact that not only has this House declared its approval of the principle of this measure, but it has, by the most overwhelming majorities ever placed on our Journals, declared that this obstruction is diametrically opposed to its wishes. I will do the leader of the Opposition the credit to say that I do not believe there is an hon. member on either side that entertains that opinion more strongly than he does. But I appeal to the hon. gentleman to assist us. I admit that he has a contingent that is uncontrollable and that even if

I were desirous to do so, I could not hold him wholly responsible. His position in the House, as everybody recognizes, has been seriously damaged. He has ceased to be the leader of the Opposition. With the exception of a few tried cohorts around him, his forces are beyond control and do not recognize the authority of their leader. But the emphatic determination of this House to proceed with this Bill is plain. And, as we have but a few days in which to complete the measure, I call upon the hon. gentleman to give all the aid that lies in his power to complete this measure and other necessary business of the House, and then let the people decide between us. I do not hesitate to say that, in my judgment, it matters little to the Government whether this measure is passed or not, for the reason that there is not an intelligent man in Canada who has given the slightest attention to the subject who does not know that the Government have done all that men could do to implement the pledge they gave the House and the country that they would exhaust every means to enact this measure into law. Knowing that, and recognizing the fact that we have determined to do all men can do to implement our pledge and to faithfully carry it out, not only because it was a pledge, but because we believe in our hearts and consciences that the interests of Canada, not the interest of the party, require that the issue between the two great parties in this country should not be determined on a question of either race or religion, we seek to press this question to a conclusion, because the most unfortunate thing that could happen in the interest of this country would be to have racial and religious divisions between the two great political parties. These are the grounds on which we feel compelled to do what, under other circumstances, we would not desire to do, press forward this Bill as we are doing, and allow the two parties to go to the country with their respective policies and accept the final issue, whatever it might be. Under these circumstances I feel that the committee cannot rise, if we are going to do anything, because the moment we go out of committee, hon. gentlemen know that the most scandalous and unjustifiable obstruction of this measure will be resorted to. I thank the hon. member (Mr. Laurier) from the bottom of my heart for his suggestion that this question should be disposed of, and that we should now take up the Bill and make substantial progress with it. If there was any evidence that the Bill would be dealt with in such a way as to bring it to a prompt conclusion, the hon. gentleman would find no disposition on this side of the House to tax the physical powers of any hon. member. There is no hon. member on either side who is in as much danger in regard to a matter of that kind as himself, or who is more reluctant that any such means should be resorted to; and if this were an ordinary session, I would be prepared to sit until autumn rather than resort to anything of this kind, but the House and the country will understand that we have pledged ourselves to pass this measure, believing as we do that the vital interests of Canada depend upon its prompt solution by this Parliament, and we have therefore no alternative but to exhaust every means that can be used to carry this Bill to a successful conclusion.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not propose to imitate, though the temptation is great, the Secretary of State, in deliberately obstructing the business now before the committee. I am afraid that when the hon. gentleman refuses, as he has refused, the most reasonable proposition made by my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Laurier), who was prepared to do his very best to enable the leader of the House to make fair and reasonable progress between the present moment and midnight, the hon. gentleman has made it manifest to every human being in this House, and out of it, that the Government have no honest desire to pass this measure.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Try them.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am perfectly willing, though I am bound to say that my hon. friend is going a very long way in offering, after five-and-twenty hours sitting, to go on with the ordinary consideration of the Bill; nevertheless, probably it may be as well for the purpose of showing publicly how utterly insincere are all the professions of the Government as regards desiring to put this Bill through, that this motion should be allowed to be voted on and some progress made, though after such a long sitting, the Government have not the slightest right to expect such a proposition. But my hon. friend has made it, and the hon. gentlemen behind him will be perfectly prepared to implement it. I want to recall to the hon. Secretary of State certain incidents in his past career. The hon. gentleman thought it was a most outrageous thing that the debate on the Address should have been delayed. Did the hon. gentleman ever hear of the year 1878? Parliament met on 7th February. We did not spend a fortnight in squabbling among ourselves, but 16th February arrived before we got the Address through, and the chief obstructionist on that occasion was the Secretary of State himself. Must I recall to his mind all that happened in those nine days? The hon. gentleman did not occupy much less time than was occupied by us, in fact, fully as long, or a longer period. The hon. gentleman said that he is not disposed to take his law from the retained counsel of one party. Perhaps not. But he is perfectly willing to take this Bill from the retained counsel of the Manitoba minority, because, if this Bill has any paternity, unless it is a legal bastard, its only father is the counsel for the minority of Manitoba, Mr. Ewart. He has had more to say than all the occupants of the Treasury benches as to that Bill, and, therefore, it was quite to be expected that the Minister of the Interior would ask a little time to consult him. I think hon. gentlemen opposite will discover that the position of my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) has not been seriously injured by the course he has pursued. I doubt if any hon. member in this House has ever improved his position so rapidly as my hon. friend, by the bold and manly course taken by him in moving the six months' hoist to this Bill, and I believe not only in Ontario, Manitoba, and all the other English provinces, but among his own countrymen, and I must express regret that the Secretary of State should have attempted to stir up animosity and prejudice against my hon. friend because he would not support this Bill, which he, and every other man, knows is a sham and a fraud. The hon. gutleman has told us that he knows we cannot sit until the autumn. He and his colleagues knew that long ago. If he and his colleagues had any real or honest intention of passing this measure, knowing as they did in July, 1895, that Parliament would expire by efflux of time on 24th April, 1896, why did they not summon Parliament for November, when this Bill might have been properly considered? If they thought it was so all-important, why was it they were not prepared to proceed with the Bill on January 2nd? Why did they waste two weeks in intrigues among themselves?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Allow me to suggest to the hon. gentleman that we did not get the answer from the government of Manitoba till last December.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Hon. gentlemen opposite were so helpless and resourceless, so devoid of knowledge as to what the government of Manitoba might be expected to do, after what had passed, they were unable to prepare a Bill, and they must wait until Manitoba replied. What was to prevent them sending commissioners to Manitoba in July or August, 1895, as had been suggested by my hon. friend, time and again? Had there been any real and sincere desire to get this Bill through coute que coute, what they should have done was to have communicated direct with the government of Manitoba. There would have been no difficulty, any more than there has been lately in obtaining from that government a complete answer as to what they desired and intended to do. Then hon. gentlemen could have come down to this House and laid the proposition before it, and it might have been acted on. Waiving that point, and they have never given a proper explanation of it, I contend they should have been prepared with the Bill to submit to Parliament on 2nd January, as the Government would have been in England, to which the hon. gentleman is so fond of referring. When they knew that Parliament would expire in three and a half months, they allowed two months to elapse before the second reading of the Bill was taken, they have themselves to blame for the position which they occupy to-day. It was their fault, and I say to hon. gentlemen from Lower Canada on both sides of the House that, in my judgment, they were sold mercilessly by certain members of the Government, if not by all, because I believe a certain contingent may have had an honest and sincere desire to promote the Bill. But the Secretary of State wants to know of any similar instance in a British Parliament of similar obstruction. The hon. gentleman must be more or less conversant with what took place in the British Parliament during the last few years, and also the period occupied in passing certain Irish Bills. Not less than four or five months were occupied in passing some of those measures through the House of Commons, and sending them through the House of Lords, and during that time a much longer period was occupied in discussing them than has been spent in any discussion which has taken place here. I should like the Secretary of State to show a single case in the last century or the last two centuries, down to the Rump Parliament, during which the Parliament of England ever died by efflux of time, and I should like still more the hon. gentleman to give any instance where, during the last three or four weeks of its existence, the British Parliament took up and put through a Bill of first-rate magnitude or one in any way as important as this particular measure. Can the hon. gentleman give us, within two hundred years, I give him down to the days of Charles I., any measure at all analogous to this in importance which was presented to the British Parliament during the last three or four weeks and attempted to be forced through that body? But the hon. gentleman does not properly understand that this is a Federal Parliament, or, if he does, he would lay much less stress on the legal right. I dispute there is a legal right, because it was his duty and the duty of his colleagues to have dissolved Parliament long ago, after the census of 1891 had shown that this Parliament was not properly representing the several provinces, and, more particularly because the province whose interests are chiefly affected by this Bill is not properly represented on the floor of Parliament. More than that, we had a Redistribution Bill, and, according to English practice and precedents after a Redistribution Bill has been passed, and more particularly must this apply to a Federal Parliament having a partially written constitution, there is an appeal made to the people. I have already said that the present Parliament does not represent 60 per cent of the electors now in Canada. A very curious proof has been put into my hands with respect to one of the constituencies of Ontario. I refer to West Durham. The revision of 1891, after the last elections, showed a total population of 15,374 souls, with an actual voting strength of 3,722, with a total number on the list of 5,530. On one revision alone, and it was a revision which took place five years ago, 1,768 names were struck off the rolls, and 902 names added. That gave 2,670 votes out of a nominal vote of 5,530; and there is another revision to be heard from. Could there be any better illustration of the truth of what I said, but although we may technically represent the electorate, we do not really and truly represent the electorate, and therefore, it is doubly wrong, on moral and conscientious grounds, to attempt to deal with this question. I would ask the leader of the House another question. He has had a great deal of experience in parliamentary matters, and I ask him whether he does not think he would make more progress by accepting the offer of my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) than by attempting to dragoon the House into sitting de die in diem until Saturday night. He must know, as every one knows, that any such attempt can only result in defeating the last chance of the Bill. If the hon. gentleman accepts the proposal of my hon. friend, there is a fair chance of progress being made; but if he refuses, there is no chance of progress being made. If he has the slightest desire to pass the Bill, he will accept this proposal, we will sit a reasonable number of hours, and then adjourn. If there is obstruction, then we shall know where it lies.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I desire to inquire if the remarks of the leader of the House were meant to convey the idea that the committee will be kept sitting continuously until the Bill is passed.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I did not say that.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I wanted an answer, in order to frame a question. Does the hon. gentleman not think it would be proper that the report of the commissioners to Winnipeg should be laid on the Table and an opportunity be given to discuss it? I would ask the Minister of Justice if he does not think that the report of the commissioners should be handed in to the House, with the Speaker in the Chair, and that we should have an opportunity to discuss it? But, if the hon. gentleman proposes these continuous sittings in committee, when does he propose that the House shall be put in possession of that report?

Mr. DICKEY. At the request of the leader of the House, I beg to say that there were two parties to this reference, and that the commissioners of the Dominion Government felt bound to report first to their principals the proceedings of that commission. The other party to the conference, who were dealing directly as principals, have already published all the proceedings that took place before the conference, and, as a matter of fact, they are in the possession of every member of this House. Technically, the report of the commissioners has not been brought down, owing to the fact, the leader of the House stated, that the report did not come before the House sat again. But it does not add anything to what has already been published on the part of the other party to the conference.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Is the House to be treated in that way, that all the information that we are to have is a report published in the papers? The leader of the House promised that it would be laid before the House immediately, and the House would like to have good faith kept with it once in a while, at any rate. We ought to have that report before another step is taken in this committee.

Mr. McCARTHY. It is an extraordinary thing that we are to be told that we are to get our information with reference to that commission from the newspapers. It is certain that the newspapers do not contain a very important part of the documents which, when brought down, will be laid before us. We want to know what the instructions to the commissioners were. I was contradicted here last night, when I said that I gathered from the papers that the commissioners were told to negotiate on the basis of a settlement which would be satisfactory to the minority; and the hon. gentleman who undertook to contradict me, stated that the minority had never been consulted.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. The hon. gentleman said last night that an offer had been made to the local government in the name of the minority. I denied that, and said that the minority was not consulted at all, when that proposal to the local government was made by the delegates.

Mr. McCARTHY. The hon. gentleman misunderstood me. What I said was that the commissioners, so far as I could gather from the papers, had gone to Manitoba to negotiate a settlement, one condition of which was that it should be satisfactory to the minority. Now, it is important to know what the instructions were, it is important to have the formal report of the commissioners with reference to the whole subject, and I agree with the hon. member for Brant that this committee ought not to advance a step until these important documents are laid upon the Table, and they cannot be laid upon the Table until the Speaker is in the Chair. It is more important in this way, that, if we are to judge from what we have seen, not only is faith broken with this House, not only did the Secretary of State commit an offence against Mr. Greenway, in garbling his telegram, for which he was forced to apologize, but we know now that the statement we made on the floor of this House repeatedly, that it was understood that, pending these negotiations, the Bill was not to be advanced, was true, and we know, from the commissioners, that this was the arrangement that was agreed to in Manitoba, and that the Minister of Justice had sincerely to apologize for the conduct of his leader.

Mr. DICKEY. No, you are entirely mistaken.

Mr. McCARTHY. Well, when we have the papers we will see who is mistaken. Now, a word as to the insignificant minority. This insignificant minority is disturbing the sleep and the quietness of mind which the Secretary of State would otherwise enjoy. Now, we were promised that this House should meet on the 2nd January for the purpose of passing the Remedial Bill, but, as has been repeatedly stated, we were not asked seriously to consider the Remedial Bill until two months of the session had gone by. What is the excuse ? The excuse is given in the words of my great leader—I do not allude to the Secretary of State—that the genius of politics is reiteration, and I gathered that the Secretary of State thinks that by reiterating and reiterating that this Bill has been obstructed in this House, he will cover up and conceal the mistakes, or the deliberate design, of this Government, by pretending to pass this remedial measure, introducing it at such a time as they knew it could not be passed. Why, this Bill might have been laid on the Table on the 3rd January. No person pretends to say that the Bill could not have been printed and read the first time, when the Address was passed, on 23rd January. That stage would have been reached but for the feud that had raged in the ministerial camp, and the difficulties that arose there delayed the proceedings of this House until 16th January. Now, I challenge any fair-minded man in this House to say that the discussion on the second reading occupied an undue length of time. It has been pointed out that more time was consumed by gentlemen on this side of the House than by hon. gentlemen opposite. The hon. gentleman says that if we went out of committee, we never could get in again. Well, we met on Saturday morning at ten o'clock, and at eleven o'clock we were in committee. We met upon Monday at three o'clock, and this House was in committee before four o'clock. Where has been the delay in getting into committee ? Now, Sir, I am bound to say, on behalf of the insignificant minority, that I am glad that at last my hon. friend who leads the Opposition has been absolved from all responsibility for my misconduct. That has been formally done on the floor of Parliament by the hon. gentleman who leads this House. I am quite willing to bear all the sins and assume all the responsibility for the course I am taking ; and I repeat again, that in committee I propose to investigate every clause and every line of the clause. I am endeavouring to improve the Bill ; I cannot help it, if the majority won't accept my suggestions. I am endeavouring to make it as good a Bill as it can be made, and if, in the end, it comes to a third reading, I shall oppose it, because, notwithstanding any improvements I shall have succeeded in making, it will still be, in my opinion, a most objectionable Bill. I pointed out the other night that the last great measure that was brought before the British Parliament, was introduced on 13th February, and did not get to the House of Lords till 1st September. During that time, when the cloture was in force, it was clotured in sections ; the Bill was divided into three parts, and at certain dates these parts were put by the Chairman of the committee. But, notwithstanding the strict application of the cloture, the Bill was forty-seven days in passing through committee. Relatively, that Bill was not more important than the Bill we have now before us. That was brought in for the purpose of relieving a minority, this is for the purpose of oppressing a province. One was for the purpose of restoring peace and harmony in Ireland, this is for the purpose of creating difficulties and trouble in Manitoba. I think that every member who takes that view of it, is bound to oppose it in every legitimate way. I have nothing to regret in anything I have done so far, and I do not hold out any promise that my course in the future will be different from what it has been in the past.

Mr. CHARLTON. The Secretary of State, a few moments ago, said that this was not to be considered a moribund Parliament so far as relates to the consideration of an important measure. He made allusion to some matters upon which, in my opinion, some answer should be given. His assertion that the Parliament that was dissolved in February, 1891, was a moribund Parliament strikes me as singularly destitute of foundation when placed side by side the statement that this is not a moribund Parliament for the consideration of a Bill so important as this. The Parliament dissolved in 1891 had held four sessions. This Parliament is now nearing the end of its sixth session. The reason for dissolving that Parliament was that it was necessary to have a Parliament fresh from the people to consider the proposed treaty of reciprocity. I think it would be well briefly to review the circumstances. In 1891 the public meetings held by the Liberal party in favour of reciprocity had resulted in showing that that measure was received with great favour by the people. And in order to checkmate that the Government deliberately decided to dissolve the House a year before the time. They also sought to make it appear that they were the true friends of reciprocity and that under their guidance, negotiations were progressing favourably. On the 15th January, 1891, the Toronto "Mail" had a despatch as follows :—

> It is reported from Ottawa, on authority which leaves little reason to doubt that the rumour is true, that the Imperial Government is urging the Dominion Ministers to unite in a proposition to arrange all matters in dispute between Canada and the United States on the basis of a wide measure of commercial reciprocity.

To that despatch the "Empire" made the following answer:—

> The "Empire" is authorized to give this statement an unqualified denial. Not only is it not true, but, on the contrary, it is learned from the very best sources that the Canadian Government has recently been approached by the United States government with a view to the development of trade relations between the two countries and that our Government has requested the advice of Her Majesty's Government on the subject.

> Washington, D.C., 29th January, 1891.
> Hon. James G. Blaine,
> Secretary of State.
> My dear Mr. Blaine,—It is reported in the newspapers of Canada and along the northern border of my state, where my constituents are deeply interested in the subject, that negotiations are going on between this country and Great Britain with a view of partial reciprocity with Canada, including natural products only and not manufactures, and it is stated that Sir Charles Tupper is on his way here as commissioner to negotiate for such modification to our tariff. I would be very glad if you would enable me to answer my constituents.
> Very truly yours,
> CHAS. S. BAKER.

To this inquiry Mr. Blaine replies on the same day:

> Washington, D.C., 29th January, 1891.
> My dear Mr. Baker,—I authorize you to contradict the rumours you refer to. There are no negotiations whatever on foot for a reciprocity treaty with Canada, and you may be assured that no scheme for reciprocity with the Dominion confined to natural products will be entertained by this government. We know nothing of Sir Charles Tupper's coming to Washington.
> Very truly yours,
> JAMES G. BLAINE.

Here was an explicit denial on the part of the Secretary of State of the United States that negotiations were in progress and a statement that the basis upon which the Government proposed to make a reciprocity treaty would not be considered by the American government. Five days afterwards on the 3rd February, Parliament was dissolved. Inspired despatches in the same terms were printed in the "Gazette" of Montreal, "Empire" of Toronto and "Spectator" of Hamilton:

> The sixth Parliament of Canada is at an end. Acting on the advice of his responsible Ministers, His Excellency the Governor General has been pleased to dissolve the House of Commons and issue his writs for a new Parliament.
> Nominations take place on Thursday, 26th February, polling on Thursday, 5th March. The writs are to be dated 4th February and made returnable on 25th April.
> In view of the foregoing important statement, the question will naturally be asked, what are the reasons which have induced the Government to appeal to the country at the present time? It is understood that the Dominion Government have through Her Majesty's Government made certain proposals to the United States for negotiations looking to an extension of our commerce with that country. These proposals have been submitted to the President for his consideration, and the Canadian Government is of the opinion that if the negotiations are to result in a treaty which must be ratified by the Parliament of Canada, it is expedient the Government should be able to deal with a Parliament fresh from the people rather than with a moribund House.
> It is understood that Canada will send a delegation to Washington after 4th March, the date on which the life of the present Congress expires, for the purpose of discussing informally the questions of the extension and development of trade between the United States and Canada, and the settlement of all questions of difference between the two countries. This delegation will visit the United States capital, it is said, as the result of a friendly suggestion from Washington.
> In view of the importance of the reasons which have induced the Government to appeal to the country at the present moment, the "Empire" is privileged to publish a copy of the despatch from His Excellency the Governor General to the Secretary of State for the Colonies, showing the nature of the Government's proposals to the United States, and indicating the earnest desire of the Administration for the development of trade between the United States and Canada.

This statement made by the "Empire" proved that that article was inspired by the Government because the despatch was not accessible to the "Empire." The despatch referred to refers first to negotiations in progress for a reciprocity treaty between the United States and Newfoundland. It stated that Canada had always been ready for reciprocal arrangements and had made repeated efforts which had been refused or ignored by the United States. This despatch then went on to say that overtures had been made to the Canadian Government by the State department at Washington. Sir John Thompson, in a speech in Toronto, said:

> On hearing that these negotiations were progressing——

That is, between the United States and Newfoundland:

> —we insisted upon the British Government demanding at Washington that Canada should have the option, if she pleased, of having Canada included in any treaty which might be made with the colony of Newfoundland, but we indicated at the same time that the proposed treaty with regard to Newfoundland did not seem to be upon lines so extensive as would suit the wants and interests of Canada, and that it might be better to avail ourselves at the same time of entering upon separate negotiations on behalf of Canada. Well, Sir, that intimation was promptly conveyed by Her Majesty's Government to Washington, and the answer made by Mr. Blaine, the Secretary of the United States on behalf of his government, was an overture to reciprocity.

So the assertion was that the overture emanated from the American government, and here is the same assertion made by Sir John Thompson. The elections were held and the Government were successful. On the 1st April, Secretary Blaine addressed a communication to Sir Julian Pauncefote, British Ambassador at Washington, with regard to the statement that proposals for reciprocity had emanated from the United States. Among other things, he said :

> A copy of the basis of negotiation which you placed in my hands on the 22nd of December last is appended hereto.
> You told me, if my memory is not in error, that you were instructed by Lord Salisbury to propose the topic to the United States for discussion, and, if possible, for agreement.
> I answered that I felt sure that the President would be willing to appoint a commission to consider the propositions as they were stated, and, furthermore, that I should be unwilling to submit them to the President.
> After some further conversation, in which you repeated that the propositions were merely the basis upon which a discussion might be instituted, I replied that in any event I had not a moment to give to the subject until after the adjournment of Congress in March, but that after that date I would be willing to respond to your request "to have a full but private conference with the British Minister and one or more agents from Canada, and go over every point of difference, and consider every subject upon which a mutual interest could be founded.
> If an agreement is reached, all well ; if not, no official mention is to be made of the effort.
> Above all things, it is important to avoid public reference to the matter.
> This the President will insist upon.
> While no notes were exchanged between us I carefully minuted my modification of the paper you left with me containing Lord Salisbury's proposition, and did so immediately after you left the department. You will observe the private character which I wished to impart to the conference is recognized by you a month later in your note of 27th January, when you called the correspondence "confidential."
> In view of the fact that you had come to the State Department with the proposals, and that the subject was then for the first time mentioned between us, and in view of the further fact that I agreed to a private conference as explained in my minute, I confess that it was a surprise to me when several weeks later during the Canadian canvass, Sir John Macdonald and Sir Charles Tupper, both stated before public assemblages that an informal discussion of a reciprocity treaty would take place at Washington after the 4th of March, by the invitation of the Secretary of State.
> I detail these facts because I deem it important, since the matter has been for some weeks open to public remark, to have it settled that the conference was not "initiated" by me, but on the contrary that the private arrangement of which I spoke was but a modification of your proposal and in no sense an original suggestion from the government of the United States.

So great was the feeling caused by this, I cannot exactly say perfidy, but bad faith on the part of our public men, that when our commissioners went to Washington they were refused an interview. The President treated them with the scorn he believed their perfidious conduct deserved. He left Washington refusing to answer the note of Sir Julian Pauncefote, and our commissioners left Washington on the evening of the same day on which they arrived. In our sessional records appears a communication dated the 21st April, 1893, from Sir Charles Tupper, in which he said :

> I told Mr. Blaine in reference to these charges, that I wished at the outset to recognize the accuracy of the statements contained in his letter to Sir Julian Pauncefote, which I had sent in reference to the initiation of the negotiations regarding the reciprocity arrangements between the two countries.

And so the hon. gentleman admitted that the statements he had made were false. Now he refers to these reciprocity negotiations and tells us, forsooth, that it was proper in 1891 to dissolve a Parliament which had sat four sessions in order to take into consideration this fictitious treaty that he had not negotiated, and that he had no expectation of negotiating, and his statements with regard to which he admitted were false. But he tells us that the Remedial Bill affecting the whole future of Canada may properly be passed upon by a Parliament sitting two sessions longer than the Parliament of 1891, and now within eighteen days of its dissolution. He acknowledged that he was guilty of falsehood, and we can give little credence to the statements of the hon. gentleman with regard to this matter or anything else.

Mr. McMULLEN. I cannot allow the statement of the Secretary of State that palpable obstruction has characterized the action of hon. members on this side of the House, to pass without contradiction. The remarks I offered this afternoon were certainly not of an obstructive character. Perhaps, however, the hon. gentleman referred to the remarks made by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), who spoke for about two hours. I must confess that during fifteen years I have never seen the House so miserably led as it is at the present time. The Secretary of State comes into the chamber and indulges in a variety of attacks, and then he leaves before hon. gentlemen have an opportunity to reply. It is perfectly evident from his action this afternoon that the Government are not anxious to carry this Bill. The hon. gentleman instead of throwing oil on the troubled waters this afternoon, simply aroused antagonism. The hon. gentleman made an attack on the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson), which he had to retract. Then he made an attack on the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), and he had to retract his statement in that case also. All these facts furnish evidence that the hon. gentleman does not desire to carry the Bill. The offer made by the leader of the Opposition was a business-like offer and it was one which would cause the Bill to receive full and proper consideration at the hands of the committee. Again, the Secretary of State referred to the broken ranks of the Opposition. That was entirely a fallacy on the part of the hon. gentleman. We rejoice in the stand taken by our leader and admire the course pursued by him. He has proved the Bill to be a sham and a fraud, prepared for the purpose of deceiving the minority, not only in Manitoba but throughout the country. Further, the Secretary of State referred to hon. members on this side of the House as a lot of disloyal followers. Let him look a little nearer home. I have never seen the Conservative party in such a demoralized condition, and this has prevailed ever since the Secretary of State became the leader of the House. Whenever an hon. member expresses an independent opinion he is pounced upon as if it were by a lion. If the leader of the Government had accepted the proposition of the leader of the Opposition, we would have been prepared to take up the Bill clause by clause, and I would be ready to endeavour to carry out, as far as possible, the wishes of my leader. We would have given full consideration to the measure up to two o'clock in the morning and, if necessary, later, and in this way, I believe it would have been possible to have got through the Bill. If obstruction took place we would know with whom it rested. The leader of the Opposition would only be responsible for the action of his followers, and as regards the course pursued by the leader of the third party he would not, of course, be answerable in any respect.

Mr. BORDEN. Every day, almost every hour, adds additional proof, and makes it evident that the Government are not anxious that this Bill should pass, and it is absolutely clear that the leader of the House, whatever other members of the Government may desire, is determined that the Bill shall not pass. The hon. gentleman is an astute politician, a man of great experience and a man of some tact. Can any one believe that the hon. gentleman would act in this House as he has done to-day, if he desired the Bill to pass. The hon. gentleman has insulted one hon. member after another, even including leading members of the Liberal-Conservative party. The hon. gentleman has so acted as to compel them to reply and occupy the time of the House. Then the hon. gentleman has charged obstruction against members of the Opposition, in my opinion for no other purpose than to draw out those hon. members, because the hon. gentleman's statements were such as to make it absolutely necessary that a reply be given. The hon. gentleman cannot expect that members of this House will listen to a tirade of abuse and not make replies. And so, in my opinion, the hon. gentleman is playing a game by which he is endeavouring to throw the responsibility of opposing the Bill on hon. members on this side of the House.

I was impressed by the statement made and questions asked to-day by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson). He asked the Government when they intended to lay on the Table papers connected with the Winnipeg conference. The only answer vouchsafed by the Government indicated that it was their deliberate intention to sit in committee for the purpose of preventing the opportunity of laying those papers on the Table. Before another step is taken those papers should be formally in the possession of the House. It has been stated that they have been published in the newspapers. That may be true, but we have a right to be officially seized of the matter, to have placed in our hands the papers with the official seal of the Government. What possible object can be accomplished by the Government keeping from the House the official statements as to what took place at the Winnipeg conference ? The object of the Government is, however, very clear. They dare not allow the House to be placed in possession of the records of the proceedings of the conference or give the House an opportunity to consider the proposal made by the Manitoba government in order to effect a settlement of this vexed question. The Secretary of State boasted of the considerable majority given to the second reading of this Bill. I ask the Secretary of State now whether he dare submit, untrammelled by party considerations, the proposals which the Manitoba government made to his representatives, and whether he is prepared to accept the offer made by that province as full settlement of this question. If the Government submitted that proposal there would be a majority, not of four, but equal to two to one in favour of accepting as a basis of further negotiation the proposition made by Manitoba. It is the duty of the Government to bring down these papers. The committee should rise and report progress, and at the next sitting the papers should be formally presented before the House, and not another step taken before the opportunity has been offered of ascertaining everything done at the Winnipeg conference. I should like to know the opinion of the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) on the offer made by the Manitoba government ; I should like to know the opinion of the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Cameron). I should like to ask those hon. gentlemen their opinion on that offer, for both of them are entirely satisfied with the condition of matters in Nova Scotia.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). No.

Mr. BORDEN. The hon. member for Inverness says he is not satisfied, but the hon. member for Halifax has said over and over again that he is satisfied.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). No.

Mr. BORDEN. Yes, and I can prove it from "Hansard." The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) said that the administration of the school law in Nova Scotia was satisfactory to all concerned.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). He said in Halifax.

Mr. BORDEN. I should like to hear the opinion of the hon. gentleman, because I believe this offer made by Manitoba gives more than the minority in Nova Scotia have received as the result of the gracious manner in which the law of the province has been administered by the Nova Scotia government.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). They did not profess to do anything of the kind.

Mr. BORDEN. Last night we had a demonstration of the fact that the Government is not prepared to furnish this committee with information to which it is entitled. This is a new departure in our legislation. It is the first time this Parliament has attempted to pass any legislation by which it is proposed to supplement the laws of the province, and it is a question on which the Government should be prepared to give the fullest possible information. Yet last night hon. members failed to obtain information from the Treasury benches. The hon. member for Queen's asked a member of the Government to show any word in the remedial order which would be justification for subsection "b" of section 4 of the Bill, and asked in vain. The hon. gentleman who leads this House says that we must remain in committee, and that he will do as he likes about supplying the information which we are asking for, or, in other words, that we must go it blind. Surely, the hon. gentleman does not sufficiently appreciate the importance of this measure. If this Bill becomes law, it may result in interminable mischief to the province of Manitoba. Improve it as much as you like, make it as perfect as possible, and still there is danger of lawsuits resulting from the passage of such a measure. If you pass it in the crude condition in which it is now, you will bestow upon the province of Manitoba a legacy which will result in enormous and expensive litigation. Why, Sir, this school question has been a subject of litigation for the last six years, and I undertake to say that, if the hon. gentleman succeeds in passing this Bill, we shall find that we have only just begun the litigation, the expense of which will be ten times over all the expense and time that have been occupied in litigation up to the present time. We have heard a good deal with regard to obstruction. So far as I am personally concerned, I have addressed myself to the subject only once. I have never been one to take up a great deal of time in this House, but on a subject of this great importance, I feel it my duty to express my opinions; and I believe it my duty and the duty of every hon. gentleman to see that, if this Bill is put through the House, it shall be made as perfect as it is possible to make it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The proposition made by the leader of the Opposition to the leader of the House, it seems to me, is a reasonable one. My hon. friend offers to assist the Government in a legitimate consideration of this Bill in committee, and proposes that from three o'clock in the afternoon until two o'clock in the morning, if necessary, shall be devoted to that purpose, without keeping the House in continuous session. It seems to me that is a reasonable proposition, and one which will promote the measure now in committee. The Government gave notice some days ago of their intention to move to take to-morrow. That motion was passed over without being moved at all. Why? Because the leader of the House had resolved that there should be a continuous session, and that the day would be surreptitiously obtained in that way by a continuous session, instead of being obtained in the ordinary parliamentary way. I think we have in that fact an explanation, also, why these very important papers relating to the Winnipeg conference have not been laid before the House. The hon. gentleman cannot lay these papers before the committee, because the committee is not entitled to receive them. The committee has only to do with the measure which is immediately before it. Now, I agree with my hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Paterson) that it is of the first consequence that these papers should be submitted to us, and that a full statement should be made by the Minister of Justice with reference to these negotiations, in order that we may be able to see how near the local government and the commission approached each other in discussing the differences between them, and whether there is any prospect that a further discussion may overcome the differences which separate the commissioners from the local government. An approximation towards common ground will go to show that if an earnest effort had been made at an earlier period, and under somewhat different circumstances, there would have been no necessity for passing this Bill at all. I think my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition has made a reasonable proposition, and that proposition has not been met in the spirit in which it was offered. We have heard much about obstruction. I ask, from which side of this House has obstruction come? I am sure that, on the part of the hon. gentlemen who support the leader of the Opposition, there has been no improper discussion, no attempt to delay the proceedings of this committee.

I am sure that I have done nothing of the sort. I have only been anxious to correct what I believe are very serious defects in the Bill, and which, if permitted to stand as part of the Bill, in my opinion, are ultra vires, and will lead to litigation. Now, my hon. friend from South Oxford says that this is a moribund Parliament, and that we ought not to undertake to deal with a controverted subject like this, because there are not now 60 per cent of the electors in the country who were electors when this Parliament was returned. Well, what answer does the hon. Secretary of State make to that ? He says that there has never been a case of Parliament refusing to deal with a subject because it was moribund, especially by a Liberal Parliament. Let me mention one case. When Mr. Gladstone undertook to put an end to the church establishment in Ireland, what position did Mr. Disraeli take? He said : You are members of this House to legislate under the constitution, and not to make important alterations in the constitution, and you are without a mandate from the nation, who alone has a right to alter the constitution. You may be entitled to deal with ordinary questions of legislation, because you may amend the law to-day, and to-morrow a new Parliament may undo what you have done. But, when you make radical changes in the framework of the constitution, you do what your immediate successors cannot undo. But the hon. gentleman was careful not to say that any Conservative Government had not taken that position. Well, take the case of Lord Grey. Lord Grey, when he was called upon to legislate upon the subject of parliamentary reform, when Parliament was being dissolved, put into the King's mouth these words : I am proroguing Parliament with the intention of an immediate dissolution for the purpose of ascertaining whether the nation approves of the measure which my advisers have recommended to the consideration of Parliament. There you have a Reform Government proposing to act upon precisely the same grounds. Also, in the case of the negotiations with the United States in 1891, Sir John A. Macdonald said he wanted a mandate from the people, from a Parliament fresh from the people, before going to Washington for the purpose of negotiating a reciprocity treaty, and upon that ground a premature dissolution of Parliament was decided upon. But I am not asking the House for delay on the ground that this is a moribund Parliament ; I am simply answering the statement made by the hon. gentleman. It does seem to me that this committee ought to rise, and that the papers concerning the negotiations between the commissioners and the government of Manitoba ought to be laid upon the Table, and at eight o'clock we can go into committee again on the Bill, and make quite as much progress as we are likely to make under the course which hon. gentlemen have resolved upon. I am not going to discuss the clauses of the Bill immediately before us ; I shall do that whenever this question that the committee rise is disposed of by the House. I do not propose to obstruct, but I propose to give to the measure that full consideration which I think, from its character and from the legal difficulties by which it is surrounded, it ought to receive from both sides of the House.

Amendment (Mr. Martin) that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again, negatived.

On amendment (Mr. Frémont),

Mr. SPROULE. I think that this is one of the worst amendments yet proposed to the Bill. We already complain that there are too many bodies in control of these matters, and the hon. gentleman proposes to add still another by providing that the selection of books relating to religion and morals shall be under competent religious authority. What is that authority in the estimation of the hon. gentleman ? It seems to me that a board composed of Roman Catholics should be sufficiently satisfactory to the people of that church.

Mr. LaRIVIERE moved that all the words after "struck out" in the amendment be left out.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would call the attention of the Minister of Justice to this section 4, subsection "c." I do not find that any provision is made anywhere in this Bill with reference to religious education. Provision is made, impliedly with regard to examination. In the Act of 1891, section 5, subsection "c," it is provided that the selection of books, maps and globes in the school shall be under control of the board as well as plans for the construction of schoolhouses.

> Provided, however, that in the case af books having reference to religion and morals, such shall be selected by the Catholic section subject to the approval of competent religious authority.

Although this Bill is nominally for the restoration of the right to give religious instruction, it makes no provision with regard to this essential right. The power with regard to examination is strictly limited, and though the board are authorized to select books there is a proviso that they shall select only those books authorized for the use of public schools in Manitoba or separate schools in Ontario. Thus the power of selection that you give them you take away again. That surely cannot be what the hon. gentleman aims at. I suppose that in drafting this statute, another was copied from, and certain essential things have, by accident, been dropped out. If any power with regard to religious instruction be given, it should be that of selecting books with reference to religion and morals.

Mr. DICKEY. The hon. gentleman's criticism deserves every consideration, and the best answer that can be made to it. The hon. gentleman will realize now that the drafting of this Bill was no easy matter. One of the objects in view was to secure the greatest possible efficiency for the schools established under the Bill. The schools in existence before 1890 were violently attacked on the ground of inefficiency. The minority declared that they wished no favours, but desired to have equal efficiency in teachers and text books with the other schools, provided their conscientious convictions were observed. I frankly say that the Government, in this Bill, limited the rights existing previous to 1890, so as to secure, on the face of the measure, a high standard of efficiency. We have not wholly limited the selection of text books, but we have given the choice between two classes. The hon. gentleman would prefer that the choice of books should be made by the advisory board of the province, as it exists, but that would be a Protestant board. This Bill provides that the selection shall be made by a board consisting of nine Catholics. One of the strongest objections made to the schools before 1890 was that they were unduly under ecclesiastical control. But it was thought that if the choice of these books lay in the hands of nine Catholics, the conscientious convictions of their fellow-religionists would not be in any danger. We left out the element of ecclesiastical veto in the original Bill. The clergy have no rights, under the constitution; the rights are those of the minority.

Mr. MARTIN. I desire to call the attention of the hon. member for Quebec (Mr. Frémont) to the fact that when he said that the selection of books relating to morals and religion did not rest with the curé, under the Quebec law, he was mistaken. He and the hon. gentleman from Bagot (Mr. Dupont) said that that law had been changed about twenty years ago. But on looking at section 1912 of the Revised Statutes of Quebec, subsection 4, I find that the Council of Public Instruction selects the books, but it is provided that books referring to religion and morals shall be selected as provided in article 2026, subsection 4. On looking at that, I find that it provides that the curé of the Roman Catholic Church shall have the power to select books having reference to religion and morals. I understand that this rule does not work very well, as it gives such a variety of books. The hon. member seemed to think that the Council of Public Instruction adopted a long list of books, and the curé selected from the list. That may be the practice, but it is not the law. It is a strong objection to the proposition of the Government that the books to be used shall be those in use in the public schools or in the separate schools of Ontario. This, of course, includes a very considerable number of books. If applied to books at present in use, there would be an objection on the ground that there would be no improvement, but that objection is removed by the assurance given that the word "hereafter" has been inserted. But the member for West York (Mr. Wallace) pointed out that the proposition of the Government was objectional from the fact that many of the books in use in the separate schools in Ontario are not of a high standard. The hon. gentleman read from the report of the separate school inspector at Ottawa and from the trustees of the separate schools here declaring that certain books now in use were inadequate and unfit to use. If that is the fact, why should we adopt in Manitoba books which have been officially condemned in Ontario. But there is a strong reason why the books should not be accepted in Manitoba and that is that under the Bill the books to be used are to be those adopted by an authority over which the province of Manitoba has no control whatever. It has been charged that there is a monopoly in school books in Ontario; but I am not going to discuss that question.

After Recess.

House again resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Chairman, at six o'clock I was dealing with the amendment of the hon. member for Quebec county (Mr. Frémont). The explanation by the Minister of Justice of the Government's reason for adopting this peculiar clause in the Bill, which it is proposed to amend, was a most remarkable one, namely, because they desired to prevent the schools becoming inefficient, by means of the restrictions imposed by this clause. They first undertake, unconstitutionally, to appoint a Board of Education, composed of nine Roman Catholic citizens of Manitoba, to administer the separate school law, and then they refuse to trust that board with the selection of the books. I consider that proposition a direct insult to the Roman Catholic people of Manitoba. If it is not possible to find nine Roman Catholic citizens of Manitoba competent enough and honest enough to provide efficient text books for the schools, why appoint that board at all? Why not give the management of the separate schools to the Department of Education, which has also the management of the public schools? I protest against the proposition of the Government as most unfair and unreasonable. If you are going to have this Board of Education, trust to their honour and capability in this matter; if you cannot do that, do not give them any control over the schools, but give the control to some body you can trust. I believe it is easy to find nine honest and intelligent citizens of Manitoba who can well be trusted to select proper text books for the schools. Now, having taken that preliminary objection to the restrictions imposed by the Government on this board, let us see whether the restrictions are reasonable or not. In the first place, the board are limited to selecting books which are used in the public or high schools of Manitoba, or in the separate schools of Ontario. The Minister of Public Works says there are no books authorized in the separate schools of Ontario, and he proposes to change the clause to provide that the board shall select such books as are now, or may be in use in those schools. How are we to know what books are in use in the separate schools of Ontario ? I am very much surprised to learn that there are no books authorized in those schools. Is that so or not ? Will some private member of the House give us information on this point which the Government ought to give ? Can it be possible that the separate schools of Ontario are allowed to use any books they see fit ? Is that the law in Ontario ? If it is the law, it is a most absurd and ridiculous thing for this Parliament to adopt it for the province of Manitoba. The Government are not willing to trust these nine men in Manitoba to select the books, but they are willing to trust any back-township board of separate school trustees in Ontario to select the books for use in the separate schools of Manitoba. Now, I am very sorry the members of the Government, and the members of the House were not here in larger numbers after two o'clock this morning to hear the very strong reasons given by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) why it would not be right to adopt for Manitoba the books in use in the separate schools of Ontario. He read from the report of an investigation which had been recently held into the separate schools of Ottawa, and showed that in the opinion of Mr. White, the separate school inspector of this city, and also in the opinion of the separate school trustees themselves, several of the books used in the separate schools in Ottawa were entirely unsuitable. Then, it is suggested that there is a monopoly in the publication of the school books in Ontario. It is suggested by the opponents of the Mowat government that that government has given undue privileges in regard to the publication of school books to certain favoured individuals. I do not know whether that is true or not ; I believe the Mowat government deny it ; but whether it is true or not, it would be possible for such a thing to happen in Ontario, and what remedy would the people of Manitoba have against the government of Ontario if such a monopoly were extended to that province ? Now, I am in favour of the amendment of the hon. member for Quebec. Though I regard the appointment of this Board of Education as unconstitutional, I say that if you are going to appoint that board, you cannot, on any reasonable principle, withhold from it the right to select the books ; and the provision we had in the old School Act of Manitoba, that the books on morals and religion selected by the Catholic Board of Education should be subject to the approval of the competent religious authority, was a proper provision. I am entirely opposed to separate schools ; but if by your law you establish Roman Catholic separate schools, you acknowledge the right of the Roman Catholic Church to teach the tenets of that church in those schools ; and if you do so, who ought to determine what the tenets of that church are ? Surely it is the competent religious authority who, in the province of Manitoba, has always been understood to be the Archbishop, who has spiritual authority there. It is well known that I am opposed entirely to allowing religious teaching or religious exercises in state schools at all ; but if you undertake to teach religion, unless it is effective as a training in religion, it is a farce. If you have religious teaching, you must have a qualified religious teacher, and that teacher ought to be examined in morals and religion. There are only two courses open, logically, in this matter. Either you must give to each denomination separate schools, and give the church control of the question of religion, or you must adopt one kind of school for all without regard to the question of religion ; because, if you merely have religion there as a symbol, without any attempt to see that the teacher is properly qualified, it becomes a mere farce, as it is admitted to be in the public schools of Manitoba to-day and the Protestant schools of Ontario. No one who is familiar with the religious exercises held in the Protestant schools of Ontario and the public schools of Manitoba will contend that they advance the pupil one iota in religion. Their effect is quite the contrary, as every one knows who has gone to those schools. They are looked upon as a mere formality, and the effect is rather against religious teaching than in its favour. It is quite absurd for those who are in favour of these merely formal religious exercises in the schools, to attempt to meet the argument of those who are in favour of secular schools, by saying that they are against religion. That argument cannot possibly be raised with any effect. If there were no other way of meeting it, I might ask how it is that so many eminent clergymen in Protestant denominations hold the view that the public schools should be entirely free from any attempt to teach religion, on the ground that the state has nothing to do with the teaching of religion. Is that an attack on religion ? No, but it is an attack on the old idea of a state church. When we arrived, in Canada, some forty years ago, at the determination not to have a state church, then, so far as the public schools are concerned, the only logical position is to exclude the teaching of religion from those schools ; because, if you are going to effectively teach religion, you are first to decide what religion it is to be, and then you have to see that your teachers are competent in religious as well as in secular matters. But when we adopt, as we do in this Bill, the principle of separate schools for Roman Catholics, it follows that that denomination must be given control of the teaching of religion in those schools ; and in what better way can that be done than that proposed by the hon. member for Quebec county (Mr. Frémont), and as was the law in Manitoba prior to 1890 ? The law in Quebec is different, and I submit that the old Manitoba law was much superior. In Quebec, instead of the books on morals and religion being selected by the highest ecclesiastical authorities, they are selected by the parish priest in each school district, and the result is very unsatisfactory. The sale of books for his schools becomes a matter of patronage for each parish priest, and a family moving from one school district to another, has to get an entirely different set of books for its children. The proposition of the hon. member for Quebec (Mr. Frémont) is much better, and that is, that there should be one set of books upon morals and religion selected once for all in the whole province by the highest ecclesiastical authority.

I desired to make these few remarks, which I think hon. gentlemen opposite will admit are to the point, but I refused to make them at 4.30 in the morning. That was no time in which one could discuss properly a question of this kind. I have no doubt that we shall have the privilege of hearing from the hon. member for Quebec (Mr. Langelier) and others upon this very important question. Surely, there could be no stronger commentary on the outrageous conduct of the Government, in attempting to force this Bill through by brute force, than the present subsection, in which they have attempted a radical departure from the old law, and as to which the House, before finally deciding, will be desirous of hearing the fullest and freest discussion from members from the province of Quebec.

Mr. LANGELIER. I want to remove a mistake which exists in the minds of many members from the province of Quebec as to the clause which we are now discussing. Many of them think that this clause embodies the law which is now in existence in that province. That is not at all the case. Were any such clause as this proposed in Quebec, the ecclesiastical authorities, who form part of the Council of Public Instruction, would refuse to continue members of that board. What is the law in the province of Quebec as regards the selection of school books ? There is a Council of Public Instruction, which is divided into a Protestant committee and a Catholic committee. The council, as a whole, almost never sits. I have been a member of it nearly nine years, and there has been only one sitting of the whole council during that time. All the work is done by the Catholic committee and the Protestant committee, each acting separately, and each selects the books for its own schools. Each committee is authorized to make a general list of books—apart from the books on religion and morals—which may be used in the schools, but it has no power to select the particular books to be used in any particular school. The selection of the books to be used in each school is left entirely to the school commissioners, but they must make their selection from the general list prepared by the Catholic or Protestant committee. If they do not, they are liable to lose the Government grant. I would not vote for this amendment. It proposes that the Board of Education, which it is proposed to appoint, shall have the selection of all books, but that the books on religion and morals must be approved by the competent religious authority. That is not the law of Quebec.

Mr. DICKEY. "Competent religious authority" is the term.

Mr. LANGELIER. It amounts to the same thing. In Quebec, not only can no book on religion and morals be used in a school, without the approval of the priest who has the spiritual control of that school, but it cannot be used except upon his choice. He is the sole authority who has the right to select the books on religion and morals.

Mr. MARTIN. I would not understand that the term "competent religious authority" would mean the priest in each district. In the Manitoba Act these words are always supposed to mean the highest authority, which is the bishop.

Mr. LANGELIER. Well, the competent religious authority might be the bishop, but in the first instance it would be the priest having the direct control of the school, subject to appeal to the bishop. Of course, if the diocesan bishop approved of a certain book, the priest could not revoke the order of his bishop ; but, in the first instance, he would be the authority to select the books, subject to the appeal to the bishop. In the province of Quebec, even the Catholic committee of the Council of Public Instruction has nothing to do with the selection of the books on morals and religion. That is left entirely to the competent religious authority.

Mr. MARTIN. In Manitoba it would not be the priest, because there the books are selected for each school district, but for the whole province by the board. The board would not consult each individual priest, but would consult the bishop.

Mr. LANGELIER. That is why I say the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Quebec county (Mr. Frémont) is not at all the law of the province of Quebec, but it is the law which existed in Manitoba before 1890. Under the law in Quebec, the curé or priest, having jurisdiction over a school has the exclusive right of selecting the books having reference to religion and morals for the use of the pupils of his religious faith.

The law of the province of Quebec for Protestants is exactly what would be the law for Catholics in Manitoba under the amendment which is now being discussed. For Protestants in Quebec the selection of books for morals and religion is left with the Protestant committee, and so far as Protestants are concerned there is no distinction made at all between books and morals and religion and other educational works. My friend from Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) is entirely mistaken as to the abuse which he spoke of in the selection of these books on morals and religion. There is practically a monopoly with regard to some of them, but it cannot be otherwise. These books are mostly catechisms, and every Roman Catholic in the House knows that the selection of catechisms is not left to individual choice. They are published by authority of the ecclesiastical superior of the diocese.

Mr. FOSTER. Then none could be used unless they obtain authority.

Mr. LANGELIER. Yes, they must be published with the authority of the diocesan bishop. Nobody but the Queen's Printer has any right to publish the laws of the country authoritatively, and it is exactly the same thing in the Catholic Church with regard to the catechisms and books on morals. These small catechisms in which the elementary doctrines of the church are taught are the only monopoly I know of, and I never heard of any complaint being made against the ecclesiastical authorities on that score. If it is intended to really give separate schools to the province of Manitoba there is no more important enactment than the one we are now considering. It is absurd to say that we are giving separate schools to the Roman Catholics minority if we do not give power to the Board of Education to select the books. As a matter of fact and practice, there is no more important matter to be decided by the Council of Public Instruction in Quebec than the question of the selection of books, and these are not only books on morals and religion, but other educational books, such as history for instance. It is well known by all those connected with education that there are certain parts of history which it is impossible for a Catholic to view as a Protestant would. If the selection of books is left to the advisory board of Manitoba, which is composed of the very same persons who composed the Protestant Board of Education before the law of 1890, there would be no use in separate schools. Under the clause of the Bill we are now discussing we leave in the hands of Protestants the selection of books for Roman Catholics, and we say that they may take the books of the separate schools in Ontario. But who makes the selection of books in Ontario ? It is the government of Ontario, after having consulted more or less the advisory board established by the law of that province. There could be no greater insult to the Roman Catholic minority of Manitoba than that we should pass the clause as it is in the Bill. It amounts to this, that this Parliament declares that the minority are too stupid or too dishonest to select books for their own schools. For my part, if it were proposed to make such a law in the province of Quebec, I would prefer to go to the public schools. I would never accept such a law from the legislature. If you suppose that the Catholics are intelligent enough to make a selection of books, why do you compel them to take books selected by the government of Ontario. If you want to be logical, and if you really want to give separate schools, you must give the minority full power in the matter. I have been nearly nine years a member of the Council of Public Instruction for the province of Quebec, and knowing as I do the practical working of that council, I know that one-half of the time of the committee of the Council of Public Instruction is occupied by the selection of books. The other duties of the Council of Public Instruction of Quebec, as set forth in the statute, are comparatively unimportant compared with this duty of selecting books. By this Bill you create a board of public instruction, but you take from it the most important of its powers, and the only real power which can give that board the control of Catholic education in Manitoba. The amendment of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Frémont) should go much further, and should give the educational board the power to select books, with the exception of books on morals and religion, which should be left to the proper ecclesiastical authorities. If that is not done, I shall vote against this section. A good many who voted for the Bill thought that this Bill was creating separate schools, but I state now that if this clause is allowed to remain as it is, it will never give separate schools to the minority of Manitoba.

Mr. DEVLIN. Days are passing, the hours, in fact, are flying, and the end approaching ; not the end of the Bill, but the end of the session. I for one would be very sorry to offer, in the slightest degree, obstruction to the end that we desire—at least the end which I desire—the successful passing of this Bill. But, Mr. Chairman, I wish to point out that the amendment offered by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Frémont) ought, I think, to be adopted by the Government. What we have to determine is whether the clause as found in the Bill offered by the Government is a better clause than the one found in the old Manitoba school law. I do not think it is. We know that certain privileges were taken away from the minority, and our business here is to restore such privileges. The clause in the Bill before the House does not precisely restore these rights, but the amendment offered by my hon. friend (Mr. Frémont), which is in substance to be found in the old law of Manitoba, does restore to the minority the privileges of which they were dispossessed by the Act of 1890. For that reason I support the amendment. With regard to my hon. friend from Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier), I think I can sympathize with most of the views offered by him. This amendmest of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Frémont) is a good amendment. It is taken from the old law of Manitoba, which was enforced for twenty years, practically speaking. It consecrates one of the elementary principles of separate schools, and more than that, it will not be objectionable to the Protestant majority, as stated by the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin). That gentleman objects to the Bill in toto, but he adds : Since you are bound to give separate schools, give them what they require for the best management of these schools, and the Protestants of Manitoba shall not object thereto. There is another reason why the amendment ought to be accepted. It sanctions the doctrine of the right of the parent in regard to education ; that is the right to determine not only the education, but the form of education which the child shall receive. The Bill will be improved by the elimination of this clause, and by the replacing of it by the amendment of the hon. member (Mr. Frémont). Mr. Chairman, I would like to add many other reasons, but I know that obstruction is in the air, and I would most sincerely regret that a shadow of any such charge should lie against me.

Mr. BRODEUR. Was there not a sub-amendment offered by the Minister of Public Works early this morning ?

Mr. DICKEY. I understood from the Minister of Public Works that he moved an amendment. It was to meet the difficulties that there are no school books authorized for use in the separate schools of Ontario, and it proceeded to say : The text-books authorized in the separate schools for the province of Ontario, which are now or hereafter may be in use in any of the separate schools of the province of Ontario. That meets the difficulty with regard to French books of a high educational standard, which will then become suitable for use in the separate schools under this Bill. With regard to what the hon. gentleman from Quebec (Mr. Langelier) and from Ottawa County (Mr. Devlin) said, I beg to say that the committee will remember that under the present condition of affairs—irrespective of this Bill—the religious minority in Manitoba is obliged to use the text-books of the public schools there, unless they desire to establish their own schools and pay for them. This Bill is intended as a measure of relief, and it was thought that from motives of economy, if from no other, the minority would adopt the text-books which are published in Manitoba, and which are found for sale in every country store at a cheap price. It was considered that there was no reflection at all upon the Manitoba minority in authorizing the use of these books in regard to education, but the fatal deficiency of these books, from a separate school standpoint, is that they include books which are conscientiously objectionable to the minority. This difficulty was met by throwing open to the minority all the text-books that are in use in the separate schools in Ontario, which, of course, entirely meets the conscientious objections of Catholics.

Mr. BRODEUR. Why not take those of Quebec also ?

Mr. DICKEY. Because the province of Ontario furnished a parallel case, having a system of Catholic separate schools for a minority, which was much more likely to meet the case of Manitoba than that which exists in the province of Quebec. The Governement desired to give the board sufficient liberties to meet every possible conscientious objection ; and at the same time to narrow the choice so as to reach the highest possible standard of efficiency.

Mr. MARTIN. How can they tell what books are in use in Ontario ?

Mr. FOSTER. It is the easiest thing in the world—simply by making inquiry.

Mr. MARTIN. Are they going to inquire of every separate school board what books they use ?

Mr. FOSTER. A board which has the duty of ascertaining what books are used in Ontario would make diligent inquiry, and could without any trouble ascertain what books are used in the separate schools in Ontario. The simplest way would be to write to the inspector of separate schools in Ontario, who would at once supply them with a list of all the books in use.

Mr. MARTIN. Then they would have to get a list every month or every week in the future.

Mr. FOSTER. It is not obligatory in the future. It is a range of choice which the Board of Education have, covering the list of books used in the separate schools in Ontario.

Mr. McCARTHY. As I understand, the law is not for the present, but for the future. Does the Minister know what books are now used in the separate schools in Ontario ?

Mr. DICKEY. I am not familiar personally with the books, of course ; but there is, I understand, a regular series of text-books, French and English, of a high educational class, and touching every controversial subject, such as histories and readers, in use in the separate schools of Ontario. What I wish to direct the attention of the committee to is this, that the proposal of the hon. member for Quebec (Mr. Frémont) is to revert to the old system. That, of course, is a matter for the committee to decide. I think it leaves the arrangement with rather loose ends, and I should be sorry if the supporters of separate schools should press for it. It is quite conceivable that under that system a miserably inefficient set of books might be chosen. I do not say they would be; but there would be no limitation whatever as to the standard. We might perhaps extend the limit of choice, but I think it should be limited to a standard of sufficient height to be equal to that of the public schools. I do not think any hon. member of this House wants to run any risk of an inefficient system of schools in Manitoba under this Bill.

Mr. BRODEUR. There is no evidence that they have been inefficient.

Mr. DICKEY. I am not saying that there is; but the hon. gentleman knows that that contention has been made; and every friend of the separate schools should desire to surround them with every safeguard. It is with that view that the Government propose the limitations they do.

Mr. LANGELIER. If the selection of books is not to be left exclusively to the board to be created by this law, but if they are to be compelled to select books in use in the separate schools of Ontario or in the public schools of Manitoba, I do not see why they are not to be at liberty also to take books selected by the Catholic Council of Public Instruction in the province of Quebec, the majority of which is composed of bishops of that province. To limit the selection to the separate schools of Ontario is somewhat of an insult to that council. If you let the Manitoba board go outside of the province, I do not see why you should not send them to a Catholic province instead of to a Protestant province.

Mr. FOSTER. Is the hon. gentleman of the impression that the government of Ontario, being a Protestant government, selects the books for the separate schools of Ontario? If he is, I think he is quite mistaken.

Mr. McCARTHY. He is not mistaken.

Mr. LANGELIER. I think they would be more likely to get a proper selection of books from the council of Catholic bishops in a Catholic province than from a Protestant province. The proposition of the Government is an insult, not only to the Catholic minority of Manitoba, but to the Catholic bishops of Quebec.

Mr. BRODEUR. (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, it is an undisputable fact that in the province of Manitoba, just as in the province of Quebec, there was a Board of Public Instruction, composed of two sections, one of which was Protestant and the other Catholic. The Catholic section had the choice of the books in use in Catholic schools. In 1890, the Board of Public Instruction was abolished and in its stead a Department of Education was created. Now, we are attempting to restore to the Manitoba Catholics the privileges taken away from them by the law of 1890. With that end in view, the Government have deemed it fit to introduce a Remedial Bill, and I believe it to be their duty, unless they have very strong reasons to urge for pursuing an opposite course, to restore to Catholics the privileges which have been taken away from them under the law of 1890. Now, among other privileges, they had that of selecting the text-books for use in their schools. Well, in my opinion, we are bound to restore to the minority, under this Bill, the right of selecting books for their schools. Now, what is the position taken by the Government under this Bill? Is the separate school board authorized to make the choice of school books? I regret to see that such is not the case. On the contrary, it is enacted by subsection "e" of section 4, that the separate school board shall have the right to select all the books to be used in the schools under its control, but subject to the provision that no book shall be selected unless such book has been authorized for use, either in the public schools of the province of Manitoba or in the separate schools of the province of Ontario. So, Catholics are told in so many words that they are entitled to select their own books, but provided such books as are selected shall be those approved of by a Protestant government, the Manitoba government or by another Protestant government, that of Ontario. What are the books in use in the public schools in the province of Manitoba? Who is entrusted with the choice of school books? Is it not the government?

Mr. DICKEY. For Ontario.

Mr. BRODEUR (Translation). I am speaking about Manitoba. Is it not, I say, the Government? Now, for over a month it has been admitted here, even on the Government side, that the Manitoba government offered no security to the Catholics of that province; and, notwithstanding that, they propose to restrict the privileges enjoyed formerly by Catholics as to the choice of their books, by enacting that they shall have to select only books authorized by that government. Now, in the province of Ontario, who has the choice of those books? Those school books are selected by the Minister of Education who is, generally speaking, a Protestant. The Minister of Justice cannot deny that statement. It is the Minister of Education who, under the law as it stands in Ontario, if I mistake not, makes the choice of school books for use in the province. So, it is a Protestant Minister of Education who selects the books. I am aware that now, thanks to the Liberal government of Ontario, that choice is made on the recommendation of the bishops, but who can tell whether, later on, the Minister of Education of the day will not be succeeded by a Marter or a Whitney, and then, I ask, what guarantees will the Catholic minority have? None. I say then, the position taken by the Government is most unfair. Why do the Government take such a position? Why have they abridged the rights and privileges of the Manitoba Catholic minority? Wherefore have they not restored the position which the Catholic minority enjoyed prior to 1890? The hon. Minister of Public Works told us that they had to secure a uniform series of school books. But, I ask, how will that uniformity be secured, when the minority have to apply to Ontario for a regular series of text books? The hon. Minister of Justice just told us that the Government propose the limitations they do under this clause with a view to reaching the highest possible standard of efficiency for the separate schools. I think the Government have no right to take such a position. What evidence is there actually before this House going to show that the Catholic schools in Manitoba prior to 1890, were inefficient, and that the choice of text books was not judiciously made? I know, Mr. Chairman, that charges have been made in connection with the selection of text books by the Catholic section of the Board of Public Instruction in Manitoba prior to 1890. I am perfectly aware that charges were made against my hon. friend from Provencher (Mr. LaRiviere) when he occupied the position of secretary of the province. But we have no evidence that such charges were well grounded. The position taken by the Government is an insult offered to my hon. friend, the member for Provencher. I consider that it is a reflection upon the Manitoba minoirty; it amounts to say that none are found in that minority intelligent enough to make a judicious selection of books. There is no evidence before us to that effect, nor is there any proof that the selection of books for separate schools prior to 1890 was defective. Therefore, I say that there is no other alternative left but to restore to the minority the rights and privileges which they enjoyed prior to the law of 1890, unless evidence is brought down, showing that the minority have abused such rights and privileges. It is a concession made to a dangerous element rampant in this country, the fanatical element of Ontario. It is contended that the Catholic schools in Manitoba were in a state of inefficiency; but I hold that you have no right to take action upon the mere assumption of wrong-doing, without first substantiating your charge. Now, no such evidence was brought down before this House. Therefore, there is but one course open to the Government, and that is to restore purely and simply the rights and privileges enjoyed by the Catholcs prior to 1890. Moreover, Mr. Chairman, why compel the minority to go and select books in use in the province of Ontario; and, if you let the minority go out of the province of Manitoba, I do not see why you should not send them to the province of Quebec. As my hon. friend from Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier) remarked, the selection of school-books in the province of Quebec is in the hands of perfectly competent men. Why, then, compel them to take text-books from the province of Ontario, instead of going to Quebec?

As I said, the proposal made by the Government is an insult offered not only to the Manitoba Catholics, but also to the Catholics of the province of Quebec. I hope that the hon. Postmaster General, who has not been in his seat since last night, and with whom we could not debate this question—and this House will recollect how strongly and eloquently he pleaded in favour of the educational system of the province of Quebec, showing how excellent and efficient it was—I hope, I say, the hon. Minister will tell us why the Government deal that way with the province of Quebec, and grant a special privilege to the province of Ontario. Why did they not extend the limit of choice of text-books to the province of Quebec? Why do they try to discriminate against that province? Mr. Chairman, that is a concession made to the fanatical element in the Cabinet. I hope, therefore, that the House will support either the motion made by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. LaRivière) or that moved by my hon. friend from the county of Quebec (Mr. Frémont), and that the proposal of the Government will not be accepted by the committee.

Mr. WOOD. The hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Brodeur) has contended that in Ontario the Department of Education directed the selection of books for use in the separate schools of that province. That is not the case; and when I state that fact, the whole speech of the hon. gentleman falls to the ground, because that was the whole burden of his speech. The school books used in the separate schools of Ontario are selected by the separate school boards, and are made uniform, as far as possible, under the inspection of the inspector.

Mr. LANGELIER. Are they at liberty to select any books they choose?

Mr. WOOD. Yes, provided they are uniform in the schools for which they are selected, and subject to the approval of the inspector of separate schools appointed by the government.

Mr. LANGELIER. He is Minister of Education in the second degree.

Mr. WOOD. The Education Department has nothing whatever to do with that. It makes the selection for the public schools and not for the separate schools.

Mr. BRODEUR. Who appoints the school inspector?

Mr. WOOD. He is appointed by the Ontario government. That being the case, I submit it would be very much better to adopt the amendment suggested by the hon. Minister of Justice, because that gives a degree of definiteness, which is certain to secure throughout Manitoba the standard of efficiency enjoyed by the separate schools in Ontario. We are agreed on one point and that is to make a good Bill go as far as we can. The amendment of the hon. member for Quebec (Mr. Frémont) would not promote the efficient working of the Bill, but that proposed by the Minister of Justice would go as far as it appears to me this Parliament has the power to go. To remove any doubt, I may say that when the hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Craig) was a member of the Ontario legislature, an attempt was made to bring about a condition of things such as he (Mr. Brodeur) appears to have been erroneously under the impression did exist in that province. Sir Oliver Mowat said, referring to the motion of the hon. member for East Durham:

> If that motion were confined to public schools, he would have no objection to it. As far as separate schools were concerned, he was not prepared to admit that the legislature had the authority to prescribe what text-books should be used in them. The legislature was bound by the British North America Act, and he was not prepared to say that that Act gave the power referred to. There never had been any jurisdiction admitted to be exercised by the legislature over the text-books of the separate schools. Attempts had been made to get them to use voluntarily the text-books of the public schools, but to impose those text-books upon them he was not prepared to say the House had jurisdiction to that extent, and he would not advise the House to that extent. He quoted the 93rd section of the British North America Act.

The Hon. Mr. Hardy said that if any attempt were made to legislate concerning the text-books, those affected would appeal to the Privy Council at Ottawa, which would undoubtedly sustain them. I give these remarks to show how utterly mistaken was the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat and also the hon. member for Quebec Centre.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The question raised is why should you select the separate schools of the province of Ontario in choosing your books, instead of selecting the books that are used in the Catholic schools of Quebec. I do not see why we should not meet the difficulty by simply adding to the clause as it is the words "or in the Catholic schools of Quebec." That would cover the whole ground. It would give the power of selecting books not only from those used by the separate schools of the province of Ontario but also from the Catholic schools of the province of Quebec.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. After the interesting discussion we have had, I have no hesitation in saying that the Government are prepared to accept the motion made by my hon. friend, which covers the case so fully dealt with by hon. members on both sides.

Mr. MARTIN. I wish to protest most emphatically against the proposition that we cannot find nine Roman Catholics in Manitoba who are fit to decide what books shall be used in the separate schools of that province. I do not see that the suggestion of the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Hector Langevin) meets the objection at all. Why should we go to Ontario or Quebec to determine what books shall be used in the separate schools of Manitoba. It is a direct attack upon the economy of Manitoba. In giving a separate school system to Manitoba, you do not propose to give them one that has to be decided by Ontario or Quebec. You are to decide in this House what system you are going to give, and how far you are going to restore the rights the minority had. This proposal is a decided insult to the Catholic citizens of Manitoba. Hon. gentlemen laugh, but I beg to say that there are none in Manitoba who have greater respect for the Roman Catholic citizens of that province than I have; and I am glad to say that many of them are friends of mine. I differ from them on this question of separate schools, as I have the right to do, and many hon. gentlemen on the other side who support this Bill are as strongly opposed to separate schools as I am. It is ridiculous to say that you cannot trust to nine men chosen by the Manitoba government to determine what books shall be used in the separate schools. The acceptance of this restriction shows that the Government do not believe that the board which will be appointed in that province, will be capable of doing its work. I am opposed to separate schools, but I am accepting the situation. The Bill has been read the second time by this House; and if we are to have separate schools, I do not see what possible objection there can be to the old law in Manitoba. Under that law, so far as morals and religion are concerned, the school books shall be determined by the Board of Education, subject to the competent religious authority. If you establish these separate schools, there is only one course to pursue, and that is to let the church decide what kind of religion and morals is to be taught in them, and that is the old law. Why have they departed from the old law in this instance? It must be because they are afraid that the Roman Catholics in Manitoba, if left to themselves, will not have efficient schools. What right have they to put that insult on them? Where will this proposition land us? It has been shown that in Quebec the books on morals and religion are not selected by the Council of Public Instruction nor even by the inspectors, but by individual priests in every school district.

Mr. JONCAS. They are selected from a list of books authorized by competent religious authority. There is no person in the province of Quebec who can choose a book which is not authorized by competent religious authority.

Mr. BRODEUR. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. He can do it.

Mr. JONCAS. He may choose for his school the books he wants, but he must take them from a list furnished to him.

Mr. BRODEUR. No.

Mr. JONCAS. Authorized by a competent religious authority.

Mr. MARTIN. Let me read the law to the hon. gentleman. Paragraph 4 of article 2026 of the Quebec statutes :

> The curé or priest administering the Roman Catholic Church shall, however, have the exclusive right of selecting the books having reference to religion and morals for the use of the pupils of his religious faith.

Mr. JONCAS. That is correct. The priest of the parish has the exclusive right to choose the books on religion and morals, but these books he cannot choose outside of those which have been authorized by competent religious authority.

I will give the hon. gentleman an instance. Take the catechism. Will the hon. member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier) tell me that any priest in any parish of the province of Quebec can use any other catechism than the one authorized by the bishop.

Mr. LANGELIER. I took a good deal of trouble to point out that the competent religious authority was the priest, in the first instance, but he was under the control of the bishop.

Mr. JONCAS. Exactly.

Mr. MARTIN. I do not differ from the hon. gentleman as to the practice, but he will agree with me that it is not in the law. The practice which prevails in the province of Quebec is just what the member for Quebec proposes to apply to Manitoba. By that amendment there would be liable to be selected by the Board of Education in Manitoba, any of the numerous text-books which possibly, with the approval of the bishops, are selected for these schools in the province of Quebec. I claim that we are entitled in Manitoba to have one set of school books, properly subject in matters of morals and religion, to the approval of the bishops. It is argued that it is not constitutional to have a separate school board at all, but if you are to have a separate board, surely you ought trust them with the selection of the books. As a Manitoban, I protest against our being compelled to select any books from Quebec or any other province. I wish to know what is the opinion of the Government with regard to the amendment of the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. LaRivière), who proposes to leave it absolutely to the board to select the school books, not only for secular subjects, but also in morals and religion, without the ecclesiastical sanction. It seems to me that he misses the real principle of separate schools by overlooking the right of the ecclesiastical authorities to say what the books should be.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The position of the Government on the question is this. The amendment which they approve of, is as follows :—

> To select books, maps and globes to be used in the schools under its control, provided that no book, map or globe shall be selected, unless such has been authorized for use either in the high or public schools of the province, or in the schools of the province of Quebec, or have been or may hereafter be used in any of the separate schools of the province of Ontario.

That answers the question of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin).

Mr. MARTIN. There are no books on morals or religion authorized for use in the Catholic schools in Quebec.

Mr. DEVLIN. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) used the words "in the schools of the province of Quebec."

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear. That is exactly as I read it.

Mr. LANGELIER. That would not remove the objection, because the ecclesiastical authority in one diocese should not be compelled to use books authorized in another diocese. Each bishop controls his own diocese.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). Oh, pshaw, I thought we were all the same.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Langelier) seems to fear that the Catholics of Manitoba may be forced to adopt books that might be accepted by the Catholic authorities in Quebec. I can tell the hon. gentleman that the Catholic minority in Manitoba are perfectly satisfied with this clause. The fact that the minority in Manitoba agreed in the clause of this Bill, indicates that the books which are in use in the province of Quebec are quite acceptable to them.

Mr. EDGAR. We are told to hold our tongues here because the minority in Manitoba had accepted the whole of the Bill, from beginning to end. It appears now that the minority in Manitoba have accepted something which will be put from the Chair in ten minutes, and which they never could have seen. The whole thing is a farce.

Mr. LAVERGNE. This amendment of the Government means that the religious authorities in Manitoba will have no right to compose any text-books on religion or morals, but are bound to go to other provinces to get these books. The amendment of my hon. friend from Quebec (Mr. Frémont) gives them the right to choose these books and to get them wherever they like. It is against the Roman Catholic doctrine not to give the choice of these books to the Catholic authorities in the diocese. My hon. friend from Quebec (Mr. Frémont) puts in his amendment the words of the old law, and that is what the minority want to have restored to them. The Protestant majority in Manitoba, which is fairly represented by the member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), say that they will be satisfied with that amendment, and if it is in accordance with the wishes of the minority, and of the majority in Manitoba, and in accordance with the doctrine of the Catholic religion, why should it not be accepted ?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Those schools are public schools, so far as secular education is concerned, and why should you have arithmetics, grammars and geographies different from those in use in the public schools ? There might properly be an exception as regards history, although it is a secular subject. What right have we to regulate the question of books on religion and morals ? It seems to me that, when you jumble books on the special subject which gives a right to separate schools, and books on the common subject which belong to the separate and public schools together, you are making a great mistake. Supposing, after your Bill is passed, the province should say : You have not adopted the books we have adopted on secular subjects, there is not an opportunity of making a fair comparison in inspection, and we decline to have anything to do with your books. You are simply putting an impediment in the way of any advantage to those who are desirous of having separate schools, and it seems to me, so far as you can, you should make the separate schools like the other schools.

Mr. POWELL. I think I have an amendment which would meet all the difficulties of the case. Would not this do : In section "c," after the word "globe" add the words "other than books on morals and religion." and at the end of the paragraph, the words, "or in the separate schools of the province of Ontario" may be erased. That will leave the selection of books on morals and religion entirely in the hands of the Catholic board, and will have the effect of cheapening the books used in these schools.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It seems to me there is a good deal in the suggestion of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Powell). I cannot see why there should be a difference in the text books on all subjects, which are used in the separate or public schools, except in regard to history. Fortunately, as yet, there is no Protestant or Catholic algebra or grammar, that I have heard of. There is nothing except history which there ought to be any difficulty about whatever. I think that the amendment of the hon. member (Mr. Powell) does look most reasonable.

Mr. McCARTHY. I quite agree with the suggestion of the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell), and I had already prepared an amendment in that direction. I had not included history, but it seems to me it ought to be included.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think the amendment suggested by the hon. member for Westmoreland covers the whole ground, and will be satisfactory all round.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. I could not accept that amendment.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Then, Mr. Chairman, take the vote on the motion before you, and then the hon. member for Westmoreland may move his amendment.

Amendment (Mr. LaRivière) negatived.

Mr. POWELL. I move :

> That all the words in the amendment after "that" be struck out, and that the following be substituted :—After the word "globe" in the third line of paragraph "c" the following words be inserted : "other than books on history, morals or religion," and that all the words after the word "Manitoba" in the fifth line be erased.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. As I understand it, I intend to vote for the amendment moved by the hon. member for Quebec (Mr. Frémont). If you are to have separate schools, and a particular church is to have control of the religious education in those schools, it seems to me that it is only fair and right that the authorities of that church should decide what religious text books should be used. For this reason, I intend to vote against this amendment, and in favour of the amendment of the hon. member for Quebec.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Though I admit the good-will of the hon. member who has proposed this amendment, I am very sorry that it is quite unacceptable to us. The separate schools in Manitoba, in most cases, are schools where the dual language is taught. I do not think that they are on that account inferior to other schools, where but one language is taught. The books authorized by the Government of Manitoba are merely a set of English books, and the effect of this amendment would be to deprive us of the use of French books in our schools. I do not think it is the object of this Bill to prevent the teaching of the French language as well as the English language in our schools. Therefore, I do not see why the suggestion of the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Hector Langevin) is not carried out.

Mr. WALLACE. I think this amendment makes the clause a very complex one, and it should not be passed until we have an opportunity of seeing it in print, so that we may see exactly what effect it would have. If the Government accept the amendment, I think they should ask the committee to allow the clause to stand until we can see it in print.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think the amendment hardly makes sense as it stands. You can hardly speak of books, maps, and globes other than on the subject of religion.

Mr. EDGAR. I always thought the "Globe" was an authority on religion.

Mr. POWELL. If my hon. friend had kept his ears open, he would have heard that the amendment is not what he says. It is "books, maps and globes, other than books on the subject of religion."

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. As proposed to be amended, the clause would read :

To select all the books, maps and globes to be used in the schools under its control ; provided, however, that no book, map or globe other than books in history, morals or religion shall be selected unless such book, map or globe has been authorized for use either in the high or public schools of the province of Manitoba.

Mr. McCARTHY. It seems to me that the statement made by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. LaRivière) is worthy of attention. The hon. member has told us that the books in use in the public schools of Manitoba are in the English language, whereas the separate schools will be nearly all French schools.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. No, mixed schools.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mixed schools, at all events. Surely we ought to provide for a bilingual series of books, as is done in Ontario.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. I think the hon. gentleman is entitled to some compliments from me.

Mr. MARTIN. Is the hon. gentleman sure that the advisory board has not provided bilingual books for French schools in Manitoba ? My impression is that they have.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. No.

Mr. LANGELIER. I think the following which would be shorter than the clause, as proposed, would meet the case :—

To select books, maps and globes which may be exclusively used in the schools, with the exception of books on morals and religion, which books shall be exclusively selected by the competent religious authority.

The effect of this would be to leave the selection of all books, whether in French or English, except those on morals and religion, entirely within the discretion of the board. They might select books used in the separate schools of Ontario, or in the schools of Quebec, or any other set of books.

Amendment (Mr. Powell) agreed to : yeas, 55 ; nays, 37.

Mr. McCARTHY. I move the addition of the following :—

And in districts where any large number of pupils attending the separate schools do not understand English, but speak French or a foreign tongue, the books and maps shall, so far as practicable, be bilingual, in the English or French or foreign language spoken by the pupils, with the object of teaching the English language in the most efficient way.

Mr. BERGIN. I object strongly to that amendment. French is not a foreign language in Canada.

Mr. McCARTHY. I have not called it a foreign language. I have been very careful not to do that.

Mr. DICKEY. That amendment seems to me to be objectionable, in that it involves a very large and unknown expense. It means that the Board of Education would be obliged to go to the expense of obtaining a French translation of any book now authorized in the Manitoba public schools, and it must be in both languages. I would ask the committee if they do not think the suggestion of the Government, in the first place, has merits, that is, to go to the separate school system of Ontario for French books.

Mr. McCARTHY. There are no French books in the separate schools of Ontario. There is a bilingual series in the public schools, not in the separate schools.

Mr. DAVIN. We have in the North-west Territories, a bilingual series, just as they have in Ontario.

Mr. McCARTHY. This amendment does not require them to print books. They can get the books anywhere. We have had a good deal of trouble with this in Ontario, and a commission was appointed and reported that the only thing to do was to have a bilingual series.

Mr. LANGELIER. I want to know where we are. I want to know the exact effect of the amendment which has been adopted. How will the clause read ? I understand the amendment adopted on the motion of the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) to be to the effect that the selection of the books is to be confined to the books now used by the public schools of Manitoba. I do not know whether I am rightly informed or not, but I am informed that there are no French books at all used in the Manitoba schools. Is the Government disposed to wipe out the French language altogether ?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No.

Mr. LANGELIER. I think this is an insult to the French-speaking members, and I do not believe there is one who would support it, if he knew what the clause as amended meant.

Mr. DICKEY. I was going to ask the committee to allow that clause to stand, because the motion of my hon. friend the member for Westmoreland has somewhat changed the aspect, and I think the objection of the hon. member for Provencher is perfectly well taken. It is difficult to take in the bearing of such a complicated amendment as the hon. member for Simcoe has suggested, and I would like time to consider the whole question.

Subsection (c), with proposed amendment allowed to stand.

On subsection (d),

To approve of the plans for the construction of school-houses.

Mr. FLINT. I move in amendment that that be struck out. There is no reason whatever for this subsection. You will be compelling the school trustees in Manitoba for all time to come to submit the plans of their buildings to a board at Winnipeg, and possibly a board not as competent to form a good opinion of what is required as the trustees who are on the spot. This is bound to create delay and inconvenience and a great deal of irritation. The majority of school-houses in the rural districts are of very simple architecture, containing only one room, so that there is no occasion for drawing plans or requiring the approval of a board perhaps 500 miles distant.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I agree in what my hon. friend has said. The people in every school section are the best judges of what amount of taxes they can bear. The trustees elected by those who pay the taxes and who are compelled to construct the building ought to be at liberty to decide what the school-house shall be. In Ontario the school inspector may decide that a new school-house is required or that a certain cubic passage is to be furnished to every child, but the erection of the house and the determination of the structure is in the hands of the trustees. You will create great conflicts between the Board of Education and the taxpayers by a provision of this sort.

Mr. DICKEY. These words are exactly as they were in the old law of 1881, and that takes away a great deal of the argument of the hon. member for Yarmouth.

Mr. FLINT. Does not the hon. gentleman think this will impose entirely unnecessary expense? It would involve the making of a plan by a regular architect and necessarily involves the interference by a central board with the plans of the local trustees.

Mr. MARTIN. The fact that it was in the law before is no reason that it should be in this law. This very clause is one of the reasons why we objected to the old law. These boards became bureaucratic and were continually interfering in every trifling matter. You had to go to this school board, which was practically going to the superintendent, for every little step you were going to take in every school district. If you were going to build a school, you had to go and get the plans assented to, although in most cases no plans were required. It might be reasonable to make regulations requiring that no school-house should be built unless the rooms were of a certain area or that each child should have so many cubic inches of ventilation, but to say that the board must approve of every plan, when as a matter of fact many of the school-houses are mere log houses, which are put up by the people themselves, who call a bee for that purpose, is absurd.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). Whatever provision there is in the present provincial law of Manitoba, the same provision should be in this law.

Mr. FRASER. If there is to be supervision of the plans for the construction of school-houses at all, it should be made by the inspector who travels around, and not by a board which meets in the city of Winnipeg perhaps 500 miles away from the locality where the school is to be erected. Some one in the section objects to a school-house being built at all, and files a petition against it, to which he obtains a few signatures, and sends that on to the board, and the board will compel these people to travel all the way to Winnipeg in order to hear what they have to say for and against the petition.

Mr. MARTIN. That is what they used to make them do.

Mr. FRASER. I can see how this would create an endless amount of trouble, and I do not think it is necessary at all.

Mr. McCARTHY. I would suggest in amendment that it would be better to use the language which we find in the Manitoba Act, and which was used after experience of the difficulties referred to :

To make regulations for the dimensions, equipment, style, plan, furnishing, decoration and ventilation of school-houses and for the arrangements and requisites of school premises.

Mr. LAURIER. I think this is one of those matters in which there should be uniformity. There may be a separate school and a public school within a stone's throw of each other, and it would be much better that both should come under the same regulations as regards construction. This is a case in which there should be uniformity.

Mr. McCARTHY. That is my view, but it has been so often overruled by the committee that I did not think there was any use in suggesting it.

Mr. WALLACE. I do not see any necessity for this clause at all. If you make those restrictions, you will prevent the very thing the Bill aims at, namely, the erection of schools and the promotion of education. If a poor school section has to submit plans to the Board of Education and the Board of Education does not meet perhaps for six months, here is this school section a thousand miles away from the place where the board meets, and not until that board meets, they cannot have a bee and put up their school-house. But they have to employ an architect and submit a plan for the approval of this board, all of which means expense that they can ill afford to pay. You may depend upon it they will establish the best school-houses they can afford. It can be said about the people of Manitoba as about the people of the other provinces, that they give what money they can afford to erect good school-houses and to pay competent teachers. It is absurd to place these restrictions contained in this clause, and I would ask the Government to strike out the clause altogether. I am glad to notice that there is a spasmodic attempt on the part of the Government now to attend to the business of the House.

Mr. DICKEY. I do not see any great objection to leave that clause out of the Bill. There is no particular object in it, but at the same time I do not agree with the argument of the hon. gentleman from Yarmouth (Mr. Flint). In spite of what the hon. gentleman from York (Mr. Wallace) has said, sometimes we get sections which are exceedingly mean with regard to the school-houses they provide, and I do not know of an educational code in which there is not a standard for school-houses. We should certainly insist upon that principle. I would suggest that this clause be struck out and when we come to other clauses referring to advisory board we can deal with this matter.

Mr. LAURIER. Hear, hear. The more attention the hon. gentleman (Mr. Dickey) gives to this Bill, the more he will be convinced that the views laid down by my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) are correct, and that all the matters which relate purely to administration and are altogether civil or municipal in their character, should be left to the advisory board. In regard to school buildings and those other matters, the question of separate schools cannot come in. The question of separate schools can only have one object, namely, the teaching of religion, and if you have uniformity in everything else, you will have a better system.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. In everything that does not require the action of the advisory board, there may be no objection to submit to any of their rules, but where we dictate any duty to be performed by the advisory board, I would object to giving them power, because they may refuse to act.

Mr. McCARTHY. They must act.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. You cannot compel them.

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes, you can.

Mr. WALLACE.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. We will have to secure you as our solicitor.

Mr. McCARTHY. I will take the fee now.

Mr. LAURIER. As has been explained by my hon. friend (Mr. Mills), separate schools are public schools in every sense but one. Although they are public schools in every way, they have this further privilege granted to them that they may teach their own religion.

Mr. McCARTHY. They are public denominational schools.

Mr. LAURIER. Yes. And wherever all these matters outside of religion are provided for already for the public schools, it would meet every requirement of the case, if you had confined the power of the Board of Education simply to the part which relates to the teaching of religion.

Mr. McCARTHY. That is the proposition I started out with.

Mr. WALLACE. Then why not enact here now, that all the regulations of the advisory board shall have force in the separate schools. I have too much confidence in the fairness of the advisory board to think that they would be guilty of such meanness as to make a regulation specially to injure the minority. You should leave all these civil regulations to the advisory board, just as is the case in Ontario and Quebec and everywhere else. These regulations have nothing whatever to do with the teaching of morals and religion.

Amendment (Mr. Flint) negatived.

On subsection (e),

To make regulations regarding the selection of school sites, the size of school grounds, and the formation and alteration of all school districts under its care.

Mr. FLINT. This is practically open to some of the objections that I mentioned with regard to the former clause.

Mr. McCARTHY. These powers should be assigned to the advisory board. They are a matter of administration.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. No, no.

Mr. FLINT. The School Act of Nova Scotia would, I think, be a fair model and I find all these regulations are placed under the head of duties of trustees. I do not think that the trustees should be governed in this matter of the selection of a site by a central board miles away from the school district.

Mr. FRASER. What is the meaning of the words "to make regulations regarding the selection of school sites." No person should select a site except the ratepayers who are most interested in having it in a suitable place for the school district.

Mr. McALISTER. Suppose they do not agree ?

Mr. FRASER. Then the inspector should decide, and it should be one of his duties to do so.

Mr. POWELL. It means general regulations, such as that a school-house must not be erected near a tavern or within a certain distance from a dwelling house, and not specific regulations.

Mr. FRASER. If it is simply laying down a rule where a school site shall not be, I think the clause is unfortunately wrong. If that is the meaning, is not the inspector the best man to decide that ? There is no regulation relating to this in Nova Scotia.

Mr. DICKEY. The hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken.

Mr. FRASER. No, the matter is left to the inspector of schools.

Mr. LANGELIER. The construction put upon this regulation in the province of Quebec is that given to it by the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell). It is very essential that the school ground should be large enough to give fresh air to the children attending the schools, and we have regulations forbidding the placing of a school-house near a cemetery, or near an inn or place of bad repute, or too near other buildings ; and I think it is a very wise provision of the law.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). In Ontario, most of these regulations are made in the statute itself. For instance, it is provided that the school site shall be as near the centre of the section as possible, that it shall contain not less than an acre of land, that it shall not be near an orchard or a pleasure ground, and so on. This clause of the Bill is too vague, because you hardly know from it what the parties who make these regulations can or cannot do. I think a number of these regulations should be set out in the law, as they are in the Ontario law, leaving the subordinate regulations to be made by the Board of Education.

Mr. FLINT. This clause compels the board to make regulations regarding the "formation and alteration of school districts under its care." That is very vague. I do not see any clause providing for the manner in which the school districts are to be laid out. I think this conflicts with section 10, which gives a large portion of that power to the municipalities.

Mr. POWELL. One is general, and the other is specific.

Mr. FRASER. Under the law of Nova Scotia, it is no part of the duty of the Council of Public Instruction, which corresponds with this Board of Education, to decide on school sites or anything of that kind. The trustees select the site, and the inspector approves of it, as the county commissioners used to do. And I think that this clause, instead of leaving that matter to the Board of Education, should leave it to the ratepayers themselves, subject to the approval of the inspector of schools, as is done in Nova Scotia. The inspector has to make the round of all the schools, and he could easily do that work.

Mr. McCARTHY. I do not understand why we should strike out clause "d" and leave "e" to stand. I understand that the Government propose to transfer the power mentioned in clause "d" to the advisory board.

Mr. DICKEY. No.

Mr. McCARTHY. I thought so. What has become of "d," then ?

Mr. DICKEY. What I intended to state was that regulations could be made hereafter, as we came to the proper place, that school-houses could be built according to the plan adopted by the advisory board ; but I never proposed that the plan should be subject to the approval of the advisory board.

Mr. McCARTHY. If that is the case, I see no difficulty in providing for section "e" in the same way. Leave out the latter part of the clause, which is to be dealt with separately, and say what the advisory board has to do—"to make regulations for the arrangement and erection of school premises." Why can you not provide, just as you do with reference to the construction of school-houses, that these regulations shall be applicable to the separate schools ? Why do you say in section "d" that the regulations with reference to the construction of school-houses shall apply, and refuse to say that the regulations as to school premises shall apply in the same way ? I think it would be better to strike out both, and make the provisions uniform.

Mr. LAURIER. The provisions of this subsection, so far as they relate to the selection of school sites and the size of the school grounds, are now well understood ; but I would call the attention of my hon. friend to what follows :—"and the formation and alteration of all school districts under its care." Can he explain what is intended to be the nature of these regulations. Section 10 provides that school districts shall be formed by the mayors and reeves of the municipalities under regulations that may from time to time be issued by the Board of Education. What does this mean ? Does it mean regulations in regard to the notice to be given to the electors, or the form of procedure which mayors and reeves are to follow ? What is the nature of these regulations ?

Mr. DICKEY. I should suppose they would be general regulations, applicable to the circumstances under which it would be advisable to establish new districts—as to the number of pupils——

Mr. LAURIER. It cannot be the number of pupils. That is provided for by the Act.

Mr. DICKEY. That is only one limitation. I suppose it would be regulations of that character.

Mr. McCARTHY. Why not leave it to be settled in accordance with the plans of the advisory board, just as you do with regard to the size of the school-houses ?

Mr. FLINT. Is there not danger of giving this board too much power—of giving them really legislative powers ?

Mr. LAURIER. I would suggest to the hon. Minister of Justice that he might let this clause stand. On reflection he will find that there is a great deal in the contention of my hon. friend from Simcoe, that the first two objects, namely, the selection of school sites and the size of school grounds really might go under the regulations of the advisory board.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Suppose the advisory board will not act, there is a deadlock.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman does not seize the point. The advisory board has made permanent regulations for the selection of school sites and the size of school grounds, and there is no reason why they should not apply just as well to the separate schools. That would be better than to have one set of regulations for the separate schools and one for the common schools. I am not disposed to accept the contention of the hon. member for Simcoe that the same regulations should apply to the formation and alteration of school districts, because these regulations must necessarily be different. What is the nature of those regulations ? They apply to the condition of things in Manitoba, and there is no gentleman on the Treasury benches who can give the information.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. The subsection is simply a re-enactment of the power which the Board of Education had formerly. They were regulations made by each section of the board, and one of these was that no school site should be approved of unless it was of the area of at least one acre. There were other regulations. This subsection does not provide merely for general regulations, but also for particular ones. Take the regulations regarding the selection of school sites, that might be of a general naure or of a special nature ; and the board, whether the Board of Education or the advisory board, would require perhaps to act specially in a special case. Well, if we are appointing a Board of Education, we should clothe it with all the necessary powers ; and in order to avoid friction, anything that requires any action on the part of that body should not be vested in another institution. If we required anything from the advisory board, they might refuse to act, and their refusal might bring about a deadlock and prevent the object we have in view.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What steps are to be taken for the purpose of making these regulations known ?

Mr. LaRIVIERE. They are published annually in the report of the Superintendent of Education.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). There is no provision for the report of the Superintendent of Education in the Bill or for the publishing of these regulations.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. We could provide a clause to meet that objection.

Mr. McCARTHY. It would be ultra vires, not having been provided for in the remedial order. As regards the objection of the hon. leader of the Opposition concerning the formation and alteration of school districts, that is met by clause 10, which provides for this matter.

Mr. LAURIER. Subject to regulations.

Mr. McCARTHY. But the very fact that clause 10 provides for the formation and alteration of school districts subject to regulations, gives the power to make regulations which need not be given here again.

Mr. LAURIER. The regulations for the separate schools in the formation of districts may be different from those which apply to common schools.

Mr. McCARTHY. The advisory board do not deal with the regulations for the formation of school districts, but with the regulations as to school premises.

Mr. LAURIER. That is all right.

Mr. McCARTHY. That is all I propose—to make regulations for the dimensions, equipment, arrangements and requisites of school premises. With regard to the other clause, dealing with the formation and alteration of school districts, that is sufficiently dealt with in section 10, and if not, when we reach that section we can make it right.

Mr. WALLACE. The same objections which applied against subsection (b) apply with greater force to subsection (e). The two things provided for in subsection (a) should be subjected to the same regulations as the advisory board makes. With regard to the third portion of the clause, referring to the formation and alteration of school districts, that is amply provided for in clause 10. What is the necessity of duplicating power and authority ? The Government have been so conciliatory this evening in dropping for the present altogether clause (c), and in dropping entirely clause (d), that I hope they will either give some good reason for the retention of clause (e), or drop it altogether. The regulations for the selection of school sites and the size of school grounds, which are good enough for the public schools, ought to be admirably adapted to the separate schools.

Mr. DICKEY. It seems to me that this Board of Education, which is to control the education matters of the province, should certainly have power to make regulations with reference to the selection of school sites and the selection and alteration of school districts. The latter is particularly necessary. They may be dealing with a municipality which, in some quarters, may be hostile to the system of separate schools, and all sorts of difficulties might arise unless the body itself, which is trying to work out this school system, laid down regulations to which these school districts should be subjected.

Mr. LAURIER. What is the nature of those regulations ?

Mr. LaRIVIERE. One of the principal regulations that the school board in former days had to make had reference to the area of the school district, and decided within what range the school district would serve and what children were within its limits. There were also regulations regarding the location of school-houses in cases of township lots and river lots. Those regulations were published from time to time in the annual report of the Superintendent of Education and were scattered broadcast. One regulation was, that in case the municipality would decline to interfere in the formation of a school district, then the board have the power to pass a special regulation.

Mr. LAURIER. That is provided by clause 10.

Mr. EDGAR. Why should the power be left to the board to arbitrarily select a school site, without the sanction of the ratepayers. Why does not the Government adopt the provisions of the law as it stands in Manitoba to-day, and which regulates these matters very well. We should not delegate to the board the functions of a legislature about such a very important matter as the selection of school sites, which are permanent, and upon which public money has to be expended. I do not know how it is possible that we can delegate to the board power to expropriate land for a school site.

Mr. DICKEY. This has nothing to do with expropriating the land at all. It merely refers to the preliminary selection of the site.

Mr. FLINT. Why not have a few of these regulations inserted in the clause. It seems to me that the wording of the clause is too vague, and that the principle upon which the board should be empowered to make regulations could be laid down in a few words.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Instead of these regulations provided for generally, you ought to have a number of clauses similar to those in the Manitoba Act of 1890, and which are copied from the Ontario statutes. It would be a most unusual proceeding, if we had the power to expropriate private property, and put it under the control of a board, and to say where it should be taken and under what conditions. All these matters which the hon. gentleman proposes to hand over to the board, are in reality regulated by statute under the Ontario school law. It seems to me that the parties who pay for the school sites should have the opportunity of choosing them.

Subsection (e) agreed to.

On subsection (f).

> To make and enforce regulations for the establishment and operation of departments in such of its schools as it may deem suitable for the preparation of candidates for the annual examination of teachers and for matriculating at the University of Manitoba, and for the doing of general literary work corresponding to the standard required for these examinations, and to give special aid to such schools from the funds at its disposal, not exceeding in the aggregate one-twentieth of its appropriation, provided that no school shall be entitled to receive such special aid that does not comply fully with the regulations made by the board for its operation ; provided further, that each such department shall be established only with the consent of the local board of school trustees.

Mr. FLINT. It seems to me that this is in the nature of giving the board power to establish a normal school.

Mr. FOSTER. Do they not want to prepare their teachers ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It is copied word for word from the statute of 1887.

Mr. FLINT. I am speaking now as to the extra financial obligation which we are placing upon this board.

Mr. DICKEY. It is only an enabling clause.

Mr. FLINT. But this is legislating in the direction of higher education, which is not one of the grievances complained of to the Privy Council, and which is altogether distinct from separate common schools.

Wednesday, 8th April, 1896.

Mr. DICKEY. It does not seem to me that the fact that the teaching was extraordinarily good and supplied a high standard of education, would take it out of our power. We are providing generally for the education of the youth, and I do not see why we should not carry it up to a high standard. It is one of the powers which was exercised by the minority, and was taken from them, and it is simply intended to restore it. If this system is to be of any good, you must have teachers, and this is a means of getting proper teachers educated to carry on the system efficiently.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). This clause speaks of "the preparation of candidates for the annual examination of teachers." Does that mean condidates who are to be prepared to examine teachers ?

Mr. DICKEY. I understand it to mean, candidates to go up for examination. I have no objection to making it read "as teachers."

Mr. EDGAR. Will the hon. Minister point out the exact clause of the former Act from which this is taken ?

Mr. DICKEY. Section 11 of the Act of 1887.

Subsection (f) section 4 agreed to.

On section 5,

> 5. The board may, whenever they shall see fit, appoint and hold a meeting of such board, in any part of the province, and such meeting shall be as valid as if held in the city of Winnipeg, which shall be the usual place of meeting of such board or section.

Mr. FRASER. Where is the provision in the Bill that the board shall be paid their travelling expenses if they meet elsewhere than in Winnipeg ?

Mr. FOSTER. The board would be sensible enough not to go unless they could pay their way.

Mr. FRASER. The board cannot pay themselves, unless authority is given them to do so. This is providing that work shall be done without remuneration.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. I can inform the hon. gentleman that this Board of Education has existed for nineteen years, and not one of the members ever received a cent for his services.

Mr. FOSTER. The Board of Education of the province of New Brunswick is not paid.

Mr. McDOUGALL (Cape Breton). The Board of Education of the province of Nova Scotia is not paid.

Mr. FRASER. In the province of Nova Scotia the executive of the province are the Board of Public Instruction, and they have never held a meeting outside of the executive chamber. But if that board had to travel over the province, it would be a different thing ; their expenses would have to be paid ; and if this board have to travel outside of Winnipeg, there should be some provision as to how they shall be paid, and I ask, where is the provision ? Otherwise, we are imposing a duty upon them that will not be fulfilled.

Mr. POWELL. It is not a duty at all. It is optional.

Mr. FRASER. But even in that case, are they not to be paid ? Is it expected by the Government that this board have to travel at their own expense ?

Mr. WOOD. Surely the hon. gentleman must know that the board may never be called upon to travel outside of Winnipeg at all. This is only to provide for emergencies—that in case the board should be called upon to hold any meetings outside, they might do so, and their action would be valid.

Mr. FLINT. I do not find anything in the Bill necessitating the board travelling, or having more than one place of meeting, and I think it is important that the governing body should have a regular headquarters, where it would always meet. It seems to me this is a provision which is very much in danger of being abused. I think the clause might as well be struck out. It is an invitation to extravagance and useless expense.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. This was in the old Act.

Mr. FRASER. I think it should be provided in this clause that the board should be paid.

Mr. CAMERON. Oh, no.

Mr. FRASER. It is very well for gentlemen who will never be members of the board to say, "no," but you cannot get good work done unless men are paid for it.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. I have been a member for ten years, and I have not been paid.

Mr. FRASER. Unless there was some good reason why the board should meet elsewhere than in Winnipeg, this would not be in the section ; and if that is likely to happen—and I can conceive of some occasions when it might be necessary—you cannot, and will not get the work done unless you provide for paying their expenses. Banks and other institutions do it, and I do not think this board ought to be made an exception.

Mr. LAURIER. When a question is asked why a certain provision is in the Bill, it is not unfair to expect an answer to be given. What is the reason you have such an obsolete provision as this ? The only reason given is that it is in the old Act. Well, I do not suppose it is a sacramental matter that everything that was in the old Act must be in this Bill. What reason can there be for giving this board such a power ? There is a board of education in the province of Quebec, and I am sure it has no such power. It meets in the city of Quebec, and nowhere else ; and, as far as I can understand, the practice is the same in every other province. No one can conceive why the board should meet in any other place than the usual place of meeting.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the objection ?

Mr. LAURIER. The objection is that unless you can give a reason why a provision is in the Act, it should not be there. There should be no redundancy in the law. No reason is given for this obsolete provision, and unless some good reason is given for it, I am not prepared to support it. I move that it be struck out.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think it is a sufficient reason that there was a similar provision in the old law, and I assume that there was a reason for it. I can see a very good reason. Suppose that in a district remote from Winnipeg a number of cases should arise, and the board should come to the conclusion that it would be more convenient for them to go to the locality instead of bringing all the people concerned from there to Winnipeg, why should they be deprived of that power ? The very fact that, in the condition of the country, with which they were better acquainted than we are, they did adopt that provision, appears to me to be a good and valid reason why it should be in this Bill.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. I could, perhaps, give some explanation with regard to this clause. Winnipeg and St. Boniface are close together. In former days, a majority of the members of the Catholic section of the Board of Education resided in the town of St. Boniface, and the chairman of that section was the lamented late Archbishop Taché, who had been ailing for years. In order, therefore, to legalize the meetings of that Board of Education, the law was amended so as to permit any section of the board to decide where they should meet. I do not see what objection there can be to that. In some cases it might be more convenient to the majority of the board to meet at St. Boniface.

Mr. LAURIER. That is a tangible reason which one can understand, but there is no reason in the suggestion made by the hon. Secretary of State that the board would have to travel in order to dispose of cases. The board would simply send its inspector, and decide on his report. If it is thought advisable that the board should have power to meet in St. Boniface, there could be no objection to that, but I do not think we should give it power to travel all over the province.

Mr. DICKEY. I think the objection of the hon. member for Guysboro' answers the hon. leader of the Opposition. As long as there is no money, they will not go jumping round the province.

Mr. FRASER. By no means. The hon. Secretary of State has given us good reasons why this clause should be amended. If this is to be a perambulating commission, I would move, in amendment :

When the board holds a meeting in any part outside Winnipeg, such members as attend such meeting shall be paid their actual expenses.

If it will be only necessary for them to meet in St. Boniface, let that be put in the section, and there will be no need for my amendment.

Mr. EDGAR. I would propose an amendment which, no doubt, will meet the case. It would be proper to fix, by statute, a place of meeting for the board, and I would suggest that the following be substituted for this section—

The place of meeting of the board shall be either at Winnipeg or at St. Boniface, and that at all meetings a majority shall be a quorum.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Shall clause 5, as amended, be adopted ?

Mr. FLINT. I see that there is no provision for the election of a chairman, and I move that the following be added :—

And the board shall at its first meeting elect a chairman who shall preside at all meetings of the board.

Mr. DICKEY. I do not think any such amendment is necessary, and, in any case, the one proposed is very objectionable, because if the chairman should not be elected at the first meeting of the board, it would be questionable whether they would have power to elect one at any other meeting ; and if the chairman should die, they might not be able to elect another.

Mr. GIBSON. The hon. Minister of Justice must know that the first duty of the board is to elect a chairman.

Mr. DICKEY. No doubt, but I do not think it is necessary to put it in the Bill.

Mr. GIBSON. Without a chairman, no business could be conducted, as there would be no one to give a decision or to appeal to. In my opinion, the board would not be legally constituted unless we provide for a chairman.

Mr. DICKEY. There is not the slightest objection to providing for a chairman, and I would therefore move, in amendment, that the board shall have power from time to time to elect a chairman to preside over its meetings.

Mr. FLINT. I withdraw my amendment in favour of that.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. Will the chairman have the right to vote ?

Mr. DICKEY. Not under that amendment.

Mr. EDGAR. I do not think the hon. Minister of Justice has taken the best way of doing it. On a permanent board, it is always well to have a permanent chairman. This amendment only provides what any meeting can do, that is elect a chairman for the special meeting.

Mr. DICKEY. I think it is better to leave that to the board.

Mr. EDGAR. It is not usual or business like. The board will have the control of money, and they will need a permanent chairman for the signing of cheques.

Mr. DICKEY. That is for them to say.

Mr. EDGAR. I do not think it is.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. The usual course pursued in Ontario with regard to the selection of a chairman for a Board of Education is, that the chairman is selected at the first meeting, and he presides over the deliberations of the body for one year. According to the provision just read by the Minister of Justice, this board whenever they meet, might have to appoint a chairman, but if you have a chairman appointed for a fixed period then he controls the movements of the board. I think it would be advisable that this board should be put on the same working basis as the boards of education in other provinces. All men are possessed of a certain amount of ambition, and I suppose this office would go around, and then you would have a new chairman at every meeting, and the result might lead to endless difficulties. We should strive here to make this Bill more workable, and I think that this would be accomplished if the suggestion is adopted. I do not think there is any sense in the assertion frequently made during the discussion, that because a certain clause is in the old Act, it should be transferred to the new. This is a progressive age, and it is to be supposed that this is a progressive legislature. It often occurs that there is necessity for special business, and the teachers go to the chairman and ask that a special meeting of the board be called, and then the chairman instructs the secretary to call a meeting. If there is no chairman these teachers have no one to go to.

Mr. DICKEY. I am very anxious to make this Bill workable, but I think there is some danger in appointing a permanent chairman. In the first place there are no functions for the chairman to perform under this Bill, and it seems to me that all we need do is to give them power to organize properly, and then they could select a chairman for such time as they think proper.

Mr. DEVLIN. Why not say "the board shall have power to elect a chairman at its first meeting." I am not a lawyer, but I think that would meet it from a common sense point of view.

Mr. DICKEY. I see no very great objection to that.

Mr. FRASER. I would suggest to the Minister that he would adopt the provision of the Nova Scotia Act in regard to this matter.

Mr. DICKEY. Under the present advisory board in Manitoba, there is no provision for a chairman or anything about it.

Mr. FRASER. But there should be, and if you specify it in this Bill you will save a great deal of trouble.

Mr. EDGAR.

Mr. POWELL. In the New Brunswick law there is no provision whatever for the election of a chairman, and there has been no trouble in the matter for twenty-five years. As a matter of practice the Lieutenant-Governor is always selected as chairman when he is present, but there is no provision in the law. The New Brunswick regulations have been in every court from the parish court to the Privy Council, and they have stood fire.

Mr. EDGAR. In order to try and make this section perfect, I would move as an amendment :

> The board shall have power at the first meeting in each year to choose one of its members to be chairman of the board for that year.

Mr. DICKEY. I think that would suit.

Amendment (Mr. Edgar) agreed to.

Section 5 agreed to.

Mr. DICKEY. With regard to section 4, subsection "c"——

Mr. LAURIER. I hope the hon. gentleman will not go back to that. Quite a number of gentlemen who took an interest in that section have gone away under the impression that it would not be taken up again this evening.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The whole matter has been completely discussed, and I think agreed to by the House. The only object now is to cover the French language, and the proposal of my hon. friend the Minister of Justice with that object will, I am sure, meet with universal concurrence.

Mr. LAURIER. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I have been informed just now that the amendment proposed by the hon. Minister of Justice is not satisfactory, and that was why I asked that the clause be allowed to stand.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Perhaps if the hon. gentleman will hear it read——

Mr. LAURIER. I know what it is. It is to add Ontario and Quebec, and I know that is not satisfactory.

Mr. DICKEY. I do not feel like going on with it, if the committee does not want to ; but of course I would like very much to get on. I have no desire to enter on a protracted contest, after twelve hours work.

Mr. EDGAR. The hon. member for North Simcoe, who had an amendment as to that, is not here.

Mr. DICKEY. Yes, I think that is a very strong reason.

On section 6,

> Any member of the board absenting himself from the meetings of the board for six months, unless from sickness or absence from the province, shall be considered to have ipso facto resigned his position, and the superintendent of the board shall notify the Provincial Secretary of the vacancy so caused, and the member appointed to replace him shall hold office only for the unexpired term of the member whom he replaces.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Suppose that the provincial secretary or the provincial government refuse to have anything to do with the administration of the law under this Bill, this notice would be altogether nugatory. There is no propriety in sending the notice to the local government.

Mr. McLEOD. The only object of the notice is to empower some one to make the appointment.

Mr. IVES. The provincial government will make the appointment if they see fit. If they do not see fit to do so, then other authorities will act. I do not think we can presume that they will refuse to act. If they do not act, and the appointment is made by the central government, the notice given to the provincial secretary does no harm.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman has failed to catch my point. There is no provision that in case the provincial government refuse to act, any one else shall act. This section requires to be amended by the insertion of a provision similar to those in sections 1 and 2, that in the event of the provincial government not making the appointment, the Governor in Council or other authority may do so.

Mr. McLEOD. Section 2 provides for that.

Mr. FRASER. Yes, but the second authority that may make the appointment if the first fails, ought to be notified as well as the first ?

Mr. IVES. You naturally wait for three months before you apply to the Government of Canada through the Secretary of State to fill the vacancy.

Mr. FRASER. In the meantime, if all the members absented themselves for six months you would be then without a council at all.

Mr. IVES. That is hardly a supposable case.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Why do you give notice to one government to fill the vacancy and not the other ?

Mr. IVES. You do not ask the Government of Canada to act unless there has been default for three months by the provincial government.

Mr. FRASER. That three months only refers to the first appointment. Does the hon. gentleman think that in the case of each vacancy you must apply to the local government, and then wait for three months ? In that case, you might have no board at all for three months.

Mr. IVES. You might have an earthquake.

Mr. FRASER. Under the Act, five constitutes a quorum, and if five absented themselves for six months, there would only be four left and there would be no board. You must make provision that the board shall be continuous, and that the vacancy shall be filled at once.

Mr. IVES. If there are only four members left, then the majority of the four may report.

Mr. FRASER. Then, I suppose that if only one remained, he could carry on the work. Is that the idea ?

Mr. IVES. That is the idea.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The Minister of Trade and Commerce has not caught the point I raised. In the first place, you propose that the board shall be a provincial board, to which the appointments shall be made by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, and you give them three months within which to act. So far as the first appointments are concerned, you ascertain whether the local government has acted, and if not you make the appointments here. But when a vacancy occurs, you provide that notice shall be given to the provincial secretary ; but you make no provision for giving notice to the Governor in Council here. Both parties who have the power to make the appointment should be notified of the vacancy, otherwise the vacancy might continue for a whole year without anybody being appointed to fill it.

Mr. POWELL. In the first case a notice is required, because after the lapse of three months the power of the local government to make the appointment is spent. The power of the Governor in Council is not spent by any lapse of time, and the local government might claim that they would have made by the appointment. For that reason the notice is provided simply to protect them.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That is absurd.

Mr. FLINT. This is a copy of the old clause, but it provides for an entirely different set of circumstances. It has to provide for an alternative, and an alternation in it is absolutely necessary to make it meet the different condition of things. There is no proviso in this clause in case a member was appointed and refused to act.

Mr. POWELL. The common law would provide for that.

Mr. FLINT. The common law will not provide for a case which arises under a statute. Then, who is to judge of the validity of the excuse to be offered by any member for his absence from the meetings of the board ? Who is to settle the question whether the seat has become ipso facto vacant ? Then, there might be no provincial secretary.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. In the Ontario school law, the provision is that if a member of the board is not in attendance at three successive meetings, his place becomes vacant; and if he takes a seat after that and votes at the meeting, he renders himself liable to a fine of $20 for each time he does so. That would be much more effective than this provision, because the matter is there definitely settled, and it is not left to anybody to settle. This provision may lead to endless trouble. A man might say he was sick when he was not sick at all, and thus he might continue a member of the board and not attend any of the meetings. Then he might be a resident of a foreign country, and still be a member of the board, under this clause. Then it should be made necessary to notify the Governor in Council as well as the provincial secretary, because if the provincial secretary refused to act, it would be necessary to invite the Governor General in Council to act. I think that six months is too long a time. That should be changed to three months, as otherwise the board might not be able to get a quorum for the whole year. I therefore suggest that the time limit be changed to three months.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). There may be serious evils arising through a number of vacancies existing in the board, and if the Lieutenant-Governor in Council does not act, surely it is important that the Governor General in Council should be notified. Some officer of this Government should receive the notice in order that action may be taken and the board so constituted as to enable it to discharge its duties. You cannot suppose that the Governor General in Council have some unusual means of obtaining information, and will know that a vacancy exists without being officially informed of it. Why do you require this notice to be given to the provincial secretary? It is that the notice may be official, and not mere hearsay; and you provide that when a vacancy exists, a certain party authorized to fill it shall receive the notice. You make this provision, not because it is a favour conferred upon the party, for it is an obligation which you call on him to discharge; and if the provincial secretary fails to discharge the duty, the other party, the Governor General in Council, on whom the duty falls, should receive the notice also.

Mr. GIBSON. Under this provision, a member of the board might be sick all year, or refuse to go to the board for five months, and then leave the province, and no one has the power to elect another in his place. It seems to me that a number of the members of the board, either through sickness or absence from the province, might leave the board in such condition as not to be able to conduct business. Some provision should be made that after a member has been absent for three months from the board, his place should be declared vacant, and if, after that time, he took any part in the proceedings, he should be fined. The very fact of any member of the board leaving the province should be at once a reason for electing another in his place; but, under this Bill, that very fact would prevent the government appointing some one in his place.

Mr. DEVLIN. Suppose the Roman Catholic Archbishop of St. Boniface should be a member of the board and should be called to Rome, as he frequently is, he could not get back for several months, and he would be excluded from the board under my hon. friend's suggestion.

Mr. GIBSON. Then put in the words "temporary absence from the province" and we shall overcome that difficulty. This seems to me a most ridiculous provision. A member of the board might say he was sick and he might remain sick for a whole year, or he might move into another province, and the hands of the board would be tied for twelve months until another election could take place.

Mr. FRASER. I would suggest that any member of the board absenting himself from three successive regular meetings shall be considered to have resigned his position, and a new member shall be appointed to replace him, who should hold office for the unexpired balance of the term. This provision shall not apply to clergymen.

Mr. DEVLIN. A member of the board might be a member of Parliament and he might be here during a session lasting five months.

Mr. HAZEN. It would be much better to fix the length of time than the meetings. You might have three meetings in a week.

Mr. LANGELIER. It is not contemplated by this Bill to pay any fees for attendance to members or even their travelling expenses, and therefore it cannot be expected that the board will meet very frequently. It is as easy to travel in Quebec as it is in Manitoba, and yet in Quebec the Catholic committee of the Council of Public Instruction only sits once in every six months. The result of this clause would be that if a man absented himself from one sitting he would vacate his seat. It am stating the actual facts. In Quebec, from 1869 to date, the committees of the Council of Public Instruction have never sat more than twice a year. The Catholic committee sits once in the month of May and once in September. This board will not sit more frequently in Manitoba. And under this clause, if a man absented himself from one sitting he would lose his seat. I think, therefore, that some amendments as suggested by the hon. member for Guysboro' should be accepted. We should also adopt the suggestion of the hon. member for Grey that no excuse should be entertained in the case of absence. In Manitoba when Mr. Hamilton was a member of the Norquay government he went to reside in the United States for some years. Suppose he had been appointed to this board, he might live in the United States two or three years and two or three other members of the board might do the same thing, and its sittings would be completely prevented. Even if a man has legitimate reasons of absence, yet, if he cannot attend, he should vacate his seat. The board requires his actual presence, and, whatever may be the reason of his absence, if he is not there he should not continue to be a member.

Mr. DALY. We have one duty here, and that is to restore the rights and privileges of the minority, as they existed previous to 1890, and so we must proceed legally. If we seek to give the minority greater powers than they enjoyed under the old law, it would be ultra vires, and consequently we might undo all the good we seek to do. The section under discussion is identical with the section under the old law, as it existed from 1881 up to 1890. We may not think it right, but then there is the danger that we may go beyond our powers in making these alterations suggested by hon. gentlemen opposite. It is impossible for us to alter or amend this clause, as it stands now, so as to give greater or other powers to the board than they enjoyed previously to 1890.

Mr. EDGAR. Surely, the Minister of the Interior cannot contend that.

Mr. DALY. I do most seriously.

Mr. EDGAR. Before the hon. gentleman came into the House, section 5 of the Bill was struck out altogether, and two different things substituted for it. Are we to be told that this Parliament has to sit here and not improve the details of the measure ?

Mr. DALY. Section 5 is entirely new.

Mr. EDGAR. How could the hon. gentleman put in something new, and which, as he says, might render the whole law illegal?

Mr. DALY. Because it was not supposed at the time to give greater or other powers than what existed previous to 1890.

Mr. EDGAR. I decline to accept that contention of the Minister of the Interior. I would move to amend section 6 :

> By adding the words " without permission of the board " after the word " himself " in the first line ; to strike out the words " absent from the province " in the third line ; to strike out the word " six months " in the second line and to substitute therefor the words " three successive meetings of the board."

That is a much more practical and reasonable clause than the present one. I may mention that the Minister of the Interior is greatly mistaken, when he says that we might have amended clause 5, because it was a new one. As a matter of fact, clause 5 of this Bill is absolutely identical with clause 6 of the old Act.

Mr. DALY. I do not see it in the old law.

Mr. EDGAR. This is a case in which the Cabinet is divided against itself. The Minister of Justice has one opinion, and the Minister of the Interior another. The Minister of Justice, who had charge of the Bill until one o'clock, discussed this clause very fully, and accepted an amendment which I moved myself.

Mr. DALY. I would have been glad to do so myself, but I contend that clause 5 is not identical with the old law, as it existed prior to 1890.

Mr. EDGAR. But the hon. gentleman said it was new.

Mr. DALY. Yes, as it is framed here, it is new. I have got the old law here before me, and I fail to find that clause in it.

Mr. EDGAR. I can read the old law to the Minister, and he will find that clause 6 of the old law is identical with clause 5 of this Bill.

Mr. DALY. Unfortunately for me, clause 6 of the old law has been omitted from the copy which I have before me.

Mr. EDGAR. I do not accuse the hon. gentleman of stating intentionally that it was not in the old law.

Mr. DALY. That does not alter my position at all. I have no doubt that any suggestions the Minister of Justice accepted were not in the line of giving greater powers to the minority than they enjoyed prior to 1890. I am perfectly sure the Minister of Justice would not have accepted the amendment, if it altered materially the old law.

Mr. EDGAR. We cannot help one member of the Government having a different view entirely about the fundamental laws which govern this Bill. The Minister of Justice never suggested that we could not amend any of these clauses.

Mr. DALY. I do not say that we cannot amend any of these clauses. I said that the amendment proposed to clause 6 would so materially alter the clause, that it would make it ultra vires, and I am satisfied that it would, because we would be giving other and different powers than they had prior to 1890.

Mr. EDGAR. The amendment would make it very much more workable and much more reasonable, and if the law is good at all this won't hurt it.

Mr. WALLACE. I am surprised to hear the Minister of the Interior make the statement that if a clause restores rights and privileges that existed prior to 1890 it must not be touched. Where does he get the authority for that ?

Mr. DALY. The remedial order.

Mr. WALLACE. The judgment of the Privy Council is a much higher authority than that and it does not say so.

Mr. DALY. That is not the question.

Mr. WALLACE. The judgment of the Privy Council says : "It is certainly not essential that the statutes which existed prior to 1890 should be restored." And yet we have the Minister of the Interior saying the contrary to that. We have amended clause 5, which was a reproduction of the old law before 1890. In fact, the judges of the Privy Council go further, and say that it may not be desirable to re-enact the legislation prior to 1890. This is a most unworkable clause as it now stands, and I agree with the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Somerville) that it should be amended on the lines of the law in this regard as it exists in the province of Ontario.

Mr. HAZEN. The amendment suggested by the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) I think, meets the case exactly, and I trust that the Minister of the Interior will be able to see his way clear to accept it. I fail to see how that amendment could be construed in any way as giving greater power to the minority in Manitoba than they had under the Act of 1881. While it is within our power to give less to the minority than they had prior to 1890, we cannot give them greater power. I do not think any court would construe this amendment as giving the minority greater power than they had before.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The Minister of the Interior made an observation that has frequently been made in the House before —and I do not think it has been confined to the Treasury benches—with which I do not agree. I do not think that this House is bound up in the way that the Minister suggests. I have already indicated what I think are the rights and privileges which this Parliament is entitled to restore. But, assuming that there is to be no action on the part of the local legislature, I do not think that this House is restrained, if, as a matter of necessity, it has to provide the machinery for the purpose of giving effect to those rights and privileges ; because that is a matter of procedure, which cannot be tied, even by the remedial order. You are tied by the remedial order with regard to everything relating to rights and privileges, but not as to matters of procedure. Their Lordships, in their judgment, say :

> With the policy of these Acts their Lordships are not concerned, nor with the reasons which led to their enactment.

What do they mean by the policy of these Acts ? They mean the various modes adopted for carrying them into effect. As they have used no expression to which they do not attach, in their own minds, a definite meaning, hon. gentlemen will see how far the Government have crippled themselves by tying themselves up to the mode of procedure, as it existed under the old law. These matters of procedure are matters of public policy, and you might have made every one of them different from what they were before, without in the smallest degree making an ultra vires provision. The rule of ultra vires does not refer to them at all.

Mr. FRASER. I hope it will not be contended that this Act will become ultra vires, if any member of the board absents himself from any of the meetings for six months without the consent of the board ; because that is the whole change. With regard to this notice to the Provincial Secretary, if the provincial authority failed to comply with the Act, he might pigeon-hole the notice : consequently, you must have a provision by which notice shall be given to the Governor General. What I propose is to provide that, in the event of a vacancy, the new member shall be appointed "by the proper authority." This section must be remodelled in some such way, if it is to be made effective. The hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Devlin) said that this might apply to the bishop, if he was a member of the board. I have provided for that : "this shall not apply to any clergyman who may be a member of the board, or any member temporarily absent from the province." This slavish attempt to adhere to the words of the old Act that never had in contemplation the necessity of coming to the central Government, is most absurd. An entirely different Parliament is legislating now. Nor must we follow slavishly the words of the remedial order.

Mr. DALY. The hon. gentleman says we are legislating here under a certain authority. That authority is the remedial order ; and under that authority we have to restore the rights "in the manner provided for by the said statutes which were repealed by the two Acts of 1890"—not slavishly to the full extent, but within the terms of that order. We cannot, by legislation here, give other or different powers to the board which we are creating under this Act, from those possessed by the Roman Catholic section of the board under the old law. The alteration suggested by the hon. gentleman, that we should change the six months to three months, might, I admit, be a very satisfactory change but it is a very material alteration, and the court might hold that this law should have been enacted in the terms of the old law prior to 1890, which provided for the case of a member absenting himself for six months, and not for three months. That would be a material change, and might affect the legality of the whole clause. It was supposed, when we framed section 2, that that met the difficulty, in case the notice was given to the Provincial Secretary, and the provincial government refused to act. The hon. gentleman says that we should provide for giving notice to the Secretary of State or to the Governor General in Council. We contemplate that the local government will act. If they do not act, power is given in section 2 to the Governor in Council to act. If, under section 6, notice is given to the Provincial Secretary and the time elapses mentioned in section 2, common sense will suggest that the superintendent will give notice to the proper authority. The Governor General having created the board, the difficulties arising under section 6 would not arise. If the local government appoints the board, the notice under section 6 will be given, and, if the Lieutenant-Governor does not act, the superintendent would act, as common sense would suggest, under section 2.

Mr. FRASER. The answer the hon. gentleman gives is not an answer. Section 2 contemplates that the provincial government may not act, and provides for that contingency. Section 6 must provide for the same contingency. How can you read into a section what common sense will dictate ? Any court will say at once that, if the contingency mentioned in section 2 was likely to happen under section 6, the Provincial Secretary, or the Governor in Council, as the case may be, should be notified. The insertion of two or three words in that clause would get over the difficulty.

Mr. McLEOD. The matter seems to me very clear. Section 2 gives the power, first of all to the Lieutenant-Governor to make the appointments to the board, and he has three months within which to make them. If he des not make them in these three months, then the Governor General shall make them. If any vacancy occurs—and it does not matter whether the appointment was made by the Lieutenant-Governor or by the Governor General—then the Lieutenant-Governor has three months within which to fill the vacancy, and if he does not fill it in these three months, the Governor General shall do so. When a vacancy occurs, notice is sent by the superintendent of the board to the provincial secretary, so that the local government may make the appointment if they choose. But if they do not make the appointment within the three months allowed them, then the Governor General shall make it. No notice is required to be sent to the Governor General of the vacancy, but of course he must be notified in some way of the default of the Lieutenant-Governor to make the appointment before he can act. When a Dominion officer dies or resigns or his place becomes vacant from any cause, there is no formal notice given to the Governor General, but as soon as the fact that the vacancy exists comes to his attention he has the power to make the appointment. No doubt, in this case, the superintendent would make it a point to inform the Governor General that the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba had not filled the vacancy within the prescribed time, and no doubt then the Governor General would act. No practical difficulty can occur at all.

Mr. DALY. If the hon. member for Guysboro' insists upon pressing his point about the notice, I have no objection to meet him, and I shall prepare a special subsection to section 6, which will meet the difficulty that seems to perplex him, by providing that the superintendent shall give notice to the Governor General. We did not think it was at all necessary, but in order to get ahead, I will undertake to have such a clause framed.

Mr. FRASER. I think the suggestion of the hon. Minister will meet my views. I think that the contention of the hon. member for St. John (Mr. McLeod), that although the Lieutenant-Governor in Council may have refused to make the appointment, still when a vacancy occurs he must be given notice, and has three months in which to fill the vacancy, cannot be sustained as a legal contention.

Mr. McLEOD. Section 2 says so.

Mr. FRASER. Section 2 is based altogether on the assumption that the Lieutenant-Governor is not going to act. Section 2 is new and section 6 was in the old law now reproduced. Section 6 had reference solely to the Lieutenant-Governor, who alone acted under the old law, and I contend that the notices called for by section 6 to be given the provincial secretary only applies where the appointments were originally made by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council.

Mr. McNEILL. With regard to the second subsection, that provides that if the Lieutenant-Governor in Council does not within the three months make appointments to the board, the Governor General may act. Under that section, if the Lieutenant-Governor made two appointments, he would comply with the law, because he would have made appointments, and the Governor General could not interfere.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I would like to ask the hon. gentleman how far the proposed amendments before the Chair are acceptable to the Government ?

Mr. DALY. I cannot accept them. I do not want to disturb this clause.

Mr. MULOCK. I do not like the summary manner in which a member may be extinguished from this board without having an opportunity to establish a case.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I presume that when this clause is passed, it is the intention that the House will adjourn.

Mr. DALY. We are going on with the Bill.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I thought, perhaps, that when the clause was carried, the committee would rise.

Mr. FRECHETTE. Next Saturday night.

Mr. IVES. Let me ask the hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition, does the passage of this clause depend upon our adjourning afterwards ?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not suppose it does; but, if you pass this clause, you would make what is considered reasonable progress, and it is now three o'clock in the morning. Do I understand the Minister of the Interior to say that he feels bound to adhere to the clause because it was a clause of the old Act. He seems to be under the impression that we are bound to keep to the wording of the old section.

Mr. DALY. As far as we can. That change proposed from six months to three months would, in my opinion, be a material alteration.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) As far as I am concerned, it seems to me that the amendment of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Edgar) is in the right direction.

Mr. McNEILL. I wish to refer to the suggestion of my hon. friend (Mr. Davies) that the committee should rise after this clause has passed.

Mr. IVES. Is the hon. gentleman in order in referring to this matter now ?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Mills, Annapolis). I do not think so.

Mr. McNEILL. Then, in order to put myself in order, I move that the committee rise and report progress. In view of the fact that the gentleman who represents the Government says that the committee is not to be allowed to rise after having been sitting for thirty-six hours, I think the motion which I make is a very reasonable one. The suggestion that we can consider this Bill at this unreasonable hour is absurd. I would suggest to the members of the Government here, and who are now very sleepy, as to whether it is not absurd to suppose that a British Parliament can be coerced in this way. I have made this motion at three o'clock in the morning.

Mr. DALY. It was made at half-past two, yesterday morning.

Mr. McNEILL. We have given you half an hour more, and you do not seem to be thankful for it. The best possible argument in favour of this motion has been adduced by the Minister of the Interior, who pointed out what little progress has been made during the twenty-four hours. That is what might be expected, for this is not the way to make progress. This kind of thing has been tried before, and tried in vain. We can, of course, continue changing men until the end of the session, but I want to know if there is any reason in compelling the House to sit in this way ? I think it is something we as a Parliament ought to be ashamed of.

Mr. FRECHETTE. You ought to be ashamed of it.

Mr. McNEILL. Those who are responsible for the attempt to coerce this Parliament ought to be ashamed of it. My hon. friend thinks I ought to be ashamed of it, and I think he ought to be ashamed of it. Now, I think there are a great many reasons why the Committee should rise. The Committee was reminded that this was no way to make progress, and my hon. friend has practically told us that no good result has followed the attempt to force this business through this House. If no good result has followed that proceeding in the past, what is the use of continuing it now ? The only argument in favour of this course is that through physical incapacity men can be coerced to allow measures to pass which they otherwise would not. That is the only argument that can be adduced, and I do not think it is a very creditable argument. Now, there has been a great deal of talk with regard to the rights of the minority in Manitoba having been violently taken away from them, and their conscientious objections to attending public schools having been trifled with. A strong attempt has been made to create sympathy for this measure, for which I have very little sympathy. Not that I have not sympathy with the conscientious scruples of any of Her Majesty's subjects. I would have been very glad if such evidence had been adduced to show that the minority really entertain strong conscientious objections to attending public schools. We have no evidence of that kind which we could rely upon.

Mr. COATSWORTH. What about the petitions ?

Mr. McNEILL. No man knows better than the hon member who interrupts me how little reliance is to be attached to a petition.

Mr. COATSWORTH. Not when the petition amounts to a retainer.

Mr. McNEILL. What is the point of the hon. gentleman ?

Mr. COATSWORTH. The point is that the petition was presented by the counsel of the minority and was signed by about 4,500 of the minority of Manitoba.

Mr. McNEILL. What in the world does that amount to ?

Mr. COATSWORTH. I say it is almost the equivalent of a retainer. It is an expression through the counsel for the minority, in the way of evidence of the grievance they sustained, and as such was accepted by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

Mr. McNEILL. Will my hon. friend tell me in what way there is any value to be attached to those signatures which a gentleman brings before a court?

Mr. DALY. While the hon. gentleman is resting. I think we had better understand ourselves. At half-past two yesterday morning, over twenty-four hours ago, the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) made a motion similar to the motion made to-night by the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill.)

Mr. WALLACE. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. At half-past two I was addressing this House on clause "c" of section 4, and I continued to address this House till about half-past four; and no motion to adjourn had been made the whole night.

Mr. DALY. I speak subject to correction, but I say that at half-past two yesterday morning the hon. member for Winnipeg moved a similar motion, that the Committee rise and report progress. At that time there were in your hands, Mr. Chairman, two amendments to subsection "c," of section 4. The committee had no opportunity, after the hon. member for West York had finished his speech, of discussing those amendments at all; because before there was any possible chance, either for the Government to state their position on those amendments, or for any discussion on them, the hon. member for Winnipeg made his motion; and from that time till the time I left the House at one o'clock the committee were discussing subsection "c" of section 4, and that section had not been passed by the House yet, for what reason I cannot say. This committee has been discussing to-night section 6 and two proposed amendments to it, and the hon. member for North Bruce, who has no doubt refreshed himself by sleep, comes here and commences the same tactics that we had last night. I want to place the responsibility where it belongs. If the tactics of the hon. member for North Bruce, the hon. member for West York, and hon. gentlemen opposite, have the effect of preventing this Bill passing, the blame will have to rest upon their shoulders.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I cannot sit silent and allow the hon. gentleman to make that charge, which is totally unfounded. I was in this House at three o'clock this afternoon, when the leader of the Opposition made a kind, a gentlemanly suggestion across the House that the Government, having detained the House for twenty-four hours in session——

Mr. DALY. The Government?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Yes, the Government—and preventing members getting their natural rest, the leader of the Opposition urged that we should proceed to make proper progress with the different sections of the Bill; and, speaking on behalf of those he leads, he said they were one and all prepared to go on and make proper progress with the Bill. The hon. gentleman must understand that these sections are not to be swallowed wholesale. They must be discussed, and any one who has followed the discussion during the last 24 hours must see the necessity of a lineal examination and discussion of this Bill.

Mr. DALY. There is no objection to discussing the Bill.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I) What took place when that suggestion was made? Why, Sir, if the leader of the House had accepted it, we would have been away on in the Bill before now, and a large number of sections would have been passed; but the leader of the Government got up and for forty-five minutes spoke on matters entirely foreign to this Bill. He deliberately obstructed the proceedings, for some object, I do not know what. He attacked most violently some gentlemen who have been in the past accustomed to act with him, and went back to quote the divisions of the House from time to time; and, after wasting forty-five minutes of time, he sat down without saying one word on the proposition my hon. friend made. And after this open and deliberate attempt to obstruct the business of the House and to prevent us getting on with the Bill, we have the hon. gentleman getting up and saying we are trying to prevent this Bill passing. I say there is no foundation for that charge. After the leader of the Opposition had begged the leader of the House to get on with the Bill, the leader of the Government gave the cue to his followers not to get on with it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is it true that for 45 minutes the hon. gentleman scolded and denounced members who had heretofore been associated with him, and said not one word on the Bill itself? What was it done for? What was that forty-five minutes occupied for just at the time of day when progress could have been made? The hon. leader of the Opposition spoke in that strain at that time of the day when it is customary to get to work, and when we were prepared to let bygones be bygones.

Mr. DALY. I make that proposition now: Let bygones be bygones.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) At three o'clock in the morning.

Mr. DALY. You are just as fresh as I am. You have had a good sleep.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) So far as I am concerned, personally, I would like to see section 6, as amended, carried, and then have the committee rise. This hour in the morning is no time to proceed with the Bill.

Mr. WELDON. We are pretty well agreed to accept section 6 as amended, and we are coming to a section which will provoke as determined a discussion as any section of the Bill before we reach section 74. There is a radical principle in that section which, if my information is correct, is not to be found in any existing systems in these provinces which have separate schools. There shall, therefore, be a very thorough discussion on that section, and I would urge on the Government to accept the proposal, and consent to adjourn after we have adopted this section 6.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, if I rise, the first among the French-speaking members, to participate in the discussion of a very peculiar kind now going on, it is because I feel it my duty to record my strongest protest against the words fallen from an hon. member of this House. That hon. gentleman said that the leader of the Government gave the cue to his followers, and that we blindly followed the Government. Quite the contrary ; we are here the representatives of our constituencies, pledged to support the Government when they pursue a straightforward course, and as the measure they have brought down, and which is now before this committee, is a fair and just one, we support it, not because we are bound to support the Government at any cost, but because the measure is fair and just in itself. The hon. member for Queen's (P.E.I.) (Mr. Davies), was not warranted in saying that we blindly follow the leader of the House. We will support the Ministers so long as they are entitled to our confidence, and so long as they propose as fair and just measures as the one which is now before the House.

Mr. McNEILL. So far as I am concerned, when I moved that the committee rise and report progress, I had reference simply to the fact that we were given to understand that if we passed this clause, we would still be kept in session. I would be satisfied to withdraw my motion on the understanding that we should rise and report progress after agreeing to clause 6. As the Government do not seem inclined to agree with that, I do not feel disposed to withdraw my motion. As far as the statement of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Daly) is concerned, regarding the course I have taken, I am not at all desirous of minimizing the course I am following at present. The country can judge as to whether it is reasonable or not to endeavour to force through legislation in this way in a dying Parliament. The Government desire to force it through a dying Parliament, because they know they could never carry it through a new Parliament. I do not hesitate to take the responsibility that my hon. friend endeavours to throw upon my shoulders. I desire in no degree to withdraw from the position I assumed. I say here and now that this attempt to force legislation of this kind through the House by keeping the House in session thirty-six hours is one which cannot be too strongly denounced. The hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Coatsworth) who, I understand, is a barrister, made use of an argument which astonished me. He argued that because a petition is handed to a counsel, that makes it any more valuable than it was before. The idea that because a petition is brought to a counsel, it proves any more than one which was not so treated, is a most extraordinary one, and I give the hon. gentleman who expounded it credit for being serious while he unfolded his theory.

Mr. HUGHES. Easily seen he is a constitutional lawyer.

Mr. McNEILL. Well, he is a poor constitutional lawyer or he would know that it is very bad for the constitution of hon. members to have to sit up so late. I was about to make some reference to the views of the minority in Manitoba, but I cannot do so because of the noise that is going on. However, I shall rest my voice until the disturbance ceases.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Mills, Annapolis). I do not think there is any disturbance that requires you to take any rest.

Mr. McNEILL. I think that I must be the judge as to whether I am able to talk over the noise that is made, or not, and if you are not able to keep order, I am not bound to raise my voice. I was speaking about the views of the minority in Manitoba, and I would like to know what evidence has been produced as to their views here. The only evidence is that of the petition, which has apparently received extraordinary value because it was handed to a counsel. I do not regard that as any evidence because a petition can be easily gotten upon almost any subject. Unless we have evidence to show that there is a desire on the part of the minority for this Bill, we should not proceed with it. And we have no such evidence. I personally have had some intercourse with members of the Roman Catholic church. In my younger days I was very much brought in contact with a great many of them, and was on terms of very great intimacy with them. And I must say, from what I have learned, I have very great doubt as to the foundation for those statements that the minority in Manitoba are very much opposed to public schools. I think, at all events, that the proposals made by the Manitoba government to set aside a part of the day for religious instruction ought to be sufficient to meet the case. I must ask you, Mr. Chairman, to keep order.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Mills, Annapolis). There is sufficient order for you to speak.

Mr. WALLACE. The obstruction is apparently encouraged by the Chairman.

Mr. McNEILL. It is not supposed that we are here to transact business at this hour. The very suggestion is absurd. I was about to say that in Ireland I have known a case somewhat in point in reference to separate schools, and which with the permission of the House I would relate.

Mr. MULOCK. Is it a proper story ?

Mr. McNEILL. Quite proper.

Mr. MULOCK. Go on then.

Mr. McNEILL. We have no proof that the minority in Manitoba really have conscientious objections to attending public schools, and the supposition that they have is the foundation for our legislation here. I was told the other day, very much to my surprise, by an hon. member for Nova Scotia, that he knew no Roman Catholic in his province who was not in favour of separate schools. There was a man living in the county Antrim whose name was McElheran.

Mr. MULOCK. Give us his family history.

Mr. McNEILL. I do not think that is quite necessary. He was a poor man. His son went to sea and became commander of one of the Black Ball liners. He was a Roman Catholic, and one of the persons connected with the company by the name of Tracey was intimately acquainted with him.

Mr. MULOCK. What was Tracey's first name.

Mr. McNEILL. I do not know, but he was a Roman Catholic. Mr. Tracey had two children.

Mr. HUGHES. Both boys.

Mr. McNEILL. Both girls. His wife died. These girls were left on his hands, and he had to have them educated, and he sent them from Liverpool to the County Antrim to the care of this old man McElheran.

Mr. HUGHES. Was Tracey the father of the children ?

Mr. McNEILL. Mr. Tracey was the presumed father of the children. Mr. McElheran sent the girls to a school there.

Mr. FAIRBAIRN. What has this got to do with the Remedial Bill ?

Mr. McNEILL. This is strictly on the Remedial Bill. The school was a good school and the father was greatly pleased with the progress the girls were making, and he told McElheran he was on no account to take them from that school without his leave. Some time after a Roman Catholic school was established in Larne where McElheran resided.

Mr. FAIRBAIRN. Where is that ?

Mr. McNEILL. It is in the County Antrim, Ireland. I hope my hon. friend has nothing to say against Ireland, or against the County Antrim.

Mr. FAIRBAIRN. Not at all. Erin go Bragh.

Mr. McNEILL. The Roman Catholic priest, Father McKenna, with whom I was well acquainted, and who was a very amiable man, came to McElheran and told him he must remove the children from this school and send them to the Roman Catholic school. McElheran said he would not do so without the leave of the father of the children. He was told by the Rev. Father that that would not do at all, and that he must have the children sent to the Roman Catholic school. The old man refused again unless he could obtain the leave of the surviving parent.

Mr. HUGHES. He was a stubborn old man.

An hon. MEMBER. He was from the north of Ireland—that is enough.

Mr. McNEILL. Yes, he was a stubborn old man. He wrote to Mr. Tracey in Liverpool, and asked him what he should do. Mr. Tracey, who was a Roman Catholic, wrote back to say that he was on no account to remove the children from where they were.

Mr. FAIRBAIRN. I thought he would have advised him to join an Orange lodge.

Mr. McNEILL. He might have done worse, but he did not. The priest came back to McElheran and asked him what his determination was, and McElheran showed him the letter he had received from the father of the children, and said he intended to obey his instructions, and not the instructions of the Roman Catholic priest. The result was that he was deprived of the rights of the church, but he adhered nevertheless to his determination and he retained the children at the school where they were making such good progress. There is a case in point where two Roman Catholics united in a determination not to send the children to the separate school. I want to know whether, under circumstances such as those, I would be justified in assisting to pass legislation that would force those people to send their children to that Roman Catholic school. I want to know whether this House of Commons is to assume that there is proof that the Roman Catholics of Manitoba wish these separate schools. I know that in the town of Walkerton—and my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) may know of it too—there was a most determined resistance to an attempt to establish a separate school: resistance by the majority of the Roman Catholics of that town. I know that men of the highest standing in society belonging to the church were amongst those who resisted that attempt. A separate school has nevertheless been established there. I want to know whether, under those circumstances, it could be fairly said that it would be trampling on the rights of the minority if that school was done away with, for I think it was established contrary to the wishes of an overwhelming majority of the minority there. We had it stated here by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) that a representative Roman Catholic from Manitoba had stated here that the wishes of the minority in that province were in favour of their being allowed to attend the public, and not the separate schools. The hon. member made the remarkable statement that this gentleman had been elected a school trustee by the minority, in opposition to the wishes of the hierarchy, by a majority of 90 per cent of the Roman Catholic voters of the municipality of Winnipeg.

An hon. MEMBER. I understood the minority did not elect the trustees now in Winnipeg.

Mr. McNEILL. I am not speaking about what they do now. In view of the statement of this gentleman, it is a very grave matter for this House to consider, how far we are justified in assuming that the Manitoba minority is in favour of this legislation.

Mr. DALY. Mr. O'Donohue was not elected by the minority. He was elected as a school trustee, and he was voted for by all.

Mr. McNEILL. Ninety per cent of the Catholics voted for him.

Mr. MULOCK. Was it an open vote?

Mr. DALY. By ballot, I think.

Mr. McNEILL. In view of these circumstances, I venture to think it would be well to pause in our consideration of this measure, and that the committee should rise.

Mr. MULOCK. The member for East Toronto (Mr. Coatsworth), I think, stated, that some 4,000 Catholics of Manitoba had petitioned for this legislation.

Mr. COATSWORTH. Are you asking me that question?

Mr. MULOCK. Yes, I wish to get some information on the point.

Mr. COATSWORTH. Look in the census. You have the same opportunity to get the information that I have.

Mr. DEVLIN. The hon. member (Mr. Coatsworth) is perfectly correct.

Mr. MULOCK. I am only asking for information.

Mr. DEVLIN. I suppose I have the right to answer.

Mr. MULOCK. I do not object. How have the Government come to the conclusion that the majority of the minority have asked for this legislation?

Mr. McGREGOR. There are 20,800 Catholics in Manitoba according to the census. The petitions were placed in the churches, and those who went out or came in were asked to sign the petition. All ages, all sizes, and all persons attending the church were asked to sign the petition. I was in the country at that time myself.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It is not fair for the Minister of the Interior to state that the motion that the committee rise was made yesterday at half past two o'clock.

Mr. DALY. I was mistaken. The Chairman says it was 3.40 o'clock.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The position taken by the Minister of the Interior and by the Secretary of State to-day, in fact taken every day since this Bill has been introduced, is not fair. Every member of this House who does not obey the will of the Secretary of State is accused of obstructing this measure. I want to point out that so far as I am personally concerned, it appears to me that the result of the position in which we are placed is due to the action of the Government themselves. I think any man in this House, whether on the Government side or on this side, whether opposed to the Bill or in favour of it, will admit that most of the discussion previous to the moving of this motion for the committee to rise, was germane to the sections of the Bill under consideration. If any evidence was needed that it was desirable to discuss those sections of the Bill, we had it in the fact that after the legal gentlemen on both sides had criticised them, the Government adopted the suggestions and amendments that were offered. So important did it appear to be to perfect the Bill that the Minister of Justice asked that a certain clause should stand, until he could draft a more perfect clause. There are gentlemen in the House who yesterday morning and this morning have had to remain, who are in favour of the Bill, and who are not obstructing. Others whose constituents are, by a great majority, opposed to this legislation, feel that they would not be held blameless if they were not present to watch it, and take part in the discussion; and they have assumed the responsibility of their action. I do not think any member of this House should be forced under the circumstances to stay here at an unreasonable hour to discuss the merits of the Bill. I wish it to be clearly understood that the accusation made by the Minister is unfair and unfounded in fact. No doubt, like the leader of the Government this afternoon, his object was to make political capital.

Mr. DALY. Not at all.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Government by their action are forcing members of this House into the position of apparently assisting those who are taking the responsibility of opposing this measure in every legitimate and constitutional way; but I think the country will understand that while they are accusing gentlemen of obstruction, those who are anxious to get on with the business are not responsible for it simply because the assertion is made.

Mr. WALLACE. I think some misapprehension exists with regard to the statements that have been made by the Government. Those who are determined to criticise this Bill and examine into its clauses, and who ask that proper hours be given for that purpose, are not making this request to save themselves, but out of deference to the wishes and weaknesses of the gentlemen who are supporting it. We are here ready to criticise the Bill; but we have not got to that pass where we are ready to submit to the dictates of brute force. This attempt to coerce the House by continuous sessions is a game that two can play, and we accept the Government's challenge. So far I do not suppose the result has been very encouraging to those gentlemen who told us that they were going to compel the House to accept this measure without proper consideration. That cannot be done. The House will consider and criticise it, and we would not be doing our duty if we did otherwise. We will not be deterred from that duty by any threats to keep the House in continuous session until Saturday night. We were told that there was no law to prevent our sitting on Sunday. Well, the gentlemen who have been making those threats will find us as ready and willing to do our duty as they are to take that course. A very reasonable proposal has been made, that the House, after considering the section now before it, should adjourn and be ready to meet again at three o'clock this afternoon. That proposition was not accepted. The leader of the Opposition, I am told, made an equally reasonable proposition this afternoon, and he received the compliment from the leader of the House of having it neither accepted nor rejected. Well, that course does not advance the legislation of the House to any extent, so far as I can see. I see many members coming in at one or two o'clock in the morning. I do not think that is a very good plan to secure the proper consideration of the Bill; and if the Bill does not receive proper consideration, the onus must fall on the Government of compelling members to come here at unseasonable hours to consider it. From three o'clock yesterday afternoon till three o'clock this morning, so far as I know, there has been proper criticism of the Bill. There was no motion for the committee to rise, and no attempt to discuss anything but the clause immediately under consideration. Therefore, having spent 12 hours in the consideration of the clauses of the measure, I think we have spent as much time as we should be asked to do for one day. Yet the Minister of the Interior accused us of obstructing at half-past two.

Mr. DALY. I corrected that. I said 3.40.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman will have to correct that again, because at 3.40 I was addressing the House on subsection "c" of section 4.

Mr. DALY. The Chairman is my authority.

Mr. WALLACE. Then, the Chairman will have to revise his statement too. I addressed the House till half-past four, and any motion must have been made after that hour. Suppose the House began discussing a measure at three o'clock on Monday afternoon and continued discussing till five o'clock on Tuesday morning, and some one then moved that the committee then rise. I think that was a very reasonable proposition. I think it was a sign of a long-suffering House and a model legislature. We have lost more than two months of the most valuable time of the session, because the early days are those in which business can be put forward. In July last, the pledge was given that on the 2nd January the session would be called together for the purpose of passing a Remedial Bill, should no settlement have been come to with Manitoba in the meantime. No such settlement was arrived at; and when the 2nd January came, the country expected that the Government would have had this Bill ready to present to Parliament and would have demanded that Parliament should immediately take it up and give it first consideration over all other business. But what occurred? Troubles occurred in the internal organization of the Government, the responsibility and accountability for which rested entirely with the Government themselves. Time was wasted and the business of the House was not even attempted to be proceeded with. After more than two months had elapsed, after Parliament had been marking time for two months, we were brought face to face with this question, the most important that was ever brought before Parliament. I agree that it is a subject of great importance and therefore demands very exhaustive discussion. Parliament went into committee on the Bill after passing the second reading. Hon. gentlemen opposite say to us: you must stay perfectly quiet, we will not permit you to give consideration to the Bill, and it will be pushed through, night and day. What does that mean? A man cannot remain here twenty-four hours each day in the six.

Therefore if the Bill is proceeded with every hour of the day, what will be the result ? It will be that members of Parliament, whose duty it is to criticise every clause of the Bill, will be unable to be present and watch this legislation and propose any amendments that may be necessary, and therefore will lay themselves over to a charge of neglect of their duty. Supposing some clauses of the Bill, which are considered very objectionable, went through in my absence, what would my constituents say ? The would say : You should not have let that clause go through ; and nothing I could say would convince them that I was not derelict in my duty. There is only one way to obviate that, and that is to adjourn at reasonable hours and give up these continuous sittings. It is hardly likely there will be any more clauses passed until three o'clock this afternoon. If the Government is anxious to have us here sitting with them, we will spend our time discussing, in a general way, all those problems which it is the privilege of a great and free Parliament to consider. We will spend our time considering these very great questions which have been excluded from Parliament the last three or four months. Why, we are neglecting the material interests to which the country expects us to give attention. There is the great question of whether a policy of free trade or protection is best adapted to the interests of the people. We will be going before the people in a few days or weeks at the most. Some say a few days, and the sooner the better I say. But we will go before the people very rusty on these material questions. We have lost sight of them in our discussion of the religious question. We have been preparing ourselves to wear gowns and go into pulpits and discuss theology. We have been studying theology and discussing religion since the 2nd January. But, looking around me, I do not see that it has improved the morals or the manners or the Christianity of members of this House. I have my eye on a gentleman who used to occupy a pulpit with great acceptance, in days gone by, but who has apparently lost all semblance of Christianity.

Mr. MULOCK. Name.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Coatsworth).

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). He has fallen from grace.

Mr. WALLACE. I hope not. We will pray that he may not fall from grace, but I must say that the outward and visible signs are such as to lead us to the conclusion that he has really fallen from grace.

An hon. MEMBER. The chairman is asleep.

Mr. WALLACE. Oh, I do not think so. I was making a few observations on theology. I have been trying to wean myself away from theological subjects and to come back to these great material interests. They are not of as great importance as the paramount questions of theology and the future of our benighted friends in Parliament or out of it, but there are important material interests which it is the duty of this Parliament to consider.

An hon. MEMBER. Go on.

Mr. WALLACE. I am told by my hon. friend to go on. I shall be delighted to do so, but is there encouragement to go on ? I see the hon. Minister of Railways, whom I thought I had converted to my views last night, but when I was almost sure of it, I found he was sound asleep. I found that the eloquence I had been trying to exert and the solid arguments I had used, instead of convincing him, had just sent him into the arms of Morpheus. So that I am not much encouraged to go on. Our hon. friend from South Simcoe has followed the example of the Minister of Railways and Canals. Even my hon. friend at my elbow has yielded to the peaceful influence of the hour. I was going to say that it is not only the question of remedial legislation that should be engaging our consideration. Instead of spending our time on this question, there are other interests we should be discussing. And I do not think I could spend a few more moments more profitably than in discussing them before this intelligent audience. I have had occasion to observe once more the gentlemen whom I see around me to-night, the most select of that great gathering of the intelligence of the Dominion, the Parliament of Canada. There is my friend the hon. Minister of Interior, who bows and smiles and blushes because he has to recognize the truth of that statement. I say we should be considering the great material interests of Canada. There is the great protective policy which has built up this Dominion during the last eighteen years and made this country prosperous from one end to the other notwithstanding the depression that has existed in every other country.

An hon. MEMBER. What about cold storage ?

Mr. WALLACE. Cold storage is closely allied to the question of protection.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). How would it do to put the Government in cold storage ?

Mr. WALLACE. I think that the Government perhaps might be allowed to cool off a little. They seem to be getting a little heated. It does not appear likely this Bill will become law.

Mr. McNEILL. The progress is not rapid.

Mr. WALLACE. No, and we have only a few weeks to consider it. We want more time than that. They say they are going to give us the opportunity of considering it night and day. We are delighted at that; and I suppose if there were more than 24 hours in the day we could have them with pleasure.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). What about the dead-meat question now?

Mr. WALLACE. That is simply a branch of the great protective policy of the great Conservative party. I hope that the members of the Government will discuss Bill 58 in a general way now. There are 112 clauses, and on every clause a whole sermon in theology could be preached.

Mr. MULOCK. Do you not think it would be well to adjourn now until three o'clock to-day?

Mr. WALLACE. Not at all. It would be a disarrangement of our plans, and it would be better to carry out our programme. The Minister of Trade and Commerce could deliver a sermon on each of the clauses of this Bill.

Mr. MULOCK. Which particular clause would you like him to deal with?

Mr. WALLACE. Any one.

Mr. MULOCK. But he is more competent to deal with some than others.

Mr. WALLACE. I would prefer leaving that to himself; but he can take section 4 if he likes.

Mr. WELDON. I wish to emphasize some reasons why the committee should now rise. Some little regard for health has compelled even the most industrious members of the House to divide into sections, and so we notice in the Chamber new faces at different hours of the sitting. That is more true with regard to members of the Administration, for there are only two of them present at this hour. I submit that the absence of the Minister of Justice, the leader of the House, the Minister of the Interior, and others peculiarly qualified to deal with the Bill, is a strong reason why the committee should rise. We are asked to waste our time here, and yet the Cabinet Ministers, by their absence, treat us with constructive contempt. They ought at least undergo the strain and fatigue they are putting us to, or elese the committee should rise. During the last 24 hours the House has given such close and careful attention to the Bill, as to cause this motion to be reasonable. Each clause of this Bill is an organic part of the whole, and yet the consideration of it is dealt with for eight hours by one group of men, and for another eight hours by another group of men. There consequently cannot be any unity of critisism on the Bill. I agree with the hon. member for York (Mr. Wallace) that with the organization which seems to be perfected on both sides, we can, with very good results to our health, continue at this until the leaves bud and the snow flies again, but really it is a most grotesque proceeding and we should not be asked to participate in it.

Mr. MULOCK. Every one will admit that a condition precedent to any legislation of this kind is, that it shall have been asked for by the minority, and the committee has a right to be told by the Government if this legislation has been asked for by the minority. The member for North Essex (Mr. McGregor) has told us that the request has come in the form of a petition signed by men, women and children. I would submit that the only persons whom the law would recognize as the petitioners, would be the taxpayers, who, if they so wish, will have their taxes diverted from the public schools under the provisions of this Act. If the majority of the duly qualified ratepayers of the Catholic minority of Manitoba have not asked this legislation, what put the Government in motion to issue their remedial order? If the Government are not sufficiently well represented now, to give this information, this clause should certainly be allowed to stand and the committee should rise. If this condition precedent to which I have referred has not been complied with, the Bill would be a dead letter, and we would occupy the ridiculous position of sitting here as a Parliament in order to pass a measure that is not worth more than the paper it is printed upon. The Privy Council decided no question of fact one way or the other. They simply decided a theory. They made clear what the Government were in doubt about before, whether this Parliament could pass the remedial legislation or not; and the Privy Council has simply advised the Government that we have that power. There is no legal obligation created by the decision of the Privy Council. We are simply to construe the statutes in the light in which the Privy Council have told us we should construe them. Now, if there has not been that proper legal request required by the law, all our labour is in vain. I think the question is sufficiently important to receive an answer from the Government. But they refuse to give us the information we are entitled to. It looks as if they had deliberately fixed upon the policy of preventing progress being made on this measure, first, by disturbing the debate by accusing the members of obstruction, as the leader of the Government did this afternoon, and as the Minister of the Interior has done to-night, and, secondly, by refusing to give us necessary information. I submit that the foundation of all this legislation is, first of all, a legal application, made in form and substance as required by the Act, and representing at least a majority of the duly qualified Roman Catholic ratepayers of the province of Manitoba. If only 4,500 men, women and children have applied, there are only about 25 per cent of the total number. Do you think we are entitled to be told by the Government that there has been any legal foundation for this legislation? As they refuse to give the fullest information to the country upon it, I am compelled to the conclusion that they are at least doubtful, and unless an explanation is offered of the course they are pursuing, we must conclude that their design is to prevent the passage of this measure, or a fair consideration of its various clauses. I now submit to any member of the Government whether it is not due to every class of people in the country that they should state whether or not we are going through an ante-election campaign, whether the Government are engaged in a mere buncombe process of vote-catching, or whether we are engaged in settling a very important public question.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I want to speak for a short time about this farce that is going on. There is not a man sitting opposite but who knows that the whole thing is as great a farce as has been enacted in any Parliament. Do these gentlemen think we are all such fools that we are going to give them the same opportunity of passing clauses when we are forced to be here hour after hour at this unseasonable time, as we would if they permitted us to go home and get reasonable sleep? I cannot understand what they mean. They know now by experience that after a certain hour of the morning human nature asserts itself, and does not propose to go any further under the whip or lash of any man, or any party or any Government; and they will find out as they grow older that there is too much Scotch in some of us to be overcome in any such way. I am very much amused at the attempts the members of the Government are making to impress the country with the idea that we are obstructing. This Government cannot do that with any consistency, in view of the history of their dealings with this Bill. This session, the sixth session of this Parliament, the first that has ever taken place since confederation, was called for the very purpose of considering this Bill. From the time this session was promised on the 8th of July to the 2nd of January, when it met, there were six or eight months during which the Government did not do anything to prepare themselves for the session. Why did they not during that time prepare this Bill, so that when the House met they would be in a position to submit it? The day after Parliament met there was a convulsion in the party. Seven of the Ministers were not prepared for remedial legislation, and they resigned, and were called traitors and bolters, and a number of other hard names by the Conservative press. They were out about fourteen days, during which time the leader of the Government bent every energy to form a new Cabinet, but no sooner did he secure one accession than the new-comer was button-holed by somebody else and decided to remain out. Finally the bolters came back and fell right into the hole from which they had been projected. The Opposition kept urging the Government to bring down the Remedial Bill; but although Bill after Bill was introduced, this great measure, which we had been called together specially to consider, was mysteriously delayed, and when it did come down, it ranked the fifty-eighth on the list. Fifty-seven other Bills had been introduced before it. Why did not the Government introduce the measure earlier? Was it because Sir Charles Tupper, Bart., had summoned himself from across the sea to take control of the Government, and the Bill could not be introduced until he had obtained a constituency and was elected? Whether that was the reason or not, it was he that took charge of the Bill, and he gave us convincing proof that he knew nothing at all about it, when he proposed the second reading, for he spoke on almost every other subject except those treated by the Bill. This Bill has had a most chequered career. We have every reason to believe that it was submitted to people outside the House for approval before it was submitted to this Parliament. Anybody who has read Father Lacombe's letter to the hon. leader of the Opposition must draw the inference that he had seen the Bill before it was presented to Parliament, because his letter was dated the 20th January, in which he urged the leader of the Opposition to support the Bill, and the Bill was not introduced until the 11th February. The debate has taken such a wide range, the Government have done so much to cloud the real issue, that I think it would be interesting if I were to give a short sketch of the history of the Bill and the causes which led up to it. I think I can show that the province of Manitoba has occupied a very consistent position all along the line. For about 200 years that province was governed by the Hudson's Bay Company, but in 1868 or 1869 the rights of the Hudson's Bay Company were purchased by the Dominion, and the money paid over, and the next step taken by Canada was to annex the country. We appointed a Lieutenant-Governor, the Hon. William MacDougall, who went as far as Pembina, sixty miles south of Winnipeg; but when he got there he was met by a deputation of half-breeds, who gave him to understand that he was not wanted, and that if he valued his life he had better not proceed any further, but stay where he was—which he did. The people held a convention, called the convention of twenty-four. This council drafted a bill of rights and sent it to the Hon. William MacDougall, and sought to extract the promise from him that the Dominion Government would accept that bill of rights. Some trouble after this arose, and there was a rebellion. Riel put himself at the head of the rebellion, and the Government took steps to pacify the rebels. They sent up three delegates to negotiate, Sir Donald Smith, Colonel DeSalaberry, and the Revd. Mr. Thibault. On the arrival of these delegates, they called a meeting of the inhabitants, about a thousand of whom attended. And out in the cold, with the thermometer 20 degrees below zero, these people stood for five hours discussing the question of their admission into the Dominion. During the whole of that discussion there was not on either side a word said regarding separate schools. Acting on Sir Donald Smith's advice, forty delegates were chosen, twenty of whom were taken from the French half-breeds, and twenty from the Scotch and English half-breeds, and these forty delegates met together and formulated a basis upon which they agreed to come into the Canadian confederation. That meeting is known in history by the name of the Council of Forty. They discussed the question five days, and then on the advice of Sir Donald Smith, they appointed a committee of six to draw up a bill of rights. That committee, after two days of deliberation, formulated the bill of rights number two. Bill of rights number one they had sent to the Hon. Mr. MacDougall. In this bill of rights number two, there was not one word about separate schools. (The hon. gentleman read the various clauses of the bill.) The ninth provision is the only one at all in which reference is made to schools, and that provision says :

> That while the North-west remains a territory the sum of $25,000 a year be appropriated for schools, roads and bridges.

If it had been the wish of the province to make a demand for separate schools, it would have been made here, but it was not made and that shows that the people did not demand separate schools at the time. The thirteenth demand deals with the English and French languages, so that there must have been a discussion on the dual language, and if the dual school system had been under discussion, they would have made a demand for separate schools. Bill of rights No. 2 was submitted to Sir Donald Smith who promised that it would be accepted by the Dominion Government. He advised the settlers to appoint three delegates to repair to the city of Ottawa to present the demands of the settlers to the Government. One of the delegates was Mr. Black, another Mr. Scott, and the other Mr. Ritchot. That was on April 5th, but they were delayed in leaving Fort Garry, and in the meantime Riel formed a provisional government which formulated bill of rights No. 3. The delegates carried with them to Ottawa the bill of rights from the council of forty, and the bill of rights from the provisional government. After arriving here the delegates consulted Sir John Macdonald and Sir George E. Cartier. I have here the evidence of Sir John Macdonald in reference to the matter, and it goes to show that it was Bills of rights Nos. 2 and 3—probably a combination of both of them—but neither of them made any reference to separate schools. Therefore it is not pertinent to the point now, which of the two was accepted as the basis of union. Sir John Macdonald said the Federal Government could not recognize the provisional government, and that any document from the latter could not be presented in their name. Sir John Macdonald, as recorded in the Journals of the House of Commons, for 1874, make that statement. There was therefore no demand made for separate schools, because the bills of rights were the very papers that were sent home to the English Government and upon which was based the Act of Union of 1870. Sir John Young who was then Governor General of the Dominion, sent them in a despatch dated 29th April, 1870, to Lord Grenville. That will be found on page 129 and 130 of the "correspondence relative to recent disturbances in the North-west," and which was presented to both Houses of the Imperial Parliament. Now, I want to identify these with the bill of rights No. 3 which was sent down by the people from Fort Garry. The original copy of the same papers that were sent to the English Parliament were found among the papers of the late Thomas Munn, who was Secretary of State to Riel's provisional government, and they corresponded exactly with the papers sent to the English Government upon which the Act of Union was based, and in neither of which was found a single word asking for separate schools. I think that proves beyond a doubt that it was either Bill No. 2 or Bill No. 3 that formed the basis of union. The clauses in the Act of Union on which this whole dispute has rested was smuggled in by some interested party at Ottawa, for the request never came from the people of Manitoba at all. Manitoba never saw the Act of Union, and never was consulted in regard to it. It was passed here and sent up there at the point of the bayonet.

Mr. DALY. Will the hon. gentleman explain what he means by being sent up there on the point of the bayonet ?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I will explain that. The Bill went up nearly at the same time that Colonel Wolseley went up at the head of the 60th Regiment, in the summer of 1870. The fourth Bill of Rights was published by Bishop Langevin in 1889, and when the late Mr. Taylor of Winnipeg pointed out that it appeared to be a bogus affair, Bishop Langevin did not deny it. He simply said it had its existence all those years, but the executive did not publish their determination, especially during times of trouble. Now, I think I have given the history of the union of the province of Manitoba with the Dominion. When the first step was taken by the minority in Manitoba, they claimed that rights and privileges were taken away from them by the Act of 1890. Dr. Barrett, a Catholic ratepayer, refused to obey the by-law passed for the collection of public money, and his case went to the Privy Council of England. The Privy Council decided that the minority had no rights and privileges at the time of the union, because there were no schools established by law at that time. They also decided that the Act passed by the Greenway government in 1890 was within the competence and jurisdiction of the province. The minority contended that if there were no rights and privileges at the union, they had rights and privileges which had grown up under the legislation of 1871, and which they had enjoyed for nineteen years, till they were taken away from them by the legislation of 1890. The case was first brought before the Supreme Court, which decided that they had no rights or privileges that would entitle them to an appeal to the Governor in Council. The Lords of the Privy Council, after hearing the case, decided that they had the right of appeal. That is all they decided. They did not decide or hint what this Parliament or the Governor in Council should do. They left the Governor in Council free either to interfere or not to interfere. It has been said that those rights and privileges were bestowed on the minority by the constitution, and an hon. gentleman said yesterday that the word "may" in the Manitoba Act read "shall." In my understanding of the English language, the word "may" indicates discretion, whereas the word "shall" is imperative. Therefore, the word "may" indicates that the Government here have discretionary power. That is the position we take.

Mr. COATSWORTH. What position does the hon. member for Bothwell take ?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I know the position the hon. gentleman takes. It is said—I do not say it is true—that he is expecting some position——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. COATSWORTH. I think the hon. member ought to withdraw that. It is absolutely untrue.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). What is untrue ?

Mr. COATSWORTH. The statement you made that I expect some position for my vote here.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I did not say so.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron).

Mr. HUGHES. He is too contemptible a coward to repeat it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Mara). The hon. member for Huron says he did not make the statement.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes) used unparliamentary language in saying the hon. member for North Huron was a coward.

Mr. HUGHES. When he takes it back, I withdraw.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Mara). I did not hear the remark of the hon. member for North Victoria. He did not rise in his seat when he made it.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). What I said was that it was stated that the hon. member for East Toronto was expecting a position for the position he has taken on this question.

Mr. COATSWORTH. I submit that the hon. member has no right to repeat statements of that kind. As I said before, the statement is absolutely untrue.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I did not say it was true, but I said it was so reported.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Mara). The hon. gentleman ought to withdraw the insinuation.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I did not insinuate. I said that it was published in the press.

Mr. DALY. The Chairman has ruled, and I call on the hon. member for Huron to obey the chair.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Mara). The hon. gentleman should withdraw the insinuation.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I did not make any insinuation. How can I withdraw an insinuation that I did not make.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Mara). I certainly understood the hon. member to insinuate that the hon. member for Toronto expected a position for a certain vote he gave in the House.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). If I made the statement that the hon. gentleman expected a position I withdraw it, but I did not say it.

Mr. HUGHES. He is a political blackguard.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman has a perfect right to explain what he said.

Mr. MULOCK. You said, Mr. Chairman, that you did not hear the hon. member for North Victoria, when, on a former occasion, he used most unparliamentary language. He has again said, from his seat in the House, that the hon. member for Huron is a blackguard. I submit that the hon. member for Victoria must demean himself as a gentleman, whether in his seat or addressing the House. There is no excuse for his departing from proper conduct so long as he is in this chamber, and I call upon you, Mr. Chairman, to protect members from insult and ungentlemanly and improper language; and if you do not give that protection, then we must take a vote upon your ruling.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Mara). If the hon. member used the epithet which he is charged with having used, it was unparliamentary and he should withdraw it.

Mr. HUGHES. What I said was political blackguard and I was not addressing the House.

Mr. MULOCK. He used the word "blackguard," for I heard it here. If the hon. gentleman says he did not say so, then I can only say that I heard him say it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Accepting the hon. gentleman's statement, his language was unparliamentary and he should withdraw it. Unless we are to degenerate to the level of a bar-room, it is time we should assert the dignity of the committee and make gentlemen who use offensive epithets withdraw them.

Mr. HUGHES. I shall withdraw the expression I made as soon as the cause of making it has been withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Mara). If the hon. gentleman used the words "political blackguard" his language is unparliamentary.

Mr. MULOCK. He did not.

Mr. HUGHES. I beg your pardon, I did.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Mara). If he did, his language is unparliamentary and he should withdraw it.

Mr. INGRAM. I was sitting alongside the hon. member for Victoria and I certainly heard him use the words "political blackguard."

Mr. HUGHES. I used the term political blackguard with reference to the language of the hon. member from Huron. If the language was unparliamentary, I will withdraw it.

Mr. INGRAM. You have already ruled that the hon. member for Huron is out of order and he should withdraw his language.

Mr. MULOCK. I myself regretted when I heard my hon. friend allude to the hon. member for East Toronto in the way he did. I would recommend him to also withdraw what he said. What he said was,—and that is where he justifies himself, though even the justification is not perhaps sufficient—that it was said and he did not himself assume the responsibility of making the statement. Nevertheless I think that even that is too far to go. And I think it will be better for the work we have to do that the hon. gentleman should retract. It is a very honourable man, who, when he makes a mistake, acknowledges it. I do not think the less of the hon. member for North Victoria because he has seen fit to make proper restitution. Some people think it is undignified to withdraw, but I myself often make mistakes, and think all the more of a man who acknowledges when he is wrong.

Mr. SPROULE. With reference to the point of order, I would like to make one observation.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Mara). There is no point of order before the Chair.

Mr. SPROULE. After the hon. member for North York had spoken to the point of order, I got up immediately, when the hon. gentleman sat down, to make some observations with regard to the point of order. I do not want this disturbance to continue, and if hon. gentlemen persist in continuing I will name them before the House and let it go to the country that they are here with machines for the purpose of disturbing the work of the House. I regard it as quite in order for any member of this House to make use of the language that the hon. member for Huron did when he said that it was said——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPROULE. I am speaking to the point of order.

Mr. DALY. I think the hon. gentleman misapprehends the position. There is no point of order before the Chair. What the hon. member for York said was that under the circumstances the hon. member for Huron was unfortunate in making the statement he did, and that it would be well he should withdraw it.

Mr. SPROULE. I certainly understood the hon. member for North Victoria to rise to a point of order. He challenged the statements made by the hon. member for Huron as being out of order.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Mara). There is no point of order before the Chair. The hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Hughes) withdrew the statement that he made.

Mr. HUGHES. I did not rise to a point of order at all.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Mara). The hon. member for Huron (Mr. Macdonald) said he did not make the statement ascribed to him, and he has the floor.

Mr. SPROULE. Then I appeal to you, Sir. How could an objection have been raised to the statement of the hon. member for Huron if it was not on a point of order ?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Mara). There is no point of order before the Chair.

Mr. SPROULE. Then I want to raise a point of order. Is an hon. member entitled in this House and is he within parliamentary rights when he refers to something which has been rumoured in the press? I say he is perfectly within his rights.

Mr. DUPONT. That is no point of order.

Mr. SPROULE. As I understand parliamentary rights and usages, an hon. member has the right to quote current rumour.

Mr. MULOCK. I am afraid that I am responsible for the tangle. I did not mean to suggest that my hon. friend from East Huron was out of order in giving his recollection of a statement in a newspaper, but as a matter of propriety, I think it would be better for him to withdraw the statement. I do not say there was any point of order in it, but if one gentleman departed from what is advisable as a matter of good taste, we should endeavour to get back to a proper spirit, for, after all, we are a club of gentlemen, and that we must always remember.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). If I said anything unparliamentary, I withdraw it. I was proceeding to say that instead of putting themselves in communication with the Greenway government, this Government issued a harsh remedial order, demanding the restoration of the schools which had prevailed in that province previous to 1890. It is said sometimes that the remedial order did not mean the restoration of the schools as they were previous to 1890, but the speech made in the Senate by the leader of the Government on the 11th of last July completely sets aside that pretention. According to his speech, the schools were to be restored as they existed previous to 1890, but still we are told that the remedial order was couched in language very smooth and complimentary. When this matter was discussed in the public press a certain individual in Winnipeg appears to have found a mare's nest, and wrote a letter stating that previous to that Order in Council, an Order in Council of the very mildest language possible was sent to Mr. Greenway, asking him to restore the rights which the government had taken from the minority. In order to show in what position Manitoba was when that Order in Council was passed, let me read the statement made by Mr. Fisher. I think it well to read the petition or memorial from the archbishops and bishops of the Roman Catholic Church of Canada, and which is dated May 8th, 1894. The statements made in that memorial, if true, would require to be adjusted and corrected. If these schools established by the Greenway government were Protestant schools, and if the Catholics were forced to send their children to Protestant schools, then I think this Government should interfere. That was the reason that many of us wished that a commission be appointed to ascertain whether these statements were real facts. I hold still, that if there had been a commission appointed for the purpose of placing these statements beyond dispute, then it would settle these differences that appear to exist. The charge is that the school property has been confiscated, and although this conference took place the other day, we find that it took no notice of this charge against the Greenway government. In answer to that petition of the Bishops and the Archbishop, this Government sent the following Order in Council. (The hon. gentleman reads from the Order in Council.) In this Order in Council the Government assumes the truth of all these statements in regard to the confiscation of property, and the schools being Protestant. Surely it was the duty of the Government, before sending this command to the Manitoba legislature, to ascertain whether these statements were true; and I ask the Minister of the Interior how he can explain that away. Here was a statement in which the Government acknowledged its ignorance of the facts, and at the same time asked the Manitoba government to redress the grievances which had been set forth. (The hon gentleman continues to read from the Order in Council.) Here is another statement that the school property belonging to Catholics had been confiscated by the Greenway government. Was it not necessary for this Government to make investigation into such allegations made by the minority, when the Government had no positive information as to their truth? (The hon. gentleman reads from the memorial of the Committee of the Privy Council.) Now, how could this Government ask the Manitoba government to redress grievances which they did not know existed? When we asked this Government to appoint a commission to ascertain whether these allegations were true, they refused to do so. Now, why did not the Greenway government redress those alleged grievances? Because they had investigated all these questions before; the legislature had discussed these questions as to the school being Protestant, and as to the lands of the minority having being taken away. As to some of those questions, they had already been before the courts and had been decided in favour of the province, and others were then pending. Now, was anything more reasonable than Mr. Greenway's answer to the remedial order? He said: We believed that when the remedial order was framed, the Dominion Government had not sufficient information upon the question to enable them to frame it in a proper way. Mr. Greenway again suggested the appointment of a commission. (The hon. gentleman reads a portion of the answer sent by the Manitoba government to the second remedial order.) Here Mr. Greenway again invited this Government to make an investigation into the disputed points between the provincial government and the minority.

Mr. McDONALD (Victoria, N.S.) Are you a Protestant?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I think I am.

Mr. McDONALD (Victoria, N.S.) What do you mean by that ?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I mean that I am a Christian man. Is not that satisfactory ?

Mr. McDONALD (Victoria, N.S.) No.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). The Greenway government goes on to say : (The hon. gentleman reads.) Here Mr. Greenway says distinctly that if there were any discrepancies in the law, if there were any injustice pointed out, he was perfectly willing to amend it. Now if a commission had been appointed, and it had been shown that any injustice had been done to the minority in taking over their lands, or in any other way, Mr. Greenway was bound by his answer to this Government to correct that injustice. But that plan was not followed by this Government, and the consequence is that we have all this turmoil and trouble, sitting up late, to the destruction of our health, and the aggravation of our own tempers. A couple of weeks ago a conference was appointed. Had that conference been appointed six or eight months ago, it would have accomplished far more than it has done. The Greenway government has now made two offers to the Dominion Government, the first is to secularize the schools, excluding, not religion, but religious teaching as such.

Mr. McDONALD (Victoria, N.S.) Do you want the schools to be perfectly secularized, and have no religion at all ?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Mara). Order.

Mr. McDONALD (Victoria, N.S.) I am quite in order. I ask the hon. gentleman, does he want all the schools in the country to have nothing taught in them but secular education, or does he want religion taught in them ?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). It is not a question of my private opinion in regard to the matter.

Mr. McDONALD (Victoria, N.S.) You are speaking as a member of Parliament, and I want to know your opinion as a member of Parliament.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I am speaking now of the position of the Manitoba government, and if Manitoba thinks it is more to her interest to establish secular schools, I have no right to interfere with her.

Mr. McDONALD (Victoria, N.S.) I am tired of listening for the last ten days to this nonsense in the House. I want to know, do you want religion in the schools, or do you not want it ?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Mara). Order, order.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). As I said, Mr. Greenway has propounded two solutions of the question. One is to secularize the schools, and another is to allow the last half hour of each day to be given up to the religious teaching of the pupils. In Roman Catholic schools the teacher would have the right to teach the Roman Catholic religion during that half hour, and in Protestant schools the time would be divided between the various denominations in proportion to their numbers. In cases where 60 per cent of the children are Roman Catholics and 40 per cent are Protestants, three half hours in the week would be given up to the religious teaching of the Roman Catholic children, and the other two half hours to the religious teaching of the Protestant children. In Nova Scotia there is an arrangement between the Catholics and the Protestants by which religious instruction is given in the schools. But Mr. Greenway proposed to the commissioners an arrangement by which he would place on the statute-book a law under which such instruction could be given. The impression that the public schools of Manitoba were Protestant schools has been removed. The leader of the House introduced the Nova Scotia school law in 1864, a law which is substantially that now on the statute-books of Manitoba ; yet that hon. gentleman is now keeping this House sitting day and night for the purpose of passing a law to place shackles on that province with regard to educational matters. I have here the opinion of the Premier of Nova Scotia in regard to Sir Charles Tupper's action on the Nova Scotia school question, which I will read to the House.

Mr. DEVLIN. What reference has that to the matter before the Committee ?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Mara). I do not know what the hon. gentleman proposes to read.

Mr. DEVLIN. The hon. gentleman has announced that he will read an opinion expressed by the Premier of Nova Scotia in regard to Sir Charles Tupper.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Mara). We had better hear a few lines read.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Mr. Fielding says :

> It is deplorable that Sir Charles Tupper should figure as he has done in this matter.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Mara). Order. I think the point raised by the hon. member for Ottawa County (Mr. Devlin) is well taken.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I insist that the quotation I desire to read is pertinent to the question.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The leader of the House introduced into the discussion this question in regard to the School Act of Nova Scotia. His claim in regard to passing it through the provincial legislature was challenged by the hon. member for King's (Mr. Borden), and although there were three appeals to the Speaker, that hon. gentleman was ruled to be in order. The leader of the House replied a second time to the hon. member for King's, and that reply brought up comments made by outsiders, notably the Premier of Nova Scotia, as to Sir Charles Tupper's conduct. This question of the Nova Scotia school law has an important bearing on this discussion, and if you, Mr. Chairman, rule that it is out of order, I must appeal to the Speaker.

Mr. DALY. The hon. gentleman from Huron had better, perhaps, read further.

(Mr. Macdonald read the quotation referred to.)

Mr. DEVLIN. When the hon. gentleman rose to speak, the statement he made was that he was going to give Mr. Fielding's opinion of Sir Charles Tupper. It was against that that I protested.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I wish now to refer to the manly stand taken by Sir John Macdonald in reference to the New Brunswick School Act. He would not interfere with the Act passed by the legislature of New Brunswick in 1871, because he held that as the legislature had the power to pass it, it was contrary to the principles of our federal system for the central authority to interfere. Sir John Macdonald was personally in favour of a legislative union, but he was prevailed upon by the majority of those who worked with him to accept a federal union. He pointed out that if the complaints of all minorities were to be listened to here, and their grievances redressed from here, the federal union would be in fact done away with. He admitted that the minority in New Brunswick had a grievance, and that the Federal Government had power to disallow their Act, but still he refused to exercise the power of disallowance. It is true that the minority were not given the right of appeal that is given to the minority in Manitoba, but still the federal power might have been exercised quite as efficiently by disallowance, but Sir John refused to exercise it. If he had been leader of the Conservative party to-day that party would never have got into its present position. But their pea-nut politicians have led them deep into the mire, from which they are not able to extricate themselves. The policy of their leaders has driven from them some of their very best men.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). They used to be called their best men. I can remember when, only three years ago, the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) was referred to as the coming man of the Consevative party. But because he cannot see eye to eye with the pea-nut politicians below him, they seek to deny even that he has the ability which formerly they were so glad to recognize. I desire to show the position taken by Sir John Macdonald with regard to the New Brunswick school question. (The hon. gentleman read the extracts referred to.) It will thus be seen how careful the hon. gentleman was to avoid interference with provincial rights. I have given a synopsis of some phases of this school question. Now with regard to obstruction, I believe it is the duty of every man to obstruct the Government after a reasonable hour. I do not go behind their backs to say that if they do not adjourn at a reasonable time, say three o'clock, and give people sent here to do the business of the country time for rest and recuperation, they ought to obstruct from that hour until the hour when the House should ordinarily sit again. And I will venture to advise the Government, if they wish to make progress, they should only ask the House to sit in reasonable hours, say from three in the afternoon until three in the morning. Members who are kept here at unseasonable hours are not in a proper frame of mind to criticise and to perfect a measure such as this School Bill, and every time they have tried to trample upon independent men they have come out at the small end of the horn, and at the next election the hole they will come out at will be so small that no one will be able to see it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) When the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) moved at 3.20 this morning that the Committee rise and report progress——

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. At 3.10, I think.

Mr. DALY. The Serjeant-at-Arms says at 3.05, and I have it at 3.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) We will not quarrel about the odd minutes. But when the hon. member for North Bruce moved the resolution, he suggested an important point as to whether there was evidence that the minority in Manitoba had applied for such a Bill as has been presented to the House. The hon. member for one of the districts of Toronto said that a petition, signed by 4,500 had been received by the Government, asking for this Bill. If this statement was true, it would be prima facie evidence that the majority of the minority were seeking for remedial legislation. Here a legal question arises of no small importance. Supposing the minority did not apply for remedial legislation, then it is plain that no appeal could be legally heard. The question arises whether we can go behind the remedial order as a Parliament, and enquire whether a proper petition was presented on which the remedial order was based. The hon. member for Toronto stated the other day that the Privy Council had ample evidence to justify them in concluding that the minority did desire remedial legislation of this character. But I desire to ask this committee to look at the facts in connection with this matter. So far as I have been able to ascertain, I think the statement of the member for Toronto is altogether wrong. There was a petition presented to the Privy Council in 1890, signed by His Grace, the Archbishop of St. Boniface, by several parish priests, by one member of Parliament, and one member of the provincial Parliament, and by 4,257 others. But that petition was not praying for remedial legislation at all, it was praying for the disallowance of the Act which had been passed in 1890 by the provincial legislature, on the grounds that certain rights which the minority claimed they had at the time of the Union, had been interfered with. That petition prayed that it might be declared that such provincial law did prejudicially affect rights and privileges with regard to denominational schools which the Roman Catholics had by law or practice in the province at the time of the union. At that time it was honestly believed by these petitioners that they had certain rights or privileges secured to them at the union which the provincial law interfered with. But this petition which was presented to the Privy Council praying for relief against the Acts of 1890, was based upon the supposition that they had certain rights at the time of the union. After that petition was presented, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council determined there were no rights or privileges possessed by the minority at the time of the union, which were interfered with by the law, and the basis of that petition, therefore, fell to the ground, and it does not afford any basis whatever for the passage of the remedial order. That petition did not ask for remedial legislation. The remedial order has sole reference to the rights which had accrued to the minority subsequent to the union, and this petition had reference to rights which they claimed to have anterior to the union. Now, we have before us petitions presented subsequently as the basis of the action of the Privy Council in passing the remedial order, and it is important to know from what parties those petitions emanated. A petition was presented on the 20th September, 1892, signed by Senator T. A. Bernier, acting President of the Executive Committee of the National Congress, who had been, I understand, Superintendent of the Catholic school board. It is also signed by 14 other persons. Two days later there was a petition presented from His Grace the Archbishop, together with Mr. Bernier, Mr. Prendergast, and about 137 others. So that practically all those who have petitioned the Government amount to somewhat less than 150 persons, out of the whole population of Manitoba, asking for a restoration of the rights and privileges which were acquired by the minority subsequent to the union. Now, that number, it is admitted, is not 5 per cent of the whole minority; and the question arises whether that number of persons had a right to represent the minority, or whether the minority ever petitioned at all. It may be argued that His Grace the Archbishop had the right, as one of the minority, to petition on his own behalf and on the behalf of others; but there you are met with a very serious question. Now, it has always been my opinion that under the circumstances the duty of the Canadian Privy Council was to have instituted an inquiry and ascertained if the signatures to those petitions represented bona fide, and with authority, the views and wishes of the minority of Manitoba. My own judgment would be that it was not absolutely essential that a clear majority of that minority should sign a petition, but it is essential that those who did petition should prove themselves to be the representatives of that minority. Now, I have examined with some care the proceedings before the Privy Council when that remedial order was applied for, but I do not find that any inquiry was made, or any evidence offered to satisfy the committee that the signatories to these petitions in any way represented anybody but themselves. I do not find that they claim to represent anybody else. I do not find that any public meetings were called, either of the population or of the trustees; I do not find that these persons claimed that the rights which the minority acquired after the union had been infringed upon. I think I have made the matter clear, that so far as these 4,000 odd signatories to the petition were concerned, they referred to a matter upon which we could not pass remedial legislation; they referred to rights said to have been acquired before the union with Canada; and with respect to which, of course, we have no power to pass remedial legislation. Therefore, it appears to me, that there is nothing to show that the minority ever complained in any legal or official way, or in any way on which a remedial order could be based, that the rights which they acquired after the union, had been interfered with by provincial legislation. If that point is well taken, of course we could not proceed any further. I listened with some curiosity to hear what answer would be made by the Government to that objection. It may be that the extreme reluctance which was apparent on the Treasury benches to grapple with that question at all——

Mr. DALY. I am ready now to reply to the hon. gentleman on that point. The first petition the hon. gentleman referred to was that signed by Archbishop Taché, a gentleman who signed the petition and 4,257 others, and is dated in August, 1890. There was another petition dated 20th September, 1892, signed by the Executive of the National Congress. The next petition is dated 22nd September, 1892, and is signed by Archbishop Taché himself; and the hon. gentleman referred to another petition dated in November, 1892. Now, that petition is signed by the Archbishop of St. Boniface, by T. A. Bernier, President of the National Congress, by Mr. Ewart, counsel for the Roman Catholic minority in Manitoba, and about 137 others, and it was on that last petition that the sub-committee of the Privy Council heard the appeal and decided to pass the remedial order. Now, Mr. Bernier signs as president of the National Congress. The National Congress was composed of representatives from every Roman Catholic parish in the province of Manitoba. It was organized for the very purpose of making the application that was made in this case, and they assembled at St. Boniface. The Executive was composed of gentlemen representing all the parishes; these gentlemen being the leading men in the parishes, and the petition is signed by Mr. Bernier as President of the National Congress, with the authority of the Congress and as representing the minority. That is evidence that every Roman Catholic parish in Manitoba was represented on that petition, and I am sure the hon. gentleman will acknowledge that it clearly indicates that this matter was properly before the Privy Council of Canada, on the appeal that was made by them under section 22 of the Manitoba Act?

Mr. McNEILL. Were those representative men elected, or were they nominated, and by whom?

Mr. DALY. I do not know anything about that.

Mr. McNEILL. If they were merely nominated, and not elected by the Roman Catholic people, they would have no weight.

Mr. DALY. The information, which I have taken from headquarters, is, that these people were summoned for the very purpose of forming this Congress, and each parish was represented by one or more delegates elected by the people, so that the Congress was fully representative of all the Roman Catholic parishes of Manitoba.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I want to point out one or two pertinent facts in connection with that. On the face of the petition, nothing is said about this. They do not urge that any meetings were held; the body petitioning does not tell us what the National Congress was or how it was constituted, whether they were elected by the people, or where the meetings were held. I would suggest whether it is not true that this congress was formed and the elections were held for the purpose of presenting the petition which was presented in 1890. I think the hon. gentleman will find that I am right, that the minority of Manitoba believing they possessed certain privileges before the union formed a national congress to secure legislative provisions. Mr. Bernier, who signed himself as acting president, signed a petition, which he would not have been able to do unless the congress had authorized him to sign.

Mr. DALY. On the 20th September, 1892, Mr. Bernier signed that petition. The council had not been fully informed at that time. They subsequently held meetings and Mr. Bernier was elected president, and they subsequently completed the organization.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The record does not show that. The hon. Minister may be able to establish that these persons had power to take action on behalf of themselves and on behalf of the minority; on the contrary, it may appear that they had no such powers. All I contend is that so far as the record before the House is concerned, it is perfectly apparent they had no authority.

Mr. McNEILL. I do not desire to refer to this matter from the legal standpoint, but in regard to the duty of Parliament. Suppose there was a national congress elected, in order to know whether it was really a representative body we should know something in regard to the meetings at which those delegates were appointed. It is an easy matter to call meetings, but if they are not properly called they are hole-and-corner meetings. It is very easy to have delegates appointed, yet they may not represent the feelings of the people. We have no evidence to show that the minority really had any grievance of which they complained. We have heard that a large petition was signed by thousands of people. It appears to have been signed at church by men, women, boys and girls. There is no evidence to show that the heart of the minority is with this movement to establish separate schools; on the contrary, it goes to show the reverse. The very foundation of our action rests upon assuming something of which we have no proof.

Mr. OUIMET. Suppose there was proof of it, the fact would not change the hon. gentleman's determination to refuse separate schools, as already announced by him.

Mr. DALY. I think as a legal proposition it could not make any difference whether the petition was signed by one or half a dozen. There was a national congress, composed of representatives of every Roman Catholic parish of Manitoba, and it did not only what the law required, but went far beyond it.

Mr. MULOCK. I do not think it is a question as to what the people wanted, it is a dry question of law. The question is whether this matter is properly before Parliament to-day. At the earlier period of the sitting some hon. members used information which we did not possess, as to who had and who had not petitioned for this legislation, and that at once raised the point in the minds of hon. members present as to whether there had been an appeal. The Government understand that the jurisdiction of this House depends upon the validity of the remedial order, that depends on the validity of the appeal, and the appeal depends upon questions of facts as to who made the appeal, and as to what amounts to an appeal within the meaning of the Act. If there is not an appeal within the meaning of the Act to the Governor in Council, there can be no remedial order. I am troubled with the question as to what class must appeal, and how many of that class in order that the Government may be seized of the matter and the appellate power of the Government be set in motion. Information has been imported into the discussion which discredits the whole action of the Government in proceeding with this legislation. It is important therefore that we should discover where we are, because, as legislators, we must determine whether any good is going to come out of this legislation. The Minister of the Interior has stated that he will at a subsequent period explain how the Governor in Council was set in motion. There was a national congress, which appears to have been a voluntary association and presumed to represent the minority of Manitoba, and Mr. Bernier was appointed president. This association claimed to represent the minority and set the law in motion. So the question arises, what was Mr. Bernier's authority to set the law in motion ? He was one of the petitioners representing the congress, which it was said represented the minority in Manitoba. What was the authority of the congress, what were its powers and objects, had it a written or unwritten constitution, was it an incorporated or a voluntary association, did the members join in a formal or in an informal way, in what way did it acquire authority to speak on the behalf of the people of Manitoba or any class ? These are questions of fact and go to the root of the inquiry, as to what authority Mr. Bernier had or this congress had to speak for the class demanding legislation. My opinion is that the only class of the people who were entitled to appeal to set the law in motion were persons to be affected as rate-payers, and that the law will take no cognizance of minors ; and in order to show that there has been a valid appeal the Government must have been called upon to set the law in motion by the request of persons authorized and persons belonging to that class of the people. The principle of representation in law depends upon express rules, and power must be given by the rules of the court or by the statute.

Mr. IVES. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman a question, if he will allow me. If, for example, one member of the House can for three hours obstruct the passing of the Remedial Bill cannot one member of the minority act effectively in setting in motion the appeal ?

Mr. MULOCK. I thought the hon. Minister conscientiously desired to ask a question and I treated him with courtesy. I cannot hereafter regard him as a responsible Minister in these matters.

Mr. IVES. I did not intend any discourtesy.

Mr. MULOCK. This is a subject worthy of respectful treatment. The hon. Minister was the president of the council. A body of gentlemen assembled in this city who were representatives of the people and Ministers of the Crown, and in effect declared that while they were politicians and responsible as such, they had also other functions and they must hear the appeal of the Manitoba minority sitting in a judicial capacity. And they metaphorically clothed themselves with the ermine, and, deliberating which of their number they should chose as chief justice they selected as facile princeps among them the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Ives) and made him president of the council. When the hon. gentleman could seek to escape his responsibility by thus clothing himself with the judicial ermine, and thus showed that he entirely misapprehended the position of affairs, we cannot be surprised if, when he deals with a question at a subsequent stage he is innocent of the first appreciation of what is the law required of Parliament. The appellants must have certain qualifications. They must be Roman Catholics, they must be residents, they must be ratepayers perhaps. One minor on signing a petition on behalf of himself and others could not set this machinery of remedial law in order. So it is with other minors ; and therefore we must ignore the signatures of children to the petition. The Minister of Trade and Commerce asked me if petitions were necessary. I did not say that. But I say the Government must be moved in some way on behalf of the minority. It seems clear that those affected in respect of taxes are entitled to petition. But whatever classes have the right to petition will sooner or later be decided by the law. If the appeal has not been consented to by the proper class or by a sufficient portion of the proper class, the Government has no right to exercise its powers, and its action will be read and the Bill based upon its remedial order will be void. I am glad to know that we are to have the facts made clear, and I hope the papers will be brought down at an early hour to-day.

Mr. WELDON. Two points have been discussed by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), one a question of law and the other a question of policy. As to the point of law I cannot agree with him. The condition precedent to the exercise of remedial power of the Governor General in Council seems to be that a right or privilege of the Roman Catholic minority is affected. I am satisfied that that has taken place. Believing that there is no initial defect I do not need to consider whether that defect would be cured by subsequent action, whether it would be held that, the Government having acted, it must be assumed that satisfactory proof of that right or privilege being affected had been adduced to them.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman will remember that I said I thought no court would go behind the remedial order. But suppose that in the matter of taxation one-tenth of the minority were to claim that to be a grievance which the other nine-tenths did not claim to be a grievance, could they cause action to be taken even against the wish of the nine-tenths? If it is a matter of religion and morals, I can understand that the head of the church could represent the body.

Mr. OUIMET. That cannot cause any trouble. There is a clause in the Bill, No. 26, I think—which is a permissive clause. Nobody is obliged to pay his taxes to separate schools. The Bill is not coercive. Any individual, if he chooses, may pay his taxes for the support of public schools and send his children to those schools.

Mr. WELDON. On the legal point I do not agree with the hon. gentleman. But on the point of policy, I think this Parliament may fairly say: Before we take the risk of creating disturbance which we must create by interference, we must be assured that the people affected are almost unanimous in asking for our help.

I wish to call the attention of the committee to another matter in the way of rebutting the charge of obstruction that is made against all of us. Hon. gentlemen are aware that a school Bill is now before the British Parliament, which is attracting universal attention in England, and arousing the deepest interest among all religious denominations. This question also shows a tendency to divide parties in a considerable degree there also. In a despatch which I find in the Ottawa "Citizen," of 6th April, it is stated that this school Bill is likely to make more enemies than friends to the existing Government. The English Government is proposing to take pretty much all the available time of Parliament for the discussion of this measure, and as Parliament there usually rises about the middle of August, they expect that the four and a half months now remaining up to that date, will be practically consumed in the discussion of this measure. Now, if so much time is needed there for the discussion of an educational measure, which is far less important, which has less far reaching consequences than this Remedial Bill, how can our Government charge us with obstruction when we demand more ample time for the consideration of this Bill, and how can they expect that it can receive the discussion its importance deserves, in the ten days which the Finance Minister tells us he is willing to give for that purpose? Then it is to be remembered that the English Government have had the aid in preparing their Bill of a board of education composed of trained experts, perfectly familiar with the whole subject; therefore, I say, it is no reproach to this Government, who have had no such advantage, who have never had any experience in dealing with educational questions in this Parliament, when we tell them that their Bill is crude, that many of its clauses are inconsistent; we must expect that their Bill would be clumsily drafted. Again, the English Parliament has full power—is not hampered as we are with questions of ultra vires. Therefore, I say that the Government are trying to rush this Bill through with undue haste, when they expect us adequately to discuss, in the committee stage, in so brief a time, a Bill of this importance, when the English Parliament propose to take four and a half months to discuss a Bill of far less relative importance.

Mr. McDONALD (Victoria, N.S.) I regret very much to see the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) taking up so much time of the committee in opposing this Bill. He is a gentleman for whom I have the utmost regard, and, therefore, I am very sorry to see him pursue the course which he has entered upon. As for myself I may say that I represent probably a county as thoroughly Protestant as any other in this Dominion, but so far as my constituents are concerned, I have scarcely ever heard the word Catholic mentioned among them. There is one parish, however, containing 315 votes, in which there are only four Protestants, and I have yet to learn that in that parish a teacher was ever asked whether he was Protestant or Catholic. If I chose to go to-morrow to my constituency and raise the Protestant cry, I could be elected by three to one. I will defy the hon. member for Queen's (P.E.I.) to come down to that county and try conclusions with me.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) You are not going to run again; you have told me so yourself.

Mr. McDONALD (Victoria, N.S.) Tell me that I wont, and perhaps I will. But I believe I will not, and I think if ever the hon. gentleman told the truth in his life, he has told it now. But it does not make any difference who is going to run, this question is not going to amount to a hill of beans in my constituency.

Mr. SPROULE. It is quite plain that the Government are making no progress with the Bill, and therefore the committee should rise and report. Yesterday the Secretary of State informed the House that as the amendment submitted by the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) was type-written it had evidently been prepared for the purpose of obstruction. This was an extraordinary argument, for in my opinion, the hon. gentleman should be commended for having carefully considered the Bill and prepared an amendment in proper form and submitted it type-written. The hon. member for North Bruce, in the course of this discussion, declared that there is no evidence that the Roman Catholic minority asked for this Bill, and he quoted an opinion expressed by Mr. O'Donohue, of Winnipeg, to the effect that the Catholic laity did not demand separate schools. At the same time it was pointed out that Mr. O'Donohue might be fairly considered to represent the Catholics as he was school trustee, and 90 per cent of the Roman Catholics had supported him. In answer, the Minister of Interior stated that it was impossible to know that fact as the vote was taken by ballot. I find, however, by the Act of 1890, clause 7, that if a poll is demanded by the ratepayers, it shall be taken by open voting. The hon. member for North Bruce also called the attention of the committee to the fact that at Walkerton, where there is a large Roman Catholic population, the Catholics refused to have the separate schools for many years, and one was erected only within the last few years. At Collingwood, where there are over 500 Catholics, many of whom are very wealthy, there is no separate school, and the Catholics have refused to establish one. In Ontario at the present time there are 592,503 school pupils between the ages of 5 and 21 years. There are 5,641 public schools, an increase during the year of 64 schools. There are only 313 separate schools, although a dozen Roman Catholics in a locality can have a separate school. The increase in the public schools during the year was 64, and of separate schools one. Out of a school population of 592,503, there were 38,067 Roman Catholic pupils in the separate schools, and an average attendance of 21,863. Over 50,000 Roman Catholics attend the public schools of Ontario. Yesterday the Secretary of State called attention to the new school Bill introduced in the British House of Commons, and spoke of the great liberality shown there, mentioning at the same time that we in Canada were refusing justice to the Manitoba minority. The latest mails bring intelligence that the people of England are very much dissatisfied with this school Bill, that they regard it as an encroachment on the established order of things, and attention is called to the fact that state aid has heretofore been refused to secularized schools. That Bill is of course considered an important one in the Imperial House, and it has been announced that it will require the full strength of the Conservative party to carry it through Parliament during the next four months, even with the assistance of the cloture and a Government majority of 168 members. Is it reasonable, then, to say that there is time for us to consider this Bill and do justice to the important subject that is engaging our attention. What are we to say of the conduct of the Government in attempting to force this Bill through by sheer physical force and without due consideration. We find their support divided up into relays so that all may get their needed rest and yet the House be kept in session. Two Ministers sit here resting in their easy chairs, their copies of the Bill and their notes put away in their desks. And when we ask for reasonable information concerning the Bill, it is not given us. This is a species of coercion which is only equalled by the coercion attempted upon the province of Manitoba. It is said the country will take note of our obstruction. I believe the country will take note of what is going on here and will give us credit for doing our duty. We do not seek to obstruct this Bill; we wish to give it fair consideration. But I contend that there is not time at our disposal this session fairly to consider the details of so important a measure. It should not be said that we are obstructing business when all we ask is that after we have done a fair day's work an adjournment should be allowed so that we may get needed rest for our work next day.

Mr. BAIN. When the leader of the House on Monday afternoon instructs the House that it must not rise until it has passed certain legislation which, as admitted by those who favour it, involves many and grave difficulties and keeps this House in session until ten o'clock in the morning of the second day, he exercises tyranny which I for one do not intend to submit to without protest. If I decline to discuss the merits of the question, I do not feel that I am called upon to make any apology. I am prepared to give fair discussion to every measure submitted to us, I do not propose to submit to an order that legislation of this kind must be passed without fair discussion and for the purpose of advancing the political ends of the Secretary of State. The hon. gentleman comes down glowing with anxiety for the minority and says that this legislation is necessary in their interests. But the Government could not, without long delay make up their minds upon the details of this measure and they had to submit to strikes in the Cabinet and difficulties of all kinds before the Bill was prepared. I doubt that they would ever have succeeded in preparing this Bill had they not had the benefit of assistance of the counsel for the minority. But we are expected to deal with all these details without giving them the consideration they deserve. As has been pointed out the Imperial Parliament expect to take four months in the consideration of a measure of much the same nature as this, even though it does not involve the very important feature of interference with a provincial legislature under a federal system of government. Now, it won't be pretended even by the strongest advocate of the rights of the minority, that this question was not thoroughly considered in all its merits at the provincial election. Six months ago this Government intimated that if that province did not take certain action, legislation looking to enforce the views of the minority would be introduced here, and pressed to a conclusion.

Yet in face of the knowledge of all these facts, what is the result of the last provincial election? Is it not an overwhelming condemnation of the attempt that is being made by the Government here to force upon an unwilling province, legislation that the people of that province declare emphatically they do not want, that they are unwilling to have imposed upon them? Now, it is idle to say that the Liberal party are responsible for the sentiment that exists in Manitoba. The Conservative party ruled that province for many years, and they are equally committed to the maintenance of the public school system. It is trifling with the truth for hon. gentlemen in this House to get up and say that in Manitoba this school question is in any sense a political question. More than that, all the evidence goes to prove that it is not to redress the grievance of the minority of Manitoba that this Government are working so earnestly, but it is to carry out a policy to which they have committed themselves, and which they believe will secure them additional support in many sections of this Dominion at the coming election. I need not say that so far as the province of Manitoba is concerned, all the evidence goes to show that this Government are the aggressors in keeping up this burning question, this source of irritation, between the two religious sections in Manitoba. Let any one read the speech of the Secretary of State the other day, and he must come to the conclusion that the whole speech was an appeal to religious prejudices for the sake of securing support for his party. Now, what is the position of the province of Manitoba on this question? I submit that the provincial government have made every concession that a self-respecting government is able fairly to make, and have offered a fair basis of compromise. The Secretary of State claims that he has given to the Roman Catholic minority in Nova Scotia every right and privilege that they can ask for, and that from 1864 down to the present time, they have lived in peace and harmony, and in perfect satisfaction with their school laws. Hon. gentlemen will remember that when the Secretary of State made that statement, the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) was asked a few minutes later, if he could tell the difference between the Nova Scotia Act that was carried through that legislature by Sir Charles Tupper, and the Manitoba Act of 1890, under which this appeal was founded, and Mr. Weldon said he had carefully read both Acts, and that they were practically the same. I ask, can there be a more scathing condemnation of the position the Secretary of State assumes to-day, when he undertakes to force through this House, by sitting night and day legislation to destroy an Act which is practically the same as the Nova Scotia Act of 1864, which has given perfect satisfaction to the Roman Catholic minority of that province by the statement of the Secretary of State?

Mr. McMILLAN. I believe the sentiments of the people of this country are distinctly against the tyrannical measure attempted to be forced on Parliament by the Secretary of State with a view to carry this most extraordinary Bill with regard to Manitoba schools. It is absurd that the Government should attempt to pass this so-called remedial legislation in view of the sparce population in Manitoba, the lack of wealth in the province, the small average attendance at the public schools. Mr. F. C. Wade, in a pamphlet states that 190 schools in the province had an average attendance of only ten scholars. Complaint is made that the Manitoba government laid out the country in school sections too small. But it is shown that instead of this complaint being well-founded, the difficulty is that the children sometimes have to go five or even six miles to the public schools. The great trouble in that country is the sparseness of settlement, that makes it all the more difficult to operate the cumbrous double system of schools that is proposed under this Bill. Above all we should avoid making two school boards. In secular education there should be uniformity in order that the children of every class may have equal opportunities for education. While I believe that the education of the child belongs primarily to the parent, I believe that it is the business of the state to provide such means of education as shall qualify the children to discharge intelligently the duties of citizenship when they become citizens. But we are not moving in that direction by the double system proposed under this Bill. This question could easily be settled without interference by this Government and this Parliament. We need go no further than the province of Nova Scotia or the province of Prince Edward Island where a system similar to that which Manitoba seeks to establish is in operation without serious complaint from anybody. But this Government, when it was decided that there was a grievance, should have called upon the government of Manitoba to send delegates to a friendly conference. The result of the conference that has been held, disadvantageous as were the circumstances attending it, has shown what opportunities for settlement the Government have lost. It has been clearly established that Manitoba desires to remedy all grievances that can be remedied. This Government have never made an honest effort to settle the question nor have they ever done justice to the province of Manitoba, In the settlement of this question it is not alone the interests of Manitoba that will be affected, but the interests of the North-west country. We believe that great, populous and wealthy provinces will be formed out of that territory, and the system of education they will adopt is very likely to be, to a considerable extent, moulded upon that which will prevail in Manitoba. Therefore, we see how very important it is that the system in Manitoba should be one that is adapted to the people of the province, and the best calculated to promote general education among them. Let me say that the policy adopted by the Government in forcing this measure through the House, by compelling us to sit night and day till Saturday, is something that would not be permitted in any other free country. I am astonished to see some hon. gentleman who voted against the second reading of this Bill, now aiding and abetting the Government in attempting to pass a measure which is intended to coerce Manitoba, after they had stood up and declared by their vote against the second reading, that they were not favourable to the passing of this measure. I am convinced that should the Government push this Bill through and should it become law, instead of giving peace and harmony, good will and satisfaction, either to the minority or to the majority of the people of Manitoba, it would produce the very contrary results, I am convinced that the great mass of the people of this country will condemn the Government for the course they are now pursuing. I believe that in the province of Ontario, even the Catholic minority, who enjoy separate schools, are not in accord with the Government in attempting to push this measure through the House of Commons. Therefore, I feel it my duty to my constituents to stand up and, so far as my weak power will enable me, assist in preventing this obnoxious Bill from becoming law during this present session. I am doing this even in the interest of the minority of the province of Ontario. In my own riding there is a large number of Roman Catholic voters, gentlemen whose feelings and whose views I highly respect. I have found them a respectable class of the community, a class that can be thoroughly relied upon, and whose promises made to me they have always fulfilled. We have the best evidence for believing that the Catholic people of Canada are opposed to the Government, by the evidence that is furnished in the by-elections that have taken place in the provinces of Quebec and Nova Scotia. So far as the recent election in West Huron was concerned, this school question was one of the principal questions upon which the people were called to pronounce. The hon. gentleman who now represents that constituency (Mr. Cameron) freely expressed his opinion on the platform, and announced himself as opposed to the passage of this Bill, and the people returned him at the head of the polls; whereas, the gentleman who opposed him in the Conservative interest, was very cautious in what he said, and it only came out after the election had terminated, that he had played a double part, and that he had not gone before the people upon the real merits of the question. I believe that the people of Canada are keenly alive to what is going on in this Chamber, and they are astonished that any statesman in the nineteenth century should adopt such tyrannical measures as are being adopted here to-day, measures which would only do credit to the Czar of Russia. This Government are endeavouring by mere brute force to pass this Bill, instead of endeavouring to convince the members by argument and moral suasion. The Minister of Justice has come before us and declared that he cannot give explanation of many clauses of the Bill, and the Minister of the Interior has declared that he believes a certain part of this Bill is unconstitutional. Another clause has been passed over, and left for future discussion. These things show most conclusively that the Government themselves have no faith in the Bill. I appeal to those hon. gentlemen sitting behind the Treasury benches, and who voted against the second reading, if they have a spark of independence left in their body, let them stand up and manfully oppose the policy of the Government, and defy the threat of the Secretary of State to read them out of the Conservative party.

Mr. INNES. As more than one member of the committee has expressed the opinion that the proposals made at the Winnipeg conference, by the delegation from the Manitoba government, might yet take effect, it may be well to examine what those proposals are. The suggestions that were made by the delegates on behalf of the Dominion Government, were as follows:—

> Legislation shall be passed at the present session of the Manitoba legislature to provide that in towns and villages where there are resident, say twenty-five Roman Catholic children of school age, and in cities where there are, say fifty of such children, the Board of Trustees shall arrange that such children shall have a school-house or school-room for their own use, where they may be taught by a Roman Catholic teacher; and Roman Catholic parents or guardians, say ten in number, may appeal to the Department of Education from any decision or neglect of the Board, in respect of its duties under this clause, and the Board shall observe and carry out all decisions and directions of the Department on any such appeal.
> Provision shall be made by this legislation that schools wherein the majority of children are Catholics, should be exempted from the requirements of the regulations as to religious exercises.
> That text-books be permitted in Catholic schools such as will not offend the religious views of the minority, and which, from an educational standpoint, shall be satisfactory to the advisory board.
> Catholics to have representation on the advisory board; Catholics to have representation on the board of examiners appointed to examine teachers for certificates.
> It is also claimed that Catholics should have assistance in the maintenance of a normal school for the education of their teachers.
> The existing system of permits to non-qualified teachers in Catholic schools to be continued for, say, two years, to enable them to qualify, and then to be entirely discontinued.
> In all other respects the schools at which Catholics attend to be public schools, and subject to every provision of the education Acts for the time being in force in Manitoba.

A written agreement having been arrived at, and the necessary legislation passed, the remedial Bill now before Parliament is to be withdrawn, and any rights and privileges which might be claimed by the minority in view of the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, shall, during the due observance of such agreement, remain in abeyance, and be not further insisted upon.

ALPH. DESJARDINS,
A. R. DICKEY.

It will be observed that there is a condition imposed on the Manitoba government which in the nature of things they could not be expected to accept, becaue the Act of 1890 was designed to do away with the separate school system which this arrangement proposes to re-establish. We know that the separate school system as establisned in 1871 and continued to 1890 entirely failed to fulfil the object in view, entirely failed to keep up the character of the school system, and fell below it, because it has been shown by evidence that cannot be doubted that the schools instead of being kept up to the standard of 1871 fell back, and disappointed the expectations of the minority who are now appealing for redress. Besides, there are inconsistencies in the proposition made. It has been shown that by establishing a separate board and still continuing part of the power to the Board of Education under the Government, it would not be a workable scheme I now call attention to the answer given by the delegates of Manitoba. They said:

> We have had under consideration the memorandum handed to us on the 28th instant, containing your suggestions for settlement of the Manitoba school question, and have the honour to submit herewith our reply thereto.
> We desire, first, to refer to the understanding upon which the conference was proceeded with. You will remember that we thought it necessary, before proceeding with the discussion of the question involved, to stipulate:
> First—That while the conference was proceeding, the Remedial Bill now before Parliament should be held in abeyance, and no proceedings taken thereon in the meantime, provided that the conference did not extend beyond Tuesday next.

We all know that this compact was departed from by the Dominion Government, and this breach of faith lies at the door of the Secretary of State, who has been guilty not only of breach of faith in this instance, but in other instances. We know that from the first the province of Manitoba has not been treated in that fair and generous spirit which ought to have been shown, and in my opinion if we had started in a different manner the province would have acted differently; at the same time I am bound to say that throughout they have behaved in a calm and judicial spirit, not actuated by prejudice, but seeking to meet the Dominion Government as far as possible consistent with the stand they have taken in favour of the system of national schools, started in 1890, which they are determined to maintain. They further say:

> Second—That in the event of an agreement being reached for settlement the Remedial Bill should be at once withdrawn, and the execution of the terms of the agreement left to the parties.

That also has failed to be done. We are in a prolonged discussion which commenced on Monday afternoon, in the course of which it has become evident that the Government are bent on forcing through this Bill without regard to the wishes of the people of Manitoba, who have expressed more than once their determination to oppose this imposition, as was shown by the verdict of the people given a few months ago when the provincial government was sustained by an overwhelming majority. They continue:

> These stipulations were agreed to by yourselves without hesitation, but notwithstanding such agreement, and in violation of its terms, the Remedial Bill was advanced a stage in the House of Commons on Saturday morning. While not desirous of taking advantage of this departure from the conditions upon which the negotiations were opened, we deem it due to ourselves to protest against the course thus pursued by the Government, by which you were commissioned.

If the delegates of the Manitoba government had chosen to act as the Government has done towards them they might have consistently, and rightly so, refused to go on with negotiations. But they were anxious to come to a compromise if possible, and so for the time being they forgot the breach of faith of which this Government was guilty and proceeded with the conference. They go on to say:

> We regret that we are unable to accede to the terms of the proposition submitted to us. A study of its details reveals the fact that it involves much more than would appear at first sight. The objections are both general, that is to say, as to principles involved, and special, that is to say, as to practical operation.
> An amendment to the School Act, embodying the terms of the memorandum, would divide the population for educational purposes into two classes, Roman Catholic and Protestant, giving to the Roman Catholic population distinct and special privileges as against the remaining portion of the people. It would establish a system of state-supported separate schools for the Roman Catholic people, and would compel their support by the school taxes and legislative grants. Not only so, but the whole school organization, text-book regulations, constitution of advisory board, board of examiners and normal school would be modified to bring it into accord with the separation principle, to an extent not usual even in places where regularly constituted separate schools systems obtain.

Hon. gentlemen will see that the proposal of the delegates of the Dominion Government was to re-establish separate schools. We know that with one exception, and that is Ontario, where separate schools are guaranteed by the Confederation Act, we have no separate school system in the whole of the Dominion. A separate school system existed for twenty years in Manitoba owing to exceptional circumstances, because at the time the Act was passed, and for several years subsequently, the population was largely composed of the class who now form the minority, but as immigration flowed in the previous majority became the minority, and the separate school system became so inferior, and was going from bad to worse, it became the duty of the legislature to pass the School Act of 1890, which abolished separate schools and established the public school system. The document goes on to say :

> In the Order in Council of December 20, 1895, transmitted to the Federal Government as embodying the views of the Manitoba government upon the question, it is stated that the proposal to establish a system of state-aided separate schools in any form cannot be agreed to. That Order in Council was taken as the basis of the policy of the government upon the question in the late general provincial election, and upon it the government was sustained. It is clear, therefore, that we are precluded from accepting the proposition which has been made. Such acceptance would, in our opinion, be a direct breach of faith with the people of our province.

It is not likely after the last general elections in Manitoba, when not only the Liberals, but the Conservatives were united in condemning separate schools and in favour of the continuance of the national school system, that the government of Manitoba would accede to the request of the delegates of the Dominion Government. They would have been guilty not only of a breach of faith, but they would have imperilled their own existence. Any government which would propose to re-establish separate schools in Manitoba would not have one hour of life. The document proceeds :

> Apart from the fundamental objection above stated, we think it due to you to state somewhat in detail a few of the practical objections to your proposal.

I call attention to these objections, because if hon. gentlemen read them they would give more dispassionate consideration to the subject than can be given by the special pleading which has been indulged in largely, especially on the other side of the House. It continues :

> As to the first clause :
> 1. Separate schools under this clause would result in a teacher having under his charge a comparatively small number of pupils of various ages and degrees of proficiency. The school could not, therefore, be properly graded, and could not attain the degree of efficiency reached by public schools in cities, towns and villages. Grading of classes and mutual competition would be destroyed. The separate school would, therefore, of necessity, be inferior. Experience elsewhere will prove the truth of this contention.

The experience had in Manitoba during twenty years of the existence of separate schools fully establishes this fact. Manitoba is not like any of the provinces of the Dominion ; it is not like Ontario, which is comparatively well populated, and where schools can be established in every school section with a fair school population. In Manitoba the population, in many parts, is widely scattered, and in many cases only eight or ten families live within a convenient distance so as to have a school established. So it would be practically impossible to have two systems workable. The document continues :

> 2. The organization of the separate school would be compulsory. Neither the Roman Catholic parents nor the school trustees would have any option. The voluntary idea upon which, almost universally, school organization depends, and which rules even in Ontario, where there is a fully developed separate school system, is entirely eliminated.

This, in itself, would be a very grave objection to the passing of this Bill, because it would require the compulsory establishment of separate schools in that province, whereas, in Ontario, it is left to the option of the Roman Catholics themselves whether a separate school should be established or not. We know, as a fact, that about 50,000 of the Roman Catholic school population in this province attend, not separate schools, but our common public schools, where they receive a first-class education, where there is not the least interference with their religious prejudices, and if the parents do not choose to allow their children to remain during the religious exercises, they can leave for the day. But in this case it would be compulsory, not only for a few years, but for all times. The very idea, in the nineteenth century, of forcing on a free people a system such as this, and this to be done by an outside power like the Dominion Parliament, is repugnant to all men of independent spirit, and there is no wonder that the people of Manitoba feel indignant that we should try and force at the tail end of a sixth session, such a system on them. The document proceeds :

> Given the requisite number of Roman Catholic children of school age, and the law would compel the separation without regard to the wishes of the parents or the trustees, and equally without regard to the ability of the district to maintain another school. It is most probable, also, that in such a case it would be held that the Roman Catholic children had no legal right to attend the public school. Thus we would by law compel Roman Catholics to separate themselves and deprive them of the right to send their children to the public schools. There seems to be no precedent even in separate school legislation for such a provision.

Here is another insuperable objection to the passing of this measure. Not only would Roman Catholic children be compelled to attend their own separate schools, but they would be precluded by the provisions of this Act from attending the public schools. It seems to me this is a piece of rank tyranny. This Parliament has no right to dictate, or to interfere with a parent's right or judgment as to the school to which he shall send his child. A Roman Catholic may have well-grounded objections to sending his children to a separate school, but in the event of this Bill passing, he would be precluded from sending them to the public schools. Another objection is thus pointed out :

> 3. In many cases it would be impossible to provide a separate building, and the Roman Catholic children would, therefore, be assigned a room in the public school. It seems beyond dispute that nothing could be worse than the separation of children into two distinct bodies within daily view of each other.

Then, again :

> The financial objections would be serious. A voluntary separate school system, such as exists in Ontario, or such as we had in Manitoba prior to 1890, could only be put into operation where the Roman Catholic rates, added to the legislative grant, would be sufficient to maintain the school, but under the plan proposed, this idea is not recognized. If the number of Roman Catholic children are to be found, a school must be provided and maintained. By whom ? By the public school trustees. The rates paid by the Roman Catholic taxpayers might be only one-tenth of the cost of the school, yet the rest of the district must maintain it. As a matter of fact, in a great majority of cases in cities, towns and villages in Manitoba, the contributions of the Roman Catholic ratepayers would only be a fraction of the cost of maintaining the school. As a result, the bulk of the expense would require to be met out of the taxes paid by the non-Catholic ratepayers, and the school would, therefore, be an additional and unnecessary charge upon the school revenue, already in every case heavily burdened. It would be hard to conceive of a more indefensible and offensive method of compelling one portion of the people to pay for the education and sectarian religious training of the remainder, and to maintain a separate denominational school, to the principle of which they were opposed.

This, also, would be a strong objection to carrying out a system of separate schools, because it would not only be a burden, on the Catholic ratepayers themselves, but an unjust burden on the ratepayers of other denominations. Again, the question naturally arises, how are the funds in the first instance to be raised for this purpose ? By the 74th clause in the Bill, there is provision made, but we know that neither this Government, nor any other government, can compel the government of Manitoba to give one cent for the establishment and maintenance of those schools. How, then, is this Government to get over that difficulty, even though they manage to pass this Bill, and make it law ? Here is another objection, showing how unworkable this scheme is :

> 5. It is quite clear that such a plan would prove unworkable. The non-Catholic people would continually struggle against supporting what they would consider to be an unjust burden. The trustees elected would probably be in accord with the views of the majority, and might prove hostile and refractory in carrying out the details of the scheme. Altogether it is clear that a most unhappy state of affairs would result. We believe there is no justification for substituting such an arrangement for that which now exists. At present in every city, town and village in the province outside of Winnipeg and St. Boniface, the Roman Catholic children attend the public schools. Not a word of complaint is heard. Absolute contentment and satisfaction prevails. The children have the advantage of efficient instruction, and numbers of them are qualifying themselves to become teachers in the public schools. We do not hesitate to say that not only is there no desire to separate, but, if left to themselves, the Roman Catholic people in the cities, town and villages outside of Winnipeg and St. Boniface, would not consent to a change in the direction indicated.

Not only is this scheme unworkable, but, as has been pointed out, we see that the public school system is being worked under the Act of 1890 to the satisfaction of the Roman Catholic minority. We have no knowledge of any petitions from the Roman Catholic minority of Manitoba being presented to this House in favour of the Remedial Bill. We have, on the contrary, the statement of the delegates who know of what they speak ; that, outside of Winnipeg and St. Boniface, Roman Catholics attend the public schools, that there is no complaint on their part, and that many of those young men and women are qualifying themselves as public school teachers. What more proof would this House require that the public school system, as established and operated in Manitoba, is giving satisfaction, not only to the Protestants, but also to the larger portion of the Roman Catholic people ?

> 6. It would be idle to say that such a plan would not impair the efficiency of the public schools. Such efficiency depends in the main upon the sufficiency of the school revenues. Given a sufficient revenue, the people under the stimulating action of the department may be depended upon to have a good school. The school taxes are now a heavy burden, and one of the ever-present questions in municipal finance is to decide how much the people can afford to pay for their schools. Subtract a substantial sum, such as would be necessary to maintain the separate schools, and nothing can be more certain than that a general lowering of the standard of efficiency of the public schools would result.

It is very evident that in Manitoba, with its sparse population scattered over a wide area of country, it is a very difficult thing for the ratepayers to maintain their schools, even with the liberal grant—as liberal as their finances will allow—given by the province. A large portion of the land is owned by non-residents. Some years ago, the Manitoba government, feeling that if they did not impose a tax upon the land of non-residents, the maintenance of the schools would prove an intolerable burden, imposed such taxes as enabled them to conduct their schools with efficiency. The document then goes on to consider the subject of religious strife, and to this I would ask particular attention :

> As to clause 2 :
> The effects of this clause would be to absolutely divest the legislature and government of control of the schools, so far as religious exercises and teaching are concerned. Where a majority of the pupils are Roman Catholics, doctrinal religious teaching without any restriction or control might go on at any hour or at all hours. The schools might be in effect, so far as religious teaching is concerned, church schools.

Which they practically were before the Act of 1890 came into effect, as we know by indisputable evidence, evidence that has not been denied.

> It might be said that if religious teaching were carried on to the detriment of secular education the department might withhold the grant. Even if this were done the school trustees would be compelled to carry on the school, and the penalty would be suffered by the ratepayers. Apart from that, however, the remedy is apparent rather than real. In actual administration we know, from experience, that it is most difficult to decide on the withholding of a grant on account of inefficiency. Repeated and troublesome inquiries have to be made, conflicting opinions have to be weighed, and in the end it is doubtful what course should be followed.

It is natural enough that if such a system were established it would be very difficult to prove the inefficiency of the schools. Repeated and troublesome inquiries would have to be made :

> Moreover, the withholding of a grant from a separate Catholic board, established in pursuance of a treaty of settlement, would almost inevitably be charged to be a violation of the spirit of the treaty.

If complaint was made that these schools were inefficient, it would at once be ascribed to the Government's opposition to the organization and establishment of such schools :

> Another feature of this clause is the effects on non-Catholic children. What would become of them while the religious education of the majority was proceeding ? Under our present conscience clause there is no possibility of trouble to any class. In the memorandum there is no safeguard. We know by experience that in schools where there was a Protestant minority under the old system most bitter complaints were made of the inability of the non-Catholic children to properly progress with their studies owing to the time of the school being taken up with religious instruction. The same result would inevitably follow in an aggravated degree if we were unable to control the holding of religious exercises in every case where the Roman Catholic children were in the majority. It is our belief that in such case the schools would be of little benefit to the non-Catholic minority. In view of the above remarks it will be unnecessary to deal at length with the other proposals contained in the memorandum, and our remarks thereon will therefore be confined to a brief space.

Now they come to deal with the question of books and the normal schools. We had a long and acrimonious debate upon the subject of books to be provided under this Act :

> As to text-books. It will be impracticable to provide by statute that the text-books should be satisfactory to the Roman Catholic minority, but we have no doubt that if other points could be agreed upon an arrangement could be arrived at on the text-books question which would be mutually satisfactory. We regard this part of the difficulty as comparatively easy of adjustment. We would have no objection to the Catholic people being represented upon the advisory board and the board of examiners. In point of fact his Grace the late Archbishop was offered a seat on the advisory board, but we see no practical way of embodying such a provision in the statutes. The effect of such a statutory provision would be that the boards would not be legally constituted without Catholic members, and the legal constitution of the board might be disturbed by the resignation of the Catholic members or the refusal of the Catholic nominees to accept office. It would also be impossible to give a statutory privilege of representation to one religious denomination without according the same privilege to others.
> The proposal to adequately assist a separate normal school we could not consider. It would be absolutely unjustifiable. The normal school is a technical training school for teachers. We endeavour to raise it to the highest possible standard by devoting to it as much of the school funds as can be spared. There can be no argument advanced in favour of dividing the funds, or of separating Roman Catholic teachers in process of training from the others. The Roman Catholic teachers would not be prevented from acquiring religious instruction elsewhere, but it is clear that their own educational interests and that of the schools to be placed under their charge would be best served by their attendance at the provincial normal school.
> As to the question of permits, the proposition in the memorandum might be agreed to by the Government, to be carried out as a matter of administration.

I need not dwell upon the clause relating to the normal schools, because I think it will be a long time before we see the establishment of a normal school in connection with the separate school system established under the Bill. They then go on to deal with the subject of breach of faith :

> The last clause of the memorandum, referring to the terms upon which the Remedial Bill would be withdrawn, is not, it is submitted, in accordance with the understanding arrived at upon the opening of the conference. The understanding was that in the event of a settlement being made the Remedial Bill should be immediately withdrawn. The passing of the necessary legislation and the carrying out of the terms of the settlement were to be left to the parties. The clause of the memorandum referred to is therefore a departure in that it requires as a condition of the withdrawal of the Remedial Bill that legislation to carry out the terms of the settlement, if made, should be enacted before the withdrawal of the Bill. Apart from the understanding which was had, it would be impossible to accede to the terms of the last clause. The legislature cannot meet until the 10th of April, and under > the ordinary procedure the government could not undertake to have a Bill passed before the 25th of April, the day upon which the Dominion Parliament expires by effluxion of time.

> It will be seen from the above remarks that the plan proposed involves the establishment of a state-aided denominational system of separate schools which, in practical effect, would carry with it the evils of the system which prevailed prior to 1890, and would also involve grave additional evils and difficulties of which we have not hitherto had experience.

This paragraph shows, it seems to me, that the Government here never desired or intended to withdraw this Bill although the Manitoba government were led to believe that that would be done. The Government here seem to have made up their minds to proceed with this Bill for their own political purposes, while they sent delegates to Manitoba to make a feint at effecting an arrangement, which I believe they never hoped to do. The objections are summarized as follows :—

> 1. The statutory division of the people into separate denominational classes.

That is manifest.

> 2. The necessary inferiority of the separate schools.

That is admitted.

> 3. Impairment of the efficiency of the public schools through division of school revenues.

That is admitted.

> 4. The burdening of non-Catholic ratepayers by compelling them to maintain separate schools.

That is also admitted.

> 5. The according of special privileges to one denomination, which could not on principle be denied to all the others, but which in practice could not be granted to such others without entire destruction of the school system.

This also is admitted.

> It will not, therefore, be a matter of surprise to you that we are unable to accede to the proposition we do, or any proposition based upon similar principles.

If a measure like this granting the organization of separate schools to the Roman Catholics were passed, why should not the Mennonites be given the same rights, why should not the Lutherans, the Icelanders and every other sect be accorded the same rights, and if this were done the public school system would be frittered away. If the state considers it its duty to carry on the system of public schools, it must refuse to recognize any sect or race. Now we come to the offer made by the province of Manitoba, and here I would direct the particular attention of the House to what they say, because I consider it is an unanswerable document and that the offer it gives is of the most liberal character. The delegates say :

> We have promised, however, to make good the promise to remedy any well-founded grievance, if such exists, and we therefore submit a plan of suggested modifications, which we believe to be free from objections upon principle, and which, in our opinion, will remove any such grievances, and at the same time in no way affect the efficiency of the public school system, or deprive the Roman Catholic children of the privilege of participating in the same educational advantages enjoyed by the rest of the people. Our proposition is in the form of an alternative :—
> First, should it be accepted as a satisfactory measure of relief to the minority, and as removing their grievances, we hereby offer to completely secularize the public school system, eliminating religious exercises and teaching of every kind during school hours. We desire it to be understood in connection with this proposition that it is made as a compromise offer, and not as embodying the policy which the government and legislature of the province are themselves desirous of pursuing.

I believe that when the Act of 1890 was introduced it was on the lines of secular education, but in deference to a very large number of people belonging to the Protestant denomination religious teaching was made optional. We know that an objection largely made against the present system by the minority was on these lines, they asserting that the schools were Protestant schools, though such statements were denied on the ground that whatever religious teaching was given was of a character not objectionable to Roman Catholics any more than to Protestants :

> We are willing, however, to adopt such a measure in order to attain a settlement of the dispute.
> Second, in the alternative, we offer to repeal the present provisions of the School Act relating to religious exercises, and to enact in substance the following : " No religious exercises or teaching to take place in any public school, except as provided in the Act. Such exercises or teachings, when held, to be between half-past 3 and 4 o'clock in the afternoon." If authorized by resolution of the trustees, such resolution to be assented to by a majority, religious exercises and teaching to be held in any public school between 3.30 and 4 o'clock in the afternoon. Such religious exercises and teaching to be conducted by any Christian clergyman whose charge includes any portion of the school district, or by any person satisfactory to a majority of the trustees, who may be authorized by said clergyman to act in his stead ; the trustees to allot the period fixed for religious exercises or teaching for the different days of the week to the representatives of the different religious denominations to which the pupils may belong, in such a way as to proportion the time allotted as nearly as possible to the number of pupils in the school of the respective denominations. Two or more denominations to have the privilege of uniting for the purpose of such religious exercises. If no duly authorized representative of any of the denominations attend, the regular school work to be carried on until 4 o'clock. No pupil to be permitted to be present at such religious exercises or teaching if the parents shall object, in such case the pupil to be dismissed at 3.30 Where the school-room accommodation at the disposal of the trustees permits, > instead of allotting different days of the week to different denominations, the trustees to direct that the pupils shall be separated and placed in different rooms for the purpose of religious exercises as may be convenient.

I think that this is a very liberal offer indeed and one that might consistently be accepted by the minority, as it assures their children of a good education, while getting religious exercises under a mutual arrangement which could readily be made for each school section. The only point is that they are determined to have what they call separate schools. But I do not see why they should not in all reason accept this other mode, because it gives them really what they contended for as really valuable under the old system :

> We believe that the foregoing proposal will remove any well-founded grievance. If the objection of the minority be that the schools are Protestant, as alleged in some of their petitions, then the objection can be fully and finally disposed of by complete secularization.

That seems not to be the wish of the Government, and I think it would not be the wish of the people, as was shown when the Act of 1890 was under discussion :

> If the real objection be the desire to have, along with efficient secular education, proper religious training, then the second plan proposed offers an effective method of attaining the object desired ; in fact it is difficult to conceive what better plan could be proposed, even were wé dealing with a system of schools entirely Catholic. It would be, in any event, necessary to have some general provision as to the time allotted for religious exercises and teaching. The individual school could not be permitted to act without restraint. The time suggested seems to be a reasonable and sufficient proportion of the school hours, and the hour in the day is undoubtedly the most convenient for the operation of the conscience clause. At the same time no distinction of any kind between denominations would be made. Absolutely equal rights would prevail. Non-Catholics desiring a greater amount of religious instruction than is given at present might carry out their views. While this desirable end would be accomplished, the uniformity and efficiency of the schools to which the children of all denominations would go would remain absolutely unimpaired and unaffected.
> CLIFFORD SIFTON,
> J. D. CAMERON.

Here we have a proposal to adopt the system that has been in practice for years under the Public Schools Act in Nova Scotia, in New Brunswick and in Prince Edward Island, and entirely to the satisfaction of the minority as has been stated here more than once.

The Secretary of State takes pride in saying that he was the author of the Nova Scotia School Act, the terms of which are on the lines proposed by the Manitoba delegates. I cannot see why the Manitoba minority cannot accept the same conditions, and why the plan that has worked well in Nova Scotia might not also work well in Manitoba. Now, we come to the reply of the Ottawa commissioners to the delegates of the Manitoba government :

> Gentlemen,—We beg leave to acknowledge your communication, dated yesterday, and written in reply to our suggestions for a settlement of the Manitoba school question. We regret to find that there has been some misapprehension as to any understanding upon which the conference was proceeded with. As to the first of those matters mentioned by you, we understand the facts to be that you insisted that no further consideration of the Remedial Bill should be pressed for by the Dominion Government until to-day (Tuesday), and that we directed your attention to the announcement to that effect in the newspapers of the day, and having every desire to meet your wishes, we further promised to communicate with the Dominion Government, asking that the Bill be not taken up on Friday. This communication we sent, and we were as much surprised as yourselves to find that late on the night of the Friday sitting the Bill was advanced a stage. We cannot say what consideration forced the Government to the conclusion that this step was necessary, and we sincerely regret that any misunderstanding has arisen as to a point upon which we carried out what we believed to be our engagement, and upon which we did all we could to have your wishes observed.

The explanation given by the delegates here, and the regret they have expressed that this understanding was not carried out by the Government in Ottawa, does infinite credit to the honour of the delegates. They express their regret that this agreement had not been carried out ; but the leader of this House has not expressed regret that he was guilty of a breach of faith.

> As to the second matter which you mention, there seems to have been a clear and, perhaps, not unnatural misunderstanding between us. We understood you to stipulate that, when the school question was settled, the Remedial Bill would be withdrawn, and we did not mean to lead you to believe that this was to take place as soon as an agreement was arrived at between us, and the concluding paragraph of our suggestions, therefore, expressed our understanding of what was originally agreed upon. We refer to those questions, which are in themselves unimportant, in order to remove from the controversy all matters of personal character.
> A few words are necessary as to the character of our memorandum. It was put in general terms as a suggestion basis, upon which our future discussions might proceed with a view to a possible agreement of all parties interested.

This may be true enough that the proposal made by the delegates from Ottawa was simply suggestive. But we find out afterwards that there was no disposition on their part to modify those suggestions, or the basis of agreement that they first laid down. So it appears they went there with suggestions already cut and dried, and there was no inclination to modify them to suit the views of the Manitoba delegates.

> It is, therefore, open to some of the objections raised by you, inasmuch as it does not deal with details, and professes only to lay down broad lines upon which legislation might be drawn. In addition to this we must promise that sufficient weight is not given by you to the undoubted legal position of the Roman Catholics. Under the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council and the remedial order they certainly have important legal rights in connection with separate schools, and while the Dominion Parliament may have jurisdiction to enforce some or all of these rights, it is universally asknowledged that this could be done with more advantage to all parties by the local legislature, and for this reason we are holding this conference.

A discussion of the disadvantages of separate schools is, therefore, in our view, not relevant to the present situation, and is likely to raise misleading issues. In our view, much of your argument misses its mark because you have not recognized the present position of affairs and dealt with our suggestion as compared with a regular system of separate schools such as might be established under the Remedial Bill, or under the old system, but have rather confined your attention to maintaining that our proposition would involve some of the drawbacks of these other schools. We deeply regret that you have felt obliged to reject our proposition, and with all deference it does not appear to us that the objections, general and special, which you urge are such as to necessarily involve so serious a step.

It would serve no useful purpose for us to support our views with any detailed argument, but some general considerations may be advanced as to the three objections upon principle which you mention, viz. : 1st. That our plan would divide the population into two classes, Roman Catholics and Protestants, giving the former class privileges as against the latter. 2nd. That it would establish a system of state-supported separate schools ; and 3rd, that the whole school organization would be modified to an unusual extent to bring it into accord with the separate school principle.

Now, here is what the delegates have to say in support of these three propositions which they have laid down. Let me observe that under the old system of separate schools which was in vogue from 1871 to 1890, the separation between the two classes was kept up, and if this Bill became law, there is no doubt the same separation would be continued.

As to the first of these objections we may observe that the separation of the Roman Catholics as a class does not arise from our suggestion. It is made by the constitution, and arises as to them because they happen to be a minority of the population. It is inaccurate to say that any privilege is given to them as against the rest of the population. It is only the rights conferred on the minority by the constitution that are in question. The problem presented in the school question is to secure to them their just and lawful privileges under the constitution in such a manner as to cause the minimum of interference with the public school system of Manitoba, and in that view we think our suggestion has merits.

Here again comes the difficulty that the Act of 1890 having been pronounced constitutional by the highest court in the realm, this proposed Act, if passed, would at once clash with the Act of 1890. So far as I can see, I cannot understand how it would be possible to carry out this Act and make it effective, because the two Acts will certainly clash with each other.

As to your second objection, we may observe that the Roman Catholic population contribute their share of all taxation for schools, and, in return, are entitled to obtain education for their children. It is now a question of the mode of that education, in view of the rights held by the minority under the constitution. The contention that the system we propose would be unduly expensive, and the limitations on ordinary separate school privileges embodied in our proposition will be considered later on. In so far as there is any principle violated by the application of taxes to the support of schools in which Roman Catholic doctrines are taught, your alternative suggestion would seem to be quite as objectionable as ours.

In reply to your third objection, we beg to urge upon you that the changes we suggest are much less than what we understand to be involved ordinarily by the establishment of separate schools. We do not insist upon normal schools. As to text-books and representation on the boards, as a matter of practice and administration, we find that you raise in point of fact, no objection. We do not ask that the Roman Catholics have a separate right to elect trustees or otherwise to have any special representation on the board of trustees, being content with the protection afforded by an appeal to your own Department of Education, and in this respect our proposals very materially limit what is always considered the privileges essential in connection with a separate school system. The proposed schools would be controlled by trustees elected by the whole body of ratepayers under the provisions of your school law. There does not seem to be any adequate foundation for your remark that the carrying into effect of our suggestion would involve a modification of school organization greater than usual in cases of separate schools. We desired to minimize such modification and think, to some extent, we succeeded.

As to your first objection in detail, we submit that, under existing conditions, there would not arise any great practical inconvenience, as in most of the localities affected the Roman Catholics are sufficiently numerous to afford all necessary facilities for grading and competition. In any event, it must be quite clear that the standard of efficiency maintained would naturally be higher than can be reached by Roman Catholics, who refuse, on conscientious grounds, to attend the public schools, and are, therefore, obliged to maintain schools from their own private means, and without the aid of the legislative grant. Considering the question of efficiency alone, we think it cannot be denied that the state of affairs under the system we suggest would be much better for the community than that which would obtain under existing conditions, or under the Remedial Bill, if it became law.

And if this is so, even the argument from efficiency is all upon the side of bringing the Roman Catholics amicably within the public school system by some such method as we suggest.

Your second objection in detail seems founded on a misapprehension. Our memorandum was drawn in general terms, and did not in any sense intend to exclude the principle of election on the part of Roman Catholics, a principle which is elementary and which is embodied in the Remedial Bill.

Then they discuss the question of finances :

As to your third objection, we cannot agree that there would be any special disadvantages in having Roman Catholic children in a separate room as distinguished from teaching them in a separate building. It would seem to be quite as objectionable on principle to separate them for religious exercises, as one of your own suggestions would involve. We cannot altogether follow your reasoning with respect to the financial objections. As before stated, the Roman Catholics must pay their share of the taxation, be it great or small, and in return they have a right to educational privileges. The school laws are full of financial anomalies, as occurs for example, in the case of a wealthy man without children, as compared with a poor man who has a large family. You observe that in Ontario and in Manitoba, prior to 1890, a separate school could not be established unless the rates with the legislative grant could maintain it, and suggest that our proposition is faulty in that this is not recognized. Your argument on this head loses weight when it is considered that we proposed that there should be in towns and villages twenty-five, and in cities fifty Roman Catholic children before they could ask for a separate room or building, while under the old law, before 1890 under the Remedial Bill, and even under your own existing law, the presence of ten children only is necessary to the establishment of a school district.

Here again we observe the difficulty that there would be under this system. Where a school might be established for ten children only, the expense in a sparsely-settled district would be exceedingly onerous upon the parents ; for, as I have already pointed out, even though this Bill were enacted into law, the provincial government cannot be compelled to make any grant for the organization and maintenance of separate schools.

We must again direct your attention to the evident advantages in point of economy in the system we propose, over the old system, over the schools under the Remedial Bill, and particularly over the existing state of affairs, where an important section of the public has to pay school taxes in addition feels compelled, from conscientious motives, to educate their children at their own expense.

There would be no expenses of organization, either general or local. The utmost that can be said is that it would cost the whole community the increase in expense, if any, which would necessarily be involved in the Roman Catholic children being educated together in one room or in one building, as compared with educating them scattered amongst the rest of the school children. It is only in small mixed communities that this could be a serious item. We note your objection that this would be an offensive method of compelling one portion of the people to pay for the education and sectarian religious training of the remainder, and must again remind you that, in principle, your own alternative suggestion is equally objectionable, because conceivably, the Roman Catholics, under your system, might pay a comparatively insignificant share of taxation, and yet you propose that their religion shall be taught them in the schools.

We must further draw your attention to the flagrant injustice of the present system, which compels Roman Catholics to contribute to schools to which they cannot conscientiously send their children, and we beg to submit that this fact deserves due weight and consideration. It is to be further noted that the Roman Catholics earnestly desire a complete system of separate schools, on which only their money would be expended, a state of matters which would meet the observation under consideration, but which you decline to grant. Our suggestion was to relieve you from the necessity of going as far as this. It is, perhaps, impossible to devise a system that would be entirely unobjectionable theoretically and in the abstract. We had great hope that what we suggested would commend itself to your judgment as a practical scheme doing reasonably substantial justice to all classes, and securing that harmony and tranquility which are, perhaps, more than anything else to be desired in a young and growing community, such as is now engaged in the task of developing the resources of Manitoba.

The ground taken in your fifth objection has been touched on in the preceding remarks. As to clause 2 of our memorandum, your objections could be met by provisions as to detail. If desired, the privileges of teaching religion could be limited to a certain time in schools attended by Roman Catholics.

The point that provision should be made for non-Catholic children is certainly well taken, and is quite in accordance with our views, which were, in this respect, imperfectly expressed in the memorandum. Neither of the propositions which you make would, as it appears to us, remove the sense of unjust treatment existing amongst the minority, nor would they possess the elements of permanency, and freedom from friction in administration, which are certainly necessary for a final and peaceable solution of existing difficulties.

We once more appeal to you in the interests of the whole population of the province, indeed, of the Dominion, as well as in the interests of the minority, to reconsider the decision at which you have arrived, and to make some proposal that we could regard as affording a chance of settlement which we so earnestly desire.

DONALD A. SMITH,
ALPH. DESJARDINS,
A. R. DICKEY.

Then we come to the final reply given by the delegates of the government of Manitoba :

Gentlemen,—We have the honour to submit herewith our views upon your memorandum of yesterday. As remarked by yourselves in your memorandum, a lengthened reference to the objections raised to your first suggestions will not serve any valuable purpose at the present stage of the discussion. Our purpose in stating the objections was to give you our view as to the results which would follow from the plan proposed, or any similar plan.

The point of difficulty in arriving at a basis of settlement seems to be very clearly defined. You maintain that, in the words of your memorandum, " the Roman Catholics " certainly have important legal rights in " connection with separate schools," and that your idea of the object of the conference is to give effect to those rights in the most unobjectionable way, through the action of the legislature of the province.

We hold, on the contrary, that the constitution gives the Roman Catholics no legal rights in reference to separate schools, except the right of appeal, under which the Federal authority may or may not restore any rights formerly enjoyed under provincial legislation.

Your proposition aims at the legal recognition by the legislature of Manitoba of the right to the Roman Catholic people to separate for school purposes. Our proposition aims at removing every practical objection to the present system without giving a legal right to separate. We understand that by Order in Council your authority is limited to making a settlement satisfactory to the minority, and as a matter of fact the minority will accept nothing short of statutory recognition of the right of separation. We regard ourselves as precluded, by our declaration of policy preceding our last election, from assenting to such statutory recognition. While joining with you in the earnest desire to reach a settlement, we are unable to suggest any way of reconciling these two propositions. We are of opinion that there would be no objection on principle to the plan we propose, and that its practical operation would prove to be very satisfactory. It would give substantial relief on every material matter without legal separation. If the minority insists on legal separation there does not seem to be any possibility of reaching a basis of compromise.

We cannot but express our regret and disappointment at the failure of our negotiations. We assumed, when a conference was asked for by the Federal Government, with full knowledge of the fact that we were clearly stopped by the terms of the Order in Council of December 20, 1895, from assenting to the re-establishment of separate schools in any form, that it was with the object of securing substantial modifications, which, while falling short of the principle of separation, would remove every alleged reason for Roman Catholic opposition to the use of the public schools. We think that the proposition which we made would, if adopted, remove every such reason, and it is, therefore, such a proposition as we believed you had come prepared to accept. Its non-acceptance apparently is due to the determination of the minority to insist upon the most extreme, and, in our opinion, unsound view of their legal rights. We entered upon the task of seeking a settlement of the question at issue in the face of grave and obvious difficulties.

In the first place, so far as the re-establishment of separate schools is concerned, the question has for years been considered settled, so far as the people of this province, to whom we are responsible, are concerned.

In the next place, we have hitherto believed that a state-aided separate school system, and that only, would be accepted by the minority. This view we have repeatedly stated, and we have not yet been authoritatively informed to the contrary. That our contention in this respect was, and is correct, is shown by your proposition, which indubitably means a system of schools separating by law Protestants from Roman Catholics, and wholly dependent for support upon municipal taxation, and the legislative grant.

It also appears that any settlement between the Government of the Dominion and that of Manitoba must, by the very terms of your instructions, be subject to the sanction of a third party, and, while all the members of both governments might approve of our proposition, or any other submitted as containing everything that in reason and in equity ought to be conceded, nevertheless, that approval would be worthless without the sanction of the representatives of the minority.

In a word, we are absolutely debarred from conceding a system of Roman Catholic and state-aided separate schools, while the representatives of the minority, and as a consequence, the Federal Government, will accept nothing less.

In conclusion, we have the honour to state that, notwithstanding the failure of the present negotiations, the government of the province will always be prepared to receive and discuss any suggestions which may be made with a view to removing any inequalities that may be shown to exist in the present law.

CLIFFORD SIFTON,
J. D. CAMERON.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I think any person, looking over this answer with a dispassionate mind, and willing to view the question on its merits, must come to the conclusion that, considering their position, considering the history of the province, considering that the province is sparsely inhabited, that the Manitoba delegates could make no other proposition than the one they have made. We must remember that the Act of 1890 has been pronounced constitutional, while, on the other hand, the clause in the Manitoba Act gives the minority a right of appeal. This Government have taken up that appeal, and the result is this precious Bill. They are now seeking to force separate schools on the province against the will of the people; and they seek to do it by machinery of a very imperfect character, as is shown in the provisions of the Bill. Even if the Bill is amended as much as possible, and is brought into operation, I cannot see how it can ever be worked with any satisfactory result.

The Manitoba government are still willing to listen to any suggestion made by the Dominion Government, are still willing to arrive at a settlement of some kind which will do full justice to the minority, while they are determined to retain their system of public schools which has been in operation for some years and given satisfaction to the large majority of the people of the province, and which in its essential points is equally as efficient as the school system of Ontario. Under such circumstances, it is folly for the Government to continue to attempt to force this Bill through the House, because the people of Manitoba will never consent to its operation even if passed, and even if it be passed it will prove ineffective and abortive.

Mr. O'BRIEN. There are certain hon. members who have opposed the Bill, but are now practically giving all support to its passage. The hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. McGillivray), the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson), the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes), the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett), and the hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Craig), will go back to their constituents at the forthcoming elections and declare with all the solemnity possible that they opposed this Bill. They will declare that they are opposed to separate schools in Manitoba, and have opposed this measure even at the risk of turning out the Government. The hon. member for North Victoria is one of the greatest sinners in this respect. It will be exceedingly interesting to notice the result of the interviews which these gentlemen will have with their constituents. Those gentlemen will state that they voted against the Bill, but they will be asked as to whether they assisted in putting the Bill through committee. It is hardly possible to conceive a greater piece of political hypocrisy than is being practiced by those hon. gentlemen at this moment. Shortly, however, they will meet their constituents, and will be taken to task for their double-dealing, for voting against the Bill, and afterwards assisting in forcing it through the committee. The electors may not be able to understand all the nice legal arguments that have been used as to the validity and the constitutionality of the various sections, but they will understand the extraordinary position taken by those hon. gentlemen in supporting the Bill at one time and endeavouring to force it through at another. I will leave them to settle these matters with their constituents, and I wish them joy. The committee should now rise in order that the chamber may be ventilated and cleared of the debris that have accumulated. The difficulty in regard to the committee rising is that the Government would then have to face the charwomen who still remain unpaid.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman is suggesting that the House should be swept and garnished. Does he recollect what happened on another occasion when the House was swept and garnished.

Mr. O'BRIEN. The reference is so apposite that I need not pursue it. This, I understand, is Wednesday, and this day does not belong to the Government, but to private members. The Government, in fact, is guilty of petty larceny in stealing this day from us. There are a number of public Bills on the paper. Are the Government afraid that the Bill of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) to prevent unconstitutional proceedings at by-elections would be reached ? Then there is another Bill on the paper to which they have practically assented, intended to prevent railway companies carrying voters to elections. An important provision in that Bill is that with respect to personation. At the last revision of the voters' lists in my constituency, 300 or 400 shantymen were in camp, and it was thought a good scheme on the part of my opponent to have them registered. I observe the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Coatsworth) has entered the chamber, and of that hon. gentleman I may say that there is no man who so thoroughly misrepresents his constituency.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. This will be the last time you will be here.

Mr. O'BRIEN. If the hon. gentleman's seat was as sure as mine he could consider himself a very happy man. If he wants to try conclusions let him come up to Muskoka, where he can get all he wants.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. Let the hon. gentleman try North Ontario.

Mr. O'BRIEN. The hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Coatsworth) had the courage of his convictions, for he voted for the Bill, and he is now doing all he can to support it. He is not in the same category as the hon. member for North Ontario, who voted against the Bill, and is now doing all he can to force it through committee. I think the course taken by some of these hon. gentlemen is due to ignorance, because they do not understand the Bill.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. I never read it.

Mr. O'BRIEN. The hon. gentleman is a sample of your pure partisan ; he is willing to support a Bill he has never read. That is the partisan right through, he believes in going it blind.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. That is what you are doing.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I read the Bill through carefully.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. I read it all but the forms.

Mr. O'BRIEN. The hon. gentleman is a sample of a class of legislators of which there are too many in this House, men who vote for Bills they do not read, who are willing to take information second-hand, and who are willing to vote in a certain direction because the Government tells them to do so. We are accused of obstruction in preventing the passage of this Bill. But, whether this Bill passes at this session or not, is not such a very serious matter. But there is a kind of obstruction that is serious, and that is the attempt to obstruct the people of Manitoba in the use of the school system which they believe to be best in their own interests, and to force upon them a system which experience has shown, even if its principle be admitted, as a matter of argument, to be wholly unworkable in their country. I hold that the committee should rise, in order to give the Government an opportunity to consider how best they may retrace their steps and get out of the false position in which they have placed themselves. We have a right of an explanation of the extraordinary statement that has been made that the commissioners went to Winnipeg on the understanding that the consideration of the Bill was to cease while the negotiations were going on. That is an imputation of more than bad faith to the Government. It is an extraordinary thing that a gentleman occupying the lofty position of leader of this House, a gentleman who for years represented us in London, should be ready to lie under the imputation of bad faith. We should have the report of the commission, in order that we may know whether the imputation is well-founded or not. If the Minister of Justice has been incorrectly reported, he should be given an opportunity to explain ; if the leader of the House has been unjustly accused, he should be given an opportunity to free himself from the imputation. I think we have given abundant reasons why the committee should rise, and why the charwoman should be allowed to come in and clear up this rubbish which we have to sit amongst. I was speaking about personation a little while ago, and said that in my constituency my opponent had placed on the voters' list some three or four hundred names of men who were employed in shanties during the winter, and, if the elections had come on in March, they were expected to vote against me. Of course they are now all scattered to the winds, but those three or four hundred names are still on this list, and consequently there is a grand opportunity for personation.

Mr. BENNETT. Was not the hon. gentleman elected chiefly through the support of some jobbers in Muskoka ?

Mr. O'BRIEN. I was elected by the free and untrammelled votes of the electors of Muskoka and Parry Sound. So far as these jobbers were concerned, there was no such vote to be had, and no such influences used.

Mr. BENNETT. Was not the hon. gentleman supported and elected chiefly by the efforts of Mr. George McCormack, of the Georgian Bay Lumber Company ?

Mr. O'BRIEN. He was not. He had Mr. George McCormack's support, and was very glad to get it, but the voters that Mr. McCormack could influence, were settlers living in the county, and were not his shantymen.

Mr. HENDERSON. It seems that the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) who, this morning, is leading the disgruntled rump of the Conservative party, has come here in a very ill-temper. Whether he was in bed last night or not, I do not know, but I think he must have wakened up on the wrong side. The hon. member has called in question my action in this House, and endeavoured to show that my course has been inconsistent. I trust, however, that my course has not been so extremely inconsistent as that of the hon. member for Muskoka, who has, time and again, during this discussion, charged hon. gentlemen with swallowing their principles.

Mr. MARTIN. I would like to know if the hon. gentleman is discussing the motion before the Chair, which is, I understand, to rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. DALY. As much as anybody else has been, since three o'clock this morning.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Mills, Annapolis). The hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) has the floor.

Mr. MARTIN. I have stated a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Mills, Annapolis). Inferentially, I have given my decision.

Mr. MARTIN. You have decided that he is talking on the question ?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Mills, Annapolis). As much as anybody else.

Mr. MARTIN. That is not the point. Is he talking to the question before the Chair?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Mills, Annapolis). The hon. member for Halton, in my opinion, is in order.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am quite sure that I am in the judgment of the committee when I say my course for consistency will bear a favourable comparison with the action of the member for Muskoka. It is true, I voted against the principle of this Bill, and since then my course has, in every respect, been consistent along that line. I am quite sure that my course is satisfactory to my constituents, with whom, he says, I may not have very favourable interviews. I may say that I have had interviews with them, both personally and by letter, and in every respect they have been of the most agreeable character. I only trust that the hon. gentleman will find as much harmony among his electors when he goes back to Muskoka, as I have found in the county of Halton. Now, I am not here to waste the time of this House in reading papers, or engaging in discussion that is not at all pertinent to the question before the House ; therefore, I think I cannot be charged with obstruction. I think it is a proper thing that this question should be fairly discussed. The country will not find fault with a fair discussion, but I think the country will find a great deal of fault with an unfair discussion such as the hon. member for Muskoka has been engaged in, night and day, during this week. I do not believe that even the hon. gentleman's constituents will justify the course he is pursuing in this respect. However, I am not here to find fault with his course, neither has he any right to find fault with mine. I think I am perfectly prepared to take care of myself.

Mr. BENNETT. The hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) wants me to adopt him as my political godfather. There are several reasons why I cannot do so. The hon. gentleman has seen fit here to abuse Mr. George McCormack, the present Conservative candidate for Muskoka, and he has seen fit to throw reflections on the votes by which he was elected in his riding. Now, in the general elections, I entered a protest against my opponent, and there was likewise a protest entered against the member for Muskoka. The hon. gentleman begged me to withdraw the protest against my opponent, in order that his opponent should withdraw the protest against himself. Well, the hon. gentleman knew that his published election disbursements only amounted to $47, so that his election could not have been overturned on the ground of illegal expenditure. Therefore, the hon. gentleman must have had qualms of conscience on some other grounds. He wanted me to throw that protest to the winds, so that he might get off scot free. I congratulate the hon. gentleman that he did get his protest sawed off, for if it had not been sawed off, there would have been some very ugly disclosures made in court. When the hon. gentleman asked me to "saw off" my protest against his protest, I did wrong in his opinion, but before I can follow the hon. gentleman I shall have to entertain a higher estimate of his political honesty than I hold at the present time.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No better evidence than the present discussion is needed to furnish a reason why the committee should rise and report progress. It is only fair to the hon. member for Muskoka to say that, while I have no personal knowledge of the matter, if general report is to be believed, in the event of the protest having gone on it would have involved not only the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) but some members of the Government. The hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) has forgotten that when strong pressure was brought to bear to remove the protest that act reflected no political dishonesty or corruption on the part of the hon. member for Muskoka, but it was thought it might reflect on some very prominent members of the party. There was much talk about the matter at the time, and it was considered that the hon. member for Muskoka was not personally so much to blame as those who assisted him in seeing that his election was secured. I am glad the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) has taken this occasion to expose such an outrageous measure as the gerrymander Act. It is very gratifying to find that he has denounced that improper Act, which sought to take away the rights of the people. Every hon. member will remember the able debates that took place on the Bill, but I do not think that, in view of the short time occupied by the hon. gentleman, a more able exposure of the gerrymander Act has not been made. The hon. gentleman has pointed out what outrageous changes were made by the Act, and how it sought to stifle the expression of the honest opinion of the constituencies. By this time the Government will surely have seen their mistake in endeavouring to coerce this House. Members sent here have rights, and their constituents expect them to be in attendance at the sittings of the House.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The people expect them to be here to do the business of the country.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The hon. gentleman has no right to dictate whether members are right or wrong in their action. They are responsible to their constituents.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. And their constituents will deal with them for obstructing and wasting public money.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I can speak for my constituents. They expect me to be here when business is being transacted. Hon. gentlemen opposite must remember that a representative cannot sit here at all hours and do his constituents justice.

Mr. FOSTER. The representatives ought to do some work.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have done my work. The Minister of Finance undertakes to sneer and insult members of the House, adopting the policy that if you do not like it, you can do the other thing. We all know that the Government have stated that they do not care what views hon. members hold, that they have a certain object in view, and they are going to push this Bill through. They do not regard the interest of hon. members or of the people, but they declare they are going to satisfy the hierarchy by putting this Bill through. The people, irrespective of their views on this Bill, are not fools, and if hon. members of this House thwart the Government by adopting all constitutional means to defeat this Bill, they will not be blamed by the people. The people, in fact, can easily see that if the Government had decided to obstruct this Bill they have taken the very best means to accomplish their object. Hon. members on this side of the House have shown their willingness to discuss the Bill fairly even until an unreasonably late hour, but when the Government adopt coercion and keep up a continuous sitting, without even being in their places to answer questions, and determine to push the Bill through whether the clauses are right or wrong, the people will realize that their representatives are perfectly justified in their recent action. So far as I am personally concerned I am satisfied that my constituents almost unanimously, and irrespective of party, would endorse my action, if I should feel called upon in refusing to be coerced into considering any legislation in such unreasonable hours, as in the present instance.

Mr. CHARLTON. I am glad to see the leader of the House in his place at this moment. I believe he listened to one-tenth of the discussion, and when he enters the chamber it is generally to throw taunts at hon. members engaged in the debate, and to charge them with obstruction. The hon. gentleman takes good care to consult his own personal convenience, and not make an undue drain on his physical force, and he makes his appearance only when it is convenient to himself He knows very little about the progress of the debate, he knows little about the objections that have been urged to the different clauses considered. Under these circumstances he should hesitate before charging hon. members with being guilty of obstruction. It is impossible to consider a measure properly under the conditions existing at the present time. Not half the members can remain in constant attendance, and any attempt on the part of the Government to force consideration of this Bill day after day is unreasonable and unjust, and is sure to arouse the resentment of those who desire full and fair discussion. Under parliamentary practice the House should not sit beyond 1 or 2 a.m. During the discussion on the Franchise Act the House discussed the Bill until 1 a.m., and then we moved that the committee rise and report progress. Afterwards we moved that the committee rise, and the debate was continued. That was a proper course to pursue, and it showed the public the manner in which the Government was trespassing on the rights of the minority in Parliament. There are many members in this House who believe this Bill should not pass, and when the Government endeavour to bulldoze, they are justified in resenting such action.

Mr. COSTIGAN. That is rather strong language.

Mr. CHARLTON. Such action is usually called in the west "bulldozing," it is transgressing on the rights of the minority. It is an unwarranted and tyrannical exercise of power, which I, for one, resent.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. I am glad the hon. gentleman has sympathy for some minority.

Mr. CHARLTON. I have great sympathy for the minority represented so honestly and faithfully by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. LaRiviere). It is admitted by all moderate men that it is desirable, if possible, to secure a satisfactory settlement of this school question. The result of the conference held at Winnipeg should be officially reported to the House. If the committee rose and reported, then there would be an opportunity for the Government to lay the official report of the conference on the Table of the House. We are told that the Manitoba government made two propositions: first, to make the schools purely secular, if the objection was urged that they are Protestant schools; second, that Manitoba would give the minority the right to religious teaching in the schools on the same terms as those enjoyed by Catholics in Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick and the North-west Territories. We have no right to proceed with the deliberation upon this Bill until we have taken steps to ascertain whether that proposal is or is not satisfactory to the minority.

Mr. McALISTER. Would you accept it ?

Mr. CHARLTON. Certainly. We have no right to assume that the minority in Manitoba would not accept it. We are trifling with a subject of grave importance when we seek to push a Bill through the House in the last days of the session while refusing to consider a proposal which gives practical redress to the grievances to the minority. Now, it has been said that the public schools of Manitoba are Protestant schools, and that is given as one of the reasons for opposition for the public school system on the part of the minority. I do not know whether this question has been entered upon in this committee, but it is one of the most important considerations in this question and one worthy of careful attention. The public school system of Manitoba is copied from that of Ontario, and the selection of scriptures to be read, I understand, are the same as those in Ontario. The form of prayer used is the same as that used in Ontario. And 50,000 Roman Catholic children attend the public schools of Ontario with the approval of the hierarchy of that province. First let me take the form of prayer for closing the schools. I well read it.

An hon. MEMBER. Dispense.

Mr. CHARLTON. No ; it is necessary to a thorough understanding of this question that this part of the religious exercises should be considered.

(Form of prayer read.)

Mr. CHARLTON. That is not a Protestant form of prayer, but a Christian prayer. Then there is a form of prayer which should be familiar to hon. gentlemen, the Lord's Prayer, which none will say is distinctly Protestant. The dismissal is in this form :

> May the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, the love of God and the fellowship of the Holy Ghost be with us all ever more.

Then we have the scripture selections. There are seventy-one selections from the Old Testament and sixty-six from the New Testament.

An hon. MEMBER. Read them.

Mr. CHARLTON. I am about to do so. The first selection consists of the first nineteen verses of Genesis relating to the creation. I shall not read these, as I do not wish to consume time. The next selection is from the 20th to 31st verses of the 1st chapter of Genesis, being a continuance of the account of the creation. Let it be understood that the regulations provide that these selections may be read either from the King James version or from the Catholic version of the scriptures. The next is from the 3rd chapter of Genesis relating to the fall of man. Then we have the account of the deluge from the 8th chapter of Genesis. If any hon. gentleman wishes to discuss that we will read it and consider it.

An hon. MEMBER. Read.

(Selection read.)

Mr. CHARLTON. The next selection is the account of the trial of Abraham. The next relates to Isaac blessing Jacob and the next to Esau's blessing. I am going over these as briefly as possible. The argument is a pertinent one and I propose to pursue it candidly and fairly. The object is to ascertain whether the charge that the schools of Manitoba are Protestant schools is well founded. I shall read none of these selections except those asked for, but if any hon. gentleman challenges my assertion that these scripture selections are not such as are especially favourable to the views of Protestants, we will examine them. The next selection relates to Jacob's vision and the next to Jacob's return to Bethel, and the next relates to Joseph and his brethren.

Mr. WALLACE. Will the hon. gentleman be kind enough to read that about Joseph and his brethren.

Mr. CHARLTON. This is from the 37th chapter of Genesis, the first twenty-two verses.

(Selection read.)

Mr. BERGIN. I rise to a question of order. I do not think that in my parliamentary experience I have ever seen anything so profane or so irreverent as the reading of the scriptures for such a purpose—not for the purpose of informing the mind, not for any good purpose, but for the purpose of obstructing the proceedings of this House. When a man reads the scriptures in that irreverent way and without the design of paying his duty to the Creator, he is doing that which he should not be permitted to do in any Christian assembly. It is not the act of a Christian man, but of a man who is prepared to use the scriptures for the most——

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. Be careful, he is an elder in our church.

Mr. BERGIN. Then the sooner you get rid of him the better. If he does not read the scriptures in a better spirit in church than he does here, he is not an ornament to the church.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Chairman, this attack is simply an outrageous one. The hon. gentleman has no right——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order; sit down.

Mr. MARTIN. Why should I sit down?

An hon. MEMBER. A point of order.

Mr. MARTIN. I am speaking to the point. The only irreverence that was shown was in the jeers and sneers with which the reading, which was made at the request of the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Belley)——

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. MARTIN. Yes; these sneers and jeers were the only manifestations of irreverence. The hon. gentleman is reading for a plain object. He is showing or attempting to show that the schools in Manitoba are not Protestant schools, notwithstanding what is said. He is attempting to show that the schools in Manitoba are not Protestant schools, and he is doing it by reading the selections which have been apportioned by the Manitoba government to be read in schools, to show that those selections are not at all of a sectarian nature, and consequently are not Protestant schools. The only indecency and irreverence that I can see in connection with the matter, are the jeers, and hoots, and sneers that came from the other side, when the hon. gentleman was attempting to read.

Mr. DAVIN. I may say that I do not think the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg do a great deal of credit, either to his intellectual training or to his parliamentary training. He himself, I believe, is an ex-teacher, but he knows well that what the member for North Norfolk is attempting to do is a logical impossibility, namely, to prove a universal negative.

Mr. WALLACE. In my opinion, the member for North Norfolk is successfully attempting to disprove a statement that has been made a hundred times in this House and out of it, that the schools established by the province of Manitoba are not what they profess to be, that is, non-sectarian, but that they are Protestant schools, in other words, sectarian. This assertion is made in spite of the decision of the Privy Council in the Barrett case, and in spite of the recent opinion given by their lordships of the Privy Council, that this School Act is non-sectarian.

Mr. ROBILLARD. They did not say the schools were non-sectarian, but that the Act was non-sectarian.

Mr. WALLACE. But the hon. member for North Norfolk is proving that schools, in practice, are not sectarian, as they are non-sectarian by law, and he is proving that by reading the selections from Scripture which may be read in the schools, to show that they are of a non-sectarian character. As I understand it, there is a question of order now before the committee, as to whether the member for North Norfolk is in order in reading those selections.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Mills, Annapolis). I would remind the committee that the question before the Chair is a motion made by the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), at ten minutes past three this morning, that this committee rise.

Mr. WALLACE. I think the question of order raised by the hon. member for Cornwall and Stormont (Mr. Bergin), must have escaped your attention, Mr. Chairman. I am speaking on that point of order, and contending that the hon. member for North Norfolk is strictly in order.

Mr. CRAIG. I think myself that the hon. member for North Norfolk is quite in order in reading these selections. But, at the same time, I think the hon. member for Assiniboia is perfectly in order in saying that the member for Norfolk is trying to prove a universal negative, and, unless he reads all the selections which are arranged for this purpose, he will prove nothing at all, because there might be one or two which he did not read, which would prove that these schools are Protestant. For myself, I have always held that the schools are not Protestant. I must say, however, that, when I heard the hon. member reading the Bible, it gave me a little shock, and I will tell you why. I believe in treating the Bible with reverence, I believe in reading the Bible. I believe it is given us to read for a certain purpose, and I hold that it is not treating the Bible with reverence to read it in this way. I think that reading it under the present circumstances is treating the Bible with irreverence.

Mr. WALLACE. The objection of the hon. member for East Durham is that it is not a matter of good taste for the hon. member for Norfolk to read the Bible. But on that question I think the hon. member for Norfolk will have to be the judge of his own action. After we have been discussing theological questions for a month, it seems to me a natural corollary that an hon. member should read some portions of the Scriptures to us, when he does so in order to prove that schools in Manitoba are not Protestant schools.

Mr. ROOME. You are trying to drive the Bible out of the schools.

Mr. WALLACE. In what way?

Mr. ROOME. By not allowing religious instruction in schools.

Mr. WALLACE. Will the hon. gentleman quote any chapter, or any verse, or any statement of mine, to show that I would not allow religious instructions in schools. Now, I contend that the member for North Norfolk is quite in order. It is to be remembered that the course of the Government in keeping us here night and day continuously, has prevented us from our usual devotions, and, if a member of Parliament will give us an opportunity, right in the House of Commons, of hearing the Scriptures read, I think we should be grateful to him.

Mr. FOSTER. It seems that the hon. member for York (Mr. Wallace) has had a total change of heart within a few weeks, for I remember hearing him express very different opinions regarding the hon. member for North Norfolk from those he now expresses.

Mr. WALLACE. I admit that when the hon. member for Norfolk gives expression to his heretical views on the trade question, no words that I can use are strong enough to express my condemnation for that hon. member, but when he reads these Bible selections for the purpose for which they are read, I must approve of his course.

Mr. FRASER. I do not think there is any rule in this House against reading the Bible. I think it would be better if that book was read oftener in the House. For myself, I see no objection to the hon. member for Norfolk reading these selections. I think, if the hon. member for York (Mr. Wallace) read that book more, he would be in full accord with the hon. member for Norfolk on the trade question, because the principles of that book lie at the foundation of the trade question, as we understand it. It is very charming to hear the member for East Durham speak about consistency. It did strike me as being rather singular conduct on the part of that hon. gentleman, who, after voting against the second reading of this Bill, has since done so much to help it along. The question is, whether an hon. member has a right to read selections from books used in the public schools. I would not, in a mixed community, have scriptural reading in the schools, because I think education is the duty of the state. But surely, if the selections are used, it is perfectly in order for an hon. gentleman to read them.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. The exception taken by the hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Craig) was that reference to scripture readings might be made, they should all be read, because fault might be found with some, although not with all.

Mr. FRASER. That would simply mean that the hon. member for North Norfolk should read the whole.

Mr. CRAIG. The hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Fraser) evidently believes in secular schools, as I do. I believe the Manitoba schools are not Protestant schools, and so does the hon. member for North Norfolk. What I said was this, while I believe the hon. member for North Norfolk is quite in order in reading these selections, Bible reading under present conditions is not very good taste. It is supposed that a good deal of this discussion is for purposes of obstruction, and a visitor to the House would suppose that a member who is reading from the Bible is taking time for obstruction purposes. In regard to my course, as to whether it has been a consistent one or not, the hon. members here know me, and I am known by the people of my constituency. I hold that my course has been perfectly consistent. I voted for the six months' hoist and against the second reading of the Bill. In doing so, I acted against the Government, but according to my convictions. I have watched the Bill in committee and taken part in the discussion, speaking on two clauses. I voted once with the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) and once with the Government, and I do not think I have been inconsistent. I have gone to bed regularly every night and have not stayed here to help the Government. I have been asked to join the obstructionists to the Bill, but I intend to maintain the independent course I have pursued, and watch the progress of the Bill, endeavouring to make it as perfect as possible, and then I shall vote against the third reading.

Mr. FRASER. I did not accuse the hon. gentleman of inconsistency, but I simply pointed out that the hon. gentleman was about the last man who should lecture members on consistency.

Mr. WALLACE. To one remark by the hon. member for Guysboro' I desire to take exception. The hon. gentleman said that if I had read the Bible more I would not have been such a strong protectionist. The hon. member passed over a certain chapter I observed, and I believe he did so because in it the policy of protection is advocated.

Mr. FRASER. Where is it ?

Mr. WALLACE It is the chapter which speaks of the storing of corn in the land of Egypt. This was protection, and by pursuing this policy Egypt became the greatest nation of the earth.

Mr. FRASER. This is a new style of theology. The hon. member for York sets himself up as a theological professor. But does not the hon. gentleman know that corn was stored in accordance with divine revelation, that there was going to be a seven-year famine in the land.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Mills, Annapolis). The hon. member for North Norfolk has the floor.

Mr. CHARLTON. I had not the remotest suspicion that I would have been accused of bad taste in illustrating an argument with respect to religious teaching in the schools in Manitoba by showing what the religious teaching actually was. The question is what is the character of the scriptural selections used in those schools. The only way of showing their character is to refer to the selections themselves. I gave the titles of the readings from the list contained in the Manitoba school regulations, and I said if any hon. member had doubt as to the character of any of the selections, they might be read. The selections from the Old Testament are historical and poetical. I pass from them to the selections taken from the New Testament. The first selection embraces the first eighteen verses of John, 1st chapter.

The hon. gentleman read the following list of selections :—

Mr. CHARLTON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have given you a list of these scriptural readings selected by the Manitoba school board for use in the public schools, to show that they are in no sense sectarian. I submit whether I have not proved the assertion that the religious curriculum in the public schools of Manitoba is in no sense a Protestant one, that none of the selections from either the Old or New Testament are sectarian in character, but that all are carefully selected for the purpose of avoiding religious prejudices on the part of any denomination. All these selections teach Christian doctrines and truths that are accepted by men of all sects who recognize and believe that Christ is the Head of the church, and the Redeemer of His people. Now, if this is the case, the argument against the schools, based upon the assertion that they are Protestant schools, falls to the ground. Of course, they are not Catholic schools. These selections are neither Catholic nor Protestant, but they are Christian, and the object of this curriculum is to make the public schools unobjectionable to any denomination. No man can object to teaching the doctrine that Christ is over all, no man can object to teaching the doctrine that there is a God, no man can object to the doctrine that Christ is divine, no man can object to the assertion that Christ died and rose from the dead, and made propitiation for sin. These are all the broad teachings that all classes of Christians accept; and the object of the Manitoba school board was to provide a system of religious readings that could not be really objected to by any class or sect of Christians; and they have succeeded. Now, if it is necessary to have these schools divided so that sectarian doctrines may be taught in them, of course the Manitoba school law does not meet the requirements. But I hold that it would be desirable if all sects would be content to accept a public school system where the religious teachings are unobjectionable to any, and are calculated to produce beneficial results upon all, and be content to have sectarian teaching given to their children in church, or in Sabbath school, or at home. Now, if it is true that proposals have been made by the Manitoba government to meet the objections made by the minority in Manitoba to the school law, if proposals have been made which will give to the Catholic minority in Manitoba substantially the same privileges enjoyed by Catholic minorities in other provinces, and in the North-west Territories, where, in each case, they are satisfied with those provisions; if that is true, then I say we have no business to proceed with this legislation until we have officially before this House, in the first place, the character of those proposals made by the Manitoba government; and in the second place, until we have ascertained whether the minority in Manitoba would accept those proposals as satisfactory. The Manitoba government has made a radical departure for the purpose of satisfying the objections of the Catholic minority, a departure which we have no right to assume the minority in Manitoba will not accept. I say it is an outrage upon the principles of fair-play and liberty for us to proceed in face of an attempt made by the Manitoba government to satisfy the requirements of the minority, an outrage for us to proceed, assuming that that proposal is insufficient, assuming that the minority of Manitoba will not accept it. I now, appeal to the Secretary of State to avert the calamity that threatens this country, and to adopt a common-sense course, by allowing this committee to rise, and by placing before this House the official offer of the Manitoba government, and by proceeding to ascertain whether that offer is acceptable to the Catholic minority.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I do not rise for the purpose of taking part in a discussion which seems to have been prolonged unnecessarily already. I rise for the purpose of seriously asking the leader of the House if he has not at last realized the solemn farce in which Parliament is now engaged. Parliament undertook to deal with this question some time ago. The second reading of the Bill was carried by a fair majority. The committee stage was reached, and yesterday morning at three o'clock, when it was time for all honest men to be in bed, the hon. gentleman persisted in pressing forward this Bill. A motion was made that the committee rise and report progress, and that question was discussed from three o'clock yesterday until 4.30 yesterday afternoon. Up to that time we undertook to discuss the Bill on its merits, and the committee sat till between three and four in the morning, time for every man to retire to bed. The Government refused to allow the committee to rise. I ask the leader of the House now, what has been accomplished from three this morning until 3.30 this afternoon ? Is it his desire that Parliament should become an object and subject of contempt ? Does he desire that the lives of hon. members should be jeopardized by the course he is pursuing ? I am aware that the hon. gentleman stated he was willing to die in his tracks in order to force the Bill through. The hon. gentleman may desire in his later days to be a martyr, but I venture to say there are not many hon. members who desire so to end their days. We are willing to give a reasonable time at reasonable hours for the consideration of this Bill and to discuss the various clauses on their merits. But the hon. gentleman must see, as everybody in the country sees, that instead of advancing the progress of the Bill by his policy, he is retarding its progress. What attention have members of the Administration been paying to this Bill for the last few nights ? It is quite manifest that any important Bill of this kind, involving complex clauses, every one of which is open to discussion, if passed in its present shape simply invites and courts litigation. It is important therefore in discussing the various clauses, that members of the Administration, especially those who have the Bill in charge or assisted in preparing it, should be in their seats in order to give the necessary explanations. I reached my seat in this House this morning at 9.30 a.m. The front bench was graced by the hon. member for Peterboro' (Mr. Stevenson) and the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills) with the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) sandwiched between them. Those were the only three members on the Ministerial benches; the second row was in a similar condition. How many Ministers were present ? The Minister of the Interior sat in his seat, like the last rose of summer blooming alone. Within a few minutes came in the Minister of Public Works, and he sat in his seat talking to the bard of the prairies, listening no doubt to his eloquent periods.

Mr. DAVIN. I rise to a point of order. I think the hon. gentleman is bound to refer to any hon. member in a given manner.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I referred to the hon. member for Assiniboia.

Mr. DAVIN. No.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). The Minister of Public Works remained five minutes, and then went out. The Minister of Railways came in for about ten minutes. He sat with the Clerk of the House, no doubt discussing constitutional law, and at the same time cracking jokes with the Chairman of the committee. That is the way the Government have been attending to the interests of the Manitoba minority. At twelve o'clock the Postmaster General came in. He was sympathized with by the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) on having been up all night, but he came in as fresh and brisk as he well could be, with his hair parted in the middle, well oiled and elaborately curled, and wearing a red rose in his buttonhole, as brisk as a bee, and as handsome as a daisy on a May morning. He remained ten minutes, and the place that saw him saw him no more. Then there is the Minister of Justice, who introduced the Bill, and was able to explain the various clauses. He was absent. Then there is the Secretary of State, the master-mind of the Cabinet, who moved the second reading of the Bill, and no doubt had posted himself thoroughly as to its contents, and the reason why the clauses were inserted. He was not in his seat. Like a wise man he was taking reasonable repose. The Minister of Marine was absent, the Minister of Trade and Commerce was absent, the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Prior) was in his place for a few minutes, and then disappeared. That is the way the Government have been attending to the interests of the minority in Manitoba, the minority whose interests they propose to conserve, in whose interest this Bill is being forced through the House in the last days of a dying Parliament ; and yet when an important discussion is before the House Ministers are not present to give the necessary explanations. I solemnly protest against hon. members being asked to sit day and night. It is unreasonable and unjustifiable, and the leader of the House can point to no instance since confederation except one occasion, and then the Ministers were present to give some explanations. No one knows better than the Secretary of State that this Bill has set the people of the Dominion by the ears. All the provinces are arrayed against the Dominion, and yet we are sitting here to force a Bill through Parliament which members are not able to consider with clear and unclouded intellects. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) submitted a reasonable proposition to the committee, and supported it with a clear and lucid argument, but the Government were not able to answer the proposition, and practically asked that the clause be allowed to remain over. Two or three clauses were then passed. Then we found there was a discrepancy between the clauses, and that it might be necessary to rescind a clause already passed. Surely this is ample evidence that Ministers should be present to explain the different clauses. It appears that the Government did not prepare the Bill, but that it was prepared by the solicitor of the minority in Manitoba. I have no objection to that, but I consider the Government should at least understand the nature of the clauses in the Bill. While I make these observations, I have been, and am now in favour of doing justice to the minority in Manitoba. If they have been deprived of rights they should be restored, but they should be restored by the authorities that took away those rights. I am satisfied from the conference that has taken place that if hon. gentlemen opposite had had wisdom, foresight and statesmanship we should never have reached the present situation. The whole matter would have been arranged by Manitoba making reasonable concessions to the Roman Catholic minority in the province. I remember reading a speech delivered by an ex-Minister of Justice in which he substantially stated that the Government had power and would exercise it. They have the power, they have tried to exercise it, and where are we to-day? The Government are on their marrow-bones asking Manitoba to give relief to the Catholic minority, while at the same time they are attempting to force this Bill through the House at the point of the political bayonet. The Government have a political bludgeon in the one hand and a flag of truce in the other, and they hope by that means to succeed in tiding over the difficulty. I have read many Bills submitted to Parliament, but a more crude and worse drawn Bill than this I never read, and I venture the prediction that if Parliament passes it in the interest of the minority of Manitoba, it will be the greatest curse which has ever been inflicted upon them. I venture the further prediction that if this Bill is passed and the Act ever finds its way to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, it will come back in such a shape that even the ex-Minister of Justice will not know it, that it will be mutilated, if not declared wholly beyond the competency of this Parliament to enact. If time permitted I would be able to show not only from the wording of the clauses of the Bill but from the authorities, that the Bill is unconstitutional, that it is beyond the purview of this Parliament, that it is ultra vires, and will not stand the test of a legal investigation. As the clauses come up I shall have an opportunity of pointing out those that are objectionable and ultra vires. Why are hon. gentlemen so anxious to push the Bill through this House in the dying hours of Parliament? Two reasons have been assigned by the leader of the House. One was that it was necessary justice should be done to the minority in Manitoba. The leader of the House tells us that justice must be done to the minority. I desire also that justice shall be done, but I am anxious that it should be done without the necessity of interference by this Parliament with the affairs of Manitoba, and with our present information and in the present condition of affairs. He declared also, if my memory serves me right, that the people were in favour of this Bill, and that would be shown in the next election, when the Government would sweep the country. The hon. gentleman has not been living in Canada, and does not know the position of affairs. He does not realize that he has practically destroyed that gallant phalanx that formerly stood behind him in this Parliament. He does not realize that in Ontario, in New Brunswick, in Nova Scotia and other provinces there is a power that has stood by the leader of the Conservative party for the last twenty-five years. I refer to the great body of Orangemen of this country. Representative bodies of that great order have been passing resolutions upon this subject, concerning which I venture to refresh his memory. As you know, Mr. Chairman, I am a young member of Parliament; I only came to the House on the 20th January, this year. In my constituency I had between 500 and 600 Irish and Scotch Roman Catholics. I respect and like them as men, and better as politicians, for they have been my friends from the first day I entered into a contest in the county of Huron. I declared on the public platform and in my address to the electors, that I was opposed to using a bludgeon of a coercive law to compel Manitoba to do what she did not want to do. And, in the face of that declaration, I polled from 75 to 80 per cent of the Irish Catholics of my county. And, from the assurances I have received since I voted against this Bill, I believe I shall poll 90 per cent of them, if I am a candidate in the next election. I would like to call the attention of the hon. leader of the House to the position of the Orange body on this question. The hon. gentleman is not in his place. You never find more than one member of the Government here at a time. They shirk their duty here, although they say that their object is to deal out justice to Manitoba. I find in the public press of 21st February last, that the Orange Grand Lodge of New Brunswick, sitting at Newcastle, adopted a resolution denouncing remedial legislation and authorizing a petition to Parliament to oppose its passage, at least until the people had declared their views at the polls. I am not an Orangeman. In many respects I do not sympathize with their sentiments. But I have many warm friends amongst them, who sometimes support me, and sometimes do not. But no resolutions, passed by any body of men, expressed views on this subject which seemed to me more sensible than these which I have referred to, protesting against the passage of this Bill until the views of the electors can be known. I find that the Grand Lodge of Nova Scotia met at Halifax on the 21st February of this year, and they passed the following resolution:—

> We, the Grand Lodge of Nova Scotia, in annual session convened, would reaffirm our attitude on the Manitoba school question, as said attitude finds expression in our declaration of April, 1895. Believing, as we do, in the principle of "equal rights to all and special privileges to none," and believing that the enactment > of such legislation as is outlined in the Bill of remedial legislation—so far as is known to us—is subversive of that principle, and believing that the Government and Parliament of Canada are under no constitutional responsibility or legal obligation to enact such remedial legislation, and believing that the separate school system has been constitutionally repealed by the legislature of Manitoba, which action has been overwhelmingly and repeatedly endorsed by the province of Manitoba, and that the policy of the separate school system is wrongful and unnational ; be it resolved, that this Grand Lodge utter no uncertain sound against any legislation whatever in favour of any system of separate schools, and against interference of whatever sort with any legislation that endorses the patriotic principle of national schools ; and be it resolved, that we urge upon all Orangemen to support only those candidates for parliamentary honours who pledge themselves to support non-interference.

I do not know whether the Minister of Justice is a grand master or even an humble member of the Orange order. I do not know whether he has any Orangemen in his county. But I commend to him this resolution of the Grand Lodge of his province. These things indicate that, instead of the result of the election being an overwhelming majority for the Government, one of the principal elements of its strength is broken. Whether I am in Parliament or not, I venture to say that they will not come back with more than a baker's dozen from Ontario.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. CAMERON. I can gauge the voices of hon. gentlemen that are crying "Oh, oh." I venture to say that ten out of eleven of those hon. gentlemen will not even face their electors. Now, there is another organization, and one in which, I am free to say, I take no stock. All the same, it is one that must be counted as an element in the election, especially in Ontario. I mean the organization known as the P.P.A. I understand, from the best authority, that they number about 300,000 votes in the Dominion. With the great body of the Orangemen and the P.P.A. in arms against the Administration, how can the hon. gentleman predict that he is coming back with an overwhelming majority ? I know that the hon. gentleman is a sanguine prophet, for I have listened to his prophecies, off and on, for thirty years. But I know that his prophecies never come true. I will read the resolution of the P.P.A. :

> Whereas meddlesome interference with the local government of any province by the Dominion Government is a source of danger to the stability of confederation, and also a menace to the integrity of the Empire ; therefore be it resolved, that the contemplated action of the Dominion Government in forcing a system of separate schools upon Manitoba against the will of the people of Manitoba as expressed by their representatives cannot be too strongly condemned.

So say I, though I have no sympathy with the P.P.A. We had a meeting of the Grand Lodge, of which the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) is the sovereign. At their meeting in July last, they passed a strong resolution on this subject. Is the Grand Lodge not to be taken into account in the politics of this country ? Verily, the leader of the House will find that the Grand Lodge and the various lodges are no small political factor. We had the great meeting in Toronto, one of the largest and most representative gatherings ever held, the attendance, I understand, being about 75 per cent Conservatives. We know what action they took, and we know that it was opposed to the policy of the present Administration. We know that when this policy was entered upon, the Administration were besieged with telegrams and letters of protest from all parts of the country. We know that the consequences even in the ranks of the Government were serious. Not only did the organization I have referred to pass resolutions opposing their policy, but the Conservative press all over the Dominion has spoken against them. The St. John "Sun," a Conservative paper, said :

> It must have struck any one who noticed the list of Ministers who have resigned and those who remain that the line of cleavage is made more by the school question than by anything else. Nothing could be more improbable than that Mr. Clarke Wallace or Judge Meredith or Professor Weldon could agree on the Manitoba question with Sir Mackenzie Bowell, Sir Adolphe Caron and Mr. Costigan, to say nothing of Mr. Kenny.

Commenting on the Victoria, B.C., election, it said further :

> The one issue which was raised against Mr. Prior was the Manitoba school question and the proposed coercion of the province by the Federal authorities. The result of the campaign affords additional evidence of the unpopularity of remedial legislation as the people understand it. It is causing Protestant constituencies to turn against the Government, and is not preventing Roman Catholic constituencies from going over to Mr. Laurier.

I trust they will continue to come over as rapidly as they have done for the past few months. I have no doubt that, when the election is over, my leader will find that many constituencies upon which he does not now count, will send representatives to stand by his side. The "Evening Star" says :

> The shadow of Sir Mackenzie Bowell, the assassinated, will fall upon every caucus and secret council of the party for years. Faith, the sense of security, reliance upon each other, are gone for a generation. Tricks and treasons will be suspected where they do not exist, and will exist where they are not suspected. Haunted by the wraith of a strangled leader, the party house will permit no repose to the red-handed. Peaceful sleep will be impossible, and waking ease out of the question. The soughing of the wind will be ominous ; the bellying curtain at the open window will suggest a hidden bravo ; the word of a man will be held worthless, and his > oath of small value. Before eating every dish will be tested for poison with the finger-ring of Machiavelli ; before sleeping, every couch will be probed with daggers, as in the palace of Henry VIII. Sir Charles Tupper is not the man to lay the ghost. It cannot be done in his generation, nor by one who was accessory before the fact. What is to be done to re-throne faith and to re-establish confidence ? Shall the men who introduced treachery at the hearthstone be made heads of the House or sent into exile ? Can they be exalted without treachery becoming the whole habit of the ambitious ?

Yet, in face of articles like this from organs of the Conservative party, the leader of the House has the assurance to tell us that he will return from the political contest with an overwhelming majority, prepared to force this Bill through Parliament, if it does not pass now. The Ottawa correspondent of the Hamilton " Spectator " says :

> The suggestion of a compromise between the remedials and antis is being talked over, and may eventually act like the atom of leaven that leavened the whole lump. It would not be the first time in politics that one party had successfully adopted a leading plank of the other party's policy for the good of the country. They are recalling stories of Beaconsfield's triumphs in that line across the water. The fact that Greenway and Laurier are advocates of a sensible way out of a difficulty should not be an insurmountable bar to the adoption of a similar course by the Conservatives. Nothing but personal feeling and stiffneckedness prevents an attempt on this basis.

The Hamilton " Spectator " further says :

> It is unfortunate for the Conservative party that its leader rushed into an alliance with bull-dozing bishops which has alienated Ontario. Will the Government go on with this suicidal policy ? Is the Conservative party to go to the country with an alliance of bull-dozing bishops ? Is the Conservative party, the success of which at the coming elections means the safety of trade, to be handicapped by an alliance with priests and bishops who cannot drive their flocks to the polls ? The failure of the bishops to coerce Laurier means that they will fail to coerce the people. It would be better for the Government to send Father Lacombe to take possession of his outrageous czardom in the North-west and tell him that that is all the Conservative party can do for the church just now. May we not hope that in view of recent developments, the Government will drop its insane intention of coercing Manitoba ?

The "Citizen," speaking in the days of trouble and turmoil, says :

> If Conservative sympathy in Ontario should receive a set-back from such voting as was done yesterday in Jacques Cartier, those who ought to be more interested in remedial legislation will only have themselves to blame.

Now, I have pointed out that not only the important Conservative organizations in the country, but the newspapers who have been the constant and steadfast supporters of the Administration, have taken the same ground. Why, I venture to assert that no respectable Conservative paper in the west sustains the policy of the Government, except the subsidized " Mail " of Toronto, and sometimes you cannot tell upon which side the " Mail " is. All the respectable Conservative papers, such as the " Spectator," and papers of that kind, have been denouncing the Government from the beginning down to the present hour. And yet, in face of the statement made by the friends of the Administration, and the organizations and organs supporting the Administration hitherto, the leader of the House, assuming the role of a prophet, predicts the return of his party to Parliament by an increased majority. Sir, I trust that Canada will be spared that infliction. We have had many inflictions, goodness knows, in our day, but that would be the most terrible infliction that ever overtook this grand country of ours. I trust and believe that a change for the better will take place ; I trust and believe that the difficulties that the Government has fomented in Manitoba by their unwise and unstatesman-like policy, will pass away when the hon. leader of the Opposition shall sit on the other side of the House. I believe that the wisdom and the sound common sense of the electors in Canada, from one end of it to the other, not excepting Assiniboia, will be true to the policy of the Liberal party, and will leave the Secretary of State and his friends at home.

Mr. CAMPBELL. We are discussing a Bill that the leader of this House declares to be the most important that was ever introduced into Parliament, a Bill of tremendous importance to the country. The Bill has 112 clauses, and no doubt it was a difficult matter to draw up such a Bill. I have no hesitation in saying that even the most competent man you could get to draw up a Bill on that subject, would find it an exceedingly difficult matter. But here you have entrusted this Bill to men who did not know what they were doing, who did not know what they wanted, and who have blindly gone on to present a Bill that every lawyer in the House says is no good at all, where one clause contradicts another, where one part of it is unconstitutional, where, after passing three or four clauses, the Government themselves admit that the Bill is imperfect, and one clause is left for further consideration. Is it not a great thing, this Cabinet we have in Canada ? We are paying a Minister of Justice $8,000 a year, and provide him with a deputy at a large salary, and with all the staff necessary to conduct his office, provided by the people of this country ; we have a Minister of Public Works, who is supposed to be a very brilliant lawyer ; we have the Postmaster General, another able and brilliant lawyer ; we have the Minister of the Interior, another man who stands at the very height of his profession ; we have also the Controller of Customs, who, as everybody knows, takes a high place at the bar ;

yet, notwithstanding all this legal talent, we find that this poor old Cabinet could not prepare this Bill themselves, but they had to send up and get Mr. Ewart from Winnipeg to come down and prepare it for them. Now, when it comes into the House of Commons, and when we ask a simple question about it, there is not a single man in the Cabinet who knows anything about it, they cannot explain it at all, and they say : We have sent for Mr. Ewart to come down from Winnipeg ; wait till Mr. Ewart comes. Mr. Ewart has come, and has been sitting in the galleries of the House for the last two or three days, when he is not consulting with the Government. They cannot tell us one single thing about it, and they have to ask Mr. Ewart why this clause was put in. Now, did you ever see such a farce ? Is that what the people of Canada pay these men for ? Is that the kind of Government we have, so helpless, so unfit for the positions they hold, that they have to send to Winnipeg and get Mr. Ewart to come down here and draw up a Bill for them ; and then, when the Bill is brought up in the House of Commons, the Minister of Justice, who ought to know all about it, does not know the first thing about it. The Minister of the Interior himself says : Wait till Mr. Ewart comes down ; he will be here in a few days, and he will tell us why it was put in. Did you ever see such an exhibition of a Government of Canada as we have to-day ? Could you imagine a more incompetent, a more helpless, a more incapable lot of men ? And to think that they are the combined intellect of the Conservative party ! They are the very cream of the Conservative party. The Conservative party has selected them as the very best men in their ranks, and we are paying them $8,000 a year each to conduct the affairs of the country ; and then we have to send to Winnipeg for Mr. Ewart to instruct them how to do their duty. The whole thing is a farce, and it is to pass such a Bill as this that the Government are forcing this House to sit night and day for a whole week. Now, who is responsible for this ? I see sitting in the House now many hon. gentlemen who were opposed to this Bill. I see the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) ; I see the hon. member for Lennox (Mr. Wilson) ; I see the hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Craig), and the hon. member for Dundas (Mr. Ross). Every one of these men have declared in this House that they are opposed to this Bill, that they believe it is a bad Bill, that it is a Bill fraught with great injustice to the people of Manitoba. And yet, strange to say, every one of these men are sitting in the House, night after night, and backing up the Government in forcing this Bill through. I say that their conduct is most inconsistent. I cannot imagine what the hon. member for Lennox can say to justify his conduct. He opposed the Bill. He says it is a bad Bill, it is a Bill that should not become law ; and yet he takes his turn like a little man, sitting twelve hours in the House, ready to vote down every motion that the Opposition may bring up. He is backing up the Government in forcing this debate to go on for a whole week ; and, when he goes back to Lennox, he will tell the people : Oh, I was opposed to the Bill ; it was a bad Bill ; it was a Bill that never should become law ; I voted against the second reading of that Bill, I voted for the six months' hoist. But he will not tell the people of Lennox that he sat day after day, and night after night, in the House of Commons, and supported the Government in forcing this Bill through.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Well, the people of Lennox will know whether the statements are untrue or not. I have been in this House, with the exception of a short time last night, since it met on Monday afternoon, and I have not heard that hon. gentleman say one solitary word against the course of the Government in insisting that this House should sit night and day. He is one of the gang who are willing to sit twelve hours a day to vote down motions made by the Opposition. Last Saturday the hon. gentleman moved that the Government should take Saturday in order to enable them to push forward the Bill. So anxious are some hon. members opposite to oppose the Bill that the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson), the hon. member for Lennox (Mr. Wilson), the hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Craig), and the hon. member for Dundas (Mr. Ross) voted to give the Government an extra day.

Mr. HENDERSON. The hon. gentleman is following the cue of the hon. member for Muskoka, and has apparently left the polished and able man who is the Opposition leader, and placed himself under the leadership of an hon. member whose position politically has not been known for some years past. The hon. gentleman repeated a charge which has been made against me a dozen times during the past few days, that of opposing the second reading of the Bill, and yet voting the Government an extra day for the purpose of pushing the Bill through the House. In regard to the resolution for taking Saturday, it simply stated that it was for Government business. But the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell) voted for a motion to give Saturday from 10 to 6 for the same purpose. Surely if I was inconsistent, so was the hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman must have been asleep during the last three or four days, and he could profitably occupy a little time in reading up his own record.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Read my name.

Mr. HENDERSON. I see the name of Campbell, and I believe there is only one Campbell in the House. Unfortunately, it is a French edition of the Votes I have. I find the hon. gentleman voted for Mr. O'Brien's motion to sit on Saturday from ten to six o'clock for Government business. The hon. gentleman says that was for the purpose of pushing through the Remedial Bill. I find the name of Campbell and McCarthy. The name of the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) is not there, because the hon. gentleman shirked voting for his motion. If I am responsible in any way for taking Saturdays for the Government, the hon. member for Kent is little less responsible, all the difference being a matter of three or four hours.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) can crawl through as small a hole as any member in this House. The hon. gentleman said that the Government took Saturday, but he did not know it was for the purpose of putting forward this Bill, but simply for Government business.

Mr. HENDERSON. The hon. gentleman assures the committee that it was well known Saturday was to be taken for the Remedial Bill. Nevertheless he voted for a motion to give Saturday from ten to six for the purpose of pushing through that measure.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The hon. gentleman must have known, when the leader of the House moved that Government business should have precedence on Saturday, that it was for the express purpose of pushing this Bill.

Mr. HENDERSON. That was why the hon. member for Kent voted for it.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The motion was made to take Saturday. I voted against that motion and the hon. member for Halton voted for it. The motion was that the House should meet on Saturday at ten o'clock and continue in session until one o'clock, then adjourn for an hour and then afterwards continue to sit until midnight.

Mr. HENDERSON. That was not the motion. Put it fairly.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Midnight was not stated, but we knew that the Government would sit until twelve o'clock. That is too small an objection. The motion came up, and the leader of the House stated that the Government were bound to pass this Bill, and it was necessary the House should sit on Saturday. The hon. gentleman not only moved that the House meet at three o'clock, but at ten o'clock in the morning, so as to obtain extra time. So anxious was the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson), notwithstanding all his professions, that this Bill should pass, that he actually voted for a motion that the House should sit at ten o'clock on Saturday morning.

Mr. HENDERSON. So did you.

Mr. WALLACE. If the hon. member will permit me, I desire to put the matter right. The statement has been made by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) that the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell) voted yea on the motion for the House to meet at ten o'clock on Saturday. When I gently reminded him a little while ago that he was not correct, he, in his overbearing and arbitrary manner, tried to push me down. I have the floor, and also a copy of the Votes and Proceedings. I find that Sir Charles Tupper moved that after Monday next, for the remainder of the session, the House should sit at ten o'clock, with a recess from one to two p.m., and that Government measures should have precedence. Among the yeas I find the name of the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson). Among the nays I find the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell).

Mr. HENDERSON. Read all the names.

Mr. WALLACE. I am calling attention to the vote on the motion to meet on Saturday. The hon. member for Halton voted yea on the motion to meet on Saturday at ten o'clock, and the hon. member for Kent voted nay, that the House should not meet at ten o'clock. The other point the hon. member for Halton was endeavouring to make was that the hon. member for Kent voted for the amendment of the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien). That amendment was that two should be struck out and 2.30 inserted, and that the House should stand adjourned at six o'clock. The hon. member for Kent voted for that motion.

Mr. HENDERSON. Hear, hear.

Mr. WALLACE. I do not see the point of that exclamation "hear, hear." The hon. member for Kent had either to support the amendment or the motion. The amendment was that the House should rise at six o'clock, and the main motion, in view of the straight declaration of the leader of the House in making the motion, was that the House should sit till midnight, and in fact it did sit until Sunday morning. That was the motion against which the hon. member for Kent voted. He had to vote either that the House should rise at six o'clock or go on till midnight, and he voted that it should rise at six o'clock. What does the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) make out of that ?

Mr. HENDERSON. If the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell) is right, the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) is wrong.

Mr. WALLACE. The member for West York is not on trial in this matter, and when the hon. gentleman chooses to make charges against him, the hon. member for West York will defend himself, and successfully too.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The House will now understand the position which the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) occupies. I voted, as has been explained by the hon. member for West York, against taking Saturdays. The hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) voted for it. Then a motion was made that the House instead of meeting at two o'clock, should meet at 2.30, and should adjourn at six o'clock. I had to vote for one motion or the other, and I voted for the motion giving the Government the shorter time, but the hon. member for Halton was not satisfied that the House should adjourn at six o'clock, he wanted every hour given to the Government, even until Sunday morning. That shows the consistency of the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson). No doubt he will go before his constituents and tell them that he voted against the Bill ; yet in every way possible he has assisted the Government in passing it, and he has been one of a gang to vote down every motion made from this side of the House. As to the hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Craig), he has undertaken to lecture hon. members on this side of the House on the subject of consistency. He also voted that the Government should take Saturday.

Mr. CRAIG. No. I think an hon. gentleman who rises to make charges should be careful that they are correct, because if I had been absent that statement might have gone uncontradicted, and it would have appeared on the record.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. Where was the hon. gentleman ?

Mr. CRAIG. I had to go home. I was paired with an hon. member. I was in the same box as the leader of the Opposition, who did not vote because he had to go away, and I do not blame him.

Mr. CAMPBELL. With whom was the hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Craig) paired ? The hon. gentleman must have seen the notice on the Order paper. He was, however, so anxious that the Government should press forward the Bill that he secured a pair.

Mr. CRAIG. I was paired against the Government.

Mr. CAMPBELL. With whom ?

An hon. MEMBER. Never mind.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Was it the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Coatsworth) with whom the hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Craig) was paired ?

Mr. CAMPBELL. The hon. gentleman cannot get out of it that way. He was so anxious that the Government should have an extra day that he secured a pair. I suppose he will tell his constituents the same story as the hon. member for Halton will tell his. Then there is the hon. member for Lennox (Mr. Wilson). How can he explain his vote ? He voted for the six months' hoist and professed to be opposed to this Bill. But he voted to give the Government an extra day to pass the Bill, and he sits for twelve hours a day and supports the Government that are trying to make this Bill a law. Then there are the members for East Toronto (Mr. Coatsworth) and Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn). I do not see the name of the hon. member for Centre Toronto on the division list. Was he paired?

Mr. COCKBURN. I thank the hon. member for the kindly interest he takes in me. The last time he devoted so much attention to me, he was deeply interested in the brushing of my hat and the polishing of my boots.

Mr. CAMPBELL. In which the people of Toronto were so much interested that the hon. gentleman heard nothing but "hat" for about three months after. Then there are the members for Hamilton (Mr. Ryckman and Mr. McKay), and the member for South Wentworth (Mr. Carpenter). But he, at least, is not so inconsistent as some of the hon. members I have referred to, because he voted for the Bill, and he is sitting here twelve hours a day to help to force it through. This attempt to force legislation through Parliament is an outrage upon this House. I lay the blame upon the leader of the House. I believe that he has been humbugging the people from the start ; my opinion is that he never had the slightest intention of having this Bill passed. The Government knew that the hon. gentleman from West York (Mr. Wallace) was bitterly opposed to the measure, and that many others on their own side were against it. Six months before this session was called, it was known on what day it would meet. Was it not natural to expect, under these circumstances, that the Bill would be ready for us ? But not only was it not ready but the very Cabinet split up into two factions. They resurrected the High Commissioner and put him at the head of affairs. But two months were allowed to pass before the second reading was passed, and it was not until after that that they moved to take any days for Government business, other than Tuesday and Friday, which are Government days always, from the beginning of the session. Then the second reading was moved by the leader of the House in a speech calculated to arouse opposition on every hand, and dealing with every subject except that before the House. For the last week or two, he has thought it well to occupy much time in speaking, and in making the most violent, abusive, and tantalizing speeches that have ever been heard from the leader of this House. If he were desirous of obstructing the progress of the Bill, he could not have taken a course more likely to accomplish that object. And now he insists that we shall sit day and night to pass this Bill, which, as I have said, is a most outrageous proceeding. Mr. Chairman, you have occupied that Chair from three o'clock on Monday afternoon until now, five o'clock on Wednesday afternoon, and I think it time for the committee to rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again. Therefore, I shall support the motion.

Mr. WILSON. I understood that this session of Parliament was called not only to pass the Remedial Bill, but to do the ordinary work of the session. I came prepared to do my share of that work, and I think that if those opposed to remedial legislation had taken as much pains to help on the business as they have taken to prevent its progress, we should not have found it necessary to call another session immediately after the election, to pass the Estimates. I voted to take Saturday for the business of the House. I have done that ever since I have been in Parliament. When the Government can spare the time to give attention to legislation, I think it better that we should be here attending to our parliamentary duties than walking around the streets doing nothing. I was attacked in the newspapers because I did not happen to be here on Saturday, after having voted for a sitting on that day. I regret to say that I had to go home on account of the serious illness of one of my sons. My position on the Remedial Bill is known, not only in this House, but by my constituents. But the House, having passed the second reading by a substantial majority, and having gone into committee on the Bill, my duty seemed to me clear. I take the position stated by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), when he said that he would use his best efforts to make the Bill as good as possible, and, when it came to the third reading, oppose it as he did on the second reading. I hold myself free to vote for such clauses in the Bill, or such amendments to them, as I think will make the Bill most perfect, believing that if we are to have such a Bill it is desirable that we should have as good a Bill as we can make. I entirely disagree with the statement of the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell) that this Bill, once passed, cannot be repealed or amended by Parliament. That seems to me a most unreasonable thing to say. Some hon. gentlemen have taken the position that this Parliament has no right to deal with the Bill. If that is so, then we have no right to do any of the business of the country. We were elected for five years, and that period has not yet expired. Our constituents have entrusted us with the duty of carrying on the public business for that length of time. It will not be long before we have a general election, and the hon. member for Kent will have to go before his electors, like the rest of us. He will have an opportunity of explaining whether it is in part through his obstruction that an extra session is necessary, which will involve an additional cost of $500,000 to this country. When the new Parliament is elected, if it is found that the majority have been elected opposed to this legislation, the Bill can be repealed or amended. The Government knows my position. I oppose this legislation because I am against interference with provincial rights. I believe that those entrusted with the management of provincial affairs, being on the ground, and knowing the local conditions, are better able to manage those affairs than is a body like this, composed of men from all parts of the Dominion. I voted for the six months' hoist and against the second reading, and I expect, if I live, to vote against the third reading.

Mr. CASEY. I propose to make some remarks regarding the conference which took place in Winnipeg last week between the delegates of this Government and the Manitoba government. The official proceedings of that conference have not yet been given to this House, although I believe they have been produced in the Senate. I believe their tenor is that these commissioners were authorized as plenipotentiaries by this Government to make such arrangement as would satisfy the Catholic minority in Manitoba. When these delegates arrived in Winnipeg, they put themselves at once in communication with the Manitoba government. They were treated with great courtsey, and they had every reason to expect success. I must ask the Secretary of State to remain in his place for a short time, as I have a serious charge to make against him, to which I shall ask him to reply. I see he has gone out now, but I expect he will return and will answer the charges I am about to make. Although the documents I have in my hand are taken from the newspapers, their genuineness is attested by the Minister of Justice. At the end of the proposal made by the Dominion delegates to the Manitoba delegates we find this clause :

> A written agreement having been arrived at, and the necessary legislation passed, the Remedial Bill now before Parliament is to be withdrawn, and any rights and privileges which may be claimed by the minority in view of the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council shall, during the due observance of such agreement, remain in abeyance and be not further insisted upon.
> March 28th, 1896.

This was signed by the three delegates of the Dominion Government, and is dated March 28th. That was the basis of consultation agreed to by the delegates, who had full plenipotentiary powers from this Government. They promised that if an agreement in writing was reached between them and the Manitoba delegates, the Bill now under discussion would be dropped, and the rights of the minority in Manitoba, whatever they might be, would remain in abeyance. The answer to that proposal came from the Manitoba delegates a day or two later, and after some proceedings had taken place in this House, and they remonstrated against the fact that faith had not been kept with them. The remonstrance was addressed to the Dominion delegates and signed by the Manitoba delegates :

> Gentlemen,—We have had under consideration the memorandum handed to us on the 28th inst., containing your suggestions for settlement of the Manitoba school question, and have the honour to submit herewith our reply thereto.
> We desire, first, to refer to the understanding upon which the conference was proceeded with. You will remember that we thought it necessary before proceeding with the discussion of the question involved, to stipulate :
>
> 1st. That while the conference was proceeding the Remedial Bill now before Parliament should be held in abeyance, and no proceedings taken thereon in the meantime, provided that the conference did not extend beyond Tuesday next.
> 2nd. That in the event of an agreement being reached for settlement the Remedial Bill should be at once withdrawn, and the execution of the terms of the agreement left to the parties. These stipulations were agreed to by yourselves without hesitaion, but notwithstanding such agreement, and in violation of its terms, the Remedial Bill was advanced a stage in the House of Commons on Saturday morning. While not desirous of taking any advantage of this departure from the conditions upon which the negotiations were opened, we deem it due to ourselves to protest against the course thus pursued by the Government by which you were commissioned.

I think they had reason to protest. Not only had a stage been taken with the Bill, but after that commission was appointed, and when the Secretary of State was questioned across the floor of the House in connection with the matter, he declared his intention to go on with that Bill, no matter what might be the results of the negotiations at Winnipeg. He declared that it would be forced on, that he would be willing to sacrifice his life to pass the Bill, no matter what might be the result of the proceedings in Winnipeg. At the same time, his commissioners up there had authority to propose, and did propose, and obtained their consultation in virtue of the proposal, to stop this Bill until the negotiations were concluded. Even at the very time this protest was made, the Secretary of State, speaking in the House about it, said :

> I may say in reply that when the Government announced that they proposed to open negotiations with the Government we distinctly stated that it was our intention to continue to press the passage of this measure. The hon. gentleman knows that we are not occupying the position a Government usually occupies with regard to Parliament.

Then he went on to point out that the short time left before the expiry of Parliament, necessitated haste, and he added :

> If this measure which is now before the committee becomes law, it will be a comparatively simple matter for the government of Manitoba to make such arrangements as will prevent its being brought into operation.

That is, he proposed to pass the Bill first, and then allow the Manitoba government to avoid it by legislation of their own. He continues :

> But if it is to become law, it must be proceeded with steadily until concluded.

This was the language of the gentleman who had authorized his delegates to propose a cessation in dealing with that Bill in this House during the negotiations. It was pointed out to him at the time that it was absurd to attempt to negotiate with a club in one hand and a sugar-plum in the other, with the government of Manitoba, who could not, with decent self-respect, accede to that, and it appears they did not accede to it. They only negotiated on the strict understanding that pending the conference, the Bill would not go on. The Secretary of State continued further—and this is a phrase to which I call the attention of his French supporters :

> If, on the other hand, it was abandoned or withdrawn, and the time lost by putting it upon the statute-books, and the negotiations did not succeed, the minority in Manitoba would be left in the same deplorable and helpless position in which they have been for the last five years. Under these circumstances, the Government proposed to press this measure with all the vigour and energy in their power until it is placed on the statute-books.

At the same time his delegates in Manitoba made this offer, which I read a few moments ago. That is, while he says in the House that they must necessarily go on and pass the Bill, his delegates in Manitoba are promising a cessation of proceedings, while the conference lasted, and that it should not go on at all, but be held in abeyance if an agreement was made between the consulting powers. There I charge an act of absolute bad faith, and to show that it was an inexcusable act of bad faith, I am going to read you another statement of the delegates, in which, while they admit bad faith, they confess themselves unable to account for it. In answer to the remonstrance of the Manitoba delegates, they said :

> Winnipeg, 31st March, 1896.
> Honourable Clifford Sifton, Honourable J. D. Cameron :
> Gentlemen,—We beg leave to acknowledge your communication dated yesterday, and written in reply to our suggestions for settlement of the Manitoba school question. We regret to find that there has been some misapprehension as to any understanding upon which the conference was proceeded with.

Mark these words, "the understanding upon which the conference was proceeded with." The conference was only proceeded with on the understanding that this Bill should be suspended in the House. They continue :

> As to the first of those matters mentioned by you, we understand the facts to be that you insisted that no further consideration of the Remedial Bill should be pressed for by the Dominion Government until to-day (Tuesday), and that we directed your attention to the announcement to that effect in the newspapers of the day, and having every desire to meet your wishes we further promised to communicate with the Dominion Government asking that the Bill be not taken up on Friday. This communication we sent, and we were as much surprised as yourselves to find that late on the night of the Friday sitting the Bill was advanced a stage.

That was the night we passed the Bill 'pro forma' into committee.

> We cannot say what consideration forced the Government to the conclusion that this step was necessary and we sincerely regret that any misunderstanding has arisen as to a point upon which we carried out what we believed to be our engagement, and upon which we did all we could to have your wishes observed.

I may say the delegates have cleared their own skirts from the charge of bad faith. They made the offer in good faith to suspend the Bill. They notified their principals that they had made that offer. That offer was binding on those principals here on account of the plenipotentiary authority these ambassadors had received. In spite of that, the leader of the Government in this House broke loose from all engagements made by his ambassadors, and on that particular Friday night, after getting notice of this arrangement, he took the Bill a stage further in this House. I ask you if any clearer case of bad faith, of breach of solemn agreement, was ever brought home to any individual than this which is brought home to the Secretary of State by his own ambassadors at Winnipeg. I asked the hon. gentleman before he went out to remain and explain this act of deliberate bad faith on his part. When he does come back to this House I am ready for him, and ready with the proof out of the mouth of his own commissioners, to show that he broke the agreement they had made in his name. There was bad faith exercised, also, towards the French supporters of the Government, who profess to be anxious in regard to the Manitoba minority. We have the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Ouimet), saying that we must go on with the Bill. This is evident from the following remarks made on March 24th :—

> When the Bill is passed a compromise can be arrived at between the majority and the minority which will cause all the dissatisfaction on the part of the minority to disappear, and will be the means of restoring peace among the people of Manitoba, and I may add that the Catholics may not after all be so very exacting. If a compromise is possible, it will be made easier because under this law the minority will have a guarantee so long as this law remains on the statute-book.

Mr. LAURIER. Then you want both the compromise and the law.

Mr. OUIMET. If these concessions are withdrawn from the minority, they will have a right to fall back on this law, and have independent schools, to which they are entitled, as decided by the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Does the hon. gentleman maintain that if Manitoba should make this concession, this Parliament would have the right to go on and legislate ?

Here is the Minister of Public Works declaring that the Bill must be proceeded with whether an agreement is arrived at or not, when, at that very time, the Dominion commissioners were promising the Manitoba government to let the Bill remain in abeyance. This is a breach of good faith between the Minister of Public Works and his supporters. Of course, the proposal of the commissioners was made with the consent of the Minister of Public Works, as a member of the Government. The Government were notified what the commissioners were doing, and they knew what they were doing at the very time these remarks were made in the House. If the hon. gentleman was not prepared to agree with the Government's action, it was his duty to have left the Cabinet. He will have to explain to his French supporters why the Dominion commissioners were proposing to suspend the progress of the Bill at the very time when he declared it must be pushed through Parliament.

I have arraigned the hon. gentleman, not on my own accusation, but on the accusation of his plenipotentiaries, who state that there is no excuse for this action on the part of the Government. This is one of the blackest incidents of bad faith known in our political annals. The conference was summoned, and delegates attended from the Dominion and Manitoba governments. Proposals were made by both sides, and I call attention to them with a view of showing some interesting points. In the first place, I intend to show there was a reasonable inclination shown by the Manitoba government to consider the question, to make considerable changes in the school regulations. Further, it is apparent that the proposals of the Manitoba and Dominion governments do not differ very much on points essential to the interests of the minority in that province. They differ in some important particulars, but the differences are not vital to the interests specially concerned. If those two bodies of commissioners, coming together under circumstances so unfavourable to negotiations, one party making threats to the other, and the other irritated by the threats, were able to come so near together, it is absolutely certain that a settlement could have been reached under different auspices. If the Government had taken the advice of the hon. leader of the Opposition years ago, and consulted Manitoba, an agreement would have been reached. If the Government had carried out their promise of last session to negotiate during vacation, a settlement could have been reached. If the Government, at the opening of this session had acted judiciously, a settlement could have been reached.

I contend, however, that the Government deliberately avoided entering into negotiations. The Premier visited Manitoba and the North-west, and inspected mission schools, and saw bright and pretty children, and, in fact, saw every person and thing of importance in the North-west except Premier Greenway, who was the principal person whom he should have seen. The Government ship has drifted so far towards the lee shore that the crew are compelled at the last moment to send a boat with three of the shipwrecked crew to beg help from the Manitoba government. No one would have been surprised if that government had said : "You are on a lee shore and refuse to save them from shipwreck." But the Manitoba government met them in a spirit of justice, generosity, and fair-play, as the Minister of Justice openly declared. The Government are keeping this question for the elections, and it remains to be seen how far they will succeed. The Government commissioners proposed as follows :—

Suggestions for settlement of Manitoba school question from Dominion commissioners for Manitoba government.

1. Legislation shall be passed at the present session of the Manitoba legislature to provide that in towns and villages where there are resident say, twenty-five Roman Catholic children of school age, and in cities where there are, say, fifty of such children, the Board of Trustees shall arrange that such children shall have a school-house or school room for their own use, where they may be taught by a Roman Catholic teacher, and Roman Catholic parents or guardians, say, ten in number, may appeal to the Department of Education from any decision or neglect of the board in respect of its duty under this clause, and the board shall observe and carry out all decisions and directions of the department on any such appeal.

2. Provisions shall be made by this legislation that schools wherein the majority of children are Catholics should be exempted from the requirements of the regulations as to religious exercises.

3. That text-books be permitted in Catholic school such as will not offend the religious views of the minority and which from an educational standpoint shall be satisfactory to the advisory board.

4. Catholics to have representation on advisory board.

5. Catholics to have representation on the board of examiners appointed to examine teachers for certificates.

6. It is also claimed that Catholics should have assistance in the maintenance of a normal school for the education of their teachers, the existing system of permits to non-qualified teachers in Catholic schools to be continued for, say, two years, to enable them to qualify, and then to be entirely discontinued.

7. In all other respects the school at which Catholics attend to be the same as the public schools and subject to every provision of the Education Acts for the time being in force in Manitoba.

I summarize these suggestions as follows :— 1. Separate tuition in separate schools where twenty-five Catholics demanded it in the country, or fifty in the city, that tuition to be by a Catholic teacher. 2. Where there is a majority of Catholics their children are to be exempt from religious exercises. 3. Inoffensive text-books for Catholic schools. 4. Catholic representation on the advisory board. 5. Catholic representation on the examining board. 6. Aid to Catholic normal schools. 7. In all other respects the schools to be public schools.

I wish to read Manitoba's proposals, and to show that they really grant, in substance, about what the Dominion commissioners asked for so far as the interests of the minority are concerned, though they might not grant all demanded by the prejudice of other parties :—

Our proposition is in the form of an alternative :

First—Should it be accepted as a satisfactory measure of relief to the minority, and as removing their grievances, we hereby offer to completely secularize the public schools system, eliminating religious exercises, and teaching of every kind, during school hours. We desire it to be understood in connection with this proposition, that it is made as a compromise offer, and not as embodying the policy the government and legislature of the province are themselves desirous of pursuing. We are willing, however, to adopt such a measure in order to attain a settlement of the dispute.

Second—In the alternative, we offer to repeal the present provisions of the School Act relating to religious exercises, and to enact in substance the following :—

No religious exercises or teaching to take place in any public school, except as provided in the act. Such exercises or teaching, when held, to be between half-past three and four o'clock in the afternoon.

If authorized by resolution of the trustees, such resolution to be assented to by a majority, religious exercises and teaching to be held in any public school between 3.30 and 4 o'clock in the afternoon. Such religious exercises and teaching to be conducted by any Christian clergyman, whose charge includes any portion of the school district, or by any person satisfactory to a majority of the trustees, who may be authorized by said clergyman to act in his stead ; the trustees to allot the period fixed for religious exercises or teaching for the different days of the week, to the representatives of the different religious denominations to which the pupils may belong, in such a way as to proportion the time allotted as nearly as possible to the number of pupils in the school of the respective denominations. Two or more denominations to have the privilege of uniting for the purpose of such religious exercises. If no duly authorized representative of any of the denominations attend the regular school, work to be carried on until four o'clock.

No pupil to be permitted to be present at such religious exercises or teaching if the parents shall object. In such case the pupil to be dismissed at 3.30.

Where the school room accommodation at the disposal of the trustees permits, instead of allotting different days of the week to different denominations, the trustees to direct that the pupils shall be separated, and placed in different > rooms, for the purpose of religious exercises as may be convenient.

> We believe that the foregoing proposal will remove any well-founded grievance.

It is not my business to say whether this would remove every well-founded grievance, but I do say it goes a long way in that direction. It would effect about as much in the interests of the minority as the course proposed by the Dominion Government. If there had been time enough, and good faith on both sides, an arrangement would have been reached. There would have been time enough if this Government had begun negotiations during the recess, or even during the early days of this session. The good faith was not broken by the delegates on either side ; that should be said in justice to those delegates, but by the principals of the Dominion delegates. In the first place, there was delay in beginning the negotiations, then bad faith when negotiations were begun, and in the third place, such a spirit manifested here that it would have been a matter of surprise to everybody if an agreement had been reached. What a blessing it would have been to this country if an agreement had been made. It would have removed this question from the arena of politics, the elections might have been already over, and the new Parliament sitting, and, above all, the irritation between races and creeds would have been avoided.

Mr. LAURIER. I merely rise to renew what I said yesterday—to point out to the Government that they will gain nothing whatever by the coercive efforts they are making to railroad this Bill through the House. Every member of this House is disposed—at any rate, I speak for the members on this side—to give to this Bill fair and legitimate consideration. This is the time for business, and I am disposed to give full consideration to the measure. But once more I repeat to the hon. gentleman that when it comes to two or three o'clock in the morning, it is unjust, unreasonable and cruel to ask members of this House to sit longer, and particularly so to ask them to sit for twenty-four hours a day, and, for my part, I am not disposed to do it. The hon. leader of the House must have some consideration for the health and convenience of hon. members. Let the hon. gentleman remember, as I told him yesterday, that the Government has consulted their own convenience in the time of bringing down this measure. If they chose to bring it down late it is not the fault of the Opposition, it is the fault of the Government. Once again I enter my protest against the action of the Government. I intend, when it comes to two or three o'clock in the morning, that a motion shall be made for an adjournment that we may go where all honest men should be at that time, in bed.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I regret that I had not the pleasure of hearing the observations of the hon. leader of the Opposition. But I desire to recall the credit I gave him a few days ago when I came into this House and found the hon. gentleman making a proposal that the question before the Chair should be removed, and that the House should take the Bill up and proceed with it seriously. I gave the hon. gentleman more credit than he deserved. I am afraid I assumed, accustomed as I am to say exactly what I think, that the hon. gentleman really intended to assist the Government in putting down and removing the obstruction which the House had shown was unpalatable to it. But when I find that from that time to this, the hon. gentleman has succeeded in bringing those of his followers over whom he still claims to have some influence to maintain the most constant and persistent obstruction ever known in any Parliament of the world, I feel bound to say that I believe that the hon. gentleman is at this moment in the closest possible alliance with the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), and is co-operating with him to the utmost of his ability in bringing every follower whose allegiance he can obtain to obstruct this measure and prevent it becoming law. I am reluctantly forced to that conclusion, and I admit frankly that the attitude in which I found the hon. gentleman when I entered the House a few days ago misled me. When we went into commmittee what happened ? Every person knows, it was manifest, that time was taken up with matters comparatively of no moment. Every possible captious objection that could be presented was brought up, while ostensibly we were dealing with the question before the committee, and it became perfectly obvious to every hon. gentleman that it was only obstruction in another form. From that time to this the hon. gentleman's followers have persistently obstructed the business of the House ; and the hon. gentleman will have to stand before the members of this House as well as before the people of the country as being in close alliance with the hon. member for North Simcoe and the small contingent who do his bidding, as acting in the most complete concert with that hon. member in endeavouring to prevent by every means this effort on the part of the Government and their supporters in this House to do justice to the minority in Manitoba. I do not envy the hon. gentleman his position. I have had letters from most respectable sources——

Mr. LANDERKIN. Produce them.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I can produce them, too. I will tell the hon. gentleman the contents. They were to this effect :—It is true you are standing in the face of the most determined obstruction that a Government ever was called upon to meet in this country, but you are not losing your time ; honest Grits all over the country are every day being made into good Conservatives.

And I tell the hon. gentleman that instead of doing his own work, instead of promoting the interests of his party, instead of increasing the prospects of the Liberal party obtaining power in this country, every hour the hon. gentleman spends in this gross, palpable obstruction of the business of the House, he takes the best and most effective means he can to prevent his ever reaching power in this country. He is showing to this House, he is showing to the people of the country, his entire unfitness to occupy a position of responsibility in reference to the affairs of this country. If he thinks by this means to turn the public attention away from the changing, the chameleon-like policy he has pursued in the past, showing that he was ready to go east, west, north or south on the great fiscal and commercial question before the country if it would only afford the least chance of his obtaining power—if he thinks he is going to turn the public mind away from the incapacity to grasp the true interests of the country in those great matters which make for the progress and prosperity of Canada, he is entirely deceived. The position the hon. gentleman occupies to-day is one showing his utter incapacity to discharge the duties of a leader of a loyal, constitutional opposition. The hon. gentleman knows that it is just such conduct as he is responsible for in this House to-day that has forced the Parliament of England to adopt the cloture. The hon. gentleman knows that a comparatively small body of men in the House of Commons in England forced Parliament to adopt that extreme measure. I can tell him more. I have the authorities under my hand to show that in New Zealand a similar course to that the hon. gentleman has adopted in relation to this measure was struck down by the Speaker of the House. When the business was prevented from being carried forward in committee, the committee rose, and the Speaker took the Chair and disciplined the obstructives as a necessary measure in defence of parliamentary government and parliamentary principle. And I can only say, Sir, that the course the hon. gentleman is taking in this House is not only outraging the sense of justice of this Parliament but it is outraging the sense of justice and fair-play and sense of public duty of every right-minded man in this country. The hon. gentleman knows that he is taking advantage, that he is taking unfair advantage of the fact that the duration of this Parliament is so limited to endeavour to prevent those of his own race and his own religion receiving justice, after long years of suffering, after long years of being deprived of the privileges enjoyed under the law and constitution of the country, even though the supreme tribunal, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in England, have decided that their rights and privileges are invaded. Yet, Sir, the hon. gentleman, by the most palpable and unfair obstruction, under the peculiar circumstances in which this House is placed, is determined to put on record before the House and the country that he cares not who suffers, he cares not what race they are of, he cares not what religion they are of, he cares not what their sufferings may be; in a vain attempt to grasp power in this country, he is willing to let them suffer, and to let them take the consequences. The hon. gentleman, by his alliance with the hon. member for North Simcoe, may succeed in preventing this Bill from becoming law: but if he does succeed by the means he and his co-conspirator are adopting——

Mr. MULOCK. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. It is six o'clock.

Mr. MULOCK. Well, if you will hold the point of order good after recess, you may leave the Chair.

Committee rose, and it being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

House again resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Chairman, I was about concluding my observations in reference to the obstruction that has been offered to the Government in relation to this measure, when the proceedings were interrupted by the arrival of six o'clock. I mentioned that this matter of obstruction had been regarded in a very serious light in other legislatures, and I will now take the opportunity of drawing the attention of the House to a very high authority on the course that was pursued in the colony of New Zealand. I quote from an authority that is recognized, not only in this country, but I am happy to say in every country where British institutions exist, that of Dr. Bourinot, under the head of "Suspension of Members." I will deal with that subject a moment later.

Mr. LANDERKIN. We will not take any action just now.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No. Perhaps the hon. gentleman may accept this as a significant hint. In the work on "Parliamentary Government in the British Colonies" by Alpheus Todd, who has long been recognized as a distinguised authority on these subjects, I find, on page 70, the following statement in reference to the action taken in New Zealand. The cloture had been practically in force in Victoria and in the New Zealand House of Representatives, but it had been abandoned; and they stood in precisely the same position in which this House stands now. But, says Mr. Todd:

> Nevertheless, in September, 1881, the New Zealand House of Representatives dealt summarily and successfully in putting down persistent obstruction by a small body of its members.

I call the attention of the House to this fact, because there has already been placed on the Journals of this House a majority of 99 to 7 on this question of obstruction, and of preventing the due consideration of this measure :

> They had been kept continuously sitting from 2.30 p.m. on Wednesday, August 31, until 5 minutes to 5 p.m. Saturday, September 3, in Committee of the Whole, after a 48 hours' sitting during which time 23 motions, alternately to report progress and to leave the Chair, had been negatived.

I am quite sure that quite as many motions of the same character during the discussion of this question have been put and negatived. I call the attention of the committee to this fact, that in New Zealand, in a precisely similar case :

> The Chairman interposed and refused to receive any more such motions. A member resisted his authority, whereupon he left the Chair and reported the disorderly conduct to the House. The House resolved this member to have been guilty of contempt. Then the Speaker severely reprimanded him, and in so doing he dealt a severe and sufficient blow against this defiance and decorum and abuse of the freedom of debate. He asserted and maintained the inherent right of the House to control its own rules and not permit them to be notoriously abused.

That I draw the attention of the committee to as the course taken in a British colony, probably the most important next to Canada to be found in the British Empire. Now, Sir, I will make the quotation I was about to make from Dr. Bourinot's work on " Parliamentary Procedure," page 189, bearing upon the same subject :

> Expulsion is an extreme penalty only to be enforced under extraordinary circumstances. In cases of minor gravity, the House may be satisfied with ordering the Speaker to admonish or reprimand the offender, and the remarks of the Speaker ought always to be entered on the Journals after motion duly made. The House may also, under certain circumstances, proceed to the rigorous measure of suspending a member temporarily from his functions. " There is no doubt," says an authority " that under the common law of Parliament any member, wilfully and vexatiously obstructing public business, would be held to be guilty of a contempt of the House, and would be liable to a suspension from his duties as a member." The rights of electors are no more infringed than if the House had exercised its unquestionable power of imprisonment. No necessity has ever arisen in the Canadian Parliament for exercising this extreme power which ought clearly to be used only in a grave emergency. It has, however, been necessary to adopt a new standing order on the subject in the English House of Commons, on account of the conduct of certain members who have wilfully and persistently obstructed public business.

Now, Sir, I do not believe that in the records of the House of Commons of the United Kingdom a more persistent attempt at obstructing public business has ever been exhibited than that which we have seen in this House. I call attention to the fact that in New Zealand the very course that has been followed here, of persistently moving again and again and again that the committee rise and report progress, for the avowed purpose of obstructing public business, was dealt with ; and the House resolved that persistently obstructing public business in that way was a contempt of the House. I have drawn the attention of the House to the fact that in this very question, when the motion was put in the strongest form that the House should have an opportunity of going on for the purpose of carrying through this measure, the House resolved, by a majority of 99 to 7, against the motion that was placed before the House for the purpose of obstruction. I do not think it is necessary to say more, Sir, than that the Government under these circumstances have felt that they have only one duty to themselves, one duty to the House, and one duty to the country to perform ; that is, steadily and persistently and to the utmost extent of their power, to press forward this measure upon the consideration of the House. A suggestion has been made by hon. gentlemen opposite that we should go out of committee. That has been tried before on several occasions ; but hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House know that advantage has been taken of the committee rising, when the motion was made to go into committee again, to waste day after day of the time of the House in obstructive motions intended to prevent the House getting back into committee or any business being done. The Government have patiently, steadily and to the utmost of their power done all that it was possible for any government to do to advance this measure. They have shown that they are ready, at the sacrifice of their comfort and their rest, and even at the danger of their health, to do all that is possible to carry this important measure, which has been placed before the House under circumstances of an abnormally difficult character. Owing to the very short period that remained of the session, they found that there was no alternative. If there was any hope or chance of advancing this measure, the only hope lay in going into committee and remaining there until such substantial progress was made with the Bill as would show that hon. members had at last come to the conclusion to avoid obstruction and not take advantage of the position of the session to prevent this measure becoming law. It is just as painful to the Government, as it can be to any member on either side of the House, to be compelled to resort to such an extreme measure as continuously to remain in session for so long a period. But no other alternative remained, if there was any hope of this measure being dealt with, and of Parliament being allowed—not the Government, but Parliament, which has, by an overwhelming majority, demanded that we have an opportunity of passing this important measure—to dispose of it before this session closes.

Mr. LAURIER. Mr. Chairman, let me at once assure the hon. gentleman, who, before six o'clock, gave to the House such a sorry and sad exhibition of impotent and unseemly rage, that he will ever earn my gratitude for his vituperation, and that I shall ever feel obliged to him, if he will spare me his encomiums. Yesterday, the hon. gentleman, in a rare moment of candour, for once spoke the truth, when, referring to myself personally, he gave me the credit of not having been guilty of any obstruction to the measure now before the House. I must say, knowing the hon. gentleman as I know him, and hearing him for once speak the truth of an opponent, I thought, reviewing my course, that I must have made a mistake in tactics. But I knew that he could not long pursue such a course ; and I could point to his colleagues and supporters who from that moment went to him and told him that it would never do in the province of Quebec to give such a measure of credit to Laurier, but that it would be far better to go back to the tactics he had previously pursued, and once more attempt to arouse against an opponent who is not of the same creed as himself, all the religious bitterness that he is capable of arousing in this country. Sir, I knew that it would not be long before he came back to his own self again ; and today we have had him, as we had him long before, vomiting forth torrents of abuse, like a volcano, but like an extinct volcano—impotent, forsooth, to launch fire, but still potent to emit mud and smoke, which, to be sure, can soil, but which, I can tell the hon. gentleman, can never hurt. The hon. gentleman has charged me with obstruction. I deny the charge, but I say at once that it is not sufficient to deny, the proof should be forthcoming, and I will give the proof presently. Sir, after having had the painful humiliation of the hon. gentleman's encomium yesterday, I do not want to have it any more. Let me have his vituperation, for I believe that as long as I have his vituperation, my course will always be approved by the people of Canada. But having had, to my sorrow, the painful humiliation of receiving his encomium, I must now answer the new charge that I have been guilty of obstruction. I sat yesterday in this House from half-past three in the afternoon till half-past two in the morning, applying myself, with other members on both sides of the House to the task of trying to perfect this Bill ; and there never was a fairer or more legitimate discussion than that which took place during that time. What did we do ? We discussed this Bill carefully. Does the hon. gentleman dare to call it obstruction ? What was the result of the discussion ? First, the Government withdrew one clause of the Bill, clause 5, to have it replaced altogether by an amendment prepared by my hon. friend from West Ontario (Mr. Edgar). That is one thing. Then we forced the Government to strike out another clause completely, that is, clause (d) of section 4, as useless and cumbrous. Then we discussed another important clause, one of the most important in the Bill, clause (c) of section 4, relating to the books to be used in the separate schools, and the hon. gentleman in charge of the Bill accepted an amendment, and then another, and then a third amendment ; and, after having accepted amendment after amendment, he was so lost in them that he had to let the clause stand, and there it stands at the present time. This is the result of what the hon. Secretary of State calls obstruction. We had to take up that clause again ; but when we came to three o'clock in the morning, the members of the House asked that the committee should rise. Why did the committee not rise then ? If there had been obstruction, I could understand and approve of the hon. gentleman's course ; but there had not been the faintest trace of obstruction. Up to that moment the discussion had been fair by hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House. But the hon. gentleman refused—no, he did not refuse ; he had gone to his bed at that time ; but, before leaving, he ordered his lieutenants to refuse to allow the committee to rise. This the hon. gentleman calls obstruction, and he threatens us with the example of New Zealand. Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman has earned a reputation in this country for a good many things. He has earned the reputation of stretching ; but I think his powers of stretching have never been displayed to the extent to which they were a few moments ago. The hon. gentleman gave us the example of New Zealand, where he said the business of the House had been obstructed by twenty-three motions that the committee rise being moved in the course of forty-eight hours ; and he said that we had seen the same spectacle here. Sir, I challenge the hon. gentleman to show us these twenty-three motions that have been moved here. I challenge him to his face, and I dare him to rise and contradict me. I tell the hon. gentleman to his face that only two motions for a committee to rise were made.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain, explain.

Mr. LAURIER. This is the way the hon. gentleman has quoted New Zealand. Now. that is not all. The hon. gentleman said that I would stand here and be rebuked before my country for preventing him from doing justice to my fellow-countrymen and co-religionists of Manitoba. God help my poor fellow-countrymen and co-religionists of Manitoba if all the help they are going to have is what the hon. gentleman and his followers are prepared to give them. What are they prepared to give them? An unworkable Bill in which it is impossible to find head or tail. I pity my poor fellow-countrymen of Manitoba or anywhere else if they expect any justice from the hon. gentleman. Do we not know his record? Does he suppose that we are ignorant of history? Have we not here in a pamphlet published by one of his supporters, the declaration of a man who stood high in this House at one time—far higher than the hon. gentleman can ever hope to stand—the late Sir John Thompson, who said that all the difficulties which the Roman Catholics of Nova Scotia had to contend with had come from the party which the hon. gentleman has led for the last forty years. Here is the letter, signed by Sir John Thompson and dated in October, 1877:

> You are aware that nearly all the difficulties with which Catholics have to contend in matters of local legislation—education for example—have come from members of our party.

And this is the head of that party who here poses as the advocate of the Roman Catholic minority in Manitoba. Roman Catholics everywhere know what esteem the hon. gentleman has for them. They know that at one time he expressed himself—to use the very choice language which he then made use of—that he had no confidence in the breed.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain, explain.

Mr. LAURIER. If he has no confidence in the breed, let me tell him that the breed reciprocates the compliment, and has no confidence in him. But that is not all. The hon. gentleman's good soul went out in pity to this side because he said my leadership was wrecking the Liberal party. I have heard of one leadership in this Government accused of wrecking a party, and it was not the leadership of the Liberal party. And I am glad to say here, whatever may be my faults in this House or out of it, that I never was subjected to the humiliation of having my course denounced by any of my friends. I never had the humiliation of seeing one of my most important followers in this House denounce me as without honour and treacherous. I never had anybody in my party read to my face such a letter as was read by the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) a few days ago, when he stood up in his place and accused the hon. gentleman of treachery—not only accused him but brought the proof. I never was subjected to the humiliation of having one of my colleagues forced under his signature to admit that I had been guilty of deceit, as was the case when no less a person than the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Dickey) was forced, under his signature, to express surprise and sorrow that this Bill had been gone on with while negotiations were proceeding. I never was subjected to such a humiliation. We are engaged in the discussion of a great question. It is impossible to expect that all men of either party can agree on this question, but I am glad and proud to say that neither publicly nor privately did ever any member of my party refuse me his esteem and friendship. Every member of my party, however he may differ with me on any particular point, admits that I am entitled to his respect and confidence and continued support. If I had been subjected to the humiliating spectacle of seeing man after man in my party rising in his place and accusing me of ruining it, I would very soon have freed the party from the incubus of my presence. But that is not all. The hon. gentleman went into the prophetic line and predicted that as soon as the elections came on the Liberal party would find to their cost what a mistake had been made by their leaders, when they would find the people in shoals going against them. Oh, if the hon. gentleman goes into prophesy, that is enough to cause me to shudder. Sir, the hon. gentleman has a record as a prophet. We know that he predicted for Manitoba and the North-west an export of no less than 640,000,000 bushels of wheat per year. We know that he also predicted that every dollar of the hundred millions of dollars which he was putting on the people would be repaid by the sale of lands in the North-west. He staked his reputation on the floor of this House that in the space of ten years—and these ten years have long expired,—no less than $57,000,000 would have gone into the treasury from the sales of public lands. And now, when he tells me that the people are against our party, I tell him that there is as much truth in that prophecy as in the others he made. The hon. gentleman need not try to bully this House nor me. Ever since I have been entrusted with the powers which my party have confined to me, I have endeavoured to discharge those powers as befits a gentleman, and I tell the hon. gentleman that the only impression his invectives produce on me is one of amused contempt, and when we go before the people I am quite willing that we should go before the country with his record and my record—with his character and my character, his conduct and my conduct.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There is an old and true saying, but none the less true, that the galled jade winces, and I have never seen it more emphatically illustrated than on the present occasion. The hon. gentleman has descended to one of the grossest acts of deception that ever was attempted to be practised on a Parliament. He read a letter of Sir John Thompson's in order to prove that the party with which I was connected had been the cause of all the difficulties to which the Roman Catholics of Nova Scotia had been subjected. I put it to that hon.

gentleman, did he or did he not know that he was reading a letter written by a gentleman, who, throughout his whole public life was a devoted friend and follower of my own, from the first hours of his public life down to his close. If not, I can produce a letter from Sir John Thompson, signed by his own hand, and written by him in Paris three years ago, in which he declared emphatically that, from the first hour of his public life down to that hour, he was my devoted friend and supporter. I ask the hon. gentleman whether it was due to his own character to put before this House a statement that had no bearing whatever upon myself for the purpose of deceiving and misleading the House. Sir John Thompson's letter, which the hon. gentleman quoted, referred to a period in the history of the Conservative party when I was not a member of it at all. It referred to the action of the Conservative party before I ever went into Parliament at all. I have stated again and again that the very first year of my election, before I had taken my seat in the Parliament of Nova Scotia, I was entrusted with the reconstruction of the Conservative party. Why ? For this reason. In the elections of 1855, the Conservative party went to pieces and only sixteen out of fifty-two of its members were returned. I was the only person who had received the support of any portion of the Roman Catholics of Nova Scotia. The present Bishop Rogers, a distinguished prelate in the hon. gentleman's own church, was the parish priest in the town in which I was born. And at my first election he gave his support to the Hon. Joseph Howe who was my opponent. That distinguished prelate is living now and can say whether my statement be true or not. When I was called upon to reconstruct the Conservative party, I told them what I believed was the cause of their overwhelming defeat. I said : You have adopted a policy in this country which makes it necessary for a member of the Conservative party to be anti-Catholic. That is a fatal mistake, and the first thing that must be done is to change that policy. Judge Johnson, as he afterwards was, a venerable man, who was the leader of the party, got up and said : I am afraid there is too much truth in what Dr. Tupper says, and I recommend that he be entrusted with the reconstruction of the party. And from that hour down to this, I have been the leader of the Conservative party in Nova Scotia. What did I do ? Why, I adopted at once the policy of equal justice to all, irrespective of race and creed, and I defy the hon. gentleman to show one hour of my life, or one statement I ever made, that was inconsistent with the policy of maintaining that the Roman Catholics of Nova Scotia, the Roman Catholics of the whole country, had the same rights as the Protestants. Therefore, I charge the hon. gentleman, in the face of this assembly and country, of being so impotent to find any just charge to hurl at me, that he availed himself of Sir John Thompson's letter, which referred to a period anterior to my having anything to do with public life, and endeavoured to brand me with an offence which he knows I have never committed. I know the hon. gentleman's position is a desperate one, and one that requires him to resort to very desperate measures, but he should find some better means than the transparent misrepresentation of his opponents in public life, for improving his position. Now, the hon. gentleman charged me with having said that I had no confidence in the breed. I defy any man living to produce evidence of that. That statement is as unfounded as the misrepresentation which he attempted to force upon the House by attempting to read the letter of a man who is no longer living. If Sir John Thompson were alive, the hon. gentleman would never have dared to make that gross misrepresentation and aspersion of his character. The hon. gentleman says that, if he had been told by his followers that they had no confidence in him, that gentleman would cease to be a follower of his, or he would disappear from public life or abandon his position. Let me read what an hon. gentleman, now in close alliance with him, said about him. Let me recall to his mind the denunciation pronounced upon him by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), and published broadcast all over this country, in which he said that the Reform party could never succeed under the leadership of a machine politician like Edgar, and a Catholic like Laurier.

Mr. MARTIN. Is calling him a Catholic a denunciation of him?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER The hon. gentleman must not plume himself upon the fact that he stands in the position of never having been abandoned by his followers. What have we seen in this House in a very recent period? Let the hon. gentleman reperuse the brilliant and eloquent speech of the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Devlin). What does that speech contain ? It contains the most violent denunciation of the policy and practice of the hon. gentleman that one man could possibly utter with regard to the course of another. In that able vindication of the rights of his co-religionists, the hon. member for Ottawa took up, point by point, every portion of the policy of the hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition, and tore it to tatters, and scattered it to the winds. The hon. gentleman had to listen to the strongest denunciation of his policy and practice in a most vital and important question, by a gentleman who had been as strong and fervent a supporter of his as any member of his party. The hon. leader of the Opposition talks of what he would do, if he were shown that he had not the confidence of his supporters. Why, did he not witness the stampede of his supporters from this House, when they were called upon to vote for this obstructive policy ? What reduced the hon. gentleman's party, what reduced the party of obstructionists in this House down to the miserable number of seven ? The hon. gentleman talks loftily of what he would do, if his supporters had lost confidence in him. Why, he knows to-day that he has lost the confidence, not only in this House but in this country, of the great body of supporters which he had throughout Canada, and I tell the hon. gentleman that he has had to go back even upon the intimation that one time he gave that this Bill should have fair-play after going into committee. He has been obliged to go back on that, because he is now face to face with the fact—and it is known throughout this country—that having lost the confidence of his co-religionists, he has nothing to hang on to but the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) and the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace). These are the gentlemen upon whose co-operation he relies. These are the gentlemen upon whom to-day all his hopes—I won't say all his hopes, for I do not believe he has any—but all his former hopes, were rested as to the possibility of obtaining power. That is the position of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier), and I do not envy him. He said that I had ventured into the line of prophecy, and he reiterated a statement which he knows to be without a particle of foundation of truth. I now refer to the prediction which hon. gentlemen in my absence—no hon. gentleman has ventured to make it in my presence—have stated that I made with reference to the grain that would be produced in the North-west.

Mr. MULOCK. We all heard you.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Not a member of this House ever heard me make such a statement. I defy the proof.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I shall be very glad to read the hon. gentleman's speech.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I shall be very glad if the hon. gentleman does read my speech.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Here it is :

> Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may say that I believe there are few members of this House, much as our attention has been turned to the developments of the North-west, who have begun to contemplate in all its fullness what the capabilities of that great country are. I have spoken of its enormous extent, of the unexampled fertility of the soil, of the splendid description of wheat that can only be produced in these more northern and colder climes. But let me just ask the attention of the House for a single moment to a few figures which will indicate what the capabilities of that country are in regard to the production of wheat. One hundred thousand farmers, each farmer cultivating 320 acres of wheat land. Has any hon. member made the calculation of what they would produce ?
> Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes.
> Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am glad the hon. gentleman has done so. I am glad his attention has been drawn to the fact that 100,000 farmers, cultivating 320 acres each, or 200,000 farmers, cultivating half that quantity each, and taking the product at only 20 bushels to the acre, instead of 27, or 30, which is the average in the North-west in favourable years, would give 640,000,000 bushels of wheat, or 50 per cent more wheat than the whole United States produces today. You have only to look at those figures for a single moment to see what the future of Canada is, to see what a magnificent granary for the world is placed in our Canadian North-west, and when you remember we have six belts running through that fertile country that would each give 320 acres each to 100,000 farmers, you can understand to some little degree what a magnificent future awaits us in the development of that great country.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It was not 640,000,000 bushels, but it was 3,840,000,000 bushels.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I want no more perfect illustration than that of the falsity of the statements made by the hon. gentleman. I presented a mathematical calculation to the House, a calculation which was not original, but which had been published in the papers, and the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) said he had seen it himself.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I did not say that I had seen it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Read what you said.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman asked : Had any other member made the calculation of what that would produce, and I replied "Yes," and I made the calculation on the spot.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Quite so. I am not only absolved from having made such a prophecy, but the hon. member (Sir Richard Cartwright) declares that he made the calculation himself. If I cannot take the calculation of an ex-Finance Minister of this country as an authority, what shall I do ? The fact is that it is a gross misrepresentation to say that I had ever made that prophecy, and it is without a scintilla of foundation. I said that Mr. Taylor, consul of the United States, who had lived for twenty years in Manitoba, had put on record the declaration that three-fourths of the remaining granary of the world lay in Canada. I went on to show the enormous capabilities of that country, and I repeated the calculations that had appeared in the papers, and which the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) says is a correct calculation. I may call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that this year the bankers of Winnipeg have estimated that the crop of Manitoba was over twenty-nine bushels to the acre, much beyond that which I had given in the calculation.

But, Sir, I was guilty of one crime, and I could not be guilty of a greater one in the estimation of hon. gentlemen opposite. I made a statement on the floor of the Parliament of my country as to the hopes I had for the future development of our western provinces. That is my crime, and that alone. I have listened to many speeches made in this House by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), but I never heard more rounded periods coming more trippingly from his tongue, than when he did me the honour to read my speech.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). It is the best he ever made.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I won't go so far as to say that, but I will say that if the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) would read my speeches and inwardly digest them he would avoid one of the most fatal mistakes he has ever made in the interest of his party, and that is : believing that he can rise to a position of influence and control of the public affairs of this country by denouncing his country, and denouncing every one who has a good word to say in favour of it.

But, Sir, what about the prophecy that I am alleged to have made with regard to the money that would be returned from the sale of lands, and which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) has referred to. I made no such prophecy. The right hon. gentleman who so long and ably led this House (Sir John Macdonald) stated that the Deputy Minister—Mr. Burgess, of the Department of the Interior, a gentleman who belonged to the Liberal party at that time—had placed in his hands a statement as to what he believed might be realized from the sale of lands in the North-west. We have been all greatly disappointed that that did not prove correct ; but, Sir, I never made the calculation, and I never gave it to the House as my calculation. I gave it to the House as the carefully compiled calculation of an officer of the Department of the Interior. So much for that prophecy.

But, Sir, I do venture upon the prophecy, and I repeat it, that the course which hon. gentlemen opposite have taken in the obstruction of this Bill will contribute to their discomfiture and defeat. I am willing to stake whatever judgment I may be supposed to have in political affairs upon that ; and hon. gentlemen opposite will do me the justice to say that I have never made a prophecy in regard to a general election in this country that has not come true. They well know that from the first hour I entered this House, I have never said that the great Liberal-Conservative party would carry this country without that proving to be true. I say to-night—knowing this country, I believe, as well as any man in this House—I have no hesitation in saying that if there was a doubt as to the result of the next general elections, that doubt has been wiped away by the policy of obstruction that hon. gentlemen opposite have indulged in, with regard to this Bill. Every intelligent man in the country, be he Liberal or Conservative, knows that these violent, these unnatural, these obstructive tactics in reference to the Remedial Bill have been adopted by the Liberals as the sole hope of wresting power from the Conservative party. They know that all that desperation—for it was a desperate act on the part of the leader of the Opposition—and all these desperate tactics were adopted with the hope of obtaining the confidence of the country, when their attacks on the fiscal and general policy of the Administration had taught them, time and again, that there was nothing staring them in the face but defeat. I know why I am so obnoxious to hon. gentlemen opposite. I know why their overcharged and overflowing vials of wrath are poured out on me. Sir, does the House not remember that in 1887, the whole session was spent by hon. gentlemen opposite, the leaders of their party telling Sir John Macdonald that he owed his victory to me.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. You may meet the statement with laughter, but day after day, my right hon. friend was told, that if he had not brought Tupper from England, he would have lost the elections. Again, when, in 1891, I was summoned by my old chieftain to take part in the battle, I would have refused had it not been that the Liberal party had inscribed upon its banners, a policy that the distinguished Edward Blake said would lead this country into annexation. I felt that every man, whatever influence and power he could exercise, was bound to come to the rescue and to fight for the maintenance of British institutions in this Canada of ours. I came here again, and, despite all the efforts of hon. gentlemen opposite, despite the combination of the most gigantic mass of corruption that was ever seen in this country, despite all the aid that Mr. Mercier and the funds of the province of Quebec could give them, hon. gentlemen opposite again found that standing side by side with my old chieftain, victory again perched upon our banners.

Mr. CASEY. Was it the hon. gentleman or his chieftain that won that victory ?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Never mind. The hon. gentleman has only to read, almost the dying words of that illustrious man, in which he bore testimony to the efficacy of my assistance in that great crisis. Notwithstanding that I knew I had to encounter all the obloquy, and all the abuse, and all the vilification that hon. gentlemen opposite could pour upon me, I thought it my duty to take part in the affairs of this country at the recent supreme crisis, when the Liberal party believed they were within forty-eight hours of the Treasury benches. But, Sir, they are still in Opposition.

I am glad to see to-night, my friend and colleague, the Prime Minister of this country sitting on the floor of this House. I am glad to be able to say in his presence, that I hurl back as the foulest slander that ever has been uttered in connection with my name, the charge that I ever intrigued or acted unjustly with reference to that hon. gentleman. From the first hour that Sir Mackenzie Bowell and I have sat in this House, and that is from the day of confederation, down to the present, I say that we have been allied together, standing side by side, and fighting the battle of our common country. Not only have we been allied politically, but we have been allied by the closest ties of friendship, ties which never, for one moment, have been disturbed. I refused to discuss the question of having anything to do with the Government, or with the party, until my distinguished friend Sir Mackenzie Bowell invited me to a conference with him, and that conference resulted in his asking me to become a member of the Administration, which I was proud to do, and with the object—an object attained—of the complete reunion of that great party to which Canada owes so much. That, Sir, is the fact. And yet, in the Liberal press of Canada, and in this House, again and again, I have been compelled to listen to tirades of abuse, which, indeed, did not discredit me, but reflected the deepest discredit on the hon. gentlemen who made them, and showed that they had so far forgot what they owed to this House, and to this country, as to indulge in slanderous misrepresentations, and abuse. They had no argument to address to the House. Sir, I will not detain the House further than to say, that I am willing that I should be adjudged by the declaration that I make here and now, that, come what will, whether we are forced to go to the country as having fought the battle to the death to save the Bill, or whether we are able to go to the country, as I hope we will, after having placed this Bill on the statute-book: I say to this House and to the country, that I am willing for all time to be judged, and I am willing that my reputation as a prophet be staked upon it: that we will come back here triumphantly, returned by the voices of the great majority of the independent electors of this country who have said again and again to hon. gentlemen opposite: Get you gone, there are better men administering the affairs of this country; we remember well our experience of the long-suffering five lean years of Canada under your management. They repeat to hon. gentlemen opposite in tones which cannot be misunderstood, that they have not yet shown any statesmanship which would warrant the people of this country in endorsing them, or placing them at the head of affairs.

Mr. DEVLIN. I rise for the purpose of correcting one statement made by the Secretary of State. I cannot allow that statement to go as it was given out by the Secretary of State. If I understood him correctly, when referring to the gentlemen who have separated from the leader of the Opposition, and mentioning in connection therewith my name, he said I had made a bitter and violent denunciation of the leader of the Opposition.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I said a brilliant and eloquent denunciation, and not a "bitter" denunciation.

Mr. DEVLIN. Well, we will substitute the word "brilliant" for "bitter," and still I take objection to that. I certainly have not been entirely in sympathy with much that has been said by my hon. friends in this House, and do not sympathize with the course that has been pursued by some of those gentlemen. But as I look through the speech which I made in this House on the Manitoba school question some weeks ago, I fail to find in it a denunciation of the hon. gentleman whom I was proud, and am still proud to call my leader

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman must allow me to correct him. I said the denunciation of his policy, and if the speech does not contain an overwhelming denunciation of his policy, it contains nothing.

Mr. DEVLIN. I have two very short passages which refer to the policy of the Liberal party in this House. The hon. Secretary of State must not forget that when I was speaking, I did, in the strongest terms possible, denounce the Liberal party of the province of Manitoba. I still denounce that party in terms as strong as I do the tactics of the Tory party of Manitoba. I see no difference between the Liberal party of Manitoba and the Tory party of Manitoba, in this respect. I did mention, in a straight way, the Liberal party, because the school policy of 1890 was introduced by the Liberal party of Manitoba. But, Sir, so far as that denunciation goes, I know, as a Roman Catholic, that I would find little consolation or little hope by throwing myself into the arms of the Tory party of Manitoba. I cannot forget that whatever mischief was done in 1890 by the Liberal party of Manitoba, that mischief was due largely to the teaching of the great Tory party of this Dominion. I know that this war of race and creed was raised in this country for the first time by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) in the year 1886, when that gentleman was the president of the Conservative Union of the province of Ontario: and he was not denounced because of that campaign, or because of the doctrine he announced, either by the Secretary of State or by the men who cheered him so wildly to-night. When the hon. member for North Simcoe preached the doctrine at Barrie, in 1886, that the French race in Canada constituted the great danger to this confederation, he was encouraged and applauded, not by the Liberal party of Canada, but by the Conservative party of Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. DEVLIN. Aye, they encouraged him in fighting against anything like justice to the Roman Catholics. This doctrine was so pleasant to the Conservative party that it was made a part of the policy of that party in Ontario at that time, and from that day to this it has been a part of the policy of the Conservative party in Ontario. Now, Sir, strongly as I denounced the Liberal party of Manitoba, I have not denounced my brilliant leader. I have never denounced the man who is to-day the brightest star in the whole political life of Canada. I certainly had a difference of opinion with him in regard to the question now before the House, and I am not afraid to express that difference ; but I did not do it by denouncing him. I know what the policy of the leader of the Opposition is. I know that in his veins their courses true and noble blood, and I know that there is not to-day in the whole Dominion of Canada a man who holds dearer the interests of the grand French Canadian race than the Hon. Wilfred Laurier. Sir, I would be sorry to do him the injustice of imputing wrong motives to him. I differed from him when he said that we had not exhausted all means for the settling of this question ; but, Sir, he has never spoken one word in this House against doing full and adequate justice to the minority of Manitoba—never. Why, Sir, read the "Mail and Empire," which is the organ of the hon. Secretary of State, and you find that paper, day after day, saying that the trouble with the leader of the Opposition is that when he comes to deal with this question he will go further even than the Government does in the present Bill. Read the speeches delivered by hon. gentlemen opposite, and what do you find in them ? That they vote against him simply because they are afraid that he will go too far in the direction of doing justice to the minority of Manitoba. No, Sir, I never denounced the Hon. Wilfred Laurier, and I have never felt that I could be denounced by him. I was to a certain extent, I believe, read out of the Liberal party in a pleasant way by one hon. gentleman. I do not mind his reading me out. He could not read me out of the Liberal party. I was born in the Liberal party, and I am a Liberal to-day ; and if I am strongly attached to that party, I will not say that it is because of the great esteem in which I hold all the members of the Liberal party, but because I am bound closely and dearly to the man who to-day leads the Liberal party, who is the proudest member of the French Canadian race, and the brightest star in the political life of Canada.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I congratulate you, Sir, and I congratulate myself. I had made up my mind, and I have no doubt you had made up your mind, to a dry-as-dust discussion to-night on the legal questions involved in this Bill, of which we have, perhaps, heard enough from members on both sides. But, thanks to my esteemed acquaintance with the Secretary of State, quite a new and pleasant development has been given to the evening's entertainment. Sir, allow me to call the attention of the House in the first place to the fact that the witness whom the Secretary of State called to discredit my hon. friend has, like Balaam of old, not cursed but blessed him. Now, Sir, as we are calling witnesses to character, I have one or two to call as witnesses to the character of the hon. gentleman himself, which I have no doubt will interest him and the members of the House. First of all, he has stated that my hon. friend had garbled, or, at any rate, misstated the letter of the late Sir John Thompson. My hon. friend stated that that letter was written in 1877, long before the Manitoba school question became a burning question, and, Sir, there is not the slightest doubt that my hon. friend was perfectly correct in saying that the late Sir John Thompson attributed all the difficulties the Catholic party had met with in the province of Nova Scotia to the conduct of the members of his own party, and, beyond all question, to the particular School Act which the hon. Secretary of State introduced. His words are :

> You are aware that nearly all the difficulties with which Catholics have had to contend in matters of local legislation, education, for example, have come from members of our party.

And there sits the man who introduced the educational system of Nova Scotia. Sir, I think my hon. friend has made out his case. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman was good enough to tell us that it was not the late Sir John Macdonald or any other insignificant person, but "I," who saved the Conservative party in 1891. Sir, I have a curious testimonial of the regard in which the hon. gentleman was held about the year of grace 1891 by certain persons who are supposed to know a good deal of what the Conservative party thought. Here is an extract from an article of a very important paper which now supports the hon. gentleman. The "Mail," of March 9, 1891, says :

> In a letter which, though unfair to the Liberal party, comprised some wholesome truths, Mr. Edward Blake told us that the policy pursued of late years had done worse, far worse than injure our national prosperity. It had left us, he said, with lowered standards of public virtue and a death-like apathy of public opinion, with a subservient Parliament, an autocratic executive, debauched constituencies and corrupting and corrupted classes. Of the system which Mr. Blake deplores, Sir Charles Tupper has notoriously been the chief agent ; all that is worst in it and has tended to debase the national charcater is familiarly connected with his name, which may be said to be a household word of corruption. Nor has he, like his late chief, succeeded in convincing the people that except when he is doing his dirty work of a political party his hands are clean ; or that if he governed the nation, its honour, while it might be in danger of such exposures as that of the Pacific Scandal, would be secure against a deeper stain. His name is at this moment unpleasantly connected with a suspicious commercial affair in England, and if the sentence of the arbitrators in the Onderdonk contract case next month should be against the Dominion, another sinister transaction will be called to mind. He will protest his innocence of course, but his word unhappily is that of a man whose veracity is much impugned and who does not scruple to use stolen letters.

Or to garble the telegrams occasionally.

It is too evident what sort of scene would be opened by his accession to power. He is the prince of political cracksmen, no doubt, but we cannot afford to purchase ability even of so rare a kind at such a price as that of continued and increased demoralization.

Quoth the "Mail" of March 9, 1891. I suppose it would sing a different tune to-day. Now, Sir, there is nothing, after all, in these cases, like quoting the opinion entertained of the hon. gentleman by persons who have been long and intimately associated with him as followers or otherwise. But, first let me say that when the hon. gentleman hankered after New Zealand, I think it was not New Zealand he had in his mind, but Siberia. The hon. gentleman, in his travels in Europe, has, I presume, become acquainted with Russian diplomatists and methods ; and if I do not misconstrue the pleasant expression of his countenance to-night, I think nothing would have given him greater pleasure than to have put my hon. friend under the knout. As to his statement that my hon. friend was unfitted for office, all I can say is that after the exhibition of tact, temper, dignity and skill in managing the House, which the hon. gentleman has exhibited during the last few weeks, I would hardly recommend my hon. friend, though a junior politician, to go to school to the Secretary of State. But, after all, there is nothing like a candid friend ; and it was our pleasure a day or two ago to hear an old and candid friend of the hon. gentleman descanting on his proceedings ; and, as he was not present, he will excuse me giving him the benefit of what his candid friend said :

But let us be fair to the Administration. It is true that we are making war upon the Administration, but we are doing it in order to save the party, we are trying to save the old party. But we say the Administration has led the party wrong. We say the Administration has made a wild bid for the vote of Quebec. We say that is bad party politics, that is deplorable statecraft in this country, or any other, but especially in a country like ours made up for the most part of two races. I say it is bad statecraft for the national authority in any country to make an unscrupulous bid for the support of any particular class in that country. The result that might be expected has happened, and you are creating a resentment in the rest of the country, and making the difficulties deeper that we hoped were becoming less.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This same gentleman also said :

If the leader of the House is not in earnest, then all recognized signs of earnestness are a delusion. I have been absent from the House for a few days.

Whereupon I remarked that it was lucky for him, or he would have been read out. He proceeded :

In reading the papers it occurred to me that there must be left on the front row of this side of the House no members except Ministers, and perhaps Sir Donald Smith and the whip of the party. My breath was almost taken away when I found that my old friend the member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) had been read out, or attempted to be read out, although the Government seem to have awakened the wrong passenger. I remember after the last elections that the whole front row was without a break, filled by men very much more able and capable than two-thirds of the members of the Cabinet, and I have never concealed that opinion. As a life-long Conservative, having been ten years in the House, my breath was almost taken away on finding that members of the "old guard," those who year after year had gradually forced their way to the front, were being forced out of the party. I do not know what is the standing of the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) ? I do not know whether he has been disciplined or not. I congratulate, not only the member for West York but the leader of the House in not undertaking to drive him from the ranks of the party. These incidents show to one who has been absent for a day or two that these high pressure sittings are having a very bad effect on the Conservative party. The front row is frightfully broken. There may be a rupture among the members of the second row, among the men next in experience and party service. The member for Inverness (Mr. Cameron) is in danger. He has stated that he will vote with me against the Bill on the third reading.

Mr. CAMERON. The member for Inverness did not state anything of the kind.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Well, I am sorry for the member for Inverness. I thought he had more sense. I gave him, I see, too much credit.

The hon. gentleman went on, in a very temperate way, to point out the extreme unreasonableness of the attempt to press this measure through the House, the extreme haste with which the whole measure had been conceived, and the very great folly of the course of the Government. The hon. Secretary of State will recollect that those charges do not come from us, but from his own friends, who supported the party long, when he was not here to guide it, and who deserved much better treatment at his hands. If there ever was a measure which did not deserve to be railroaded as this is, it is the identical measure under discussion. The measure is a new one, bristling with difficulties, certain to be litigated in every possible way ; and yet the hon. gentleman, the moment it was brought into committee, threatened us, before we had been two hours in committee, that the Government were going to force it through, 'per fas et nefas,' without the slightest regard to the convenience of Parliament. I tell the hon. gentleman that that measure should be a final measure. You can do no worse injury to the progress of the whole generation that is to succeed us, than to introduce a measure which, by its own terms, by its final clause, is shown to be a measure which cannot be final, which must be supplemented again and again, and subject us to a repetition of just such scenes as we have witnessed in the last six weeks. I will tell the hon. gentleman a plain fact, for which, perhaps, he is not wholly responsible, for I do not know how far he was acting a paternal, or grand-paternal, part to the Cabinet, which was practically brought to a close in January last. But this is certain, that in no conceivable circumstance is it wise or prudent, in a country like ours, to have a sixth session of Parliament. I will not go to the extreme length of saying that it is absurd per se, but I will go the length of saying that you cannot take a step more likely to demoralize a party than by holding a session at a time when it is practically impossible to close it before Parliament expires by efflux of time. When you call a sixth session, you offer a premium for obstruction, you open the door to attacks from your own party, which it is extremely difficult to parry; and I may remind the hon. gentleman that it was almost a fixed principle of the policy of his predecessor, the late Sir John Macdonald, never to expose himself to such a contingency. There is just one solution of the difficulty, and that is to do what he ought to have done long ago, and appeal to the people for their judgment. Every day spent here, without an appeal to the country, on a question like this, is pure waste. That is what the Opposition have demanded. That is what common sense and the interests of the public service demand. There is no use in indulging in these foolish and silly vapourings, which the hon. gentleman is so fond of indulging in, as to whether he or we may be superior in the coming trial of strength. He disclaims all responsibility for the statements I read in the "Hansard." I suppose he disclaims responsibility, too, for that famous prophecy of his, that we would obtain $58,000,000 from the sale of public lands. In 1883, the hon. gentleman read in this House a letter from Mr. Burgess:

> Having given the subject my best and fullest consideration, I estimate that the receipts——

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Who wrote that letter?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Burgess.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am going to show the use the hon. gentleman made of it. I am not disposed to withhold any part of any document that I read to the House.

> Having given the subject my best and fullest consideration, I estimate that the receipts of this department from the sale of agricultural and coal lands, timber dues, rents of grazing lands, and sales of mineral lands other than coal, with the royalties from the minerals, between the 1st January, 1883, and the 31st December, 1895, both inclusive, will amount to not less than $58,000,000.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT:

> This note is signed by Mr. Burgess, under whose personal observation and information all these various points come. I give it to the House as an evidence of the soundness of the statement made by my right hon. friend, the Minister of the Interior.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT:

> I give it to the House as an evidence of the soundness of the statement made by my right hon. friend, the Minister of the Interior, when he told the House three years ago that he confidently relied upon the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway being accomplished without its costing one dollar to the people of Canada, as the entire amount required to recoup the Government and the country for their expenditure in connection with it would, at no distant date, be returned by the sale of land and the revenues derived from lands in the North-west. I say that the evidence on that point is very conclusive.

I do not suppose it is necessary to inflict on the House the columns of figures with which the hon. gentleman followed that statement up. He went on to say:

> We estimated that by the time the Canadian Pacific Railway contract was to be completed, under the terms of the contract, we would receive not merely the $53,000,000 we were going to pay in connection with the construction of that work, but that we would receive about $60,000,000 or a considerable amount over and above the entire expenditure we were called upon to make in connection with the construction of that road. In order to show the House how thoroughly reliable and within the mark that calculation is, I will give the calculation made by my right hon. friend.

The hon. gentleman cannot accuse me of misquoting his statements, and, if those statements, so endorsed, do not constitute a prophecy, then I do not understand what is meant by an hon. gentleman making a prediction in this House. I would advise the hon. gentleman, for the sake of his own credit and dignity, to abstain in future from all these scoldings and vapourings. He knows perfectly well that my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) was perfectly prepared to implement and carry out the offer he made last night. He has no right to say one word against what my hon. friend then said, because he himself entirely refused to accept the proposition on which it is based. My hon. friend was perfectly correct in saying the debate was conducted in a fair manner up to two o'clock, when it became impossible to carry on discussion. When my hon. friend proposed to assist him, it was on the express condition that this attempt at tyrannizing and bulldozing should cease, and that we should terminate our proceedings at a reasonable hour. I have had much experience in this House, and I defy the hon. gentleman to point to one instance in which the course he is taking has ever produced any other result than what we are witnessing. Time, temper and dignity are wasted, and the House made a perfect scandal, and in the end you are further off from the point you desire to reach than when the debate began. As to his leadership, let the hon. gentleman look along the Government benches, let him remember what the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) said, and he will see that of all men living he is the last to talk as he did of my hon. friend.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I put it to the hon. member for South Oxford whether he thinks it is fair, whether he thinks it is the treatment that one member of this House should expect from another, to read such a statement as he read from the "Mail" of 1891 with reference to myself? Was it an honourable thing to present that to the House and allow it to go upon "Hansard" as the opinion of a paper friendly to me, when he knew that at the time the "Mail" was the avowed and bitter enemy of the Conservative party? If he had said, when reading the quotation, that it was from a newspaper bitterly opposed to me, I should have had no fault to find; and I could keep the House a week reading Conservative papers denouncing the hon. member for South Oxford for almost every crime in the calendar. The "Mail" at that time was a most bitter enemy of the Liberal-Conservative party, and especially of myself, because I had publicly, on the platform at Toronto and all over the country denounced it for the course it had pursued in adopting a policy which I regarded as fatal in the interests of Canada, and that policy was an anti-Catholic policy.

Mr. WELDON. The term that was thrown at the members of the Liberal-Conservative party who broke with the Administration on the school question was the most offensive term that any parliamentary leader could cast at his parliamentary supporters, namely, the term of conspiracy. I rise, not with the passion which moved the leader of the House, but with a more temperate manner and tone, to rebuke that distinguished statesman for that word of insult which he threw at and which he had no right to throw, which no man has any right to throw at me.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I made no reference to the term "conspiracy" with regard to any person except the hon. member for North Simcoe.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I leave it to the official reporters of "Hansard." I said co-conspirator with hon. gentlemen opposite.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. WELDON. I very promptly and fully accept those words of the hon. leader of the House restricting that imputation. I heard his words, and it is perfectly clear that he spoke in so much haste and passion that his words did have to the committee a bearing which he did not mean them to have. Therefore I say now, in spite of the jeers that come from the left, that I accept the altered situation, and am glad to learn that the hon. leader of the House has not described me, at all events——

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Certainly not.

Mr. WELDON—as a conspirator. After the hon. gentleman's explanation, the reason for my speech has pretty much gone, for I rose with a subdued anger which has evaporated. One word on the question before the House that the committee should rise. I find that I am addressing an entirely new House from what was present when I last addressed it this morning, just as the sun was rising over the Laurentian hills. I scarcely see on either side of the House a face which I saw then. There are three or four Parliaments, in fact, sitting here every twenty-four hours, and the most remarkable results follow. Here we are ostensibly building a second temple of education for the Catholic children of Manitoba. Of what style of architecture will it be? The plans have been given us, but one day one group of workmen are engaged in the construction, and the following day they are replaced by an entirely new group, and each group alters and carves at its will. Will the architecture be Gothic or Grecian or Roman or Corinthian.

An hon. MEMBER. Barbaric.

Mr. WELDON. No doubt it will be from the foundation to the topmast pinnacle. The structure was only half way up when the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) knocked out a flying buttress and put in place of it a Doric column. Then, when we came to the next section there was a narrow window which would not let in enough light, and the hon. member for North Simcoe knocked that out and put in a larger, so that in the end one can scarcely imagine of what character the edifice will be—whether Roman, Gothic or Byzantine or what else. For the credit of Parliament let the committee rise and let there not be three Parliaments sitting here every twenty-four hours. Let there not be three plans and purposes embodied in that construction.

I protest against this burlesque of legislation. If the country knew what we were driven to here, it would be at the back of this motion that the committee rise. We have given to this Bill an intelligent, rational, fair, patient, and close criticism for hours and hours, and we now ask that the committee rise. Give the Administration credit, if you will, for a sincere endeavour to put the Bill through, but we cannot say that their course will tend to advance its progress. Let me give a statement with reference to the experience of that great mother of Parliament, in Westminster. They are dealing with a question much like ours, and a question which is beset with somewhat the same difficulties. Mr. Chamberlain, in the House of Commons, is trying to put an Education Bill through. The great mass of the members of the Church of England, who believe in state money subsidizing education, the majority of the Roman Catholics, and other religious bodies are asking for this Bill ; while, on the other side, the great body of those who do not believe in an established church, the Presbyterians, the Methodists, the Baptists, and the Congregationalists are offering more or less determined opposition to this Bill It is instructive to compare that English Bill with ours. Although this is the eighth day of April, and although it may fairly be expected that the English Parliament will run to the 12th day of August, so far the English Government have made but one invasion into private members' days. Although it is probable that, after the Easter holidays, they may take another day for Government business. The English Government find it necessary to take four months to discuss their School Bill. I quote a statement which was published in that very excellent journal, the Ottawa " Citizen," a few days ago :

> The remainder of the session will be largely occupied with the Bill.

We see that the English Government expects to take the bulk of the time between this and the middle of August for their School Bill. Is not that an answer to the taunt that we are obstructing, when we say that it is impossible to put this School Bill of ours through in 14 days. In England, they are hampered by no questions of ultra vires or intra vires, no federal Parliament with shorn powers, and no provincial parliaments with full powers in certain matters. There they have one supreme parliament with full powers, and they are consequently at an enormous advantage in putting their Bill through; compared with us. We have no Minister of Education in this Government ; we have no expert staff of a Department of Education. The present Ministry are not to be blamed for that, because, no matter what men sat on the Treasury benches, they would be beset with the same difficulties. In England, they have the enormous advantage of having experts to draft their Bill. They have members of Parliament who have been long accustomed to deal with educational legislation, while none of us here who have not been members of the local assemblies, have that training about the details of the Bill. Sir John Gorst, a man of genius, is head of the English educational department, and with him there is an expert staff, which may be consulted. They have undivided powers in the English Parliament, they have practice in educational matters, they have a trained staff of experts, and yet they expect to take four months to put an Education Bill through, which is nothing like so difficult as the Bill we are now considering. How, in reason, can we expect to consider these 112 clauses intelligently, to have the third reading passed, to have the Bill considered in the Senate with the due consideration which the Senate, in common duty, is bound to give it ; how can we expect to have that Bill passed within a few days ? May we not expect to have behind us both the French and the English people, in the reasonable contention which we make in this House ? I would like to see the Bill go through more rapidly, and it will go through more rapidly, if we are allowed to have some sleep and rest, so as to enable us to consider it. I do not sympathize with the desire to retard the progress of the Bill ; but we would be false to our duty as public men if we allowed a Bill of this enormous importance to be rushed through in a few weeks without any consideration. Let us go on with the Bill and discuss it thoroughly, and, when a new Parliament meets in a few weeks, we can decide the question before us. We say that we are expressing the mind of the people of the country. Some of our friends say that we are misrepresenting the people of the country. Let the country decide between us. I therefore hope, Sir, that a more temperate and respectful consideration will be given to the motion that you do now leave the Chair.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The persistence of the leader of the House would lead one to believe that he had the object in view of holding back from us the report of the commissioners to Winnipeg. We have a right to demand that report, but it is impossible to receive it until the committee rises, and until the Speaker is in the Chair. That report has the very closest connection with the consideration of this Bill. I was surprised, yesterday, that the Minister of Justice, after consultation with the leader of the House, should venture to say that we had received the information as to that commission, through the Manitoba government, from the newspapers. It was an insult to the House to give such an answer. The Manitoba government are not in a position to state to this House what powers were delegated to that commission, and what instructions were given with reference to it. We have learned that the Manitoba government considered that there had been the very grossest breach of faith at the very inception of the negotiations with them. That we have a right to have a full explanation of. If the leader of the House was careful for his own reputation, he would take the earliest opportunity to have the committee rise, in order that an explanation may be given to the country, which, perchance, will place him and his Government in a better light in that respect. I would not like to suppose that the alleged breach of faith was done purposely for the view of thwarting negotiations, but the House has to speculate upon that, under present circumstances. The necessity for this explanation, as to that breach of faith, is, in my opinion, a supreme reason why this committee should rise at once. It is most unparalleled that we should be asked to sit in committee on this Bill one moment longer until that is done. I see that one of the commissioners (Sir Donald Smith) has just arrived in the House for the first time since his interview with the Manitoba government. The committee should rise now, and that hon. gentleman should have an opportunity of explaining the matter, while the Speaker is in the Chair. That hon. gentleman must have felt that his honour was somewhat damaged by the breach of faith, not on his part, but on the part of the Government. He admits, if we are to believe the newspaper reports, that he is at a loss to conceive how such a thing could occur. The member for Montreal (Sir Donald Smith) should now have the opportunity of stating what was done with reference to the matter, and the leader of the House should explain, if he can, for the sake of the honour of this country, how such a gross breach of faith was committed. The committee should at once rise, Sir.

Mr. TAYLOR. The chief whip of the Opposition, yesterday, tried to hurl back the charge made by the hon. the leader of the House, that there was obstruction by hon. gentlemen opposite. I think there is no doubt about the truth of that charge. Last week, a whole day was occupied by members of the Opposition in discussing the question as to whether the House should sit on Saturday. The House sat on Saturday, and from ten in the morning until tweleve at night the talk went on without any progress being made. The "Hansard" for Saturday contains 126 columns. 14½ columns were occupied by the hon. the Minister of the Interior, who had the Bill in charge, and by other friends of the Government; while 117 columns were filled by hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. McDOUGALL (Cape Breton) With what ?

Mr. FOSTER. Talk.

Mr. TAYLOR. With speeches not pertinent to the question under debate. The Minister of the Interior occupied 11½ columns of "Hansard," Mr. McLeod 1 column, Mr. LaRivière 1 column, and Mr. Dupont 1 column; while 8½ columns were filled by Mr. Edgar, 3 columns by Mr. Charlton. 24½ columns by Mr. McCarthy, 1¾ columns by Sir Richard Cartwright, 8¼ columns by Mr. Davies (P.E.I.), 5 by Mr. O'Brien, half a column by Mr. Brodeur, 7 columns by Mr. McNeill, 4 columns by Mr. Wallace, 12 columns by Mr. Mulock, 5 columns by Mr. Casey, 2 columns by Mr. Angers, 3 columns by Mr. Charbonneau, 10 columns by Mr. Bain, 4 columns by Mr. Semple, and 6 columns by Mr. Sproule. That was all pure and simple obstruction to any business being done. Many of the speakers referred to the fact that the Estimates had to be passed, and that other important legislation should be proceeded with, but still they talked all day on Saturday, and obstructed the progress of the Bill. The same state of affairs has continued since the House met on Monday at three o'clock Yesterday, the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) did me the honour of referring to some statements that I had made, when the second reading of the Bill was before the House. I then said that, when we got into committee on the question, I would have something further to say.

My hon. friend did me the honour, yesterday, to read a quotation from my speech. I have been waiting patiently until that stage would arrive when I would be able to address the House; but, judging from the course of hon. gentlemen opposite, that stage will never arrive. I have a motion, which, if permitted by the House, I will make now; but I presume my hon. friend will not agree with the motion I make, nor will he agree that the rules of the House would permit me to make it now.

Mr. PATERSON. Certainly. You should have made it on clause 4,, which was under discussion yesterday.

Mr. TAYLOR. It is just as pertinent to clause 6 as to clause 4. But I will give the hon. gentleman and those associated with him an opportunity before the Bill is through to divide the House on the motion I intend to submit.

Mr. BORDEN. Give notice of the motion now.

Mr. TAYLOR. I will give notice of the motion. I voted against the motion made by the hon. leader of the Opposition on this question—the motion which the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) would have moved; but as the hon. leader of the Opposition was assured by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) that, if he moved the six months' hoist, the Government would be defeated, the leader of the Opposition moved it. I voted against that motion, because neither the hon. leader of the Opposition nor any gentleman behind him said that the defeat of this Bill now would settle the question for all time to come. I also voted for the motion of the leader of the Government to refer the Bill to the Committee of the Whole, and in giving that vote I voted that the principle of the Bill be affirmed, that is, that in accordance with the decision of the Privy Council there was a grievance ; but, as every hon. gentleman knows, when a Bill goes into Committee of the Whole, every clause in that Bill may be amended or changed, and it may be practically converted into a new Bill, if the majority of the committee so decide.

Mr. McCARTHY. Will the hon. gentleman tell me the principle of the Bill ?

Mr. TAYLOR. The principle is that relief to the minority in Manitoba should be granted by this Parliament. The Privy Council have decided that a grievance exists. The legislature of Manitoba have the right to remedy that grievance, but they failed to do so, although this Government have availed themselves of every opportunity to induce them to do so. This Government even sent a commission to Manitoba to negotiate, and the legislature which is in session at present, adjourned until the negotiations were concluded, in order that they might ratify the agreement of the commissioners by an Act. The commissioners, however, have returned, and I see by the papers that they have failed to get a settlement from the government of Manitoba, who were playing into the hands of the leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for North Simcoe, for the purpose of keeping this an open question during the coming election. Therefore, I am induced to take the course I mapped out, when speaking on this question before. Some time ago, I read in the press a letter written by the Rev. Alfred Andrews, of Minnedosa, a gentleman occupying a high and honourable position in the church to which I have the honour to belong, the Methodist Church—a gentleman who has been a missionary in that country for many years. In this letter the Rev. Mr. Andrews says :

> In the beginning Roman Catholics and Protestants were pretty evenly balanced in Manitoba, prior to confederation. Schools were established and supported by voluntary means, each party providing for its own schools. In 1870, Manitoba was erected into a province of the Dominion. In the same year elections were held for the legislature. In 1871, the first Parliament enacted a school law. This provided for public schools, which have been accepted by the Protestant electors, and for separate schools, to meet the demand of the Roman Catholics. Each party was taxed for the support of its own schools. Each became entitled to receive, according to population, its share of all public school moneys. This state of affairs continued, without any great complaint or agitation for change, until the memorable legislation of 1890, which summarily disposed of all separate schools. This was made easy by the altered condition of the electorate. The Roman Catholics had fallen behind in numbers, so that they were not much more than one-tenth of the population. On their part the Protestants had never looked favourably on separate schools. Had the majority been on the other side, there had been no abolition of separate schools. As the law now stands the government of Manitoba has made possible a much higher and better state of educational development than was possible under the old law, which they abolished, and they are deserving the support of the public, in so far as this better condition has been effected.
> The Protestant majority, a hundred and fifty thousand strong, say : "The law is all right," and on two occasions the electorate overwhelmingly have supported the government's policy.
> But the feeble minority say : "We suffer an injustice," religion is the first essential of primary education, and by religion they mean the Roman Catholic religion. This has no place in the present school programme. The majority reply : "The religious exercises are Christian, neither Protestant nor Catholic." The minority aver "so far as there is any religion it is the Protestant religion and unacceptable to us." "Your grievance is merely technical," the majority claim. "The grievance is real," maintained the Catholics, and for five years, at great expense, they have supported their own schools, at the same time being taxed to support the public schools. Herein lies the grievance ; before confederation, each party provided and maintained its own school. To-day the minority provide and pay for their own schools, and yet they are taxed for the public schools, whereas the majority is provided by general tax on all assessable property, with schools that are congenial to them, and pay nothing for their maintenance beyond their ordinary taxation. Had the Roman Catholic party been in as great majority and established schools congenial to itself, would the Protestant minority have considered that they had a technical grievance only ?
> The constitution having provided for the redress of grievances, whether affecting Protestant or Catholic minorities, the Roman Catholics have proceeded from step to step, until they reached the decision given by the British Imperial Privy Council. "Here is a grievance and you have a right of appeal to Ottawa." The Ottawa Government has spoken. And the provincial authority has been requested to remedy the evil. Failing this, the present Remedial Bill is before the House at Ottawa.
> The Dominion Government very justly considers that it is legislating not for the small number of Roman Catholics in Manitoba, but really for the whole of Canada. Of the population of this fair Dominion, I suppose we have over one-third Roman Catholics, whose religion is dear to them as their life, and they have rights as sacred as our own. It has been said that the remedial order was harsh and commanding. Suppose it was, for the sake of argument. Is there not a great principle of fair-play at stake ? And forgetting the immensity of court dignity, for the sake of peace and in the interests of national unity, why should not the Dominion Government graciously pause before it is too late, and ask the provincial government to meet them, not for political effect, but in the interests of the Canadian public, to state what they are prepared to do to render a Bill at Ottawa unnecessary ?

Now, the Dominion Government have done just what the Rev. Mr. Andrews has suggested here. They appointed a commission. That commission went to Manitoba and opened negotiations to try and bring about a fair and amicable settlement; but they failed; and, as the Rev. Mr. Andrews says, this Parliament has the right now, as a last resource, to redress the grievance; and that is what the Government are now doing in the legislation before this House. The reverend gentleman goes on to suggest what could be done. He says:

> To retain one national school system, the following are modestly suggested :—
> 1. All schools in the province receiving public aid to be public schools.
>
> 2. The management to be substantially as at present. Catholics and Protestants being on the Board of Management.
>
> 3. All teachers to be subject to the same examinations side by side.
> 4. All schools to be inspected by the same officers, whether Catholic or Protestant.
> 5. All text-books the same. A minority of one-third of the members present at the meeting of the Board of Education to be sufficient to reject any text-book from the school curriculum.
>
> 6. Where a majority of the electors through their trustees prefer Catholic religious teaching, let it be given. In other schools use the present forms, no scholars being compelled against the will of their parents to be present at any religious exercise in the school.
> 7. If these recommendations are not acceptable, then discontinue all formal religious teaching or worship during regular school hours. And provide that any minister or priest of any church shall have the use of the school buildings at such times as may be convenient to him, outside school hours, and as may be agreed upon by the trustees.
> Before confederation each party had its own school and paid for it. By these or perhaps other equally fair provisions we have one system of schools open to all, and not carried on in the interest of any church or party. The schools will give the necessary secular education, and the churches can provide at a minimum of cost all the religious education they need, and our children and young people will grow up together into a strong and united people. If these provisions or others which may perhaps better supply the place be not adopted, then there only remains the adoption of a separate school system pure and simple; and as a result a divided people for all time to come.

This is what the Rev. Mr. Andrews suggests, and he says that if these suggestions are not adopted by the provincial legislature, there remains only the course which this Parliament can take. I said that before I took my seat I would read the motion which I propose at the proper time to move. It is as follows:—

> That inasmuch as under the Manitoba School Act of 1890 the Roman Catholics of 1890 are, according to the Judicial Committee of the Imperial Privy Council, subject to a grievance in the matter of religious instruction in schools, the Bill now before the committee of the House, entitled the Remedial Act (Manitoba), be referred to a sub-committee of this House, consisting of Hon. Messrs. Haggart, Dickey, Ouimet, Daly, Mills, Davies and Mr. Choquette with instructions to draft and submit a Bill to be substituted in lieu of the one now under consideration, which shall provide that in the matter of religious instruction the principle of "equal rights to all" shall prevail (said principle being violated under the Act of 1890), which can be done by either making all schools purely secular or providing that an accredited representative of any and every religious body shall have the use of the school buildings for half an hour at the close of the school day, as may be agreed upon by the different religious bodies in each section; also making provision that the said substituted Act shall not become law if within three months from the passing thereof the legislature of Manitoba shall pass a law that will remove the grievance complained of, and decided by the Queen's Privy Council to exist.

That is my idea. That is the idea I advocated when I spoke first. I believed the provision of the law would be fully complied with in that way, if that were done. But it will be for the majority in this House to amend the Bill now before it in such a way, and the majority in this House ought to control; but, evidently they are not going to do it. It was decided by a large majority that we should go into committee on the Bill. We have been in committee two or three weeks, and practically no progress has been made. But as my hon. friend from South Brant (Mr. Paterson) intimated that I was not going to say anything further on the matter, I have given my opinion as to what should be done if hon. gentlemen opposite will proceed to work; but I presume that we are to go on to-night as we did last night, and have nothing but talk till twelve o'clock to-morrow, making no progress, and that the session will close without the Bill being passed, owing to the obstruction of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. GIBSON. If the hon. gentleman had been in the House last night, instead of proposing a new Bill, which he has just done, he would have found the Minister of the Interior laying it down as a principle that the Bill now before the committee could not be amended in any shape or form, because it was based on the remedial order. It is quite evident that some notice should be taken of the statement of the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) that the House is divided into three sections, and that two-thirds of the members are not at work, but the other third does the business of the House. If the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor), instead of lecturing members in regard to the number of columns of "Hansard" that their speeches have occupied, had refrained from obstruction, which he is so much opposed to, he might have saved to the committee the time he has occupied in reading that long newspaper quotation. The hon. gentleman says that he is in favour of equal rights to all, and that he is against the Bill now before the House, but he had not the manliness to vote against the Bill when it was up for discussion.

Mr. WALLACE. I do not think the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) ought to take the proposal of the hon. member for South Leeds very seriously.

Mr. GIBSON. I do not.

Mr. FRASER. Nor himself.

Mr. WALLACE. Nor himself. I do not suppose any other member of the House has the slightest belief in his sincerity in submitting the motion he has read. Why, Sir, the hon. member for South Leeds voted for the principle of this Bill ; he voted for its second reading ; and now he has the effrontery to get up and say that it is all wrong, and that if he had his way he would appoint a committee to draw a new Bill to take the place of a Bill which he has most solemnly voted that the House should enact. This is only on a par with the other actions of the hon. gentleman. It is stated that the hon. gentleman pledged himself to his constituents that he would oppose any such legislation as is now before Parliament. He came back to Parliament, and we all remember what he said last session. I would like the hon. member now to take this House into his confidence and tell us if there were any inducements offered to him—of course there were not—to change his mind. According to the opinions we hear from his constituency, he has radically changed his opinion on this important subject. I wonder whether he will dare go back and seek to justify his course before an outraged constituency, or whether he will subside into the dignified ease of a Civil Service position. I would ask the hon. gentleman to rise and tell us, if he intends accepting any position in the service.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Superintendent of the Rideau Canal.

Mr. WALLACE. Others say he is to be made Deputy Postmaster General. I would like the hon. gentleman to say whether those statements which are being made, and which reflect on his credit and honour, have any foundation in fact.

Mr. TAYLOR. I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman has insinuated that I have changed my principles for a mercenary consideration. I repudiate the statement. He has referred to the Rideau Canal and the Postmaster Generalship. In reply, let me say that no member or Minister has ever offered me any inducement to take the course I have taken on this subject. There is no truth in the statement that I intend to accept any position at the hands of the Government. I intend to go before my constituents for re-election, and I hurl back the insinuation which the hon. gentleman makes. I have letters which the hon. gentleman has written to constituents of mine, asking them to try and get up opposition to this Bill, but they have replied that they had confidence in me as their representative and would not lend themselves to his schemes. I want to ask the hon. gentleman what he did during the time there was a little family trouble in this Government, when he offered to go into constituencies, and help to elect members who would accept office under the leadership of Sir Mackenzie Bowell, and enable him to pass this Bill. I have as many Orangemen in my constituency as there are, probably, in any other, and I am prepared to meet the hon. gentleman there, and have no doubt I will come back re-elected by as large a majority as he could ever hope to have.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman has made a little speech, and entirely forgotten his point of order.

Mr. TAYLOR. I ask the hon. gentleman to withdraw his statement.

Mr. WALLACE. So far as the hon. gentleman referred to myself as having offered to assist in the election of any member who was in favour of remedial legislation, that is distinctly untrue, and I challenge him to prove it now or at any other time, or to prove that I ever offered to go into any Government where this Remedial Bill was to be the policy of the Government. It is true, that when difficulties arose in the Government, and when seven members of the Government retired, I had no hesitation in expressing my opinion, when that family quarrel occurred, as did almost every Conservative in this country, regarding the course of the gentlemen who attempted then to wreck the Conservative party. As regards the statement concerning himself, the hon. gentleman does not deny that he had pledged himself to oppose this coercion Bill, and he cannot deny it.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. gentleman says that I pledged myself. I never did.

Mr. WALLACE. So far as making promises to his constituents is concerned, I presume that is a pledge. I have a letter in my hand.

Mr. TAYLOR. Read it.

Mr. WALLACE. I am going to read a portion of a letter, dated Gananoque, 4th April, 1896, written, presumably, by one of the constituents of the hon. gentleman. He says :

> It was rather humiliating to Orangemen of South Leeds to see the stand taken by our present member, Mr. Taylor, on that Bill, after all the promises given by him in public and private that he would oppose it in Parliament and that if the Government introduced remedial legislation, he would vote against the Government.
> We see now he has betrayed the confidence reposed in him. L. O. L. number 5, Gananoque, passed resolutions expressing our views on that point, and I had the honour of presenting that resolution to him personally. That resolution called attention to his public promise given, but I can see quite plainly he is willing to trample his principles in the mud rather than vote against the Conservatives. Though I have been a staunch supporter of the Conservative party all my life,

I cannot support Brother Taylor should he be a candidate in South Leeds again.

The hon. gentleman says that I have received letters from his constituents, endorsing his course. In my position as Grand Master of the Orange Association, I sent a copy of the Remedial Bill to the masters of every Orange lodge in British America, and a circular letter with it.

An hon. MEMBER. Approving of it ?

Mr. WALLACE. No, do you think that I would act hypocritically and approve a Bill which I had publicly denounced ? Of all the letters I received—some 3,000—there were only three supporting this Bill. One was from the constituency of South Leeds, one is from St. John, and the other is from North Ontario. The hon. member for South Leeds has not denied the statements that have been made, charging him with the intention of accepting or receiving a position under the Government.

Mr. TAYLOR. I rise to a point of order. I hope the hon. gentleman does not want to misrepresent me. I did make such a denial.

Mr. WALLACE. I have the floor, and I had not finished the statement to which the hon. member for Leeds objected, when he raised his point of order. The hon. member for South Leeds stated to this House that he had not been offered either the position of superintendent of Rideau Canal or Deputy Postmaster General.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. He did not say he was not looking for it.

Mr. WALLACE. I would like him to answer the question I put. Is he going to accept either of those offices whether offered to him or whether he seeks for them ?

Mr. TAYLOR. I gave the answer before. I said and repeat that I intend to go before my constituents and hope to be re-elected. If the hon. gentleman does not take that for an answer, I do not know how to make one. If he wants to go on insinuating, probably when he gets through I will give him a Roland for his Oliver.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman says he is going before his constituents and hopes to be re-elected. We all have that hope. Suppose he is not re-elected, or suppose he is, or he may not even get the nomination. But if he gets the nomination and becomes elected or defeated, he has not answered whether he would accept office under the Government. It has been usually the custom that we should, until two or three o'clock in the morning, do serious business, but that after that hour we should discuss matters in a more general way and perhaps take up other topics until three o'clock in the afternoon. I expected that that would have been the case to-day, but I find that a bad example has been set us, and set us by whom ? By the leader of the Government and the leader of the Opposition. For, Sir, we had a very interesting debate all afternoon and evening, but not a word about the Remedial Bill. After asking us to settle down each day and discuss this Bill, what did these gentlemen do themselves ? Did they talk about the Bill. You will bear me out, Mr. Chairman, when I say that not one word did they mention about it. They travelled into the history of Nova Scotia previous to the time the hon. leader of the Government entered public life and went over many matters of great interest to politicians, but not a word about the Bill. And when the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) read out a list of members whom he charged with having obstructed the business of the House, he showed that last Saturday there were 117 columns of speeches made. Twelve of which were made by the Minister of the Interior, three by three other supporters of the Government, and the balance by whom ? By all those who were condemned in the one category as being outcasts. Why ? Because they choose to discuss this measure, because they were taking an intelligent interest in it, for the benefit of those gentlemen whom I am delighted to see around me each evening—there is another galaxy each morning—and who do not discuss the thing, who do not criticize the clauses, but simply stamp with their feet and cry out carried. We ask that the House do rise out of consideration for those hon. members whom we see spread over three or four seats in this House. We do not ask or require any quarter for ourselves, because we come here to transact the business of the House, but we ask that the House do rise out of consideration for those hon. gentlemen who spread themselves on several seats and who get refreshments carried in to them. It is not fair that we should rush on the business, especially as this is a very crude and ill-considered Bill at the best, and each clause requires to be thoroughly considered and re-drafted in order to be made workable. We have changed a number of the clauses. We have either changed all the clauses submitted or given incontrovertable reasons why they should be changed. We must have a better reason for the retention of the clause than that it was in the old Act. When both sides of the House have agreed that well-considered and carefully drawn out amendments, we are told by the Minister of the Interior that they cannot be accepted, because the Bill must be passed as it was presented to the House. What is the use of asking the House to consider the Bill at all, if it is to be put through without any changes. However, we know that changes have been made and must be made, and yet in the early part of the night, when we came here to consider the Bill, the leader of the House and the leader of the Opposition have asked us to give our attention to another line of debate, which they have inaugurated for the evening's entertainment. I protest against our attention being diverted from this Bill. The leader of the House yesterday referred to obstruction, and said that "a very small body of men in the House" wished to prevent this Bill from becoming law. Is there anything improper in doing your best to prevent a Bill becoming law if you think it should not become law? I think you would be failing in your duty to yourself and to your constituents if you give your assent to a Bill you did not believe in; or if having voted against the second reading you turned around and assisted in making it become law. It is, I believe, a most improper form of procedure to lead your constituents to suppose you are against a Bill, when you are doing everything in favour of it. I am one of those who have opposed the Bill, and I intend to continue to oppose it in every constitutional and parliamentary way. Speaking for myself, I am not afraid to be called an obstructionist. I shall obstruct in every legal and constitutional way the Bill now before the House. I shall esteem it a pleasure as well as a duty to do that. I shall oppose it as long as my health and vocal organs hold out, as at present they promise to do for a long time to come.

Mr. ROBILLARD. You professed at one time to be anxious to improve the Bill, and at another time you oppose it altogether.

Mr. WALLACE. That is quite consistent with my duty as a member of Parliament. I can justify my course in that way by the example of some of the most brilliant parliamentarians in England. Mr. Chamberlain and other active opponents of the Home Rule Bill opposed to the principle of the Bill from start to finish, and yet every clause of it was subjected by them to the closest scrutiny and criticism and amendment.

Mr. LANDERKIN. What about the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes).

Mr. HUGHES. He is capable of speaking for himself.

Mr. WALLACE. He will have to speak for himself, too.

Mr. HUGHES. When the hon. member for North Victoria is not able to speak for himself, it is time for these gentlemen to talk.

Mr. WALLACE. You would think from the remarks of the Secretary of State that every one who dares oppose this Bill should be led to the stake. He told us the other day that this was not a question of whether separate schools should be established in Manitoba or not. If that is so, I would like to know what we have been discussing for the last three months? The ex-Minister of Justice (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) disagrees with the Secretary of State in that, and he stated plainly and boldly in this House that the question at issue was, whether we should have separate schools in Manitoba or not. That being the case, it is our duty to consider whether the Government should be allowed to do that, and especially so when they have no mandate from the people. The legislation is irrevocable, and that is another strong reason why we should take the opinion of the country upon it.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Is it not a fact that the member for North Victoria is acting as whip for the contingent of the party who stays here at night to pass this Bill through.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. WALLACE. I will have to ask the member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes) to speak for himself as regards that. Is there some statement made about personal preferment? Did that refer to me? I can tell the hon. member that I have not been offered any personal preferment of any kind for opposing the Bill. Now, I must again enter my protest against any censure being implied or expressed against any member of this House who chooses, in the exercise of his discretion or of his duty to his constituents, or to himself, to oppose this Bill. I protest against his being called an obstructionist, if that is meant as a term of opprobrium. If it is meant as a term of honour, my objection to it would disappear. I am sure the members of the Government will not ask us to stay here all night unless they stay themselves. Last night there were times when not more than one member of the Government was present. Of the 12 members of the Cabinet, I think we might reasonably ask 10 or 11 of them to stay here with us and give us their advice—I am delighted to have their advice—while we stay here. We will stay with pleasure anyhow. There is the Minister of Finance. If he will tell me that he will stay here——

Mr. FOSTER. If the hon. gentleman will go to West York, I will stay here.

Mr. WALLACE. That is not a fair proposition. My constituents would say to me, "you are neglecting your duties in Parliament." I have this evening just received a letter from my opponent, in which he says: "I challenge you to come to West York to discuss certain questions with me on the 15th of this month." But we have decided that this House shall sit on that day.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. You ought to go.

Mr. WALLACE. The leader of the Government says I ought to go.

An hon. MEMBER. It is the first day of the horse show.

Mr. WALLACE. Is it? Then, I think it is my duty to go. If the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Justice will stay here till three o'clock, we will stay and discuss the features of this Bill. Then, there are other matters that should be discussed by this Parliament. But by giving such close attention to theological subjects, we have forgotten the material interests of the country. Now, Sir, I would call the attention of the leader of the House to the fact that for two days we have not had our customary prayers in this House—not since Monday afternoon.

Mr. CASEY. Let us adjourn for prayers.

Mr. WALLACE. And I am afraid that we will not display that proper spirit in these discussions that we would if we had had, at three o'clock on Tuesday and Wednesday, the ordinary devotions to which we are accustomed. I can see the demoralizing effect which the omission has had on this House, and I would call the attention of the leader of the Government to the matter.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. The hon. gentleman forgets the lecture we had this morning on scripture.

Mr. WALLACE. I have not forgotten that, and I think I demonstrated—though the hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Fraser) did not admit it—that the protective policy was proved and demonstrated by the selections which were read by the hon. member for North Norfolk. That is the reason, I presume, that hon. gentlemen on the Opposition side of the House do not want any further reading of the same selections. Now, Mr. Chairman, I will give an opportunity to other members who wish to express their opinions on this important question.

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Chairman, I am told that another member of this House has passed from amongst us—that he has gone to his reward, and will be seen in his seat in this House no more. I refer to the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Masson), who, it is currently stated—and, I believe, the statement will be published in the press to-morrow morning—has forsaken politics and will henceforth take his seat on the bench. I understand that the hon. gentleman has thus received his reward. That is the statement, the correctness of which can be substantiated or denied by the Ministers now present. If the statement is correct, the Government have shown their wisdom in beginning to make the necessary appointments during the session, and before the elections have come off. I will pause to ask if that statement is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the House ready for the question ?

Mr. CASEY. As the statement is not denied, I take for granted that it is correct, because I have no doubt that if the Government were able to deny the statement, they would have done so. This is another indication that the Government intend to drop this measure, because in that case a vote or two in the House would not be of much consequence. Now, I wish to refer briefly to the discussion I began this afternoon, wherein, I think, I proved the bad faith of the Government towards the delegates of Manitoba. One of these, the Minister of Justice, was present at the time. The other, the hon. member for Montreal West (Sir Donald A. Smith) is now present, and so is the Secretary of State. I would like to have their statements, or that of the leader of the House on that point.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. Mara, I notice that you are occupying the place as Chairman of this committee, and I should like to know by what authority you have taken the Chair, which, as I understand, under the orders of the House, belongs to the Chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means. It seems to me that this committee is now not properly constituted. Under the authority of our orders, on the House going into committee, the Speaker called to the Chair the hon. gentleman who is the permanent chairman of committees. Now, I know of no authority by which you, Mr. Mara, are now occupying that position, and I think we had better pause until the committee is properly constituted, as it cannot go on without a chairman.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Chairman, I am not at all surprised at the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) raising this point of order. When people are in extremity they have to resort to very small points of order in order to disturb discussion. Since this Parliament has existed, for nearly 30 years, the invariable practice of this House ought to have convinced that hon. gentleman that he had no ground for raising such a question as this. I believe that from 1867 down to to-night, no gentleman has seriously contended that the gentleman who is occupying the position of Chairman of the House cannot call to his aid any hon. member of this House. You will find in Dr Bourinot's admirable work, which is recognized as a high authority, page 481 :

> In the session of 1885 the House of Commons adopted the English practice of electing a permanent chairman of committees of the whole, who acts also as deputy speaker. At the same time the House passed the following standing orders :
> "1. That this House do elect a chairman of committees of this House at the commencement of every Parliament, as soon as an Address has been agreed to in answer to His Excellency's Speech ; and that the member so elected do, if in his place in the House, take the Chair of all committees of the whole, including the committee of Supply and Ways and Means, in accordance with the rules and usages which regulate the duties of a similar officer, generally designated the chairman of the committee of ways and means, in the House of Commons of England.

In the English House the chairman of a committee is frequently addressed by name. If the chairman, through fatigue or for other reasons, finds it necessary to vacate the Chair, temporarily, he may call another member to fill his place; and mention of the fact will be made in the record of the proceedings of the committee. I trust that will satisfy the hon. gentleman that his point of order is raised without any substantial foundation. In a note on page 482 it is stated: "If the Chairman through fatigue or for other reasons finds it necessary to vacate the chair temporarily, he may call another member to fill his place, and mention of the fact will be made in the record of the proceedings of the committee, 132 E. Com., I. 395."

Mr. McCARTHY. The hon. leader of the Government thinks he has disposed of the point of order by reading a note from Dr. Bourinot's book, but, although the book is very valuable, I venture to think that if Dr. Bourinot intended to say that that is the practice which governs this House, he is in error.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. What I read is from May.

Mr. McCARTHY. It was a foot note from Dr. Bourinot.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I read May, page 431, giving the practice of the English House as stated by authority.

Mr. McCARTHY. The hon. gentleman is talking of what he does not understand and cannot even interpret the initials. It is perfectly plain that Mr. Bergeron had no right, under any standing order of ours, to appoint any person to occupy his place. Our standing orders says that the permanent chairman is the chairman of the committee and is called to that position by the Speaker. Will any one pretend that the member so called has the right to place Mr. Mara, or any one else, in the Chair as chairman of the committee? If that be the case, then all that Mr. Bergeron has to do is to sit in the Chair and then beckon for Mr. Mara, or anyone else, to take his place. That is done frequently, but it should not be done; and when we are told that we are to sit here until Saturday night, I maintain that our Chairman is bound to sit along with us.

Mr. WOOD. The Speaker can call somebody else to take his place.

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes, but he does so by virtue of statute. But there is no statute or order authorizing the Chairman to put anyone in his place. The Speaker had no authority, until the order or the statute was passed, to leave the Chair for a moment. A general order was passed which authorized the House to appoint some person to assist the Speaker from time to time, but it was found of such doubtful legality that it became necessary afterwards to pass an Act of Parliament in order to give effect to the proceedings and orders of the gentleman who is authorized to take the place of the Speaker. Under these circumstances, it is absurd that the gentleman who is appointed chairman of this committee should, upon his own motion, have the right to put another member in his place. I submit, therefore, that this committee is not properly constituted. This point was raised in England in 1883, and notice was then given of a standing order, but it was not until 1888 that the standing order was finally made. The order which was passed here, and which was read by the Secretary of State, provides that the permanent chairman shall be the chairman of committees, but that does not give him the power to appoint any other member to replace him in the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Mara). My opinion is that the House, when in committee, is governed by its own rules and orders. The rule, as laid down in Dr. Bourinot's work, is this:

> That this House do elect a Chairman of Committees at the commencement of every Parliament, as soon as an address has been agreed to in answer to His Excellency's Speech; and that the members so elected do, if in his place in the House, take the Chair of all committees of the whole, including the Committee of Supply and Ways and Means, in accordance with the rules and usages which regulate the duties of a similar officer, generally designated the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means of the House of Commons of England.

When we refer to the practice in the English House of Commons, we find that the chairman of committees there is frequently addressed by name. If from fatigue or other reasons, he finds it necessary to vacate the Chair temporarily, he may call another member to fill his place, and mention is made of the fact in the reports of the proceedings of the committee. Further, I find that in 1878, Mr. Palgrave, Clerk of the English House of Commons, in a letter to Dr. Bourinot, states, in these words, the English practice:

> When during the Speaker's absence, the Chairman of Ways and Means leaves the Chair of the committee to take the Chair—a committee sitting being over—he asks a member at hand, usually off the Government bench, to make the report from the committee, as any member of a committee can make a committee report to the House, and so the absurdity of the Chairman's report from himself to himself is avoided.

It is clear that the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means or the Committee of the Whole House has the right to call upon any other member to take his place, and that the proceedings are not voided by his so doing.

Mr. McCARTHY. I am sorry I cannot accede to your ruling, Mr. Chairman, and propose to appeal to the House. In 1885, it was settled that there was a right of appeal from the committee to the House.

(An appeal having been taken from the ruling of the Acting Chairman of the Committee, Mr. Speaker took the Chair.)

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Mara). Mr. Speaker, I was called, by Mr. Bergeron, Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, to take his place during his absence. The point of order has been raised by the hon. member for North Simcoe that I had no right to take the Chair. I decided that I had the right to do so, having been called by Mr. Bergeron, and the hon. member for North Simcoe has appealed to the House from my ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question raised is the following :—Mr. Mara, who occupied the Chair, as Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House, having been requested by Mr. Bergeron, Deputy Speaker and permanent Chairman of Committees, to take his place temporarily, his right to occupy the Chair is challenged by the hon. member for North Simcoe, on the ground that Mr. Bergeron had not the right to call any one to the Chair to take his place, even temporarily, during his absence. Mr. Mara, who occupied the place of Mr. Bergeron, has ruled that the Chairman of Committees had the right to vacate the Chair temporarily, and to call another member to occupy his place during his temporary absence. Mr. Mara's decision has been appealed from to the House, and the question now before the House is, shall the decision of the Chairman be sustained.

Mr. McCARTHY. It seems to me open to question——

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member cannot address the House at present.

Mr. McCARTHY. I am rising to a point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The appeal must be decided without debate. No new point of order can be raised. The point of order had been already decided by the Chairman of committees, and an appeal from the committee of the whole House, to the House, as to the decision of the Chairman of committees must be put in the same mode as an appeal from the decision of the Speaker should be put to the House ; that is, without debate or amendment.

Mr. McCARTHY. I rise to the point of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order ; Chair ; sit down.

Mr. McCARTHY. I am rising——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order ; Chair.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question has to be put to the House, and of course, there cannot be any further debate.

Mr. McCARTHY. But it is not on that I wish to speak.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order ; sit down.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question of order is an appeal from the decision of the Chairman, and that appeal must be decided by the House without debate.

Mr. McCARTHY. That is what I want to draw your attention to. Look at page 483.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. The question is : Shall the decision of the Chairman of committees be sustained.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Mr. Speaker——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order ; sit down.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I desire, Sir——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order ; name ; put him out.

Mr. SPEAKER. The rule is as follows :—

> The questions of order arising in Committee of the Whole House shall be decided by the Chairman subject to the approval of the House.
> The appeal must be made without debate.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am not going to debate. I want to put the Speaker a question.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Sit down ; order.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I desire to ask Mr. Speaker's attention as to what is the parliamentary practice in England on that point ?

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member is mistaken altogether with regard to the practice. I have no right to express any opinion respecting the ruling of the Chairman in committee. If the Chairman of committees is unable to decide the question of order, then the opinion of the Speaker can be asked upon the question that has been raised ; but the Chairman of committees has informed me that he has decided the point of order, and now the appeal lies to the House and to the House only.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Can it not be discussed ?

Mr. SPEAKER. No, it cannot be discussed. The question is : Shall the ruling of the Chairman of committee be sustained.
